This is the second time in my presence that the leader of the Opposition has seen fit after he was corrected to say that if General Lessard had been sent in he would have done wonders. He knows that the Prime Minister and I—and General Lessard will not deny it—gave General Lessard every opportunity, although General Fiset and I knew that he was not the man for the job. I went farther. I did myself the honour of attending the memorial service in Notre Dame church in Montreal when Archbishop Bruchesi delivered a magnificent oration. I had the honour of meeting Archbishop Bruchesi in the vestry and he told me that he was heart and soul with the Allies in this great cause but I am not at liberty to give the reasons why he was powerless to help in the cause. What he said, however, was satisfactory to me. I got Sir William Price to go with me to Cardinal Begin in Quebec, in his own palace, and I laid the matter before him. I wanted him to appoint chaplains in every county and we offered to put them in uniform, to give them every dignity and do everything that we could in that direction hoping that they would help us to raise men, but for some reason the plan did not succeed. I challenge any one from the province of Quebec to show where any young men from that province worthy of a commission failed to get it. I have gone to the fathers of the splendid boys in that province and said that if they wanted their sons to get training we would give them that training. There are young gentlemen sitting in this House, on the Opposition side, who have taken part in this war and there is not a man of them who can say that justice has not been done him. It cannot be asserted that the French Canadian people have not been fairly treated. Notwithstanding all the random nonsense that has been talked about it, I maintain that every preference has been shown towards them, that kindly treatment has been accorded them, but there is the "hidden hand" and for some unaccountable reason, unless boys were wildly enthusiastic they did not long materialize in the ranks. I offered to train the hon. gentleman (Mr Boivin) who occupies the Chair in front of me to-night, and I offered to train other gentlemen on that side of the House if they would go out and raise battalions. I left no stone unturned to get these splendid boys into harness. Therefore, I say that the cry of Ontario prejudice and "Orangeiste" will not do. No men ever had a fairer opportunity given them than the boys of Quebec but the "hidden hand" was behind and stopped it all.

Now, in conclusion, let us drop all this tittle-tattle. They have had a row in the province of Quebec. I am not going to criticise anybody: the city police, the provincial police, the city authorities, or the Dominion authorities, but I do say that one ounce of sense would have settled the whole thing without any trouble. I believe that if the boys had been handled in the right way there would have been no trouble whatever. It is the easiest thing in the world to handle a mob. The leaders of a mob are generally hot-headed, enthusiastic fellows, but if one goes the right way about it it is easy to handle them.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Commonsense and tolerance.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is right, sir; if you and I had been handling it we would have had it fixed up long ago. We had no trouble in the great camp at Valcartier, where we had 37,000 men. The boys would go to Quebec by the hundreds and they would cut the Quebec boys out of their girls, but they took it good-humouredly. They knew the fellows would not be there long and they would have their chance later on. Everything went smoothly and we watched the situation to see that everybody was treated fairly. I am satisfied that if common sense had been exercised this trouble would not have occurred. I do not look upon it as a matter of very great importance, but it is of great importance to know what the unseen power is that has prevented these splendid boys—and there are no finer in the world—from following the dictates of their own impulses and joining the forces. What has prevented them—?

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Let me tell you—bigotry.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am very sorry to hear that. I do not think these boys are actuated by bigotry; I know they are not, and I hope that the power behind them is not bigotry. Let us obey the law, let us put aside all these petty bickerings, let us cease these squabblings in Quebec and other parts of Canada and let us keep our eyes on the trenches at the front, where the boys are undergoing such terrific trials to-day. Let the leader of the Opposition join hands with the leader of the Government and work together in this great cause. If you could get a platform in the province of Quebec or Ontario large enough to hold this Government and a similar number of the Opposition it would be an appealing sight to see all these gentlemen and the leaders of the Opposition side of the House standing together on that platform and appealing to the boys to join the colours and go to the front. Let us pursue that line all over Canada instead of standing by with our eyes on the next election and on the treasury benches. I am no longer on the treasury benches and I am the happiest man in the world. I sit here and watch these worthy ministers on the treasury benches. I could see my good friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) blushing all sorts of colours to-day as his friends were digging into him. Be not carried away by any thought of the treasury benches. There will be treasury benches long after we are dead and forgotten. In the meantime, I appeal to the young men of Quebec to go to the assistance of their compatriots, the splendid, gallant French soldiers who have made the most heroic fight that men ever made in the history of the world, as well as to back up our own boys from Canada. Let us join hands together and make the military service law a success. Let us be done with all these bickerings and let us make a united appeal, whether to Orangemen, to English Canadians, or to French Canadians, to go to the front and help win the victory. I am not afraid to stand up in my own county and tell any young men who should be at the front that they have not done their duty. Let us take that line, and if we do good results will come.

Let me again remind the leader of the Opposition that in my early days I thought he was one of the greatest men in Canada. At that time I was carried away with the spirit of the man, engaged as he then was, in a struggle against the tyranny of the ultramontaine section of the church in the province of Quebec. I said: "There is a hero who is worthy of the emulation of everybody."

Sir WILFRED LAURIER: Platonic sentiment it was.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not a bit. When the ultramontaine wing of the Roman Church got control of the Quebec end of the Conservative party on a certain occasion, and when the Manitoba School question came up, and certain gentlemen resigned because they were not getting all they thought they were entitled to, did I not organize thirty-five good members of Parliament and suggest to the right hon. gentleman, who was then leader of the Opposition, that it was his opportunity to make a stand for the rights of a free people and join with us in keeping these people where they belonged? I still have an admiration for him, but, like myself, he is getting old. But not too old, there is vigour enough in us yet. If the right hon. gentleman, and the right hon. leader of the Government bring forward any proposal with the object of uniting and effecting harmony between the two races I will support them. Let us come together and fill up the ranks, that is all I am desirous of seeing. I do not care twopence for political preferment, but I do want to see the boys at the front strengthened, our ranks filled, the German tyrant smashed, and human liberty triumph.

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec W.): I am very pleased indeed to congratulate the last speaker (Sir Sam Hughes) upon the manner in which he has treated this side of the House in the few remarks he has just made. To tell the truth, Mr. Speaker, I was anticipating a speech of a very different character from him, and I must say that if we had had more speeches of the kind we probably would not have to deplore this evening the sad events that have taken place in Quebec. The position which I occupy, Mr. Speaker, is a peculiar one, bearing in mind the fact that I am the representative of a constituency in which some of the sad events which we so greatly deplore have occurred. I would not, Sir, be a real citizen of the old historic city of Quebec if I did not at once deplore the melancholy events in question. But if such sad events have taken place there must have been some very serious cause for their occurrence, and I believe that in the interest of the community it is as well that the whole truth be disclosed on this occasion.

At the outset let me say that I should be wanting in my duty did I not extend to the bereaved relatives of the victims an expression of the deepest sorrow, not only on behalf of my constituents, but also of the well-thinking population of Canada. Four innocent victims were struck down, and in trying to restore peace among a momentarily disturbed element of the population of Quebec a number of gallant soldiers were wounded. I shall venture to offer no justification or excuse for the acts which brought about such results. But I deeply deplore them, at the same time hoping that in the days to come we shall not see a repetition of such events in Toronto, or Montreal, or Halifax, or Vancouver, in Quebec, or in London, Ontario. I have said that the whole truth should be disclosed on this subject, and that I now propose to do. It is my well-considered opinion that the trouble that has occurred in Quebec was the result of direct provocation, resulting from the way the Military Service Act was applied in Quebec, and perhaps also a few local conditions. I am stating nothing new to the House when I say that we on this side, especially the French Canadian members, have been fighting the military law to the bitter end. I, for one, have done so, thinking that in doing so I was serving the best interests of the Empire. When the law was passed Quebec thought, rightly or wrongly—and I will not labour the point—that it was aimed only at Quebec. Because, Sir, that conclusion was not hard to draw. Either a conscription law was necessary or it was not; and when we saw the press of other parts of Canada stating that in their own provinces every one was going freely to join the colours, and that Quebec only was not responding, the conclusion was forced upon us, that this law was intended to hit at our province only. A conscription law is passed, Sir, when there is no other way to get at slackers or at cowards; and when I recall the declarations of the press of the country—that press bought for the purpose of carrying the idea into the rest of Canada —that Quebec was not doing its duty, I think I can establish that we were right in concluding that this law was imposed upon the people simply with a view of hitting at Quebec. I might even go as far as to say that if hon. members on the opposite side of the House will search their memories and look into their consciences they will recall that in the course of their speeches during the last election they constantly attacked the province of Quebec, declaring that it was the only province which was not answering the call to the colours. There were also many articles antagonistic to Quebec and the clergy published in the press. I will not read them all, but merely a few extracts, to show that the publication and spreading of such articles all over the country was not a good way to secure recruits in Quebec, nor of obtaining the good will of our population. As long ago as 1914, the Sentinel, under the signature of Puttenham, advised nothing more or less than civil war. It said:

The bilingual agitation should be destroyed. It is time our Government ceased to bandy words with these traitors.

That is Quebec.

Our Government should drive out of British territory the some forty thousand wicked monks and nuns who bring up the French Canadian youth in the idea of rebellion against the British Empire. There should be no truce with Rome. We must crush her or she will crush us. We must prepare at once for the imminent struggle with these French traitors and the sooner we begin the battle, the better it will be for our Dominion. Great Britain should rule Canada as she rules the waves.

And later on, what does he write?

The French Canadians have no heart for war. They are a peaceable people. We are not surprised that they have no military vocation. That is a mark of men of initiative. But the clergy have destroyed their initiative. . . The French Canadian never thinks for himself. In all important matters he goes and asks his superiors what he is to do. He is reduced to the state of a human machine.

I can quote many more selections like that, but I think these will suffice for the moment.

I heard the hon. member who preceded me say that so far as Quebec is concerned, every possible effort had been made to get recruits on the voluntary basis. In my humble opinion, and from the knowledge I have of what was going on in the province of Quebec during the period of voluntary recruiting, I do not think that everything possible was done. I follow the views expressed by my hon. leader in that regard. I think that if the Government had seriously tried to get recruits on the voluntary basis in Quebec they would have met with much more success than they are obtaining with the Military Service Act. We know, Sir, as positive facts, that certain officers offered to go to the front with their battalions as an entity, and every time their offers were turned down. Could I mention names? If I could I would mention Colonel Paquette, who through his own recruiting energy, raised a battalion of fifteen hundred men. Drafts were taken from this battalion and dispersed among other regiments commanded by officers who could not speak the language of the men who had joined the colours.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I interpose? The hon. member, I presume, does not intend to be unfair to state what is not true to the House. His statements are not borne out by the facts in any particular. Col. Paquette, and other French Canadians, were given command of their battalions. It was subsequently reported that Col. Paquette was totally unfitted to command a battalion at the front, on account of his health among other reasons, and on the recommendation of French Canadian commanding officers the men were drafted and sent overseas with other battalions.

Mr. PARENT: There is an explanation that I am, of course, bound to accept. The hon. gentleman was once Minister of Militia, and makes a statement which I must accept but at the same time—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I say further—

Mr. PARENT: At the same time, I may recall that the same statement, or something to the same effect, has been made by one of the present ministers of the Crown.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I go further? Col. Paquette was picked out by me long before the war to act as cadet officer. I had a very high opinion of him, and I raised several lively rows because Col. Paquette was not sent to the front. I made inquiries, and found, when I demanded explanations, that Col. Paquette was not fitted, physically and otherwise, to be sent to the front. I will not go into details. That was the report of the French Canadian officers. Col. Paquette was a great personal friend of my own, and I was very anxious to see him go.

Mr. PARENT: There are other cases, Mr. Speaker. There were offers made also, we are told, by Col. Gelly of Levis, to take his own battalion, and such offers have not been accepted by the Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never heard of him, that must be after my time.

Mr. PARENT: I might also mention Col. Rioux, of Sherbrooke.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He was given every chance.

Mr. PARENT: These things are well known in the province of Quebec. The people know that the services of these men were offered to the Crown, and that these people wanted not to get the chance for the sake of showing off their medals across the seas, but with the purpose of going to fight. And we are told that over and over again all their offers were turned down by the Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I correct my hon. friend about Col. Rioux, another great personal friend of my own. He was given every opportunity, and a number of his men, some forty or fifty, perhaps more, joined the first contingent. I gave him every opportunity to raise a battalion later on. I forget the details. Gen. Fiset will know them.

Mr. PARENT: The hon. gentleman has spoken. I pass that officer. I will take the case of one to whom he paid a few compliments a moment ago, Major Asselin. Major Asselin got away through what circumstances and by what efforts? It was only through the press of the country, and through articles that he wrote and wrote over again in newspapers of Montreal, that he was able to go across. What did they do with him? Did they send him at once to England or France to fight? No, Sir, that very man who had offered his services in such a gallant way, was sent to Bermuda, and when he was in Bermuda with his French Canadian compatriots, there again he appealed to the Minister of Militia imploring to be sent across, but it took months and months before his voice could be heard.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Again let me correct my hon. friend. Col. Asselin and his battalion went to Bermuda of their own choice. A deputation of his officers came from Montreal and asked that they be rushed off to Bermuda to get themselves in shape rather than stay in Montreal. They wanted to get to Bermuda where they would be free from hidden influences and otherwise, and to oblige them, and at their own request, they were sent to Bermuda.

Mr. PARENT: I remember distinctly the articles at that time, Mr. Speaker. I have not got them right here under my hand. But the statements that have just been made have also been repeated by a minister of the Crown. These statements have been made publicly by Col. Blondin, who is actually a member of the Cabinet, and they are to the effect that voluntary recruiting in Quebec had not been given a fair chance. As between the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) and Col. Blondin, I do not know whose word I should take; but evidently the Government think that Col. Blondin's word is better because he is supposed to be a better man. Col. Blondin is still in the Cabinet and the hon. member for Victoria is out of it.

So much for that point, Sir; but I intended to speak particularly of the riot that occurred in the city of Quebec and the direct causes which brought it about. To my mind, in the methods employed in the application of the law we can find, first and foremost, the real cause of the rather small outbreak of feeling that took place a few days ago. As I have said, our people were opposed to the Military Service law, but being lovers of law, and desirous of abiding by it, they were content to accept that law as it was, and they were doing so. It has been said that they applied in masses for exemption. If, however, the masses had the right to apply for exemption, then there was no reason why they should not do so. But if, in the Quebec district, so many appeals were awaiting the decision of the tribunals, it was due undoubtedly to the lack of organization in the registrar's office in Quebec. Instead of taking on its own merits each of the original cases that had been judged by the local tribunals, appeals were considered in masses, and our civil courts were crowded with thousands of appeals at the same time. The courthouses were crowded with people, cripples among them, waiting for the hearing of their appeals. The French Canadian is a little disposed to laugh at anything that appears ridiculous, and it is natural that these occurrences should cause the law to appear ridiculous to him. Here they saw hundreds of men who obviously were not fit for military service crowding the civil courts of the district of Quebec. For three months not a civil case was tried by our courts; everything was for the Military Service Act. Seven judges sat at one time, all trying these cases. I say to the credit of our judges that they applied the law fairly, as they did all other laws under which they had to give decisions. But suddenly another judge from Three Rivers, Judge Desy, came to Quebec and started to decide a few cases. A few cases, did I say? About three or four hundred men passed through his hands within three or four days, and out of these at least eighty or ninety per cent were conscripted. I do not say that he was right, nor do I say that he was wrong. Young men who appeared before Judge Desy were conscripted, while others whose cases were of a similar nature and who came before Judge Flynn, ex-Prime Minister of Quebec, Judge Dorion, Judge Letellier and Judges Tessier, Cannon and McCorkill, were exempted. These young men who, under the decision of Judge Desy were required to join the colours would say to those who were exempted by the other judges: "Our circumstances are the same; why are we bound to join the colours while you are not? That was one of the reasons for dissatisfaction in Quebec district. There are other reasons, one of the chief of which was given this afternoon by the leader of the Opposition. It seems to me that the Government has an unlucky hand when it comes to make a choice of persons to apply this law. Not long ago they chose a man by the name of Tit-Noir Desjardins in Montreal for this purpose—such a man as you might call Gyp the Blood or Fritz the Boxer. In Quebec they wanted to change the colour entirely, and instead of having Tit-Noir Desjardins they have had a man named Tit-Blanc Bacon. You see, therefore, that it is Little Black in Montreal, but Little White in Quebec; but it is the kind of men that the polished, refined population of the old city of Quebec will not have anything to do with. When the Government charges officials with the duty of searching our pockets, they should make a choice of more respectable persons.

On Friday I was in front of the auditorium shortly after it was raided and by reliable persons I am told that during twenty or twenty-five minutes a small crowd of people—young children of fourteen or fifteen years of age—threw, not stones, but small pieces of ice at the windows. At that time the police were not there. Then from twenty to twenty-five men rushed in the theatre, climbed up the narrow stairs and within a few minutes the fire started. Those very same men came down and nobody knew one of them. We used to know the pepole in Quebec, but not one of the people in the big crowd outside the building knew who these men were. That appeared very strange, I must admit, but when I heard the same thing with reference to the Belanger affair the night previous, it seemed to me that it was more than a mere coincidence. It looked as if there was some hand at work which we could not trace. I have talked, not to Belanger himself but to his brother, who had seen the wounded Federal policeman the same afternoon. Bélanger knows every man in the city of Quebec who can fight, because he has been with them all. Bélanger says that he was attacked and beaten by about fifteen persons, and he did not know a single one of them. If that is true it is astonishing, but it would also prove, to the credit of the city of Quebec, that it is not our citizens who took part in the riots. Some one may say " Well, if it were such a small affair it should have been stopped right there by the people." The remark is fair, but the French Canadian has a good deal of imagination, is naturally attracted by any demonstration, but generally minds his business. Any one who knows our population well can easily understand the people gathering in the streets even after the police had told them to go home. They did undoubtedly gather in the streets, but that is all that they did. The next day was Saturday, of Holy Week. The citizens of Quebec and of our province are a religious people, and attend church faithfully on holy days. The services last to a late hour, and it is not surprising if the military found large crowds on the streets. To the credit of the soldiers I must say that they behaved gallantly. It is not pleasant to receive a piece of ice in the face, and some of the officers did receive a few, but they bore it patiently. A few of them, I must admit, took pleasure in doing a little more than was necessary. For instance, there was no reason to make a cavalry charge through the peaceful crowd, and no reason to stop the people on the streets as they did. Let me give one example, because there is nothing better than an example. I know a man who came out of church at five minutes past ten in the evening. When he passed the Auditorium theatre, a good crowd had assembled, and there were a good many soldiers there too, so this gentleman thought it just as well to go home. He had to take a narrow street leading from St. Jean street, up to Grand Allée. There was not another soul on the street, when suddenly an officer leading two hundred soldiers came down the middle of the street at a fast clip. The officer suddenly rushed to the man who was walking quietly home on the sidewalk, and said: "Turn back; you cannot pass here; if you were a respectable gentleman you would not be on the street at this hour." So the man had nothing else to do but join the crowd; it was surely not what the officer was asking for. If he had wanted the crowd to disperse he should have at least let the people go home. If you want to know who that man was, it is the person who is addressing you now.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to cite a couple of cases where an injustice has been done. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that the people of the city of Quebec had been indifferent to what was taking place; they did not help, he said; if that is so, it is partly due to an accumulation of such small cases of injustice as I shall cite. A man by the name of Lacroix did not appeal from the decision of the local exemption tribunal, as apparently he had no good grounds, his father being alive. When the time which he was given to settle his affairs had expired he had to enlist, although his father had died in the meantime. Lacroix, who was earning from $2.50 to $3 a day, on the death of his father, became the support of his mother and four other persons. He tried to submit his case to the leave of absence board, but before the time fixed for hearing the case came the man had been sent to an unknown destination, and his family now have to depend on public charity.

Let me cite another case. Pierre Cantin is the son of a farmer, of St. Jean Chrysostome. In November last he obtained a certificate of exemption from the local tribunal. On Thursday, March 27, 1918, he came to the city of Quebec, where he was arrested by the Dominion officers and brought to the drill hall. He protested all the time that he possessed a certificate of exemption and showed it to the officers, but they took it away from him, pretending that it had expired and was of no value. Since that time he has been detained in what is called the blockhouse, but I am informed that habeas corpus proceedings are going to be taken.

Before taking my seat, I would like to make an appeal for harmony among the citizens of this country, the French Canadians as well as the English-speaking people. All the reasons which I have stated to-night are not sufficient, I admit, to justify the acts of ruffianism which have occurred in the city of Quebec and the depredations such as the burning of property and the stealing of goods in the stores of the city. I have not attempted to justify such damnable acts. I make this appeal in the hope that remedy for the situation might be found. If we are to have peace and harmony in this country, appeals to prejudice and repeated insults must cease. And to my fellow-citizens of another nationality I would say that if you knew the French Canadian as well as I do, and as well as the English-speaking element of Montreal and Quebec knows them, and if you came in contact more often with that population, surely you would not have the opinion that seems to exist in Ontario especially towards the citizens of Quebec. I would call the attention of hon. members to an article published yesterday, signed by J. H. Roberts who has spent about six or seven years in Quebec and makes an appeal to the Premier, which reads:

> Trust, then, that the good people of Toronto and Ontario generally will remember Quebec in this emergency; that you will be grateful for what we have done to help save Canada from the beer and wine curse being inflicted upon it, and that you will do everything that you can to bring about real unity between the French people of Quebec, my people. I say it as an English Protestant, Protestant from the top of my head to the sole of my feet, my dear French people of the province of Quebec, with whom I have labored these eight years, whom I have learned to love and admire, whose tolerance, forbearance and patience is beyond all description. I say let us work that we may have between those dear people and the rest of Canada a national unity that shall be worth while, that shall make us all say "Canada first," and get us working together for the common good against every enemy outside Canada and inside Canada for the good of all. (Applause.)

Such is the way those who know our population speak of it.

> And to my compatriots I would say: This unpopular law we have opposed but it has become the law of the land and it must be obeyed; in a constitutional government such as we have the majority rules and the majority has decided in favour of this law, it must be obeyed; trust that the time will soon come when the insults and the bad treatment you have received will return to those responsible for them; remember your past, twice through your loyalty and courage, this Canada was by you saved for England; loyalty and chivalry run in your blood; live up to your traditions.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton): The question before the House this evening is the justification or non-justification of the riots in Quebec, and after having listened to a number of speeches I say the defence which has been put up on behalf of the rioters is to me the evidence of their condemnation, unless you take into account the ideal which governs the province of Quebec. To say that a man named Desjardins, or a man called Petit Blanc were scoundrels, or to say that the people of Quebec were sensitive when the law is enforced, is merely to say that the temper and disposition of the people is receptive to rioting, unless indeed you take into account the ideal which governs that province. Every nation is governed by an ideal, and national character is expressed by what is called patriotism, which is nothing more nor less than a passion, or an emotion, which is in the heart of every man. The emotion and the passion in the heart of every individual in the province of Quebec, collectively speaking, is that of a colony participating in the benefits of British connection, without doing anything towards the defence of the Empire, and, if need be, the independence of Canada in the end. That is the ideal which has been spread in the province of Quebec of recent years by certain leaders. The people are not apt to be in a receptive mood for patriotic effort in that province, and that accounts for the rioting which took place recently. I am in sympathy with the French Canadian people as a people, but their leaders are not entitled to much sympathy from me. I differ in toto from the views of the leaders of the people of Quebec, but the people themselves I do not blame, because they are governed by an emotion or a passion falsely impressed on them. I will prove my case out of the mouth of the leader of the Opposition, and others who have spoken this afternoon. There is no question that both political parties, prior to the last Federal election, expressed the opinion that there was a duty on Canadians to participate in this war. Sir, a duty is engendered from a principle, which, like eternal truth, never changes, and, therefore, duty cannot change or deviate any more than can the principle itself. If it was a duty before the war, then, unless circumstances changed, it was a duty at the beginning of the war for Canada to serve the Empire. But the circumstances had not changed, or, if they did, they changed in the respect that our duty became the more imperative. Sir, to show that a nation acts by emotion and passion, and that a nation is a collective body, with neither judgment nor intellectuality, but that absorption into the collective whole is made by emotion, I have only to recite you a few instances that took place at the beginning of the war. When war was declared men were staggered at the enormity of the impending disaster, and those who came from the old land and had relatives there were the first to think of enlisting and going to the succour of those they had left behind. There was passion and emotion in the hearts of those individuals. Then, shortly after that, you had the reports which came from time to time from the front of Senlis, of Dinant, of the outrage at Scarborough, of the execution of Edith Cavell, of the crucifixion of Canadian soldiers, of poisoning wells, and many other atrocities perpetuated by the Hun. Then Canadians flocked to the recruiting offices and enlisted. Some from the province of Quebec were moved in the same way, because it was the emotion within them that inspired them and not their individual judgment. That was the system of voluntary recruiting, not that there was an exercise of judgment, but because the passion within each impelled him to resent the atrocity that was perpetuated against Canada and the Empire.

But the time came, when that passion and emotion virtually died out. I cannot give you the reasons why, but I may hazard a guess at a few of them, and perhaps it was through the fact that we learned a very short time after the declaration of war that the British navy was impregnable, and that we were secure behind it, and it was also perhaps due to the fact that we had repeated reports of the atrocities of the Hun, served to us every morning and two or three times a day as a menu and we became callous by the repetition of atrocities which created the passion and emotion in the heart of every individual in Canada. Gradually we passed from the voluntary system into another system. I say if it was a duty at first to fight, it is still a duty to-day, and I will refer now to the statement which has been made in this House to-day that the farmer is just as much a soldier as the man who fights in the trenches. I say, yes he is, and he is required. But the war is a sacrifice of blood and not the service of digging spuds, and I will say, Sir, that when war is declared you are called upon, not only to produce food, but also to give the best of the blood of your country in defense of the principles for which you fight. If it were right to fight in the beginning it is right to fight now, and if the voluntary system has failed, then I say to you there are only two ways in which you may fight in this war, as to this, and I defy contradiction from any man in the House. Either you fight voluntarily or you fight by the interpositon of military organization. I agree with the leader of the Opposition that is is not democratic to impose military organization, but it is necessary, as the only alternative of continuing the fight, I say it follows that, if a military organization is necessary to continue this fight, every democratic principle in government must be suspended if it stands in the way of success. Each man's life belongs to the State and each man must take his place in the organic whole.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is that not democratic?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Do not interrupt.

Mr. MACKIE: I court interruptions.

Mr. SPEAKER: If hon. gentlemen wish to interrupt, they must rise in their places.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKIE: Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is that doctrine not democratic?

Mr. MACKIE: That democracy which we had before the war, that democracy we had during the voluntary system, we would have right now, if you people of the other provinces had done your duty as well as the people of the province of Alberta. But Sir, I say that the only alternative—

Mr. JOSEPH READ: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKIE: Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The hon. gentleman dodges the question I ask him. Is the principle of universal compulsory military service not a democratic principle?

Mr. MACKIE: It cannot be a democratic principle, and, Mr. Speaker, because the moment that you impose a military organization upon a country, you must necessarily do away with democratic principles. Every man is ordered to take his place in the defence of his country and there is no alternative for him.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: That is democracy.

Mr. MACKIE: Well, you can have it your own way; I say it is not. If the hon. member will repair to my room some time to-morrow or on Monday, I will give him a number of volumes on the subject and he can study it for himself. When a country is at war there is only one object in view and that is victory. Citizens whose individuality is so strong that they will not submit themselves to restraint must either be compelled to accept that restraint or they should lose their citizenship. If the German people have to give up their individuality for the sake of the collective whole, then their opponents must necessarily do the same or else go down to defeat.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Sure; that is democracy.

Mr. MACKIE: Well, Mr. Speaker, Shakespeare asks: What's in a name? My hon. friend is entitled to all the distinctions in names that he likes. When the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, in 1899, for instance, spoke on this question of war, he enunciated those great principles which ought to have been enunciated in this war. Other gentlemen have read his speeches; so have I. I have had the greatest possible admiration for the right hon. gentleman and I have still to-day except for the fact that in 1917 he miscalculated results. But when he said: Let the people rule he understood the philsophy of crowds, he knew perfectly well that he did not mean to say what was printed in these pamphlets. He knew that people are moved en masse by ambition and passion and it was an election appeal that he was making to them for the purpose of returning him to power. I do not believe that the right hon. gentleman has changed the views which he enunciated in 1877, when he spoke on Liberalism in the province of Quebec; or in 1899, or in 1910 when he spoke at the Monument Nationale, Montreal, on the question of Imperialism, or in 1914 when he spoke in this House, in Toronto and elsewhere; or in 1916 when he again spoke in this House. Understanding the philosophy of nations, and the growth of emotion and passion, he threw those principles over in 1917 for the purpose of being returned to power. But he had forgotten that there are other men to-day who are taking a leading part in the province of Quebec, and taking over the fight for the achievement of another ideal than that he himself had set. He forgot also that these men have a greater grip on that province than he himself has to-day, and that they are being influenced by different ideals; and those who say that they will not stand for conscription are really standing for independence. I put this question to those men: To what nationality do you belong; to what nationality do you want to belong? They cannot split their nationality. A man is a British subject in Canada or he stands for independence or annexation. If the battle goes badly, as it might perhaps, the only alternative would be annexation; and the men who say in this House to-day, or at any time, that the system of voluntary recruiting was the only system, and that there was no other alternative, must necessarily draw the deduction from that position, that they stood and stand for the independence of Canada. Because if you are a British subject, you have a British nationality to protect and as the right hon. leader of the Opposition said: "In the matter of the South African war, and when he was attacked here in this House by men who have been attacking him recently, and within the last few years, because they desire to suppress him and to take his position. Sometime the best method of defence one will have is to attack." And that is the case. If in 1899, it was justifiable to speak that way, why do we not find the right hon. leader of the Opposition going through the province of Quebec at the present time and telling the people that the ideal which is governing them is not the ideal which should govern them, and that the best way to protect the Dominion of Canada to-day is not to wait until our shores are invaded, the best way to defend ourselves at the present time is to attack?

There is no question but that Germany's aim in conducting this war is world conquest, and anybody who tries to deny that has not followed the papers. But, Sir, I am getting away from my subject, which is the ideal of the province of Quebec. I want the right hon. leader of the Opposition to go through the province of Quebec and to read to the people statements that he made in 1899 at the time of the South African war. I will not take up the time of the House in doing so, but will just quote a few lines here and here. Let me quote the following utterance of his:

> It is inspiring to reflect that the cause for which you men of Canada are going to fight is the cause of justice, the cause of humanity, of civil rights and religious liberty.

What are we fighting for to-day? Again the right hon. gentleman said:

> Should any one of you unfortunately lose life or limb your country will feel that you have fully discharged the duty under which you place her this day by this sacrifice to Canada's glory, the glory of the empire, and, above all, to the cause of justice, humanity and liberty.

I thought those were beautiful sentiments, but to-day the expression is, "Let the people rule, and down with conscription." The right hon. gentleman is a man who understood the philosophy of nations. He played a political trick, which now he must repent. But he did not mean it. To show you that the right hon. gentleman did understand the philosophy of nations, let me read the language which he used in a speech at Quebec in 1899, when he said:

> I told you a moment ago that I would not swim with the current, I would endeavor to guide the current, and on that occasion I tried to do so. But a moment came in this question when President Kruger sent his insolent ultimatum, and there was a wave of indignation passing over all the British Empire, and I said there is no longer any hesitation, we must act, and we did act on October 14th.

He recognized that Canada in 1899 was moved by passion and emotion, just as it was in this present war. But there were some in Quebec who took exception to the policy determined on at that time. The province of Quebec manifested its ideal on that occasion just as it has done in the present war. And then the right hon. gentleman, speaking in Chicago, said:

> Can we not hope that if ever the banners of England and the banners of the United States are again to meet on the battlefield, they shall meet entwined together in the defence of some holy cause, in defence of holy justice, for the defence of the oppressed, for the enfranchisement of the down-trodden, and for the advancement of liberty, progress—

These were the sentiments that he then expressed, and he went on and said:

> Shall the sacrifice be all on the one side and none on the other?

These were beautiful expressions, but they are not being used to-day. The right hon. gentleman's famous speech on Liberalism, delivered at Quebec, I have read a dozen times. I have not yet learnt it by heart, but I am going to before the session is over. He was telling the French people about the liberties they were enjoying under the British flag, and for the purpose of expressing the idea better than he thought he could himself, he quoted Tennyson:

> It is the land that Freedom till,
> That sober-suited Freedom chose,
> The land where, girt with friends or foes,
> A man may speak the thing he will;
>
> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where Freedom slowly broadens down,
> From precedent to precedent;
>
> Where faction seldom gathers head,
> But by degrees to fullness wrought,
> The strength of some diffusive thought
> Hath time and space to work and spread.

This is really the country that we are asked to defend to-day, the country that the leader of the Opposition was telling his people was the land of liberty and freedom. Now, if the mass of the people of Quebec are wrong, it is due purely and simply to another ideal which has developed in the Dominion of Canada, because a national ideal may be divided. A nation need not be unanimous in its ideal. A nation, an empire, or a race is just like a group of individuals; you may have a sub-group. To-day if the labour group of the Dominion of Canada were unanimous in their ideals and agreed together they would become a menace to the nation itself, and there would necessarily be a clash. There is a sub-group in the Canadian nation to-day. That sub-group is the province of Quebec, which is governed by an ideal, an ideal which has spread from the leaders to the masses, whose thought has been trained in one particular direction, although the leader of the Opposition had taught them a better lesson from his entry into politics up to quite recently. But there are those who have followed him, or are going to follow him, who have been educating the province of Quebec in another way. There are leaders in that province who cannot sit in Parliament, and never will sit here, and they are the men who are particularly obnoxious to the rest of Canada.

In conclusion, those who state that the Government has furnished material whereby riots can be created in the province of Quebec are arguing against themselves, because it has reference to a nation with a temper and a disposition to be excited by the least possible thing. In war there is no choice, there is no individual liberty and freedom, and every man should take his place. One of the hon. members who spoke in this debate referred to two young men who were taken off the train at North Bay. I was on the same train and was accosted myself. Fortunately, I had a pass, which I showed to the Government officers, but even if I had no papers I could not be mistaken for a man of twenty-five years of age by any means. This illustrates that in war time men must be subjected to annoyance, and if they do not expect annoyance then they are not properly disposed towards war. I extend my sympathies to the mass of people in the province of Quebec, because it is not generally understood that these people are not acting from individual judgment or desire but from emotion and a passion which has been instilled into them by their leaders, leaders who differ with us in principle and are responsible for creating the riots which have taken place in that province recently.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec S.): Mr. Speaker, in the course of this evening's debate the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence referred to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House on whom he had conferred certain favours, and, in wishing to prove his case, he said that he had always been in favour of the people of the province of Quebec. I think the ex-minister wished to refer to my humble self, and I think it is only fair to explain to the House the nature of the benefactions he has referred to. At the time that the hon. gentleman discovered me, I held the soft and somewhat lucrative, if not honorable, position of batman to a colonel on the staff, and from that he transferred me to be scout officer on the firing line, and then had me shot. Mr. Speaker, I think that the then Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) was probably carrying out, in my case, what he has been endeavouring to carry out ever since he began his public life, that is to get rid of the people in the province of Quebec as fast as he can, and to diminish the population of that province.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. POWER: Young as I am in years and in parliamentary experience, I cannot but feel that no condemnation is too strong and no censure too severe for those who, whilst the bodies of the unfortunate victims of the late riots are still unburied, have endeavoured to revive the questions which disturbed the electorate at the last election. And, Mr. Speaker, I would remind hon. gentlemen opposite that in their indignation at the outbreak of a few irresponsibles, they must not forget that at this very moment, this very evening probably, from 25,000 to 50,000 Quebeckers are fighting, bleeding and dying on the plains of Picardy and the hills of Flanders.

Mr. BEST: Oh.

Mr. POWER: I did not quite catch the remark of the hon. gentleman, but if he has anything to say I will take my seat.

Mr. BEST: There is not half that number of French Canadians fighting at the front.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of people from the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. POWER: I said that there were from 25,000 to 50,000 Quebeckers now fighting in France. I am sure that there are at least five or six battalions—and I know that the Minister of Militia will bear me out in this—and perhaps seven battalions, excluding the Forestry, Railway Construction, Medical units, and the reserve battalions in England. Surely some hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten to read their newspapers, or have forgotten that not long ago they read in the English papers of the deeds of the 22nd Battalion which stormed the Sugar Refinery and won the streets of Courcellete. Surely they have heard of what our men accomplished at Vimy. Surely they will remember the account cabled a few days ago by Phillip Gibbs of the work of a machine gun unit from Quebec, which for ten days helped to stay the advance of the victorious Hun. Some of their remarks make me think of something which happened in France during the disastrous days of June, 1916, when, unfortunately for the Canadian corps, a certain portion of it lost some lines of trenches, and was ordered to retake them. The attack was made, and the troops had to advance across 600 to 800 yards of open ground in broad daylight. A charge was made, and some 580 men were lost inside of an hour, and I do not know how many officers. Shortly afterwards, a British staff officer—staff officers do not as a rule visit the front line, came along and, after congratulating the colonel on the discipline and bravery of his men, said: "I wish particularly to make a remark about the company on the left; the company on the left behaved themselves under fire like the very best of the regular troops." The colonel answered: "Those are the French Canadians." Very much surprised, the staff officer said: "The next man who says a word about the French Canadians, I would like to break his block off." That is the translation in the vernacular of what he said. In saying that, I have no warlike intentions towards hon. gentlemen opposite, because of reasons not unconnected with the war I am unable to indulge in fisticuffs. I only wish that English staff officer had been here to listen to the speech on the national ideals of the French Canadians delivered by the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Mackie), who has just spoken.

As member for one of the constituencies of the city of Quebec, I intend to do something which, perhaps, has not been done to the extent it might have been during the course of this debate, that is to talk about the Quebec riots. I represent a constituency somewhat mixed both as to race and as to the various classes which are contained therein. Something more than three-fifths are French Canadians and the remaining two-fifths are Irish and English Canadians. It is about equally divided between the professional and clerical classes and the labouring classes. Some disorders did occur in my constituency, but they were not brought about by any of my constituents. Unfortunately, the constituency contained the offices of two newspapers, L'Evenement and the Chronicle, which had aroused the ire of a certain portion of the population, and they were made victims of the attack. However, on Thursday, 28th March, a certain young man named Mercier, of whom you have all heard, was asked for his papers by one Evanturel or one Belanger, it matters not which, and on not being able to produce them, he offered to telephone for them or send for them to his home. A man named Moisan offered to go for them.

This offer was refused; the young man was taken to the police station, and afterwards released when his papers were produced. In the meantime the crowd got unruly; certain passages occurred between the crowd and the policemen. It has not been brought out in the debate that the man Belanger, whose pedigree you have heard, having safely escaped from the police station, returned because he had seen one of his old pals in the crowd who had said something to him. He came back and spoke to his pal about it, and that really started the whole fight. The whole thing would have been over with a few broken heads —rows such as that have occurred in other places. There were riots in Valcartier camp when some of the soldiers thought that the persons who sold tobacco and cigarettes to them were charging too much for the goods. I remember in the early days of the war that some of the soldiers tore down two or three of the stalls where cigarettes were sold, and there were a few broken heads. There have been riots, I understand, even in Camp Borden —I do not know why. I remember that there was a riot in Folkestone, England—perhaps some hon. gentlemen opposite were in Folkestone at that time—when some of the Canadian troops were displeased with the manner in which they had been treated by the British redcaps, the military police. A riot of considerable proportions occurred, and when the firemen came to turn on the hose they were served in the same way as it was attempted to serve the firemen in Quebec—the hose was cut, and they had to turn out British troops who were garrisoned in Folkestone to put down the riot. Nobody, however, thought of proclaiming martial law for the soldiers. If soldiers will get out of hand—anybody who has served as a soldier knows what discipline, particularly in the Canadian forces, means—if soldiers will get out of hand, I say, how much more must we expect the ordinary every-day mob to get out of hand.

On the evening of Thursday, or the following evening, the people were saying to each other throughout the town that they were going to the auditorium. On arriving there they did nothing for about twenty-five or thirty minutes. Some songs were sung and a few pieces of snow thrown, but no one was harmed. Finally, the crowd broke in. In order to reach that part of the auditorium building in which the registrar's office is situated one has to climb very narrow stairs, which can scarcely be mounted by two persons abreast. There were, I understand, in the district of Que-

11 p.m. bec—I have an answer on the subject to a question which I put to the Minister of Militia last week—some forty or forty-two Dominion detectives. Surely these detectives, on a stairway where not two men could climb abreast, if they were worth their salt; if they were worth anything to the Government which hired them and paid them to annoy the people of Quebec, should have defended the auditorium building and not have had to rely on the military power. However, the burning occurred, and on the following evening a kind of attack, or, rather, a sing-song, occurred at the drill hall in Quebec. Two or three hundred young men came up from St. Roch's to the drill hall and there were met by the troops. I do not think it has been brought out so far in the reports of hon. gentlemen opposite that the Riot Act was read on this occasion. I happened to be present, and I heard it read by the troops. The crowd then were caused to disperse very easily, and little of any account was done. Early in the evening, before the Riot Act had been read, snow was thrown—and in that connection I wish to congratulate the troops for their forbearance in not acting any worse than they did.

Next day, Sunday, March 31, the troops were ordered to empty the stores in St. Roch's, lower town. While they were thus employed at the store of Herman Young and Company a certain amount of snow was thrown at them and there the first shot of what we might consider the riot part of the occurrences was fired. Though it has not yet been brought out by hon. gentlemen opposite, this first shot was fired by the troops, and three innocent citizens who were something like a quarter of a mile away, were wounded.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Of course, the hon. gentleman realizes that that is not General Lessard's account.

Mr. POWER: I am quite aware that that is not General Lessard's account; General Lessard was not in town at the time. For the information of my right hon. friend, I may tell him that about six o'clock on Sunday I was entering the Garrison Club when I saw a party of soldiers coming up the street under command of Captain Dunn. I said: "What is the trouble?"—for everything seemed to be quiet at that time. He did not say very much; but he ordered his men along and they went up Citadel hill. Then Colonel Beaubien came along and said: "Did you have any trouble, Dunn?" "Yes, sir." "Any shots fired?" "Yes, sir; our men fired two or three shots; don't know if anybody was hurt." That is the source of my information. Whether this was reported by the military men to the Government, I know not, but I happened to be there by accident and this is what was said. However, I think that even then the situation might have been satisfactory. On Sunday night the rioters, that is to say, the young men who had taken part in these disgraceful scenes—I cannot but condemn them and will condemn them as long as I can—these young men were about satiated; they had seen that force was to be used; they had seen fixed bayonets and realized that the militia were determined to put down all riots and rebellion with a strong hand. Things, therefore, were becoming quiet.

Mr. MORPHY: Who were these young men, and where did they live? Were they from St. Roch's?

Mr. POWER: I am not from St. Roch's; I have not very much acquaintance with the people there. Moreover, I have been away for the past three years and do not know many of the younger generation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Tell him why you were away from Quebec.

Mr. POWER: As I was about to say, on Sunday night the rioting was about over. The rioters were to a certain extent cowed by the display of arms. At that period the Government officials in Quebec—that is to say the then public representative, Mr. Taschereau, who is now registrar, accompanied by one Colonel Machin, who, I understand, went to Quebec as the representative of the Militia Council, spoke to Armand Lavergne. I wish to state here positively that Armand Lavergne has never been, is not, and possibly never will be a political friend of mine. I have nothing to do with taking up his defence; I am only stating the facts of the case from my own personal knowledge and from the information which I have been able to secure. Armand Lavergne was summoned to the Chateau Frontenac by telephone, and there was asked if there was anything that he could suggest with a view to putting down the riots. Armand suggested that he speak to the rioters. so I understand—and I think we are in a position to prove from Armand's own words —that he was asked by Colonel Machin and Captain Carruthers (whose position I do not know) if he would attempt to appease the crowd. Armand told them he would, and left the Chateau Frontenac after they had wished him Godspeed, and told him that anything he said would be accepted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That was a pretty large order.

Mr. POWER: It was; it is the largeness of the order that surprises me, particularly when given to Armand Lavergne, who is supposed to be the arch-rebel of Quebec, as he states himself. However, Armand met the rioters and told them he had been instructed by his friends in the Government to allay the troubles, and asked them to go quietly to their homes, saying that if they did the Government would see to it that the troops would no longer patrol the streets, and if possible the obnoxious detectives would be withdrawn. Now, I see by the newspapers that the Government have to that extent carried out Armand's promises on their behalf, for they have withdrawn the detectives in the last few days. Armand made those promises, and the crowd went home. On the same evening Armand returned to the Chateau Frontenac and was congratulated on his work by the public representative in Quebec and by Colonel Machin, a member of the Militia Council, and the representative of the Minister of Militia.

Major-General MEWBURN: He has nothing whatever to do with the Militia Department.

Mr. POWER: I accept the minister's statement. I should have said the representative of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: He is certainly not my representative.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I sincerely hope the Government will not go back on Machin.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that Armand Lavergne was my representative.

Major-General MEWBURN: The hon. gentleman said that Colonel Machin was the representative of the Militia Council, and I said no, he was not.

Mr. POWER: After all these denials by the Government, I do not know exactly who Colonel Machin is, but he appeared to have some official position.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want any misunderstanding. Colonel Machin was the representative of the Military Service Council, and we have no apologies to make for him.

Mr. POWER: The Minister of Militia and the Minister of Justice may have a fight on this matter, but I am neutral. At all events, Colonel Machin represented somebody, because the Prime Minister read a report from him. Whoever he was, he congratulated Armand Lavergne on his work on the evening of Sunday, March 31.

Mr. DAVIDSON: How does the hon. gentleman know this?

Mr. POWER: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to finish my argument, I will produce all the evidence on that point, if necessary. The next day, Quebec was quiet; the riot was over. Much as we have all said against Armand Lavergne, the riot was over. Not that I think it was due altogether to Armand's efforts; I am under the impression that the young men had discovered they had gone too far, and that it was time to stop. The next afternoon proclamations were issued all over the city of Quebec to the effect that no public meetings would be held, and the soldiers would be on Jacques Cartier Square to see that no meetings were held. It had been promised, rightly or wrongly, on behalf of the Government, that the Government's answer would be given the following evening at eight o'clock on Jacques Cartier Square. At eight o'clock that evening there were twenty-five machine guns and a thousand troops on Jacques Cartier Square. Nothing happened till about eleven in the evening, except that pedestrians walking along the streets were ordered to move on, move on, move on, and the order was reinforced sometimes by a feigned and sometimes by a real prod of a bayonet, which was beastly uncomfortable to the citizens of Quebec, to such an extent that hostilities occurred at eleven o'clock. I have endeavoured to give a true and impartial account of the happenings in Quebec during these five days. I left on Monday evening.

I now come to discuss the causes which to my mind brought about the first and some of the subsequent outbreaks. The people of Quebec are under the impression that perhaps the first outbreak, and even the second when the auditorium was burned, and perhaps the third, when a demonstration was made outside the drill hall, might have been made by some children of St. Roch's and St. Sauveur, but there is no doubt whatever in the minds of the citizens of Quebec—in fact there is evidence—that any subsequent attacks on the part of the crowd were entirely due to utter strangers to the city and district of Quebec.

I have already gone at greater length into the history of the events of these five tragic days to the city of Quebec, but if the House will permit me I will now endeavour as briefly as possible to give some of the proximate causes of the outbreak. As the House is aware, when the proclamation was issued under the Military Service Act, the province of Quebec reported as well, I think, as any province of the Dominion, and when the appeals were neard the province of Quebec had about the same number of exemptions as the province of Ontario; I think there was a difference of some eight thousand. On the other hand the Government appeals in the province of Quebec were something like thirty or forty thousand, but appeals on the part of individuals were very few. These appeals began to be heard some time in January. The judges heard witnesses, allowed the conscript to state his case, and to be represented by counsel, and the case was heard like an ordinary civil case. Everything went well. Later on, the Government or the Minister of Justice, or someone else in authority—because after my experience with Colonel Machin I do not know just where to place the responsibility—decided that perhaps the law was being too well observed in Quebec, that they reported well, and that their exemptions were being pleaded well. But the rumbling of the storm which broke out this evening, was being heard in the other provinces, and it was suddenly decided to clean up in six weeks the cases which in the ordinary course of events would have taken six months to decide. Hundreds of people were summoned to the courts; relatives and children came to hear these exemption cases. There is nothing discussed except exemption and exemption and exemption. So long as the cases were carefully listened to, nothing was done; but from the moment that a judge was brought from Three Rivers, conditions changed. As a member of the Bar, I have the utmost respect for the Bench, but a certain judge was brought from Three Rivers, and with all the brutality which characterized Judge Jeffries in the worst time of English history, he refused to listen to draftees, treating them rudely, would not allow attorneys to state their clients' cases, insulted any one who appeared in court——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; the hon. gentleman is not in order in making such a statement with respect to a member of the Bench.

Mr. POWER: I withdraw my statements with regard to the judge. However, there was a feeling in Quebec that certain members of the Bench were more or less inclined to be adverse to the draftees. Even that did not affect things very much until the Government adopted the system of Government by Order in Council. First, an Order in Council was passed to the effect that the family physician was no longer to be considered as an expert in the case, that his finding was to be submitted to the Board of Medical Review, and the decision of the Board of Medical Review was to be final. In one case a family physician produced a sworn certificate before the judge to the effect that Mr. So-and-So was an epileptic and had suffered from epileptic fits all his life. That man went before the Board of Medical Review and he was classed A-1 because he could not have an epileptic fit at the proper time to convince the Board of Medical Review. These cases were well known. Everybody in Quebec talked about them.

Then, we had another Order in Council to the effect that the delays foreseen by the law—that is three days and, in some cases, twenty days, to allow for appeal from the decision of the first tribunal—would no longer count. Apparently, from the interpretation which we have had of this Order in Council, these delays were only to count in favour of the Government. A poor devil who wished to apply for his exemption, and who had been in the bush somewhere, or in the back blocks, had not a chance within the twenty days and was conscripted; whereas, if through lack of diligence on the part of the officers of the Government, the public representatives, and others, they had forgotten to apply for the review of a certain man's exemption, the Government representatives were perfectly at liberty to take the law into their own hands and see that the appeal was carried on. There was a further Order in Council prohibiting rehearing, but with that I am not familiar.

However, these are only some of the causes. The question of the men who were placed in charge of the enforcement of the Military Service Act has already been very fully dealt with by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, but there were other things which were said, and I think with some show of justice, because arrests took place in Montreal and it was stated that certain Dominion detectives held up people on the streets, and, if their papers were not exactly right, these Dominion detectives asked them to give them $2, or $5, or $10, and they would let them go free. I understand that certain people were arrested in Montreal under those circumstances. There was another rumour. This is for the information of my hon. friend who asked me a question some time ago. I hope to be able to substantiate it at some other time, because I cannot substantiate it to-night. But it is a rumour and I am giving the causes of the riot. It was rumoured among the people that the Dominion detectives were in the habit of tearing up the exemption papers.

Mr. MORPHY: Were these the papers of persons who were strangers to the city of Quebec?

Mr. POWER: The rumour was that certain of these detectives had torn up papers belonging to exempted men.

Mr. MORPHY: Of the city of Quebec?

Mr. POWER: Of the city of Quebec and the province of Quebec, presumably. I understood from the Prime Minister that such disgraceful occurrences took place all over Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say occurrences, such as the tearing up of papers, had taken place anywhere in Canada. I did not allude to the subject at all. I never heard of it.

Mr. POWER: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon. I was speaking in the more general sense. The right hon. gentleman had said that such abuses as had taken place in the enforcement of the Military Service Act —and I presume that would cover the case that I have mentioned—had taken place in other portions of Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I said that in other portions of Canada men had been asked for their exemption papers and if their exemption papers were not produced they were taken into custody until they were produced.

Mr. POWER: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that the abuses by Dominion detectives had taken place in other parts of Canada. However, these were the causes of the riot. I do not intend to go into any further discussion as to the more remote causes of the feeling in Quebec, but I do say that the fact that the Government, in its enforcement of the Military Service Act, changed the law and employed these detectives in the way which I have indicated contributed to the causes which were responsible for the outbreak in Quebec.

Instead of asking the House to moderate its views on this subject, instead of asking the country to be patient with Quebec, instead, after having studied the question, of saying: This was an outbreak which might have been avoided had we been more careful in our exercise of power, the Government have come before this House and said: We will see to it that coercion is used in the province of Quebec. They have deposited on the table of this House an Order in Council such as I do not think ever was passed in any other British country in the world. Extraordinary power has been placed in the hands of military officers. I respect the uniform of His Majesty and every one who wears it but we have put it in the power of the military officer to arrest on sight any man whom he thinks is committing a breach of the peace. This poor individual is to be tried by court martial. The civil law of the Dominion, and of the province of Quebec, is laid on one side in order that the military authorities may have full sway. I appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who should know the history of his motherland; he ought to be able to tell us whether, from his reading of history, the 700 years of coercion in Ireland has effected anything to bring Ireland more into line to help Great Britain and the Allies in the present war. I appeal to the verdict of history. We have seen Poland persecuted, its nationality lost, its religion taken away, but Poland after 200 years is still Poland and the people still long to breathe the breath of Polish freedom. We have also seen Alsace-Lorraine torn away from Mother France, and still, forty-four years afterwards, Alsace-Lorraine is one of the reasons which brought about the bloody conflict in Europe to-day. Should, Mr. Speaker, coercion be applied, as it is evident that the hon. gentlemen opposite wish to apply it, should our laws be set aside, should the civil laws of the province be set aside—laws guaranteed by treaty and sanctified by tradition—and everything that we consider just, fair, and honourable in the province of Quebec, be set aside, I am sorry to say that I do not expect it will profit hon. gentlemen opposite in any degree. As one who is for the fullest participation in this war I am sorry to say, considering those whose spirit has been outraged and whose better feelings have all been disgusted by the treatment of the Government, that it will be impossible for us, if we have to use two men for every man we get, it will be impossible for us to put the same force on the battlefields of Europe that I think we should place there. For as long as the feeling of hon. gentlemen opposite is as it is, you will have to maintain a garrison in the city of Quebec, and the effort of taking the men you need will be difficult beyond measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Sedition.

Mr. POWER: I am, as I have already said, for the fullest participation in the war. Too many of my dearest, truest and best comrades, the truest and best comrades that a man could have, now lie buried in the ground trodden by the sacreligious foot of the Hun, and I am sure they never will rest until Canada puts forth its best efforts to wrest from the Hun the land in which they now lie.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is not my intention to occupy very many minutes of the time of the House at this late hour. I wish, however, to say a word or two on this subject which I consider is of very great importance, not only to the Canada of the present day, but the Canada of the future. We owe a duty to our Canadian boys who have already gone overseas, as well as to those who have enlisted and have yet to go. We also owe a duty to the generations yet to come in this country, and it is our place, as public men occupying a responsible position, to do what we can to relieve such situations, and prevent the occurrences of such acts as have taken place recently in the city of Quebec. I am in entire accord with the leader of the Opposition when he says that the law must be obeyed in this country, that property must be respected and peace preserved. I am also in entire accord with the expressions of certain gentlemen who have preceded me on this side of the House, who have uttered the desire—an earnest desire, if I may judge from their words—that we may ultimately get peace and concord, and unity, in the Dominion of Canada. I do not think, however, that the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) was very happy in his speech if he desired to bring about peace and concord in Canada. True, the hon. gentleman was reading from a manuscript which he had doubtless prepared some time ago, no doubt thinking that some mud would be slung from this side of the House, or some insults indulged in, but notwithstanding the fact that there was nothing of the kind, he had, of course, to follow his manuscript and got it off his chest, and I presume he is quite happy now. The hon. gentleman from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) paid his respects to certain of the press of Ontario, and particularly did he pay his respects to a certain newspaper called the Orange Sentinel, remarking that he would venture to read that paper if he were provided with a gas mask. It does seem to me, having witnessed the efforts of the hon. member in this House on a great many different occasions, that that hon. gentleman should be immune from gas of any kind. I was under the impression that he was not susceptible to gas attacks, inasmuch as he has manufactured so much gas himself that I am sure he would long ago have been asphyxiated if gas would do the job.

The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), in speaking on this motion, said that the French Canadian had a good deal of imagination, and he proceeded to convince us of that fact by giving us a demonstration of French Canadian imagination. In the course of his remarks, on several occasions, he had to be corrected and facts substituted in place of imagination by the hon. member from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). But the efforts of the hon. member for Quebec West along imaginative lines are nothing as compared with those of the hon. gentleman from Quebec South (Mr. Power). I venture to say that, if the French Canadian is possessed of a vivid imagination, the hon. member for Quebec South deserves to take rank as the leader and chief of all the imaginative people of the province from which he comes. He drew on his imagination very largely, starting out with a statement which I do not think he should have made—which I know he should not have made, and which he had no warrant for making—charging the Minister of Militia with a desire to get rid of the people of Quebec as fast as possible by sending them to the war. Never in this House has a more unworthy sentiment fallen from the lips of any member of this assembly. According to the rules of the House I cannot use words which would express my feelings with regard to that statement as I think they should be expressed. But that is the sort of thing which, to my mind, indicates the real kernel of the trouble which occurred in the city of Quebec. If a portion of that city will send as its representative to this House a gentleman who will go so far as to make a statement such as the hon. member for Quebec South has made, I think I can find in that some ground for the cause of the trouble in the city of Quebec. I could not help but ask myself, when he made that and several other statements of a very extravagant character, how much did this hon. gentleman do to prevent these riots in the city of Quebec. It is quite evident from his own remarks that he was on the scene a good part of the time. He has described to us the course of events from hour to hour; he has told us that he was right there looking on when the Riot Act was read, and he saw many of the acts which were committed. What did the hon. gentleman do to try to calm the people, and to get them, some his own constituents, to go home and behave themselves as they should? I wonder what the hon. member has ever done to teach the people of his part of the country what their duties and responsibilities were with respect to this war?

An hon. MEMBER: He went to the front.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is all very well, and that makes it all the more strange to me why an hon. gentleman who has been over to the front, and who knows the needs of our men, should assume the attitude which he has in this House to-night, when he made the charge which he has made against the Minister of Militia. I think that is exceedingly strange coming from a gentleman who has had on the King's uniform.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition, in the course of his remarks, stated that a more peaceable and law abiding community could not be found in the Dominion of Canada than that of the city of Quebec. That may be so. The hon. leader of the Opposition has represented that constituency for a great many years, and he ought to know it intimately. It occurs to me that they chose a rather peculiar way of showing their peaceable intentions. I am also struck with this fact. The leader of the Opposition has told us that it was not the people from the city of Quebec who were the ringleaders in the riot; no, they came from the city of Montreal. He is unloading his sinners off onto another constituency in the province of Quebec. And who are they? Ex-convicts, thugs, scoundrels of the worst type. And these strangers came to the city of Quebec, which has been represented for some forty years by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. Though it has been represented by the right hon. gentleman, and has had the advantage of his intimate knowledge and his ideas of peace, love and harmony, and should consequently excel in those virtues, we find that city departing from or forgetting the teachings which, I assume, the right hon gentleman has given to the people all these years, suddenly forsaking the doctrines of peace, love, harmony and unity preached to them for forty years, and being carried away by the leadership of four or five ex-convicts, thugs and scoundrels from the city of Montreal. That may be the case, but it does seem strange to me.

There was one course taken by all the hon. gentlemen, including the right hon. gentleman himself, in regard to this trouble: they laid the blame on the Military Service Act and the administration of that Act. The right hon. gentleman went into particulars in regard to the man Belanger, who was a boxer, a fighter and a man of muscle, and another man, associated with him as one of the Dominion police, was also of not very good character. He told us that they stopped a young man named Mercier and asked him to produce his papers. This young man said: "I have not the papers with me, they are at my house." They refused to allow him to telephone for them, and the right hon. gentleman thought that that was a crime on their part. As I understand it, these Dominion police are appointed to perform certain duties. They know what their duties were, and it is not included in these duties that they are to allow men to telephone or to make other excuses for non-presentation of their papers. I also understand from the Act that men of military age are supposed to carry their papers with them, and I can readily understand that. There have been hundreds and thousands of cases throughout the country in other provinces where men have not had their papers at the time they were asked for them, and where they had to go with the officers until such time as they produced their papers. The right hon. gentleman takes the stand that the authorities who were enforcing the Act were to blame because they did not allow this man to telephone to his house requesting that his papers be sent down; and that the Government is censurable because men who, according to the right hon. gentleman, did not appear to be of the best character were appointed to assist in carrying out the provisions of the Act. Well, what does the right hon. gentleman want in the administration of this law in the province of Quebec? When a man is appointed a Dominion policeman for this purpose, must he show his pedigree? Must he pin on his person in a conspicuous place a list of this ancestors for several generations back? When he calls upon a man to show his papers, must he put on kid gloves? Why do hon. gentlemen opposite demand for the province of Quebec a different procedure from that asked by the people of any other province? They tell us that the people of Quebec, especially those of Quebec city, are of a very sensitive nature. Well, that may be; they seem to think more of their own feelings than of the feelings of others. The member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has informed us of what took place in connection with these disturbances. The mob threw pieces of snow and chunks of ice; and the hon. gentleman congratulates the troops on the way they stood these attacks. I am sure that the troops, when they read his words in Hansard, will be delighted to know that they have his congratulations; it is about all they get from him. The troops, then, are to be congratulated because they allowed the mob to throw bricks and chunks of ice at them. This happened on two or three occasions. On the first occasion they show a good deal of forbearance. It happens again, and there is more forbearance. More congratulations from the member for Quebec South, more ice and snow and bricks and stones from the mob. A splendid spirit on the part of the troops; a magnificent spirit, I suppose, on the part of the mob in the city of Quebec. So this goes on, until not content with throwing stones and ice, breaking into and tearing down buildings and nearly murdering a couple of men; not content with all that, the mob get out their revolvers and shotguns and undertake to shoot up the soldiers. And now the hon. gentleman complains because Quebec was put under martial law; because the military took charge of the situation and intend to round these fellows up and send them overseas so that they may exercise their fighting propensities on the Huns instead of against the boys on this side who want to go over and fight our common enemy.

I am not in sympathy with those who have criticised the administration of the Military Service Act. I was one of the members of the House who voted for and helped to pass that Act, and when I gave it my support I supported those clauses which provided for tribunals, appeal judges, and so on. As we have provided this machinery for carrying out the law, the people of Quebec as well as of the other provinces should have the right to exercise their full powers under the Act. Why has there been so much delay in the province of Quebec as compared with other provinces? Hon. gentlemen have called attention to the number of exemptions and the number of appeals, but they have not taken into consideration also the enlistments from the other provinces, which they should do in order to give the figures fairly. However, I pass that by. In Quebec, then, they were merely exercising their right in appealing against the decisions of tribunals. There were more appeals in Quebec because there were more men in the province eligible under the Military Service Act, and there were more men eligible because fewer men had gone from the province to fight overseas under the voluntary system. This meant congestion in the hearing of appeals. The appeals have not gone forward as rapidly as they have in the other provinces—and why? Simply because the sentiment behind the Act in the province of Quebec was different from the sentiment behind the Act in the other provinces. What are the underlying causes of the disturbances which have taken place in Quebec city and in other parts of the province of Quebec? About eight years ago, speaking in this House, I made the statement that there was in the province of Quebec an anti-British or anti-Imperial sentiment. I was severely taken to task by hon. members on both sides of the House for having so expressed myself, but within the last few years, since the war started, the conduct of the province of Quebec has thoroughly justified my statement of seven or eight years ago. If there is such a sentiment in the province of Quebec, why does it exist? I believe that it does exist, although I am sorry to hold that belief. I think the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) struck the nail squarely on the head this evening in the excellent speech he made when he said that in that province they have different ideals, and that there has been wrong teaching. Wrong teaching by whom? Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go into details, or to go back into the history of this country, but were I so disposed I could quote different utterances of the leader of the Opposition which, in my judgment, have not been conducive to cementing the relations between Quebec and the other provinces of the Dominion and the Mother Country. I could, if I so desired, quote many utterances of the right hon. gentleman which have furnished an excuse to those in the province of Quebec who desire an excuse for evading military service. I have them under my hand; I could give them to the House; I have done so on more occasions than one. Moreover, I have done so in the presence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition; so that I cannot be accused of saying in his absence what I would not say in his presence. I regret it as much as any man who wishes to see this country what I believe it was intended to be, a great country, and what it can only be if we have a united people. Those of the province of Quebec who have enlisted and gone to the front have proved themselves as courageous and as brave as any men who have left the shores of Canada; I have that from personal conversation with different officers who have stood with these men over there, and I cannot think that these men who have gone overseas and helped to make the record that Canada has achieved are different from the great majority of the people of the province of Quebec; but there are certain elements in the province of Quebec which have kept those people from doing their duty, and I propose to state in just a few words what those elements are.

First of all, I say that one of the causes for the sentiment which exists in that province—and this is back of the rioting which has taken place there recently, and back of the hostility to the Military Service Act,—is men like Bourassa and Lavergne who have misled the people of that province, and inasmuch as Bourassa and Lavergne repeat in their speeches statements which have fallen from the lips of the right hon. leader of the Opposition I hold him primarily responsible as the original teacher of those false doctrines, and he must bear his share of the responsibility. There is a way of dealing with men like Bourassa and Lavergne—a way which I suggested in this House a couple of years ago, on more than one occasion. Lavergne should have been stripped of his rank as colonel long ago, because he is a disgrace to the rank he holds; that also should have been done out of regard to the men who were in khaki and are in khaki at the present time. It is all nonsense to say that if you do that, you will place him on a pedestal as a martyr, which is just what he wants. I do not believe it for a moment. You put a man like Lavergne or Bourassa behind the bars for treasonable or seditious utterance, and do you think he will boast of the fact that he is behind the bars? Not on your life. He will whine like the cur he is. That is one way of dealing with that sort of people.

Another thing that should be done is to suppress, and suppress immediately, papers like Le Devoir which have not scrupled to scatter their seditious doctrines throughout Quebec and so influence the minds of the people. We are in a state of war and these matters should not be handled with kid gloves. It is either right for a paper to be allowed to circulate that publishes seditious language, or it is wrong, and I do not think there is a man in this House who thinks it is right that such a paper should circulate, and it seems to me, then that the only thing we have to ask ourselves is: Has this paper circulated seditious utterances, and does it continue to do so? If so, our course of action is clear; there is only one thing to do.

There is another cause for all the trouble in Quebec, and I will refer to it in just a word. I have said that I believe that one of the causes of the trouble is wrong teaching by such men as I have referred to. Another cause for this wrong attitude and mistaken sentiment on the part of the majority of the people in the province of Quebec is the attitude of the Roman Catholic church in that province. For some reason or other, the attitude of the great majority of the Roman Catholic clergy of that province is opposed to the Military Service Act, and opposed to this country taking its part in the war which we in Ontario and other provinces think it should take. I have never in my life uttered one word derogatory of the religion of any man, and I hope I never shall. It is not my purpose to discuss the rights and wrongs of this or that religious belief. I wish every man, no matter what his religious belief may be, Godspeed on his journey as he sees it through life, and I hope he will succeed in getting to the proper place when he leaves this world. But while I have no word of criticism in regard to the Roman Catholic religion, I say that when a church, be it Roman Catholic, Presbyterian or any other denomination, enters the domain of politics and takes an active and influencing part in directing the destinies of this country, and tells the people what to do in a great crisis such as this, I have a perfect right to discuss the matter with them. I do not attack their right to express their views; if they wish to enter the arena and place their reasons before the public they have a perfect right to do so; but I trust that no person will then find fault with me if I pass my opinion upon their views.

I do not intend to state here why the attitude of the Roman Catholic church in the province of Quebec is what I believe it to be, but I do say that in those two reasons—the hostility of the majority of the clergy of that province to the Military Service Act and to full participation by Canada in the war, and secondly, to wrong teaching by such men as I have alluded to—you have the causes leading up to the disturbances which took place in the city of Quebec last week.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, when I was elected to represent in this House of Commons of Canada the constituency of Dorchester, I was under the impression that I would be called here to give, according to the very modest experience which I possess, my views on the legislation which would be submitted for consideration. I have been here now ten days, and I have listened very attentively to the discussions which have taken place. I have had two surprises already, and perhaps I shall have more before the session is ended. Last year, the whole press of this country, Liberal and Tory, proclaimed to the country that a Union Government had been formed, composed of the best elements of our population, to help Canada take her part in the war. But since the session commenced, we have seen just what kind of Union Government it was that was formed at Ottawa. Last week my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced a Bill, and hon. members on his own side of the House took occasion to make a very violent attack on the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On the Bill.

Mr. CANNON: The minister was behind the Bill, or the Bill was in front of the minister. I think the minister was more badly hit than the Bill because the Bill passed. When I left Quebec a day or so ago, I looked into the faces of women who had lived hours of tragedy and of drama. We had soldiers in our streets of Quebec by the thousands. Every street corner was guarded with machine guns. Quebec was practically under martial law. We were experiencing all the difficulties and troubles of actual war. Nevertheless hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House take the occasion of these troubles to bring on a debate, and not to remedy the conditions, not to suggest measures which would bring peace to the people in Quebec and throughout the rest of the Dominion. When the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) rose in this House, he rose, not as a patriot, not as a Canadian, thinking only of Canada, but he was thinking of his own petty and mean interests as a local provincial and parochial politician from Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should qualify his language. He should withdraw the words "mean," "politician." They are hardly parliamentary.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your decision. I withdraw the words which are not parliamentary. I only wanted to point out to the House that I thought is was very unfortunate that an event of the importance and of the gravity of that which happened in Quebec should be taken as the occasion of such a debate as we have heard in the House to-day. Have we spoken, Mr. Speaker, of the riots in Quebec? Have the members on the other side of the House suggested remedies? I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) making an attack on the Roman Catholic clergy. I have heard members on the other side making attacks on the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I have heard them making attacks on the French Canadians as a race. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I thought in this House of Commons of Canada that, no matter what province you came from, no matter what nationality you belonged to, no matter what creed you believed in, there was one ideal which was common to everybody—the love of our common country. I do not think, Sir, that discussions like that which took place to-day will help Canada to become the big, prosperous and great nation she should become. Hon. members on the other side of the House have been very wide in their remarks. The scope of their speeches has extended over the whole political situation in Canada. They have pointed out different reasons for the situation which exists in Quebec to-day. Will you let me say that the members of the Government are responsible for the situation in Quebec to-day, on account of the policy which they have followed, on account of the policy which they persist in, unfortunately, to-day, of coercing the province. I do not wish to say that the ministers have bad intentions; I do not wish to say the Government is doing it with the object of arousing ill-feeling in the province of Quebec. But I say that the attitude of the Government for the last four or five years has been of such a nature that ill-feeling has been aroused, and that the Government ought to take measures to appease the people of Quebec. What happened, Mr. Speaker? We have heard the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) talking about Mr. Bourassa, talking about Mr. Armand Lavergne and saying that Bourassa and Armand Lavergne were the real cause of the whole trouble. I am not here to defend Bourassa. I have never been a political supporter of Mr. Bourassa, and never endorsed his political ideas. On the contrary, I have always fought his candidates. I was a candidate in 1911 in the county of Charlevoix. I stood there as a Liberal candidate, supporting the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I stood for the Naval Bill introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I stood for participation by Canada in Imperial wars. But at that time Mr. Bourassa was not denounced by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), nor by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), as a cause of danger or as a reason for sedition in the province of Quebec. Bourassa was brought by the friends of the hon. members in the province of Ontario, and he spoke to the people of Ontario in order to defeat the hon. leader of the Opposition. What was the programme of Mr. Bourassa at that time? I do not wish to insist on this point, but I only want to point out that in 1911 Bourassa and his school, supported, financed, paid and organized by the Tory party, went through the province of Quebec, and said that we did not owe anything to England, and they were applauded by members of the Tory party who afterwards became members of the Borden Government. Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the House of one incident. In the by-election in 1910, in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, I supported the policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who was leading the fight against the Conservative candidate. Mr. Monk was a minister in the Borden Cabinet. Mr. Sevigny, Mr. Blondin and Mr. Lavergne were there. And who was supplying the money to beat the Liberal candidate? The Montreal organization, backed and inspired by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), if my information is reliable. That night, when the result of the election in Drummond-Arthabaska was announced—the hon. Minister of Railways laughs. He may laugh, but I am quite convinced he knows what I am saying now is true.

An hon. MEMBER: You have got the wrong minister.

Mr. CANNON: On election night, when the Liberal candidate was defeated, when the Nationalist doctrine in Quebec received its first support and triumph, a member of the present Government telegraphed Armand Lavergne and said: "Anything to beat Laurier." The hon. member for North Simcoe, this afternoon rose in this House to inquire about the reason of the riots in Quebec. I will give the real reasons. I have given the first, and I will give later the proximate reason of these riots. Let us go further, and examine the history of the last five years. When the elections of 1911 were held in Ontario, the Tory organization, led by the then Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), waved the British flag, and said that in the province of Quebec everybody was disloyal and everybody was a traitor, whereas in the same province, Armand Lavergne, Henri Bourassa and all that crowd were fighting the fight of the Tory party.

You succeeded. The Tory party came into power. Those who had promised in the counties of Ontario, and in the counties of the English provinces, to save the British Empire, were the first to give the fattest portfolios to their new Nationalist friends to reward them for their share in the victory. Canada had this extraordinary and remarkable spectacle of an ultra loyalist like the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) sitting close to Mr. Monk, who would not fight for England. That is the second cause of the riots in Quebec. It was the want of sincerity on the part of our public men when the Cabinet was formed.

Let us go farther. A gentleman who is still a member of the Cabinet, although he is not a member of this House or a member of the Senate, a man who is kept in this Cabinet against every principle of constitutional law, a man who has no right to sit in the Cabinet because he has no responsibility towards the people, a man who bored holes in the British flag in many counties in Quebec, has been drawing $7,000 from the Crown since my right hon. friend has been the Prime Minister of this country. Third reason for the riots in Quebec.

My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) wants to know why the people of Quebec are displeased. I will tell him. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that a province like the province of Quebec, which has been the pioneer province of this country, a province that has sent to this Parliament the brightest men that Canadian politics had known, will consent to be represented by a man who has lost his deposit in one constituency and who has been beaten in another by 2,000 votes? French Canadians may have defects, but they have one quality, and that is the quality of self-respect. When a race has self-respect that race has the right to be respected by the Government of the country. Fourth reason for the riots in Quebec.

My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) claims that Le Devoir ought to be suppressed. I am also of that opinion. Suppress it. But I am sure of one thing, and that is that the Government has not the courage to do it. It is no use coming before this House to lie to the country. What we want are the facts and nothing else. Le Devoir is a menace; suppress it. Orders in Council are easily passed. Why will not Le Devoir be suppressed? I will tell you—because it is financed by Tory money. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) is the man who financed Le Devoir in 1911 so as to beat my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for St. Antoine is not in the House. I am sorry. If he were here I would say just the same thing.

An hon. MEMBER: And he would not deny it.

Mr. CANNON: The money that was given to Le Devoir to preach this doctrine of sedition, this unpatriotic principle of non-participation by Canada in Imperial wars, came from the Tory party. Every word which was printed, every sheet that was distributed in Quebec was paid for with Tory money—

An hon. MEMBER: The country's money.

Mr. CANNON: And probably the country's money. How is that money being reimbursed to the hon. member for St. Antoine?—boot contracts for the troops over in Europe. Mr. Speaker, that is the fifth reason for the riots in Quebec.

I wish to congratulate my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie) on the very moderate speech which he has made. I have had very bad information about the hon. member. I understand that last year there was a certain discussion into which my humble personality was mixed and certain things that were said were reported to me. I am quite sure that my hon. friend from Simcoe was not in as good humour then as he was to-day. I congratulate him and I also congratulate the hon. the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes). I can tell my hon. friend that in Quebec there are some people who do not like him. Why, I do not know. If my hon. friend would go to Quebec oftener and speak the way he has spoken to-night everybody would like him. The unfortunate side of the situation between Ontario and Quebec is that the people of Ontario do not travel often enough in Quebec. If the two peoples would meet, if the two populations would mix, all this friction would soon disappear and this trouble would be a thing of the past.

I am quite sure, Sir, that you have heard it said in the House that I was a rebel. It has been said. It was said, I understand, last year that if I was elected to this House, I would not be allowed to take my seat because I was worse than Louis Riel.

Mr. BUREAU: Who said that?

Mr. CANNON: I forget who said it. I am very charitable and even if I did remember who said it I would pretend that I did not remember. But I can tell this House that I am no rebel, that I am a plain, simple, good-intentioned Liberal.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Very simple.

Mr. CANNON: I may be very simple but I will try to be complex as fast as I can. This afternoon I heard certain hon. members talking about the riots in Quebec. I was present. I had gone there to spend the week-end with my family and that is no sin. These troubles, I understand, were not serious at the outset. As a matter of fact, nobody considered them very serious. Who is responsible for the occurrence on Monday night I do not know and it does not belong to me to lay the blame on any shoulders. Col. Machin came to take charge of the situation and, as representative of the Federal Government, what did he say and what did he do?

He was then, mind you, representing the Government. He put the whole situation into the hands of one man, who has been denounced by every speaker on the other side of the House this afternoon. I refer to Col. Armand Lavergne. The Prime Minister has mentioned statements from Col. Machin and Mr. Taschereau. The statements referred to have not been read, but with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read you an affidavit or sworn declaration that I have received from Mr. Lavergne. The papers in Ottawa were kind enough to say that that affidavit had been handed to me by my friend, Mr. Lavergne. I do not deny that Mr. Lavergne is a friend of mine socially. Politically, we have never been friends, but I do not believe in beating a man when he is down, and if the Government has committed a blunder of putting the situation into the hands of Armand Lavergne, I think it is my duty as a member of the House to acquaint the public with the facts. That is why I am going to read Col. Lavergne's affidavit:

I, Armand Lavergne, of the City of Quebec, advocate, being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists, DOTH SAY AND DECLARE:—

1. Sunday the Thirty-first of March, about 6.45 p.m., at my house where I was confined by a slight attack of grippe, I was called to the phone by Mr. Alleyn Taschereau, Public Representative of the Minister of Justice for District E, under the Military Service Act.

I understand that since this affidavit has been sworn to Mr. Taschereau's position has been changed, and instead of being simply the representative of the Department of Justice in the city of Quebec, he is the registrar of the whole district. Therefore, there is no doubt whatsoever as to his official status and standing.

2. Mr. Taschereau, who has been for long a personal friend of mine, requested me to go over immediately to the Chateau Frontenac, and meet him at Room 301, stating that he had something very important and urgent to talk to me about;

3. When I got there, about a quarter past seven, I was introduced to Col. Machin, and another gentleman by the name of Carruthers, Captain or Colonel;

I do not know who the Mr. Carruthers referred to is, but perhaps some member of the Cabinet will give us that information.

4. After a few friendly words, Colonel Machin asked me what I thought of the present situation in Quebec City, how it was caused and the best means to face it;

5. I told Col. Machin that in my humble opinion the situation had been brought about by the choice and lack of tact of the Government federal detectives charged with enforcing the Military Service Act. On this point we all agreed;

6. I then said that my impression was that the whole thing could be stopped if anybody was willing to go and meet the rioters, speak to them, tell them that those detectives which are known in the city as very low characters, would not have anything more to do with the enforcing of the Act, and that the troops who were patrolling the streets would be returned to barracks. If that were done all the trouble would soon end;

7. Colonel Machin, or one of the other parties present, informed me that we should try to avoid bloodshed, as the troops that night were going to fire;

8. To this I agreed willingly. As Colonel Machin, myself, and others present, were desirous to bring the thing to an end as soon as possible, with the least serious consequences. I suggested sending anybody, and said that as far as I was concerned, I was willing to do it if I could state the above-mentioned conditions, namely, the removal of objectionable detectives and retirement of troops;

9. Colonel Machin told me that he had not the necessary authority to assure me of that, but that he would do his best to have those things accepted in Ottawa, and he thanked me for my willingness as to the best means to end the trouble;

10. He then asked me to dine with him—

That would have been a rather funny dinner.

—which I refused, saying, that I was going to try immediately, to which he consented, and wished me Godspeed;

11. I left the Chateau Frontenac and went down to headquarters, where I saw General Landry, Officer Commanding Military Division No. 5. I told General Landry that I had seen Colonel Machin, and what I proposed to do. He told me it was the best service I could do them, and the City, under the circumstances. I then asked him where he expected the most serious trouble to break out that night. General Landry told me the rioters had just burnt the store of Martineau on St. Joseph Street, and he was informed they were coming to Lower Town to the Mechanics' Supply, via St. Paul Street, and asked me to go down that way and meet them;

12. I then left and went down alone by Mountain Hill, St. Peter and St. Paul Streets. Opposite the Mechanics' Supply I met two municipal policemen, and asked them for any sign of rioters, which they told me they had not yet. I then walked out St. Paul Street and met a small group opposite the C. P. R. Station, composed of about thirty, which group came to my notice as they were walking on the sidewalk, by some whistles being blown, and some of them yelling "Let us go down (en bas)". I made a sign to them with my hand to stop and asked them where they were going. Their welcome to my question was very equivocal, so I said to them "You know who I am", gave them my name, and told them that if they went further they would be mowed down by the troops; that, on the other hand, I was the bearer of a message of peace if they would stop trouble. After some discussion, their number had then increased around me to about three or four hundred, who could hear what I was saying, I made them the above proposals, and a few of them suggested my addressing them to the whole crowd, which might number one thousand or fifteen hundred. I got up on a Ford automobile, which was there, and repeated what I had said, and asked them to disperse, stating that the military authorities would rely on their honour to keep quiet, and that they in their turn could rely on the honour of the military authorities to have things in the City restored to their normal state the next day if they would be peaceful that night, and if the military authorities kept their word, to pledge themselves (the rioters) to create no further disturbance on any of the following days. To this they agreed in great majority enthusiastically, although I had to meet objections and insults from a very few seattered individuals;

13. After that someone suggested that a great crowd was assembled on the Jacques Cartier Market Place, and to prevent any trouble from them that I should go and repeat my remarks there, to which I agreed;

14. The crowd was swung back, and we walked back to the Jacques Market Place, where I repeated practically the above remarks before an audience of five or six thousand persons. The people then again pledged themselves to keep peace, and the propositions I was bearer of were greeted with enthusiasm, except from the same few scattered voices;

15. After that, they requested me to let them accompany me to the Chateau, but I begged them to disperse and go home immediately. I boarded a street car, came up to the Chateau, and reported to Col. Machin, who thanked me for what I had done, and I told them that although I understood that the troops had to be kept in readiness, if they were taken away from public view I felt assured perfect quiet would reign in the city. He agreed with me, and said he would report same to General Lessard. I then reported by telephone to General Landry, stating the same opinion, and also personally, to General Lessard, who appeared at the Chateau a few minutes later. I just say that of all the people I saw last night in the crowd of rioters, I knew nobody personally except one man, to whom I had not spoken for the last five years. When I went home about one o'clock, practically all the troops had gone back to headquarters, and no trouble had been reported since.

I also want to state further that if it had not been for Colonel Machin's earnest request and sincere desire for peace, I would not have take any action in the matter, and I have signed:

Armand Lavergne.

SWORN before me in Quebec this First day of April, 1918.

H. E. Lavigueur,
Maire de Quebec.

I think that, in justice to Mr. Lavergne, and in order that the House may have a complete story of the facts as they happened in Quebec, it is very important that that affidavit should have been read.

I do not wish to prolong these remarks. I only wish to say that when this Government introduced conscription the feeling in Quebec was very adverse. As a matter of fact, I have been a candidate against conscription, and I am not afraid to repeat that I have not changed my attitude, and I am still opposed to conscription. I am not against it because I am against the British Empire; I am not against conscription because I do not wish to help the British armies in this war, but I am against it because I think that conscription is not the best means to help the British Empire. And one of the main reasons for that belief is that it has divided our country; and as was said many years ago, a nation divided against itself must perish. But conscription passed, and passed with most extraordinary and exception methods. I have no right to judge those methods, but what happened later was also a cause of the riots in Quebec. The Government did something which is not usually done. It announced, before the elections were even announced, that the elections were going to be won. And why? Because they had deprived part of the population of their vote. And I admired this afternoon the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) when he frankly admitted that if it had not been for the Franchise Act the Government would have been beaten. I do not think that the province of Quebec was well pleased to see this Government elected by the means chosen.

Now, a few very brief remarks as to the application of the law itself. After the elections were over, the people of Quebec, after fighting the Government and being defeated, took their medicine like men. They obeyed the law, they registered, there was no trouble; everything went fine. When did the real trouble start? When the Government, against the constitutional rights of this country, started amending the Military Service Act by Order in Council. That Act was passed last year and is the law of our country. We have to obey the law, and every citizen has to abide by the law of his country. But I maintain that no Government no matter how strong it may be, has a right to tear up the British Constitution and enact laws by Order in Council without consulting Parliament. A few days ago the Military Service Council sent the members of this House a pamphlet entitled "The Military Service Act, 1917, Manual," and also giving particulars as to the regulations. A few months ago I received another pamphlet bearing exactly the same title, but if you read the two pamphlets you will see a difference. The Military Service Act has been changed in its essentials without the people or Parliament being consulted. In what sense? My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is a man whose legal experience I admire. He has been a member of the judiciary of our province, and is at the head of the Justice Department. I may tell him that I do not believe one word of what hon. gentlemen opposite said this afternoon about the administration of his department. I have confidence in the Minister of Justice, and, although he has been attacked by his own friends, I tell him that my confidence in him is not shaken. Has the hon. Minister of Justice advised his confreres that such change should be made in the law? It was changed in three ways. First, the man who was before a court had the right, according to the law and the existing regulations, to adduce medical evidence as to his present condition, whether he was A1, or B, C, D or E. Under this regulation doctors were brought into court, and family doctors and physicians were examined. The Government has passed a new regulation, putting in the hands of three doctors forming or composing a board of revision the final decision as to the physical capacity of the conscript, without the right of appeal to the judge. The judge cannot change that decision. Since when—and I appeal to the Minister of Justice—has a judge been bound by the decision of an expert? It is against every principle of common law in this country. May I add that as far as the city of Quebec is concerned, I do not know if the Government acted with bad intentions, but when that board of revision was formed, instead of choosing in the city of Quebec physicians and doctors who were fully competent, they chose, I do not say doctors who were not competent, but doctors who did not belong to that city or to our province, who did not talk the language of the people who were brought before them, and who asked for information and when the conscript gave it the doctors did not understand it. Is that a fit condition of things? I am quite sure that the minister did not know things like that were happening in Quebec, because if he did there would have been a change.

Another change has been made. The regulations enacted were to the effect that the military authorities or the conscript himself had twenty days in which to appeal and not a day more. Therefore, if, after a man had received a favourable decision, twenty days had expired, the man could go home according to law and say: "My case is settled, I will not be worried any more." But on account of the incompetency of the officials in Quebec, appeals have not been taken within the twenty days. And what did the people of Quebec hear ten days ago? That this Government, without consulting the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled, had provided that the military authorities could appeal whenever they wished, whereas the conscript had not more than twenty days within which to appeal, as under the old regulations. Is that fair? A man goes before a tribunal, he is exempted, and then, three, four, or six months later, he may be dragged again before the court and have his case reopened. That is not British justice; that is not British law. I am sure that a law of that kind would never have passed in England, and if any Government had dared to pass it, they would not have lasted twenty-four hours afterward. The people of the province of Quebec do not want privileges; we do not want favours; we want justice and nothing else. This is a third change in the law that the Government had no right to make, having regard to constitutional authority and precedent. An hon. gentleman smiles; but I tell him that I know what I am talking about. According to constitutional usage in England and in Canada this Military Service Act cannot be amended except by Parliament itself. The Prime Minister this afternoon talked about the War Measures Act. If the War Measures Act is a war measure, wide enough in its scope to change the character and the essence of the constitution, it has no binding effect upon the people. Not even the Parliament of Canada has the right to change or alter the constitution of the country. But, Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple and elementary question. Two years ago the gentlemen then sitting on the treasury benches thought that it would be good for their political health if they took steps to extend the term of Parliament. It was a matter of less consequence than amending the Military Service Act or than changing a law which calls people from their homes and occupations and business to do military service on the other side of the water. Did they pass an Order in Council? Did they use the War Measures Act? They could not; they had no right to do so. Why? Because the extension of the parliamentary term meant an amendment to our constitution, and the only power that can amend our constitution is the Imperial Parliament. Since when has our constitution provided that the representatives of the Canadian people shall no longer be consulted on matters of this kind? Why are we here, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CURRIE: Because we are here.

Mr. CANNON: It may be that the hon. gentleman does not know, but I do know. Why are we here? To pass Daylight Saving Bills? To be consulted on petty and mean measures? To deal with what the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) the other day called fads and freaks? But when it is proposed to suspend the common law of our country, to close the courts of our provinces, to deprive the population of liberty and freedom and constitutional privileges, we, the representatives of the people, are not consulted. Mr. Speaker, your parliamentary experience is very wide, but I should be surprised if you could quote a precedent from British, Canadian or American constitutional history—I shall not say similar, but even a slightly analogous instance—to justify the step which the Prime Minister of Canada has taken to-day. Motions are called, and without giving us the right to discuss the matter the Prime Minister lays on the Table an Order in Council destroying every constitutional guarantee that we in the province of Quebec and you in the other provinces have. Is that fair? Is that the proper way to govern this country? I say that it is not. What are the aims and objects of the allied nations in the great war which is now being fought? It is that of maintaining liberty and freedom for the universe and for humanity.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CANNON: I hear an hon. gentleman say "hear, hear." I believe it is an hon. gentleman who has fought for liberty and freedom in Flanders, and I congratulate him on having done so. I would ask him, however, to put the same energy into fighting in this country for the preservation and maintenance of the freedom of his own people. The House of Commons of Canada has today witnessed as sad a spectacle as ever was witnessed by any Parliament in the British Empire. Why so? Because, first, this Order in Council has destroyed every constitutional guarantee; and, second, in this country there should be no question of coercion. We should be united. Why is it that in the city of Ottawa, at the Chateau Laurier, on the street, when members of the House of Commons meet, they exchange a friendly handshake and friendly views, but the moment they enter the House they seem to forget their friendliness and their common united interests? No matter what may have been said, the province of Quebec is very useful to the rest of the Dominion and has done much to build up our country. Quebec has produced great statesmen; I have only to point to my right hon. leader, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who is certainly the most distinguished man that Canadian politics has produced. The people of Quebec want to live in peace with the other provinces, but how can we live in peace unless the attitude maintained at present by certain elements of the population ceases? The Solicitor General in the present Government (Mr. Guthrie), for instance, addressing a public meeting in the province of Ontario, narrows his mind to such an extent as to declare that, luckily for Australia, it has no province of Quebec. How can you have union in this country, how can you have harmony in this country when the president of the Council makes such declarations as he did during the last election campaign? How can you have union and concord in this country when a man like the Hon. G. H. Ferguson declares on the floor of the Ontario Legislature that French Canadians are no more needed in the province of Ontario than Germans or Austrians? How can you have union in this country when you have the press of this country insulting Quebec every day? The Orange Sentinel is a sheet which ought to be suppressed. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has declared that Le Devoir ought to be suppressed. I agree with him, but he ought also to agree with me in asking for the suppression of the Orange Sentinel for the same reason. Much to my surprise and astonishment the Prime Minister of this country announced this afternoon that there was a revolution and sedition in Quebec. For a definition of sedition, Mr. Speaker, I would refer you to Article 132 of the Criminal Code, and the decision given by Lord Halsbury in England. If the Prime Minister is sincere in his desire for union and peace among the peoples of this country, let him suppress the Orange Sentinel and have its editor arrested, just as Le Devoir ought to be suppressed and its editor arrested. What is bad in Quebec is no better in Ontario. Let us hope that better days are coming. Let us hope that in the English provinces there will arise a man of the broadmindedness of the former leaders of the parties in this country. Let us hope that Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Oliver Mowat will have worthy successors. Let us hope that once more from Ontario Liberalism will be heard. Let us hope that once more from Ontario a voice will speak as the old Liberals used to speak in this Canada of ours when we used to fight for liberty and freedom. Let us hope the spirit of Lyon Mackenzie, of Mowat, Blake, Ross and Macdonald is not dead. Let us hope that Ontario will again do something for liberalism in Canada. When we have real liberal-minded people in the English-speaking provinces, if they will come to our province, they will be welcomed, because in the province of Quebec there is no narrow-mindedness; we are broadminded. We have sent to this House fifteen English-speaking members elected by fifteen French-speaking constituencies; I should like to know what county in Ontario, with an English-speaking population, would elect a French-speaking candidate. What is the use of wasting our time as we have been doing this afternoon talking about Quebec and Ontario. There should not be any Quebec or Ontario; it should be Canada. So far as I am concerned, in my personal business, I do not ask whether a man comes from Nova Scotia or Saskatchewan, whether he is Irish, Scotch or English; as long as he is an honest respectable Canadian, that is good enough for me. I regret that we in this country have never well understood Canadianism. You may love England. England is the mother country of the vast majority of the people of this country, and it is only natural that English-speaking people should love England. England is lovable on acount of its great institutions and its great history. But why did our forefathers come to this country? They came to settle in a new country, where we could be loyal British subjects in being loyal Canadians, and I think that the moment that the people of this country realize this truth all these small, petty, mean provincial troubles will disappear.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I have no desire at this time of the morning to take up the time of the House, but I believe this is a subject which interests people in Canada at this time more than any other. The people of Canada are anxious to know the reason for the recent disturbances in the city of Quebec, and I have listened with a great deal of attention and interest to the reasons put forth by the speakers on the other side of the House. The last speaker, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) asked a very pertinent question towards the close of his remarks. He asked why we were here. He did not give an answer but I will give one. The majority of the members of this House are here to see that our men overseas get proper reinforcements, to see that every part of Canada, so far as we can make laws to accomplish that purpose, shall provide an equal and fair proportion of those reinforcements. A great many reasons or excuses have been given to-day for the disturbance in Quebec. The reason put forth by the leader of the Opposition was that a certain officer employed by the Department of Justice asked a young man in a very uncivil manner to show his exemption papers, and when he could not do so, arrested him. Consequently, there was a riot, which I believe cost the lives of many innocent citizens. For the benefit of those members who do not understand the circumstances in other provinces, I may say we have exactly the same thing to contend with in Ontario and every other part of Canada. I know one point within a short distance of where I reside where a man may be called upon to show his papers ten times a day. If he boards a train, he has to show them, most assuredly, and show them again before he gets off, and if it is a junction point he may have to show them five or six times in one afternoon; but there are no riots up there; we have killed nobody; we have not had to dig any one out of the snow. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who was on the ground at the time, gave a variety of reasons for the disturbances and incidentally I suppose rehearsed some of his election speech. He said the reason the Military Service Act was enforced upon this country was in order to get rid of the poor habitant of Quebec, send him over to France and get rid of him as soon as possible. If that were our object, we have not been very successful. A few minutes later the hon. gentleman said that there were twenty-five to fifty thousand men on the fields of Picardy to-day from the province of Quebec. I venture to say, and I believe I can say it without danger of successful contradiction, that there has never been in any part of France, 5,000 French Canadians at any one time. It is all right enough to praise the 22nd Battalion, and we do it. We give the French Canadian soldier every credit, and he deserves it, but unfortunately the only infrantry battalion from Quebec which has ever seen France is the 22nd, or about 1,000 men. We know these facts. And as a matter of fact hundreds of men were taken from Alberta and other provinces to reinforce that one single battalion, which is at the front at the present time, and these men were not even French Canadian by origin, but men speaking the English language. The hon. gentleman goes on to tell us that this Act is applied differently—or he infers that this Act is applied differently—in the province of Quebec, and that is the real cause for the riots. He does not say for an instant, that he, as a member of this House, did anything to stop the riots, or counsel these men in a better way, or to lead them in the right way. We have every reason to suppose from his own words that he did nothing to counteract the trouble in Quebec.

Then we come to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). He has a different version, although he says he was present at the time, and he goes very far afield when giving the reasons for the riot in Quebec. But he went into the matter very carefully and he gave the reasons, first, second, third and fourth, and what do you suppose were the reasons which he gave? 1st he says that there was an election in the county of Drummond-Arthabaska, and that the Grit representative was not elected That is reason number one—a Liberal candidate in the Drummond-Arthabaska election in 1910 was defeated. Reason number two is that during the election of 1911, only seven years ago, there was an unholy alliance between the Tories of that time, or some of them, and the Nationalists of Quebec. I do not intend to take the time of this House with the discussion of a matter of this kind. We all know it is absolutely beside the question of the present time, and it is only done for the purpose of camouflaging the real issue as it stands to-day. Reason number three was that the present Postmaster General had been or was drawing a salary of $7,000, and he is not at the present time a member of the House, having been defeated in 1911.

The fourth reason was that Le Devoir had not been suppressed. I think it is idle even to discuss matters of this kind. This gentleman knows perfectly well that the only reason which can be given which will hold good in the matter of the disturbances in the province of Quebec is that these poor misguided men have been deliberately misled by the leaders in the province in which they reside. We know perfectly well that these men of themselves are peaceful, law-abiding citizens, but they have been badly led from time to time, and they have been persuaded that if they would raise certain disturbances, or take certain action, this Government would be weak enough, or supine enough, to allow them to get off, and permit the Act to fall into disuse.

Mr. BUREAU: That is absolutely false.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman says that is absolutely untrue.

Mr. BUREAU: I do.

Mr. ARTHURS: In the riding which I had the honour to represent in the last election this argument was used openly from the platform in places where there were French Canadian voters. It was represented to the voters that if they voted for the candidate supported by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Opposition, he would secure for them immunity so far as military service is concerned, and personally I have not the slightest doubt that was done in every constituency in Canada where it was necessary to get the French Canadian vote.

Mr. BUREAU: Who was the French Canadian leader who stated that in the hon. gentleman's riding?

Mr. ARTHURS: I am not talking about French Canadian leaders, but I refer to the man who opposed me, and his statements were on a parity with the statements of all the French Canadian leaders, and I know the statement was made throughout Ontario.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman said Quebec just now.

Mr. ARTHURS: I believe it was made in Quebec in exactly the same way.

Mr. BUREAU: It was not.

Mr. ARTHURS: Another complaint made by the hon. gentleman from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) was that this Government had got in, and this Act was being enforced—why? Because the late Government had deprived certain citizens of the country of the right to vote; or in other words, that had we given a vote to the alien, the men who had no interest in the country, who knew nothing about our interests, whose interests and leaning and longings were all for the old land of Germany or Austria from which they came, the result would have been different. He suggested that if we had allow these three or four hundred thousand aliens to swamp the vote of the Canadians in this country his party would have been successful, and there would have been no riot in Quebec. I honestly believe that statement is true, but the people of Canada were not so inclined, and at the election on the 17th of December they not only gave this Government a mandate to enforce the Military Service Act, to take the necessary number of men for the reinforcements at the front, but they said that this Act which deprived these Germans of the right to vote as British citizens was absolutely to their liking and was good common sense.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Members of the Cabinet said quite the contrary, and yet the Cabinet has been sustained. The War-time Elections Act was not the policy of the present Government, it was the policy of the preceding Government; and many of the men who sit in the Cabinet to-day denounced it, and quite properly so.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think, Mr. Speaker, that one member to-day, the hon. member for North Simcoe has very properly said that the members behind the Government on this occasion are not rubber stamps, that we have minds of our own, and that we say exactly what we think. If I am asked what I think about that particular measure I will say this: That if the present Government are not in favour of it their judgment is not as good as the judgment of the late Government, because the late Government were absolutely right in passing a measure of that kind. So far as I am personally concerned I believe the verdict of the people on the 17th of December last, means one thing, if no other, namely that the people of Canada gave to this Government, whether they are Unionist or Conservative or whatever they may be, the mandate to support the boys who so sorely need that support to-day. They gave them the right to take, not 100,000 or 200,000, or whatever men were necessary for reinforcements, but they gave their mandate that, so far as humanly possible, every part of Canada should do its share in supplying men. I think it is idle to give excuses. I think the representatives of Quebec would employ their time far better if they would apologize for the occurrences in Quebec, instead of trying to defend them.

Mr. T. VIEN (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, your French Canadian colleagues, and especially the residents of the city of Quebec, who are members of this House, have a special interest in the subject-matter of the present debate. In both of these capacities, I feel that it is my duty not to remain silent. No doubt we are passing through a serious stage. Overseas millions of men are engaged in the fight, and we are proud indeed that in this battle for the supremacy of civilization and democracy, we count hundreds of thousands of our compatriots. Two weeks ago the struggle entered upon what many believe to be its final stage. I think, as has been pointed out by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), it is beyond question that very much depends upon the issue, and the hearts of the people of the whole country are lifted up in intercession that the right may prevail. It is therefore deplorable beyond expression that at such a time as this an ugly outbreak and disturbance of the peace should occur, in this country. For us Quebeckers and French Canadians it is sickening and almost unbelievable to think that such shocking incidents should take place in our dear, old, peaceful city of Quebec. Nobody resents it more than we do. For the outsider the incident will have only an historic importance. Many will come to Quebec to visit the spot where it occurred, to see the places where the machine guns were laid on the mob and to see the streets where the men fell. But we Quebeckers who live there shall constantly have a remembrance of the disgrace that took place last week.

By what I have been able to gather, from what has been said by hon. members on the other side of the House, the necessity for the drastic enactments contained in the Orders in Council laid on the table of the House was due to the lack of response on the part of the French Canadians to the appeal to them to willingly enlist, either under the system of voluntary recruiting or since the Compulsory Military Service Act was brought into force.

Sir, allow me to take exception to that statement. There is no lack of ideals on the part of the French Canadians. The ideals of the French Canadians are not emotions and passions, as was stated a few moments ago. The patriotism of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec lies in a clear comprehension of the true interests of this country. This clear comprehension, Sir, is not alone the heritage or the property of the French Canadians. The clear comprehension of the interests of every country has been the decisive motive that has led every country and dictated the action of every country in this war. What did the English statesmen consider before they decided to enter the war on the side of France and the other Allies? A few days before the declaration of war the French Ambassador at Petrograd, in consultation with his Russian colleague, tried to induce the English Ambassador to make a formal declaration that England would be on the side of France and Russia if war broke out. What did Sir Edward Grey instruct his ambassador to respond? He said that England would not side in the war with France and Russia unless British interests required it. That is contained clearly in the diplomatic papers. The French Ambassador urged England to declare that she would be on the side of France and Russia, and he went so far as to say that if such a declaration were made war would not be declared by Germany. Notwithstanding that, English diplomacy stood by the contention that England would not enter the war unless British interests required it. While Sir Edward Grey was declaring that unless British interests would lead England into the war——

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker, ——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I was held down pretty closely to the rules and I would suggest to you that the hon. member is travelling pretty far from the question before the House.

Mr. VIEN: I understand the point of the order raised, but I made an assertion, and what I am saying is preliminary to establishing it. I made the assertion that the French Canadians in the province of Quebec comprehended the interests of this country, and that in looking at the situation purely from the point of view of Canadian interests, they are acting in the same way as the British diplomats did. I do not blame England for having considered British interests before committing the country to war. We considered that Canadian interests were at stake and we looked at that directly. A few months after the declaration of war a message of the President of the United States was issued urging the people of that country to stay neutral because that was in the interest of the United States. Only after three years had passed did the United States enter the war. Did they enter the war when Belgium was invaded, when France was attacked and invaded? No, Sir, during those three years the United States, following the same course, doing business as usual, were trading with Germany and Austria, were supplying the enemies of the Allies with munitions, food and weapons to invade Belgium and France, But one day German submarines came across the ocean, American ships were sunk and American lives were lost. One day the Lusitania was sunk and hundreds of Americans perished. Then the United States entered the war because American interests were at stake. I say, Sir, that true Canadian patriotism must not be carried off its feet simply by the fixed idea that the war can be run only with men, that the war can be won only through the instrumentality of the Military Service Act, and that even if we take another standpoint we are not patriots and true Canadians.

Sir, it has been stated to-day that we did not respond to the Military Service Act, and that has aroused the sentiment of the population of the other provinces against the province of Quebec. We have sent four hundred thousand men overseas, we have spent almost two thousand million dollars, and we now stand alongside the United States, who, for three years, have enriched themselves with the millions derived from trading with Germany, and who during that period did not send a single man overseas. If we are allied in this war we are partners in the same enterprise and to the same end; but in a partnership every partner must do his duty. What would you think of two merchants, partners in a store if one would go in the morning and open the store, sell to customers the whole day long and put money in the cash box when it was empty, and the other would go at nine o'clock, smoke a cigar, simply chat with the customers, take one half of the earnings when he required it, and walk away at night? Such a partnership would not be fair, and would not long continue. Sir, if we are partners in the war the United States must do their share, and they have the men to enable them to do so. It is useless to contend that Canada must send one hundred thousand men more to win the war; the men are not required. The men are required only for the political purposes of those who apply the Military Service Act. Why do the Americans refrain from sending men to the front? Their contention is that they have no ships. How is it, then, that after sending overseas four hundred thousand men we have the vessels wherewith to send one hundred thousand more, and yet the Americans have no ships for the transportation of their soldiers?

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (Perth N.): Where does the hon. gentleman get the information that no American troops have been sent overseas?

Mr. VIEN: I do not say that no American troops have been sent, but I take the declaration of the United States Minister of War for anything I say in this regard. A certain number of American troops have gone overseas, but there are two million men now available in the United States. Why do not the United States send those two million men across the ocean? Because they say, they have no ships with which to transport them.

Mr. CURRIE: Is the hon. gentleman trying to make the argument that Canada should not reinforce her men at the front, but leave them to die like rats in the trenches until such time as two million Americans were sent over? If so what has that got to do with the resolution before the House?

Mr. VIEN: I was coming to that point. I am trying to make that point clear to the minds of my English-speaking friends. I have often discussed the matter with them, and I have met with the same objection that the hon. member for North Simcoe has now raised. I say that the contention of the Government is simply a matter of pride, a matter of fulfilling a promise which was certainly made without due consideration. Why should we keep five divisions, or four divisions, or two divisions at the front? If, Sir, we have sufficient men to maintain two divisions at the front and two divisions in the rear, let us keep two divisions in the rear. Sir, we must not forget—and this is an answer to my hon. friend, the contradictor,—that France handed over a portion of its front to England, that England assigned a portion of its front to Canada. Why should not Canada to-day hand over a portion of its front to the United States? We have for three years during the war done our duty. Why should we not now, when we are called upon to make a greater effort, allow our partners in the war to do, not better than we have done, but just as much. Sir, this is the point of view of many French Canadians. They look at the matter from a purely Canadian point of view, because it will not be in the interests of Canada to ruin the human, the vital force of the Dominion, and ruin its credit.

In so far as the sending of 100,000 men overseas is essential to the winning of the war, if it were so, I would immediately approve of it, but I say that it is not essential, because if a hundred thousand Canadians were kept here, a hundred thousand Americans could be sent overseas to do their duty and take their share, and in that light we view the true interest of the Canadian people. We are not in Canada for one year or for twenty-five years; we must foresee the after-the-war conditions, and in so doing must consider to what extent our effort financially, and in so far as man power is concerned, must go.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? There are, I believe 4,000 odd French Canadians fighting bravely at the front. Does the argument of the hon. gentleman mean that no further French Canadians should go to support them, and that we should depend upon Americans to support those brave French Canadians at the front?

Mr. VIEN: That is not at all my argument. I take a much wider, a Canadian, point of view. I am not making any discrimination or undue distinction between any portion of the elements of Canada in the ranks of our troops overseas, and in so far as that is concerned, to answer my hon. friend, I might point out what I heard said in a speech at Niagara. When British-born citizens came to settle in Canada before the war, I learn from reliable sources, there was a certain appellation applied to them. They were called "English sparrows" in some circles here, because the English sparrow has had the bad characteristic of going to its neighbour's nest and eating the eggs. When the war broke out, what occurred? The province of Ontario was glad to rank and to number among her sons 60,000 of these "English sparrows," who were not Canadian-born. We had no "English sparrows" in the province of Quebec. The men who have been sent overseas from our stock are Canadian-born citizens.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And many more than four thousand.

Mr. MORPHY: The number is 4,826.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, Sir, I have it from a chaplain who was there from the beginning. There are over twenty thousand French Canadians at the front, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. VIEN: I want to make this argument to show that the population of the province of Quebec were not carried away by simple emotion and passion. They are directed in their conduct during the war by a true understanding of the real interest of Canada and they are foreseeing post bellum conditions.

I have answered the hon. gentleman who said that we were carried away simply by emotion and passion. Let us come now to the sad events which have occurred in Quebec. A complete statement of the facts is now in the possession of the House, and they have been ably narrated by hon. members who have already spoken. I do not wish to cover the ground again, but I think that too great stress cannot be placed upon the fact that among the population of the province of Quebec the disturbance has received the unreserved condemnation of the great mass of all classes. The churches, the liberal professions, the industrial commercial and labor leaders, and the local press have unanimously joined in reprobating it. To bear me out in that statement, and to leave no doubt whatever in the minds of hon. gentlemen, allow me to invoke the unimpeachable testimony of Major General Lessard himself. On the 3rd April, in his statement to the press, as I read it in the five o'clock edition of the Ottawa Journal, he qualifies the whole incident as "the disgraceful conduct of a small number indeed of irresponsible persons inspired and directed by outside agents." I have cited his words textually. That fact was absolutely evident to everybody down there. I was in Quebec on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and although not an eyewitness of everything that occured, I have made it a point to collect reliable information right at the scene of the disturbance. On the 2nd of April, the Prime Minister made a statement to this House which appears on page 250 of the unrevised Hansard. I cannot agree with my right hon. friend in so far as his appreciation of the action of the local police is concerned, but in the main his statement is corroborated by the subsequent reports laid on the Table. Allow me to make a very brief summary of what took place and of what the Prime Minister said.

The incidents commenced on Thursday evening. On that evening some Dominion officers were pursued and sustained some injuries from the handling to which they were subjected, but nothing more of importance—I cite the very words of the Prime Minister—seems to have occurred that evening. On Friday an attack was made on the registry office which was ransacked, but very little loss of important documents occurred. The same evening two newspaper offices were attacked and damaged, but there was no great material loss, and there was no bloodshed. On Saturday evening there was some disorder, the mob appeared very unruly, and military patrols of the local garrison were ordered out, but still there was no bloodshed. That is all that occurred before the active intervention of the military, according to the Prime Minister's own statement, and as supplemented by the reports published in Hansard. It is greatly to be regretted that the newspapers were at first supplied by the Canadian Press with grossly erroneous and exaggerated reports.

The Canadian Press was most unfortunate indeed in the choice of its local representative; or else if the events were correctly reported, and afterwards viciously exaggerated before they were communicated to the newspapers, that is tantamount to an odious conspiracy, and the public has the right to know what influences were brought to bear on the official of the Canadian press and for what purpose this course was taken.

As soon as the disorder broke out, with an apparently commanded unanimity, the press interpreted it as a general loosening of a previously determined and well-organized opposition on the part of the population of the whole province against the application of the Military Service Act. As if to excite a still greater animosity against Quebec, the first disturbance, which now boils down to a simple row, was greatly exaggerated. Belanger, the Government spotter, was reported dying in a hospital, whereas he had simply been black-eyed and had returned home unmolested during the day. Those who have visited the auditorium since the occurrence know that the fire damaged only a few rooms. The breaking of a few windows in the auditorium annex and the commencement of fire, easily extinguished, were reported as the complete wrecking of the whole auditorium and its destruction by fire. What the Prime Minister sums up as a very small loss of important records—Hansard page 250—was reported to be the destruction of all the records absolutely essential to the successful application of the Act in Quebec. Immediately after, again with an apparently commanded unanimity, the press intoned a hymn of hate against the oldest province of the Dominion, against one third of the population of this country. This was the prelude to an equally unanimous appeal to the Government for a sturdy treatment of Quebec, which course the Prime Minister later announced and which we now know has been followed. The conduct of the Canadian Press was in the first place, extremely dangerous, as likely to inflame against each other, as it did, the already excited minds of English and French-speaking people, and as likely to drive the rioters to further excesses. Secondly, it created in the minds of the people the impression that the population of the city and the province at large were backing the disturbance, which, we know, was contrary to the fact. I am pleased to see that as soon as the various newspapers had time to send a special representative to the scene, they immediately proclaimed that the great mass of the population disapproved the movement. As General Lessard puts it, the whole affair was the result of the disgraceful conduct of a small number indeed of irresponsible persons, inspired and directed by outside aid. But the harm was done, and a thorough investigation should be made to place the responsibility where it should lie. The press is a power in this country, but the essential condition of the privileges and liberties which it enjoys is that it should not become mischievous and a danger to public peace. On the other hand, the newspapers which in good faith published reports received from the Canadian press should see that they are not deceived in future, and that the offenders are punished. Before long it is not improbable that we shall know what influence was brought to bear on the official of the Canadian press to cause it to give out such grossly exaggerated reports.

Let us now consider the intervention of the military, and whether it was justified by the facts. All members of the House will agree that in such a riot or outbreak the first consideration of the officers should be that of preventing bloodshed. Bloodshed is the most regrettable incident of the whole affair. On the first evening some Dominion officers suffered injury through the handling to which they were subjected. On the second evening the registry office was ransacked, but little loss of important records occurred. The newspaper offices were wrecked, but there was no bloodshed, and the mayor thought that he could deal with the situation; that military assistance was not required. But by reference to Hansard, page 300, it will be seen that the Government intervened; they sent to Quebec a Toronto regiment, which paraded the streets with machine guns; and then the bloodshed took place. Happily the situation is now well under control. To many the action of the Government in causing the military to intervene in the Quebec trouble will appear to be a strong and commendable move. I shall agree with them if such a course was, first, in conformity with the cardinal principles of British Government; second, in conformity with the law of this country; third, justified by the facts; fourth, prudently carried out. We all agree that peace and good order must prevail; their maintenance is the very object of the existence of public institutions. Strong action on the part of the public authority in its proper sphere is desirable. The aid of the military and the civil power in some circumstances is also desirable, and it is especially provided for by the law. But, on the other hand, it has always been a cardinal principle of British government that the military power should be the servant, not the master, of the civil authority. Our compatriots the Orangemen—I shall call them my compatriots, for they are Canadians and so am I—my compatriots, the Orangemen of this country, still gloriously celebrate on the 12th July the Battle of the Boyne. But the Battle of the Boyne was the final incident of a big revolution. The real results of the revolution had been previously embodied in 1689 in the Bill of Rights which supplemented the Magna Charta. Among other things laid down in the Bill of Rights was the denial of the two things against which we are now fighting—the Divine right of Kings or Kaiserism—and secondly, militarism. To deny the Divine right of Kings, the Bill of Rights provided that the civil list which up to that time it had been customary to vote for life on the accession of each sovereign would in future be voted yearly. To safeguard against militarism and to prevent the Army from being controlled by the King, the Bill provided that the Army Act should also be voted yearly. King William III, one of the greatest soldiers who ever sat upon the British throne, only came to the throne by solemnly abjuring the exaltation of the military over the civil power. These principles are the rock bottom upon which is based the British Constitution, and they constantly receive the wholehearted support of every true Englishman.

These principles have received constant application, in Great Britain, the United States and Canada. The United States went so far as to wage the War of Independence to guard against the enforcement of an obnoxious tax by armed force. In Canada this Parliament has restricted by statute the interference of the military power in civil affairs, even for the maintenance of peace and good order. Our Militia Act not only specifies the case in which the militia can be called out in aid of the civil power, but carefully prescribes the procedure, which is supplemented by the King's Regulations. It will be illuminating at this moment to read the provisions of the Militia Act, contained in section 80 and the following sections of chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

80. The Active Militia, or any corps thereof, shall be liable to be called out, within or without the municipality in which such corps is raised or organized, for active service, with their arms and ammunition, in aid of the civil power, in any case in which a riot or disturbance of the peace requiring such service occurs, or is, in the opinion of the civil authority hereinafter designated in that behalf, anticipated as likely to occur, and, in either case, beyond the powers of the civil authorities to suppress, or to prevent or deal with.

81. The district officer commanding in any locality, if he is present in the locality and able to act, or if he is not so present, or from sickness or other cause is unable to act, the senior officer of the Active Militia in any locality, not from sickness or other cause unable to act, shall call out the Active Militia, or such portion thereof as he considers necessary for the purpose of preventing or suppressing any such actual or anticipated riot or disturbance, when thereunto required in writing by the civil authority hereinafter designated in that behalf: Provided that so far as the Permanent Force is available, a sufficient number of the Force is to be employed upon the duty of preventing or suppressing such actual or anticipated riot or disturbance before recourse is had to other militia corps, and shall replace such other militia corps if so called out upon duty so soon as and to the extent the Permanent Force shall thereafter become available.

The Act specifically provides that the active militia shall not be called out on active service unless required, in writing, by the civil authority. We have also the British North America Act, which entrusts the provincial legislatures with the maintenance of peace and good order, with authority to enact police regulations. In this country, as well as in England and the United States, the police organizations are essentially municipal, and everything pertaining to municipal matters comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial authority. (British North America Act, section 92, pp. 8 and 16.) These principles have been upheld time and again by the Privy Council. Thus, in British institutions the military power is made the servant of the civil authority. Our Constitution leaves to the province the maintenance of peace and good order in all municipal affairs. Even in the administration of justice the provincial Attorney General is the proper authority. The Militia Act limits to very specific cases the intervention of the military power, in aid and upon the request of the civil authorities.

Let us now come back to the complete facts of this case. The disturbance of the peace was local in character. At first there was no bloodshed, but some government policemen were roughly handled, a few windows were broken, some documents destroyed and building set on fire. The police could not prevent everything, but they did prevent bloodshed. The general officer commanding assures the mayor that military assistance is available, but the mayor declares that he can deal with the situation, that military assistance is not required, and that he is able to cope alone with any outbreak. This is contained in the statement laid on the Table by the Prime Minister himself, and reported on page 300 of Hansard. In such a case was the Government justified in calling on the military to intervene? No, Sir. The cardinal principles of British government, the constitutional laws of this country, the special Act provided to govern the militia, condemn the Government and the military authorities. Until then no bloodshed had taken place. It was only when the Government had chosen to reinforce the garrison at Quebec, and bring into action all the military machinery, that blood was shed. Was that course justified? The Prime Minister himself has taken the trouble to give evidence to the country. (Hansard, page 250.) An adequate effort by the local authority would have put down the disturbance. Then, surely in the case of failure by the municipal authorities, an appeal from them to the local garrison would have been amply sufficient.

The mayor was in conference with the general officer commanding and was supplied by him with a copy of the Riot Act. He proceeded to the place of the disturbance and succeeded in reducing the effect of the disturbance, the result being that while some windows were smashed, there was very little loss of property. Without authority and without necessity, the federal authority inflamed the smouldering embers by bringing to Quebec a Toronto regiment. Other cities in the past have been the theatre of such deplorable incidents, but the military authorities never intervened before being called upon to lend assistance to the civil powers, as provided by law. What would the good people of Toronto say if, in order to quell a disturbance in that city, a Quebec regiment were sent there with machine guns. They would pelt with rocks and stones the damned Frenchmen from Quebec. Excuse the expression, but I want to be accurate —they would shoot at them with firearms of various kinds. This is what was done in Quebec. (See Prime Minister's speech, Hansard page 251). The facts narrated by the Prime Minister would never justify such an outrageous intervention by the militia. This was a gross and most imprudent transgression of the law. This incident exemplifies the soundness of the principles laid down by the right hon. leader of the Opposition; that is to say, the desirability of at all times following the law. The fact that one illegality will lead to another and as a logical consequence——

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order. We are starting a new Parliament. I am quite willing the leader of the House should make a statement from written notes, but I think it is time we drew the line at these long drawn speeches being read off by members of the House.

Mr. VIEN: I understand the point of order, and I am willing to submit to it. I will explain the reason of it before the ruling is given. It was simply to get through more rapidly and save the time of the House.

Mr. CURRIE: Take it as read.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule of the House is very explicit that written speeches may not be used.

Mr. VIEN: As a consequence of this transgression of the law by the Government, and the outrage on the people of Quebec by calling Toronto regiments to parade in their streets with machine guns—

Mr. CURRIE: I again call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman has not obeyed the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman from West Simcoe rises again to a point of order, and says that the hon. gentleman is not obeying the rule, but that he persists in reading the speech.

Mr. VIEN: I will abide by your ruling, but I think that my hon. friend is very severe, indeed, in the application of the rule, on this side of the House, but he himself was called to order many times by the Chair when he delivered his own address. He is very severe indeed towards a new member of this House delivering a speech in a tongue not his own. If my hon. friend were to deliver a speech in French he might be obliged to use some notes, and to read them, and I am paying to the majority of this House the compliment of speaking in their own tongue, although the French is an official language in this country. It seems to me that I am badly repaid for my goodwill. I will simply have to take a little more time, because the rule which prevents me reading my notes does not prevent me from consulting them. I said, Sir, that, as a consequence of this transgression, and of the outrage to the people of Quebec by calling Toronto regiments to Quebec to march through their streets with machine guns, the excitement of the mob naturally greatly increased, and then only did bloodshed ocur. The Prime Minister has endeavoured to shirk responsibility from his shoulders, and to very generously shift it to the municipal authorities of Quebec, stating, and I might be allowed to use this note to quote, textually, the words of the Prime Minister, so that my hon. friend might not take exception to it. At page 251 he said:

> The disturbance might have been put down without much difficulty, if proper effort had been made by civic authorities.

The Prime Minister, to my mind, only succeeded in clearly establishing that the affair was a purely local one, such as occasionally occurs in every city, and nothing warranted the nation-wide importance which was given to it by the press and by the Government. The Government which so forcibly declared its intention to see that the law is strictly adhered to gave us a very poor example of obedience to the law. As wrong is ordinarily followed by wrong, and as one illegality leads to another, the military intervention has caused serious bloodshed, the responsibility for which lies exclusively with the Government. The Prime Minister's insinuation that the local authorities were not disposed to observe public order is not worthy of his high office. (Page 251 of Hansard). No statement is less warranted by the facts. In the state of excitement of the mob, the police did very well, indeed, to prevent bloodshed and limit the effect of the disturbance to rough handling of some undiscriminating Government spotters. The breaking of a few windows and a little loss of important records were all that occurred. The disorder, Sir, would surely have died away with no other consequences, had not the Government been guilty of a very unwise, ill-timed, unlawful and outrageous intervention. During this occurrence, the local authorities showed great wisdom and consideration, and knowledge of the character of the population. The Government, if not actuated by political motives, have not shown justifiable grounds for their action and their intervention. The Orders in Council which have been laid on the Table of the House involve a serious departure from the ordinary course of constitutional law in England. Disturbances more serious than the riots at Quebec have occurred in England and Ireland and the Government of England did not see fit to suspend the constitution of the country. Might I cite one instance in which the Government of Great Britain might have been justified in taking drastic steps? Will my friends the Orangemen of this country kindly remember what occurred when King Carson organized an army of 60,000 men to resist the application of Home Rule? He armed these men with the outspoken intention of resisting the application of the law. Did the British Government suspend the constitution? Did the British Government recall the Magna Charta or the Bill of Rights? No such thing was done. British institutions were strictly adhered to. What did England itself do in Ireland during this war? A Military Service Act was enacted in England. Was it applied to Ireland? No. Why? Because the Irish people did not want it.

Mr. BOYCE: What have we to do with Ireland? The hon. gentleman has travelled all over the world.

Mr. VIEN: I am citing these instances to show that the Government, on the present occasion, put aside the constitution of the country, that they were not justified by the circumstances and that they will find no precedent to sustain their conduct in this regard. They will not find any precedent in England, in Ireland, in Australia, in America or any place in the world.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Except Germany.

Mr. VIEN: Except Germany, and I was coming to that. We are fighting against Kaiserism, against bossism, against Prussianism. What are these appellations? What do they mean? They mean the encroachment of an organized military Government against the freedom of modern democracy. If we want to make the world free for democracy, which is stated to be the intention of the allied countries, we must not follow the same path that the Kaiser has followed on the other side. We must not introduce into this country Prussianism and Kaiserism with their results.

Canadian blood has been shed in Quebec. A few years ago a great strike broke out in France. The employees of the various public utilities quit work. The telegraphers and the railway employees left their employment. They organized themselves to prevent others from working in connection with the public utilities. The Prime Minister of France then took the necessary steps to put down the disturbance and after having used all his power to accomplish that result he was able to go to the French Parliament and to show to the whole world that his hands were clean of French blood. I very much regret indeed to say that after the repression of the Quebec riot the Prime Minister of this country is not able to say to this country that in suppressing that local disturbance his hands are clean of Canadian blood.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Yes, and innocent blood.

Mr. VIEN: And innocent blood. It is a most regrettable incident. It is a most unfortunate feature of that incident that it should have been given such grossly exaggerated proportions, that it should have caused the Government to set aside the principles of British Government. There is an incipient apprehension in this country and in this House when we see the constant trend in the political movement in the direction of superseding the civil power by the military power. What is the real effect of the Orders in Council which have been laid on the Table of the House? The real effect, Sir, is to take away the judicial power from the properly constituted authority, and to vest and merge it in the executive power. This has never been done under the British flag since the Bill of Rights. It is now twenty minutes after two, and I will no longer occupy the attention of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear .

Mr. VIEN: Some of my friends on the other side appear to think that I have taken too much time already.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Go on.

Mr. VIEN: We will certainly not be afraid of whatever threat the Government of Canada choose to hold out to the French Canadian element, or to the province of Quebec. We are law-abiding citizens. We were equally so under voluntary enlistment law, because there was no compulsion then. We are still law-abiding citizens when we take advantage of the provisions of the Act to enforce our civil rights, and I think it is a vicious insinuation to characterize the action of the French Canadians in that respect as absolutely unpatriotic, as was done this afternoon. I think that if a better understanding of the French Canadian point of view were arrived at by the English-speaking side of the House no such thing would be possible. I think that through a more intimate intercourse we could come to understand each other's point of view more intelligently and more closely. We do not criticize the English-speaking element of Canada, neither do we want to impose our views on them. We do not wish to enact laws to govern them, our desire is that they shall be free to do as they please under the British flag. But, at the same time, Sir, we claim the same privileges for ourselves. If this is a free country, and we are to continue to enjoy the liberty to which we are entitled, all will be well. But I say that the provisions contained in the Order in Council laid on the Table to-day are opposed to that liberty, and if they are put into force I am afraid this beautiful Canada of ours will not be a happy country to live in. I am afraid that grave danger of disruption is impending, and that the Government is not taking the necessary steps to eliminate that danger in the future. As I have already said, we are law-abiding citizens, and we will continue to be so, but there is not the slightest reason why a vicious reflection should be made on the character of a whole population because of the occurrence of a riot of a merely local character.

Mr. D. L. REDMAN (Calgary, E.): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I would be doing very much less than my duty to my constituents who elected me to Parliament on the 17th of December last, to say nothing of ignoring my own very strong feelings on the subject, were I to remain silent and not to express my views on the subject under discussion. I come not from Ontario, nor from any part of Quebec, where possibly historic conditions may be responsible for local feeling or prejudices, but from western Canada, where I can assure you there is no feeling or prejudice against any nationality or any special race. In the West we regard ourselves as Canadians and we think that answers all requirements. For us there are no especially favoured communities; and we feel that as Canadians, as members of a free community of the British Empire we have very great rights and privileges, and that it is our duty now, and whenever occasion may demand, to fight as fully as may be in our power for those rights and privileges. I do not think I am taking an unreasonable view in expressing the belief that the willingness to fight for the rights and privileges we enjoy should be coexistent with their enjoyment. I am absolutely free, as I believe the people generally in our province are absolutely free, from any prejudice. But we do feel, for two reasons—first, that we need the men, and secondly, because the province from which I come, and perhaps other parts of Canada have done more towards sending men overseas than have been done in the province of Quebec—that more men should be sent to the firing line from that province. The mandate which was given to me, equally, I believe, with the mandate which was given to other members who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, on the 17th of December last, was that we should come to Ottawa and do our utmost to enforce the Military Service Act, not only in a similar manner in each province, but also that like results should be obtained from one end of Canada to the other. That, I feel, is the reason that I was sent here by my constituents, and, to be frank, I have grave doubts as to whether I was sent here for any other reason. Such being the case and such being my own personal belief and feeling, I intend to do what little I can here to see that the Act in question is carried out absolutely and entirely.

As regards the riots that have taken place in Quebec, I do not think the Government have gone too far in the way in which they have attempted, and have to some extent succeeded in enforcing this Act in that province. The previous enlistments in the province of Quebec for service overseas were not nearly as great as in other parts of Canada, and while, under the Military Service Act, one hundred and seventeen thousand men have registered—there are still a great many who have not done so—the province of Quebec has sent overseas only some three thousand, or less. Under the circumstances it seems to me that we have a right to demand that more men shall be obtained from that province. I believe that the enforcement of the Military Service Act up to date in the province of Quebec has not been successful. Therefore, it is necessary for such changes to be made in the Act as will ensure a greater degree of success. I wish to congratulate the Government on the Orders in Council dealing with this subject which they have brought down. I believe that each and every one of them will make the Military Service Act more successful, and our opinion is that the changes necessary to render the Act more successful must be made.

I feel that if it is not made successful, and that if we do not obtain, and obtain speedily, from the province of Quebec as many soldiers to go overseas as the rest of Canada has furnished, each and every one of us who have come here with very, very clear orders given on the 17th day of December, will have failed to do our duty in carrying out our instructions, and that we are not worthy to represent the people who have sent us here.

I have listened to-day to various speeches by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, in which they have professed a willingness to obey the law, and to participate, as far as Canada is concerned, fairly and equally in this war. I am not going to say what may be the actual beliefs or feelings of those hon. gentlemen, but it does occur to me, after listening to their speeches, that the result of their words cannot in any sense be calculated to cause those who follow them to be more anxious or more likely to obey the law; nor do I think that the consequence or effect of their words will in any way increase recruiting. By the plainest of logic, and the use of the most ordinary commonsense, one cannot come to the conclusion that these hon. gentlemen are very anxious to assist recruiting or exceedingly anxious that the law should be obeyed. I would not care to be in the position of those hon. gentlemen, who can exercise influence over their people to the proper end, and who have influenced them in the manner which they have taken here to-day. Various arguments have been put up, the usual arguments we have heard before, that these men should be retained at home for food production. Food production and other industries are all very fine. But men are needed at the front, and when men go overseas, very often they get killed, and each part of Canada should bear its share of that risk. I know of no reason why that should not be.

I would remind hon. gentlemen that they are here to-day enjoying the rights and privileges of British citizenship, and while they are right in protecting those rights and privileges, if we do not send men overseas, and if we do not do our part, and others do not do theirs, we shall see such a sweeping away of British rights and privileges that there will be none left. I have seen the work of the Germans. I have been overseas and have seen them doing their work. And we on this side are doing what should be done in this country to preserve these various rights and privileges, about which we have heard so much talk.

Another point which is very significant to me is that these riots have broken out at the exact period when overseas we can almost see the fate of our country and of these British rights and privileges, the fate of all that I consider to be decent and worth living for in this world, trembling in the balance. And it occurs to me that, at a time when people who think at all upon these subjects are in a state of great anxiety as to what may occur, those people in Quebec who engaged in these riots and those in sympathy with them have given very significant evidence of their feelings towards the struggle in which we are engaged, and I think the Government should take that fact into consideration. I do not believe that, even with the Orders in Council that have come down, the Military Service Act now will get the men we will have to have as speedily as we require them, and I believe the Government will have to make even more drastic changes in this Act in order to give to Canada, the Empire and the world the men needed at this moment, in order to keep faith with the people who sent us here on the 17th of December.

One more point. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stated to-day that riots had burst forth in different parts of Canada, and referred to the city of Calgary, one of the constituencies of which I have the honour to represent. The riots which took place there occurred some years ago. They were not against the Military Service Act, or against the authorities, but they were riots which broke out against the property of various persons whom the soldiers there believed to be Germans, and who, in some cases, were of German sympathy. That was the nature of the riots which took place in Calgary.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, although the debate has already been very extensive, I feel it my duty to add a few words. In commencing, I must state that, although I believe the Military Service Act was introduced to the House with the predominating idea of winning the election rather than of winning the war, and was only camouflage of the same sort as was used in 1911, yet I believe that the law must be obeyed, and that we should all regret the riots which occurred at Quebec last week. If, Mr. Speaker, you will listen to me for a few moments I believe I can prove to your satisfaction that these troubles have been partly brought about by lack of tact on the part of the Government, as well as by the unfair attacks, endorsed by the Government, of the English-speaking papers, not only of Canada, but of the United States and of England.

It is obvious to me that since the Military Service Act came into force, the sun has not risen once without insults and unjustified attacks being made on the province of Quebec and the Catholics. It would only be repeating what everybody in this House knows and has read about, if I were to enumerate the unanimous accusations of the English press to the effect that the province of Quebec is not obeying the law. You can conceive, Mr. Speaker, how the ultra-loyalists of the province of Ontario would have resented attacks of that nature, and to what extremes they would have gone, if the French press had daily said that Ontario was less obedient to the law than the province of Quebec. I am going to prove to you that it is a fact, not by argument or deduction, but by merciless statistics. I do not want to bring this as a criticism, but only to show the unfairness of these attacks.

On the 12th of January, 1918, the population of Ontario was 2,582,000, that of Quebec, 2,263,000. The men of Class 1 conscriptable in Ontario numbered 153,066, and those in Quebec, 124,343. How many of them registered? On January 12th, 1918, in Ontario, 127,750, and in Quebec, 117,104. Then in the loyal province of Ontario, on January 12th, 1918, there were 27,316 deserters, while in Quebec there were only 7,239. In Ontario, 118,128 claimed exemption, and in Quebec 115,707; in Ontario 94,197 exemptions were granted, and in Quebec 89,575. In Ontario there were 21,276 appeals from local tribunals, and in Quebec 27,683. But while the majority of appeals in Ontario were made by the applicants for exemption, the majority of appeals in Quebec were made by the military authorities. Of 23,931 demands for exemption disallowed in Ontario, 13,293 conscripts only submitted to the decision, while out of 26,132 demands for exemption disallowed in Quebec, 23,564 conscripts submitted to the decision of the tribunals. The military authorities appealed from 25,115 local decisions in Quebec, and from only 10,638 in Ontario. The proportion of appeals in the province of Quebec by the military authorities was 90 per cent, and in Ontario 50 per cent, and furthermore on the 5th of March 1918 there were 1,337 deserters in Toronto, 384 in Kingston making 1,721 in these two Ontario cities while Montreal had 708 and Quebec 36, a total of only 744. Should we wonder, therefore, why the newspapers have been saying that appeals in Quebec have been hindering the application of the law? The hindrance comes not from the citizens of Quebec, but from the Government. And there is another point to consider. In Ontario 91 county judges are hearing appeals, while in Quebec only 34 judges of the Superior Court are so engaged. These figures clearly establish that the province from which the illustrious mover of this resolution comes has not complied with the law to the extent that the province of Quebec has. Can you imagine what would have happened if the roles had been reversed and Ontario had voted against the Act, as Quebec did, and had then been asked to comply with the law? My imagination forcibly gives me the vision of scenes similar to those which were enacted in this country, when the forefathers of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) pelted the carriage of Lord Elgin with bricks and rotten eggs and burned the parliament buildings. I will read from the book of Archibald MacMechan on The Winning of Popular Government a few paragraphs concerning this incident in our history. They are as follows:

Lord Elgin is speaking himself; this was in 1849.

When I left the House of Parliament, I was received with mingled cheers and hootings by a crowd by no means numerous, which surrounded the entrance of the building. A small knot of individuals consisting, it has since been ascertained, of persons of a respectable class in society, pelted the carriage with missiles which they must have brought with them for the purpose.

The article continues:

The "missiles" which could not be picked up in the street were rotten eggs. One of them struck Lord Elgin in the face. That was the Canadian method of expressing disapproval of a governor general for acting in strict accordance with the principles of responsible government. But this was only part of the price he had to pay for doing right. Worse was to follow.

Immediately after this outrage a notice was issued from one of the newspapers calling an open-air meeting in the Champ de Mars. Towards evening the excitement increased, and the fire-bells jangled a tocsin to call the people into the streets. The Champ de Mars soon filled with a tumultous mob, roaring its approbation of wild speeches which denounced the "tyranny " of the governor general and the Reformers. A cry arose, "To the Parliament House!" and the mob streamed westward, wrecking in its passage the office of Hincks's paper the Pilot. The House was in session, and though warned by Sir Allan MacNab that a riot was in progress, it hesitated to take the extreme step of calling out the military to protect its dignity. At this time the whole police force of the city numbered only seventy-two men, and, in emergencies, law and order were maintained with the aid of the regiments in garrison, or by a force of special constables. Soon the House found that Sir Allan's warning was against no imaginary danger. Volleys of stones suddenly crashed through the lighted windows, and the members fled for their lives. The rabble flowed into the building and took possession of the Assembly hall. Here they broke in pieces the furniture, the fittings, the chandeliers. One of the rioters, a man with a broken nose, seated himself in the Speaker's chair and shouted, "I dissolve this House." It seems like a scene from a Paris émeute rather than an actual event in a staid Canadian city. Soon a cry was heard. "The Parliament House is on fire." Another band of rioters had set the western wing alight, and, in a quarter of an hour, the whole building was a mass of flames. Although the firemen turned out promptly, they were forcibly prevented by the mob from doing their duty, until the soldiers came to their support, and then it was too late to save the building. Next day only the ruined walls were standing. The Library of Parliament was burned in spite of efforts to save it, and the student of Canadian history will always mourn the loss of irreplaceable records and manuscripts in that tragic blaze.

Now, what was the reason for this affray? Was it because the lives of the English-speaking citizens were endangered, was it because their institutions or their religion were threatened? Had there been any violence or exactions? No, the reason was that the Governor General had sanctioned a Bill passed by a Parliament with a majority of English-speaking citizens to indemnify those who had not taken part in the Rebellion of 1837, and whose property had been wantonly damaged. The law did not attack the lives of these most loyal citizens, but their pockets, and it was more important than their own lives and the blood of their fellow citizens. Mr. Speaker, I relate these facts not to excuse what happened at Quebec, but to show what might have happened if conscription had been voted down by Ontario and enforced by the Government. I am not 'au fait' of provocating acts in Quebec, but I know what happened in Montreal. Men were arrested even when they had their exemption papers in their possession. Their papers were taken away from them and the men put in jail until writs of habeas corpus were taken in the courts of Montreal.

It might be interesting if I informed the House how many writs of habeas corpus have been taken in Montreal from the 27th February, 1918, until to-day. There were thirteen. One was taken by P. L. Charre on February 27, the next day the military authorities through Colonel Hibbard, declared that the man was wrongfully arrested and did not oppose the writ. On the 1st March, E. St. Denis made a petition, and was liberated for the same reason on March 16. On the 4th of March, D. Giaconimi made a petition and was liberated the next day. On the 9th, E. Ciamarro made the same petition and was liberated on the 12th of March. On the 11th, Joseph Fortin made the same petition and was liberated on the 14th. On the 21st, H. W. Dodd, made the same petition and was liberated two days after. On the 23rd, J. Paulicci made the same petition and was liberated three days after; and so on. The names of the other men who made the same petition and were declared to have been wrongfully arrested were A. J. Villeneuve, J. Romani, Henri Fugère, Louis Paquette, Charles Dubé.

I have here an affidavit in the case of Henry W. Dodd, who was arrested on the 21st of March, and liberated on the 23rd.

That your Petitioner, on the 29th day of November, filed in the hands of the Registrar, under the Military Service Act, for the District of Montreal, an Appeal from the decision of the local tribunal, which Appeal the Registrar acknowledged having received on the 3rd day of December;

That your Petitioner was summoned to appear on the 21st December before Honourable Mr. Justice Duclos on his claim for exemption, and his case was continued until the 7th of January, 1918, in order that he may be examined by the Revisory Board in the meanwhile;

That on the 24th day of December, the Military Medical Revisory Board declared that your Petitioner was of category "E", and therefore on the 7th day of January, 1918, Honourable Mr. Justice Duclos rendered judgment accordingly, allowing the Appeal, the Appellant having been placed in Class "E";

That, nevertheless, on the 4th day of March, 1918, your Petitioner while at work in his office was informed that one Major McKenzie wanted him at the Military Headquarters;

That on the said date your Petitioner, although having produced his papers, showing that he had been placed in Category "E", and that, consequently, he was permanently exempted from all Military Service, was lodged in the military prison in the Guy Street Barracks;

That the said Major McKenzie pretended that your Petitioner having been placed in Category A2 on the 12th of October by the military doctors had to undergo another examination and to follow a treatment at the Montreal General Hospital;

That on the 5th day of March your Petitioner was taken under guard from the Guy Street Barracks to the Montreal General Hospital where he was detained until the 11th day of March, during which time he was guarded day and night;

That on the 11th day of March your Petitioner was removed from the hospital and was again confined in the Military Prison at the Guy Street Barracks, and had to suffer the most ignominious and injurious treatment, as if he had been serving a sentence;

That on the 15th day of March he was put in uniform and permanently attached to the 1st Quebec Regiment under the orders of Major General E. W. Wilson and Lt.-Colonel Piché;

That your Petitioner, has, on many occasions, prayed the Respondent to see that his liberty be given him, stating that he had been exempted from Service by judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Duclos on the 7th day of January, 1918, and had been placed in Category "E" by the Medical Advisory Board;

That the papers which he had in his possession on the 4th day of March were taken from him;

That the Respondents have always refused to grant to your Petitioner his liberty;

Mr. Speaker, I was present on the morning when the petition was presented before the Hon. Mr. Justice Lamothe in Montreal. and Lieut. Col. Hibbard, who represented the military authorities, stated that the facts mentioned in this petition were true and the man was liberated. This is one of the reasons—I do not say it is an excuse—why riots occurred in Quebec. If the law had been applied in the same way in Quebec as it has been in Montreal, if men had been robbed of their exemption papers, confined in prison and only released by the arm of the civil law by habeas corpus proceedings there is no wonder the people are excited, and resort to serious measures, and no wonder these regrettable incidents occurred in Quebec.

In closing, I wish to answer the remark made by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), who asserted that Le Devoir had published seditious articles, and that Henri Bourassa ought to be interned. It is not my duty, nor my intention to defend Bourassa in this House. He is well able to defend himself; but if I judge the knowledge of French of the hon. member for North Simcoe by his love for it, he certainly has not read those seditious articles in French. If he has read a translation, and the translation was made, as they generally are, for the sole purpose of creating racial and religious feeling, I submit that the hon. member for North Simcoe, before rendering judgment on those articles, ought to take a special course in French. French is like good music and it might have a good effect on him. "La musique adoucit les mœurs."

Mr. E. D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, since the hour is late I will be brief, and as the point at issue has, till now, been argued in English I will pay a tribute of homage to Her Majesty in the French tongue by using it to convey the few remarks I wish to make anent the important question which forms the subject matter of the present debate.

First of all, I believe it my duty to reply to the attacks directed against the clergy of the province of Quebec by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). The hon. member—it is, moreover, a habit with him,—did not miss this opportunity to criticize the French Canadian clergy of my province. According to him, it is the clergy who have instilled into our people their present state of mind, and what is happening to-day is due to their influence.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we have in nowise to blush for the actions of our clergy, and that, under all circumstances the wisdom of their guidance has led us through the paths of right, of honour and of duty. If the hon. member for Frontenac has the least knowledge of Canadian history he cannot ignore the fact that at the time of the war which resulted in American independence it was the clergy of the province of Quebec who advised the French Canadians to refuse the advantages offered them by the Americans who sought to enlist the aid of the Canadians in the struggle for independence.

Neither is anybody ignorant of the fact that when the Government, last year, inaugurated national registration by means of cards called national service cards, the clergy took upon themselves as a duty to exhort the people to obey the law. Always, the clergy have shown themselves worthy of their high position and it truly is a matter for regret that we should have in this House members who never allow an occasion to pass when they can throw insults in the face of the clergy of the province of Quebec, in particular, of the Catholic clergy as a whole. Let us remember that at this moment thousands of French priests and monks are shedding their blood on the soil of France for the cause of liberty and civilization.

Such attacks are unjustifiable and I do not see how I, the representative of a county both French Canadian and Catholic, could let them pass without a reply.

To my mind, the question of the Quebec riot has been debated with such forcible arguments that I have no intention of recurring to all the points discussed; but, Mr. Speaker, one thing is certain: if this riot in the city of Quebec has taken place, it is because the people of Quebec were provoked and, Mr. Speaker, it is not solely in the application of the Conscription Act that we meet this provocation.

I represent the county of Rimouski, and in the parish of Mont Joli, barely a few weeks ago, a trainload of soldiers, coming from Ontario or from the western provinces —I do not know which—stopped at Mont Joli. The soldiers left the train, and proceeded to storm the drug-store, breaking down the doors in order to procure whisky; then they went to the restaurants and insulted the young waitresses there; in a word, they aroused the entire population of Mont Joli who are peaceful folk but who, as our expression has, will not allow their feet to be trod upon.

It is just such deeds that bring on riots. What happened at Quebec, therefore, is not a matter for surprise.

There is no doubt that the same gang who operated at Montreal was behind the Quebec affair, and perhaps the hon. Minister of Justice will be obliged, before long, to hand over another $10,000 bail in order to get one of these individuals out from behind the bars.

The application of this Act was put into the hands of irresponsible people, most of the time, ne'er-do-wells, individuals totally devoid of discretion, and of judgment, who hie themselves to street corners and there insult peaceful folks, men whose very aspect is a certificate of exemption. For instance, you might have noticed in the papers that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) was arrested at Quebec. He was asked to produce his exemption certificate; was it not ridiculous to make such a demand upon a man whose hair is sufficient witness to his age? In a way, of course, it was flattering for him, but on the other hand, it was pretty insulting to have some nondescript of a policeman lay hands upon him, without cause or justification.

Mr. Speaker, feeling in the province of Quebec is against conscription; there can be no doubt on that score. For my part, I was elected in Rimouski county as an anti-conscriptionist; I was opposed to conscription before it was voted; I was opposed to it during the elections and I am against it still. I have not changed my conviction, because I believe that this conscription law is inopportune, that it is opposed to the best interests of our country and that it is not a help to the British Empire.

I was saying a moment ago that there had been provocation; well, if there was provocation, there was more than that. Certain high-falutin' personages in the Government of this country came, one day, to give advice to the voters of the province of Quebec, during that notorious election in Dorchester, when Mr. Blondin, the musical-comedy colonel, came to Dorchester to assist Mr. Sévigny in the contest, and that your humble servant had the advantage of meeting with him at Ste. Rose de Dorchester.

Mr. Blondin, while I was telling the voters that conscription was on the way, spoke in this vein: "You people here in Ste. Rose; if conscription were to become law in Canada, you are near the American frontier; all you have to do is to escape."

When a man of Mr. Blondin's position comes to the people of St. Rose and says: "If conscription comes to Canada you can escape to the United States," how can you expect the people of the province to submit to this law; to submit, after that sort of advice coming from such an important figure in Canadian politics?

I say that the Government was ill-advised when it passed this conscription law. It seems to me that it would be better under the circumstances to withdraw the law so that peace of mind may reign once more in all Canadian homes.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to engage the attention of this House too long, but I wanted to express my opinion before this debate had ended. I received from the voters of the county which did me the honour of sending me to this House a very definite mandate: I was elected as an anti-conscriptionist; I am to-day, and I will remain an anti-conscriptionist.

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as this is my first utterance in the House I crave the indulgence of hon. members. I have been very much impressed with what has been said upon this subject during the course of the debate. What impressed me the most was the position taken by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). The very moment he rose to his feet he reached deep into the well of his feelings and hurled his anathemas at the province of Quebec. I regretted his words very much, and especially those in which he launched an attack upon the Catholic clergy of that province. I regretted it on his own account as much as for myself. The province of Quebec is accused always in the same old way. All through the campaign the province was subjected to attack, and I was accused of upholding a doctrine antagonistic to the interests of the Empire. I hope I shall have an opportunity of stating the position which I took during that campaign and I am not ashamed to state it here. I did not preach cowardice, but on the contrary I maintained that we should do our duty to France which gives us our intellectual life and that we should also do our duty to the British Government which has preserved the liberty that we have thus far enjoyed here on this Canadian soil. I took that position, Sir, and I am doing business at the old stand still. I regret that hon. members on the other side of the House who have been elected as Unionists should feel called upon to cast reflections on the province of Quebec because we differ in opinion with them on certain questions. I took the stand that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took and the stand that Mr. Lloyd George himself, the Prime Minister of England, has taken. He has said that what we want is ships, ships, and more ships, to carry the last bag of wheat to feed the Allies. I trust that I may say without any discourtesy to the hon. member for Frontenac that the word of Mr. Lloyd George is as good as that of the hon. member for Frontenac. I heard the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) speak about the ambition, the passion and the philosophy of nations. I confess that I want none of his philosophy of nations or his ambitions. I am a Canadian enjoying the liberty here that the British Government has established and I wish to continue to enjoy it. He said that it was independence that we were searching for; at least that is what I understood him to say although I could not understand him very well. He also mentioned annexation. I have lived under the Stars and Stripes and I say, I hope without reproach, that I want to enjoy British liberty. We appear now to be a financial dependency of the United States. In connection with every measure that is adopted the United States is mentioned. What I said a moment ago I will always maintain. I repeat that I want to enjoy British liberty. My hon friend from Parry Sound (Mr. Artnurs) said that his opponent had stated during the campaign that if my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition came into power all the soldiers would be liberated. I could not quite catch all of his remarks but I think he said something of that kind. Probably that would take place in the trenches because that is where the promise was given. All through the campaign I did not go farther than my right hon. leader. I took a stand against conscription because I believe that in this country where we want production, you cannot have both soldiers and production and if you drain the country of man power production will be very much diminished. Of course, we must be careful not to compromise the action of the Allies and that is why I took the stand I did. If you want production you must allow the farmer to remain a farmer. You cannot make him a soldier and a farmer at the same time. It was stated at the beginning of the war by the greatest economists of the world that in this conflict famine might perhaps have the last word. I believe we are all verging on famine and that Canada will pass through a great financial crisis. I believe that this country has great resources but we must husband them and we must conduct our affairs in accordance with the principles of economy or else the future will be compromised. We must be careful that we do not allow the tendency towards militarism in this country to compromise our future or interfere with the success of the Allies.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this debate. I had sent word to the Speaker earlier in the evening that although I intended to say a few words I would refrain from doing so out of regard to the lateness of the hour and the number of speakers. But I just wish to say one word. Whether one is moved by emotion or passion I do not know and whether it be a crime I am not prepared to say. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) who has just taken his seat. He has moved me by the strong British sentiments which he has expresesd to rise to my feet and tell him, an hon. member of French origin from the province of Quebec, the pleasure it gave me to note the splendid, sterling, British ring of the utterances with which he has favoured the House.

I liked his speech so much that that is my excuse for saying a word or two in this debate; it was in marked contrast to the speech of the hon. member from, I think, Montmagny—

Mr. VIEN: Lotbinière.

Mr. MORPHY: —to whom I listened to-night with feelings of great regret. I acknowledge the hon. gentleman's earnestness, his ability, and his out-spokenness, and I was rather pleased in one way to hear him address the House as he did, although I totally disagree with the sentiments which he uttered. I have been told, Mr. Speaker, and it has been commonly said, that the ideals of the province of Quebec, as a part of the Canadian confederation, were based largely upon thoughts such as were expressed by the hon. member for Lotbinière in his observations to-night. What were they? Without going into details I hope the hon. gentleman will pardon me when I state in an abstract way what I gathered from his remarks, viz.—that his ideal of life and liberty was limited to Canada entirely. He had not, like the hon. member for Bellechasse, who has just spoken, the same high ideal of the liberties we enjoy, and have enjoyed under the aegis of the British Empire. He seemed to forget, Mr. Speaker, that these liberties have been preserved to us by the great British Empire. I am sorry to say it, but in this, the greatest stress of the world's life, in this the greatest crisis in the history of the world, in this day when the British Empire—and what ought to be his beloved France but which apparently is not—when these two great empires are struggling against the power and might of the vandal Hun, it is a travesty upon the life of any part of the civilized world that in the Parliament of Canada a member could be so recreant to his duty as to stand up and condemn those of us who think differently from him, because we say that we have a duty to perform to the man-power that is gone to fight the battles of liberty, not only from the provinces outside of Quebec, but from that province itself.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say this: I may not have proven to him what I intended to prove through lack of fluency in his language, but what I intended to say is this: That we believe in maintaining in this country British institutions, but we claim that the best way to help the Empire is not merely by sending men. We can help the Empire otherwise and at the same time foresee the after conditions of the war for Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not wish to get into a discussion particularly about it, nor do I desire exactly to accept the statement the hon. gentleman now makes, or to withdraw anything which I have said. I am endeavouring to give to this House the full effect and meaning of the words that the hon. gentleman uttered in as good English as any man who has spoken in this debate. The hon. gentleman, beyond peradventure, gave the House to understand that he was prepared to-day to stop the sending of any more men overseas from this country, and he gave as the reason that the United States should send men, that Canada had done enough.

Mr. VIEN: Absolutely.

Mr. MORPHY: Am I wrong, Mr. Speaker, when I so construe the hon. gentleman's remarks? If the hon. gentleman said that, and he did so, and I do not think he will deny saying so, I maintain that such an utterance was the most pusillanimous utterance that was ever made on the floor of this House during the six or seven years that I have had the honour of being a member of it. I have been told, but did not believe, that the ideals that the hon. gentleman has set forth here to-night were the ideals of the province of Quebec. It has remained for him to prove that there is one county at least represented by a member who cherishes those ideals. We from Ontario sit still under the accusations of lacking friendship to Quebec, of wanting to domineer over Quebec, of wanting to impress the power of Ontario upon Quebec. These gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, who deal in that kind of recrimination, who set up those men of straw for the purpose of knocking them down, do not know the people of Ontario. I have stood here to-night and listened to all the unpleasant things that could be said about the Orangemen of Ontario. I happen to be a member of the Orange order, and I am very proud of it, because, I want to tell the hon. gentleman, in the Dominion of Canada, nay, in the world, there is no Order that has gone to the front as loyally and patriotically as the members of the Orange Order in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. VIEN: Is the hon. gentleman referring to my speech?

Mr. MORPHY: No.

Mr. VIEN: Because I do not think that I said anything against the Orange Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for North Perth has the floor, and it is only with his permission that any other hon. gentleman may make interruptions.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not know the names of the hon. gentlemen who made the remarks to which I refer, because the House is more or less new to me; but it is within the knowledge of all of us that such language was used by several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The Orange Order in Canada needs no apology. Its motto is a splendid one: Fear God, love the Brotherhood and honour the King. They are not the fanatics they are painted; the constitution of the Orange Order assures the same liberty to hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec as they claim for themselves. I wish the hon. gentlemen to understand that we are not the "Orangiste fanatiques" that we hear so much about; we are merely men of flesh and blood and kindly instincts. That sort of remark thrown across the floor of the House is done, to my mind, for a purpose, and what good purpose can be served by it is very difficult to say; but it ill behooves men sitting upon the other side of the House, who preach against fanaticism in such a way as to antagonize, while at the same time praying for a consensus of opinion and for union, to throw these taunts across the floor.

There have been something like 75,000 Orangemen who have gone to this war, not a mean number. Are they to be condemned because they are fighting for our liberties and yours? What is there about the Order that it should be made the butt of and subjected to such attacks? It would be better for hon. gentlemen to look at home for the reasons for the trouble.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: Can the hon. gentleman state what attack was made on the Orangemen by hon. members on this side?

Mr. MORPHY: I did not take note of it, as it was not a matter that I had intended to speak about. But hon. gentlemen heard it to-night. The attack upon the Sentinel.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: That is not the Order.

Mr. MORPHY: I will quote it to the hon. gentleman from Hansard when it is printed. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen should look closer at home for the cause of the trouble. We are discussing the cause of the riots in Quebec. I won't deal with the mixture that I have heard from the statements of hon. members opposite, but in the abstract I have noticed, while sitting here, one hon. member on the other side state that the trouble did not come from people in the city of Quebec, but that it was caused by outsiders. A little later the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said that it did come from the people of Quebec, but he did not know them, that they came from the parish of St. Roch's. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) said that the trouble did come from the people of Quebec city, and he gave five reasons why they engaged in riotous conduct.

Mr. CANNON: May I ask the hon. gentleman in what part of my speech did I say that these troubles were caused by these people? I remember my speech perfectly, and I did not say that.

Mr. MORPHY: It was the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) I referred to. But it was the hon. member for Dorchester who gave five reasons why the people rioted.

Mr. CANNON: I could have given many others.

Mr. MORPHY: Which further emphasizes and clinches my point. Outsiders would not go to Quebec for grievances held by the people of Quebec. The people there resented for five different reasons the action of Col. Blondin, the action of the Government, the action of the Dominion police, and so on. The resentment was not against outsiders, it was the people who were annoyed, and so we have this contradiction of speeches discussing the matter from all points of the compass, crisscrossing each other, and defeating the arguments advanced in turn. Let us see what was the cause. I am more convinced than ever that the cause was mentioned by the hon. member from Lotbinière (Mr. Vien). From the nature of his remarks, the hon. gentleman shows how he has been educated. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to my mind, is more to blame for the views held in the province of Quebec than any other man. He has always been a man who was against the Empire and in favour of the provincial idea.

An hon. MEMBER: The Canadian idea.

Mr. MORPHY: Not even the Canadian idea. And the proper Canadian idea is British, and British to the core, and ready to help France as well.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: And France is helping England, too, in this war.

Mr. MORPHY: And Quebec did not help France.

Mr. VIEN: Did the hon. gentleman grasp that what we meant was simply a difference of views in the methods of helping the Empire?

Mr. CURRIE: Do not start to apologize now.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman's question is a subterfuge, Mr. Speaker. To say that every man in the province of Quebec is a farmer is too absurd to be considered for a moment. There are thousands of young men there who are seeking to evade military service. The hon. gentleman will not deny that. There are thousands going to the bowling alleys and billiard rooms.

Mr. CAHILL: I represent a Quebec constituency, and I would like the hon. gentleman to make good his remarks, and the Government of the day to make good their remarks, that there are thousands of eligible young men in Quebec who wish to evade the Military Service Act. It is either a reflection on the Government, or the hon. gentleman is mistaken in his statements.

Mr. MORPHY: I am not mistaken at all. The press and the figures show clearly that there are thousands in Montreal alone—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Where did the hon. gentleman get those figures?

Mr. MORPHY: They come from the daily press, the Montreal press.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is the daily press the source of your official information?

Mr. MORPHY: It is quite sufficient for my purpose to-night. The hon. gentleman can use any kind of figures he chooses, but we know that is the fact in this country, and we know that was part of the trouble in the province of Quebec. I was going to say that hon. gentlemen should look closer home to the leader they have. I made the statement that the right hon. leader of the Opposition had been more provincial than Imperialist. Why did I say that? All his history shows that he backed away from any great movement of Empire. At the time of the Boer war, his attitude was: Not a man, not a dollar. Public opinion became so strong that he was forced to allow men to go, but he let the English Government pay them. At the time of the Riel Rebellion, he was going to shoulder his musket to fight in favour of insurrection and rebellion.

An hon. MEMBER: And for the navy.

Mr. MORPHY: There are lots of things to talk about. In his Boston speech, Canada was ultimately to fall from the Empire as the ripe fruit drops from the parent tree. He preferred the Yankee dollar to a British shilling. Any one would prefer a dollar to a shilling but the sting is in the placing of the Yankee against the British. These things have sunk into the minds of the people of Quebec. Armand Lavergne gives twenty-two reasons why he is a Nationalist all taken from the speeches of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. He is the godfather of Messrs. Bourassa and Lavergne. They have adopted his doctrines. Armand Lavergne has been quoted in the press as saying: "I am right; Sir Wilfrid has left me; he has gone back on the doctrine he taught me." There we have the situation, and it is to be deplored, and is most deplorable, and yet logical, that when a serious outbreak did come it came in the constituency of the right hon. gentleman.

Who better than his constituents knew what he would like? Disruption against authorized law and constitutional authority. Did he appeal to them after the outbreak? No. And you ask me what is the cause of the riots in Quebec. The trouble was brewing there; did the leader of the Opposition go to Quebec and say to his people: take counsel with me? No, he contents himself in the House with saying that before anything happened he had told the House that his people would obey the law. The point is that he has failed to intervene and to make any attempt to pour oil on the troubled waters and prevent riot and insurrection. It is quite logical, I say, that an outbreak of that kind should, under the circumstances, occur in his constituency. How deplorable it is that innocent wayfarers, passers-by, should be the mark for the guns of the militiamen. The blood of these innocent people has been shed because of an insurrection in the constituency of the leader of the Opposition, while men higher up have escaped. There are men in this House who will some day have to take the responsibility for the wanton attacks made in this House to-day against established law and order. In my constituency dozens of men have been improperly apprehended; is that a cause for rebellion or riot? No, thank God; there are no agitators amongst them to set them on, and to encourage them. When I heard a member to-day say that he saw the mob going upstairs to destroy the records of the Government and virtually admit that he stood there and let them pursue their nefarious work without taking sufficient interest in it to find out their names or to call a policeman and intercept them, I thought what a travesty it was on public life that members of Parliament could stand by and see a crime of that kind committed without taking any action. It is a hollow sham, Mr. Speaker; clever men of that kind would know who did it, and it does not do to pretend to an intelligent House that they do not know, because they could easily have found out.

A while ago we had in this neighbourhood an agitation about language. The "Orangeistes" of Ontario, the "Bosches" of Ontario, were depriving the people of French origin in Ontario of certain rights which they claimed to possess. This Parliament building was surrounded by hundreds of school children, a resolution was introduced in the House, which admittedly had no jurisdiction over matters affecting education in the provinces. The member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) in one of the ablest speeches I ever heard him or any one else deliver, presented his case fairly. His address was of a very high standard. But the matter should not have been thrown into Parliament; the discussion tended to intensify and aggravate a situation then pressing very heavily on the Ontario Government, and had the effect of injuring the school population in many parts of Ontario. But during all this agitation, which was the main source whence this trouble in Quebec sprang, the leader of the Opposition stood by and lent a hand to the member for Kamouraska; never once went out with an appeal to his people to stop their agitation. Subsequently the language question which was the subject of the resolution at that time was considered by the Privy Council and a decision given absolutely against the claims of our French compatriots in Ontario. They did not themselves raise the agitation; it was raised by the people who came from the other side of the Ottawa river. To my mind, Sir, that was the proximate cause of the trouble in Quebec. It was the proximate cause that resulted in young and middle-aged men tearing down recruiting stands and signs on the streets of Montreal and assaulting men who were endeavouring honestly, openly and publicly to interest the bright youth of French and other extraction in the cause of the Allies. The mob came down, so the paper reports say —I do not know the facts, because I was not there—many students of Laval University were among them, and when the police came they took refuge in the sanctity of a church. We are asked to consider the causes of these disturbances. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that because an officer made a mistake, all this trouble ensued. Nobody in Canada will believe that. There was a deeper cause, and it is based on the same principle on which is based the attitude of the people of the south of Ireland—a cause that makes for disunion and for the weakening of bonds of empire, for the lessening of the power of the Allies. Let us divide the forces, these people say, for paltry political effect, so that Laurier will carry a solid Quebec. This feeling is what helped to cause the riots in Quebec. Well, I thank God, Mr. Speaker, that as a Canadian—and I am proud to be a Canadian, within the Empire—I cannot be charged with being a party to any cause that would tend to weaken the arm of the Empire at this time. When I look at the difference between the north and the south of Ireland; when I see the Ulster Presbyterians by the thousands going to the front —and many of them did go from the south of Ireland—when I see these Ulster Presbyterians, ninety-five per cent of them Orangemen, walking into the trenches and giving their lives for their country and for the Empire, it makes me feel that hon. gentlemen opposite should be chary indeed about reviling anybody because he happens to be of that particular faith, denomination or order. It is not worth while; you cannot get liberty and union in any such way. Did our friends from Quebec feel that politics were more important than the cause of Empire? It is for them to say, in their hearts and souls. It looks to me as if that was their main object. Was it a worthy object? I submit not. The time was too critical; politics is one thing, and war another. Have hon. members opposite helped to create the right atmosphere? The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has, to his credit be it said. He has a son who loyally went forward; and he himself has done more in the way of recruiting than most people I know. Why can we not all do these things? What is the matter with us? Is this Parliament so narrow that we cannot get down to a common basis? As the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) pleaded to-night, let us forget animosity. I am willing to forget the nasty things said over there; you be willing to forget the nasty things said over here.

There is this difference that I see, and I have seen it coming for many years, and have been sorry to see it. When we people of English extraction sing "God Save the King" we are answered by "O Canada" from the other side. There is the line of demarcation, the line of cleavage. Does any man on the other side of the House think he is a better Canadian than I am because I am of English extraction. Let French-Canadians remember that there are other Canadians, and that English-speaking Canadians, while we do not boast of our superiority, do not relish any attack upon us as being inferior beings. That is another line that is worth while wiping out and putting a carpet over.

Another thing that differentiates us and ought to be considered is this: Up where I live and all over the West, everywhere in Canada, in fact, except Quebec, the country is ringing with loyal and patriotic war songs. "We will never let the Old Flag Fall" has resounded from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Do they know the song in Quebec? Has it been sung in their fields, has it been shouted from their house-tops? One gentleman has spoken of patriotism to-night. To my mind there is a great difference between loyalty and patriotism. Loyalty is love of country, a sentiment purely. Patriotism is more than loyalty. It extends beyond it, enfolds it, brings it into itself, covers it over. Patriotism is much more and much greater than loyalty, because it means loyalty plus something else—action, something must be done. A man can sing "We will never let the Old Flag Fall" for a thousand years, but if he does not do something to keep the old flag flying, he may be loyal, but he is not patriotic. Action—something to be done, that is what is wanted. Quebec can do a great deal if its men with right instincts will stand up and take their place. I make this appeal at this early hour in the morning to the few who are here, and I would urge in all candour, and with reasonable hope, that we get together and that soon we will coalesce, and there will be more co-operation and less party politics and less bitterness.

May I digress for a moment to say that there has been more party politics, more bitterness in this debate, than during all the sessions since the war started. Why is it? Is that the spirit in which men have come from their constituencies? I hope not, but that is the situation.

I am sorry I have talked so long, but I feel very, very keenly about this matter, not for Britain alone, but for Canada as well. We have sent 400,000 boys over there, and when they pledged themselves not to let the old flag fall, we pledged ourselves to "keep the home fires burning." That is a song that has swept over Canada, but do they sing it in Quebec? Answer me, somebody. Apparently not. Instead of keeping the home fires burning, we have had a small incipient blaze of the red fire of revolution and anarchy—a shame and disgrace to any civilized people in the world who pretend to enjoy the liberties the Empire gives us. But what, oh what, of noble France, whose chivalry shines brighter to-day than ever in the past? French Canadians may say, "I want the language of France," then I say "Do you love France, and will you fight for her? If you do not fight for France you cannot love her, and you are not worthy to enjoy her language." France lies bleeding to-day, the wonder and the admiration of the world, and as an English-speaking Canadian, I express my pride in the most glorious country on the battlefield to-day, for the honours she has won and the shining armour she has put on, of truth and nobility that is the envy and pride of the civilized world. Let us English-speaking people plead with our fellow-members from Quebec to enjoy the privilege of going to their counties and getting the men to help France; put new blood into her veins and help her win this fight. This is a fight in which your liberty and mine is in jeopardy, and the man or the province or the colony or the Dominion that does not take its place to-day in this the greatest Armageddon of the world will hang his head in shame for all time to come. I hope and pray that this Parliament may through mutual co-operation, careful judgment, and unity of thought so propel the measures before it that all individual likes and dislikes and political bickerings may be forgotten, that we may join together in one common purpose, that this country as a part of the Empire and as a part of the Allies, with France, may as the poet said:

> Strike till the last armed foe expires,
> Strike for our altars and our fires,
> Strike for the green graves of our sires,
> God and our native land!

And may Canada as a result be prosperous and happy, ready for the period of reconstruction after the war, where all shall be one, and that one for the Empire and the Allies.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): I have the honour to-night to represent a whole province. There has been a good deal of talk about Quebec, and it would appear, listening to hon. gentlemen opposite, that Quebec was the only delinquent in this matter of supporting the so-called Union Government; I will give it its proper name and call it a mongrel Government. I see two hon. gentlemen over there from my province, and they are here by reason of the soldiers' vote. I happen to be in the fortunate position of representing a whole province on this side of the House, because the only other Liberal member who has been declared elected has not arrived yet. I want particularly to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen on the other side, and especially of the gentlemen who belong to the same cult as the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Morphy) to the fact that our province has already learnt the lesson that will unite Canada eventually, and which if it had been learnt by the great province of Ontario would have prevented all this trouble and all this debate. I would advise the people of Ontario to learn the lesson as soon as possible, and I say this with all earnestness and sincerity of purpose. I am an old man, and have no politics to bother about. I do not ever expect to run in an election again, and if I should I do not care if I am elected or defeated, anyway.

[Mr. Morphy.]

I tell the people of Ontario to get non-sectarian schools, and I would advise the people of Quebec to do the same as soon as they can. They would then be in the same position as Prince Edward Island, which is the provincial leader in all the political advantages and all the political advancement which has been made in the last century. We have led the Dominion of Canada in temperance legislation. We were the only British community, up to a few weeks ago, that had adopted prohibition, in the whole of the British Empire. Away back in 1852 we were the first British people, I think perhaps the very first people, to adopt the free school system—that is to say, to pay for the schools out of the public treasury, and not impose upon the people taxes for school purposes. We made the schools absolutely free, and later on we made them non-sectarian. The result is that we have done away with bigotry and intolerance, that accursed viper that is gnawing at the vitals of Canada to-day. Bigotry and intolerance are the cause of the riots in Quebec. My hon. friend talks about Orange lodges. We have Orange lodges in our province. The best and most manly supporters I had were sound educated Orangemen, not those narrow people who subscribe to the Orange Sentinel. It is true they sent a lot of Sentinels down there to try to debauch our people, but they said: "This is only a Tory organ, and a reactionary organ at that." The biggest joke of the whole campaign in my county occurred when they sent a big bundle of them up to be distributed in a certain Orange constituency, and by some mistake, which perhaps was not a mistake, the driver, instead of taking them over to the Orange constituency, took them to the Roman Catholic constituency, and they did some good down there. What do we find in Prince Edward Island? With a majority of Protestants, they have a good Roman Catholic premier, and a Tory at that. That is how broad they are. I have absolutely no hesitation in saying that if the people of Canada are going to get together, they must eliminate this foolish division and this foolish irritation between these two big provinces. My province has been sacrificed for 40 years, and for what? To help these two big provinces to get together, keep together and abstain from fighting one another. Prince Edward Island is the cradle of Confederation. Are hon. gentlemen aware that the first conference that was held to confederate the provinces of Canada was held in the city of Charlottetown in 1864?

The intention was simply to unify the three maritime provinces into a maritime union. Quebec and Ontario at that time, as at present, were at one another's throats, like the Kilkenny cats. Hon. gentlemen know that they tied together the tails of the Kilkenny cats, and threw them over a clothesline, and they fought until they killed one another. That was the condition of affairs in Ontario and Quebec. When they found we were going to form a maritime union, the big men of the two big provinces, men like Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the one side and Sir Sam Hughes on the other, got together and asked if they could be represented at the convention. Our people said, "Come along boys, and if we can do anything to help you out we will be pleased." So they came down there and formed the conference, and while our people did not go into Confederation at that time, for a very good reason, because of our smallness, and because the people felt that in place of being—

An hon. MEMBER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. READ: I am speaking to the point. I want to show the cause of the Quebec riots. There is no use diagnosing a case unless you can indicate the medicine. I will not go into the story of Confederation; it would take too long. I desire to say a word about annexation. Some hon. gentlemen expressed the fear that Canada might be annexed to the United States. Let me assure hon. members of the House that Canada will never be annexed to the United States. No politician or no party could ever annex Canada to the United States. I am a believer in natural law, and natural law itself would prevent unification of Canada with the United States. Drive out nature with a fork she comes running back. Canada runs along east and west lines, and there has never been a country on the face of the earth that ran along north and south lines involving climatic changes. Every nation must be homogeneous in order to be a stable nation, and you could not make Canada part of the United States if all the Lauriers and Bordens and the rest of them were to try for centuries. The United States would not take Canada to-morrow. The better-thinking people of the United States know very well that if Canada were added to the States it would break up the balance of power. The very thing that produced the Civil War in the United States in 1860 was the fact that they were adding Kansas, as a slave state, or a free state, to one or other of the two halves, which would break up the influence of the other half. Why does the United States not take Mexico? Simply because it would break up the balance of power. They do not want Mexico, so put that foolish idea out of your heads. The Military Service Act has been placed on the statute-book, and must be obeyed, as long as it is the law, and I am satisfied it will be obeyed in Quebec as in the other provinces. At the same time, while it is the law on the statute-books it was the enactment of that law primarily that caused the riots in Quebec. When I started my campaign down in the little province one of the open statements I made over my own signature was that, in my judgment, the Conscription Bill in its conception—not conscription itself, but the conception of the Conscription Bill—at that time was a paramount crime and, secondly, a political crime— in every way. Why do I say that? Not because I am not in favour of conscription. One hon. gentleman whom I interrupted indicated that conscription was an autocratic institution. Conscription is a democratic institution. We have on the statute books of Canada already a conscription bill—the Militia Act. That is perfectly and absolutely democratic. What is the principle of true democracy? It is that we work together for the common good of all hands. The state undertakes to guarantee the safety, liberty and protection of her citizens and as a quid pro quo the citizen is in duty bound to render national service to the state. Consequently, universal military service for every man and universal national service for every woman are absolutely democratic institutions. But, the Conscription Bill in its conception was a political bill intended not to win the war but to win an election. Many perhaps did not know enough to see the dragon's tail. They might have seen a mermaid's head but they could not see the dragon's tail. The right hon. leader of the Government to-day when he brought that Order in Council down, stated that voluntary enlistments in July and August amounted to some 3,000. The wonder is that there were any at all. How was it in May when they came down to this House and announced that they were going to inaugurate the principle of conscription? For that month and ten months previous the average was 6,500 per month. That was the average rate of recruiting by voluntary effort alone. Volunteers were coming in at this rate against the wish of some of the members of the Government, if we are to believe the evidence of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes).

The Conscription Bill was unnecessary because there was a better Act on the statute books. It was unnecessary because it synchronized with the mobilization of the great American army the transportation of which will take all the ships that can be produced for the next three years by all the Allies, by all the confiscations they are making of other nations' ships, and by chartering of Japanese ships. It will take all the ships that can be produced for the next two or three years to carry the American army across the ocean without ours at all. There will be an army of 6,000,000 men. If we stood them up in single file north and south along the meridian of longitude the line would reach from here to the Equator and 400 miles farther. It is an immense body of men. The hon. gentleman who sat down just now twitted some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House by saying that they wanted to let the Americans do the fighting for us. We do not want to do anything of the sort but we want them to do their share. They have a better right to do their share in so far as the number of men is concerned and in every other respect than we have. They are in the war as a sovereign state, they are in it in a constitutional manner, they are in it because they have to be in it. They could not exist as a nation and have their honour degraded in the way it was being degraded by the Germans. They are in it and we are only making fools of ourselves by taking on a burden that does not belong to us. At the same time, every ounce Canada has got whether in man or material power must be, and will be—and I know it will be willingly, including Quebec—dedicated to the most sacred cause that has ever presented itself to the people at any period in the history of the world.

Our civilization is based upon democracy. We would never have had this democracy before the discovery of America. For a thousand years the world had been in a worse position than the German Empire is in to-day. This applied to the whole of Europe including the Mother country, old England, Spain and Italy. Why? Simply because the country was over populated. Simply because the whole population was pressed against the limit of subsistence and because the human mind was cramped by the pressure of want. On the top of that great mass, of that dead sea of men, were the emperors, the kings, the dukes, the barons and the unfortunate clergy who had to do the bidding of the bigbugs about them. They held the whole European proletariat in a state of serfdom. Ignorance was bliss; it was folly to be wise. That was taught even by the clergy. There are some bigoted Protestants who throw out that slur to the Roman Catholic church. The Roman Catholic church, it is true, at that time, taught that ignorance was bliss and that it was folly to be wise, but the Protestant church would have done the same thing if it had been put in the same position. I have been all over the world, I have travelled over every country in Europe and America, and I want to say on behalf of the Roman Catholic peoples that they are the most tolerant and the least bigoted amongst the nations of the world. Look at Brazil, that great democracy. Did they have a riot—a Quebec riot—when they wanted to get clear of their autocracy? No Sir; they just simply took old Dom Pedro, gave him a free passage to Portugal and a little annuity and said: You go home and take care of your children and we will run this country as a republic. This is the only country in the world that became a great democracy without the shedding of one drop of blood, not even as much blood as was shed at the Quebec riots, and what do we find down there? You can go right through the city of Rio de Janeiro—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I have been trying to be very tolerant to the hon. member, and a great deal of latitude has been given during the debate to-day, but I really must rule that the remarks which are now being made have no bearing at all upon the cause or the cure of the Quebec riots.

Mr. READ: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling, but I want to make this statement, and I make it without fear of successful contradiction, and because I know that the people of Canada can get together: this country to-day is in a state almost of disruption, and it is because of that disruption that we have had these riots in the province of Quebec. I know that the conflicting elements of the population can get together because I know what other countries have done in that regard. I know that people can live together in harmony, each worshipping under his own vine and fig-tree. I know that people can be educated so that they will not take any more notice of a man's religious opinion than they do of the colour of his hair, because he is just as much responsible for the one as he is for the other.

I entirely agree with the mover of this resolution in one statement which he made, and that is that we should have to-day in khaki, not forty thousand, but two hundred thousand men. The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) also was right when he stood up in his place in this House over a year ago and advised the Prime Minister to put the Militia Act into force. That Act could have been enforced in such a way that we could have raised two hundred thousand men without injuring the industries of the country, and without interfering with the farmers of this country. The men could have been called out in classes and sub-classes, and they need not necessarily have been sent across to fight in the fields of Flanders; they could be ready for any emergency. The time when we will want men most is when the terms of peace is being negotiated. We shall want a persuader then. How did Disraeli and Salisbury do in 1878 when they were going to negotiate a treaty with the Germans and the Russians at Berlin? They sent to India for twenty thousand Sepoys, Sikhs and Ghurkas, and placed them on the Island of Malta. Great Britain was not at war with anybody, but her statesmen mobilized the fleet and placed a military force as stated. Then they went over and negotiated the celebrated Berlin Treaty, that Billy the Bold called a scrap of paper and tore up the other day. Why did they put the troops there? In order to have a persuader. The British ministers at that time negotiated a remarkable set of treaties, and on returning from Berlin the first thing that Disraeli said as he stepped from his ship, was, "I have brought back peace with honour". One of the things which this Government ought to do is to get as many men as possible into khaki, not necessarily to send to the front, but to be available in case we want them. We never know what is going to happen. We do not want to lose the fruits of victory if we win, and we do not want to make a humiliating peace as poor Russia did if we lose.

Mr. CURRIE: My object, which was to secure a full and open discussion, having been obtained, I now beg to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

WAR GRANT $500,000,000.

On motion of the Hon. J. D. Reid the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding five hundred million dollars ($500,000,000) be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred by or under the authority of the Governor in Council, during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1919, for:—

(a) The defence and security of Canada;

(b) The conduct of naval or military operations in and beyond Canada;

(c) Promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;

(d) The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war; and

(e) Payments made for the said purposes during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and eighteen, in excess of the amounts authorized by The Appropriation Act, 1917.

2. That the Governor in Council be empowered to raise by way of loan, temporary or otherwise, such sums of money as are required for the purpose of making any payment authorized by any Act founded on these Rosolutions.

3. That the principal raised by way of loan under this Act and the interest thereon shall be chargeable on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.—Sir Robert Borden.

Hon. J. D. REID: I may say that an understanding was arrived at between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition to the effect that the statement which is necessary to be made in connection with this resolution should be made on the second reading of the Bill. It was decided between them that this resolution should be allowed to go through and a Bill founded upon it introduced.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is my understanding.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask if on the second reading we shall get all the information that we could have obtained had we been able to put questions in Committee?

Hon. J. D. REID: That is the understanding.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): There was an unfortunate misunderstanding a few days ago in regard to a certain Bill which was apparently put through under a somewhat similar arrangement as that just announced, and which arrangement debarred members from exercising the same freedom which they would otherwise have enjoyed. I hope the understanding in this case is quite clear, and that no question will arise on the second reading as to our freedom to question the Ministry and obtain all the information that we deem necessary.

Hon. J. D. REID: The Prime Minister wrote a note to the leader of the Opposition, and the understanding between them has been reduced to writing.

Mr. CAHILL: I would like to know what the understanding is.

Hon. J. D. REID: The understanding is that on second reading, or in Committee, all necessary information will be given.

Mr. CAHILL: The same as if it were on the first reading?

Mr. REID: Yes

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Hon. J. D. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 38, for granting to His Majesty aid for Military and Naval Defence.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 4.40 a.m. (Saturday).

The House met at Three o'clock.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Carvell, Bill No. 40, To Amend the Public Works Act, was introduced and read the first time.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

Hon. F. B. Carvell (Minister of Public Works) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, to amend Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. CARVELL: It was found in the operation of the Navigable Waters Protection Act that sometimes questions arose as to the rights of people to erect wharves, etc., in navigable streams. The object of this Bill is to prevent this happening, except with the consent of the Public Works Department. The Bill defines the public works more generally than they are defined at present, and also provides that, except in certain very small matters, if people persist in obstructing navigable streams, the Public Works Department, with the consent of the Governor in Council, may take whatever steps may be necessary to remove the obstruction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 39, to amend the Yukon Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain, please.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill provides for ratification of the steps already taken to reduce the organization of the Yukon Government, in so far as the administration under the Interior Department is concerned. It also provides for relieving the Auditor General of the necessity of sending one of his staff to the Yukon annually. It provides that he shall be sent only as the Auditor General deems it in the public interest. It further provides the Governor in Council shall have power to abolish the Yukon Council, and substitute in its place another council appointed by the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HEREDITARY TITLES IN CANADA.

MOTION BY MR. NICKLE FOR ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY NOT TO CONFER THEM.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, an Address should be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty,

Most Gracious Sovereign,—

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any hereditary titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada, or any title or honour that will be held or can be used by, or which will confer any title or honour upon any person other than the person in recognition of whose services the honour or title has been conferred.

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into Your favourable and gracious consideration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising, to support the resolution which stands in my name, it is only fit and proper that I should advise the House that I am making this motion instead of the hon. member from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), whose privilege it was to introduce the subject to the House in 1914, because of his having informed me that he did not care this year to give the matter consideration. In speaking to me in reference to the matter, he told me that he thought war conditions at the present time were so pressing, and that the responsibilities of the Government were so great, that it would not be right, fit, or proper that they should be worried with other anxieties at this time. While I appreciate the sincerity of the hon. gentleman's motives, I must say that I do not see eye to eye with him. It occurs to me that if there ever was a time when a subject such as this should be brought before the House, it is a time when the nation is at war, because if war teaches us anything it teaches us this: that when the country is at war and when the war is over, you are likely to have the greatest crop, if I might use that term, of decorations and recognitions that are from time to time seen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: And, Sir, I think there is another reason why this matter should be brought before the House at this particular time, and it is that we have in Canada a Union Government, a Government that is supposed to have within its ranks representatives of the two great political parties in Canada, as well as representatives of Labour. And, I know from the address that was delivered to this House in 1914, that the Right hon. leader of the Opposition is not unsympathetic with the resolution that I present to the House to-day for consideration, and I hope favourable decision. For these reasons I think the House should bear with me in presenting to it reasons why I think, first, that hereditary titles should not continue to exist in Canada, and secondly, why women should not bask, if I might use the expression, in the reflected glory of their husband's distinctions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: I might say, Sir, if I were to go as far as my inclination takes me, my resolution would strike at the very root of the iniquity, because I have no sympathy at all with titular distinctions given to men in civil life. I am quite prepared to admit the correctness of men in military life being given rank and distinction, because if the system is to prevail there must be distinctions by which those with higher rank have recognition and priority over those of lower rank; but when it comes to granting distinctions to men in civil life for the services they have rendered their state, for great munificence, or for outstanding ability in their profession or business, it is a procedure with which I have no sympathy. But, Sir, while in theory I might go farther than my resolution goes, yet I trust I am not altogether blind to practical considerations. They say that when a man begins to remember the days of long ago, it is an evidence that age is creeping on him, and when I was endeavouring to secure some comparison as to how I might bring to the House my reason for not going as far in this matter as my desire would take me, I cast my mind back to my student days at Queen's University, when Sir George Kirkpatrick, at one time Speaker of this House, in addressing the students of my day, said: "If you want to roost high you have got to fly high, but be careful you do not fly over the roost." And that is what influenced me in restricting my resolution: I wanted to fly high, I wanted to roost high, but I did not want to frame my resolution so that a dozen or so men in this House would escape from their sense of obligation, and vote against it because the resolution was broader than their sympathies. For that reason I have restricted the resolution to hereditary titles and what I may call the reflected titles of women.

Now, Sir, it has been said that in Canada we should have titles because they have titles in England; that England has developed an official aristocracy which is a very essential part of the Government, and if it is good for England it is equally good for Canada. I think we should examine the analogy, I think we should examine the source from which titles in England come, and I feel satisfied that from an examination of the source and of the development of the institution it will be apparent that conditions in England and conditions in Canada are totally different. Titles to-day in England are really only the picturesque effect of the days of feudalism. They are distinctions without the responsibilities of service. In the old feudal days in England and on the continent the granting of a title was a recognition, but it carried a duty. It was the giving of a privilege, but it carried an obligation, and, as a rule, titles were granted in respect of territorial possessions.

Many of the members of this House have, like myself, been in England. I do not know whether I am a deeper dyed democrat than they are, but there was one thing that always grated upon me, and that was when a man rose to address an assemblage of Englishmen, an assemblage of Britishers, he began his address by, "My lords and gentlemen."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: My lords and gentlemen may be all right for England, or Britain, but from my point of view it is not all right for Canada. Britain has an aristocracy which is deeply rooted in her constitution, but no man can have talked with the common people in England, no man can have considered the conditions of the common people there without standing aghast and being shocked at the class, almost the caste, distinctions that there prevail.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: Not two years ago I drove one evening in a motor car in Scotland and talked to as bright a young man as one would want to hear, and he told me that he regretted that he had stayed in the Old Country because the class and caste distinction was so great that he occupied exactly the same position in society to-day that his forefathers had occupied in earlier days, and that there was no opportunity of bettering or improving his condition.

As I said, Sir, in the early days, titles indicated service, but they are now largely meaningless, and perhaps the House will bear with me a moment or two while I refer to what just a few of the titles of Britain mean.

We will take for instance the title of Duke; it meant the leader of an Army, or a military governor. It is a title that did not come into England until the time of Edward III. Its delay in coming to England arose from the fact that the title of William the Conqueror in Continental Europe was only that of a duke. and he did not care to create in Great Britain a title that was equal to his own. But when Edward III was king, the kings had become so well established that they did then appoint dukes, and the title became hereditary. In the early days it was granted to a man if he had an income of £800 a year from the land—and, Sir, I trust the House will see as the debate progresses, that from the beginning it was those who were or are in affluent circumstances that had the advantage of the King's prerogative.

Now, taking the title of Marquis; he was governor of a province that bordered on or "marched with" another state, and it was his duty to guard his province. The title was first granted for life; it became hereditary for the first time in the German Empire about 940. In England the title was first used in Richard II.'s reign, and he created all sorts of discord and annoyance by interposing this title of Marquis between the title of Duke and that of Earl, which was the first Anglo-Saxon title after that of Prince. Before the Norman conquest there was no other titles than those of Prince and Earl, except such merely officiary ones as Sheriff and Alderman. The Earl was an "honourable man," a warrior, and in return for his recognition by the King made payment in men, horses and spears. That was his service. The value of an Earldom was £400 a year. He had power of administration in his own district or county.

Then there was the title of Viscount, the official left in charge by a Count. First the title was officiary and afterwards it became hereditary. Sometimes the Viscount was created by the King instead of the Count, or as his vassal direct. In jurisdiction the rank was perhaps equivalent to Saxon Alderman or Sheriff. But this title of Viscount was not used in England until after the reign of Henry VI.

Then we have the title of Baron. The baron was lord of the territory from which he took his name, with some judicial powers, but beneath the dignitaries hitherto spoken of. There were three classes of barons; first, King's Barons, holding their land direct from the crown, secondly, Barons of subjects, under Earls, and holding their baronies from them. Both these classes were Parliamentary barons, and had revenue amounting to "13 knights fees and the third part." Thirdly, there were Lords of Manors, with smaller revenues and not summoned to Parliament.

I would like to draw attention to this point, for this reason. We have sometimes heard it said that these titles only arose from the prerogative of the Crown. In the main they did, but those of a certain station had the right of creating titles for their inferiors. There were the King's barons, those created by the King; and then there were the barons of pledges, created by earls in the higher order, and then we have the lords of the manor, and so on. Then we come to the title of baronet. Baronet is rather an interesting title in these days.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: It has been the creation of baronetcies in this country which has aroused some little interest in this subject. It is interesting to know how these arose. I wonder if you will be surprised to learn that James I, with an ingenuity born of a financial stringency, created the title of baronet to secure a class that would look after the colonization of Ulster, and he sold the privilege for a thousand pounds. And if you are going to get a thousand pounds for a title, you have to make it worth while for the recipient to pay the money. So he made the title hereditary, giving the baronet precedence over all the knights, and he said in the patents: "You are entitled to be called Sir, and your wife may be called Lady, Madame or Dame.

The knight was a landed proprietor, with a very small holding, and by virtue of his gentle condition he had the privilege of fighting on horseback instead of on foot, holding his land on the express condition of readiness to assist the king in arms.

In 1205 a writ of King John directed that every nine knights should provide a tenth, well equipped with horse and arms, for the defence of the kingdom, and should contribute 2s. per diem for his keep. The penalty was forfeiture of their land and a fine. But in the time of Henry III., in 1224, the king, in order to obtain money for his wars, ordered all laymen, who were of military age and who held a knight fee, to get themselves knighted, and a similar order was issued in 1234. In 1254 all who held land of the annual value of £10 were ordered to receive the dignity, though exemption might be purchased by payment of a fine. In those days men were anxious to avoid knighthood on account of the responsibilities it entailed, and the fines appear to have been considerable. Edward I. imposed the obligation afresh, and in 1292 ordered that all who held land to the value of £40 a year were to be distrained.

Coming to later days, James I., in the early part of his reign, revived the practice, and called on all who received forty pounds a year to receive knighthood or to pay a composition, and he made many hundreds of knights in the first year of his reign. The Long Parliament abolished compulsory knighthood on the ground that they objected to the king raising money in that way without their consent. In other words the conferring of knighthood meant that the knight had to pay something for his privilege. And I was rather amused to be told by a knight, in these democratic days, that distraint of knighthood has somewhat changed its method of extracting money, that even to-day under democratic conditions, people were demanding their toll. He told me that a short time ago he asked for a service and he was asked a somewhat large sum in payment, and he said to the man: "You are charging me much more than this is worth," to which he had the reply: "Why, are you not a knight?—you have to pay for your privilege." Democracy is taking advantages of these privileges. As I said a moment ago, privilege and obligation, rights and duties, went hand in hand in the early days. In titles, it is the same as it is in many other things: You grant a privilege and you expect a realization of duty, and those to whom the privilege is granted soon forget that they hold the privilege for which they owe a duty, and believe they hold the privilege as a vested interest. It was not long, as we count the life of nations, before the privileges in the old land were taken as a right, and the duties forgotten. As a historical example of this, I would ask you to consider the position of the Highlands of Scotland. In the Peninsular War the Highlanders fought by the hundreds, but the large land-owners found sheep raising more profitable than keeping their tenantry on the soil, and used their land for grazing. And so, in the Crimean War, the Highlands were so stripped of men that they were almost unable to furnish soldiers. To-day, in some of the north lands of Britain, the shooting rights are of more value to the owner of the land than the rights of the tenantry. That is one reason why we are being called upon to-day to cultivate to a greater extent than should be necessary to send food to the old land. I am not saying anything on my own initiative. There are probably few men in this House who have not read Goldsmith's "Deserted Village." The simplicity of the theme and the gentle touch of the writer are remarked to-day, and I would like to draw the attention of the House to a few lines taken from that work, in which the author says, speaking of a condition similar to that to which I have just now attracted the attention of this House:

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade:
A breath can make them, as a breath has made:
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied.
A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
When every rood of ground maintained its man;
For him light labour spread her wholesome store,
Just gave what life required, but gave no more:
His best companions innocence and health,
And his best riches ignorance of wealth.

I therefore say, Sir, that if anything is demonstrated, it is that hereditary titles have not done for Britain what their founders expected they would do.

Now, let me for a moment or two draw the attention of the House to conditions in Canada. Some Canadians may glory in their ancestry, but I think the majority of us look facts fairly in the face, and realize that the majority of the men who came to this country, the fathers and grandfathers of the present generation, came to this country because it offered to them better opportunity for making their way in the world. To try to claim anything else is to try to set up snobbishness instead of the true standard. I want to say that, in speaking from my place in this House this afternoon, I speak as the son of a man who came here because he realized that the Old Country did not offer him the opportunity for him to advance that he thought this country would, and anything I have in this world I owe to his industry and thrift and courage in facing Canada when it was a wilderness. Now, Sir, as I said at the beginning, I am a democrat.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: I have always been deeply impressed by the beginning of the second paragraph of the American Constitution, in which Jefferson, influenced by the philosophy of Locke, laid this down as a principle: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." Now, Sir, I want the House to remember that, in preparing that Declaration of Independence, Jefferson was preparing a political document. It was a political, not a moral, declaration. And when Jefferson said that all men were created equal, he did not mean that all men were created equal intellectually or morally. What he meant was this: that all men before the law had equal rights and equal privileges, and that no one was entitled to priority. I subscribe to that as the sound declaration for a democratic country, and I sincerely trust that before I am through this afternoon the Prime Minister will say that he realizes that the democracy of Canada is equal to that of the country which lies to the south of the line.

I think that the simplicity of our forefathers is something of which we may all be proud. You may say that Canadian statesmen were the makers of Canada, but the men also who made Canada were those who came to this country and amid the trials of the wilderness laid the foundation of the rights and privileges we enjoy to-day. They were the true makers of Canada. But, Sir, no man who has lived in this country within the last ten years can think of Canada's development prior to the war without being shocked by realizing how far we were getting away from the simplicity of our ancestors. We have had in Canada tremendous national and industrial expansion. People grew rich; if a man wanted to make money it was almost impossible for him not to grow rich, if he made money his ideal. A new standard was developing prior to 1914 in the matter of how a man was to be measured. We were beginning to value a man by what he was worth—the size of his house, the number of his motor-cars, and the elegance of their equipment, and the extent of his wife's dinner parties, and the number of gowns she had was beginning to determine what a man's family station was. This war has brought tremendous agonies; it has brought sorrow and anguish into Canadian life, but, thank God, it has brought one other thing; it has changed the standard of value of the citizens of Canada. We no longer value men by what they have; we value them by what they are. Some people call me a Socialist. I should like to define my Socialism. Socialism is a very general term; you may regard it as synonymous with anarchy, or you may define it as the recognition of the right that every man is entitled to a fair chance. I am a Socialist, if by that term you mean that there should be a reasonable equality of opportunity; if you lay down as a fundamental principle that every man should get a due amount of this world's goods for the services that he renders; that no group, no class, no individual should be crippled just because of lack of money to get a fair start in life. I have run, not one, but five or six elections, parliamentary and municipal, in the city from which I come, and if there is one thing that has wrung my heart it has been to find, among the households of people whom I call my constituents, especially bright boys or girls who were obliged to leave school because the factory age had come and the family could not afford to keep the child at school because of the necessity of their earning to assist the other members of the family. I am a Socialist, to the extent of my belief that that child is entitled to a chance. It has been strongly borne in upon me that "slow rises worth by poverty oppressed." My views are to this extent socialistic: that unbearable burdens of this kind should be lifted from the masses of the people.

As I say, the war came. Men went to the war from a sense of duty. We learned that in the humblest clay a hero might be hidden; that there was no monoply in virtue. Occasion showed who were brave and who were cowards; who were saints and who were sinners. Numerous examples might be given to the House of wonderful nobleness of spirit, but two that come from the people have deeply impressed me. One is of that of a boy John—I do not remember his surname; I remember him only as John. He stood on a certain battleship until he was killed, when every member of the gun crew was gone, because it was his duty to stay there. He did his duty, and did it unto the end. The other magnificent example of nobleness of spirit was that of a simple seaman who stood on board a man-of-war as she was sinking, having previously drawn the lot entitling him to go into the lifeboat. He turned to a good friend whom he knew had parents to support, and said: you take my slip; you get into the boat—and then he calmly faced the future knowing that death was inevitable. You cannot get finer examples of nobility of spirit than this, and if we are going to have titles, this is the class of people which should have recognition, not those who by vast munificence, have to a certain extent, brought themselves public recognition.

As I said in the beginning, the reason why I am speaking this afternoon is that I fear that out of this war is going to come a great shower of titles. Why do I think that? Because on the 18th day of March of this year, the following despatch came from England:

Canada Asks Title Delay.

London, March 17.—The list of honours of the new Order of the British Empire appears to-night for Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the Crown colonies, accompanied by the intimation that "at the desire of the Canadian Government submission to His Majesty of the list for the Dominion of Canada has been postponed."

That means, if the despatch is correct, that a list had been prepared and that the Canadian Government had asked that the list be held up. I think that we as members of this Parliament, representing the people, have the right to know who prepared the list, and if it was not prepared on the word of the Prime Minister, or of this Government, we have the right—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has gathered an entirely erroneous impression from the despatch. It merely meant that the Canadian Government had up to that time prepared no list.

Mr. NICKLE: Then, as I always gladly do, I accept the word of the Prime Minister. But in rising it seems to me that the Prime Minister lays down this as a principle; and as the Government of this country has not prepared a list, no list should be submitted to His Majesty for approval without the consent of the Prime Minister. I say that that is sound and proper. What I intended to ask the Prime Minister was this: was that list prepared by him, or was it prepared with his approval, or was it prepared by somebody else? He tells me that no list was prepared; therefore the despatch was incorrect and I shall not follow the matter further.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may tell my hon. friend that the Prime Minister was asked to prepare a list, but that he found other urgent engagements which made it impossible for him to give consideration to the subject.

Mr. NICKLE: I am very glad indeed that the Prime Minister found other considerations requiring his attention. If we read into the lines of his remarks the meaning that is obvious, it is apparent that if other considerations had not had his attention, before this fresh hereditary titles might have been bestowed upon Canadians.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The British Empire Order is not hereditary.

Mr. NICKLE: Well, others are. The reason why I speak of the matter from this angle is this: I have a great regard for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I think he is one of the finest examples of the fine Tory politician, mellowed by ripe experience into an Imperial statesman. But in the debate of 1914, page 480 of Hansard, he said this in reply to the resolution of the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham):

I have not very much to say upon this question except that I think the bestowment of honours comes from the source of all honours, that is, the King; and that we must allow the King to have unrestricted scope as to the selection of persons upon whom to bestow these titles of honour.

I do not know that this Parliament, not having the power of originating or controlling; not being the supreme source of power so far as the bestowment of honours is concerned, has anything particular to say about it, or should pass legislation with reference to it. That is my first objection to the passage of a Bill of this kind in this Parliament.

Now, Sir, there I want to differ from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have got a long way beyond the divine right of kings. I think the prerogative of the Crown must be exercised constitutionally, and I am not prepared for one moment to admit the doctrine that an overseas dominion has no voice in the recognition by His Majesty of the citizens of that overseas Dominion. I want to show you, Sir, that I am not the only one who thinks this. Last year, we had in England a conference at which the Premiers of the overseas dominions were present. I am now reading from a little volume called "War-time Speeches of Lieutenant General, the Right Hon. J. C. Smuts." It is published by Hodder and Stoughton, of London, Toronto and New York. Among those speeches, I find the following resolution moved by the Prime Minister of this Government:

The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities.

They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the Dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several governments may determine.

Surely that lays down the principle that an overseas dominion within the sphere of the Imperial authority in so far as it affects an overseas dominion, has a right to be heard and to be recognized. General Smuts took also the same view, and I am reading these remarks, to illustrate the sense in which I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce was wrong in the principle which he enunciated in this House in 1914. General Smuts, in speaking to the resolution of the Prime Minister of this Government, said:

The subject matter of this resolution, as Sir Robert Borden has stated, has been carefully considered, and although quite properly, a definite decision on the main problem is to be postponed for future action by a more important conference than this, yet certain principles are affirmed here in this resolution which are very important and far reaching. The resolution refers, in the first place, to the question of the status of the self-governing Dominions. That matter has already been referred to both by Sir Robert Borden and by Mr. Massey, and I wish to say a few words in reference to the point. The resolution says that any future settlement that is come to must "be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth." The whole question of the future status of the Dominions is therefore raised in this resolution. So far the British Empire has developed along natural lines. The Dominions started as colonies and settlements of the mother country and of the British Isles. They started as Crown colonies; they developed into self-governing colonies, and now they have become the present Dominions. Other parts of the world have been added to the Empire, until to-day we have really a congress of nations. These old colonies and the present Dominions have in course of time increased in importance, increased in population and in economic influence, and are to-day already playing a part in the world which seems to my mind to make it very necessary that their status should be very seriously considered, and should be improved. Too much, if I may say so, of the old ideas still cling to the new organism which is growing. I think that although in practice there is great freedom, yet in theory the status of the dominions is of a subject character. Whatever we may say, and whatever we may think, we are subject provinces of Great Britain. That is the legal theory of the constitution, and in many ways which I need not specify to-day, that theory still permeates practice.

In the light of those speeches and in the light of the resolution, I think the principle as enunciated by the Prime Minister and by General Smuts is the correct principle and one that should govern in Canada, and the position taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not such as a self-respecting overseas dominion can acquiesce in.

Going a step further and coming to the philosophy of titles, if I may so term it, why do people want titles at all? As far as I can find out, and as far as I can think it out, I suppose we must admit that there is vanity in most people. Human beings desire recognition, and the people at large are pleased when such recognition is justly given. Besides, there is in the world a certain class of people who will do more if they are going to get something for it; in other words, if you recognize them. They like it to be known by the world in general and by people with whom they mix that other people recognize their abilities, and that they have a handle to their name as evidence of their virtue and of their character. If, in every day practice, you could reward where reward should be given, and if it were possible for the Prime Minister —because I still stick to my position that the Prime Minister in England, in the main, recommends to His Majesty those to whom titles shall be given, and it is a constitutional privilege that the Prime Ministers of the overseas dominions must exercise if this thing is to be kept in reasonable check— exactly and accurately to determine all those to whom recognition should be given —there might be some merit in the continuance of the system. But those of us who have thought over the matter, know that this is altogether impossible. We know that, as a rule, titles go to those who have the big places and who catch the public eye, and that the men who, in restricted areas and within their own circles, do just as efficient, just as thorough, and just as praiseworthy work, get nothing but the go-by, with the result that a spirit of jealousy is engendered, and instead of your stimulating a nation to united effort as the result of the recognition of only those who are outstanding, the majority of the people are indifferent, and there is a tendency to think that nothing need be done because nothing will be heard of what has been done. You get away altogether from what I think is the right principle, namely, that virtue is its own reward. If Pitt and Gladstone were big enough to be Prime Ministers of England and to carry to their dying day their own surnames, I do not think we should be going too far if we should ask that men less great should do the same.

I have heard a good deal as to the position I have taken in regard to a woman not being given a title owing to the fact that her husband has been granted a title. To catch my point of view, you have to go back a little and consider the legal and constitutional position of women in relation to the community. In the old civilization woman was really, so to speak, a chattel, the chattel, first of her father, and then of her husband. A relic of the old days exists in the fact that on her marriage day a woman is given away by her father. In the old days, the woman belonged to the parent until the father transferred the title, so to speak, to her husband. But the position that woman occupies in society to-day is quite different. First, we had the right gradually recognized that her property could not be taken from her without her consent. There was no longer unity of property. Then we had a further recognition, at least in the province from which I come, by which she was given absolute control of her property, and only a few day ago the leader of the Government introduced into this House a Bill by which woman is given equal status with man in this country so far as the franchise goes. It is inevitable—it has not reached here yet; it may take a few years—it follows, as night does the day, that you must give her in the near future the right to sit in these halls and in the legislatures of the provincial parliament. If she has brains enough to vote—and we all admit that she has—with a little training she will have the ability to sit and debate in these legislative halls. The whole status of a woman has been changed. She is now an independent entity. She has her own position in the community, and, having that position in the community, I think the time has come when she should have her recognition by virtue of her individual accomplishments, and not shine, as I said in the early part of my remarks, in the reflected glory of her husband. I want to go further—and in this I may offend certain women in this country —I believe it is the social aspirations of the women that lead them to desire titles in this country. A cynic in this country once said that a man measured his worth by his intellectual capacity and the money he could make, and a woman by her social status, and I have been shocked at the social superiority that some women attempted to assume, simply because their husbands had been singularly successful in making money, and had shown great tact in the method they had adopted in giving donations to certain objects. I think a woman's status entitles her to recognition as of her own right, and I believe if there were no reflective titles, you would have less seeking after them, and you would have greater equality in society, and for these reasons, briefly put, I think there should be no such thing as a woman being given the title of a "lady," by virtue of the fact that her husband is called "Sir."

I want to go a step further. I am speaking again of hereditary titles. I have no sympathy with other titles, but my resolution is directed against hereditary titles. When I ask myself the question, why should a title be hereditary? I cannot answer it, and one of the greatest difficulties I had in preparing an argument on such a question as this, is that I could not consistently put up a mental man of straw that I could later on knock down. I could not conceive why there should be such a thing as hereditary titles. Lloyd George once used what I might call a brutal simile. I do not know that I would like to adopt it, but he was the great democrat twenty years ago, and is yet. In talking of the hereditary titles in England, he said: "I never could see"—these are not his words but the gist of his argument—"how we get to the position that all the quality is in the oldest pup in the litter." It is a rough simile, but I cannot see why the oldest son has all the qualities, and yet if he has not all the qualities, why should he have all the recognition? To go back to the earliest titles, they were not hereditary. In feudal lands, freehold was vested by the monarch in the father for his own life. But as time went on, the father having rendered efficient service, the son knew what was to be done, and on the death of the father the fee went from him to the son, and in that way the hereditary title came. It followed the land, and it followed the service. If the father rendered the service, and received recognition the son got the land and had to undertake the service, and therefore, got the title, but to-day there is no fee. There is no territorial holding in Canada. We are a long way off from the territorial holding as entitling a man to recognition. But we have this: we have the money fee. To use the terms of the hon. gentleman from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), we have got the centralization of wealth, and in a moment or two I intend to direct my attention to that, but I believe with hereditary titles coming to this country, we are going to see the wealth of the father coming to the oldest son instead of being equally divided amongst them all, and later in the debate you will see why that is repugnant to a man of my temperament. A hereditary title rests on this principle: You admit that the oldest son of a noble should be noble, but your experience has proved the fallacy of the argument. If you want to go further and look among the peers of England you will find examples that will shock you, but I do not intend to use the name of any man. Those who are anxious to look into the matter may learn for themselves. Why should we have hereditary titles? What we want to build up is wholesome democracy. and I would commend to the House, and to the Prime Minister of this country, this gentle but firm reply, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts gave certain English nobility in 1640, when they offered to come and settle in Massachusetts, provided that state would create them as an hereditary house. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts made a reply which I think stands out as a beautiful piece of literature, a firm declaration of a democratic group of what they considered the principles that should influence a democracy in the giving of recognition to those that were thought to be great. The declaration was that no man is great because he is the son of a great man, but only those are great who have within them a personal and individual greatness of their own. This is what the Commonwealth of Massachusetts said:

> When God blesseth any branch of any noble or generous family with a spirit and gifts fit for Government, it would be a taking of God's name in vain to put such a talent under a bushel, and a sin against the honour of magistracy to neglect such in our public elections. But if God should not delight to furnish some of their posterity with gifts fit for magistracy, we should expose them rather to reproach and prejudice, and the Commonwealth with them, than exalt them to honour, if we should call them forth when God doth not, to public authority.

That was a clear-cut enunciation of those who understood the principle of democracy, that if a man had worth, the people would recognize it, but if God had not given a man ability, then no hereditary right should be exercised to give him a place in the community he had no right to occupy. If we are going to have hereditary titles, let us be consistent. Why not make our Distinguished Service Orders hereditary? Why not make our university titles hereditary, and our V.C.'s hereditary? And if the Government of this country to-day are prepared to stand by hereditary titles, I see nothing for it, but that they must appoint a committee on eugenics to see that the proper men are given titles. I had hoped, Sir, for the moment that the House would take this matter seriously. Now, Sir, if hereditary titles rest on anything, they rest on the belief that a noble sire will transmit to the coming generation the characteristics that are outstanding in him, and if we are going to come to the conclusion as to whether a noble sire does this, what would you do? You would look back and see the stock from which a man came, and study his atavism, and his prepotency. And if Canadians are to be appointed, I suggest we should appoint the hon. Minister of Justice, whose calm deliberation would enable him to judge of the intellectual qualities of the recipient, and then I would suggest the appointment of the Minister of Agriculture, with his knowledge of stock raising, and then, Sir, as mental and physical qualities are not the only things, by which a man is to be judged, we must consider the spiritual characteristics, and who could be better qualified to act in that respect than the hon. President of the Council on such a committee? I said a moment ago that I thought if we had hereditary titles in this country it would lead to the inevitable conclusion that, a system of primogeniture would be practised; that is the recognition that the eldest son must be given the money, to enable him to maintain the dignity of the family name. I am opposed to the concentration of wealth, and opposed to estates—being entail—being followed in this country. I believe a man should be valued by what he is, and not by his father's worth.

Sir, a man does not have to be very old before his personal ambitions are merged in his ambitions for his children. Little as the distance may be which I have gone, I would a thousand times rather that my children looked back on my virtues, if I have any, than that they should look back on the fact that I gave them a title to carry through life.

This question of hereditary titles is not a new subject in Canada. We have had it up in reference to this country three or four times. I want to go back a little bit into Canadian history. James I, as you know, was a gentleman who knew how to replenish his coffers by the sale of baronetcies and knighthoods. There was a Scotchman by the name of Sir William Alexander, and if there is anything to be got where there is money at the end of it you will generally find that a Scotchman, in dealing with the English in reference to these matters, will be looking after the main chance. Sir William Alexander saw that baronetcies were to be created because James was very anxious to build up Ulster, and to replenish his exchequer. He, therefore, approached the monarch and said: "Across the Atlantic there is New England and New France, let us create a Nova Scotia. If you transfer to me a large tract of land and give me the right to create baronetcies and baronets, I will attempt to populate the country for you." Therefore, in 1621 James the First granted Sir William Alexander a huge tract which practically included all the country now known as the Maritime Provinces. Under the power conferred, Sir William offered a baronetcy and a tract of land three miles long upon the coast, and ten miles up the country—

"To all such principal knights and esquires as will be generously pleased to be undertakers of the said plantation and who will promise to set forth six sufficient men, artificers or labourers, sufficiently armed, apparelled and victualled for two years".

Each baronet paying Sir William "ane thousand markis Scottis money." The proclamation constituting the Order of Baronets of Nova Scotia was issued on November 31, 1624, and ten days before the death of his father Charles I wrote to the Privy Council recommending the scheme. The number of baronets was fixed at one hundred and fifty; one hundred and seven were created. In what is now New Brunswick, thirty-four; Nova Scotia, fifteen; Cape Breton, twenty-four, and Anticosti, thirty-four. The scheme came to nought, as Charles I. handed the country back to the French. His plan was to establish in Acadia a state of society similar to that of mediaeval Europe, with the soil in possession of lords paramount, under whom the colonists should hold their lands as tenants. Sometimes, in studying history from that standpoint, I am not sorry that Charles handed the country back to the French, because in that way he saved us from a great deal of trouble in Canada and especially in the Maritime Provinces to this day.

There is a nearer example and an example that is pregnant with thought for me. I want to view this subject seriously. While at times there may have been jocular things in my remarks this afternoon, I have never approached anything in my life more seriously than I have this subject. I think that it strikes at the very foundation of Canadian society, and we have got to stop it. In 1789, after the rebellion south of the line, the Colonial office prepared a document. This document is not in print, but I had the privilege of seeing a copy through the courtesy of Mr. J. S. Ewart, of this city. It shows that it appeared to the Colonial Office at that time that the rebellion of the thirteen colonies was caused by the fact that there was not, as a bulwark between the Crown, the monarchy and the democracy, a hereditary house that would stimulate the ambition of men to desire recognition and which would have so operated that it would have won from the democracy and to the monarchy the great men who took the part of the democracy or who took the part of the thirteen colonies against the Mother Country. It was suggested in all seriousness that there should be established in Canada a hereditary house. We see the result of that document in the Constitutional Act. The Constitutional Act came into effect in 1791, and the fifth and sixth provisions of that Act read as follows:

V. And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That every member of each of the said Legislative Councils shall hold his seat therein for the term of his Life, but subject nevertheless to the provisions herein-after contained.

VI. And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That whenever His Majesty, His Heirs or Successors, shall think proper to confer upon any subject of the Crown of Great Britain, by Letters Patent under the Great Seal of either of the said Provinces, any hereditary Title of Honour, Rank or Dignity of such Province, descendable according to any Courts of Descent limited in such Letters Patent, it shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, His Heirs or Successors, to annex thereto, by the said Letters Patent, if His Majesty, His Heirs or Successors, shall so think fit, an hereditary right of being summoned to the Legislative Council of such Province, descendable according to the Courts of Descent so limited with respect to such Title, Rank or Dignity; and that every person on whom such right shall severally so descend, shall thereupon be entitled to demand from the Governor, Lieutenant Governor or Person adminstering the Government of such Province, His Writ of Summons to such Legislative Council, at any time after he shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, subject nevertheless to the Provisions hereinafter contained.

Therefore, we see that this sixth section of the Constitutional Act made provision for establishing in Canada a hereditary legislative council. One of the reasons why that was not carried out in practice probably was that Lord Simcoe and Lord Dorchester, both firm old Tories, Lord Dorchester the greatest Tory of them all, advised against the creation of hereditary titles. Lord Dorchester said:

The fluctuating state of property in these provinces would expose all hereditary honors to fall into disregard and disrespect.

He saw that if you were going to have a hereditary aristocracy for the support of the monarchy, you had to make provision for money for the decent support of those who enjoyed the titles.

I now want to read to you another extract, because I am afraid that perhaps some one will say: This man is setting up a new doctrine; but what does he know about it after all? He is expressing his own ideas, and they are not entitled to much weight. They are only the expression of one man's idea. You know how you can laugh a case out of Court, and I have known many good cases to be laughed out of Parliament. I want to read a quotation from Professor Shortt's life of Lord Sydenham, which is as follows:

The legislative council was supposed to be the counterpart of the House of Lords. A great part of the Constitutional Act was taken up with provisions for securing in the colony a body of landed aristocracy which, when furnished with suitable titles of honour, would provide the requisite nobility from which to recruit the legislative council, or Canadian House of Lords. The proximity of the exalted rank and dignity of those Canadian nobles would incidentally sharpen the tooth of remorse which was assumed to be gnawing the consciences of those fallen republicans in the lower regions to the south.

The provision for an aristocracy contributed the Family Compact, with the necessary accompaniments of land-grabbing intrigues, for an impecunious aristocracy would inspire little awe and less envy.

As the members of the legislative council held their offices for life, they were free from the corrupting influences which press upon those who have to keep in touch with the vulgar multitude. They could, therefore, if so inclined, freely devote to public questions an enlightened mind and unbiased judgment; or, if differently minded, they could devote themselves with equal effect to the pursuit of private interests and class privileges, with a calm disregard of public opinion.

If you have no respect for the opinion of Professor Shortt who wrote the life of Lord Sydenham, let me refer you to what Fox said when the Constitutional Act was under debate in the House of Lords. He said this:

As to the points of hereditary powers and hereditary honours, to say that they were good or that they were not good, as a general proposition, was not easily maintained; but he saw nothing so good in hereditary powers and honour, as to incline us to introduce them into a country where they were unknown, and by such means distinguish Canada from all the colonies in the West Indies. In countries where they made a part of the constitution, he did not think it wise to destroy them; but to give birth and life to such principles in countries where they did not exist, appeared to him to be exceedingly unwise. He could not account for it, unless it was that Canada having been formerly a French colony, there might be an opportunity of reviving those titles of honour, the extinction of which some gentlemen so much deplored, and to revive in the West that spirit of chivalry which had fallen into disgrace in a neighbouring country. He asked, if those red and blue ribbands, which had lost their lustre in the old world, were to shine forth again in the new? It seemed to him peculiarly absurd to introduce hereditary honours in America, where those artificial distinctions stunk in the nostrils of the natives. He thought these powers and honours wholly unnecessary, and tending rather to make a new constitution worse than better.

He goes on to say:

The legislative councils ought to be totally free, and repeatedly chosen, in a manner as much independent of the governor as the nature of a colony would admit. Those, he conceived, would be the best; but if not, they should have their seats for life, be appointed by the King, consist of a limited number, and possess no hereditary honours. Those honours might be very proper, and of great utility, in countries where they had existed by long custom; but, in his opinion, they were not fit to be introduced where they had no original existence; where there was no particular reason for introducing them, arising from the nature of the country, its extent, its state of improvement, or its peculiar customs; where, instead of attracting respect, they might excite envy; and as but few could enjoy them, those who did not, might be induced to form an unfavourable comparison between their own situation and that of their neighbours, among whom no such distinctions were known.

Now, Sir, I said at the beginning the reason I brought this motion up to-day was that I thought the war would be used as a reason for the creation of honours. I want to direct your attention to the fact that in 1791 the war was used as a reason for the attempted creation of a hereditary class that should intervene between the democracy and the Sovereign. The war may be the reason to-day why hereditary titles may be introduced into this country.

I would like to read another instance before I leave the subject. Lord Bryce is a man for whom we have much respect, and I would like to read to this House, and through Hansard send out to the country what Lord Bryce thinks of hereditary titles. I will now read extracts from his American Commonwealth:

> It may seem a paradox to observe that a millionaire has a better and easier social career open to him in England than in America. Nevertheless there is a sense in which this is true. In America, if his private character be bad, if he be mean, or openly immoral, or personally vulgar, or dishonest, the best society may keep its doors closed against him. In England great wealth, skillfully employed, will more readily force these doors to open. For in England great wealth can, by using the appropriate methods, practically buy rank from those who bestow it; or by obliging persons whose position enables them to command fashionable society, can induce them to stand sponsors for the upstart, and force him into society, a thing which no person in America has the power of doing. To effect such a stroke in England the rich man must of course have stopped short of positive frauds, that is, of such frauds as could be proved in court. But he may be still distrusted and disliked by the elite of the commercial world, he may be vulgar and ill-educated, and indeed have nothing to recommend him except his wealth and his willingness to spend it in providing amusement for fashionable people. All this will not prevent him from becoming a baronet, or possibly a peer, and thereby acquiring a position of assured dignity which he can transmit to his offspring. The existence of a system of artificial rank enables a stamp to be given to base metal in Europe which cannot be given in a thoroughly republican country.
> Europeans have been known to ask whether the United States do not suffer from the absence of a hereditary nobility. As may be supposed, such a question excites mirth in America; it is as if you were to offer a Court and an Established Church. They remark, with truth, that since Pitt in England and the Napoleons in France prostituted hereditary titles, these have ceased to be either respectable or useful. "They do not," say the Americans, "suggest antiquity, for the English families that enjoy them are mostly new; they are not associated, like the ancient titles, with the history of your nation; they are merely a prize offered to wealth, the expression of a desire for gilding that plutocracy which has replaced the ancient aristocracy of your country. Seeing how little service hereditary nobility renders in maintaining the standard either of manner, or morals, or honour, or public duty, few sensible men would create it in any European country where it did not exist; much less then should we dream of creating it in America, which possesses none of the materials or conditions which could make it tolerable. If a peerage is purchasable even in England, where the dignity of the older nobility might have suggested some care in bestowal, purchasable not so openly in Portugal, or a German principality, but practically purchasable by party services and by large subscriptions to public purposes, much more would it be purchasable here, where there are no traditions to break down, where wealth accumulates rapidly, and the wealthy seek every avenue for display. Titles in this country would be simply an additional prize offered to wealth and ambition. They could not be respected. They would make us as snobbish as you are." A European observer will not quarrel with this judgment. There is a growing disposition in America, as everywhere else, to relish and make the most of such professional or official titles as can be had, it is a harmless way of trying to relieve the monotony of the world. If there be, as no doubt there is, less disposition than in England to run after and pay court to the great or the fashionable, this is perhaps due not to any superior virtue, but to the absence of those opportunities and temptations which their hereditary titles and other social institutions set before the English.

Lord Bryce declares, further, and I want the House to pay attention to what he says:

> It would be the very wantonness of folly to create in the new country what most thinking people would gladly be rid of in the old one.

I fear I am wearying the House but I would like to direct attention to another side of the question—and it is a most serious side—the corruption that is being brought to view in the granting of titles in England.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: I am not going to use my own language because I do not know, as a matter of fact, of my own knowledge that which is spoken of, but I will read from the Debates that took place in the House of Lords in England, in 1914, and twice afterwards in 1917, and I think that before I finish, this House will be convinced that titles are, as Lord Bryce said, purchasable for money, and that they are no indication of the worth of their recipient, or of him to whom they are given. James I of Scotland created a Viscount and Lord Treasurer for which he secured £20,000, Pitt in the period from 1784 to 1801 created 140 peerages, granted to men whose buroughs he wished to buy that he might strengthen himself in Parliament and make his Government secure. What I intend to draw the attention of the House and the country to this afternoon is that the prerogative that was at one time exercised by the Crown for the enrichment of the Sovereign is to-day recognized and used by political parties in England for the maintenance of party funds.

Now, Sir, let me first turn your attention to what was said in the debate of 1914, and

I will quote from the proceedings as found at page 274, Lord Ribblesdale was speaking to a resolution which was before the House. The Earl of Selborne had moved:

> That a contribution to Party Funds should not be a consideration to a Minister when he recommends any name for an honour to His Majesty; that effectual measures should be taken in order to assure the nation that Governments, from whatever Political Party they are drawn, will act according to this rule; and that this House requests the concurrence of the House of Commons in the foregoing Resolution.

In other words Lord Selborne asked that an assurance be given that party funds were not to be got by the sale of titles. Practically no member of the House of Lords denied the existence of the practice. Men like Lord Ribblesdale, of a cynical temperament, admitted that it existed, but said it was not of much importance. Hear what he said as printed on page 274 of Hansard:

> I am afraid I belong to the class of people which the noble Lord behind me (Lord Charnwood) very pleasantly alluded to as people who seem to think that these things must be, that they do not very much matter, that they have always gone on and are likely to go on, and that if they do not go on in one form will go on in another. That is precisely my opinion.

He admits the existence of the fact, and says that, as far as his opinion goes, it must go on. Let me read you what the mover of the resolution says:

> There is a prevalent belief—I do not think that I should be guilty of exaggeration if I said a very widely prevalent belief—that persons are often recommended for these honours whom no one would have thought of so recommending if they had not contributed largely to Party funds. That prevalent belief takes three forms, as I know, not only from the Press, but from a voluminous correspondence on this subject. It is believed that persons who have social ambition, or whose wives have social ambition, and who have really no claim at all to receive an honour, can purchase it if they go to the right place. Again, the belief takes this form, that there have been cases where social ambition has never entered into the soul of the innocent rich man, but where he has been tempted and where an honour has been actually hawked to him on condition that he would make this contribution. The third case is rather of a different kind, but still, I maintain, a great evil. It is the case of men who have really done public service, whom public opinion would be very content to see honoured, and who have had pressure— I would almost say brutal pressure—put upon them to make a contribution to Party funds which they did not wish, and in some cases could not afford to make. If it were necessary, I could quote sheaves of cuttings from the public Press to prove the prevalence of this belief, and from newspapers covering the whole field of political opinion, from the Labour Leader to the Morning Post, and from the Nation to the Saturday Review, and last, but not least, we have the new publication, the Candid Witness, in which Mr. Gibson Bowles has dealt very fully with this question. And further, every playgoer knows that this matter of the sale of honours is now openly scoffed at in the theatre; and it has also even been thrown across the floor of the House of Commons as a taunt from one member to another.

And, then, Sir, it did not stop there. A resolution along similar lines to that moved in 1914 was again moved by Lord Selborne. In the course of the debate Lord Beresford, one of the outspoken men who says what he thinks, is reported at page 184 of Hansard to the following effect:

> My Lords, I should like to support the views of my noble friend Lord Selborne. There is no doubt that the feeling in the country is that most of the Party funds are raised in a manner which is discreditable to public life; that enormous sums of money are paid for Peerages, Baronetcies, and Knighthoods, and they believe further that sums of money have been paid for Privy Councillorships.

Then he goes on and says:

> This war will be celebrated in history for the large numbers of honours, rewards, promotions, and even offices given to people who have disastrously failed. Nobody can deny that. Many of these people who have received honours have no earthly right to them except that they were lucky enough to be plutocrats. Why should not the Patent for a Peerage be made out on exactly the same lines as the Patent for the V. C.

He meant by that that the patent should set out the reason for granting it. Then I would refer to pages 204-5 of the Debates of the same year, in which Lord Salisbury waxes warm in regard to the matter. The Marquess of Salisbury says this:

> Does anybody doubt, even after hearing my noble friend's speech, that there is corruption in the administration of honours in this country? Nobody doubts it. My noble friend said that he knew nothing about it, and had never heard of it. O sancta simplicitas: Does my noble friend really expect us to believe that the leading public men of this country do not know of the corruption which exists in the administration of honours.

Earl Curzon of Keddleston replied:

> I said that I was perfectly well aware of the rumour. I said—and I repeat it—that I know of no established case; and I ask for one.

The reason I read this reference is this: When I come to the October, 1917, debate in the House of Lords, it was established beyond peradventure by cases given in that debate that titles are sold in Britain. Not in the same way that you may buy butter and cheese over the counter, but grants to party funds to secure men peerages, baronetcies and knighthoods. And the Marquess of Salisbury hopes nobody doubts the existence of this evil.

Now I come to the debate of 1917. That is the debate par excellence. That is the debate in which the facts of the whole issue came out. And I am going to read from it at considerable length. I fear I am going to weary the House, but I want the House and the people of this country to know that if the system of honour is going to be continued in Canada, it is going to result in the establishment of a system in the days to come which is going to have a very pernicious effect in this country, because if both parties in England will dispose of honours, it is not going to be long before the principles which I have been speaking of this afternoon—and I do not see how anything else can be admitted—must be adopted in Canada; that is, if the Prime Minister of this country is responsible for the recognition given to Canadians, it will not be long before Prime Ministers in this country may find themselves unwillingly, and perhaps unknowingly, being parties to just such a system as exists in England. I want to be absolutely honest and frank, and my reading of the debate leads me to this conclusion, that the Prime Ministers are not actually aware that they are improperly giving recognition to certain men by granting titles, that it is done through the party whips, and as we are often blind to what the sources of the party expenses are, so the party whip is blind in the matter of recommending titles. The resolution moved by Earl Loreburn reads as follows:

That this House, convinced that Ministers have in recent times advised His Majesty to confer honours and dignities on persons who have given or promised money to Party funds as a consideration therefor, considers that His Majesty's Government ought forthwith to give effect to the following provisions: (1.) That when any honour or dignity is conferred upon a British subject, other than a member of the Royal Family or the members of the Naval, Military, or permanent Civil Service under the Crown, a definite public statement of the reasons for which it has been recommended to the Crown shall accompany the notification of the grant. (2.) That a declaration to the Sovereign be made by the Prime Minister in recommending any person to His Majesty's favour for any such honour or dignity, that he has satisfied himself that no payment or expectation of payment to any Party fund is directly or indirectly associated with the grant or promise of such honour or dignity.

Sir, as I said a moment ago, I want to be perfectly fair. That was the resolution proposed, but the resolution as passed was varied to this extent. The preamble of the resolution as proposed read as follows:

That this House, convinced that Ministers have in recent times advised His Majesty to confer honours and dignities on persons who have given or promised money to Party Funds as a consideration therefor.

That was in the resolution. But during the debate it became manifest that, if this clause were left in, the country at large would read it as meaning that the Prime Ministers were aware of the fact that money had been paid, and that it would have involved the honor of the Prime Minister and might involve the good faith of the Sovereign, and when the resolution was finally passed, these words were deleted, and the second part of the motion was also varied by being made to read as follows:

That the Prime Minister, before recommending any person for any such honour or dignity, should satisfy himself that no payment or expectation of payment to any party or political fund is directly or indirectly associated with the grant or promise of such honour or dignity.

In other words, the House of Lords declared that the bestowal of titles had reached such a stage in Britain that hereditary titles had lost the position that entitled them to respect, and that they were degenerating into a by-word, and a hissing. Let me read to you a few extracts from the speeches made at that time.

The noble and learned Earl said: My Lords, the subject that I am bringing before your lordships is no new one. In February, 1914, before the war, Lord Selborne moved:

"That in the opinion of this House a contribution to party funds should not be a consideration to a Minister when he recommends any name for an honour to His Majesty; that it is desirable that effectual measures should be taken in order to assure the nation that Governments, from whatever political party they are drawn, will act according to this rule; and that this House requests the concurrence of the House of Commons on the foregoing resolution."

That resolution was passed without a division, with unanimity, in this House; but unfortunately, as I think, the House of Commons has taken no notice of that communication. It has been stated here that during this year a number of Peers aud Privy Councillors, of whom I was one, endeavoured by private ways to advance this same object. In August last Lord Selborne raised the same question in this House, but some of us, also including myself, did not think that the answer which was then given, or the way in which the question was met, was satisfactory. I should myself have much preferred if Lord Selborne, who, greatly to his honour, was the first to bring up this matter, had consented to bring forward this evening the motion which stands in my name. He has, however, thought otherwise; therefore I move it myself.

I have thought it right to state plainly on the Notice Paper the ground of this notion, so that there should be no question as to be attitude which is taken up. It is this—"that Ministers have in recent times advised His Majesty to confer honours and dignities on persons who have given or promised money to party funds as a consideration therefor." I believe that to be the truth; and it lies at the root of this resolution. In the course of former debates my noble friend Lord Crewe has given two assurances to the House. One of them was that contributions to party funds had not been a consideration to any Prime Minister in recommending the bestowal of an honour. Of course, I accept the statement of my noble friend. It is explained by his second assurance —namely that the Prime Ministers had not been aware, in recommending any name, of anything that could be said to be a payment made in respect of honours and dignities. I accept that statement also. It comes really to this, that Ministers have not been told, regarding any recipient of honours, that he has made any such payment, and therefore can say truthfully, of course, that no such payment has been a consideration to them. That is precisely what I have heard from very good authority. What I want to secure is the Minister shall be told, before he makes any recommendation that an honour should be bestowed upon any person; for I believe that, although the Minister has not been apprised, payment, or a promise of payment has in fact been in some cases made—of course, I cannot say in how many cases. I mean that there has been a promise of payment in substance and in fact, whatever may have been the circumlocution or the different communications by which the transaction may have been concealed.

In debates of 1914 no instances were given, but in the debate of 1917 instances were given. I quote further from the report:

My Lords, I have not sought any confidences upon this subject in any quarter, but since Lord Selborne's motion in 1914 various perfectly reliable people have told me of purchases and sales of which they knew, or of offers which had been made and been refused, giving the sums of money proposed and also the names. Let me give two illustrations, one from each side—one from the buyers's side, and one from what I may call the seller's side. A personal friend of mine told me that within a period which I will call five or six years, he was three times approached with proposals that he should pay £25,000 for a baronetcy or £15,000 for a knighthood. He, in fact, did not want and had never wished for a title, and he refused; and then a short time afterwards he was told—I am quoting his own words, because he wrote this as well as told me—that "there was a chance of pulling it off if he would go to £10,000 for a knighthood." and that if he wanted a baronetcy later. "a full valuation for the first honour is allowed, and such candidate as a prior claim.

I wish to go further and read another instance:

Then Lord Knutsford told the House, in the last debate on this subject, that a gentleman, almost unknown, had asked him, when the King was going down to a certain hospital, whether if he gave £25,000 to the hospital he would be as likely to get a title as if he gave the money to the party funds. Lord Knutsford told him the truth. He said he would be more likely to get the baronetcy if he gave the money to the party funds; and, added Lord Knutsford "within a short time he came out as a baronet and the hospital suffered in consequence."

Now, my Lords, when we put all these things together; when we have heard in private numbers of statements of a similiar kind; when we hear of great party funds and do not know where they come from; when we see honours given, followed in a short time by fresh honours to gentlemen of great wealth who have never done any public service whatever; when we know that the belief is universal that this is a matter occasionally of bargain and sale; and when we have never heard it denied by anybody, either in this House or anywhere else—then one naturally looks to the Government of the day and expects them either to deny the practice or to provide a remedy.

During the course of the entire debate nobody denied that these things were being practised and were regularly going on in Britain. I now come to the speech of the Earl of Selborne—and I must hurry because time is flying.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Take your time.

Mr. NICKLE: An hon. gentleman near me says: "finish it up properly;" I am glad he thinks that I am making progress in that direction.

The Earl of Selborne said:

My Lords, I rise to second the motion of the noble and learned Earl. When I asked a question on this subject at the beginning of August, my noble friend who leads the Opposition made a most skilful and ingenuous speech in reply. But the foundation of that speech was the erection of a case which he proceeded to demolish, but which we had not named. We have never said that a person otherwise worthy to be honoured by the Crown should be debarred from that honour because he is a good party man and has contributed to party funds, and we have never suggested that great public munificence is not a reasonable subject of award. I wish quite clearly to repeat that we have never occupied that position. I was very plain in my statements to that effect when I first brought this matter before the House in February, 1914, and I did not think it necessary to weary your Lordships last August by repeating those arguments. But as my noble friend assumed that that was our position, I take the first opportunity of again contradicting it.

I have read that because I do not want it said that I have set up the case that great munificence should be debarred from recognition if recognition is given. Great munificence in itself, or the expenditure of great amounts in itself, should not be a ground for recognition. If recognition is given it should be the recognition of the spirit that prompts the donation, not of the amount of the donation itself. (Reading):

The whole attitude of my noble friend opposite (Earl Curzon) and of my noble friend Lord Crewe in dealing with the subject on more than one occasion has been a scepticism as to the extent of the evil. My Lords, we have always understood the extent of this evil. From the information that has come to my knowledge, the evil has greatly increased in recent years and has been increasing up to a quite recent date.

Then he goes on to give the instances. I am going to read them, because I think they should go on Hansard. The foundation of my argument is that these evils exist in England and that I am afraid they will be introduced into this country, and I want the House and the country to understand how publicly and how grossly the thing has been practised overseas. (Reading):

When I spoke on this subject before, I told you that I had been the recipient of many confidences, but that they were confidences, and that I was not in a position to give facts or names. But standing at this place in August I made an appeal, and I asked whether some of those who had personal cognisance of this matter would not allow me to mention here in the House facts on their authority. I am glad to tell you, my Lords, that my appeal was not in vain, and that I am in a position to-night to state the facts of a certain number of cases.

Dr. Millard, the medical officer of health for Leicester, authorises me to say that he had a friend who had done public service in many ways, and unknown to that friend, he approached the local political association of the party to which that friend belonged and asked whether an honour could be obtained for him in reward for his public services. The answer from the leader of the local political association came pat, and these were his words: "Certainly we will consider your suggestion. But we must be quite frank with you. We know it is very objectionable, but we have got to do it. What is your friend prepared to pay?" The reply was that the suggestion had been made quite unknown to his friend and that he knew his friend would in no circumstances pay anything; and then the matter dropped.

The next case is more remarkable. There is a gentleman in Lewes, in Sussex, called Mr. George Holman, who has been seven times mayor of Lewes. He has done public work of a great many kinds, but he has never asked for an honour. In 1912, at the end of his seventh mayoralty, some of his friends in Lewes went to him and said, "We should like to get an honour for you. You have done so much public work that we think you ought to have a reward." He said, "I should like an honour very much. I am greatly obliged to you." One of his friends went straight to headquarters to the Whip, and the Whip said, "Yes, this is a clear case for an honour, What is he prepared to give to my party fund?" The friend returned to Mr. Holman and told him what had been said. Mr. Holman then remarked, "In no circumstances will I give a penny to party funds." The friend then went back once more to the Whip, and the Whip said on each occasion, "This is a very good case for an honour, but an honour he shall not have unless he contributes to my party fund."

My last case has been furnished to me by an ex-member of Parliament, Sir George Kekewich. Sir George, your Lordships will remember, was the Permanent Secretary of the Education Office, and, after that, member for Exeter. He authorizes me to tell this story.

When he was in Parliament at the time the Licensing Bill of the Liberal Government was before the House, a friend of his, not unconnected with the trade, came to him and said that he wanted a knighthood. He was introduced to the Whip, and he was informed that there was no great difficulty about his request. He was a Liberal, and had been a benefactor of his borough and Mayor of it. But he was told, "There are two conditions you have to fulfil. The first is that you should abandon opposition to the Licensing Bill; the second is that you should subscribe £5,000 to the party funds." He said, "All right, I will do both." His name appeared in the next list of honours.

There are other cases, but I shall not weary the House with them. I should like to read to the House something that Lord Bryce has said, because I have a great respect for that gentleman. I believe, if ever there was a man who did public service to his country, who was imbued with a desire to give service because he felt that great men should render public service, it was Lord Bryce. I have endeavoured to make it perfectly clear that I am not casting any imputation on this or that party in Great Britain. It is generally admitted through the debates that in the practices that have grown up, one party is just as black as the other; but if public respect for the peerage is to be maintained, Britain has to grip this reptilian thing by the neck until it dies. This is what Lord Bryce says:

My Lords, I have only a few words to say upon this question and I propose to direct them to a branch of the topic which has not been touched upon by either of the noble Earls who have addressed your Lordships. But before I advert to that particular topic I may perhaps be allowed, though I cannot give any of those sensational incidents to which my noble friend has just treated the House, to say as an old member of the House of Commons—what I think any member who sat in the House of Commons from 1880 to 1908 would say—that there was no doubt at all, even then, in the House of Commons, of the existence of these evils. When we saw hon. members—sometimes others, but chiefly members of the House of Commons, for it was of them that we knew most—when we saw men of great wealth who did not appear to us in their daily converse of the House of Commons and its lobbies to take anything but a purely perfunctory interest in politics, suddenly rise to the peerage or receive other marks of titular distinction, men whose merits no eye less penetrating than that of a party Whip had been able to discern, we were driven to only one conclusion. What was it that entitled them to receive these honours? To that question there was only one answer.

I happen to know some things which I have been told in confidence and therefore cannot use; but although I cannot say anything to your Lordship's to confirm the evidence which my two noble friends have given, I do not think any member of the House of Commons who sat in that assembly during those years, when the evil, according to what my noble friends have said, was less gross than it appears subsequently to have become, doubted the existence of those facts. They doubted them no less than people in the days of Sir Robert Walpole doubted the infinitely and incomparably greater evils which prevailed in those days.

And those of us who know anything of British history know how great were the evils that existed in Walpole's day. I might go on and read the remarks of other members of the House of Lords. Lord Sumner says:

Some noble Lords in speaking, have minimized the evil. Some treated it with an almost paternal indulgence. Some have said that it is not so bad as it was. Some have, in terms, admitted its existence. Nobody has said he does not believe that it exists. I have the greatest difficulty in believing that any noble Lord will speak on behalf of the Government to-night and say that he, for his part, disputes its existence. If he did, I am inclined to think that your Lordships will be disposed to ask in what clostral solitude he has passed his meritorious life.

The Marquess of Lansdowne says, in regard to the question of the granting of honours:

I believe there have been what it is perhaps not too much to call scandals in connection with it, scandals for which the Prime Minister of the day has been in no way responsible, but which have been due to indiscretion or overzeal on the part of his subordinates. Therefore, when my noble friend Lord Selborne suggests that some of us were sceptical about the extent of this evil, I say at once that although he probably considers that it exists on a larger and a more flagrant scale than I do,—

And this is what an ex-Governor General of this country says:

—I am entirely at one with him in believing that there is an evil and it requires to be redressed.

He says further, speaking of qualifications:

I venture to suggest that the real test is this —that no amount which has been contributed in his way by a possible recipient of honours should be recognized as a qualification for him, unless he is abundantly qualified for wholly different reasons un-connected with contributions to party funds.

I would like to direct attention to the fact that Lord Curzon's reply for the Government does not deny that these things exist. He admitted they existed, but in stating the case for the Government insisted the Prime Minister was not aware of it, and the very fact of Lord Curzon speaking for the Government practically meant that they accepted the resolution of the noble Earl Loreburn as truly stating facts. It goes to show, that so far as the Lords were concerned, they were satisfied that these evils did exist. If any gentleman is interested in going further into this matter, it is for him to read. But before I sit down—and I am now reaching, what probably all hon. members will be glad to know, the end of my remarks,—I am going to read one or two extracts from the Canadian Press, because I think the Canadian Press, to a very great extent, mirrors public opinion. While I do not believe that this House should ever be stampeded by public opinion, merely because it is public opinion, yet when from the Atlantic to the Pacific you hear but one voice raised by the public press, and that is that hereditary titles have no place in public life, I think we should listen to what is said. Before, however, I read those extracts, I should like to read a remark made in the legislature of the province of Ontario by the present President of the Privy Council when he was the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition in that House. The president of the Privy Council says:

I venture to think that in the free democracy of Canada we are not improving conditions by importing hereditary titles passing from father to son. I hope it may be the last. I think that when we are fighting the battle of democracy the world over the tendency will be in the old country to bring themselves into harmony with the spirit of democracy rather than for us transplanting part of the old feudal system into Canada.

If the hon. gentleman does not agree with the remarks I have read—I know he does—it is his privilege to rise in his place and contradict me as quoting him incorrectly. The Ottawa Journal-Press says:

We may have had doubts as to the wisdom of introducing life titles into this new country, but we have no doubt at all as to the unwisdom of establishing hereditary titles here. This can be said without any reflection upon recent recipients of such honours.

The idea that any man should be set apart, should be given a handle to his name, and any precedence or advantages attaching thereto, simply because of something done by his ancestors, is foreign to the make-up of the people of this country.

Our principle is and should be that every man must stand on his own feet, and that this position among his fellows must be gained by merit. The acquisition of wealth sometimes upsets that principle, but hereditary titles violate it to an extent that calls for protest at the very outset.

The Hamilton Herald says:

Once more the Herald enters its protest against the bestowal of a peerage or any other hereditary title upon a Canadian resident in Canada and intending to remain in this country. If encouragement is given to this new departure in the way of Imperial honours in Canada, it may not be long before we shall wake up to find ourselves with an aristocratic caste fastened upon our social system. In Britain these hereditary honours stand for something real.

I do not think the writer knew of the debates of 1917.

They are links with Britain's historic part, survivals of the forms of feudalism though dissociated from the powers and privileges which accompanied them in the old feudal days. They are, therefore, interesting historically, and, to a people who reverence their past, they have real symbolic value. In Canada they are exotics, and, to be frank, seem somewhat absurd. There is no historical background for them in this country. They are as in incongruous and out of place here as would be a Gobelin tapestry in a log cabin or a suit of medieval armour in the cottage of a day-labourer. And will mere baronies satisfy the craving of the new aristocracy? If barons, why not Canadian viscounts and earls and dukes? The reason for engrafting the lesser hereditary honour upon the Canadian social system may prove equally good when claims are made for the higher honours. No man who wants to be a baron, no woman who wants to be "Lady", will be content with these distinctions when there is any prospect of the baron becoming an earl and the lady a countess. It is to be regretted that a beginning was ever made in this bad business but we hope there will be so general and pointed a protest against it that it will be discontinued.

This is an essentially democratic country, and we are sure that so far from there being any general desire here for the establishment of a hereditary titled aristocracy, such a movement if attempted would be regarded generally with resentment and disgust.

And the Journal of Edmonton, Alberta, says:

There are reasonable differences of opinion on the subject of titles in general but there is practical unanimity in this country with regard to those which pass from father to son. They are out of keeping entirely with Canadian life. It is no time to introduce them here when feeling against them grows stronger all the time even in the Old Land. There is much to confirm the view that those by no means young will live to see the day when the only hereditary honour in Britain will be the kingship. It stands on quite a different plane of usefulness from that of the various ranks of peers.

The Westminster Gazette of England contended that:

Honours do create and intensify class divisions; they encourage snobbism, and stamp inequality, but we cannot do without them because without these things you could not finance political parties nor could you reward political service.

They do create snobbery and flunkeyism. I am not going to use the name which appears on the head of this paper, but is there any decent, fair-minded man who does not resent this sort of thing? You cannot pick up the Sketch of Britain without seeing a picture on its pages underneath which may be printed.

The Hon. X. Y. Z. walked down Pall Mall with her dog Ponto yesterday. The Hon. X. Y. Z. takes a great interest in munition workers.

Why should she not? Here is an item which reads:

Princess X. helps the workers and takes a great interest in the soldiers.

Why should not the Princess X take an interest in the workers of the munition factories and the soldiers? Some of us feel we are giving a great deal to try and help democracy in this country, to maintain constitutional monarchy, and to maintain the present dynasty on the throne of England. We are proud of our monarch. We sing "God Save the King" with reverence and feeling, but I say it is snobbery and flunkeyism where that sort of thing is presented in the country as a reason why we should look up to the Princess or to others to whom I have referred.

I have tried to make a case without feeling. I have tried to show why women should not have a reflective title. I have tried to show this House that reflective titles have no justification in history, that the title should carry with it service as well as recognition. I have tried to show you how it corrupted the Kings of England, and how it was used to obtain money. I have tried to show you how the prerogative of the Crown became a constitutional prerogative, and how the responsibility to a very great extent of such a recognition is vested, in so far as Great Britain is concerned, in the Prime Minister of those three isles, and that, so far as Canada and the overseas Dominions are concerned, it is vested in the Prime Minister of the respective Dominion. I have shown, not from my own mouth, but from speeches delivered in the House of Lords that the rankest corruption exists in England and stinks in the nostrils of the people, and if something is not done in Canada, it will stink in the nostrils of the Canadian people. I have tried to show there is no justification for hereditary titles in Canada. If there is some justification in the minds of some gentlemen, there is none in mine; but I say to this House and to this country that we have sacrificed much for the maintenance of democratic principle, and if out of this war should arise a crop of titles which would make the people of this country feel that their sacrifices have been in vain—and there is no greater sacrifice in this war than that of the wife who has given her husband, and the mother who has given her son, and the young man who has given his future—and if there should arise from this war a feeling that worth did not obtain recognition—and that feeling will grow if titles are without justification given—then the inevitable conclusion will be reached—that while princes and lords are but the breath of kings, an honest man is not the noblest work of God, and people will realize, to use the words of Mr. Asquith, that we are establishing a class in this country who are sincere "in the tranquil consciousness of effortless superiority." I do not want that class in this country.

Speaking from this side of the House today I want to extend my thanks to the hon. gentleman from Brome (Mr. McMaster) who allowed me to move this resolution because I said to him: "Let it come from the ranks of the Unionist party rather than from the ranks of yours. Let it not come from your side, but from mine, so that the people will know there is no politics in it, that we approach it on a broad basis, because we think it is pregnant with possibilities of irretrievable injury to this country, and will militate against the establishment of a wholesome democracy for which we crave and pray.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): My first words must be those of thanks to the hon. gentleman from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) who has associated me with him in the resolution before the House this afternoon. It is true that eleven months ago, almost to a day, in accepting the nomination in the county which I have the honour to represent, I told the delegates that if I were fortunate enough to be elected to this House I would place upon the Order Paper a resolution saying that it is undesirable that hereditary titles should be bestowed upon Canadians living in Canada. Perhaps a word of explanation is due to the House and to my constituents why I have associated myself with the motion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) rather than that I should promote my own motion. The reason is that his motion was a better one than mine. It goes further in the first place, and it is better planned from the point of procedure. He is an older parliamentarian than I, and his motion was couched in more practical terms, and called for action, which my motion did not. Then there is the advantage to which the hon. member for Kingston alluded, when he said that if the motion came from the Government side it would be presented in a non-party sense. Party feeling is an extraordinary thing and there are no doubt some Conservatives, if such exist now in the country, who, if as a Liberal I had moved it might have looked askance at the motion. There may be perhaps those on my side of the House who might have thought that the motion had something bad in it, if it came from the other side. So that we are both godparents to this interesting child. As Hercules in his cradle throttled the snake, I hope this child will throttle this snake of hereditary titles in the Dominion of Canada. I am proud to associate myself in this matter with the mover of this resolution.

There are three sorts of Liberal-Conservative. There is the Conservative who calls himself Liberal-Conservative because he likes a hyphenated name, and because the word "Liberal" looks good to him, but, apart from that there is no liberality or liberalism in his makeup. Then there is the Liberal-Conservative who has been defined by a great English statesman as one who sometimes talks Liberal but always votes Conservative, and then there is the Liberal-Conservative to which class my hon. friend belongs, the impression of whose words and thoughts and actions on the public is to make us realize how right the French political philosopher was when he said there was a great deal of artificiality in the political divisions into which mankind is divided.

The first point I wish to make is this: that hereditary titles are unpopular in Canada. If proof of that were required, I would suggest that by a short Bill—I think we have had almost enough Orders in Council this session—that genial authority which you, Mr. Speaker, so well exercise, and to which we all cordially and respectfully bow, should be extended sufficiently to enable you to make a progress through this country—beginning with your old historic province, you might place yourself at the corner of some popular street in the county metropolis and ask every man who passed whether he was in favour of hereditary titles or not. I do not believe that, if you questioned a hundred men, you would find one that was in favour of that principle. If you went to the metropolis of Canada, the city of Montreal, and placed yourself on St. James street, unless by chance you found some financial magnate who had already received a hereditary title, I feel satisfied the result would be the same. In Toronto I am inclined to believe that not two people out of a hundred would be in favour of hereditary titles. As you went westward, I believe it would be well for you to be accompanied by the Serjeant-at-Arms and the Mace, because, if you asked that question of the stalwart democrats of the West, I am afraid you might be in danger of personal violence; they would not tolerate being even asked such a question.

Edmund Burke has said that the strength, the spirit, the essence of the House of Commons is that it is the express image of the nation. If we are true to that conception of the House of Commons, we must see to it that the desire for the elimination of hereditary titles, or at least the feeling against the perpetuation of hereditary titles, has its necessary legislative action in this House.

Are the people right in their desire? I say they are. I say that hereditary titles are, first of all, undesirable socially; that they are undesirable politically, and that their perpetuation or increase in this country is a breach of faith with the men at the front. Why are they undesirable from the social standpoint? It is difficult for me to say anything new on this subject, because it has been treated in such an exhaustive and masterly way by the hon. member (Mr. Nickle), but let me say that hereditary titles lead to the caste system. I shall give an illustration. A friend of mine was once speaking about a very prominent banker in Montreal, the son of a baker who had gone into a bank in Scotland. He told me that if that boy had been born in England he never would have got into a bank, because the son of a baker in England, through the caste system, could not have been received in a bank. In Scotland, due very largely to the influence of the democratic Presbyterian Church, there is a more democratic feeling and the boy was admitted to a bank. He rose to the highest position in the Canadian banking world.

The caste system leads to snobbishness, and snobbishness leads to the caste system. Snobbishness is not one of the lesser evils; it is one of the greater evils. A young lady takes a trip to another land and she comes back after having acquired an accent that she forgets in a few years. This may be a matter of small moment, but it is more serious than that. Snobbishness often means extravagance. Snobbishness means contempt for and disrepect of parents. It means very often delay in marriage until the young folks can start where the old folks left off, and delay in marriage produces all sorts of social evils. But, I need not labour the point.

Is it not politically undesirable? I do not think we want to strengthen the House of Lords in England. I believe the people in England are not very fond of an hereditary House of Lords. They have been talking for years themselves of mending or ending the House of Lords. The members of that august body themselves have had plans under consideration for their own reform. We do not want to increase that power or to transfer power to the House of Lords and that is a sound idea on the part of the Canadian people. Why? The members of the British aristocracy have done valiant service in this war. They have been as brave as the Scottish shepherds, as brave as the Dundee trawlers, as brave as the boys from the plains of Saskatchewan, as brave as our own lads from the counting houses and banks, but no braver, and we have the right to look at the question whether the House of Lords has been an influence making for progress in the Old Land or whether it has been against progress.

In 1906 the Liberal party in England, after having been in opposition for some years, came back into power and started a great era of reform—old age pensions, the Licensing Act, the Education Act, and reforms of that sort? What was the history of those measures? When those Acts, to give better living conditions to the poor people of Great Britain, came into the House of Lords they were defeated. When it was desired that a better education should be given to the children of British workingmen, the Education Act was defeated in the House of Lords. When the people wished to control the liquor traffic in the Old Land, when they wished to have local option, did you not hear the honourable gentleman who addressed this House before me state that a man was to receive a title on condition that he withdrew his support from the Licensing Bill? The Licensing Bill was thrown out by the House of Lords.

In order to effect great social reforms and to provide ships of war, Lloyd George brought in his great Budget of 1909, and that Budget came up in the House of Lords. It was thrown out by the House of Lords. They dared to oppose the constitution of Great Britain which had said for hundreds of years that the House of Lords must not reject a Bill dealing with money. They had a great election in January, 1910, at which time the British people reaffirmed their determination to deal with financial matters through the House of Commons alone. What I wish to impress upon the House this afternoon is that the House of Lords, in thus dealing with the Budget in 1909, and in dealing with these other reforms that I have just mentioned, was running true to form.

In spite of notable exceptions to the general rule, in spite of the individuals who have given great talents and great wealth to the furtherance of social progress, I make the declaration that every step in the direction of progress taken during the nineteenth century by the British people was met with the stern, the unrelenting and the bitter opposition of the House of Lords. Take Catholic emancipation. Before 1829 Roman Catholics did not have the right to vote for members of Parliament. The Duke of Wellington and the Tory party of his day refused to pass the Bill for Catholic emancipation until they had brought the country to the verge of revolution.

In 1832, three years afterwards, the great Reform Bill was brought forward by Lord Grey, which tried to effect some equality between those who did the electing and those who were elected. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, how before that time a few houses in one place, or a small village in another place would elect a member to Parliament, while great industrial cities with hundreds of thousands of inhabitants had no representation at all. You would have thought that a reform to do away with that inequality would not be resisted. But, it was resisted by the House of Lords, and for several days Great Britain was on the brink of a revolution.

I ask you to think of the repeal of the Corn Laws. I ask you to think of how Richard Cobden and John Bright went through the length and breadth of Great Britain preaching that the poor man's food should not be taxed. Where did the great opposition come from? The great opposition came from the landed interests of Great Britain, and that landed interest was entrenched most firmly in the House of Lords. Do you remember the condition of the working people at that time? Surely it was enough to wring the heart of any man with feelings of humanity in his bosom. Do you remember that famous Corn Law rhyme:

> "Bread taxed weaver dost thou see,
> "What this tax hath done for thee,
> "See thy children vilely led,
> "Singing hymns for shameful bread,
> "While the stones of every street
> "Know their little naked feet."

That was the call of the British people for bread, for untaxed food. And what was the reply from the aristocracy of Great Britain, the landed interest of that day? The Duke of Richmond suggested the advisability of the working class staying the pangs of hunger by mixing a little curry-powder in water and drinking that between meals.

I need not rehearse the story of the different steps taken towards democracy in Great Britain: how when the franchise under the influence of John Bright was extended to work people in 1868, the upper classes, the House of Lords set their faces against it, until John Bright had to protest against the Botany Bay view of their fellow-countrymen taken by these men, and Gladstone had to recall to the foes of the measure that the poor people were their own flesh and blood. By whom was the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Ireland resisted? By all the highest aristocracy in the House of Lords. I could go on and rehearse the whole history of the 19th century in English reform but it would serve no purpose because I am talking to those who are already converted.

I need not dwell, Mr. Speaker, upon the corrupting influence of hereditary titles. That has been most ably dealt with by the speaker who preceded me. We have tried —and I think it is just to us to admit we have succeeded—to conduct the discussion of this resolution upon the level of principle, and not upon the level of personality. There are those who have received hereditary titles in Canada, who perhaps deserve them as well as any one else, if hereditary titles are to be given. There are others whose meteoric careers have filled us, their fellow citizens, with astonishment and wonder, if not with admiration. We can think of one of them sitting down in Great Britain on some quiet Sabbath afternoon in the old land, and thinking of the old Scottish paraphrase as he writes to another in Canada:

> High is the rank we now possess,
> But higher shall we rise,
> But where we shall at length attain
> Is hid from mortal eyes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: That is the sort of thing that has been going on. That is the sort of thing we would like stopped.

This country has been warring for democracy, we have been fighting for liberty, for equality and for justice. Is it right that in the old land and in this land, when the boys are fighting for democracy, that we should establish, or that we should allow to be established, a hereditary aristocracy in Canada? I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the voice of Canada will be unheard when this resolution goes before the Throne in Britain, and I want it to go there. I want this resolution either to be accepted by the Government of the day, or for them to allow this matter to go to a vote, so that by an overwhelming majority the mind and heart of the Canadian people on this subject may be known to the people across the ocean. Why should we encourage and now compel men to fight for democracy and perpetuate an aristocracy, or, rather, a plutocracy, among ourselves. I want to say, in conclusion, that I am at one with the mover of this resolution in his feeling that titles of all sorts should be done away with if possible, but seeing that our forebears came from Scotland, and that prudence is a Scottish virtue as well as economy, we have started in at the most vulnerable point in the armour of the so-called aristocrats. The weak joint in their armour is that these hereditary titles are opposed to common sense, and opposed to the spirit and the heart and the mind of the Canadian people. I trust that the Government of the day will accept cordially and emphatically this resolution, and that if they cannot see their way to endorse it that they will allow us to vote upon the resolution so that our views may be given expression to.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House has listened with a great deal of interest to the observations of the mover and seconder of the resolution, and that it will be willing to extend to them congratulations upon many eloquent passages to which we listened in the course of their remarks. It might be said that, perhaps, in both instances there were certain observations which were not very closely relevant to the particular subject which is embodied in the resolution, but in the main they were relevant. I would like to observe to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMaster) that it by no means follows, either in this or in any other country, that the abolition of hereditary titles, or all titles, will do away with the plutocracy to which he has alluded. It does not seem to me that the two are very closely associated, and if my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) will permit me to say so, I venture to think that a man in the United Kingdom, whether he be peer or commoner, is held in public estimation at his true worth just as thoroughly as in any country in the world. That is my belief from pretty careful observation covering a period of some years. It is perfectly true that there are these class distinctions in Britain. It is perfectly true that people have precedence at social and other functions in consequence of them. I am not speaking of that; I am speaking of a man's worth as measured by the estimation in which he is held among his fellow countrymen as a whole, and I repeat that the worth of no man in Great Britain is measured because of the mere fact that he happens to be a member of the House of Lords, or that he does not happen to be a member of that august body.

Now, my hon. friend from Kingston—and I will allude to only a few of his observations, because in the main they will be covered by the discussion which I shall take up later on along somewhat broader lines—seems to be of the opinion that there has been a very great grasping for titular distinctions in this country. After an experience of some six and a half years as First Minister of this country, I am not disposed to concur in that observation. I think, on the other hand, that there is a much less general desire for such distinctions in Canada than there is in the United Kingdom, and from first to last I have never heard of the anxiety for titles on the part of ladies to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, nor do I believe that any such supposed anxiety exercises any influence upon the granting of such distinctions in Canada. The hon. gentleman also alluded to his disregard for ancestry. No one in this country, I imagine, would very much desire to have his worth reckoned by what his ancestors were, rather than by what he is himself, and yet, on the other hand, there is, I hope, in the heart of all of us the feeling that we are descended from those of whom we have no need to be ashamed; that we come of good stock; that we hope by our conduct to be worthy of the record which our forefathers have made. All that is perfectly desirable and perfectly honourable. We should also concur fully in what the hon. gentleman has so eloquently expressed as to the desirability in this country, and in every democracy that there should be equality of opportunity to all the people, so far as human conditions permit. In this connection I may say that if my hon. friend is under the impression that the inheritance of considerable wealth is of any great advantage to a young man in this country, I for one, am not disposed to agree with him. If you look around Canada today and see those who are foremost in all the important spheres of national activity, I venture to say that you will find, in ninety-nine cases, out of a hundred, that they are men who did not inherit any wealth at all but who have made their mark in the world by their own ability and effort.

My hon. friend also referred to the observations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1914 when this subject was under discussion. I do not think that the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time were intended to bear the meaning which my hon. friend attributes to them. He was speaking of the prerogative of he Crown in its relation to the Government and to Parliament in all the Dominions of the Empire, and he was not dealing especially with Canada.

My hon. friend attacked the principle of primogeniture, and he seemed to be under some apprehension that it might be established in Canada. I have not the slightest apprehension that that principle will ever again be established in Canada. It was abolished in the very early history of every province in this Dominion, and unquestionably it never will be re-established in this country. He referred also to the baronets of Nova Scotia. I believe that Order was established, as he says, by King James 1. We have never really heard very much about them in Nova Scotia, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that, so far as the material, moral and constitutional development of that province is concerned, it has never suffered in the slightest degree from the institution of that Order.

My hon. friend from Kingston went at considerable length into the question of alleged corruption in connection with the bestowal of titles in the United Kingdom. I shall not follow him in that. If there is presently prevailing in the United Kingdom any evil of that kind, I think we may safely entrust its removal to the people and the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and no great advantage will accrue to the public interest either here or in Great Britain by having such matters made the subject of discussion in this Parliament. So far as Canada is concerned I have never heard it suggested from first to last that under any Government in this country has there ever been any evil of that kind, and I do not believe that there is the slightest probability that any such evil ever will arise here.

It will be necessary for me to go into an examination of the question in a somewhat broader aspect than has hitherto been brought to the attention of this House this afternoon, and it might be advisable to call it six o'clock now so that I can take up the subject this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (resuming): Before coming to the more general aspect of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), I should like to say a few words with regard to that portion of it which relates to the use of titles by any person other than the person in recognition of whose services the honour or title has been conferred. As I understood from the hon. member, this portion of his resolution is designed to prevent the wives of knights, baronets or peers from being addressed by the title of "Lady" in this country. I am not of the opinion that that proposal really adds very much strength to the motion. Unless I am greatly mistaken, the appellation of "Lady" is applied to the wife of a knight only as a matter of courtesy; I think this is true also of the wife of a baronet, although I am not quite sure of that. The member for Kingston, to whom I spoke on the subject, is of the contrary opinion. I have had neither the time nor the desire to make elaborate study of that rather minor question, but in looking at a couple of standard dictionaries I find that the version I have given is the correct one: That is to say, the appellation of "Lady" as applied to the wife of a knight or baronet is entirely by courtesy. Would it not be rather absurd for this House to ask His Majesty to make a formal pronouncement in respect of a matter which is purely one of usage.

Some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House exhorted the member for Kingston to make "a thorough job" of this question. Well, if we are to make "a thorough job" of it, we must go much farther than my hon. friend has proposed. For example, as a title of respect, archbishops are addressed by courtesy in this country as "Your Grace"; bishops as "Your Lordship." More than that, members of the legal profession, to which both the mover and the seconder of the resolution belong, when seated on the Bench, are addressed as "Your Lordship." I know that they are so addressed in nearly all provinces of Canada—perhaps not in the province of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Formerly they were not so addressed in New Brunswick, but I believe that recently they have followed the custom even there. The member of the legal profession who happens to rise to judicial office is not thereby rendered a Lord, and there is no particular reason, I suppose, in logic or in law why he should be addressed as "My Lord;" yet he is so addressed. The member for Kingston must not go too far against the women in this matter, or by and by, when he has flown high enough to "roost on the bench, —if I may use his own expression—some eloquent lady member of this House may propose a resolution asking His Majesty the King to debar my hon. friend from being addressed as "Your Lordship" or "My Lord."

As a matter of fact, these appellations vary from time to time and from century to century. Three or four hundred years ago every Master of Arts in Great Britain was addressed as "Sir," and because members of the clergy were usually of liberal education, the title "Sir" was applied to all clergymen in England. In the time of Shakespeare, as any one will recall who has read his plays, even a curate was addressed as "Sir" So-and-so. That practice has passed away.

Mr. BURNHAM: Sirloin steak.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, that is so. Other similar usages prevail in this country. For example, certain members of provincial legislatures, that is to say legislative councillors, the Speakers of legislative assemblies and members of executive councils of the provinces, are enitled to the appellation of "Honourable" as a matter of law, under the King's direction, so long as they retain the position to which the title appertains. When they cease to hold these positions, then they cease to be entitled to the appellation of "Honourable;" but every one continues to term them "Honourable." It does no particular harm that I know of. We might as well ask His Majesty the King to fulminate against this usage as to ask him to make a pronouncement against the courtesy titles which certain ladies in this country receive as a matter of usage and which they do not enjoy as a matter of right.

However, there is a much broader aspect of the whole question: The motion proposed by the member for Kingston and seconded by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) does touch very closely the exercise of the prerogrative of the Crown. The functions of the Crown as distinguished from those of the Cabinet, and Parliament are very clearly set forth, so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, in the monumental work of Mr. Todd, which was first published in 1866 and of which a second edition edited by his son, appeared in 1887. Following that came his work—still more useful to us in the Dominions—on parliamentary government in the British colonies, the first edition of which appeared in 1880 and the second, also edited by his son, in 1894. Todd himself died in 1884, all too early. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with these matters know that both these works are regarded as of the highest authority, not only in the United Kingdom, but in every dominion of the Empire. The exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in self-governing dominions was defined by Todd in his work on Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies as follows:

> Moreover, certain prerogatives of the Crown are suitably reserved in every colony to the direct and immediate expression of royal pleasure thereon. The powers so reserved differ according to the position and circumstances of the particular colony; but they invariably include the abstract right of dealing with all colonial legislation, and of disallowing such acts as may be deemed objectionable, or in direct opposition to Imperial policy. Sometimes, colonial laws which, for defect in form or substance, might otherwise need to be disallowed, are remitted to the colony wherein they were enacted, accompanied by a despatch from the secretary of state for the colonies suggesting their modification or repeal. The judicial prerogative of the Crown, or the right of determining in the last resort all controversies between subjects in every part of the Empire, has been universally reserved, as being one of the most stable safeguards, and most beneficial acts of sovereign power, The administration of the prerogatives of mercy and of honour is either reserved to the Crown or is made the subject of special and limited delegation. Finally, all questions which involve the relations of British dependencies, and consequently of the United Kingdom itself, with foreign States—the formation of treaties and alliances; the naturalization of aliens; the declaration of war or peace, and, by consequence, all regulations affecting the disposition or control of Imperial military forces—are, invariably and for obvious reasons, reserved for the direction and control of the parent state.

We have travelled far in constitutional development since these words were written by Mr. Todd. One of the most notable steps taken in Canada was that taken in 1876 by Edward Blake as Minister of Justice. The instructions to the Governor General authorized his independent exercise of the prerogative of mercy. Upon the very able report presented to the Privy Council by a subcommittee over which Mr. Blake presided, those instructions were changed in 1878, and the British Government, in their subsequent instructions, have fully recognised that the prerogative of mercy in all of the self-governing Dominions must be exercised upon the advice of ministers. In all these matters, the natural trend of constitutional development has been along the same line, that is, of ministerial responsibility for the exercise of the prerogative in any self-governing Dominion. There are illustrations of this arising from time to time. I need not go over all the changes brought about since Mr. Todd's book was first published. The absolute control of many matters there alluded to as being within the function of the Imperial Government, is now exercised without question by the Governments of the Dominions. Since this war broke out, a question arose as far back as November, 1916, as to whether or not the prerogative of the Crown to requisition in time of war ships registered in Canada and owned by people domiciled in this country should be exercised by the Government of the United Kingdom or by the Government of Canada, and we had no hesitation whatever in maintaining—and our view was accepted—that the exercise of the prerogative in such cases ought to be upon the advice of the ministers of the Crown in Canada and not upon the advice of the ministers of the Crown in the United Kingdom.

In this respect, I might express the doctrine of the present day in the words of a notable author, a man evidently of varied gifts.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We are not, I believe, to understand that any claim was made by the British Government that we had the right to exercise the prerogatives which have been spoken of here?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The matter became a subject of discussion, and the Government of this country took the position to which I have alluded. I was referring to Mr. Arthur Berriedale Keith, who is a barrister of the Inner Temple, and who was for many years in the Colonial Office. In 1912 he published a very notable work in three volumes called "Responsible Government in the Dominions," and since the war broke out he published, in 1916, a work in one volume, which is very instructive and useful, called "Imperial Unity and the Dominions." When his first work was published in 1912, he was, as I have said, occupying a very important position in the Colonial Office, but between that date and 1916 he left the Colonial Office, and when the latter work was published in 1916, he had become Regius Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology in the University of Edinburgh. His summary of the present day position of the matter is as follows:

> It is now clear law that the Governor has a delegation of so much of the royal prerogative as is required for the conduct of the executive government of the Dominion or State of which he is Governor, and time and good sense have united to make it clear that this necessary delegation includes practically all the prerogatives of the Crown in the United Kingdom.

I would be content to accept that as a fair statement of the case. The prerogative of the Crown is, of course, a very important and, on many occasions, an exceedingly useful power. If I remember correctly, the great reform made about sixty years ago in Great Britain respecting the Civil Service, by which patronage was abolished and appointment after competitive examination was established, was effected by the exercise of the royal prerogative and not by statute.

With respect to the exercise of this particular prerogative, a debate, to which reference has been made this afternoon, took place in 1914. I was unable, through illness, to be present in the House on that occasion, and consequently I did not take any part in the debate. It was spoken to by several hon. members, amongst others, by my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). The practice in this country with regard to the preparation of lists of proposed honours to be forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, probably has changed very little in the last twenty or twenty-five years. On occasion I have spoken to my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition as to the practice while he was Prime Minister, and it did not vary greatly from that which has been pursued since I have occupied the position I now fill. It is customary that the Governor General makes up his list twice a year, usually about two months in advance of the time at which honours are to be announced. He submits that list to the Prime Minister, and he is willing to receive suggestions. I cannot recall any occasion on which there was any pronounced difference of opinion, and I have always found that the Governor General very strongly inclined to uphold the voice of the Government of this country in such matters. During the past six and one-half years there are only two occasions that I can recall on which honours have been bestowed upon persons ordinarily domiciled in Canada as to which the Governor General and the Prime Minister have not been consulted. I know, on both those occasions, protest was made and explanations followed. As to the bestowal of honours, there has never been any difficulty that I can recall between the Governor General and the Prime Minister. Such matters, during the past six and a half years at least, have never been brought before Council in a formal way. The Prime Minister, if he thought it desirable to do so, would consult a colleague here or a colleague there, but they were never brought formally into Council or dealt by Council in the way in which the ordinary business of the country is dealt with.

Now, as far as the United Kingdom is concerned, the prerogative of the Crown in the bestowal of honours is almost invariably exercised upon the advice of some minister. I say, almost invariably, because I think a few occasions arise now and then when some person has rendered a personal service to the Crown, either in attendance at the court, or in attendance upon some tour made by a member of the royal family, when it is considered desirable that the Crown may still exercise the prerogative of bestowing honours without invoking the responsibilty of any minister of the Crown. In the United Kingdom, the minister upon whose responsibility honours are bestowed is the Prime Minister, and in respect of nearly all honours—not all, but nearly all—bestowed upon persons domiciled in any of the dominions of the Empire, the bestowal is made on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I am not sure how it is with regard to India, whether the Secretary of State for India has a direct voice or not. Undoubtedly he has a voice, but it may be he makes recommendations to the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister makes recommendations to the Crown, so far as India is concerned.

Coming to some observations of my hon. friend from Kingston this afternoon, I may say that, apart from his criticism of certain conditions in the United Kingdom, upon which I do not think I am called upon to speak or to offer any criticism, and apart from the question of abolishing the usage by which the wives of certain persons are designated by courtesy titles, I very largely, if not altogether, concur in what my hon. friend from Kingston said. I particularly concur in this part of it, that I see no reason why the Government of this country, represented by its Prime Minister from time to time, should not have the same right and the same responsibility in respect of the bestowal of honours upon persons domiciled in Canada as that which is enjoyed by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in respect of the bestowal of honours upon persons domiciled in the British Islands.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: Does my right hon. friend mean that, although the House should adopt this resolution, the Prime Minister of Canada would still be free to exercise that power?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think I shall make myself clearer to my hon. friend as I go on. I do not observe anything in the resolution which would conflict with the view I have just expressed. It is dealt with in that way in the United Kingdom as a matter of ministerial responsibility, but as a matter in which the Prime Minister speaks for his colleagues in the Government, and I do not think that it is there dealt with by Order in Council or in any formal way but as I have just now indicated. The question as to the procedure in such matters was taken up by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as far back as 1902, and I have obtained permission to bring down, and communicate to the House, the Order in Council then passed, as well as the reply then made by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I have obtained the like permission to communicate to the House an Order in Council which was under consideration of the Government some weeks before this session began, which was submitted to His Excellency the Governor General on 9th March, and which has since received his approval, after he had the necessary communication with the Government of the United Kingdom on the subject. The Order in Council approved on the 19th February, 1902, is as follows,

On a report dated 15th February, 1902, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister submitting that the exercise of the Royal Prerogative conferring honours and titular distinctions upon His Majesty's subjects in Canada is one which has not hitherto been brought into harmony with the principles of Parliamentary Government, of which it is an important part.

The Prime Minister further submits that the great development of Canada, and the high position which she has now obtained, render it advisable that upon this subject, as upon all others, the exercise of the Royal Prerogative shall conform to the well understood principles of Ministerial responsibility.

The Prime Minister observes that though Canada has had conceded to her the powers of self-government, and His Majesty the King, is here the fountain of honours and titular distinctions, yet, the exercise of this branch of the Royal Prerogative which may be as necessary to reward the servants of the Crown, within the sphere of Government in Canada, as it is in the United Kingdom, is, nevertheless, totally disassociated here from Parliamentary Government.

The Royal Prerogative of conferring honours and titular distinctions for important public services, is within the sphere of Ministerial authority, as necessary to good government in Canada as it is in the United Kingdom; so that those who are responsible for administrative government in the Dominion would be greatly aided by the stimulus which such powers would give to those engaged in the service of the Crown for the time being, not less than such Prerogative strengthens the hands of the Executive in the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister states that in practice, since the establishment of Confederation, the granting of honours and titular distinctions upon the subjects of the Crown in Canada, has been the result of correspondence between His Excellency the Governor General and the Colonial Office, and of recommendations made by the former, usually yet not invariably after consultation with the Prime Minister, but not in conformity with any settled principle and without constitutional responsibility.

The practice is not in harmony with the principles of our constitutional system. There are two classes of persons upon whom honours and titular distinctions may be conferred within the Empire, and outside the United Kingdom; the one class, honoured by His Majesty for services of an Imperial character, and in respect to which His Majesty is rightfully advised by His Ministers at Westminster, and the other is for services done by the subjects of the Crown associated with His Majesty's Government in the Colony, and on whom honours and distinctions should be conferred upon the advice of those Ministers only, who are there responsible to His Majesty and to the Colonial Parliament, for that part of the administration of His affairs. In this way, the constitutional advisers of His Majesty, within the United Kingdom, would avoid invading the sphere of His Majesty's advisers in the Colony, and would leave to those advisers both the advantage and the responsibility for everything which might contribute to the honour and efficiency of His Majesty's Government within the range of the constitutional duty assigned to them.

The Prime Minister submits that while His Majesty may take the initiative in respect to the bestowal of honours and titular distinctions, the Minister should be none the less responsible for what may be done. To the Ministers of His Majesty at Westminster responsibility attaches for every reward conferred for public service within their sphere of action.

In Canada a Government similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom has been established, and the advisers of His Majesty in Canada are the proper advisers of His Majesty for every kind of reward bestowed upon His Majesty's subjects for services performed within the legal and constitutional sphere of Canadian jurisdiction. His Majesty's Ministers in Canada are acquainted with the standing in the community of the persons upon whom it may be proposed to confer honours, and of the character of the services for which these honours are the reward, and to have those rewards bestowed by His Majesty on the advice of those who are but imperfectly informed as to the estimation in which the recipients are held, or of the character of the services for which the honours are bestowed, is practically an invasion of the right of local self-government.

The Committee of the Privy Council concurring in the report of the Prime Minister, recommend that the same be presented to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, and respectfully ask that the Royal Instructions be modified to the effect that the same rules which apply for the exercise of the Royal Prerogative in granting honours and titular distinctions to subjects of the King in the United Kingdom be made likewise to apply to all recommendations by the Governor General for the exercise of the Prerogative to the King's subjects in the Colonies, and that all such recommendations by the Governor General to the Sovereign in such matters be made upon the advice of his responsible Ministers.

To that Order in Council, which went forward in the form of a despatch, a reply was sent, dated the 23rd of April, 1902. It is as follows:

Downing Street,
23rd April, 1902.

Canada.

Confidential.

My Lord,—

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Your Lordship's Confidential despatch of the 4th March forwarding for consideration a Report of your Privy Council relative to the procedure they advise in respect to future recommendation for Honours to be submitted to His Majesty.

2. The Report in question has received my most careful consideration, and I have now to acquaint you with my views upon the subject.

3. I am of opinion that it is of primary importance not to lose sight of the fact that the Crown is the source of all honours, which may even be granted without the interposition of a responsible minister, although as a rule they are only given on his advice. As Your Lordship is aware, the usual method of rewarding conspicuous services rendered by those resident in the Colonies is by appointment to the Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, an Imperial Order, for appointment to which, in all but very exceptional cases, the responsibility ultimately rests with His Majesty's Government. Service to Canada is recognized by conferring membership of this Order, because service to the Crown in any part of the Empire, is service to the Empire.

4. As regards the question of procedure in making recommendations, I consider that if the service is of a political or administrative character, rendered solely in the sphere for which the Ministers of the Crown in Canada are responsible, they are constitutionally the proper authorities for making recommendations, and that in transmitting the same, they should be accompanied by Your Lordship's observations thereon.

5. In regard, however, to persons whose purely Imperial, Provincial, or Municipal services, or public services of a charitable, literary or scientific character, are held to merit recognition, I consider that the proper course would be for you to transmit a list of such persons to your Prime Minister, inviting his observations on the same, and such list, with the remarks of the Prime Minister, should be submitted to me.

6. In dealing with this subject I have been desirous of meeting the views of your Ministers as far as possible, but as the responsibility for making recommendations to the Sovereign in regard to appointments to an Imperial Order, such as that of Saint Michael and Saint George, rests with the Secretary of State and not with your Ministers, it is his duty to obtain the best advice he can, and he must be the sole judge of what is the best advice.

7. I should be glad if Your Lordship would make known to Your Prime Minister the purport of this despatch, and I trust that the arrangement herein described will prove acceptable both to yourself and to your Ministers.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

(Sgd.) J. CHAMBERLAIN.

It will be observed that the reply of the then Secretary of State for the Colonies does not at all conform to the views which were put forward in the Order in Council I read a moment ago. For example, in the fifth clause of this despatch, Mr. Chamberlain says that where purely Imperial, provincial, or municipal services, or public services of a charitable, literary, or scientific character are held to merit recognition, he is to be the judge and not the responsible ministers of the Dominion in which the persons alluded to are domiciled at the time and in which they have rendered such services. The matter does not seem to have been followed up. I can find no trace of any further correspondence on the subject. The Order in Council which I have just read and the reply of Mr. Chamberlain thereto have been carefully considered by myself and by my colleagues as well, and after giving a very great deal of thought and consideration to the subject, in the month of February last, I brought into Council, on the ninth day of March, a recommendation which was approved and submitted to His Excellency, who gave his approval thereto on the 25th of March last, after communication with the Imperial authorities. That Order in Council, which I shall now read, is as follows:

P.C. 668.

Certified Copy of a Report of the Committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 25th day of March, 1918.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration a report dated the 9th day of March, 1918, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, touching the procedure for conferring titles of honour upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

Submitting that the subject demands consideration and attention, the Prime Minister observes that the Royal Prerogative of conferring honours and titular distinctions for important public services is unquestioned, but that it is necessary to consider the conditions under which and the advice upon which it should be exercised within this Dominion. He submits that the bestowal of honours is a matter of concern to the whole community and has a direct relation to the orderly government of the State. Its purpose is to signify public recognition and approval of the recipient's conduct and services in cases where these have been commendable and notable.

Having regard to the firmly established principles of self government in Canada, the Prime Minister is of opinion that no title of honour or titular distinction should hereafter be conferred upon any subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except upon the direct advice and responsibility of His Majesty's Canadian Government. Such an assumption of control by the Government of Canada follows the natural course of constitutional development in this country as the tendency has invariably been in the direction of complete control of every function of government.

The constitutional aspect of this question suggests consideration of the analogy to other exercises of the prerogative. It has been said by a careful student of government in the Dominions that:—

"It is now clear law that the Governor has a delegation of so much of the Royal Prerogative as is required for the conduct of the executive government of the Dominion or State of which he is Governor, and time and good sense have united to make it clear that this necessary delegation includes practically all the prerogatives of the Crown in the United Kingdom." (Keith, Imperial Unity and the Dominions, p. 52.)

The Prime Minister is not aware of any other prerogative of the Crown which in its relation to Canada is not exercised on the advice of His Majesty's Canadian Ministers; and he is unable to agree that a different principle should be maintained in the exercise of the prerogative of conferring honours. He entirely assents to the view that in Canada the functions of the Sovereign in such exercise should be subject only to the same limitations as in the United Kingdom, except with regard to hereditary honours as hereinafter set forth.

The Prime Minister calls attention to a Minute of Council approved on the 19th day of February, 1902, copy of which is hereto appended, and he desires to associate himself with the views therein set forth insofar as they are in accord with the recommendations herein contained. Attention is also called to the confidential Despatch of 23rd April, 1902, from the then Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Excellency the then Governor General, copy of which is also appended. Without pausing to examine the development of constitutional relations at that time, the Prime Minister finds himself unable to accept as appropriate to present conditions the view set forth in that despatch as to the responsibility for recommendations to the Crown in respect of honours to be conferred upon persons ordinarily resident in Canada.

In expressing this view the Prime Minister realizes that the character and number of the honours to be conferred in any Dominion must necessarily be considered by the Government of the United Kingdom. This view seems entirely consistent with the principles which are herein affirmed.

With respect to the bestowal of hereditary titles of honour upon persons ordinarily resident in Canada, special considerations must be taken into account. In submitting these considerations the Prime Minister desires it clearly to be understood that they have no relation whatever to the status or functions of the House of Lords of the United Kingdom in its legislative or judicial capacity. He thoroughly realizes that any representations which might be construed to bear such a meaning would be uncalled for if not presumptuous; and the observations which follow apply only to conditions of national development in this country. The Prime Minister equally disclaims any intention of casting the slightest reflection upon the status or service of any resident of Canada who has been honoured by the bestowal of hereditary distinction. The purpose of this recommendation is concerned with the question of general policy and with that alone.

The Prime Minister is firmly of opinion that the creation or continuance of hereditary titles in Canada is entirely incompatible with the ideals of democracy as they have developed in this country and that the time has arrived when their heritable quality or effect should be abolished in this Dominion. The hereditary peerage as an institution can find neither historic justification nor scope for usefulness in a state structure and social tradition such as that which now exists in Canada. Consequently the effect of such an institution in this country is merely, on the one hand, to confer and to perpetuate arbitrarily for some members of the community a titular distinction or status of honour, and on the other hand to imply a position of special though ill-defined privilege to which there is not and cannot be assigned any obligation or function in the activities of Canadian national life. Honours conferred directly upon deserving recipients, under appropriate conditions and by proper authority, will be respected by the community; but a decoration or titular distinction which is attached to the holder, not in recognition of his own services, but merely from the incidence of birth, and which is invested with no special or public duties or responsibilities, will inevitably arouse in this country a sense of utter incongruity and a feeling of keen impatience.

Such an attitude toward a state institution cannot but have unfortunate effects upon the respect and regard in which the authority of the State is held; and since the question concerns so intimately the honour, dignity and security of the Crown it becomes the duty of His Majesty's Canadian Ministers to take immediate and serious notice of it and to advise an appropriate course to be followed.

The Prime Minister further observes that the procedure necessary to provide that titles of honour already held by Canadian residents shall no longer have hereditary effect in Canada will doubtless require careful consideration, and that the question involved is one which may appropriately be submitted for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown advising His Majesty's Government. In this connection it is desirable that a course should be followed under which any Canadian citizens who now hold hereditary titles would not be subjected to undue inconvenience or disadvantage. For that purpose appropriate provision for a reasonable time limit may be desirable within which the operation of the proposed enactment or other necessary proceeding would be postponed.

The Prime Minister therefore recommends that this Report, if approved, be forwarded to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies with the respectful request that the necessary formal action may be taken to render effective the proposals herein set forth, which are recapitulated as follows:—

1. No honour or titular distinction (saving those granted in recognition of military service during the present war or ordinarily bestowed by the Sovereign proprio motu) shall be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

2. The Government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.

3. No hereditary title of honour shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

4. Appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title of honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognized as having hereditary effect.

The Order in Council goes somewhat further than the resolution which my hon. friend from Kingston has proposed in respect of the continuance of hereditary titles in this country. That question deserves some serious consideration for this reason: although we may provide, and the Crown may assent to our proposal, that hereditary honours shall no longer be granted to any person ordinarily resident in Canada, it is quite possible that persons holding hereditary honours may come to reside in this country and may become domiciled therein, and titles may be perpetuated in that way. According to the judgment of the advisers of the Crown in this country, this would not be a desirable consummation——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:—and therefore we reached the conclusion that some method should be devised by which, after a certain period, no title of honour held by any person resident in Canada, should continue to have the heritable quality. I must admit, at the same time, that the difficulties which present themselves in bringing about such a result are somewhat serious. With respect to the Order in Council I have just read, I have had communication with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and I am authorized to state this: First, the British Government offer no objection to its publication, provided it is made clear that it is published before they have had time to consider it, and that the whole matter is reserved for personal discussion after my arrival in England some time this summer. Second, that in the meantime no honours will be conferred except in accordance with the proposals recapitulated at the end of the Order in Council. They give their assent in that way for the time being, and as a matter of fact, I do not apprehend that there will be any serious difficulty in obtaining the concurrence of the Crown to the first three proposals. The only difficulty that is likely to occur is with regard to the last of the four proposals. And third—they have not asked me to say this specifically, but I think it is a fair deduction from what has been said—there are grave difficulties as to the fourth proposal and it raises serious questions affecting the United Kingdom. It does certainly raise a serious question, because after an honour has once been conferred carrying with it the heritable quality, it would require legislation, I should think legislation of the Parliament of the United Kingdom itself, to deprive that honour of its heritable quality. Without special legislation it is impossible that any person shall sit as a peer of the United Kingdom in the House of Lords, holding simply a life tenure. Members of my own profession will recall that, in 1856, Sir James Parke was appointed a life peer with the title of Baron Wensleydale. The House of Lords appointed a committee, and decided eventually that life peers could not be created. It was alleged that there had been a prerogative exercisable and exercised in former days by which life peers could be appointed; but it also appeared that the exercise of that prerogative had been discontinued for at least four hundred years, and there was grave doubt as to whether any such prerogative had ever existed at all. Accordingly Sir James Parke was appointed a peer in the ordinary way, took his seat in the House of Lords, and afterwards Acts were passed by which, first four, and then six, Lords of Appeal in ordinary were appointed as barons, and for life only, as members of the House of Lords. There is an interesting note in an English constitutional writer which sums up the whole matter very well, and which I might as well give to the House. Sir William Anson says:

> The rule of law seems clear. The Crown can confer such dignities and with such limitations as it may please, but a Lord of Parliament must be an hereditary peer, except in the special cases of the Bishops and the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary; when once an hereditary peer is summoned the right to a summons descends to his heirs, except in the special case of the representative peers of Ireland.

Then, of course, there are the special provisions with regard to the representatives of the Irish and Scottish peers in the House of Lords, as to which I need not trouble the House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that if hereditary peers of Britain are debarred from living in Canada, because I understand they have to give up their hereditary title here, how would French, Italian and peers of other nations be affected?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Their titles would have effect in this country only as a matter of courtesy.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The others would only have effect by courtesy, too.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No; the others are quite different. Any person who comes from another country, enjoying a title of honour from that country, has a different status here from that of a peer of the United Kingdom, whose right extends over the Empire so far as the heritable quality to which I have alluded is concerned.

Now, it is only proper for me to say that no reflection is intended by the Order in Council which I have just read upon those domiciled in this country who have been honoured by the bestowal of the peerage or other hereditary honour, or upon the character or extent of their service in any case. We are simply laying down a general line of policy which we think ought to be followed, and which, I believe, will be followed in this country in the future.

My hon. friend from Kingston made a very forcible and eloquent speech, pointing out the incongruity of hereditary honours in this country. It is well to bear in mind that the most important privilege of a peer is to sit and vote in Parliament as a hereditary legislator. That is a duty which cannot ordinarily be discharged by persons domiciled in this country, and no duty or responsibility in relation to this country is attached to any such position. The Order in Council which I have cited sets forth in concise form the considerations which influenced the Government in reaching its conclusion. I might add, as a summary by the constitutional writer whom I have already quoted, a citation which is to be found on page 62 of Mr. Keith's work on "Imperial Unity and the Dominions." He says:

> If as early as the end of the 18th century, it was felt that the proposal to create a hereditary aristocracy, which was contemplated as possible by the Quebec Act of 1791, was out of the question, the creation of a mere social arstocracy must be deemed still less in harmony with the ideals of the Dominions in the twentieth century. The grant of membership of the various Orders, of knighthoods, of the highest distinction of Privy Councillorships terminate with life, and are earned by service: there is no essential objection on democratic grounds to such distinctions which meet a need of human nature, but there is the gravest objection to the grant of honours which descend to those who have no claim to them except by the accident of birth.

Mr. EDWARDS: Might I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? If an English peer should take up his permanent residence in Canada, would he have the right to run for a constituency in this country, and have the right to sit in this House?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN. I remember looking into that question as a matter of interest many years ago, and I came to the conclusion then that there was no reason why he could not be elected.

Mr. EDWARDS: He could not sit in the House of Commons in Great Britain?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not there, but here he could. I do not think that has ever been a subject of a judicial decision. Apart from all this, the hon. member for Kingston has raised the question as to how far the bestowal of honours not of a hereditary character should proceed in this country. I entirely agree that that is a question which may well concern Parliament and the country. On the other hand, I am bound to say that there have been a great many cases in which I think such recognition has been very highly regarded from one end of the country to the other. Leaving out of the question those actively concerned in public life, let us take the case of Sir Frederick Fraser in the province of Nova Scotia, a man who, through an accident, lost his sight when he was eighteen or twenty years of age, and whose life has been devoted to the upbuilding of the finest institution for the blind which exists in the Dominion of Canada. A recognition of that character, granted to a man of that type, is, in my opinion, very happily bestowed. The same might be said of Sir William Gage of Toronto; of men who are at the head of great universities; of men whose duty and pleasure has been found in service to their country and doing good to their fellow beings.

Reference has been made to the British Empire Order, which was instituted last year. We heard something of it when we were in London, but we were too much engaged with other matters to give very much consideration to what was proposed. I think that the constitution and the by-laws and all that is necessary in these matters were being prepared at that time. I was asked at the end of last summer and again in the autumn, as well as at the beginning of the year and later in January, to take into consideration the preparation of a list. The Order itself embraces, I think, no less than six classes. The number of persons who might be honoured under it in Canada was very large indeed; I think it ran into some hundreds, including all the minor classes of the Order. I should like hon. gentlemen to realize that the institution of this Order was prompted by the very best of motives. The idea and desire was to give some suitable recognition in the various dominions of the Empire to those who by service, by devotion, by self-sacrifice, had sought to do their full duty to their country in time of war. When the matter was presented for my consideration, I felt that it was one which gave rise to the greatest difficulties. In the first place, I was not at all clear as to the wisdom of the proposal. But, assuming that it was wise, I should like hon. gentlemen to consider the very great responsibility and the burden that would be placed on a Prime Minister who undertook a task like that. Even if it were possible for him to have a perfect knowledge of the service that had been rendered by every one of the eight million inhabitants of Canada, it would be a difficult task for him to determine which service was most worthy of recognition. Of course, it is not humanly possible for a Prime Minister or for any one else to have that perfect and absolute knowledge; therefore it seemed to me that if the task had to be fulfilled at some time or other, it should at least receive more considartion than I had been able to give it since my return to this country on May 15 last.

Another order has recently been instituted, known as "Companions of Honour." We were not consulted with regard to its institution; nor were we with regard to the institution of the Order of the British Empire, otherwise than as I have indicated. It is true that honours under the British Empire Order have been awarded in New Zealand, Australia and South Africa, but I thought that I might very well, under the circumstances, defer the consideration of any list for Canada, and action has been postponed for the present. It is a subject that may be taken into consideration and discussed when the Canadian ministers visit Great Britain next year.

I have placed the whole matter with the greatest possible frankness before the House and the country exactly as it rests at the moment. The proposals which are set forth in this Order in Council represent absolutely the opinion of the Government. I desire, however, that the House and the country should understand that the fourth proposal, although it does embody our absolute conviction, cannot be worked out without great difficulty; indeed to work it out in the way we have suggested may prove to be altogether impracticable. I am not at all confident how the House of Lords, for example, might receive a legislative proposal which would cut down an hereditary honour to merely a life honour; nor am I confident that the Government of the United Kingdom would be prepared to propose such legislation to the Imperial Parliament. However, we have recorded our opinion, and I leave it at that. Under the circumstances, and as the British Government has as yet had no opportunity of considering fully the proposals which we have put forward to them, possibly the mover and the seconder of the resolution may consider it desirable to let the motion stand, upon the assurance of the Government that no action inconsistent with its purport will be taken before we meet in another Parliament.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has certainly reason to congratulate himself upon the result which he has already obtained in the declaration of the Prime Minister. For my part, I should have been more pleased if the Prime Minister had not marred the effect of his remarks by suggesting that the member for Kingston and the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) should not press their motion to a conclusion. I infer from the remarks of the Prime Minister that the Government are in sympathy with the motion, and if that is the case it is obvious that when the Prime Minister takes the subject up with the authorities in Great Britain his hand will be very much strengthened if he has in support of it the declaration of the Parliament of Canada. With all due respect, therefore, I suggest that the member for Kingston persevere in his present intention, inasmuch as the idea embodied in his resolution has been accepted by the Government.

If the member for Kingston will permit me, I think I can say that every member of the House has been impressed by the exhaustive manner in which he has presented his case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I agree with every syllable that he uttered—not only every syllable that he uttered, but also the hint he threw out, if I understood him correctly, that if he had followed his own inclination he would have gone further than he did and asked for the suppression of all titles in Canada.

The reasons for the conclusions which my hon. friend has embodied in his resolution and which, aside from the terms of the resolution, he has presented to the House, seem to me to be based upon the forward movement which is now developing in Europe and all over the world. We are engaged in a great war the object of which is the triumph of democracy, and it is inconsistent with the objects for which we are fighting that we should do anything the effect of which would be to promote or to perpetuate that which is not in perfect accordance with the principles of democracy.

Democracy and aristocracy are not compatible institutions, and as democracy advances aristocracy must recede. For my part, and I say it with full sincerity, I bow with respect to the aristocracy of Great Britain to whom the world owes a great debt. If England has been preserved from the bane of autocratic Government, it is very largely owing to the efforts of the aristocracy of that country. It was the barons of the day who dragged from King John his reluctant consent to Magna Charta, which has been the charter of freedom not only in Great Britain but throughout the world, and from that day on to the revolution of 1688, the Lords of Great Britain were in accord with every movement that went on to curb the powers of the Crown. In the revolution of 1688, it was the Lords who took the lead in the revolution which finally forced the withdrawal of James II and brought about the advent of a new dynasty, the Bill of Rights and other great charters of the liberty of the people have been the consequence. Whilst up to the 19th century, the aristocracy of Great Britain has always been in the van of freedom, it has not, in my judgment, in the 19th century, been equal to its opportunities.

I am a Liberal of the old school of England. I would have been a Whig if I had been in England. I wish, for my part, that the British aristocracy had continued to do as they did in the past. But they do not understand the times in which we live. Whether the British aristocracy like it or not, or whether men generally like it or not, at the present time England is on the eve of a revolution. Such revolutions do not take place in England by force or violence; they go simply from step to step and from reform to reform. The days of aristocracy are over; a new force is now entering into the Government of Great Britain, that is to say, the great masses of the nation. Whether it be for woe or for weal the future will show. For my part, I think it is for weal; but I am sure of this, that in the new order of things, which will be the order in England, England will not be as picturesque as we have known it hitherto, but I believe that undoubtedly the great masses of the nation will be more happy than they have ever been before.

The resolution of my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) goes only to the suppression in this country of hereditary titles. Hereditary titles in Canada are of little consequence, I believe, and I think they were properly represented by the Prime Minister. The only benefit, if a benefit it be, at all events the only privilege, which is given to-day by the creation of a peer resident in Canada, will be the privilege of becoming a legislator in Great Britain; he would be in Canada a simple citizen of Canada. My right hon. friend says that he has at one time looked over the question whether or not a peer of Great Britain will be eligible to sit in this House, and he came to the conclusion, as I understood it, that he saw nothing to make him ineligible. I also studied the question, and I came to precisely the same conclusion, that a citizen of Canada who is a peer of Great Britain is eligible to sit in the House of Commons of Canada. This will not happen frequently, I am sure; it will be very infrequent that a man resident in Canada will be made a peer of Great Britain, but recent events have rather excited public opinion upon this point, and have contributed, I have no doubt, to induce my hon. friend from Kingston to introduce this resolution.

So far as I can see, I think we are unanimous in this House on this matter. I have not heard a word or seen a sign of dissent in any quarter against the resolution of my hon. friend. Everybody seems to agree that we should not have any peers created in this country. But we might go a step further. Is there any reason why there should be the bestowal of titles of any kind in Canada? Everybody will, I believe, agree that in Canada badges, titles, honours and trappings will never take any root. We are a democratic country; we have been made so by circumstances. I listened with great pleasure and interest to what my hon. friend said this afternoon. His ancestors left Scotland, and my ancestors left France, because they were not satisfied with the conditions of their native land. If there is anything that is dear to the heart of man it is the soil upon which he was born, and if any man deserts the soil upon which he was born in order to take up his abode in another country, he does so for very serious causes. We are all in the same condition in this country. No one in Canada, I believe, claims blue blood. We are all from the people, and, I believe, we shall ever be pleased to say that we are of the people, and we shall have no distinctions and no classes. I may be told: If you hold those views, how is it that you have accepted a title for yourself? Well, so it is. I have accepted a title. It was offered to me. Why I accepted it with the views I hold now, will be going into a matter of personal history which I do not care to bring forward. But at all events I may say this: I see here a little class of titled people, knights commanders of this order or that order. If they will make a bargain with me, I am quite prepared, if we can do it without any disrespect to the Crown of England, to bring our titles to the marketplace and make a bonfire of them. We are British subjects, and for my part I take very much pride in the fact that British institutions do not proceed by violence but grow up quietly and gradually to given ends. I have no doubt at all that, whether my suggestion is accepted or is not accepted, the time will come—and perhaps soon rather than late—when all titles will be held to be of no value in this country, and the only title which will be accepted will be that of a citizen of Canada and British subject.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council) Mr. Speaker, the question now before us is one in which I have taken, for some years, a very deep interest. I am sure we are all interested in the progress of democracy and in Canada as a free and democratic country. One who thoroughly believes in democracy and in the development of free and democratic institutions must, I think, realize that titles, and particularly hereditary titles, are not a normal growth of such institutions. They are rather the survival of a dying feudalism which continues to this day in some of its aspects, but which is rapidly passing away.

My hon. friend from Kingston was good enough to quote a brief extract from an address I delivered something over a year ago on this question, and he said if I was not accurately quoted I might have the privilege of so stating and repudiating the statement. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I was accurately quoted. Those were my sentiments at the time they were uttered, they are my sentiments now, and they are embodied in the Order in Council which the Prime Minister has presented to the House. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) quoted a French philosopher, who said, "How artificial are the lines that divide us," and he applied that to the discussion in the House this afternoon. I think we will all agree that it was an apt quotation as applied to the subject matter under discussion, and it was also a very apt quotation as applied to the manner in which the Union Government has dealt with this question. I frankly thought I entertained somewhat radical views on hereditary titles, but when we put aside these artificial party lines that divide us and look at this question from the standpoint of common Canadian citizenship, we find all the members of the Union Government, irrespective of party, holding exactly the same views on the question of hereditary titles. And perhaps one of the benefits which have come to us during the war is that, at times at least, we are prepared to forget these artificial party lines that divide us and to look squarely at the great issues from the standpoint of our common Canadian citizenship. The more frequently we do it the larger sense of unity we realize, because, we find there is a common consensus of opinion on the majority of the great issues which face the people of Canada at this time. My hon. friend from Kingston, I know, thought he was a radical, as I thought I was. He thought he was a radical in saying he was a Socialist on certain questions. I think that, having listened to the hon. member for Kingston we must regard him as a very moderate Socialist. The views he expressed with reference to the status of the average man in Canada in the days to come are views which might be accepted by every hon. member of this House. My hon. friend from Brome thought he was a great radical on this question, and we find that the Order in Council itself is more radical than the resolution submitted by my hon. friend from Kingston, and the hon. member for Brome. In view of the very full, admirable and convincing statement made by the Prime Minister on the constitutional aspect of this question, I shall not add anything except to observe that this Order in Council, when accepted by the Imperial authorities, as we confidently believe it will be, will mark a distinct advance in the constitutional status of Canada. It marks, perhaps, the relinquishment by the Crown of the last prerogative which it has claimed to exercise within the Dominion, apart from the advice of the responsible advisers of the Crown in the Dominion. I shall not take time to outline the development of self-government in Canada, and in the dominions of the Empire, but it is of interest to note the fact that by successive steps the dominions have developed from dependent colonies of the Crown, to free self-governing nations, part of the British Commonwealth; and I think I am correct in saying that in every momentous departure Canada has taken the lead, and all the other dominions have shared the benefit of her advance. In the Order in Council which the Prime Minister has presented to the House you have another of these constitutional developments which indicates that Canada is now reaching the full status of a nation, and the Government of the nation is exercising the full prerogatives of advisers of His Majesty in all matters relating to the government of Canada. Just in passing—although it is not germane perhaps, but yet as indicating the growth of Canada as a nation—the establishment of a Canadian mission at Washington where Canada is directly represented in dealing with the United States Government in important matters of trade and commerce, directly represented with full authority of His Majesty's Government, is another step in the development during the past few months of the policy of managing our own affairs in the Dominion of Canada. The net result of this growth is that Canada in a very real sense is to-day no longer a dependent colony of Great Britain, but is, as I have stated, one of the free nations that go to make up the British Commonwealth. The resolution passed at the Imperial Conference, which was read by the hon. member for Kingston, moved by the hon. Prime Minister of Canada, and seconded by General Smuts, I think, states the relation of the self-governing dominions to the Mother Country in a way that can be accepted by all those who believe in maintaining the full rights of self-government, and at the same time preserving the essential unity of the Empire. Passing away from the important constitutional aspect of this matter which is the assertion of the right of the Government of Canada to pass upon all these questions and to say that no title or honour should be conferred except upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister of Canada, speaking for the Government of Canada, I have one or two observations to make on the other question, that of conferring hereditary titles. The matter has been so well and so ably dealt with by the hon. member for Kingston, supplemented by the hon. member for Brome, and further discussed by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the Opposition, that I shall not dwell upon it, but I think a recent British writer has expressed in very clear and admirable language the effect of such hereditary titles. He said: "The effect is to develop the twin evils of snobbery and flunkeyism," both incompatible with a free democracy. We do not wish to see those twin evils flourish in Canada by the enlargement or development of such a system. It has been suggested by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that we should go still further. This Order in Council goes further than any proposal made up to this time by any government in Canada. It is the most advanced declaration on the question of titles made by any government in Canada. My right hon. friend has said that the British Commonwealth has made progress not by revolution, but by orderly development, and it may be that what he has predicted in this case will be true in the future; but certainly up to this time we have gone even in advance of public opinion, as indicated by the resolution submitted to the House and now upon the Order Paper. Personally, I am a democrat, and I would not object to be present at the bonfire to which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition referred, but it may be we will not have the opportunity of witnessing that for a short time to come. The whole question is larger than the simple question of conferring certain titles and dignities. It is the whole question of a class or caste system. We all realize in the time of a war like this, when we are fighting the battle of democracy against autocracy and for the triumph of our free democratic institutions, the spirit of democracy will have a larger expression in English-speaking communities after the war than prior to it. The whole tendency will be towards a fuller expression of democracy in all the affairs of government.

When we recall the fact that more than sixty per cent of the men who have gone from Canada to fight our battles come under the class of labouring men we realize what a tremendous contribution the working men of Canada are making for the preservation of our homes, our liberties, our property, our free institutions. I venture to think that when these working men return to Canada, having defended our homes, preserved our lives and liberty, and saved for us our inheritance, they will expect and demand a larger share in that inheritance than they have received in the past. If that is true of Canada it is true also of Great Britain. The ferment of industrial and political revolution is at work. That man to-day is blind who does not look into the future and see the great and the grave possibilities that face us. It behooves us at this time, facing conditions as they exist, to recognize that the democratic tide is setting in, that it will go on to the flood, and to set our houses in order and give full recognition to the honest service, the honest toil of the honest man, so that, not only will every toiler have the rights which my honourable friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) mentioned, but he will live under conditions where he is able not only to earn sufficient to maintain himself in decency and comfort, but to provide a suitable home for himself and family, to feed and clothe those dependent on him, and to give them a suitable education so that every child born in Canada may be properly equipped for the service and the opportunities of life.

We are facing great industrial and social changes as well as changes in the political world. Because this whole system of hereditary titles is absolutely inconsistent with the spirit of democracy, and with the great cause for which our gallant men are fighting, we are opposed to its continuation in Canada. The Government has stated its position that no more shall be conferred, and if proper legal means can be found for putting an end to the hereditary character of titles already conferred these means will be found and the spirit of this Order in Council will be carried out to the full extent and power of the Government.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to give way to some honourable gentleman on the other side who would continue this debate, following in the footsteps of the right honourable the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who has done me, the humble member for West Peterborough, the very signal honour of having announced himself a convert to my views. I wish to express my gratitude to the leader of the Opposition for his gracious acknowledgement of the correctness of my statement. I must confess that, knowing how broad his sympathies were and what a splendid and highly illuminated idea he had of democracy, my feelings received a severe rebuff when, having brought a resolution before the House on a previous occasion, I found that he could rise and speak against it. The leader of the Government for the time being probably felt called upon for some reason beyond my penetration to object to it. The members of the House, I had found, were distinctly in favour of my view that all titles of honour in Canada should be dispensed with as being entirely inconsistent with the necessities of democracy. But, when the right hon. leader of the Opposition, without waiting for others to intervene in the debate, and without giving the humbler members, the back benchers, an opportunity to express their opinions, snuffed us all out in a genial, thoroughly polite and chivalrous manner, I felt there was nothing much more to be said. I went away considerably abashed. But, how proud am I to-night to feel that, having thought the matter over, his conscience having pricked him, he has come to the conclusion that it is necessary to retrace that step and speak according to the promptings of his own heart, the teaching of his own knowledge and the aspirations of democracy and to vote for doing away with all those artificial distinctions which mean nothing and which cannot make a man any better than he is.

I view, as I did on that occasion, the long procession of people who pass in the course of everyday life. The last shall be first and the first last. It was sometime before I grasped the true idea of that phrase. When a woman has been left, by the untimely death of her husband with a large brood of small children to bring up, when she faces her task boldly, meeting all the trials that we know surround her and fighting the good fight; when she brings her children up and turns them out good citizens, working her way for herself and family as the hirelings perhaps of people who have done nothing but who have received the very titles to which we now object, if virtue, if greatness, is to be rewarded, in Heaven's name, why is it that such a woman should not be created a Lady of the Washtub if others are to be created Ladies of the Bed Chamber?

We have had to-day a magnificent restatement of the case of democracy by the hon. member from Kingston (Mr. Nickle). He went into the whole case thoroughly and well realizing how difficult it is to read copious quotations and put them all down on Hansard so that those who come to read the matter up will have a thorough grasp of the whole question. I admired his perseverance just as much as I was charmed by his fluency of speech. Democracy, as the previous speaker has so well said, is a growth, the very flower of the people of the world; and instead of being rebuked by having titles thrust upon people who, in many cases, do not deserve them at all, it should be encouraged by an emphasis being placed upon the equality of all people who deserve recognition. How absurd it is to analyze the question of the bestowment of titles. Pray, who could give Plato a title? Who is there would venture to dub Aristotle or Socrates with a title. They did attempt to give a title to Sir Isaac Newton, who interpreted the heavens for us. He probably knew nothing about it, but they gave him a knighthood which one of our Kings of England gave to a roast of beef. We have also Shakespeare remaining without a title; Milton, Leibwitz and Laplace. When we come to investigate the history of learning, the history of greatness, we find that as a matter of fact titles are a blot, not an honour. We should therefore be much less scrupulous than we might otherwise be in addressing a request to His Majesty to discontinue bestowing titles of honour upon people when they are in themselves unnecessary, and historically incorrect.

The resolution is to be interpreted in two ways: One is, do the people of this country want titles? I do not suppose there is a member of this House who is not prepared to answer and to say: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: If that be the case, why not dispense with further discussion; it is not necessary to go into the merits of the case, at all, because the people rule. This is the age of democracy. When we speak of prerogatives, there is no prerogative but that of the people. When the people have said we do not wish for titles, that is enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: Whether it is philosophically and intrinsically correct, or otherwise, it is not for us to say. The people, not le Roi, reign, and what the people will must be done. I am not, nor is anybody else, speaking in the slightest disrespect of the institution of monarchy. It has served its purpose in the past, and no doubt will serve its purpose in the future. That does not in the least derogate from the fact that the people do not want precedence and privilege which were once and for all swept away by the French Revolution. The people want more of that; and if this war does not suffice to convince men that the good and the peace of the world depend upon democracy, then in God's name, what will convince them?

I have been asked why I did not bring this matter up again. For two reasons: One was that I thought that titles were an insignificant thing in comparison with the issues at stake at the present time, and in the face of the very fact that our soldiers one and all deserve titles which we have not the power to give them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is one reason and in response to the request of the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) I gave him that reason. There was another reason which I did not give him and that reason is this: Having the abolition of the titles of honour thoroughly at heart, I was looking for co-operation, and if I could find one, two, three or a dozen more who would take up the burden—I knew my own heart was true—I was glad to see them co-operate and undertake it. Therefore was I not delighted to see the member for Kingston and the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) put resolutions on the Order Paper? Far be it from me to say that they have stolen my thunder. More power to them. Let us have more expression from the people of this country. We had an expression from the people through the newspapers. The newspapers exercise a very great power in this country, and I must freely and frankly say that it is a power for good. They are doing with a conscientiousness the work of expressing public opinion upon democratic principles in Canada that speaks well for the future of this country, and the men of this House must see to it that they keep abreast of the times, of the newspaper, of the aspirations of the people, and of the very right and justice of the case.

I cannot sit down without saying that I quite heartily concur in the statement of the member for Kingston when he says, in appreciation of the very forward steps taken by the Government in the Order in Council, that a vote of this House would very greatly strengthen the hands of the ministry. I trust therefore, that the resolution will go on record, and not only so but that the chief men of this House, the men who in future will historically represent public opinion in Canada, men like the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition and others will be chronicled with the men who represent Canada in this great new Parliament, throbbing with the new life of the country, where there are so many representatives of a high order commercially and otherwise, in this new Parliament fresh from the people and through thoroughly understanding what the spirit of democracy in Canada is, in putting on record that they do not wish any further so-called titles of honour to be conferred upon its citizens, but that every man should do his level best for his country and realize that the highest reward he possibly can have is a consciousness of having unselfishly done his duty.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): My hon. friend from Peterborough did not charge me with being a convert to his idea because I had the honour to second his motion when he introduced a Bill into this House two or three years ago. I believe, however, that he is not quite accurate in his appreciation of the stand taken by my right hon. leader at that time. The right hon. leader of the Opposition did not say that he was against the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. gentleman, but that this Bill could not come under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and that the hon. gentleman should have taken the steps which have been taken to-day by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I remember quite well that my right hon. leader told me at that time that he was prepared to support a resolution asking for what is asked to-day by the present resolution before the House. I congratulate the hon. member for Kingston on the admirable speech which he delivered, which is certainly an unanswerable argument against the absurd and demoralizing custom of bestowing titles upon Canadian citizens, and I do not make exception for those which are not hereditary. We must be grateful to the Government, or whoever are responsible for the condition of things which exists to-day, because by distributing titles by the bushel in this country they have aroused a public opinion and have created a feeling of resentment which will cause the disappearance of a threatening evil for Canada. We have been assured that the Crown was giving those titles of its own grace; but everybody realizes in this country that the appointments are ordinarily made on the recommendations of the Government. and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has just told us how the thing generally occurs. We have come to the point where citizens in every quarter of Canada are enquiring why certain gentlemen have had titles conferred upon them, and where, on the other hand, many titled citizens prefer that the people should not enquire why they have received their titles. When we consider the fact that in the great country to the south of us, the President of the United States is called by the plain, democratic name of Mister Woodrow Wilson, and that one of his predecessors was plain " Teddy "

Roosevelt; that the President of glorious France is plain Monsieur Raymond Poincaire; that the Prime Minister of France, the great statesman who has just achieved his long-cherished idea of having unity of command on the western front, is called Monsieur Georges Clemenceau, and that in this country, in both the federal and provincial fields, we have titles of all kinds, flavours and descriptions, I say that this is a condition of things which must be done away with, and that blue plague of aristocracy, or muck aristocracy, must be driven from our shores. To use a stereotyped phrase, our country is fighting with the Allies "to make the world safe for democracy," and we must see to it that Canada must not be made unsafe for that very same democracy. We must prevent the class system from being organized in this country, and we must prevent the establishment of the system against which all the free peoples of the world have fought, even to the extent, in some cases, of resorting to revolution. There is no place in the public life of this country for hereditary leaders or rulers. Brains, honesty and work should be the only qualifications for leadership in a democratic country like ours. This contagious disease, this thirst for titles, is not new. It has been so for centuries. It is a remnant of the Middle Ages, and in these modern days the people are getting sick of it, and the hon. member for Kingston demonstrated this afternoon that in Britain there is going to be a change. At least, the people are trying to effect a change. The hon. member read many extracts from the debates which took place in the House of Lords. I will read only one quotation, from the remarks of Viscount Knutsford, who said:

> The noble Earl (Lord Selborne) suggests that a statement should be made in public of the reasons why an honour had been conferred. That would remove the pleasure we experience every New Year in endeavouring to solve the puzzle set us. But it might be carried further. Letters might be put after the name of the recipient to indicate why he had received a title. For instance, "B.C." might stand for "Beggar for Charities," or "B.O." for "Bazaar Opener," and so on. That would be a way of indicating why the smaller titles were given. Moreover, if titles are purchaseable, they ought to be saleable. We all ought to be able to sell our titles to enable us to give a handsome present to the Red Cross.

We have had in this country glaring instances of the condition of things which has been described in the debate referred to. I would not like to mention any names, but there is one which comes to my mind just now, and that gentleman was very fortunate in the selection of his new name, which indicates that there is as much "water" in his nobility as there is in the capital stock of the companies he organized on this side of the Atlantic.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not forget the "beaver" either.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: That gentleman has been given a new position recently. I must say that if a capacity for disseminating the opposite of truth is a qualification for the office, he possesses this fitness to a remarkable degree. Buffon has said:

> "La louange publique, signe éclatant du mérite est une monnaie plus précieuse que l'or, mais qui perd son prix et même devient vile, lorsqu'on la convertit en effet de commerce."

The translation of these words is as follows: "Public praise, shining sign of deserving merit, is more precious than gold; but it loses its price, and even becomes valueless, when it is perverted into a negotiable article."

A lavish distribution of titles has had the effect of depreciating the institution itself, and of making it no longer a valuable distinction for a citizen to be given a title. The institution itself is vicious and productive of evil. It works as an inducement for gentlemen of proud dispositions, or whose ladies have social ambitions, not to do anything which might injure their chances of obtaining honours and putting them on bad terms with those who are responsible for their distribution. I am not sure that this has not had a certain effect with certain gentlemen during the last general election, or previous to it. It has always been so. When old republicans protested to Napoleon because he had instituted new orders in France, he said: "You call them toys; know that by these toys people are led." It is the same policy to-day, and has always been so. The ambition to acquire something which distinguishes one from his fellows is as strong to-day as it was in the days when the Egyptians, the Greeks and the Romans were the great nations of the world. Now, Sir, I admit that great acts of heroism and of public devotion, great services to the State, outstanding talents and virtues, deserve special recognition, but I deny that such recognition should take the form of empty titles. The public soul and spirit shall always discern true merit. M. Thiers, the great French statesman, had been created a baron by King Louis Philippe, but he never used the title. This did not prevent the French people, after 1870, from giving him a more glorious title, and from hailing him as "Liberateur du Territoire."

I hope that a vote will be taken on this resolution, that it will carry, and that the practice of conferring hereditary titles will be entirely done away with in this country. To those who are eager to get titles and to those who are actually wearing them with distinction, I commend these words of the poet:

> Titles of honour add not to his worth
> Who is himself an honour to his title.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I should have risen at this stage of the debate were it not that I have an amendment to offer. I should have preferred first to listen to the remarks of other hon. gentlemen, because, being a new member, I like to sit at the feet of modern Gamaliels and learn wisdom. However, there is one objection to waiting until all other members have spoken: one finds that arguments that he had carefully worked out are used, one after the other.

The member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in his elaborate speech, to which I listened with interest and admiration, covered the ground very thoroughly. I had, however, one note that I thought nobody would touch, and that was the instance of the French revolution. According to my reading of history, the French revolution was brought about largely by the aristocracy. The aristocrats of old France, coupled with the kings, were paramount, and the people—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do not forget the church.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I will leave my hon. friend to deal with the church; he is probably better qualified to do that than I am. I assume that the church had something to do with it. However, those who have read the history of the French revolution know how the kings and the princes and the aristocrats were all-powerful; how the people were down-trodden until the clash came and the common people rose and cut the king's head off, cut the queen's head off, cut the heads off half or most of the aristocracy. All honour to them for doing so; for when they did that they sounded the tocsin of liberty in that great nation of France. Moreover, I believe that it is not unlikely that the present war is largely due to the creation of titles, to the existence of the aristocrats. If the common people throughout the world were ruling as they should rule, as I believe God intended that they should rule and shall rule in the future, this bloody war would not now be going on. I regret that the member for Kingston did not make his motion more sweeping, by including all titles. I spoke to him about the matter a day or two ago—he will not charge me with violating any confidence, because I asked him if I might make this statement—and he informed me that he was heartily in favour of the abolition of all titles, though he feared that if he introduced a resolution to that effect, it would not carry.

After listening to the right hon. leader of the Opposition in his splendid declaration of democracy, my mind is brought back to the old days when the right hon. gentleman used to tell us that he was a democrat to the hilt.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It was delightful to me, an old Liberal, to find my leader of twenty-five years ago coming back to the old line and declaring that he would be proud to stand by and see the title that the King had conferred on him burned in a bonfire. I wish that we could set that bonfire in the House of Commons to-night, and burn up all the titles.

The amendment that I propose, if I am in order—it is so long since I have been in Parliament that perhaps I am a little rusty on the rules; however, you will set me right, Mr. Speaker, if I am wrong—has for its object the abolition of all titles. Had I not secured a seconder, I should have asked the right hon. leader of the Opposition, in view of the statement just made by him, to second the motion; and I am sure that he would have been willing to do so, as would also the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe).

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Anything in that line.

Mr. RICHARDSON: So that I have a number of seconders. The wording of my amendment, which is seconded by Mr. Levi Thomson, is as follows:

> That the word "hereditary" be struck out from the resolution and that the third paragraph thereof conclude with the word "Canada" in the ensuing line.

That means that the word "hereditary" be eliminated from the resolution, which would then read as follows:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada.

The rest of the resolution is deleted. I believe, with my leader of former days, that if we are not going to have a new heaven at the close of the war, we are at least going to have a new earth. A tide is rising against titles of any kind. I was interested in the Order in Council and the correspondence which the leader of the House read, and I could not help thinking that after all what a waste of time and money is involved in even discussing the subject of the conferring of these titles; let us be done with them altogether.

It is said that that great independent democrat, Robert Burns, was invited by a local laird to participate in some amusement which a number of distinguished guests had been invited from Edinburgh to enjoy. When Burns arrived at the house he was shown into the kitchen with the servants of the house, while the titled persons who were invited enjoyed their feast in the dining-room. It is said that while Burns sat in the kitchen he wrote that great declaration of independence, "A Man's a Man for a' That:"

A prince can make a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, and a' that;
But an honest man's aboon his might,
Guid faith, he maunna fa' that.

Tradition says that he recited these lines before the company, and that when he came to the following passage he pointed his finger at the person who was being entertained, and spoke out in declamatory tones:

Ye see yon birkie ca'd a Lord,
Wha struts and stares and a' that;
Though thousands tremble at his word,
He's but a cuif for a' that.

We have had one Prime Minister in Canada who has refused a title. I refer to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie—and I am sure when I speak the name of Alexander Mackenzie who was Prime Minister of this country from 1873 to 1878, the blood must flow fast through the veins of Liberals because Alexander Mackenzie was a real Liberal. Alexander Mackenzie was the type of Liberal who would sooner go down fighting for what he believed to be right than stand for what he thought to be wrong. Then we had that great tribune of the people, Hon. Edward Blake, who led the Opposition in this House for years and years, and who was perhaps one of the noblest sons that Canada ever produced. Hon. Edward Blake refused a title when it was offered to him. We have also a newspaperman in Canada—hon. members will pardon me for mentioning his name, because I am a journalist from boyhood myself, and I like to think we had one stalwart newspaperman in Canada, John Ross Robertson, proprietor of the Toronto Telegram, who recently refused a title. He preferred to go down to posterity as plain John Ross Robertson. He preferred that his children should remember him as plain John Ross Robertson. The State, the Crown, can do nothing to dignify our manhood. After all, I agree with what the Prime Minister said, that whatever is inherent in man will come out and that titles cannot make him greater than he is. If that be so, let us accept the declaration of the Prime Minister this evening, and let us declare that in this young democracy, in this gem of the British Empire, we will set our faces steadfastly in the direction of democracy, and it shall not be said of us that we love titles, or that we shall receive any title from the Crown or from any other source, but let it be said that we Canadians will do our duty in a plain, simple manner and be content with such dignity as manhood can confer upon us.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, as my name has been associated with the amendment, I beg to offer a very few remarks. I think the Union Government of the day is to be congratulated on the stand it has taken on this question. Those of us who have supported Union Government, sometimes perhaps a little against the grain, and who have made Union Government possible, may congratulate ourselves on the work that has been done by that Government. I have noted what the Prime Minister has said in the beginning of his remarks, and which has been quoted partially by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), that is, that we are to judge men on their merits and not on any titles that are conferred upon them. That was the idea, if I do not quote the words exactly. They were very much along the same lines as the words quoted by my hon. friend from the great poet Robert Burns. If we are to judge men in this way, what, after all, is the use of titles? Titles, of any kind, are absolutely useless, if we are to so judge men. And if titles are useless why have them? There are plenty of useful things in this world without bothering our heads or wasting our time about the useless things. I have, therefore, very much pleasure, in seconding the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Springfield.

There can be no question that every hon. member present must support the original resolution if we come to that resolution. I am heartily in accord with that resolution, and the Government are heartily in accord with it, because they have agreed to that themselves, and there can certainly be no objection to this House expressing its approval of the action of the Government of the day, which is all we should be doing by passing the resolution which is submitted to us. I believe we should go further, and I for one am prepared to go further; I am prepared to follow the matter to its legitimate conclusion, and in doing so, I believe we should do away with titles altogether, and in doing that, we should only be carrying out the principle laid down by the Prime Minister in his address.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great pleasure and interest to the remarkable speech delivered this afternoon by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle). After having listened to him and to my good friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster), I thought their resolution was not broad enough. I am glad my hon. friend from Springfield has implemented that resolution by the amendment which he has just moved in very eloquent language. I shall give my support to that amendment, and I hope the House will face squarely the issue. Public opinion will be very much disappointed, indeed, if, after the House has spent the day over this question, it should be dropped. My hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) has cited the words of Buffon about the inanity of titles. Might I be allowed to quote a few lines of a French-Canadian poet, which describe the situation in very noble language? The lines run thus:

"Sur cette terre sauvage
"Où les titres sont inconnus,
"La noblesse est dans le courage
"Dans les talents, dans les vertus.

On this barren land where titles are unknown,
True nobility resides in courage, talents and virtue.

These are the true sentiments which are embodied in the masterly addresses which have been delivered this afternoon by the mover and by the seconder. Titles in the Old Country have been a source of corruption. They are a source of corruption in Canada to-day. As my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson), whom I was so pleased to welcome in this House, after so many years of absence, said a moment ago, titles in the pre-revolutionary days in France, as he will read in Carlyle's history, were the cause of malfeasance in office. Privileges and titles also precipitated a revolution in England, where, Sir, you must not forget that also a king was beheaded. Let my hon. English-speaking friends, who are so proud of the glories of old England, not forget that if the French once beheaded their king, the English beheaded theirs also.

Mr. RICHARDSON: He deserved it just as much, if not more.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some appointments of late have created a commotion in England. I regret to say that such a commotion was created on the occasion of honours bestowed on a Canadian far more famous for his cement merger than for his accomplishments on behalf of the Empire. I am sorry the name of Canada is to-day being branded in England on account of the bestowal of titles on such an individual. Sir, I cannot forget that during many months before the last election that individual libelled and slandered the province to which I belong, the faith which I profess, and the race from which I come. Sir, aristocracy of that brand is not healthy; it is not congenial to our soil.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask a question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would the hon. member have any objection to stating how the gentleman to whom he refers libelled his people?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. If my hon. friend will go to the library, and ask for Max Aitken's Epitome of the War, one edition published in English and one published in French, the one purporting to be a copy of the other, although it is not, he will see where Sir Max Aitken libelled the province of Quebec.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not believe it.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Read the Daily Express, his newspaper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At all events, thank Heaven, the French Canadians are not alone in gauging the nobility of Lord Beaverbrook. In England to-day, if you read the Westminster Gazette, the Manchester Guardian, and some of the most influential organs of public opinion, his appointment is very seriously questioned. Aristocracy, I say, is not healthy for this country; it is not congenial to Canada. In the old days we had some nobility during the French domination, but if Canada is what it is to-day, we do not owe it to the French nobility. It is a matter of history that as soon as our ancestors were defeated on the Plains of Abraham, the whole of the nobility returned to France, and the peasantry, the habitant of French Canada, with his curés, remained in the colony, and made it what it has become since. The nobility of the French régime, with a few honourable exceptions, which exceptions only prove the rule, did not take much interest in the colonization, the settlement and the industrial development of New France. That nobility was busy breaking the law enacted by His Majesty the King, against trading with the Indian and exchanging liquor for furs. They were indeed most picturesque, those coureurs des bois. They were mostly all noblemen, but nevertheless they were breaking the King's laws. I repeat it, the best nobility that French Canada ever produced was the French Canadian habitant himself, the honest simple peasant of old. It has been stated, and quite erroneously, that the province of Quebec had been a feudal country until 1854. That statement is an historical error. There was never in French Canada any feudal system. The seigniorial tenure was only an undertaking for the colonization and the settlement of lands in Canada. There were a few of the old seigniorial privileges enjoyed by the seigneurs, and for the time being all went well, but, Sir, after a while, it became evident that the seigniorial system created an impediment to not only colonization but to the industrial development of the country, and in 1854 the French Canadian censitaires demanded the abolition of the seigniorial tenure. I said a moment ago that titles were a source of corruption in Canada. Does it not strike you, Sir, that on the eve of an election the Government of the day bestows titles on journalists? Hon. gentlemen will have noticed that during the past five, six or seven years past many journalists have been made knights, baronets and lords. That is where the greatest source of corruption is felt. The wells of public opinion are poisoned by those new aristocrats, who, in return for the titles that are being bestowed on them, libel one good half of their fellow-countrymen—one good half of Canada. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the President of the Council spoke of the progress which self-government had made in the Empire, and he said that Canada had been in the van in each of these progressive movements. It is quite true that Canada has been in the van of progress in the many developments which have been accomplished by the various dominions composing the Empire. In my judgment, the greatest forward movement that was ever accomplished was the granting of responsible government to Canada by the Mother Country, thanks to the efforts, the energy, the courage and the true Canadianism of the men of 1840. Responsible government made a step further by the coming of Confederation, and, Sir, I regret that my hon. friend forgot that it made one step further when the right hon. gentleman beside me (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) created the Canadian Navy, and obtained from the Mother Country the right for Canada to control her own zone in the Pacific and in the Atlantic ocean. I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to find that at least in the Canadian House of Commons we have had a Canadian field day. We heard expressions of opinion from the other side of the House which make me think that many of the hon. gentlemen should sit on this side. I see no one on this side who would want to cross and take a seat on the other side. I believe there has been a healthy injection of good sound Liberal doctrine into the present Government, but I must warn my hon. friend, the President of Council, that if titles are abolished, as they will be if this amendment is voted upon this evening, there is great danger that with blatant jingoism, acute Imperialism and haughty militarism, the curse of every land, titles might still revive in Canada.

Imperialism which invariably leads to jingoism, because it is a more acute form of imperialism, breeds aristocratic tendencies, it is the seed plot of titles. Sir, there are some gentlemen in this country who do not care much now to be called Canadians. In this city of Ottawa a society of women gravely decided that in future they should not sing "O Canada." It was too vulgar; it was too common! We have reached a point in our history when some people are ashamed to claim Canada as their native country. I think my honourable friend the president of the Council (Mr. Rowell), when he was a Liberal, claimed that he was proud to be a citizen of the British Empire, but it is not our only citizenship as we are all proud to be Canadians. The one citizenship doesn't exclude the other. But, when a journalist has acquired a large fortune in this Canadian commonwealth, if he tastes the wine of imperialism and of jingoism, if perchance he goes across and meets lords and dukes, he suddenly asks himself: "Why should I not get a title?" That is the psychological moment when he forgets his Canadian citizenship and adopts flunkeyism. He then is ready to sacrifice the independence of his paper, to sell his pen and that of his editors in order to parade as Sir So-and-So, or Lord So-and-So.

I am proud, Mr. Speaker, that in the House of Commons, Conservatives and Liberals have united this evening in the sentiments which have been embalmed in both the resolution and the amendment. We have at last realized that the time has come to do away with all these trappings, with all this fuss and feathers, proclaiming that we are proud to be simply Canadians, simply British subjects, law-abiding citizens of a great democracy.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would not have interjected any remarks into this debate but for the unfortunate reference made by the honourable member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) to Lord Beaverbrook.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I can prove that, you know.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The honourable gentleman has undertaken to prove things before and has signally failed. Lord Beaverbrook is a gentleman of whom every honest Canadian may be proud. The statement which my honourable friend made that Lord Beaverbrook had reflected on French Canadians in his book is absolutely untrue and without foundation in any way, sense or shape. His reflections on Lord Beaverbrook in connection with any business transactions in which he has engaged are utterly unfounded. The cement merger, or any other merger that has been spoken of, or any other transaction that the honourable member has mentioned, is clean in comparison with deals that my honourable friend has been associated with. He will not question me; I have the facts.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Sir Sanford Fleming had the facts.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman failed to get a knighthood when nearly every Liberal in the Cabinet of the right hon. gentleman who sits at his left (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was plastered with titles, hereditary and others, obtained from the British Government. Lord Beaverbrook's name will go down in history while the names of some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken here to-night will have been forgotten. Lord Beaverbrook will stand as having done more for the cause of democracy and humanity than all the Lemieuxs that ever wore mufti or uniform in any part or at any time in the history of the world. It is absolutely uncalled for to drag in the name of an honoured man who has done so much for the cause of democracy in this war and who has derived no profit while engaged in upholding this great cause. The hon. gentleman has vituperated the leader of the Opposition to-night. Why did not the leader of the Opposition recommend for a knighthood the hon. member from Maisonneuve? Nearly every man in his Cabinet got one. Canada was dosed with them as never before, and if there is a revulsion of feeling against titles coming from Great Britain now it is partly due to the fact that the leader of the Opposition accepted a title himself after declaring on every platform that he was a democrat to the hilt, and then labeling his own followers for sixteen years until titles got to be common.

An hon. MEMBER: What about honorary colonels?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Honorary colonels were conferred, as honours are conferred on men at the front, on citizens who had done this country some service. Take Jack Stewart and scores like him; their names will go down as men who have done something in this war. We are proud of what some of these honorary colonels have done. We are not ashamed of the honorary colonels. I would not have said one word if it had not been for the reference made to my friend, Max Aitken, who has done not only more than I can tell here to-night but has practically saved the situation on more than one occasion in connection with this great war. I have examined statements which have been made about Max Aitken over and over again, and I tell the hon. member from Maisonneuve that the meanest transaction that Aitken was ever associated with is clean compared with the best that the hon. member from Maisonneuve and his friends were ever associated with. I am in a position to back that up. I had the honour to be talking with a gentleman in Montreal and he said that he could not understand how it was that I would associate with Max Aitken. He named Max Aitken and a couple more of my good friends. I said to him: "My Christian friend, I have heard of all your palavering from one end of the country to the other, and I am in a position to tell you that the dirtiest transaction in which Lord Beaverbrook was ever concerned was clean in comparison with the best I have heard of you, and I know of your doings from British Columbia to the Atlantic." Now I make the statement to my hon. friend from Maisonneuve—let him take it up and I will meet him on his own ground: Lord Beaverbrook's dirtiest transaction, that I have heard of, is clean compared with what my hon. friend has been associated with. Come along, now.

I stand here to-night to endorse the Order in Council as read by the Prime Minister. As far as the amended resolution is concerned, I am not just prepared to endorse it; I have never yet been troubled, either on account of my crown, stars, cross-swords or titles; I do not have to be. Let me supplement the remarks of my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson), my good old opponent and colleague in days gone by in the House. He quoted from Robbie Burns about some character who was a laird in the old days in Scotland. Let me point out to him that one swallow does not make the summer. There is a supplementary statement to the verse he quoted from, it runs like this:

> And man for man the world o'er
> The best is he, an' a' that
> Who stands erect in self respect
> And acts the man, an' a' that.

Whether labouring man or laird the individual who counts and whom we want in this part of the world is the "man" and not the "autocrat." I want to point out, Sir, that the spirit shown by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in his little braggadocio was amusing to me. Imagine for an instant, if you can, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier sliding over the market square to deposit his insignia of office in a pile. Why, wild horses would not drag him there. Talk about autocracy and democracy, there is not a democratic act I have known of that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has ever practised. In the past he has taken the most autocratic position, and as a member of the old Liberal party he always did that. He ruled his following then and rules them now more firmly than the Kaiser ever ruled Germany. We have sitting on the floor of this House to-night a gentleman (Mr. Fielding) who was Minister of Finance in the Cabinet of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and when the great question of creating two new provinces in the Northwest, was consummated, the gentleman to whom I refer never was consulted but was led into the House to vote like a whipped child.

Mr. W. S. FIELDING (Shelbourne and Queens): If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt. I was in Europe when the Bill respecting the organization of the new provinces in the Northwest was drawn and I could not be consulted. When I came back I took my stand on that matter, and my position was stated in the House. When the hon. gentleman states that I was not consulted he is not putting the facts fairly before the House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I made the statement that the hon. gentleman was not consulted, and I repeat it. I do not know where he was, but I make the statement that he sat in the House and went back on the principles which he had enunciated year after year, to my certain knowledge. The then Minister of the Interior, Mr. Clifford Sifton, now Sir Clifford Sifton, was not consulted either. He told me that he had not been consulted in relation to these matters. But the Apostolic Delegate from Rome was consulted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in regard to the formation of the provinces in question when responsible ministers of the Crown and responsible members of the House of Commons were not consulted. Talk about your democracy, why that is the very height of autocracy.

I might point out to this Government that a great many persons consider that many of the Orders in Council passed from time to time by the present Administration do not savour of democratic ideas as interpreted by the people. I might point out further that we talk of democracy, but where in the world can you find—and I am no defender of the nobility, I have taken just as strong a stand against the aristocracy of Great Britain as any man living, I believe now and have always believed in democracy and try to prove myself a consistent democrat—where in the civilized world can you find a race of men who have so solidly stood for the cause of democracy and have again and again intervened between the tyranny of the Crown on the one hand and the tyranny of the mob on the other, to such an extent and to such a degree as the so-called aristocracy of England have done whether you take the laws made on the field of Runnymede, which has been referred to by the Prime Minister, the time of King Charles referred to by my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson), or the time of King William. Always the British aristocracy have been on the side of true democracy, and I say here that the aristocracy of England have ever been the greatest democrats. That is, taken as a body. Of course now and then you will find autocrats among them, but taken as a body they have stood more for the liberty of the people than the people themselves have ever done, and always to a greater degree than the Sovereign himself has in that regard excepting William Prince of Orange. Moreover, in the South African War—and I do not hold any mandate from those gentlemen, because as every one knows I have had my own struggles with some of them to keep them in their place—the nobility showed the spirit that they are made of. When gentlemen here were opposing every move made to protect the integrity of the Empire, and were doing nothing to bring about a proper defence of the Empire and to assure victory, at that time the nobility of Great Britain were going down like ninepins, leading their men on the field of battle. And in the present war famous house after famous house, famous name after famous name, has been wiped out from amongst the nobility of Great Britain, having gone down in the great struggle. Whatever else they may be reproached with, the aristocracy of Britain cannot be accused of not taking a fearless stand for the great cause of democracy and going down almost to a man.

I might point out while on my feet that the charge made against the nobility of Great Britain—and I want them distinctly separated from the autocracy of Britain, because the autocracy of Britain, as I regard it, are the labour unions, not the nobility of the country at all—it has been charged here today by the hon. gentleman who so beautifully moved this resolution, that a great deal of the vacant land of England was due to the nobility who had driven the people off it. The exact opposite is the fact to-day. I want to tell the mover of the resolution that one can raise grain at Calgary and land it in London cheaper than it can be brought from the highlands of Scotland to London, and it is the competitin of the western states for the last half century and of our own great prairies which has caused the lands in the highlands of Scotland to be unproductive.

Mr. NICKLE: Possibly the hon. gentleman did not quite catch my meaning this afternoon. I said nothing about sowing grain, I talked about raising sheep.

Sir SAM HUGHES: My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about. Let me inform him that the ground formerly devoted to raising oats is now used for raising sheep. On the island of Mull the very ground that for the last thirty years has been raising sheep was once raising oats. There were once 37,000 people in the Island of Mull. There are now only 2,500. They raised oats then, and they raise sheep to-day, and it is not due to the fact that there is a landlord, but that their fields could not compete with the prairies of the United States, and accordingly the settlers have gone hither and thither, and the inhabitants are now raising sheep, because it does not pay to raise oats. The honourable member for Kingston should be more careful, and know whereof he speaks.

They are truly democratic in England. I remember the first time I was over there many years ago. The toast to the King was honoured by every one standing. The next toast was to the Prince of Wales, and in this country, this land of autocrats and nabobs, everybody bobs up when the toast to the Prince of Wales is drunk. I stood up, but a gentleman pulled me down, saying: "We never stand for the toast to the Prince of Wales in England." They toast the King, not because he is King, but because of the sovereign position which he occupies. They never stand for dukes, lords and princes; they remain in their seats and drink in silence. England is where you find the truest democracy.

Now, speaking of labour unions—and I had no intention of bringing this up—the great danger to this country to-day is the autocracy of labour unions. I use that statement advisedly. We have had in recent times the example of Bolshevikism, and the greatest autocracy that has ever disgraced the world, to my mind, has been in Russia, where the attempt to raise a nation from labour unions is being tried by those who pose as democrats and who are looked up to as democrats. The greatest tyranny we have to face now is the autocracy and tyranny of the men who pose as democrats, though they have not a democratic principle in their whole constitution. Until these labour unions are put in their place, until the country sees that these organizations have no right to limit the production of commodities in our factories, until labour unions abrogate the right to hold themselves as a separate and distinct body in the nation—a nation within a nation,—we will never have democratic government, we will have government by the most irresponsible and autocratic element in any land. I back labour unions so far as they benefit their members and help production; but when they say: You shall limit production, and no man shall act on his own behalf—even the Order in Council introduced last Friday which ties up every man for labour—limits a man that goes out on strike; that is the only thing that I objected to in that Order—until that time arrives we are going to have trouble, and we will be ruled by the most irresponsible autocracy.

I have no intention of saying a word in this debate, but the unfortunate rejoinder of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who probably feels hurt that he was ignored by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in the days when he was securing titles for everybody, and who was smarting under that disappointment, evidently caused him to speak as he did.

Mr. BUREAU: Would the hon. gentleman be willing to throw his title on the bonfire in the market-place?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not have to depend on titles. The people know I am one of the boys, and that I am always ready to deliver the goods

Mr. BUREAU: If they do not, then you tell them.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Well, never mind. Let me repeat: Lord Beaverbrook has been attacked most maliciously in this country. I tell the hon. gentlemen, and those who have been attacking him here, and the irresponsibles in England, who are not fit to black his shoes, that I know the man himself as I know the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and I am speaking of what I know.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Flavelle?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I know the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and I say to him here to-night that the meanest transaction which Max Aitken has ever been connected with is clean compared with some of the deals that the hon. member has been associated with. Some one asks me: What about Flavelle? He is a gentleman who has caused all this turmoil. Talk of the water in stocks—what about the water in pork?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir SAM HUGHES: My good friend, the President of the Privy Council is supposed to be his right hand man, and he is a "democrat to the hilt"; and the other runs the pork end of it. I shall not here enter into a discussion of anything in that connection to-night, but I am taking the liberty of informing the House, that possibly at no distant date, should opportunity arise in the House, I am prepared for a very interesting and lengthy discussion in connection with many institutions with which that gentleman is connected. There are old things to be uncovered, and a true statement of affairs on many matters of interest to the public in the past two or three years may yet come out fairly and squarely, and will prove very interesting. Let me tell the hon. member for Maisonneuve that I shall not tolerate the making of wrong charges or the slandering of a gentleman as he has slandered Max Aitken here to-night.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) who has just sat down is a splendid illustration of the desirability of doing away with titles. We are too close to judge of men's honour here, we have to see them in perspective, and coming down from our province by the sea, with the straits of Northumberland between us and the mainland, we can view this gentleman's virtues better than those in other parts of the Dominion. I want to say of my hon. friend who has just sat down, with all his idiosyncrasies and peculiarities, with all his humour, that, in my judgment, notwithstanding all these, and all the mistakes he has made, he will occupy a niche in the hall of fame in future history because of his great performance in connection with this war. But simply for that probably, and nothing more. With regard to another titled gentleman here, whom I see beside me, his title is a rag compared with the glorious position that he will occupy in the history of his time and of his country—I refer to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), that grand, lone figure, who during the last five or six months has stood out and led his people out of the land of Egypt and the house of bondage alone, with the men who ought to be supporting him heaping vituperation and abuse upon him! In the future, when the history of these times is written, his name will stand out as the greatest star of these times. The greatest Imperial statesman of our great Empire. Imperial in the best sense of that word.

There are two kinds of imperialism. There is the kind that stands for the integrity of the great British Empire, not as a solidified nation, but as a great federal body, in each part of which autonomy, home rule, obtains. The only way that this great Empire can be united is, as the poet Willie said, by the "chains of liberty." That is Laurier imperialism!

Some hon. gentlemen have referred to Robbie Burns. They do not seem to realize that Robbie Burns was a prophet. The following are the concluding words of that famous poem of his to which hon. gentlemen opposite have referred:

> "Then let us pray that come it may,
> As come it will for a' that;
> That sense and worth o'er all the earth
> May bear the gree and a' that.

For a' that, and a' that,
Their tinsel show and a' that;
The man of independent mind
Is king of men for a' that."

What would it matter to our titled friends if they should burn their titles to-morrow? The position given to them by their miserable titles does not amount to a scrap of paper compared with the position they must occupy in the future ,when each man will be judged on his merits.

Like other members who have spoken on this subject, I am against the degradation of Canadian public life by the conferring of titles, and I desire to put myself on record as supporting the amendment.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): Mr. Speaker, it will doubtless seem presumptuous to you that at this late hour of the night and after so lengthy a debate I should rise to address the House, particularly when I am deeply conscious of how far I fall short of the eloquence and research which has had my admiration and envy this afternoon. But, like the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), I had given hostages on this question, as it had come up among others during the election, and I should not be redeeming one of the few promises I was called upon to make if I did not put myself on record.

It was a pleasure to have the resolution introduced into this House, and it was a still greater satisfaction to have the Order in Council which had been prepared by the Government laid before the House. The amendment just proposed receives, it is evident, the support of practically every member present, if one may judge from the unanimous expression of opinion; and so far as I am concerned it receives my heartiest support. I do, however, wish to dissociate myself from some remarks which may be fairly construed into an attack on the House of Lords. While the Parliament of Cromwell might well pass a resolution commencing as follows:

The Commons of England assembled in Parliament, finding by too long experience that the House of Lords is useless and dangerous——"

I do not think it becomes the Parliament of any overseas dominion to reflect upon or criticize an institution which pertains almost altogether to the legislation of Great Britain, particularly at a time like this, when, as a former speaker said, that institution, its members and their descendants have done much to redeem themselves from the disdain with which they had been treated.

[Mr. Read.]

In view of the fact that 150 heirs to hereditary titles have already fallen in the war, and that some 2,000 recipients of honours have gone to their last home, I should be sorry to be a party to anything in the nature of criticism. But it is clear that neither the Order in Council—I think that the Prime Minister referred particularly to that point—nor the resolution or amendment do reflect in any way upon that House, so that one can support them without hesitation.

I agree with what the mover of the resolution said, that even in the midst of war this question should receive our immediate and urgent attention. Debrett states that during the past three years, since the war began, honours have been conferred in 7,900 cases; that, of course, includes the various companionships. During the last twelve months, 3,870 such Orders have been granted; 18 peers have been created; 32 baronets, 277 knights and 3,472 companions. These, with some additional honours granted to existing peers make up the total of 3,870, so that if that flood is to continue—and in comparison with past years, it is a flood—we in Canada could not fail to be inundated by it.

As the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) has said, the objection to speaking late in the course of a discussion is that one's arguments have all been advanced, one's quotation used, and little remains to be said. I should like, however, to emphasize the difficulty which the Prime Minister pointed out regarding the fourth section of the Order in Council. I agree with him that great difficulties exist, and although they may be removed by the action of the Imperial Parliament, that, as he pointed out, involves the consent of the House of Lords. As late as 1907 a case came before the House of Lords which illustrates the tenacity with which the Lords guard their privileges. It appears that in 1302 a picturesque individual who went by the name of Roger le Bygod surrendered his earldom of Norfolk to Edward I. Ten years later Edward II. granted to Thomas de Brotherton this earldom, and for many years that new family enjoyed the honour. In 1907 a direct descendant of Thomas de Brotherton asked to be confirmed in the title. But the Lords held that the original earl could not surrender his title, that the charter granted ten years later was invalid, and that the only persons entitled to the Norfolk title were the original descendants of our friend Bygod. As Lord Halsbury puts it "No peer of this realm can drown or extinguish his honour." As one knows, the doctrine of ennobled blood, based perhaps upon the same foundation as the divine right of kings, appears to endow the nobility with that ichor or ethereal fluid which supplies the veins of the gods instead of the blood of mortals, so that do what one may, it is a difficult matter to get rid of hereditary titles once they are granted. This, then, is the time to take action to prevent their entry into Canada, and for that reason the resolution should have the support not only of this House but of the country at large.

The mover of the resolution and others have pointed out very strikingly the evils which spring from the granting of titles. The harm is not so much to the recipient as to the rest of the community. Man is prone to worship, and too often, as we all know, he is ready to worship false gods. I remember Henry George prefacing one of his chapters with the translation of a proverb of India:

White parasols and elephants mad with pride are the flowers of a grant of land.

It seems to me that might be paraphrased under these circumstances:

White stockinged serving men and a populace mad for worship are the flowers of a patent of nobility.

Mr. F. B. STACEY (Westminster District): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say at this hour, but I venture to think that perhaps the House will permit a new voice from the far West to express his very hearty endorsation of the principles that have been so ably and fully set forth this afternoon and evening. I labour under a disadvantage and a handicap. Being a new member, I have been careful to read the rules of the House, and I find there is a prohibition against repetition. It is, therefore, almost impossible to avoid the consequences of an injunction at this hour. I think I voice to some extent the opinion of the far West when I say that the expressions that have been made here today will give to the people of the West intense satisfaction and delight. We were inclined to think that perhaps radicalism would find, or had found its fullest expression in the West. But I do not think there has been heard from any platform in the West any more radical or thoroughgoing democratic expressions and statements than have been made here this afternoon from the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

I would not presume to pass any criticism whatever upon any English habits or customs at the present time. We know that the Premier of Great Britain has stated openly and publicly his great debt and gratitude to the labour unions of Britain. He has gone out of his way, if I may say so, to express his intense satisfaction with the attitude of the labour element of England their contribution towards the victory that is before us as a people. It becomes us, I take it, to confine our criticisms at least to our own country, and our own business, and the question that is before the House. If there is one reason more than another why I believe the people of Canada are in sympathy with the attitude and action that is proposed this afternoon, it is this, that certain people receive titles which, in the judgment of those who know them best, their fellow citizens, their own friends, they do not deserve. I may be wrong in some cases, but I know in many cases this is the deliberate conviction of the people of Canada. The question may be asked: Why are the Canadian people opposed to this? Answers have been given in great numbers this afternoon, and I shall sum them all up in one sentence which, I think, covers the entire ground—the Canadian people do not want titles. They have many reasons for taking that stand, but the result is the same in every case. They believe that true merit is, "when unadorn'd, adorn'd the most."

I have been impressed with this thought that after all the voice of history is truly democratic. Reference was made by my hon. friend from Springfield to certain names which are known in history without any appendage. The fact is that in the whole realm of history, whether we take the field of letters, the field of science, the field of art, the realm even of religion, the realm of philosophy or the realm of statesmanship, the outstanding names in each one of those departments is without a title of any type, shape or character. To quote the language of one of my hon. friends this afternoon, who would dream of adding any title to some of the great names of English history, particularly of English letters? From Homer down to Lloyd George they are all alike; they stand unadorned because they are adorned with the force of their own merit, their own manhood and their own superb character. If I remember my Canadian history aright, I think that during the last few years when the people of Canada have been appealed to to decide some great national question, two or three words would have summarized that appeal. In 1873 the issue before the Canadian people could have been summarized in two words.

In 1878 possibly two words again would have summarized the character of the appeal. In 1896, possibly three words would have covered the character of the appeal. In 1911 one word summarized the great issue, and in 1917 I claim that one single word before the Canadian people from East to West summarized the character and the nature of the issue which the people of Canada were called upon to decide. And, Sir, if it were feasible, even hypothetically considered for a moment, that this Canadian Parliament were dissolved, and an appeal to the country made on one issue, and that issue were summarized in these words "Canadian democracy," and on the obverse side of the shield "Titled aristocracy," and the people of the country voted on that issue, what would be the result? I believe we should have a unique thing in the history of the parliaments of the world—an absolutely united Government. There would not be a man in opposition from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and then, Sir, for once in our life, I believe we would be free in such a contest from all that appeals to race and religion and sectional strife. They would be all set aside, and the people from the East to the West, and from the North to the South would unite solidly, and there would be no words such as some of us deplored having heard in the House of Commons. There would be no disagreement, such as we have listened to in this House, but from East to West we would have a united Canada, and, perhaps, some one might be able to compose a new national anthem that would bring in the strains of "The Maple Leaf," "O, Canada," and "God Save the King," and we would be no longer French Canadians or English Canadians, but Canadians, from North to South and East to West.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne Queens): I regret I had to be absent during part of the evening, having had to attend a committee meeting, and had not the pleasure of hearing my hon. friend, the President of Council (Mr. Rowell), nor the addresses of the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the amendment. I am informed, however, that an amendment has been moved, condemning all titles, and that is the issue upon which we are about to vote. Let me say that while, as most of my friends are aware, I have less appreciation, perhaps, than some others, less enthusiasm as to the value of these titles, I have never gone to the point of saying that all titles in Canada should be put an end to. I think the argument against hereditary titles is absolutely complete and unanswerable. I am glad that that argument was presented, not only by the hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Brome, but also in the very important Order in Council which the right hon. the Prime Minister brought down. But with respect to titles generally, leaving aside those of an hereditary character, though, as I say I am not as enthusiastic as some others in my admiration of them, I am free to admit that there may be circumstances—it has seemed so in the past—that might justify them. I do not think we should discuss it from a personal point of view. If one cared to do that, we could go over the list of gentlemen honoured with titles, and many of them would be recognized as men who have won eminence in the particular lines in which they are engaged. Some titles have been granted which are open to criticism. In some cases gentlemen who have been a short time in the public service, who might modestly have waited a little longer, have been ready to seize the title when the opportunity came. From one viewpoint if you take the whole list of titles you could find very little ground to take exception to any one of them. One may say that all the recipients are decent, honourable respectable people. But if you take up the list and go over them one by one and say, wherein does this man differ from a hundred men around him, what service has he rendered, what distinction has he in the community, what reason was there for giving him a title any more than giving it to a hundred men around him?—you may fail to get an answer. It is a case in which you might quote the old lines:

> The thing itself is neither rich nor rare,
> The only wonder is how it got there.

But I am not prepared to go so far as the hon. gentleman who would condemn the titles generally. I think, properly awarded, there is something to be said in favour of the system, and an abuse of a system is never a good reason for abolishing it. While I am not as warm in my admiration for titles as some others, I would be content to-day to adopt the moderate position taken by the hon. member for Kingston and I should be content to vote against hereditary titles, because I think, in that respect, the argument is complete and unanswerable.

A word more—not of any importance. My hon. friend from Victoria-Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes), who is not in his seat now, made some allusion to the conferring of titles at the time when the right hon. leader of the Opposition was Prime Minister, and he rather intimated that all the gentlemen in that Government got titles. They did not all get titles. Quite a number did not. While my hon. friend was speaking, I made a little calculation. I may be wrong, I am giving this thing in all good faith, subject to correction—"errors and omissions excepted." If I am correct in my memorandum—I am confining myself to the Cabinet ministers who quietly drew titles to themselves, and I am not finding fault with any of them—I find that in the Cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the following gentlemen drew titles: Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Louis Davies, Sir Allen Aylesworth, Sir Richard Scott, Sir Frederick Borden and Sir William Mulock. They all received titles when they were Cabinet ministers. These count six in number. I find that in the Cabinet which succeeded them, and of which my hon. friend the hon. gentleman from Haliburton was an ornament, the following gentlemen drew titles: Right hon. Premier, the Hon. Messrs. Kemp, Perley, Foster, White and Hughes. They count six. That means that in six years of the Government of which my hon. friend was a member they drew to themselves as many knighthooas as the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier drew in fifteen years.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: While I was absent from the Chamber a little while ago my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) moved an amendment to the resolution which is now under consideration, and to the exact meaning of which I think the attention of hon. gentlemen of this House ought to be directed before any vote is passed upon it. As I understand the amendment of the hon. gentleman, it would convert the resolution as originally proposed into a resolution which reads as follows:

> To the King's Most Excellent Majesty, Most Gracious Sovereign,
> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon your subjects domiciled or living in Canada.

Now, if we are to proceed along the lines evidently intended by this resolution, I think all hon. members of the House will agree that the language should be carefully selected, and we should not adopt any form of words which might go beyond the meaning and intent of those who are proposing to vote in favour of it. During the past three years we have had a very large number of men fighting overseas for this Dominion, for the British Commonwealth of which it forms a part, and for the cause which the allied nations are supporting in this war. In the course of their military service, a great many men from our own Dominion, from the other dominions of the Empire, and from the United Kingdom have from time to time been honoured by their Sovereign, in recognition of their heroic services, with certain classes of distinction which might be regarded as coming within the terms of the resolution as now presented. The word "title" might probably embrace a great many of the honours which have been conferred upon men during the past three years for actual service in the field. It certainly would cover distinctions that have been conferred upon several of them at least. There are two classes of the Order of the Bath. One is a civil class conferred upon people for services of a civil character. There is also a military class of the Order of the Bath, conferred in its various distinctions, upon men for actual service in the field. There are also other orders by which actual service in the field is recognized. There is the Victoria Cross, the highest of all. There is a D.S.O is there not?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, the Distinguished Service Order.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is the Military Cross and there are other distinctions for actual service in the field. I should think that the House might well pause before it should exercise upon our men, who have fought as gallantly and as well as any men from any other part of the Empire, or any allied nations, a discrimination which they would regard as absolutely unjust, and which might be brought about by the terms of the amendment as proposed. If we are to embark upon this proposal, we should carefully select the language in which it is to be couched. Further than that, I would respectively suggest that if we are to embark upon the policy of affording no recognition for any kind of service by any such means in future, we might very well consider whether those distinctions already granted in this country ought not to be abolished. In view of the fact that we have had no notice until to-night of the proposal which has been put forward by the hon. member from Springfield, I think the House should consider the question more maturely and, at all events select some form of words which would not discriminate against the soldiers from this Dominion and place them in a different position to those from the United Kingdom and from other parts of the Empire. Having in mind these considerations, I move, Mr. Speaker, that the debate upon this motion, and upon the amendment, be now adjourned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the debate is to be adjourned, will my right honourable friend give us a day to take it up again?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Probably the right honourable, the leader of the Government, would prepare a resolution worded in such a form as might be acceptable to the House, and if so, would be perfectly willing to accept it in place of my amendment.

Motion agreed to,and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—DECORUM OF THE HOUSE.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. SPEAKER: I would draw the attention of honourable members to the fact that it is provided by the rules that honourable members may not leave their seats until the Speaker has left the Chair. It is hardly in conformity with the dignity of the House that the Speaker and the mace should rustle with honourable members for possession of the means of egress from this chamber.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11:45 p.m.

Tuesday, April 9, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. JOSEPH READ.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Kings): I rise to a question of privilege. I notice in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning an excerpt taken from the Hansard report of the debate on April 5, as follows:

Quebec Difficulties.

From Hansard Report, House of Commons, April 5, 1918.

Sir Sam Hughes: I am satisfied that if common sense had been exercised this trouble would not have occurred. I do not look upon it as a matter of very great importance, but it is of great importance to know what the unseen power is that has prevented these splendid boys—and there are no finer in the world—from following the dictates of their own impulses and joining the forces. What has prevented them—?

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. Joseph Read: Let me tell you—bigotry.

Sir Sam Hughes: I am very sorry to hear that. I do not think these boys are actuated by bigotry; I know they are not, and I hope that the power behind them is not bigotry.

The honourable member for Victoria when he made that statement, misapprehended the methods of a good soldier because by implication he made me appear to say that these boys were actuated by bigotry. I never intended to make that assertion, and the subsequent speech which I made in the House at the end of the debate will show what I did mean. I just take this opportunity of drawing attention to it so that there will be no misapplication of what I said.

VAN BUREN BRIDGE COMPANY.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways) for the third reading of Bill No. 14 to confirm an agreement between His Majesty the King, and the Van Buren Bridge Company.

Mr. MICHAUD: I wish to move an amendment to the third reading of this Bill:

That all the words in the said motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The said Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole of the House for the purpose of adding to clause 1 of said Bill the following words: Provided that the Railway Station at St. Leonards on the line now known as the International railway shall be maintained, reconstructed if destroyed and kept in operation during the term of the said agreement.

This means that the present station shall not be removed but shall remain where it is at present.

Mr. REID: Perhaps the honourable gentleman will explain what he means by that.

Mr. MICHAUD: The explanation is that the people living at St. Leonards do not wish to have the station now built on the International railway transferred to the Transcontinental railroad. They want to leave the station at the terminus of the International railway. On the second reading of the Bill I presented a petition which urges very forcibly that no change be made in case the Government leases the branch line between the Transcontinental and the International railways. In the name of the people of St. Leonards I ask the Government not to remove the station but to leave it where it is at this moment.

Mr. REID: We discussed this matter in committee and the honourable gentleman is only moving again on the lines of that discussion. The object of the Bill is to make provision that the International railway and the Transcontinental railway may be connected by a small piece of railway, two or three miles in length, that we are leasing and which has been operated by the Bangor and Aroostook railway. I do not think that any member of the House would think that the suggestion of the honourable member that we keep both stations is fair or reasonable. The Government now own and operate the Transcontinental railway between Lévis and Moncton, and on that line there is a station in the village or town of St. Leonards. Since the Transcontinental railway was taken over by the Government, they have purchased what is known as the International railway running between Campbellton and St. Leonards. The International railway had a station also in the town of St. Leonards, and it has been running into that station. The Government therefore are compelled to keep up two stations and to maintain that portion of the road, two or three miles in length, that is being operated by the International railway from the point where it will branch off to go over to the Transcontinental station. It does not seem to me that it is in the public interest that we should keep up two stations in one place and it does also strike me that it is much better for the travelling public that all the trains should go to the one station. As I understand, from what the hon. member said a few evenings ago, the International railway station is a little nearer that of the Canadian Pacific railway and it would be more convenient perhaps for passengers coming in on the International who wanted to go to the Canadian Pacific railway. They would have a little less distance to walk than if they had to go from the Transcontinental Railway station. But, as shown by the statements of the hon. member, and by plans which I submitted the other evening, the distance between the Canadian Pacific Railway station and the Transcontinental is only about one thousand or twelve hundred feet. I cannot see why the people of St. Leonards should ask us to keep up two stations. This small piece of road is necessary for traffic passing over the International railway to the Transcontinental railway and in order that we shall not be paying for the carriage of that traffic to the Bangor and Aroostook railway. Under the circumstances I could not possibly accept the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member, and in the interest of the public service, and for the convenience of the public that travel on both Government lines, I would ask the House to reject that amendment and accept the agreement that has been arrived at and signed.

Mr. MICHAUD: I would like to point out—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. MICHAUD: The Minister of Railways is under a misapprehension with respect to a certain fact, and I simply desire to correct him. I wish to state that people getting off the International Railway train have not to walk to the Canadian Pacific Railway station. They have their own line running to the Canadian Pacific Railway station, and people getting off a train there connect with the up-train to Edmundston and the down-train to Grand Falls.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (Algoma E.): It may seem out of place for a member representing a constituency in Northern Ontario to interject himself into the discussion of a proposal that has to do with a purely local matter in the province of New Brunswick, and in so far as anything I may say on this subject might be interpreted as interfering in that connection, I apologize to the House for making any observation at all. It has not been my privilege to have visited St. Leonards. As a matter of fact, I believe, if it was necessary for me to go there I would have to consult a railway map in order to determine just how I might reach it. St. Leonards may be a metropolitan or commercial centre of very considerable importance, or it may be simply a rural community of no great importance—that is neither here nor there in so far as this subject is concerned. But there is a principle involved in the discussion that has taken place with regard to this Bill that strikes at the very root of the whole question of government ownership and operation in this country. If I have interpreted correctly the remarks of the Minister of Railways on the occasions that he has spoken on this Bill, I take it that he is acting under the advice of the responsible officers that are in charge of the Government railways; and I say, that if government-owned railways are ever going to be operated successfully, it will be when this House and the country stand behind the minister in assuming just that position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If Government-owned and controlled railways are to be made a pure matter of parish politics, then I have grave doubts as to the success that we shall ever attain in the operation of such railways; and if it is any consolation to the Minister of Railways to know it, I would like to say to him that here is one member of the Commons that is going to stand behind him rigidly in following the policy of his predecessor and turning an absolutely deaf ear to those who would subjugate a great national undertaking to a simple basis of political grab, which is what many members of this House, representing different parts of the country, apparently desire to do with Government-owned railways.

Amendment negatived, Bill read third time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 5, to amend the Dominion Lands Act, was read third time.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF A JUDGE AD HOC.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 27, to amend the Supreme Court Act, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Appointment of ad hoc judge; Quebec appeals; evidence of appointment; duties; compensation; delivery of judgment.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to move to amend section 1, not with any desire of materially altering the nature of the Bill, but merely for the purpose of modifying the procedure by which the particular judge who is to serve may be designated.

The proposed amendment would provide that in the cases where the Exchequer Court judge is not available the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, instead of directly himself designating a particular judge who would be called in, would request of the Chief Justice of any of the provinces to designate one of the judges of the High or Superior Court in his province. I suggest this amendment because it has been pointed out to me that it was not desirable, that it might, perhaps, even be considered not to be absolutely courteous to the Chief Justices of the provinces for the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court directly to intervene and select the judge who should act. In the second place, it has also been pointed out, and with considerable force, that the Chief Justice of the province from whose court the judge is to be taken is in better position to determine what judge is most available in the existing condition of business of the court in the province. The modified section will have the further advantage of proceeding, say, in the same manner as is provided in some of the provinces, if not in all, for analogous cases where it is necessary to have a judge ad hoc to sit in the Court of Appeal of the province. In the province of Quebec, for instance, where there is occasion, similar to the occasion foreseen here, to call for a judge to sit ad hoc in the Court of Appeals, the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals addresses himself to the Chief Justice of the Superior Court, who, in consultation with his judges, designates the one who is to act. I think that the reasons which I have outlined, and to which my attention has been called, are sufficient to make clear that the amendment which I am about to propose would be an improvement over the system which the section originally in the Bill as introduced proposed to adopt. I beg, therefore, to move, Mr. Chairman:

That subsection (1) of Section 1 be amended by adding at the end of the subsection the words "to be designed in writing by the Chief Justice of such provincial court upon such request being made to him in writing."

That amendment will necessitate some further modifications in the balance of the section, and we might as well deal with them all at once. There is one other amendment which does not turn upon them, which I desire also to move, and it is:

That sub-section (2) be amended by striking out the designation of numeral (2) and inserting the words "provided always that."

It will then read:

Provided always that unless two of the judges of the Supreme Court available fulfil the requirements of Section 6.

And so on.

Mr. BUREAU: Those words will be inserted at the beginning of subsection (2) before the word "unless"?

Mr. DOHERTY: Instead of section (2) we will have a proviso to the first subsection. I desire further to amend it by substituting in the second line of the subsection, before the words "ad hoc," the word "the," instead of "an."

Mr. BUREAU: Striking out the words "ad hoc?"

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but substituting the definite article 'the" for "an." I wish also to amend the third line of the present section (2) by striking out after the word "judge" the words "from a provincial court." The effect of this modification would be to make the requirement that where one of the two judges who is absent or ill, and who is to be replaced, is one of the two judges which by the statutes are required to be judges of the province of Quebec, that in this case application should be made for the judge of the provincial court wherever it is a matter of cases coming from the province of Quebec.

Mr. BUREAU: It would be a King's Bench judge?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, or if the Chief Justice chose to designate a judge of the Superior Court, I do not think he would be limited in that regard. The application would go to the Chief Justice of the provincial court. I presume he would designate a judge of his own court, I think it would be probably the proper action on the part of the Chief Justice. Of course, there might be cases where it would be difficult to do that, because an appeal might be from the judgment of that very court of appeal in which possibly one of the judges of the appeal court might have sat.

I would beg further to amend subsection (2) which, if my amendment carries, becomes the proviso, by adding at the end thereof the words "designated as above provided," so that the provision would be that he "shall be a judge of the court of King's Bench or a judge of the Superior Court of that province designated as above provided."

I beg further to amend subsection (3). This is also an amendment consequent upon the previous change to amend subsection (3) of section 1, in the first place, by substituting the figure (2) for (3) and in the second place by inserting in the second line, after the words "senior puisne judge," the words "and where a judge of the provincial court is designated to act, of the letter designating him." That particular subsection made the requisition of the Chief Justice the proof of the authority of the sitting judge, whereas in virtue of the proposed change it will be necessary to have not only a requisition of the Chief Justice but a designation by the Chief Justice of the province to complete the proof of the authority. It would be proper, at all events, to provide that the requisition and the designation shall be the proof of the authority.

Also, following upon the proposed change in subsection (1) I beg to move to amend subsection (4) by substituting the figure (3) for the figure (4), and by inserting after the word "requested" in the second line of the subsection the words "or has been so designated," to provide for the case of the judge who is properly requested, and the case of the judge who is designated.

I beg further to move to amend section (5) by substituting (4) for (5), and by inserting in the second line of the subsection, after the word "request," the words "or upon such designation." And, finally, to amend subsection 6 by substituting (5) for (6)

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I understood from the minister during the previous discussion on this Bill that he would have no objection to calling upon the second judge of the Exchequer Court in such cases.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should have no objection to allowing the second judge to sit, but as we are dealing with the final Court of Appeal of Canada it seemed to me that we should not provide for the sitting of a judge who, in the particular court to which he belongs, is the assistant judge. The reason why it had been considered desirable that the assistant judge should sit was in order to have, in cases from Quebec, and in cases where the absent judge was a Quebec judge, a judge versed in the law of that province. That object is attained by the provision that where the absent judge is one of the two judges required by the statute to be judges of the province of Quebec, and where the case to be dealt with is a case from that province, there shall be asked for and designated a judge of the Superior Court or Court of the King's Bench of the province of Quebec. So that the provision as it now stands, with the amendment, meets the necessity of having at all times, in cases from Quebec, the statutory number of Quebec judges. It did not seem, therefore, desirable that we should specify or designate the assistant judge of the Exchequer court when we had open to us the entire field of provincial judges.

Mr. MORPHY: A Bill of such importance as this cannot be properly considered until it is printed in the form which it will assume with the amendments. Five or six amendments have been proposed and discussed; some members have not heard them, and some cannot understand them. Moreover, a large number of members have not heard the remarks of the minister, and I suggest that he have the Bill referred back and reintroduced in proper form so that we may consider it intelligently.

Mr. DOHERTY: Under ordinary circumstances I should be glad to meet this suggestion, but I should like to point out that the Supreme Court is prevented from carrying on its business at present because Mr. Justice Duff is engaged in the hearing of appeals under the Military Service Act, and, by reason of the illness of one of the other judges, it is not possible for five judges to sit in court. Accordingly, they adjourned their Court until April 15 in the hope that this measure would be adopted in time to enable them to proceed with the business. The situation is, perhaps, peculiarly urgent because of the fact that in the last term they were suffering largely from the same difficulty, and were in a position to hear only those cases in which the parties were willing to proceed with four judges. Though the amendments are numerous, they are all, with the exception of a slight modification making subsection 2 a proviso instead of a subsection, the consequence of one change, which is as follows: under the Bill as introduced it was provided that where there was need for an ad hoc judge the chief justice or senior puisne judge of the court could himself select that judge. The effect of the amendment is that where there is need for an ad hoc judge, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may address himself only to the Chief Justice of any of the provinces, asking him to provide an ad hoc judge. The Chief Justice so applied to would thereupon, no doubt in consultation with his judges, designate the particular one who was to act. That is the entire effect of the proposed amendment. The others, with one exception, are the necessary consequences of making that change. Then there is an amendment merely to meet what was suggested the other evening: that in cases coming from Quebec you might not have a court constituted in compliance with the express requirements of the statute, which makes it necessary that there shall be two judges taken from the bar of the province of Quebec. The amendment provides that in such a case a judge shall be applied for rather than a judge of the Exchequer Court taken. I should be glad, therefore, if the committee could see its way clear to deal with this matter to-day. If, of course, hon. gentlemen feel that they have not had proper opportunity of fully grasping the effect of the amendments, we must meet that; I would not ask the committee or the House to pass a measure without having ample opportunity of becoming thoroughly familiar with its provisions. But I may add that if the measure is to enable the Supreme Court to proceed on the 15th, it will have to go through the Senate as well as through this House and receive the assent of the Governor General during the present week.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. MORPHY: I appreciate to the full the argument of the Minister of Justice, but I still feel like adhering to the request I have made, that the Bill be brought back printed as it will appear with the amendments, for further discussion. The minister has told us that through his importuning all the Superior Court judges of the province of Quebec are sitting on the tribunals. I suggest that he take the balance of the Supreme Court judges that are here and put them with Mr. Duff in order that the work may be speeded up. In the meantime, the Supreme Court work can be postponed for a little while, notwithstanding the great importance of the cases that may be awaiting trial.

I am pleased that my main objection, about which I purposed saying a word, was removed by the amendment striking out the name of the Chief Justice in section 1. Nevertheless, the measure is a very far-reaching one; it extends over the jurisdiction of the whole country, and there may be some points to be raised even as the Bill stands now. I do not think it is fair to ask the House, on such an important measure as this, to take absolutely the word of the Minister of Justice for everything. As we are supposed to be individuals here, we are surely entitled to consider for ourselves the full effect of any measure that is brought before the House. I again request the minister to have the Bill referred back, reprinted and introduced in the proper form, even although that may cause some delay.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I, for my part, take very strong objection to the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy). The Bill has been introduced and is in the possession of the House. When it has gone out of Committee, it can be reprinted. But I do not think it is in the power of this Committee to order that the Bill be reprinted with amendments that have not been accepted by the Committee. There may be some discussion on the amendments, and objections may be taken to them. I think, therefore, before we order the reprinting of the Bill, we must discuss the Bill as it stands, and then when it is accepted by this Committee, it may be reprinted.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I regret very much that I have not heard the remarks of the Minister of Justice in regard to this Bill. While it is a very short Bill, it is very important, and it lays down a principle in connection with the judiciary of this country which should receive very careful consideration before any change is made in the general practice. Under this Bill, we give the Government power to fill temporarily vacancies which may be caused by the illness of members of the Supreme Court of Canada; but when we do that, we should not go any further, and the Governor in Council should perform its function in connection with temporarily filling these vacancies just as it does in connection with a permanent appointment to the bench. It is perhaps unfair to this country to place such a power—as would be done under this Bill as originally printed, or as it is proposed to be amended by the Minister of Justice—in the hands of the Chief Justice of Canada or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of any province. Perhaps it would be wise if the Government would adhere to the original practice, and have these appointments made, even although they are made temporarily, by an Order in Council, for which the Government shall be responsible. As to delay in having these amendments printed, I call the attention of the House to the fact that, prior to the calling together of the House of Commons, there was dislocation of the work of the Supreme Court of Canada. About a month before Parliament assembled the Supreme Court of Canada had to adjourn its sittings by reason of the illness of two of its members. If there had been absolute necessity for haste this matter might have been disposed of much earlier in the session than now. Personally, I am desirous of seeing in type the amendments which the Minister of Justice proposes to make to this Bill, and then I shall be able to vote intelligently on it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to press once more the suggestion I made the other day to the Minister of Justice about the assistant judge of the Exchequer Court. The minister will remember that when the Supreme Court was constituted Exchequer work was done by the Supreme Court. It was only in after years that a separate jurisdiction was created, and that the Exchequer Court came into existence. At first there was only one judge of the Exchequer Court, Mr. Justice Burbidge. Then the present incumbent, Sir Walter Cassels, was appointed, and an assistant judge was appointed with the same jurisdiction, the only difference being that one was the senior judge and the other the junior. My hon. friend is right in stating that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may request the Chief Justice of any Superior Court to delegate some one to act as judge ad hoc. Would it not be more proper and more in the interests of the litigants, inasmuch as it would save time, for the chief justice to request the judge of the Exchequer Court, who originally had the same jurisdiction as he has, either to give his services as judge ad hoc or to ask his assistant to act in his stead? The reason is obvious, because it may happen that the Chief Judge of the Exchequer Court may be away. The Exchequer Court judges travel from one part of the country to another. Sometimes you have Mr. Justice Audette or Sir Walter Cassels in Prince Edward Island, or Quebec or Nova Scotia. One of the two is generally in Ottawa. There is no distinction as between their jurisdiction; it is the same except that the one is Chief Judge and the other is Assistant Judge. It seems to me it would serve the ends of justice, and it may on many occasions save time to get right in the same building the very man whom the Supreme Court would like to have to fill a gap. I shall, under these circumstances, give notice of an amendment to add to line sixteen, after the word "judge," the words "or the assistant judge."

Mr. DOHERTY: I appreciate what the leader of the Opposition has pointed out as to the impossibility, so far as I can see it, of our reprinting the Bill at this stage with the amendments in the position in which they now stand. At the same time, I have every desire in the world that the measure should not be dealt with, without every hon. member feeling he has had every opportunity to grasp its full effect and significance. Under those circumstances, we might proceed to-day in committee, and if, after we have got through the committee stage of the Bill, hon. members still feel they desire further time for consideration, we might perhaps not press the Bill further to-day. It might still be possible, if we get this Bill through this House to-morrow, to attain the result, which I think is desirable, of having the measure passed, if the House desires it should be passed, in time to put the court in a position to act next week.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Bill can be printed after it has gone through committee and before the third reading.

Mr. DOHERTY: We could have the Bill reprinted before it goes to third reading, and then everybody will have an apportunity to grasp its meaning and effect.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Will it be brought back into committee again after it is reprinted so that we may see the amendments? I have not heard a word the Minister of Justice has said to-day and I am particularly interested in the first clause of the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that the Minister of Justice proposes to amend the Act by requiring the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada to ask the Chief Justice of a provincial court to designate a judge of his court who can be spared for the purpose of attending to the duties of an ad hoc judge in the Supreme Court of Canada, and thereupon it will become the duty of the Chief Justice of the Provincial Court to designate such a judge. When so designated, he becomes an ad hoc judge for the purpose of this Act.

Mr. TWEEDIE: What limitations are there as to the particular province in which the Chief Justice shall be requested to make an appointment?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the judge is to supply the place of one of the judges from the province of Quebec, the application will be made to the Chief Justice of the province of Quebec. If the judge is to supply the place of one of those who have been selected in the other provinces, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court would apply to the Chief Justice of the highest court of the other province.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is only in the one exceptional instance where these two things combine, namely, that the judge to be replaced is a judge originally from the province of Quebec, and secondly, that the case to be dealt with came from that province, that it is imperatively required that the Chief Justice shall go to a particular province. The reason for that is obvious: We have to meet the statutory requirements that there shall be two judges appointed from the province of Quebec. With regard to the other provinces, as the Act stands at present, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court might apply to the Chief Justice of any province. It might be desirable to provide that where the judge who had to be replaced came from some province other than Quebec, and the case itself came from some other province than Quebec, in that case the Chief Justice should address himself to the Chief Justice of some of the other provinces. That was what I had in mind. I am not quite certain if that is made absolutely clear in the Bill, but I shall be very glad to make it quite clear if, in the judgment of the committee, that method is thought the most desirable.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Is there any objection to allowing the Governor in Council to make these temporary appointments? In my opinion there is no need to pass legislation which will involve restrictions as to the appointments which may be made by the Chief Justice of a province with the assistance of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. I think if the Governor in Council would simply take the responsibility of making these appointments, in the same way that he makes permanent appointments, our troubles would be at an end.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is hardly proper to speak of these as appointments. It is simply calling upon somebody to perform duties of essentially a temporary character, and if, to meet that requirement, we legislate, as we would have to legislate, to empower the Governor in Council to appoint an ad hoc judge, we should create a situation where an assistant judge was appointed to a specific office and would hold that judicial office for only a limited period of time. I would submit to the committee that it is not desirable to have men act as judges for only a little while—men who are taken from the practice of the profession to sit as judges for perhaps a month or two, and then return to the practice of that profession. I think that would hardly be consistent with the idea, which is a very important and very fundamental one, that judges dealing with cases should be men whose entire work is of a judicial nature—men set apart for that purpose. By the method we propose we secure that the men who will act are men who are already judges, and that the individual man will be designated by the man who is in the best position to judge which one of those judges can be spared to the best advantage, from the point of view of the ordinary business of his court. It is true we might by statute empower the Governor in Council to appoint a man and to select him from among the judges of the other courts, but that would be putting in the hands of the Governor in Council the determination as to which judge in any particular province could best be spared from the judicial work of that province. If you put that power in the hands of the Governor in Council, acting, as it would seem to me he ought to act, if he wanted to act wisely, he would consult, I think, with the Chief Justice of the Court from which he was going to take a judge away; that is one consideration. There is another consideration which I submit is not without importance, and it is this: I think it is undesirable to create a situation where we would have a particular class of appointments— appointments, it is true, not carrying with them any financial remuneration, but still implying the very high honour of being asked to sit in the Supreme Court of Canada— which would be in the hands of the Government of the day to make, and which the Government of the day would be constrained to make as among the judges. Personally I think that would create a situation where it might be suggested that the judges were liable to have ambitions for something which was in the gift of the Government. Anything tending to create that position is undesirable from the point of view of maintaining the principle which I think is of great importance, that the judicial officer should be acting in a position of absolute independence and without anything before his eyes as an object of ambition which is in the gift of the Government of the day. The question whether what is desired to be done had better be done by direct appointment of the Governor in Council or by some such method as we here propose, whereby we leave the designation of the individual who is temporarily to act to the Chief Justices, had very careful consideration before the Bill was introduced. I think that the proposed amendment improves what was originally contemplated, but as regards the choice between the Bill as now proposed to be amended, and a system by which the Governor in Council would make the appointments from among the judges, I must confess that after the best consideration I have been able to give to it, though I would of course defer to the opinion of the committee, it seems to me the balance of advantage is in favour of leaving the selection of the individual to the judicial officer in the very best position to determine who, among the judges, can best be spared. I think that there is a further objection to the appointment of these men coming from the Governor General in Council. If the Governor General in Council designates a man to act as judge ad hoc, in the Supreme Court, and the circumstances are such that he remains in that position for a term or two, and a vacancy then occurs, I think, as human nature is constituted, he finds himself face to face with a gentleman who will think that in some way he has a claim, or a particular right, to be appointed to the vacancy that occurs. That is an undesirable state of affairs. In so far as it is humanly possible, when the Government is called upon to appoint a judge, and particularly a judge of the highest court in the country, it ought to be able to approach the question of who ought to be appointed as free as possible from any claims to preference upon the part of anybody. I have tried to put before the committee the reasons which, as the result of careful consideration, led us to the conclusion that it would be better to have the matter dealt with in this way through the intervention of the existing judges than by the direct action of the Governor General in Council. There are possible objections which may be suggested to the method originally proposed. I have tried to make clear to the committee—I am sorry if I did not make myself heard by everybody—the reason which led us to think that this modification would be an improvement on what was originally proposed.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would like to know if the question of remuneration is dealt with in the Bill and if there is any change in the remuneration which a provincial judge will receive when he is appointed?

Mr. DOHERTY. No, he will receive no additional salary. All he will receive will be his travelling expenses and living allowance just as he would if he went from one city to another to perform the duties of his own court. There is no remuneration attached.

Mr. BUREAU: There are five or six amendments before the Chair which means that the whole section is now being discussed as it was first put before the House. I understand the first part of the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, but not the last part. I suppose they were a repetition of the remarks made to my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Tweedie). The Minister of Justice knows very well that in the province of Quebec certain action has been taken to remedy our judicial system and I have been one of the prominent kickers as to the constitution of our Court of Review. My objection is based upon the fact that our Court of Review is composed of three judges and that these three judges, when they sit in Montreal, are taken from among the judges of the Superior Court of the district of Montreal. Every time there is an appeal before them they have to pass upon the judgment of one of their confreres sitting on the same tribunal. If the appeal is from the judgment of the Superior Court of the district of Quebec, there are three judges chosen from the Superior Court of that district and these same judges for the time being sit as judges of the Appeal Court and have to pass upon the judgment of their confreres. I do not mention this because I have any suspicion about the honesty or righteousness of the judgments of those gentlemen sitting in review but there is a feeling about it among the public. I have often heard it said among business men that they could not understand how it was that these judges should be sitting in the same court. It is only natural that they should consult with one another when a case comes up. My honourable friend the Minister of Justice knows better than any one else, because of his long experience while practising at the bar and while occupying a position on the bench, that judges consult with each other at the court house when an intricate or a new question comes before the court for decision. That being the case, the first objection I take to this Bill is because of the provision it makes with regard to a judge of the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court is a court of exclusive federal jurisdiction. It is a Federal tribunal and when you appeal from any decision of the Exchequer Court you go before the Supreme Court and the first man you want to appoint to the Supreme Court is the man whose judgments are subject to revision by that court.

Mr. DOHERTY: In that case the judge of the Exchequer Court would be unable to sit. If it is necessary we will put in a proper provision. He is not to be applied to if he is absent or unable to sit. If there is any ambiguity about that we will correct anything that would make it possible to ask him to sit in appeal on his own judgment.

Mr. BUREAU: I am sorry if my hon. friend has ever suspected that to be my view. I do not understand the Bill in that way and I do not believe that you would ask the Exchequer Court judge to sit on the bench to pass on his own judgments. It is not the fact that he would expect to sit on his own judgments to which I take exception because I know he would not. He would not be a judge of the Exchequer Court if he went so far, or if he were so wanting in self respect, to sit and pass upon his own judgments. But there is the idea of a judge of the only federal court in Canada with original jurisdiction sitting as a judge of an appeal court which has to pass upon his own judgments. I do not say that he will sit on a case upon which he has already passed but the fact of his being part of the tribunal is not absolutely right. There is a shadow of doubt about it. I have the idea but I cannot express it. Among the judges of a court, as I think my brother lawyers well know, there is a certain solidarity.

Mr. McMASTER: Camaraderie.

Mr. BUREAU: More than camaraderie because when they meet at the court house they consult upon any important or intricate question. Judge So-and-so has given a certain decision and a judge, of course, is anxious to justify his judgments and to have them confirmed by the higher court; therefore judges consult their confreres. There is a close relationship between the judges. I do not think that the judge of the Exchequer court ought to sit as a judge of the Supreme court.

Mr. DOHERTY: Would the suggestion of the hon. gentleman be that it would be better to eliminate the judge of the Exchequer court?

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly not; I do not mean to abolish the Exchequer court.

Mr. DOHERTY: But to eliminate him as a judge to be called upon to act as a judge ad hoc in the Supreme court.

Mr. BUREAU: What I mean is this: instead of appointing a judge of the Supreme Court to investigate all the scandals of the late Government let that judge remain in his own court and attend to the discharge of the duties which are imposed upon him by statute. If a judge falls ill, or the increase in the business of the country demands it, why not increase the number of judges, the same as has been done in the district where I reside? There owing to the industrial growth, the litigation has been increasing, and the existing judges could not overtake the work, and therefore other judges were drawn from Montreal, Arthabaska, and other districts. If litigation is increasing rapidly the first remedy to apply is to return those judges, who are now doing outside work, to the bench of their own court and make them stay there. The second remedy I would suggest is to appoint another judge of the Supreme Court, if the volume of business is too great for the present staff. If that were done it would give great satisfaction. I am confining my remarks to the province of Quebec because I am not familiar with the constitution of the courts in other provinces. Taking that province let me say that there is not a case which goes to the Supreme Court which has not originated from the Superior Court. If my learned friend (Mr. Doherty) is going to take a judge from the Court of King's Bench, the chances are that the case has originated in the Superior Court, and from there has gone to the Court of King's Bench, and the appeal to the Supreme Court is from the Court of King's Bench. The possible exception may be a judge taken from the Circuit Court in Montreal, where the judges have Circuit Court duties exclusively and no other jurisdicion. In my opinion, what is proposed is not a proper way to deal with litigation; the judges of the highest court in the land should be kept absolutely apart from any influence or contact whatsoever with any matter which might weigh with them when they render their decision. In taking this position, however, I want the committee clearly to understand that I do not entertain the slightest suspicion about the character of any of the judges who may be called upon to decide appeals coming before the Supreme Court. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) stated a moment ago that he would like to see an outsider appointed by the Governor General in Council. Speaking for myself, I do not concur in that.

Mr. TWEEDIE: The hon. gentleman did not correctly gather the purport of my remarks.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought my hon. friend wanted an outside barrister appointed by the Governor in Council to act as Supreme Court judge ad hoc.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I said that the Governor in Council should take the responsibility of filling vacancies temporarily, the same as they take the responsibility of making permanent appointments to the Bench, I do not care whether it be a barrister, or a judge of any Superior Court or Exchequer Court.

Mr. BUREAU: With respect to the appointment of an outsider, the Minister of Justice has answered that suggestion. If it is proposed to appoint a judge of the Superior Court for the Supreme Court my position is the same whether he be appointed by the Governor in Council, by the Superior Court, or by the Chief Justice of the Court from which he is drawn. My idea is that Courts of Appeal should not be connected in any way, whether temporarily or otherwise, with any justice or any court of inferior jurisdiction upon whose judgment they have to pass. That is one of the defects I find in our Court of Review, and it is one of the pleas I have been making for a long time that we should have a special Court of Review, composed of three judges. Under the circumstances it will be possible to secure great improvement in the judicial procedure by wise thought and careful deliberation over this matter. Our tribunals ought to be organized in such a manner as to render justice to all litigants in this country. At the present time there may be circumstances which justify the Government in utilizing the knowledge and experience of certain judges in other directions, but such provision would only be temporary, whereas what is proposed by the present legislation is of a permanent character. Now, if it is proposed to enact permanent legislation because of prevailing extraordinary or abnormal conditions, we ought to think twice before we pass such a law. Mr. Justice Duff will conclude the consideration of these war-time appeals some day, and then he will revert to his normal position in the Supreme Court and stay there. Mr. Justice Brodeur will soon recover his health, I hope, and will be able to sit all the time, as heretofore, in the Supreme Court. If the Minister of Justice considers, from the reports made to him, or as a result of his own observations, that the business of the Supreme Court has increased to such an extent as to warrant it, why not do as is done in other courts where the business becomes too great for the judges who have to administer it—why not appoint another judge. That suggestion, I submit, is worthy of the consideration of the committee. I am perfectly indifferent in the matter because I shall not suffer very much whether my suggestion is carried out or not, but I think the principle proposed to be adopted is not —I will not say vicious because that implies a meaning contrary to what I have in mind—is not a correct one, to have a man pass upon the judgment of any of his colleagues who have been acting or sitting in a particular court.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): I agree with the hon. member for Three Rivers in the opinion that it is a great mistake to have judges stepping from one jurisdiction to another. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau) has just mentioned that he is one of the kickers with respect to the Court of Review. Let me say that he is not the only one, but that practically all the lawyers that I know of in the province of Quebec, or in the district of Montreal, are also kickers with respect to that particular court. In French it is styled the Cour de Révision, but many have called it a Court of Confirmation, because its function is to confirm judgments. If we take the record of that court we will find that it allows appeals at the ratio of perhaps one in ten cases. This does not mean that the judgments of the Court of Review are bad. Nor is there any intention in this discussion, as my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) has just said, of casting any reflection on the reputation of the Court of Review. But I maintain that when the Court of Review in Montreal hears from six to eight or ten cases each day for three or four days in succession, the court cannot fully study the records and render to them the attention which they deserve. What is true of the Court of Review should be true of the other courts; but the main point is this: It is not right and proper that judges in one tribunal should sit as judges in another tribunal.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS: We know that such is the case to-day, and any lawyer who practises in the province of Quebec is aware of it also. It is only right that judges should consult among themselves. It is only right that the five judges of the Court of Appeal should consult, but I do not think it is right that the judges of the Superior Court should consult among themselves and after that that their judgments should be revised by other judges of the Superior Court, because it is inevitable that it will often happen that when a judge of the Superior Court consults with his confreres about a case, the same case may come before the Court of Review, and one of the three judges of that court, who has been consulted before, would be sitting in the Court of Review. I do not think that is right or fair. The same principle applies here. My hon. friend has said that this Government is well able to provide the country with judges. I think that if an advertisement were put in the newspapers we could get as many judges as we need; and I do not think that in order to get a supply such a step should be necessary. There are plenty of learned and well-read lawyers in the country out of whom the Government can make judges. I do not want to launch out too far, but perhaps I may go so far as to say that it is bad enough that judges should be named for life, without taking a judge who is appointed for life and who has no account to render to anybody but his own conscience, and transfer him from one court to another. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I follow the leadership of the hon. member for Three Rivers in the conviction that this Bill should not be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee to adopt subsection (1) as amended?

Mr. BUREAU: I understood from the Minister of Justice that his amendment was made only as a matter of courtesy to the Chief Justice of the province of Quebec.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not only to him.

Mr. BUREAU: I understood that.

Mr. DOHERTY: That was one reason; it was not the only reason, nor was it only for the Chief Justice of the province of Quebec. I did mention that it was a matter of courtesy to all the Chief Justices that if a judge was to be taken from their province, they should be asked to designate him.

Mr. BUREAU: As the minister well knows, there are two judicial districts in Quebec covering the whole province. The Chief Justice of the Superior Court, Sir François Lemieux, is now in Quebec, and at other times the Chief Justice may be in Montreal. How would it be to leave to the discretion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, or the senior puisne judge of the Supreme Court, the making of this request either to the Chief Justice of the Superior Court or to the Assistant Chief Justice? While I do not want to be taken as acquiescing in any way in this legislation, because I am dead against it, and consider that it is wrong in principle, if it is going to be enacted I want to get the best procedure that I can, and that is why I make this suggestion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I hardly think there would be any advantage in providing that the acting Chief Justice in the district, say, of Montreal, shall act. Although there is an Acting Chief Justice in the district of Montreal, there is a Chief Justice of the province of Quebec, and he is the Chief Justice of the entire province.

Mr. BUREAU: Supposing he is away?

Mr. DOHERTY: If it is to meet the case of his absence, then perhaps we could provide in his absence for somebody else doing it. There may be some advantage in that. If we carry that out, or it the chief justice——

Mr. BUREAU: Or the assistant chief justice. I do not know how it is in other provinces, but talking with my confreres I think Quebec is the only province with that situation. I understand that in other provinces there is only one judicial district for the whole province. The chief justice, whether in Montreal or Quebec, could take necessary action.

Mr. DOHERTY: The chief justice could undoubtedly draw from the whole province.

Mr. BUREAU: I admit that.

Mr. DOHERTY: If we are going to provide for the case of his absence, we will have to nominate the acting chief justice or the senior puisne judge, because if we are going to foresee it is possible that both will be absent, and if we specifically provide——

Mr. BUREAU: Supposing it happens that you have only one chief justice?

Mr. DOHERTY: In Ontario they have four or five chief justices. They are rich in chief justices in Ontario.

Mr. BUREAU: They are luckier than we are. I was not assuming any knowledge other than that of conditions in my own province. Under the circumstances, how would the Minister of Justice get around it if our chief justice was away or absent from the province of Quebec?

Mr. DOHERTY: If we insert the words "or the acting chief justice," would not that meet such a case?

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose both were away?

Mr. BOYS: We had better make it read "the senior puisne judge."

Mr. DOHERTY: If we make provision for the absence of the chief justice, then we ought to make a provision which will give assurance that there will always be somebody competent to act. Perhaps we might add the words "or acting chief justice, or senior puisne judge," or perhaps it might read "or in the absence of either or both, the senior puisne judge."

Mr. Du TREMBLAY:: Does this Bill not provide for the calling of more than one ad hoc judge at a time?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, there is no power for the calling of more than one ad hoc judge. This is the first time that there has been any provision for an ad hoc judge in the Supreme Court of Canada, and I think that if we make provision to fill the absence of one judge we are, perhaps, going as far as is necessary at present. There are six judges, five being required for a quorum, and, therefore, unless two are incapacitated for some reason, there is no need of resorting to any such provision. I did give thought to the possibility of two being needed, but I came to the conclusion that it would not be wise to create the possibility of more than one ad hoc judge sitting at a time in the Supreme Court.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: The clause does not seem to be very clear on that point. It seems to me that under the Bill more than one judge could be called to replace judges who were absent. A couple of judges of the Superior Court of Quebec might be called, or two or three from other provinces.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the language of the section makes it amply clear that the power is limited to calling for one judge. The Exchequer Court judge is first called upon, and in his absence only one other judge. There is something to be said for the suggestion that power should, perhaps, be extended to the calling of two, but for myself I do not think that desirable. I think it is undesirable except in case of absolute necessity to have sitting in the Supreme Court a judge or judges ad hoc.

Mr. BUREAU: The Minister of Justice has stated my case exactly. I agree that it would be extraordinary if three Supreme Court judges at the same time should not be in a position to sit; therefore, this provision is for the appointment of only one ad hoc judge. The only difficulty that might be experienced in replacing the absent judge would be to comply with the Supreme Court Act in the case of judges from the province of Quebec. If this legislation is passed, I think the minister had better reconstitute the Supreme Court and be able to show whether or not the increase in business justifies an increase in the number of judges, or whether the inclemency of the weather or other circumstances will result in our being obliged to having a spare man in the background for emergencies. I was suggesting that this point should be taken into consideration, and the suggestion of the minister with regard to the provision for the emergency for a judge being absent makes my request a little bit stronger than it was before.

Mr. MORPHY: The member for Three Rivers has raised a very important point.

This Bill has not had the consideration which a measure of its importance should have had. I think that the whole difficulty can be got over if the Government itself will take the responsibility of appointing such judges as may be required—two, or three, if necessary—so that the court may always be properly constituted and so that the difficulty suggested by the member for Three Rivers could not possibly arise. The country would have confidence in the appointments of the Government, and all the difficulties suggested would fade away like a snowball in the hot sun. Let the minister put a provision in the Bill to this effect; let him do away with all these varied conditions which are likely to arise in the case of judges not being present or the case of two being required when only one is provided for. Let the Government take the responsibility so that the business of the country may not be held up at any time for want of a quorum of judges in the Supreme Court of Canada, and so that we shall have a court with, perhaps, more life in it than it has had for a long time past.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I do not think that it is a good principle to adopt that the Government should appoint a judge or judges in special cases when the properly constituted judges are unable to sit. The people would complain of these appointments; they would certainly be displeased, and would not believe it to be a good principle. Moreover, the principle of the Bill in every way is wrong. I support very strongly the suggestion of the member for Three Rivers; let us appoint another judge of the Supreme Court, if necessary. The minister knows well the position of the Superior Court in the province of Quebec; we have no judges to spare, and if any move in the matter of appointment is to be made, a good move would be to appoint someone to that Superior Court. The business of the Quebec courts is suffering, especially during certain months, and I suggest that the Minister of Justice look into the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MORPHY: No.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not wish to be understood as having stated that if any judge was to be taken from any Superior Court or inferior tribunal to sit ad hoc in the Supreme Court, he ought to be appointed by the Governor in Council. I say that judges should not be taken from their jurisdiction. The appointment of judges in such cases by the Governor in Council would be radically bad. The chief justice would at least be able to tell what judge he could dispense with or what judge would have more time to spare than another; while the Governor in Council could not possibly be familiar with any of these conditions.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am heartily in sympathy with the measure brought down by the Minister of Justice. I feel that no man is more competent to express an opinion as to what men should be chosen to sit on cases in the Supreme Court than the chief justice of the court to which the application is made. From the experience which the chief justice has had in dealing with the particular judges of the court, he is, it seems to me, in a position to know who has the most talent, who has the most experience, who is the best versed in law. I readily support the Minister of Justice.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Lemieux moves to further amend clause 1 by adding to line sixteen, after the word "judge" the following words "or the assistant judge." The clause will then read:

—as an ad hoc judge, for such period as may be necessary, of the judge or the asistant judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to appear as being in the position of criticising in any way or suggesting that the assistant judge of the Exchequer Court is not, speaking of him as an individual, in every way thoroughly competent, but I do think it is incongruous that, when we are dealing with providing a judge for the ultimate appellate court of the country, we should, in preference to the chief justices and the judges of all the higher courts of the provinces, call in a gentleman who, however high his qualities, does hold the position of assistant judge in the court to which he has been appointed. I do not wish, as I have said, to suggest that that implies any lack of qualification upon his part, but at the same time it does not seem to me to be desirable that we should take an assistant judge of any court and place him in the position of sitting in the ultimate tribunal. There is also this that might be pointed out as a practical consequence, namely, that you will create a situation in which, although the letter and the spirit of the law is that you fully meet the special system of law in Quebec by providing two judges from that province, you will, in every case, even in cases coming from other provinces, where you need an ad hoc judge —if the judge lacking is from some other province and the cases come from some other province—be compelled to have three judges sitting from the province of Quebec. While we all want to see that the statutory rights are recognized, on the other hand, there is this to be considered from the point of view of the other provinces, that we should not impose upon them the possible absolute necessity of trying the cases in that way. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that there is not anything of sufficient importance involved in his suggested amendment that should prevent him from reconsidering the desirability of insisting upon it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not at all converted by the argument of the minister. It seems to me that the judges of the superior courts of the provinces should, only in exceptional circumstances, be called upon to sit as judges ad hoc in the Supreme Court of Canada. The first call of the chief justice of Canada—and in such case he would have to exercise his own judgment—should be at the Exchequer Court where he has two judges who heretofore would have been members of the Supreme Court; that is to say, under the old system that prevailed they would be members of the Supreme Court, the Exchequer jurisdiction being exercised by the Supreme Court. There he has two judges with exactly the same jurisdiction, except that the one is junior and the other is senior. Having those two men available, you provide for all contingencies and emergencies, and it seems to me, that in the interest of justice, without any additional cost, without any travelling expenses, the chief justice of the Supreme Court should call upon the one or the other. It may be that to-day Sir Walter Cassels is in British Columbia or Mr. Justice Audette is in Prince Edward Island, but at all events there is always one of the two in Ottawa, and the chief justice can call upon either of them to sit as ad hoc judge. It is only under extraordinary circumstances that we should rely on the Superior Courts of the provinces. We should not deprive the provinces of their judges, because, as the minister knows, the courts are generally congested, and they will be congested for a long period of time. The Exchequer Court is sitting in Ottawa. It is admitted that the two judges have equal jurisdiction. It seems to me, therefore, they should be called upon to sit, the one as well as the other. Why should we make this invidious comparison between the chief justice and his assistant? While one is the senior and the other is the junior, they have exactly the same jurisdiction; they hear exactly the same cases; they interpret exactly the same statutes. By permitting the appointment of either of them as ad hoc judge, you would save money and you would save time in emergencies. Let us take a case in point. The minister informed the committee a moment ago that the legal fraternity could not proceed to-day before the Supreme Court because one or two of the judges are away. Mr. Justice Duff is sitting as Central Appeal Judge, and Sir Louis Davies is, I think, ill. The court, therefore, cannot sit. According to this first section, if it is not amended, the chief justice would have to inform, let us say, the chief justice of Ontario, that he is deprived of two of his brother judges on the bench. This would entail some correspondence, and the chief justice of Ontario would have to select two of his judges to sit in the Supreme Court. This means a lot of correspondence and delay, whilst the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada can, by pressing a button in his office, send for one of the two judges of the Exchequer Court and have him sit on that very day. The matter is so clear I am surprised that my good friend the Minister of Justice does not yield to my appeal.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am afraid I would make a poor member of a Union party. Just a moment ago I agreed with the Minister of Justice in saying that I believe the chief justice of the province was the better man to choose the judge. I now find myself in the position of differing from him in his idea of ostracizing one of the two judges of the Exchequer Court. I know the Minister of Justice is not doing this because he feels one is less competent than the other, but simply because the one is the assistant of the other. I support the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) because in choosing one of the members of a certain bench to sit in special cases of the Supreme Court, I do not think it is right to cast the stigma on the other judge on that same bench that, simply because he is assistant judge, he is not qualified to sit with his brother judge and try the cases.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am very sorry indeed that one of my hon. friends should look upon this as being invidious, and the other as casting a stigma or ostracizing. Certainly nothing was farther from my mind. I must confess I fail to grasp why it is considered that there is any ostracism or any reflection whatever cast on the capacity of an individual gentleman, when in enacting a statute it is provided that a man holding another and a different office from his shall be the person called upon to do a particular work. I do not think there is any reflection upon a gentleman because he is an assistant judge while someone else is the judge, nor any reflection because one may be a puisne judge and somebody else a chief justice. It might appear proper, and there are not wanting instances where powers and functions are conferred upon the chief justice as such. Does anybody say that that is a reflection on any one else? I entertain the highest respect for Mr. Justice Audette, and I am very sorry it should be insisted upon that this is in any way intended to cast the slightest reflection upon him. It is not a question of personality at all. Parliament in its wisdom thought it was right that there should not be two judges on absolutely the same footing in the Exchequer Court. Parliament so provided, and the gentleman who holds the position of assistant judge accepted that office and accepted that decision of Parliament. I am very sorry the personal equation should be introduced in a matter in which there is nothing personal at all. Whatever the distinction was that Parliament intended to create between a judge and an assistant judge, when we are dealing with the question whether it is wiser and better for us to call upon someone in some other court to sit in the Supreme Court of Canada, and not to call upon the gentleman who holds the position of assistant judge of the Exchequer Court, I repeat, I am sorry it should be insisted that we are casting any reflection on the assistant judge. For my part there is no reflection intended.

Mr. MOWAT: After the explanation of the Minister of Justice, and the very generous remarks he has made about the assistant judge of the Exchequer Court, showing there is absolutely no personal question in the matter at all, but a distinction created by statute, which should govern, I think the amendment of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve might very well not be insisted on. We know this: the Supreme Court is supposed to represent the great judges of the Dominion. They are all great lawyers, and while men who are not as eminent lawyers as the judges in some of the Supreme Courts of the provinces, may, perhaps, get into the Supreme Court, yet the public looks upon the personnel of the Supreme Court of Canada as comprising the greatest lawyers in the whole Dominion. In this Bill provision is made that the judge of the Exchequer Court shall be the judge to do this work. The question of personality does not enter into the matter at all, and I think it would be a pity, after the minister's explanation, for my hon. friend to insist upon his amendment. I might suggest here what has been in my mind for a long time, and that is that there is no reason why there should be six judges sitting in the Supreme Court of Canada all the time. In the greatest court in the Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, composed of the hardest-headed and best lawyers that ever existed in any country, it does not matter how many judges sit; whether it is seven or only three, the opinions or advice of that tribunal is effective and is held in equal respect. I do not see why there should not be some such system here, whereby, say, four judges could sit equally as well as six. Furthermore, I think I represent the opinion of the vast majority of the bar of all the provinces when I say there are too many individual judgments given in the Supreme Court of Canada. The number of separate judgments given in all our courts is getting to be intolerable, when one has to read through them all to see the small points on which the judges may agree or disagree. It would be far better if the judges would adopt the practice of deputing to one of their number the task of reading the opinion of the majority and, if necessary, the opinion of the dissenting judges, so that we could have a clear-cut statement of the view the majority of the judges took, as well as the view taken by the minority. In the judicial committee of the Privy Council, we lawyers all know that it is a great advantage to get only one judgment; we do not have dissenting judgments there; we have but one judgment, or opinion, or advice, as you may call it, which is the judgment of the whole court. That judgment obtains, no matter how many or what judges sat. That judgment carries to the people in every corner of the British Empire the conclusive opinion of the Privy Council as to what is the law by which they are to be governed. I think it would be an excellent thing, and it would relieve the Supreme Court and the country of the great expense which is now proposed by providing for an ad hoc judge, if the court were to give two opinions, one declaratory of the law, the other of dissent, and then it would not matter how many judges sat. It would avoid the necessity of bringing in an ad hoc judge with all its attendant embarrassments.

Mr. BOYS: As I understand it, the amendment proposes to insert after the word "judge" in line 16, the words "or assistant judge," and to make a change in the next line by saying "or should they be absent." It seems to me to come down to this: These changes would render almost useless the following language in the section, for as I understand it, either the judge of the Exchequer Court, or the assistant judge thereof is always present in Ottawa, and in consequence no other ad hoc judge would be designated. I think that would be undesirable, because you might get a case like this—in an appeal from the province of Ontario, two regular judges of the Supreme Court might be unavailable; you would then require an ad hoc judge. The judge of the Exchequer Court might be absent, in which case the assistant judge, Mr. Justice Audette, would be called upon to preside. You might then have the Supreme Court constituted of three judges from the province of Quebec trying an appeal from the province of Ontario. I do not think that would be any more desirable than having three or more judges from the province of Ontario, or some province other than Quebec trying an appeal from the province of Quebec. It seems to me that the section as worded is more desirable than as proposed to be amended by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) were to have the consequences which have just been pointed out by my hon. friend (Mr. Boys) I would altogether agree with him. This takes us back to the formation of the court. Section 6 of the Supreme Court Act reads as follows:

> Two at least of the judges shall be appointed from among the judges of the Court of King's Bench, or of the Superior Court, or the barristers or advocates of the Province of Quebec.

What is the reason of that exceptional provision? When the Act was passed in 1875 establishing the Supreme Court there was great objection in many of the provinces, in Quebec particularly, to having the Supreme Court constituted as a court of appeal to pass upon provincial laws. Many held, as I did myself—I was a young member then—that it would be better to have a court of appeal, to be known as the Supreme Court, to pass upon the laws of the Dominion alone. But a contrary opinion prevailed and it was made a court of appeal for all the provinces. The province of Quebec, not being under the common law but under the civil law, it was thought fair that two judges of the court should at least be versed in the civil law and not in the common law only. That, I think, was a wise provision. If the effect of this amendment were to be that three judges versed in the civil law would have to pass upon a case from the province of Ontario, which is under the common law, it would be very unfair. If that should be the consequence I would advise my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Lemieux) not to press his amendment. But, let us look at the Bill. The Bill provides that if there is a judge ad hoc to be appointed, the first choice should fall upon a judge resident in Ottawa. Everybody can understand the advantage of having a judge resident in Ottawa. There come here lawyers from all parts of the country, from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia, their time is precious; of a sudden a judge cannot sit, the court has no quorum and it is indispensable that the quorum should be filled at once so that it can go on with its business. The first thing that happens is that the judge of the Supreme Court takes a judge sitting in Ottawa—the judge of the Court of Exchequer. If there is no judge in the Exchequer Court available, the chief justice of the Supreme Court, or in his absence the senior puisne judge, has to seek one elsewhere. If you say that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court shall have the power to address himself, first, to the judge of the Exchequer Court, or, if for any reason he is unable to act, then to the assistant judge or to a judge of any provincial Superior Court, leaving a discretion open to the Chief Justice to call either for the Exchequer Court judge or the assistant judge or for a judge in any of the different provinces, the difficulty is obviated.

Mr. BOYS: That is not the wording of the section as amended by the hon. member for Maisonneuve.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear. I agree, but I repeat what I said at the beginning: If the wording is such that the possible consequence might be that three judges from the province of Quebec could not be avoided, or if we should have to take the judgment of three judges from that province, I would advise my hon. friend, (Mr. Lemieux) not to press his amendment because it would not be fair nor in accordance with the principle which was embodied in the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. BOYS: I understand that the chief justice of the Exchequer Court is away most of the time which would mean that the assistant judge would be called upon to act as the ad hoc judge.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It would be sufficient to say in the Bill that the judge of the Supreme Court should have discretion to call either the judge of the Exchequer Court, or the assistant judge or a provincial judge. I am sure that the judge of the Supreme Court would always see that there were not more than two judges from the province of Quebec on the bench. If we would not trust to his discretion in that regard it might easily be provided for but I do not see why there should be that exclusion, mentioned by the Minister of Justice and by my hon. friend from Simcoe, of the assistant judge of the court of exchequer.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think it is susceptible of question that, with the amendment in, the provision will reach the results pointed out by the hon. member for Simcoe because, if we leave it as it stands now and add the amendment of the hon. member from Maisonneuve, it will be imperative for the chief justice of the Supreme Court, before he asks for any provincial judge, to take either the judge of the Exchequer Court or the assistant judge of the Exchequer Court. If the judge of the Exchequer Court be away it will be imperative upon the chief justice to take the assistant judge. If the absent judge who had to be replaced was a judge from a province other than Quebec you would have three gentlemen, all of them originally versed in the civil law of Quebec, sitting. If I seized rightly the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition it was that we should remove from the chief justice the obligation in any case of taking the Exchequer Court judge and leave to him freedom to say whether he will call on the Exchequer Court judge or whether he will call upon the assistant judge, or whether he will call upon the chief justice of a province to give him a judge. As the Bill stands now, with the amendment as suggested this afternoon, it has the effect of leaving the chief justice no choice as to the individual judge. His duty is to call upon the Exchequer Court judge. If the Exchequer Court judge is not available then it becomes his duty to call upon the chief justice of one of the provinces to furnish him with a judge. If we accept the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition we put the chief justice of the Supreme Court in this position: the judge of the Exchequer court is here and the assistant judge is here. If for any reason the chief justice would rather have a provincial judge he will be put in the position of having to make an invidious distinction by having it placed in his hands to select either of these two judges or by passing them over to ask for a provincial judge. I hardly think it is fair to put the chief justice of the Supreme Court in the position of having to decide as between individuals. As it stands at the present time his duty is all marked out for him. Hs asks for the judge of the Exchequer Court. It is not because he wants to do it but because the law says he has to do it. Failing him, he has to ask the chief justice of a province to furnish him with a judge.

Mr. MORPHY: Will it be competent for the provincial chief justice to furnish him with the assistant judge of the Exchequer Court according to the meaning of this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not as the law is worded now, and it would perhaps be a little anomalous for the chief justice of a court, say in British Columbia, to designate the assistant judge of the Exchequer Court for any particular duty. I am afraid to do so would be to introduce confusion into the operations of the Bench. While I am quite prepared to admit the force of the different objections that have been made from that point of view, from the best consideration I have been able to give the matter up to the present time, I am still disposed to think that the section as amended perhaps meets all the exigencies of the case, and I would like to repeat that it could not be interpreted as implying any reflection upon the gentleman who happens to be assistant judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (Simcoe, S.): There are only two Exchequer Court Judges for the whole of Canada, and it seems to me that if this amendment be carried we may have this result: It will be some months yet before Mr. Justice Duff may be liberated from his duties as Central Appeal Judge, and be free to return to the Supreme Court. Now if one of the two Exchequer Court Judges should be required elsewhere, it might have the effect of causing a congestion in the Exchequer Court, and tying up business there. That is the reason I would not be disposed to favour my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Supposing that one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the province of Quebec is ill, and has to be replaced, does not some objection arise there?

Mr. MORPHY: I quite agree that there should be a provision in this Bill that where an ad hoc judge is to be chosen, he should be appointed from the province from which the judge whom he is to replace comes. I gathered from the remarks of the Minister of Justice that he really intended that, but I find no provision in the Bill which makes it plain. I quite agree that in case of an appeal from the province of Quebec there should be two judges from that province; but there is no interference with that arrangement because it is a statutory provision anyway.

Mr. DOHERTY: As far as regards existing legislation, the proviso is quite clear in its terms if the case is a Quebec case and the absent judge is a Quebec judge. As regards the other provinces, I am quite in the hands of the Committee as to what is the wisest course to pursue. All the other provinces have a common system of common law; Quebec is the only province which has a distinct common law system of its own. Now would there be any advantage in having an Ontario judge because a case comes from Ontario, or in having an Alberta judge because a case comes from Alberta? Both of these judges will be men versed and trained in the same common law. I must say that if it were not for this exceptional system of law which prevails in the province of Quebec, I would not dream of making any exception in the case of that province; it would probably be an advantage that the judge who is to go to the Supreme Court of Canada to try a case coming from Quebec should be a judge from some other province, because then we would avoid the suggested objections of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) of a possible relationship between judges from the same province who have been associated in the same court. Similarly with regard to the province of Ontario, if you could have an outstanding lawyer, trained and brought up in that province's system of common law, but who has had no relations with the judges upon whose judgments he is sitting in appeal, I think it would be a desirable thing. If it is considered that any advantage would be gained by getting a man from the same province I would not be disposed to strenuously oppose it, although I think it is wiser to leave the field as wide as it can be left.

Amendment negatived.

On subsection 2—Evidence of appointment.

Mr. Doherty moved to amend the subsection by adding after the word "judge" in the second line, "and where a judge of a provincial court is designated, the act of the letter designating him."

Amendment agreed to.

On subsection 3—Duties.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move the following words be added in the second line after the word "requested," "or has been so designated."

Mr. McMASTER: Should the word "or" in the phrase "or any conference" not be "on?"

Mr. DOHERTY: No. In that event he will get nothing when he attends a sitting of the court.

Mr. BUREAU: Would not the request be sufficient? A designation would correspond to a request.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. But if he is a provincial judge he cannot attend merely on the request. The Exchequer Court judge will attend simply on the request of the chief justice of the Supreme Court. But a judge coming from any other court, in order to be entitled to sit, must come in consequence of the request of the chief justice of the Supreme Court addressed to his chief justice, and the designation coming to him from his chief justice is the authority upon which he attends. And for that reason I thought it wise to say in the Bill "a judge who attends a sittings of the Supreme Court on such request or upon such designation." Then the reason why we say "or any conference of the judges" is in order that the judge so attending may get his travelling expenses, not only when he comes to attend a sittings of the court, but also when he comes to attend a conference of the judges with regard to the rendering of the judgment.

Mr. BOYS: Would it not make it plainer if you said "an ad hoc judge" and left out the words "on such request" in the second line of the section?

The CHAIRMAN: I would suggest that the words "on such request or upon such designation" be added after the word "who." The wording would then be: "A judge who, upon such request or upon such designation, attends a sittings of the Supreme Court or any conference of the judges called for the consideration of judgments," and so on.

Mr. BOYS: Would it not simplify it still more to strike out the words "on such request" in the second line, and to begin the subsection with the words "an hoc judge?"

Mr. DOHERTY: That will be all right.

The CHAIRMAN: The section as amended now reads:

An ad hoc judge who attends a sittings of the Supreme Court or any conference of the judges called for the consideration of judgments in cases in which he sat, shall be paid his travelling expenses and shall receive a per diem allowance for living expenses of ten dollars for each day that he is necessarily absent from his place of residence, as provided by section eighteen of the Judges Act.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection (2)—Valuations in assessment appeals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: This amendment deals with appeals of a special nature provided for by section 41 of the Supreme Court Act, which provides that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from the judgment of any court of last resort created under provincial legislation to adjudicate concerning the assessment of property for provincial or municipal purposes, in cases where the person, or persons, presiding over such court is, or are, by provincial or municipal authority authorized to adjudicate, and the judgment appealed from involves the assessment of property at a value of not less than ten thousand dollars. This is an appeal especially with regard to the assessment of property for provincial and municipal purposes, and, as will be seen, provides for a general right of appeal if the value of the property is not less than ten thousand dollars. I understand that in certain of the provinces there have been constituted assessment boards, who have been constituted the final valuators or judges without further appeal, or which are courts of last resort practically for valuations of this sort. It is not proposed to withdraw the appeal in cases of judgments or determinations of such valuations, but to add a proviso to the effect that the Supreme Court of Canada shall not disturb or vary the judgment unless it is satisfied that in fixing or affirming it such court of last resort in the province has proceeded upon an erroneous principle, and, instead of its fixing the amount of the assessment, which in its opinion should be varied, the court may remit the case to the court of last resort in the province to fix the same according to the principle which the court declares to be applicable. In other words, there is not to be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada for the mere purpose of valuating or estimating values. If this proviso be added to the section, the court is not to disturb the judgment merely upon the simple question of valuation if it finds in the principles upon which the original courts have proceeded that there is no error.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that not the present jurisprudence?

Mr. DOHERTY: That principle is very generally laid down, but inasmuch as these very questions themselves are questions of valuation, and that there is a special section giving an appeal in this particular kind of valuation, it did appear that there was room for the suggestion that since the cases are cases that involve nothing but valuations, and the especial appeal is created for them, there might be the inference that the intention is that the Supreme Court should substitute itself as a valuator pure and simple.

Mr. BUREAU: Would that be a limitation of the prerogative of the court?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will be a limitation of its power, certainly.

Mr. BUREAU: Why should we do that?

Mr. DOHERTY: Because it seems to me that so long as you keep this to the exclusive question of valuation with no principle involved at all, and the province has provided for a board to make that valuation in the place itself, and has determined that in its judgment that valuation ought to be final, the Supreme Court of Canada seems to be rather a peculiar body to substitute as a board of valuators for the exclusive purpose of correcting valuations, in portions of the country which, in a large number of cases, the judges, even if they were expert valuators, are not at all familiar with, and it seems to me, as suggested by the right hon. gentleman, that it is only clearing, where the case is purely on a question of valuation, the right of the court to decide what it practically, I think, decides in the great number of cases, that is to say of ordinary appeals, that it will not interfere where it is a question purely and simply of estimating values and there is no error whatever in the principle upon which the court below proceeded.

As for its being derogatory to the prerogative of the court, I shall be disclosing no secret if I say that the court itself desires in the strongest possible way that this legislation shall be enacted. As the result of its experience it is very much impressed with what I am trying to point out: that it is not the best body in the world to perform the pure and simple operation of the valuation of property.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—courts of final resort:

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this amendment is to subject appeals from all the provinces to the same rules and restrictions that are imposed upon appeals from Ontario; to assimilate the law determining in what class of cases there shall be appeal in all the provinces other than Quebec. As the law now stands, certain restrictions are imposed on the right of appeal from Quebec, and certain restrictions on the right of appeal from Ontario, those effective in the former case being greater than those effective in the latter. The other provinces remain under the general provision of section 36 of the Act, which provides that, except as otherwise provided, appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any final judgment of the highest court of final resort now or thereafter established in any province of Canada, whether such court be a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction, in cases in which the court of original jurisdiction is a superior court. But there is no limitation, for instance, as regards amount. In Ontario there is no right to appeal from a judgment of last resort unless the amount involved on the appeal be at least $1,000, or unless the case comes within the limited category of cases provided in section 48. The effect of this provision is to assimilate the law in regard to the right of appeal in all the provinces other than Quebec, and that assimilation is brought about by subjecting them all to the same limitations that are presently imposed on the right of appeal from Ontario. I understand that when the restrictions were imposed on Ontario and not on the other provinces, it was largely because in all or in the majority of the other provinces at that time there was no distinct and separate Court of Appeal, appeals within the province being from a judge of the court to the court itself in banc. In all the provinces now, with the exception of Nova Scotia, there is a separate and distinct Court of Appeal, so that there seems to remain no reason why there should be a distinction between the conditions respecting the right of appeal from Ontario and those respecting the right of appeal from the other provinces. It is possible that Nova Scotia will at no very remote period be put on the same footing with regard to the existence of a separate Court of Appeal as the other provinces.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, and amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the Bill be read the third time?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood from the leader of the Opposition last week that he would be willing to facilitate the passage of the Bill in time for next week, and I should be glad if the Bill could be read the third time now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The objection was made by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy.)

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the hon. member for North Perth is satisfied.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY EQUIPMENT AND MATERIALS.

ACQUIREMENT BY MINISTER OF RAILWAYS FOR CANADA DURING THE PRESENT WAR.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, Minister of Railways and Canals, the House went into Committee, Mr. Boivin in the Chair, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that during the present war and for one year thereafter, the Minister of Railways and Canals, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may acquire engines, cars, rails and other railway equipment and materials, and may sell, lease or otherwise dispose of any such equipment to any Canadian railway company or companies upon such terms and conditions as may be approved by the Governor in Council, and may defray all expenditure made hereunder out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada; and that for the payment in whole or in part of any such equipment the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may issue equipment notes or other obligations or securities, or may guarantee the principal and interest of any securities issued by any company approved by the Governor in Council; and the times and manner of the issue of such securities, and the forms and terms thereof or of any trust deed, lease or other instrument incidental thereto, and the trustees, shall be approved by the Governor in Council, and the provisions of section four of chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1907 shall apply to any instrument relating to such equipment executed under the terms hereof, and such securities shall be made payable by instalments, the last instalment to be made payable on or before the expiry of ten years from the issue thereof; and further, to provide that the Minister may transfer to the Canadian Government Railways any equipment so acquired, and in such event there shall be charged to the accounts of the said railways such amounts as may properly be chargeable herefor, and the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act shall, as far as applicable, extend to the accounts and charges incurred hereunder.

Mr. REID: I may explain the necessity for this legislation. Owing to the Government taking over the Canadian Northern railway, and owing to the Government requiring more equipment for the Government railway system, and then, on account of the war, owing to the other railways requiring equipment, it is necessary for the Government to purchase and finance this equipment. In doing so, we wish to have the power, after purchasing it, to lease or sell it to railways, other than the Government railways, that may require further equipment. In purchasing this equipment, we wish to be in the same position as other railways are at the present time in making such purchases. For instance, other railway corporations, such as the Canadian Pacific, or the Canadian Northern, or the Grand Trunk, are in a position to issue equipment bonds and in that way not pay the full purchase price of the equipment at the time delivery is made. By issuing equipment bonds they can spread the payment over a term of years. It certainly makes it very difficult for the Government to finance the purchase of equipment when it is called upon to pay a very large amount in one year at the present time. For instance, last year the Department of Railways and Canals ordered 150 engines and six or seven thousand cars. We put the amount in the estimates, and of course we were compelled to pay the amount of the equipment delivered last year. We received the equipment, and we leased a portion of it to the Grand Trunk railway system and a portion to the Canadian Northern railway system. The Canadian Pacific railway got four or five of our large engines, and the other engines went to the Canadian Government railways. If we had not purchased that equipment, we would have been in a very serious position during last winter on account of not having sufficient motive power. It was, therefore, a good thing that we ordered the engines last year. The other day we had, in order to protect the transportation situation during the coming winter and for the future, on account of the heavy movement of troops and so on, to give orders for a very large quantity of engines, cars and other railway equipment. We had to order 100,000 tons of rails that will cost five or six million dollars. We want to be in this position that we can pay for the equipment and then transfer it to other companies by way of sale or lease. The purchase of the items that come under this Bill is all done in the regular way by tender and Order in Council, and any lease or sale is done by Order in Council in the usual way.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is any part of the $500,000,000 loan to be effected under the Bill introduced by the Prime Minister to be used for purchasing any of this equipment?

Mr. REID: No, this is a regular operation, irrespective of any war measure at all.

Mr. DEVLIN: I find in the Canadian Daily Record of Saturday, March 23, 1918, a paper published by the Canadian Records office for the boys in the trenches, this article:

> Record railroad order, Government places contract of $22,500,000 value, mostly cars for Canadian Northern railway.
>
> (Daily Record Cablegram), Ottawa, Friday.
> One of the largest railroad equipment orders ever placed in Canada has just been given by the Dominion Government. The order totals $22,500,000, the bulk of it being for cars for the Canadian Northern railway. The Canadian Car and Foundry Company, of Montreal, receives about $16,000,000 worth of orders, which will be distributed between several subsidiary companies at Montreal and Hamilton and in Nova Scotia.

Will the minister state what other companies are to have the balance of the orders totalling $22,500,000?

Mr. REID: This is the equipment that we have ordered. In the first place, we have ordered 150 engines, that is divided between the two companies in Kingston and Montreal. That disposes of the question of engines. In regard to other equipment, we ordered 5,000 forty-ton steel frame box cars from the Canada Car and Foundry Company. They are dividing that order amongst the plants at Fort William, Montreal and Amherst. We ordered 1,000 forty-ton steel frame box cars from the National Steel Car Company. We gave them an order for 1,000 cars a year ago, and up to the present time they have delivered about one-half, but they say that they will, about the first of May, deliver the balance of those cars ordered last year, and that they will have this last order of 1,000 ready by the fall.

Mr. DEVLIN: Where is that company?

Mr. REID: The National Steel Car Company, Hamilton. We ordered 750 forty-one foot, forty ton flat cars and 650 fifty ton coal cars from the Eastern Car Company. That is all they said they could handle. We ordered from the Hart Otis Company 250 Hart Otis side dump cars and 200 Hart Otis side and centre dump cars. Those are all we wanted of those types. We ordered from the Pressed Steel Car Company, I think of Pittsburg, or some other American point, 25 general service tank cars, that is oil tank cars.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that the only American order so far?

Mr. REID: Yes. That was the only company that tendered for those cars or that could build them. We also ordered from that company 25 water service tank cars. From the Canada Car and Foundry Company we ordered 250 refrigerator cars. From the Pullman Car Company we ordered fourteen sleeping cars and seven dining cars. No company in Canada wanted orders for those cars at the present time. From the Montreal Locomotive Works we ordered 50 consolidated freight engines and 10 switching engines. From the Canada Locomotive Company we ordered thirty Pacific type engines, 60 Mikado type engines, six switching engines and four narrow gauge superheated engines.

Mr. DEVLIN: What is the total amount of those orders?

Mr. REID: $32,966,515.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is that the total amount of orders given within the last year?

Mr. REID: That is, so far as my memory serves me, the total amount. When I say within the last year, probably it was about the first of April or the first of May when we gave last year's orders.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The only objection I have is that we are giving carte blanche to the Minister of Railways to order equipment to any amount. Will the Bill contain any limit beyond which the minister shall not go? Can the minister give the House an approximate idea of the amount that will be involved by these operations in the course of the next fiscal year?

Mr. REID: $32,600,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the amount be mentioned in the Bill?

Mr. REID: No, it is not mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: However reasonable the minister's explanation may have been, he will understand that this is a very large order. Why not insert in the Bill an amount a few thousand dollars more than the minister thinks he will require, so that he would be within the mark.

Mr. REID: It is very difficult for me to name a certain amount. We have taken over the Canadian Northern railway, and people in all the provinces are urging us to take over more lines. These railways, if taken over, will want equipment, and we would not buy equipment if it were not needed; we shall buy no more than is absolutely necessary.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at 8 o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) said that he was asking for this resolution on account of the Government having acquired the Canadian Northern and other railways, that it was now their purpose to purchase engines, cars and rails; and that, in order to finance these purchases, the minister required legislation authorizing him to issue equipment notes. The inference I gathered from the statement of the minister was, that, in his judgment, the men who will sell to the Government of Canada the engines, cars or rails, would consider a mortgage on this property of greater value than national bonds.

Mr. REID: No, that is wrong.

Mr. ROBB: Why, then, is it necessary to obtain this legislation? Why cannot the minister, if he desires to purchase this rolling stock, pay for it as we have paid for dredges or steamboats in the past? That is something I would like to have cleared up. I am not at all objecting to the policy of purchasing engines and cars. Indeed, the minister will remember that I myself advanced the idea, a couple of years ago, that the trouble we had experienced in the past in getting the grain crop moved from the West was due to the fact that we were short of engines and cars. It was suggested from this side of the House that the Government might very well consider the possibility of purchasing engines and cars and leasing them to the roads at a time when they might require them. Certainly, the minister created in my mind the idea that in his judgment these equipment bonds would be more acceptable to the parties selling this rolling stock than bonds of the national treasury, and I think it would be well to have that cleared up.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member (Mr. Robb) must have misunderstood my explanation. What I wanted to say was that the several railways—the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern—required extra equipment in the way of cars, engines and rails. At the present time these railways are not allowed to put out loans. If they purchase equipment and issue bonds they cannot go on the money market of the United States and sell those equipment bonds, they are not allowed to do it by the United States Government. The British Government will not allow them to raise money in the United States. They have to get the consent of the Canadian Government to put their bonds on the Canadian market. In order to protect the public and the railways we are purchasing equipment of all kinds. When we purchase the equipment we pay for it, but we take the equipment bonds of the railway company, for instance, the Grand Trunk, and dispose of them at the proper time. The money will come back in that way. The conditions which I have explained are attributable to the war, and the Bill which I purpose to introduce will make provision for a term during the present war and for one year thereafter. The financing conditions are a little difficult, but the Government can take the equipment bonds from the railway, purchase the equipment and at the proper time dispose of the equipment bonds. We ordered a hundred thousand tons of rails the other day. Part of that order is going to the Grand Trunk railway, several hundred miles to the Canadian Pacific, some to the Canadian Northern and some to another railway in Quebec owned by the Delaware and Hudson. We will be able to sell the rails to the Canadian Pacific, and they will pay the money immediately. The Grand Trunk and some of the others may not be able to do this, and we will have to take their securities. This Bill is for that purpose and no other. When we get into committee honourable members will see the Bill, and it will perhaps be easier to understand it. The clauses of the Bill give information that probably the resolution does not.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has not quite cleared up the point I raised. I understand him now to say that the Government are to take the equipment notes or bonds of these several railways, guarantee them, I suppose, and give them in payment of the rolling stock. The legislation asked for authorizes the Government itself to issue equipment bonds. Does the minister consider these equipment bonds of greater value than national bonds issued in the ordinary way?

Mr. REID: If it were for the Canadian Northern we might issue equipment bonds. I do not consider them better. No man would admit that; no bonds in the world are better than Canadian Government bonds. But it is the custom of the railways to issue equipment bonds. I do not say it will be necessary to issue Canadian Northern equipment bonds but they can be issued and if on account of our taking over the Canadian Northern railway it is necessary for us to guarantee the equipment bonds issued by that company, there is no reason why we should not do it, because we own the Canadian Northern now. We are not asking for any powers here other than we should receive in connection with the operation of these railway systems. That is the opinion I get from the lawyers and solicitors who understand everything that is necessary in carrying on the operation of a railway.

Mr. SHEARD: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister—and I ask simply for information, not wishing to be critical—if, in his opinion, this resolution is not broad enough to authorize the purchase of the whole of a railway excepting the right of way, and, if the Government at any time saw fit, would it not be possible to convey that railway to any other corporation? I ask the question because I understand this resolution is preparatory to a Bill being introduced based upon the resolution.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Bill gives the answer to the question asked by the hon. member. It states that notwithstanding anything in the Act, or in any other statute or law, the minister, during the present war and for one year thereafter, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may acquire directly or indirectly, or assist in acquiring, engines, cars, rails and other railway equipment and material hereinbefore called equipment, and so forth. This explains that the resolution relates only to equipment.

Mr. CAHILL: It seems to me that before this resolution passes, the Government should give the House a statement of its proposed policy with regard to the railway situation in Canada, which is undoubtedly one of the gravest problems with which we have to deal. We are told by the minister that the Government has taken over the Canadian Northern railway, but I understand that there is at the present time an arbitration board sitting in Toronto valuing the stock of that railway. If such is the case, the road has not been actually taken over by the Government.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: We have acquired five-sixths of the total shares of the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. CAHILL: But as a matter of fact the railway has not yet been taken over. I sincerely hope when it is taken over its administration will not be placed in the hands of a minister of the Crown, because this is entirely too big a proposition to be handled by any minister, the administration of nine thousand miles or more of railway, with the thousands of employees. I believe the argument has been used that the Canadian Northern is being taken over on the strength of the recommendations contained in the Drayton-Acworth report. One of the recommendations in that report is as follows:

> We do not consider that the operation by a minister directly responsible to Parliament would be in the public interest; it would not secure better service or lower rates. We therefore reject the idea of direct Government ownership and operation.

Before the Government asks for this blank cheque, so to speak, for the purchase of equipment for roads which either are now owned by the Canadian people or may be acquired as the hon. minister suggested, we should have a statement from the Government as to what their intended policy is. The minister suggested that other railroads may be bought because every province in the Dominion was asking that that be done. When the Drayton-Acworth investigation was undertaken, we are told the men in charge had to take inexperienced men to make a valuation of the road. On the recommendation of these inexperienced men, after an investigation of six or eight weeks which should properly have taken a year, we are being asked to take over some nine thousand miles at a cost of five or six hundred millions of dollars; and it is now further proposed that we should hand the Minister of Railways a blank cheque to expend the balance of the country's money. Before this is done we ought to know something more about the proposition. There is no question but that our railway condition in Canada to-day is a very bad one, and it will be very much worse judging by existing circumstances. I cannot see how we can possibly manage this great railway system without placing thoroughly experienced railway men at its head, and in my opinion we should hesitate to authorize the expenditure of such great sums of money for equipment and new purchases.

In connection with the purchasing of other railways, we have the statement of the Drayton-Acworth report, in which it is stated that the Mackenzie and Mann interests had no equity in the stock. Nevertheless we find that a board of arbitration is sitting for the purpose of valuing the stock. Either we should or we should not accept the Drayton-Ackworth report. What is being done with the railway situation? Personally, I am strongly opposed to spending one dollar of Canadian money on these railway propositions as long as the system is to be left in the hands of a minister of the Crown. I think that such a policy will lead Canada, as well as the Government, into grave difficulties. I think the situation is one that merits the best consideration of the greatest railway authorities in Canada, and the fact that representations are coming from other provinces in favour of our assuming other railways should should bring home to the Government the actual condition of railway affairs in this country. It would seem to me a good plan to appoint a commission of practical railway men to review the whole railway situation of this country and see if something cannot be done to put our railway systems in such a position that they can be financed and carried along, and not literally "eat us up" as they are apparently doing now. I venture to make the prediction that if conditions continue as they are, if the management of the Canadian Northern railway remains in the hands of a minister of the Crown for two years more, public ownership of railways will be killed for a long time in this country, because the railway systems will get into such a condition that nobody in this country will want to hear any more about Government ownership or public ownership of railways. I know nothing about the abilities or capabilities of the present Minister of Railways, but I do know that he is not a railway man. The railway situation in this country should be handled by practical railway men, and until we take that step I am afraid we shall be heading for a bad state of affairs in the Dominion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the purport of the resolution before the committee was to empower the Government to acquire further railway systems in Canada, the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat might be quite pertinent and well worthy of consideration. But that is not the object of the present resolution, which is simply to enable the Government to assist in the purchase of rolling stock for some of the railway systems in which we are interested.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What railway systems?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will come to that in a moment. It is hardly fair, I think, to expect a declaration of the Government's policy on a resolution of this character, because that would hardly fall within the scope of the resolution. The Minister of Railways will be going into supply almost at the first opportunity, and then, I think, the House would be entitled to some statement as to the Government's policy with respect to the railways of this country.

Now, what is the position of the Government in respect of the railways systems in Canada. In the first place, we are the sole owners of the Intercolonial railway known as the Canadian Government railway system. As far as the Canadian Northern railway is concerned, we have acquired practically all the shares of that system, and a commission is now conducting an inquiry at Toronto to determine the value of the equity of redemption of the shareholders. The maximum amount of the equity was fixed at ten million dollars, so that any amount which Canada may be called upon to pay by that commission cannot exceed that sum. Nevertheless, at this moment we are in possession of the shares of the company and that railway system is under our control. A certain number of the board of directors have been nominated by the Government, and to all intents and purposes it is a railway system belonging to the Government. Hon. gentlemen know that the road is not financially strong and that in one way or another it must be assisted for many years to come by the Government in order that it may carry on the ordinary functions of a railway system. At the last session of Parliament an Act was passed enabling the Government to pay an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 to meet obligations maturing during the year, to pay interest, and to supply such equipment as was necessary to carry on the operations of that road; and, during the year, that amount of money was advanced by the Government to the Canadian Northern railway. A similar Bill, not quite exactly the same, will be submitted to Parliament this session. There are obligations of the Canadian Northern railway maturing this year to the extent of $78,000,000 which we must care for in some way or other, because that railway system belongs to this country.

The purpose of this resolution, however, is to enable the Government to assist the railway systems in which it is interested directly and indirectly, and to assist some roads in which it is not interested at all as owners to secure sufficient rolling stock so that the trade and commerce of this country can be carried on unimpeded and without loss to the citizens of Canada. Last year hon. gentlemen know the traffic of this country was seriously tied up at many times, and it would be a very serious matter, indeed, if at any time in these days the traffic of Canada could not be moved by our railway systems. While it is a very difficult thing, and quite embarrassing in these days, for a government to be called upon to finance to such a large amount as forty or fifty million dollars any of our railway systems, still for the common good, and in order that the commercial strength of this country may not be impaired, we must do it in one form or another. The Minister of Railways has already intimated to the committee that it is desirable to purchase rolling stock for the Intercolonial railway, the Canadian Northern railway, the Grand Trunk Pcificè and the Grand Trunk system itself. None of these roads, outside of the Intercolonial, is in a position to finance the purchase of the equipment which they severally require, therefore the obligation falls upon the Government to assist them.

Now, for the Government to purchase this equipment, involving such a vast amount as was indicated by the Minister of Railways, and at the same time carry on our civil and war expenditures, entails quite a serious burden upon this country, and very naturally the Government are anxious to devise some other method of financing these expenditures if it is possible, and in a manner that will not entail any larger outgo of revenue than is absolutely necessary. Therefore, the Minister of Railways proposes by this resolution to purchase rolling stock on behalf of all the roads which I have mentioned.

Mr. DEVLIN: And others.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Well, there would be no others. They might be limited by name, but that would be hardly necessary. The Minister of Railways proposes, as a matter of fact, to purchase and has in fact already ordered, rolling stock for the Intercolonial Railway system, the Canadian Northern system, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How much for each?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot distribute the figures among the several systems, but the Minister of Railways can do that. This rolling stock will be distributed among the several railway systems which I have mentioned according to their necessities. This, as I have already said, will involve a very large expenditure, and if the Department of Railways can finance this operation by the sale of equipment bonds, it necessarily entails less financial outgo on the part of the Government, and I submit to the committee in all fairness that this is a very fair, proper and businesslike arrangement in all the circumstances of the case.

Further, the resolution asks that the Government may guarantee equipment notes issued by any company for the purchase of rolling stock. Now, perhaps I can best illustrate the purpose and intention of the resolution upon that point by pointing out to the committee that the Canadian Northern railway will require, I think, about $30,000,000 worth of rolling stock. While the Government of Canada own that railway, still our ownership is evidenced merely by the possession of the shares of the company; the corporate entity still exists as the owner of the road. It may be that, later on, the rolling stock ordered by the Minister of Railways may be acquired to the extent of twenty-five or thirty million dollars by the Canadian Northern railway, and it will issue against that rolling stock so acquired equipment bonds which it will sell in the Canadian market, or in the American market if it can. And if the Government's guarantee will facilitate a profitable sale of these notes, evidently it is in the interests of the railway, and certainly in the interests of the Government, that they be relieved as far as possible this year and next year of as much of the cost of purchase of this rolling stock as is possible. The Government may exercise either power as defined under the resolution, but whichever is taken it seems to me that when one considers the large financial obligations entailed upon the Government these days, it is only fair that in acquiring this rolling stock it should be permitted to resort to this system of financing, which is common with all other railway systems and which, I think, is not objectionable in any respect.

Mr. ROBB: Before the Finance Minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean) leaves that point, what does he mean by exercising either power as defined in the resolution?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As I understand the resolution, under the first part the Government may acquire all the rolling stock necessary for these railway systems and itself issue equipment securities, or it may hand over to the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk railway systems whatever portion they require, these companies, in turn, issuing equipment securities, guaranteed, if necessary, by the Government. It is unfortunate that so many of the railway systems of Canada are at present in such a financial position as to require government assistance to the extent shown by the large purchases of railway equipment. Nevertheless, the Government must stand behind these railway systems, because if it did not the whole commercial fabric of the country would fall to the ground, and we should find ourselves in a very uncomfortable position indeed. The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) suggested that there should be some limitation as to time or amount in this resolution. That may be well worth considering, but I suggest to him that he allow that consideration to stand until the Bill is introduced.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what I intended.

Mr. FIELDING: I judge from what the member for Maisonneuve says that there has already been some discussion as to the limitation of amount. The object of this resolution is one which we should all heartily approve. The need of rolling stock on most of the railways is urgent, and the companies themselves are not in a position to do their own financing. I agree that somebody must help the railway companies to get rolling stock, whether this help be given through the medium of equipment bonds or by the Government's paying for the rolling stock and then lending it to the companies. These are matters of detail; the Government are wise in leaving these various avenues open. But the resolution is open to the observation made by an hon. gentleman who has spoken: that the Government are taking a "blank cheque." The Minister of Finance is authorized to issue equipment bonds. Whatever you may call them, if issued by the Minister of Finance, they are the bonds of the Government of Canada, and under this resolution the Government may issue them for untold millions. I do not speak in a critical spirit, but I suggest that this is a matter into which inquiry might well be made and that an estimate—not necessarily exact, an approximate estimate—be made of the amount required by the several railways for this purpose. It would be the wiser and safer thing, before the Bill is through, to provide a reasonable limitation, so that there shall be no such thing as the "blank cheque" which has been spoken of.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall be pleased to consider that matter when the Bill is introduced. I think it is worthy of consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Before we vote this resolution, we are entitled to have a more detailed statement as to its application. A general and vague statement has been made, but we have not been furnished with details.

Mr. J. D. REID: This afternoon I gave a detailed statement of the $32,966,515 worth of equipment that has been ordered. I gave the details in respect of each company.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In what proportion is this amount divided among the different companies—the Intercolonial, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. J. D. REID: There will be a small amount for the Canadian Government railway system, which, of course, includes the National Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Moncton, as well as the Intercolonial.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: And the Prince Edward Island railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. The largest portion of it, however, is for the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk. Seventy-five of the engines ordered are for the Grand Trunk railway system; $4,500,000 is being expended in engines alone. Last year we purchased 100 or 150 engines, and the Grand Trunk got 45 or 47 of them, so that we are really providing equipment for the Grand Trunk system. An hon. member a few moments ago said that I should make a statement with regard to this matter. It has been the custom of the Minister of Railways to make a statement when he brings down his estimates, and I intend to do that so far as this railway question is concerned. The same hon. gentleman said that the railways of Canada were not in a very good shape in the matter of operation. Taking everything into consideration, I think that the standard of the operation of the railways of Canada during the last winter was equal to, if not better than, that of any other country.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Except Prince Edward Island.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will tell you why I believe they were well operated. The equipment that we purchased a year ago gave great assistance during last winter, which was a very severe one. In the month of October last the presidents of the Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and New York Central railway systems met in Montreal and formed an organization known as the national railway defence association. They practically agreed to operate the several railway systems of Canada as one. They have since formed a subcommittee of the several railways; the members of that committee have been meeting every week and have been operating the railways practically as one system. In other words, if one railway gets into trouble the railway which is in the best position to do so comes to its assistance and runs trains over its lines. The members of that association are entitled to the greatest credit for the splendid assistance they have rendered during the last winter. I am in communication with that association every day; its secretary has sent me the minutes of its meetings and has kept me advised of everything it has been doing. I have a full report, if it is of any interest to the members of this House, of all that the association has done from the time of its organization up to the present day.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Has that association reported to the minister, in his official capacity as Minister of Railways and Canals, that many engines, on account of not having been overhauled, have been lying idle at junction points? And has the Government been requested to supply skilled labour to overhaul those engines?

Mr. J. D. REID: I never heard of any such complaint until the hon. member mentioned it to me this evening, but, since that organization was formed, when I received a complaint of any kind I immediately communicated it to Mr. W. M. Neal, secretary of the organization, and it did not matter whether that complaint was in regard to shortage of cars or trouble at any point, I always received an immediate reply and assistance was at once forthcoming, or the matter in regard to which the complaint was made was taken up by the association and promptly dealt with.

As I have said, the heads of that organization are the presidents of the railways. Some of the men on the subcommittee are: Sir George Bury, representing the Canadian Pacific; Mr. Gillen, representing the Grand Trunk; Mr. Hanna, representing the Canadian Northern; Mr. A. E. Warren, representing the minister here at Ottawa; and Mr. Hayes, representing the Government railways. I think Sir George Bury, Mr. Hanna, Mr. Gillen, and the rest of those gentlemen will bear me out when I say that they have done everything possible to operate the railways during the past winter practically as one system, and to give the very best service and assistance in their power as operators, and as the railways themselves could render. I wish at this point to give those men all the credit that is due to them. At the present time they are carrying on that organization and doing everything they possibly can. I should not like the impression to go out that the railways had not, during the past year, been operated to their fullest capacity. I should like it to be known that in my opinion those men, from the president down to the humblest man on the railways, have, during last year, worked harder and had better co-operation than at any previous time in the history of the railways of Canada. I believe they all realized that, on account of this war, it was their duty, as men, to do all they could. I believe they did their work sincerely and honestly; they are continuing to do so now, and they will continue to do so as long as this war is going on.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I did not wish to attack the association, and I do not wish to oppose the purchasing by the Government of the equipment necessary for our railways. I do not object to that at all. I think, however, it is a matter of amazement for the public to see the Government of this country giving the railways financial assistance to purchase engines, while at junction points everybody is at liberty to see many engines lying idle, and when you ask why all those engines are lying idle there, thus diminishing the hauling power of our railways, you are told the reason is that the railways of this country are unable to secure the skilled labour necessary to overhaul those engines. If that is the reason why you often see trains with two engines when one should be able to do the work, my opinion is that instead of purchasing new engines, it would be better for the Government to supply skilled labourers to overhaul those engines in order that the greatest tonnage might be hauled. That is the point I am endeavouring to make.

Mr. J. D. REID: Might I ask the hon. member at what point he saw so many engines lying idle? The reason I ask is this: Complaints of that kind should be brought to the attention of the organization. If the hon. member will tell me on what road and at what points those engines are lying idle, I shall be able to explain the matter when my estimates come up in a few days from now.

Mr. GAUTHIER: When the minister brings down his estimates, I shall be able to give him all the information. It is a matter of public notoriety, even in our province, that at all junction points you see those engines lying idle. When you travel, you will come across two engines hauling a train when one engine is generally able to do the work.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is because the engines are not sufficiently strong in motive power. The railways have not been able to purchase engines of sufficient strength to operate their trains. During the last year or two they have not been purchasing a sufficient number of locomotives. Therefore the condition the hon. gentleman describes might very well happen. Railway companies in Canada during the last year have had to operate trains with engines which in ordinary times they would use in their yards, or which would be engaged in light and unimportant work.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The explanation of my hon. friend may be all right; but when your curiosity is excited by seeing two engines hauling a train and you inquire into the hauling capacity of each engine, and you make the addition of the tonnage, and when you are told the reason why there are two engines on the train is because the engines are not properly overhauled, the explanation of the minister does not fill the bill.

Mr. J. D. REID: I should like again to ask the hon. member to tell me at what point on any railway he has seen a number of engines lying idle since October last, and I shall tell him the reason why. Time and again during the last month or so I have had up in my office the head officials of the Grand Trunk railway company. I have had Mr. Robb, who is the general master mechanic of the Grand Trunk railway company, and Mr. Robb assured me that every engine of the Grand Trunk railway was in operation and that there was no trouble to keep them in repair. Therefore, from the statements made to me by the Grand Trunk officials, I do not believe that it is on that railway that engines have been lying idle since October last. As to the Canadian Northern, Mr. Hanna tells me that all their engines have been in operation and they have had no trouble making repairs when necessary. So far as the Government railways are concerned, the officials tell me they can keep their engines in repair, and they have sufficient men to do so. I cannot for one moment believe that the Canadian Government railways have any engines lying idle at any point on the system. Therefore, from the information before me, and not having heard from the Canadian Pacific, I conclude that if engines have been lying idle since October last it must have been on the Canadian Pacific. In discussing matters with the Secretary of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence, I was informed that the railways had used all their equipment. The question came up whether the Canadian Pacific could loan four engines to the Algona Central railway, and they would only consent to loan them on condition that we gave them four of the new engines in their place; that is the way I understand it. It was the greatest surprise to me this evening to be told that on any of the railway systems of Canada there have been a lot of engines lying idle since last October. It is such an important matter that I think the hon. member should give me the names of the different railways, so that I can take the matter up with the Canadian Railway Association for Naional Defence and ascertain why engines were allowed to remain on the railways unrepaired.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I will supply that information at the proper time.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman should let me have it now, so that I can give him a reply when my estimates are up.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I will give the information privately to the minister if he desires; I want to put the facts before him.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: It appears to me that some of the remarks made this evening with regard to railway equipment are in keeping with much of the criticism we have seen in the public press during the past year on this subject. It is a plain indication that there are a great many people in this country discussing railways and their operation who have very little idea of what the operation of a railway really means, or of what it means to keep the motive power and rolling stock of a railway one hundred per cent efficient. In this country the season of heavy traffic, the time when the strain on the motive power and rolling stock of the railways is greatest, is from November 1 to April 1, and there are not in this country adequate facilities for keeping the locomotive and rolling stock of our railways up to one hundred per cent of efficiency during that period, no matter how many mechanics you may be able to employ. The railways may start in on November 1 on a one hundred per cent efficiency basis, but they will gradually depreciate until the climax of the difficult season is reached about March 31 or April 15, and in the meantime they will of necessity have accumulated a certain number of locomotives and cars which will have to be put in the shops for repairs during the season when they undertake to do that kind of work. I have myself seen statements in the newspapers with regard to the conditions which prevailed on some sections of the railways last winter. It was stated that a specific number of locomotives were tied up, on certain sections of railway, owing to the fact that locomotives had been sent out on the road in a condition that made it impossible for the men to get them over the road—simply another evidence of the fact that men are interjecting opinions on a subject they know nothing about. I have had the privilege of running up and down the railways of this country for about seventeen years on locomotives and I know something of what it means to keep locomotives in repair, and what it takes to put locomotives out of repair, and what it takes to repair them when they go into the shops Conditions will arise at certain times of the year when it is humanly and physically impossible to keep the locomotives in any part of this country up to one hundred per cent of their efficiency. My hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) stated that he had frequently seen on the railways two locomotives hauling one train. There is nothing new in that. Any man with any experience whatever in the operation of railways knows that that is done frequently in order to get additional tonnage over the roads and in order to use locomotives which on account of the fact that they have become more or less obsolete are not fit to go up against the heavy traffic they meet with during the winter months; it is not due to the fact that they are not in proper repair. I grant that certain circumstances will arise in the operation of any railway when a locomotive not in first-class repair will go out upon the road, but it does not follow that that is done deliberately. It is a common thing on the Canadian Pacific to meet trains coming east from Port Arthur with two locomotives, but one of those locomotives may be en route to the machine shop for a general overhauling, and possibly while doing that it is performing the service of hauling perhaps fifty or sixty per cent of the load and assisting in that degree in moving traffic.

Just a word with regard to the resolution itself. If the Minister of Railways did not take the step he now contemplates, if he did not foresee the conditions that may possibly arise during the winter of 1918-1919 and provide, so far as it is possible for him to do so, the necessary locomotives and cars to assist every railway in this country, he would be derelict in his duty.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before six o'clock I urged the Minister of Railways to fix a limit to the amount required for the equipment of these railways, and I am glad that this evening the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) promised the committee that when the Bill founded upon this resolution is introduced my suggestion will be considered; I am quite satisfied with that. In view of that, I think the minister should amend his resolution because, as it stands, it is still a very large order. It reads:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that during the present war and for one year thereafter,—

I think everybody will agree that during the course of this war we shall have to come to the aid of all the railway companies of Canada with the possible exception of the Canadian Pacific. I quite admit that this equipment will be more urgently required during the winter months on account of the heavy traffic. But I do think the minister should amend his resolution to read as follows:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that during the next fiscal year,—

And so on. The minister knows that every railway company prepares an annual budget, just as the Government does, and estimates its requirements for the coming fiscal year, and it would be quite easy for my hon. friend to thus estimate his requirements of rolling stock.

In fact, if you read the annual report of any railway company, you get the data about the requirements of that company. I repeat, this is a very large order. Nobody objects to helping the railways during the present emergency; on the contrary, the people are quite ready to commit their Government to the aid required by the railway companies in order to facilitate the transportation system. But this is, after all, a money Bill. Whether the Finance Minister is called upon to give cash, or to issue treasury bills, or to endorse notes, or to sign bonds, or to sign equipment bonds, the credit of the country is none the less engaged. Being a money Bill, we cannot amend it by decreasing it, because we do not know the amount which will be required by my hon. friend under this resolution. We could, however, decrease the amount if we knew it. At all events, my hon. friend can easily find out from the companies what help they require from the Government in the matter of equipment for the next current year, and with that information at hand he can say about what amount will be involved during that period. Otherwise my honourable friend is not amenable to Parliament; he puts himself above His Majesty the King. His Majesty the King, requiring supplies from Parliament, states the amount in the estimates, and each item is checked and debated. But, my hon. friend is above the King. He comes and asks, not for a limited sum, but for any amount during the present war and for one year thereafter. If my hon. friend will amend his resolution and provide that there will be a stated annual amount based on the estimates which he will receive from the railway companies, he will meet no opposition in the House, because everybody is anxious to help the transportation system.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance explained that if the resolution is allowed to go through he will introduce the Bill, and when we get into committee we can amend it there.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Amend it in what respect?

Mr. REID: We can then consider amending it in so far as limiting the amount is concerned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I was glad to hear the hon. Acting Minister of Finance say, in answer to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), that he proposes to limit the appropriation. But I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that he must do it on the resolution, because he cannot do it afterward.

Mr. REID: Why?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Because the Bill is founded on the resolution and you must limit the amount that you are asking Parliament to vote by your resolution.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill must not authorize a greater amount than was authorized by the resolution. There being no amount stated in the resolution, it would seem to be perfectly proper for the Bill to put a limitation to the amount. Therefore, I do not think there will be any violation of the rule.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There would certainly be a violation of the rule. The rule is that no blank cheque can be given to the Government. They must state what they ask of the people to spend, and if they ask for a limited appropriation, a fixed amount, that certainly must be put in the resolution. The point is worth considering.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not examined the point particularly, but I would think that if a resolution, upon which a Bill is to be founded, authorized an expenditure of $100,000,000, the amount could be reduced in the Bill to $50,000,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is the absolute point which the Acting Minister of Finance has made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He says that inasmuch as there is no limit in the resolution you may nevertheless properly put a limit in the Bill, and that is what he proposes to do.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If you have a money Bill it must be founded on a resolution to limit the amount that may be expended. You may decrease it, but you cannot increase it.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I suppose, in discussing this railway question. the Prince Edward Island railway is considered as part of the Intercolonial railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is part of the Canadian Government railway system.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: It appears to me that this resolution calls for the expenditure of the whole of the consolidated fund of Canada that is not appropriated. My hon. friend has pointed out a great many difficulties that have been encountered in connection with the transportation question of Canada during the past year. I mentioned on a previous occasion that this transportation question is one of the most important which comes before the Parliament of Canada to-day. It is all very fine for people to talk about increasing production on the farms, but it is of no use to increase production on the farms if you cannot move the product. In my province the whole railway system is in the cellar and has been for the last four years. The fact is demonstrated by the acts of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid) in providing four new narrow gauge locomotives for a railway which in the natural course of events will cease to be a narrow-gauge railway in the very near future. I am not blaming the Government for that.

I want to say a word about Mr. Hayes, the General Manager of the Canadian Government Railway System. I know him very well and I have had a great deal of business with him. He is the most capable gentleman that ever at any time handled the Canadian Government Railways. When Mr. Hayes told me he was going to order these four locomotives, he said, "I suppose you will object to them?" I replied, "Not by any means; it is the best thing you can do to tide over a situation which at present is unbearable."

But, Sir, there is a better way of obviating the difficulties on the Prince Edward Island railroad, and I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to what I am going to say in this regard. Notwithstanding that I am not an expert—like my hon. friend across the House who has been riding on the railroads for a long time—I know what I am talking about because I am an old transportation man. I want to tell the minister that the best way to obviate the difficulties on the Prince Edward Island railway with reference to rolling stock and engines is to widen the gauge of that railway, or supply a third rail between Port Borden and Summerside and Port Borden and Charlottetown. That will accomplish results very much better than by buying a lot of narrow gauge cars and narrow gauge engines that we would have to re-sell within the next two or three years.

While I am on this subject I would like to ask the minister whether the Reid-Newfoundland railway system has pre-empted, or done anything towards purchasing, the narrow gauge rolling stock and locomotives on our system, when we dispose of it.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not heard of the Reid-Newfoundland railway making any proposition with respect to the purchase of any narrow gauge equipment on our railways, because we would not consider it for one moment until the existing gauge has been widened. I can say to the hon. gentleman there has been no proposition whatever of the nature to which he alludes.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The minister knows as well as I do that the Reid-Newfoundland system is narrow gauge like the Prince Edward Island railway. He knows further that a promise has been made to us, which the right hon. leader of the Government is going to implement as soon as he can, to widen or standardize the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway. Otherwise he will lose the credit which he is getting to-day for having provided the Prince Edward Island car ferry system. Our narrow gauge system in Prince Edward Island is owned by the Dominion Government, but it was paid for by the people of that province, a fact which some members of this House ought to know when the affairs of Prince Edward Island are being discussed, and allusion is made to the railway deficits, and all that sort of thing. We paid for the Prince Edward Island railway ourselves and presented the Dominion Government with it. The Government may say, "All right, take it back," but that is not the question. We will take the railway back if the Government will give us the money that is due to us, for you must remember that when we went into Confederation the Dominion owed us five or six million dollars, and that was the money with which the railroad was built.

Mr. DEVLIN: If this were not somewhat of a war measure I certainly would put myself upon record against the resolution, because it really places too much power in the hands of a minister. However, if it is to be considered in any way as a war measure I want to give my ready assent to it. Before doing so I call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that under the Appropriation Act of 1916 we have already paid the Canadian Northern $15,000,000. The minister informs us that so far by way of equipment we have given over to the Canadian Northern some $22,500,000. I would like to know from him whether anything else has been given to that company, by way of equipment, material, or rolling stock?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is all that has been given to the Canadian Northern. We are purchasing some rails and that company will get some of those as well as the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific systems.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is apart altogether from the $22,500,000 which the Canadian Northern have already received during the current year?

Mr. J. D. REID: The $22,500,000 of equipment will be paid during the present fiscal year. We have not yet bought any equipment of any kind.

Mr. DEVLIN: But contracts have been placed?

Mr. J. D. REID: Not for the Canadian Northern, except as regards the contracts I read a few moments ago.

Mr. DEVLIN: What about the message cabled over by the Government directly to the boys in the trenches about the Order totalling $22,500,000, and the bulk of it being made up of cars for the Canadian Northern railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is all included in the figures to which I have referred.

Mr. DEVLIN: Has the minister in contemplation the purchasing of further rolling stock for the Canadian Northern for the coming year?

Mr. J. D. REID: Outside of what I read to-night, the only equipment that I contemplate purchasing is as follows: A requisition has been made on me to purchase ten or fifteen snow ploughs, which might probably cost another $100,000. Then I have been urged by the National Railway Defence Association, the organization representing all of the railways in Canada, to purchase one hundred tourist cars. At the present time, speaking from memory, there are probably six or seven hundred cars owned by all the railways in Canada that are available for the transport of troops to and from the seaboard, and I have been discussing the proposed purchase of one hundred additional cars with Sir George Bury, the head of the Canadian Pacific railway, with a view to ascertaining if we cannot get along without any more equipment of the kind. We have also been asked to purchase nineteen baggage cars to be used in connection with the movement of troop trains to and fro, and it may be requisite to acquire a few more things of that kind.

As to the suggestion of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) that I limit the scope of this motion, I would move that the resolution be amended by adding the following words:

Provided, however, that the expenditure in any one fiscal year under this resolution shall not exceed the sum of fifty million dollars.

I mention that amount for the reason that we have 100,000 tons of rails ordered. I may have to purchase some more equipment such as I mentioned a little while ago. That is not a very large amount over what we have really contracted for, and if the hon. member will accept this amendment I would like the resolution to be moved.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly, I accept the amendment for myself. But I hope that when the Bill to be founded on this resolution comes before the House, my hon. friend will be able to give an approximate estimate of what is to be expended during the present fiscal year.

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course, I will be glad to do that. I shall give the hon. member all the information I can.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: While the hon. minister is on this question, will he kindly let us know how many of the 25,000 cars which were in the United States a few weeks ago are still there? According to a statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works, in a speech he made in New York or Boston, they had 25,000 of our cars down there. Have we got them back yet?

Mr. J. D. REID: There has been an excess of Canadian cars in the United States over and above the number of American cars in Canada. The highest number at any one time was about twenty-three or twenty-four thousand. I have been pressing, and the Canadian railways have been doing everything they could to get the cars back, but the car shortage in the United States has been so great that any cars sent over there we could not get back, and the number increased until it reached twenty-five thousand, and the shippers in Canada were suffering because we could not get our cars back. We had to refuse to allow Canadian cars to go over to the United States until we got the number over there reduced. From time to time the number was reduced, and if my memory serves me right in the last report I had, a week or so ago, the number was down to about eleven thousand. If we had those cars in Canada we would not have any shortage of cars to supply the public.

Mr. CAHILL: Before this resolution goes through, I would like to point out that the hon. minister's amendment further strengthens my opposition to the measure. It is further evidence to me that the Minister of Railways and Canals should not undertake the management of this great railway system of Canada. He is able here, in five minutes, to make his estimates for an indefinite period, from now until the war is over, and for a year after that. How does he know that he will not require $51,000,000 next year, or $25,000,000, or any other sum? It is altogether too large an order, stepping out here with a fifty-million-dollar-a-year resolution. I think that the Government should take the matter under consideration and come to some determination as to what they intend to do with the railway situation in this country, before we go on spending these millions by the fifties or hundreds.

Mr. HAY: If I may be permitted, and if I may make bold to do so, I would like to offer a word of advice to the Minister of Railways. I have had some experience as a railway man, not as my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) on the engines of a railway, but as a maintenance of way man on the roadbed of the Canadian Pacific. I would like to point out to the minister what, in my opinion, seems to be the necessity for the vast expenditure on equipment of the railways at the present time. The whole trouble lies in the fact that the roadbed of these different railways is in poor condition, and has been so for a great number of years. I think it would be well, if it comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Railways, to see that these roadbeds are put into proper shape, and I know that if that is done not nearly the amount of money which is being asked for will be required in the future to keep the rolling stock in condition. I know conditions in the West, because I have travelled over the Canadian Northern to some extent, and I know that the roadbed is in poor shape; in fact, I happened to be in a wreck on one of the branch lines of the Canadian Northern near Winnipeg; and in that wreck some seven or eight freight cars were derailed, and they were simply lifted aside with a lifting machine and burned on the ground. Now, that is occurring all over Canada at the present time on the Canadian Northern system, and, I believe, on the other Government systems in the Dominion. If the roadbeds were put into proper shape the engines at present used on these different roads would be able to pull double the number of cars they are pulling at the present time. I understand that in the West, on some sections of the Canadian Northern system, the engines are pulling something like twenty or twenty-five cars, and that is the utmost they can pull. An engine, if it is any good at all, on a good roadbed, on the prairie sections of the road in Manitoba and the West, should pull at least fifty to sixty cars loaded to capacity. I say that if the roadbeds are put into proper shape it will be of great assistance to the Government in financing and in providing for the rolling stock of these different railroads. The whole trouble lies in the fact that the roadbeds are not kept in proper shape. I suppose, if I began to discuss the labour question, and what the Government intends to do in regard to it, I would be driving away from the question, so I shall not take up that phase of the matter at this time, but on another occasion I may have something to say on this point.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I do not think it is fair that the hon. minister should ask us to give the Government a blank cheque of fifty million dollars. We are sent here by our constituents to vote what definite amounts should be spent this year and next year and each year. The Government might just as well ask us once for all to vote them as much money as they want, and let us go back home. The Government should respect the people, and inform their representatives what they intend to spend, and how they intend to spend it, giving details. The Government comes to the House with an estimate of $250,000,000, with another estimate of $500,000,000, and now we are asked for $50,000,000 more. They are spending money as if it were peanuts. I am opposed to this method of doing business. No company would do business on such a basis. Before we go further with this resolution, Mr. Chairman, I submit that for the benefit of members of the committee and the people of the country we should have more detailed information on the subject.

Mr. DECHENE: This resolution will authorize the Minister of Railways to buy a good deal of equipment; in fact, orders have already been placed for such equipment. The National Railway Defence Association appears to be taking good care of the engines, but I do not know that they have taken as good care of the freight cars. On the way from Montreal a month ago any one could see in the yards many freight cars, empty, some with missing doors, some with parts of the roofs off—cars which could have been repaired very easily and put back in the service to help relieve the shortage of equipment. Many of these cars now lying idle could easily be repaired at Moncton. The Canadian Government railways own and operate big shops, some of which are not used at all, or practically not used. Take, for instance, the Canadian Government shops at Rivière du Loup. These shops, which were built at great expense, are now lying idle; why are they not used for the repairing of freight cars in order to relieve the situation? I understand also that many of our freight cars are used in various parts of the country for storing freight. For very little money sheds could be erected and these cars could be unloaded and put back into service. Last winter, the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) told the House some engines had been left idle and that a great many cars had been left loaded in the big yards because of the lack of water facilities. Take, for instance, in Montmagny, where there are a few miles of track and siding, and where I have seen five or six freight trains at a time delayed on account of lack of water facilities. Often the engineers have to run their engines from Montmagny up the hill to St. Pierre to get water; then they cut the train in two, leave part at Montmagny, and do not come back to Montmagny to get the other part of the train. This difficulty exists on account of water facilities not being placed at Montmagny, and consequently much traffic is not properly taken care of. The minister says that $50,000,000 or thereabouts will be sufficient to help relieve the situation during the next fiscal year. That is quite a sum. He has already ordered $35,000,000 worth of equipment; to this he adds $15,000,000—what for? We do not know. He wants the committee to adopt a provision under which $50,000,000 may be appropriated each year during the war, and one year thereafter. Surely it is in order to provide a sufficient amount for the next fiscal year, and if when Parliament meets, nine or ten months hence, more money is required, then we will grant, perhaps, another $50,000,000. That is a safe procedure; it is better than providing for the expenditure of $50,000,000 a year for an indefinite number of years. When will the war end? Will it be considered as ended when the men cease fighting at the front, or when the treaty of peace is signed? Or will it be ended by Order in Council passed by this Government under the War Measures Act? So far as I can see, anything at all can be done under that Act. I do not think it would be safe for this committee to vote so many millions under the plan suggested. I think the position taken by the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) is very wise, and that many members of the House will support it.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister told us tonight before six o'clock that he had placed an order for 60,000 cars and 150 engines. According to the resolution, a considerable number of cars will be added to the stock already purchased. Has an estimate been made of the number of cars that will be required, and has any inquiry been made as to the possibility of building the cars, the number of shops now working, and the number of cars which can be turned out each year? I put this question to the minister because I have sent him a letter written to me by a gentleman from Three Rivers who has had considerable experience in car building and who is ready and willing if the order is placed with him, to deliver ten freight cars a day five months from this date, provided the order justifies the manufacture. Surely this amount is not asked haphazard; some estimate must have been taken of future requirements of the railways which desire to procure equipment from the Government. Has any estimate been given to the Minister of Railways as to the number of cars that the railway companies are short or the number of cars that may be required for transportation during this year? If so, are the cars so required to be ordered through the Minister of Railways, and has he any idea what apportionment is to be made to the different companies of the various kinds of cars—flat cars, coal cars, tank cars, and so on—mentioned in the statement the minister read to the House this afternoon?

Mr. J. D. REID: Before ordering any equipment at all, I got together in my office the heads of the Canadian Northern railway, the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Government railway system, and we had a discussion as to the quantity of equipment that would be required during the present fiscal year, so that the railways could haul next season's crop and also be in a position to be operated to their full capacity during the coming winter. After going over the matter with those gentlemen, we gave an order for the equipment, a list of which I have given to the House. Each railway, of course, stated what it would require, and I have given that statement. In Canada, there are companies that manufacture cars that have a capacity very much larger than necessary to fill our orders. I see by the press, and, in fact, I know, that the Canada Car and Foundry Company have received a very large order from the United States Government, because the United States Government are giving very large orders for cars for the railways of that country. The United States Government are doing practically the same as we are doing in this regard. In this time of war, it is not in the interest of the country that railway companies should go on to the market with their bonds. I shall be very glad to give the hon. member further detailed information if necessary, but I think the information I have given covers all the questions he has asked. This equipment will be distributed amongst our own Canadian railways.

Mr. BUREAU: The Grand Trunk is the only one that is not under Government control.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian Northern, while it is owned by the Government, is being operated as a private corporation. There is the Grand Trunk railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

Mr. BUREAU: That is under Government control.

Mr. J. D. REID: Not yet.

Mr. BUREAU: Partly.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Quebec Southern, which I think is owned by the Delaware and Hudson, requires a few rails. The Canadian Pacific, under this legislation, will get 300 miles of rails, two or three million dollars' worth of the purchases we propose making. They will, of course, pay cash for what they receive; at least we expect they will. It will be seen, therefore, that we are purchasing equipment that will be used by the several railways.

Mr. McCREA: Do the Grand Trunk, the Delaware and Hudson and the Canadian Pacific prefer to have the Government buy their equipment for them? Are they not capable of purchasing their own equipment?

Mr. J. D. REID: I mentioned the Canadian Pacific for this reason. The Canadian Pacific have been trying to purchase rails. There are only two companies in Canada that make rails, and the Canadian Pacific could not purchase rails from those companies because they were manufacturing munitions. The Government arranged with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company to change their plant from what they were manufacturing and to supply 100,000 tons of rails. We purchased that ourselves, and we intend to distribute it amongst the several railways.

Mr. McCREA: Do the several railways prefer to have it done in that way?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, they asked that it be done in that way.

Mr. McCREA: The minister told us that early this season 20,000 Canadian cars were in the States, and that the latest report he had was that that number had been reduced to about 11,000. Can the minister give any information as to how many foreign cars are in Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: There are, in the United States, 25,000 Canadian cars in excess of foreign cars in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE: At the present time the country is suffering from the lack of cars and also from a lack of passenger accommodation. That portion of the country which I represent and a part of the country represented by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), containing a population of approximately 150,000 people, is back to the old days again of construction; they get one train in the morning and one train at night.

Mr. McCREA: The hon. member should be glad to have that.

Mr. CURRIE: I want to know from the minister if there is any possibility of this war board giving any better passenger accommodation than has been given, or if it is going to be like a new "cop" on the corner, stopping all the traffic.

With reference to freight cars, I know that so far as shipping during last winter, is concerned, the shortage of cars occasioned a loss to shippers in Ontario of thousands of dollars daily. A concern in which I am interested had no less than 27 carloads of steel tied up between Buffalo and Collingwood, the amount involved being close on a quarter of a million dollars, and that shipment was tied up for weeks and weeks. Something must be wrong. We know, of course, that the snow was pretty bad, but I was held up on a passenger train, travelling thirty miles in two days, and in that thirty miles there was not a snow drift that stopped the train for three minutes. There were four snow-ploughs ahead of us. What was wrong? The crews? When the Bill comes before the House, the labour question will have to be discussed, because we all know that the men have been giving service to the railroads for a great deal less money than is paid to men in any other department of business in the country.

In regard to this resolution, I am pleased that the minister has limited the amount, because I think it is asking Parliament to go a very long way to give any minister of the Crown in such a democratic country as this a blank cheque on the treasury. That has never been done in the history of British parliamentary institutions, and I do not think we should establish a precedent. Further than that, I do not think it is a good precedent to establish an annual vote for years ahead. Are we going to give up all our parliamentary functions? Is Parliament going to cease to exist? Is Parliament going to go out of business altogether and give a blank cheque to each of the ministers of the Crown to carry on business until a year after the war? I say with all seriousness, that this war may continue for four or five years. If one reads the papers this evening, the conclusion of the war looks as far off as it did two years ago. For that reason, I think the minister should hesitate. This Parliament has never refused a Minister of Railways or any other minister any reasonable request for funds that has ever been placed before it. There is no reason why we should give up all our functions to a star chamber and allow any department of Government to have a blank cheque up to fifty million dollars a year from now on to the end of the war I believe in British institutions. I believe in maintaining the constitution of this country, and to do that I think we should carry on in war time the same as at any other time. There are too many people going around the country wanting this fad and that fad on account of the war, and men are wanting to sell corn cures and this, that and the other thing to help win the war. This Parliament is asked to vote $50,000,000 until the conclusion of the war for no other reason than that it is in connection with the railways on account of the war. I think the minister will be well advised when bringing down the Bill to limit the time to the fiscal year. I think there will be a few of us, at all events, left for next session; we do not expect the Germans to come and take possession of the country before then, and as we shall have another session of Parliament, the minister could bring down another vote next year. I am not opposing this vote, but I am opposing the unconstitutional features of it. The first thing about the resolution that struck me, and which I could hardly swallow, was that it was giving the minister a blank cheque. The second feature to which I objected was that it was good during the war and for one year thereafter. Something might be said in its favour if this were for a foreign expenditure during a war period, but Parliament is quite able to cope with domestic expenditures of this kind by voting an amount annually.

Mr. McCREA: Unquestionably there has been a great shortage of both power and cars. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has complained about the passenger service. No doubt it is not what we should like to have, but I have never heard of a man having to wait for a week for a passenger train, as has frequently happened in the case of freight shipments. The passenger service has been curtailed, but on the whole I think the needs of the people are well taken care of. We are certainly not so badly off in that matter as we are in respect to freight. There is a great quantity of freight to be moved, and there is evidently a severe shortage of cars. One gentleman has said this evening that the sidings are filled with empty cars out of commission, but I think you will find that these cars are of an old type and of light capacity, and therefore not safe for heavy traffic.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member is a very large shipper. Has he been able to get all the empty cars he wants in which to ship his freight, or is he a month behind with his orders?

Mr. McCREA: I certainly agree that there is a shortage. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. CURRIE: Everybody says the same.

Mr. McCREA: I think the minister was justified in bringing down this measure in order to supply the needs of this country. What I was not clear about was whether the Canadian Pacific, the Delaware and Hudson, and the other roads who are able to take care of themselves were satisfied with this arrangement, but the minister assures me that they are, so that is all right. What the shippers want is means of transporting their goods, and I think the minister will be well advised to proceed as quickly as possible to provide the required equipment and rolling stock to carry on the business of the country. I must say, however, that it is not wise to give carte blanche even to the Minister of Railways. The minister might amend his resolution limiting the period to one year, and then he could ask for another vote next session, and it would be quite in order for the House to give it. But I do not think he should ask to be given carte blanche for an unlimited period, and without any restrictions on the expenditure.

10 p.m.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. J. D. REID: Replying to my hon. friend from North Simcoe, the passenger service has undoubtedly been curtailed during the past year.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it going to be increased this summer?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member wishes us to increase the passenger service in Canada. Let me tell him why the passenger service was curtailed, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend. We have a lot of troops to transport to the seaboard, and a lot of men to bring back, and it was necessary for the railroads to cut down their passenger traffic in order to provide the necessary cars and engines for this purpose. The position of the board of railway commissioners, of which I approve, was that we should take all the passenger cars we could possibly get and use them for war purposes during the war. We cannot build cars in a day; it takes time. All the roads have had instructions to decrease the passenger traffic as much as possible in order to provide cars for the purposes I have mentioned. That has been the policy, and so long as this traffic continues, we must have the cars. Let me give one instance where extra passenger cars have been required. A very large number of cars—perhaps I should not mention just how many—have been required to bring a great many thousands of Chinese from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast on their way overseas. We had to take cars from some of our systems for this service, and the passenger traffic was decreased on certain roads. The hon. member for North Simcoe asks whether he will get a better service during the coming year. I say to him that when the traffic of which I have spoken ceases I am willing to urge the railway commission to give him a better service on his road, but if it is necessary to transport troops from the Pacific to the Atlantic in order to help the boys at the front, then my hon. friend's passenger service will be decreased, if necessary, in order that we may get the cars. The coal situation also accounts for a further decrease in the number of cars. The railways were taxed to their utmost in order to get fuel to the different parts of Ontario, and, in fact, throughout the whole Dominion. I can say, having gone into this matter, and being in touch from day to day with the organization in Montreal, that I believe the heads of the different railways have done everything possible to give the best service they could to all parts of the Dominion during the last year and they will continue to do so during the present year if they can possibly spare the cars. But war needs must be supplied first. I have been doing my best, and the railways have been doing their best, to get cars built during the past year, and the companies I have mentioned have promised to let us have these cars in time for the rush in the fall. The criticism that this resolution is practically giving the Government a blank cheque for a certain length of time, is met, I think, by the fact that the amount is limited to $50,000,000, and the period is limited to the duration of the war and one year thereafter. We all hope the war may end this year, but it may go on for another year. That is a matter that I would like the committee to allow me to consider when we get the Bill in the committee. At all events, it limits the amount to $50,000,000. It is for the war and one year after, but it may possibly be for one, two or three years. It is not for an unlimited time; it is limited by the clause "for the war and one year thereafter." We all hope it will not be for more than one year.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not a fact that in the year 1916 there was double the number of troops moved in this country, and is it not also true, as everybody knows, that there was no slackening in the passenger traffic?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, that statement is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. CURRIE: It is correct and everybody knows it.

M. J. D. REID: I say to the hon. member it is not correct.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I want to ask the minister if, when he was making his estimate, he allowed for the extra revenue the railways are going to get by reason of the increase of fifteen per cent in freight rates. I understand the railway commission has permitted the railways to increase their freight rates by fifteen per cent. I had a letter from a western man complaining of the good western Unionists and saying it was going to take at least $20,000,000 out of the western farmers, and that it served them right. Well, that is all right. When you were estimating it at $50,000,000, did you allow for the $20,000,000 that you are going to take out of the western grain growers by this increase of fifteen per cent? That only applies to the grain crop. There are the other freights all over Canada and I should think that the fifteen per cent added to the freight rates is going to give the railways an immense sum. I see the Government penalize the Canadian Pacific to the extent of fifteen per cent showing that they can make both ends meet, like the dog when he was catching the flea. I understand that the Grand Trunk railway last year paid up all their liabilities and that they have been able to expend $26,000,000 in speculation in the last two or three years. These railways are doing all the work they can, and if you are raising the rates by fifteen per cent they must be getting a big rake-off. I want to know if the minister allowed for this increased revenue that is going to accrue to the railways by reason of the advance in freight rates?

Mr. CAHILL: I do not want to be put on record as being opposed to the country getting more rolling stock; quite the reverse. I am only objecting to the system that has allowed the country to be two or three years behind in getting rolling stock. As the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Hay) has pointed out, the roadbed is in bad shape. That will come in for consideration, I presume, at a later date. But that is another question that is being left a little late. My position is, not that this country does not need rolling stock or repairs to the right of way, or that the maintenance of way should not receive attention, but my complaint is of the system that allows the railways to get into this position before conditions are taken care of. I maintain that under the present system of management we will not have efficiency. I do not find fault with increasing the rolling stock. I know we are short.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I only heard the minister make a few remarks in reference to the status of the railways. I gathered from him that the Canadian Northern belongs to the Government, but that it is operated by the Canadian Northern corporation. Is that correct?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It is now the property of the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: We own the stock, but the road is being operated by the Canadian Northern directors.

Mr. RICHARDSON: There is an arbitration in regard to the majority portion of the stock, is there not?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Government have taken over the stock, and therefore own the Canadian Northern system. A portion of the equity is subject to arbitration, and the board of directors are operating the system.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What is the status of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Moncton is being operated by the Government. It is part of the Canadian Government railway system. The Grand Trunk Pacific is being operated by the board of directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company, a separate corporation controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway company. The Grand Trunk Pacific practically belongs to the Grand Trunk Railway company.

Mr. RICHARDSON: They are in an entirely different position from the Canadian Northern and the Transcontinental railway which belong to the Government?

M. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I understand the minister to say that this amount that we are asked to authorize, and the expenditure to be made for rolling stock will be distributed among the various companies. He also stated that the Government would give to the Canadian Pacific a portion of the rolling stock and that the Government expected the Canadian Pacific to pay them back.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said the Canadian Pacific would get a portion of the rails that we had ordered. There are a hundred thousand tons of rails. That is only a portion of the equipment to be purchased under this Bill. Three or four hundred miles of those new rails out of the hundred thousand tons will go to the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The minister said that it was the expectation of the Government that the Canadian Pacific would pay for those rails.

Mr. J. D. REID: They will pay for them.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I think the House is entitled to a clear and positive declaration, not that that is the expectation, but that the money will be demanded from the Canadian Pacific. That company has a surplus of tens of millions of dollars, in addition to which this Government has granted an increase in rates of fifteen per cent, which will enable the company to increase its earnings by from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. Of course, it is understood that they are to be taxed. As far as my judgment goes, that is somewhat indefinite. I had hoped that before this stage of the session was reached we would have had a field day on the railway question. The granting of an increase of fifteen per cent to the railways all round will mean an additional direct burden on the people of this country who use transportation, of not less than $30,000,000, and it will mean, in my judgment, an indirect burden upon the people of probably $100,000,000. The moment this increase in rates was announced the price of sugar advanced ten cents a hundred in Winnipeg, and an intimation was given that the price of all commodities would be increased. Merchants will seize this as an opportunity for increasing the price of foodstuffs and staples. That is the tragedy of this increase. Perhaps this is not the time to discuss this question. I should like to have a day to myself to discuss it, but at present I only point out that in so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned, a wealthy corporation with a surplus of tens of millions, it ought to be very clearly understood by this House and the people of this country that the Government does not propose to use its resources in order to feed that company with millions and millions of dollars' worth of rails and equipment. I feel strongly that we should not give a blank cheque to the Government for an indefinite period. The question as to when the war will close is, in my judgment, a very indefinite one—the war may last ten years, it looks to me as if it will certainly last two or three years anyway—and while we want, and must provide, transportation in this country, still I think that Parliament ought to reserve to itself the right to control the expenditures from session to session.

While I am on my feet and discussing the question of rates, I want to say that I think the result of the increase will bear with especial severity upon the people of the Northwest. After all there is only a limited percentage—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to desist from discussing railroad rates, and the circumstances of the people in the Northwest, because that subject is too far from the scope of the present resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I beg pardon of the Committee, and I will not proceed further on that line. Probably when a field day takes place on this subject we will have the opportunity of expressing our views.

Mr. J. D. REID: I can say to the hon. member that the Canadian Pacific Railway company will pay for the rails they get.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Railways has mentioned only a few of the companies that may benefit from this resolution in the matter of equipment. He has mentioned the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk system. Might I ask the minister if some of the branch lines on the Intercolonial which have not been purchased by the Government and other branch systems in eastern Canada will also be heard if they require any equipment?

While opposing the mode adopted by the minister in presenting this resolution, I am not against the spirit of the resolution itself. On the contrary, I believe that we must help our railway systems to get equipment during these years, especially in view of what occurred last winter when traffic was congested during the hardest months of the year. In that connection, however, might I suggest to my hon. friend an increase in the demurrage charges? Last winter—and I know this because I am identified with the pulp business indirectly—some of the firms with which I am connected could hardly secure any cars because the railway companies were suffering from a shortage, their cars were in the United States and were not being returned. Is there not any possible means by which the railway commission in Canada, and the inter-state commerce commission in the United States, could reach an agreement whereby an end would be put to that state of things?

Mr. CURRIE: What do you say as to reciprocal demurrage?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what we have.

Mr. CURRIE: Let me give you an illustration: You want coal for your factory and the railway company switches your coal into a siding half way towards your factory, and leaves it there for a couple of weeks. Why should you not collect demurrage from the railway company? There are two sides to the demurrage question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very pleased that the minister has accepted my views and limited the amount he proposes to expend to $50,000,000 per year. But after having listened to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) and my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) I say that the minister should accept the suggestions of his friends and incorporate in the Bill that will be based upon this resolution the principle of one year's subsidy. I may say to my hon. friend from North Simcoe that, much as we differ on other esential matters, on a principle such as the one involved here, so British and so constitutional in its nature, I am with him heart and soul, and this is the best way to prove my loyalty and attachment to British connexion and to British institutions. Now here we have a case in point: My hon. friend comes before Parliament, and for a very laudable motive asks for certain large powers. He is entitled to obtain from Parliament the powers for which he asks, but he is restricted by our constitutional precedents. He must not place himself above His Majesty the King. When His Majesty the King comes before Parliament, through his ministry, and asks from the Commons a grant of money the amount is fixed, and it is a yearly vote, and if the money is not expended within the year it lapses.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Minister of Railways says that he is willing to do so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If he had admitted that I would not be asking the minister to refrain from taking the power to expend $50,000,000 per year during the balance of the war. There's where I differ from him. The war may last several years, or it may only last a few months, and it is not dignified on the part of the Government to secure holus bolus—I shall not say the benefit of the war because it confers no benefits—but during the continuance of the war, unknown as its duration may be, a huge sum of money. I appeal again to my hon. friend to consider the matter very seriously, and to amend his resolution so as to declare that the Government will only expend the $50,000,000 in the one year. Next year he can apply to Parliament again, and he will be as liberally and generously treated as he has been this year.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman asked me a question with respect to branch lines in New Brunswick.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had reference to those that had not been acquired by the Government.

Mr. J. D. REID: There are six or seven of them?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is one also in Gaspé.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, there is one in Gaspé, but all of these railway companies stated last fall that they had not sufficient equipment and were in trouble. I issued instructions at that time to General Manager Hayes to give them all the equipment and assistance they needed at any time to keep their lines in operation, and the railways in question received that assistance during the whole winter. If these railways wanted the use of our cars we would charge them a certain amount for the privilege, if they wanted to purchase any of our equipment we would let them have it; but really the amount they required altogether was very small. We deal with them as we do with the Canadian Government railways, and they are given engines or cars as they may require them, an arrangement which is perfectly satisfactory, I think, so far as they are concerned.

Now with reference to the resolution, two questions have been raised. One was as to the amount. That was answered several minutes ago, when I moved the amendment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no objection to that.

Mr. J. D. REID: The other question raised is as to the period being for an unlimited time. I stated some time ago that it was for the duration of the war and one year after. I said that when we got into committee I would consider the matter at that time. The Bill, of course, could not go further without being again in committee. However, if it be the wish to insert it in the Bill before the Bill has been introduced—I have the Bill here printed and ready—I am willing to limit it to the fiscal year. I do not want to do anything other than what I think is fair. Therefore I would ask that the resolution be made to read as follows:

That it is expedient to provide that during the present fiscal year the Minister of Railways and Canals, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may acquire engines, cars, rails and other railway equipment and materials to an amount not exceeding fifty million dollars—

And so on. That would limit the time to the present fiscal year and the amount to fifty million dollars. I beg to move:

That the resolution be amended by striking out the words "present war and for one year thereafter"—and substituting therefore the words "present fiscal year."

Mr. CURRIE: Would the minister allow me to make a suggestion? Occasionally, Mr. Chairman, it is the custom, in the case of large public buildings, to grant a total sum, and then vote a certain proportion of that per annum. Might we not provide in this resolution a sum not exceeding $200,000,000 during this present war, and that fifty millions would be voted for the present fiscal year?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. CURRIE: That has been the custom. For instance, the parliament buildings estimate was fixed at five million dollars, and half a million appropriated from year to year.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a different question.

Mr. CURRIE: Parliament is not voting that amount at all, but it specifies some sum which may possibly be voted. That was what the minister felt in the first place, that he could not put the omnibus amount in. If he wishes to amend it to fifty millions annually as he has done now, I am quite willing to accede to it.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the Minister of Railways and Canals:

That the resolution be amended by striking out in the first and second lines thereof the words "war and for one year thereafter," and substituting therefor the words 'fiscal year," and by adding in the fourth line of the said resolution, after the word "materials," the words "to an amount not exceeding fifty million dollars."

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Mr. FAFARD: Might I ask the hon. minister if it is the intention of the Governmen to increase the number of cars in the section between Levis and the east, including the counties of Montmagny, L'Islet and Kamouraska? That section is a farming country, and I noticed last year that the farmers and lumbermen could not get the cars they required.

Mr. J. D. REID: I took up with the general manager a short time ago the question of providing cars in the very district mentioned, and he promised me that he would do his very best, and stated that he expected to relieve that situation within a very short time.

Mr. DAVIS: May I ask the minister whether the calculation he has made includes the necessary equipment for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, that is not in this item.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Following the example of the hon. member of L'Islet (Mr. Farfard), I would like to say a few words regarding conditions in the district of Abitibi. Reading La Presse the other day, I came across an article headed "Colonization in the Abitibi," in which it was stated that there is practically a crisis in that region, that colonization and agriculture cannot be carried on for lack of means of transportation.

I know of a lumber company which has a great deal of lumber and pulpwood ready for shipment, thousands of cords of pulpwood are ready for delivery, which cannot be sent to the United States, or to the wharves and harbours in this country, for the reason that there is no means of transporting it. I would like to ask the minister if it is his intention to remedy that situation.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have had that question up with the board of railway commissioners and with the national defence association, and we have been doing our best to relieve that situation. As I stated a few moments ago, the whole trouble is that if we send our Canadian cars to the United States we do not get them back, so we are then unable to transport the pulpwood to the mills in Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: Abitibi is in the northern part of the province of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I asked a moment ago if the hon. minister could remedy the situation which existed last winter owing to our cars not being returned promptly from the United States. The exporters of Canada were really in a very difficult position on account of the shortage of cars. The United States keep our cars, and I do not know whether it is that the demurrage is not high enough, but they do not seem to care about returning them promptly. Is there not an arrangement between the interstate commerce commission and the railway commission by which such a state of things can be remedied?

Mr. J. D. REID: I may say to the hon. member that it is an impossibility to do more than we have been doing during the last winter. The board of railway commissioners, and the several railway companies have been doing everything possible to remedy the situation. They have had special men in the United States looking up the cars. We have had our representative Mr. Lloyd Harris, doing his utmost with the American Government. I have personally sent message after message to Mr. McAdoo, urging him to assist us in getting what we claim to be our just rights. So that the influence of this Government, of the railways and of the railway commission, has been exerted to the utmost to remedy the situation. As a result, as I said before, we have lately been able to reduce the number of cars held in the United States from twenty-five thousand to eleven thousand.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Hon. J. D. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the Department of Railways and Canals Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Militia and Defence—salaries, $212,500.

Major General MEWBURN: The amount of these estimates for the Department of Militia and Defence is so insignificant compared with the amount that we have just been discussing—$50,000,000—that it will not require very much explanation. It is my intention when, at a very early date, the war estimates are brought before the House, to give a detailed statement of the war policy of the Government, including such information regarding our troops in France, England, and Canada as it is advisable to give from a public standpoint. I do not purpose, therefore, to make a full statement to-night in connection with these estimates, but I shall take advantage of the opportunity of doing so when the war estimates are brought down by the Prime Minister.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the minister please fix a date, say next Tuesday, for this debate?

Major General MEWBURN: The Prime Minister told me yesterday that he hoped to bring down the war estimates to-morrow, if that would suit the convenience of the House.

Mr. DEVLIN: When may we expect the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report, containing details of the war expenditure?

Major General MEWBURN: I thought it had been laid on the Table.

Mr. MURPHY: May I suggest to the Minister of Militia, whom I am glad to see in the House this session for the first time, that he follow the practice that has been followed for the last few years of presenting to the House a detailed statement of the expenditure of money voted for war purposes? During two or three previous sessions—in fact, ever since the war began—a special publication has been issued and distributed among the members giving in detail the expenditure of the war appropriation. Without that information it is impossible to discuss intelligently either the expenditure that has been made or the appropriation of $500,000,000 that is asked for this session. I therefore urge upon my hon. friend the necessity of submitting that information to the committee as soon as possible.

Major-General MEWBURN: The report of the Militia Council is in press now, but the purchases of the Militia Department were made through the war purchasing commission, whose report is soon to be laid on the Table. I fancy that is what the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. MURPHY: No, not altogether. It is necessary to find what expenditure is made under war appropriation, for instance, whether the cost of certain commissions, of certain boards, of certain offices that have been established, relate to the war appropriation. My reason for pressing this request to-night is that upon searching through the Auditor General's report for information regarding this expenditure—information which would ordinarily be found in that report—I discovered that it was not there. It is impossible, therefore, to ascertain the character of the expenditure under this war appropriation unless this information be given. I have not in mind particular contracts or purchases made through the war purchasing commission, but other expenditures, information regarding which apparently is not available in any other quarter to which I and some of my friends on this side of the House have had access.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would call the minister's attention to the fact that the only details we have as to war expenditure are to be found in the public accounts under war accounts. The details of the war expenditure by the Militia Department are given from 1st April, 1916, to 31st March, 1917. Further than that, we have absolutely no details as to the war expenditures and no way of finding them out, so that we are hardly in a position to vote any estimates until we have fuller information.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I realise what my hon. friends are asking for. During the last three years there has been issued a memorandum which is supplementary to the report of the Auditor General. That memorandum, as I understand it, has not been issued this year, the reason being that practically everything that heretofore appeared in the memorandum will now appear in the report of the war purchasing commission. The Minister of Militia, therefore, is not able to give that information to-night. I would suggest that perhaps we might confine our discussion to-night to Civil Government, which is the item under discussion, and I am sure the minister, when the matter comes up on the next occasion, will be able to give the House all the necessary information.

Mr. MURPHY: I agree with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) that to-night the discussion, on which we have not yet entered, should be confined to the proposed appropriation immediately before the Committee. But might I also point out that a statement of the transactions carried out by the war purchasing commission will not give the House information as to what has been paid for salaries, for instance, for salaries in connection with the board of food control or in connection with the central appeal judge's office and matters of that kind which I understand are taken out en bloc of this war appropriation? It is items of that kind, in regard to which it has been found difficult to get information.

Mr. CARVELL: That is quite true, and the House is certainly entitled to all that information. That, of course, would not appear in the report of the war purchasing commission, which would give only the actual purchases. There will however be another way of getting at it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Militia will find no difficulty with his estimates, if, after discussion with his deputy minister, he gets that detailed statement for which, since the beginning of the war, we have been accustomed to ask. The affairs of the Militia Department have increased so much that the estimates which are before the House are not sufficiently explicit for hon. members. I may say to the minister that he will find no difficulty in having his estimates passed, because he has the good will of the House and has always, since the opening of the session, answered very willingly and generously the requests made to him. But to facilitate the work of the Committee, we certainly require this detailed statement, which the minister's predecessor used to distribute each time his estimates came up before the House. I agree that as regards Civil Government, this statement is not so much needed.

Major General MEWBURN: I can assure the hon. member that that statement will be forthcoming. It is probably due to ignorance on my part that it has not been distributed. As to the memorandum published last year, all purchases of the Militia Department which have been made by the war purchasing commission will be included in its report, which is in process of preparation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When will it be ready?

Major General MEWBURN: We have every day been asking the war purchasing commission to expedite it. As regards salaries and expenses paid in connection with the tribunals under the Military Service Act, no money had been paid out by the Department of Militia and Defence in connection with the operation of that Act. Except as regards any military representation who may have attended the tribunals. The whole administration and operation of that Act has been in the Department of Justice, and the Minister of Justice has had full and absolute control of its administration. So far as the Militia Department is concerned, we have had nothing to do with the Military Service Act until such period as we have been notified that the individual man has been refused exemption, and he is a soldier when he is handed over to us.

Mr. BUREAU: As the Minister of Public Works has suggested, if we are to consider anything this evening, it should be the salaries, and the only source of information is the Auditor General's Report. We have had the estimates of the other departments before us; we have not yet had the estimates of the Militia Department. I have, however, no objection to offer to that. I see a note I took the other night while we were putting through the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Naval Service. At that time a remark was addressed to the Minister of Militia by his predecessor. I am rather afraid to embarrass somebody else by keeping the promise I made to the ex-Minister of Militia that night. The note asks this question: Why should not the Deputy Minister of Militia receive the same salary as the Deputy Minister of Agriculture or the Deputy Minister of Naval Service?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Or the Deputy Minister of Justice?

Mr. BUREAU: The Deputy Minister of Justice receives eight or nine thousand dollars.

Mr. LEMIEUX: More than that.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to make any remarks as I know I should embarrass the Deputy Minister of Militia who is present to-night, but I want to make a reservation for myself and ask the Minister of Militia's permission to come back on the subject later on, although we may not be discussing the question of salaries, so that I may keep the promise I made to the former Minister of Militia and also follow the dictates of my heart. I want to impress upon the Minister of Militia that this is a true demand we are making. I know nothing about the operation of the Department of Militia, but I am told that the Deputy Minister of Militia is also vice-president, or occupies a prominent position in the Militia Council, and I have been informed that this Militia Council holds meetings, if not daily, two or three times a week, and that it involves extra work. If I speak now, it is just to get a reservation and to ask the minister's permission to come back to this subject, as I have something else to add, and I am in a very peculiar position, having to make the statement before the deputy minister himself.

Major-General MEWBURN: Of course, the hon. member is free to ask any questions and I shall endeavour to answer them, but if he does not wish to ask them to-night, he will have another opportunity. What was the question he wished to ask?

Mr. BUREAU: I wish to make a plea in favour of an increase in salary to the deputy minister. The Deputy Minister of Immigration receives a salary of $6,000; the Deputy Minister of Naval Service receives a salary of $6,000; the Deputy Minister of Justice receives a salary of $10,000, and I understand that the largest and heaviest burden of administration in civil government falls upon the shoulders of the Minister of Militia and his deputy.

Major-General MEWBURN: As regards salaries of deputy ministers, I do not hesitate to say that in the short time I have been administering the Militia Department and, from the knowledge I have of some of the other departments, I think the deputy ministers are very much underpaid for their services. I am a great believer in trying to get efficiency from a business standpoint, and I know that in private concerns you could not get a man for twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars a year to assume the same responsibilities and carry out the same work that are put upon the shoulders of deputy ministers. From my personal knowledge since I have been in the Militia Department and from my intimate connection with it for years past, I know that not only the deputy minister but some of the other officials have not worked by the clock but have worked until all hours of the night in order to cope with the burdens laid upon their shoulders.

Mr. BUREAU: I may take that as an intimation that my request will be granted without any further remarks on my part?

Major-General MEWBURN: I certainly will be pleased to concur in that, if I can get it done.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister explain the increase in the salaries of these two officials. One of them is apparently in the first division.

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes, in subdivision A of the first division. There are three statutory increases of $100 each. Mr. Brown has gone up as chief accountant, and the other is Mr. Lewis, who appears here as assistant secretary of the militia council, with a salary of $2,800. He was formerly in subdivision B of the first division at the same salary.

Contingencies—Sundries, $11,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What does this item include?

Major-General MEWBURN: Telegraph and telephone communications from different parts, cablegrams, etc. I have not the details here, but I can get them for my hon. friend if he desires.

Progress reported.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. F. B. Carvell (Minister of Public Works), Bill No. 40, to amend the Public Works Act, was read the second time.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

Hon. F. B. Carvell (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 41, to amend Navigable Waters Protection Act. He said: I had intended to ask for the second reading of this Bill, but if my hon. friends think it is time to adjourn I will not press it.

Mr. BUREAU: We do not object to giving the Bill its second reading provided it is distinctly understood that if we object to the principle of the Bill, we can discuss the principle in Committee.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. member can discuss anything in Committee. I could not keep him from discussing it if I wanted to.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister flatters me, but I should like that distinctly understood, because the other day we had understood the Prime Minister to aquiesce in a similar request, he objected to the principle of a Bill being discussed in Committee. If, therefore, it is distinctly understood that we can discuss the principle of this Bill in Committee, if we so desire, we shall have no objection to agreeing to the second reading.

Mr. CARVELL: I am perfectly willing to agree to that proposal.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Carvell the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Wednesday, April 10, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

VACANCY IN ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF LANARK.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Lanark by the decease of Adelbert E. Hanna, Esquire. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

PROPOSAL BY Mr. SPEAKER TOWARDS EFFECTING ECONOMY IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the extremely severe financial pressure due to the present war, I have thought it proper to endeavour to effect such economies in connection with the management of the business of the House as may be secured without injuriously affecting its prompt and efficient conduct. To this end I appointed a committee of three of the senior officers of the House to look into the question of the parliamentary printing. This committee has made a report recommending that the Votes and Proceedings and the Journals should be consolidated. The committee believes that in this way, while a full and proper record of the proceedings of the House would be preserved, that a very large saving would result. I beg to suggest, therefore, that the House appoint a small committee of three experienced members to consider whether this proposal should be adopted. It is not intended to make any change this session, but during the coming recess to work out the details of the scheme, and to begin the new arrangement next session.

I may also inform the House that I purpose, myself, to immediately make a very full inquiry into the duties and organization of the staff of the House, the result of which I shall communicate to the House in due course.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In accordance with the proposal which has just been made by Mr. Speaker I move, seconded by Sir George Foster, that a committee composed of Messrs. Pardee, Nickle, and Lemieux, be appointed to consider and report upon the question of consolidating the Votes and Proceedings and Journals of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The committee as proposed is quite acceptable, but I would suggest that the name of Mr. Currie, of Simcoe, be added. That hon. gentleman presented a very valuable report upon a similar question last session, which perhaps did not receive the consideration it merited. Doubtless the new committee will find a good deal of information in the report referred to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall be very glad to add Mr. Currie's name.

Motion as amended agreed to

MILITIA COUNCIL REPORT.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): I lay on the table of the House the report of the militia council for the year ended 31st March, 1917. Also a memorandum prepared by the Department of Militia and Defence covering the year 1916. I ascertained that this memorandum was not brought down last year, and while it contains the same information with respect to the establishment and organization of the department that would be available now, an additional memorandum has been prepared which is not yet printed, but which will be distributed as soon as completed.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING BANKRUPTCY.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It has been suggested that the second reading of the Bill respecting Bankruptcy should be taken pro forma in order that it may be referred to a special committee for the purpose of studying it. The second reading of the Bill under such conditions will not commit the House to the principle of the measure, or to any particular provision of it, but will afford an opportunity for the special committee to study the Bill and make their report with regard to it, and for the House to consider that report during the present session should time permit.

Mr S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I beg to move second reading of this Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move, seconded by Sir George Foster, that Bill No. 25 respecting bankruptcy be referred to a special committee to be composed of Messrs. Guthrie, Nesbitt, Cockshutt, Redman, Mowat, Henders, Thomson (Qu'Appelle), Nickle, Green, Jacobs, McMaster, Ross, Lapointe (Kamouraska). Leduc and Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysboro) with power to report from time to time, and that the said committee have leave to sit during the time that the House in in session.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the House do now return to Motions.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the House do now proceed to Notices of Motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Order No. 13 has been on the Order Paper for some time, and embodies a proposal which I think it would be very well for the House to adopt. In the absence of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), I beg to move on his behalf that the motion be passed in the following terms, leaving out some unnecessary words in order to make it effective:

That a Special Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the Pension Board, the Pension Regulations and the sufficiency or otherwise of the relief afforded thereunder, the Pension lists in force in Canada for disabled and other soldiers and the dependents of those killed while on active service, and any other matters relating thereto or connected therewith, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the House do now return to Motions.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 48, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Explain.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS: The proposed amendment will not affect the principle of the Act at all, but it has been found, in administering the Act, that it might be made materially more useful if some amendment were made touching the procedure under it. There are quite a number of such changes, and I do not suppose the House desires me at this stage to go into all the details.

Mr. MURPHY: Will they call for an increased staff?

Mr. CROTHERS: No.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

ENROLMENTS AND EXEMPTIONS.

Mr. MacNUTT:

1. What is the total number of "draftees" under the "Military Service Act," up to 1st February, 1918?
2. How many were exempted for farm work?
3. How many were declared "medically unfit?"
4. What disposition has been made of the "medically unfit?"

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to define his question a little more clearly. It is difficult to determine what he contemplates by "draftees." Does he contemplate men eligible for service and ordered to report, or men who have been actually enrolled? It makes a difference not only as to the first question, but as to what is apparently contemplated by the other questions. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would let me know exactly what he wants.

LEASES OF PROPERTY AT QUEBEC.

Mr. POWER:

1. Has the Department of Justice leased any property in Quebec for the purposes of the Military Service Act since the first of July, 1917?
2. If so, what rental is being paid, from whom was such property leased, and on whose recommendation?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.

2. 209 John street, from Berlinquette Estate, on rental of $115 per month; lease expires 1st May prox. 217 John street, from Joseph Vincent of the Cummings Estate; leased by the late District Military Representative and taken over by the Deputy Registrar at Quebec and used as Police Headquarters: rental $50 per month; lease expires 1st May prox. The Auditorium, leased from the Auditorium Company, Limited, at a rental of $375 per month, from the 1st February, 1918: lease terminated 30th ultimo, as the premises were gutted by fire started by rioters and are wholly uninhabitable. Early in January it was found that the John street properties were wholly inadequate for the working requirements and the proper housing of the staff, and it was then arranged to move into larger quarters in the Auditorium building. On Tuesday, the 2nd April, temporary quarters were secured from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the new wing of the Chateau Frontenac on the seventh and eighth floors, at a rental of $1,000 per month. The John street properties were leased by the Deputy Registrar at Quebec, Mr. A. Gobeil, K.C.; the Auditorium on the authority of the Military Service Council and the Chateau Frontenac on the recommendation of the Director of the Military Service Branch.

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. LESAGE:

1. Has the Military Service Act, respecting medical examinations, been amended by Order in Council?
2. If not, is the medical examination sworn to and made by the family physician, still given the same consideration under the Act, as if said examination were made by a military medical officer?
3. Is the Government aware that, in many cases, no consideration is given to the medical certificate of a family physician, and that in most all cases said certificates are given only a minor consideration by the Military Medical Boards?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to check such abuses, and concede the consideration which a responsible medical profession deserves?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No.

2. Where difference arises between report of Military Medical Board and other physicians, the Exemption Tribunals may refer the case to a Board of Revision composed of civilian and military physicians.

3. No.

4. The Government is not aware that any abuse exists.

PAYMENTS TO MEMBERS OF EXEMPTION TRIBUNALS.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. What is causing delay in the payment of amounts due members of local Exemption Tribunals?

2. What amount is paid citizens who filled such offices, and on what basis?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Their large number and the numerous cases where unjustified charges are made, necessitating careful checking and delay in adjustment.

2. Five dollars a day each day's sitting up to 7th day of January, where remuneration is asked for, plus reasonable expense.

BRITISH EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. SMITH:

Is it the intention of the Government to urge the repeal of the Act of 1896 so that Canadian cattle will be allowed into Great Britain?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The information called for by this question is set forth in the following extract from a discussion on the subject which took place at the Imperial War Conference on the 26th day of April, 1917. This discussion was embodied in a return laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom in September last, and also laid before the Parliament of Canada at the last session, and which reads:

Imperial War Conference, 1917.

Extracts from Discussions at the Imperial War Conference on the Admission of Canadian Cattle into the United Kingdom.

NOTE.—The discussion took place on the Fourteenth Day, Thursday, 26th April 1917. (See p. 113 of Minutes of Proceedings in [Cd 8566.].)

Mr. Rogers: Mr. Chairman, yesterday, when the Resolution presented by Sir Albert Stanley from the Board of Trade came before this Conference, a Resolution which was, in my judgment, very proper and very desirable from all points of view, he was able to make no mention of beef imported from the Dominion of Canada, and my purpose in bringing the matter up is to draw attention to the fact that this was entirely due to the action on the part of the Board of Agriculture in placing an embargo as against Canadian cattle because of alleged pleuro-pneumonia in a shipment of Canadian cattle to England in the year 1892. Now, as I understand, it was shown conclusively that the allegation was erroneous, and that it was irregular to create the embargo and to put it in force; but later it was made statutory. Since that date I may say, for the information of the Conference, that over 3,000,000 head of cattle have been shipped from Canada and slaughtered on arrival in Great Britain, and no single case of disease has been discovered. Now you can understand that this is a condition which we complain of very seriously, and we have made several appeals with respect to it. Later on we got an answer through his Excellency the Governor General of that day, Lord Grey, giving us a copy of a letter from the Board of Agriculture, in which it was stated that the experience of foreign countries had shown how suddenly and unexpectedly foot-and-mouth disease made its appearance, irrespective of an efficient veterinary organisation.* That goes to show that the Board of Agriculture were not able to support the ground upon which they placed an embargo against all Canadian cattle originally, and shifted their ground in making this statement that in foreign countries experience went to show that very suddenly and unexpectedly foot-and-mouth disease could develop. This has had a very detrimental effect in Canada. This, of course, intensifies the feeling that a great injustice has been done by the Board of Agriculture as against the Dominion of Canada in respect of the cattle industry, and when this Resolution was presented by Sir Albert Stanley, we felt that it was an opportune moment to bring this matter to the attention of the Conference, in order to see if it would be possible for us to have redress. I may say that our Minister of Agriculture, in a letter on the question, states that our cattle are as healthy as any cattle in the world, and during the three outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in the United States, which have occurred since the embargo was placed, Canada has been able to maintain her herds absolutely free from infection. From the point of view of disease, therefore, I feel very strongly that there is every justification for the removal of this embargo. Of course, we naturally argue that this embargo has been placed as a matter of policy by the Board of Agriculture for the purpose of the development of the British live cattle industry. If the Board of Agriculture conceive it to be their duty and to be in the public interest of Great Britain to have a policy of protection of their live cattle industry, then we would have no complaint and offer no objection; but we do seriously complain in that an embargo is placed against our cattle which supplies this protection and carries with it the stigma that they are liable to have pleuro-pneumonia, and, therefore we suffer not only in this market but more or less in the markets of the United States. I think it is due to Canada—and I think this is the proper time when we should ask this Conference—to take some definite action in order that this wrong may be remedied, so that our Canadian cattle shall have the same consideration and be received in Great Britain without having to go through the embargo that has been placed upon them by the action of the Board of Agriculture.

You, Mr. Long, were good enough to suggest that you would like to see present here a representative of the Board of Agriculture when the matter came up, and the discussion on the point was adjourned from yesterday for that purpose. I am glad that the representatives of that Department are here to-day, and if they have any explanation to offer, or any reason why this embargo should be continued in the future, then of course we would like to know it and to understand it in order that we may be able to explain it, at all events, when we go back to Canada, because it is a very very very live question and one in which our people take the very deepest interest. Probably you will remember, Mr. Long, that I had this matter up with you some days ago, and you sent me a letter to say "Mr. Prothero suggests, therefore, that further discussion on the matter should be deferred until after the War, when the representations of the Canadian Government can be brought forward for reconsideration." But we do not like to feel that we are misunderstood or that our cattle industry is suffering from a reputation that never did exist, and a stigma which never ought to have been attached. Therefore, if there is any explanation to be given on the part of the Board of Agriculture, we shall be very glad indeed to hear it.

Mr. Prothero: Of course you know in this country we are very panicky about outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia, and you quite correctly state that the case on which the policy was founded dates right back to 1892. I had up the papers which relate to the alleged outbreak in 1892, and as far as I could see it was not a case of pleuro-pneumonia at all. The case upon which this embargo was founded—it is not quite correctly stated as an embargo, because cattle are allowed to be landed provided they are slaughtered at the landing—dates right back to 1892. As I say, I had the papers up before me this morning, and I think the papers show that the alleged case on which the embargo was founded is extremely doubtful as to its being pleuro-pneumonia. I also believe that at the present moment and for many years past, as far as I can make out, Canada has been free from the disease, and on those grounds therefore we should receive the present suggestion for the removal of the embargo very sympathetically. As far as I personally am concerned, and so far as the English Board of Agriculture is concerned, after the War is over, of course, because it is not an economical mode of bringing meat to this country during the War to bring over live animals, we should, I consider, be wise to remove the embargo, and I think for this reason in the main: The home demand for store cattle in the eastern counties has been rather imperfectly met for many years past. On the other hand, there has been a considerable increase in breeding in this country; but if we have, what I think we shall have, a large extension of the arable farming in this country, we shall want to increase our reservoir for store cattle. Of course, your Canadian cattle will come over as what we call "stores," that is to say, they are to be fed and fattened here in England. We shall want a great many more store cattle if we have this great extension of arable farming; we shall want more animals to trample the straw and eat the root crops. At the same time there are signs that we shall not get the same number of store cattle from Ireland as heretofore.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

You will understand—I do not know whether there is a representative of the Irish Department here—that the main opposition, at least one strong line of opposition, to the introduction of Canadian stores is that the Irishman is afraid that it is going to cut into his trade in store cattle with this country. Well, Ireland is advancing most rapidly in its agricultural development. If we get cattle from Ireland they will increasingly come over here in the form of finished, fully fed cattle. Therefore the supply of Irish store cattle is likely to diminish, and in that case again the fact that we can turn to Canada for store cattle will be of great advantage to us, and I can assure you that so far as the English Board of Agriculture is concerned, we are in favour of the removal of the embargo. We do not believe that there is now, or has been for a good many years past, the slightest ground to exclude Canadian cattle on the score of disease. I do not know—I am afraid you know a great deal better than I do—but any statistics I have seen as to disease in Canada show me that you have been remarkably free from it. That is so, is it not?

Sir Robert Borden: That is absolutely so.

Mr. Prothero: Therefore, that is the answer that I would like to make you. I am afraid I ought to consult the Irish Department, because they may make difficulties, but I do not think they will, because, as I say, the whole development of Irish farming is in favour of the breaking up of these great grass ranches on which the store cattle were grazed, and from which they were sent over. Instead of that they are adopting the finishing system, upon which, of course, there is very much more money to be made and much more profit agriculturally in other ways to the farmer.

Sir Robert Borden: Mr. Prothero, may I ask a question purely for information: Is the statute or the regulation which constitutes the so-called embargo applicable to all countries or is it only applicable to certain countries?

Mr. Prothero: It is applicable to all countries. I believe it was passed by Mr. Walter Long in 1896.

Chairman: It was.

Mr. Rogers: Are you quite sure, Mr. Prothero, that it applies to all countries?

Mr. Prothero: It does. I mean that it is a broad general principle, but we can admit animals in exceptional cases from time to time. I think that is the case.

Sir Robert Borden: We appreciate very much your sympathetic attitude with regard to the matter, Mr. Prothero. As to postponing it until after the end of the War, I am not so much impressed by the consideration put forward, because, assuming the absence of tonnage, nothing would come forward in any case until that shortage is relieved. As far as Canada is concerned, I do not want it understood that we desire to interfere in any way with the fiscal policy of the United Kingdom. If it is thought desirable here that the cattle industry should be protected, whether in Ireland, or England, or Scotland, or Wales, that is a matter of domestic concern for the United Kingdom, about which we do not desire to make any suggestion; but what has been felt in Canada, whether rightly or wrongly, is this, that under the guise of a sanitary regulation you have succeeded in carrying out a fiscal policy—

Chairman; It was said just now that I was responsible for this policy, for advising the Government. It certainly was not that at all, nor did we accept the view (which my friend Mr. Prothero has said obtained twenty years afterwards) that we had not abundant evidence. There was a difference of opinion between your scientific people and ours. Our people held a strong view about it. There was a great agitation in this country about disease, particularly pleuro-pneumonia, and our scientific people differed from yours.

Mr. Rogers: A Commission was appointed to go into the facts of the whole case, and they decided that there was no ground for the action which was taken.

Chairman: Your people held one view and ours the other.

Sir Robert Borden: I think Mr. Prothero has put it very moderately when he says that it was at least a doubtful case. I should say there was not any substantial evidence at all of disease in Canada. There was only one instance adduced, and the experts were divided upon that. We sought an independent investigation outside Canada, and that investigation convinced us that there was absolutely nothing in it, and from that time up to the present not a single case has developed in Canada so far as I am aware, whereas numerous instances of disease have developed in the United Kingdom during that time. As far as sanitary regulations are concerned, there would be far more reason for us to put an embargo against British cattle coming to Canada than there would for Great Britain to impose an embargo upon Canadian cattle coming here. Whether rightly or wrongly, the impression does exist in Canada, that it was more the carrying out of a fiscal policy than the enforcement of a sanitary regulation. I know that view impressed itself upon the members of the late Administration, and we are not free from it ourselves.

Chairman: Sir Charles Tupper held that view.

Sir Robert Borden: Yes, and the members of the late Administration held that view; the Canadian Minister of Agriculture I am quite sure held that view. If it is desired to protect the cattle industry in the United Kingdom, let it be done; that is a matter of domestic concern; but do not accomplish it by the enforcement of a regulation which casts an undeserved slur upon conditions in Canada.

I am sure we are all very much obliged to Mr. Prothero for the sympathetic consideration he has given to the subject, and, as it is a matter of sentiment with us as well as a matter of material consideration, I hope it may be possible for him to reach the conclusion that it is not necessary to await the termination of hostilities before taking action for this purpose; but that, of course, is for him to decide. I only offer a strong suggestion along that line.

Chairman: Of course you could get publicity given to the thing by having a question asked in the House of Commons, without passing any statute. As far as I am concerned, as my name has been brought into it I can only say that I entirely agree with Mr. Prothero's policy. I think the time that has elapsed has shown that Canada has had a complete and clean bill of health during that time. I am not concerned to defend my share of the policy, though I was personally responsible as Minister, but it is fair to my advisers at that time—I am sorry to say I am afraid they are no longer alive even—to say that they disagreed with the advisers of the Canadian Government. Sir Charles Tupper was Minister for Agriculture, I think.

Mr. Rogers: No, he was the High Commissioner.

Chairman: Perhaps I mean his son.

Mr. Rogers: He was never Minister of Agriculture. It was Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, who took the matter up and took a deep interest in it.

Chairman: That is our old friend who died the other day.

Mr. Rogers: Yes.

Chairman: No, I mean another Tupper, one of the sons. I thought he was Minister for Agriculture. He came over here, saw Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary for the Colonies, and then came to see me. There was a difference between the technical experts on both sides. In Canada they held that there was no justification; whereas our experts took the opposite view, and they held further that as it was possible for cattle to pass from the United States of America into Canada and they frequently did pass, and as in the United States there was risk of disease, they ought to be fortified here. That was the view that prevailed, and it was really a case for the experts, who were not fiscal reformers at all; they differed, and we followed our experts. I think, however, subsequent experience has shown that Canada has an absolutely clean bill of health.

Mr. Rogers: Yes, and we had it even in that case. They slaughter them now at the dock immediately they arrive.

Mr. Prothero: There is one point I might mention. I think, if I might use a slang phrase, we were rather "jumpy" at that time about cattle plague, because just before 1896, when this new legislation was made, we had been bringing in cattle from Argentina, and on the voyage a whole shipload of cattle were discovered to be actually suffering from foot-and-mouth disease. That was no doubt one of the reasons why we made this more drastic alteration, but we could, not by legislation but merely by an order of the Board of Agriculture, put Canada into the free list to-day.

Mr. Rogers: Then for Heaven's sake why do not they do it?

Chairman: I think that is not so. I have not looked into this thing for twenty years, and I think that that was exactly the sin I committed from the point of view of Canada. I think before the passing of the Act of 1896, to which we are now referring, you could do this by Order in Council. At that time, as Mr. Prothero has said, there was the gravest apprehension here with regard to our cattle industry. It was extremely important to our English cattle-breeders to increase the number of cattle in the country. We had from the year 1865 or 1866, right away down to the nineties, a succession of outbreaks of various diseases, foot-and-mouth and pleuro-pneumonia, and the demand of the cattle-breeders in this country was that they should be protected against disease, however slight the risk might be. That was a demand which was backed by experts. That was the real history of it. I think that removed from the Board of Agriculture the power to put countries on the free list. I think you will find that you will have to repeal the Act of Parliament, but I speak subject to correction.

Mr. Prothero: I am afraid I have not looked at the Act on this specific point. I was not quite sure what point I was supposed to address myself to, but I will look into it, and if we do take any action I do not see why it should not be taken at once, especially if we cannot put it into operation until after the war is over.

Mr. Rogers: How do you mean, you cannot put it into operation?

Mr. Prothero: Because there are no ships.

Mr. Rogers: We do not object to that, but remove the stigma against us from which we are suffering.

Chairman: Now the position is that the restriction is to be removed, and the Board of Agriculture will take such steps as are necessary for this purpose, but upon the understanding that, there being no tonnage, there cannot be any arrivals.

Mr. Rogers: I do not want to have any understanding about it. If there is no tonnage, that follows.

Chairman: No, I do not want it to be a misunderstanding.

Sir Robert Borden: It cannot become effective because there is no tonnage.

Chairman: We cannot do it; I am quite sure that the Shipping Controller would stop it at once, and he would say, "We cannot let live cattle come because they take up too much room."

Sir Robert Borden: We perfectly understand that.

Mr. Rogers: Yes, but still, we do not want to be placed in a false position. This is an old sore and an old grievance, and now is the proper time to have it cured, because the facts are all in our favour.

Chairman: The Minister of Agriculture has undertaken to do it.

Mr. Rogers: Do not you think we should have a Resolution about it?

Chairman: You do not want a Resolution, do you—or if you like you can simply move that the embargo on Canadian cattle be removed as speedily as possible.

Mr. Rogers: I beg to move that.

Chairman: Mr. Prothero accepts that, and there is an end of it.

Mr. Hazen: I think as we have a statement from the President of the Board of Agriculture that this restriction will be removed, and that he does not see why it should not be done at once, we might leave it there.

Mr. Massey: Does this embargo apply to Canada only, or to all overseas countries?

Chairman: All overseas countries.

Mr. Hazen: You do not ship cattle from New Zealand; it is too far.

Mr. Massey: They did ship cattle from Australia, but we never ship them from New Zealand.

Hon. J. D. REID:

The following is the information in so far as the Department of Railways and Canals is concerned:

DETENTION OF FREIGHT CARS IN UNITED STATES.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware of the fact that a number of cars belonging to the different railways in Canada are being detained by the American authorities?

2. Has the Government any statement of the number of said cars so detained, and the length of time they have been held?

3. Has the Government taken any steps in order to obtain from the American authorities release of the said cars? If so, when, and how many cars have been thus returned to Canada?

4. Is the Government to take any further steps for the immediate return of the remainder of said cars in the United States?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The Government is aware of the fact that a number of Canadian owned cars have been detained for a considerable length of time in the United States.

2. The Government has not got any information showing how long each car has been in the United States and it would be a very heavy matter to have each Canadian railroad prepare such information, but it does know that some of the cars have been detained in the United States for a considerable length of time.

On March 15, 1918, stood as follows:

	Due Canadian Rys.	Due U.S. Rys.
Box cars	18,146
Auto, refrigerator, flat and stock cars.....	5,531
Open top cars		9,407

Approximately 4,500 of the open top cars cannot be used for loading, as they came in with coal under an arrangement that they would be returned to the United States just as soon as made empty.

3. The Minister of Railways and Canals has had the matter up on several occasions with the Director General of the United States railways; the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence has also had the matter up on several occasions with the Regional Director of the United States railways as well as with the Car Service Section of the United States railways. The secretary of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence interviewed the Regional Director of the United States railways in New York on Friday last and was promised that a movement of empty cars to Canada would be immediately arranged. For some considerable time there has not been much change in the standing of the interchange balance.

4. The matter will not be allowed to drop and every means taken to obtain the desired end.

3. What position did these men formerly occupy?

4. What was the fee, if any, paid to said officers for each draftee arrested?

Major-General MEWBURN: In so far as the Department of Militia and Defence is concerned, there is no officer specially employed in connection with the Military Service Act.

3. What remuneration does each of said officers and assistants receive per month or per day, or for each conscripted man so informed against or apprehended?

Major-General MEWBURN: So far as the Department of Militia and Defence is concerned, no officer is specially employed in connection with the Military Service Act. It is, however, part of the duties of the Acting Provost Marshal and his military police to assist in the apprehension of defaulters under the Act.

ROYALTIES ON COAL.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

Is it the intention of the Government to remove the royalties on coal mines in the Dominion of Canada, other than those removed from the Yukon coal mines by Order in Council of the 17th day of March, 1918?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government has no proposal for the removal of the royalties on coal. The Order in Council of March 17 provided merely for the continuance of a practice that has been in force for five years.

CANADIAN FREIGHT CARS IN U.S.

*Mr. PARENT:

1. Has the Government, by itself or through the agency of a Commission or some party, taken steps for the return to Canada of freight cars in the United States at the present time, belonging to Canadian railways? If so, what steps have been taken?

2. Through whom, and to whom, have representations been made?

3. What has been the result?

4. Has the Government provided that in future the freight cars owned by Canadian railways shall not be unduly detained in the United States to be used in the operation of railways in that country?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Yes. The matter has been taken up by the Minister of Railways with the Hon. Mr. McAdoo, Director General of the United States Railways; the Regional Director of the United States Railways and the Car Service Section of the United States Railways; with the Canadian War Board at Washington, the Canadian Railway National Defence Association, and the railways have been doing all they could of their own initiative.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. We have not yet secured the return of sufficient Canadian cars or of the delivery of enough United States equipment to offset the Canadian cars.

4. There is no way by which the Government can exercise any jurisdiction over Canadian cars when they are in the United States. In order to prevent any further number getting away from Canada, some time ago all Canadian railways refused to allow their cars to be loaded for United States points, except in case of great emergency.

CANADIAN NORTHERN PHYSICAL ASSETS.

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Has any inventory been made of the physical assets of the Canadian Northern railway of Canada since the month of September, 1917, or within a year prior thereto?

2. If so, who made the inventory and when was it made?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to have one made in the near future? If not, why?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. An inventory was made of the physical assets of Canadian Northern railway by Professor Swain and is dated March 10, 1917. Full copy of report is included in Report of Royal Commission to Inquire into Railways and Transportation, and which was laid on the Table of the House.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. An announcement will be made in due course after report of Arbitration Board has been received.

WAR GRANT, $500,000,000.

THE PRIME MINISTER GIVES DETAILS OF WAR EXPENDITURE AND MAJOR GENERAL MEWBURN EXPLAINS MILITARY ESTIMATES.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38 for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I proposed the second reading of a Bill very much the same as this in February, 1917, and I had then great hope that it would never be necessary to propose in this House a vote for war purposes of so large an amount. Unfortunately, the duration of the war has greatly exceeded the anticipations we had at that time, and the present is a moment when the greatest effort of the nation seems to be required.

It is not necessary, I hope, for me to say anything in support of the principle which this Bill embodies. It is, however, most desirable—indeed, absolutely necessary—that full information as to expenditure during the past year and estimates for the coming year should be afforded to the House in order that they may consider whether or not the Bill in its present form should be approved. It is precisely in the same form as the Bill which passed this House last year. I propose, therefore, if it meets the view of hon. gentlemen opposite and of the House in general, that the House go into committee on the Bill, whereupon I shall give such information as is available with regard to the expenditure of the past and the estimate for the future. I shall endeavour to have that information placed upon Hansard in a form which will be quite intelligible. After I have discharged that duty, the Minister of Militia and Defence will give a statement to the committee setting forth information more especially upon the military side of the questions that are involved. We shall then be very glad to have suggestions from hon. gentlemen as to any further information that may be desired. I would then propose that the committee should rise and report progress, in order that the information thus spread upon the pages of Hansard may be taken into account with a view to further consideration of the Bill in committee on another day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The suggestion of the Prime Minister, in so far as the method of giving information to the House is concerned, is quite acceptable. In order to facilitate business, the information which is usually conveyed to the House in a resolution was postponed until the second reading of the Bill. We on this side of the House shall reserve our right to criticise the main features of the Bill, after the information promised has been received, when the Bill comes up again for discussion.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

On Section 1—short title:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before the Bill is considered section by section, it is desirable that I shall set forth, so far as it is available, the information to which I alluded in speaking upon the motion for the second reading. It is important that the committee should be informed of the war expenditures from the commencement so far as the returns have been received. Hon. gentlemen will, of course, realize that full particulars and details as to expenditures overseas are not available for some months after the expenditure has taken place.

The expenditure overseas has, naturally and necessarily, been under the direct supervision of the Auditor General. I think about two years ago we conferred with the Auditor General as to the desirability of his having special officers on the spot in England to audit the expenditures over there. We gave him an absolutely free hand. We told him to appoint for that purpose officers who should be resident overseas, and, if necessary, to establish a branch of his office in London for that work. He did send an officer or officers overseas, who remained there for some months, but I believe they have since returned, as he did not think it necessary that they should remain there during the past winter. Thus, all the expenditure that has taken place in the United Kingdom and France has been very directly and thoroughly under the supervision of the Auditor General in that way.

The total expenditure, on account of the war during the fiscal year 1914-15, the fiscal year 1915-16, the fiscal year 1916-17, and the fiscal year 1917-18, is detailed in a statement which I have under my hand and which has been approved by the Deputy Minister of Finance. In order that it may appear upon Hansard for the information of the members of the committee, I shall read it. It is in four columns, giving the department and the year, and also setting forth the expenditure of each department in each year.

It should be borne in mind, however, that it is only possible to give for the present year the totals of the items which have passed through the books of the Department of Finance up to date. Very large items chargeable to the past fiscal year, especially with regard to the overseas forces, may be expected to come in for a considerable time, yet, even as late as the end of June.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the details of the expenditure for the year 1917-18 be available to the committee?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will make them available as far as we can. Of course, my hon. friend understands that the Auditor General's Report has not yet been prepared. We will give all information that is presently available.

Mr. MURPHY: Will it be possible to supplement that by a statement, such as was afforded us last year and the year before, of the expenditure in addition to the information contained in the Auditor-General's Report?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We did give some such statement as that to which my hon. friend alludes. I have some of that information now in connection with the estimates for the coming year. A very careful estimate has been made which I shall give to the committee in a few moments and that contains pretty full information as to the character of the expenditure which has been incurred during the past and previous years and which will have to be incurred during the year upon which we have just entered. I am just reminded by the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence that the report of the Militia Council, which has just been laid on the Table, and which will be distributed at once, contains information up to the 31st of March, 1917. As far as it is possible to supplement that in regard to the expenditure during the past fiscal year we shall give the information, of course.

Now, with respect to the character of the expenditure of the various departments during the past fiscal year and the estimated expenditure for the fiscal year upon which we have entered, it will be possible for me to make a statement in tabulated form. I hope hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that with respect to the expenditure during the past year there may be some discrepancy between the report which is given to me from the several departments and the report which I have just read from the Department of Finance because some of the items which have been paid may not yet have gone through the books of the Finance Department. The report from the Department of Agriculture is as follows:

EXPENDITURE BY DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Expenditure	$63,001 10
Estimated Expenditure		$317,000 00

The items of the expenditure of $63,001.10, as presented to me by the Department of Agriculture are as follows:

Exemption representatives, expenditure	$11,155 38
Unpaid accounts	3,260 00
Total		$14,415 38
Bacon-hog Campaign, expenditure	23,763 60
Unpaid accounts	2,135 35
Total		25,898 51
Salaries of substitutes, expenditure		16,644 76
Representatives at Leave-of-Absence Boards, expenditure	542 45
Unpaid accounts	5,500 00
Total		6,042 45
Grand total		$63,001 10

The estimated amount required by the Department of Agriculture for 1919 shows an increase of $280,000, consisting of allowance for substitutes, $17,000; representatives at leave of absence board, $20,000, or a total of $317,000.

The next item is Canada registration board. The estimate for the expenditure of that board is $1,000,000. The minister in charge, Hon. G. D. Robertson, informs me that voluntary service may reduce this amount by one-third, and he hopes it will be so reduced.

The next item is Customs. The expenditure during the past year was $10,000; the estimate for the coming year is $10,000, and it comprises salaries and expenses of certain officers employed to enforce the prohibiting orders respecting exports and imports under the War Measures Act.

The next item is for the Department of External Affairs. The expenditure for the past year, as reported to me, is $19,914.46. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $35,000, and the increase is due to the transfer of the Prime Minister's office from the Privy Council to External Affairs.

The Department of Finance is next. The expenditure during the past year reported to me is $38,847. The estimate for the coming year is $60,000, and the increase is largely attributable to the newsprint commission.

The next item is with regard to immigration and colonization. The expenditure during the past fiscal year is, roughly speaking, $30,000. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $35,470. The actual expenditure from May 24 to February 28 last 4 p.m. was $22,228.64. The increased expenditure has been occasioned by closer inspection at the American border, under Order in Council number 1433, to prevent men eligible for military duty from leaving the country.

Department of the Interior. The expenditure during the past fiscal year was $96,670, and the estimate for the present fiscal year is $100,000, or about the same amount. The expenditure is altogether, or nearly altogether, in the payment of substitutes for men who would have enlisted and gone overseas.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Can the hon. gentleman tell me what is meant by "substitutes?" I have a statement of expenditure before me, and the figures do not correspond. I see an item, "Interior, salaries for substitutes," $1,100,000 for this year and for the past year the estimate is larger. I have before me the paper the right hon. gentleman sent to me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Possibly I may have been reading the wrong column. The figures are a little out of line. I see, on looking at the items, that the right hon. leader of the Opposition is reading the wrong column. With reference to his question, I may say that when men applied for leave of absence to enlist and go overseas it was necessary to provide temporary substitutes to do their work in a great many cases, and this amount in connection with the Department of the Interior is for that purpose, because a very large number of men, from both the inside and outside service went over.

The Department of Justice. The expenditure for the past year was $1,470,000 and the estimate for the present fiscal year is $1,100,000. The cost of internment operations has been reduced from an annual charge of $1,230,000 to about $600,000. There are a few increases in other items of that department, but on the whole there is a net estimated decrease of $370,000.

Department of Labour. The expenditure during the past year is $39,480.22. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $75,000. The increase is due to the increased staff required for investigations.

Department of Marine and Fisheries. The expenditure during the past year was $569,297.98. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $34,735,470. The increase is due altogether to the shipbuilding programme, which is being paid for out of the war appropriation.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Department of Naval Service. The expenditure during the past year was $10,662,981.91. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $19,000,000, and the increase is due to a large increase in all directions of naval activities which have been considered absolutely necessary, after a very careful study, and very many conferences with the British Admiralty and very high naval authorities, who have been sent to this country for the purpose of such conference.

Post Office Department. The expenditure during the past year was $900,000. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $600,000. The explanation of that decrease is that an amount of $300,000, which was asked for to cover salaries of substitutes for men who might enlist, will not be required, as no salaries have been paid to men who have enlisted or been drafted since the Military Service Act was passed.

Privy Council. The expenditure during the past year was roughly speaking $30,000. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $15,000, and the reduction is due to the transfer of the Prime Minister's staff from the Privy Council to External Affairs.

Department of Public Works. The expenditure during the past year was $217,500. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $3,664,000. This is due almost altogether to the necessity of further buildings for military hospital accommodation. Those buildings are being constructed by the Department of Public Works. It it also due, to some extent, to the repairs to Government property, damaged or destroyed by the explosion at Halifax.

Department of Railways and Canals. The expenditure during the past fiscal year was $1,150,000, and the estimate for the present fiscal year is $700,000. The difference is accounted for by the fact that an item of $450,000 had to be appropriated to make good the damage to the railway by the Halifax explosion. That item will not be necessary for the present fiscal year.

Department of the Secretary of State. The expenditure during the past fiscal year was $82,106.05. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $60,000. There is a decrease of about $29,000 in printing and stationery, and some slight increases in other items, which together account for the difference.

Department of the Archives. The expenditure during the past fiscal year was $13,435, and the estimate for the fiscal year is $10,000. The expenditure is in relation to the War Archives Survey Commission and the War Trophy Exhibitions.

Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The expenditure during the past year in respect of matters that are now under the direction and control of that department was $9,303,294.80. The estimate for the present fiscal year is $12,000,000. A note which has been placed before me states that the expenditure of the military hospitals commission for eleven months ended February 28 was the amount that I have mentioned, $9,303,294.80. Of this amount $5,678,749 will not recur owing to the transfer, under Order in Council No. 433 passed on February 21 last, of certain branches of the Military Hospitals Commission, to the Departments of Militia and Defence and Public Works. The note further states that the expenditure for the coming year is difficult to estimate as a great deal depends upon casualties overseas, the rate of return of wounded and invalided soldiers until final discharge, and the number of men who may require re-education. However, the very best estimate that has been made is $1,000,000 a month, or $12,000,000 altogether.

Department of Trade and Commerce. The expenditure last year was $121,861.77, and the estimated expenditure for the present year is $286,864.29. The increased expenditure thus estimated is due to the establishment of the war trade board and the performance of the duties which it has undertaken, and also to larger expenditure by the fuel controller in the present fiscal year.

I come to the principal item, the expenditure by the Department of Militia and Defence, and I shall give to the Committee such information as I have available with regard to the expenditures both in this country and overseas in connection with the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that the Hospitals Commission is henceforward to be under the Militia Department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. What has been accomplished is this: The care and treatment of returned soldiers up to the time of their discharge, whether in hospital or otherwise, is now undertaken by the Department of Militia and Defence; but the care and treatment after their discharge, and many of them require care and treatment after discharge, is undertaken by the Invalided Soldiers' Commission, which is under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. The estimates that have been placed before me divide the proposed expenditure into that which will be incurred in Canada, and that which will be incurred overseas. In making this estimate the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence has looked to the enrolment during the year of one hundred thousand men in Canada for the purpose of supplying reinforcements to the forces at the front. The estimate which has been placed in my hands, and which I have discussed with him, is as follows:

It might be well to place before the committee, so that hon. gentlemen may have the opportunity of studying it, the explanatory note upon the estimate which I have just read.

The estimates of 1918-19 are based on the assumption that the operation of the Military Service Act will increase the number of troops raised in Canada to a total of 500,000, accounted for as follows:

First Draft, Military Service Act	100,000
Home Defence Force	10,000
In England	150,000
In France	140,000
Discharged after service at the front Killed, died of wounds, &c.	100,000
	500,000

The estimate of 150,000 troops in Great Britain might, perhaps, be misunderstood, if I did not explain the view set forth to me by the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence. It must be borne in mind that the troops in Great Britain comprise, in the first place, the Forestry Corps, which is carrying on important work in the United Kingdom; there is a considerable force of that corps doing such work in the United Kingdom. In the second place, it comprises all the wounded men who are in hospitals in various parts of the United Kingdom. In the third place, it also includes the men who, having become convalescent in the hospitals, are sent to the various camps in the United Kingdom in order that they may be trained again for service at the front. And, lastly, it includes all the troops that from time to time are sent from this country to Great Britain in order that they may be available as reinforcements for the front. It includes also a considerable number of men who are detained in Great Britain for the purpose of doing necessary work around the hospitals and the camps and for various purposes of that character, and so the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence has made his estimate based on these considerations.

The note goes on to say that the proposed expenditure in Canada amounts to $217,887,500, and it is estimated that $225,162,500 will be expended overseas, making a total of $443,050,000, which works out to an average of $1,107.62 per man. I recollect that, in the early days of the war, the statement was made to the House that the probable expenditure for keeping each man in the field for a year would be about one thousand dollars. This estimate is slightly in excess of that. The memorandum proceeds:

DETAILS.

Pay.—The average cost works out at $1.25 each per day for all ranks; deducting 100,000 for casualties as above, the daily cost for the 400,000 remaining on pay would be $500,000 or a total of $182,500,000 for a year. The increase in the amount of deferred pay for the troops Overseas is estimated at $8,000,000.

As men return in increasing numbers from the front, of course, deferred pay will become payable to them in increasing volume, and arrangements are under consideration by the Department of Militia and Defence as to the best manner in which that payment can be carried out so as to ensure that the deferred pay thus handed over will be employed by the men for some useful purpose. The memorandum proceeds:

The net amount required for pay would, therefore, be $174,500,000, of which $50,187,500 would be paid in Canada, in addition to $54,000,000 assigned pay of troops Overseas, and $70,312,500 would be paid in England.

Separation Allowance.—There are at present about 71,000 dependents in Canada receiving separation allowance. The allowance has been extended to dependent sisters and invalid fathers during the past year, and increased for rank and file from $20.00 to $25.00, making an average of about $26.75 a month for all ranks—This would amount to about $19,000,000 for the year, and allowance is being made in the estimate for possible increase in numbers.

There are also a number of soldiers' dependents in receipt of separation allowance who reside in the British Isles and are paid by the Chief Paymaster, Canadian Overseas Expeditionary Force. It is estimated that about $6,000,000 will be paid out by him on that account during 1918-19.

Rations.—This includes the allowance in lieu of rations and rations in kind. The average cost in Canada is 50 cents per day for each man, the average having increased by 15 cents over last year's estimate. For the troops in England the average cost of rations, billeting etc., is estimated at about 1/7 (38½ cents) per diem each for 150,000 men only, as 140,000 at least will be in France and rationed by the British Government.

Clothing, Necessaries, Accoutrements.—The estimate is for the outfitting of 100,000 troops at $64.00 each for clothing and necessaries, at $5 each for waist belt, water bottle and haversack to be supplied in Canada, and upkeep at $29 each for the first renewal after 6 months; and for the upkeep of clothing for the year of the remaining 160,000 men in Canada and England. Accoutrements, other than the three articles enumerated are supplied in England and in all probability will not be paid for until the end of the war. The upkeep of clothing for the troops in France is covered by the payment to the British Government of 9/4 a day each for their maintenance.

The arrangement made with the British Government in the autumn of 1916 was for a considerably less amount than nine shillings four pence each; I mentioned this to the House last year. After that arrangement had been in force some time, however, the British Government desired that it might be reopened, under an understanding which had been made when it was first entered into. The grounds upon which they based their request seemed to be reasonable, and I believe that the request has since been acceded to by the Commonwealth of Australia and the Dominion of New Zealand. The ground was this: at the time the arrangement was made no one had any conception of the tremendous expenditure for ammunition, especially ammunition for the field guns; there was no adequate conception of the number of shells that would be used in the tremendous battles that have since been waged. They gave us quite satisfactory evidence that some readjustment ought to be made of the amount of six shillings or thereabouts that had been first decided upon. I am not quite sure whether or not we have yet acceded to the proposal. It was thought when I was in England about a year ago that some further inquiry should be made and the most exact information procured before we should give our final assent to any change in an arrangement which had been made after very careful study and consideration. As I say, however, the other dominions have agreed to the change, and unless there is some good reason to the contrary—I know of none at the moment—it would appear desirable and even necessary that this country should adopt the course which has been adopted in Australia and New Zealand in that regard. When I went over this memorandum with the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, the question occurred to me as to why the cost here is greater than in England. He tells me that the rations of the troops in Canada are issued on a very generous scale, and include some articles that cannot possibly be provided in the United Kingdom. On that account—really on account of the food conditions in the United Kingdom and France—the ration with which the soldier is provided there costs less than the very ample ration which is provided in this country.

The memorandum continues:

It is estimated that $1,000,000 will be required to pay the proportion of the outfit allowance issued in Canada to officers, nursing sisters, and warrant officers, and that a further sum of $700,000 will be paid out by the Chief Paymaster, Overseas.

Equipment. This includes everything in the way of requirements in the field except what is provided for under other heads. This is based on previous expenditure but may or may not all be expended, depending on whether payment will be required by the British Government for articles supplied in England.

Ordnance Services (Overseas). This is to cover the upkeep of ordnance stores for the C.E.F. and all expenses connected with their purchase and distribution.

Medical Services (Overseas). For the purchase of medical equipment for hospitals and the upkeep of existing hospitals, field ambulances and clearing stations, with all incidental expenses such as bandages, drugs and special diets.

Ammunition. The estimate is for quantities manufactured by the Dominion and Lindsay Arsenals and purchased from the trade, the former being based on estimates from the respective superintendents and the latter on previous expenditure.

Machine Guns. The estimate of $2,000,000 is based on past expenditure.

Transport. The estimate of $15,675,000 is for the railway and ocean transport of 100,000 men eastbound and for 25,000 invalids westbound at $125.40 each. In addition to this sum it is estimated that $450,000 will be required by the Chief Paymaster Overseas for the payment of the travelling expenses of officers, N.C. officers and men on duty in the British Isles.

Railway transport of troops in England and ocean transport from England to the continent is provided by the British Government and will in all probability not be repaid them until the end of the war.

Forage. There are 2429 horses with the C.E. F. in Canada at the present time. Forage for these at the estimated rate of $180 each will cost $437,220 leaving a margin of $12,780 for any addition to the above number which may be made during the year.

Veterinary Services (Overseas). This estimate of $3,000,000 is for the purchase of remounts, cost of forage, and all expenses of a veterinary nature.

Engineer Works and Housing of troops. This includes the estimate of the M.G.O. for Canada with a slight increase for incidental services and $1,000,000 for rent, water, fuel and light. The estimate of $1,250,000 for Overseas includes $1,000,000 for rent, water, fuel, light, etc., and $250,000 for the erection of any new buildings which may be required for the accommodation of the troops.

Civilian Employees. There are 4,000 civilians, including clerks, paid from War Appropriation in Canada. The expenditure overseas under this head in 1916-17 was $473,553.43. The number of employees is now considerably increased, and some further increase may be expected in the coming year.

Sundry (Canada). This is to provide for the pay of censors, recruiting expenses, telegrams, cables, postage, printing and stationery, customs duty, funeral expenses, drugs, and all other expenditure not included under other heads.

Printing and Stationery (Overseas). For the purchase of office equipment and stationery and the printing of forms, books, etc.

General Expenses (Overseas). For the payment of all miscellaneous expenses not chargeable elsewhere, including expenditure in connection with mechanical transport, horse transport, Engineer services (other than new buildings) damage claims, cost of funerals, exchange, etc.

Maintenance of troops in France. This is to repay the British Government for the maintenance of 140,000 troops in France at the stipulated rate of 9/4 each per day.

I have already explained that the stipulated amount in the first instance was six shillings per day, but we have been asked to increase it to nine shillings four pence per day, for the reason already mentioned.

That is all the information with which I think I need trouble the committee at the moment. The Minister of Militia and Defence will follow me with a statement more directly connected with the military features of the situation, and afterwards we shall be glad indeed to have any inquiries from hon. gentlemen regarding any further available information which they may desire to have placed before the committee.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): I feel somewhat diffident in appearing before the House to give an explanation of the war policy of the Government, because I realize fully the magnitude of the task, and I would, therefore, bespeak for myself the usual generous indulgence extended to a new member. This is the fifth occasion since the war began on which war estimates have been presented to the House. In dealing with the whole situation, I should like, if possible, to transfer the minds and imagination of hon. members to our troops in France. On what is known as the western front there is a Canadian army of not far short of 150,000 men. The existence of that army is the reason for my being here to-day. Its presence there gives us a high status among the nations of the world even at this early date in the history of our young country. It is our business and it is our pride as a nation to maintain that army. I venture to suggest that, in all our thoughts about our policy, we should keep our army constantly first in mind. Its efficiency should be the standard at which we should aim, and by keeping its wellbeing ever in mind, we shall preserve a sense of proportion in weighing the details of our national effort. The heroic deeds of the Canadian Expeditionary Force are a sacred pride to every true Canadian.

I think I am justified in giving to the committee an outline of our organization in France, and I ask that the committee do not require certain detail which it would not be advisable in the allied interest to give.

The Canadian Army Corps, as it exists in France, as hon. members are all well aware, is under the immediate command of Lieut.-General Sir Arthur Currie. It consists of four divisions, comprising an establishment of about 78,000 men and corps troops, largely artillery, amounting to about 11,000 more.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How many men are there actually in a division?

Major-General MEWBURN: We have approximately 90,000 men in the whole four divisions—ninety thousand is the maximum; but the number is not usually as large as that. The army corps thus has a total not far short of 90,000, including the artillery. I may mention that this is the standard large formation in the British army. At the opening of the war the normal European army corps was composed of two divisions. Experience has proved that the division is the standard fighting unit, but it has also been shown that, for the larger purposes of the war, divisions can with profit be grouped into these large army corps. In the British army the corps comprises from three to six divisions, the most usual and convenient number being four. Thus Canada is maintaining a standard large unit of the British army in France. I may further remark that it would be well for hon. members to bear in mind that the Canadian forces in France are far more numerous than those I have already mentioned. For instance, we have some fifty or sixty thousand more troops there—and at times the number may exceed that—than are in the actual Canadian Army corps. These extra corps have rendered most valuable services, for which recognition must be given. I refer to our Railway Construction Corps, Forestry Battalions, and so forth. My right hon. friend asked what was the size of the divisions. It is well known that in the German army and in the armies of some of the other European nations in the last six months, the whole composition of the divisions has been changed for military reasons. Some have been considerably enlarged and others considerably reduced.

During 1917 the Canadian troops in France steadily added to their efficiency and their fame. Our army corps placed on their escutcheon the ever memorable names of Vimy, Lens and Passchendaele, whilst the Cavalry Brigade bore a part in Sir Julian Byng's victory at Cambrai, and in the past ten days our cavalry have taken a very prominent part in the recent operations. I may say that our Cavalry Brigade, ever since they have been in France, have been attached to the Imperial Cavalry Brigade. Their exploits during the fighting that has been going on in the last two weeks have, as most hon. members know, been marvellous. I regret to say that the casualties in our Cavalry Brigade within the last few days have been very heavy, particularly amongst the officers. It is not necessary for me to say much in praise of our troops; their fame is too secure and too widespread to make eulogy necessary in this House.

I should like to mention one or two considerations which bear upon their efficiency. One is that we have, up to the present, been able to provide reinforcements so as to keep our ranks in France up to full strength. Apart from the obvious fact that the more soldiers one has the stronger one is, there is the fact that the soldiers fight better under encouraging influences, and it is a great encouragement to the individual soldier to go " Over the Top " with his regiment up to strength. If his platoon is up to full strength his own tasks are the lighter. Moreover, he sees, so far as he is concerned, that the army system is working smoothly. It has been remarked by non-Canadian observers that part of the high morale of our army corps is due to the punctuality and promptness with which drafts reinforce the men in the trenches.

Another matter of interest is the remarkable and progressive firmness of discipline which has marked the history of the Canadian Army Corps. This impulse of it has come from within the corps. It has accompanied its growth in effectiveness. Prowess and discipline have gone hand in hand. The Canadian army in France now is a very highly disciplined body of men, and it is to be hoped that the arduous, but beneficial lessons of the trenches will follow all ranks on their return to Canada, and their merging into civil life, so that Canada, as a whole, will be the gainer through the hardening of the moral fibre and the strengthening of the self-restraint of our soldiers overseas.

As regards our troops in England, I should like to give a short resumé of what we have done and what we are doing in England. Behind the Canadian army in France are our forces in England. Their business in a large way is to prepare reinforcements for France and to take charge of those who for one reason or another return from France to England. The Prime Minister, in presenting the estimates, spoke of the approximate number of men in England, how they were utilized and what they were doing there. We have there our various reserve units or battalions, including not only infantry, but cavalry, artillery, engineers, machine gunners, Army Service corps, Army Medical corps, Canadian Forestry corps, Canadian Railway Construction troops, etc. Into these reserve units all the reinforcements sent from Canada go to continue and carry on their training as reinforcements for the front. Until a short time ago we had distributed throughout the various camps in England what were known as the reserve units. Those reserve units include the various units of the service, and include men in the various categories which are technically known as " A," " B," " D " and " E." There have been a large number of men in those various reserve units of the different branches of the service who have not been immediately fit for the front as reinforcements. In those reserve units are also included men in hospitals; that is, when a man is evacuated from France as a wounded man, he is immediately taken off the strength of the base in France and taken on the strength of his reserve battalion or unit in England. He is shown as either in hospital undergoing treatment, or in a convalescent home, or in one of the reserve units which he may join after his convalescence is over. We have, therefore, those men in the various categories, and at one time what was known as category "A" was down to a very low ebb, particularly after the battle of Passchendaele, when the casualties were very heavy. Our men go from one category to another, and when they work up to category "A," they become available for reinforcement.

We also had the Fifth Division which was at first intact, but which it unfortunately became necessary to break up in order to ensure a steady flow of reinforcements for the other divisions in France.

That was one of the most highly trained divisions we ever had since the commencement of the war. But it was conceded, and it must be conceded, the way recruitment is, that Canada could not maintain and keep up more than four divisions at the front. It was believed to be far better that we should maintain four divisions up to strength than attempt to maintain five divisions that were only partly up to strength. Therefore, for military reasons, sad and disappointing as it was to the officers, it was conceded to be essential that the divisions should be broken up and the men put into the various reserves whilst gradually flowing on to France.

In addition, we have what is known as the administrative units which take in all the business end of the organization in England, training schools, Canadian Army Service Corps, Canadian Army Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Ordnance and Pay Corps, Record, Discharge, General and Command Depots. These various establishments in England are most important connecting links between our army in the field and our efforts here. In addition to that there are the hospitals.

There are several training reports coming in from time to time in connection with the overseas work in France which show what is being done from month to month. There is not much information in these reports that I can give the House as they are purely matters of detail in regard to the training but there are one or two reports which I think may be interesting and if I may digress for a moment I would like to quote them to show, for instance, what is being done by the chaplain services in France, I read:

FRANCE: The Chaplains of the Canadian Corps have continued to prosecute their work with unabated loyalty and devotion. An estimate of the service they have set themselves to accomplish may be gained from the programme carried out by the Chaplains of the First Division during a recent offensive.

These officers have had considerable experience at the front and promptly seized the opportunity for service which they realized a sharp engagement made possible. Knowing the nature of the operations to be carried out by the Division they made preliminary arrangements for the establishments of soup kitchens and coffee stalls in the most strategic places close to the front line in order that they and their helpers might minister to the wounded and also to the weary men going to, and coming from the battle-front. This work was carefully planned to the last detail. One of the Chaplains reporting on the four days activities states:

"We worked hard all day and most of the night serving the wounded and others. We carried hot coffee, tea and soup in petrol tins to the roadside where we distributed it together with biscuits and cigarettes. Infantry men, artillery men, tunnellers, engineers, Royal Flying Corps men, anti-aircraft personnel, stretcher bearers, and others were ministered to in large numbers."

It is estimated by the Chaplain in charge that in the four days twelve thousand were in some way served. Thousands of cigarettes were given away and great quantities of coffee and other refreshments were served out.

Another bright spot in connection with the chaplain work in France is disclosed by a report to the senior chaplain. In a report to the senior chaplain by an officer commanding one of the units of the Third Division, the following comment is made on the work of the chaplain:

In a report to the Senior Chaplain by an officer commanding one of the units of the 3rd Division, the following comment is made on the work of the Chaplain "He was tireless in his efforts to evacuate wounded and bury dead. It was mainly through his efforts that we were able to hand over our quarter of the battlefield cleared of both our own, and enemy dead. Since then his work has been most excellent. During our last tour of the trenches although under continuous observation and shell-fire he has succeeded in obtaining proper burial of 46 British dead as well as a number of the enemy." What is therein stated concerning one Chaplain can be applied with equal truth to the zeal and devotion of most of the Chaplains of the Corps.

I am just reading these extracts to show how that work is carried on by those splendid men at the front.

I now come to Canada with which I am more familiar. I can probably speak with a greater degree of certainty of our efforts here to procure men, to equip them and to get them overseas as soon as possible. Within the last nine months we have thought it wise to give up any attempt to go into any detailed training. Our chief aim and obligation has been to get men over to England as soon as the ships are available and when they get over, their organization and training are completed.

Speaking generally, our efforts in Canada are to procure men, equip them, give them their preliminary organization and such an amount of training as is possible, and despatch them to England as ships are available. The Overseas authorities complete their organization and training and forward them to France. Conversely, the Overseas department sends back unfit or superfluous men and the Militia Department to-day are confronted with the large and serious task of evacuating our wounded and sick from England, the treatment and care thereof, and carrying out their discharge from the army. Up to a year ago we were enthused by the large number of recruits coming forward and the task that was undertaken by the citizens as a whole. It was a pleasant task to provide positions for the men going overseas, but we are now confronted with the most serious aspect of the war, viz., the return of our magnificent men, many maimed and injured for life, broken down in health, and with shattered nerves. In other words, we are to-day confronted with the enormous task of demobilization and all that it means, of which I will speak later.

I would like to speak for a moment of the change in organization here. What I am about to say is not at all by way of criticism because when we look back and see the wonderful results that we have accomplished we cannot have any feeling other than that of admiration, but in the very large number of battalions that we have raised, and which were authorized, and which it must have been known could never get to the front, we find the reason for the very large number of surplus officers of whom I am going to speak later.

Last year it became necessary to re-organize our method of supplying reinforcements for overseas. Up to the fall of 1916, and in the early spring of 1917, we were still raising complete overseas units. It was conceded by many of those who were vitally interested in recruiting, that complete units could not all get to the front and in the judgment of many officers, who had devoted a great deal of time and energy, that instead of raising so many C. E. F. Battalions, it might have been better, from the first, had the old militia units, through whom the first, second and third divisions were raised, been able to retain their old numerical numbers, thereby keeping up the esprit-de-corps of the old Canadian militia units and sending forward reinforcements for the battalions that would have then been at the front. There is, of course, a great deal to be said for the system of raising complete battalions, as it was done voluntarily and it was by this means that the large number of volunteers were obtained. When the policy of sending complete units overseas, ceased, it was then necessary to organize within Canada, Depot Battalions throughout the various military districts, into which recruits were taken, and from these Depot Battalions, organized on the Territorial system and linked up with the Territorial system in vogue in England and the front, our men are forwarded in drafts to England.

The soldier to-day begins his military career in the Depot Battalion in his district in Canada. After he has gone through the preliminary training, medical examination, inoculation and vaccination, he proceeds to England with a draft and is taken on the strength of the same territorial regiment or battalion there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How long after being enlisted?

Major-General MEWBURN: Just as quickly as we can get him over. Ordinarily speaking, it would be much more preferable if a man could be trained here for some months before he left. To-day, within two or three weeks after the recruit is enlisted, vaccinated and inoculated, he should proceed overseas, not that it is desirable that he should do so, but because it is a question of ships. When we can get ships we feel that we should get our men into England as rapidly as possible for the sake of getting them over and getting them trained there.

Eventually the man finds himself in France still in the same regiment which he first joined. This system has replaced the earlier method of raising battalions. For instance, we have the first and second Quebec regiment, and the first and second Ontario regiment, and so on. They are organized territorically by provinces, as well as could be done, although it was rather late to do it, and it has not worked out as well as we hoped it would have, because there are many men to-day from all over Canada who are in different regiments at the front. There are men from Manitoba who are in Quebec regiments, men from Ontario in New Brunswick regiments, and so forth. It could not help but be so. It is simply a case of filling up from reinforcements as casualties occur. That earlier method had its advantages, and under it many officers put forth efforts and made sacrifices which merit the highest praise and the most generous recognition. I shall refer to their cases later on in my remarks. But it had this disadvantage, in that it involved a great waste of regimental loyalty; a battalion would go through all the difficulties of recruiting and training and would cultivate esprit-de-corps, only to disappear, and its members would have to form new associations and to cultivate a new corps loyalty. The new system conserves much energy in this respect, and has many other advantages; I do not mean to enumerate these advantages; what I am concerned now to do is to present to you how it has affected our whole organization in a very far-reaching manner. You can conceive of an officer who has been authorized to raise a battalion, who gave up his time, his money and energy and the best that was in him, in Canada, and,

5 p.m. through the assistance of his friends and the public generally, he raised a large number of men, obtained officers that were approved, formed a large battalion up to the standard, and proceeded to England. No sooner did he set his foot in England than all his officers were taken, his battalion broken up, and distributed among different reserve battalions. You can imagine the feeling of humiliation those officers felt when this occurred, but military exigencies have to govern. The foregoing remarks have been designed to place in proper perspective the work done by the Militia Department and to indicate the great change in our fighting organization which has affected a large proportion of the work in Canada.

Up to last year we had all these numerous battalions. We also had complete units of military infantry, army service corps, and so forth. Now we have got the permanent depot battalion organized in each military district in Canada which is permanent here, composed of officers of whom a very large percentage are officers who have returned from the front, unfit for service there. These depot battalions take the men that are coming in under the Military Service Act, also the volunteers. Their documents and papers are completed, what little training can be given them before they go is given, and as these men proceed overseas they then go on to the reserve battalion in England, and these depot battalions we have organized in Canada will be retained and are being utilized to carry out the big programme of demobilization of which I will speak later on.

An example of the change in policy which has been carried out during the year is to be found in regard to training. Up to the end of 1916, no less than 200 battalions of infantry were organized. At the beginning of 1917, no less than 58 additional battalions were organized, or in process of organization in Canada, in addition to a certain number of draft-giving units which had been formed to furnish re-inforcements to certain battalions. Many of these late battalions were unable to recruit anywhere near up to strength and it is well known that in the fall of 1916 voluntary recruiting began to wane. It, therefore, became necessary, as already stated, to organize the various Depot Battalions of the Territorial Regiments, in the manner already described. In addition to the above, there were Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, Machine Gun Corps, Army Service Corps, Army Medical Corps, Forestry and Railway Construction Corps. The Staffs of these Depot Units in Canada, both as regards Officers and N.C.O's, have been selected, as far as possible, from officers and men who have been overseas. You can conceive the condition of affairs, if you will recognize that at the front we will not have more than 50 or 52 infantry battalions. I am not speaking now of the Railway Corps, Forestry Battalions, and other troops, but I refer to infantry battalions. If we raised 258 battalions, and have only got from 50 to 55 battalions, the number of battalions which have been broken up accounts for the large number of surplus officers.

As the urgent need of re-inforcements became apparent, it was found impossible to waste any time on training men in Canada, and it was felt that it was incumbent on us to get men to England as speedily as possible, and as ships were available. The very fact of having re-inforcements in England and closer to the field of operations would be a tremendous source of encouragement to our sorely tried men in France. Another advantage of the re-inforcements being in England is the specialist training which is available and which is overwhelmingly important in this war.

A large number of specialist schools are established in England, some of which are: Musketry, Lewis Gun, Sniping, P.T. & B.F., Trench Warfare, Anti-Gas, Bombing, Entrenching, Artillery, Cavalry, Engineers, Signals, Canadian Machine Gun Depot, Canadian Pioneer School.

This war has become one of specialists. The soldier, now, must have several accomplishments, and a battalion is a wonderful organization of numerous and diverse specialists. It is needless to say that it is easier to manage and adjust this complicated machinery a hundred miles from the firing line than three thousand miles from it. All these branches of training have been carefully co-related as between Canada and Great Britain. The Canadien troops have shown most remarkable progress and ingenuity in the various specialist branches of training. For instance, in a test on Rapid Wire Training a special demonstration was given for the Imperial Inspector General of Infantry, Major General Sir Francis Howard, on the 16th of January, consisting of one N.C.O. and ten men, supported by a carrying party of the same number. The team erected a double apron fence, 100 yards long, in 16 minutes, 26 seconds. The time allowed for the erection of 50 yards double apron fence is 40 minutes.

Another interesting item in the training reports from overseas, is from the musketry training, to which a great deal of attention is paid. The latest report speaks of the good results obtained by the French Canadian section, under the charge of Sergeant-Instructor Robitaille, which was the outstanding feature of the course. In the P. T. & B. F. course at Aldershot, it is noted that the Canadian candidates headed the list, having obtained 21.93 points above the average.

There is one aspect in which the new system conduces to the happiness of the recruit. No doubt, the majority of the hon. gentlemen present are familiar with the phenomenon which was often to be seen in the days of voluntary enlistment. A battalion would be authorized, officers would be appointed, recruiting would start with a rush, and the first four or five hundred men would be secured very quickly. Then the stream would begin to dry up, and it would take months to get the last five or six hundred. The first effect to notice is that the men who enlisted early in the history of the regiment would remain in Canada an inordinately long time, while the laggards might embark a week or two after enlisting. This was not satisfactory. A second effect many times to be observed was that the men would conclude that the fate of the regiment, on arriving in England, would be to be broken up for drafts. Forthwith all loyalty to the regiment they had joined, and which had first taught them to be soldiers, would disappear, and their anxiety would be to see the last of it. It is hard for the men to merge into other battalions to make new chums, and naturally it is rather disconcerting and disheartening to the men. This killing of esprit-de-corps was very undesirable. Of the fate of the officers in a regiment having this experience, I shall speak a little later.

Under a system of regular drafts, with intensive training in a carefully organized system of specialist schools, it is found, now that a recruit can be passed into an experienced, well-trained, war-tried battalion after 14 weeks' training. This does not mean that a whole battalion could be trained in three or four months; it takes longer to train a battalion than to train a single man among experienced soldiers, and it is essential to the plan I am describing that the drafts should be small and the veteran battalion to which they are sent should be fairly strong; the new men then are quickly absorbed, and in turn they quickly absorb the older soldiers' steadiness and resourcefulness. It is obvious that such a method is much more economical of the man's time and of the nation's money; while for the individual soldier it is far more interesting to push rapidly and steadily through his instruction, with no waste of time, than to spend months in barracks on preliminary training.

In other words, our men upon arriving in England are taken through specialist courses—and I might say that they are now classified according to the different occupations they have followed in Canada and the technical knowledge they possess in order to ascertain what branch of the forces they have aptitude for, a policy which should have been adopted from the very beginning—and after undergoing a training of fourteen weeks, a remarkably short course, and assigned to their respective battalions, they are pronounced fit for service in France.

What I have said regarding training leads to an important reorganization of the troops in Canada. What is aimed at is to cause all units in the country to fall into three types. First, we have the depots I have been dealing with; recruiting and training units of all arms and services, existing to recruit, outfit and despatch troops. Secondly, we have certain garrison troops, required to garrison and guard certain important points. The strength of these troops is being gradually reduced, and all possible economy is being exercised. I aim in having in this latter class no men who are fit for the trenches; and of the men fit for garrison or guard duty we will employ only those really necessary. Thirdly, we have depot units for the reception, administration and disposal of returned soldiers who are to return to civil life. These last mentioned units are absolutely essential for the purpose of carrying on demobilization, and every man before being discharged must have his documents and records completed and a final medical examination held before final discharge.

This question of training presupposes the procuring of men. The past year has been the introduction of the Military Service Act. I wish to make it very clear here that the Military Service Act is administered by the Department of Justice. The task of approaching the civil population and selecting therefrom a proper number of men to be recruits is committed, very properly in my opinion, to a civil department. When the Department of Justice has made the selection, has decided that it is equitable and advantageous, considering alike the interests of the nation and the circumstances of the individual, that a given man should serve the country, we in the Militia Department receive him, outfit him, train him and send him overseas.

The business of tribunals and exemptions is very largely outside of our sphere, although we naturally have a deep interest in the matter, and our administration touches that of the Military Service Act at numerous points. Our interest in the matter, indeed, is so strong that I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion there must be a decided speeding up of the tribunals. In view of the recent events, the need for men is more apparent than ever. Canada must produce the men; she must bear her part in the great work set before civilization. The Military Service Act has produced, so far, recruits enough to keep our splendid divisions up to strength, but in order to maintain them it must produce more.

As is well known, the Military Service Act provided for the raising of one hundred thousand reinforcements. I had no part in bringing into operation the Military Service Act. I have felt, and still feel, that we have got to get reinforcements overseas. I realize there are difficulties to be overcome, and in that connection I was much interested in the debate which took place here the other night with respect to the unfortunate occurences in the province of Quebec. Nevertheless I have always felt, and I still feel, that the province of Quebec will do its duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Major-General MEWBURN: I may be wrong, I hope I am not, and I regret as deeply as one can regret the events that took place in the city of Quebec, but I feel satisfied that that province will yield her quota to keep up the number of Quebec battalions at the front. It must be known to hon. gentlemen that in the forces in France there are several battalions that are known as Quebec battalions, just as there are battalions which are known as Ontario, or Manitoba battalions, as the case may be. One or two first class battalions that went from Quebec were not altogether English-speaking battalions. I know of one battalion having representatives of both nationalities in its ranks that had to be broken up because there were not reinforcements.

Beyond question the men who are at the front should be supported and supported by soldiers from their own provinces. The city from which I come has sent overseas more than ten thousand men, and we have not got a single representative battalion at the front. That is a cause of soreness, but we do not care so long as we are contributing to the good of the country as a whole. I feel that every province should maintain its own units at the front, and while my hon. friend, the former Minister of Militia, may not agree with me, I honestly and frankly say that I believe that had the provinces been authorized in the early stage of the war to raise distinct and complete divisions, such divisions would have been raised and maintained by those provinces. I may be wrong but that is my own conception. As far as the Military Service Act is concerned, I sincerely hope the tribunals will be speeded up, and that we will get our flow of reinforcements to keep the men of our four divisions up to strength.

The Military Service Act is not the only source from which we have been obtaining recruits. We have in the United States what is known as the British-Canadian Recruiting Mission. Before the United States entered the war their Government consented to the Imperial authorities recruiting men within the Union. At first the idea was to get men for the British Expeditionary Force. Afterwards we were asked to join them and endeavour to secure recruits for the Canadian Expeditionary Force. We did so in a very small way, but gradually the movement grew. The officers we have sent down there were all returned officers who had seen service at the front.

We do not obtain all our recruits from the Military Service Act. Up to a short time ago, voluntary recruiting was permitted to continue and a considerable number of men were obtained for technical services. A large number of young men, who had not attained the age of legal obligation, joined the Royal Flying Corps; youth being a great asset in this new and strange way of fighting.

I wish to utter a word of appreciation of the activities of the Royal Flying Corps in the Dominion. As is well known, it is an Imperial organization. Canada having followed the policy of assisting in every way possible this organization, everything has been done by the Government, and by my department in particular, to assist the officers of the Royal Flying Corps in their arduous undertaking. Some five thousand Canadians, the flower of our youth, have joined this corps. Much glory has come to Canada through its contribution. On the other hand, the officers of the Royal Flying Corps have maintained correct and congenial relation with the Canadian military authorities. It is thought by some Canadians that we should have started, and should start even now, a flying corps of our own, but in my opinion that would be a mistake for more reasons than one. Some gentlemen also think that Canada should contribute certain squadrons to the Royal Flying Corps. Whether or not such a thing is advisable is a question to be considered. It is known that the Imperial Government have established throughout Canada a tremendous organization, and, as I have already stated, some five thousand of our young men have joined the Royal Flying Corps, and we all know what a name they have made for themselves. In one of our camps, Camp Borden, the work that was accomplished by that Flying Corps last year was wonderful. Camp Borden is recognized as one of the best Flying Corps camps in the world. The young Canadians who received their initial training there and passed through the various courses of instruction, were considered fit to go to the front, I am advised, as technically qualified Flying Corps officers after a very short period of further training in England. They have done so, and have made a name for themselves.

The British Canadian Recruiting Mission, as I have already said, assisted in obtaining recruits for the Imperial and Canadian Expeditionary Forces and the Royal Flying Corps. That Mission is in charge of Brigadier-General White, an Imperial officer. His second in command is Colonel J. S. Dennis, a well known Canadian, who for months has worked untiringly throughout the United States, and who has given his services gratis to the Canadian Government. For this mission we have furnished a considerable number of officers and n. c. o's., who have been returned from the front, wounded and unfit for further service overseas. They have done wonderful work in the United States. Through their efforts we have succeeded in obtaining, up to and including the 30th March, 1918, 17,553 British subjects residing in the United States for the Canadian Expeditionary Force. In adition to these, a large number of men have been obtained for the British Expeditionary Force as well as for the Royal Flying Corps.

Mr. MURPHY: Has Col. Dennis seen active service?

Major-General MEWBURN: Not in this war. Colonel Dennis is beyond the age limit; I am afraid he is nearer sixty than fifty. He did see service in the Northwest Rebellion. But he has loaned his time, without any expense to the Government, to assist in this undertaking over there, and he has been a tremendous asset to us. All the young men who have been over there are officers or non-commissioned officers who have done splendid work overseas, several of whom have received honours. The young officers who have been in the United States have carried out a wonderful mission in that country. They have not only succeeded in getting a large number of first-class recruits, a large majority of whom are already overseas, but they have accomplished another and far-reaching object, namely, to foster a splendid feeling between all classes in the United States and Canada, which I venture to say will have a lasting effect. I do not know whether my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will concur in that statement, as in the early days of the session he accused members on this side of the House of trucking with the Yankees. We have been trucking with the Yankees, so far as that mission is concerned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Major General MEWBURN: And we are delighted to do it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I approve of it, and compliment my hon. friend. We can stand some more of it, especially in the matter of trading.

Major-General MEWBURN: Now, regarding the transports. As soon as we can raise our troops and equip them, and with what little training we can give them, it is our duty to get them overseas. So transportation by rail and ocean has been one of our great activities. Within the twelve months between April 1, 1917, and the 31st of March this year, we have sent overseas reinforcements to the number of 66,733 men. That includes all branches. In addition to that there has been a rather interesting work undertaken by our Quartermaster General's Branch, which, of course, has acted in conjunction with one of the big railroads. We have transported across this continent overseas about 85,000 Chinese coolies, who are serving in certain special labour corps in France behind the lines.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they from Hong Kong?

Major-General MEWBURN: From northern China. Some have just passed through here.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have seen them.

Major-General MEWBURN: To move such a large number of men naturally, at a time like the present, greatly added to the difficulties of those officers entrusted with transportation duties. During the past winter unusual obstacles have had to be overcome. We had to cope with a large number of outbreaks of infectious disease; these were successfully dealt with but, of course, they caused delays and gave trouble. It is hardly necessary to speak of the bad weather. It hampered the movement of troops as it did every other species of traffic on this continent. The Halifax disaster interfered for a month with embarkations at Halifax. It is only fair to add that the railways had trouble as well as we. Not only was the weather outrageous, not only was there an alarming shortage of coal, but they had to contend with two special disadvantages. One was that they were and are shorthanded, for we have made heavy drafts upon the skilled railway workers of Canada to serve the strategic railways of France—and brave and effective service they are rendering Another is the lack of rails. This is coming to be severely felt in Canada. Our own troubles, it is well to bear in mind, are not in excess of those which others have to bear.

Now, regarding transports. We are up against this situation, not only as regards transports for troops going overseas, but we are now face to face with the problem of invalids coming back, and also of men unfit for further service at the front being brought back. There have been some complaints, probably some of them just and many unjust, as to the transports coming back. We are not responsible here for bringing the troops back to Canada so far as berthing and arranging for ships is concerned. That is entirely under the Admiralty. So many troops, who are collected at the Buxton Discharge Depot, where they undergo their examination, and the returned and hospital cases, are notified on very short notice to proceed to the embarkation point and get on board ship. So far, the Canadian Government have been unable to charter a complete ship, and men complained, in some instances, that berths were empty, and that they were not permitted to use those berths. An investigation is going on now. Some time ago an officer proceeded overseas to see if some better co-ordination could be brought about. The steamship companies sold passages and berths in England to civilians, and in some instances the berths were not occupied. Canada was paying so much per capita for the transport of the men, and when the ship sailed with empty staterooms, there was complaint by a few of the men; but the majority realized the difficulty about transports, and that there was bound to be a little trouble. But I think it has practically all passed away and better and more definite arrangements are being made. Probably we will be able to charter complete ships, and bring our men back as troops and not as civilians. It is a difficult thing to handle men coming back when they are not organized as units but as individuals, collected on short notice. For instance, I have known of men hurried down to the port of embarkation, and held twelve and fourteen days before they were allowed to leave. These conditions have arisen and will arise in the future, but arrangements have been made that will gradually and effectually overcome all of these little annoyances. After all, as many officers and men have told me, these are only petty annoyances and discomforts, and they realize that there is a war on, and that they must put up with some discomforts.

I would like to speak, if I may take up the time of the House for a few minutes, regarding the surplus officers returned to Canada. I feel it is my duty to say something in regard to that, and I would like to call to the attention of hon. gentlemen, who may not have seen or read it, an article which appeared a short time ago in the Military Gazette entitled "Mental Crucifixion of Officers." I shall not wade through the whole article, but I think hon. members will appreciate it if an explanation is made, and some of these unfortunate offi-ers will have more decent consideration than they have had in the past:

It is about time that the indignities and mental torture endured by officers ordered back to Canada, because of age and senior rank, were put an end to by a strong and clear announcement from the Militia Department, published, at advertising rates, if necessary in every single paper, great and small, in the country.

Owing to the system of recruiting by means of county and district corps, so long in vogue, and so wonderfully fruitful in result, a very large number of senior officers found themselves in England, without a chance to serve with their rank in France, and with but little chance, even in the lower grade, to see service there. These gentlemen had enlisted in perfectly good faith, fully expecting to accompany their respective corps to the front, only to find on crossing the seas that the exigencies of war required the battalion to be broken up for reinforcements, with the result that their connection with it was severed forever. Now, there is in England very useful employment for a great many officers. All the reserve battalions need them, to say nothing of such big departments as the Pay Corps, the Records Office, and a dozen minor ones. These various positions absorbed many officers or disbanded units, who thus did useful work, releasing younger men for the front.

But as the war went on, and the number of returned wounded officers increased, it was felt that these men who had suffered much should be given these positions in England, their vacated posts in France being filled, wherever possible, by men from the ranks who had seen much service there.

With this plan surely no one can quarrel. As a result a gradual displacement has taken place, so hundreds of officers, of the county corps class, have been superseded by returned casualties, and find themselves without employment. What could these unfortunates then do? IF BELOW FORTY YEARS OF AGE they could revert to a lieutenancy and go to the front. Hundreds have done so, but hundreds of others, in fact, nearly all of the rank of Major and Lt.-Colonel, with many Captains, too, were above the age limit, and could not be used in this way.

I may say that that age limit has since been reduced from forty to thirty-five years.

The writer has known many who have fairly gone on their knees to headquarters to be excepted from the general rule, and allowed to go over, though past forty. Naturally, headquarters has been deaf to these appeals, for to open the door to one would make trouble with scores of others.

Nor could an officer "grab up a rifle and rush to the front," as some melodramatic people at home have recommended. War is no longer a "rush to the front," but a highly organized business in which headquarters has the say as to who shall and shall not "rush" there.

As an officer said to me: "This is an awful war. It takes an awful long time to get to it." He had been in England for a year and a half. The article continues:

And so in due course, an officer who has sacrificed much in helping to raise a corps, who has given up a lucrative profession or business, who has done his best to go and fight, and has not been allowed to do so, finds himself ordered back to Canada, and at home once more.

And then the horrible thing happens, at least it has often happened, and may again. His fellow citizens actually send a committee to ask him to apologize for not having been killed. The bitter humiliation of such a visitation can only be appreciated by one who has had to endure it.

I regret that there is a good deal of truth in what the writer of this article says. The whole trouble experienced in connection with returned surplus officers is simply the by-product of voluntary recruiting. Two hundred and fifty-eight battalions were raised, each having from thirty-six to forty officers, senior and otherwise. Many of these officers had given years of their lives to training; others had joined the forces only since the outbreak of war. With very little financial assistance from the Government, they raised these battalions and took them overseas. I know one man not many miles from Ottawa who was asked to raise a battalion and assured that he would be allowed to take command of it at the front. He sacrificed his business, raised the battalion, and went over to England. There his unit was broken up and ultimately he was returned as a surplus officer. There have been many such cases, but it is difficult to know what to do under circumstances like that. In these various battalions there were some three or four thousand officers; what was to become of them? Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that as we were accumulating this mass of officers in England, officers without war experience and war testing, the divisions in France were advancing men who had shown ability and leadership on the field of battle. Much is to be said in favour of making promotion in war time depend upon war service. But what of our officers fresh from Canada? The easy reply is, "Let them revert." For the younger men this is possible to some extent, though only to some extent; for there is a limit to the number of lieutenants needed, and the battalions at the front have many deserving non-commissioned officers of proved worth whom they desire to promote. For older men reversion becomes very difficult. When a man is past 40 he is not likely to make a very good platoon leader. That is a young man's job. Then an order was issued that no officer over 35 years of age could revert. I put it to every honourable member: if he were colonel of a battalion in the trenches and had his choice for the leadership of one of his platoons between a man of 45 who has never been in action, who was formerly a major or a colonel, and a young man of 22 who had risen from the ranks, who had had a couple of years of fighting, who had proved himself able to command men in billets and to lead them in battle, who, perhaps, had won the D.C.M. for exceptional valour and skill in action—which would he choose? He almost certainly would choose the younger man. But, is that the fault of the older man? And is it not hard on him? Is not the failure of the senior officer to get to France, in most cases, merely his misfortune? And if that is so, can any injustice be more galling than for the stay-at-homes, the protected, and those who have sacrificed little, to insult the man who had made many sacrifices, had worked hard, had given up two or three years of his life, at a time when years count—to insult him on the express ground that he has had bad fortune, has met with disappointment? There may be cases of unworthy men, but I think the majority are in the other class.

It is my view that the Dominion of Canada owes a debt of gratitude to these officers who came forward in an emergency and sacrificed all in order to raise battalions; who did so in good faith, in expectation of going to the front, and who were not fakirs, funkers or slackers. When they come back to Canada, they ought to receive the consideration that the country owes them.

Now comes the question of the employment of returned officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, which has caused no little anxiety in my department. It is a difficult problem to deal with. It is an absolute impossibility for the Militia Department to absorb all returned soldiers, and give them permanent employment, or even temporary employment. Some people have an idea that everybody now employed by the Militia Department, who has not been overseas, should be dismissed and returned soldiers given the jobs. This is all right in theory, but it does not work out in practice. If this principle is to be adopted, then every employee, in every department of the Government, who has not been overseas, should be peremptorily dismissed, and returned soldiers given their jobs.

On this subject of finding employment for returned officers, I wish to utter one word of caution. Occasionally we are urged to dismiss all officers in Canada who have not been overseas and replace them with men from the trenches. Certain cases will arise when replacements can advantageously be made; in such cases they will be made. But I would remind the House that our first object is to carry on the war and to employ in each post the man best suited to fill it. Consideration for individuals must yield to consideration of the public interest. Suitability is partly a matter of intrinsic fitness and partly a matter of training and experience. It would be poor business to dismiss a man who was managing a technical post with conspicuous success and who is intimately acquainted with every aspect of the work and replace him with a new man who would have to be trained to fill it. We should be fair and just in this matter. There is no doubt that in the Militia Department we have a large number of officers who have not been overseas—and I refer to them in the same way that I referred to the surplus officers who have been sent back from England. Since the war started a large number of officers, some of military age, others medically unfit, have been prevented from going overseas because of their being held here by superior authority—and rightly so. Theirs has been drudgery; they expected to go overseas in due course and take their place in the firing line. As time went on, however, it became apparent that there was little chance for those men getting overseas who had been held in administrative offices and in training positions. They have faithfully and conscientiously performed an important work in Canada; their task has not been a pleasant one, and it is manifestly unfair to criticize them now and simply say: get off the grass; let a returned soldier take your position; you are no longer wanted; go back and do something else. Certain branches of the Militia Department are very technical in their nature and the man who has a thorough training in military matters, administrative and otherwise, may be more valuable than six or seven who have not. Where returned soldiers can be placed, they are being placed; so far as I am concerned the returned soldier will in every case get the preference, having due regard to efficiency. Aside from that, it is obvious that we should endeavour to be just to every one.

Just a word with regard to the Military Hospitals Commission, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and the Invalided Soldiers Commission. Up to a few months ago the Military Hospitals Commission were handling the returned soldiers. That commission was founded in good faith and was absolutely necessary in the early stages of the war in the work of looking after the returned soldier. It must be conceded by every person who understands military work that a soldier must be controlled by the military authorities so long as he is a soldier, but the minute he ceases to be a soldier he passes to civilian life. If he requires further medical or other assistance, he is placed under the direction of some other department. We have, therefore, organized depot battalions—a chart is being prepared and will be presented to members who desire to see it—for the purpose of handling our returned soldiers. When men who require hospital treatment, or who are among the many sad cases of tubercular trouble, insanity or epilepsy, return from England with all their necessary documents, they go to their district headquarters and are taken on the strength of the depot battalions. If they require further medical treatment, they immediately enter one of the military hospitals, and if they are suffering from tuberculosis or such other diseases as I have mentioned, they are at once put under observation. If they are found to be suffering from tubercular trouble, they will be immediately discharged as soldiers, go on full pension and go into one of the sanitaria for treatment. If a man goes into a hospital, while undergoing treatment, he may, at his bedside, commence vocational training, working in conjunction with the Invalid Soldiers' Commission. Subsequently to that, he is discharged; he then goes on to his pension, and continues his vocational training under the direction of the new department. He then ceases to be a soldier. Before we discharge a man, however, we must give him and insist upon his having a final medical examination in Canada. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that that is right. Formerly, a man was examined in England at Buxton before he left that country; he was examined again at one of the discharge depots at Halifax or Quebec; then he came back and had a third medical examination. That was irritating to the men. My reason for insisting on the final medical examination is for the protection of the man and of the country. In regard to every man who is discharged, there should be in the hands of the Militia Department or of the commission evidence of the man's physical condition at the time of his discharge. It is well-known that the United States are paying millions of dollars in pensions in connection with the Civil War for men who were never near it. There will, therefore, be hundreds and thousands of cases of men discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Force who, after their return to Canada and discharge, are not entitled to pensions, but who will later on claim pensions on account of physical disability which they will allege is due to their military service. That is why the evidence should be in the possession of the Government to protect the man and the country. Therefore, the Military Hospitals Commission are now carrying on another function, and the Militia Department are taking care of the military hospitals for the care and treatment of our men while they are soldiers so as to have them discharged as speedily as possible.

Another question I would like to mention is that of demobilization, with which we are now confronted. Demobilization is now going on in a very small way. It will grow apace, and I may say for the information of hon. members that should demobilization commence to-morrow, it is estimated it will take some eighteen months to convey our troops back from France. We have to consider all the paraphernalia and impedimenta of the troops and services properly belonging to them in England. The United States' troops have also to be brought back. The troops from Australia and New Zealand have to be brought back. It is estimated by the War Office that at least thirty to forty thousand troops would proceed per day across the channel from France. The problem, therefore, is large. We are working on a scheme of demobilization which is almost complete; and we hope to have a perfect organization, so that when demobilization takes place there will be a complete decentralization by military districts, so that we shall be able to carry out demobilization effectively.

Most hon. members are familiar with the Militia Headquarters. We have at Militia Headquarters what is known as the Militia Council, composed of the deputy minister, the Chief of the General Staff, the Adjutant-General, the Quartermaster-General, the Master-General of the Ordnance, and the Paymaster-General. Associated with them are the Director General of Medical Services, and the Judge Advocate-General. That Council meets at least once a week, if not oftener, when all matters concerning each branch are brought before it. Important matters are discussed and policies settled, subject always to final approval by the Governor General in Council. It is a business organization, which is as complete as it is possible to have it, and business records are kept.

Mr. COPP: How long has the Militia Council been in existence?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think since 1904. Since the war started, the scope of the Militia Council has been greatly enlarged, and one can imagine that the work of the council is very much greater than it has ever been before. It is an advisory council, matters of a very technical nature come before it, and before decisions are given, reports are made to it by the heads of the different branches of the Militia Department.

Mr. VIEN: There is no longer a Parliamentary Secretary.

Major-General MEWBURN: No, I wish sometimes there were two or three of them. I should like to bear testimony to the very efficient work of several of the officers who have carried on this burden since the war started. In the first place there is my deputy minister who is present now. I shall not say what I think of him at the present time, but certainly his long experience of both military and administrative work, his military services in South Africa, and his faithful and unceasing work, not only before the war but since, are wonderful, and he is deserving of the greatest possible credit. There is another officer of whom I should like to speak, and I do so with the greatest admiration and respect. I refer to the Chief of the General Staff, Major-General W. G. Gwatkin, who has been directly responsible for all the training and military operations of the troops. He has also had numerous other responsibilites thrust upon his shoulders. The public do not and probably never will realize the magnificent work that has been performed by this hard-working, patient and faithful officer. He has been responsible for all the confidential correspondence and cables with the War Office and has been directly in touch with the Admiralty on naval matters in connection with the war, as far as my department is concerned. The country owes a heavy debt to both General Fiset and General Gwatkin for their faithful and efficient work performed since the war started. There are other officers who are working day and night in that department. I wish to tell the hon. gentlemen present that the Militia Department is overworked. It has no complaints to make. The only regret we had when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) brought in the Daylight Saving Bill was that he could not increase the number of hours per day to twenty-four so that we might probably have heavier production. The duties of the Adjutant-General which are now performed by Major-General Ashton, are tremendous. Under the Adjutant General the following officers have shown wonderful ability and have devoted all their best efforts to the prosecution of the war; I refer particularly to Brigadier-General Gwynne, in charge of mobilization, Colonel C. S. MacInnes, in charge of organization, Colonel A. Z. Palmer and Major S. T Blackwood, and others, who have worked night and day faithfully and honestly, not for the small pay which they have been receiving, but simply for the honour and glory of doing something for their country.

The organization of the department has been undergoing certain changes. My hon. friend asked me last night if I had the details of it; I have a draft of it here but I shall not burden the House with the details. But the organization in the different departments is under the Minister of Militia, the deputy minister, the chief of the general staff, the Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, the Master General of the Ordnance, who goes into all the technical work of the branches and the whole service generally, and who has a much heavier task than many hon. gentlemen realize. Then we have, under the Adjutant General, what is known as the Record Office which has developed since the war started. That office is responsible for all the documents and information pertaining to every officer, non-commissioned officer and man who has gone overseas or who has returned from overseas.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Both officers and men?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes. Of course, the records of all officers are also in the militia headquarters. The Record Office in London, England, has grown to an enormous extent. It has a large staff which is responsible for getting out all the returns, the statistics relating to every individual man and all the casualty lists. As the casualties come forward, one can realize the heavy strain on that department. I have been endeavouring to make some changes in various departments, and while I am not boasting in any way, within the last few months I have, by reorganization undertaken by a very efficient man who came from overseas, who has seen service at the front, and who is familiar with that work, succeeded in reducing the staff by over 400 and in showing a saving of over $250,000 in that one department alone. There has I understand been criticism in the press and elsewhere in regard to the dismissals of employees in the record office.

There has been no person peremptorily dismissed. I want, if I can accomplish it, to get the highest efficiency and economy in my department. I do not ever expect to reach that objective, but I am endeavouring to do so. It is necessary in my judgment, if you are running a department, to get an efficient head, put the responsibility on that head and make him live up to it. If you do that, you will accomplish something. There will be no dismissals except for cause. In the Record Office the correspondence and the magnitude of the work is enormous. There are over two thousand five hundred telegrams and letters coming in daily that the branch has to deal with. Every time there is a casualty the Record Branch deals with it and conveys the news to the next of kin promptly.

One of the largest departments under the Paymaster General is the Assigned Pay and Separation Allowance Branch. When I took charge of the department I found the work of that branch to be something in the nature of an enormous financial transaction and I made up my mind to put it on a proper financial basis. I succeeded in getting an officer who had been at the front and who simply loaned his services until he got it running smoothly. Then, he went back to civil life. I have been assisted by financial men who have voluntarily given their services, with the result that I think I am getting the efficiency in that department that I am getting in many others.

I would like to give a few facts relating to the Separation and Assigned Pay Branch in order that hon. members may realize the magnitude of work carried on there. During the year 1917, the average number of cheques issued each month was 254,400. Since the Separation and Assigned Pay accounts have been consolidated, the average number of combined cheques is about 180,000 monthly, although, of course, action has to be taken on 265,000 accounts. To write out the cheques for one month would take an average clerk, working full working hours, over four years. With the new printing machinery which is now being installed in the Separation Allowance and Assigned Pay Branch, it would be possible, if necessary, to write these cheques in two and one-half days. This new equipment also automatically prepares the mailing list for the post office and the Return for the Auditor General. The average number of letters received and replied to during the year 1917 was about 425,000, or about 1,350 per working day. Some days the correspondence received is as high as 5,000 letters.

So you can realize when some hon. member writes to know why one of his constituents has not received her separation allowance why the devil he does not get a reply by next mail that it is very difficult to comply with every request of this kind as speedily as otherwise might be possible.

During the year 1917, 18,000 new Separation Allowance accounts and 56,000 Assigned Pay accounts were opened. During the same period 14,000 Separation Allowance accounts and 26,000 Assigned Pay accounts were closed. Also, 8,000 soldiers changed the amount of their assignment, through the Chief Paymaster, overseas. Change of address has been one of the great troubles.

The number of clerks employed in the branch is 872. The total expenditure during the year 1917 was $59,561,299, or an average of almost $5,000,000 per month. It is difficult to realize the work which is done by the S. A. & A. P. Branch, unless one visits their office and makes a close inspection.

During the year 1917 almost every one of the 80,000 separation allowance accounts has been investigated to see that the separation allowance was being properly paid. The enormous amount of work entailed can only be imagined. The dependents live from coast to coast, and each investigation had to be carried on in the locality in which the dependent resided. This, of course, was only rendered possible by the co-operation of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. Such investigation was necessary, as no business firm would think of paying out money unless they knew that the payee was entitled to it.

The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) has been instrumental in rendering the greatest possible assistance, through the Patriotic Fund, to the Militia Department in getting information regarding these thousands of accounts.

Every payment of assigned pay from the S. A. & A. P. Branch amounting to some 170,000 accounts each month, has been checked over with deductions made in the Chief Paymaster's Office, London, England, and the organization is now so perfect that a casualty in the field affecting a soldier's assigned pay is acted on in the S. A. & A. P. Branch within seven days from the date of casualty being reported. I think we are improving, and that probably in a short time the department will be working more smoothly and without much cause for complaint.

The country, as far as the Militia Department is concerned, is divided into eleven military districts, the division not in all cases being in conformity with provincial boundaries. The districts are as follows:

No. 1, Western Ontario, Brigadier-General L. W. Shannon; No. 2, Central Ontario, Major-General W. A. Logie; No. 3, Eastern Ontario, Brigadier-General T. D. R. Hemming;

No. 4, Western Quebec, Major-General E. W. Wilson; No. 5, Eastern Quebec, Brigadier-General J. P. Landry; No. 6, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, Major-General F. L. Lessard; No. 7, New Brunswick, Brigadier-General A. H. Macdonell; No. 10, Manitoba and a portion of New Ontario, Major-General John Hughes; No. 11, British Columbia, Major-General R. G. E. Leckie; No. 12, Saskatchewan, Major-General J. C. MacDougall; No. 13, Alberta, Colonel G. Macdonald.

Each of these districts has a general officer commanding, with the necessary staff. That staff is qualified to perform administration duties as well as to handle all recruits, train and mobilize the same. During the past year these district staffs have disbursed in the neighbourhood of $75,000,000, under the direction and authority of headquarters.

As I said before, I am a great believer in decentralization. With a country the size of Canada, it is absolutely impossible to carry out the enormous amount of work by centralizing at headquarters. As heavier and greater responsibilities have been and will be put on the shoulders of G. O. C.'s of districts, some changes have taken place and other changes will likely be made. No permanent appointments have or will be made at present, as it is recognized as things develop that appointments to these positions will be made by officers who have seen service at the front. In all districts in Canada, there have been officers who have been carrying on the drudgery work since the war started and magnificent service they have performed. I know of no single instance where an officer who has been employed at headquarters has not desired to go overseas. In some instances there have been officers who have been medically unfit and for this reason unable to proceed overseas. There are many other instances of officers, whose hearts have almost been broken with the idea of being held back, but in order to cope with the tremendous situation in Canada it was absolutely essential to retain certain officers in Canada to carry on the work, as Canada is the base and foundation of all our overseas forces.

Just here I wish to bear testimony to the faithful, loyal support and help that has been given by the G. O. C.'s of various military districts and their splendid staffs and I would particularly mention General Shannon at Military District No. 1, General Logie at Military District No. 2, General Hemming at Military District No. 3, General Wilson at Military District No. 4, General Fages at Military District No. 5 (Quebec), General Benson at Military District No. 6, General Ruttan at Military District No. 10 (Winnipeg), Colonel Macdonald at Military District No. 13 (Calgary, Colonel Duff Stuart at Military District No. 11 (Vancouver).

It is a difficult matter to single out any one officer for special recognition, as with very few exceptions all officers employed both at headquarters and at districts are performing and have performed their arduous duties with the greatest satisfaction, and the names I have mentioned are those who are the responsible heads of departments and districts.

It is my intention to carry the idea of decentralization very much further than it has ever been carried before and on the same principle as I have spoken of in regard to some of the other branches. In each military district, a good general officer commanding should be responsible for the whole organization, administration and discipline within his military district. If that is carried out, it is going to save the headquarters from a great deal of labour and it is going to make for greater efficiency because everything that is centralized in headquarters tends to weaken the efficiency of the militia service. It is difficult in a country extending three thousand six hundred miles from Halifax to Esquimalt to administer military affairs from headquarters. It is physically impossible, and the machinery will play out if it is attempted. I hope that in the near future we will have a strengthening of the various military districts by the adoption of a policy of decentralization and everything it means.

There are two branches of the service I would like particularly to bring to the attention of the House. One is the Medical Services.

The devotion of the Canadian Army Medical Corps has been magnificent, both overseas and in Canada. The following extract is from a report made by Mr. McPherson to the House of Commons in England, as to the work of the Army Medical Corps, and is significant:

> In the Napoleonic Wars the percentage of deaths from disease was 97 and from death on the battlefield three. Even as late as the South African Campaign there were 67,000 cases of disease admitted to hospital and over 8,000 deaths. Four times as many men died from disease in South Africa as there were cases in France up to the beginning of November last. Sir W. Cheyne, than whom there was no greater authority, had made it clear how, although in a stationary army epidemics of disease were most liable to break out, skill and medical science, care and forethought had made the incidence of disease in the British Forces in France less than in the history of any army in the world."

The Canadian Dental Corps has performed marvellous work. During the past eighteen months, 1,042,000 dental operations have been performed, and I am making a conservative estimate when I say that at least forty per cent of the Canadian soldiers now serving in France, would never have been permitted to leave Canada, had it not been for the magnificent service rendered by the Dental Corps.

From the reports from overseas, on the work of the Canadian Army Dental Corps up to the 31st of December, 1917, we learn that the Dental Corps in England and France, performed 1,375,629 different dental operations and treatments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many men have you in that dental corps?

Major-General MEWBURN: It is distributed all over. In Military District No. 2, at Camp Borden and at Niagara, the dentists and their assistants have a corps of, I think, not over 35 or 40, and I know, from the figures I checked as A.A.G. of that district, that 10,000 men proceeded overseas to France who would have been rejected had not the Army Dental Corps given their services.

If any further information is desired I will be delighted to give it at any time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is the debate to be adjourned?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will meet at eight o'clock and see if any hon. gentleman desires information.

At six o''clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed in committee at eight o'clock.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Militia and Defence this afternoon began his observations by remarking that he was opening his mouth for the first time in this House, and he claimed the indulgence always given to new members. I may tell him that he might have dispensed altogether with any such request. He needed no indulgence, he gave us a very masterly speech, and one which contains a lot of very valuable information; and if he will take it from me, I convey to him the sincere appreciation of his speech from this side, and perhaps I may say from both sides. But the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, as well as the Prime Minister, gave a lot of figures which it is impossible to review at the present time. There are also several details which are yet needed, and I understood from the Prime Minister that he would agree to adjourn the debate to another day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then, if my right hon. friend agrees to the adjournment of the debate we will resume it at some other time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I merely thought we would resume this evening for the purpose of ascertaining if there was any subject which occurred to hon. gentlemen on the other side which has not yet been placed before the Committee, and as to which they desire information. It would be useful to have any suggestions of that kind in order that the information necessary might be prepared and be immediately available. However, as no question seems to arise for the moment, perhaps we had better adjourn the debate forthwith.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have one question to ask. Can the Minister of Militia and Defence give us the number of men conscripted in Canada?

Major-General MEWBURN: The number of men that are in Canada?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not think it is desirable to give details as to the actual number of troops of the Canadian Expeditionary Force that are in this country, but on the 31st March there were approximately 30,000 troops in Canada, including conscripted men. If my right hon. friend would like to get any further information I will be very glad to give it to him confidentially, because I do not think it is wise to disclose the places where all these troops are. They are, as hon. gentlemen know, moving overseas very rapidly. As I stated this afternoon, we are desirous of getting them there as quickly as possible, or as soon as ships are available. We have distributed in the various military districts both the men who have reported to these depot battalions, and others who have come from the United States as recruits raised by the recruiting mission that has been at work there, and they are categorized in the various branches as infantry, cavalry, artillery, engineers, medical and dental organizations, railway construction corps, veterinary units, and so forth. Those are not immediately available for duty overseas by any means, unfortunately. A rigorous medical examination is now required. In the first and second years of the war men did go overseas, and broke down under training in England or at the front; they were unable to stand the severe test of the arduous work there. Therefore we have found it necessary that, after the men get into the depot battalions or regiments where we have them now, and before sending them overseas, it is necessary to have a final medical board. It has been found inadvisable to allow men to proceed overseas who are not absolutely in what we call technically class A, and fit for immediate service at the front. I regret to say that under the Military Service Act there have been many cases of men who have been found after re-medical examination, medically unfit. These men have had to be discharged and this has, in some instances, reduced our available reinforcements. Some of the men in question have been placed, even after joining the colours, in the lower B category. They will, we hope in some instances, come back to the higher category. Then, included in the number given are a certain number of men whom we have had on special guard duties within Canada, and whom we have been forced to hold, including the garrisons at Halifax and other points. Approximately the total is as I have stated. Should my right hon. friend desire more details I would be very glad to give them to him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Publicly or privately?

Major General MEWBURN: Privately. I do not think it is in the public interest to give detailed information publicly.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): The minister, when speaking this afternoon, said he thought a mistake had been made in the early part of the war in sending over so many battalions officered by such a large number of officers—I think he told us that each battalion had thirty-five or forty officers, if I remember correctly. He said that upon reaching the other side the men were drafted into other battalions and the officers were left in England with practically nothing to do. Now there has been a great deal of talk in the press and elsewhere with regard to this matter. I notice by the press that a large number of these officers have been returned to Canada, but there still must be many on the other side. Would it be possible for the minister to state the approximate number of such officers who are still in England?

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Major General MEWBURN: As regards the surplus officers in England, I am not in a position to give the exact number that are there at the present time. With respect to the regiments or battalions which were raised in the early stages of the war, I did observe that I thought other arrangements might have been made, but there was this to be said with respect to the regiments in question: when these battalions were authorized and organized, in 1915 and 1916 particularly, had it not been for the individual efforts of these officers in raising the battalions in question I do not think we would ever have got the number of men that we did get. Owing to the military situation those battalions went overseas up to their regular establishment, in round figures about 1,150. Each composite battalion had one hundred extra men, but the strength was subsequently reduced to 1,050. I do not think all the officers were struck off, but in many instances when those battalions went overseas the officers were taken away from them. The men were put into one or other of the numerous reserve battalions for training in England, which were then officered by officers who had been in England from the early stages of the war, as well as officers who had been returned wounded from France and could not go back. There were many instances where officers failed to find employment, but in 1916 they were all employed in England and they were employed in taking special courses. A very large number of those officers took various courses, qualifying them for the higher rank, such as field courses, and so on, with the object of giving them the higher training that would enable them to be utilized in France. Subsequently the policy was adopted under which non-commissioned officers and privates who had distinguished themselves in the field and who were recommended by their commanding officers were given commissions. Therefore, there naturally was very little chance of some of the officers in question getting to the front. They had the privilege of reverting to the rank of lieutenant, but in many cases officers who went from Canada did so with the rank of major and had held that rank in the Canadian militia for a long time. They had taken highly technical courses and were in command of double companies when they went to the front. There were many of those who did revert in rank and are to-day serving at the front as lieutenants, and all the more honour to them on that account. There was another class of officers who were over the age of thirty-five, and who, under the new order, were prohibited from going to the front. There were still others—and I think this is a great compliment to Canada—who accepted positions in the Imperial army. For a time the Imperial army were short of officers, but to-day they have a large surplus of junior officers. In some instances we had officers who were trained in the higher branches of the service who were qualified for conducting open warfare, and who would, under the new order, be struck off and sent back to Canada as surplus. But I am glad to say that I know of two instances where Canadian officers were accepted by the British War Office and are to-day in France in command of British regiments with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. The British Army recognized their ability and were glad to accept their services. A very large number of officers returned to Canada. I am not prepared to give the exact number because I have not the information available. Within the last six or seven months a large number of officers have been returned. A large number have gone back to civilian life; a large number, when they found they could not get over to France, in some cases even offered to go as privates and being refused, returned to Canada. Other officers went immediately off the pay-sheet; they paid their own way back to Canada and have gone back to civil life rather than loaf around. There are other officers who, after being employed temporarily, are being sent back gradually. Take the officers of the Fifth Division. At the time that division was up to full strength, and after the artillery of that division was taken away, there were some 330 officers released to be disposed of. There are something like 2,300 officers employed in administration, and a large percentage, I am informed, employed in these administrative services, are unfit to return to France. In the reserve battalions, I have not the actual figures, but I may say that these officers are being very rapidly returned to Canada, and where they cannot be absorbed here—we cannot give employment to everybody—they are very rapidly returned to civil life. Those to whom we have given preference and priority, having regard to efficiency, are the officers who have served actually at the front and who have been wounded and are not fit to return to the front. I am afraid I cannot give the actual number of officers now in England now unemployed, but my information is that there are very few and they are returning rapidly by every ship.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The principle of taking officers from the ranks dates from the beginning of the war. On one occasion, long before the overseas minister was appointed, we had the honour of taking over two hundred and fifty men in one day from the ranks of the non-commissioned officers and promoting them to be officers. Let me give in detail the plan. The First Division passed over. I can not recall a solitary instance in the First Division where officers were put on from outside sources, the promotions were always from within. Then the Second Division went, taking over very few officers outside of those who had been engaged in raising and training the battalions composing that division. The officers who were qualified in that division were retained. Some we had to replace, but in replacing them, as far as we could we selected officers who had already served in the First Division. In the same way, the new officers held their battalions as far as qualified, which was perfectly right, and each man had to go through a very rigid test to prove whether or not he was qualified to take his position in the battalion. In other words, we did not impose on any division that had already been in the fighting, but we did take the ground that new divisions going in, or new brigades, should as far as possible, retain the officers they had been trained under, provided they were qualified. In cases where an officer had to be replaced, he stepped down and out willingly, but he was always courteously treated, not thrown out like a buccaneer, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) was when he went over with his battalion. When we organized the Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Divisions, in large numbers by battalions, every officer was given to understand that unless he measured up, and unless his unit measured up, he must give place to the corps already in the field, and his unit must be broken up. That was distinctly understood by ninety-nine out of every hundred, and if it was not understood it was contrary to orders. They were to go over taking their chances, and if by their efficiency they could merit recognition, they were to be maintained together as far as possible as reserve battalions. There never was any intention I can assure hon. gentlemen but that officers who had given their time and money, as they had done in the years 1915 and 1916—I may say here that there was never anything to equal that system in the history of this or any other country—were entitled to absolutely fair treatment.

It was only when the overseas minister was appointed that these men had their battalions taken from them and they were thrown out. I never in my life saw anything like the way they were treated. Non-commissioned officers would sometimes take the battalions away from the colonels who had brought them over. In my time they were treated with the utmost courtesy in every solitary instance. It was all right enough to break the battalions up. That could not be avoided, except in some cases where there was favouritism shown, and men were put over the heads of better men, and others were treated discourteously and given no consideration at all.

Mr. COPP: On whose recommendation were these men put over the head of the others?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have not the records. The hon. member will have to get that from the records. It did not occur in my time.

Mr. COPP: In your time? On whose recommendation were these inferior men put over the heads of the others?

Sir SAM HUGHES: There were no inferior men, no junior men, put over the head of the senior, unless the senior were absolutely unqualified, in my time. But later on there were many instances where men were put over excellent officers, their betters in every way, and these had no chance whatever, but were passed over, and then, of course, there was a good deal of trouble. The whole trouble could have been avoided if these men had been courteously relieved of their battalions instead of their being ruthlessly taken from them. Perhaps the Minister of Marine and Fisheries can explain why he was thrown out.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Chairman, I cannot altogether concur in the last observation of my good friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). I certainly was not, as he puts it, thrown out in England. I endeavoured to raise an overseas battalion of infantry, the 245th Battalion Canadian Grenadier Guards, and with the loyal and enthusiastic assistance of the officers associated with me, and at the expenditure of a respectable sum of money, I succeeded, after great effort, in recruiting a considerable number of men with a splendid organization, but I could not bring my battalion up to strength. The reason for this was that the voluntary system of recruiting had broken down, and notwithstanding the fact that there were plenty of available men in the good city of Montreal, I found it quite impossible to induce them to join up for overseas service. Before I left with my battalion for overseas I was perfectly well aware that it would be broken up shortly after our arrival in England. I knew that my men would be drafted into one of the reserve battalions there, and later, after they had completed their training, sent forward to France. When I arrived in England with my unit I was allowed to retain command for about ten days in Shoreham camp, and then I received orders to turn my unit over to the 23rd Reserve Battalion. I was then ordered by the General Officer Commanding, Shoreham Camp, to report at London. I offered my services to General Turner in any capacity that he considered I could best serve in either in England or in France, but he informed me that my services could not be accepted, for two reasons: First, that only junior officers would be allowed to go to England, men not over 35 years of age, and inasmuch as I was fifty years of age, I could not be permitted to revert to the rank of lieutenant. The second reason was that there was a large number of junior officers in the various camps in England, some fully trained and others training, waiting an opportunity to go to France. I found no fault with the policy prevailing in England, that overseas units arriving there of necessity had to be broken up to maintain up to strength the four divisions of Canadian infantry in France.

Mr. VIEN: That was in May, 1917?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, I admit that there was a large number of Canadian officers in the various camps in England at that time, but that was not surprising. Notwithstanding the training officers and non-commissioned officers and men receive in Canada before they leave for overseas, they have to take a long course of additional training in England. At the present time there are not nearly so many Canadian officers in England as there were when I was there, because owing to the heavy casualties at the front they are being sent over more quickly. I will admit that, like all other commanding officers whose battalions are broken up on arrival in England, I was disappointed. I knew full well, however, before I left that this system would prevail, and I can find no fault with the treatment accorded me.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman, on his return from overseas, was one of the most wrathy men I ever met.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Disappointed.

Mr. McMASTER: The remarks of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) may be very interesting, but I would ask him to speak a little louder, so that we all may get the benefit of them.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was saying that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), on his return from England was—I will not say the maddest man, but one of the most intensely disappointed men that it has ever been my privilege to meet. I told all whom I met before they left that they must take their chance; that the proficiency or strength of their battalions would be the measure of their chance of being retained in the new divisions. I wish to pay my good friend (Mr. Ballantyne) this tribute: no officer in Canada surpassed him in zeal, in enthusiasm, or in the desire to have a good battalion. For some unaccountable reason—he knows, you know, and others know what the troubles were; I shall not intrude them on the committee now, though I may do so later in the session—recruiting did not measure up as I had hoped. The officers who went over with these battalions knew that it was not possible under the circumstances for every battalion to go to the front as a unit, but what did hurt me was that officers who had given of their time and money to the raising of their battalions should have them taken from them immediately on their arrival in England. To illustrate—I say it advisedly; the facts are as I state them unless officers have misrepresented them, and I do not believe that they have—officers have landed in England, marched their battalions into camp, and have never been allowed to see them again. One member of this House told me that his battalion had been taken from him by a sergeant major and marched off, while he and his officers were left behind. That has been the cause of much dissatisfaction. Many of these officers—all, I think, who were within the age—were desirous of going to the front. At that time there were not, of course, places for all officers. The system of taking non-commissioned officers from the ranks and giving them commissions was not new; it had been in vogue from the beginning of the campaign within each battalion, division, and so on. But when a new division went over it was right that the officers who had raised the units and who had given their time and money to the work should, provided they were qualified, command the battalions, companies and platoons in the field.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has told us that many of these battalions were disposed of rather unceremoniously. He has cited the case of a man whose battalion was marched off by a sergeant-major; was this done at the instance of the Canadian, or of the Imperial, authorities?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The policy had been to keep the battalions there for a time and let them get settled down, the old officers remaining with them until the units were broken up. Later the policy was inaugurated of breaking up the battalions immediately on their arrival in England. That was done by the Canadian local brigadier and officers in command of the unit to which the battalions were assigned. Certainly I had nothing whatever to do with it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did this come from the Overseas Minister of Militia?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know from whom else it would come. I should hope that it did not come from this side.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The same thing was done before an overseas minister was appointed. The commanding officer of the 189th Battalion, a very fine young man named Piuze—

Sir SAM HUGHES: A fine fellow.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: He recruited his regiment with great success and crossed over in 1916.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What month?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: In September or October.

Sir SAM HUGHES: October, I think.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: An officer was waiting on the wharf at Liverpool, and when the regiment disembarked the officer asked for Colonel Piuze. He then told Colonel Piuze that he had orders to take over the command of his regiment, and that fine officer, who had been the most successful recruiting officer in the province of Quebec and who had been assured that his regiment would go to the front as a unit, had not the glory—if it be called a glory—of commanding his own unit on British soil. He had to act as a sort of visitor at the camp for some months. Colonel Piuze, who is a very well qualified officer, is to-day commanding the depot battalion at Quebec. That is what happened in England; I was there at the time, and I know what I am talking about. All the officers of the unit were very angry, and took opportunity to ventilate their grievances. Colonel Piuze himself did not complain.

Sir SAM HUGHES: These are the cases that I complain of. Colonel Piuze was one of the best officers in the service; he took over a very fine battalion. Personally I had nothing to do with the matter; it was after I had the handling of it.

Mr. BUREAU: The other day one of the members inquired regarding an article in the papers about the treatment received by the soldiers returning from overseas. The Minister of Militia and Defence replied that the matter rested with the overseas minister. I must say that I know very little about this overseas minister, and I am anxious to know more. We have in this House a Minister of Militia who is responsible to Parliament for everything that is done in his department, and we are here to criticise him if we have occasion to find fault. But things are done by the Overseas Minister of Militia for which the Minister of Militia who sits in this House is responsible. We cannot criticise those things because we do not know what is going on overseas in regard to them. The question that comes to the ordinary mufti-dressed man is: Why should there be two departments in one, and why should one man, if I may use the expression, wear the harness, draw the cart, be exposed here to all the criticism, and yet have no control over the other man? I do not believe, unless they have private information, there are many members of this House, except those who have been overseas, who know what is being done there. I do not know what is being done nor who is performing what duties. When I look over the statutes and read the authority of the Minister of Militia and Defence, I know exactly what his authority is and what constitutes his department; I know exactly what powers Parliament has vested in him. But when I speak about the Overseas Ministry of Militia, why, I do not even know by what authority it exists, unless it be by Order in Council. I do not know what are the powers of the Overseas Minister of Militia, what duties he is performing overseas or what is under his control. There is no doubt he must be spending a great deal of money in England. If I understand aright the position as it is now, the authorities in England are spending money on our behalf and we are spending money on theirs, but the balance must be drawn some day. If they are equipping and paying for our men, if we on this side are paying for ships or wheat or other commodities, when the day of reckoning comes, there is a balance to be drawn. Who has the supervision of that expenditure on the other side? I do not know. Are we to have any control over it? Are we going to be allowed to criticise the way in which the money is expended? Certainly not, according to the way in which things are being done now. I do not, of course, want to be understood as fault-finding, all I want to know is what control or authority the Overseas Minister of Militia has with reference to the Canadian Forces, and how it is that you can have two or perhaps three departments in one? Does the Overseas Minister of Militia control the expenditure of Canadian moneys or the administration of Canadian forces in France? That is what I should like to have light upon in order to be able to put questions so as to ascertain what condition we are in and what we may expect from this duplicate or triplicate administration of the Department of Militia and Defence. It is most unfair that one man should shoulder in this House the whole burden, and be in this unenviable position of sometimes being unable to give information when that is absolutely not his fault. I do not want the minister to understand that I desire to criticise him. I know he cannot do any better than he is doing. If I had two branches of my business, one being in Montreal, and I could not go to Montreal, nobody could blame me for not knowing anything about my deeds and abstracts there, but the system could be blamed, and people could accuse me of ignorance, or neglect, or recklessness, for which I would be answerable if I were at the head of that office and had the administration of it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall endeavour to relieve, as far as I can, the darkness which, according to my hon. friend, is overspreading him. If he would extend his researches into the statutory law a little further and examine the statutes that were passed last session, he would find there a statue which defines the powers, duties and jurisdiction of the Minister of the Overseas Service. That can be stated in a very few words. The Minister of the Overseas Service is to have, and does have, the same jurisdiction and powers and duties in respect of the troops in Great Britain and France that the Minister of Militia and Defence has in respect of the troops that are raised here before they embark for overseas. So far as the payments overseas are concerned, I have already explained to the committee—I do not know whether my hon. friend was present or not—that they are under the direct supervision of the Auditor General, who, after consultation with the Government about eighteen months ago, detailed officers of his department for the purpose of examining the system of checking accounts overseas. Officers have gone to England for that purpose and have made any necessary examination. Further than that, my hon. friend does not seem to be aware that the major portion of the expenditure overseas is regulated by statute; that is to say, the pay and allowances of the troops who are serving in Great Britain and in France. That is provided by law; it is not subject to the discretion of any minister or officer. In respect of transport and in respect of the provision of food, expenditures have to be made, and are made in the ordinary way. The maintenance of the troops in France is undertaken by the British Government, and a fixed amount per day for each man serving in France has been agreed upon between the Government of this country and the Government of the United Kingdom. Those are matters of accounting which will be adjusted afterwards.

Mr. VIEN: Can the Prime Minister tell us how much the amount is per man per day?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already stated that this afternoon. I shall state it again. The amount per man in France, as regulated in the first instance, was six shillings, which covered not only the maintenance of the man there, but ammunition for the rifles, shells for the guns, everything that was to be done in France.

Sir SAM HUGHES: But not the pay of the men.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But not the pay of the men. I thought, of course, I had made that plain already. It is for the maintenance of the men and not for the pay of the men, so that there is very little left to the discretion or regulation of the overseas minister, but whatever is left has been under the direct supervision of the Auditor General and has been carefully checked by him from time to time. I spoke to the Auditor General to-day before coming into the House, and so far as I could gather from him, the arrangements made in the public interest to superintend those expenditures are entirely to his satisfaction.

Mr. BUREAU: My right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) tells me, as one of the explanations to make sunshine in my darkness, that that expenditure is authorized by statute.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The greater part.

Mr. BUREAU: Very well. Even if the whole of it were authorized by statute, that would not be a satisfactory explanation. The expenditure of this Parliament is authorized by statute, and yet my right hon. friend knows how that expenditure is criticised, and he knows that parties in Opposition have found that expenditures, although authorized by statute, are sometimes very badly handled. That is the objection I raise. Even if the expenditure be authorized by statute, the man who has authority to spend the money ought to be in this House or have a representative here; or if you like it better, the minister who is responsible to this House ought to have a representative under his control, and this expenditure ought to be made also under his control. The other explanation given by the right hon. gentleman is rather a surprise to me, namely, that the expenditure is under the immediate control of the Auditor General. The other night we had a discussion in this House, and I addressed the following remarks to the acting Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Finance, I do not know which, as that matter is a little hazy just now: I note that in your estimates you are decreasing the amount which goes to pay the employees of your department. He admitted that. I asked him: How can you do it when your work of auditing is increasing on account of the larger expenditures to which the country is being put as a result of the war? I did not have time to look at Hansard, but what I gathered from his answer was this:

The details of the war expenditure do not go to the Auditor General to be examined and passed upon. His answer seemed to be very reasonable, in view of the objection that I was making, that the staff was decreasing as the work was increasing. It seemed very reasonable to suppose that somebody else must have been assuming a part of the burden. My right hon. friend says that the Auditor General has been there and has examined the accounts. It may be all very well to say that the Auditor General is assuming responsibility, but I contend that the Auditor General is our officer, he is our servant, he is independent of the Government, and for a very good reason. He is the watch dog of the treasury, as we are pleased to call him, but I do not think it is fair that he should delegate his powers to any man over whom he has not immediate supervision. He may find a good man, but I do not think he should have an assistant auditor or a staff of auditors across the seas to perform work which ought to be performed under his immediate supervision in his office, and for which work he should be open to criticism. It may be that the darkness is very thick, as analyzed by my hon. friend, but that does not account for it, and that does not make me feel satisfied with the audit of the expenditure made overseas by the Department of Militia and Defence.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am sorry if my efforts were so unavailing. I will repeat—

Mr. BUREAU: I understand what you said; you need not repeat.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid my hon. friend did not quite understand it. I said that these expenditures, like all other expenditures of the Government, are under the supervision and control of the Auditor General. They are being made three thousand miles away. It did not seem desirable that they should continue without the Auditor General being brought more closely in touch with the expenditures at the place where they were actually made. After consultation with the Minister of Finance and with the consent and full approval of the Government, the Auditor General went overseas himself and examined the measures taken there to safeguard the public interest. He left over there a representative who continued there for some months or for the space that the Auditor General thought necessary. He afterwards returned to Canada and he is in Canada now, I believe. When the Auditor General thinks the public interest demands that the officer should return in order that he may be brought into close touch with the expenditures in Great Britain and France and that closer supervision may be exercised, he will send him back. Why should that not be left to the discretion of the Auditor General? My hon. friend seems to suggest that he should not send his officer for that purpose.

Mr. BUREAU: I suggest that the expenditures should be controlled here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are controlled here in the same way as other expenditures, by the Auditor General. They are controlled, in the first place, by the fact that they are, for the most part, fixed expenditures. No man can pay anything in excess of the amount fixed by law to any officer, non-commissioned officer or man who serves at the front. They are controlled, in the next place, by the supervision of the Auditor General through himself and his officers here as well as by officers whom he sends overseas.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I presume the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) does not wish to give the wrong impression that the Auditor General brought about any reforms when he went over there?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: On the contrary, he was compelled to report—I do not know whether willingly or against his will—that he found everything correct.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that is correct.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I might point out, to show what the conditions were in England for a while, that when the troops went over there at first they were regarded, not as Canadians, but as British soldiers. I had the honour of going over in 1914, arriving at the same time as the troops, and while speaking with the Acting High Commissioner, Mr. Perley, now Sir George Perley, he said to me: "You do not pretend to have any control of the soldiers here?" I said: "Why not?" "They are British soldiers," he said. I said that I was not aware that I was called upon to offer any explanation, but that I felt, as I was bound to feel, that I was standing by the law. I later on met the Secretary of State for War, who used almost identical language. On the strength of the remarks of the Acting High Commissioner, he said that these troops were British soldiers, and added: "You do not pretend to have any claim upon them?" I said "I make no pretense to anything, but I merely claim what the Army Act allows." Section 177 of the Army Act, to my mind, clearly gives Canada absolute control of her troops except as to military directions in the field. They are subject to the Commander-in-Chief of the British army in the field. That is the line I took. That is the ground I stand on to-day and that is the ground, I am pleased to have to observe, is taken by the Government, although I had a long up-hill fight before I carried my point. A little later I received a message from Canada asking if the Canadians were in action. I replied "No." A cable came back asking if So-and-So had been killed in action, saying that his wife had been notified by the British War Office that her husband had been killed in Belgium. I made inquiries and I found that a man had been killed in Belgium two weeks before and it did not require a great astuteness to see that there was something wrong. Some one had drawn pay for that man who had been dead for two weeks. I found that the pay of a great many absentees without leave had been drawn by somebody. I presume that the officers did not check the matter up very closely in some cases. I immediately set to work to rectify this and I found that the Pay Department, by somebody's instructions, was under the direction of the British War Office and that we were not supposed to interfere. I let it pass for the time being but I instructed the officers to keep a careful eye on this aspect of the matter. Later on I found out that in order to have anything like a proper control of payments there must be a different system, and after consultation with General Carson, I placed in charge of that department, and made responsible for the correct auditing of the accounts, a very capable officer whose name I forget at the moment. He did willing service and in a short time he reduced the system to a proper basis. We then introduced the system of paying by passbook and carried it out so that we had it down in a short time to as perfect a system as could be established anywhere. Still wishing to strengthen the system, I selected Colonel Ross, of the Royal Highlanders, Montreal, and sent him over with instructions to see that everything was done in an absolutely correct manner. Then the Auditor General, after he had been well worked up by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), in a fit of epilepsy thought things might be going wrong over there and he went over himself. When he got to England he gratefully acknowledged that he found everything in absolute ship-shape. I want to narrate the condition of affairs to the House, to show that every avenue and every loophole for the possibility of fraud, looseness or carelessness had been closed before the Auditor General and his assistants were sent over by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Finance Minister. Perhaps the present Minister of Militia might explain—although I do not charge him for being responsible for anything that has gone wrong—whether the Auditor General has been active in seeing that accounts for separation allowance and assigned pay are kept in proper condition in Canada, or whether there have been any slips and any money lost.

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand the Auditor General has been and is auditing the accounts regularly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And that everything is all right?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have no statement from him, but I know that, as a matter of fact, there are a large number of accounts for separation allowance and assigned pay where over-payment has been made, and I think in the early stages of the war, in the years 1914 and 1915 particularly, mistakes were made when the separation allowance and assigned pay were being paid out by military districts, instead of by Headquarters. In many cases where troops have gone overseas there has been over-payment in connection with the separation allowance. Every endeavour, I understand, has been made to recover those payments in some instances, and I imagine quite a number; but I do not think those amounts can be or should be recovered. They are at present, I understand, written off or put in suspense account, and will have to be dealt with by the House at a later date, when they are finally ascertained, but they chiefly were cases where married women received over-payment in connection with separation allowance, and where they have endeavoured to keep up their little homes and families. I think it would be an extreme hardship if they were asked to refund $50 or $100. It was through no fault of theirs that they were overpaid. I am speaking generally, and am not in a position to give figures.

Mr. VIEN: And is there on this side of the ocean any office or any representative of the overseas Department of Militia and Defence?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of the Overseas Service sends regular reports to the Prime Minister and copies of them to the Minister of Militia and Defence. In that way touch between the department and the department here is continually kept up.

9 p.m.

Mr. VIEN: Is the Overseas Minister of Militia and Defence under the control in any shape or form of the Minister of Militia and Defence on this side, or of the Militia Council?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The minister overseas is in the same position as any other minister of the Crown He is a member of the Cabinet, responsible for the administration of the department which has been confided to him.

Mr. VIEN: He has not, as yet, laid upon the table of the House any report of his department overseas, has he?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The report of his department was comprised in statements made upon this appropriation last year. At the commencement of last year the present Minister of the Overseas Service had been in office only a very short time.

Mr. VIEN: I want to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence what system exists in so far as purchasing of war material is concerned? Is the war material purchased for the expeditionary force on this side of the ocean, or in England? I wish to refer specially to general service wagons, for instance water wagons, munition wagons, and also to arms, clothing, equipment and munitions.

Major-General MEWBURN: As far as the Army Service Corps wagons or kitchens, or any equipment of that kind is concerned, none has been purchased in Canada in the last year or two. With regard to arms, the answer is, no. The arms that our force is using at the front are supplied, I understand, by the Imperial army—the same weapon as they use. As regards the clothing, that is contracted for and purchased in Canada, and those purchases are made through the War Purchasing Commission on demand from the Department of Militia and Defence here.

Sir SAM HUGHES: For the soldiers at the front?

Major-General MEWBURN: All the uniforms are sent from here for the troops overseas.

Mr. VIEN: Even for those at the front?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes, certainly—made here in Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Since when?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am advised that system is carried on at the present time. They are shipping a certain number of uniforms over regularly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: For troops in England?

Major-General MEWBURN: And the boots for our troops in Canada have been manufactured in Canada, issued to the troops in Canada, and each man going overseas takes two pairs of boots with him.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know what the latest order is, but I might place the facts before the House. In regard to the troops in England, the statement is correct. For the troops going over to France, they take the uniforms on their back, and do not change before they go. They keep the boots on their feet.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the uniforms?

Sir SAM HUGHES: When the uniform was supplied the rule was—and I fought against it—that the troops in France and Belgium should be supplied with a British outfit.

Major-General MEWBURN: Those were replacements, I understand.

Sir SAM HUGHES: No; they are supplied to our troops, and the Prime Minister will remember that when the arrangement was made and submitted to me for approval, I drew his attention to the fact that if these uniforms were to be taken from the British stores, the British Government should give to the Canadian manufacturers orders for a similar number of uniforms to those supplied to our troops in France and Belgium from the British store. The hon. Prime Minister will remember that. I understand that has not been done, although we still take uniforms from the British store, but I understand the British Government is not buying from Canadian manufacturers an equivalent amount.

Mr. VIEN: Is a scale of prices arranged for with the British Government, in so far as the equipment arms, and clothing is concerned? Who has control of them?

Mr. TWEEDIE: The minister has just mentioned one fact——

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to obtain an answer? I put a question and the minister will answer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend will be patient, he will get his answer.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I wish to congratulate the hon. Minister of Militia on the very generous position which I understand he has taken in connection with the overpayment of separation allowance. I feel that his stand will meet with the approval of every member in this House, even though it would mean a loss to the country. A great many cases have come under my personal observation in connection with my work and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) and I were discussing the matter to-night. We find many cases in which a man has been killed, or for some reason his pay should have been suspended and separation allowance stopped. His dependents, however, continue to receive this money. The practice in the past seems to have been to insist rigidly on the repayment of this money by the dependent, but, as the minister has pointed out, in nearly all these cases the dependents are in such circumstances that they are unable to refund the whole or any part of the money, and I think the hon. minister is acting very generously with them if he writes that off and carries his decision into effect by not making any demand on these dependents for the return of the money. That is very good so far as the separation allowance is concerned, but, personally, I feel that every member in this House would like to see that policy carried one step further and made to cover cases arising in connection with assigned pay.

There are a great many dependents who have received Assigned Pay under conditions not entitling them to it, but, as in the case of the separation allowance, it was through no fault of their own and they were ignorant of the fact that they were taking the money improperly. They have received and expended the money, and I think that if the minister will adopt a policy of not demanding the return of either the assigned pay or separation allowance which has been overpaid, he will be adopting a generous policy—a policy which is just to the dependents and will meet with their approval throughout Canada, which will do a great deal to promote comfort in their homes, and I have no doubt will receive the approval of every member of the House.

Mr. VIEN: Would the hon. the minister answer my question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will give the hon. gentleman the answer as far as possible. In the first place, the men go over with their uniforms from here, and with a certain additional supply, with extra boots, for example; and when they leave England for France they are fully equipped with uniforms, boots and everything else which has been supplied to them before they leave this country. It is impossible, of course, to keep up separate depots for the Canadian force in France. That force is part of a very large army, and it is necessary to have depots, commissariat arrangements, and everything of that kind provided for the army as a whole; it is entirely impossible to have separate arrangements for 150,000 men out of perhaps two millions. So, in France, the replacements of uniforms, as I understand it, are made out of the British stores. I am not sure at the moment whether or not any exact arrangement has been made as to the amount which shall be charged for these replacements. If no such arrangement has been made, it will be subject to adjustment at a later date. We have never found any disposition on the part of the British authorities to endeavour to exact from this country a higher price than that which would be just and reasonable for all such supplies.

Mr. VIEN: Yes. But probably the difficulty would arise when the war is over and the readjustment takes place. Would it not be better—and I suggest it with no political intention—that some arrangement should be made right away so that regard should be had to prevailing prices, and no advantage taken of perhaps higher prices at a later date when the readjustment takes place?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: When the readjustment takes place, of course, it must be on the basis of the prices at the time the articles were furnished. I do not at all anticipate any such difficulty as my hon. friend suggests. However, inquiry will be made with regard to the matter if he considers it important. There are a good many subjects which will come up for adjustment between the two governments when this war is ended, and, of course, on both sides a complete record is kept of such matters for the purpose of the proposed eventual adjustment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would draw the Prime Minister's attention to the point I raised some time ago. It may seem a small matter, but I know that the British Government is willing to deal fairly in the premises—they told me so personally, and I think the Prime Minister took the matter up also. The manufacture of clothing for 150,000 to 200,000 men is quite a little item. It is of primary importance that our factories should be kept going and employment given to our workers. I drew the Prime Minister's attention, at the time the conference with the British Government was arranged, to the desirability of purchases being made directly through this Government from our manufacturers, or that a quantity of uniforms corresponding to the number which the British Government have supplied to our troops at the front should be replaced from here. In that way the manufacturers would receive orders and the labouring people get employment in the same manner as they would if we were ourselves supplying our own troops with uniforms.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am bearing the hon. gentleman's point in mind. I impressed that consideration upon the British authorities not only by correspondence, but also orally; it formed the subject of some discussion about a year ago. The British Government are desirous of doing anything in that regard that may be practicable, but, of course, we have to take into consideration the difficulties of transport, which are very considerable. They are able to point out to us, as they have pointed out, that if we may be a little short in the supply of uniforms or equipment of any kind, we are very much ahead in the supply of shells, munitions of war and a great many other articles which have been produced in enormous quantities in this country, in very great excess of the requirements of the Canadian troops at the front. So on the whole I think we have not anything to complain of, although we would be very glad, indeed, if an arrangement could be made by which some of the uniforms for the British troops could be purchased in this country.

Mr. JACOBS: The principle which has been enunciated by the Government with regard to the appointment of two cabinet ministers for one position is something which we on this side of the House cannot understand. It is to us subversive of all principles of ministerial responsibility and parliamentary practice. There are other countries at war just now as well as Canada, but I have yet to find that in any of the other governments they have considered it necessary to have two ministers of war. They are satisfied to have one minister on the parliamentary benches, and to have officers who are properly qualified for the position in the trenches. But to have ministers in the trenches and on the benches at the same time is something that does not appeal to us at all. Now the United States are allies of ours, and I have yet to learn that they have two cabinet ministers attending to the War Department, although there would be much more reason for them to have two ministers than ourselves, because their administrative system is entirely different from ours. In the United States there is no ministerial responsibility, the cabinet is in no way responsible to the House; and if a member of the United States cabinet wishes to take a jaunt across the Atlantic to see how matters are going on at the front, the business of the country can go on just the same. I see by the newspapers that Mr. Baker is conferring with the Allies on the other side, but no additional minister, as I understand it, is taking his place even under the American system. The only reason I can suggest why there should be two ministers for Canada—one on the other side of the Atlantic and one on this—is that they should not quarrel, and therefore it is well to have the Atlantic ocean between them. Or, it may be, that the right hon. the Prime Minister, in his desire to see that both parties were properly represented in the Union Government, thought fit to provide that the Conservative Minister of Militia should be on the other sde of the Atlantic, and the Liberal Minister of Militia on this side.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Fifty-fifty.

Mr. JACOBS: This system of providing positions in order to make room for every person, in order to see that every person is happy during these strenuous times, is further exemplified in the division of the functions of the Minister of the Interior. That position has also been divided, and now we have a Minister of the Interior, looking after the Department of the Interior I suppose, and we have a Minister of Immigration and Colonization. At no time in the history of Canada did we less require a Minister of Immigration than at this time when there is not a single immigrant coming into the country, and as for colonization the matter is not to be thought of until after the war is over. And yet it was considered necessary to create a new portfolio only a few months ago, and $7,000 of the people's money accordingly goes to the up-keep of a Minister of Immigration and Colonization.

Then we have also the Ministry of Finance divided, and we find a Conservative Minister of Finance in California three thousand miles away, and at the same time we have a Liberal Minister of Finance in Ottawa, so that every one is satisfied.

So far as I can understand, Mr. Chairman, the position which the Overseas Minister of Militia occupies just now is nothing more or less than that of a glorified paymaster. That is all he is, because we cannot hold him responsible for anything he does. The session will have prorogued before we are able to see the classic lineaments of this gentleman on this side of the Atlantic. This business could be done just as well by a deputy minister, and not by a full-fledged Minister of Militia and Defence, whose duty is to be right here at this particular time to answer all questions that are being put to him. The House had an opportunity the other day of seeing how a minister refused to accept responsibility for certain acts committed in Quebec. When the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) referred to one department, that gentleman stood from under and put it on the other minister, and then that gentleman tried to absolve himself from responsibility. That is what is going to happen in this case. The Minister of Militia and Defence will say: I have nothing to do with that; the other minister is attending to that. We have no means of checking him up, and in that way the party responsible can escape because of the duplication of the position. It is an endeavour to make some person responsible for the acts of some other person. That is what is being done by the creation of this new position. It may be that I cannot see this matter as well as some hon. gentlemen in the House, but I have always been brought up to believe in personal, individual responsibility, not vicarious sacrifice, and that is probably why it is that I rise to ask some further explanation from the right hon. Prime Minister, or the Government, as to why this position was duplicated at this particular juncture.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid that my hon. friend has not pursued his studies into cabinet responsibility very far, otherwise he would have learned that the Government as a whole is responsible for the acts of every minister. There is not any such individual responsibility as he alleges, apart from the collective responsibility of the whole Cabinet. The minister has his responsibility in the first instance, but the Cabinet as a whole is responsible for the administration of every minister of the Crown. My hon. friend has not pursued his studies far enough, or he would have known what has taken place in Great Britain. One of the first things done in the first six months of the war was to divide up the War Department in Great Britain. Has the hon. member never heard of the Minister of Munitions?

Mr. JACOBS: Is that gentleman who has been created an additional member of the Cabinet following the camp in the same way as our present minister, or is he in London?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He is in London, and it would be rather idle to establish a Minister of Overseas Service and have him here when his duties require him to be overseas. My hon. friend seems to think that we have divided up departments for the sake of making positions.

Mr. BUREAU: Of duplicating positions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Let me say that Sir Edward Kemp was not desirous of assuming the duties of Minister of Militia overseas, and it was at my urgent request that he accepted; he is endeavoring to discharge his duties to the best of his ability, and he is discharging them with great ability and diligence. But with regard to the illustration which I gave to my right hon. friend, of the division of department with which he found so much fault——

Mr. McMASTER: Might I interpose a question? Has the Minister of Munitions in Great Britain a seat in the House of Commons? I think he has.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly, he has a seat in the House of Commons, and so has Sir Edward Kemp a seat in this House.

Mr. McMASTER: It is unoccupied.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does my hon. friend imagine that every minister of the Crown must be present in this House all the time?

Mr. McMASTER: Sometimes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does he not know that both in Great Britain and here there are ministers of the Crown who are members of the other House, and their colleagues have to answer for them? And we shall endeavour to answer for the Minister of Militia Overseas. But I can give you hon. friend some more illustrations to indicate to him how imperfectly he has followed up this question in the United Kingdom. After the outbreak of the war, I think about a year and a half after, a Minister of Blockade was established in Great Britain, who undertook duties which formerly were performed by other departments of the Government, and later on a Minister of Shipping was appointed, who undertook certain duties which theretofore had been discharged by the Admiralty. I read a statement in the British Hansard not long ago to the effect that there are at the present time something over ninety members in the British Government, taking ministers, parliamentary secretaries and every one else. So I think that, on the whole, considering that we are at war—and I hope my hon. friend will not forget that,—

Mr. JACOBS: I helped to vote $500,000,000 this afternoon, so I have not forgotten it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought in the course of his observations that he had forgotten it for a moment; I am glad it is always in his mind. We are at war, and there are very serious duties devolving upon those who sit on the Treasury benches, much more serious and arduous duties than have ever before been placed on any Government in this country. It has been necessary somewhat to enlarge the Government, but not in anything like the same measure as has been found necessary in the United Kingdom. We have established a Ministry of Militia Overseas, and have put a man on the spot, with the idea that he could supervise over there and keep in continual communication with the Minister of Militia here, each one of them having definite and specified duties, and we have also—

Mr. JACOBS: Why could not a deputy minister do that work instead of torturing the Constitution in this way?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I do not propose going over all that debate which took place last session—

Mr. JACOBS: I was not here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: —when a statute was passed which established the Ministry of Militia Overseas. It is perfectly true that my hon. friend was not here, but I might suggest that Hansard is available to him, and it might be worth while to look at that before he takes occasion to discuss this matter. I repeat that, so far as the Minister of Militia Overseas is concerned, we, his colleagues here, will answer for him. In the very nature of things he cannot be here to answer for himself. We shall give all the information with regard to this expenditure that he could supply, and if anything is asked for which the information is not available, we will telegraph for it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LEMIEUX: I caught the eye of the Chairman.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I shall be delighted to leave it to the Chairman, but I shall not make way unless the Chairman rules the other way.

The CHAIRMAN: I told the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) a few minutes ago that I would see him next.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to revive a corpse, but I would like to ask the Minister of Militia what became of the Ross rifles which were discarded?

Major-General MEWBURN: My information is that very few of them were discarded, but I am not positive. I understand they were disposed of to great advantage in the United Kingdom.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were they transformed?

Major-General MEWBURN: I cannot answer that. The hon. ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) can probably give more information than I can.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question, and I may say, incidentally, that I do not propose entering into a discussion. I am trying to remember that we are at war—although there are ninety members of the British Government, the British are not meeting with any great success at the front at the present time; and bearing that in mind, I shall not enter into a discussion of what is fully in my heart, which might not be just as advisable to discuss at the present time as we might like. I may point out here that the United States Government, having in view the fact that the Canadian Government has multiplied its officers to a very large number, and in view of the fact that the British Government had increased its membership—though I did not know it had reached the number of ninety; God pity the country if they have ninety—refused point blank to have a committee appointed by either branch of the Congress of the United States to advise and consult with either the Secretary for War or for the Navy on matters connected with the war. If I may express an opinion, they did absolutely right.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the United States they have appointed a great many boards and commissions.

Sir SAM HUGHES: All under the Secretary of War.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Each board or commission is under a chairman who is in some association—I do not know precisely the nature of it—with a department of Government. For example, they have a War Industries Board, a War Trade Board, an Ordnance Board, and a great many such bodies. I was informed to-day, though I do not say it authoritatively, that very important additions have been made to the War Department quite recently.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Under the Secretary for War?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) made an inquiry regarding Separation allowance and Assigned Pay, and

I understood the minister to say that in future, in cases where the refund asked for could not be made by the person who had been overpaid, the amount would be written off the books and a report made to the House. I suggest that when the minister makes his report on this subject, he ask Parliament also to vote an appropriation to reimburse the poor women who have already made such payments, and who in many cases have had to borrow money in order to do so.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not treat all alike, and give it also to those who were not overpaid?

Mr. BUREAU: The cases would not be identical. The ex-minister suffers from the same disease as the Prime Minister, who gives an example of the subdividing of departments. I do not object to the subdividing of departments, but I do object to the duplicating of departments and the creating of concurrent jurisdiction. The Minister of Militia Overseas has the same power as the Minister of Militia in Canada. I know that there is solidarity among the ministers, but what I do not know is what the other gentleman is doing overseas. I should like to see him in his seat, the same as the Minister of Militia for Canada, so that we could quiz him when we wanted to find anything out.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no doubt that he would like to be here and enjoy the privilege of being quizzed by my hon. friend or by any other hon. gentleman, but in default of his presence, my hon. friend is at liberty to quiz us.

Mr. BUREAU: Why the concurrent jurisdiction?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I pointed out the statute to my hon. friend; it is chapter 35 of the statutes of 1917. He will see that his assertion that these ministers have the same duties is entirely unfounded. Ministers of various departments have to act in conjunction with each other. For example, if any member of the Government desires additional accommodation for his department, say, the erection of a new building, the minister who desires the building erected gets in touch with the Minister of Public Works, under whose direction and by whose officer the construction of the proposed building is carried out. There is nothing very difficult about the situation as regards the Minister of Militia and Defence and the Minister Overseas. One deals with the raising, provision for and equipment of troops here in Canada until they embark for overseas, and when they reach England they come under the immediate jurisdiction of the Minister of Overseas Service.

Major General MEWBURN: In regard to the Separation Allowance, there were many cases of hardship where overpayments on both separation allowance and assigned pay had been made. The officers in charge of the department, asked, and rightly so, for refunds where these overpayments had been made. In cases where the refund would cause hardship, however, the amounts were left in what we call the suspense account, consideration having first been given to the matter by the Auditor General. I had intended, when the adjustments were made, to come to the House and ask permission to write the amounts off. I do not see how we could very well make the provision retroactive, because, as the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) suggests, we might have to pay every one the additional amount.

Mr. VIEN: It is known that these overpayments amount to several hundred thousand dollars?

Major General MEWBURN: I could not give the amount.

Mr. VIEN: Is the minister prepared to admit that they amount to over $100,000?

Major General MEWBURN: I would say that the amount does exceed $100,000, though I could not say by how much.

Sir SAM HUGHES: A great many of our boys transferred from the Canadian Expeditionary Force to the Royal Flying Corps, and in doing so they reverted in rank and were required to take less pay, and there was a great deal of complaint. Has anything been done in this matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If I am not mistaken, an Order in Council was passed some time ago by which it provided that Canadian officers entering the Flying Corps and thereby receiving smaller pay than that of their rank in the Canadian Expeditionary Force should have the difference made good to them. I think that is the case today.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLASS: Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN: I promised the member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) that I would see him next. I will recognize the hon. gentleman (Mr. Glass) as soon as the member for Charlevoix has finished.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Minister of Militia stated this afternoon that as quickly as a number of men were ready, they were sent overseas. I wish to find out whether it is the policy of the department to follow that course in the future.

Since the beginning of the war troops have been very well trained and have rendered effective service at the front. The former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) established throughout the country beautiful camps, especially Camp Borden, Niagara Camp and Valcartier. I am surprised to see that those camps are lying idle, and that nothing is being done in this country to train those men here. If those men were trained in this country, the money spent in training and equipping them and providing them with the necessaries of life would be spent in this country, instead of, as under the present circumstances, overseas. Moreover, at this particular time, when there is such a scarcity of foodstuffs in the Mother Country that the inhabitants are being put on fixed rations, it would be better for us to feed, equip and train those men in Canada as long as we can, and then, when they are ready to be sent to the front, send them overseas. We have here experienced colonels, captains, lieutenants, non-commissioned officers, who have seen service at the front and who are competent to give proper training to the men in this country.

Major-General MEWBURN: I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that a very serious war is being waged in France. As regards all the suggestions the hon. member makes as regards the training of men in Canada I shall absolutely agree that we have on this side officers, camps and facilities for giving them perfect training. As regards allowing them to remain here, whereby a considerable amount of money will be spent in Canada while they are undergoing training here, my hon. friend's statement is all very true. But when there is an immediate urgent necessity for men at the front, our duty is to get the men overseas as rapidly as we can. I do not think any other consideration enters into the discussion at the present moment. It would be a good thing if everybody would realize, as I feel some hon. members do not realize, the very urgent necessity for men at the front. Even our Allies, the United States, realize that to-day, and they do not intend to waste any time in training their men in the United States if they can secure ships to transport them to France. I have read it in the press, and I believe it to be true, that the United States Government have decided that for every man who goes on a transport over to France, another man shall take his place in a training camp in the United States. I wish we could say the same as regards Canada. Since the month of December, I have been using my utmost endeavours to get every available man who is fit for service in France, over to England just as quickly as we can get ships to transport them there. I have succeeded so far in filling every ship I could secure to put men on. We are now coming to the stage that we may have a few ships and we may not secure the men we want. I trust my hon. friend will realize the very urgent necessity of getting men to the front as quickly as possible. If he would read Lloyd George's speech which was delivered in England yesterday, he would see the urgent necessity for men, because the British authorities are sending boys of eighteen and nineteen to the front without even giving them time to say goodbye to their parents. That shows how urgent the necessity is.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. GLASS: Reverting to the matter of overpayment in assigned pay and separation allowance, I just wanted to ask the minister whether, under the auditing system which is in force now, there is likely to be any recurrence of those errors. I presume not. In the early stages of the war, several cases of that nature came to my attention in my own district, and I knew of several cases in which it was positively impossible for those who had been recipients of overpay to return the money. It would be a great hardship for them to have to do so. I agree entirely with the hon. members who have stated that the action the minister purposes taking in that matter will meet with the approval of the House. It would be uncharitable to attempt to enforce payment from those unfortunate beneficiaries who have been overpaid through the error of the Government. I have not had my attention personally drawn to any cases of the kind during the last two years, and I presume the system of accounting will prevent the recurrence of the mistakes made at the beginning of the war.

Major-General MEWBURN: I think I can honestly and safely say that there have been no mistakes of that nature under the present system of accounting. In the early stages of the war those accounts were all paid out by military districts where the troops were raised. There was no oversight, and that is how the mistakes occurred. Many mistakes were made during the first two months of the war.

Mr. LEDUC: I think all hon. members understand the requirements of our men overseas, but my opinion is that the men who are required at the front are trained men, and as soon as the men are trained, we are as willing and ready as the Minister of Militia and Defence to send them overseas. But while we have the food here for them, we would not like to send them overseas until they are fully trained. Why should we send them to England to be trained, when we can look after them better than they can be looked after on the other side where there is such a scarcity of food? Last week, I was asked this question by a gentleman who has a son a prisoner in Germany: "Is the Minister of Militia aware that the fathers of prisoners in Germany are sending overseas equipment, boots and everything else they require? Are we supposed to leave those men there without any equipment whatever or are we supposed to look after them?"

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the House this afternoon or not, but I shall endeavour to make myself very clear in regard to the training of troops. In the first place, I believe I am supported in my view by everybody who is vitally interested in this war and who realizes the urgent need of reinforcements. The fact of having our men in England even untrained is a great source of relief and comfort to our troops in France, because they feel that those men are only a hundred miles away from the firing line instead of three thousand miles. Our men going to England now are being given what is known as intensified training in all branches. An individual soldier can, with fourteen weeks of a syllabus of intensified training, be fitted for service in France, and no man who goes over to England is allowed to cross over to France until he has gone through that course.

As regards prisoners in Germany, I think I am right in saying that every possible measure has been and is being taken to see that our men get the proper and necessary supplies and money there through the various missions. I know whereof I speak because one of my cousins has been a prisoner in Germany since the battle of St. Julien in June, 1915, and I understand they are getting everything that is necessary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand the policy of the Minister of Militia is to use as little as possible the camps that have been built in this country, such as Camp Borden, Valcartier and Petawawa, and to send the men as soon as possible to Europe?

Major-General MEWBURN: It would give me the greatest amount of satisfaction and pleasure if we could use Valcartier and some of those other large camps. As far as Camp Borden is concerned, that camp will be utilized, I think, to the full extent, by the Royal Flying Corps. I am in hopes that we will be able to get sufficient men under the Military Service Act this spring to enable us to have troops for training at Valcartier and at some of the camps in the West. I had hoped that we could have forwarded overseas reinforcements at the rate of about ten thousand per month and always hold sufficient in hand for our training here. But our flow began to drop off and it would not be possible to open some of the camps unless we got an increased number of men.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The minister will only be able to send a certain number overseas because he has not the ships available to send too many. Undoubtedly there will be such a rush to camp in the spring, and with the impetus given by the Union Government, and all that sort of thing, that our camps will be more than filled and we will not have room enough for the thirty or forty thousand men in the camps all over the country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Let us hope so.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says that it gives courage to the boys in the trenches to see the other fellows beside them. But I do not see any reason why the minister should speak in a loud voice or accuse us of ignoring that there is a war on, or treat us with suspicion when we ask honest questions. When it is suggested that the scarcity of food on the other side might be regarded as a ground for training some of our men here, consuming the food here and dispensing with the necessity of finding transportation for it, that is no reason why the minister should impute motives to gentlemen on this side of the House. If the minister is going to get angry when we ask a question we will not get any farther. He will not scare us by talking in a loud voice. I do not intend to have any motives imputed to me, and I do not propose to refrain from asking questions because the minister gets impatient. He had better remain patient and give us answers to the questions we ask without imputing motives.

Major-General MEWBURN: The hon. gentleman has misunderstood my motives. If I talk in a loud voice it is probably my misfortune and not my fault. I did not intend to convey any idea of resentment. Probably I may be feeling very deeply and very sincerely in my desire to get troops overseas. If the hon. gentleman had seen some of the cables that have come into my possession in the last three months, and if he had known how necessary it was to get troops over there, he would probably have felt as keenly as I do. But I want to assure my hon. friend, and every hon. member on the other side of the House, that I had no thought of answering anybody in the way my hon. friend has suggested.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The men have to be trained on this side of the water or on the other side, and my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) asked a very pertinent question and even made the suggestion that it would be better to have them trained in this country where there is a sufficient provision of food, rather than in England. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence in answer to that, said the men should be in England as soon as possible, because we were at war, and the troops got comfort and courage because they saw these men beside them. That may be true, but the question was one that was perhaps not answered as it should have been.

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall endeavour to make myself a little clearer. My first object was to rush quite a number over to England as quickly as possible, if we could get the ships to take them over. It all came down to a question of ships. Secondly, they have various training schools at which these men are trained. A cable we received last week spoke of some of the men who had gone over under the Military Service Act, and said that they had made marvellous progress and had become expert in various lines of training. This cable also spoke of the great effect upon the morale of our troops which had been caused by the fact that these men had gone over.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I suggest, as one who has been over there and has known the conditions, that there are such things as emergencies in war. We do know that the casualties in battle in any army, even the Canadian army, can count up very rapidly, even in the space of a few hours, and that the reserves which I believe were available for trench warfare in England a few weeks ago would hardly last any time at all. I think every man who knows anything about conditions, who knows the crisis that is existing to-day, who knows how low the Canadian reserves have been, must congratulate the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence on the methods he has taken to get men across the Atlantic. I was over there in the days before conscription was introduced into England. My regiment often was down to two hundred, two hundred and fifty or three hundred men in place of a thousand.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do you mean a Canadian regiment?

Mr. McGIBBON: No, I was in the Imperials. Many a time we got recruits over from England with only three or four weeks' training. We were glad to get them. We found them very useful, because after all, the best training you can get in this war is the training the boys get in actual work in the trenches.

Progress reported.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, Bill No. 12, respecting the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title:

Mr BUREAU: So that there may not be the same misunderstanding as there was in regard to the last measure before the House, I desire to get an explanation. I observe this Bill is in the name of the Prime Minister.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: I should like to know what department will be shorn of any of its prerogatives by the creation of the new department of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Bill speaks for itself as to the duties imposed upon the minister, and as to his powers.

Mr. BUREAU: How are they being performed, and by whom? Or is this measure just for future emergencies?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The House has already been informed of the change that is made in remitting to the Department of Militia and Defence certain duties that heretofore have been performed by the Military Hospitals Commission. The line of demarcation, I think, is perfectly clear. Until the soldier is discharged his care, whether in hospitals or otherwise, is to remain with the Department of Militia and Defence. If, after returning here from overseas, he requires further treatment in the hospital he will receive that treatment in a hospital which is under the direction and control of the Department of Militia and Defence, and will remain there until he is discharged. If, on the other hand, he requires no treatment in a hospital he is to be returned to a depot home in the militia district.

Mr. BUREAU: There was one point this afternoon which I did not understand. As long as a man is sick, he is under the Department of Militia, but the hon. Minister of Militia stated a case of a man who, for instance, had tuberculosis or a disease which would make him unfit for future work. I did not understand what they were going to do with such a man—the man with articular rheumatism or something that makes him absolutely unfit for future occupation.

Major General MEWBURN: In the case of a tubercular man, our arrangement was that when he came from overseas he left England as a soldier, he arrived in Canada as a soldier, still on the strength of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The intention of the medical service was that that man should be placed under immediate observation in one of the homes, and if it were found that he was suffering from acute tuberculosis, he would immediately have his pay adjusted up to date, would go on full pension, and then go into one of the sanatoria which still remain under the control of the Invalided Soldiers' Commission, which was formerly the Military Hospitals Commission. They are retaining under their control the sanatoria and vocational training camp which will take charge of that man after he has been discharged from the service. He is off our strength, and is given his military pay up to date, and then goes off on full pension. The same might be said of the insane cases. There are, unfortunately, many cases of insane men coming back. Arrangements have been made with the other department, and the old Military Hospitals Commission, through some of the various provinces whereby they will take care of these patients. If that man has a wife or children his pension is paid to them. If he has no wife or child, and he is entitled to a pension, that money is held, and some arrangement is made with the local government about caring for that man while he is in the hospital. There are many cases of epileptic, and possibly nervous cases, which have not reached that stage that will be discharged and go back to their own care, but if they require further medical treatment, this new medical department will look after them, but they are chiefly charged with the vocational training end of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The explanations which have just been given by the Prime Minister and Minister of Militia and Defence do not seem to fit. The object sought—

Major General MEWBURN: I was explaining what would happen to a tubercular man.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We are here dealing with the creation of a department of government—the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. The explanations given by the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Militia do not agree with the object of the Bill, which is stated in clause 5.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was interrupted by a question as I was about to give an explanation.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked a question which had no reference to this Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The right hon. gentleman might state the object of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: It is my fault; I plead guilty.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was merely explaining as a preliminary matter that a clear line of demarcation had been fixed between the work of the Department of Militia and Defence in connection with the soldiers returned from the front, and the work of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The Department of Militia and Defence has complete control and direction of the men until they are discharged, and if it is necessary that the men receive treatment in hospitals before they are discharged, they receive that treatment in hospitals under the control and direction of the Department of Militia and Defence. While they are in those hospitals, however, they may receive instruction, vocational training and help of that kind, by arrangement between the Department of Militia and Defence and Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That would only be regarding instructors. They would be loaned?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think they would be loaned. They would be permitted to go to the hospitals, and give instruction and vocational training to men before they had been discharged. That training would be given under the direction of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The Minister of Militia and Defence has pointed out that men suffering from diseases on account of which they should be discharged immediately for prolonged treatment, will be discharged, and provision made for their treatment by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department and by the Invalided Soldiers' Commission which is attached to that department in sanatoria and in convalescent homes. But that is only a portion of the work of the department which we are now seeking to establish. In regard to men who do not require hospital treatment when they return to Canada, and who are discharged immediately, the Department of Soldiers' Re-establishment will assume the duty of seeing that those men are provided with any training and any re-education required to fit them for taking up once more their duties in civil life. And further than that the department will have the duty in connection with the authorities of the provinces, in connection with the commissions for that purpose which have been established in every province in Canada, to find employment and means of activity in the life of this country for men who have been so returned from the front. The work of this department is intimately connected with the question of demobilization. If this war should end tomorrow we would have three hundred thousand men or more to be returned to Canada. It would be quite a task to see to it that those men are provided with the opportunity in this country of earning their livelihood, or receiving training or re-education which would better fit them for that purpose.

The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is charged with the duty of solving that problem as best it may. It takes over the soldier who requires treatment in sanatoria, or convalescent homes, or asylums, takes him over and provides for him re-education or vocational training when he is able to receive it. It also takes over all those who do not receive any special care and treatment so far as their physical condition is concerned. And finally, this department, in connection with the commissions which have been established in the various provinces of Canada, is charged with the duty of re-establishing these men once more, of absorbing them into the general activities of the country and bringing about once more the conditions which prevailed before we entered upon this war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What control will this department have over the men,—I will not say soldiers because once they come back they cease to be soldiers—or what means of asserting discipline?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no control in the sense of military control.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the point I have reference to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no such control. They are absolutely free from all military discipline. So long as they are in hospitals I suppose there must be some control, but I do not know precisely how that will be worked out. But the department, the general commission that has been established, the Invalided Soldiers' Commission, and the various commissions in the several provinces of Canada, will be at the service of any man who desires vocational training or re-education, or who desires the assistance of any of these commissions in seeking such employment as he may consider himself fitted for. The department, in short, is charged with the general problem of assisting these men in re-establishing themselves once more in civil activities.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If I might make the suggestion, it would be well to avoid the fault that was committed at the time of the creation of the Military Hospitals Commission, and which resulted in an overlapping of authority, which was largely responsible for its failure.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I think so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend will pardon me for saying that, in my judgment at all events, and I think the judgment of most of those who sit around me, the explanations which he has given are rather hazy. It is not so much my right hon. friend's fault as it is the fault of the Bill being either ill-digested or not digested at all. If the Bill means anything it means that the Government have created a department to assist men in getting re-established in civil life. It is not proposed that the men who have fought shall always remain in military life; on the contrary, we hope that as soon as possible they will be returned to civil life, and the object of the Bill, we gather, is that a department is created for the purpose of assisting those men who return from war to take their places once more in civil life. Let me read the section of the Bill which bears upon the point:

> The minister shall have the management and control of all matters relating to the re-establishment in civil life and activities of all persons who have served in the naval or military forces of His Majesty, or any of His Majesty's Allies during the present war, and the dependents of such persons, and the administration of any statutes or of any regulations or orders enacted or made by the Governor in Council for such purpose.

What are the matters here referred to? My right hon. friend has stated that they will relate to the looking after of men who have returned diseased from the war and have to go to a hospital or a sanitorium. That has nothing to do with the establishment of a man in civil life, it is a matter of caring for the man who is diseased, or has been crippled and cannot engage in civil work at all, and who must be a charge upon the country. When I first took the Bill in hand I thought what it was proposed to do was, for example, to seek to help a man who wanted to go into farming, or something of that kind. The object of the Bill may be all right, what is intended may be good, but it seems to me we should have before us a concrete plan of what this department intends to carry out. The whole thing is very hazy, we are left in the dark, and the explanations are very meagre and cannot be otherwise until the Government has arrived at a well considered plan as to what it proposes to do in order to restore the returned soldier to civil life. Perhaps the returned soldier may be without any occupation, or, perhaps, he cannot return to the occupation he formerly followed for some reason or another. In that case the Government should have ready a concrete plan under which they could say: We propose to do this or do that to assist the man into this or that occupation. Certainly there is nothing in the explanations which have been given, or in the Bill itself, which indicates what the Government are going to do. It may be that the department itself should initiate some plan, but at the present time, it seems to me—I speak with all due deference, and not in critical terms, because the object contemplated may be a very good one—we should have more information than we have at the present time to justify the creation of such a department. After the American Civil War in 1865, nearly one million men, perhaps over that number, went back into civil life without any effort at all. Those who were disabled were given a pension, and those who were able to earn their own living with brain or brawn were simply discharged and absorbed in a very short time into civil life. Perhaps it is advisable that the men here should be aided in returning into civil life, but I warn my right hon. friend, and not in any carping manner, that if this Bill establishes a department to assist returned men to go back again into civil life he is preparing for himself a crop of applications which will, perhaps, be very embarrassing. I would rather trust the manhood of the man, if he comes back sound in limb and body, to find his own way into civil life, than depend for that upon the assistance of a paternal government. I would urge my right hon. friend, if he will permit me to say so, to think very seriously before he undertakes to hold out hopes of that kind to the men who come back, but rather to trust to their manhood as far as possible. If they are crippled or disabled then, of course, the country must take care of them, but if they come back sound in body and limb, we had better leave them to their own exertions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There might be some force in what my right hon. friend has observed if these men were coming back sound in limb and body, and, further than that, possessing the capacity for continuous work which they had before they went overseas. But I may tell my right hon. friend—and I think he will realize it—that this is not such a war as ever was in the world before, and even when men do come back apparently sound in body and in limb in every way, I venture to believe that they will require some aid and guidance before they can once more take up their work in the civil life of this country as they had taken it up before they went overseas. I know of what I am speaking from absolute experience among some of these men. No one of us can realize the effect upon a man's temperament and nervous system of two years in that awful warfare at the front. It has a very serious effect sometimes. But, apart from all that, there are thousands and tens of thousands who will not come back sound in body and limb. Some of them are coming back, unfortunately, blinded, some maimed with the loss of an arm or of a leg, or the loss of both arms or both legs. Is it not desirable that we should give these men some assistance so that they can continue, after they return to Canada, to have an interest in life and to feel that they are performing some honourable service in the ordinary life of the country? I venture to think that we would be derelict to our duty if we did not make some provision for them. The problem is a great one which has been studied in the United Kingdom during the past year very attentively, and we have given consideration to it here. I spoke to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence about this, and he agreed that it would be a cruel thing if we brought these men back and dismissed them from the army and told them to shift for themselves. We could not do it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is what is happening to lots of them already.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not happening so far as I am aware. At all events, I do know that the Military Hospitals Commission and the various commissions which have been established in the several provinces, have been doing a very creditable work in that regard, and I have been trying to keep in very close touch with it. It is valuable and wise work. It may be that, in some cases, men have been overlooked. If so, I am sorry for it. This new department has been created with the general problem placed before it, and one of the duties of the minister at the head of that department will be to consider and to submit to the Government the methods by which he will proceed to carry out what I venture to believe will be regarded by the people of this country as a proper and a necessary purpose. We have not the concrete proposals to submit to the House this evening because the minister has not yet been able to give that study and attention to the general problem which will be absolutely necessary before any matured scheme could be submitted to the Government or presented to Parliament. So we are asking the authority of Parliament for the constitution of this department, realizing, as we do, that a very serious task is imposed upon it and that it will have great scope for usefulness in the immediate future. For these men are coming back in considerable numbers now, and when the war is over we shall have the problem immediately placed upon this department of undertaking work of this character for three or four hundred thousand men as rapidly as they can be returned from overseas.

Sir SAM HUGHES: When the Liberal party came into power in 1896, times were not good in Canada. I may be pardoned for bringing in the name of a gentleman to whom I attribute the good times which followed. It was the Hon. Sir Clifford Sifton who foresaw the opening up of the Northwest and the bringing in of settlers from the United States. That made good times in this country. And without entering into that discussion any further, I have observed that fact very closely, having been engaged in the development of the Northwest two years before the Liberal party came into power, and having been instrumental in directing the attention of that gentleman and his Government to the prospects in the Northwest. In short, the opening up of the Northwest made Canada prosperous for many years after 1896.

Mr. BUREAU: And it made Sifton rich.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was speaking to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) a few minutes ago—and let me suggest here, that, from my point of view, that department can utilize from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand men directly and indirectly as soon as they return from the war and millions more who may choose to come in afterwards. That department is required and there is work for it to do now. I think the money we are voting for it will be well spent money. Some one objected to it, but the appropriation should be made. I am satisfied that the whole Northwest of Canada should be surveyed from the viewpoint of drainage, for the provision of main arteries of wagon roads and of railroads. New territories are there only awaiting development, waiting for settlers to come in, and many of these settlers will come from the United States; others with a little money will come from other places, and they will start their homes. They will require furniture, hardware, farming implements, and in order to put up their homes and out-buildings they will require lumber and other building materials. This will bring about a repetition of what occurred from 1896 onwards under the administration of the leader of the Opposition. The consequent stimulation of trade will make eastern Canada feel good, and bring about most harmonious relations between the East and the West. I am satisfied that we would not have any trouble at all in absorbing the great bulk of our returned men. But I can see that there is still room for the work of a commission of this kind to help those who are not in as independent a position as others, and to assist in opening up for those some new avenue of life. I look with great faith and interest to the new Department of Immigration and Colonization to help to absorb the soldiers on their return, provided there is preparation made in advance for the work they have to do. Millions of acres could be reclaimed by drainage, and tens of thousands of men could be employed in drainage and road building, as well as in the construction of new railroads; and the Government must, to my mind, see to it in advance that these things are done so that when the boys come back they will find avenues of work.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the hon. gentleman any idea, or any warrant for the idea, as to what percentage of the soldiers who return from the front will be suitable for farmers and what percentage will be likely to go into farming?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have no conception. I was not thinking of farming alone, for the farmers may come from any place. Any one familiar with the development of the Northwest knows that in every six miles of settled country there are stores, blacksmith shops, employing men, churches requiring ministers,—

Mr. BUREAU: And Orange lodges.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, thank goodness, Orange lodges, which give men employment in building them. Often the men work as carpenters or at other trades, and in the evening they attend to their adjoining homesteads. In some cases their wives remain on the farms while they step into the towns to carry on their particular work. Thus one development brings on another; the farms and the towns are built up and in that way a development of the whole country is brought about.

Mr. WIGMORE: I look upon this as one of the most important measures that was ever brought before the House. It is only another evidence that the Government intend to carry out their promise to the boys who went overseas. In the constituency which I represent cases have come under my observation of men who, having returned from the front, have been discharged and allowed to drift about, seeking employment here and there, and in many cases not getting it. Those suffering from tuberculosis; those who are otherwise diseased; those who are unfortunate enough to have to be sent to military asylums, are being provided for in some way, while those who do not come within those categories, but are simply unable to seek employment in regular walks of life, are given three months' pay, and the Militia Department has no further interest in them. I have felt for a long time that the Government should take hold of this matter in a more serious way—and I congratulate the minister on bringing it to the attention of the Committee and giving us an opportunity of expressing our views. We have in Canada to-day a number of training camps, and it is my view that after the war, when the soldiers return from the front, instead of being given three months' pay and set adrift they should be mobilized in these camps under military discipline until they are honourably discharged, or until those who wish to employ them go to the Government and request their services. I suggest also that employers give the Government some guarantee that the positions they are offering are permanent and will afford sufficient remuneration to the employees at least to enable them to keep the wolf from the door. The returned soldier should, to say the least, be placed in as good a position as he occupied before enlistment. We owe a debt to these men, and I think we should discharge it to the full. It is not right simply to pay them off when they are unfit for further military service, and leave them on their own resources. We cannot furnish positions to all these men, but we should continue their military pay and keep them under military discipline until they are fit for service in their different walks of life.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that the intention of this Bill?

Mr. WIGMORE: The Bill does not go that far, but I would go further than the Bill does. A number of men who have returned from the front are walking the streets to-day, looking for Government positions. There are not enough of these positions to go round, and these men are criticizing the Government and the Militia Department. This condition should not exist; those of us who are at home should be sufficiently interested in the boys who have fought our battles to see that they are properly looked after.

Mr. NICKLE: I agree with the member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Wigmore), that this is one of the most important measures that have come before the House this year, and probably quite as important as any that will come before the House. I agree with him also that this Bill has not gone far enough, but I view it from a different angle altogether from that from which he regards it. He takes the position that the returned man should be kept in some central depot battalion under military discipline until he is discharged.

Mr. WIGMORE: I mean at the close of the war, when 300,000 or 400,000 men are brought back.

Mr. NICKLE: I misunderstood the hon. gentleman; I thought he meant at the present time. I was going to say that my point of view was diametrically opposed to his. My idea is that this Bill does not go far enough in that it does not make the line of cleavage between the soldier returning to be restored to civil life and the civilian being prepared for the work of a soldier. In my judgment, as soon as a soldier is brought back to Canada, all our energies should be directed to getting him away from what we call military discipline. There should be a cessation of accentuation of his position as a soldier, and accentuation of his duty as a citizen. I agree with the object of the Bill in making the demarcation, but when the man returns to Canada, it being reasonably clear that he never again can be a soldier, he should be taken from under military discipline and put under civil discipline. I believe no man in this House has given closer attention to the problem of the returned soldier than I have. No problem is going to be of greater difficulty of solution, or is apt to cause more heart-burning and sorrow than the position of the returned soldier in the community in the years that are to come. In speaking of the mental position of the returned soldier, I refer to the man who has been to the front; who has been under fire; who has suffered more or less from the nerve strain incidental to actual warfare. His nerve is not altogether broken; his nerves are not altogether gone. I do not know that I can describe his condition any better than a surgeon in Kingston, in one of our military hospitals, described it, when he said that the man was "susceptible to his environment." To-day we are bringing the men back to Canada, we are dividing them, if I understood the Prime Minister correctly, into two classes. One of these classes, such as the tubercular, we are turning over to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. But the ordinary man who comes back wounded, and is not tubercular or affected with a disease that makes it clear that he never again will be useful in any capacity as a military man, is put in one of the large military hospitals and there kept under military discipline. The result is that instead of developing individual initiative in your returned man and accentuating the duties of self-restraint, you continue to emphasize the military system. The man is not taught self-restraint; he is not taught personal responsibility; but it is impressed upon him, as it has been impressed upon him for months, that duty and obedience is something he owes to the man who occupies a higher rank than he does. Instead of stimulating, as I termed it a moment ago, individual initiative, you stamp still further upon him an apathy towards self-responsibility and towards the attitude of mind that makes a man realize that he is going to pay the penalty of his own mistakes, not because some superior authority is going to punish him, but because the inevitable trend of events will be to make his future action unsuccessful. It seems to me the military authorities are carrying this idea of military discipline towards the returned men to ridiculous lengths. I have never been in a military uniform; I have never had to respect what is called superior rank in the army. But when a man issues an order to men in military hospitals that they must salute a military officer, and if their physical condition is such that they are unable to give a salute in the ordinary way, they must turn their heads in the direction of such authority, I say, as a Canadian citizen, that is ridiculous. Such an order was issued a short time ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where?

Mr. NICKLE: It came to Kingston.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do you know the officer?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why did you not report him?

Mr. NICKLE: I am reporting it now. That order came through the Army Medical Service, and I think came through General Fotheringham, at least, he and I discussed it vigorously at one time. The order was that men who had returned from the front had to salute their superior officers, and if they could not give the salute in the ordinary way they had to turn their head in the direction of the officer.

Mr. McMASTER: On their pillows?

Mr. NICKLE: I am not saying that because I do not know, but I assume that it is so, because it was a hospital order. All the nurses in the Army Medical Service hospitals are lieutenants. That makes every nurse in those hospitals the superior officer of the private and the non-commissioned officer, and that carries with it that the nurse must be respected because she is a superior officer and not because she is a nurse. If you think that is going to develop individual initiative, I do not believe it is going to do anything of the sort. Those hospitals for returned men should all be civilian. We should impress upon the returned men: You owe a duty to yourself to behave yourself. If you behave yourself you will be treated as you will be in any other hospital. A man in that way would be taught that good conduct brought good results, and that bad conduct brought bad results, not because, as I say, some superior authority impressed that on him, but as the actual reward of every day life on his own conduct.

I want to go into another matter. I feel pretty strongly on this returned soldier problem. I do not think any board of doctors who have to determine what a man's pension shall be should be superior in military rank to the man making application for a pension, and they should not be in uniform. A private or non-commissioned officer goes before a medical board to be examined as to his disability. That board has the power of determining to a very large extent what that man's financial status shall be during the rest of his life. Some of them do not approach that man as doctors to decide on his case. I am only speaking of some doctors, and in a case like that we must speak of the case of the man who cannot be heard and who is going to suffer. Some doctors approach his case as a lawyer might cross-examine a witness. They approach him from the point of view that there is an antagonism between the State and the man and not from the point of view that he is a man who has done something for his country and for whom his country wants to do all to which he is entitled. I have been told by men who have gone before these medical boards for pensions that they were asked to tell their condition, how they felt and this, that and the other thing about themselves and that when they had done so, the medical officers who were their superiors in rank said: "That is not so; we do not believe it; that is subjective." When a doctor used the word "subjective," he means: That is your point of view as to your disability, but it is not the true point of view. These men could not contradict the doctors because, according to military etiquette, they cannot contradict a superior officer. When a soldier comes before a medical board to apply for a pension, the soldier should be in mufti and the doctors should be in mufti. It should be a consultation between a medical man who is there to protect the state and a soldier who has done his duty to the state. The soldier should be absolutely at liberty to state his condition and position, but there should be no suppression of the facts and no browbeating of the man by superior authority. Their rights should be equal. That is my view.

In regard to what has been done for the returned soldier, I do not know what has been done in the other provinces, but in Ontario we are doing quite a little as the Soldiers' Aid Commission is assisting in a branch of what was the Military Hospitals work. The provincial legislature, by statute, constituted the Soldiers' Aid Commission for the express purpose of aiding and assisting the returned soldier. The central office is in the city of Toronto where there is an inspector. There is a western inspector in London and an eastern inspector at Kingston. Each of those inspectors has a subordinate officer whose duty it is to make an industrial survey of that part of the country in which they are working, so as to make themselves thoroughly conversant with the positions open in industrial work, and offices have been opened both at Kingston and at London to which the returned soldier may make application for work. The returned soldier goes there and the man in charge will learn from him what work he can do. He then tells the soldier if there is any industrial occupation open to him and he tries to bring employer and employee together. In that way very much good has been done. This is one of the problems that is going to meet us. The returned man particularly the man who has had to undergo the rigours of active service in the front line trenches, while he may appear all right, while in ordinary cases one would say he is a normal man, he really is not, he is affected in his nerves or as I put it a few moments ago, he is "susceptible." You send him to a factory and the very roar of the machinery breaks that man down and he cannot continue. Within the last year while I had the power of recommendation of those who should assist in the care of the convicts in Kingston penitentiary I suggested to the warden the names of nine or ten men who had been overseas, to act as nightkeepers in that institution. The warden co-operated most loyally with me in trying to give the men work. Of the ten men sent there there was only one man I think who lasted two months. Some of them told me they could not stand the mental strain of knowing that the clock was coming round to the hour at which they had to begin their work. All they had to do was to walk around the grounds and buildings and see that things were all right. Some told me their nervous condition was such that they could not stand the strain and they gave up the job. What are you going to do with such a man? His brain is clear; his eye is bright, but the ordinary man does not understand his real condition. The country has to be taught to understand him and we have to devise ways and means by which the country may be taught to understand him.

I should like to advert to one point which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) brought up. He asked how many men were going to go back on the farms. My inquiries lead me to believe that very few will go back. I doubt very much if you will get ten per cent. You may get five per cent who will take up farming and stick to it. These men have had all the outdoor life—the camp life—they want. They want to go back to the cities and enjoy the comforts of everyday life. I think what we have to plan for is to see that industrial openings are as far as possible made for these men, and in working along that line I would urge on the Government that, while this is a move in the right direction, they give careful consideration to the fact that they have to go farther than the Bill has gone and take every man, when he returns to Canada and whom the militia authorities admit cannot again be a combatant, into a hospital manned by civil doctors and nursed by women in ordinary nurses' uniform, and endeavour to stimulate the sense of personal responsibility and to develop individual initiative.

Mr. WIGMORE: I am afraid that my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) misunderstood me. I meant to say that when the war is over and the troops come home they should be kept in these camps for a while instead of being turned loose. If you took two hundred thousand or three hundred thousand men and turned them loose with nothing to do, even if they were all Presbyterians, they would not turn out very well. What I meant was that they should be put in these camps under military discipline so that they may be looked after until the time arrives when they can get suitable positions throughout the Dominion.

Mr. MANION: I just wish to say a word in reply to the observations of the hon. member from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in regard to the treatment and attention given these returned soldiers in military hospitals. Did I understand my hon. friend to mention the name of General Fotheringham?

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. ex-Minister of Militia and Defence asked me who had issued a certain order and I said that I thought it had come from General Fotheringham.

Mr. MANION: I have been overseas and I have seen some of the military hospitals; therefore, I may be able to give some reasons for some of the conditions referred to by the hon. member for Kingston. I have the very greatest respect for that hon. gentleman because nobody is in a better position to speak on this subject than he. I remember that during the progress of the battle of Vimy Ridge it was my duty and privilege to dress the wound of the son of the hon. member for Kingston in order that he might return to the firing line and continue the fight, which he did, displaying such gallantry and courage as to win the Military Cross. In some of the remarks which my hon. friend addressed to the committee he was not quite correct. For instance, he spoke of the discipline in military hospitals. I have had a good deal of experience in military hospitals and one of the difficult things to do in a military hospital where soldiers are being handled is to deal with them in such a way as to maintain discipline. I am saying this most respectfully to the soldier because nobody has a greater admiration for the Canadian soldiers than I have. But a certain amount of discipline is necessary in a military hospital or you will find the soldiers over-running all your orders and imposing upon you. The point that my hon. friend made in regard to soldiers being irritable is absolutely correct. A man coming back from the front, after he has been in the firing line for from seven to ten months, is exceedingly irritable although perhaps he is not conscious of it. His nervous system has been subjected to a shock that has upset him. The reason I asked about General Fotheringham was this: I happened to know General Fotheringham very well. I was a student of his fifteen or sixteen years ago in Toronto and he was then, as he is now, my friend. I knew him at the front when he was A.D.M.S. to the Second Canadian Division at the front, and I have had some dealings with him in Canada. I think that the remarks of my hon. friend were an implied charge against Dr. Fotheringham and therefore I wish to say that there is no officer, whether he be in the medical service or in the ordinary military force, who is more conscientious.

more honest, more upright or disinterested in every sense of the word than is General Fotheringham.

Mr. NICKLE: If you can discipline a hundred and fifty or two hundred soldiers suffering from tuberculosis in a civilian hospital as the Prime Minister proposes, why cannot you discipline the same number of other men without military discipline in another hospital?

Mr. MANION: I am not suggesting that military discipline should be carried to the extreme. The point I am making is that a certain amount of military discipline is necessary to get the best results in handling patients in the hospital. I am speaking from personal knowledge. I remember being in a British hospital for some time and it was in charge of a colonel who was a very lax disciplinarian. The result was that the patients were allowed to ignore the officers and it was almost impossible to handle the patients. I think every real military man—not an honorary one such as I am myself—will back me up in saying that no man, including a patient, is expected to salute any superior officer more than once in any one day. If he salutes him once that is sufficient and he does not have to turn his head and salute him the second time. That rule applies in hospitals as well as elsewhere.

An hon. MEMBER: Why should he do it at all?

Mr. MANION: In order to have discipline in military life it is necessary. A man who has never been in touch with military affairs does not realize the necessity for discipline. If you did not have discipline and if you did not have saluting in the army, you would never succeed in getting your men to go over the top and suffer the trials and dangers that are necessary. As I mentioned, yesterday was the anniversay of the battle of Vimy Ridge. The Canadians would celebrate it at the front. I did not hear it mentioned in the House by anybody; I presume it was forgotten. In fact, I had forgotten it myself.

There are no soldiers who have ever gone to the front who have shown themselves to be superior to the Canadian soldiers, and I do not think we can do anything too good to the Canadian soldier on his return from overseas. There is nothing that we can possibly do, no money, no position that we can give him, that will remunerate him for the sacrifice that he has made. Every consideration must be given him. I just offer these suggestions in justice to General Fotheringham. I would like to impress upon the committee the necessity of everybody remembering that the men, when they come back from the front, whether they belong to the ranks, or whether they are officers or non-commissioned officers, are in an irritable condition and must be given special consideration not only by this House, but by the people of the country. I would beg the House to give every consideration to these men.

Major-General MEWBURN: I entirely disagree with the remarks of the hon. member from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), and I entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Manion). There is no desire on the part of the military authorities to keep these men under military discipline or control for a moment longer than is absolutely necessary. If the hon. member for Kingston had ever taken an interest in military matters, or if he had ever been in uniform and in personal touch with military affairs, he would probably look at the matter through different spectacles and have a different kind of vision. I think I am quite safe in saying that every European nation, and particularly England, France, and the Allies in the United States, for many years past, have gone into this thing very carefully, and it has been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that a soldier should be under a certain amount of military control until he is discharged from the army. This question of saluting and looking up to superior officers, and everything of that kind, to me is all nonsense. You would think from the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston that the officers and nursing sisters were putting themselves on a pedestal away above the soldier. I do not believe that to be the case. Saluting is not a question of paying any particular respect to the individual officer or nurse. It is the amount of respect that is shown throughout the army, not only from the man to the officer, but from the officer to the man. This matter has been very carefully considered. If my hon. friend says you should immediately get the soldier back to civil life, then why should my good civilian friends, who are sincerely and honestly, I believe, endeavouring to help in this matter, wait until the soldiers come back to Canada? Why not go to No Man's Land, and, when the soldier comes from a casualty on the battlefield, take charge of him there? Why wait until he returns to Canada? Why not look after him from that point before he is discharged from the army?

Mr. NICKLE: Do you think that would be practicable?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, and I do not think the other proposition would be practicable.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is a question of pay. As long as he is under pay of the Militia Department, that department has the right to control him.

Major-General MEWBURN: The man is brought to England and taken to the hospital, then taken from the hospital, and brought back to Canada. All we desire to do—and it is no particular desire, I believe it is our duty and responsibility—is to look after that man up to a certain stage. If that is our duty, we must assume it and live up to it. Why bring in those various classes of men? My hon. friend was speaking of the different classes of men requiring medical treatment, who will go into a military hospital and undergo the treatment required. Working in conjunction with that hospital is the other department where the vocational training may continue as long as the man requires further medical treatment. He is under military pay. He is drawing his pay, and allowances up to the time the medical profession say he should be evacuated from that hospital, where he can no longer do himself any good. He is only taking up room that may be required for another invalid soldier. He evacuates the hospital, and then goes out on to a pension or is paid up in full as a soldier. He goes out of the hospital at the earliest possible moment, as he will not require further military treament. Then he passes into your new department, and if that man is not fit for further work in the civilian line, and requires further treatment, he will then be taken care of as a civilian. I think probably the Bill does not go far enough. I hope in future further attention will be given to this, but I am thoroughly convinced—and I speak not only from my own observation, but from the experience of Great Britain, Italy, France and the United States—that it is a mistake to make some other change, and probably make more mistakes. With reference to General Fotheringham I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion). General Fotheringham has had long experience in his profession, and long military experience, and has served with great credit to himself with the Second Division at the front. I do not wish to doubt the statement of the hon. member for Kingston, but I cannot conceive any orders that may have been issued for any man to keep on saluting his superior officers and nursing sisters. If a soldier is in a hospital under discipline he will pay respect to those in charge as any other good soldier will do, and I think I am safe in saying that the majority of these men who have returned from the front would prefer to be under military care up to the time they are discharged from the army.

Mr. NICKLE: I do not want the hon. Minister of Militia to put words in my mouth, and I will not let him, if I can prevent it. I do not know that I said he should keep on saluting. I used no such language. I simply said that, in my opinion, an order issued that a man in a hospital must turn his head in the direction of a superior officer, provided he was not physically able to salute in the ordinary way, was in my judgment ridiculous, and it would not make the slightest difference to me whether the ex-Minister of Militia and the present Minister of Militia thought differently, I still would think it ridiculous. I stick to my ground on that point. Those hon. members are soldiers; I am not. As the Minister of Militia says, if I had taken an active part in militia affairs, I probably would see eye to eye with them. Probably I would, because I have noticed, from the little experience I have had, that there is a singular contagion in military etiquette in regard to the exercise of authority. I made no reflection on the good intention of General Fotheringham. I made no reflection on his capacity or his medical knowledge. The ex-Minister of Militia asked me from whom that order came. I told him from whom I thought it came. Dr. Fotheringham may be right. He approaches the matter from the point of view of the soldier. When a member is asked a question in this House as to who gave a certain order and he names the man, it cannot be implied that there is anything improper in his motive. I simply say that he issued an order that, in my judgment, was not a wise order. Dr. Fotheringham thinks differently. He is responsible for the administration of the Army Medical Service, and I am responsible to my constituents. He is doing what he thinks is right; I am doing what I think is right, and we will leave the matter there.

Sir SAM HUGHES: No man in Canada, passing along the street and meeting a very charming lady, takes off his hat with greater grace than the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. NICKLE: Not because I must.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, because the hon. gentleman must. Common courtesy would rise in rebellion in the heart of the hon. gentleman if he did not do that.

Mr. BUREAU: Because it is the weaker sex.

Sir SAM HUGHES: This question which has been brought up is rather a serious matter. I saw the account of it in the paper, and I do not know whether it is true, but if true, I think the officer should be disciplined very severely, who would so far demean himself as to treat a soldier as this officer in Kingston is said to have done. If he did so, it was some mud major, not an honorary colonel—I would guarantee that, because all the honorary colonels are gentlemen—and in place of finding fault with the soldier, they would say: "Well, old boy, how are you? Where did you get your wound? How long will you be in the hospital? When will you get out?" No decent honorary colonel would do otherwise. I saw in the paper that that mud major had brought the soldier up and tongue-thrashed him for his conduct.

Mr. BUREAU: What is a mud major?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know what he is and do not care.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked, what is a mud major.

Sir SAM HUGHES: A bum major. If the soldier knew his business, all he has to do is to write a report, reporting this officer for misconduct, and I am satisfied when the matter came before the proper authorities the officer would be the one who would get the wigging, not the poor soldier. It is not generally understood that the officer owes a salute to the soldier just as much as the soldier owes it to the officer, and as to the question of a soldier lying in his bed and turning his head to an officer as he comes along, it is perfect nonsense. No medical officer ever heard of it being done. The soldier lies there and the officer comes along and always has a kind word for him.

Mr. NICKLE: That order was issued.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Then the officer had no business to issue it.

Mr. NICKLE: We agree there.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, the proper spirit to have in all these things is to shut one's eyes to these little delinquencies. I have had men walk up to me and say "Hello, Sam, how are you, I want to have a talk with you."

The CHAIRMAN: I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to come nearer to the subject matter.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And I was only too pleased to acquiesce in his request and have a good talk with him. I may say, Mr. Chairman, I am merely following the lines laid down, and I think it is very important, if we are going to get along with this Bill, that a proper understanding of discipline in this matter should be reached.

I have no hesitation in saying that the man who is going round all the time insisting upon the observance of little points of etiquette and discipline, and wanting himself to be regarded as somebody, is unfit for his job; he should treat these wounded soldiers with every courtesy and consideration. Personally, I have never met many soldiers who would not be inclined in matters of this kind to meet their officers more than half way.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS: Whether a soldier is an inmate of a soldiers' hospital, or whether a man is a civilian and an inmate of a hospital, the moment he goes within the doors of that institution he comes under discipline, and he must do so for his own good. I am very strongly of the opinion that no officer who had seen active service at the front would think of insisting on a wounded private—a man who was wearing blue badges on his sleeve to indicate that he had been wounded—saluting him. If any officer has so far forgotten himself as to insist upon a wounded soldier giving him a salute, I venture to say that officer is a man who perhaps three and a half or four years ago was in civilian life, but who upon the outbreak of the war was given a lieutenancy, and then with only a few days' interval between each stage was jumped up successively to the office of captain, major, and colonel. If you want to get persons who are in sympathy with the returned soldier to determine pensions, or promote his welfare in any other respect, by all means secure the co-operation of men who have been overseas. The man who has never been outside of Military District No. 3, or for that matter any other military district—the man who has never left the shores of Canada, no matter how kindly natured he may be—is in my judgment absolutely unfit to deal with the question of pensions, or to sit on a medical board in connection with questions of discipline. Because, no matter how genial he may be by inclination I do not think he can have that proper sympathy for the returned soldier that an officer would have who has seen service overseas.

I believe there are plenty of offices in this country occupied by men who have never been oustide of Canada, although they are wearing uniform, men who have jumped very rapidly from one rank to the other. Such men should be relegated back to civil life and their places taken by men from overseas. If that were done, it would be most advantageous all round. I am conversant with the case of one young man who enlisted five days after war was declared, went overseas with the First Contingent and served twenty-six months in France. He had graduated at the Toronto Veterinary College and did good work in France, but came back a broken man and unfitted for further overseas service. His case came before a medical board, not one of whose members had ever been overseas, and they decided that he was unfit to return to the front. On the seventh day of a certain month—mark the day—he received notice that he was only fit for home service if anything could be found for him to do, and on the eighth day of the same month he was notified that no employment could be found for him and that he would be given his discharge. That decision had been arrived at between the seventh and the eighth day of the month, so that there was not very much time spent in ascertaining whether there was anything available for this poor fellow or not. Let me tell the Committee that in Military District No. 3 there are to-day two men acting as veterinary officers. One has been overseas, I believe, but the other was never outside of Military District No. 3. Yet both men are drawing colonel's pay. What, in the name of Heaven, the officer who was never out of the district did to entitle him to be promoted to the rank of colonel, I do not know; it certainly was not the blood that he spilt overseas. I have it on pretty good authority that there was only one sick horse to attend to last winter, out of all the horses that came under the charge of these officers in Kingston, and a year ago last winter there were only three. Yet, for such slight services we have two men drawing colonel's pay, and the man to whom I have referred, and who had served twenty-six months in France, was discharged because there was nothing for him to do. Mr. Chairman, I believe there are thousands of cases in this country of men who were formerly civilians and when the war started donned their uniform, and secured rapid promotion to the rank of major and colonel. I am always glad to hear of the promotion of any man who has gone overseas, whether he went as private or as officer, and nobody will envy his promotion after he gets there, but I do think that thousands and tens of thousands of dollars have been improperly paid out in this way; that men have been advanced in rank without sufficient justification. I refer to men who have never been outside of Canada since this war commenced, who were contented before that to strut around for twelve or fourteen days each year in camp, thrusting out their chests and exposing their gold buttons and gold lace, and all that sort of thing, and who would humbly kowtow to those placed above them in rank. Too many of this type of men have been advanced in rank with a corresponding advance in pay, and in Military District No. 3 at Kingston it has simply come to this, in my humble judgment, that we have practically got a little ring there that they say among themselves: "You boost me and I'll boost you."

In reference to returned soldiers going back on the land, you would think that with three or four hundred thousand men returning, all you had to do was to send them out on the farms and they would take their places there. A great many of the men who enlisted and went overseas came from cities; they do not know a bit more about farming than the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean), and he would not know which end of a horse to put the halter on if he went on to a farm. These men should not go to the farm simply because, that, theoretically, it would be a nice place to put them; they are going to exercise, the same as other people do, the right of selecting their own job. While I would like to see a great many of these men go on to farms, I don't think you are going to solve the difficulty which has to be met in that way; these men will hunt their own vocations. Some of them will go back on the farms, but a great many will look for positions in the cities and towns.

I would like to add this one word more. Whatever we do, do not be in too great a hurry to get rid of the men, and get them off our hands, when they come from overseas. We might better throw away a few million dollars in overpaying than in underpaying the men who have come back from the front. There is one thing we cannot afford to have in Canada. When this war is over we cannot afford to have any person pointed out as one who, having served his country is neglected after he returns from overseas.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I agree with nearly every person who has spoken to-night that this is perhaps the most important Bill which will be brought before the House during this session, unless we are to have other Bills which will more clearly define the policy of the Government in regard to the aiding of men after they have come back to this country. In looking over the Bill, which purports to establish a department for the re-establishment in civil life of the returned men, I have no doubt that the exigencies of the case will make it necessary for regulations to be passed by the Council allowing the minister in charge to carry into effect whatever the policy of the Government may be. While this discussion may not come within the terms of the Bill I believe that the members of the Government will be very glad to have had this discussion to-night in order that they may gather the views of members of the Commons from various parts of the country. Personally, I have some very strong views with regard to some points. I come from a district in which a great many men have been enlisted for overseas and a district to which a great many men have returned from the front. Clause 5 of the Bill, setting out the powers of the minister, says:

> The minister shall have the management and control of all matters relating to the re-establishment in civil life and activities of all persons who have served in the naval or military forces of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies during the present war, and the dependents of such persons, and the administration of any statutes or of any regulations or orders enacted or made by the Governor in Council for such purpose.

This clause is broad enough to cover all those who return, and the dependents in this country of those who do not return. The first class which will be considered, no doubt, will be the dependents of the men who have been killed at the front or have come back absolutely incapacitated for the performance of any duties in civil life in this country. That class will be dealt with by the Pension Board.

I understand that a special committee is to be appointed for the consideration of the question of pensions. I wish to call attention to one or two facts. Although the Government has made generous increases in the matter of pensions, I still think that further increases can be made. When a man is killed and leaves his wife and children, the Government makes an allowance of only eight dollars for the support, maintenance and education of each child. It is beyond belief that under the present conditions any woman can possibly bring up her children as they should be brought up on such an allowance. If there is any class of people who should receive the consideration of this Government, it is the dependent children, because they are the future citizens of this country, and very great consideration should be given to them. Again, when a man is returned invalided, I have known of some pensions which have been payable at the rate of $2,50 per month. I do not believe, under any circumstances, that there can be any justification for a man found to be entitled to a pension from this country receiving so small a pension as $2.50 per month, and I think that the Government should take into consideration the fixing of a minimum pension which shall be paid, or the adoption of the old bonus system.

The next class to which we come is that of men who have been invalided home and have been confined in hospitals. Every possible means should be adopted in order that these men shall be returned to take their part in civil life, and if it is found that they cannot be returned to such a condition of health, then adequate compensation should be given them by way of pension.

The third class includes the men who return to this country and are physically fit and who wish to embark upon civil life. We must realize that the men who left this country in 1914 and in subsequent years are men who have made great sacrifice. The sacrifice which they have made is the sacrifice of opportunity. While they have been absent from their homes and their work for three or four years, others who have remained at home have made that much advance in their civil life, and in the vast majority of cases have been acquiring a competence to live upon. What should be the attitude with regard to these men when they return? The present system is that when they receive their discharge from the army they get a post-service pay of three months, which simply means that a man, after serving at the front, anywhere from four years to the close of the war, has only three months' pay on which to re-establish himself.

We know of no other provision which has been made by the Government other than the provision made by the Land Settlement Act, about which I shall speak later. I believe that if these men are to be successful in their civil life they should be retained, as has been suggested here, under military service in so far as their pay is concerned, and that they should receive their pay, and their family should receive separation allowance for a reasonable length of time, even if that should be six months or twelve months, in order that the man himself may look around and view the opportunities which lie before him to enter voluntarily upon some civil employment for the rest of his life. You may attempt to carve out a man's future, when he is between fourteen and eighteen years of age. But when you take a man from twenty-five to forty years of age, his life is so shaped that others cannot carve out for him his future course, and I believe that the responsibility rests upon this Gov- which will be the congenial to him. the opportunity of selecting employment which will be congenial to him. In addition to that, I think the Government is to be congratulated upon the system of education which has been established in connection with the military hospitals, and it should be expanded so that the men, if they so desire, may further equip themselves upon any particular line which they choose.

Now, in regard to the men going upon the land, we have the Land Settlement Act, passed by the House, I believe, last year. But I do not think that Act is in any way a compensation for the soldier. They have the opportunity, if they are farmers, of taking up land and procuring a loan from the Government, but I understand that the man must be a skilled farmer, and must prove himself worthy of the loan, in order to procure it from the Government. In that case we are not doing much more for the soldier than the Federal and provincial governments are doing for civilians. In the provinces of British Columbia Alberta and Saskatchewan, I understand legislation is now in effect whereby they will make loans to any agriculturist on security of his land and chattels. So that the position of soldiers in the matter of land settlement does not differ materially from that of men who come to this country from any other part of the British Empire or, perhaps, from any foreign country.

I do not concur in the view expressed by the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) with regard to the matter of aid to returned soldiers. There is no doubt that the responsibility for the care of these men and their dependents after the war is over rests upon the Federal Government, and the Federal Government alone. It is not in keeping with the dignity of this young and prosperous country that charitable organizations throughout the country should be seeking subscriptions for the purpose of rendering aid to soldiers and their dependents. In the early days of the Patriotic Fund I was an ardent supporter of the voluntary system, but at that time we anticipated that the war would be of short duration and that the enlistments would be small in number. Since then hundreds of thousands of men have gone overseas, and I now believe that all funds of this kind should be financed by the Federal Government and paid out to soldiers and their dependents as a matter of recognition of services rendered, not as a gift from any class of the people. These men enlisted of their own free will; there was no bartering, no trading, no dickering on their part as to what amount they should receive for their services. They left it to the honour of the people at home to see that they were fairly dealt with on their return, and it rests with this Government to make fair and generous provision for these men and their dependents.

Mr. COPP: I am glad that the Government are taking some steps in the matter of looking after the returned soldier when he becomes incapacitated. At different times during the past three years I have approached departments of the Government in regard to these matters. I have asked the Board of Pension Commissioners that justice be done to the dependents of soldiers who had been wounded or killed overseas, and I was met always with an excuse, courteously expressed, of course, but having the effect of bringing no definite result. During last session I had occasion to approach officials of the Government with a view to getting information regarding pensions which I thought should be paid to two mothers of soldiers who had been killed at the front. I was told that while it was just and equitable that these pensions should be granted, it was impossible under the regulations to grant them. Soon after the prorogration of Parliament an election came on, and during the progress of the election, early in December, pensions were granted in respect of the two claims which I had previously brought to the attention of the Board of Pension Commissioners. It is evident, therefore, that though the regulations six or nine months previously prevented the granting of pensions in these cases, there was nothing to prevent their being granted during the early part of December. If this Bill has the effect of creating a department that will honestly investigate all these matters and decide them equitably and thus bring an advantage to soldiers generally and their dependents, it will have my hearty and undivided support, but if it is the means of bringing about further delay, it will mean a large expenditure with very little resulting good.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Department constituted:

Mr. CANNON: Who is the minister in charge of the new department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Sir James Lougheed.

Mr. BUREAU: This Bill creates a new department and all the machinery and organization necessary for its operation. I realize the importance of this problem, and I have no objection to the Government's taking any step to facilitate the re-establishment of returned soldiers. The member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) suggests to me, however, that it would be well, in this or another section of the Bill, to provide a time when this department and the machinery created for its administration shall cease to operate. My object is to have it stated that there shall be a Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for the period of time that the condition of the soldier or the war may require, so that when that time comes, whoever is in power, will not have to face a large number of civil servants in that department who will ask him to let them continue in their positions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend must realize it will be quite impossible to fix a definite time at which this department would become unnecessary and its continuance undesirable. I shall, however, recall to his mind that, in an Act which passed this House a few days ago, power was taken for the Governor in Council to amalgamate departments and also to abolish departments. Under the power which is vested in the Governor in Council by that Act, this department and other departments which have been constituted by reason of the necessities of the war, can be abolished when there is no further occasion for them.

Mr. BUREAU: I realize the position, but I want to point out the difficulty that will confront the Governor in Council as well as Parliament in abolishing a department after it has once been established, while at this particular juncture, when there will be no pressure exercised and no objection offered, we should say: This Act shall be in force for a period of twelve, or fifteen or twenty years, or longer, after the war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really think it would be undesirable to fix a definite period. I would hardly assent to that. The power is vested in the Governor in Council. As I have already declared in this House, that power will be exercised as soon as that Act receives the assent of His Excellency the Governor General, by the amalgamation of the Department of Inland Revenue with the Department of Customs. In the same way, at the proper time, this department will cease to exist under a like order of the Governor in Council regarding it. It will be impossible to define the time at present. This department may have to continue in existence for half a dozen years after the war is over. We cannot foresee the conditions at present. There are in the public service at present many people who cannot be continued in the public service after the necessities of the war have ceased. I appreciate entirely what my hon. friend has said. Those are difficulties with which this Government or some future Government will have to deal, and they must be dealt with in the very best way possible with due regard for the public interest in dealing with them.

Mr. CANNON: I understand there are at present twenty-three Cabinet ministers. Am I right?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will tell the hon. gentleman who they are. There is the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Minister of Overseas Military Forces, the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the Secretary of State, the Postmaster General, the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the Naval Service, the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, the President of the Privy Council, the Minister of Militia and Defence, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Labour. Then there is Hon. A. K. Maclean, who is Vice-Chairman of the Reconstruction and Development Committee and who is also discharging the duties of Minister of Finance during the absence of Sir Thomas White. There is Hon. Mr. Robertson, who is Chairman of the Labour Committee and Chairman also of the Registration Board. Both those gentlemen are quite as actively occupied as any of the ministers in the duties which devolve upon them. There is also Hon. Mr. Cochrane, who is a minister without portfolio.

Mr. CANNON: This list includes twenty-two ministers, if the Hon. Mr. Maclean and the Hon. Mr. Robertson are to be considered as Cabinet ministers.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are Cabinet ministers.

Mr. CANNON: But at present they have no special department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They have the duties to which I have already alluded. One of them is Vice-Chairman of the Reconstruction and Development Committee, and virtually Chairman, because the work devolves altogether upon him. The other is Chairman of the Labour Committee and Chairman of the Registration Board.

Mr. CANNON: Am I to understand that besides those ministers there are also parparliamentary secretaries?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are two parliamentary secretaries, and the Solicitor General.

Mr. CANNON: Who are they?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The parliamentary secretaries are Mr. McCurdy who is Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and Mr. Hugh Clark, who is Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of External Affairs. The Solicitor General is the Hon. Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. CANNON: According to custom in Canada, the Solicitor General is not a member of the Cabinet. Is the Solicitor General under the present ministry, a member of the Cabinet?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Solicitor General is not a member of the Privy Council, nor is either of the parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. CANNON: Judging by these answers, we have at present 22 ministers, one Solicitor General and two parliamentary secretaries, making in all 25 ministers, and as I might call them, assistant ministers. At a time when we are all speaking of economy, I would suggest that it might be possible for the Government, instead of appointing a minister to administer this department, to pass the work over to another minister whose department is not working as hard on account of the war. I see, for instance, that there is in the Cabinet a Minister of Immigration. Immigration, at present, is absolutely nil. There is a little immigration from the United States, but the work of the department is in no way large enough to occupy the ability and energy of the minister. Why not utilize his energies and abilities in the administration of this new department? We would save money by doing so. The country would not have to pay the salary of one minister, and I am quite sure the work the Minister of Immigration would do in this department would be satisfactory.

Instead of putting the very important question of the civil re-establishment of soldiers in the hands of a minister who, unfortunately, in most cases is a politician, why not put it into the hands of a commission? The Prime Minister has, I understand, had a special preference for forming commissions since he became Premier of this country. The hour is late. I do not ask the Prime Minister to tell me the number of commissions he has formed since 1911, as the number is very considerable. I would not even ask the Prime Minister why all these commissions have been formed and what they have done. But I think that this is a case where one should be formed instead of entrusting this responsibility to a minister or a department. These soldiers are coming back from the war; I agree with all the remarks which have been made on both sides of this House, that they deserve the best treatment possible. Is there not a danger that if this civil establishment is left in the hands of a minister and a politician, you will have a certain amount of patronage? When the Union Government was formed it was to have many effects, but it had one effect, and a good effect, if we are to believe the newspapers. That is the effect of abolishing patronage. How long will this Government keep to its attitude as regards patronage? I do not know, but I hope patronage is abolished never to return. But when Union ceases because—after all, Union is not to be eternal—

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. CANNON: If it is to be eternal the ideas of some of our friends on the other side will have to change, because we have been watching since the session opened and we have seen certain signs of a lack of cohesion in the ranks of the Government supporters. But supposing Union ceases, we will have in this country either a Liberal or a Tory Government. If it is a Liberal Government there is nothing to fear as to how the soldiers will be treated. If it is a Tory Government, I hope everything will be all right, but I am not so sure of it as I would be with a Liberal Government. In either case we will have patronage and under those circumstances ought a question like this to be left in the hands of a politician? I say no.

This same question has been submitted to parliaments before. The question of the civil re-establishment of soldiers has arisen in other countries. If you will refer to the history of France after Napoleon's wars you will see that the question was up before the Parliament of France. It was a very serious question. What were the French people to do with those soldiers who had fought for twenty years under the Emperor in every part of Europe and who had won glory for their country? These soldiers were handled by the Government as the Government thought best, and the consequences were very bad for the country. The soldiers were disbanded too quickly. They had acquired an adventurous spirit and it was hard to get them to return to the habits of civil life. That is a danger that we will have to avoid in Canada. What means will be taken we do not know, the Bill does not mention them. As to the evils of patronage in connection with the civil re-establishment of soldiers, the best example we have is what happened in the United States after the Civil War. Any man that would support a Republican thought he was entitled to a pension and he sometimes got it even though he had not fought at all in the war. After the Civil War had been finished for over forty years the number of people who were receiving pensions from the government was far greater than the number of soldiers who actually fought in the war. Is this going to happen in Canada? If it is what amount of money will be spent? Where will we stop? What guarantee have we as long as a politician is administering affairs in connection with the civil re-establishment of soldiers?

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman calls them politicians; the members of the Union Government are statesmen.

Mr. CANNON: I suppose that if we have statesmen everything will be all right, but how long will it last? I submit that this Bill, the principle of which is very good, the principle of which I approve of, ought to be amended in such a way that instead of establishing a new department, we shall have a commission composed of independent men, composed, for instance, of soldiers who have gone to the front, composed of business men, composed of men who can give justice without any regard to the political preferences of the people who apply to them for justice. What has happened since the war started? Soldiers who have gone to the front, soldiers who have done their duty, because they did not belong to the right side of politics, have been unable to obtain justice from the Government in some cases. I understand that since the Government has changed and has been improved by the fact that some Liberals have entered it, conditions have altered. But, we have no guarantee for the future.

I heard the Prime Minister say that this Bill was introduced because the Government realized that we were at war and that we had to do something for the returned soldiers. We all agree, but how it is that it took the Government four years to realize this? We have been at war since 1914, we are now in the year 1918, and it took four years for the Government to realize this. I believe the real reason is that some friends of the Government needed portfolios, that they had to be given portfolios on the fifty-fifty basis which the papers mention, with the result that instead of having a commission of impartial men in whom the people would have full confidence we have now a department the portfolio of which will be given to some politician, either Liberal or Tory Unionist. Mr. Chairman, before finishing these remarks, I wish to say that I am willing to give every support possible to the Government in helping the returned soldiers but I sincerely hope that politics will have nothing to do with the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Cannon). He seems to think that the late Government, myself particularly, appointed too many commissions during the past six and a half years, and yet he desires me to heap another sin on my head by appointing another commission. The observations of my hon. friend do not seem very logical in that respect. I leave it at that. As far as the duties of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization are concerned, I can only say to my hon. friend—if he will permit me to say it with all respect—if he were discharging the duties and carrying on the work which the minister is carrying on at the present time, he would find himself very much busier than ever he has been during his entire life. As far as the appointment of a politician is concerned, we have taken that matter into account and we have appointed a gentleman who is not a politician. My hon. friend has not been long enough in parliament to realize that in the pure and serene and happy atmosphere of the Senate there are no politicians at all, and it was for that reason that we selected Sir James Lougheed, who has been a minister without portfolio for six years before he assumed this post and who, during that time has given, without salary or remuneration, very effective and valuable service to the people of this country in many ways. My hon. friend also observed that we had waited for four years. We have not waited four years, because it is less than three years since the soldiers commenced to come back from the front—probably not much more than two years. They have not been coming back in great numbers until recently, but now they will be coming back in much larger numbers, and it seems desirable that this department should be established, in order that desirable safeguards and measures that are eminently necessary might be adopted and carried out.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Duties.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I desire to move that clause five of the Bill be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, however, that nothing in this Act shall be deemed in any way to affect the powers or duties of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada."

I do not think there is anything in the Act which would affect these powers and duties, but that board was appointed under the report of the special committee, approved by Parliament and afterwards carried into effect by Order in Council. It is desirable that the independent status should be maintained. It is probable that the board will report to the Minister of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Hitherto, it has reported wherever there was occasion to report, to the Minister of Finance who has desired more than once to be relieved from giving attention to such matters for the reason that his other duties and responsibilities are sufficiently onerous.

12 p.m.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I notice on reading Clause 5, the following:

The minister shall have the management and control of all matters relating to the re-establishment in civil life and activities of all persons who have served in the naval or military forces of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies during the present war.

Would it not be preferable to limit it to those who resided in Canada before the war?

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand the point my hon. friend mentions, but it was thought it should apply to any soldiers who served in the Allied armies and came to this country, and that we should endeavour to assist them with vocational training and re-education and otherwise, so that they might be assisted, so far as they needed assistance, to take their part in the ordinary activities of our national life. That is assuming they came here to take up permanent residence.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was a member of the Returned Soldiers Committee last year. I listened to the evidence which was presented to that committee and took part in the framing of the resolution which was adopted, and that principle was consecrated. Soldiers belonging to another nationality, but fighting with the allied nations should be treated on a footing of equality with our own men. The safe principle was embodied in the resolution introduced last year by the Minister of the Interior as regards the land in the West. It seems to me the principle is a good one.

Mr. STACEY: I have the honour to come from a province which, I believe, contributed by voluntary enlistment about one-tenth of the entire population. A very large number of those men, I am not prepared to say how many, are from the rank of what we call in British Columbia small farmers. They were on what we call ranches. A great many of those who are returning are looking forward to resuming civil life on some such plan as existed when they left, and I venture to suggest to the Government the advisability of making some special provision for them which, if I understand the Land Settlement Act correctly, is not made in that Act. We have in the province of British Columbia a great many thousand acres of the richest land in Canada, which is at present practically unoccupied. While theoretically and absolutely held by the Dominion Government, or held by some of the natives of that country, the land is wasted, has never been used, and in all probability never will be used. It might be well at this juncture, if consideration were given to the advisability of satisfying the Indian claims, and so arranging matters that these men could be placed upon small holdings of say 10 or 20 acres, so that they could resume the occupation which they left upon entering military service. I am safe in saying that if consideration could be given to a plan of this kind, which I have only barely outlined, it would meet with the approval of a great number of people who have gone from that province to the front. Many of them would like to return, but the conditions are such that, unless some special arrangement is made, they will not be able to do so. If they could go back there they would be very valuable contributors to the welfare of the province. Referring to a suggestion that has been made, I am satisfied this House realizes that it would be next thing to criminal to compel our men, during the life of this generation, to go away back in the northern country far removed from all society—I mean society in a good sense—and from all social surrounding on the contrary. If we can keep these men near to us with the idea of community life, it would be very vital to their comfort and to the wellbeing of the community as a whole.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The observations which the hon. member for Westminster District (Mr. Stacey) has placed before the Committee are well worthy of consideration and they will receive it; I shall commend them to the attention of the minister. As far as the Indian claims in British Columbia are concerned, my hon. friend doubtless realizes that the Indians of that province have pretty comprehensive claims. As to what those claims are, and whether or not anything can be worked out along that line I am not prepared to say at the moment.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Previous action confirmed.

Mr. POWER: May I ask the Prime Minister if the Board of Demobilization will come under the jurisdiction of this new department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. The Board of Demobilization, so far as I understand, is under the Department of Militia and Defence. It deals with matters which are to be considered in connection with the discharge of the soldiers, their transportation from overseas, and the order in which they come. There are a great many considerations of that kind, which my hon. friend will appreciate as well as any hon. gentleman in this House, which must be taken into account. But those matters are naturally under the Department of Militia and Defence. So far as measures are to be taken overseas, they would come under the attention of the Minister of the Overseas Service.

Mr. POWER: Then this department will have no jurisdiction whatsoever overseas?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. It deals altogether with matters in Canada.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, and amendments read the first and second times and concurred in.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is there any objection to taking the third reading now?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would prefer, in accordance with the wishes of the leader of the Opposition, that the Bill should stand.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 12.10 a. m. (Thursday.)

Thursday, April 11, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Naval Service) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 49, respecting the Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act, 1911.

Motion agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE: The object of this Bill is to provide that the discipline on the ships of the Canadian Navy shall be similar to that of the Imperial Navy and the Australian or New Zealand Navies.

In 1911 when the Canadian and Australian Navies were being formed the Imperial Parliament passed the Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act, 1911.

The Act declares that any dominion having adopted the Naval Discipline Act, references therein to H. M. Navy and H. M. Ships are to have effect as including the naval forces and ships raised by the Dominion.

The Act is intended to give effect to the agreement arrived at by the Imperial Conference with respect to the government and discipline of the naval forces of the self-governing dominions and their relations to the Royal Navy and to one another, namely, that there should be power by mutual agreement between the Home Government and the Dominion Government, and between one dominion government and another, to provide that the fleets and ships of the Royal Navy and of the dominion navy, and of one dominion navy and another dominion navy, when co-operating together, should be treated, so far as discipline is concerned, as belonging to the same service, so that an officer of one such force could be treated as a superior officer in relation to an officer of another such force and could assume command over the ships belonging to such other force, and that for the purposes of court-martial officers could be taken indiscriminately from both or all such forces. The Act, however, provided that its provisions should not come into force with regard to the naval forces of any dominion until that dominion had adopted the Act by legislaion.

The Act was applied to Australia on the 12th August, 1913, and to New Zealand on the 16th July, 1914.

The Canadian Naval Forces having, since the outbreak of war, greatly grown, it becomes increasingly difficult to provide the necessary disciplinary measures.

It is almost impossible to form a court martial for the trial of offenders under the Naval Discipline Act, owing to the lack of Canadian officers of sufficient seniority. On the other hand, Imperial officers cannot sit on a Canadian court martial, as the above mentioned Act has not been adopted by Canada.

The passage of the Bill, a copy of which is attached, will place the Imperial and Canadian navies on an equal footing as regards disciplinary measures, and will have the effect of making officers and men interchangeable in the two navies. It will also provide that officers of both services will use a common form of commission, which is not the case at present. I shall be very glad to give further details when we are in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to enter into any controversy, but would my hon. friend state if, when he speaks of the Imperial Conference, he has reference to the Imperial Conference of 1911?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: My remarks do refer to the Conference of 1911.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by astericks.)

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, VACANCIES ON TRIBUNALS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Is it the policy of the Government to fill vacancies on Tribunals, under The Military Service Act, with men opposed to the Government and to compulsory military service?

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

2. Is it the policy of the Government to appoint as agricultural representatives on the Leave-of-Absence Boards in the Province of Ontario, representatives opposed to the Government and to compulsory military service?

3. If not, on whose recommendation are they appointed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to the first question: The method of filling vacancies on tribunals is determined by the Military Service Act. In reply to the second and third questions: The only policy followed by the Government is to appoint those persons who, having regard to the public interest, are most suitable for the duties to be performed and most capable of performing them.

POLICE INSPECTOR M. D. No. 4.

Mr. LESAGE:

1. Who is the Dominion Police Inspector of Military District No. 4, whose office is in the Drummond Building, Montreal?

2. What salary is he paid?

3. What are his duties, executive power and prerogatives?

4. How many subordinates has he got, and what salary or remuneration is paid to each of them?

1. J. A. Belanger.

2. $200 per month.

3. He is in charge of Dominion Police in Military District No. 4, under direction of Police Commissioner Kerr.

LOBSTER INDUSTRY.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysboro):

With reference to the announcement by the Honourable Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the Government has decided to discontinue the propagation of lobsters by hatcheries and sell the equipment, has the Government any alternative policy for the preservation of this industry? If so, what it it?

Hon Mr. BALLANTYNE:

After exhaustive study and investigation the conclusion has been reached that the artificial propagation of lobsters by means of hatcheries has been of little or no value in the preservation of the fishery. In lieu thereof attention has been directed:—

1. To the adoption of a system of technical education for the fishermen, which will include study in the life, history and habits of the lobster and the necessity of preserving lobster life at its critical stages. Under the direction of the department original research has been conducted by Dr. Knight and others, and much valuable information has been secured. These investigations are being continued.

2. To the prohibition of the taking of immature lobsters, regulations for which have already been adopted for that portion of the Atlantic coast westward from St. George's island, Halifax harbour, to and including the waters of the counties of Albert, Charlotte and St. John, N.B.

3. To increased efficiency in the enforcement of the existing regulations prohibiting fishing during the close seasons, and the protection of the mother lobsters. Considerable improvement has been effected in the past few years in this respect, and the better class of fishermen are co-operating with the department to overcome illegal fishing.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MANION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday I referred to the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), and said that during the battle of Vimy Ridge I had the privilege of dressing the wounds of his son. Unrevised Hansard quotes me as saying:

In order that he might return to the firing line and continue the fight, although he did not do so.

What I did say was: "And he did so," meaning that he did return to the firing line after being wounded. And I might say that this gallant young gentleman received the Military Cross for his bravery in that battle.

THE VICTORY LOAN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I notice in looking over the reports of the sitting of yesterday that no mention was made of the manner in which the Victory Loan of $300,000,000 was made, and how effected. I made a motion in that respect as far back as the 20th March last. I shall expect that information to be brought down to the House before the Bill is proceeded with.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: When was the motion made?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On the 20th March or thereabouts.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

IMPRISONMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIER FOR NON-EMPLOYMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to a news item which appeared in this morning's Citizen. It appears that at one of the criminal assizes held in Ontario—I forget at what place—the grand jurors, in their visit to the jail, found that a returned soldier was being held at the jail because he had found no employment. I will send the paper over to my hon. friend; I hope that he will remedy this grievance.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have seen no such report, and I shall be glad if the hon. gentleman will send me the paper.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

ALLEGED ORGANIZATION OF DESERTERS AND DRAFTEES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two Mountains): I should like to bring to the attention of the Government a very important matter which, I think, should be promptly dealt with. I read in this morning's Citizen the following:

Band of Deserters Flying "Red" Flag, Defy Authorities.

Draftees and Germans Are Fortified in District Along the Petawawa River—Threaten to Die First.

Daring the minions of the law, both civil and military, to come on and take them a band of young men, two of them deserters from the army and the others alien enemies and draft evaders have formed a Bolsheviki soviet of their own in a lonely spot 20 miles out of Pembroke, and the neighborhood is greatly excited over it.

This happened, therefore, in Ontario.

Reports which came through from Pembroke last night to The Citizen give only fragmentary details of this extraordinary incident, but it is enough to make one marvel at the extent some young men are prepared to go to get out of serving their country.

Whether Jimmy and Cahill Coughey, two young men of Pembroke—

Deserters from Kingston headquarters.

—are the self-constituted leaders of the strange band is hard to determine, but these two fellows are deserters from the army and both the civil and military police have been after them for some time. They have been in parts unknown for several months now along with other men whose services are required in the army and also some German residents of the district, whom the police have to keep their eye on, and it was not until last week that a hint as to their whereabouts was received in Pembroke.

It filtered into the ear of Chief of Police Carroll on Friday last that he would find the fellows he was looking for camping on the banks of the Petawawa river in a very lonely place, some 20 miles from the town.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member does not intend to read the whole of the article.

Mr. ETHIER: No, I simply wish to finish my remarks—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. In my judgment this matter is not one of sufficient urgency to permit the hon. member to take the time of the House on the Orders of the Day. In any event, questions of this kind, which are not of urgency, should go on the Order Paper in the usual course.

Mr. ETHIER: I will leave to the Government the reading of the article from which I was quoting. I wished to bring this matter to the attention of the Government, and to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware of these facts, and if so, what steps he has taken. If he is not aware of them, does he intend to make an inquiry into the matter? Perhaps it would be a good opportunity for the Government to send Quebec troops there.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: Would I be in order, Mr. Speaker, in giving a short explanation of this report?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member would not be in order. The question is one which should be asked in the ordinary course; it cannot be permitted to give rise to a debate or discussion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I had no information on this subject until I noticed the item in this morning's paper. The attention of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Militia will be directed to the matter and the hon. gentleman may rest assured that if the facts are as stated, effective measures will be taken to remedy the situation.

Mr. W. F. O'CONNOR, K.C.

RESIGNATION OF COST OF LIVING COMMISSIONER IN DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (E. Lambton): I wish to ask the Government whether Mr. W. F. O'Connor, of the Cost of Living Branch of the Department of Labour, has resigned, and if so, what reasons are given for his resignation.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I think my hon. friend's question can be best and most briefly answered by simply reading Mr. O'Connor's resignation and my reply thereto. The resignation is in these words:

Ottawa, April 4, 1918.

Hon. T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

I hereby resign as your commissioner and examiner, under Order in Council re cost of living, of November, 1916. The resignation takes effect immediately. My reason is that I have failed to secure from you that support in the administration of the duties committed to me, to which support I have conceived myself entitled, and without which I cannot possibly further carry out with effect, such duties.

I thank you for unfailing support until this occasion. If I did not deem the situation one which demands the action which I am taking, I would remember such unfailing support as a reason for overlooking your one failure, but I know that if the course upon which you have entered is persisted in, and if insubordinate employees may go over my head to yours, there will be an end to all discipline, and all effective work, so I respectfully retire from under.

Yours very respectfully,
(Sgd) W. F. O'Connor.

To which I replied the next day as follows:

Ottawa, April 5, 1918.

Dear Mr. O'Connor,

I have your resignation of the position you had in the Cost of Living branch in the Department of Labour—'to take effect immediately'—together with the reason assigned for the course you have taken. Your attitude in the matter does not commend itself to me, and if such is necessary, I at once relieve you from further duty in the Department.

The facts are few and simple. A little friction having arisen in that branch, involving a few clerks, one of them asked me to look into the matter, which I promised to do. Having apparently heard of that promise—

I recollect now that I spoke to Mr. O'Connor about it myself. (Reading):

—you wrote me advising among other things, that I should not trouble myself respecting the matter. The next morning I had a talk with you about it, when it appeared that you had no personal knowledge concerning it. I then saw your assistant, who also stated that he was not personally familiar with the circumstances causing the friction, but had learnt them from the officer immediately in charge of the clerk in question. I then asked him to request her to come to see me, but instead of her coming, in a few minutes you came in to see me, considerably excited, when you said, in substance, that if I pursued the inquiry further, you and they would resign, to which I replied that you were at perfect liberty to do so.

The simple question is whether a minister at the dictation of a superior officer of his department, is to refuse to make a personal inquiry at the request of a clerk who alleges unfair treatment. I have never refused, nor shall I refuse, to hear the humblest clerk in the department who feels that he or she (in this case a young woman apparently exemplary in conduct and character) has been unfairly treated. However, you have chosen your course, which you had a right to take, and to which I have no right to object.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd) T. W. Crothers.

I think that answers my hon. friend's question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Was there any reply by Mr. O'Connor?

Mr. CROTHERS: There was a reply some days afterwards, after the whole thing was over.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think, in fairness, we are entitled to the whole of that correspondence.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think so.

SOLDIERS CIVIL REESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, Bill No. 12, respecting the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, was read the third time.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT, 1913, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) the House went into committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, and to provide that an official certificate by any Dominion Government Assay Office in Canada that any article to which the Act applies has been assayed shall be prima facie evidence of the ingredients and quantities stated to be contained in the article, and that the certificate shall be receivable in all legal proceedings under the Act as evidence of the facts set forth therein.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the minister kindly explain the resolution?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The resolution really explains itself. As the Act stands at present, the certificate of the Dominion Assay Office at Ottawa fulfils the duties that are set out in the resolution. This is to make it so that any other Dominion Assay Office can give a certificate which will have equal force.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the minister explain the reason why that should be done?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The reason is this: Supposing the Silver Marking Act director is in British Columbia and matters come up with reference to the violation of the law. There is a Dominion Assay office in British Columbia. As the Act is now, he would have to send the material to be analysed to the Assay Office at Ottawa. This is simply to make the certificate of the Dominion Assay Office in British Columbia of equal force in that regard as the Dominion Assay Office at the Mint here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That seems to be reasonable.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is all there is to it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I suppose the officials of the mint concur in the amendment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 3, to confer the electoral franchise upon women, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Women to be entitled to vote.

The CHAIRMAN: The Bill has already been read, amended and reprinted. It was distributed last Monday as reprinted.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER: I presume it is now in order for me to discuss the merits of this Bill. This Bill, with respect to woman suffrage, which is now under our consideration, is only one of the forms of feminism which are now spreading throughout the world. The question may be asked whether all the laws which have opened the liberal professions to women and which have conferred upon them the right to vote, or to be elected to Parliament, have had any beneficial results on the progress of civilization, or have advanced the happiness of humanity. It is our urgent duty as law-makers to examine this Bill with the greatest care, and not to accept as necessary a radical reform, the advantages of which have not been clearly demonstrated. I for one say that it will be a great error if, on the pretext of giving a transitory liberty to a class, we should bring down women from their throne at the fireside, where natural law has placed them to fulfil a divine mission. If the consequences of this movement to take women from the home and to lead them into the public arena where men are disputing great questions, are good, it is evident that we must vote in favour of this Bill; but if, on the other hand, it can be proved that those consequences would be evil for the country and regrettable for the home, it is our duty to vote against it.

For my part, I deplore this movement. The work of woman, her true realm, is nowhere but in the home, and this I say not only for the woman who already possesses a home, for the mother of a family, but for the woman who has no home.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. member consider that he has a right to speak for women?

Mr. FORTIER: Certainly; the Prime Minister said that we could discuss the merits of this question when the Bill was in committee. A woman who has no home will always be able to exert her energies for the betterment of those who suffer, and we all know that there are not lacking homes where distress and desolation reign supreme. I know of more than one home which is thus visited by good women who spend their leisure hours in helping their afflicted sisters. These good women really have a civilizing influence in these homes of misery. They are not satisfied with healing the wounds of the heart and of the soul, but by their example they raise the moral level of these fallen homes. It is therefore in the home, in that which she has found herself, to which she has brought consolation and enlightment, that woman accomplishes with a royal majesty the work which Providence has designed for her.

Natural law confides to men and to women a mission where the efforts of both are required towards the accomplishment of a great work. The work itself is varied, and each consort has a particular part to play in relation to the other. Nothing but confusion would follow if one did that part of the work which is allotted to the other, or both were to do the same work. Let me illustrate by the case of a woman who is forced by circumstances to earn the living for her familly which should be provided by the husband. The first unhappy consequence of this pretended freedom, or liberty, of the woman is that the industrial work in factories being ill-suited to her physical characteristics, she may become sterile or perhaps give birth to unhealthy or undeveloped children. This is not all, for moralists have shown the demoralizing effect of factory work, with its promiscuous and dangerous associations. Only too often the absence of the mother from the home during the greater part of the day is the ruin of family life; in fact, in some cases the children have to be sent to the orphan homes. This is one of the evils which factory work brings to the labourers' home, when the woman leaves her natural sphere and does the work of man.

Let us now pass to women in political life. Woman, naturally so good and beautiful, and so easily mastered by outside impressions, will naturally put her whole soul into this fascinating life, and will bring into every home from the most humble to the highest the same cause of ruin. Who can think for a moment that this right to vote, which is to be conferred on women, will be restricted to the depositing of her ballot in the box on election day? If a woman is to vote in an intelligent manner, will it not be her duty to get all possible information concerning political affairs, and to take part in the agitation which precedes the election? This means that she would have to attend political meetings side by side with men of all classes, or else organize such meetings amongst women. Many of them will make a personal canvass, or take part in the campaign through lectures, newspapers, and literature generally. Election campaigns in this country are usually long, and when one is ended it is almost time for another to begin. There are campaigns of many different kinds, for instance, municipal elections, election of school trustees, provincial and federal elections, the referendum and the plebiscite, which follow each other in almost uninterrupted succession. It seems evident that the question of political life must necessarily draw woman from her true sphere in the home, into the discussions of the forum and of the street, if she is to use her right of voting in an intelligent way.

No, Sir, this is not the conception we have of the important part to be played in the world by women. She must remain crowned with the halo of our deep respect and of our love. The work and activities of a man are not suited to her. We wish to see her in the home, surrounded by the unspeakable affection of her husband and children, and always deserving of the sweet appelation, "Mother of the living." This is the woman who instils life into a new generation, and this is the woman to whom go my praise and my admiration.

Mr. PAMPHILE REAL Du TREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): I am glad the Government have brought down this measure this session, although I think it should have been brought down last session. This Bill renders justice to women to some extent. At the last session of Parliament, the Government saw fit to enact a law giving the right to vote to a certain number of women in this country. The women of this country, of certain provinces at least, are desirous of having the vote to-day. In my constituency the women are very keen to vote. Let me give an example: Two days before the last election I was informed that only 2,400 women were on the list in my county, but on the day of election we were surprised to learn that about 3,400 had actually made application to vote. They tell me that certain women from certain parts of Ontario were so anxious to vote that they came to my county because they could not vote in Ontario according to law, but in my county they could do so. So that we can judge from this fact that the women of this country, to a certain extent at all events, are to-day prepared and anxious to cast their vote, when an election takes place. Now, the question is, do I favour the principle of this Bill? I say yes, but I want to submit the following observation: I think it is fair to say that all the women in all the provinces are not desirous of voting, and I think, in what I am about to say, I voice the opinion of the majority of the women of my province. I think it is a question of education and of sentiment, and when I speak of education I mean the direction in which education has been given to women. In France, for instance, the women do not intend, and have not the slightest desire to vote, and you will admit that the women of France in all respects are learned and patriotic women, that they desire to advance the interests and welfare of their sex, and take a great interest in the welfare of their country. Then we have, on the other hand, across the channel, the English women. Hon. gentlemen are aware that for some years the women in England desired to vote, and started a widespread campaign with the object of obtaining the right to vote. At first the statesmen in England refused them this right. Fine speeches have been delivered in the House of Commons and before the public, and speeches have been made by the women; I understand that the Government has decided that they will give them this right, so eagerly sought for many years. So that there is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that this is a question of education, and this depends on the direction in which education and sentiment have been directed. Therefore, I think, that this being taken as a fundamental truth, we should leave the question in the hands of each province to decide for itself. In Canada we have a law regarding the franchise for men. It has been in force since 1898; by this franchise each province established a franchise for men within their respective limits. It was enacted by the Liberal Government of that day, and I think we are satisfied with it. In the United States, I understand, an amendment to the existing law was submitted to Congress, and has since been adopted. The amendment reads:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abrogated by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

This means that everybody in the United States of 21 years and over, by this amendment, shall have the right to vote. Now, what is the law? This amendment, after being sanctioned by the Senate, is to be submitted to the various states for ratification, and in order to become effective, three-fourths of the states must approve of it. There are 48 states in the Union, and, therefore, the approval of 36 states will be necessary to carry the amendment. Twelve states have already granted women suffrage. In the United States, by this amendment and by this law, they have approved of the principle that I have laid down. Why has this law been enacted by the Congress? Just for the reason that I have pointed out, that they understand that this question is one of sentiment, domestic necessity and of education, as was well explained to this House at the last session by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. In the United States the women are well advanced and well educated, this question has been before the people for years, books have been written on the subject and a commission has been appointed to study the subject, and this legislation is a result. In this country we are, to a certain extent, in the same position as the United States. We have different zones, and we have a large country. From the Atlantic to the Pacific different people speak different languages. Therefore, I say, if this law is wise for the United States it is wise for this country. If adopted in one province, it will not deprive any one of any right in the other provinces at all. Why force the women of the different provinces to vote if they do not wish to do so? Let this Parliament pass a law providing that each province shall have a referendum on the question. Let every woman over twenty-one years of age have an opportunity of going to the poll and saying whether she is in favour of voting or not. If I am consulted I will say to the women of my province to take advantage of the opportunity that presents itself and declare themselves in favour of voting in future elections. I believe that the enfranchisement of women will have the effect of elevating our political life to a higher moral level. This is an advanced measure, but I am not afraid of it, because I believe that the women of our country have arrived at the stage where they can render valuable help to the men in carrying on the public business.

But, while I am on this subject, let me say that the franchise of a country is an important and a sacred thing. It should not be disturbed often and it should be touched with caution because it is the very basis of the liberty of the country. It assures popular liberty and security, and if the rules of this House permitted me to offer an amendment to the constitution it would be that the Franchise Act should not be changed by a simple majority of Parliament at the instance of the Government to carry out their own aims, or for any other purpose, before an election. The constitution should be so amended as to provide that before the Franchise Act can be touched by an unscrupulous Government at least two-thirds of the members of the House of Commons should concur in the change. We may be some day, as we have been in the past, at the mercy of an unscrupulous Government. This manipulation of the franchise is what has caused many of the troubles in countries to the south of us. The troubles which have distracted the Republic of Mexico for the past fifty years have been caused by the fact that political tyrants, in order to retain power, have, before the elections, disfranchised a part of the people. In this way they have sought to ensure victory at the elections. Therefore, we, the representatives of the people, in the interests of the people and of popular liberty, should declare that the Franchise Act must not in the future be changed unless with the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the House.

In conclusion, I would ask that it be left to each of the provinces to decide whether it is in favour of the enfranchisement of women or not. In that way justice would be done to the women of this country. I hope that some day the women will not only vote but that they will come and sit in this House, and by their presence, add charm to the public life of the country.

Mr. FOURNIER: Mr. Speaker, this House contemplates the idea of granting the women of Canada the right to vote in all federal elections, on the same grounds as men. Concurrently with that right, comes naturally the right and privilege to become candidates for, and members of, the House of Commons. My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), in proposing this Bill stated that it was not prompted solely by the new conditions created by the state of war, but as a reward due to the high merits of all the mothers, wives and daughters of this Dominion.

With all the reverence and respect due to the word of the Prime Minister, I think that the reward he proposes to grant them could be classed in the same category as the gift which Nessus gave to Hercules' wife. The reward offered the women of Canada by the Prime Minister will become the instrument of their torture and the cause of their downfall.

Are we not too much in favour of all the ideas coming from the old world; are we not too easily attracted by the whims, fancies and freaks promoted in countries whose people do not know how to exercise their activities? Before granting the women of Canada the right, and imposing upon them the duty, to vote, before throwing them into the turmoil of political campaigns, before deciding that we shall abolish all and every distinction between man and woman, we must consider, and seriously consider, the ultimate consequence of that action.

With the Prime Minister, I pay a tribute of admiration and gratitude to the marvellous work of all the Canadian women in this dire crisis of the war. With him I acknowledge that they have deserved well of the country, and I would be in favour of granting them the highest privileges possible in so far as it would not be contrary to the best interests of the women and of the country.

A country cannot, without paying the full price, act contrarily to the laws of God and of nature. There is an essential distinction between man and woman. Although they have been moulded in the same clay, although they have received the same divine gift which we call intelligence, although they feel, think, speak and act alike, in almost every walk of life, there is an essential difference which ordains that a man shall always be a man, and a woman a woman, and all the laws of man shall not change that. The immediate passing of this measure will create no commotion in this country; the people will go along living in the same old way, but who shall foretell the result in a few decades from now? Shall there not be conflicts between men and women? Shall there not be causes of dissatisfaction in the home or elsewhere? Or shall there even be any homes? We cannot take up a daily paper or a periodical without reading that the birth-rate is decreasing every year at an alarming rate. Will the granting of a franchise like this increase the birthrate? People may sneer at this petty preoccupation; people may consider it as a joke, but the future of a young nation like ours rests entirely upon the birthrate. And to keep up the birthrate of Canada we must keep our women within their sphere; we must attract them towards the accomplishment of the duties of their sex, duties specified by the unchangeable laws of nature.

A nation is not a collection of individuals; it is a collection of families. To judge of the prosperity of a nation you have to look at the condition of its family ties. If the parental authority is respected, if the parents are not afraid of the hardships and difficulties inherent in the bringing up of a family, you may say without any danger of misconception that this nation is strong, because its fundamental element, the family, is sound and healthy. On the contrary, if the family ties are vanishing, if parental authority is a myth, it is a sign of weakness. This Franchise Bill, in my humble opinion, tends towards the disruption of family ties and the destruction of parental authority.

This Bill is not only disastrous from a national standpoint, it is deplorable if we consider the sole interests of the women. It is useless to review the state of subjection in which women were before the Christian era. They were mere slaves in the hands of men; they still are mere slaves in all the countries where Christian civilization has not brought its light. Christianity has brought women to the position for which the Creator made her; it has made her the companion of man. The wonderful qualities of woman have been utilized by Christianity to complete the work of man. In all matters where men could not exercise all the needed beneficial influence, women have accomplished it. And it is in the Christian home that the all-powerful influence of woman has been felt. For all that she has done in that direction she has been surrounded with respect and love. There is not a man who does not look upon his mother as the sweetest creature on earth. There is not a manly man who does not surround his wife and daughters with respect. Will the passing of this Bill increase that respect? I think it tends to destroy it. This sort of feminism tends to place women on the same footing as men. They will no longer be considered the companions of men; they will become their rivals. I have a great deal of respect for the women who are most desirous of obtaining the suffrage, but my respect is for the purity and beauty of their characters and lives, not for their political judgment. The ideal woman of man is not a politician. I readily agree that women should be fully guarded by law in all rights of property and labour, but as they have been the guardian and the wellspring of the world's faith, morality and tenderness, I say that if they are degraded to a commonplace level with men this fine essential quality will be impaired, and their weakness will have to beg and follow where it now guides and controls.

It will be a nice condition of affairs with our women in politics. Imagine at a convention multiplying the tongue whangers, without increasing the minds capable of initiating legislation. It will injure women physically. Who shall say that at all times they will be equal to the excitements of caucus rows, campaign slanders, briberies, inflammable speeches, torch parades, and balloting on stormy days? How will the poor workman's wife go to the polls? It is the sediment, not the wave of a sex. It is the antithesis of that highest and sweetest mystery, conviction by submission, conquest by sacrifice. I want no contest with women, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FOURNIER: They are higher, purer, nobler, smaller, meaner, more faithful, more frail, gentler, more envious, more merciful, far more merciful, than men are. Those of them who are Catholics are better Catholics than their husbands and sons; those that are Protestants are better Christians than their menfolk. Women have all the necessary qualities to make good men, but they must give their attention to it while men are boys. If the rich ones do not do so, they will have to hand their work over to the poor ones.

This win-the-war Government is the sponsor of compulsion. It was elected by means of a policy of force, but it should employ its force towards other problems of national needs, paying heed to the call of the Motherland for production, and not to the forcing through of legislation such as the grading of hay and straw, playing with the clock, and forcing women into the foul vapours of politics.

Mr. GERVAIS (Berthier) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I believe it is only seemly that, when a Bill of such prime importance as the one now before this House is being discussed, I should pay my homage to woman in the beautiful French language.

For more reasons than one the question of woman suffrage is among the most important matters that could be submitted to the law-makers of any Parliament. In the first place, we must remember that we are living in a democratic country, blessed with a constitutional government, and that any law which has to do, either proximately or remotely, with the representatives of the people becomes, by virtue of that very fact, a matter of the highest importance. The representatives of the people, sitting in this House, are here in answer to the popular will, and when it is sought to change the law which governs our elections, whether in war-time or out of it, this, in all justice, should be gone about with the greatest circumspection, for our laws are the voice of Parliament and this voice may be influenced both by the manner in which the vote is taken and by the preparation of the voters' lists.

I believe that the women of the community are entitled to absolutely equal rights with the men.

If the woman of to-day, if the woman of our century, if the woman of our civilization, is not the equal of man in several respects, it is a question of education and training, which are encompassed not by one year but by the work of centuries.

Were I to indite a list of the men who have shone in the arts, in politics, on the speakers' platform, in Parliament, everywhere, and confront it with the names of those women who have acquired a certain fame, there is no doubt but that list of men would be much more imposing.

If we consider the comparative brain capacity we find that man's brain is more developed than that of woman; but this again is a matter of training and of civilization.

With regard to the physical aspect, woman is man's inferior. This is still a matter of civilization and of training, taking into account the nature of the work that she has had to accomplish for generations as also the nature of the work performed by man.

It is certain, nevertheless, that we must take things as they are and enact legislation which will keep abreast with the progress of our present-day civilization.

So true is it that women could develop, and should develop, in the same manner as men, that all through the history of civilization you can keep track of civilization's progress amongst the different races by considering the measure of freedom which they granted to their women. It is for us to guide woman and to educate her; and, having shown her her duty, to grant her all her rights; and I believe that, once sufficiently enlightened, women should enjoy all the rights of men.

Let us take the situation as we find it. My colleague from Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Du Tremblay) was saying a moment ago that the women of France are not asking for the vote. That is true; but you cannot deny that the Anglo-Saxon women most decidedly do want to vote.

All of us remember the struggles, at times hysterical, which were carried on in England for the cause of woman suffrage; and it is only the recognition of women's tremendous generosity and patriotism during the war that has prevailed upon the Government there to grant them the vote; I do not know as they would have ever got it otherwise.

But, in a general way, if you glance at the map of the United States, it is certain that the Anglo-Saxon woman does want the vote. The French women do not desire to vote because their education was not conducted along those lines, whereas the education of women in Anglo-Saxon countries was precisely along those very lines, and these women want the ballot.

Now, what should our position be? What attitude must I adopt? What attitude shall I adopt?

In theory, as I showed a moment ago, I am in favour of conferring on woman all possible rights, and I believe that these rights should be equal to those of man. When all is said, beyond the theory, there is the practical side of the question; and I do not believe that the time has come to put such a law on our statute books. Let me tell you the reason why.

Mr. Chairman, how will the voters' lists be prepared? On the one hand, the western provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia and in the east, Ontario, have given women the vote, so we hear, and have found it to their advantage, on the other hand, in the province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces women are as yet denied admittance to the voting-booth.

So far, the Federal Government had always accepted the voters' lists prepared by the different provinces for their own elections and I do not see how these lists will be compiled hereafter. The Dominion Government grants a certain right; hence, its duty to prepare its own electoral lists. This was previously done by the provinces and the plan worked out to the general satisfaction. Do you ask for instances to show that the provinces, and the Federal Government as well, were fully satisfied with the system of preparing these lists, in vogue till now? In 1887-88 the Federal Government, which was Conservative, took upon itself to name revisers who were intended to prepare the voters' lists for the following election. What were the consequences? A clamour of indignation against the proposed system arose from the Liberal ranks, and in 1893 the Liberal party adopted as the first plank of their platform the suppression of these revisers, and gave their word that they would take the preparation of the voters' lists out of the hands of the central authorities entirely. When the Conservative party came into power in 1911 they accepted the reforms brought about by the Liberal party, as also the lists prepared by the provinces.

We have another example of the danger of allowing these lists to be prepared by the Federal authorities. Does any one believe, for instance, that we on this side of the House are at all satisfied with the manner in which the lists were prepared for the last election; this thing is not even approved by all the members of the Government and it cannot be satisfactory to those who believe that an election should be carried on honestly and lawfully.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Bill we are discussing is not sufficiently clear. It makes no mention of the way in which the voters' lists will be prepared; for instance, as regards the province of Quebec, there is not a word about the way these lists will be obtained. Evidently, the provincial lists will not avail, since women in Quebec are denied the right to vote. The Government can allow women the vote but can they force the women to register? What I say of Quebec province is equally applicable to the Maritime Provinces, since conditions are the same; there, as in Quebec, how will these lists be prepared?

No, Mr. Chairman, 'twere better to allow this idea of woman suffrage to mature; we should let it grow by itself, make its way unaided in the public mind; let us allow the slow advance of the social education I was speaking of a moment ago. We should wait until this reform has sufficiently matured in the public mind; we should respect the privilege granted the provinces by the central power; let us leave to the provinces the preparation of the voters' lists, as in the past; in this way we will avoid a new cause of misunderstanding between the western provinces which have given the vote to women and the eastern provinces still withold this right from them.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Does this Act suspend the provincial lists? For instance, in Manitoba the provincial list is adopted as the federal list; if we pass this Act, will Manitoba be obliged to accept it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it does not affect the lists for the provinces. Upon the provincial lists there might be some not entitled to vote at federal elections. Lists would have to be made up if the elections took place under the War-time Elections Act in the manner provided by that statute. If, on the other hand, an election should be held under the Dominion Elections Act as it existed in the past, it would be necessary to have additional machinery by which women could be put on the lists in provinces where they are not entitled to vote at present. Moreover, in the provinces where women have the right to vote, the lists would have to be brought in accordance with the principles which are embodied in this statute.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I think it is important that an educational test should be applied under this Act. In 1890 when Mr., now Sir Hugh John, Macdonald was premier of Manitoba, he introduced into the legislature an Act providing that an educational test should be applied to all electors. In the West we have a very heterogeneous population, including many foreigners, and the view of the then Premier that there should be an educational test was generally accepted in the West. Let me give an illustration to strengthen my point. In the municipal election held in Manitoba not many years ago, they were voting on a by-law as well as for reeve and councillors A number of electors were brought to the poll, and when requested, improperly, of course, to state for whom they were going to vote, in a number of cases they said: we want to vote for Mr. By-law.

The committee will see that if there are many electors so ignorant—and there are—it is well that an educational test be provided in an Act of this kind. The educational test by Mr. Macdonald when he was Premier of Manitoba was that every elector should be able to read and interpret the Manitoba Act. Perhaps it was a rather severe test, but I believe that no person, male or female, should be given the franchise, unless he or she is able to explain the idea of voting or has some knowledge of the constitution of the country. It was our judgment at the time that the test proposed by Mr. Macdonald was not too strong.

I believe that this country has been all too tardy in rendering justice to the women in the matter of the franchise. The women have demonstrated in past years, and particularly in recent years, their ability, their intelligence and their right to exercise the franchise. Although during the recent election the vote was extended only to women who were relatives of soldiers, I am glad to say that the women of the West generally took a deep interest in the election and worked faithfully and well a month prior to the polling as well as at the time of polling. I have no sympathy with the view held by the gentleman who spoke in the French language (Mr. Gervais), or of my distinguished looking friend with the white hair (Mr. Fournier); I do not think that the birth rate would be materially affected if the women were given the franchise. As a newspaper man of long standing I have found the women in favour of moral reforms, always ready to take a hand in promoting such an issue as prohibition or any measure designed to benefit the people. I have great pleasure, therefore in recording my earnest support of the extension of the franchise to women; I believe it will prove to be a good thing for the Dominion of Canada. In Manitoba the women have been given the franchise, and, I think, in Saskatchewan as well.

Mr. DENIS: When the Prime Minister moved the second reading of this Bill, he spoke as follows—I quote from page 95 of Unrevised Hansard:

> I do not depend for this upon the considerations which I have placed before the House as to the condition of provincial legislation on the subject. I do not even base it on the wonderful and conspicuous service and sacrifice which women have rendered to the national cause in the war. Apart from all these, I can see that women are entitled to the franchise on their merits, and it is upon that basis that this Bill is presented to Parliament for its consideration.

Not being very familiar with the English language, I thought it wise to consult Webster's dictionary as to the meaning of the word "merit" when employed in this connection; and this is the definition I found:

> The quality or relation of deserving well or ill.

From this definition of the word which the Prime Minister used we find that this Bill is presented for the acceptance of the House on the principle that it is based on conditions stable and permanent. A Bill presented on its merits is a Bill based on principles which are supposed to be true now, which were supposed to be true yesterday, and which will be true in time to come. I would contrast a Bill presented on its merits to what I would call—I wish to be corrected if I am mistaken—an emergency Bill. The question of woman suffrage is not a new one in this House. Last year, there was presented to this House a Bill to give a certain class of women the right to vote. This year, a new Woman Suffrage Bill is submitted for our consideration. I have found it hard to believe that the two Bills do not conflict. Although it may seem rather strange to some hon. members, I would go so far as to say that the ideas contained in the Bill of last year and in the Bill of this year appear to me to be opposed to each other. That may seem paradoxical, but nevertheless I am convinced that the merits of one Bill defeats the merits of the other. Let me explain what I mean. The principle of a Bill presented on its merits was true yesterday, it is true to-day, and it will be true in the future. Consequently, if last year it was true, on its merits, that woman deserved the right to vote, why is it that last year only a certain class of women were given the right to vote? The merits of the case were the same last year. If it is true and correct to say that on the merits of the case women are entitled to vote, how is it that last year the right to vote was not given to all the women of this country? Is it to be supposed that the admiration or condescension of the Government towards the whole class was only in its infancy last year, while this year it has attained to its full growth and maturity. If last year we ignored what is this year the merits of the case, it must have been because there was a reason. What is the reason? I cannot find any other reason than this—

An hon. MEMBER: To win the war.

Mr. DENIS: It is because last year we wanted to give the right to vote to a certain class of persons who were expected to help this Government to win the elections? This year I suppose compunction has come to the hearts of my hon. friends on the other side, and they want to repair the injustice which they did last year to a large majority of the women of this country by depriving them of the right to vote. This year, therefore, the Government is presenting to this House a Bill on its merits which will give the right to vote to all the women of this country. If the Bill were presented last year for the sole reason I have mentioned, I congratulate hon. members on the other side on the sinister success they achieved. They certainly made no mistake last year if they gave the right to vote to a certain class of persons with the sole intent of winning the elections. If I may be allowed to use an expression which I have often heard in the speeches of the Prime Minister, I might say that this Bill of last year, drafted as it was, was certainly "fully adequate." It was adequate because it fulfilled the purpose for which it was drafted.

Let us examine the merits of this question. The question is a very wide one and one on which a great deal may be said. The few remarks which I intend to make to the committee will, I am sure, be very incomplete. If we refer to sacred history, as far back as we can go, if we read the first chapter of Genesis, we find that woman was given only as an aid and consolation to man. We find that all through the Holy Scriptures that woman has no other part. She does not govern. She does not command. She has her place in no council except in that of the family. Profane history in antiquity does not show woman in any other role than as an aid and consolation to man, or else in an inferior role. The highest philosophy of antiquity has not conceived any other function for woman than that of companion to man. We all know that a companion is not a principal. A companion is a person whose object it is to follow and assist a principal, but not a person who is supposed herself to be a principal. In all domains of life, from childhood through middle age into old age, whether in science, literature, philosophy or religion, we do not find that woman has shown any superiority. Perhaps, as the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Gervais) has said, that was because woman was not given an opportunity to develop her mind and her talents. At all events, as it is now, we must admit that woman has shown no real superiority except in so far as sentiment or imagination is concerned.

The physiology of woman, the anatomy of woman, reveals that she is in this world for the purpose of love and motherhood and not for the purpose of political strife. If the father has to be away from the home, it is the part of the mother to remain at home. I do not mean to say that she should be confined to the house, nor that her mind should be closed to all intellectual subjects; but one of the two has to remain in the home, and if it is not the mother, it will have to be the father, to take care of the children, so long as there are to be children in this world. From that point of view, I say if the father is not to remain in the home, then the mother should. If we give the right to vote to woman, we must as a consequence give her the right to attend political meetings, because what is the use of giving her the right to vote, if she is not to be well informed in regard to politics? Women must know for whom they are voting and why they are voting. Consequently, it is a matter not only of marking a ballot, but of studying the politics of one's country, which of course entails the necessity for women attending and assisting at political meetings.

Mr. McMASTER: Why not?

Mr. DENIS: If it is my hon. friend's opinion that they should, I respect it, but I hold that it is preferable for the sake of the family that the woman should remain in the home instead of taking part in political strife at political meetings, and at times, hearing the hard words which we are often accustomed to hear at such gatherings. Conjugal harmony is almost impossible between a husband and wife holding different political views. It would be all right if they held the same views on politics, but when the husband holds one view and the wife a different one, as will happen very often, conjugal harmony will be impaired. This law, while not especially designed for that purpose, will, it seems to me, lead to a husband being arrayed against his wife in certain instances.

Have the women of this country asked for the right to vote? Some say they have this right already, which is not so true as some people believe. But if it is true that they have an undeniable right to vote, how is it that in England, the United States and other great democracies they have been so long denied that right? Consequently, we must conclude that it is very difficult to decide whether women have or have not the right to vote. But assuming they have that right, are the women asking to be allowed to exercise it? There are many rights which we possess which are never exercised, perhaps because we never think of asserting them. We must not forget that happiness is a relative thing. A man who is happy in one condition may be unhappy in another, and so it is with the right of women to vote. If the women of this country wanted the right to vote so keenly that they could not be happy without it, I might go so far as to say that, though it would be a dangerous tool in their hands, we should give them that right. But they do not ask for it. What did we see in England? Suffragettes there have been going after the Prime Minister day after day, intruding on him in the privacy of his home, but the Prime Minister would not give them the right to vote for a long time; although lately they have been enfranchised. The same is true of the United States. In Canada there has been no demand by women for the vote. If, then, the franchise is a dangerous tool in the hands of women, why should we give it to them when they are not asking for it, and when it might work against the welfare and happiness of the women themselves?

I will take the liberty of quoting the law of the province from which I come on the status of women. Article 174 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada reads:

> A husband owes protection to his wife; a wife obedience to her husband.

Has civilization advanced beyond that? I do not know, but this is taken from the old Roman law which was introduced into the French law, codified by Napolean in 1804, and now the law of the province of Quebec. The wife owes obedience to her husband. That does not mean that she is a mere cypher in the family, but that there must be a head and the husband is that head.

Article 175 of our Civil Code reads:

> A wife is obliged to live with her husband, and to follow him wherever he thinks fit to reside. The husband is obliged to receive her and to supply her with all the necessaries of life, according to his means and condition.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to ask whether my hon. friend suggests, having regard to the law which he has quoted, that the wife should be obliged to vote in the way that her husband directs?

Mr. DENIS: Not by any means. I am quoting the law, and the intention of the law is that the husband shall be the head of the family. If we give the wife the same rights as her husband it might separate the family and array the wife against her husband. We have seen by Article 175 that the wife is obliged to live with her husband and follow him wherever he thinks fit to reside. If we refer to Article 1292 we find the same principle laid down; in fact, we find this principle all through the Civil Code of Quebec. It is a basic principle of our civil law now in existence that the husband shall be the leader, and that the rights of the wife, or woman, shall be confined to the family council.

Before taking my seat I should like to summarize my objections to this Bill. I say that the Holy Scriptures, theology, ancient philosophy, Christian philosophy, history, anatomy, physiology, political economy, and feminine psychology, all seem to indicate that the place of women in this world is not amid the strife of the political arena, but in her home. Let me give one or two facts. In the United States the right to vote has been granted to women. This right to vote necessarily entails the right to become a candidate in the elections for Congress or for Parliament. At the last election in the United States, Miss Jeanette Rankin was elected to Congress from the state of Montana, the first woman ever elected to the Congress of that country. When she first entered the House of Representatives her name was freely mentioned in the newspapers, and many people had their eyes on her to see what she would do. The first important measure that came up in Congress after this lady had taken her seat was the question of declaring war against Germany. After the question had been discussed at length Miss Rankin was called on to vote, but she would not speak; she was called the second time, and still she would not speak; when called the third time she wept, and at last she said in a voice scarcely audible that she was not willing to throw her country into war, and she voted with the very small minority against the declaration of war. In the opinion of a great number of hon. members in this House, Miss Rankin certainly did not prove that it was a considerable asset to have women in parliament, nor I do not think it will be an asset to have them in public life. The experiences of Miss Eva Zaintz, in the Russian "Battalion of Death," have been published in this country. Miss Zaintz was a soldier in the ranks of that battalion. Nothing could be more pathetic than the case of these women who enrolled voluntarily to defend their country when the men of Russia would no longer defend it. I will not take up the time of the House to give details. These women have shown to the world, if ever it will be shown, that they were heroes equal to the best that this wonderful war has produced. They had their hair cut. They donned soldiers' uniforms. They went through their training. They swore they would fight until death for their country, and that if every soldier in Russia ran away from the Huns, they would stand their ground. And what happened? They fought the exterior enemies of their country and many of them were killed. Then they fought the interior enemies, the Bolsheviki, and many others of these women were killed, and at the conclusion the premier, Kerensky, was so horrified that he ordered the disbandment of the Battalion of Death. All those that remained returned to their homes, and Miss Zaintz adds that after that she made her way with her aged father across Siberia and came to America. Her action reminds one of the Trojan hero of yore, fleeing from Troy, carrying his aged father upon his shoulders, to avoid the vengeance of the Greeks. And yet this woman writes to-day that there is a place for men and women, and it was not their place to go and form this Battalion of Death because they were altogether out of their sphere. The case which I am citing to this House might seem to be an exceptional one. I might relate at length facts in regard to it, but I am simply mentioning this to show, that from my point of view, there is a place for man and a place for woman in this world. Consequently, I say it is a social question, a moral question, a question of education, a question of local tendencies, a question of family traditions a question of race traditions, and a question of personal aspirations and feelings. And for all those considerations I think that this central power of Canada should not interfere in this matter, but should leave it to be decided by each province in Canada. That, Sir, is my conclusion. We do not want to interfere with the rights of the Anglo-Saxon ladies of Ontario or elsewhere, nor to interfere with their aspirations and traditions. We shall be very happy if they find happiness in getting the right to vote. Let every race, let every family and every province—which is, perhaps, to a certain extent, a large family—decide as to their needs and settle this question for themselves. I have every admiration for the fair sex, but I would be very sorry to think that this admiration went to the extent of sacrificing all the traditions that we have known ever since this world has existed. I say very humbly that I have not been convinced that I should give my support to this Bill.

Mr. THOMAS HAY: When this Bill first came before the House I asked the same question as was asked by the hon. member for Springfield whether an educational test would be provided in connection with this Bill. The Prime Minister misunderstood my question, or, perhaps, I did not make myself clear, but the reply was to the effect that the Naturalization Act provided for an educational test. My question did not refer to the women that were to come into the country after this time, but it related to that class of women already in the country—and we have thousands of them who are unable to read or write in English, French, or any other language—and I asked at that time if the voters would have to comply with any law the province might pass in regard to a test, before they could become Dominion electors. I think that was the text of my question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As far as the educational test is concerned, I think I did understand pretty well what my hon. friend asked. Perhaps he did not quite understand the answer I gave. In the first place, if we are to have an educational test at all, I think it should apply to men as well as women. There is no particular reason why we should establish an educational test to which women should be subjected, and provide no educational test for men. So far as the matter is left by this Bill, both are in precisely the same situation. That is to say, any person who comes to this country and is naturalized must have a certain educational qualification, which is provided in the Naturalization Act. Any woman who comes to this country, and is not naturalized in her own right, but is naturalized by reason of the naturalization of her husband, or by the naturalization of a parent, must, before she is entitled to vote under this Bill, possess the qualification which would be required if she were making application for naturalization in her own right. That subjects men and women in this country to precisely the same test, so far as their right to vote is concerned. If the House in its wisdom conceives that some additional test is necessary, that ought to be provided by a general law applicable to men and women alike. It has not been undertaken in this Bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Was there a Naturalization Act passed by the Dominion?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, there was an Act passed in 1914 which has a wider effect than the previous Naturalization Act. Those who are to be naturalized require to have a fair knowledge of either the English or the French language.

Mr. PACAUD: Mr. Chairman, if the few observations which I venture to make in criticism of this Bill could be construed as a desire on my part to deny to the women of Canada a privilege which they were claiming, I confess that I would promptly desist from such a course, remembering as I do this obvious truth, that it is never given to men to have the last word.

This is not my intention. I fully recognize, Sir, that it may be claimed with a great deal of justification that, as a matter of right, if the women of Canada really desired the privileges of citizenship which are now conferred only on men, these privileges should be granted to them.

Looking at this question from this angle, I readily admit that the women of this country have the necessary qualifications to exercise the franchise. They have both the intelligence and the culture to grasp the issues at stake and to cast their votes with an unbiased mind and a conscience free and unhampered by those selfish interests which too often weaken the judgment of man.

May we not add, Sir, that strong as may have been their claim in the past to have a vote in the management of our public affairs, stronger still is that claim to-day, when we recall the noble part that women have taken in this war? Their title to the vote has grown in proportion to their splendid service to the state and to their never ceasing sacrifices to our men at the front.

Whether in Canada or abroad, they have given their time and their help for a great cause and amidst these scenes of misery and of woe they appear to us to-day, more than ever, "as heaven's chosen messengers on earth."

Sir, it is because women have to such a degree elevated themselves that I hesitate to-day to be a party to a measure which, to my mind, will only tend to bring woman down from her lofty position where she is admired, respected and loved. The influence of her example is a great moral asset to the state. That influence is derived in a large measure from her position of "splendid isolation" within the home. Let us not tamper too lightly with this tradition by dragging women into the turmoil of political strife.

The question which impresses itself upon my mind is not whether we should grant the vote to women, but whether the women themselves want it. I do not believe that the majority are in favour of it. I know that in many provinces this right of suffrage is already granted. I recall the legislation of last year passed in this House granting to some women a right which was denied to others. This was a grave injustice. It had no justification in fact. It was done for a special purpose. It achieved the end which its authors had in view and in so far as this Bill tends to repair a wrong done, to wipe away an unfortunate distinction that was made in the War-time Elections Act, it has the merit at least, though too late, of extending equal treatment and equal justice to all the women of Canada.

Speaking for my province, I do not believe that there will be great enthusiasm displayed for this Bill. We do not consider that woman's mission has changed; her kingdom is still her home. We are more concerned about placing a wedding ring on her finger than putting a ballot in her hand. We feel that the larger field of human activity which is offered to women by this Bill will not raise them any higher, but may even degrade them in the youthful eyes of those whose hearts they never cease to lighten and to bless.

Sir, this does not mean that the women of my province do not take an interest in our public affairs. Far from it. They hold in a large measure what I may call the substance of power. Their influence in the home is dominant. They are consulted in all matters. Their advice, always sought, is usually followed.

But, with that instinct, which women alone possess, they feel that it is wiser and better to leave to others the expression of that power. They have large families which entail heavy domestic duties which they fulfil with care and devotion. These obligations are a barrier to their appearance on a larger stage. I do not believe that it is wise to take the risk of destroying their true, womanly work, their domestic skill, their lovable and endearing qualities, by tempting them to follow us to a polling booth, to a public platform, and, some day, into this very House. For, Sir, we cannot be blind to the fact that we are but entering into the first phase. The others will follow rapidly.

Neither man nor woman can play a double part in life; they have their own spheres of activity. I do not believe that this is a time to experiment with a new order of things or to uproot that which has resisted the test of centuries.

Mr. J. E. PREVOST (Terrebonne) (translation): Mr. Chairman, am I wrong in believing that two speeches in the French tongue are not over-numerous when we are dealing with "la dame de nos pensées," the lady of our thoughts, as they used to say in dear old France?

The Bill before the House just now brings up this question of feminism which has elicited such divergent opinions in this House, in the press and elsewhere.

I do not believe in being absolute, neither on the one side nor on the other; and I believe that here, as always, it is in the happy medium that truth and justice abide.

In theory, it is indisputable that every person who contributes to the resources of the State is entitled to a voice in controlling the administration of the resources of the State. That is just and logical.

In practice, it should be borne in mind that, ever since 1869 the English have given their women the municipal vote which exists if not everywhere, at least in many parts of Canada. There have been no complaints on that score.

The women-voters have shown themselves to be most discreet, mainly devoting their activities and their time in matters political to questions affecting the relief of the poor, and bringing with them into this sphere, side by side with a sound administrative control, a little of the spirit of charity and of tenderness, a little of the maternal spirit.

In New Zealand, in Australia, the women have a voice in the election of their representatives. These representatives are none the worse for that... neither are the women. I have even heard that public life in those countries had been chastened thereby. That may be.

Even, if that were all.

It is said moreover, and this of England as well as Australia, that the women voters pay great heed to questions of morality, honesty and respectability, and that they give more weight to the moral character of a candidate than to his party affiliations.

If this be so, then the experiment is surely deserving of a trial in our own country.

Forcefully anti-feminist in many respects, absolutely convinced that what exists, and what should exist, between woman and man, is not equality but equivalency, I am grieved to see women invading occupations which are not the least bit in the world suited to them and which remove them from their proper sphere, that is from the hearth; most of all I regret that our economic methods and the condition of our manners should often induce women to follow that course; I am saddened, too, by all this childish, silly feminism, by this insane desire to be mannish in ridiculous things, by women who smoke, women who cycle, by women, man-fashion, astride a fiery steed, women who invade professions nowise meant for them, etc., and who neglect their kingdom for all these things.

Nevertheless, I am inclined to approve whatever tends to establish "equality of rights" and to facilitate "the exercise of these rights." Here I approve, but with the understanding that the exercise of these rights will not go to lengths where woman will be diverted from her function, from her natural and sacred duty.

When you say to me: The woman doctor, the woman lawyer, my features express my disapproval; because I am sure that one woman lawyer is perhaps not one lawyer more, but it positively is one woman less—and one mother less.

When you say to me: the woman teacher, my face, begins to brighten up because there is nothing to prevent a woman from being at one and the same time a teacher and the mother of a family.

No doubt, we would rather see—however, let that be.

And, finally, when you say to me: the woman voter, I haven't a bit of objection left. In the first place I am just and logical and in a country where my messenger is a voter I find it rather "tough" that my sister should not enjoy that privilege; in our day, when a woman may be queen, Queen of Great Britain, Queen of Holland, Queen of Spain, I can see no reason which would make us consider a woman as unworthy of expressing an opinion on political matters. I even see in the right of expressing that opinion the welfare of society.

There are people who argue against woman suffrage that the exercise of this right will whirl our women into the political vortex. Do those who speak in this vein reflect that, as a matter of plain fact, that in reality, our women are practically living to-day in the atmosphere of politics, that they devote both time and attention to politics, go to the meetings, very often attend the committees organized, even in the most remote country districts, talk over the election with their husbands and with their neighbours, men and women; that, even, when the country is in the throes of discussion anent a question of the utmost import, the women are not the last to feel the consequences and to be stirred by them?

For instance, when military conscription was brought up, when there is talk of prohibition, when there is any discussion of questions involving the relief of the poor, public health, sanitary regulations, etc., our women, feeling themselves directly interested, take an active part in the discussion of these questions and are really in the current of public life; but they have not the right to express their opinion by a vote when the day comes to choose a legislator who will make enactments which the women will have to observe. Women are to a certain extent inferior to men in education and culture, that is, amongst what we have chosen to call the upper classes; they are superior to men in intelligence, common sense and natural keenness, in those things which are comparatively inborn to mankind, I mean to say, in those things precisely which are brought to the fore in the almost universal suffrage of our elections. The working girl has a finer sense of the fitness of things and a sharper intellect than the workingman; the peasant woman has better insight than her male companion; the latter is well aware of this and always consults her. Hence, our electorate is deprived of the more intellectual influence in its phere.

Women voters will pay more heed to moral questions than to matters of party, they will give more weight to the morals of the candidate than to his platform, his manifesto and his declarations. The more I look into this thing, the more I favour woman suffrage and the less reason I see for opposing it. Its sole effect would be the introduction of calm counsel and of the human element into polities generally. Another point of view; it will persuade man, by a tangible warning and a permanent demonstration, of a thing in which, amongst a certain class, he does not sufficiently believe, namely: that the woman is his equal; that he is the head and that he must remain the head, but not the master, and that his helpmeet is a person before the State as before God. And so I come to the conclusion that women should have the vote. However, the solution of this problem, for it is a problem, should be left to the provincial legislatures.

As a matter of fact, this is a question of education and of temperament. In certain countries people willingly admit that women should go to the polls, in others where, nevertheless, the ideals of liberty and progress are in honour, as is France, for instance, this right has not yet been granted to women because it is not consistent with the French temperament. It is the same thing in Canada where ideas differ and education varies from province to province within Confederation. Each provincial legislature is better informed than any other regarding the state of mind and the opinions of that province and it should be left to that Parliament to decide whether or not the women of that province shall vote. Moreover, this interference of the Federal power in the provincial sphere has an ugly look to us. We have reason to believe and to fear that in thus assuming the role of the legislature and defining the electoral qualifications on a given point, the Government of Ottawa is heading towards the old system of Federal voting lists, which was so faulty and so unjust. Prior to 1896 the Federal voting lists were prepared by revisers who were handsomely paid by the Government at Ottawa and who could add or cancel a name, at their own sweet will, so as to make the lists favourable to their masters. Nobody has forgotten the crying injustices which were wrought against so many voters whilst this system was in vogue.

The liberals came into power in the year 1896; and in 1897 they abolished the system of Federal revisers. Since that time the voters' lists have been compiled in each province in accordance with the provincial law. For instance, in the province of Quebec the lists are prepared by the secretary-treasurer of each municipality and are revised by the municipal councils where every voter has the right to produce his qualifications and get fair treatment. By this law granting the ballot to women all over Canada the Government at Ottawa is encroaching on the system established in 1897, it deprives the provinces of the right to themselves define the electoral qualifications which shall preside at elections, and seems desirous of setting up once more the very vicious system of olden days. This foreboding is all the more justifiable on our part since at the time of the last Federal elections, in 1917, the Government, by its ignoble War-time Elections Act, was guilty of the gravest injustice against a huge number of voters in giving over the electoral lists for revision, in the very last days preceding the election, into the hands of a legion of examiners who, in nearly every part of the country, played havoc with the lists; which is one of the reasons behind this Government's success. We meet again, in 1917, the Tory spirit of former times, the spirit which presided at the preparation of the voters' lists to the detriment of the voters but all to the advantage of those in power. So I do not look favourably upon the present interference of the Government who, through their law granting women the ballot are beginning to deprive the provinces of the right to prepare, themselves, the list of voters. That is why, although favourable to the principle of woman suffrage, I am opposed to the law which the Government is now asking the House of Commons to sanction. It is the right of the provincial legislature to decide whether or not their women shall vote. I fail to understand the eagerness and the zeal of the Federal Government, which has suddenly become imbued with an excess of politeness towards the ladies, in taking away from the provinces the opportunity of granting or refusing to their women the right to have a say, by means of the ballot, in the elections of our country.

M. ARTHUR TRAHAN (Nicolet) (translation): Mr. Chairman, pray do not be astonished if I make use of the French tongue in voicing my opposition to this measure. When, under pretense of protecting woman and of elevating her social status, the Government proposes a law which is a slight upon woman and which will fatally result in lowering her, I believe candidly—with the hon. members for Berthier and for Terrebonne—that, in championing the dignity and the grandeur of woman it is only proper to employ the richest, the most delicately shaded, the daintiest and the purest of human tongues, which, by reason of these qualities has been acclaimed as the language of diplomacy.

On the second reading of this Bill the right hon. Prime Minister brought up a question of principle. Amongst other things, he said:

> I can see that women are entitled to the franchise on their merits, and it is upon that basis that this Bill is presented to Parliament for its consideration. It is our belief that the influence of women exercised in this way will be a good influence in public life. We believe that beneficial results have ensued wherever the franchise has been granted to them; indeed the principle of granting the franchise to women generally was practically affirmed in the last Parliament.

Let us examine right away, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, the pretext invoked in the last sentence I have just read. Personally, I am not very much inclined to follow the bad examples of the last Parliament; it was guilty of far too many iniquities: witness, the conscription law, a monumental blunder from both an economic and a patriotic standpoint, founded on a principle which is false and unconstitutional, and a law which I would choose to see wiped off our statute books, if the thing were possible; witness, again, the Wartime Elections Act which embodies the most heinous injustice and an absolute breach of faith towards thousands of British subjects, citizens of this country; that law also should be repealed, which repeal moreover has been requested by the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan.

I would never be through were I to recite the long list of iniquities perpetrated by the last Parliament. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, we were not elected for the purpose of approving all that had been done by that Parliament. If that were the case, an election would always be superfluous and we ourselves would be mere machines.

This argument of the hon. Prime Minister is not serious and he knows that better than any one else. We are here to study questions on their merits and to decide them according to our conscience and not at all according to what may have been the opinions of the members of the last Parliament.

Read over the hon. Prime Minister's speech and, outside of the pretext just mentioned, you will find nothing but the glittering generality: "Women have the right to vote and their exercise of this right will be an influence for good." Not a single word of argument to prove his contention, so much so, that if we had only his utterances to guide us in forming an opinion upon this question, which is highly important from every point of view, we would be hard put to it to reach a conclusion founded not alone on reason, but, I say more, on the teachings of experience and of facts.

So I was obliged to look elsewhere and it is a brief synopsis of these explorations that I wish to present to the members of the House. In running through the best authors who have dealt with this subject I have become convinced that the Bill before the House is contrary to the natural order, to the social order, to the economic order and to the moral order. For the sake of argument, I take it for granted that, once this Bill has become law, women will exercise the privilege granted them and will take an active part, in the same way as, and side by side with, the men, in political contests. They will come to the meetings in search of information, they will busy themselves with propaganda and with what we commonly call electioneering; consequently, they will undergo the rude apprenticeship of the brutalities of public life and, sooner or later, will claim the right to become members of Parliament and to sit in our legislative halls. This, of necessity, will divert them from their homes and from their usual occupations and will pit their native weakness against all forms of seduction and deceit.

With this admitted, allow me to try and demonstrate the truth of my thesis. First, this Bill is contrary to the natural order which has endowed woman with a different constitution from that of a man; and since nature has not given woman the same strength, she cannot impart to woman the same tasks, the same duties and the same rights.

"In general," says Auguste Comte, "the true path of human progress is this: to render the feminine life more and more domestic and to release it more and more from all outside occupation, the better to insure the accomplishment of its end: mating."

This theory of the Positivist philosopher is confirmed by a celebrated practitioner, Doctor Fonssagrives:

"Woman," he teaches in a treatise on the education of girlhood, "is essentially a hidden being, primordially destined to a private life; public life, once it touches her, transforms her into a strange being, a hybrid, a sort of pariah creature."

Further, it is contrary to the social order which demands a guardian over the home, and which in consideration of woman's relative weakness has confined to her everywhere the ministry of the interior.

Woman's place is in the bosom of her family. Everything calls her there, everything holds her there, everything ties her there.

"The state of the family," writes M. Villey, "assigns to each his natural task: the man works and produces; the woman administers and takes care of the children; you cannot normally ask her to perform any other task; her own, well accomplished will require all her activity, and it is a great pity that she should engage in outside occupations: this is responsible for the fact that the domestic hearth is broken up and that family ties are loosened and often sundered."

It is also contrary to the economic order and on this score I will quote no less an authority than M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu. In his treatise on the theory and practice of political economy, he expounds the following doctrine:

Well-ordered consumption is equivalent, in part, to production, since it causes objects to last without diminishing the pleasure they afford. So, just as we say that the woman constitutes half the fortune of a home, we might add that the qualities of thrift and of caution in its women form half the fortune and welfare of a nation. Hence, the absurdity of trying to foist upon woman the functions of man; it is against the most natural division of work and of tasks; it is striving to destroy wealth. (Page 202, vol. 4.)

And elsewhere:

The question of the condition of women is one of the most delicate and the most complex that exists. We tried to deal with it in one of our first works. No doubt, we must grant women more rights, make them mistresses of their earnings and of their savings, make their lot happier. But we must not fail to realize that the "Feminist Movement" such as promoted by a number of propagandists and favoured by several of the lesser States, constitutes, from any point of view, a serious menace to civilization. By making the home less desirable, and motherhood more troublesome, more formidable, the masculinisation of woman must gradually strike at the birth-rate which, already, in most civilized countries, has too great a tendency towards falling off. So legislation, while making it easier for women to earn their livelihood, should not favour the assimilation of woman to man, neither should it suppress what is consecrated by law, nor interfere with the natural division of the functions between the sexes. (Page 625, vol. 4.)

The reduction of the birth-rate, Mr. Chairman; is not that the shoal we should avoid, particularly at this sorrowful period of our history? The birth-rate is intimately associated with the question of the increase of our population, which is one of the hardest problems to solve, when you consider the tremendous number among us who will have fallen victims to this disastrous war. The Government has given its attention to this problem. In order to solve it, partially at least, they have evolved the problem of giving more importance to immigration by placing it under the special direction of a minister who will have charge of both immigration and colonization. But they should not, it seems to me, render fruitless the efforts of this minister towards increasing our population, as they are doing in a law like this which will inevitably result in gradually decreasing our population.

I wish to draw your attention to a further drawback from both an administrative and economical standpoint; is not it to be feared Mr. Chairman, that when women have the vote they will demand their share of the election spoils? Then the plague of patronage will be intensified. As a consequence, the expenses of civil government will constantly tend to increase, for I doubt very much if the ministers—no matter what Government may be in power—will be able to resist the prayers and supplications, not to say the orders, of the women voters who will demand their reward for services rendered. Why preach economy when the Government by this Bill is deliberately laying itself open to greater expense and greater waste.

Finally, it is contrary to the moral order which suffers greatly from promiscuity between the sexes, and from the desertion of the domestic hearth. The women are exposing themselves to serious dangers in taking an active part in our political contests which, too often, alas, are carried on without pity, without generosity and without courage; and where the clash of interests, of dislike and of selfishness seek their only outlet in the crushing of an opponent. Even if they were to escape all these other perils it seems nearly impossible to me that their minds should remain chaste; in the language of Jules Simon "she will inevitably suffer in her virtues." Woman cannot fail to be the enormous loser when, in the social relations brutal constraint, material force, "the yoke of numbers and that of wealth," ineradicable consequences of political contests, take the place of persuasion, of reason, of sentiment, of intelligence and love. The mite of material power that, by means of the vote, she might painfully obtain through the sacrifice of her health, her modesty, her motherhood and her happiness, cannot possibly be sufficient compensation. Through mingling in public affairs she will feel the need of, in a way, deserting the home, of becoming interested in others than those who have a natural claim to her love, she will live her life for herself and not for her loved ones, she will become dissociated, so to speak. Only part wife, she can be none but an insufficient mother. Her role and, consequently, her grandeur will inevitably wane.

On the contrary, by remaining in the home, which is her sanctuary, woman will wield an influence beyond compare. She will remind all classes of the "Fundamental preponderance of sentiment over reason and over activity."

What woman needs is to live in the midst of her family, to return to the home. We are here concerned with the future of the nation, with the dignity of woman, with the sanctity of family life and with the welfare of the country.

In a preface written to Mesdames Van Vorst, for their book "The Working-Woman in the United States," ex-President Roosevelt says:

> A people whose men are not prepared to labour in every way, not ready to fight with all their might and who have not in their hearts a yearning after fatherhood; a people whose women are not convinced that there is for them nothing grander than to be a good wife and a good mother; well, such a people has serious reasons to be alarmed about its future.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, this Bill to my mind is a deplorable yielding to a wretched sort of feminism and bids fair to cause the social disintegration of what remains of the family, to the injury of the true woman: wife, mother and queen of the household. As a result, all the world of feminine parasites—blue-stockings and "society women"—will unfold. And that is only the beginning. To complete the disintegration, there is thought, it seems, of submitting a Bill to facilitate the granting of divorce. What profound aberration!

Those are, Mr. Chairman, some of my reasons for opposing the present Bill, which is not called for by the majority of women, but solely by a few emancipated creatures, a few suffragettes, crazy for a crumb of petty glory.

If I take this stand, if I maintain that women should be exempt from all political responsibility, it is not, I pray you to believe, with a view to lowering her social rank and limiting her influence. Far from that. It is so as to consecrate woman with more splendor to the eminent role which nature has assigned her and which she alone can fulfil; it is to prevent the dispersal of the family, to labour towards the resurrection and, at the same time, the reconstitution of a solidly organized society, which will make suffering much more bearable and will avoid an incalculable amount of harm; it is because I respect and love woman that I do not wish to see her abandon her rank, and I intend to remain worthy of her and of her teachings; finally, it is to safeguard, in its entirety, her moral sovereignty which, till now, has been the whole charm of our civilization.

Mr. FRASER: I have the honour to represent the constituency of Welland, which I represented in the local House for ten years, and during all that time no woman in my county ever asked me to vote for women's franchise. To-day, the cry is apparently "women's franchise." I am free to admit that the women of this country should have a vote; they are far more intelligent than the majority of the men. But I want to say right here and now that in the county of Welland the women are not looking for the franchise, but they are looking for help to be sent to their fathers, husbands and sons overseas. Why should we waste time? We have wasted one day discussing titles; we are wasting another day over votes which the women do not want, and we are not dealing with matters which will support our men at the front. Why do we not get down to business, forget these side lines, and try to help the boys who are helping us? These matters of titles and votes for women are mere camouflage; let us forget them and turn our energies towards the means of sending help to the boys at the front.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. DEMERS: I desire, Mr. Chairman, to express my views in a very few words, although the question under consideration is one of the most important ever brought before the House. In doing so, I am not moved by any selfish motive. I am not afraid of the results of this legislation so far as the men of Canada are concerned; I am inspired only by a desire to preserve the happiness of our women, for whom I have the most profound respect and admiration and whom nobody appreciates more than I do.

Sir, I have no faith in the results which will be derived from this legislation; on the contrary I believe that it is a bad piece of legislation. This Bill, when it becomes law, will not in any way improve the organization of our social, moral, economic or political life. Far from being a step forward for women, this so-called emancipation will mean disaster to those on whose behalf it is granted, as well as to the nation at large.

Let us not forget that in this country woman occupies an exceptional position. She is at all times the object of the respect, the consideration, the solicitude of all; but I am afraid that in what we are attempting now, far from elevating her to a still loftier position, we shall but bring her to the level of those who, like ourselves, have to gain their bread by the sweat of their brow.

The great, democratic principle of equal rights is intended to be applied by this legislation. This principle may have been quite sound when applied to the large labouring classes in their struggle to better their position and standing in the community, but such circumstances are not applicable to the position of the women, especially those in our own country. At all events, in the province from which I come, the women are so well satisfied with existing conditions that not only are they indifferent to this legislation, but the great majority of them are against it. This seems to me a good reason why such legislation should be left for the various provinces to decide on. The workingman fought for suffrage because he held an inferior position in the community; because he suffered ill-treatment at the hands of the wealthy classes. Have the women of Canada the same motives to impel them to desire such legislation as this? I answer, no.

It is said that woman desires the right to vote in order that she may be able to affirm that she is on an equal footing with man. Does she not realize that under existing conditions she is far superior to man, and that to be equal is to renounce that superiority? Does she not fear that by assuming the functions especially exercised by men up to this time, she may lose much more than she can ever hope to gain? The women of this country have rights, and they also enjoy privileges. A single glance through our civil and criminal codes will convince us that our laws have guaranteed to women a standing in society which is sacred.

Let us also consider the social position of women in the state. Everywhere they are tendered respect, admiration, attention; in a word, they are idealized. This admiration is extended to them because we all recognize their sublime mission; that is to say, the moral and intellectual development of our children. We should not distract them from this great domestic and national duty. I believe that it is a dangerous experiment to take away from our homes those who are so efficient in them and transport them to the slippery and dangerous regions of politics. I am afraid that in the future there will be realized the prophecy made by a great French writer that in all our attempts to make women perfect, we shall simply succeed in making them imperfect men:

Au lieu de faire des femmes parfaites, on ne réussira qu'a faire des hommes manqués.

Mr. BURNHAM: Mr. Chairman, he would be a poor man who would not say something on behalf of women at this crisis. We have heard enough about their being idealized; they are so idealized and so etherealized that they seem to be utterly useless and to have no rights. Let the women alone; let them speak for themselves. Pray, who gave men authority and dominion over them? I am amazed—not only amazed, but chagrined—that there is such a solid feeling on the part of the Opposition against granting women the right of the franchise. To think that the Liberal party, the great Liberal party, led by that illustrious gentleman who leads it now, and who stands so high in the history of this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: —should put itself on record as having fought throughout the day and throughout the night a measure to grant to women the right to have a voice in the affairs of this country. Ought they to have it? We hear this from hour to hour and from mouth to mouth as if some of those hon. gentlemen had the divine right to say whether women ought to have the franchise or not. Pray, who put the destiny of women in their hands? Who made them the judge? They say one minute that women are such superlatively fine beings, and the next they presume to say what they shall do. They put the harness on women; they bind them, as if, forsooth, my hon. friends were the more superlatively fine beings themselves. The inconsistency of the position needs only to be cited to be seen. The truth of the matter is that women stand really on a par with men. If women choose to have children and choose to bring them up, that is their own business. If men hitherto have gone out and earned money to keep the pot boiling and have had, after all, the easy end of it, let them be thankful, without depriving women of the right to vote if they want it. And if they want it, they alone can say. It is presumption for men to answer for them. It is only an attempt to treat them as children. Do I understand that the province of Quebec, the oldest and, in many respects, the most cultured of all the provinces, the seat of so much history, of so much learning, and of so much that is fine in the affairs of this country, wants to stand to one side and put her women behind the screen as if they must be placed, like the Turkish women, in a sort of harem, lest they be looked upon? Nay, rather, they should have a right to look upon the affairs of this world in which they participate and from which they so often suffer.

There is no compulsion about this Bill. If women do not want to vote, they need not do so. If they do wish to vote, let them vote, and let men, instead of treating them with opposition and discrimination, drive up to their houses on the polling day and escort them to the poll, and show them, if possible, the polite way to take part in the affairs of this country, so that they may bring to bear some of that idealizing influence, so that they may put a drop of the ambrosia of the gods, as it were, into the ordinary liquor of every day life. If they can do that, why, let them do it. We need it. The affairs of the world are not so superlatively fine that they cannot be improved. Let them try, but whether they try or whether they do not, there is not one man who dare deny that they have the right to vote. And that point having been granted, to discuss the practical part of the question is simply, as I have said, to assume a dictatorship over women, which is not only an insult to women but derogatory to man. Notwithstanding the prejudices which actuate so many and which seems to have taken such entire possession of the Opposition, notwithstanding the deep-rooted prejudices, it cannot be gainsaid that women should have the right to vote. And let me say that if my hon. friends should succeed in breaking down this Bill, they will put back the cause of woman for an age, at least, for a decade. Would it not be a nice thing to think that the illustrious women, the splendid women, the average women of this country should owe it to the Liberal party that when they wished to have it they were debarred from having a voice in the affairs of this country? Woman can do kind acts for us; she is allowed the sublime privilege of ministering to our wants; but when indeed, she asks to have a little voice in the affairs of this country the Opposition say: No. They say: You may be our servants, and we shall tolerate and even praise you, but our equals, never. I sincerely trust that the opposition which has been manifested by the Liberal party in this House to this measure is more academic or jocular than real. At any rate, to me, it is absolutely unaccountable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the various speeches which have been delivered this afternoon and evening on this very important subject of woman suffrage. I think I voice the sentiments of the House in stating that we have listened to new speakers who will be quite an addition to our debating power and I am pleased to say, as hailing from the province of Quebec, that it has given this new Parliament quite an array of talent which the country might well be proud of. I have listened to my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), who is an exile in the Tory part who should be in the ranks of the radical party. He has proved that on many occasions. I am sorry to say, that on this question, he has begged the issue. He exclamed in his opening remarks: "but what, Sir, the great Liberal party is opposed to woman suffrage" —as if it were something new that the Liberal party were opposing a measure of this nature. If my hon. friend will look to England, from which the Canadian Liberal party and Conservative party draw their best inspirations, he will find that in that country the leaders of political thought on both sides have been opposed to woman suffrage. If my hon. friend will accept the revered name of Gladstone as the best personification of Liberalism during the 19th century, I may tell him—and I shall quote chapter and verse in a moment—that Mr. Gladstone was opposed to woman suffrage. If my hon. friend will come to more recent times, he will find that Mr. Asquith, the great radical Premier of England, was also opposed to woman suffrage. And might I not say, taking another aspect of the question, that if the Liberals, who are in a majority in the Union Government, were true to themselves and true to the cause of provincial rights, they would be with the Opposition on this question? Does my hon. friend believe that the Conservative party in England is a unit on this question? I have read speech after speech, lecture after lecture, by the leading members of the great English Conservative party, and I have found that they also are opposed to woman suffrage. The very agitation which took place in England took away from the woman's cause the most ardent believers in woman's rights.

I am sorry, for reasons which I shall give the committee in a few moments, that the Prime Minister has thought it proper to bring forward this measure at the present time. If I have one reproach to address to my right hon. friend, it is that he is too fond of swimming with the current. He listens a little too complacently to passing whims and he is too ready to grant whatever request is made under the shallow pretext of winning the war. When the Prime Minister was in England two years ago, he was interviewed by Mrs. Pankhurst herself, the leader of woman suffrage.

The press reported that interview, and if my memory serves me well only one day or so before his departure the right hon. gentleman was not persona grata with the Woman's Franchise League in England. He gave the league a very curt answer. I do not forget that when Mrs. Pankhurst came within the precincts of this House some time ago she was introduced by our late lamented friend the member for Dundas, Mr. Broder. Mrs. Pankhurst might be said to be the very personification of woman suffrage, but the right hon. leader of the Government hesitated before giving his assent to her presence on the floor of this House. I remember the remark made by our good friend the late Mr. Broder in introducing Mrs. Pankhurst, "At last, Mrs. Pankurst," he said, "you have succeeded in entering Parliament without a fight."

Let me say at once to my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) whose opinion I generally respect, that when he states the Opposition in this House deliberately insults the women of this country by denying them the franchise, he is quite beside the mark. Those of us who are opposed to woman suffrage—and we are on both sides of the House, because this afternoon the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Fraser) declared himself in a few terse sentences against woman suffrage—do not wish to insult women or belittle their influence, but we wish to keep the woman as the angel of the home; we wish to keep her where she is most needed and where she does most for the family and most for the country. I would qualify my remarks this evening by this statement: I recognize the right of any province of this Dominion to adopt woman suffrage. As has been stated and proven beyond peradventure this afternoon, it is a question of education and environment; it is a question of ambient air. If I were living to-day in the province of Alberta, where my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) introduced and carried woman suffrage through the legislature, or if I were living in the fair province of Saskatchewan or Manitoba I would bow to the verdict of the majority, but I would not agree to imposing woman suffrage on any other province which, for reasons of its own, did not think the time ripe for granting the franchise to women. My hon. friend is surprised to find that outspoken statements have been made on this side of the House against granting the franchise to women, but if he will read the literature on this question he will find that not only men of eminence in politics, in the churches, and in the various walks of life are opposed to woman suffrage, but to his chagrin, that some of the most prominent women in arts and literature are opposed to the granting to the vote to women. Let me mention only two well-known names. I remember some years ago we had the honour of a visit to this country by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, one of the brightest writers of English literature. Mrs. Humphrey Ward is the president of the Anti-Woman's Suffrage Association in England. In the United States Mrs. Everett P. Wheeler, noted for her interest in many social organizations, is also opposed to woman suffrage, and has headed many leagues against the extension of the franchise to women.

I may be told by my hon. friend—indeed, I think he meant to say it this evening—that we are not very progressive on this side of the House, and especially those of us who come from the province of Quebec.

Let me tell my hon. friend that the legislature of the province of Quebec, known at the time as the legislature of Lower Canada, was the first one in the British Empire, and possibly in the civilized world, to elect a representative of the Jewish race. One hundred years ago, Sir, the unprogressive people of Quebec elected the first Jew who ever sat in Parliament, and the city of Three Rivers, represented here today by the ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Bureau) was the city which the late Mr. Hart represented in the legislature of Lower Canada. No, we are not unanimous in our opposition to woman suffrage. My hon. friend, who understands French, knows perfectly well that one of the best arguments that could be adduced in favour of woman suffrage was delivered from this side of the House by my hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost). He delivered an excellent speech in French in favour of woman suffrage, but always with the qualification that the franchise was a matter of provincial rights, and I shall prove in a moment that it is also a question of civil rights, and therefore appertains exclusively to the provinces.

The reasons why I am personally opposed to woman suffrage are many. War time, as my hon. friend from Welland has said this afternoon, is not the proper time to press such a measure as this, because it is a revolutionary measure. It is difficult, if not impossible in war time—and my hon. friend must realize this after the last election—to discuss matters calmly, and war time, I claim, is not the proper time to introduce a question of such grave import as the one before us.

I do not wish to refer to the meetings which were held during the last campaign. If I have fault to find with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, it is not so much on account of the Franchise Bill, which he passed through closure during the last Parliament in order to obtain the majority of votes, not so much on account of the fact that he duplicated the vote of every soldier, but it is because of the fact that he gave a special franchise to some only of the women of this country during the last election. We had the women, the favoured few, of this country in the various provinces organizing themselves, holding meetings, canvassing, giving the people of this country a sorry spectacle indeed. If I had only one objection to granting women's franchise at the present time, I would say that the meetings which were held during the last campaign were sufficient reason for me, at least, to hesitate before granting them that franchise. But my objections are on higher grounds. My hon. friend a moment ago uttered a truism. He said that the franchise was a right granted by the state to the individual. A human being, as a member of the community, is a subject of right, and it is desirable that different rights should be recognized by different people at different times, and as attaching to sections of the community. Sir, I am not expressing a reactionary principle. I appeal to the common sense of my Anglo-Saxon friends. No man has studied more deeply the constitution than Professor Dicey, and what does he say? Dicey, I might say, en passant, was carried away by the doctrine of Stuart Mills and was at first a supporter of women's franchise, but he changed his mind later on and, he said:

> The right to vote is in reality not a right at all; it is rather a power or function given to a citizen for the benefit, not primarily of himself, but of the public.

The franchise to women has not been the only right denied by Great Britain and by all other civilized countries. It has been also denied to minors, and why should you deny the franchise to a minor of twenty, for instance, and grant it to a man who becomes a major at twenty-one? Why the distinction is so trivial that no explanation can be given for it. Yet there is the raison d'état which justifies the legislator in denying the franchise in that case. To say that it is an insult to women to deny them the franchise is preposterous. Are there any men in this community, Mr. Chairman, who are better fitted to vote on public questions and to pronounce upon public issues than the judges of the land? Yet they are specifically denied the right to exercise the franchise. Why? Because society deems it imprudent on the part of a judge who represents the sanctity of justice to be dragged into the turmoil of public affairs. The fair name of justice and the fair fame of the judiciary is sufficient reason why the franchise is denied. Might I not say, by way of comparison, that if, for that reason, you deny to the judges of the land the franchise, you also deny it to women, because of your respect for the stability and the sanctity of the home. Mr. Chairman, good citizenship is realized through many functions. Some of the most important, indeed the most important of all, motherhood, is assigned to women. I say further that it is unnecessary to give women votes in parliamentary elections, because, at least with my own race, women wield a great moral influence on the votes of men. I have had some experience in elections. I have sat in this House for over twenty-two years. I am sorry to say that I am one of the deans of the House, with the leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, who entered this Parliament the same day as I did in 1896. I have passed through many elections, I know what a crucible it is, and I make bold to say that, when electioneering in the county of Gaspé, and the county of Nicolet or Rouville or Maisonneuve, if I were sure of getting the women for me, I could easily carry the men afterward. They have moral influence, and no candidate will begin an election, in Quebec at least, without securing the good will of the fair ladies of that province. Mr. Chairman, the interests of the women are so intermingled with those of the men that, in safeguarding their own interests, men will, ex necessitate, to use a judicial expression have to safeguard the rights and privileges of the women. Besides, women are indirectly represented by men of intelligence and sympathy, who have the interests of women at heart. Is there a man sitting on either side of the House of Commons who would stand for any injustice being embalmed in the statutes of this country against womanhood? I say there is not one man in this House who would not do his utmost to prevent any injustice being done in regard to the rights of women. Moreover, it is admitted that the women of this country, as of all other countries, have their fair share of intellect, even of genius. They can always agitate, they can always write, and they can speak as much as they can smile. So that their point of view cannot remain unknown. A moment ago my hon. friend was surprised to find that Liberals were opposed to women's franchise. I do not suppose that John Bright was ever a Tory. He was a good Liberal. He was even called a radical in the forties at the time of the passage of the Corn Laws in England. What do I read from John Bright? He was opposed to John Stuart Mill on this question, and he said:

> I act from the belief that, to introduce women into the strife of political life would be a great evil to them, and that to our own sex no possible good could arise. When women are not safe under the charge or care of fathers, husbands, brothers and sons, it is the fault of our non-civilization, and not of our laws. As civilization founded on Christian principles advances, women will gain all that is right for them to have, although they are not seen contending in the strife of political parties. In my experience, I have observed evil results to many women who have entered heartily into the many political conflicts and discussions. I would save them from it.

That is the opinion of John Bright, the great mind of the radical party, and one of the greatest minds of Britain, and of the civilized world. Women, as was stated this afternoon by my hon. friend from Joliette, are unfitted for military service. Is it fair or is it just that women should be called upon to pronounce on a question of peace or war? Because I say, Mr. Chairman, if you give the women of this country the right to vote, you must be logical, you must be consequent with yourselves. If she has the right to vote, she is eligible. If she can be elected to this Parliament, then she will have the right to pass judgment on questions of peace or war, while she is labouring under a disability and is unfitted for military service. I have just quoted a few words from John Bright. Might I quote Cardinal Gibbons, who has summed up, in a few terse sentences, all his objections against this franchise? He said:

> When I deprecate female suffrage I am pleading for the dignity of woman. I am contending for her honour. I am striving to perpetuate these peerless prerogatives inherent in her sex, those charms and graces which exalt womankind, and make her the ornament and the coveted companion of man. We must remember that, though woman does not personally vote, she exercises the right of suffrage by proxy. So powerful is the influence which a sensible matron exerts over her husband and sons, that they will rarely fail to follow her counsel, which comes from an inspired instinct, rather than from laboured reasoning.

My right hon. friend, in introducing this Bill the other day, said that the women of Canada had done an admirable work during the present war. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my right hon. friend that Canadian womanhood has given the world a great example. We have seen in every home, in every hamlet, in every village, and in every city of this Dominion, our womenfolk doing its utmost to afford comforts to the boys at the front. It is not through a lack of chivalry, or a lack of recognition of the admirable work performed by the womanhood of Canada, that we oppose the granting of this franchise. Rather is it to preserve the chivalry which exists as between man and woman and the good standing of the community that I am opposed to female franchise. The women of this fair land should not be embroiled in the bitter party conflicts of Canada, because we wish to preserve the unity, purity and sanctity of the home. If political ideals are divergent in the home, what will be the result? Domestic controversy will ensue. The words of Mr. Gladstone on this question are appropriate. He says:

A permanent and vast difference has been impressed upon women and men respectively by the Maker of both. I for one am not prepared to say which of the two sexes has the higher and which has the lower province. I am not without the fear, lest beginning with the state, we should eventually be found to have intruded into what is yet more fundamental and more sacred, the precinct of the family and should dislocate, or seriously modify, the relations of domestic life.

In all frankness and sincerity, I must say to my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) that Mr. Gladstone never insulted the women of England, he never insulted any one in his life, and I prefer his reasoned judgment on this question to that of my hon. friend. We should not burden the majority of women with a responsibility, which, I believe, they do not want. To use the words of another Radical, and possibly the leader amongst the men of letters in this country, Mr. Goldwin Smith:

It is the course of nature that man particularly does uphold the Government and enforce the law.

To sum up my objections, I say that woman suffrage implies not only the casting of the ballot, but the entering of women into the field of politics. Politics is modified war. We saw it during the last campaign. There is struggle, strife, contention, bitterness, heart-burning, excitement and agitation, all things which are out of harmony with the true character of womanhood.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me examine this question from another angle. All those hon. members on the other side of the House who have a fond recollection of ever having belonged to the Liberal party, should, even if they support woman suffrage, oppose this Bill. The Bill is the thin edge of the wedge in the sense which I will explain to the committee. The Bill implies a uniform franchise in the Dominion of Canada. Liberals in all parts of Canada, whatever may have been their differences or their contentions about certain issues, have always united on the question of provincial rights. There is here a concrete question of provincial autonomy. This Bill aims at a uniform franchise.

This is not the first attempt which has been made in Canada to put upon the statute book a uniform Franchise Act. At the first session after Confederation Sir John Macdonald, who was the apostle of legislative union, introduced a Bill in favour of a uniform franchise, but he withdrew it. In the seventies he introduced another Bill founded upon the same principle. Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion, who was one of the leaders of the Opposition, moved an amendment, and Sir John Macdonald again yielded and withdrew his Bill. Finally Sir John came before the Parliament of Canada and introduced the famous Franchise Act of 1885, by which he undertook to get a uniform franchise for the Dominion. He instituted the famous organization of the revising officers. The Liberals who sit on the other side of the House must remember the plucky fight which was put up at that time by their late leader, the Hon. Edward Blake, Sir Richard Cartwright, the Hon. David Mills and the right hon. gentleman, the present leader of the Opposition. Sir John Macdonald was in favour of centralization as against local liberty. The principle of centralization was, and is, antagonistic to the very federal principle which governs this country. The Bill was fought energetically by the then Opposition, but it passed after a protracted debate, and in the elections of 1887 and 1891 the Liberals had to face in every constituency a franchise made by revising officers created and paid by the Government of the day.

So incensed, so disgusted were the people of this country that in 1896, when not only the school question but the question of the franchise, was fought out, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was justified to present new legislation. It was introduced during the session of 1897, or 1898, and by that new legislation the Parliament of Canada reverted to the principle of the provincial franchise, and it has elected us ever since. There has been no agitation to return to the revising officers of old. On the contrary, the people have declared time and again in favour of the principle of the provincial franchise. It is the best adapted to our people. We are all elected upon the particular franchise of each province. I may be told by hon. gentlemen that this diversity of franchise constitutes an anomaly. But, Sir, let me again go to the source of parliamentary government. Let me read the opinion of that great exponent of British Liberalism, Edmund Burke.

Government has been deemed a practical thing made for the happiness of mankind and not to furnish a spectacle of uniformity to justify the scheme of visionary politicians.

No doubt, it would be an excellent thing if in this country, so large and yet sparsely settled, with different provinces and populations, we could have one language and one law. That would be considered the millennium. But that is only the scheme of a visionary mind, as Burke said. In the United Kingdom, they have not uniformity of laws. Scotland has laws differing from those of England. It is a strange spectacle for one who has attended the sittings of the Privy Council in England to hear one day counsel from the province of Quebec arguing in their own language and citing their own French laws; and, next day, to hear counsel from the Channel Islands again cite the old laws of Normandy. Again, Indian counsel argue on the law of Manou. Still again, there is Mauritius, with its own French laws. Then there is the common law of England. In some of the other colonies, Roman law and Dutch law also. So cast away from your mind, Mr. Chairman, the idea of uniformity in the British Empire. The beauty and the real unity of the British Empire rest on its diversity. So it is with our own Dominion. We have different laws, beliefs, customs; we have different minds on many questions; and it is the duty of a statesman to respect those laws, those customs and those characteristics of each province. An anomaly in our Constitution? Of course. In the province of Quebec, when I was a younger man than I am to-day, alas! I remember that my party, the Rouge party, was deadly opposed to the maintenance of the Legislative Council. Being a little older to-day, I stand for the Legislative Council. Why? Because the Legislature of Quebec, constituted of a majority of French Canadian members, is at times apt to pass hastily-considered legislation, and the older men on the Legislative Council are there to revise the legislation of the Lower House. The people of my province have come to realize that the Legislative Council is, after all, a useful institution, though it may not be as useful in other provinces. There is, I think, a Legislative Council to-day in Nova Scotia. It has been abolished in New Brunswick and in Prince Edward Island. Yet, it is an anomaly; in some provinces, they have only the popular legislative body, and we, in Quebec, have the bicameral system. The same anomaly exists as regards the franchise.

A franchise, Mr. Chairman, must suit the particular circumstances of the community. We have nine provinces in the Dominion. There are different elements in our population; we have a different territory. It may be, and I believe it is, a good thing in Alberta and Saskatchewan, where the homes are so distant one from the other and the population is sparse, and where you have a medley of races, to have a woman franchise. If I were living in those fair provinces, I should certainly accept the verdict of the majority in that respect, the golden principle in our country being that the majority rules. But, Sir, each of the provinces knows its own peculiar circumstances, conditions and sentiments, and, furthermore, its passions and prejudices.

Let me again recall to my hon. friend the ideal which should prevail in public life. We must have national unity in Canada. To reach that goal, we must not only respect the qualities and the virtues of our fellowmen, we must also respect their prejudices and their passions. That is the great test of national unity. The franchise, I submit humbly, is a civil right, and civil rights come within the ambit of the provincial legislature. Mr. Chairman, will you allow me to give you the authority of Storey on this point:

> The truth seems to be that the right of voting, like many other rights, is one which, whether it has a fixed foundation in natural law or not, has always been treated in the practice of nations as a strictly civil right, derived from and regulated by each society according to its own circumstances and interests. It is difficult, even in the abstract, to conceive how we could have oherwise been treated.

So, Mr. Chairman, if the question of franchise is a civil right, as it is, it belongs exclusively to the provincial legislature, and I claim that the Dominion Government has no right to invade or to impinge on that domain. In the United States, where the Federal principle is supreme all over the land, the question of franchise is relevant only to state legislatures. In the republic to the south the states themselves determine what their respective franchises shall be; and so it happens that in some of the western states, women may vote in federal elections, while in many other states they are denied that right. To use the words of the late Mr. Blake when citing that example during the famous debate of 1885: "There you have the reason and the theory, the practice and the experience of the federal principle."

I said a moment ago that we drew our inspiration from England in matters of legislation. Although England, Scotland and Ireland have a legislative union, it is a fact that the franchise in each differs considerably. In England the franchise is controlled by the minor municipal bodies, not by the central Parliament. On this point let me quote the admirable words of the late Mr. Blake:

> Now, the English system has for its basis the local making of the lists. I have spoken of local liberties in the sense of provincial liberties; but I say that municipal liberties are not less important. It has been recognized in England by the students of free institutions that the nurseries of larger liberties are minor local liberties; and that the powers of action of municipal bodies, within their narrow sphere of executive work of business done, and of functions and privileges enjoyed, are of the greatest consequence, as educating the people in the general principles of representative government; and in those restraints, under constituted authorities, which are essential to the establishment of a democratic, and yet orderly and stable system of Government, I say, then, that the privileges which the municipalities enjoy in England, of making the lists through their overseers and officers, are ancient and important privileges, and if the hon. gentleman defers to British practice, he had better follow it here.

I also defer to British practice on this question. We have had no general agitation throughout the country in favour of the adoption of a federal measure of woman suffrage. We have had in a restricted degree an agitation for woman suffrage in some of the provinces; I do not object to the granting of the franchise to women in such cases. But no petition in favour of Dominion-wide franchise for women has been sent to this Parliament, and I do not see why at this moment, under the flimsy pretext of giving votes to women throughout the Dominion, we should ignore the first cardinal principles of our constitution. I am willing to give the women of my province the franchise if they ask for it and if the majority votes for it. Living in Ontario, I should have no objection to woman franchise if it is the will of the majority. It would be a provincial franchise, and that is the only franchise which constitutionally elects the members of this Parliament.

Mr. GLASS: The hon. gentleman says that if the women of the province of Quebec asked for the franchise he would be willing to grant it to them. Will he tell me whether the women of his province have ever had an opportunity of expressing themselves on this subject?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There has been in all the provinces—mostly throughout the West—some agitation in favour of woman suffrage. In the province of Quebec we have women of the highest intelligence, some of whom are leaders in social works, yet there has been no concerted action on their part in favour of woman suffrage. I think I am right when I say that the majority of the women in the province of Quebec to-day are safe in the hands of the men, and do not care to exercise the franchise.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (York East): I desire to congratulate the Prime Minister on having brought forward this very advanced and progressive measure.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind members of the committee that the same decorum must exist in committee as in the House. There is altogether too much conversation. Members are not obliged to remain here; if they do not want to listen to the speakers I would ask them kindly to retire from the chamber to carry on their conversation.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Our American cousins to the south have also brought forward an advanced measure similar to this, and action along this line has been taken in England as well. Many of the hon. gentlemen opposite appear to think that this measure should be a provincial, not a Dominion measure. I do not agree with that view; I think that the law should be made applicable to the whole of the Dominion.

An hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon said that some 2,000 to 2,100 women were qualified to register in his riding in Montreal, but that 3,000 either registered or made the attempt to register, showing that they were anxious to have the franchise. The hon. gentleman did not tell us how many of the 2,100 who were qualified to vote actually did vote. If out of that number 1,500 or 2,000 voted, I would say that the women of his riding were sufficiently educated and sufficiently advanced in their ideas to vote, especially when they thus evidenced their appreciation of the opportunity of exercising the franchise.

It has been said that it is necessary, before extending woman suffrage to all the provinces, that there should be a campaign of education whereby the women would become qualified to vote intelligently. That may be the case in one or two provinces, but I think I can speak for Ontario and some of the western provinces, and say that the women in these provinces do not require to be further educated, to enable them to vote intelligently. They are to-day well educated along that line. That was proved in the recent Dominion election. In my constituency some 3,000 women were eligible to vote and out of that number some 2,700 exercised the franchise. I may say that they did not spoil their ballots, their ballots were properly marked and they took a great interest in the election. At one of my public meetings I had the honour to see presiding the first lady who occupied the chair at a political meeting, and I know of no man who could have discharged the duties of that position better than she. That shows the capability of women to exercise the franchise.

In performing all the necessary duties in a campaign, and in taking an interest in all matters pertaining to an election, women are well qualified. I think that, even in the province of Quebec, if the women had the opportunity, they would show the men that they were quite capable of exercising the franchise. Women have been tested, and have shown their capabilities to occupy public positions. In Toronto we have had two lady representatives on the School Board. We have had the franchise extended to women in the election of mayor, aldermen, and controllers of the city, and invariably in municipal elections the women take great interest. You do not have to send automobiles to their homes to take them to the polling booths; they go to the polls and vote and return to their homes without any urging, thus showing the deep interest they take in municipal matters. If that is so, why should they not take an equal interest in Parliamentary elections? Have we not, in the western provinces, extended the franchise to women? Have we not lady representatives in some of the provincial legislatures in the West? Judging from those who have been elected, I would prophesy that they will make very capable representatives in those legislatures. If women are a success in municipal and provincial matters, surely we can extend the franchise to them in Dominion matters. We should have no fear of their capabilities. If women had the franchise in Dominion matters, I think there would, in many cases, be better results. The women would not be so apt to play politics as perhaps some of the men are. When an election comes on some men whom one might call politicians will say: Well, there is an election coming on in a couple of months; we must size up the leaders of both parties; there is Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the one side and Sir Robert Borden on the other. After reviewing the situation, they will say: Well, if I do not support Sir Robert Borden I may be disappointed; he is the one that I shall support and I hope that he will be elected; if he is elected, I expect, on account of my influence and the energy and work that I have thrown into the campaign, that I shall succeed in getting some favour for my company. If he is not a commercial man, he may feel that some title should be bestowed on him for the good work he has done and the results he has produced in the campaign. He might say: I do not think I shall follow Sir Robert Borden; I shall make my choice of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because I know from past experience that he has been generous; if I want to build a railway similar to the Grand Trunk Pacific, there is no doubt that Sir Wilfrid Laurier will be generous, and in that way it will be worth my while to vote for him. Thus, with the men, there is that danger of playing politics for the benefits that they may get out of the game. My experience is that whn you extend the franchise to the women they will not play the political parties for the benefits they may get out of them, but they will play their part with the greatest of honest simplicity and thought. They will say: How will this affect my home; in making my selection of the one I shall support, my first thought shall be of my home, my family and my general surroundings; from which of the parties shall I get the best results in those regards? They will thus accomplish more for their homes, their families and their general surroundings if they receive the franchise. There is, therefore, not any danger in granting the franchise to women. We can trust them. Two hon. gentlemen opposite referred to the days of Napoleon and John Bright. The opinions of those men in those days can be explained, but what would their positions be to-day? If John Bright occupied the position of Premier of England to-day, his opinion, in my judgment, would be quite different from what it was in those days. By extending the franchise to the women of England he would show his appreciation of the great work that has been done in this war through the women's organizations. Why should he not do so? Are we not all proud of the part the women have taken in this great war? Have not the boys overseas appreciated what the women have done? Have they not gone on their knees night after night offering up prayers to the women of Canada, to their mothers, their sisters, and others for the great work they have done and the comforts they have given them? Are the women not going into the munition factories and on to the farms? Are not thousands of them operating machinery? Have they not shown ability in that work equal to that of men? Are not thousands of them drawing equal pay with men? And, if they are doing equal work, they have a right to receive equal pay. If they have performed all those duties and accomplished so much good, surely the least we can do is to extend the franchise to them.

It is certainly then a progressive idea to bring a measure of this kind forward, showing that the Government is listening to the sentiment and feeling that prevails over the whole country. Why should we misinterpret that sentiment? From my experience in cities and different ridings, I believe a strong sentiment prevailed throughout the Dominion that the franchise should be extended to women.

My experience in the West has been that there is that general feeling, and if there is the general feeling that the franchise should be given to women after this thorough test of whether they are the equal of the men—and I say they are the equal of the men—it is our duty to extend the franchise to the women in appreciation of the great work they have done. Do you not think there will be great rejoicing among the four hundred thousand of our boys overseas when they hear that this Bill has passed this House and that their mothers and sisters and other female relatives who have been working morning, noon, and night to help them, are to be given the right to vote? I appreciate very much the Premier's action in bringing this measure forward. It is a Dominion measure, not a provincial measure. It has been suggested by several members on the other side of the House that this is a question for the provinces to deal with; I do not agree. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has spoken of some of the western provinces, and he thinks it quite right that the women in those provinces should have the franchise. Well, if he is consistent, why should not the women of all the provinces have the franchise? He should be consistent and say: Give it to the women of this whole Dominion; they are as well qualified to vote as are the women in the western provinces.

Mr. E. D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Before confiding to the House the few remarks I wish to make on the important question which forms the subject of this debate, I would like to cite an instance to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) which will prove that his statement is not true when he claims that the province of Quebec always gives proof of narrow-mindedness. I shall cite an instance which has to do particularly with the county which I have the honour of representing here. I wish to inform him, should he not know it, that on the suggestion of the great Lafontaine, Robert Baldwin, beaten in his own province, was elected in the county of Rimouski, the most beautiful county of the province of Quebec. I cite this incident to show that it is not always right to arouse popular passions and prejudices, and on all occasions to strike at the back of Quebec in an effort to prove that we are behind the times and that we are shortsighted people.

The hon. member for Peterborough said also, in the course of his speech that we, of the Opposition, we, the members from Quebec province, had no mission from our women, nor from the women of the country generally, to come here and oppose this legislation.

I might say the same thing to him and ask him if delegations of women came to him begging that he would champion this measure.

Mr. Chairman, for my part, I would believe myself guilty of a serious lapse of duty towards the voters who did me the honour of electing me as their representative, if I were not to submit to the House the reasons which prompt my opposition to the present Bill.

I am entirely aware of the sentiments of my constituents towards woman suffrage, and I know perfectly well that the women of my county haven't the least desire to vote at Federal elections.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not beat around the bush. I am opposed to this legislation, on principle, because I believe it to be radical and inopportune. By obliging woman to take part in our political contests and quarrels you are forcing her out of her own noble rôle. Woman's place is not at political rallies, on election committees or in the polling-booth.

The ideal spot for woman is the family fireside. Isn't she, in all truth, the angel of the hearth, which she has helped to establish and of which she is the most beautiful ornament?

The application of the law of woman suffrage will necessarily contribute to the destruction of family unity and to the decrease of that respect which man must have towards woman. What quarrels we will witness, and how many interminable disputes; all of which will be the result of our own deeds, if we adopt this Bill which gives to the women of this country the right to vote.

I am surprised, I find it strange, Mr. Chairman, that a Government which calls itself a Union Government should bring up this legislation which is foreordained to cause disunion in most of our Canadian homes. And I wonder what respect men will have for the woman voter, the woman organizer, who lend themselves to all sorts of low machinations so as to favour such and such a candidate or such and such a political party.

If we wish to safeguard for woman that respect from man which is her right, let us not, by granting her the franchise, deprive her of that dignity and daintiness which make of her the most delightful and most exquisite of creatures.

In my humble opinion, I believe I can assert that woman suffrage is immoral and that it will, of necessity, result in regrettable and irreparable disasters.

So, let us leave our women beneath their own roof with their husbands and their children. There they will fulfil their true function, that of rearing noble and valiant defenders for their Canadian fatherland.

Mr. STACEY: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of those who have spoken, especially to those I was able to understand. One gentleman, whose name or constituency I do not know but from somewhere in the East, stated principles with which I most heartily agree, and I wish to take him at his word at that particular point where he said he would advocate a policy of education, of enlightenment, of instruction, study and research, or words to that effect. I think that is right, and permit me to say that for a generation at least that very policy has been in operation among the women of this country, to such an extent and with such a result that from the spot where we now stand to the Pacific ocean there is not a foot of ground which is not hallowed with the presence of a political atmosphere that recognizes no distinction of sex. The women of the West have given a great deal of study and attention to this question, and so have the men, with the consequent result that, in the provinces west of the Ottawa river, without exception, the women have equal privileges with the men. We have in each of the two extreme western provinces a woman sitting in the local legislature. And why should not women sit there? In one of those provinces, from which I have the honour to come, there is a woman in the local legislature. Her husband was formerly an ornament in that legislature, and was a member of the provincial cabinet. If I mistake not she has given three or four sons for the defence of her country, and at the voice of her fellow-citizens she accepted a nomination, and obtained a majority of some 3,000 over her male competitors. She was accorded a most hearty welcome in the provincial House, which House she graced as an ornament, not merely because she is a woman, but because of her capacity to discuss provincial and other questions. And why should this not be so? I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments and statements of the members of the Opposition on this question. Why should there be a distinction between man and woman in the sole item of franchise? Men and women equally recognize the law and obey the law; there is not a law prohibiting certain crimes which applies only to man and exempts women. But, when we come to the door of the polling booth, in the past women have been prohibited from entering because of their sex, although in mental capacity and general ability they are fully the equal of men. Why should they be debarred from the expression of their convictions at the polls? They have a right to express themselves because of their services to society and their contribution to the intellectual and moral wealth of the community and of the State.

I have listened also to the address of the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) who has spoken of himself as one of the deans of the House. I had listened to his remarks up to this stage with a very great deal of interest, but I confess that to-night I was disappointed. It may be because of my parliamentary youth. Why, Sir, I believe this is the year 1918; we are not in the last century. If reference be made to the action of celebrated British statesmen and their deliverances in the latter half of the last century, why not go back a little farther? For, if we do we shall find equally celebrated British statesmen unwilling to grant the franchise to men. It is only in comparatively late years that a practical manhood suffrage law has been in force in England. They have grown. But why go back to that date in English history when to-day we find that in England the franchise has been extended to women? They have grown, they have widened, they have seen the obligation resting upon them as citizens and they have granted what the women in England have asked for and what the most advanced conviction of English manhood believe to be their right to enjoy.

One other argument advanced by the hon. gentleman was that women were unfitted for military service. I felt like hanging my head when that statement was uttered. Look at the state of affairs in England to-day. Look at the countless thousands of women who are working their full time and every day for the defence of the realm. Look at the women who are taking the places of men in, as far as I know, every avenue of life, every avenue of manual labour—working on the farms, driving motor cars, acting as conductors on tramways, taking their places in the munition factories by the tens of thousands. Is any one justified in saying that these women are unfitted for military service? Does military service simply mean taking your position on the firing line? Hon. gentlemen on the other side have been telling us that there were men in their provinces who were engaged in agriculture and that that was a form of military service. I grant it. But is it not a form of military service to supply the men at the front with the munitions and the materials of war? Surely military service is not confined to pointing a gun?

The records of the past will show that in all forms of active national service in the history of mankind woman has taken her place and done her full share. There is no question in regard to that. Military service is such a broad term that I take it that every man and woman who does his utmost for the Empire, for the protection of society and for the great principle for which we are all striving is deserving of the qualification of being fitted for military service.

Another point spoken of by my hon. friend —and I hesitate to state it here at this hour —was the necessity of preserving our chivalry towards women. I endorse that most heartily. But, Mr. Chairman, let us remember that we cannot preserve our chivalry while we allow women to remain under this injustice. We cannot have them retain our respect, and we cannot secure and hold their respect, if we are unwilling to do the right thing by them. It is certainly at this hour in the world's history, the right thing to recognize their equality in the realm of active life, and the only way to secure and preserve their respect and confidence is to grant them the privileges which we as citizens enjoy and not condemn them to inferiority because of the accident of sex.

My hon. friend to whom I first referred showed his true manhood, I think, in his closing words. His remarks seemed to me to suggest a political argument. He argued against woman suffrage, but I noticed that when he came to the conclusion his bigness of heart shone forth and his manhood expressed itself when he said that he hoped soon to see women in the position in which this Bill seeks to place them. If I understood him correctly, that was his concluding remark. That is characteristic, I believe, of men all over. Many talked against this reform, and I would fain think that if there are men on the other side of the House who talk against it it is because they are in Parliament. They feel that to grant women the franchise is the right thing to do and when it comes to the vote, and to the decision I trust they will not act against their better convictions.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat late in the evening to attempt to say anything new about this very important Bill. But there are, perhaps, some observations which can be made on it with regard to features which have not been touched upon before. There are two objections to this Bill generally. There is a great deal in favour of the Bill, but I will first mention two general considerations against woman suffrage. The first general objection is that it may possibly create a certain amount of friction at election time if the husband belongs to one political party and the wife to another. I think that is an objection which should be considered, although I do not believe it is strong enough to offset the good features of the Bill. The main objection to the measure is that which John Bright found to a proposal for woman suffrage towards the end of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Woman suffrage is not a new proposal in British countries. It was about 1873, if I mistake not, that John Stuart Mill introduced into the British House of Commons a Woman Suffrage Bill, and it was defeated, but received a surprisingly strong support at that time. John Bright on that occasion voted in favour of the Bill; but subsequently, he voted against the Bill, and the reason he gave for so doing was that it would enormously increase the power of the church in politics both in Great Britain and in Ireland. Now, we are all, I take it, anti-clericals. None of us want to have the church trench on the state; none of us want to have either priest or minister suggest, dictate or exhort from the pulpit what attitude his flock should take on a political question. And there is no question but that at the beginning of woman suffrage it may increase the power either of the priest or the minister of religion. We Liberals in the province of Quebec have for years and years stood out against clerical interference in politics. There is an interesting case in the law reports of our province where an election was set aside because a parish priest had unduly endeavoured to influence his flock to vote for one candidate rather than another. We have set our faces against that. For forty years and more the Liberal party in Quebec fought against that attitude of mind on the part of the church, and we stopped it. And, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen in other provinces, as well as in Quebec, have got a work to do along these lines in regard to the ministers of other churches, because in the last election we had a very sad condition arise. We found that ministers of the Gospel did not confine themselves to advocating principles, but they stood up on the Sunday before election day and told their flocks for which party they were to cast their votes. Now, I am no enemy to the Christian church; I hope I am a humble member of that body. I remember on the Sunday morning before election day that in a church in the county in which I was running a certain circular letter—a mandement we would call it if it came from a bishop in our province—came from a certain committee on social and moral reform of a very great church in this country, and those ministers who read it exhorted their flock to vote for one political party rather than another. That happened on the Sabbath morning. I did not go to church that morning; I thought there was going to be something like that, and I thought I would rather not hear it or be tempted to walk out, as a number did do on that morning. In the evening I went to church, and there the minister prayed the Lord for guidance for the people that they should vote in the way that their conscience and mind dictated, and you could not tell from his sermon whether he was going to vote for me or for my adversary, and I do not know which way he voted. That was the proper attitude for a clergyman to take. This question of clerical interference in politics touches very closely the subject we are now discussing, for women are more religious animals than men are, and are more likely to be affected by either the priest or the minister. Now, I trust that we shall have no more of this in Canadian elections. I trust that the ministers and the priests of all churches will see to it that they render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.

Now these are two points against woman's suffrage on the surface; I do not think they go down to the root of the matter. I am in favour of the principle of this Bill. The husband and wife may disagree even if one of them has not got the vote. The fact that both of them have the vote may lead the husband to endeavour to convert the wife. It will be worth while, for she will have a vote. And the wife, of course, will not cease her efforts to convert the husband. The unbelieving husband may be saved by the believing wife, and the unbelieving wife may be saved by the believing husband. And, as regards clerical domination, it is just as well for women to have the vote, because that will raise them in their own self-respect and it will make them in time less prone to take political direction from their husbands, or their ministers, or anybody else.

What are the arguments that can be, and have been, brought forward against giving women the vote? There is the argument that woman is queen of the home. I often think she is more really queen of the dishpan or of the washtub. The idea that a woman sits regally enthroned by the fireside is very pretty, but it is not according to facts, because, as a rule, women have to work longer hours, go through greater drudgery, and enjoy fewer holidays than men do. The idea that women are going to be in any way lowered by mixing in politics does no credit to the political atmosphere of this country. If our political atmosphere is low we must endeavour to raise it to make it worthy of the women we are admitting to our ranks to-night. It has been suggested that women will have to go to political meetings. Of course they will. I will say that they go to political meetings already; they certainly do in the county which I have the honour to represent. So far as the children are concerned, I have seen a grandmother come along with a daughter, accompanying the father and with a tiny baby who was placed on the schoolhouse desk and who slept peacefully all through the meeing.

An hon. MEMBER: Small families.

Mr. McMASTER: Small families, my hon. friend says. Political meetings do not come along at all times. Most women do their own work, and are very busy, but most are able sometimes to get out to church even in the country districts. They are able to attend social functions at times, and there is no reason why they should not attend political meetings when they want to. It is for us to see that political meetings are conducted with such fairness and decorum that it will be an honour for women to attend them. I believe that their presence always tends to make debate more moderate. And let me say this, Mr. Chairman, politics will not become less bitter when the ladies come into it. We saw that very plainly in the last election. The ladies are often prone to bring a personal element into a discussion which men do not. But that is possibly due to their training; possibly after they have been voting for some time they may tend to view matters from not such a close personal point of view.

Now, I would not like hon. gentlemen opposite to think that because certain of us from the province of Quebec are not in favour of woman suffrage we are any less gallant than the rest of the country, because that is not so. The reason for it is that in the province of Quebec the woman in the family occupies as high a position and is as much looked up to—more looked up to—than anywhere else in the Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McMASTER: I will say as much; we won't make any invidious distinctions. What I mean is this: I believe that the inhabitant of the province of Quebec is as prone to consult his wife and to be guided by her opinion on every important transaction in life as people are anywhere else in the Dominion of Canada. I think that perhaps one reason why there has been no demand among the vast majority of the women of Quebec for the vote—and that is absolutely true, there has been no great demand from the women of the province for the vote—is because they have had a very large influence in politics and in social life through the simple fact of their position as wife and mother. There is no place in the wide world where family ties are stronger, where father and mother receive more affection and more respect, than in the province of Quebec. The law of that province creates a partnership between man and wife. All the movable property—the personality, as you would say in the English-law provinces—which either of the consorts owned at the time of marriage goes into the partnership fund. All real estate which they acquire during the marriage falls into the community property; that is, generally speaking, there are exceptions. During the marriage the husband controls that community property, but when he dies he can only will half of it away; the wife who survives the husband becomes immediately the owner of half the joint acquisitions which have been made during the lifetime of the husband, the theory of the law being that the wife by her work in the house and by her prudence and economy does just as much to build up the family fortunes as the man does by his work. There is a statement of law in the province of Quebec that the husband is the "seigneur et maître," that is, lord and master, of the community. But, as our professors told us in college, that is only a legal fiction; the husband is not lord and master of the community; he is the joint partner—the senior partner perhaps only in name, because he has to consult the junior partner all the time. I make this explanation because I do not want hon. gentlemen from other parts of the country to have the impression that we of the province of Quebec wish to keep the women in a place inferior to ourselves. Those gentlemen who have spoken out against the Bill are interpreting in a large measure the views of the women of the province of Quebec who are not anxious for the vote. But my contention is that there are women in the province of Quebec who wish to have the vote, and even if the majority do not want to have it, that is no reason for keeping the vote away from those who want it—and there is no law to compel people to vote who do not want to do so. I am, therefore, in favour of the principle of the Bill.

But I wish to direct the attention of the committee to section 2 of the Bill, which reads as follows:

> 2. This Act shall be construed as one with the Dominion Elections Act, chapter six of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and The War-time Elections Act, chapter thirty-nine of the statutes of 1917, and in each of the said Acts the expression "person" or "male person," or any similar expression, shall include a female person, unless a different meaning is required by the context or by the terms of this Act.

It was with deep regret that I observed this clause in the Bill, because it seems to indicate that the Government propose to keep on the statute book an Act which I consider to be a blot on the fair name of Canada, that is, the War-time Elections Act. This Act was described by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. J. A. Currie) the other evening as having been passed for certain purposes. I read as follows from his remarks, found on page 404 of Hansard:

> As I say, we had to face—

"We" apparently was the last Borden Administration, as distinguished from the present Union Government.

> As I say, we had to face an adverse vote in Quebec and in the West, and men like myself realized that if the Government had gone to the country without first adopting the War-time Elections Act, the control of the country would have been lost to anti-British—

With that statement, of course, I do not agree in any way; there are no anti-British people in this country. We all desire the success of the Allies; we all have affection and respect for the Motherland, and although we may differ as to the best means to a given end, that does not give hon. gentlemen opposite the right to infer that we are anti-British or anything of that kind. (Reading):

> Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.
> Mr. CURRIE: The control of this country would have been lost by the British element and handed over to the anti-British element for the next twenty-five years.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is quoting from another debate which is not allowed by the rules of the House.

Mr. McMASTER: If I am not allowed to quote further from the debate, I certainly will not do so.

The CHAIRMAN: A member cannot quote from a previous debate during the same session but reference to a previous debate by way of illustration only, would be considered in order.

Mr. McMASTER: That is to say, I may rely on my memory, but not on the written words. Well, my memory is that the member for North Simcoe stated in very emphatic terms that this Government owed its election to the War-time Elections Act; that without it, this Government would have been defeated. Moreover, the hon. member justified the War-time Elections Act on the ground that without it the country would have passed into the control of anti-British people. That is what he said—I do not agree with him. What I would not hopefully, but very respectfully and very earnestly, ask the Government to do is to strike out from this Bill any reference to the War-time Elections Act. Why should a woman from Switzerland or some other part of Europe whose language is German, but who is a true Canadian woman, not have the right to vote? Under the War-time Elections Act a man who came from a country at peace with us, but whose native language was German, lost his vote. I do not wish to go into this matter at length, but I know that other gentlemen sitting opposite think with me that the War-time Elections Act is a blot on the fair name of Canada, and should be removed. We do not wish to see the conferring of the franchise on women tarnished by the restrictions on their voting which are imposed by the War-time Elections Act. The other day Mr. Asquith addressing his constituents at Cupar, Scotland, said that he felt sure of the success of the Allies in this war because the great spiritual forces of righteousness were fighting for us. The War-time Elections Act was morally wrong; it took away from people who were as loyal to Canada as any of us the right to vote just because they happened to come years ago from countries with which we are now at war. Bohemians, Ruthenians, people who had no sympathy at all with our enemies, were deprived of the right to vote. It was not right; it may have been expedient, but I belong to the school of political thought which believes that honour, justice and righteousness are stronger than expediency. I believe that we shall be on the side of the great spiritual forces fighting for righteousness if we, the common people, in Parliament assembled, see to it that in granting the franchise to women, we take away the stain from the Canadian shield and escutcheon by wiping off the War-time Elections Act.

Mr. GLASS: In rising to say a few words in this debate, I do not presume that I shall be able, at this late hour, to contribute any new thought or add to the arguments in favour of granting the franchise to women. But if I did not place myself on record as being in favour of woman suffrage, I feel I should not be doing my duty to the noble women of the district which I represent, who have rendered such splendid service to the nation during these four years of war. I have listened with some interest to my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster), and, for a moment, I was hardly able to understand whither he was drifting. He gave two outstanding objections to granting the franchise to women, first, that it would create friction at election time, and, secondly, that it would enormously increase the power of the church. If his opinion in that respect were correct, I am at a loss to understand why he drifted to the other angle later on. I am reminded of a homely story which, while it may be an old one, is very apropos. A couple of tramps travelling through the country arrived at the gate of a farm where a large collie dog, in his happy, or, as it might have been, unhappy way, was wagging his tail, and at the same time growling and showing his teeth. These men wished to go to the farmer's house so that they might get something to eat. Henry was a little in advance, and Pat was a little in the rear. Pat said to Henry, "Go on, he will not bite you; he is a good-natured old fellow; can't you see he is a-waggin' of his tail." "But," said Henry, "he is also a showing of his teeth, and blest if I know which end to believe."

During a period of many years women have been more or less engaged in election contests in the province of Ontario, and I cannot agree with my hon. friend that the granting of the Dominion franchise to them is liable to cause family friction. I would respect and honour my wife quite as much even if her opinion differed from mine. My hon. friend refers to the possibility of the wife trying to convert the husband and the husband trying to convert the wife. I suppose, under such circumstances, if they were pulling apart and were settled in their views, neither one could be converted. I am reminded of an incident of a public man, a politician, who was on one occasion accosted by a suffragette and asked for his opinion on woman suffrage. He was very ready to answer her question. He said, "Yes, my dear lady, I go further than believing in woman suffrage; I maintain that men and women are equal in every respect." The lady's reply was, "Now, Professor, are you not bragging?"

I have found, in the activities of our women during recent years, that woman has measured up in her powers and capacity for assuming responsibility in every respect equal to man. Let me give an illustration to show the quality of intellect and the capacity of women even amongst the girls of our schools. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Greater Resources Committee of the province of Ontario, in which it is attempted to show how the boys and the girls in that province assisted in the great work of production last year. In connection with that work a competition was held amongst the schools in the different counties. In each school where the competition took place there were offered first, second and third prizes. The object of the competition was to have the boys and girls write an essay showing the best way in which greater production could be assisted by the co-operation of boys and girls. I find that in one competition, out of the three prizes given, a girl won the first and a girl won the third. I was interested enough to look into the pamphlet further, and I found that in the schools of the province in which the competitions were held, of the first prizes won, 96 went to the girls and 50 to the boys, and out of the total number of prizes, first, second and third, 206 went to girls and 180 to the boys. Some time ago the Canadian Municipal World had an article written by Miss Agnes Chesley, in which she was answering the arguments of Dr. James Murray, who, amongst other points of opposition to woman suffrage, brought forward the following: First, that when the franchise had been extended to women they had not shown an interest in the work; second, that they had not recorded their votes in the proportion that was expected of them. Miss Chesley went on to show that this argument was not borne out by facts. She said:

In New Zealand, according to the latest returns, 82 per cent of the women voted as against 84 of the men. In Australia 57 per cent of the women voted as against 68 of the men. Practically all the women registered, and the percentage of women voters was higher in the settled districts and lower in the unsettled, as might be expected. It is not difficult to understand, in places where the voters have to travel, that it is easier for the men to go than for the women.

She stated further:

In Wyoming, 80 to 90 per cent of the women vote; in Colorado 75 to 85 per cent vote; in Utah, 85 to 90 per cent. In Washington 85 to 95 per cent; in California, a splendid percentage, 90 to 99, and so on through the list. Statistics show conclusively that where women have the vote they do use it.

Miss Chesley at that time undertook to make a report as to the conditions in the province of Quebec, to which my hon. friend has referred. She said that at the civic election held at Montreal previous to the writing of the article—that is, at the last election—the Montreal Local Council of Women undertook to get out the women's vote. She continues:

So successfully did they accomplish their big undertaking that the percentage voting was very high, in one ward reaching 90 per cent. I wonder if any ward would show such a high percentage of men voting! At one civil election in a ward of this city, 25 per cent of the men voted. Talk about the apathy of the women! The women of Montreal are vastly more interested in municipal affairs than the men.

If women in that part of the province have manifested such an interest in municipal affairs, it is only natural to conclude that they will manifest a similar degree of interest in the larger sphere of provincial and Dominion affairs. There will be all the more reason as the years go by for the influence of the women in our public affairs, because many of the things on which the provinces will have to legislate go very closely home to the people. The article goes on:

Suppose we now examine a few more of Mr. Murray's preposterous statements and see if they are also based on ignorance. "Even in matters affecting the lives of women and children, the women voters have shown little interest," he says. This is the apotheosis of ignorant dogmatism. The very smallest enquiry into facts would have stopped any pen from making such a statement. I can go over country after country where women have the vote, and the unanimous testimony of the wisest and best is that the women's vote has invariably been used for his very thing:—the betterment of the conditions under which women and children live. Judge Lindsay writes, "We have in Colorado the most advanced laws of any state in the union for the care and protection of the home and the children, the very foundations of the Republic. We owe this more to Woman Suffrage than to any other one cause." Turning to our own British Empire, Sir John Cockburn writes, after an experience of nearly twenty years in Australia: "It may be safely affirmed that the inclusion of women in the electorate has greatly facilitated the passage of laws safeguarding the welfare of children and women and removing temptations from the path of men."

It is not necessary to quote such statements, because we have other evidence. No statesmen dare say on the floor of the legislature in those provinces where the franchise has been extended to women that it was a mistake. I believe that giving women the vote will raise politics to a higher plane—to a plane which as my right hon. friend has said, would justify women taking a more active interest in public affairs. If our country is growing better, and we think it is growing better from day to day, every move that has been made for a higher civilization and better ideals of citizenship has been due, to a large extent, to the influence of the women behind it. The moral laws, the laws of right, the laws which provide for better care and protection of the home and for better citizenship, have been largely the result of women's influence.

I congratulate the Prime Minister on introducing this Bill at this time. Some hon. gentlemen think this an inappropriate time, but in view of what woman has done for the state in this crisis, in view of her activities and the real serviceable work which she has done, and which has meant so much, I think this House dare not longer deny her the right which, in my opinion, should have been granted many years ago. I believe that in supporting this measure, as I propose to do, I shall be unanimously endorsed by the electors whom I represent.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I am unequivocally in favour of the principle of this Bill. Among the many reasons I have for supporting this Bill, the first is that my mother was a woman, my wife was a woman, and the old Queen Victoria was a woman, and so was Queen Elizabeth; and if there are any two individuals on the earth who have demonstrated the fact that women can exercise public functions wisely it is these two great queens who have given to their several eras their names—so that we speak of the Elizabethan period and the Victorian era. I think there is no question as to the capacity of women to exercise the functions which the franchise will confer on them. Slavery always degrades, and woman has been a slave in this country, in a political sense, until the western provinces gave the franchise to women. Giving the franchise to women will develop public spirit, on the same principle that it developed public spirit in the non-property owner. I am surprised at some of my hon. friends telling us we ought to go back and listen to what the French people and the English people did away back in the night of time. We need not go back to the night of time. It is only a very few years ago that the Roman Catholics in this country and in all the British possessions did not have the franchise.

There is another thing I want to point out. If you give the franchise to any section of the Dominion, it does not follow that the women have to exercise the franchise. The greater includes the less. It is not as if we were taking something away from them; we are giving something to them, which they can use if they like, and if they don't like they can stop home. There is nothing compulsory about it. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier), I think, made use of a fallacy. He was afraid the birth rate would decline if we gave the franchise to women, but at the same time he told us that in old France they did not give the franchise to women. I am speaking of this to show that giving or withholding the franchise has nothing whatever to do with the birth rate. The people of old France, in my judgment, are the first and the only people who have solved the great question of modern civilization in regard to the birth rate. The people of Quebec have followed quite a different policy; they have been increasing their birth rate while the French in the old country have decreased theirs; and there were political reasons for that, and not only political reasons but scientific and national and social reasons.

I say that the great French nation, so far as civilization is concerned, stands ahead of every nation in the world. People of this country do not seem to realize that our present civilization and our present democracy are absolutely new. Why, the world has only been fit to live in for about fifty years as a matter of fact. The reason we have this democracy and this civilization is because of the relief of the congestion of the populations of Europe by the discovery of America, and the giving room for the people, and giving them time to think. The man who is pressed against the limit in the matter of subsistence cannot become civilized. The man who gets up in the morning and looks for a snake for his wife's breakfast cannot become civilized. Our present civilization depends upon our present democracy, and our present democracy is absolutely the result of immunity from pressing want. But what has happened? What induced this war? This war is more or less the direct result of over-population. The Empire of Germany in my time—and I am not a very old man—and in the lifetime of nearly every hon. gentleman sitting in this House has doubled its population. Since the Franco-Prussian War, 40 odd years ago, their population has doubled. Now, remember the population increases in a geometrical ratio. I am using that term in contradistinction to an arithmetical ratio. Take Germany as an illustration. The German population in forty years rose from forty millions to eighty millions. In the next forty years it will be one hundred and sixty millions and the following forty years it will be three hundred and twenty millions. What about the forty years following! It would be six hundred and forty millions. North of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, at the beginning of this century, we had one hundred million people, in Canada and the United States. In thirty years that population will be doubled, and we will have two hundred millions; in sixty years, four hundred millions; in ninety years eight hundred millions. Given peace, plenty and immunity from epidemics, and there will be nearly twice that many, if Quebec keeps at it at the present rate. According to Malthus, the population of the Anglo-Celtic people, given peace, plenty and immunity from epidemics, will double itself every twenty-five years. Get to work with your pencils and paper and figure out what that means, and think of what the future has in store for the civilized nations of the world. At the same time, remember that I am not discouraging the increasing population. I do not want to do that; Canada is a new, great country, almost illimitable, in one sense of the word, and the first duty of Canadian statesmen is to occupy that land, and make it a white man's country. Another duty we owe, and especially we owe it to the people of this country immediately after the war, is to get as many people in here as we possibly can, so that they will divide up the tremendous public debt, and thereby lessen the debtb per capita, otherwise, we will all have to go out of the country. These are little suggestions, but I should like the House to sit up and take notice, and look to the future, because, as a matter of fact, we do not want to live on a smouldering volcano and not know it is there.

There are some other little points made. Some gentlemen said that women were not the equal of men. Why is that? Simply because they have not the franchise. If you give the women the franchise, I venture to say that in twenty years they will have just as much public spirit as the men, and be just as capable of exercising the franchise, because there is nothing like freedom, nothing like liberty, and nothing like giving people their rights, if you want to develop their character, but you must develop it along lines of self-reliance and not make slaves of them, because slavery always degrades.

Speaking about the influence that the church will have upon women, give them the franchise, and that will obviate the very difficulty that my hon. friend feared; because once the women get the franchise, they will develop the same as the men. It is because women have been driven out of public life and out of taking an interest in the affairs of the country, that they have been driven to patronize the theatre matinee and the five o'clock tea, when they would be a great deal better out of such places. At the same time, I want to draw the attention of the hon. leader of the Government to a principle which I think he would be well advised, and the Government be well advised, to recognize, and that is they should not be showing too many red rags to a bull. The Quebec people are sensitive; they are as fine a class of people as there are to-day in Canada, or any part of the world for that matter, but they are sensitive, and when they see a measure before this House, whether it is a conscription Bill, or Woman's Suffrage Bill, at an inopportune time, they necessarily think that it is aimed at Quebec, particularly if it has that colour. That is what it looks like to a good many of my friends. They feel this legislation is aimed primarily at the province of Quebec, because they do not happen to have women suffrage or for some other reason. I am not going into the generic reasons, because you will recognize the situation as well as I do. That is one of the principal reasons why hon. gentlemen on this side of the House criticise the Bill more severely than they would if my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had introduced it. I want to warn the Government to be careful and not irritate any class of people in this country. The truth of the matter is this is a young country, and the inhabitants are not homogeneous. But they will become so if you leave them alone. And another thing, if you want to crystallize certain things that you think are evils, persecute the people, because persecution defeats the very end the persecutors have in view. You cannot get a better illustration of that than Old Ireland, where the southern part of Ireland has been persecuted—

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to come nearer the subject-matter of the Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: This is very apropos of the Bill. We will leave that alone, however. I was speaking about the Bill and the feeling that my friends on this side of the House have towards it. They feel that it was aimed primarily at the province of Quebec. Let us do away, as far as possible, with this irritation, and I am satisfied the Bill will pass if put to a vote. I do not know that it is worth while for me to speak any further on the subject. I could take up a great many other subjects touching this Bill, but I am anxious to see the Bill become law. However, it is all right to stop at this late hour.

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Chairman, I have never been a believer in the divine right of kings, nor am I a believer in the divine right of men to the franchise. I think women have just the same right to the franchise as men have. It has always been my belief that when Adam gave his rib for the creation of Eve he lost the best rib he had and possibly a good deal of his backbone with it. We are going to give women the franchise. We have no right to withhold it from them and never had. The only fault I have to find with this franchise Bill is that it is a sort of skim-milk proposition. It is siamesed with the War-time Elections Act, and I think that phase of it is objectionable. I think that is practically the only objectionable feature to my hon. friends on this side of the House, or the other side, because there was just as much objection to that phase of it from the other side, when it was last in committee, as there has been from this side. I would like to call attention to the fact that the best speech made in French in favour of the Bill to-day was made on this side of the House by a Quebec member, and I think the best speech in opposition to it was also made on this side. My hon. lessen the debt per capita, otherwise, we favour of the Bill; so are any number of gentlemen on this side. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) was not justified in suggesting that the opposition to the Bill was actuated by a political motive or in talking about eighty-five members on this side of the House defeating a hundred and fifty members on the other side. That was only talking to the gallery, or the press, or his constituents. There is no good reason to my mind why women should not have the franchise. They are just as intelligent and as capable of voting as men are. The women of the constituency which I represent polled a very large vote in the last election. I got more votes in the last election than the combined votes of the candidates in the previous election; so that the women must be voting intelligently. That is another argument that is very much in favour of woman suffrage. I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member from East York (Mr. Foster) when he was explaining the inner workings of the Tory mind and suggesting that it was a good thing to offer the women this inducement. I am satisfied that the women, being honest and honourable, will naturally turn to the honest party in the country and of course this measure must be of great benefit to the Liberals of Canada.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's, Montreal) (translation): Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I heard the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) express his astonishment that the province of Quebec should be opposed to granting women the franchise. I appreciate his position—which is of a very particular nature—and if the hon. member fails to fully grasp our objections to this Bill, it may result from the fact that he is in the very midst of his honeymoon.

Mr. Chairman, we are not opposed to women obtaining the vote in the other provinces; on the contrary, we believe their mind to be ripe for this reform, as folks are pleased to call it. And if we are opposed to this law it is not because we consider the women of Quebec less intelligent than those in the other provinces; on the contrary we are convinced that they are just as well able as any one to judge political questions at their true value and will use their ballot with both enlightenment and intelligence. But we are opposed to this law because we fail to see, clearly, in what way, from a social point of view, it will improve the situation in our province.

We may well ask ourselves, in the first place, whether or not the women of Quebec have any desire to be admitted to the voting-booth. To this question, Mr. Chairman, we are in a position to give an exact reply, because we have just come from meeting with our constituents in every county of the province, and we may state, in full sincerity, that all the women of the province are strongly opposed to being saddled with the responsibility of the ballot, a burden which they find too heavy for their delicate shoulders.

During the last election campaign we had the opportunity to ascertain whether or not the franchise does improve woman's status, socially. Well, what took place? When the Patriotic Fund was organized, in the very first days of the war, it had been understood that the Fund, which was subscribed to by all the citizens of Montreal, irrespective of race or party, would in no way interfere with forthcoming election contests. That is to say: the Patriotic Fund was entirely neutral in the matter of politics. Now, what happened? At the December elections we saw women, who belonged to this organization, soliciting votes for the Government; we even saw them go from door to door and some of them went so far as to offer money. More than that, Mr. Chairman, on the very day of the election, they organized a Unionist masquerade. In the district of St. Henri-Westmount we saw a certain group of women who were entitled to vote, spend nearly the whole day in the different polls so as to prevent citizens from voting, by making them believe that the polls were overcrowded with people awaiting their turn to mark their ballots.

Such, gentlemen, are the results of the first trial of this granting to women the privilege of the ballot. Now, we are opposed to this proposal of woman suffrage because we find that it is contrary to the character and the temperament of our women in the province of Quebec.

We believe that the sentimental side of their nature is so developed that this would expose them to many dangers.

I will cite only one instance to show that the sentimental side of woman can often be at fault. Last winter, I believe it was, we witnessed an association of women, moved by the imperialist spirit, decreeing, after due deliberation, that an honest citizen, who was exercising his right of free speech,—that is what Mr. Armand Lavergne was doing,—should be thrown into prison.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask you, was this young man, in taking advantage of his freedom to express his opinions, doing anything else than these women themselves?

He was their best friend, and they wanted, at the time to encroach on his liberty. I wish to draw their attention to the fact that the principles of Armand Lavergne were their own principles in 1911, that he has always been consistent in his manner of reasoning and in 1918 continues to profess the opinions he expressed in 1911. Which all goes to show that nerves are at times unduly influenced and that it is not prudent to grant them a privilege like the franchise.

Now, we are told, as an argument, as a reason, that this is being done all over the world, that it is a well-established current of opinion, in a word, that we need something new in this country. I will admit that we do not require novelty; but, at this time, when thousands of our Canadians are falling on the fields of Flanders; at this time, when those who return to us are disabled, mutilated or contaminated, it is at least strange that we should be presented with this proposal of replacing the family spirit in our country by the spirit of the hustings.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is not by making speeches, it is not by writing articles in the newspapers, nor with lectures, nor with poetry, that, under the present circumstances, the family spirit, which is certainly the most precious for us to nurture, can be replaced.

I must draw your attention to the fact that in the province of Quebec we are not relying on immigration to increase our population; besides I find this hope unfounded even in the other provinces. I must tell those who hear me, that at the present time the gates are closed against immigration. It is not the United States who, after the war, will allow their subjects to come and colonize a depopulated Canada; it is not France nor England assuredly; and still less, devastated Belgium and ruined Serbia. No, Mr. Chairman. Moreover, a barrier will surely be established in this Dominion.

We have a last hope: the immigration of the yellow races; but we fear the yellow peril. If our friends in the other provinces are hankering after this immigration, that is their own affair; but, for our part, we are opposed to having this race enter the country. We claim that the French Canadian cannot be replaced by a Chinaman; and neither can the English Canadian be replaced in this Dominion by a Chinaman.

Mr. Chairman, I will not go on very long, as the hour is late and a number of speakers have eloquently dealt with the subject; but I must say that, to my mind, politics and the home are two incompatible things.

By granting the franchise to women we will, in a way, oblige them to become well-informed so as to cast their vote in an enlightened manner; in a way we will force them, in order to gather this information, to read all sorts of things; we will oblige them to desert their homes and go to clubs in search of information; we will oblige them to be present at meetings; and we, who have the habit of considering our women with the greatest respect, will be pained to see them set off, bound for those common meeting-places where, perchance, they will leave a little of their reputation.

I do not share the opinion of the English philosopher, Stuart Mill, who maintains that the rôle of woman throughout her whole life is to drag the chains put on her by her husband, for this opinion is absolutely false.

However, I do not say that such a thing could not happen amongst those who are not really married.

This Bill is presented to the House in the shape of a reward. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, how we can accept this reward when it means the imposition upon woman of a heavy responsibility which will force her to leave her home to go to rallies, to leave her family, to leave her household duties, so as to fulfil a duty which is far too arduous for her character, her habits and her delicate temperament.

Now, if I understand aright, this Bill is presented to the House as a reward or as a token of gratitude for the services rendered by Canadian women to the divers organizations having for their object the relief of our soldiers and of their families during the present war.

I wish to point out to the hon. Prime Minister that, if such be the end he has in view, there are other means of proving his gratitude to the women of our province, means far more effective than the ballot, which will never dry the tears of so many bereaved mothers, nor soothe the deep wounds left in their hearts by the absence of their sons on the firing-line. This franchise will not console our old men who, because their sons have gone, are forced to bend their backs to labour so as to earn, by the sweat of their brow, a bit of miserable war-bread. No, Mr. Chairman, if the Prime Minister wishes to reward the devotion of our Quebec women to patriotic undertakings, let him give them back their sons, the object of all their tenderness and their sole interest in life. I may assure him that this form of reward from the Government would be much more appreciated by them.

So I say, in closing, that I am opposed to this Bill, first because it is against Nature, and next because it turns the established social order upside down. Each tree must bear its own fruit and no other. The mission that woman is called upon to fulfil is absolutely incompatible with the rôle which this Bill seeks to foist upon her.

I make bold to hope that the observations made against the Bill will be accepted in good part by the Government. As regards myself, I am convinced that the province of Quebec is not ready to accept this change. Things may be different in the other provinces and against that, we, in the province of Quebec have no objection; but we maintain that it is for the provincial governments exclusively to decide this question. To them belongs the privilege of preparing the voters' lists; and when the province of Quebec is ready to adopt such a radical change she will not fail to take advantage of this privilege, which will put her on the same footing as the other provinces. For the time being, I do not hestitate to say that this Bill shows a very bad policy and constitutes an abuse of power, since it takes a prerogative away from the provinces and gives it to the central authority.

Mr. J. E. LESAGE (Hochelaga): Mr Chairman, it was not my intention to say anything on this subject, but I think it is a duty to my constituents to express my opinion on the Bill. There have been many arguments for and against this measure which have their value and deserve great consideration. I do not think it is necessary to cover the subject as thoroughly as many of the preceding speakers, but I merely want to call attention to certain details, and to explain the reason why I am against this Bill. This question of franchise, if you will look at it in a political way, may suit some localities and certain persons, but I do not think you can advance any reason which will modify in any way the nature of women. I have seen in the United States women elected on school boards. I can very well understand the reason for that, but there I think you will admit they were elected by the people as mothers, not as politicians, in order that they might come in closer contact with the children in the schools. I understand that in that sphere they were very useful following up the work which they had begun at home. In all ages we have found women in hospitals as nurses; we find them in this war taking care of the wounded soldiers at the front, but always as women, not as politicians. It was within their sphere to follow these different occupations and to perform work appropriate to women. They have done more. It has been mentioned here that they have taken the place of men in the field and in the factory. I can understand that very well. It was the duty of everybody to do what was possible to help win the war. The women did it willingly, they are still doing it in many places, but I am very sure that it was more because of the compulsion of events, and that they will be glad to be relieved when their duty is over and to return where they belong, in the home. It is all very good, Mr. Chairman, to talk of privileges and to bring forward the argument that, because they have done so much for the country, they deserve the right to vote. I believe the natural franchise which belongs to them, and the only one for me is the franchise at home. One hon. member has told us that politics stirs up passion and emotions. The two go together. I believe that if politics leads to these ends, we had better keep our wives at home and the passion there with them. In the province of Quebec, I know very well, as has been stated here, there has not been any particular movement or demand for this franchise. I am sure that the women would exercise it in that province as well as they would anywhere else. But there is one thing sure: if men feel political life to be a burden sometimes, and find that it is a sphere in which one goes deeper and deeper, if you give women the privilege of voting and deciding upon political questions I am much afraid that the privilege will expand a great deal further than it is supposed to do, and I think there will be a revolution in our ideals which will be incompatible with ideals of home life. And that is one reason why I do not agree with the principle of this Bill. I remember that a candidate in one of the counties in Quebec in a certain election was very surprised at being defeated, and all his friends told him after the election: "We loved you so much that we wanted to keep out at home." I love the women so much that I want to do likewise. Allow me to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that in my business I am in close daily contact with them; I know that they want to be respected, and that they should be respected, and I believe I would vote against the Bill, to keep them at home. I have nothing more to add, but, as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) stated, as an argument for the Bill, that the emotion was so great at one time in his last campaign that even women with little babies came to political meetings, I am of opinion that that is an argument against the franchise. I do not believe that common decency would allow that as an argument for a Bill. There is a limit to everything. It shows an abuse that should be corrected. I do not think that women, enjoying all the rights and privileges which they do, should expect to have the right to vote at this moment.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I promised the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) that I would see him next.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The only reason I desire to speak is that reference has been made to me this evening——

Mr. JOHNSTON: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. The reason I rise at this late hour is because I come from a province where the women may rightly be termed electors. At the time of the last election, I want to point out to the Government, these women in the province of Saskatchewan and in the constituency which I have the honour to represent who had been privileged to exercise the franchise in June of last year and were denied that privilege in December of the same year, do not feel very kindly toward the Government who put them in that position. I notice that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) attached some significance to the fact that in clause 2 of the Bill there is a reference made to the War-time Elections Act. Personally, I am content to accept the statement made by the Prime Minister the other day about this matter in connection with the War-time Elections Act. If I thought that by endorsing this Bill I was in any way endorsing the War-time Elections Act, my vote would certainly be registered against it.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I come from a province where the women have the franchise in the provincial sense at the present time. I was struck with the remark made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). He said that if a candidate in the province of Quebec could be sure of the support of the women he would be all right. That remark carried some little significance to my mind; that the hon. gentlemen to the left of you, Mr. Chairman, who have been opposing this Bill are not in the happy position of commanding the support of the women of the province of Quebec. But my mind was disabused of that thought by the explanation given to the committee by the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), who showed us that in his constituency the women had been enfranchised to a considerable degree, and that they used the franchise.

The women of Saskatchewan—I speak only for those in my own constituency—are looking for just such a measure as this. To my mind they are entitled to it in every sense of the word, and should have had it at the last election, if for no other reason than as a reward for good citizenship, proof of which we have seen ever since this great war began. As evidence of the unfairness of the enfranchisement of some of our women as against the enfranchisement of all, I may point out that nearly all the women of the small village in which I live who have given their time to war work have no sons to send overseas. They worked hard; they burned midnight oil, doing all they could in the way of Red Cross work, knitting socks, and so on; but they were not permitted to cast their vote in the election of last December, while those who happened to have sons overseas and were not in a position, perhaps, to do so much war work, were enfranchised. These things brought home to fair-minded men and women the unfairness of the War-time Election Act.

Some at least of those who oppose this measure must do so from a selfish motive. Often when a man marries a woman he expects her to bury her individuality and merge it with his. But we cannot build up a strong citizenship in this Dominion by building up one-half of our people; we must build up all classes in order to make the development complete. I am guided in my support of this Bill by the old axiom, "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none," and I believe that hon. gentlemen who have opposed the Bill have not been acting in the best interests of the whole of Canada. I hope that when the time comes I shall have the privilege of voting for this Bill, and also of voting to wipe off the statute book of Canada the War-time Elections Act. The people whom I represent have sent me here to do that. Other matters, I have been told, are to rest in abeyance during the war, and I shall not take up the time of the Committee by discussing them now. I am heartily in favour of this Bill.

Mr. MAHARG: Mr. Chairman, were it not for the anxiety that seems to prevail among a number of hon. gentlemen on the other side, I should not have attempted to say anything to-night. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, seem to have been living in an atmosphere of terror almost ever since the opening of this session. They seem to dread the effect of every measure that is proposed, and I wish to attempt to relieve their minds with regard to what they deem to be the probable effects of the legislation which we are now considering.

In Saskatchewan, women have voted in provincial and Dominion elections, and I have been unable to detect any trace of difficulty. If domestic affairs have been adversely effected by giving women the vote, the difficulty lies not with the woman but with the man of the household. Up to the present time the male electors have been giving the franchise to the women, and if they turn round and create trouble in the household, surely it is their own fault.

The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) laid particular stress on provincial autonomy. I agree that we should have provincial autonomy wherever it is advisable, but there is a point where we must draw the line. I desire to emphasize this fact: in all our provinces there have been cesspools of iniquity for the removal of which the vote of the women is necessary. In this respect, then, the limit of provincial autonomy is reached; the Dominion Government must step in and provide legislation whereby such cesspools may be prevented or removed. Our experience in western Canada is conclusive proof that the extension of the franchise to women has been the means of clearing up some of these cesspools of iniquity. I may refer, in the first place, to the almost entire removal of the liquor traffic from Canada. This movement started in a province where the women had the franchise; to the female electorate of the western provinces must go the main credit for this reform. Had the franchise been extended to the women of the province of Quebec two or three years ago there would have been no such evasion of the prohibition law of Ontario as has been evidenced by the traffic across the Ottawa river. The Ontario law did prohibit very largely, but a new vessel was created—called the "self-container," I believe—which worked continuously between the two provinces its particular path being across the bridge that spans the Ottawa river. I shall just go a step further, although this may not be very pleasing to the members of the Cabinet at the present time. Had we had women representatives, not only in this House, but in the Cabinet, this nefarious trafficking in that, I was going to say, damnable stuff—because it is nothing else—would not have been given another lease of life as it was about a month ago. Recently I spent a week end in an Ontario city where I have some friends who are in business and who require the services of draymen to conduct their business. They told me it was absolutely impossible for them to secure the services of draymen because every possible conveyance that could be secured was being used in the distribution of liquor that had been ordered before the first day of April and it had to be delivered before the first of May. They further told me that the draymen had a full month's business. One of these people had a boy under sixteen years of age who is a particular friend of my friends and who comes of a splendid family. If his people had known in what occupation he was engaged, he would not have been allowed to remain there.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. gentleman to come nearer to the subject-matter of the Bill under discussion. I can understand references to temperance legislation by way of illustration, but I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to go into matters connected with the liquor traffic.

Mr. MAHARG: I bow to your ruling, Sir, but the circumstance was so outstanding that, holding the belief I do, that the granting of the franchise to woman is going to have a considerable effect on traffic of that nature—and that is not the only case; there are a great many of them—I could not refrain from giving you the information.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve also spoke about the influence woman has over man, and how she would affect him in his exercise of the franchise. He stated that if he could secure the support of the women he would be quite sure of election. I have on several occasions listened to the sweet, I might say melodious, voice of the hon. gentleman, and I have often wondered how he cultivates such a sweet, soothing voice, but he has given us the explanation himself here to-night. We shall not have to worry about that any longer.

Another point that the hon. gentleman made was that woman should not have the privilege of speaking on either war or peace. His reason for that was her physical condition, that women were not considered physically fit to go to war. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would be consistent, and if he is, his method of reasoning should apply all the way through. I would ask him: Is he going to abide by the Militia Act and allow only those who are physically fit for the ranks of the army to have a vote in this House? If that were the case, how many of the honourable members present would be sitting here to-night to exercise their vote on this particular Bill. I do not think there would be very many. I, at least, would be counted out, because I would be considered beyond the age at which they would take a person for active service. We must at least recognize some field in which women will be on an equality with men.

My hon. friend also made reference to the Liberals always falling into line in so far as provincial autonomy is concerned. My hon. friend may be quite right in that, but the West has been very largely Liberal; it is still Liberal, but it is not of the Liberal school that is always afraid to step out of the old rut when necessity arises. It is of the school that is not afraid to strike out when new conditions arise, and that does not go away back into history as the hon. member for Maisonneuve has done for his references. The Liberal school of western Canada is not of that type, and does not yield to my hon. friend's argument.

Another hon. gentleman spoke of the birth rate decreasing. I do not think we have any cause for worry in regard to the birth rate. That is largely a work of nature. We have reason to worry a little as to whether a child is well born or not, and whether it is surrounded with a suitable environment after it is born. If it is not the work of the mother to study out and suggest legislation, and even to enact legislation, in this case whose work can it be? Surely we can trust that to the mothers. Consequently, to make that work effective, the women must be given the franchise.

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) made one or two references to the ladies. It is difficult for me to understand why some hon. gentlemen have used those references. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) placed women in a class with minors, as it were. He said that we would not allow minors to vote; yet we were going to allow women to vote. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) referred to women as being a more ferocious animal than man. I do not think that can be borne out at all.

Mr. McMASTER: If the hon. member will pardon me, I did not say that woman was a more ferocious animal than man; I said woman was a more religious animal than man.

Mr. MAHARG: I shall take it all back. I should not like to get the hon. member in wrong with the ladies. The hon. member said that political meetings were not fit places for ladies.

Mr. McMASTER: I never said that.

Mr. MAHARG: That statement was made by one of the hon. members.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not want it fastened on me.

Mr. MAHARG: During the recent election campaign, I attended a few political meetings, at practically all of which we had ladies present. At one meeting a gentleman had the nerve to make a silly interjection, and one lady in the meeting silenced him to such an extent that he did not open his mouth during the rest of the meeting. If we had had a lady or two like that present at some of the meetings in some parts of the Dominion of Canada, who could have silenced similar interjectors as well as she did this one it would have been a good thing. I think the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) stated that in Quebec the men had a partnership with their wives. He put that forward to show that the electors of the province of Quebec had done more for the women than the electors of some of the other provinces. I would inform the hon. gentleman that we have similar legislation in our western provinces. We have our dower laws there, and the women are very well satisfied with them. Moreover, they did not have to secure the franchise in order to get those laws; they had them before they received the franchise. I will leave the War-time Elections Act alone for the present, as there will probably be another opportunity to discuss that measure.

Mr. COPP: I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this Bill, although I have the right if I want to, but I do not desire to do so. I have never been very much enamoured of the granting of the franchise to women, but any doubts I had in my mind have been settled by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Maharg). I am going to support the Bill, but I would prefer to have the franchise come from the different provinces. Some of the provinces have already granted the franchise to women, and I understand that legislation will be passed by the New Brunswick legislature next session giving to women the vote. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question on section 1.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it would be better, now that the principle of the Bill has been discussed, to take the Bill up clause by clause, it being well understood that the debate on the second reading is now over, and that we will confine our remarks to the clauses as they come up for discussion.

On section 1—women to be entitled to vote:

Mr. COPP: In the province of New Brunswick it is not one official, but a board of revisers, of three officials, that makes up the lists. I see that paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 1 says that a woman may vote if she is otherwise qualified and "obtains and presents to the official in charge of the preparation or revision of the voters' lists." If the statement was filed with just one of the officials it might not get before the board of revisers at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think under the interpretation clauses the singular includes the plural wherever necessary, but we could put in after the word official the words "or officials." I beg to move that after the word "official" the words "or officials" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: In the province of Quebec the lists in rural municipalities are made up by the clerk of the municipality from the assessment roll and revised by the council sitting as a Court of Review after the lists have been posted for a certain time. We have no enumerators except by virtue of the War-time Elections Act, and if a woman wanted to get on the roll she would have to appeal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have explained three or four times already what perhaps my hon. friend has not observed, that so far as the Dominion Elections Act is concerned, we must provide additional machinery, but that is no urgent at the moment; we need not do that at this session. So far as the War-time Elections Act is concerned the machinery is there, but before using the Dominion Elections Act again we must undoubtedly provide the machinery.

Mr. BUREAU: That machinery would apply only to women voters.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The machinery necessary to enable women to be put on the lists.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought it might be as well to put the machinery in the Act that gives women the franchise.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is quite right, except that the Dominion Elections Act will not come into operation before another session, and therefore we need not trouble about that this session. It would require a good deal of consideration as to how that is to be worked out in the different provinces. We may have to embody in the Dominion Elections Act some such provisions as those which are now in the War-time Elections Act, but probably those could be improved and simplified. We did not want to cumber this Act, which is designed to affirm and carry into effect the principle of giving to women the vote, with the provision of machinery which will not be necessary until the next session of Parliament at least.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the word "said" at the commencement of line thirty is superfluous, and I move that it be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: Why would a certificate as to age be required from a judge of a Superior Court? That is the case of a woman who had become a British subject by marriage, or who had become a British subject, her father being an alien, and naturalized while she was a minor. I do not see how a judge would be in a position to decide such a case.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be a matter for the judge to determine, on such evidence as he might hear. We are following the provisions of the Naturalization Act.

Mr. DECHENE: I understand a certificate would give the lady in question the title of British subject. She is entitled to be considered a British subject, but will not really be one.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If I correctly apprehend the hon. gentleman, I may tell him that this really provides that women who have been naturalized in one of two ways—that is by marrying a British subject, or by the naturalization of the father while the women was herself a minor—shall not be entitled to vote by virtue of that naturalization until they themselves fulfil what would be required by the Naturalization Act, if they made application in their own right. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. DECHENE: Yes, but that is not the point. Take the case of a lady born in Germany coming to this country. She has been here five or six years. She is alone, unmarried, and over twenty years of age. She goes to the judge and asks for a certificate proving she has fulfilled all the requirements of the Naturalization Act. She gets a certificate that she is entitled to British citizenship, and then stops. She does not go through all the procedure required by the naturalization laws. She gets a certificate, and her name is put on the voters' list. A year or so later she goes back to Germany, or some other country, and subsequently returns to Canada. She has not lost her first status, and has the right to vote.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: She has not the right to vote in the case the hon. gentleman puts, because she has never become a naturalized British subject.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think that is the point my hon. friend wished to make. The section of the Bill says:

"and is possessed of all requirements necessary to entitle her, if unmarried, to become naturalized as a British subject, and that she has taken the oath of allegiance.

At one time—I do not know how it is now—we had to post up the name for a certain time, so that, if there were objections to the man seeking naturalization, they could be stated. But my hon. friend (Mr. Déchène) had in mind all the requirements. In the case referred to, the woman may have the residence age and everything, without actually following out all the procedure. She might seek to become a British subject and take the oath of allegiance. The section says: "and that she has taken the oath." In fact, she would be a British subject at the time she presented the certificate.

Mr. SIFTON: She cannot get the certificate unless she is a British subject.

Mr. BUREAU: And the necessary requirements are just surplusage?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It seems to me very plain. She is entitled to vote if she is a British subject whether by birth or by naturalization made on her own application. But if she has become naturalized by reason of naturalization of her husband, by reason of having married a man who was a British subject, or by the naturalization of her father while she was a minor, she must conform to the qualifications set forth.

Section agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before going to the preamble I would like to add a section. I move, seconded by Mr. Sifton, that the following section be added to the Bill:

3. Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, it shall not be necessary by reason of any of the provisions thereof, to prepare new voters' lists for the purpose of any by-election to be held before the 1st day of January, 1919, and in the case of any such bye-election any lawful lists available therefor may be used for the purposes of such by-election to the same extent and with the same validity as if this Act had not been passed.

The intention is that this Act shall go into immediate operation, so far as the preparation of lists in the ordinary course is concerned, but inasmuch as there are lists available for by-elections, it was not thought desirable that it should be necessary under this Act to prepare new lists for by-elections before the first day of January, 1919. In the meantime, I think, in most of the provinces, new lists will have been made, and the Act will have its operation after the preparation of those lists, but new lists are not considered necessary in the case of by-elections.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the meaning of this new amendment?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If there are lists available for any by-election between now and the first of January, it shall not be necessary to make up new lists for the purpose of this Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then the women would not have the right to vote?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They would not have any additional right at any by-election between now and the 1st of January.

Mr. BUREAU: Supposing new lists were made?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It merely says it shall not be necesary to make new lists by reason of anything this Act contains. If they are made in the meantime, well and good, but it shall not be necessary by reason of this Act to make specially any new lists for by-elections before next January.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Suppose by-elections are held in the province of Quebec, the women would not be entitled to vote until January, 1919?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Except in so far as they are upon the lists now available.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, (Minister of Railways and Canals) the House went into committee on the following resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that an employee in the service of His Majesty who is injured, and the dependents of any such employee who is killed, shall be entitled to the same compensation as the employee, or as the dependent of a deceased employee, of a person other than His Majesty would, under similar circumstances, be entitled to receive under the law of the province in which the accident occurred, and the liability for and the amount of such compensation shall be determined in the same manner and by the same Board, officers or authority, or by such other Board, officers or authority or by such Court as the Governor in Council shall direct; and any compensation awarded shall be paid to such employee, or dependents, or to such person, as may be directed by the Board, officer, authority or Court, who may award costs as in cases between private parties in the province where the accident occurred; and any compensation or costs so awarded may be paid by the Minister of Finance out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. J. D. REID: I wish to introduce a Bill, after this resolution is passed, placing not only the employees of Government railways, but all employees in the Government service under the same laws as other railway employees are under in so far as compensation for injury or loss of life is concerned. The Bill will provide that the compensation is to be the same as under the law of the province where the accident occurred.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the object of the resolution is a very proper one. I have no objection to the principle, but I must take decided objection to the manner in which the compensation is to be fixed. It is to be determined —in the same manner and by the same Board, officers or authority, or by such other board, officers or authority or by such court as the Governor in Council shall direct.

This is another instance in which the Governor in Council is assuming jurisdiction which he should not exercise. The board which is to determine the compensation should be fixed by law. However, it is late and I shall not press the point now, but I shall press it upon the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If I understood the minister aright, this law will apply only to provinces where they have a Workmen's Compensation Act. I believe there are four provinces in Canada where there are no such Acts. There is one in Quebec, one in Ontario, I believe one in Manitoba, and one in another of the western provinces. I believe that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have no Workmen's Compensation Acts.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is such an Act in Nova Scotia.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps it is in New Brunswick in which there is no such Act. There are certainly three or four provinces where there is no such Compensation Act.

Mr. TWEEDIE: What are the provinces which have no Compensation Acts?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe that in Prince Edward Island there is no Compensation Act.

Mr. SIFTON: They have one there under which the amount is decided by arbitration and the real object of this resolution is to provide for the appointment of a board in Prince Edward Island instead of submitting the matter to arbitration. All the other provinces have Acts of some kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was told by a gentleman in one of the labour unions that there are four provinces in which there is no such Act.

Mr. SIFTON: There are four provinces in which the Acts are practically identical; there are four provinces which have Acts that they prefer; but all the other provinces have some kind of an Act.

Mr. BUREAU: The object of this resolution is to bring workmen employed on Government railways under the Workmen's Compensation Act of the province. I object to any provision that will require the submission of the case of a man injured on the Canadian Pacific railway to a different court from that to which will be submitted the case of a man injured on the Canadian Northern.

Mr. SIFTON: That is an alternative only.

Mr. BUREAU: I object to the alternative. I want the same court to try every case whether the accident happens on one line or on the other. These two lines run parallel in my constituency for about twenty-five miles, but, notwithstanding that, a case affecting a man employed on the Canadian Northern will be tried before a different tribunal from that which will hear the case of a man injured on the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is not the intention of the Bill at all.

Mr. BUREAU: That is what the resolution says.

Mr. J. D. REID: The intention is that the case affecting a workman employed on a Government railway shall be tried by the same court that will try the case of a man employed on the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. BUREAU: If that is the intention it is all right.

Mr. McMASTER: I trust that the Bill, when brought down, will contain a saving clause to protect all causes of action which have already arisen from the operation of the Act. I have knowledge of one case which is being dealt with by my office. My partner is negotiating with one of the departments to get what we consider an adequate recompense for a widow whose husband was killed. The department had offered just about the amount that they would be liable to under the compensation law of Quebec. We did not think the compensation allowed was sufficient in this case and we have been trying to get a larger allowance. I would not like our rights, or the rights of our clients, to be prejudiced by any legislation adopted in a House of which I was a member.

Mr. J. D. REID: The railway employees would like a Dominion Compensation Act, but that would take a considerable amount of time and I thought it would be well to simply bring in a Bill for this session putting Government railways in exactly the same position as the other railways. When the resolution is passed the Bill will be introduced and it will be printed so that every one will have an opportunity of looking it over. That is the reason I would like to get the resolution through to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will this apply to pending litigation?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no pending litigation.

Mr. TWEEDIE: There is one point in connection with this Bill that will have to receive very careful consideration. Disputes have arisen between different classes of labouring men in the different provinces in regard to interference with common-law rights by reason of compensation Acts. Under the Compensation Act in the province of Ontario, if a workman is injured in the course of his employment he is brought under the Compensation Act, his right to the common law remedy is taken away from him, and his damages are limited to the amount which is fixed by the Act.

Mr. McMASTER: It is practically the same in Quebec.

Mr. TWEEDIE: There is an Act before the legislature of Alberta over which there is the same discussion. Last year, the province of Saskatchewan undertook to amend their Compensation Act along that line, and it was thrown out. My personal opinion is that any Compensation Act which interferes with the common-law rights of the labourer is wrong in principle, because the Compensation Acts fix definitely the amount of damages which can be recovered, and they are fixed in some cases as low as $2,500 in the event of death, and the dependents receiving compensation under that Act are barred from their remedies under the common law. Now, if this Government brings railway employees under the Workmen's Compensation Acts of the various provinces, they should certainly put in a clause which will safeguard to those employees the rights which they have at common law. Until we have the particulars of the Bill before us, it will be unnecessary to discuss this matter, but I want to point this out to the Minister of Railways, because I feel that, if he takes away the common-law rights from the railway employees of Canada he will be introducing legislation which will be very unsatisfactory to them and will, I think, work injustice.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Possibly my hon. friend has not quite grasped the purpose of the resolution. I have had the advantage of discussing it with some—not all—of the labour organizations, and they are exceedingly anxious that it should be passed. More than that, this legislation would not take away any common-law right at all; it is not taking anything away, it is giving something. And in giving the right to compensation, it has been thought desirable, for the present at least, to follow the same lines which have been established under the laws of the several provinces. There is nothing given away, but a right is conferred.

Resolution reported without amendment and read the first and second time.

Hon. J. D. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 51, to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, (Minister of Railways and Canals) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Department of Railways and Canals Act, Chapter 35 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by providing that the stores account of the Canadian Government Railways shall be debited with the cost of materials, equipment and stores purchased, and of work preformed and expenses incurred in connection therewith, together with the cost of establishing, maintaining and conducting the railway stores; and shall be credited with the values of materials, equipment and stores as issued and charged to proper appropriations, or otherwise disposed of; and that the balance to the debit of the said stores account shall not at any time exceed six million dollars.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Railway Act of 1906 contained a section, No. 20, which reads as follows:

Stores accounts as heretofore established in connection with the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway shall, respectively, be debited with the cost of materials, equipment and stores purchased and of work performed and expenses incurred in connection therewith, together with the cost of establishing, maintaining and conducting the railway stores, and shall be credited with the values of materials, equipment and stores as issued and charged to proper appropriations, or otherwise disposed of.

Since that time we have taken over the Transcontinental railway and the International railway, that is to say we have increased the magnitude of the Government railway system. We propose to amend the clause I have just read so that it would apply to the enlarged railway system. Section 21 of the Act reads as follows:

The balance of the debit of the respective stores acounts so established, shall not at any time exceed, for the Intercolonial Railway the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, and for the Prince Edward Island Railway the sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

The object of this Bill is to increase the quantity of the stores that we can have on hand. Owing to the high price of coal and other necessary supplies, it is an impossiblity to operate the roads with the quantity of stores which $1,500,000 will purchase, and, of course, under the Audit Act, We cannot purchase without having a sufficient credit. For that reason this resolution proposes to increase the amount which may be invested in stores from $1,500,000 to $6,000,000. Of course, the system now requires supplies from Port Arthur to Sydney. We have to keep a supply of coal at Port Arthur, for instance, and 100,000 tons at that point at $5 or $6 a ton represents in itself a large proportion of the amount we are asking.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That explanation seems reasonable enough, Mr. Chairman. I hope the hon. minister at a later stage will give us some statistics showing why he has selected the amount of $6,000,000 instead of $2,000,000 or $4,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall give a detailed statement showing the stock on hand at the present time.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the Minister of Railways and Canals lost the Canadian Northern railway again? He does not mention it.

Mr. BUREAU: In the clauses of the Act read by the minister I notice that specific amounts are allocated to the two railways mentioned, $1,500,000 to the Intercolonial, and $100,000 to the Prince Edward Island railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have now a much larger mileage embraced in the Canadian Government Railway system.

Mr. BUREAU: Will a certain proportion of the six million dollars be divided amongst the different roads, so much to the Canadian Northern, and so on?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian Northern railway is being operated under its own charter. This resolution applies only to the railways operated by the Canadian Government and covered by the Railways and Canals Act.

Mr. BUREAU: But the Canadian Northern is the property of the Canadian Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Only when it comes to the matter of making payments.

Resolution reported without amendment, and read the first and second time.

Mr. J. D. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 52, to amend the Department of Railways and Canals Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12.19 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, April 12, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

THE QUEBEC DISTURBANCES.

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF ARMAND LAVERGNE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a report in the Montreal Gazette of to-day purporting to give an account of the inquest held at Quebec yesterday in connection with the Quebec disturbances. The following appears in this report as the evidence of Armand Lavergne::

> They then asked him to go and address the crowd, and as he had previously received the offer to act as chief keeper of records of the M.S.A., in Ottawa, which he had refused, he thought Col. Machin was fully authorized and accepted.

I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether Colonel Lavergne ever offered to act as chief keeper of records of the Military Service Act in Ottawa?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not heard of the matter to which my hon. friend refers; I should be very much surprised if any such statement was made. Inquiry will be made with regard to it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a world of surprises.

THE VICTORY LOAN.

STATEMENT BY ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE OF EXPENDITURE IN CONNECTION THEREWITH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance): Yesterday the leader of the Opposition made inquiry concerning a return asked for on 20th March last in reference to the expenses in connection with the last Victory Loan. As he evidently desires that this information be submitted prior to the introduction of the War Appropriation Bill, I ask the leave of the House to make a statement which I hope will give him the information he desires. The reason the return has not been brought down was that full statements of all expenses in connection with the loan are not available to the department; consequently it is not possible to give to the House the exact information required by the Order referred to. However, I hope to be able to give the House substantially the information asked for, so that the progress of the War Appropriation Bill may not be delayed.

All expenditure in the way of remuneration for services in connection with the loan may be divided into three classes: first, remuneration to co-operating bond dealers and brokers; second, commission to canvassers; third, remuneration to banks.

As to the first, remuneration to co-operating bond dealers and brokers, in this loan the principle of co-operation rather than competition among brokers was adopted in order to organize and cover the whole country as effectively as possible. For this work practically the whole organization of all bond dealers and brokers was employed. The arrangement made by the Minister of Finance in reference to the remuneration of these firms was that at the close of the loan, after consultation with the Dominion Executive Committee and the consideration of any views or recommendations put forward by them, the amount to be paid would be based on the value of the services rendered in connection with the campaign by the several bond dealers and brokers. Some adjustments may yet have to be made, but on April 5th the total payment under this head was approximately $750,000. Additional payments may yet have to be made to brokers. On the other hand, only last week $30,000 was refunded by three of the principal bond houses of Toronto, and a few days ago $2,000 was refunded by the chairman of the chief committee in Saskatchewan. Possibly further refunds may be made of allowances paid to several of the committees throughout the Dominion.

As to commissions to canvassers, I may say that local canvassers were employed to solicit subscriptions and were given certain territory or lists of prospective subscribers to cover. Local canvassers were not permitted to solicit subscriptions from those who had been placed upon the special subscriptions list, which composed all prospective subscribers who, under previous loans, had subscribed for bonds to the amount of $25,000 or over. That is, any persons receiving subscriptions from those who had subscribed for sums of $25,000 or over in previous loans were to receive no commission thereon. Arrangements for the canvassing for subscriptions from these were made by the Special Subscriptions Committee, and no commissions were paid upon the same.

The Dominion Executive Committee was authorized to pay commissions to local canvassers on the following basis:

(a) In all places having a population of more than 10,000, local canvassers were to be paid a commission of ½ of 1 per cent upon all subscriptions obtained by them.

(b) In places having a population of less than 10,000 and in rural sections, canvassers were to be paid one-half of one per cent on all subscriptions obtained in their respective sections, whether secured by the canvassers or placed by subscribers directly with the banks, excluding, of course, subscriptions from the Special List referred to above.

As of April 5, total disbursements for commissions to canvassers were $1,140,813.75.

As to remuneration to banks, a remuneration to chartered banks of one-quarter of one per cent on the total allotment was paid for receiving subscriptions, payments, delivering interim certificates and definite bonds, and cashing coupons during the term of the loan—that is, during the 5, 10 or 20-year loan periods, as the case might be. The total amount paid to the banks for this purpose was $984,395.64. The allotment of the loan reaching $398,000,000 consisted of 5, 10 and 20-year bonds bearing 5½ per cent interest. The issue was made at par with the privilege of deferred payments. It is estimated that the total expenses will reach approximately 1¼ per cent of the amount allotted.

Putting the matter in concise form, the expenses of the loan up to date have been as follows:

Organization expenses	$ 376,000
For Publicity Campaign,
(a) Through the Dominion Publicity Committee	163,000
(b) Through Canadian Press Association (disbursements to date)	207,000
For remuneration to Brokers and Bond Dealers	750,000
Commissions to canvassers	1,140,000
Remuneration to Banks	984,395
Total	$3,620,395

In addition to this, there are, of course, the departmental expenses for printing the interim receipts, for engraving the bonds, for the staff employed, numbering some 700 persons, in the Department of Finance, who have been specially engaged upon this work since last December. It is estimated that the total cost of the loan, when finally available, will approximate $5,000,000, or about one and one-quarter per cent of the whole loan, which I think may be regarded by everybody as a very satisfactory rate.

The price of the securities issued was, of course, par, but by acceleration of payments, a slight discount, equal to the rate of interest which the bonds bear, namely, 5½ per cent, was allowed to subscribers. Perhaps I may make that clearer to the House by saying that if a subscriber paid his subscription in full on January 2, last, he would pay for his bonds at the rate of 99·107; if he paid in full on February 1, last, he would pay at the rate of 99·467; if he paid on March 1, he would pay at the rate of 99·722; if he paid on April 1, he would pay at the rate of 99·909, and if he deferred his payment in full until the 1st of May, as he might do, he would pay at the rate of 100 per cent. I trust this will give to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and to the House, the information desired. I shall pass over to my right hon. friend the statement from which I have read, and if there is any other information which he desires and which I can possibly give to him, I shall be glad to do so. But I trust that, with the information I have given, he will inform the Prime Minister that he may proceed with the War Appropriation Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN: What is the total amount of the discount?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The total discount, inclusive of all expenses, will amount, we estimate, to one and one-quarter per cent.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister said that all the expenses were not available to the department. I suppose that does not mean that the department will not ultimately have a statement?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Just as soon as possible, I shall submit to the House a complete and detailed statement of the cost of the loan.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am perfectly ready and willing to go on with the Bill to-day, but before we go into committee, I should like to see the statement.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not purpose going on with the Bill to-day. I thought it was desirable that this information should be given at least a day in advance.

Mr. PEDLOW: Do the items of $163,000 and $207,000 cover the entire cost of the publicity campaign? On what basis was that allotment negotiated? Was the price paid for that publicity at the ordinary commercial rate charged for the space used, or was it on a different basis from that usually negotiated in an ordinary commercial transaction?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the information. I am simply using the figures given to me by the officers of the Department of Finance. The total amount for advertising was $207,000. I do not know how the advertising rate was fixed. I shall give my hon. friend the information to-morrow.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is the item of $163,000 not also for publicity?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. PEDLOW: The two together would amount to $370,000, which is the amount, I take it, of the cost of the publicity campaign.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the details the minister promises to give the House include the names of the firms and papers which received advertisements, and the amounts paid?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If that is desired.

Mr. MURPHY: It is highly desirable to know the amount paid to each newspaper.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That will cover all the newspapers in Canada.

Mr. MURHPY: We want the information.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 39, to amend the Yukon Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—"Section 115, abolition of Council and new Council provided for."

Mr. MURPHY: Is the Governor in Council, in regard to the selections to be made, to confine its choice to judicial officers, or are the selections to be made generally of persons presumed to be capable of performing the duties attaching to the council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure that I understand the hon. gentleman's question, but the Yukon Act provides that there shall be appointed a commissioner and also that there shall be an administrator, whose duties shall be to substitute for the commissioner in the absence or illness of the latter. Without power being given under the Act to abolish those offices, they cannot be abolished. They are, however, already abolished under the War Measures Act, but it is the intention that this legislation shall confirm the action taken, and that it shall date back so as to ratify that action. There are, in the general administrative machinery of the Yukon, other offices which have been abolished as well, and notifications have gone to all the holders of those offices that their services shall cease on the 30th of April, but the Act does not provide for the creation of those offices, and consequently it does not need to be amended in so far as those offices are concerned.

Mr. MURPHY: The Bill does not apply to the last class of officers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be said not to apply, because the action can be taken without an amendment to the Act.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 1—"Section 116, Governor in Council may abolish offices and transfer duties."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanation I have just made applies to this subclause, but does not apply to the previous clause. As to the previous clause, that provides for the abolishment of the Yukon Council, and that action has not yet been taken. The amendment empowers the Governor in Council to take that action.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Auditor General may send an officer to audit accounts in Territory when he deems it necessary, instead of yearly, as heretofore:

Mr. FIELDING: What is the substance of the clause repealed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act as it stood said that the Auditor General "shall send an officer," but he may not deem it necessary to do so.

Mr. FIELDING: This makes it optional?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

SALARIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the provisions of clause two of Bill thirteen, An Act to amend the Salaries Act and the provisions for preserving the Independence of Parliament, shall be deemed to have come into operation on the twenty-third day of October, 1917, and to apply and extend to the Chairman of the Sub-Committee of Labour Problems and to the Vice-Chairman of the Reconstruction and Development Committee, and that they shall be deemed to have been named by the Governor in Council under the provisions of the said clause on the said date, and shall each receive a salary of seven thousand dollars per annum.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This resolution is necessary in order to make an amendment to the Bill for the purpose of conforming with the Orders in Council upon which the Bill is based.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We can have the discussion on the Bill.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

REVENUES OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

SUSPENSE ACCOUNT PROPOSED.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways), the House went into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the receipts and revenues of the Canadian Government railways and of any railway under the charge, management or direction of the Minister may be deposited in a Suspense Account, and the working expenses of the said railways may be defrayed therefrom, and in the event of a deficit occurring at any time, the amount of such deficit shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and in the event of a surplus the amount thereof may be transferred to the said Fund; the Suspense Account and all payments therefrom being subject to the audit of the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. J. D. REID: I wish to move that the resolution be amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the working expenses of the Canadian Government railways and of any railway under the charge, management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the said railway, and in the event of a deficit occurring at any time during any fiscal year the amount of such deficit shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, the said deficit to be voted by Parliament at its first session following the close of such fiscal year.

This change is made at the suggestion of the Auditor General, and is for the purpose of giving Parliament control in case there is a deficit.

Mr. FIELDING: I think this resolution is open to one objection. When I first read the resolution I was favourably impressed with it as a businesslike arrangement, but on further consideration the impression I have is that it will withdraw a very important matter of public business from the consideration of Parliament. It proposes to set apart a portion of the Government business and say that that shall not be managed as other Government business, but shall be treated as a separate account. It might be argued with some force by the minister that putting this annual appropriation in the estimates swells the total, and that it is, after all, a mere matter of book-keeping. The Government railways on the whole will probably pay their expenses, but in many years they have not, although we are all hoping for better things. It is only in the event of a deficit occurring that Parliament would be asked to vote the money, but in the event of there being no deficit the consideration of the railway situation would probably be withdrawn from the consideration of Parliament. I hope the minister will give the matter further consideration. Perhaps the view I take of it is not correct, but it seems to me, where the appropriations for the railway will run into so many million dollars, that there is no good reason why Parliament should not have the opportunity every year of considering the appropriations, and that would necessarily open the way for a general criticism and inquiry, which, after all, is one of the chief purposes for which Parliament is assembled. There may be another side to this question, but for the moment I ask the Acting Minister of Finance whether he is not, as a mere matter of convenience—and it would be no doubt a convenience to the department—taking away from Parliament one of its most valuable and important duties.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The principle which the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) enunciates would no doubt be a sound one if it had reference to taxation. Beyond doubt Parliament should possess of itself the sole right of appropriating any moneys collected from the people of this country by means of taxation, but I submit that the revenues which are obtained by the Government railways of Canada from the people of Canada, for services rendered by that railway, are in a different position altogether from revenues received by way of taxation. I think a fair test of the fairness of the proposal contained in the resolution is this: Does the continuance of the practice of voting a general amount in the estimates after all mean anything? Last year I think we were asked to vote a sum of about thirty-five millions under the heading "Operating Expenses of the Government Railway Systems of Canada." That, of course, gives no particular information to Parliament. No questions, therefore, are ever asked under that item. The amount cannot be approximated by the Department of Railways with any accuracy whatever. I am told by the officers of the department that this year they cannot estimate within five to ten million dollars what would be the operating expenses of the Canadian Government Railway system during the present fiscal year. My objection to the inclusion of the amount in the annual estimates is that it swells our general estimates unduly, and no good purpose is served by it.

Mr. MURPHY: What harm is done?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It leaves the impression abroad that our annual expenditure as shown to be in the estimates is greater than it actually is. I think it is only a fair proposal that the revenues of a railway system should be used to pay operating expenses, without Parliament being asked to vote that amount. If the amount could be voted with any degree of accuracy, possibly some good might come out of it, but it has never in the past interested the House, and I say it is unfair to the railway system. It is unfair to the estimates to load them with this amount. The Canadian Government are to-day the owners of the Canadian Northern railway system.

Mr. BUREAU: And they do not operate it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Our operating expenses will not be voted in this manner. They were not voted this way last year. We voted a certain amount to take care of the deficit. We shall ask Parliament to do the same thing this session. If the resolution is adopted by the House, I think the financial position of the Intercolonial will really be presented to Parliament in a better form than heretofore. If there is a deficit Parliament will be asked to vote that deficit, and a very definite and clear cut discussion may then take place upon the administration of the railroad, because Parliament is asked to vote a deficit which it has never been asked to do before. The principle is not a new one. The Intercolonial has what they call a store account. The minister is permitted to provide a certain sum for the purchase of railway supplies and material, and while there is a limitation of $1,500,000 to that account, still the principle is exactly the same. The same principle applies to the King's Printer.

Mr. W. S. FIELDING: We increased the store account to $6,000,000 last night.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The principle is just the same, and it applies to the King's Printer. The principle in the Bill is this: that the Government railway system be permitted to pay, out of its own revenue, its operating expenses. I submit that is a fair proposal, and I hope it will be accepted by the committee.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose it is a surplus?

An hon. MEMBER: Do not suppose that.

Mr. BUREAU: We must suppose all kind of things now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The book-keeping system is not interfered with. Every dollar and every cent that goes to the system are credited to the Receiver General. Every cent paid out by the railway is paid by cheque at Moncton upon the Bank of Montreal, Ottawa, where the Government account is kept.

Mr. CAHILL: I am glad to hear the Minister of Finance state to-day that we have the Canadian Northern, because last night apparently we had lost it.

Mr. BUREAU: It is a hide-and-seek game.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of Railways yesterday proposed a new resolution to increase the amount that might be voted for stores to $6,000,000. He told us the increase was required on account of the Transcontinental and International roads but he did not mention the Canadian Northern, and I inferred from that that he figured the Government did not at the present time own the Canadian Northern. I am further strengthened in that opinion by the fact that the Government solicitor in Toronto two or three days ago made the statement before the commission that he could not get a report of the earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway company since last October. Now, if we own the road, surely we should be able to get a statement of its earnings.

Mr. J. D. REID: I might say to the hon. gentleman that the statements were given to the solicitor immediately.

Mr. CAHILL: Why did he have to go to the Commission and ask for the statement? He said he could not get it from the proper sources. I know he got the statement the next day. Of course, he would have to get it; that is quite natural, but he could not get it up to that time. The hon. Minister of Finance states he does not want to have his estimates loaded up with a deficit. I do not think there is any question, if the railways of this country are managed by the Government as they have been, that we may forget about surpluses. It will be a question of deficits, and we want honest bookkeeping in this country. If we are making a loss on the railway, let us know it and show where we stand, and not try to cover it up by adopting some other system. If we are making a loss, it is a loss to Canada, and increasing Canada's debt, and why not show it, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) suggests?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand my hon. friend to say he is in favour of the resolution?

Mr. BUREAU: No, he is against it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The resolution proposes to accomplish just what my hon. friend says he would like to see.

Mr. CAHILL: In what way?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Inasmuch as the deficits—and he says we will always have a deficit—will be disclosed in the estimates because it must then be voted. Is my hon. friend supporting the resolution?

Mr. BUREAU: No, he is against it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not understand that he is against it. I do not know what he means.

Mr. BUREAU: He wants Parliament to control public funds.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Parliament is not dispossessing itself of the control of anything. I understand him to say, in his judgment, the operation of railways in Canada by the Government will always result in a deficit, and he would like to have these deficits put clearly before Parliament. Did I understand the hon. gentleman correctly? If I understood his statement rightly, this resolution, being enacted into the form of a Bill, will accomplish exactly what he wants. It has hardly been possible heretofore to know what was the actual result of the operation of the Canadian Government Railway system in Canada unless one took the trouble to go through the annual report. The Government has no desire to hide anything. I think that the Minister of Railways and Canals is perfectly justified in asking to be allowed to administer the Government Railway system in the same manner as other railways are administered.

Mr. CAHILL: Does not the resolution state that any unappropriated fund shall be drawn upon to the extent of the deficit?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear the amendment proposed, and perhaps I was wrong in pressing my question because he had the original resolution before him. The amended resolution will read:

That it is expedient to provide that the working expenses of the Canadian Government Railways and of any railway under the charge and management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals shall be—

Mr. FIELDING: What does my hon. friend mean by " and of any railway under the charge and management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals?" Has he anything in his mind? Does that mean the Canadian Northern?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. I think it was intended to cover the Transcontinental railway.

Mr. FIELDING: That is part of the Canadian Government Railway system, is it not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not sure as to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see why my statement should occasion any merriment on the part of any hon. gentlemen opposite. If any hon. gentlemen knows what it means they might stand up and inform the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We will let the Government do that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The words " Canadian Government railways " might be limited by statute to what is known as the Intercolonial railway and the Prince Edward Island railway. If they are limited to those railways then I am perfectly right in my statement and hon. gentlemen are wrong in their laughter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are they so limited?

Mr. BUREAU: The question is whether all the railways owned by the Canadian Government are Canadian Government railways or whether the words are limited by the statute to the railways mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Possibly my hon. friend is right, but there need not be any discussion about the words "and of any railway under the charge and management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals," because that can be amended later. Let me read the amendment:

That it is expedient to provide that the working expenses of the Canadian Government Railways and of any railway under the charge and management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the said railways, and in the event of a deficit occurring at any time during any fiscal year, the amount of such deficit shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, the said deficit to be voted by Parliament at its first session following the close of such fiscal year.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. FIELDING: Touching the question of the interpretation of the expression "Canadian Government railways," the Acting Minister of Finance is perhaps unaware that his colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals, last night gave his own interpretation—and I am not objecting to it—that "Canadian Government railways" includes the Transcontinental and all other Government railways except the Canadian Northern. On the faith of that interpretation we allowed the hon. gentleman to increase his stores account from $1,500,000 to $6,000,000. I am merely asking whether the hon. gentleman has anything particularly in his mind. I appreciate the point made by the Acting Minister of Finance as to the distinction between revenue which represents taxation and revenue of different kinds. But his argument will probably carry him a little farther than he appreciates when we come to apply it. If the principle of the resolution is sound, why not apply it to other departments as well? Suppose I were to suggest that we should apply it to the Department of Customs, my hon. friend would say at once: " That is taxation." So it is. But, suppose we should go to the Post Office Department. That is not taxation. The postage stamp represents payment for service just as much as the railway ticket represents payment for service. If my hon. friend's argument is good that this is a proper thing to do with regard to Government railways, the same argument might be advanced with regard to the Post Office Department. You might extend that in different directions. What it really means is that the appropriation for each railway system which has hitherto always been made by parliament is no longer to be made by Parliament and whatever opportunities the making of the appropriation offered for enquiry and discussion and criticism will not longer be available. The annual appropriation of the moneys needed for the operation of the Intercolonial railway has always presented an opportunity for widespread inquiry, criticism and discussion. The withdrawing of that appropriation from Parliament, I grant you, as a mere matter of book-keeping, may not make any difference, but at the same time I think there is no good reason why Parliament should give up the privilege of making the annual vote for a mere matter of book-keeping. I do not see that it is going to make one cent's worth of difference to the treasury of Canada one way or the other, but as a pure matter of parliamentary procedure we should keep as far as possible to the principle of parliamentary control.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In reference to the case suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) of the Post Office I would submit that it is hardly analogous. The Government Railway system is a well defined and limited operation. It is administered from a single office at Moncton. I imagine that all the revenues of the road go there first and ultimately to Ottawa. All operating expenses are incurred at that point. In the case of the post office system, there must be twenty thousand or thirty thousand branches throughout Canada extending from coast to coast.

Mr. FIELDING: There are railway stations all over Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I fail to see how in any respect the cases are analogous. The money is received by the post office but there are scores and scores of offices receiving that revenue. You could hardly pay the operating expenses of the post office in Vancouver out of the revenues received, at, say, St. John, N.B. In the case of the railway system the revenues all go into the head office of the system at Moncton and from there all expenditures are authorized, all operating expenses are paid and there is established the Government Railway audit system. The Government Railway accounts are audited at Moncton.

Mr. DEVLIN: Reverting to the question asked by my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), will any of the working expenses of the Canadian Northern railway come under this resolution?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian Northern railway, although owned by the Government, will be operated in the same manner as it has been in the past by the board of directors, separate entirely from the Government Railway system unless, as there may be in the future, some arrangement by which the Canadian Northern may be amalgamated with the Government railways and the whole worked together as one system. Until that is done the Canadian Northern railway will be in no way connected with what is proposed by this resolution. What the resolution really means is that instead of putting an amount in the estimates each year to provide for the expenditure, a certain fair amount will be advanced to us for operating expenses. On the other hand, they often have to estimate what the revenues will be, and the two appear side by side. This does not affect in any way the carrying on of the expenditures in connection with the railways. It is difficult—take it this year, for example—to estimate what the operating expenses will be; they are very much higher this year than last. Then again, the revenues will not be anything near what the operating expenses are. For the past year the loss on the Canadian Government railways will be very large, amounting perhaps to five milion dollars, or probably five and a half million dolars. If this resolution passes, an item will have to be inserted in the estimates showing the loss that has occurred in connection with the operation of those railways.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the objection to that?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no objection at all, but it loads up the estimates with an amount that really should not be there. But there is no desire in any way, shape or form, so far as the Railway Department and the Finance Department are concerned, to change the method of carrying on the expenditures in connection with the Canadian Government Railway system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is simply a blind.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not a blind. I do not see how the right hon. gentleman can make such a statement. We may have to pay out probably a larger amount than we estimate at the present time, for this reason: You cannot tell at the present time how things are going to turn out, as regards the cost of labour, and so on, and it may probably involve adding a considerable amount more than was at first thought necessary in order to carry on the operations of the Government system.

Mr. BUREAU: Supposing we do. The leader of the Opposition was right; it is a blind.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will this mean an increase of the staff?

Mr. J. D. REID: It does not involve increasing the staff in any respect. It is simply a matter of book-keeping and the money will be deposited and paid out in exactly the same manner as before.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We do not want to be accused of indulging in captious criticism, because we desire to facilitate the despatch of business, but the Minister of Railways has told us that he does not want this money to appear in the estimates. If that is not a blind, what is it? By all means let us have the truth.

Mr. J. D. REID: As far as having the truth is concerned, I am trying to explain to the right hon. gentleman, as clearly as I can, what is proposed. Now, what is the present system? The revenues are deposited to the credit of the Receiver General, and the cheques are issued by the railway and passed by the Auditor General at Ottawa. That system will still continue in exactly the same manner.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is no question about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will there be the same method of treating the revenues of the railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: Just the same as before.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No; because at the present time the revenues of the road, like the revenue of the post office, are sent to Ottawa and put in the consolidated revenue fund, but what my hon. friend proposes is collect the revenues of the Government railways and send them to Moncton and expend them there.

Mr. J. D. REID: If the right hon. gentleman has gathered that meaning from anything that I have said, he has gathered an erroneous impression. The financial representative of the Department of Railways and Canals tells me that there will be no change of the kind at all; the money will be deposited in exactly the same manner as before, and the expenditures will be made in the same way. If this resolution passes, and there should be any doubt at all as to what is proposed, when the Bill founded upon the resolution is introduced, we can make the matter very plain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The resolution as framed would not give that impression. At the present time the revenues of the road are collected from the different stations, sent to Ottawa, and deposited in the public treasury to the credit of the consolidated fund and all the payments are made out of that fund. If I understand this proposition aright, it is in contemplation to collect and expend the revenues at Moncton, and if there is any deficit Parliament will be asked to make it good out of the public treasury. It may be a mere matter of book-keeping, and it may be that the country will not lose anything, but what will happen is, as was stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) that Parliament will not continue to have the same control over the operations of the road as it has to-day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Minister of Railways should not ask Parliament to pass this resolution unless there is some strong reason for it, and Parliament should not refuse to pass it unless some substantial objection exists.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If there is any substantial objection to the resolution the Minister of Railways will very gladly withdraw. Let us see if there really is any objection to it; I must say that I have not heard one yet.

Mr. BUREAU: The Acting Minister of Finance has just said that the Minister of Railways should not bring forward the resolution unless there are strong reasons for its passage. I would like to hear what those reasons are.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The right hon. leader of the Opposition has just stated that this proposition will prevent Parliament from discussing the expenditures of the Canadian Government railways. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. BUREAU: It is in one way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I submit that the argument is not founded upon fact, because there are numberless items presented to Parliament in the estimates every session which will afford the amplest opportunity for discussion of the management and administration of the system. Now, surely, that statement is correct. Surely I am correct in saying that each member of the House, under the various items which appear in the railway estimates will have in the future, as he has had in the past, the amplest opportunity for a full and free discussion of the expenditures and the method of operation of the Canadian Government railways. Therefore, I say that there is nothing in that objection, and the opposition to the proposal, if founded upon that point, must fail. I agree with my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) that Parliament should know annually what is the operating deficit of the Government Railway system, and I hope therefore that he will support the resolution. That is one of the advantages of this resolution, that it will bring before Parliament the exact financial results of the railway system during the previous fiscal year.

Mr. FIELDING: Do we not get that now?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, we do, but as a matter of fact, under the proposed system it will come up in a very concrete way. It is much better that Parliament be asked to vote under one item the sum of $5,000,000, if that sum should exactly represent the deficit in the operation of the Canadian Government system. The net result of the operations are there before you, stated in a single line, in a few figures, and the minister asking Parliament to vote that amount must explain the result. Under the present system we are asked to vote, say, $35,000,000, $40,000,000, or $50,000,000 to cover operating expenses. The amount is not estimated with accuracy; it affords no information or intelligence; nobody ever discusses the item and as a matter of business it should not be there. I cannot conceive any stronger reasons than that why the resolution should pass. The system proposed by the resolution will present to Parliament the net result of the financial operations of the road during the year. As the member (Hon. Mr. Fielding) well says, by taking the Auditor General's Report and the report of the Minister of Railways you can ascertain the total revenues of the railway system and the total costs of operation, and by simple mathematical computation you can ascertain the actual operating results. But as a matter of fact, during the years I have been in Parliament, I have heard but little discussion of the actual financial operation of the road; our time is occupied more in the discussion of the estimates presented by the Department of Railways. But this will put before Parliament more pointedly and in more concrete fashion than ever before the exact financial operations of the railway system, and I submit that that will be an important advantage.

Mr. McMASTER: Would it not be possible, while maintaining the system which has hitherto prevailed of bringing down estimates to have also a concrete statement as to deficit?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have that now, and it occasions very little discussion in Parliament.

Mr. McMASTER: I think the acting Minister of Finance is with me when I say that that is quite possible even if you maintain the present system of setting aside a certain sum of money yearly for the operation of Government railroads. It seems to me that attempts are being made to gather into the executive of the Government a great many functions which properly belong to Parliament. Order in Council after Order in Council is brought down with regard to other matters, and my impression is that this is evidence of a general attempt to assign to the executive the powers of Parliament. It has happened in the House of Commons of Great Britain, where protests have been made against it; and now the people of Canada are beginning to feel that parliamentary government is running into a certain danger through the adoption of this course by the ministry.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Can either of the ministers in charge of this proposal inform us what the practice of any constitutionally governed country, such as Australia, has been, in a matter of this kind? Australia has a much larger experience in Government-owned railways than we have.

Hon. J. D. REID: I am sorry that I cannot tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr MICHAEL CLARK: Perhaps the acting Minister of Finance can furnish the information.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I am not in a position to inform my hon. friend.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am surprised, because the Government is very strong on precedent.

Mr. PEDLOW: The acting Minister of Finance to the contrary notwithstanding, I think that the parallel case submitted by the member for Shelburne and Queens is an apt one. The minister contends that revenue received from the Post Office Department is not on a line with revenue received from the Railway Department. But in the Department of Railways revenue is received from the various stations and offices of the different systems, and the same principle applies to the Post Office Department. The other night when we were discussing a similar proposal to this, the Minister of Railways asked the House to grant him a "blank cheque" for use in the administration of his department. This is practically the same thing; he is asking to-day for another blank cheque. He did not receive it the other night, because the members on both sides refused to submit to his dictation in the matter. The minister wants us to vote an unlimited amount to be expended on the railway systems of this country; he wants carte blanche for the expending of money during the year. Instead of submitting an estimate of what he will require in the administration of his department during the current year, he asks us to give him the right to spend without limit, and at the end of the year he will, after the money has been spent, demand from us the extra amount required. That is not good business.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I cannot for the life of me see what the object of this resolution is, unless it be to ruin the credit of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: If the Government have to make an estimate of how much the deficit is going to be, they surely will have to make an estimate of how much they will need to run the road. I should like to know from the minister whether the accounts of the Prince Edward Island railway are kept separate from those of the Intercolonial. As a matter of fact, the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways are now connected by a car ferry, and the Prince Edward Island railway is looked upon as a feeder of the Intercolonial. I understand that, from the way in which the freight rates are arranged, they can make the Prince Edward Island railway appear to owe $300,000 of a deficit every year, when, as a matter of fact, it is the biggest asset we have. I would like to know if the accounts of the Intercolonial railway and the Prince Edward Island railway are kept separately or not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry if I cannot answer the hon. gentleman; I could not hear him.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member asked if the accounts of the Prince Edward Island railway and the Intercolonial railway were kept separately or not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The accounts of the Prince Edward Island railway are kept separate from those of the Intercolonial railway system, but the Prince Edward Island railway is a part of the Canadian Government railways. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) says that the Post Office Department and the Canadian Government railways are somewhat analogous. There is a distinction between the railway system and the post office system.

Mr. PEDLOW: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In the first place, the operating expenses of the post office system are secured from taxation, and they are voted by Parliament annually. It is true there does come back a great deal of revenue from the public by an indirect system of taxation, namely, the stamp tax, which is provided by statute. But the revenues of the Government railways represent money paid by the public for services rendered by the railway.

Mr. PEDLOW: A postage stamp and a railway ticket are practically the same thing.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The one is taxation imposed by Parliament.

Mr. PEDLOW: Absolutely no.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The other is a receipt for money paid by the public to the railway for services rendered by the railway, which is run by the railway manager. In Canada there are as many post office managers as there are post offices, but there is only one manager of the Canadian Government railways.

Mr. BUREAU: Are there not many railway station agents?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But the Canadian Government railways are under the control of the railway manager. The revenues of all the post offices in Canada are sent to Ottawa. I cannot see what else could be done with them. The revenues of the Canadian Government railways go to the Receiver General ultimately, but they go through the offices of the manager at Moncton, where also all expenses are authorized. Such a system is not of necessity applicable to the post offices, as the post offices are scattered by hundreds and thousands throughout the length and breadth of this country, and the expenditures must be authorized at Ottawa. There is, of course, some similarity between the Post Office and the Railway Department. I would not presume to take the position that there is not, but for all practical purposes, there is no similarity whatever. All this resolution purposes doing is to put the Intercolonial Railway system into the same position as other railways. It is very easy to suggest sinister motives on the part of members of Government in proposing this resolution. Any hon. member can do that. Any man outside of Parliament can do it. Men who will never be in Parliament might do it, but that does not prove that there is any foundation for the imputation of improper motives.

Mr. PEDLOW: I decidedly object to the statement just made by the acting Minister of Finance. It is not my intention, nor do I think it is the intention of any hon. member on this side of the House, to impute sinister motives to any minister of the Crown, but we consider we are quite within our rights in criticising the actions and business methods proposed by ministers of the Crown. I criticised the action taken in this resolution, and I consider the methods proposed in this resolution are not business-like. That is the reason why I am offering this criticism. It would be much better, in the interest of the Canadian Government railways if the Minister of Railways would figure out as closely as possible the amount he thinks he would require to cover the deficits for the year, and if he would submit that proposition to the House and let us vote upon it.

Mr. BUREAU: The acting Minister of Finance, a few moments ago laid down a very sound principle. I agree with the principle, if he will only carry it out. He said that, in bringing this resolution down, the Government must have very good reason for doing so. I agree with him in that, and when those reasons are explained to the House, if the Opposition do not want to accept the resolution, they must have very grave objections to offer to it. The acting Minister of Finance proceeded, not to give us the reasons why the resolution was brought down, but to discuss the objections which had been taken. I am satisfied that this resolution has not been brought down without a study having first been made of the situation, and without a discussion having taken place between the officers of the department, the Minister of Railways, and the acting Minister of Finance of the reasons which have determined their action in bringing down this resolution. It was framed, I suppose, after mature consideration, so that the Minister of Railways would have permission from the Government to open a suspense account in which would be charged all the revenues of the Intercolonial and credited all the expenditures. If this suspense account resulted in a surplus, the surplus was to be paid over to the Receiver General; if it resulted in a deficit, the Government would then ask Parliament to vote an appropriation to cover that deficit. The resolution says:

The Suspense Account—

That includes all the revenues of the Intercolonial or of the Transcontinental, or in short, of the Canadian Government railways.

—and all payments therefrom being subject to the audit of the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. J. D. REID: The resolution has been changed. Did the hon. member hear the amendment?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes. That was the result of the mature deliberation of the Minister of Railways and the acting Minister of Finance.

Mr. MURPHY: The change?

Mr. BUREAU: No, this resolution. It was put on the Order Paper so that members could study it, and, if they saw fit, criticise it. As I said last night in regard to another matter, the Auditor General is an officer of this country; he is not an officer of the Government. He stands between the Government and the public. We have not had any reasons except one from the acting Minister of Finance. He says: Why burden the estimates with $35,000,000, when we can, by a subterfuge, or in other words, by withdrawing from the control of Parliament, an amount of $35,000,000, or even $45,000,000, by keeping accounts separately——

Mr. MURPHY: Make the estimates look that much less.

Mr. BUREAU: Make the estimates look that much less to the people. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says: You want to use a blind. The acting Minister of Finance seems to become indignant at that. The intention, however, apparently seems to be to reduce the estimates by $35,000,000. I object to this resolution because we ought to know what we are going to spend on our Government railways, just as well as on any other department. I am not going to discuss the question of the similarity or dissimilarity between the Post Office and the Canadian Government railways. Any revenue, whether it is procured from the Canadian Government railways or from the post offices, is turned into the Government Treasury, whether it is collected through the intermediary of station masters or postmasters. Be that as it may, my reason for objecting is this: If there is a deficit the acting Minister of Finance says the Government will come to Parliament and ask them to vote the money, and that will bring the question more forcibly before Parliament, and there will be a full discussion of the railway matters of this country. Since I have been in this House, it has always been the custom for my hon. friend the Minister of Railways—he was then Minister of Customs, but generally undertook the work, as Hon. Mr. Cochrane's health was never good about that time—to make a full statement to the House of the operation of the Government railways when the railway estimates were up, so we have always had a full discussion of the railway situation. The statement made by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) is absolutely true; there is undoubtedly a tendency in this Parliament to withdraw from the House of Commons control of the expenditure of public moneys, and a tendency also to withdraw from the representatives of the people in this House control of matters upon which it is their exclusive right to legislate. Furthermore. there is not only a tendency, but it is the actual fact that the Government are passing Orders in Council amending the Constitution of this country and creating conditions which do not exist even in England.

Let us suppose that after the war this country will become as prosperous as she was before, and that we have a surplus. Under the Bill based on this resolution we shall have a separate account for the Intercolonial, and this account will be under the control of the Minister of Railways and the Superintendent of Railways. The principal office of the railway will be in Moncton, and this surplus will be entirely outside of the control of the House of Commons; we shall not have anything to say about the matter; it will be entirely in the hands of the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance. The only thing we will be able to say is that in 1918 we assented to a Bill giving absolute control of railway finance to the Minister of Railways. I repeat that if there is a surplus we shall have absolutely no control over its expenditure. The minister may say that it will be paid into the consolidated revenue fund, but I repeat, the House of Commons will have absolutely no control over it. If the Minister of Railways and the acting Minister of Finance have any other reason than that they are adopting this subterfuge in order that the people will not see their extravagance in the estimates, let them give it to the House. My hon. friend says that he does not know what the probable expenditure is going to be. Surely he knows that the revenue for the current year is always based on the past year's expenditure. If you will look at the estimates you will find that in every department the expenditure of 1918-19 is based on the expenditure of 1917-18, taking into account any change there may be in conditions, and I have never heard, during the eighteen years I have been in this House, that the Intercolonial or any other Government railway had to complain of being refused money for operating expenses. Under the circumstances, I think the Minister of Railways should ascertain what the probable expenditure for the coming year will be and then submit it to the House, and then next year he can ask for a vote again, and we shall have an opportunity for criticism. I do not see why we should not show in the estimates the amount of money we propose to expend on the operation of the Government railways, and I shall not support this resolution unless my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, or the acting Minister of Finance, gives some better or more substantial reason for presenting it to-day. The question was asked: Will it make any difference in the book-keeping? The answer was, No. Well, then, if it is going to make no change in the book-keeping, and if the staff is not going to be increased, I do not see any reason why we should adopt the resolution or pass any legislation based upon it.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I ask the Government to believe me when I say that I am very sincerely sorry that I cannot quite take their view of this resolution. I do not think their defence of it has quite convinced me up to the present moment. This Government received a mandate from the people for a specific purpose, and that was to win the war by certain definite methods. I think I listened carefully to everything that either minister said, and neither of them said that this proposition was put forward for the winning of the war. They do not then put it forward as a war-time measure, and that being so, one is bound to look at it on sound financial principles, and on parliamentary principles, as far as one understands these principles. The only reason that either minister has given for this proposition is that they object to the loading up of the estimates. It would be a fortunate thing for Canada if its Governments all over would object to loading up their estimates. I have preached economy in this country for many years. I was sorry to hear an hon. member opposite anticipating regular deficits in connection with our Government railways. I trust that will not be the case. I trust these railways will be so managed, and I have sufficient belief in the future of Canada to think that if they are well managed they will not show deficits, but whether there are deficits or surpluses the principles of sound finance demand that the statements in regard to them should be placed before Parliament in an annual financial statement. I very well remember listening to speeches, as well as reading all the speeches he made during my lifetime, of that great master of finance, Mr. Gladstone. There was nothing he insisted on more than that the expenditures and the incomes of a country should be presented to Parliament each year and be debated by Parliament each year. If that is a sound principle—and in every constitutionally-governed country in the British Empire the principle is one of parliamentary practice—then this is a departure from the universal parliamentary practice of all the constitutionally-governed countries in the British Empire, including the Old Country herself. Before the point was raised by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) the analogy between the Post Office and the railways occurred to my own mind, and I must say the acting Minister of Finance was very unsuccessful from my point of view in showing the analogy was not perfect. I think all he said upon the point was really making a distinction without a difference. The analogy to my mind was as perfect as one could find. What was the analogy? The post offices form a department of the public service. In so far as the government-owned railways are concerned, they constitute a department of the public service. The analogy to that extent is surely perfect. They are both departments of the public service which one might call "carrying departments." In the one case they carry letters, and in the other case they carry goods and persons. You might compare the various stations on your railroad to the various post offices. You might compare your station-masters to your postmasters. You have public expenditure in each case, and you have public incomes in each case. The analogy is absolutely perfect from alpha to omega.

Now, what has been said to justify such a departure as this proposition is from parliamentary precedent and practice? I asked the question as to what is done in regard to government-owned railways in this very matter in other countries? I asked that question for information. I have very little doubt as to the facts myself, and I would like to ask the Government to find out those precedents, and to consider this matter a little before they press the resolution upon this House. No part of constitutional government is more important than giving the people, through their elected representatives, absolute and annual command of the expenditures and incomes of the country, and I must say that I have heard nothing from either of the ministers in charge of this resolution to justify me in thinking that they are making a wise departure. I close by referring to the point with which I began. I believe we are wasting the time of this Parliament when we are taking these things up, for the reason that they do not make for the winning of the war. The mandate of this Government is for a specific purpose, and the constitution of the Government was for a specific purpose. It was to go on with the war, and I cannot see that this proposition comes under that category. It certainly is a very strong departure from the recognized practices of all constitutional governments within the Empire, and I hope the Government will proceed slowly with it.

Mr. J. D. REID: So far as the amendment is concerned, the impression is that, in regard to the operation of the railroad, it is changing a procedure, in so far as the payments for carrying on of the road is concerned. But it does not change it one particle. The Railway Department, as I understand it, is operated in this way; that all receipts in connection with that department are deposited to the credit of the hon. Receiver General at all points along the line. They go direct to the credit of the Receiver General.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought the acting Minister of Finance said they went to Moncton.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am explaining it as I understand it from the financial official of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. BUREAU: Who is right?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think my information is right. The official of the department is sitting beside me, and he tells me all the money collected goes direct to the credit of the Receiver General. Then about once a month the Auditor General gives credit for the amount that has been voted by Parliament, and on that credit cheques are issued by the Railway Department from time to time, until that credit has been exhausted. Then another credit is obtained from the Auditor General, and so on, during the fiscal year. That is as I understand the way the operation is carried on at the present time. If this Bill were to go through the same procedure would follow. The Auditor General would be asked to give a credit from month to month in the same way. That was the intention when this resolution was framed by the officials of the department. So far as the Department of Railways and Canals is concerned, we do not want any change whatever. We want the revenues as collected to be deposited to the credit of the Receiver General, and to get from the Auditor General exactly the same credit. The only intention of this change was to place an amount in the estimates, as has been done from year to year, estimating the amount. We do not know whether it is a correct amount or not. The officials of the department get as near as they can to the amount, and of course the amount goes through the House without any criticism whatever, for the reason that the safety of it is that the Auditor General audits everything that is paid out in connection with that item. When this matter was explained to me by the officials and recommended, it was stated there would be no change whatever in any way, shape or form. The only reason I have to offer for the change in the system is that it is the custom of all the railways in Canada. Every large railway has a system of that kind. The Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern have similar systems. All moneys are paid into the head office and the head office, in so far as the Government railways are concerned, is the Receiver General, and this resolution would place the Canadian Government railways in the same position as other railways. One of the main reasons for introducing it is in order to avoid loading up the estimates with very large amounts. On account of your railway system increasing, you will load up the estimates with an amount that does not appear to be fair, when the working expenses on the other side are not shown at the particular time, which, if shown, would reduce the amount of total estimates that are being submitted to Parliament. At this particular time, when the war is on, when we must go to foreign countries and borrow very large amounts, in so far as the public is concerned, and those from whom we borrow, you are loading up the expenditure with a very large amount, while the revenues on the other side do not show the proper amount, for the reason that there is no estimate made of them. As far as the public is concerned, what happens is that your expenditures appear as a very large amount while the receipts on the other side do not show in their true proportions for the reason that there is no estimate made of them. I have no desire to submit to the House any resolution or plan for changing the system under which the railways have been operated in the past.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clarke) suggests that we should find out what is done in connection with Government railways in other countries. I will be pleased to go into the matter further and let the resolution stand in the meantime. I will make further inquiry and if it is thought better to bring in an estimate, I have not the slightest objection. But I want to impress on the House that this resolution does not change in any way the manner in which the revenues of the railways have been disposed of in the past. They have been deposited directly to the credit of the Receiver General and under this proposal the revenues would be deposited and the expenditures would be made in exactly the same way. Therefore I move that the committee rise and report progress. I will look into the matter again and I will find out what system has been adopted in other countries. After I get that information it is possible that the House may feel that the system proposed has advantages as compared with that which is at present in force.

Progress reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

LEGISLATION TO BRING THE OUTSIDE SERVICE UNDER THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. MACLEAN, acting Minister of Finance, the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to consolidate, revise and amend the Civil Service Act of Canada; and to provide that the salary of the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission shall be six thousand dollars per annum; and to make provision for the readjustment of grades and salaries in the various classes of the Inside Service, and for the preparation by the Commission of schedules of the positions, duties, and salaries of the Outside Service or of any portion or branch thereof; and to make appointments to the public service upon competitive examination and otherwise eliminate political patronage in the control and management of the said service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope it may be satisfactory to the committee to discuss this matter after the introduction of the Bill. Primarily, the purpose of introducing this resolution is to amend the Civil Service Act in order to provide that in so far as possible all regulations and statutory requirements that are to-day applicable to the Inside Service shall apply to the Outside Service. Appointments to what is called the Outside Service shall hereafter be made by the Civil Service Commission and upon the basis of competitive examination.

An Order in Council was passed on the 13th day of February last upon this subject, and I assume that hon. gentlemen know the general tenor of that Order in Council. It appeared quite fully in the press of the country at the time, but, perhaps, it might be quite proper that I should just in a few words give the purport of it. That Order in Council provided that where knowledge of a professional or technical character was required on the part of any person about to be appointed to the public service the appointment should be made by the deputy head and the Civil Service Commission instead of by the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the deputy head as heretofore. The Order in Council also provided that the Civil Service Commission should, in so far as possible, make appointments to the Outside Service by competitive examination. It required all officers, clerks, and employees in the Outside Service to be appointed in the same manner as persons were appointed to the Inside Service, viz., after competitive examination. The Order in Council also provided that temporary employment in the Outside Service should be authorized from time to time as the Commission deemed necessary and the Commission were also authorized to determine the purpose for which the employment was authorized, and that it should be mentioned in the certificate of qualification to be issued by the Commission.

It also provided that promotions in the Civil Service should be made for merit upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission and of the deputy head of the department. It also provided that no transfer should be made from the Outside Service to the Inside Service under the provisions of Section 50 of the Civil Service Act unless the person concerned obtained from the Civil Service Commission a certificate. The Order in Council also provided that in all competitive examinations held under the Civil Service Act, persons who had been on active service overseas in the military or naval forces of His Majesty, or of any allies of His Majesty, and who had left such service with an honourable record, or who had been honourably discharged, and obtained sufficient marks to pass the required examination should, irrespective of the marks they obtained, be placed in the order of merit on the list of successful candidates above all other candidates. In a general way this is the purport of the Order in Council, which was more in the nature of a direction to the Civil Service Commission than otherwise. It was extremely doubtful if, under the War Measures Act, or any other statute, the Governor in Council could validly establish the regulations contained in the Order in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: Was there not a report made by the law officers of one of the departments that the Governor in Council had no power to enact any such regulations?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I really do not know if there was any such report by one of the law officers of the Crown or not. At any rate, the Government were of the opinion that there was hardly sufficient authority, under the Civil Service Act or under the War Measures Act, to establish as law the provisions of the Order in Council, and therefore it was issued more, as I say, in the nature of a direction to the Civil Service Commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will you kindly read the Order in Council?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is quite a lengthy document.

Mr. JOS. READ: Were the railway employees brought in?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. The employees of the Canadian Government railways were exempt from the operations of the Order in Council, as were also the crews of His Majesty's Canadian ships. The reason the latter were exempted must be obvious to every hon. gentleman. I can hardly apprehend how that class of public servant could be placed under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. JOS. READ: What about the railway employees?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The railway employes were exempt from the provisions of the Order in Council for the reason that up to the time of its passage, the Government had found it impossible to work out any system of appointment to the railway service upon the basis of competitive examination. The Civil Service Commission were directed by the Government to give special study to that phase of the matter, but so far they have not reported to the Governor in Council. I am sure hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I say that difficulties of considerable magnitude confront the Government in applying this principle to the employees of the Government railways. However, we trust that very shortly some system can be evolved by which appointment to the Government Railways systems can be so regulated. So far as promotions on those railways are concerned at present, I think they can hardly be 5 p.m. said to be a matter of patronage or politics; they are largely controlled by the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees, at least that is my impression.

Mr. BUREAU: Only an impression.

Mr A. K. MACLEAN: I am speaking subject to correction.

Mr. BUREAU: It is well to qualify the statement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have never had very much experience in the matter.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: What about new appointments?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At the present time, and since the passage of the Order in Council, the management of the Canadian Government railways has been given absolute freedom to appoint such persons as he may see fit and to disregard any representations which may be made by any persons to him.

Mr. BUREAU: By any member of Parliament?

Mr. COPP: Has he been ordered to disregard representations?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know whether he has been ordered, he has authority to do so.

Mr. COPP: I tell my hon. friend that is not carried out.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That may be, but I am afraid my hon friend is trying to push the Government into the Kingdom of Heaven ahead of time.

Mr. McMASTER: The Government made an attempt to enter the Kingdom of Heaven at the time of the election by declaring that patronage was to be eliminated absolutely.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I say that that has been done by the Government so far as is possible.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Not in the case of the railways.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I admit that possibly my statement does not apply so strongly to the railway system.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It does not apply at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: However, I will say with confidence that the result of the passage of this Order in Council has been very beneficial to the public and the public service. I live in a constituency containing a population of probably one hundred and fifty thousand. Within that constituency is the city of Halifax, one of the termini of the Government railway system, and there are at that point a great number of employees of that system. Since the 20th of January I am sure I have not received three letters from anybody in my constituency, whether employed on Government railways or not, concerning the matter of appointments or promotions on that system. I may say further, that since that time I have not had twenty letters in reference to the matter of patronage from my constituency, or indeed from the whole province of Nova Scotia. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that the general effect—

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman is a lucky man.

Mr. MACLEAN: A very lucky man. I attribute it entirely to the passage of this Order in Council, and I trust that the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite has been just as pleasant as my own in that regard.

Mr. BUREAU: It is more pleasant, we never get any such letters on this side of the House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You are very fortunate.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman has been reading from an Order in Council passed in February last, as I understand it. Was there not a subsequent interpreting, or modifying, Order in Council passed, and if so will the hon. gentleman bring it down before we enter upon a discussion of the Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, I shall lay on the Table copies of all Orders in Council connected with this matter before we proceed with the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: Can the hon. gentleman now state what was the effect of the modifying or interpreting Order in Council?

Mr. BUREAU: Let a copy of the Order in Council in question be produced and placed on Hansard.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: I can speak as to the second Order in Council. Its object was to make clear that all boards or commissions appointed by the Government came under the provisions of the first Order, so that any appointments to the staffs of such boards or commissions will have to be made in the manner provided by that Order in Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was the second Order in Council retroactive?

Mr. ROWELL: It could not be retroactive.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It could hardly be retroactive.

Mr. ROWELL: It will apply to future appointments in the service.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hundreds of young men and young girls have been appointed to the staffs of the various boards and commissions.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand the President of the Council to state that the second Order in Council is a confirmation of the appointments made under the first Order in Council?

Mr. ROWELL: No. The second Order in Council—I am sorry I have not got a copy of it here—was to make clear that the provisions of the Order in Council in question applied to appointments to the staffs of boards or commissions. It was suggested that the first Order in Council might only cover other departments of the Government, whereas it was the intention of the Government that they should apply to the boards or commissions that were appointed. The second Order in Council was intended to make that point clear.

Mr. COPP: It was an interpretation of the first.

Mr. CURRIE: Has that Order in Council been brought down, and if not, will it be laid on the Table before this legislation is proceedeed with. All Orders in Council should be laid on the Table before the legislation to which they relate is proceeded with.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All Orders in Council have already been laid on the Table several days ago, when my hon. friends opposite complained about the great number of them, and they include the Order in Council in question.

Mr. McMASTER: There are so many that some of them may be lost.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This Order in Council was laid on the Table early in the session.

Mr. PROULX: Will postmasters come under this Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Was the Ottawa postmaster appointed under this Order in Council?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: His appointment preceded the passage of this Order in Council.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Chronology.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If this Order in Council has been strictly adhered to, the country and the House have reason to be grateful. The mere instance that prior to the passage of the Order in Council some few persons may have been appointed because of party alliances is not, I submit, a matter that is fairly open to substantial criticism. I assure the committee that this Order in Council has been strictly adhered to.

Mr. McMASTER: In the month of October last emphatic declarations were made by the President of the Council and, I think, by one of the other ministers who used to function in the West, that patronage was altogether eliminated. Were the appointments of the postmaster at Ottawa and the collector of customs at Montreal made prior or subsequent to these declarations?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My information is that these appointments were made prior to the passage of this Order in Council. It is easy, of course, for hon. gentlemen who are not supporting the present Government to doubt the bona fides of this Order in Council, but the great public outside of Parliament will be interested in whether or not it is lived up to. If it can be, it is a good thing, and greatly in Canada's interest. This reform could only be possible under present political conditions. Had my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) been returned to power, I have no doubt that he could not have inaugurated such a reform in the public service. Moreover, had the present Prime Minister been returned to power at the head of a Conservative government, it would have been impossible for him to institute such a reform as this. The main purpose of the proposed Bill is to give statutory effect to the Order in Council, and having decided to do this it was necessary to change here and there many of the sections of the Civil Service Act. Particularly was it necessary to vest in the Civil Service Commission certain powers conferred upon the Governor in Council in that Act; and that necessitated many verbal changes. It was considered desirable, therefore, to consolidate the Civil Service Act entirely and to introduce a new Bill. Some thirteen or fourteen amendments have been made to the Act. There will be other changes, but if the Committee will be satisfied with these explanations of the Order in Council, ample time will be given after the Bill is printed and distributed to enable members to become acquainted with its provisions.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman referred to an inquiry or investigation that the Civil Service Commission was making. Will the report of that inquiry be available before we proceed to a discussion of the Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That had reference to the matter of appointments to the railway service. The Civil Service Commission have not yet had an opportunity of commencing their investigation; the passage of this Order in Council has entailed upon them an immense amount of work. They will probably be able to begin very shortly, but I cannot promise that a report on this matter will be available as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. MURPHY: Before proceeding to a discussion of the Bill would the hon. gentleman be good enough to bring down a statement showing how many members of the Outside Service have been transferred to the Inside Service since October 1, 1917, and how many persons have been appointed under section 21 of the present Civil Service Act since that time?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, I will produce that information.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to unduly criticise the acting Minister of Finance; I think, from what I heard of him and from him when he sat on this side of the House, that he is acting in good faith and means well. He says that if the right hon. present leader of the Opposition had been returned to power he might not have been able to carry out such a reform as this. Well, one thing I appreciate in public life is sincerity and frankness. When the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister—in the elections of 1908—he promised one great reform, a reform of the Inside Civil Service. Shortly afterwards, he passed a law which is on the statute book to-day, the Civil Service Act. The resolution was introduced by Hon. Mr. Fisher, then Minister of Agriculture, and in it there was laid down for the first time in Canada the principle of competitive examination, a principle which has been accepted in England and which has made the English Civil Service the best in the world. Moreover, that principle was lived up to by the Liberal Administration which went out of office in 1911. I am not so sure that my hon. friend will find comfort in the record of his associates as regards the operation of the Civil Service Act. It was put to a very severe test by those who came into office in 1911. So much so, indeed, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), speaking of the system of patronage said:

> It almost always causes the dry rot and disintegration that break up Government after Government and party after party. . . .If there is any canker of public corruption, in 99 cases out of 100 you can trace it to the baneful effect of political party patronage.

My hon. friend used those strong words after he had seen his own colleagues in the late Government administering the Civil Service Act. He had seen what Mr. Rogers, the late Minister of Public Works, had done in his own department, namely, appointing in defiance of the Civil Service Commission, a gentleman as chief architect of the Public Works Department, giving him a salary of $7,000, after the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission had refused to recommend him as chief architect, and also had refused to yield to the ultimatum that had been served upon him to recommend such a high salary for that official. I am glad that the Minister of Public Works of to-day has given a permanent leave of absence to that official. My hon. friend may, therefore, just as well have more faith in his old friends than in his new associates as regards the milennium which he is seeking to bring about by this legislation. Does he not know that in 1904, in 1908, and in 1911 promises of Civil Service reform were made by members of the Conservative party, and that Sir Robert Borden pledged himself that there would be Civil Service reform not only in the Inside Service, but in the Outside Service? In the month of December last the Government issued a new manifesto, in which a solemn pledge was taken before the electors of Canada that this Government would put an end for the future to patronage in the public service. At that time, however, and during several weeks afterwards, hundreds of young men and young girls were being taken into the various Government boards and departments, always under the shallow pretext of winning the war. In the city of Ottawa, although we had another solemn pledge embalmed in an Order in Council, passed in 1915, that preference would always be given returned soldiers, we found that the best positions in the Civil Service were given, not to returned soldiers, but to party managers and ward politicians. Take the case of the postmastership at Ottawa. In the first place, I do not know why Mr. Gouin, the postmaster, was relieved of his duties. He was still hale and hearty, a splendid official, giving entire satisfaction to the public. Nevertheless, he was superannuated, and to the dismay of the people, Mr. Acres, who was the secretary of the Conservative association in Ottawa, was given the position, in defiance of the protest of the Civil Service Federation. The Civil Service Federation, which, I believe, has been consulted concerning this Bill, protested most vehemently to the Prime Minister when it became known that Mr. Acres would be appointed, because there were able officials of twenty and twenty-five years' standing in the Ottawa post office whose services were ignored. And for what purpose? To give a fat office to the secretary of the Ottawa Conservative association. I do not know Mr. Acres. I hope he will prove a good official. I know he is a respected citizen of the city of Ottawa. But why did the Government pass over the heads of old employees in the Ottawa post office, after the pledge had been given by the Prime Minister and by some of his colleagues at the beginning of the election campaign, that there would be no more patronage in the public service.

Let us take the case of the Montreal customs collectorship. I know Mr. Weldon, who will prove an excellent collector of customs. At the last session of Parliament, when we were discussing the estimates, the present Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) made a distinct promise that this office would go to a returned soldier. Yet, a few months after that solemn pledge was given, alderman Weldon was given the position. I do not object to Mr. Weldon personally. I know he will be an excellent collector of customs, I know he has served in South Africa. The fact remains, however, that a pledge was given that a returned soldier would get the Montreal collectorship of customs. There again the principle of promotion, the principle of competition, was not followed. Quite a host of other appointments from the ranks of the friends of the party have been made. An appointment was given to Mr. Nichols, half brother of the present Minister of Finance. Mr. Brabazon a former member of this House was appointed Superintendent of Works on the Ottawa river. I forget the others, but quite an array of Conservative politicians received fat appointments immediately before or immediately after the election, although at that time the Government was preaching throughout the land that there would be no more patronage at Ottawa. In the case of an appointment made at Wingham, Ontario, the principle that postmasters should be appointed only by the Civil Service Commission was again made light of, and a member of the local legislature, I forget his name, was appointed postmaster. The Acting Minister of Finance should not be surprised if we are a little dubious as to the sincerity of the Government in regard to this proposed reform. Until we have strong evidence of its sincerity, we are "Doubting Thomases." We shall, at all events, await with interest the explanation of the Government in regard to the appointment of Mr. Acres at Ottawa. I am anxious to hear what the Acting Minister of Finance has to say about that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A few moments ago I stated that I did not think the great advance proposed by the terms of the Order in Council in the Civil Service of this country could have been accomplished by the leader of the Opposition, if he were in power as leader of the Liberal party, nor by the present Prime Minister if he were in office as head of the Conservative party. I did not intend to detract in the slightest from the credit due to the ministry led by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition for passing the Civil Service Act of 1908. On the contrary, I think that ministry is entitled to every possible credit for passing that Act. It was a great reform. I repeat I do not in the slightest degree wish to minimize the efforts made by the ministry of that day. because I was in Parliament myself and supported the Bill.

The Inside Service is very small as compared with the Outside Service in Canada. and the reform contemplated by the Bill which I am about to introduce was only possible by reason of the political conditions which now exist. When my hon. friend referred to the late ministry I think he meant the ministry of which he was a member himself, because the late ministry was the ministry led by the present Prime Minister and was supported by what was known as the Conservative party. My hon. friend is inclined to doubt whether the Act to be framed on the lines indicated by me a few moments ago will be faithfully administered and strictly adhered to. It is very natural for my hon.

friends opposite to have doubts as to the ability of a ministry to enforce the promised reform in respect to the Civil Service, and I do not blame them in the slightest degree for expressing this doubt. It might well have been expressed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and by the citizens of Canada. It is such a tremendous reform to undertake that any attempt in that direction by the Government deserves the sympathy and support of every hon. gentleman in this House. no matter on which side of the Speaker he sits, because that reform can only be accomplished by having the intelligent support of the people of this country. To apply the provisions of the Civil Service Act to the Outside Service was what all parties and all governments in the past have baulked at and refused to do. But the present ministry are attempting to carry out faithfully and strictly the declaration which was made to the country by the right hon. the Prime Minister some time prior to the last election.

I do not think it is fair to judge of the bona fides of the Government in this matter by appointments which were made prior to the passage of the Order in Council. As regards appointments at Ottawa and Montreal, my hon, friend the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) says that in each case the men appointed were excellent in every respect. I take it that he means that both Mr. Acres and Mr. Weldon will make capable and efficient public servants. If that be so, I doubt if the public are very much interested as to which party both or either of these gentleman supported.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Except that the principle of promotion was ignored.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At that time the principle of promotion in the Outside Service had not been fully worked out, and no Order in Council had been promulgated. My hon. friend must remember that the elections took place only on the 17th December.

Mr. BUREAU: We remember.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And polling overseas was not concluded until the 18th day of January this year. Some time early in February the Order in Council was promulgated. I do not think my hon. friend from Maisonneuve will impress any body in this country very strongly when he urges as a criticism of the Bill which is to be introduced, or of the proposed policy of the Government, the fact that it has happened that one or two former Conservatives were appointed to office before the passage of this Order in Council. I have no doubt that before this Order in Council was passed, some persons were appointed to office, who were Liberals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There was a stampede.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know what my hon. friend means by a stampede. They may have been pressure exerted on behalf of Conservatives and also on behalf of Liberals. But that is a matter which can be of very little concern to members of Parliament now, or to the public, who naturally should be interested in the question whether the proposed reform is in the interests of the country and in the interests of wise, sound, and efficient administration of public affairs. What the public are interested to know is whether in future there will be a strict adherence to the proposals as set forth in the Order in Council, which we propose shall hereafter have statutory effect by the Bill we are about to introduce.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend says that my criticism is not justified in view of the great reform that the sinners are about to effect. I am a doubting Thomas because I have observed the performance not only of the late Government but of the present one. Let me read the pledge given just prior to the election by the Prime Minister, the leader of the Union Government.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

SITTING SUSPENDED FOR ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

The Speaker informed the House that His Honour the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty'e name the Royal Assent to the following Bills.

An Act to provide for the Time in Canada being in advance of the accepted standard time during the summer months.

An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act.

An Act to authorize re-arrangement and transfer of duties in the public service.

An Act respecting the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

An Act to amend Montreal Harbour Advances Act, 1914.

An Act to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed consideration in Committee of the Whole of the resolution providing for the revision and amendment of the Civil Service Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was saying that the reason why we have our doubts as to the sincerity of the Government in the operation of the new Act is that the Prime Minister made a very solemn pledge in the following words on the eve of the election:

> Civil Service reform with a view to extending the principle of the present Civil Service Act to the Outside Service and thus to abolish patronage and to make appointment to the Public Service upon the sole standard of merit. The Civil Service Commission has already been directed to make a report to the Prime Minister as to the necessary steps for that purpose. Such arrangements will be subject to the existing regulations, which will give preference to the appointment of returned soldiers who are duly qualified.

And in the Order in Council passed 19th February, 1918, the Prime Minister adds the following:

> The Prime Minister observes that immediately after the announcement of this policy directions were given to each department of the Government that patronage lists in every such department should be thereafter abolished.

So that immediately after the pledge was given the Prime Minister states that directions were given to each department to abolish patronage, and in spite of that hundreds of new civil servants were appointed to the various boards, commissions, and departments, and in the Outside Service here at Ottawa, Montreal, and even, I am told, in Winnipeg. Therefore, it is not surprising if we have our doubts as to the sincerity of the Government. When those appointments were made very strong protests came from the Civil Service Federation. The following statement was made:

> The Executive begs to record its deep regret in the public interest that patronage appointments have been made since December 17th, especially those made recently in Montreal and Ottawa.
> (Signed), WALTER TODD, President.

And from Winnipeg came the following telegram, dated February 17, to Sir Robert Borden:

> Desire to express keen disappointment regarding recent appointments to Montreal and Vancouver customs and consequent failure of Government to fulfil promise to eliminate patronage and recognize merit.

Another from Winnipeg:

> This association most emphatically protests appointment of Acres, Postmaster, Ottawa, in direct violation of Government pledges to people and service and demands in interests of public morality and Service, that his appointment be rescinded and made for merit only.

I am told that the Prime Minister, and my hon. friend, to whom a copy of these telegrams was sent, did not even answer. What faith can we have in the promise of the Government that patronage will be abolished even after this Act? We can have none. We had similar promises made by the late Administration before the election of 1911, and what happened? My hon. friend knows only too well that twelve thousand Liberals were dismissed and 23,000 Conservatives were appointed. I am afraid, as a result of the examples we have had since the election, that the Government will find some means to go back to the same old methods in spite of the stern and unbending Liberals who have been introduced to give new life to the old Administration.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) may rest assured that his fears will not find any justification in the actions of the Government under the proposed Civil Service Bill. If my hon. friend is anxious that the Government should be aided to implement its pledge to abolish patronage, I am sure he will facilitate the passage of this resolution and the Bill to be founded upon it. My hon. friend read from the declaration of policy which my right hon. friend Sir Robert Borden made prior to the election. That was a pledge of policy to be pursued, and a statement of fact of what had already been done. It was a pledge that it was the intention of the Government to extend the Civil Service Act to the Outside Service, and the statement of fact was that the Civil Service Commission had already been instructed to made an investigation looking towards the legislation necessary for that purpose. That is my recollection of the statement as read by my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Order in Council that I have quoted contains the pledge of the Prime Minister, and he adds the following words:

> "The Prime Minister observes that immediately after the announcement of this policy directions were given to each department of the Government that patronage lists in every such department should be thereafter abolished.

Mr. ROWELL: The declaration of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister contained a statement of fact as well as a statement of policy. It contained the statement of fact which my hon. friend has read: that patronage lists in the departments should be abolished. My hon. friend knows very well that patronage lists are not lists of appointees all over the country. The patronage lists as commonly known in the departments are lists upon which purchases of supplies are made. Appointments to the public service and the patronage lists existing in the departments are altogether different matters. The statement made by the Prime Minister is absolutely true: that he had sent notice to the departments instructing them that the patronage lists should be abolished and that purchases should be made in the public interest irrespective of these lists. That policy was further implemented by the Government, just as soon as the Government could deal with the matter by transferring the purchasing for all the departments of Government to the war purchasing commission. Therefore, that feature of the policy of the Government, and the statement of the Prime Minister when he enunciated that policy, have been carried out to the letter.

Coming back to the question of appointments to the Outside Service, the Prime Minister, as my hon. friend has read intimated that the Civil Service Commission would be asked to make a report as to the steps to be taken to bring the Outside Service under the Civil Service Act. So soon as the election was over, and when there was an opportunity to take the matter into consideration, my hon. friend will see from a perusal of the Order in Council that in the absence of the Prime Minister on vacation, I asked my hon. friend the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to take the matter up and he immediately started in with the Civil Service Commission to investigate the matter, and to see what provision should be made to give effect to the policy of the Government. My hon. friend will recollect the unfortunate and terrible disaster that happened at Halifax. The conditions following that disaster absorbed a great deal of the time of the acting Minister of Finance. Under these circumstances, it was not possible for him to make the same progress in dealing with the matter as he would have been able to do had he not been obliged to go to Halifax. It so happened, therefore, that the matter was not ripe for consideration and action when the Prime Minister returned. Upon his return, the Prime Minister took the matter up with the acting Minister of Finance and the Civil Service Commission, and an Order in Council was formulated as soon as the necessary provisions could be worked out between the members of he Government and the Civil Service Commission.

My hon. friend will bear in mind that certain appointments could only be legally made by Order in Council. Under the law as it stood, appointments to the Inside Service were made under the Civil Service Act upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, but no similar provision existed for making appointments to the Outside Service. Until new Orders in Council were passed, until the Civil Service Commission was authorized to deal with appointments to the Outside Service it necessarily followed that the old method of appointment continued. The pledge of the Prime Minister that he would have this matter investigated has been carried out, the Order in Council has been passed, and now the legislation is submitted to the House.

With reference to the number of persons involved in this change, I am sorry that I have not the exact figures here. I did not know that this matter was coming up at this time, but my recollection is that there are in the Inside Service about 5,000 persons and in the Outside Service about 35,000. You cannot make a change affecting such a large number of officials without the necessary careful consideration and preparation by the Civil Service Commission. You cannot at one stroke transfer to a commission which has been dealing with 5,000 employees in the Inside Service the burden of dealing with 35,000 employees throughout the whole Dominion. You must give consideration and serious thought to the details necessary to work out such a radical change. I think it must be conceded by all that this is the most radical proposal in the way of Civil Service reform that has ever been made on this continent at least, and I think I am safe in saying that it is the most radical that has ever been made at one stroke in any country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Acres' appointment was not so imperative.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not say that any appointment was imperative. Appointments were made under Order in Council because that was the necessary and legal course until a new policy was legally put into effect. Mr. Acres was appointed under the law that was then in force. My hon. friend, the acting Minister of Finance, is correct in saying that what the country is interested in is the fact that this reform is to go into effect. If all the comment that has been made in reference to two or three appointments, which, it is said, were political appointments, is justified, what is the country going to be saved from when this legislation goes into effect and when 35,000 appointments from one end of Canada to the other will no longer be political appointments as they have been in the past, but will be non-political appointments under the provisions of the Civil Service Act? That indicates the character and extent of the reform.

One word more and I am through. My hon. friend referred to one appointment of which I have particular knowledge and, therefore, I wish to mention it. He referred to the appointment of Mr. Nichols as a relative of the Minister of Finance and as a Conservative appointment pressed in before the election. Mr. Nichols was not appointed because, but in spite of the fact that, he was a relative of a member of the Government, and he was appointed after consultation with gentlemen of the press, because he was represented as the best newspaper man whom we could find who would be available to become director of public information and carry on that work for the Government. He was appointed solely because he was believed to be the best man for the position, and in spite of his relationship. And I can say this further: As far as the Minister of Finance was concerned he did not know that the appointment was under consideration, or in fact anything about it, until the proposal was submitted to Council. I know that because the appointment came under my personal charge, and it was made on my own recommendation.

Mr. BUREAU: If you get your neighbour to make an appointment, it is no better justification than if you put the appointment through yourself.

Mr. ROWELL: I have already given my hon. friend my word that the Minister of Finance knew absolutely nothing about it, and that the appointment was made on my recommendation.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not improve matters at all.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know what my hon. friend means when he says "if a man gets his neighbour to do it."

Mr. BUREAU: I will tell you what it means. It means that the Minister of Trade and Commerce may appoint the Prime Minister's brother, to a Government position, and in return the Prime Minister may appoint to an office some relative of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That explanation does not justify the appointment.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It is the return of a courtesy. Here we have an exemplification of the advantages of Union Government.

Mr. ROWELL: The courtesy has not yet been returned.

Mr. BUREAU: It may be expected.

Mr. ROWELL: I repeat that the appointment of this gentleman was made after consultation with gentlemen of the press who represented him as the best newspaper man available for this important and responsible post. It was not made because he was a Conservative, a Liberal would under like circumstances have been taken just as quickly. My hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) may feign surprise, but the statement is nevertheless true.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed consideration in Committee of the resolution providing for the revision and amendment of the Civil Service Act—Hon. A. K. Maclean—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. ROWELL: I now have the second Order in Council, dated February 28, 1918, that was referred to this afternoon. It is as follows:

Whereas doubt has arisen as to whether the Order in Council of the 13th day of February, 1918, (P.C. No. 358) respecting appointments to, promotions in, and other matters relating to the Civil Service, applies to officers, clerks and employees other than those employed in the several departments, and it being desirable to remove any such doubts;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the President of the Privy Council, is pleased to declare and it is hereby declared, that the provisions of the said Order in Council do extend to all officers, clerks and employees in the public service, whether employed in any department or under or in connection with any Commission or Board appointed or created by or the members of which are appointed by or in pursuance of any Order in Council, and any power heretofore given to any such Commission or Board or the members thereof or any of them to appoint or promote any officer, clerk or employee is hereby rescinded, except in so far as such power may be exercised subject to and in conformity with the provisions of the said Order in Council of the 13th day of February, 1918.

The purpose of this Order in Council was to make it clear that all commissions came under the provisions of the previous Order in Council.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Does that include railway employees?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: No, they were expressly excepted pending investigation by the Civil Service Commission of the conditions under which they might be brought under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: When we rose at six o'clock, the President of the Council was making statements which rather excited my curiosity. He stated—if I am in error, he will correct me, because I do not wish to misrepresent him—that Mr. Nichols' appointment was made in spite of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White).

Mr. ROWELL: I said, not because of, but in spite of, his being a relative.

Mr. BUREAU: My error appears to be a grammatical one; I think that I understood my hon. friend rightly. The appointment was made as a result of a conference between the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) and certain newspapers or newspaper proprietors. The position is a rather important one. A bureau of information was being created to deal with matters connected with the war, and it was necessary that a man of superior ability and integrity, who enjoyed the confidence of the people, should be obtained for the position. We have known Mr. Nichols as the editor of a Montreal newspaper, and as such he must be fairly known to all other newspaper editors. The member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) was talking the other night about the relations between the President of the Council and certain newspapers. It would seem that my hon. friend himself, therefore, knows something about newspapers.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not catch my hon. friend's last remark.

Mr. BUREAU: I understood the member for Russell to intimate that the President of the Council was himself connected with newspapers.

Mr. ROWELL: No, that is incorrect.

Mr. BUREAU: I am glad to accept the correction. But it was important that my hon. friend communicate with other newspaper men if he desired to obtain a man who had the necessary qualifications as a publicity agent. As a matter of curiosity and of information, may I ask the President of the Council whether he consulted editors of such Toronto newspapers as the Star, Mail and Empire, News, World and Telegram; or of such Montreal newspapers as the Star and the Gazette; or of the Winnipeg Tribune or Winnipeg Free Press? Of course, down home, we do not get the coast newspapers.

Mr. SHEARD: The Orange Sentinel.

Mr. BUREAU: The proprietor of that paper, being in the House, could be consulted now, if not then. That, however, would depend on the judgment of the President of the Council. I suppose some of these gentlemen were consulted, having regard to the fact that the appointment was being pressed so strongly upon the Government in spite of his relation to the minister, because there must have been some grave reason for the appointment being made in spite of the relationship.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BUREAU: No. I want to know what editors or members connected with any of those newspapers were consulted.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend asks me if any editors or members connected with some of the papers named were consulted. I can say, yes, but I do not think that when a minister of the Crown consults parties with reference to matters relating to appointments in the public service, it is wise to disclose confidences, where there are confidential communications.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I just came in when the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) was speaking. Was the hon. member criticising the appointee as being incompetent?

Mr. BUREAU: No. I suppose my hon. friend was not in the House this afternoon.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I was, most of the time.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, when the question arose, somebody in the House stated that the appointment of Mr. Nichols was rather shady, because he was a brother-in-law or a half-brother, I do not know which, of the Minister of Finance. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) explained that in spite of that relationship—they had to fight against this very thing that is so obnoxious to them—they appointed him on account of his super-qualities. But not only were those super-qualities in the judgment of the President of the Council, they were impressed upon him by editors of the leading newspapers of this province. I am inquiring from the minister who those editors are. I see the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) does not nod assent. I suppose he was not consulted.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That was not what I had in mind at all when I rose to speak. I am not prepared to discuss the question as to whether the apppointment was necessary or not, but I should like to say that I have known Mr. Nichols intimately for twenty years, and I desire to pay testimony to his rare ability. He was an excellent newspaper man; he is a man of splendid parts, most aggressive and thoroughly reliable. From my long and intimate acquaintance with him, I would say that if one were to search Canada, one probably could not find more than half a dozen as bright men as Mr. Nichols. If he has the misfortune to be half-brother to the Minister of Finance—

Mr. BUREAU: That was not a misfortune in this case.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Mr. Nichols and I were members of the same board for three or four years. We met weekly and it was the universal testimony of newspaper men in the West that Mr. Nichols was a man of exceptional ability. It would be very difficult to find a man more fitted for most occupations, except possibly the preaching of the Gospel, than Mr. Nichols.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: While I agree with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) that Mr. Nichols is a journalist of standing, I do not accept the reasoning of the President of the Council when he says that he cannot state under what recommendations Mr. Nichols was preferred to others. I am told by reliable parties, who belong to the press, that many others could have been selected for the post to which Mr. Nichols was appointed. More than that, I am told that the position itself was not required at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That may be.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not the question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to put a question to the President of the Council. Mr. Nichols is an excellent journalist. He was at one time in Montreal publishing the Daily Mail and the Evening News. I may say, by the way, that he killed both papers. The President of the Council is, perhaps, not familiar with conditions in Montreal. I know that while he was leader of the Liberal party in Ontario he had to read many newspapers published in his own province. I may tell him that for months and months Mr. Nichols and his two organs in Montreal, the Daily Mail and the Evening News, never ceased to attack most bitterly a gentleman who was in the late Government. I refer to the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), a dear friend of mine, as hon. members all know. I have heard the ex-Minister of Militia complaining in this House to the Minister of Finance in regard to those attacks. He referred to them in many of his speeches. He said that there was a conspiracy in the Government against him and that Mr. Nichols was the instrument to carry out that conspiracy. Let us come to the point at issue. My hon. friend cannot with a wave of the hand dismiss the case so easily, because with all its glorious promises of Civil Service reform, the new Government has appointed Mr. McLean, Comptroller of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, Mr. Boyce a member of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and Mr. Brabazon as Inspector of the Ottawa Dam Works.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Superintendent of the Works on the Ottawa River. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that Mr. Nichols is the very acme of the ideal journalist.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I did not say he was the ideal journalist, but he is a good man.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let me say he is just as good a journalist as my good friend from Springfield.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Then he is all right.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the President of the Privy Council justify Mr. Nichols' appointment to a post that is not required at all on the mere ground that he is a good journalist? Will my hon. friend tell us, first, the salary of Mr. Nichols; second, where his office is in Ottawa, and third, the nature of the work connected with his office? I understand, for instance, the necessity for the creation of a propaganda office in England. Whilst I do not accept the appointment which has been made and which has been so severely criticised by both political parties in England, that of Lord Northcliffe, Lord Beaverbrook and Lord Rothermere; still, in England they are not far from the Continent, and it is necessary to carry out the propaganda there. All the European governments have been carrying out propaganda on the Continent. I can understand that. But why here in Canada have an office for propaganda? What propaganda and what work has Mr. Nichols performed? Can my hon. friend show me anything that Mr. Nichols has accomplished since his appointment at the high salary of $5,000 a year? What is the nature of that propaganda? I am not accusing; I am asking. Is it a political propaganda? Does it consist in the publication of those appeals which were made during the recent election and which were spread in the press from one end of the country to the other? If that is the nature of his work, I blame the Government very seriously for the appointment of Mr. Nichols, because that propaganda was not in the public interest; on the contrary, it was to promote a political interest and nothing else, and certainly it was far from promoting national unity. But what his duties are I do not know, and I should be glad to hear from my hon. friend who brought up this subject this afternoon. We are told—and I draw the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to this—that we are displaying parochialism when we rise and criticise these matters. The other day I resented his telling me, when I was discussing the famous Order in Council about the borrowing powers of the provinces that I was giving vent to parochial views. This is not parochialism. Surely the duty of my hon. friend as Acting Minister of Finance is to check the expenditure of this country. If there was one thing which I admired this afternoon in the speech of another old friend now in exile on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), it was his quotation from Mr. Gladstone that a Finance Minister should never be ashamed of cheese paring. The hon. member for Red Deer said that this Government was elected with a specific mandate to win the war. If we are to win the war we must take the necessary means, and surely we must check the expenditure. I say that spending $5,000 here and $2,000 there and $6,000 elsewhere is lavish expenditure, and I do not consider myself parochial in bringing this matter before the House. I am sincere in what I say.

Mr. RICHARDSON: When I was defending the appointment, I was speaking of Mr. Nichols as a journalist. I do not know if he was required or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As one of the leaders of journalism in Canada, my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) would perhaps give me the benefit of his views. Does he believe that Mr. Nichols or any other gentleman is needed for propaganda literature in Canada at the present time? All the Germans and all the Austrians are interned, and it seems to me that propaganda of that nature can have very little influence on public opinion in this country; and certainly if the literature he is turning out is what was published during the last election, far from helping the cause it has just the contrary effect.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Nichols, of course, has had nothing to do with political propaganda in any shape or form. His work is solely in connection with the war and the matters already set out in the return brought down. Might I suggest that it would be a more convenient time to give detailed information when my estimates are up, when I shall be very glad to go fully into this matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is in my hon. friend's department?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is his salary?

Mr. ROWELL: It is $5,000.

Mr. FIELDING: The resolution before you, Mr. Chairman, is one that has my warmest sympathy and support, and if I make an observation or two concerning it, it is only that I may obtain some information as to the machinery whereby my hon. friend expects to carry it out. I notice the salary to be voted for the chairman of that board is $6,000. My recollection is that the salary in the past has been $5,000. Am I not right?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Six thousand, I think.

Mr. FIELDING: My recollection is that the chairman has heretofore been paid $5,000, and it is now proposed to increase his salary to $6,000, but I am not complaining about that, I take it for granted that the Government have good reason for increasing the salary, and I just wanted to be sure whether my memory was correct as to the figure. One of my difficulties is in understanding how this excellent programme is to be carried out, and I am not sure that my difficulty is any greater than the Government's, because I fancy they have their own troubles in the matter. I think we are getting away from the purpose for which the Civil Service Commission was created. It was never intended to be a patronage distributing body, but a body with distinct purposes, a body to hold examinations and to take means of guaranteeing the qualifications of applicants for the Public Service. That, I think, is a correct statement of its original purpose. But now the Government seem to be obliged—I am not saying they could do otherwise—to make this commission a patronage distributing body. Now to say to A, B and C, who are members of Parliament, that they shall have no right to nominate anybody, but that D, E and F, who are called the Civil Service Board, shall nominate and appoint the men, does not seem to me to be abolishing patronage; it is simply transferring it from a number of gentlemen who, whatever their faults may be, have some knowledge of local conditions, and turning it over to gentlemen who have no knowledge of local conditions. It seems to me that is the effect of it. I happen to have a copy of the latest Order in Council that has been issued, and here is how it proposes to deal with the post office:

When the appointment of a rural postmaster is desired the Commission shall, through the responsible official of the Post Office Department—

I do not quite know who that is; there are a great many responsible officials in the Post Office Department.

—institute inquiries in the locality in which the appointment is to be made, with a view to securing a suitable person, suitably located, for such position and, having made a selection and having satisfied themselves that such person possesses sufficient education to enable him to efficiently discharge the duties of the position and that he is duly qualified as to health, character and habits, the certificate required for his appointment shall be issued.

Where is the Civil Service Commission going to get information regarding all the virtues of this man who is to fill the office of postmaster away out at Blankville in Cape Breton county? I do not know what the experience of others has been, but I have had some of the worries of my life in getting a capable man to accept the position of postmaster, and how these excellent gentlemen in the city of Ottawa are going to get a postmaster for Blankville better than any one of us I fail to comprehend.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Will the hon. gentleman suggest what method he thinks should be followed?

Mr. FIELDING: I confess my difficulty. I merely say the Government is not making it any better, that is all; I am not complaining. I said a moment ago I was very much afraid that my friends in the Cabinet are no wiser than I am. I know their object is good, and I think they are trying to find a way of accomplishing it.

I cannot understand how this Civil Service Commission located in Ottawa is going to be able to obtain any better information about a man who is qualified to be a postmaster down in my constituency than I can obtain myself. You may say I would make a partisan recommendation, and perhaps I would. You know these commissioners of the Civil Service are only human. They will get information from somebody, and he may be a partisan, and perhaps not as fair-minded a person as I hope I am myself. I only want to state that the machinery by which the Cabinet is endeavouring to accomplish their purpose seems to me to be full of trouble. I do not think it is going to work well. I do not blame the Cabinet for trying to do it; it may be the best way. With reference to the nomination for this fifty-dollar postmastership, if you are going to say a member of Parliament is not to be trusted to make the nomination—and he knows something about it at all events—and you are going to turn it over to three gentlemen in Ottawa who may know nothing about it, it seems to me it will not work out. I want to help my hon. friends to work it out. I am not complaining. I call attention to some of the difficulties they have in their way. I am not doing it in a fault-finding way. I would be glad to make it better if I could.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It seems to me the criticism of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) is unfair and destructive. When a man rises to criticise the action of somebody else it his duty to propose an alternative. I do not think it is fair to suggest that two or three gentlemen in Ottawa are going to select the postmasters at $50 a year for Burrard Inlet or some place in Cape Breton. I think the resolution is clear on that point. It says the responsible officer—meaning, of course, the inspector in the district where the vacancy occurs—shall be the man who will make the inquiry. You will not always get just the exact and proper man to fill this position, of course. But what has been the experience in the past 40 or 50 years? All sorts of partisan appointments have been made. When the Government changed charges were made against postmasters for partisanship, and postmasters have been dismissed. It seems to me it is the absolute duty of every hon. gentleman to support this idea. The idea is to get rid of partisanship and patronage in appointments. If the hon. gentleman knows any better method than that suggested by the Government, it is his duty to propose it. He must lay some constructive scheme before this House before he will induce me, at least, to accept his criticism, and to oppose the scheme which the Government proposes. It must surely be the conviction of every hon. member in this House, as well as the conviction of every thoughtful man in this country, that if there has been one curse in connection with public administration it has been the patronage system. If the Government is making, as I believe it is, an honest effort to strike a deadly blow at patronage, then, instead of being criticized, the Government should be encouraged in every possible way. It is a Union Government, a government composed of both parties. I cannot say that they had the unanimous support of every section of Canada at the last election, but they were not so far from it. This Government, therefore, is in a position that no other government in Canada has ever occupied to accomplish such reforms as the one now proposed. If hon. members are disposed to carp, criticize and attempt to destroy the efforts of the Government, they are going to paralyze the arm of the Government. It is amazing to me that any thoughtful Canadian who has watched the working of the patronage system in this Dominion for the last thirty, forty or fifty years, should not hold up both hands in support of any effort, if this effort is being honestly made, to strike a death blow at the patronage system.

Mr. FIELDING: I have stated that I am in favour of the resolution. The effort of my hon. friend in picturing me as trying to destroy the efforts of the Government is unnecessary, and his statement is groundless. I am trying to get some information. I may not get it from the members of the Government; they may be in as much difficulty as I am. I am trying to suggest to the members the difficult position in which this Bill is placing the Civil Service Commission. When the Civil Service Commission is asked to conduct an examination, or to judge as between A, B. C and D, and award the recommendation to the man who wins the prize, that is the purpose of the Civil Service Commission, but I cannot see how the thing is to work out, or how this commission is going to get information as to petty appointments all over the country. My hon. friend says the inspector for the district will select the man. He is only a human being like ourselves. My point, with respect to that class of small appointments is that the Government is not going to make things any better. I can tell my hon. friend a better rule than the one he has laid down, and that is that if anybody proposes a change he must advocate the change and show reason for it; he cannot propose a negative. He might say: "Well, let well enough alone." I do not say, "Let well enough alone," I admit the trouble; I know the tremenduous harm that is done by patronage. But patronage may be honestly and fairly administrated, or it may be abused. The idea that every appointment that has been made under the patronage system is a bad one, is a delusion. Three out of four men appointed to office have served the country well. There have been abuses in the patronage system, and there may be abuses under this system. The only point I am asking is that it seems to me the imposition of these duties on the Civil Service Commission, is inconsistent with their original purpose, and I am trying to find out whether the system will work out well. I hope it will.

Mr. EDWARDS: I agree with very much that has been said by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, and whether his remarks are regarded as constructive criticism or not, I venture to say that in the working out of this plan much that he has said will have to be taken into consideration in order to make the plan workable. There has been a great deal said and printed in the papers in regard to the patronage evil, and in order to get rid of this supposed evil this scheme has been evolved. I take it I am expressing the opinion of every hon. member in this House when I say no member of Parliament is anxious to administer the patronage in his constituency; we would all like to get rid of it. But I fail to see how it is possible to administer the Civil Service and make the various small appointments throughout the length and breadth of this land without receiving the advice of the man who knows more than anybody else about the outlying portions of this country, namely, the member for the constituency. Further, in regard to the patronage evil, it is my firm conviction that, notwithstanding the fact that the Inside Service has for years been under the Civil Service Commission, the Outside Service appointments which have been made, if you like, through the member or by the administration of patronage, are better appointments, and the service is much more efficient than the service in Ottawa, where the appointments were made under the Civil Service Commission. And why? Take my own constituency—and I am speaking, I am sure, for every other man in this House—there is a safeguard in regard to the appointment to the Outside Service by reason of the fact that every member of Parliament who makes a recommendation to office, whether it be a post office appointment or the appointment of a preventive officer, or some other small job, at $50 or $100 or $200 a year, knows that he has upon him the eyes of the people of that locality who are going to criticise him and watch his movements very closely. He knows also that he is responsible to his people. All this makes him careful as to the men he names to fill positions. That is a conclusion which cannot be overlooked. There have been some patronage evils, no doubt, but most of the trouble in regard to the evils of party patronage have been in connection with the large purchases of supplies or something of that kind. I do not believe there has been warrant for the criticism and the newspaper talk in regard to the patronage evil in so far as the hundreds of minor appointments are concerned. For instance, there is a vacancy in my constituency; a little position which pays the munificent salary of $150 a year happened to become vacant last fall. It was a position that did not require to be filled immediately inasmuch as there was nothing for the appointee to do until the season of navigation began. It is impossible to get an outsider to go in there. The appointee must be some person who lives in that locality and has something else to depend upon for a living. A man is necessary there and we have to appoint some one. Who knows better than the representative of the constituency who would be the best man for the position? Is not the public interest safeguarded in taking a recommendation from me, in that I know that if I name for the position some person who is not qualified and who is not entitled to it, I will bring down upon myself the criticism of the whole community? They will get after you—that has the tendency to keep you straight. How is that position going to be filled? Are you going to refer it to the Civil Service Commission? If so, what are they going to do? They have to get somebody to find out who is qualified to take that post. The same thing applies to the appointment of postmasters here and there throughout the country. It is all right enough to say that the inspector of the post office district would be asked to name a man. How is he going to name a man? My constituency is a hundred miles long. I venture to say that the post office inspector, who lives in Kingston, has never been in the northern part of my county and does not know any more about the place than he knows about Cape Breton. He has to apply to some man who is thoroughly acquainted with the riding.

I do not think that there has ever been justification for a considerable part of the criticism which has been offered in regard to party patronage and which has appeared so profusely in the press. I am not saying that the idea of the Government putting the Outside Service, generally speaking, under the commission and getting it out of party politics is not one worthy of support and consideration. But it does seem to me that the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) were very much to the point and ought to be taken into consideration by the Government when they come to work this matter out. I do not see how they are going to work it out. Are they going to refer to the Civil Service Commission the appointment of a labourer in a drain or some such little job where a man gets $150 or $200 a year? I do not think it is workable or practicable and I do not think the system should apply to these positions. The Civil Service Commission, apparently, is not asked in regard to positions when they carry salaries of $6,000 or $8,000 a year. There is not nearly as much consideration given then to safeguarding the public interest. It seems to me to be straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel when you speak of a desire to safeguard the public interest by looking after the appointment of people to little positions worth $150 or $100 a year and putting such appointments under a commission that does not and cannot know anything about the circumstances bearing upon the case.

Mr. DEVLIN: I believe that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) has put his finger on what is going to be the great difficulty in the working out of this Act. Advice must be sought, and it is natural that the member for the constituency should be in the best position to give advice. I also agree with the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). At the same time, if I understand the idea of the resolution, it is to absolutely remove patronage from the hands of members of Parliament. I think the hon. members for Ottawa city will be willing factors in that movement. It is strange that we get in our mail, practically every day, from the Civil Service Commission, notices that certain positions are vacant, the idea of the notices being that we should send in a recommendation for the filling of these positions. Whether these recommendations will be acted upon is another matter. If I had a suggestion to make—and I do this for the benefit of the hon. member from Springfield (Mr. Richardson)—it would be that in all matters where appointments are to be made in rural districts, the advice of the municipal councils be sought and that the Civil Service Commission act upon the recommendation of those councils. I know of no less partisan bodies than the municipal councils.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favour of this resolution. I believe it involves one of the most important steps that the Union Government have taken—if they will only do it, honestly, candidly and without hypocrisy. I heard my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) say to-day that the Union Government was elected especially to win the war. In so far as that is its purpose I am prepared to tell him that every man in this House, so far as I know, is behind the Government; we all want to win the war. But, at the same time, while we are behind this Government, and while we are anxious to win the war, we want to be in a position to carry on the public affairs with honesty, economy and integrity. The Order in Council that this resolution is based upon calls for the appointment of public servants through competitive examination and otherwise eliminating party patronage. In the name of common sense, why does not this Government include in the elimination, patronage in the railway system of Canada? Canada is entering upon a great railway nationalization policy, and unless this elimination of patronage is made applicable to the railway system, the railways will own Canada and not Canada the railways; the railways will own the Government and the Government will not own the railways. I speak with some authority on this subject, as I have lived right alongside the railroad, which runs past the corner of my house, and I come from a province that was sold into the Dominion of Canada absolutely through its railway; and I say that this patronage has been the curse of the whole Governmental system in the Dominion of Canada. Now, my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who, I understand, stands for "Free Trade as it is in England,"—though he should stand for "Free Trade as it should be in Canada,"—can give us better advice from the English standpoint on this question of Civil Service reform, because there is no country in the world that has solved that question so completely, so splendidly, so efficaciously, and so thoroughly, as Great Britain. I know my hon. friend from Red Deer can give us a pointer in that regard. I have had the opportunity of knowing the Old Country almost as well as our own, having visited Britain nearly every year for thirty years, and having to do with civil servants there —Customs House officers and all that class of men—directly and indirectly; and I want to say that over there they do not have any of this trouble in regard to patronage that we have had in Canada. Patronage in this country is one of the worst things that exist to-day in civil government. It is bad because it lends itself to a system of corruption. It is one of the most corrupt methods of canvassing for votes, going and promising half a dozen men an office. In that respect difficulties have been created for members of Parliament, and I am sure that every man in this House will hold up both hands to get clear of patronage, except one or two. You have heard of the prisoner of Chillon. The prisoner of Chillon was imprisoned for so long that when he was liberated he went back to the prison, he could not live with the manacles off him. And, unfortunately, there are some men like that.

I am going to vote for this resolution, and I want other hon. members to do the same. I do not use the term "hon. members" now in the sense that Mark Antony used the word "honourable" when he said, "so are they all, all honourable men," when he was speaking about Brutus with the blood still dripping from the dagger. But I mean honourable men in the parliamentary sense of the term. Now, to show you the earnestness of some members of Parliament——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some members of the Government.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Yes, some members of the Government——on this question of patronage. I wrote one of the hon. members of the Government under date of January 9th on this subject, and asked him that now that the Union Government——

Mr. MURPHY: That was after the election.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: That was after the election. I wrote one of the hon. members of the Government to the effect that now the Union Government had been returned to power I presumed that patronage was going to be eliminated. With regard to the question of Union Government I want to say that, so far as I was concerned personally, I was, and am now, in favour of a Union Government that would have commended itself to me, but I wanted it to be a Union Government that stood for unity. However, be that as it may, I wrote and pointed out that there was a certain section in my constituency where the probability was that some men would be required in the public service, and asked if it was the intention of the Government to eliminate partisan patronage in the appointment of these people. I desired to do away with the irritation that had been rampant all over the country with regard to patronage, especially during election time. But the young gentleman I was running against, who happens to be my own nephew, when the word came down that the sheriff of the county was going to be appointed as the returning officer, sent him a list of fifty enumerators, and every one of them was a dyed-in-the-wool Tory. And yet he was calling himself a Unionist, a fifty-fifty man. That was irritating people very much and I wanted to do away with the irritation, and to tell you the truth, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to see Union Government a success. If the Union Government are not a success we should turn them out, and hon. gentlemen on the other side will help us to do that, I am satisfied. Now here is the letter:

9 p.m.

Dear Sir,—

Yours of the 9th instant duly received. As far as any patronage in connection with the Railway Department is concerned, there is not the slightest doubt but that both Liberals and Conservatives who supported the Union Government will receive every consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name, name.

Mr. READ: The writer of that letter was a member of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name, name.

Mr. READ: No, I will not give the name, because:

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return,

I have a letter from another member of the Government and his reply was to this effect: So far as I am personally concerned, I mean what I promised the people publicly and privately, and that was to eliminate partisan patronage.

I mention these matters because I want these gentlemen to get together and reform themselves. If we are going to have stable government they must get together on principle where honesty and integrity are the paramount issues, and where hypocrisy is absolutely eliminated. Hypocrisy in public life is nearly as bad as it is in religious life, and we know all about that.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I am going to support the motion, and I hope that when the Bill comes down my hon. friends in the Government will see to it that the railway system is brought within its scope. If they do not they are going to make the biggest mistake they ever made in their lives, both in their own interest and the interest of the public. If there is any public service in this country that requires the elimination of patronage more than another, yes, five times more than any other—and I speak with authority because I know from experience—it is the railway service. That service as a Government service it is going to spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific with its branch lines and its ramifications. Talk about the Inside Service and the Outside Service, why, there will not be any comparison between them. I tell you that when this great railway system goes through the country, unless we adopt the principle of putting it under commission—not only the appointment to it, but the whole great railway system—putting it under a non-partisan commission, the members of which would have all the authority, all the sanctity and all the judicial capacity of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, there is going to be trouble.

The Civil Service Commissioner whose salary is named in this resolution should be a man of the very highest integrity. He should be above any government; like the Auditor General, he should be in a position to tell the Government to go to Hades if it does not do what was right.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: At the beginning of a new Parliament one gets many surprises. I must say that the greatest surprise I have received yet in this Parliament was in finding any disposition on the part of the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), or the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to hang on to some belief in the old doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils." The member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) put his finger on the essence of what the Government is trying to obtain in the destruction of patronage. It is, as I conceive it, to separate the member of Parliament from the appointments in his constituency. What would happen if we could accomplish that? In the first place, the people of the country who are civil servants would know that they held their positions upon their merits, and would give their service accordingly. In the second place, the whole of the people would, at election time, vote upon public questions as they conceived those questions would work out for the public good, and not for their own private emolument. That is what would be the effect upon the people; what would be the effect upon members of Parliament? Knowing that the people were going to vote upon the merits of public questions, candidates for Parliament would inform themselves upon public questions and would stand upon their intellectual and political merits for election, not upon their ability to go in for what my friend opposite has called corruption. That is the gist of the whole matter as it appears to me. Can any member of this House who considers the question from that point of view fail to see that if we carry out this principle it will immensely elevate the public life of the country? That is what I mean by the abolition of patronage in this particular aspect. As to who should make the appointments in small country post offices, in my part of the world it has been a very great difficulty to get men to take office at all. In many cases, when asked for a recommendation, I have simply written a letter to the department, saying: Ask the inspector to go there and get the best man he can, whatever his political colour may be. The member for Frontenac says that he knows the people in his district better than certain other men can know them. That is just the trouble with a great many of us; we have known the districts, and known the men. We all know—let us get rid of cant in this matter—that men have been appointed by members of all political complexions with the expectation that political services would be rendered for the appointments. Now, that should go. Men should be appointed to serve the public because of their merits, they should be promoted because of their merits, and they should be free to act for the public good at election time just as members should be allowed to stand for the public good and for the public good only, and to stand for public questions on their merits. I repeat that if that can be brought about, it will immensely elevate the public life of the country and make for the good of Canada.

I want to say this on behalf of the Government: No sane man expects them to produce in one moment a perfect scheme for this change, in all the manifold complexities of this great country and its public services. But in making an honest endeavour to begin to do it, they deserve the sympathy of every right-thinking person in the country. They certainly have my sympathy; they will have all the help that I can give them; and if they go on courageously in the way they are beginning, they will have the encouragement of all the best-thinking people in large portions, at any rate, of this Dominion. So far as the next election goes, if anybody is looking so far ahead, he will stand much better under this system than if he had hung on to the old method of giving enough jobs to get enough votes to be returned to Parliament.

Mr. FIELDING: If I gave my hon. friend the impression that I proclaimed the doctrine that "to the victor belongs the spoils," or that I was anxious to cling to the system of the distribution of patronage, then I can only say that I failed to speak with that clearness which I always endeavour to attain, though I may not always succeed. I have no desire to do either one. I have never proclaimed the doctrine that "to the victor belongs the spoils," in the sense in which the words are commonly used—though there is a sense in which the words might be legitimately applied. Nor do I desire to cling to patronage. I have had some experience of it, and it has not been exactly in the line that my hon. friend suggests. His idea is that when one is instrumental in getting one of his friends a public office, he expects to be rewarded with political support. Well, that is not my experience. On the contrary, when I have had opportunity of recommending a man for any public office and the question of political support has come up, I have always told him: My friend, your party services have had something to do with your getting the office, but from this time forward your are the servant of the community, and I do not want you to meddle in politics. That has been my experience in the administration of patronage. The only point of my observations was to call attention to the difficult position in which the Civil Service Commission was being placed. I frankly said in reply to the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) that I could not at the moment suggest anything better. But I was pointing out that while the Civil Service Commission would be an excellent body to hold examinations, to test qualifications, to decide as between A, B, C, and D for any particular office—that is the duty they were originally intended to discharge, and they are well qualified to discharge it—yet where there can be no examination and no test, nothing more than an inquiry somewhere, the Civil Service Commission were in no better position to get information of that character than anybody else.

Mr. EDWARDS: I also, Mr. Chairman, want to repudiate the suggestion that I am one wrapped up in the theory, that "to the victors belong the spoils." I am sure that every member of this House would gladly wash his hands of appointments even to a $50 or a $150 job. It is not that we want that work, for political or any other reasons. But I say again that I do not see how it will be possible for the Civil Service Commission, sitting in Ottawa, to ascertain the proper persons to appoint to these positions without applying to those who might be reasonably expected to know who were qualified for them. I repudiate the reflection which I maintain is to a certain extent thrown upon members of Parliament generally by the wording of this resolution and by some of those who are supporting it. In effect, you are saying that no man who has been chosen as a representative of the people to sit in this House can be trusted to make an honest recommendation or to select an efficient man to fill a vacancy in the Civil Service. I have had the privilege of sitting as a member of this House since 1908, and I have honestly endeavoured, whenever it has fallen to my lot to recommend a man for a position, to recommend a man who, I believed, would perform the duties of that office efficiently and well, and in doing so I was not thinking about the next election. I believe, when I say that, I am speaking, not for myself alone, but for scores of members in this House. It is not fair to say, because it has fallen to our lot as members of Parliament to recommend men to fill vacancies in the Civil Service, that in our recommendations we were thinking about the votes we were going to get. That is putting members of Parliament on a very low plane.

Mr. TWEEDIE: If the Government succeed in placing the Outside Service under the control of the Civil Service Commission, they will have done something to justify their return to power. I wish to endorse very heartily the statements made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). If Civil Service reform is to be a success in this country, it will not depend so much upon the Government or upon the Civil Service as upon the individual private members representing the various constituencies throughout the Dominion. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) made some reference to the Inside Civil Service in the city of Ottawa. Complaints have been heard with regard to the Inside Civil Service, but I believe the blame rests upon the shoulders of the private members. We all know how every hon. member has in the past used his influence, and notwithstanding what the hon. member for Frontenac says to the contrary, hon. members have in the past used their endeavours to secure for their political friends positions in the Government service, whether at Ottawa or in any other part of the country. The question is: Are we going to be willing to sacrifice what might be termed a political vested right and uphold the work of the Civil Service Commission, or are we going to endeavour to retain in some slight degree control of these appointments throughout the Dominion of Canada? If we undertake to retain control over the minor offices or the major offices, Civil Service reform in this country will be a failure. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) seems to anticipate there will be difficulty in connection with appointments to minor positions. I do not see how there need be any difficulty. As the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) have pointed out, we have inspectors travelling throughout the Dominion in connection with the post office, customs, inland revenue, and those inspectors are the men who should be responsible to the Civil Service Commission in regard to seeing that appointees to minor positions are fully qualified. When you get down to the lowest class, such as the men who draw $100 or $150 a year, it may be for the position of a janitor or a porter, my contention has always been that the man who has charge of the post office, or the land office, or the customs office, in which a janitor is required, should have vested in him authority to hire a man to carry on that work. If the man who is at the head of that office has not the intelligence and good judgment to hire a janitor or a porter, that man should be removed from his position and a man capable of doing that work and making such appointments named in his stead. After an appointment of that kind has been made, it should be reported to the Civil Service Commission, and the appointee should hold his position unless he is removed from it for good cause.

I just wish again to point out to hon. members that in my opinion the success or the failure of the Civil Service in this country rests almost wholly upon the private members. If they will keep their hands off, if they will not importune the members of the Civil Service Commission to appoint friends to positions, if they will not use their political influence on behalf of those in whom they are interested, I believe the Civil Service Commission will do their work in a manner which will be a credit to that department. Otherwise, Civil Service reform will be a failure.

Mr. MANION: I have had an important matter brought to my attention in the last few days by a man of fairly high authority, that is, that the Civil Service Commission, with which I am wholly in sympathy, should, in filling positions in each district, appoint people residing in such district. I do not believe the Civil Service Commission should, at any time, except in unavoidable cases, bring from some outside district men into, say, my district, to fill ordinary positions in the Civil Service. There may, at times, be positions which require men having special training, but as regards ordinary positions carrying salaries of $100 a month or thereabouts, in the customs, railways and so on, I presume every constituency of the 234 constituencies in this country can supply men capable of filling such positions. A rule should be laid down that the Civil Service Commission should be instructed in so far as possible to fill those positions with men selected from the particular constituency in which a vacancy arises.

Mr. PROULX: In filling the positions will any regard be given to the different political parties? A vacancy might occur in one locality and many people might be qualified to fill it. It does not require high qualifications to fill the position of postmaster of a small place. When selections are being made, how will the officers of the Post Office Department be instructed to make selections?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will find out by some means or another.

Mr. PROULX: It will probably depend much on the political complexion of the officer. If he is in sympathy with the Government, he will endeavour to find a person who is known to be a supporter of the Government. If the officer is a supporter of the Opposition, he will probably want to select a Liberal. At the last election we were given pledges by the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues that there was to be no more patronage. The Premier stated there would be an equal division of the seats in the Cabinet amongst the Conservatives and Liberals. We have not reached that stage yet, but we expect to reach it. The other day the Premier said that he was going to implement his pledge, and that Liberals and Conservatives would occupy the same number of seats in the Cabinet. When he made that pledge, we expected that in appointments to the Senate, regard would be had to the two political parties supporting the Government. Since that pledge was given, about a dozen appointments have been made to the Senate, and I do not think one Liberal has been appointed. Perhaps the Prime Minister meant by that fifty-fifty basis, that fifty Conservatives would be first appointed, and then perhaps some Liberals. It might turn out the same way with the Civil Service Commission, that under the guise of no patronage and an equal share to both parties, only members of one party might be appointed. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said a few minutes ago that there was more efficiency in the Outside Service than in the Inside. There may be a reason for this. The qualifications for the Outside Service are not as high as those for the Inside Service. I am pretty much of the opinion of my hon. friend that in the case of these minor appointments it will be just as hard for the Civil Service Commission to find properly qualified persons as for members of Parliament, and perhaps harder.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And sometimes easier.

Mr. PROULX: Perhaps.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Frequently the Civil Service Commission will fill a vacancy much more quickly than if it were left to a member of Parliament. I have known of vacancies in highly important offices remaining unfilled for perhaps one or two years because the member of Parliament in control of the patronage could not make up his mind what person he would nominate.

Mr. PROULX: So far as that is concerned I agree with my hon. friend. I am in favour of abolishing patronage. I think it would be a good thing for members on both sides of the House. But, as the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) has said, in the practical working out it might be more difficult for the Commission than for members of Parliament to make a selection.

Mr. NESBITT: If the Government will carry out this resolution as it is on the Order paper, it will be the greatest step in advance, in my judgment, that has taken place in this country for many years.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I wish to draw the minister's attention to a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved on the 18th March, 1918, as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 16th March, 1918, from the right hon. the Prime Minister, stating that application has been made to the heads of several departments for the dismissal of public officials on the ground of offensive partisanship during the recent election.
>
> The Prime Minister observes that the power to dismiss upon such consideration should be sparingly exercised.

It seems to me that that word "sparingly" is utterly opposed to the principle of the Bill. Might I have some explanation from the minister.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As I understand it, this Order in Council is a direction to the Civil Service Commission that any dismissals made by them should be made only after very careful consideration, and for some offence—against the state for example, or for dereliction of duty. The last paragraph of the Order in Council reads:

> The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends that in no case shall any dismissal for such a cause be made except after reference to the Civil Service Commission and with the approval of that Commission, after such inquiry and investigation as the Commission may deem desirable in the public interest. In reaching a determination the Commission shall have regard solely to the question whether the public interest will be better conserved by the retention or by the dismissal of the official in question and shall take into account his efficiency, the length of his service and the relevant circumstances which may enable them to reach a conclusion.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What are the relevant circumstances and what about the first part of the Order in Council?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not feel I should detain the Committee in explaining the Order in Council. After all, the portion I have read is the important part, because it contains the declaration of the policy of the Government in respect to dismissals.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I think the first part is just as important as the last.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The first part states:

> Application has been made to the heads of several departments for the dismissal of public officials on the ground of offensive partisanship during the recent election.

That means that since the last election very many requests have been made to the heads of the different departments of the Public Service in Ottawa for the dismissals of persons who at the last election opposed the present Ministry.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The first recommendation of the Prime Minister is important.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Prime Minister only made one recommendation, and it was contained in the portion I read, that dismissals be made only after due consideration by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Read the other part.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Reading):

> The Prime Minister observes that the power to dismiss upon such consideration should be sparingly exercised and he is of the opinion that, having regard to the policy adopted with regard to appointments to the public service, as set forth in the Order in Council approved on the 13th day of February, 1918, dismissals for such a cause should only be authorized in flagrant cases and subject to the conditions hereinafter set forth.

I submit to my hon. friend who interjected this matter quite irrelevantly into this debate that there is nothing in that to give cause for criticism. The purpose of the Order in Council is quite obvious, I think, to any person who wishes to read and understand it. It means that since the last election a great number of applications have been made for the dismissal of persons who at the last election opposed this Government. In my hon. friend's own province, I suppose, there was hardly a person holding a Government position who was friendly to this Government at this last election, and there naturally came to the Government requests—

Mr. BUREAU: Did the minister say that very few who held Government positions were friendly to the present Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am talking about the Government in office during the last election. The consequence was that a great many applications came in, particularly from the province of Quebec, asking for the dismissal from office of those persons who had not been friendly to the Ministry at the last election. I acted as Deputy Postmaster General for two or three weeks, and during the few hours I spent in that department I observed scores and scores of applications for the dismissal of postmasters in the province of Quebec who had openly taken part in the last election against the present Government. I think there is nothing in the Order in Council that is open to criticism whatever, but rather that it is open to commendation. It is not usually the practice to engage so much of the time of the committee upon a resolution upon which a Bill is to be founded. The Bill must be preceded by a resolution merely because it contains a section which provides for the voting of money to the members of the Civil Service. That, at least, is the practice, whether there is anything to commend it or not I do not know. Personally I have never been able to discover any good in that rule.

I now desire to say one or two words about the resolution before it is passed. It will be a very difficult thing for the Government to enact this proposed legislation unless hon. gentlemen approach it in the proper spirit. It will not interest the people in the country very much whether Mr. Acres in Ottawa or Mr. Weldon in Montreal was or was not appointed before the Order in Council was passed. The thought of the country is engaged on more important things. I imagine it would interest the country very little, even if these two appointments were purely political. Before the Order in Council passed, necessarily there must have existed some method of filling public offices. It was not the function of the commission, and these appointments referred to the Outside Service. In the absence of Union Government, and a party government being in office, they would have exercised the right of appointing such person or persons whom they saw fit to these vacancies.

I realize that there are a great many difficulties to be encountered in enacting this legislation, and there will be tremendous difficulties to encounter in its operation, but that is not a reason why we should not attempt to establish this reform in the public service of our country. It will, perhaps, be a little difficult for the commission to make appointments to vacant post offices, but that is not a reason why we should not attempt the reform. After all, I do not see why the Civil Service may not fill post office positions from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast just as well as members of Parliament. In my own experience, and I know it is the experience of almost every hon. gentleman in this House, that vacancies remained open in constituencies for weeks and months, because the member feared a recommendation, on account of the number of friends who were soliciting his support for appointment to the vacant office. The change will entail, no doubt, a large amount of work upon the commission. Possibly the commission must be enlarged; quite probably it should be enlarged. The commission, however, may avail themselves of the services of other officers of the Government. For instance, so far as appointments to the post office are concerned, they may easily utilize the assistance of the several provincial inspectors. They may advertise for applicants. In appointments to vacant offices in the country districts they may establish the principle which will govern them in the selection of appointees. They would, I suppose, establish, first, the most desirable location for the office. That having been done, I assume that they would feel obliged to appoint some respectable person who would make an efficient public officer, and who resided in close proximity to the location where the post office is to be established. Objections were raised when it was proposed in the United States to extend the appointment to office upon examination, or upon merit, or by some system of selection outside the patronage system. Still, these objections have been overcome. It has been tried in the United States, and, so far as I understand it has been successful. The appointments to the Civil Service were attempted in a similiar way in England. Its friends were apprehensive lest it be unsuccessful. Its opponents said of it the very same thing that will likely be said of the proposals here to-night, but, at any rate, let us give it a fair trial. The Government, if it desired to be partisan in this matter, might very well keep within its control appointments to public office, just as all preceding governments have done. The Government thinks in the circumstances that neither course should be followed, and, as has been said by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to-night, if this Government goes out of office with nothing to its credit other than having put in force and made practical and operative a Civil Service Act which removed from politics all appointments for public office, it will render to this country a service greater than that which has been rendered by any Government since the Confederation of the provinces. Every hon. gentleman knows what a curse patronage is in the public affairs of this country. I am going to delay the Committee a moment to discuss that matter. I hope I reflect the views of every hon. gentleman in this House. None of us will be members of this Parliament for very many years, and therefore it should be our ambition before we leave it to go away feeling that we have done something at a time the most favourable in our history for the accomplishment of a reform of this character. This is the most interesting Parliament in Canada's history, and probably it will be the most important for the next century and a half of its history, and everything lends itself to the accomplishment of a reform of this character. My hon. friend for Shelburne and Queens said that this would entail obligations upon the commission that were never contemplated before. I think that is probably correct. The statute, however, will place upon the commission further duties, and I have no doubt the commission will gladly accept the same and will do their very best in administering the Act and performing duties which devolve upon them at the present time and the added duties which will come upon them under the amendment proposed to be made to this Act. The member for Prince (Mr. Joseph Read) deplored very greatly the fact that the Act will not apply to railway employees. I can assure him, if he can suggest any amendment to the Bill which will include in any way the employees of the Government Railway system, we shall be glad indeed to give it consideration and to give statutory effect to the suggestion if it is at all practicable. It did not form a part in the Order in Council, but I frankly say to the committee that the Government could not at the moment see just how it could be put into effect. As I said in moving the resolution, however, that particular phase of the public service will have the special consideration of the Civil Service Commission, and I hope, if not during the present session, then at some other time we shall be able to amend the Act in such a way as to give effect to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Prince.

Mr. DEVLIN: My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) must not think that any inquiries which have been made on this side meant that we were opposed to the principle of the Bill. In fact, as my hon. friend will remember, the idea of Civil Service reform has been a Liberal idea. It has been advocated on this side of the House for a number of years. The fault that has constantly been found on this side of the House is that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) who leads the Government did not implement the promises which he had constantly made before each general election for years past. It was a favourite pastime of the Prime Minister to promise Civil Service reform. The only actual Civil Service reform that has been carried out in this country was carried out under the leadership of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and is contained in the statute of 1908. We want this Act to be improved, if any improvement can be made in it, and we are back of the Government in any genuine reform of the Civil Service. My hon. friend, (Mr. A. K. Maclean) must not try to convey to the country the impression that the Liberal party is opposed to Civil Service reform because some questions have been asked from this side of the House. On the contrary, we have been preaching it for years and we are advocating it now.

Mr. MURPHY: With the principle on which this resolution is supposed to be founded I am in the most complete sympathy. Any citizen of Ottawa who has spent all his life in this city, and who has had anything at all to do with public life, will very strongly support any measure calculated to remove political patronage. I am not going to weary the committee at this stage of the discussion and at this hour of the night, with any recital of what the members for the city of Ottawa have had to undergo in the past, and possibly have to undergo even yet, in connection with patronage. But I can assure you, that, although I have not the honour to represent the city of Ottawa, the county which I do represent in this House includes a portion of the city of Ottawa, that portion in which His Excellency the Governor General resides. He is a constituent of mine. He has never voted for me, but having regard to the resolution under discussion, perhaps it is proper for me to add that neither has he asked me for a job or to appoint anybody to a position; so that, I have no complaint about patronage on that score.

The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has said that patronage is a curse. Most heartily do I echo that designation. It is such a curse that my continual wonder has been that men on both sides of politics would put up with it for the length of time that it has endured. I remember that when I was Secretary of State I was summoned one day to the office of the Governor General of Canada, the representative of His Majesty the King, to discuss a matter of urgent public business. When the messenger entered my room I was engaged in a wrangle with an individual who insisted that I should appoint him to the position of, what do you think?—ash sifter. Ash sifter! It was useless for me to tell him that there was no such position, useless for me to tell him that I could not create such a position; he demanded it as his right as a free man and a citizen of Canada. I had never heard of or seen him before, and I never want to see him again. That man was the cause of my delaying the Governor General, the representative of His Majesty, fifteen minutes while I discussed that important question of patronage. However, that is an extreme case, but it is an experience that is liable to happen to any member of any Government should a hungry office seeker of that type succeed in invading his office. That is only a very minor example of what people have to undergo in Ottawa in connection with patronage.

During the discussion of this resolution a question was asked by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) regarding the provision in the resolution for the payment of a salary of $6,000 to the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) was not quite sure whether that was the same salary as had previously been paid or was an increase of $1,000. If my hon. friend will recall the circumstances connected with the creation of the Civil Service Commission and its personnel, he will remember that the commission as first appointed consisted of two commissioners, Mr. Shortt and Mr. Larochelle, each receiving a salary of $5,000. Neither of these gentlemen was appointed chairman, but by reason of dominating the work of the commission, Mr. Shortt succeeded in having the public address him as the chairman, and he never objected to the title. There was no chairman as a matter of fact. Then the personnel of the commission was increased to three, and provision was made that the last appointed would be chairman of the commission. The three present members of the commission are Hon. Dr. Roche, one of our late colleagues in this House; Mr. Clarence Jamieson, another respected colleague of ours in the late Parliament, and Mr. Larochelle. Dr. Roche is chairman of the commission. This is a provision for increasing by $1,000 the salary previously paid and it is for the Chairman.

The hon. Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) in the course of his last remarks, stated that this was the most interesting Parliament in the history of Canada. By dint of repeating that they have abolished patronage, the members of this Government, or at least some of them, seem to believe that patronage actually has been abolished. I do not blame them for that but I wish to point out, particularly to my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) who expressed the belief that the Government was honestly trying to eliminate patronage, how difficult it is for those members of the committee, and particularly for any person who has lived in the city of Ottawa and who has knowledge of what is going on, to accept that statement without qualification. With the copy of a letter in my pocket written by one of the members of this Government to a correspondent telling him that he would be placed on the patronage list for orders in his line of business, I think I would be doing violence to my common sense if I should accept without qualification the statement that patronage has been abolished.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That has no reference to this resolution.

Mr. MURPHY: I propose to show that it has.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the Order in Council?

Mr. MURPHY: If my hon. friend will bear with me I propose to show that it has, because this resolution, and the Bill to be founded upon it are designed to "eliminate political patronage in the control and management of the said Service."

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the patronage list.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has been good enough to point out that the phrase "patronage list" appears in the Order in Council which has been brought down, which is supplementary to the resolution under discussion and which is supposed to form part of the basis upon which the new Act will be founded. Now in addition to this letter, which was written by a member of the present Cabinet, after this Union Government was formed, I heard, as I entered the Chamber, discussion as to the appointment of Mr. Nichols.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was that letter sent after the election?

Mr. MURPHY: No. It was a well-timed letter sent just before the election.

Mr. LEMIEUX: After the pledge?

Mr. MURPHY: I heard discussion as I entered the Chamber about the appointment of Mr. Nichols to the position of Director of Public Information, and I heard the tribute paid to Mr. Nichols by my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson). As far as I am concerned I do not controvert what the hon. gentleman said with regard to Mr. Nichols in the slightest degree; but the whole point is, and I was glad to see my hon. friend from Springfield qualify his observation, whether the position was necessary or not. The position, I unhesitatingly say, was not necessary. Mr. Nichols had made a failure of a newspaper enterprise in Montreal. He was, in the language of the day, "down and out." He is the half-brother of—I do not know whether he is Minister of Finance —but in any event, the half-brother of Sir Thomas White. He was a good fellow, no doubt. He was a supporter of the Government and a job had to be provided for him. The position of Director of Public Information was created at a salary of $5,000 a year to impress the public of Canada how entirely and sincerely devoted this administration is to the winning of the war. Now with that fact within our knowledge, I submit to my hon. friend from Springfield it would be doing violence to our common sense to accept unqualifiedly the declaration of the Government that they have eliminated political patronage.

In the city of Ottawa there is a publication known as the Civilian, a very ably and well written paper, which is the official organ of the civil servants under the present Government. In issue after issue since the date of the election that paper has specifically charged this Administration with the exercise of most reprehensible forms of patronage. That paper in one or two issues made, in point of fact, a most shocking charge against the Administration in connection with appointments to some of the departments, a charge to which this evening I shall do no more than allude, but to which it may be necessary for me to return later on. I have not heard, and I do not believe, that these charges were challenged by the Government; in any event if they were so challenged I have not heard that any punishment has been meted out to the person responsible for making these charges over his own signature; and certainly if the charges could not be sustained, then the man or men who made them would merit, not only public dismissal but public punishment. I have not heard that anything of that kind has been done, and so while the record in that regard remains as it is, again I say it would be doing violence to one's common sense to accept without qualification a statement that patronage has been abolished.

Mr. LEMIEUX: By word of mouth.

Mr. MURPHY: Just about the time that this Order in Council was passed to which my hon. friend the acting Minister of Finance referred this afternoon and this evening and from which he has read extracts, we had, synchronizing, as his predecessor (Sir Thomas White) would say, with its passage, one of the most flagrant exhibitions of political patronage that ever occurred in the city of Ottawa, or in the public service of this country, and that is saying a good deal. We had an exhibition of political patronage which has spread disaffection through the whole body of civil servants, not only in Ottawa, but elsewhere throughout the Dominion. Civil servants, by reason of this happening, have reached the conclusion that unless through the accident of family relationship, or by reason of coming within the favoured class so delicately alluded to in the letter which was read by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Read) they have very little hope of receiving justice at the hands of this Administration. Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) and I think my hon. friend the acting Minister of Finance also, will be aware that the former Auditor General, as well as the present Auditor General, and the members of the Treasury Board under the last two Administrations, took no position more strongly against innovations, or violations of the Civil Service Act and the Superannuation Act, than they did in connection with attempts to add more years of service to the term of service of the civil servant who wanted to retire. And yet, Sir, this Government claims it has abolished patronage, and the members of it comport themselves in public as if they actually believe that statement. These are the hon. gentlemen who are responsible for a transaction referred to in the columns of The Ottawa Citizen of February 14, 1918, and which I propose to read to this committee. The article in question is an editorial, under the title of, "Sir Robert Borden's Prestige." The text of that editorial is as follows:

The superannuation of Mr. J. W. Borden, paymaster of the Militia Department, may have been arranged without the Prime Minister being consulted about it. According to the terms of the superannuation and retirement act, in ordinary circumstances, Paymaster-general Borden would seem to have been entitled to a retiring annuity of about $1,600. By a dubious interpretation of certain provisions in the act, the retiring paymaster is being credited with five more years service than he has actually given to the state; and in this way it has been arranged for him to draw an annuity of about $2,000; practically $400 a year more than the ordinary civil service retirement allowance.

Mr. J. W. Borden is being credited with five years more than he has actually served, apparently on the pretext that the office of paymaster-general and accountant is being abolished. When, for reasons of economy and efficiency, certain offices are abolished in the civil service, the retiring official may be credited with extra years of service. But the abolition of the paymaster-general and accountant's office would seem to be something of a legal fiction, hardly in accordance with the spirit of the act. The office by a technicality may be said to have been abolished. Actually it has been divided into two offices paymaster-general's office and accountant's office.

With regard to efficiency and economy, whatever may be said for efficiency, the change could hardly have been made on the basis of war economy. In the place of one paymaster-general and accountant, Mr. J. W. Borden, at $4,000 a year, there has now been installed a paymaster-general, Col. J. G. Langton, at $6,000 a year, and one of the present officials of the department—a well qualified one, by the way—has been moved up to the position of accountant at $3,500 a year. So that, where the position formerly cost the state $4,000 a year, it will now cost, with the superannuation allowance to the retiring paymaster, $11,500.

There need be no great objection to the higher salaries. It has been one of the weakness of the Canadian civil service that the permanent officials who do the actual work have been much underpaid. It would perhaps have been more encouraging to the Canadian men overseas, if the position of paymaster had been given to an officer who had actually seen active service. It does not enhance the prestige of the Prime Minister, however, to permit such a dubious interpretation of the superannuation and retirement act as the awarding of an extra allowance to the retirement annuity of Mr. J. W. Borden.

When Sir George Murray reported to the Prime Minister in 1912, he said of this very practice:

"The provisions of section 12 of the Superannuation and Retirement Act, which enables an addition of years to be made to the actual service of certain persons, are in my opinion of doubtful expediency; and I should prefer to see them withdrawn."

As an instance of precept without example, in public service reform, the employment of this doubtful expediency for the financial benefit of Sir Robert Borden's own brother could hardly have been arranged in any spirit of friendship to the Prime Minister. It must be calculated to have exactly the reverse of a helpful influence with regard to the Prime Minister's resolution to establish Civil Service reform.

Sir George Murray says further of this mode of retirement as employed for Mr. J. W. Borden's benefit:

"Under the act the grant of the additional years is personal to the individual and depends on the view which may be taken, either at the time of his appointment or at the time of his retirement, of his qualifications, and on other considerations of a less relevant character. This involves a good deal of rather invidious discussion, which would be avoided if the grant depended not upon the individual but on the qualifications required for the office which he happened to hold."

When certain other cabinet ministers are desirous of perpetuating the business of political patronage, and debasing the Civil Service into a political machine, in spite of all the Government's pledges, they could not employ more subtle ways than by involving Sir Robert Borden personally in an evasion of the spirit of Civil Service reform, and in the countenancing of patronage influence in Civil Service changes.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I hesitated about calling the hon. gentleman to order, but my impression is that the reading of this article and the making of these complaints against the administration of patronage in the past would have been more in order if brought up on the presentation of the militia estimates. However, perhaps the hon. gentleman will show whether or not he is in order by telling the committee whether he is reading this article or making these complaints as a means of presenting reasons for or against the resolution.

Mr. MURPHY: I have cited the cases to which I have directed attention for the express purpose of showing the necessity of this resolution and of affirming my intention to support it, in order that the instances to which I have referred and the evasions and breaches of the law which I have exposed may not be repeated in the future. No greater act for the purification of public life in Canada than a statute founded upon this resolution, provided it is rigidly enforced, could be passed by this or any other Parliament. I most heartily support the principle upon which, as I said, it is understood that this resolution is founded.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As to the motive of the hon. gentleman in reading the editorial to which he has referred, we can all form our own conclusions.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And we may take with how many grains of salt we may think suitable the reading of that article when the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn), who is responsible entirely for the incident to which he has alluded, is not here to make his answer. If the hon. gentleman desires to renew the discussion at the proper time—which, as he knows well, is on the consideration of the militia estimates—he will get his answer then from the Minister of Militia.

Mr. MURPHY: It is not my fault that the Minister of Militia is not in his place. Members of the Government, like other members of Parliament, are supposed to be in their places during this or any other discussion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman knows that the Minister of Militia will be in his place when the militia estimates are under consideration. He knows also that that would be the proper occasion to raise the discussion which he has just now entered upon, and that this is not the proper time.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are none so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. BUREAU: Our friends on the other side seem to have a desire to reproach gentlemen on this side with opposition to the resolution. We are all in favour of this resolution; all we want is to get information. We see by the Order in Council which I had the pleasure of procuring since six o'clock, that the Government has gone to a good deal of trouble. There have been conferences will the Civil Service Commissioners, conferences with the law officers of the various departments, and with the Parliamentary Counsel. The acting Minister of Finance seems to think that because this resolution is introduced by the Union Government, we must swallow it and say nothing; that we must regard it as the great benediction of the year. As the acting minister has said, if the purposes which appear to be aimed at by this proposed measure, accomplish the results which we hope for, it will certainly be a good thing for the country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Then why not let the resolution go through?

Mr. BUREAU: We want it to go through, and that is why we want to throw some light upon it; so that my friend will be able to draft a Bill that will meet the desire of all members of the House, and so that he will go down to posterity as the choker of the great evil and curse of this country, patronage.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I prefer to have all the light my hon. friend can give me when he has the Bill before him and is in a position to know exactly what he is talking about.

Mr. BUREAU: And I prefer that my hon. friend bring down a Bill carefully prepared—he has the machinery to do it; he has the men with whom he can take counsel; he has the Civil Service Commission—and be in a position to give reasons for every clause in it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill is ready, and if my hon. friend is desirous of getting light, why does he not allow the resolution to go through—or, at least, discuss the resolution itself?

Mr. BUREAU: Instead of losing his temper; instead of singing with his mellow voice "Carried" when we get up to speak, why does my hon. friend not take notice of what we say, so that, in conjunction with his advisers, he may be able to bring down a Bill which will be satisfactory to the House and based upon such conclusions and such information as may be derived from this discussion? It is true that the Bill, if founded only on what is contained in the Order in Council or the resolution, will be imperfect; but what I got up particularly to say was that my hon. friend ought not to accuse gentlemen on this side of the House with opposing the resolution. We are in favour of the resolution, but we have a right to ask for information. Last night we passed a Bill, and we were told: wait until next Parliament; we will then provide the machinery. We do not want to support a Bill which is simply an enunciation of policy; we want to establish the machinery that will give effect to this proposed measure. My hon. friend, therefore, should go a little more into detail; if he has further information to give to the House, and wait until he brings down the Bill, it may then be too late. He will say:

why not let this Bill go through; we want to make an experiment; next year we will see where the defects are and at the next session we will bring down a new Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A moment ago my hon. friend said he was going to make an inquiry in regard to the Bill, and he has not made the inquiry. If he has not made the inquiry, I am wondering why he rose.

Mr. BUREAU: That would not be the first time that my hon. friend would be wondering, not only at my rising, but at other things.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No one wonders when the hon. member rises.

Mr. BUREAU: I am glad that somebody can realize why I rise. I was going to ask if this resolution was introduced for the purpose of discussion, or if it was only introduced for the purpose of throwing it down upon the Table with the statement by the Minister of Finance: I have brought down this resolution; wait until I introduce the Bill; when the Bill is introduced, swallow it? This resolution is brought down for the purpose of discussion, so that when the Bill comes before the House we shall have a Bill containing suggestions that deserve to be taken into consideration by hon. members. Therefore, if the minister is getting impatient, I may tell him that he need not try to convey to this House or to the country the impression that we are against the Civil Service Commissions providing patronage is abolished and providing they will be a check upon the various ministers and will prevent them from writing letters such as the one which has been read here tonight by my hon. friend from Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Read), stating that everybody who is a Liberal Unionist or a Conservative Unionist may live happily because patronage hereafter will go fifty-fifty.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) declared a moment ago that his Bill is ready. I am very sorry it is, because I would suggest that in this Bill should be included a measure of justice to repair the great injury committed by the late Government. During the period of six years from 1911 to 1917, when this new Union Government was formed, the evil of patronage existed; not only did it exist, but, I might say, it bloomed, and not only did it bloom, but it flourished. In the city of Quebec, in which I reside, and in the district of Quebec, a constituency in which I represent, public officials were thrown out of office. People who had worked for the Government of the country for years, people who had given satisfaction during long periods of years, were thrown out of their positions. Why? Because they had either the fortune or the misfortune to be Liberal when a Tory government was in power. In the city of Quebec, we saw the very sad spectacle of politicians who had become members of Parliament writing letters to the different members of the Cabinet at Ottawa recommending that so-and-so should be thrown out because so-and-so happened to be a Liberal and the government was a Tory government. What happened then did not surprise us in Quebec, because we knew the methods of a really Tory government. But now I understand we no longer have a Tory government; that this Government has been improved to such an extent that it is transformed, that from a Tory government it has become a Union Government. I cannot judge of the actions of the Government in the other provinces as I have not been there, but how has this new, wonderful, Union Government acted towards my province of Quebec? In the same old way as the Tory government which preceded it. I wish to recall to your memory, Sir, the very impartial way in which officials were appointed in the province of Quebec to hold the recent election. Was patronage abolished? The Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden) at that time was touring the province of Ontario with the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), if I remember aright, and sometimes with the Solicitor-General. The promise made by the Premier in all the cities in which he spoke was: I have, since the formation of this Union Government, abolished patronage, and this Government, if elected, will introduce legislation to do away with patronage permanently. At the time the Prime Minister was uttering those words, patronage was being exercised by his own colleagues in the province of Quebec in the appointment of electoral officers. Of the enumerators appointed throughout the province of Quebec, not one, in any constituency of which I know, was a Liberal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Perhaps it was impossible to get any to act.

Mr. BUREAU: The result of the election shows that.

Mr. CANNON: I do not catch exactly what my hon. friend the minister means.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I say that probably it was impossible to get Liberals to act

Mr. CANNON: I am quite sure that if the returning officer in my constituency had wanted a list of my friends who would be willing to act as enumerators, judging by the majority I secured it would have been easier for me to supply a list than for my opponent to do so, and the same thing is true in every other constituency in Quebec. Not only were enumerators chosen from amongst the Tories, but after the election was over, after the Government was elected with a huge majority, was the system changed in our province? In the city of Quebec, has patronage been abolished? Since coming to the city of Ottawa to represent my constituency in this House, I have seen Tory supporters of the Government in the streets of Ottawa seeking jobs either for themselves or their friends. Would they be here if patronage was abolished?

I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the committee, but we on this side of the House, as the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has said, are in favour of abolishing patronage, but we want the Government to be in good faith. We do not want the Acting Minister of Finance to say to us: You have to support this measure because I have introduced it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say that.

Mr. CANNON: If the minister did not say that, he came very close to saying it. Such a statement is no recommendation. We on this side of the House want more than that. The Government, from my experience, apparently has two means of defending measures; either they say: You must not talk against this measure because it is a measure to win the war, or they say: You must not speak against this measure because we former Liberals introduced it. This is no way of discussing legislation on its merits. If the Government's Bill is good, we shall support it; if it is bad, we shall vote against it. The Government, so that we may be sure that this is a good measure, has first of all to prove its sincerity. Has the Government proved its sincerity?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Wait until my hon. friend sees the Bill.

Mr. CANNON: I need not see the Bill; I have the resolution. I say that the Government, by the appointments which have been made since the recent elections, such as the appointment of the postmaster of Ottawa, which has aroused the anger not only of Liberals but of Conservatives, and similar appointments made throughout the country, has shown that patronage has not been abolished. Yet when we ask for an explanation from the Acting Minister of Finance, he does not give us any explanation, he simply says: The hour is late; let us pass the resolution, and I shall introduce my Bill. We on this side of the House are willing to support all measures which the Government prove to us are good.

The CHAIRMAN: Before reporting this resolution I should like to say that in my humble opinion, the discussion on the resolution has been entirely out of order, and I must ask hon. gentlemen not to transgress in the same way when in future a resolution is being considered in committee. The position of the Chairman was made more difficult because some of the oldest parliamentarians in the House, on both the Government and the Opposition side, transgressed the rules. A resolution is placed before the committee for the purpose of obtaining the approval of the committee to the principle of expending a certain sum of money, and for no other purpose. The discussion which has taken place on the resolution has been very interesting, and I hope it will have the effect of saving considerable time on the second reading and when the Bill is in committee. It was, however, entirely out of order and in future I shall so rule.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) Bill No. 3, to confer the electoral franchise upon women, was read the third time and passed.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL.

On motion of Hon. C. C. Ballantyne (Minister of Naval Service) Bill No. 49, respecting the Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act, 1911, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act, 1911, made applicable to Canada:

Mr. BUREAU: Very few of us have had occasion to refer to the Naval Discipline Act enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. We do not want the details, but perhaps the minister might explain briefly what the effect of this Bill will be.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In brief, it is this: Suppose the Rainbow is on the Pacific coast, and one of its officers has committed a serious breach of discipline, necessitating his trial by court-martial. On that particular boat there may not be an officer of sufficiently high rank to conduct the court-martial. If this Bill meets with the approval of the committee and the House that officer could be tried by a senior officer on board any British, Australian or New Zealand man-of-war that happened to be in the harbour. The Canadian Naval Service would simply call upon that senior officer to preside at the court-martial. It is simply for discipline purposes. I might state that in 1911 the Imperial authorities passed what was known at that time as the Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act, 1911. It did not apply to any of the overseas dominions, unless the parliaments of those dominions saw fit to pass similar legislation to that passed by the Imperial authorities. Australia passed the legislation which we are now asking to have adopted on 12th August, 1913. New Zealand passed it on 16th July, 1914. And, inasmuch as the Canadian navy is still very small but at the same time considerably larger than it was some years ago, we thought it necessary, for discipline purposes, that we should be able to have an interchange of officers between any of the ships belonging to England, Australia, New Zealand or any of the overseas dominions.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the minister infore me whether that applies in times of peace, or only in time of war, when the ships of Canada have been placed under the jurisdiction of or are co-operating with those of Great Britain?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If this Bill passes the House it will be on the statute books, and will have effect in time of peace just the same as in time of war.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. BUREAU: I understand some hon. gentlemen have further comments about the Bill being in force in times of peace, and in regard to allowing Australian officers to preside at an inquiry on a Canadian ship.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is a good opportunity to make those remarks.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Canadian officers have the same privileges as the officers of Australia. Suppose an Australian ship were in Halifax, and one of the junior officers committed a breach of discipline, and it was necessary he should be tried by court-martial, and a Canadian man-of-war had a senior officer on board, the Australian ship could send over to the Canadian ship and get that officer. It is simply for the purpose of holding court-martial—nothing more nor less. Australia has passed similar legislation, as also has New Zealand, and the only country which has not done so is Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: I can quite understand and quite approve of the provision that in time of war the navies of the different overseas dominions and of Great Britain should act as one, and that there should be this perfectly free interchange of authority between officers of the different overseas dominions, and of the Motherland, but without very careful consideration, and without strong reasons for the proposal, I am very doubtful whether the proposal tends to what we are all desirous of having, namely, the closest possible spiritual unity between the different British Commonwealths. Frankly, I do not like the idea that in time of peace a servant of the Canadian Government should be tried by court-martial presided over by an Australian. Although the hon. minister informs us Australia passed this legislation, at the same time I do not think it would tend towards unity to have an Australian tried by court-martial presided over by a Canadian. I believe the greatest unity will be brought about if, as far as possible, in times of peace we should all act as one. I desire to insist upon that. And it would be better to have Canadians, if they have made any errors or have infringed the military or naval law in any way, tried by their own fellow-countrymen, and by them alone. Suppose that in one of these trials a miscarriage of justice occurs—and it is possible—what bitter feeling might be engendered. If, say, a Canadian superior officer by some mistake condemned an Australian improperly, I think a very considerable amount of feeling might grow up between Australia and Canada. I would not like this Bill to pass without this aspect of the situation being presented, because I believe those who have thought about the relation which should exist between the different British Commonwealths have come to this conclusion, that the tie which binds us will be strengthened in proportion as each individual Commonwealth is allowed to work out in its own way what seems best to the citizens of that Commonwealth, and I am afraid that the Bill presented to-night endangers that spirit of unity which I spoke about. I cannot aliow the measure to pass without drawing to the attention of the Government the objection which I have in mind.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken and has exhausted his right.

Mr. BUREAU: This Bill was presented yesterday. Will the Prime Minister consent to have the third reading at the next sitting of the House? I understand some other gentlemen on this side of the House would like to express their views. I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is a motion that is not debatable.

Mr. BUREAU: I am asking to have the third reading Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Under the circumstances, the Bill only having been presented yesterday, I consent to the debate being adjourned. I may say, however, to the hon. gentleman who raised this question (Mr. Bureau), that the Bill only carries out the purpose, as I understand it, which was embodied in the legislation of this House as far back as 1910. There need not be the slightest anticipation of any difficulty or lack of harmony in working it out. It is merely a Bill designed to assist co-operation between the permanent naval forces in each portion of the Empire, whether in time of peace or war. As a matter of fact, its operation would be practically altogether confined to the time of war; it is extremely improbable that it should ever be invoked in time of peace. It might, but it is a remote possibility, that it will have any effect in time of peace. Its operation, in so far as it would come into operation at all, would be in time of war.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals), Bill No. 42, to amend the Department of Railways and Canals Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee on the Bill; Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister said the other night that the Government would take the initiative in acquiring the rolling stock and materials that were necessary for the Government and other railways. I understood the minister to say that some of the material so acquired would be apportioned to the Canadian Pacific railway. Am I right in that surmise?

Mr. J. D. REID: One hundred thousand tons of rails will go to the Canadian Pacific. The Government will purchase the rails and distribute them amongst the different railways. The Canadian Pacific will get probably half of these rails. It is merely a book-keeping account so far as they are concerned. The rails will be shipped to them and they will immediately pay the money back to us; or they will pay the Dominion Iron and Steel company for the hundred thousand tons of rails that they get.

Mr. BUREAU: I understood the minister to say the other night that he had given orders to the various steel mills for steel for cars and rails?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Also that contracts for freight cars have been given, and that the companies that have received these contracts will get steel through the department for the building of steel frame cars?

Mr. J. D. REID: If there is anything that the Government can purchase for any of these companies cheaper than the companies can purchase it themselves, it will be glad to do so. The Government is able to purchase some things in the United States that a private company probably cannot purchase. In that case the Government will purchase the material and hand it direct to the car company at whatever is paid for it, in order to be sure that the cars will be completed at the earliest possible moment. Last year two or three companies had great difficulty in getting materials on the other side of the international boundary, but as the cars which they had contracted for were to be supplied to the Canadian Government for war purposes we were able, through our representative, to persuade the Washington Government to allow us to have the necessary materials, and we got them probably a little cheaper than the contractors would be able to get them. If we purchased anything of that kind it would simply be to hand it over to the company at the price we paid for it.

Mr. BUREAU: The question was asked the minister the other night if the car factories in Canada were in a position to deliver the cars as they were required by the Government. My hon. friend promised that he would bring down a statement or give us an idea of the different kinds of cars that were required and how soon they would be distributed and put in use on the Government railways. Are there in Canada sufficient car factories actually in operation to fill these orders and meet the demands of the Government? We have in Canada shipyards constructing wooden ships. I understand it is the policy of the Government to abandon that completely. I am told by the owners of shipyards now engaged in building wooden ships, that they are well equipped to build wooden ships, as well as steel freight cars. These ships will be launched in June or July and after they are launched the yards will be idle, although they have a complete equipment for building freight cars. Of course, I make that statement on the information of a gentleman who, as the minister knows, is perfectly well qualified to speak upon the subject. One of them has been the managing director of a big car factory in the United States and even in Canada. They say that within a very short time, perhaps within a month, they will be in a position to turn out freight cars at the rate of ten, twelve, and fifteen a day. Rather than see orders go outside of this country to the United States, and allowing these yards and this capital to remain idle, I suggest that in the national interest, it might be well to convert them into car factories. I may tell my hon. friend, surprising as the fact may be, that the men who are employed in the building of these wooden ships are all old men, and it is remarkable to see how actively and skilfully they do the caulking and the other different kinds of work required in shipbuilding. It seems that the wooden ship building is being revived, and it is giving a new lease of life to these old men whose business it had been in days gone by to build wooden ships. Now, as I say, I raise the question because at the time I asked my hon. friend this appropriation was not before the House, and with the money that he had at his disposal, all the orders that he foresaw to be given, I understood from him, had been given. Now, if I am not mistaken, all these cars have not been ordered, and I would submit that what I have suggested be taken into consideration when he distributes the orders for these cars.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman, as I understand, has asked me if the number of car factories in Canada is sufficient to fill these orders. My information is that there are sufficient car factories now equipped in Canada, and have been in operation for some time, to manufacture probably five or six times more than the order that we have been giving and dividing up. If I remember well, the Canada Car Company, with their several plants, could manufacture about thirty thousand box cars per annum. The Eastern Car Company and the National Car Company of Hamilton can both manufacture several thousand. There are several other factories operating; in fact, the order that we distributed would suffice only to keep one of the factories going but a short time. If I understand correctly, the Canada Car Company, to whom we have given an order for five thousand cars, distributed among the three plants at Fort William, Montreal and Amherst, have taken an order from the American Government for ten thousand cars at a higher price than we are paying. I am informed the contract has been completed, if not, I know that the negotiations have been going on; and the company were very glad to get the order to keep their factory going. The difficulty with these factories is this: Take the Fort William factory. They tell me that it is one of the best equipped car factories in Canada, and even on the continent, with a very large capacity. It was built at the time of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and other roads, and then remained idle for some time, but they were enabled with the order for two or three thousand cars which we gave them last year to start the works up again. They have also been engaged in turning out Russian orders as well. However, if they were not able to get any other orders for cars than those that we have given them, I do not think their factory would operate longer than two or three months at the most. Our orders were distributed among those factories that are well equipped and in operation, and I understand we are to have those cars by the first of September or the first of October for the transportation of wheat and other products.

I may say to the hon. member that the shortage of cars in Canada is causing us a great deal of trouble and creating uneasiness. The hon. gentleman comes from the province of Quebec. Let me tell him that I am very much worried for the reason that

11 p.m.

I could ship fifty thousand cars of pulpwood out of the province of Quebec that are now there awaiting shipment to the United States, but I have not got the cars to enable me to do so. The general manager tells me that if we send a box car over there we will not get it back. Ontario is also suffering for the want of cars; the people who are getting out pulpwood and lumber, and so on.

Mr. BUREAU: And for the want of the money?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, suffering for the want of the money also. If we could get the cars to ship these materials over it would help us out very much: I think I have fully answered the hon. member.

Mr. WIGMORE: Why is it necessary for the Government to purchase this large number of rails for a corporation like the Canadian Pacific? I can understand it being done in the case of the smaller corporations, but why should it be necessary for a corporation of the financial standing of the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. J. D. REID: The reason is this: The Dominion Iron and Steel company and the Algoma Steel company are the only two concerns that manufacture steel rails in Canada. Both of them had orders from the Imperial Munitions Board, and it was necessary to arrange with that board to get them to release one of the companies for a time until we could get some steel rails rolled, in order to enable the main lines to be put into proper condition. Therefore, the Government, under the terms of an Order in Council, required the Dominion Iron & Steel company to manufacture one hundred thousand tons of rails, which they purchased and immediately divided among the different railways. The rails are invoiced to the Government, the Government sends the invoice to the Canadian Pacific railway and the company promptly pay for them.

Mr. WIGMORE: Then there is no expense incurred by the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: No expense whatever. When the invoice comes to the Department of Railways and Canals we send the account to the Canadian Pacific, and they forward a cheque. That cheque is deposited to the credit of the Receiver General. It is just a matter of book-keeping, and is done in order that we may promptly get and distribute the rails.

Mr. WIGMORE: Would that also apply to the Grand Trunk?

Mr. J. D. REID: To the Grand Trunk as well. As for the Canadian Northern, they are financed by the Government, but the procedure is the same.

Mr. ROBB: During the past two years the Government have taken up a lot of rails, some of them new, and shipped them to the Allies overseas. Are these rails sold to the Allies at about the same price as the Government are paying under this large contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: I must frankly state that I have not gone into that matter carefully, but I could get the information and give it to the hon. gentleman. As I understand, the rails were taken up mostly in the West, and the cost of taking them up and shipping them is to be added to the cost and paid by the Allies. The rails were mostly taken from the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it was only a short time ago that I was speaking with the president of the Grand Trunk railway about the matter. I am satisfied that the price was adjusted satisfactorily; the amount is charged to the Allies, and there will be no difficulty about that. Of course, they are paying the same for the rails from the Transcontinental as they are for those from the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. ROBB: These rails were taken up and sent overseas, and possibly charged to the Allies on the basis of what they cost, plus transportation. The cost of these rails was considerably less per mile than the cost of the rails the minister is now contracting for; consequently, if the rails he is now buying are to be used to replace those sent overseas, so much more will be added to the capitalization of the railway and the Canadian people will have to pay for it.

Mr. J. D. REID: These rails are not to replace those taken up and sent overseas. Any replacement of this kind will likely not be done until some future time. The only rails taken from the Transcontinental and sent overseas were those in sidings and yards, and they were replaced with second-hand or lighter rails.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were rails taken up from the Hudson Bay line?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not yet decided to take them up, but if we do so, they will be replaced with lighter rails.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says he has distributed orders for cars. On what basis are the orders given? Are tenders called, or is there a set price for which the companies are to build a special kind of car?

Mr. J. D. REID: We asked all the car companies to submit tenders and we awarded the contracts accordingly. We asked the several car companies to say how many cars they could supply. The Eastern Car Company, Nova Scotia, had an order for 1,000 cars last fall. Although they had a great deal of material on hand, they were unable to get all the material required to complete the order. However, they stated how many they were able to take and we gave them an order for what they could manufacture up to next fall.

Mr. BUREAU: At what price?

Mr. J. D. REID: At the lowest price in every case. We did the same with the Hamilton Car company, which had an order for 1,000 cars about a year ago. They completed the order about the 1st of May, and then wanted a further order for 1,000 cars.

Mr. BUREAU: Was the price the same.

Mr. J. D. REID: The tender of the Hamilton company was somewhat higher than the others, but they came down to the price of the lowest tender, and we gave them another order for 1,000 cars to keep their plant going. All orders were given within Canada except a total of 50 oil and water tank cars which are not manufactured in this country. These were purchased in Pittsburg at a very low price.

Mr. ROBB: What is the approximate cost of a 60,000 pound box car?

Mr. J. D. REID: About $2,750 complete.

Mr. CANNON: Is it the intention of the Government to use the Transcontinental workshops in the city of Quebec?

Mr. J. D. REID: It would require a good deal of money to put them in working condition. Of course, the whole railway situation will have to be looked into in the near future, and that is one of the matters that will receive attention.

Mr. WIGMORE: What steps are being taken to trace the 25,000 cars mentioned by the minister as having been sent to the United States and lost track of? How many box cars have been ordered from the different firms? If 25,000 Canadian cars are in the United States, it would be good business to make a special effort to trace them.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the number of cars to which my hon. friend refers has been reduced to 11,000 or 12,000. We cannot compel the return of these cars, but I have personally by telegram and by letter to the Director General of Railways in the United States made every possible effort to secure their return. The Canadian Railway Defence Association in Montreal have also been doing all they can in this direction. Up to the last month, however, all these concerted efforts have not reduced very much the number of cars which are still outstanding. I have also taken the matter up with Mr. Lloyd Harris, of the war mission, at Washington, and he has been doing all he can to have these cars returned.

That shows that every effort has been made. In addition to that, almost every other day I am telegraphing to find out if I cannot have the cars returned to this country. Only this evening, I sent a message to the several railway companies in the United States urging them to try and let us have cars to take out the pulpwood and lumber in Quebec and other places. Everything that can be done, either by the railways or by the Government, to get the number of Canadian cars in the United States reduced, is being done.

Mr. ROBB: I hope the minister will not make the mistake that seems to have been made in the United States, of going so far as to place an embargo against Canadian cars going into the United States. The House and the country must remember that our cars do not go into the United States empty, they go there with Canadian goods for which money comes back to us. It would not hurt this country if we had a little reciprocal treatment from the United States and had cars coming into this country loaded with corn which we need so much. It is largely owing to the War Board in the United States that the railway situation has been tied up. I hope we are not drifting along into the same condition in this country.

Mr. J. D. REID: Last fall, we allowed cars to enter the United States so as to let our products move out, with the result that the cars that went across the border never returned to Canada. The number of Canadian cars in the United States mounted up to 25,000, and if we had not prevented our cars from crossing the border, the result would have been that we would not have been able to move our own Canadian products from one part of the Dominion to the other. If, at the present time, we were to load our cars with lumber, pulpwood and other products and rush them into the United States, we would not have cars for our own traffic. Instead of a surplus of Canadian cars being in the United States, there should be a surplus of American cars in Canada. But when our cars get into the United States, the American railway companies will not return them.

Mr. MANION: The car situation is a very important matter. Can the minister impose any penalty upon cars going into the United States? If a car of goods comes here, and it is detained for twenty-four hours in the yards, we have to pay demurrage charges. Why should we not impose some charge on cars going into the United States? If we are allowing our cars to go into the United States and they are being held in the United States, and we have to buy new cars to replace them, I do not see any advantage in that.

Mr. J. D. REID: We cannot do other than allow the arrangement entered into between the railways and the Interstate Commission to be carried out. A foreign car on any railway is charged a certain per diem rate, and the railway that has that foreign car must pay that rate. At the present time, it pays the United States railway companies to pay that rate and to hold the cars. Let me draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the reason why the United States railway detain our cars. In the United States they have given an order for 100,000 cars and 3,000 engines, which shows the shortage of cars there. Therefore, any railway that can secure any foreign cars and can keep them by paying the per diem allowance, will do so, because it pays them to do so, owing to the great shortage of cars. The United States railways are very short of cars, and there is nothing more we can do than we have been doing to get those cars returned. The Government realize that the fact of our businessmen not being able to ship goods to the United States is affecting our trade balance. The necessity of maintaining our trade balance is one thing that makes it imperative for us to do everything possible to have our cars returned to Canada.

Mr. MANION: Is any duty imposed?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is just a per diem rate. The moment a United States car arrives in Canada, a per diem rate is charged until the car returns to the United States. If a Canadian car goes to the United States, for instance, on to the New York Central, while it is on that road they pay sixty cents a day. That railway can keep that car, because there is no way of compelling it to return it. They might keep it for a year by paying, say, $180 for the use of that car.

Mr. FIELDING: How is that rate fixed?

Mr. J. D. REID: By an agreement between our railways and the United States railways.

Mr. FIELDING: A penalty might be imposed by increasing the rate. If it pays the United States' railways to keep our cars over there, we should increase the rate.

Mr. J. D. REID: In order that that might be accomplished, all the railways would have to agree to it. The Canadian railways could not do it alone, and as the United States railways are so much in the majority, it might be a little difficult to make such an arrangement. The suggestion, however, is a good one. Since last fall the Government railways represented by myself, together with some of the other railways, have been doing all we could to get our cars back from the United States; we have reduced the number from twenty-five thousand to ten or eleven thousand, and we hope in the next few months to reduce it still further. That reduction, together with the new cars we are getting, we hope, will put us in a much better position than we have been in for some time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The shortage of cars is a very serious problem, and, to a certain extent, the Minister of Railways deserves credit for this legislation, but I am amazed to learn that the same old penalty of sixty cents per day represents the demurrage when a car has been sent into the United States and has not been returned. The two Governments, having succeeded in establishing a commission on international waterways, a commission which has been working most successfully since its establishment, should establish a joint railway commission. Some years ago, when I was in the Government the then chairman of the commission in Canada, Mr. Justice Mabee, was authorized, not officially, to enter into negotiations with the commission in the United States. I do not know the result. Mr. Mabee died shortly afterwards, and I do not know if the matter was pursued further. At a time like this, it is of the utmost importance for both countries, having regard to the precedent of the joint commission on international waterways, to find a way out of this difficulty by some arrangement between the two railway boards. Since the beginning of the war the Government has been able to reach some conclusions which, before the war, were considered absolutely impossible of solution. Many arrangements that have been made between the Ottawa Government and the Washington Government since the war commenced, are to-day considered as matters of course. This is a practical question which will affect relations between both countries for all time to come. My hon. friend, if he is a progressive minister, should see to it that we have a joint arrangement between the Interstate Railway Commission and the Railway Commission in Canada. Last winter, a company with which I am connected had most serious difficulty in securing cars because our cars were in the United States. I appealed to my hon. friend and to the Chairman of the Railway Board and got as much satisfaction as they could give me, for which I am thankful. We simply had to beg for these cars and we got them back in driblets. It seems to me that the time has come for my hon. friend to strike a bold blow and make an arrangement with the United Statets for raising the penalty. With a penalty of only 60 cents a day, the companies in the United States will keep cars for months, and probably for years.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners has been working unofficially with the Interstate Commission and has been doing everything he can to get the cars back. The organization that was established in Montreal by the railway companies has also accomplished something. Their secretary has been travelling backwards and forwards and has been working in conjunction with the American organization. The War Board in New York has also been working along the line suggested by my hon. friend. It had never occurred to me before that raising the penalty might have some effect in getting the cars back, but I am to have a meeting with Sir George Bury, Mr. Gillen and other gentlemen connected with this organization next week, and as we had intended to discuss this matter I will bring my hon. friend's suggestion before them. We are anxious to devise some means for getting our cars back and keeping the spread to a minimum, and I am glad to have my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. WIGMORE: Will the Government's purchase include coal cars?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. WIGMORE: Have the orders been placed?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. WIGMORE: I do not think any organization will be so effective in tracing cars as the Railway Departmetn itself. I think it will be good business for the Railway Department to send men over the different lines in the States to locate these cars and send them back. What is everybody's business is nobody's business, and wiring to the different railroads will not be very effective in my opinion.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

On motion of Hon. F. B. Carvell, the House went into committee on Bill No. 41, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Definition of work:

Mr. MURPHY: Is the present definition being widened?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. I have not the exact citation, but I think a decision was made by one of the courts throwing some doubts on whether "structure" included power lines and that kind of thing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is an "aboiteau?" I know it was a work well known to the Acadian farmers of the old days.

Mr. CARVELL: I think it means dyke.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is a very well known term in the country from which I come. It means the embankment which is made across a creek running into a piece of land that has been dyked off from the sea. There are creeks in such land, and it is necessary to build a very much heavier embankment than usual across such creeks, and they are called aboiteaux. Usually there is a sluiceway through which the water can enter to a limited extent into the creek. One supposed derivation of the word is from the two words "abattre" and "eau."

Mr. CARVELL: The whole question arises over the uncertainty as to whether the former Act covered overhead cables and wires of different kinds. The idea of this Bill is to follow the lines of the Railway Act, which prevents telephone, telegraph, electric light and power companies from stringing wires over a railway except under special plans and specifications approved by the Railway Board. The idea is that this was to be the same thing, except it was to be approved by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BUREAU: Applications have been made when wires were stretched over the St. Lawrence.

Mr. CARVELL: I dare say; I have not the exact citation here, but I know some of the courts have questioned whether the word "work," as defined in the original Act, was broad enough to cover this particular kind of structure. To take it out of any controversy it has been suggested by the officers of the department, and I think, rightly so, that this small amending Act should be passed. That is practically the only object of the Bill. It goes a little further than that however, and there is another phase of it. I refer to sections 4 and 5. The original Act provided that no work should be placed upon or built over or crossing a navigable stream except on plans approved by the Governor in Council, but this did not apply to small wharves, or small projections where the cost did not exceed $1,000. The language of section 4 is obscure and it is intended to make it perfectly plain that there can be no question that it must have the consent of the Minister of Public Works. Section 5 which is an extension of the former section, provides that if any works are constructed in, upon or along a navigable stream without the consent of the proper authorities they may be removed by an Order in Council. This goes further and provides that whatever salvage there is may be sold and credited up to the cost, and the owner can be compelled to supply the deficiency whatever that may be. That seems to me to be logical. If there be an authority in the country which has the right to say what obstructions there shall be to navigation, whether or not anything shall be built, in or upon or along a navigable stream, then if any person chooses to build any of these erections without the consent of the proper authorities he ought not to find very much fault with their removal. I think those are really the principal objects of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: There is another change, if I remember. Under the old Act the Governor in Council, or the Minister of Public Works, had the right to order the destruction of the works if they were an obstruction to navigation. Under this Bill the right is absolute. I think the Act is all right, and I perfectly agree with the Minister of Public Works that these various works which were not completed at the time of the passing of the first Act, such as running pipes over the river to carry water, running power wires over the St. Lawrence as they do, was not contemplated at the time. But there is one case where a grave injustice is being worked, and I want to call my hon. friend's attention to it, because the matter has been hanging fire for a long while and I do not think the consent of the Governor in Council ought to be refused. The people of Shawinigan Falls could not cross the river with boats on account of the great quantity of logs which accummulated there every spring. They got together and asked the provincial government to furnish one fourth of the funds, the municipality one fourth, and the Shawinigan, the Belgo-Canadian, the Electrical Chemical company and all the companies that are using the power, to furnish the other fourth. These people did not bother about any statute. They went to work and took advantage of the ice, and started their piers. I asked them one day: "Have you permission of the Public Works?" They said, "Why? We have the permission of the provincial government, which is contributing to this bridge, and this is their river." I said to them: "The St. Maurice is a navigable river." I then made the proper application and prepared the necessary documents. At that time the false works were all up and the ice on the eve of breaking, and if it had broken, the whole structure would have come down, and there would have been a loss of $80,000 or $90,000, or perhaps more. When the advertisements were all complete, and the four weeks were over, I presented my application. Naturally the Justice Department reported that the site must be approved, although the statute said that all works constructed before a certain time shall not require such approval, but we did not come within the exception. But in this case the Department of Justice were strictly within the law. I may add en passant that we got a letter from the secretary of the Public Works Department, under the amendment of 1908, which authorized the Governor in Council or Minister of Public Works to tear down this structure, ordering us so to do. I am not sure as to the date of the amendment ordering the town of Shawinigan Falls to tear down their bridge. They were in an awful state, and I came up to Ottawa about the matter. The St. Maurice is a navigable river and it is a non-navigable river, paradoxical as that may seem. Parts of the river are not navigable. At this particular point it is not navigable, except for the alligator of the Government which runs near the falls to pull the booms in. This boat can pull itself ashore and go around the falls. The injustice is this: the municipality paid its share and the provincial government paid its share, and the companies say, "You are not in a position to collect money from us because you are not authorized by the Government, the site has not been approved by the Governor in Council." This matter has been hanging fire for four or five years, and I have been trying to have it arranged. I think an exception should be made in this case. The construction was made in good faith. I may say the bridge was being built under the supervision of the engineer of the Public Works Department in Quebec, and if we had stopped when we were told to stop, the whole false work would have gone out and the superstructure would have been carried away.

Mr. CARVELL: Has it been completed?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, but there is that part of the money that was promised to the company.

Mr. CARVELL: Have you applied to the Public Works Department for a certificate of some kind?

Mr. BUREAU: No, they applied for leave and approval of the plans after the bridge was completed. The bridge had been commenced when it came to the notice of these people that they had no authority. It was commenced in ignorance of the law, and when we gave notice and the application was made, we had to advertise for four weeks. The ice was on the eve of breaking away, and they were ordered to stop, and if we had stopped it would have been a dead loss.

Mr. CARVELL: Was it above or below the falls?

Mr. BUREAU: Above the falls.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not suppose any one can seriously say it interferes with navigation to any considerable extent.

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly not.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend will see that the amendment proposed in no way changes the previous law.

Mr. BUREAU: No, but the provision may work a hardship in cases like this.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know just how far the department would be justified in going in order to approve of plans of that kind, but a reasonable amount of common sense should be exercised in such a case, and if the hon. gentleman can convince the present Minister of Public Works that this is not an interference with navigation and that he has the power to approve the plans and specifications he will not be long in doing it.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the trouble. I do not think he has the power to ratify plans under the Act when the work is finished. The Act gives him power to approve of the site and plans. The objection that was taken by the Deputy Minister of Justice was the fact of the bridge being built, and the site occupied and plans being executed. He had nothing to recommend. It was beyond the power of the minister to do anything. But I will take it up later on.

Mr. CARVELL: I am expressing a very offhand view, but notwithstanding the very high authority the hon. gentleman quotes it seems to me there should be a large element of common sense in dealing with matters of this kind, and I would be disposed to go the whole limit in order to rectify it.

Mr. BUREAU: I am glad to hear that. I will take the matter up with my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have any applications ever been made to the Department of Public Works by any private interests concerning the project of damming the River St. Lawrence at Long Sault? For many years various attempts have been made by private interests to obtain from the Canadian Government the necessary powers to dam the St. Lawrence at that point. The water-power to be developed at Long Sault is one of the most important, if not the most important, after Niagara Falls. There are some gentlemen in the United States and Canada who are banded together in order to force the hand of this Government just as they were banded together to force our hands when we were in office. Fortunately, so far, the Governments which preceded the present one have kept these interests at bay. This syndicate has not been allowed to get control of this magnificent water-power. My hon. friend is aware that there is a strong feeling in the country in favour of the Government owning the remaining water powers on the St. Lawrence. I am not arguing in favour of the Government ownership of railways. I am not discussing that phase of the question of Government ownership, but I am speaking of water-power. Where the Government has the upper hand in reference to this question of water-power it should keep these powers, and if the river is to be harnessed it should be harnessed as a Government enterprise and for the greatest good to Canadian consumers. With the scarcity of coal that exists, it is of the utmost importance that our water-power should be conserved for and in the interest of the public. While I believe in competition in regard to the operation of railways, and while I have yet to learn that government ownership is the best thing in connection with railway operation, I am a believer in government ownership as regards the water-powers of the country, particularly those large water-powers on the St. Lawrence river, and I hope my hon. friend will prove to be the faithful watchdog of the Canadian people.

Mr. CARVELL: I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend digs up the old ghost that I thought had ceased to exist seven or eight years ago. We spent thirty-six or forty-eight hours' time in the old House of Commons debating that question, and I have never heard of it since.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It exists.

Mr. CARVELL: Since I assumed the duties of Minister of Public Works, no application has been made to me either officially or privately and I have never heard the matter discussed, except that I read something in the report of the Conservation Commission which was sent to me a few days ago. The secretary of that commission seemed to be chasing that phantom, the same as my hon. friend is to-night, but I can assure him that it is only a phantom and no person need lie awake at nights for fear that some of the Dominion's interests are going to be sacrificed by the gobbling up of these water-powers on the St. Lawrence. I had a big flood of telegrams from all sorts and conditions of people, municipalities and organizations, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in October last, protesting against the ratification of plans farther down the river, I think, somewhere below Beauharnois.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Cascades?

Mr. CARVELL: It was below Beauharnois.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Cedars?

Mr. CARVELL: I think it was below the Cedars, but I never looked into it. I understand that in the month of September somebody gave notice that he would apply to the Public Works Department for the approval of plans but the application has not been made. I can assure my hon. friend he can rest easy and rely upon the old doctrine that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Mr. HAY: Between the county of Selkirk and the county of Springfield there are a number of ferries crossing the Red river. They are operated by means of cables stretched across the river which can be lowered when a steamboat is approaching or passing. Would they be affected by the operation of this Bill?

Mr. CARVELL: Not by any means. The object of this Bill is to see that these ferries shall be installed according to specifications ratified by the department. The chief object of the Bill is to see that no such obstruction as a wire ferry shall be placed across a navigable stream until it has been properly investigated, a proper plan prepared and the work constructed according to this plan.

Mr. HAY: These ferries have been in operation for a great many years.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a provision regarding them in the original Act. I can assure my hon. friend that this Bill is not aimed at anything like that. This Bill is to protect things of that kind, but to see that no obstruction is put across a navigable stream without the matter being properly investigated.

Bill reported read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. F. B. Carvell (Minister of Public Works) the House went into committee on Bill No. 40 to amend the Public Works Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Power to dredge, etc., beds of navigable waters.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the necessity for this legislation arise owing to a judicial decision?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I do not know that it arises over a judicial decision.

Mr. BUREAU: It is confiscation of part of the bed of a river.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is right in a sense, but I would say that it is expropriation of property rather than confiscation. We have been going on for a great many years, but the only authority which the Government have for taking possession of the beds or banks of rivers for the construction of public works has been the vote by Parliament. That is, when the money has been voted for the work it is the only authority we have, and the question has arisen as to whether that is sufficient authority. The officers of the department, and contractors and other persons working under them, have been threatened with suits for trespass, and as I hardly know a member of this House who does not want public works in his constituency, I fail to see how I am going to meet all these requests unless I can get authority to go on the land and do what is necessary. It might to some extent amount to what my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) calls confiscation, but if it so be, it is confiscation for the public good. One can hardly imagine the Public Works Department deliberately confiscating property without rendering some value to the community concerned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In this case the bed of the river?

Mr. CARVELL: The bed of the river or some place along the bank. You must have a place to put your wharf on, or your pier, or things of that kind, and this is really a sort of short-cut, I would say, to the expropriation of the property required. I do not think there is any question whatever but that this Parliament has the jurisdiction.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know about that.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not the citation at hand, but I remember a case some years ago in which our good old friend Mr. Conmee was asking for a charter. The question arose as to the right of the Dominion to expropriate—even the right of the Crown as represented by a province—and I remember that the decision of the Privy Council explicitly stated that we had that right. Therefore, I think there is no question about our jurisdiction.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was that case?

Mr. CARVELL: I have forgotten the name of the case, it is some eight or nine years since I looked it up, but I am sure there is a decision of the Privy Council to that effect. Therefore, having the jurisdiction, it seems to me very proper that we should have authority, and that is the sole object of this Bill.

Mr. COPP: Has it not been the practice to purchase land needed by the Public Works Department as the site for a wharf?

Mr. CARVELL: I think so, and this Bill does not say that we are going to confiscate; it only gives us the right to take possession. I cannot conceive that the Government will confiscate people's property, it is only a short cut to expropriation.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. BUREAU: My observation in regard to confiscation was said by way of a joke, but I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works did not consult the Attorney General for the various provinces before introducing this legislation. However, it cannot do any harm, because it is in the public interest and with the object of improving navigation. Referring to the river St. Maurice, part of that river is in the harbour of Three Rivers, and harbours, as hon. gentlemen know, are within the jurisdiction of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The works in that part of the river St. Maurice which is in the harbour of Three Rivers are maintained by the Department of Public Works. On account of a contract made between the St. Maurice Boom and Driving company and the Department of Public Works—a contract which I think ought not to have been made, but at any rate it was done—

12 p.m. the department have been paying for all the piers, for the booms and for everything.

Now, the Canada Iron Foundries company needed a wharf on which to land pig iron and the clay for their moulds. Application was made to the Department of Public Works, who in turn forwarded it to the Marine Department, and pending the desired permission advantage was taken of the ice by the company to draw materials and go on and complete the work. Now the Department of Marine and Fisheries take the position that parties may not build a dock before getting the approval of the department, whereas the location for the dock has to be approved by the Department of Public Works. We are in this unhappy position, as between the two departments, that we do not know who has jurisdiction, and we are all at sea.

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry, but they are wonderful people at Three Rivers.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not finding fault, but I think the question of jurisdiction ought to be settled.

Mr. CARVELL: I know, the people there are willing to accept almost anything. In fact, I understand they want to build ships on dry land and then get the department to dredge a launching basin for them.

Mr. BUREAU: Sites have to be got on land, they cannot build them on the water.

Mr. CARVELL: To go back to the suggestion of my hon. friend as to the booms and piers, I do not think he should object to that. If the Dominion of Canada for forty years have been doing that which they have no right to do, surely he cannot object to their trying to get back to solid ground and handing those booms and piers over to the people who are using them. I do not want to get into a discussion on the point now, because that raises the question as to the Gatineau river, and I think the Ottawa river also. Why on earth the Dominion of Canada should provide booms and piers for the big lumber corporations is something I could never understand. Furthermore, why Three Rivers, and the Gatineau and Ottawa rivers should be singled out from all the rest of the rivers in Canada is a mystery to me. I think it was a very wise provision indeed to get these particular piers and booms out of the jurisdiction of the Public Works Department, and the Government generally, and let the big corporations look after them the same as is done elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. CANNON: What about compensation for damages if any should arise?

Mr. CARVELL: I want to point out to my hon. friend that we have been taking this land ever since Confederation. You cannot have public works unless you have the authority to go on the land and construct them. I do not see that there is any change in principle proposed here.

Section approved of, Bill reported and read the third time.

PENSIONS.

COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REPORT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the following members do compose the Special Committee, ordered by the House on the 10th instant, to consider the report upon the Pension Board, the pension regulations and the sufficiency or otherwise of the relief afforded thereunder, the pension lists in force in Canada for disabled and other soldiers and the dependents of those killed while on active service, and any other matters relating thereto or connected therewith: Messieurs. Cronyn, Green, L. A. Lapointe, Lemieux, Nesbitt, Nickle, McCurdy, Murphy, Power, Parent, Redman, Rowell, Ross, Sutherland, Turriff.

COMMITTEE ON BANKRUPTCY.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That Messieurs. Fulton, Harold, Scott, Trahan, and Tweedie be appointed members of the Special Committee on Bill No. 25 in the place of Messieurs. Green, Nesbitt, Nickle, Redman and E. Lapointe.

He said: These gentlemen are to take the place of four members of this committee who have been made members of the Pensions Committee.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 12.12 a.m. (Saturday.)

Monday, April 15, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Orders in Council under the Military Voters' Act, 1917, and the War-time Elections Act.—Hon. Mr. Doherty.

Report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into and report upon the Pilotage System and its administration at the port of Halifax.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

YUKON ELECTION.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have examined the special report of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in respect to the election for the electoral district of the Yukon Territory, and I have spoken concerning it with the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. It seems the proper course to refer the returns to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I, therefore, move:

That the Special Return of the General Returning Officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with power and authority to consider the same and the several documents therein alluded to and to report their conclusion and determination thereon to this House.

Motion agreed to.

SECRET SESSION TO BE HELD ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 17.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Having regard to the gravity of the conditions which are confronting the Allied nations at the present time, and with the view of informing hon. members of this House in a confidential way as to certain matters upon which it is advisable that they should be informed, and as to which confidential information in regard to military exigencies could not properly be given in an ordinary session of the House, I have conferred with the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition as to the holding of a secret session of this House. The conclusion I have reached in conjunction with my colleagues is that such a session should be held in the immediate future. It will be possible when that session is held, to explain much more in detail the reasons on account of which I think it is desirable. I therefore, move:

Resolved that the sitting of Wednesday next, the seventeenth day of April, instant, shall be a secret session until the House shall then otherwise order, and that all strangers be ordered to withdraw during such secret session;

Provided however, that this Order shall not affect the privilege enjoyed by members of the Senate of being present at Debates in this House.

Resolved further that a message be sent to the Senate acquainting their Honours with the terms of this Resolution.

Under ordinary conditions, it is most unusual that a secret session of either House of Parliament should be held. However, during the past two years secret sessions of the British Parliament have been held on several occasions. There were two in the spring of 1916. There were two, I think, in the spring of 1917, one of which was held about the time my colleagues and I were leaving England. There was a secret session held by the British House of Commons in the month of December last and another in January. It seems desirable that under existing conditions the same course should be followed here on this occasion.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Prime Minister, as he stated, did me the honour of consulting me last Saturday as to the advisability of holding a secret session of this House. The Government must, of course, take the responsibility in regard to a matter of this kind as they are in the possession of information of which the public is not aware, and it is for them to decide as to the advisability of conferring with Parliament in regard to it. It is also for them to decide whether, as a result of that, it will be possible to give the information to the public. But of course, all this is upon the responsibility of the Government, who have knowledge of which the public is ignorant, and which they consider the public should not have, at all events, at the present stage. Under such circumstances there can be no objection to the course the Government have decided to take. I can add to what has been said by my right hon. friend that not only has the British Parliament had secret sessions, but the French Parliament has had secret sessions on one or two occasions.

Motion agreed to.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

HON. SIR THOMAS WHITE.

FURTHER STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO ABSENCE OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE BECAUSE OF ILL HEALTH.

On motions being called:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I made a statement to the House on the 21st of March last with regard to the reasons which had occasioned the absence of the Minister of Finance from the session up till that time, and I stated that from the Easter adjournment there would be another announcement, which I now propose to make.

After making my statement to the House I telegraphed to Sir Thomas White, and on the 24th of March received the following reply from him:

Los Angeles, March 24th, 1918.

Sir Robert Borden,

Ottawa, Ont.

I have your telegram containing the statement which you made in the House on Thursday. If you are clearly of opinion that the public interest will not materially suffer by reason of my absence until my health is recuperated, you may announce to the House that I will return at a later date and resume the duties of my office. If, on the other hand, you are of the view that the public interest may suffer through my further absence, I should prefer to be relieved immediately. My desire is to do what is best in the national interest at this critical time in our affairs. Think I can return about May 1st.

W. T. White.

To that I replied on the 25th of March as follows:

Ottawa, March 25th, 1918.

Sir Thomas White,

Los Angeles Golf and Country Club,

Los Angeles, California.

You do not need to be assured that your telegram of yesterday was very welcome and I rejoice to know that you see your way clear to remain at your post. It will be a great satisfaction to have you once more among us but I urge most earnestly, and in this all my colleagues concur, that you should not think of returning to your duties during the present session nor thereafter until your health and strength are fully restored. We do not anticipate a prolonged session, and I am thoroughly confident that you will best discharge your duty to the country by taking a complete respite from work and worry for such a period as will enable you to resume your labours with all your accustomed vigour and energy.

R. L. Borden.

It is with very great pleasure I am able to announce to the House that since the date of these telegrams there has been a very marked improvement in the health of Sir Thomas White, and I anticipate that within a few days he will leave California for the purpose of taking part in certain conferences at Washington with regard to the financial arrangements for the present fiscal year, which demand the closest attention of the Government and which will be of great moment to Parliament and the country. I have already explained the very difficult conditions with regard to providing adequate financial arrangements for payment of producers in this country for the supplies of food, munitions and other articles which are urgently needed by the British Government and by the allied nations in general. The extent of the burden thus imposed upon this country is perhaps imperfectly realized. When the time comes for presenting the Budget to Parliament that question can be gone into more fully. In the meantime certain further negotiations are necessary, and I am very happy to know that the Minister of Finance finds himself sufficiently restored to health to take part in them in the immediate future.

THE RAILWAY BELT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 54, to amend the Railway Belt Act was introduced and read the first time.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that work has been recommenced on the new parliament building, and I would consider it a very great pleasure if the members of the House would take an early opportunity of visiting the premises for the purpose of acquainting themselves with the general layout and making any suggestions which to them may seem proper with a view to expediting completion, and which might be acted upon by the committee having charge of the reconstruction. I regret to say that it does not look as though the building would be completed for the next session of Parliament, unless very radical changes are made in the present method of construction. If it meets with the convenience of hon. members I would suggest that either to-morrow or on Wednesday, between the hours of 1.30 and 3 o'clock, I shall be on the premises with as many of the officials as possible in order to conduct hon. members over the building and explain the general layout and proposed arrangements. I also extend this invitation to the press. I think that an hour, or an hour and one-half, could be very profitably spent and might result in speeding up the work, to the advantage of the country at large. I will leave the matter of the date and hour open, awaiting suggestions from hon. friends on either side of the House, but I repeat that either to-morrow or Wednesday, from 1.30 to 3, would suit me admirably.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I take this opportunity of asking my hon. friend whether it be true that the Government have decided to erect a house on the cliff, between the cliff and the present building, for a lodgement for the Speaker?

Mr. CARVELL: The committee, who are really the only ones exercising any jurisdiction in the matter, have decided they will not provide accommodation for the Speaker within the walls of the new building, but no further decision has been arrived at.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry that has been decided thus far. For the convenience of the Speaker himself, I think he had better be lodged in the building, as was done in the old building and as is the custom in Great Britain to-day. If it is decided to erect a separate building for this purpose between the present building and the cliff, I think it would be most offensive to the eye. There is not enough space between the cliff and the present building for another building, and far from enhancing the beauty of the surroundings it would have the contrary effect.

Mr. CARVELL: There has been no decision to erect a building on the cliff. Perhaps hon. members will be in a better position to discuss these matters after they have examined the building carefully.

THE QUEBEC DISTURBANCES; ARMAND LAVERGNE.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I desire to answer a question which was put on Friday last by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp). I was not present in the House when the question was put, but on the Orders of the Day the hon. member for Westmorland read what purported to be a report of some testimony given by Mr. Armand Lavergne at the coroner's inquest in Quebec, as follows:

> They then asked him to go and address the crowd, and as he had previously received the offer to act as chief keeper of records of the M.S.A., in Ottawa, which he had refused.

The hon. gentleman's question was whether Colonel Lavergne ever offered to act as chief keeper of records of the Military Service Act in Ottawa. I say in answer that there is no such office as chief keeper of records of the Military Service Act in Ottawa. I am assured by Colonel Machin of the Military Service Branch that there never was any offer whatsoever made of this non-existing position to Colonel Lavergne, nor, so far as he or any of his officers know, did Colonel Machin ever offer to fill that non-existing position. If Mr. Lavergne's testimony is correctly reported, it would appear to be an instance of the over-activity of a too vivid imaginaton.

EXCESS CIRCULATION ISSUE BY THE BANKS.

RESOLUTION TO APPROVE PROCLAMATION OF GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is a motion on Government orders which is somewhat urgent. It appears at page 22 of the Orders of the Day. The motion is very largely of a formal character, but it has to be made within thirty days after the opening of Parliament. In order that there may be no question as to the matter having been taken up within the limitation by law, I beg to move that the House proceed to Government notices of motion.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance) moved:

That the proclamation of the Governor in Council published on the 20th February, 1918, in the form following, be approved:—

Devonshire
[L.S.]

Canada.

George the Fifth, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India.

To all to whom these presents shall come, or whom the same may in anywise concern,— Greeting:

A Proclamation.

E. L. Newcombe,

Deputy Minister of Justice, Canada.

Whereas in and by section 4 of the Act of Parliament of Canada, passed in the fourth and fifth years of Our Reign, and intituled: "An Act to conserve the Commercial and Financial Interests of Canada," it is provided among other things that in case of war, real or apprehended, and in case of any real or apprehended financial crisis, Our Governor in Council may, by Proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, authorize the several chartered banks to issue excess circulation from and including the first day of March in any year to and including the last day of August next ensuing, or during any part of such period, to amounts not exceeding fifteen per cent of the combined unimpaired capital and rest or reserved fund of their respective banks, as stated in their respective statutory monthly returns to the Minister of Finance of Canada, for the month immediately preceding that in which the additional amount is issued,—

Now Know Ye that by and with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada We do by these presents proclaim and direct that the several chartered banks be authorized to issue excess circulation as in the said Act defined from and including the first day of March, 1918, to and including the last day of August, 1918.

Of all which Our loving subjects and all others whom these presents may concern, are hereby required to take notice and to govern themselves accordingly.

In Testimony Whereof, We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of Canada to be hereunto affixed. Witness: Our Right Trusty and Right Entirely Beloved Cousin and Counsellor, Victor Christian William, Duke of Devonshire, Marquess of Hartington, Earl of Devonshire, Earl of Burlington, Baron Cavendish of Hardwicke, Baron Cavendish of Keighley, Knight of Our Most Noble Order of the Garter; One of Our Most Honourable Privy Council; Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George; Knight Grand Cross of Our Royal Victorian Order; Gorvernor General and Commander in Chief of Our Dominion of Canada.

At Our Government House, in Our City of Ottawa, this Twentieth day of February, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, and in the eighth year of Our Reign.

By command,

Thomas Mulvey,
Under-Secretary of State.

He said: Hon. gentlemen will remember that under the Bank Act banks are authorized at certain periods of the year to exceed their normal bank circulation, particularly during the period of harvesting crops in Canada. Ordinarily their note circulation is confined to their unimpaired paid-up capital, the amount of current gold accounts, and Dominion notes which they hold in the central gold reserve, which is a banking reserve. From the 1st September to 28th February they are permitted by the Act to issue excess circulation not exceeding 15 per cent of their paid-up capital, rest and reserve fund. Under this power they are obliged to pay to the Government at the rate of 5 per cent interest for such excess circulation. Section 4 of the Finance Act of 1914 provides that the Governor in Council be further authorized to permit this excess circulation by the banks throughout the whole year; not only from the 1st of September to the 1st of March, but from the 1st of March until the last day of August. Section 4 of the Finance Act reads:

The Governor in Council may by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette:—

(c) authorize the several chartered banks to issue excess circulation, from and including the first day of March in any year, to and including the last day of August next ensuing, or during any part of such period, to amounts not exceeding fifteen per cent of the combined unimpaired capital and rest or reserve fund of the respective banks, as stated in their respective statutory montly returns to the Minister for the month immediately preceding that in which the additional amount is issued;

The Finance Act further provides that this authority for excess circulation during the entire year, or during the additional period of six months, becomes effective by proclamation, and it always provides that the proclamation shall continue in force for not more than thirty days after the beginning of the next session of parliament, unless it has been approved by resolution passed by both houses of Parliament. Parliament opened on the 18th of March, and consequently this proclamation must receive the approval of this House by resolution to-day, or possibly to-morrow. Therefore, it is, to keep perfectly within the statutory requirement, that I ask Parliament to approve of this resolution. No similar resolution was passed last year or the year before, for the reason that the proclamation issued while Parliament was in session, and the Justice Department advised the Department of Finance that the approval of Parliament was not necessary. I may say that the banks generally have exercised the powers granted under this proclamation. During the past year a total interest of $109,533.06 has been collected from the banks on account of excess note circulation. All of the chartered banks have availed themselves of the privilege given them under this provision of the Finance Act. I trust, therefore, that Parliament will be pleased to approve of the resolution. I might further say that on Friday last the Senate passed a resolution of approval.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The House would be interested in knowing whether or not the banks all require this extension of power. Has a petition to this effect been presented to the Government, or has there been a resolution by the boards of directors of the banks?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The very fact that the banks have all exercised the privilege granted by the Finance Act clearly shows that they desire the privilege, and the proclamation was made upon the presentation of the banks.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, that may be so, but, since Parliament has to review the proclamation, in the nature of things Parliament should be informed in the same way as the Government was informed. I am prepared to believe that the banks have asked for it; therefore, I see no serious objection.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House returned to the "Orders of the Day."

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 9, respecting Fraser Lumber Company, Limited, and Fraser Companies, Limited.—Mr. Elkin.

Bill No. 22, respecting The Canadian Society of Civil Engineers and to change its name to "The Engineering Institute of Canada."—Sir Herbert Ames.

Bill No. 8, respecting The Cosmos Cotton Company.—Mr. Spinney.

PATENT OF O.G.C.L.J. OVERBECK.

House in committee on Bill No. 29 respecting a patent of O.G.C.L.J. Overbeck.—Mr. Fripp. Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 2:

Mr. CURRIE: What is this Bill about? I see it is one of those German patents, and I was wondering whether it was some patent in connection with munitions and whether a German firm wants to get in on it. Have you the memorandum, Mr. Chairman, which is issued on each of these Bill stating what the object is?

Mr. RICHARDSON: The man who has applied for this legislation is a British subject, although he may have a German name. He has a patent on a process to dealcoholize beer, take away the kick and leave the flavour. There was no strenuous opposition in the Committee on Private Bills, but owing to the current of the war he seems to have lost his rights, and he merely asks to be reinstated. He wants to be able to furnish the world with beer without the kick, and the committee felt unanimously that he ought to have that privilege.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—WRITS OF HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. How many writs of Habeas Corpus have been taken out to date, in the military district of Montreal, towards securing the freedom of conscripted men?

CANADIAN FUEL DEPOSITS.

MOTION BY MR. J. E. ARMSTRONG ADVOCATING DEVELOPMENT AND UTILIZATION OF FUEL RESOURCES OF CANADA.

Mr. JOSEPH E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is of great importance that the increased and increasing demand for fuel for manufacturing and residental purposes be supplied in larger quantities and at cheaper rates than are now possible; that the deposits of bituminous and anthracite coal in Canada located in the extreme eastern and western portions thereof, be more fully and thoroughly utilized for the benefit of the residents of the central provinces; that the enormous peat and lignite deposits so widely distributed through all portions of the Dominion be also scientifically made use of for the same purpose, and further that the Government of Canada make a special effort through legislation and otherwise, to have these valuable deposits more fully and rapidly developed to the end that the people of Canada may be adequately supplied with these fuels.

He said: The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) who was to have supported this resolution has been obliged to leave owing to illness in his family. He, therefore, asked me to read on his behalf a letter which embodies his views with respect to this resolution. The letter reads:

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Ottawa, April 12th, 1918.

—Re Your Resolution in the House—

Dear Mr. Armstrong:—

Enclosed you will find copy of letter which speaks for itself.

Owing to the illness of my aged father I arranged to go to-morrow afternoon to visit him. Train connections make it impossible for me to return here in time for Monday's discussion.

I, therefore, beg you to be good enough to point out to the House, that it is possible, in my opinion, for the Province of Alberta to supply all the coal needed in the Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and even in the Province of Ontario, subject to costs and facilities of transportation.

This subject has been ably covered by Mr. Lemieux, member for Maisonneuve, and I am sure he will co-operate with you in every particular. In my opinion there is no reason why the miners of Alberta should not be kept busy at the mines during the summer months, and the coal transported and stored in such a way that only a small percentage would be lost.

If the winter demand for the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and Manitoba is now supplied many of the miners could be transported to the Eastern coal fields, there to enlarge the output so as to supply from that point, at least the Province of Quebec, if not Ontario.

I regret very much that your Resolution is brought at this time because the delegation of miners who are coming to this city on the 17th instant, for the express purpose of discussing the ways and means of production, could be of material assistance to us in this discussion.

This Government, in my opinion, should not neglect to keep in close touch with the labour element so as to remedy, in this particular case at all events, the condition of things which exist. I would have suggestions to make, but not having had the opportunity to discuss with the Minister of Labour, and not knowing what he has in mind, I refrain from so doing.

Yours very truly,

H. A. MACKIE.

Enclosed with the hon. gentleman's letter was the following communication:

District No. 18.

United Mine Workers of America.

Calgary, Alta., March 30th, 1918.

H. A. Mackie, Esq.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:—

I beg to acknowledge yours of the 25th inst. and wish to state that pretty near all the Lignite Mines are closed down as they have no Orders, Drumheller Mines and Mines in the Lethbridge Field, if you could get the Government to give us the Manitoba, and Saskatchewan market, we could work ten months in the year. Last year and all winter they were having heatless days in the East, at the same time Mr. Magrath was allowing coal from the lakes that had been shipped while the Lakes were open, sending the coal to Winnipeg, and our Mines in the Drumheller valley, closed down, during November, December and January, these mines only worked two months, that was before the strike, A committee of the Miners of District 18 will be in Ottawa on April 17th, and will see you and give you all information that is necessary.

Yours truly,

"Edw. Browne"

Secretary District 18.

The resolution which I have moved is identically the same as that which I placed upon the Order Paper last year. It is not my intention to repeat at any great length any of the arguments which I used at that time, but I do feel that the Government should then have given this matter their immediate attention. While it is true that they have during the past ten days set aside by Order in Council the sum of $400,000 for the development of the coal areas of the West, and that they also contemplate the development of some of our enormous peat deposits, I feel that a full year has in reality been wasted, and instead of being ready with a supply of fuel for the coming winter, with its anticipated still greater shortage, we shall not be in a position to supply public demands for some considerable time unless the greatest possible speed is attained. However, I cannot but congratulate the Government upon the action they have taken, and am confident that the people of Canada will uphold them in any reasonable efforts they may make to provide fuel for the winter of 1919.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. member if he will say if he knows anything of the Graham carbonizing process and if the Cabinet has taken it into consideration?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I will leave the answer to the minister; I am not positive what action they have taken. My advice to them is to speed up the organization to the utmost limit, and I am going to offer some suggestions as to how it should be speeded up. What we need, Mr. Speaker, at the head of the Geological Survey and the Mines Branch is a man who should and would devote all his time and energy towards making it what it should be, one of the most progressive departments of this Government. He should be given a free hand to reorganize and rearrange this department. In making this statement, I do not wish in any way to criticise the present acting Minister of Mines, for I believe he is at least trying to straighten out some of the many things which need to be straightened out in that department; but the present Minister of Mines is also the Secretary of State, and in that position he cannot give the Department of Mines the attention it deserves during these trying days. Let me call your attention, for a moment, to the extent of the operations carried on in this department, and the amount of money which is spent.

Civil Government salaries, 1917 and 1918 - - - - - - - - - $321,364 67

This amount has been expended on employees operating in the different branches of this department. The employees on April 5th numbered 276. In 1907, the Geological Survey Act was passed, and the appointment of a separate minister was considered advisable, and since that time there have been seven ministers in this department, and several acting ministers. You can readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that no definite policy could be worked out in this way. Many of these ministers did not take even a reasonable interest in their department, and some of them while they were in office never visited or inspected the branches in Ottawa to see whether those branches were living or dead—and I want to make the statement that some of the branches, at least, appear to be more dead than alive at the present time. It is surprising to me that so much has been accomplished in the last few years under the circumstances. There should not be any divided authority in this department. I am confident that there should be a general readjustment. Some men should be superannuated; others should be dismissed, and some new blood injected into this department, which, though one of the most important, has been one of the most neglected in the service.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

There is serious overlapping in this department, and a useless waste of public money as well as of the valuable time of officials. Take the matter of statistical reports; they are one or two years old before being handed out to the public. The 1917 report has not been sent to the printer yet. Some radical changes are needed if this department is to serve the public as it should in its future development. The Minister of Mines should, at an early date, call the heads of the mines branches of each of the provinces together, and devise a scheme whereby overlapping and duplication of work should be stopped. The mines branches in the different provinces should work in perfect harmony with this department, but under present conditions the very opposite is the case. This department should also get in close touch with the industries using mineral products in our country, and every encouragement should be extended to assist the development of these industries. Parliament should deal generously with this branch and provide it with every reasonable means to carry on its work. Last year, the production of our mines amounted to over $192,000,000, of which the province of Ontario produced $71,000,000. The mines of Canada are capable of far greater development, and if the Government will take the money spent by this department in useless and unnecessary work, and add to it the money used by commissions in duplicating the work already done by this department and by the Interior Department there would be a large amount available for these developments.

Canada must be ready, after the war, to manufacture, as far as possible, her raw material. Vast quantities of raw material are leaving our mines to be manufactured into finished products in the United States and elsewhere. We have only developed a small portion of our mineral area, and no country in the world can offer greater opportunities to the man who wishes to invest in mining. Canada needs a fuel controller, but she also needs a mines department that will back him up and assist him in furnishing the fuel. Why should it be necessary for the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta to import coal from Pennsylvania, two thousand miles away, when they have abundance of excellent fuel within their own boundaries? Five hundred and fifty thousand tons of Pennsylvania coal was transported to the western provinces last year, when, with proper development and distribution, the coal deposits of the West would have been quite sufficient to supply their needs. In addition to this, 2,376,934 tons of other grades of coal from the United States were utilized in those western provinces. According to the Commission of Conservation, the total imports of coal into Fort William, Port Arthur and Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta points of entry for the years 1914, 1915 and 1916 were as follows: I will quote the 1916 figures:

	Tons.
Anthracite	533,642
Bituminous—
Slack	258,836
Lump and run-of-mine.. ..	2,118,098
Total	2,910,576

The estimated value which the commission has placed on this coal is at least ten million dollars.

Mr. CURRIE: How much is that per ton?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That depends on the grades and qualities. This is the statement made by the Conservation Commission:

> The foregoing valuation of the coal imported in 1916 is based on the price at the mines in the United States, and does not include the freight charges on American lines, nor the freight on that brought up by the lakes. The total amount of money which annually leaves Canada to pay for these imports represents approximately ten millions of dollars.

Practically the whole province of Alberta, and many parts of Saskatchewan, are undermined with coal. These provinces have a greater quantity of coal than any country in the world with the exception of the United States. There is no excuse for a coal shortage in Canada between Port Arthur and the Pacific ocean, nor yet is there a reasonable excuse for a shortage of coal between Montreal and the Atlantic ocean. I understand that the mines in the West would be able to materially increase production if steady employment could be given to the miners; and by producing fuel in the West for consumption there it would create a steady demand for coal and mean all-the-year-round operation of the mines. Millions of dollars would be kept in this country which is now going to the United States in payment for coal. The people of Nova Scotia should be furnished with transportation facilities in order to land their coal, iron, steel, coke, tar, and the chemicals produced from coal, in Quebec and Ontario ports, and in return would receive our flour, wheat, bacon and manufactured goods. Canada has tremendous resources in her mines, and we must commence to investigate and to utilize them. The coal areas of Canada have an estimated total extent of 109,168 square miles, and on summing up the reports of the coal deposits of the world we find that Canada has the second greatest amount available, namely, 1,234,269,000,000 tons, while the United States has 3,838,659,000,000 tons available. The actual available supply in Nova Scotia is estimated at 400,000,000 tons, and the present output in that province is 5,000,000 tons per annum. The Maritime Provinces once provided the province of Quebec with 2,000,000 tons of coal; last year they only provided 50,000 tons. It may safely be said that there will be no permanent reduction in the price of coal, rather it is reasonably certain that there will be a gradual and steady increase. The price of anthracite and other coal is advancing largely because of the exhaustion of the thicker beds, the increased cost of working and the increased freight rates. In the United States, they are digging coal dust from coal dumps and rivers and find it, after treatment equal in many ways to the best slack coal. This merely goes to show that the people of the United States are making every effort to conserve their fuel resources. They are also demanding that their people save fuel. In the anthracite region, during a period of many years, 5,000,000 tons of what is called coal slush has been dumped into the rivers. If you go through that region to-day, you will see dredges working in the rivers taking out this slush, which is afterwards sold. I understand that within the past year a considerable quantity of this material has been finding its way into Canada.

George H. Cushing, editor of Black Diamond, says:

> The United States will start this year with 125,000 fewer miners than at the end of 1916. These men have either been drafted or have drifted to industrial centres where munition and other plants pay higher wages. Car supplies have not materially increased.

Vice-president Schayer, of the Pennsylvania railroad, after a study of the car situation says:

> Only alleviation, not correction, is possible this year. It will take the railroads until the end of the war to catch up with their traffic. Apart from direct coal requirements we must supply from American coal enough by-products to support 1,500,000 troops shooting away powder.

Let me read a paragraph from a statement made by Mr. W. J. Dick, of the Geological Survey Department, to the Mining Institute in the city of Montreal some weeks ago.

> Speaking of the waste of coal in Canada, W. J. Dick said:

A large proportion of the coal mined in Canada was lost and wasted through caving of measures owing to the practice of mining lower seams of better quality first, with the result that by the caving in, the recovery of coal from the upper seams was generally impossible. In other countries leases were granted only on satisfaction being given the authorities that a proper scheme of operations was to be carried on. In Canada, there was indiscriminate leasing of coal lands without restriction, and if the mines were working to their capacity, the output would be 16,000,000 tons per annum. He deprecated the opening up of farmer or "snowbird" mines, about 400 of which had been abandoned in Alberta alone, as they had only destroyed the entrance to a coal field for large operations and were a menace to safety in the workings. He suggested that slack coal should be made into briquettes if a cheap binding could be found.

I merely read this for the purpose of calling to the attention of the ministers the need of more stringent regulations with regard to the operations carried on at the mines and the development of our coal resources.

Here is a statement made by a professor in a Saskatchewan college:

The United States wastes $500,000,000 worth of coal every year, said Dr. R. D. McLaurin, professor of chemistry at the University of Saskatchewan, in a recent letter to F. Maclure Sclanders, industrial commission of the Border Chamber of Commerce, Windsor.

Canada has been as wasteful proportionately. In view of the present necessity for fuel of all kinds, this waste of coal is nothing less than criminal.

Let me direct the attention of hon. members to a statement made by H. A. Garfield, United States fuel administrator. The article is headed "Won't You Help to Save Coal?" Mr. Garfield says:

The war has created a demand upon the United States for 100,000,000 extra tons of coal this year. Because of the congested condition of the railroads, due to war shipping, it will be impossible to supply more than half this additional demand through increased production alone. The remaining 50,000,000 tons needed to support war activities and to keep us warm will have to be saved shovelful by shovelful through care in American factories and homes.

The United States is called upon to produce 700,000,000 tons of coal this year. This is 100,000,000 more tons than we have ever produced before. The high water mark of production this year, in spite of all handicaps, will give 50,000,000 tons of this additional amount. The remaining 50,000,000 tons must be filled in by patriotic thriftiness. If in each home there was saved one shovelful of coal each day it would mean a total saving of 15,000,000 tons a year. Comfort for 7,500,000 soldiers in army cantonments. Enough to send a fleet of twenty-five battleships 3,000 miles across the Atlantic to guard our transports

This is a statement issued in New York within the last few days:

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

New York, April 11.—Warnings that a shortage of bituminous coal exists were issued today by fuel authorities here. The situation is so serious, according to Harry T. Peters, chairman of the State Fuel Conservation Committee, that we will be back where we were last winter unless something is done to relieve matters.

March was the worst month in point of production during the past year and a half, Mr. Peters asserted, and some factories have been forced to continue working with barely enough fuel to meet current needs.

To show how urgent is the need for conservation of coal, the following is quoted from the United States Fuel Bulletin:

But unfortunately, the transportation of coal alone uses up 30 per cent of the entire railroad equipment of the United States, cars, locomotives, sidings, and terminals.

I read these extracts merely for the purpose of emphasizing how dependent we are on the United States for a large quantity of coal annually, and the necessity of the Government taking immediate action to endeavour to supply the people of Canada with an adequate quantity of coal for the coming winter. This is a statement made by the coal operators of the Northwest:

Production in Alberta can be almost doubled in 1918 with same labour. Alberta coal operators are anxious to supply the coal needs of the Canadian West, and thus relieve the general fuel situation in Canada. To this end the Northern Alberta Coal Operators' Association has sent two delegates to Ontario to impress this on the people and through them upon the Government. There was a meeting of the coal operators of Alberta at Calgary on February 11, said Mr. Anderson, at which possibly 75 operators were present, representing the mines of Edmonton, Drumheller, Lethbridge, and the Alberta portion of the Crow's Nest Pass field. The meeting was called to ascertain what the Alberta coal mines could do to increase production in 1918. The mines of Alberta produced approximately 4,700,000 tons of coal in 1917. At this meeting the Crow's Nest Pass field promised an increase in 1918 over 1917 of 1,250,000 tons, Lethbridge an increase of 200,000 tons, Drumheller an increase of 1,800,000 tons, and Edmonton an increase of 1,000,000 tons, if the mines were kept running continually and with labour which is at present employed.

This country is short of transportation facilities, therefore, it is short on coal One begins to comprehend the nature of the problem when confronted with this fact: the transportation of the 30,000,000 carloads of coal mined last year constituted more than half of all the freight carried by the railroads. But when to this eloquent factor is added the explanation that railroads themselves in their locomotives used last year between 125,000,000 and 135,000,000 tons of coal, and that they will this year require for their use 175,000,000 tons, it is seen that this hauling of coal is a burdensome proposition.

During 1917 the mines of Alberta worked on an average of 13.3 days per month for the year. On February 9, when a portion of Canada was ordered to close its manufacturing concerns owing to lack of fuel, a mine in the Edmonton field, having an output of 400 to 500 tons daily, was closed down for lack of orders. Mr. Shelden represents the Humberstone Coal Company in the same field, with an output of 800 tons daily, and which has been closed several days in February owing to lack of orders. All this while Ontario is short of fuel.

I am convinced that only by the development of our own fuel resources in our western country can we expect to avert a crisis such as we had in Ontario during the last winter.

As to the question of natural gas for fuel purposes. In addition to the enormous deposits of coal, the western provinces are supplied with large quantities of natural gas; in fact, no country in the world has so large a supply. Millions of feet of this most valuable fuel are being wasted every day—wasted, to a large extent, through the carelessness of the Mines Branch of the Interior Department, in connection with the western provinces, and wasted also through conflict between the Geological Survey and Mines Branches. I can best emphasize this statement by reading a reply to a letter I sent to the Deputy Minister of Mines. It is dated Ottawa, January 8, 1918, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Armstrong:—

Your letter of the 2nd inst. to the Minister of Mines relative to the waste in natural gas in northern Alberta was referred to this office for attention.

There is, however, some waste both on Peace River and at other places in northern Alberta. At present the operators can practically do as they please, and it is high time that some regulations were formulated aiming at controlling their actions.

In addition to the waste of gas there is also danger of faulty or careless boring injuring or destroying gas horizons by letting in water.

The great gas field in northern Alberta is under the control of the Interior Department, and leases to bore for gas or oil are issued by them. I have already drawn their attention to the pressing need of regulations to govern boring operations, and hope some action will be taken in the matter during the present winter.

I know that this matter has only to be called to the attention of the present Minister of the Interior to receive his very earnest consideration. Our part of the country furnishes a great many of the drillers who go into the western provinces, and I come in contact with quite a number of them. I understand there are about 35 drilling rigs operating there. If these drillers are at all careless in removing the casing or not plugging the well properly and allowing the water to get into the veins, an enormous wastage of gas results. Let me give an illustration of what two wells in our western country have been wasting. I received this information from the Mines Department. One gas well on the Athabaska has been wide open, wasting gas for the past twenty or twenty-five years, and it is to-day wasting 200,000 feet of gas.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where did you get that information?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: From Dr. Dowling of the Mines Branch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not know what he is talking about, if he says that.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This well has been wasting gas for the past twenty or twenty-five years; I have heard of this well myself a number of times, and have called the attention of the Mines Department to it. For years it has wasted over 500,000 feet of gas per day—an estimated loss of about one billion feet of gas altogether. There is another well on the Peace river wide open. These are only two of the wells that have been abandoned and are wasting this excellent fuel. I think the Mines Branch, so far as the leasing of wells and things of that kind is concerned, should be under the Geological Survey Branch. I think that was intended when the Act was passed on the 27th of April, 1907. Clause 4 of that Act reads as follows:

The department shall administer all laws enacted by the Parliament of Canada relating to mines and mining, and shall also have the management and direction of all subjects assigned to it by the Governor in Council.

Whenever, under the provisions of this section, the management and direction of any subject is transferred from any other department to the Department of Mines, the Minister of Mines and the Deputy Minister of Mines shall be substituted for, and have all the powers and perform all the duties of, the minister and deputy minister, respectively, of such other department, as defined and provided by the Acts and regulations relating to such subject.

Natural gas is the cleanest and best of natural fuels. Raymond S. Blatchley of the Bureau of Mines of the United States estimated that up to 1914 the waste of natural gas in the state of Kansas alone had amounted to 25 billions of feet, and that the state of Oklahoma had wasted a similar amount through carelessness. Abandoned wells were improperly plugged and water was allowed to enter the gas veins. A great quantity of natural gas in the United States is being used for the manufacture of gasolene. The quantity of gasolene that may be obtained from gas ranging in specific gravity from 0·64 to 1·46 varies from zero to 5 gallons per 1,000 feet of gas. With the absorption process a natural gas containing less than 1 pint of gasolene per 1,000 feet can be treated at a profit. In the year 1915, 65,000,000 gallons of gasolene prepared by these methods was placed on the market in the United States. The production of gasolene from natural gas in 1916 in the United States was over 100,000,000 gallons.

In order that I may give some idea of the increase of consumption of gasolene as a fuel, the Bureau of Mines of the United States says that while the consumption of gasolene in 1909 was 11,000,000 barrels of 42 gallons, in 1914 it had increased to 30,000,000 barrels, in 1916 to 50,000,000 barrels, and in 1917 to 75,000,000 barrels—a total of 3,150,000,000 gallons. A similar increase in the consumption of this fuel is going on in Canada, and this is an additional reason for conserving our natural gas. The people of the United States in 1914 used 591,000,000,000 feet of natural gas in their cities, towns and factories for heating and lighting. What is Canada doing to conserve and utilize her gas fields? In Ontario, for instance, the provincial government have appointed a man whose duty it is to follow up all drilling operations in the provinces, to see that wells are carefully bored, and that no water is allowed to escape into the veins of an abandoned well through being improperly plugged.

Now a few words about powdered coal. In the United States 8,000,000 tons of powdered coal was used last year. I understand that little, if any, of this product is used in Canada.

I have made somewhat extensive inquiries in regard to the use of powdered coal in factories and on the railways, and I am convinced that we should immediately investigate the advisability of using coal in this form. In order to use coal in pulverized form it should be specially prepared, which consists of thoroughly drying and grinding. The cost of preparation is off-set by mechanical feeding, doing away with high-priced firemen; this is particularly true when applied to firing locomotives. It is blown into the furnace with a burner similar to an oil burner.

I am informed that the provincial laws of Alberta forbids the burning of the high volatile lignite coal, owing to the danger from starting fires. In the pulverized form the combustion would be so thorough that there would be no danger from this source, and, besides, it entirely eliminates the smoke nuisance which is so prevalent at busy city terminals. In talking this matter over with railroad men in Alberta, they seemed to think that the high per cent of moisture in the lignite coal would seriously interfere with the burning of it in the powdered form. However, I have secured from Mr. John Sterling, Inspector of Mines in Alberta, analysis from seven of the largest mines, two of which I give, showing a fair average:

Lakeside Mine—
Moisture	24·1
Ash	6·1
Volatile	26·7
Fixed carbon	42·1
Lethbridge Chinook Coal Co., Ltd.—
Moisture	8·7
Ash	11·2
Volatile	28·
Fixed carbon	52·1

The former shows high percentage of moisture, but when this coal was submitted for analysis to J. E. Muhlfield, President of the Locomotive Pulverized Fuel Company, of New York, he at once stated that the moisture was so easily reduced that it was no detriment. I quote Mr. Muhlfield, for it is largely through his personal efforts that the use of low grade fuels in powdered form has been brought to its present state of efficiency. In 1915 the fuel situation in Brazil was in such a serious condition that the average price reached $40 per ton for best coal. There are large deposits of coal in Brazil, but it contains so great a percentage of sulphur and iron pyrites, which clinkers on the grates of an ordinary boiler, that it was impossible to get results, and for this reason had practically no commercial value.

The Brazilian Government, learning that their native coal might be used in the powdered form, sent Dr. Riberio, Locomotive Superintendent of the Central Railway of Brazil, to the United States to make a test of 50 tons of Brazilian coal on locomotives in the pulverized form, analysis of which was as follows:

Moisture, from	2 to 8 per cent
Sulphur	3 to 9 per cent
Volatile	14 to 28 per cent
Fixed carbon	34 to 58 per cent
Ash	26 to 30 per cent

The tests of the above proved that the volatile and fixed carbon percentage made this a very satisfactory fuel in powdered form, and orders were placed for 12 locomotives to be constructed to burn pulverized coal. These are now in service on Brazilian railroads and have proved so satisfactory that the Brazilian Government have placed orders in the United States for 250 more locomotives to be equipped to burn native Brazilian coal in pulverized form.

The American Locomotive Works at Schenectady, N.Y., have a powdered fuel plant, and they are using this form of fuel under their water tube boilers, and also have substituted this kind of fuel at their oil burning furnaces in their large forge plant. Mr. R. H. White, their maintenance engineer, said that they were getting as good results in their forge plant with powdered coal as they formerly did with oil at a very much reduced cost. Mr. White also stated that some of the coal which they were using successfully in the powdered form was of such low grade that it could not be used in furnace grates.

I submit this information to the House for its consideration.

Now, in regard to electricity. The simplest way to cut down our coal imports into Ontario is to use our water-powers, when Niagara and the St. Lawrence, and their tributaries are doing the work they should do there will be little need of coal for industrial development, we will however need large quantities of coal for heating purposes. What is the Dominion doing to assist in the development of electricity? Should we leave the development of this industry to the provinces? Ontario for instance, has $50,000,000 invested in the electrical development of the province. It is estimated that Canada has 18,800,000 horse-power available from her water-powers, and has only developed 1,800,000 horse-power, leaving about seventeen million horse-power undeveloped. (Assuming a horse-power to call on an average of 10 tons of coal per annum.) This means a waste of 170,000,000 tons of coal annually, providing it was necessary to develop all our water-powers. What are we doing as a Dominion to control this enormous waste? If we did not have the development of electricity in Canada we would be compelled to import from the United States or other countries double the amount of coal we are importing to-day. Canada has the greatest amount of water-power in any country in the world, and in the future there will be tremendous developments in this direction. This Government should place the development of electricity for light, heat, and power purposes, under some minister who will take an active interest in its promotion.

Just a word in regard to our peat deposits. It is not my intention to discuss at any length the question of peat, oil shale, deposits, or producer gas. The Government officials decided that peat could be manufactured in blocks suitable for industries and private homes at an actual cost of $1.75 per ton. The officials of the Mines Branch claim that this was the actual cost per ton of producing 2,000 tons from the Alfred bog, just outside Ottawa. If the officials of the Government are correct in their calculations as to the cost of this peat, we are neglecting the development of our peat bogs. Canada has 37,000 square miles of known peat bogs, but these form probably but a small fraction of the total constituting a potential national asset of enormous value. The peat deposits of Canada are greater in extent than those of any other country with the exception of Russia. During the period from 1908 to 1914 the Mines Branch located, mapped and investigated 140,000 acres of bogs, estimated to be capable of yielding 115,000,000 tons of fuel, and 10,500,000 tons of peat moss litter. Seven of these bogs within convenient shipping distance of Toronto, will yield 26,500,000 tons of fuel, four bogs within a few miles of Ottawa are estimated to contain over 25 million tons. Seven bogs in the Montreal district could furnish that city with 23,500,000 tons of fuel, and five bogs along the St. Lawrence and convenient to Quebec, could supply 16,250,000 tons of fuel. Next winter there will be a greater demand for fuel, and the railroads cannot cope with the conditions, and handle any great quantities of this fuel. We are calling for greater production, and the railroads will be taxed to their utmost. How then can we expect to be in a better position as regards transportation? This is the time to begin to speed up coal delivery, and to urge the production of other fuels as well as coal. The Department of Mines of the United States issues a pamphlet, called "Five ways of saving fuel in heating houses."

We should educate our people in the use of lower grades of fuel. The same department issues another pamphlet called "Firing bituminous coal in house heating boilers." We educate our people in food conservation, why not in fuel conservation? A campaign of publicity, through the press and otherwise, should be instituted similar to the campaign for food conservation. Farmers, and others living in rural communities, should be urged to use wood fuel. Canada must plan for a fuel supply, not only for this year or next year, but for generations to come. The coal shortage of the United States last year was officially estimated to be 50,000,000 tons. The people of Canada in 1916 used 30,000,000 tons of coal and we only produced 14,500,000 tons.

There will be far greater shortage this year unless immediate action is taken. The demands for coal for industrial purposes have greatly increased and the demands for export purposes have increased enormously. The United States, through its fuel administration, has ordered that no coal is to be exported from that country except to Canada. How long will the United States deplete her stock of coal to keep us warm and to keep the wheels of our enterprises going? The coal shortage in the United States will continue for the duration of the war and Canada is sure to be seriously affected thereby. Canada to-day is facing a fuel situation of great gravity, a situation created by our dependence on the United States for our fuel supply. It will be quite impossible for that country to supply our needs, and give reasonable attention to the requirements of her people.

Our present position is most unsatisfactory and can only be improved by a determined and energetic exploitation and utilization of our own vast fuel resources. To do nothing, or to waste time, must lead to misery and disaster. Drastic measures must be undertaken by this Government in order to prevent as far as possible a serious shortage of fuel in 1919. I therefore respectfully urge that every effort be put forth by this Government to provide for abundance of fuel for the coming winter, and at the same time lay the foundation for an unlimited supply of fuel for the future.

Mr. M. CLARK: I should like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) if he could give us the comparative figures as to the export of coal from the United States to Canada and from Canada to the United States.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I regret I am not in a position to give those figures. I have no doubt the minister will be very glad to supply that information.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, provided that this House gives assent to the resolution that is proposed by my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), and the Government gives effect to it, it will be of such inestimable value to the section of country in which I live, that I feel I would be derelict in my duty if I did not give as strongly as I can my support to the resolution. I have referred to the section of the country in which I live, and I hope that my hon friend from Lambton will forgive me for taking a sectional view of what is a splendid Dominion-wide policy. If anything which I feel in connection with this policy is not any larger than the section or the province I represent I do not think the point which I propose to make would be worthy of respect. This is a Dominion wide policy and I hope that, while I am speaking of the section I represent, no one will feel that I am too small a man to take a broad view of the question.

The section of the country to which I refer is the whole east half of the province of Saskatchewan and a large portion of the province of Manitoba, in which territory, there live at least one million people and the coal supply for that one million people should naturally come from the lignite fields of Southern Saskatchewan. I believe I am correct when I say that from these fields can be taken, not millions of tons of coal, but billions upon billions of tons. I believe, so enormous is that coal field, that it will supply Canada for hundreds of years to come. Notwithstanding the fact that we have one million people living there, and notwithstanding the fact that there are billions of tons of coal, we are using only two hundred thousand tons a year out of that field.

To-day I am somewhat in a state of doubt, not in regard to the resolution, because I give it my most hearty endorsement, but in regard to my attitude towards governmental action. Doubt has come to me because of the statement which was made in this House last week by the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), in reply to the motion made by the hon. member from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). I paid particular attention to him as he was speaking and I noticed that he spoke with a great deal of hesitancy. I know the Minister of the Interior and I know that hesitancy is not one of his characteristics. I also noticed that he was lacking in detail upon that particular occasion. I know that he is a master of detail and I rather wondered at that. I also noticed that he was not too definite in what he said and he usually is quite definite. So, I came to the conclusion, which I think was natural, that the hon. member was not too sure himself of the question upon which he was speaking. Then, in the last two or three days, taking up the western press, I have noticed that they have been dealing with his statement very extensively and I find that they are very much in doubt as to what is proposed. Some of them say that the Government has decided to vote $200,000 for the development of the lignite fields of southern Saskatchewan and that the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan would each vote $100,000, making $400,000, and that this was to be used in establishing a briquetting plant at Estevan. Then again, the press informed us that they had interviewed the local governments and that the local governments had expressed themselves to the effect that they did not know anything about it. We are informed by the hon. member for Lambton that an Order in Council appropriating $400,000 has been passed. I hope that is so, and I hope that my ignorance in regard to the matter may be excused. I have never seen that Order in Council, but as the whole thing appears to be in a state of doubt, I feel that I should support, just as strongly as I can, the resolution of my hon. friend from Lambton, and urge upon the Government that if they have not yet decided to vote that money, they should immediately decide to do so.

About ten days ago the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), from his seat in this House, made a statement, which I took to be an enunciation of policy on the part of the Government, when he said that not one dollar of money would be expended on any unnecessary work. I take that to be a hint to all members of this House that we need not bother ourselves very much asking for local improvements. With that policy I fully agree. The seventy thousand people living in the constituency of Regina have sent me down here for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is to remove all embarrassments from the Government of Canada until we had got this accursed war out of the way. That is the reason I am here. I am not here to make any unusual demands and I do not intend to do so. But at the same time I can say that this $400,000 would not be an expenditure at all, but it would be an investment which would return the full amount to the Government and to the people, because they are one, and under those circumstances I think I am justified in saying that such an expenditure would be entirely within the policy announced by the Minister of Public Works.

Why is it that only two hundred thousand tons of lignite coal have been mined and used annually in that section, and why is it that we are importing, as the hon. member from Lambton has said, some five hundred thousand tons of anthracite from Pennsylvania? Surely Saskatchewan is not a natural market for the anthracite of Pennsylvania? I believe most thoroughly in the policy of the exchange of products, and is not coal a commodity in regard to which an exchange can naturally be made? The mines of the maritime provinces might find their natural market in the eastern United States, and the United States might send us their coal without hindrance. But when it comes to Saskatchewan, I cannot imagine any one saying that Saskatchewan is the natural market for anthracite from the Pennsylvania coal fields, when we have billions of tons of coal in our own territory. Why, then, is it that it is being sent there? I think some of the hon. members of the House will be interested in knowing the results of the experiments which were made in the city of Regina last year because of the coal shortage, and the result of which will show that governmental action is absolutely necessary and advisable, and would be profitable if it were undertaken. Last year, in connection with our municipal power plant, we entered into a contract for twenty thousand tons of Greenhill coal, and Greenhill coal is the finest coal that is mined on earth, and it comes from the province of Alberta. But the Government authorized the breaking of the contracts, with the result that we had to increase the price. More than that we were confronted with the possibility of not getting coal at all. So we decided to authorize our commissioners to purchase two thousand tons of this lignite coal to use in our plant as an experiment in order to see how it would compare with the other coal, and whether it could be used advantageously or not. Now, I will give you some of the results of that test in order to demonstrate what the conditions are, and to show you that governmental action is necessary if we are going to be able to use the coal from this immense coal field.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Where did you get your lignite?

Mr. COWAN: From Estevan, which is ninety miles, as the crow flies, from our city. As I say, we agreed to purchase twenty thousand tons of western coal, which had to be brought a distance of six hundred miles to Regina. The Estevan mines are only ninety miles, as the crow flies, south of Regina, but when we came to purchase the Estevan coal we found that in order to get it to Regina—and the same thing applies to the natural market for this coal—we had to bring it to our city in a very roundabout way. Instead of it being a matter of ninety miles, we had to ship the coal west and then double back, involving a distance of one hundred and fifty miles all told. The freight rate for the six hundred mile journey required to bring the Greenhill coal from the Alberta mines to Regina was $3 a ton, whereas the freight rate from Estevan by the roundabout way of a hundred and fifty miles was $1.50 a ton.

That is to say, bringing in the Estevan coal by the roundabout way cost twice the rate per ton per mile involved in bringing in the Alberta coal. Hon. gentlemen will readily see that is a very great handicap indeed. I would point out to the Minister of the Interior and to the Minister of Finance that in order to make their investment of $400,000 in coal development a profitable one, it will be necessary to build a seven-mile railway from the Grand Trunk Pacific railway in order to tap these mines. In that way a direct line from the mines to the natural market will be provided. I do not know what interest the present Government has in the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, but I fancy that sooner or later it will have a very substantial interest in the deficits of that line, and the easiest way to get rid of those deficits would be to build the little spur line which I have suggested and this would permit of the public getting ample supplies of coal by direct route.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What would that make your distance to the mines?

Mr. COWAN: Less than one hundred miles. It would save about sixty or seventy miles and make the distance to be covered between ninety and one hundred miles. The building of the suggested seven-mile spur would give easy access to the whole of the north and north east country, and bring these coal mines into direct communication with the natural market.

Well, we found that not only did we have to pay double freight rates on this lignite, but when we came to experiment with it we proved conclusively that it carried a water content of thirty-one per cent. Now the usual water content for the western Alberta coal is less than two per cent, so hon. gentlemen will see how we were handicapped. We had to pay double freight rates on coal thirty-one per cent of which was water, and the House will readily understand it is a rather difficult thing to burn water.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): There is evidently as much water in the coal itself as there is in the stock of some of these coal companies.

Mr. COWAN: If the hon. gentleman is inviting me to express an opinion about water in the stock of some of the coal companies I might be inclined to say some very harsh things, but I will not do that at present. In addition to having thirty-one per cent of water in this coal, we found ourselves further handicapped when we came to burn it; it took eleven per cent of the heat of the coal to drive out the thirty-one per cent of water content already there. Hon. gentlemen will therefore see that we were handicapped from the beginning with a forty-two per cent loss. Even in the face of all these handicaps we found we could use this coal with a loss of only eighteen cents per ton, which proved to me conclusively that if we could secure one or two things we might use it with success. Those things are: To get a direct route so that the freight rates would be computed on the shortest route to point of destination, or a reduction equivalent to the rate per ton per mile obtainable on the main line.

Now what can we do to remedy the existing state of affairs, and that is the question, I think, which confronts the Government to-day if it is going into the development of our coal resources? We thought probably we could dry this coal, and it can be dried pretty conveniently, but when you have the dried product you have a rather dangerous commodity; it is very explosive, as a matter of fact, and I would not care to recommend it. In addition to that, after the lignite is dried and left exposed for any length of time, we found that in twenty-four hours it again carried a water content of twelve per cent, having absorbed that amount of moisture from the air during one day. It is therefore evident that the drying of the coal is not sufficient to meet the difficulty. There is one thing that can be done, however, and that is briquette the coal, for it can be briquetted very successfully. I am not speaking of my own knowledge on this point, I have before me the report of the Government of the province of Saskatchewan, which has gone into the subject pretty extensively. In quoting this report, I do not wish to be accused of being actuated by party or political bias. The Government of Saskatchewan has, ever since the province was created, been of the Liberal persuasion, and I have always been —at least until the war broke out—a very ardent Tory, and I certainly am not ashamed of it. I am therefore not speaking with any party bias, and I can say—notwithstanding the fact that the Government of Saskatchewan is always wrong, except when it is right—that the reports which it publishes are quite reliable, and the report in question not only contains a good deal of common sense, but displays evidences of enterprise. In the matter of briquetting the Government's investigations have been very extensive. Their tests were not merely laboratory tests, although they have carried those out of course, but they have sent a very substantial quantity of this lignite coal to places where briquetting is done, and brought it back, and they have given the product the most severe test which could be given. They use a certain quantity of the briquettes in their own plant built for the purpose, and the balance of it was distributed in small lots among several hundred families of the province, in order to be tested in domestic circles. I think you will agree with me that if this fuel is to be used by the people for domestic purposes that was the proper kind of test to give it; to send it out amongst the people and let them test it for themselves, and let their opinion prevail. I have a great deal of faith in public opinion, and when that public opinion comes back in the form in which it has here, and in the shape of reliable Government reports, we must accept that opinion. The conclusion was that the briquettes had given entire satisfaction. Now if we can briquette this coal for several hundred families and give entire or universal satisfaction I think I am safe in saying that we can briquette it for several thousand families, and also give universal satisfaction. If it can be done, and it has been done on a small scale, why can we not do it in a more extensive way, and thus save ourselves from importing these hundreds of thousands of tons into an unnatural market? I will read one or two extracts from the report to which I have referred, which will show conclusively that this is a very sound proposition.

The briquettes made from the Saskatchewan carbonized lignite have 11,500 to 12,000 British thermal units per pound. They burn with a short flame, no odour, no smoke (except a very little resulting from the volatilizing of some of the pitch binder when first thrown on the fire), and no clinker. They can be used wherever anthracite or bituminous coal is burned. They retain their structure in the fire until completely consumed. They do not disintegrate or lose value in the weather, and can therefore be stored for any length of time and shipped any distance without loss.

Now, I want to know what better product for use by our people you could have than that?

They do not disintegrate or lose value in the weather, and can therefore be stored for any length of time and shipped any distance without loss.

That makes it a staple product, and if it can be produced in quantities at a commercial rate, I say that the proper thing for our Government to do is to immediately provide it. The article goes on:

As a domestic fuel they are fully equal to the anthracite that is marketed here ton for ton. While the anthracite averages approximately 13,000 British thermal units per pound, a little higher than the lignite briquettes when compared in a laboratory, there is no clinker from the lignite briquettes, no loss in burning, and they can be used nicely in kitchen ranges, which is impracticable with hard coal. They make an exceptionally fine fuel for fireplaces.

And in another place, I find this:

Carbonized Lignite Briquettes. These have proved excellent for domestic service and are equal in fuel value, ton for ton, to the anthracite marketed in this territory.

Now, I need not proceed further, I think that you will agree that that is sufficient proof that this is a practicable process.

Mr. CURRIE: What is meant by carbonized briquettes? Is it the raw coal passed through a press?

Mr. COWAN: Yes, it is passed through a press. That is what I am urging, that these presses be adopted; that is what we want to have established there. I will just refer to that here.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the binder used in making these briquettes?

Mr. COWAN: They have been experimenting with a number of binders. The one which they are using makes an absolutely safe briquette. There is very little pitch in it, so that there is no odour. When they are first thrown on the fire there is a bright flame, lasting only a moment or two. I am speaking from personal knowledge, because I have burned them in my own house. They burn until completely burned out.

To find out whether this is a commercial proposition or not. You can establish as many units as you wish. One unit will cost some $75,000, that is, it would have cost about that when this report was issued, but I suppose the price will be somewhat increased now, for in the last year and a half the cost of everything has increased very substantially. But a $75,000 unit will produce in one year 50,000 tons of briquettes. The $400,000 which is now to be expended could establish, as I understand it, about five of these units, and of course, you could add as many units as you saw fit. Would that be a profitable thing to do?—to spend $75,000 to produce fifty thousand tons of briquettes? You may look at in this way: I will begin by taking the city in which I live as an example. In that city, fortunately, it so happens that we use fifty thousand tons, or thereabouts, every year, of Pennsylvania anthracite coal, so that we consume an amount equal to what would be produced by one of these units. That coal sells in Regina to-day at $15 a ton. As a matter of fact, it is such an inferior quality of coal which we are now getting that, compared with the price paid two or three years ago, we must be paying between $22 and $25 a ton for it; the coal is really not fit to be imported into that country at all. The excess freight rate from Pennsylvania to Regina—by that I mean the amount of freight on this coal additional to what it would be if shipped from Estevan to Regina—is a little over $4 a ton. So that we are paying $200,000 per year in freight rates alone over what we would pay if we got the coal from our own mines one hundred miles away. Is it profitable to spend $75,000 and thereby save in one year the sum of $125,000, which is the difference in freight rates, and at the end of the year be possessed of the plant which has been established?

But it is not only that. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) drew attention to the fact that there was a very keen coal shortage in eastern Canada last year. I do not think that there was so much a coal shortage as a shortage of freight cars, engineers and conductors. If I mistake not, the shortage was in the matter of transportation. Now, let us look at it that way. We in Saskatchewan are two thousand miles away from the Pennsylvania coal fields; we are three times as far away from the anthracite mines as they are in the central part of the province of Ontario. Now, take the fifty thousand tons of coal and multiply it by three, making 150,000 tons, representing the increased possible haulage, and you will have some idea of the number of cars that would be available to ship coal to the settled portions of the province of Ontario. Or, take the 500,000 tons of coal delivered annually in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and multiply it in the same way, and the result is 1,500,000 tons. Would the release of that transportation have been of any value to the province of Ontario last winter, or it may be, in the coming year? That is the question. If you can remove the loss due to the long transportation, cut it in three, and enable the transportation officers to concentrate their attention upon delivering coal to their nearest or natural market, you will have done something well worth while in the matter of assisting our country at this particular stage of its history. I do not know that I can add anything more to this subject, excepting, in a general way, to give strong support to the resolution which the hon. member for Lambton moved. I cannot imagine why these coal fields were put in Canada unless to be developed by the Canadian people. I cannot imagine what the Canadian people are in Canada for unless it is to develop the natural resources of the Dominion. Anything short of that falls far below the ideal of a genuine Canadian policy, and for that reason I support this resolution as strongly as I can.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) is to be congratulated for bringing this matter before the House.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand you called upon the hon. gentleman from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would have recognized the hon. member on my left, but he yielded the floor to the hon. member for West Toronto. The custom ordinarily is that I should alternate from one side to the other.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understood it that way, Mr. Speaker, before I started to speak. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Lambton, and to say that if the thermometer registered 30 degrees below zero to-day, perhaps this question would receive more attention from the House than it appears to be getting. With the weather as mild as it is to-day, perhaps fuel production and conservation are not quite as popular as they might be if the thermometer had been 30 below. Last winter all through western Ontario the people were existing for days on two or three scuttles full of coal. They were standing in queues before the coal dealers' offices and at the city halls trying to get coal, and there was a good deal of suffering all through the province, especially in western Ontario, because of the shortage. Now, it appears to me that any proposition which is going to relieve such a situation should receive the attention of this House. When the member for Lambton suggests that the western coal fields should supply the West I think he is on sound and safe ground.

That might interfere with the operations of some of the transportation companies, but the transportation companies ought to yield on a matter of that kind, because, in my judgment, it is important that in the distribution of coal from Canada to the United States and coal from the United States in Canada, we should endeavour to maintain a balance that will ensure an adequate supply to those sections of Canada which cannot be served from our own deposits, that is, practically the whole of the province of Ontario. Western Canada can be served from Alberta. Eastern Canada can be served from Nova Scotia. Large sections of the United States are, I understand, supplied from British Columbia. The province of Ontario, however, must be supplied from Pennsylvania; it cannot get coal economically from any other source. If, therefore, the 2,000,000 tons, or whatever the quantity is, of coal which goes into the western provinces from Pennsylvania, were diverted into the province of Ontario, that would very materially relieve the situation in this province.

I have always been surprised that this Government had not given greater consideration to the development of hydro-electric power. If we should develop all the hydro-electric power that is capable of development, an enormous saving in coal could be effected by operating our railway systems with electricity. I understand there is in existence a report which goes to show that in northern Ontario there is enough hydro-electric power capable of being developed to operate the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway and the Transcontinental railway in that section of the country. I have that information from a gentleman who is on intimate terms with the commission that operates the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. If that be the case, a tremendous saving of coal can be made by the development of those water powers in northern Ontario. I have no doubt that on the rivers running into lake Superior there are water powers sufficient to develop electricity to operate the Canadian Pacific along the north shore. That railway, to operate along that shore, must bring its coal supply a long distance, and the transportation of the coal necessary to operate its trains is a considerable item in itself.

This Government should take the matter in hand in co-operation with the province of Ontario and carry out and amplify the policy which that province has adopted and has been carrying along so successfully. In the city of Toronto we have as local fuel controller a very capable man, Mr. R. C. Harris. Mr. Harris has taken steps to require the manufacturers of western Ontario to convert their steam plants into hydro-electric plants for power purposes in order that coal may be conserved. He has shown a great deal of judgment and good sense, and if he can effect a large number of conversions from steam to electricity in the factories of western Ontario, he will enable us partly to solve the question. There is still a tremendous quantity of power that can be developed at the Niagara Falls and also at Queenston Heights on the Niagara river. There is also power to be developed at the Chippewa Falls, the Long Sault rapids and along the Trent canal. If all those water-powers were developed, a sufficient quantity of electricity would be secured to operate nearly all the railways of western Ontario. The Government ought to go into that policy very seriously. While some considerable outlay may be involved in putting in generating systems, in the long run the scheme would certainly prove economical and give great satisfaction to the people of Canada, who would be saved from a possible fuel famine. I am not familiar with conditions in the West. In addition to developing hydro-electric power, the Government ought to go into every question of fuel development. They should look into the peat deposits. I have not sufficient information to enable me to form a judgment as to whether any great relief can come from that direction or not, as all that I have read on the subject leaves some doubt in my mind. But whether it is a question of peat, or oil, or natural gas, or native coal deposits, it is the duty of this Government —and in my opinion they should co-operate with the provinces in the matter—to develop all those deposits, so as to secure the supply of coal for fuel and power purposes that the country needs.

My own province has given to the world an outstanding example of the possibilities in the way of developing hydro-electric power. Speaking broadly, I believe all the water-powers are still in the possession of the country. Some of them may have been alienated, but not a very large proportion. Therefore, when we develop electric power which will take the place of fuel, we get it under the control of the Government and the people, and we have this great force under public ownership to be sold to the people of Canada at cost. How has the development of hydro-electric power worked out in the province of Ontario? Under the Hydro-Electric Commission, of which Sir Adam Beck is chairman, we can get power for an ordinary factory for less money per annum than the rental of the space that would be occupied by an engine and a boiler capable of producing the same amount of power. In my own plant, I am using only about 120 h.p., but the rental of the space that it would take to put in a 120 h.p. boiler and engine would be more than what I pay for that power for the year. I presume my experience does not differ very much from that of many others. This development, which after all is a fuel development, has been of inestimable value to the people of Ontario. I should not like to see this Government over-ride the province of Ontario in its handling of hydro-electric power; I should rather like to see it co-operate with the provincial government. The provincial government has a great deal of experience which would be of value to those who would have the matter in charge. If the Government would take up this question, and if all the provincial governments could be inspired and encouraged to do what they can in the development of the different forms of natural power, that would be to the benefit of the whole country.

If the conditions in the Mines Branch are as bad as the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) states, a special committee of this House should be appointed to make an investigation; or if not, an efficiency expert should be appointed to go through that branch of the service and make whatever recommendations he thinks necessary. I have no knowledge of the matter myself, but certainly the importance of the work to be done by that branch makes it advisable for us to take steps to make it efficient, because this is going to be one of the big questions before the Dominion of Canada, not only at the present but in the future.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion this afternoon, and I will re-echo the statement of my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) that I too am sorry the House is so depleted when such a vital question is being debated. It is true we have extremely fine weather to-day, but only a few weeks ago there was a great deal of misery, suffering and hardship in this city of Ottawa. As I said the other day in presenting a motion on similar lines, the summer will soon pass away, and the same hardships will be felt throughout the central part of Canada. Sir, the House and the Government especially should recognize the emergency and face the issue squarely, and take proper measures to save the country from the consequences of another more serious fuel shortage which may confront us next winter.

I am not exaggerating at all when I say that central Canada—the province of Ontario and a large part of the province of Quebec—is absolutely dependent on the United States for coal. The West can take care of itself, and so can the extreme East, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and the Mariime Provinces generally, but Central Canada is absolutely dependent on Pennsylvania. The fuel controller in the United States has just issued a statement in which he says: "the United States is short in transportation facilities, and therefore it is short in coal." Then he gives a series of figures and averages, and concludes by saying that the war has created a demand upon the United for 100,000,000 tons of coal more this year than is normally produced. Because of the car shortage and the congested condition of the roads it will be impossible to increase the supply by more than 50,000,000 tons. The remaining 50,000,000 tons will have to be filled in by conservation in the homes and industrial plants of America.

Hon. J. D. REID: That explains why our cars are kept on the other side.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a shortage of cars and a shortage of labour. As I said the other day, this emergency exists because of war conditions and because of a lack of transportation facilities and the labour situation. As it does exist in the United States, our chief source of supply, we in Canada must look around and see what can be done for next winter. The coal shortage last winter was felt in many homes and industrial plants, and though I do not wish to be unduly pessimistic, it will be more severe next winter. What is the Government going to do about it? My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has passed the Daylight Saving Bill; that is a step forward, but there is still something to be done. The Government have appointed a fuel controller, the best available man in the country. Mr. Magrath is a conscientious and most painstaking gentleman, and I am sure he will do his duty. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) has given us his theories about the briquetting of lignite in the West. Whilst I admit the value of these experiments, still they are only experiments, and in this emergency the country cannot afford to wait on experiments. I saw in the press the other day that the Government has voted $400,000 to experiment with briquetting lignite coal in the West, and I am pleased if that is true; but as my hon. friend from Toronto said a moment ago, there is something more to do. Perhaps removing the duty on coal during the war would help, but that is not the point I wish to make just now. The point is this: the Government, in addition to encouraging as much as possible the conservation of coal, should also encourage the intensified production of wood fuel for next winter. I read a letter in the Ottawa Citizen not long ago from a man who is certainly an authority on that question; I refer to Senator Edwards. He said that in this country there are such large forest reserves that in view of the coal famine next winter the Dominion Government should bring about a more intense production of wood for fuel purposes. That is what they are doing in the United States. I see that a conference has been called by Mr. J. J. Storrow, the federal fuel administrator for New England, who says:

A serious shortage of coal threatens New England this winter. The situation does not warrant neglecting any possible measure of preparedness. For this reason it seems advisable to make a New England campaign for the production of wood on a large scale. Good hardwood properly prepared and dried can be used extensively for domestic purposes as an emergency measure. Wood cut in November can be burned the latter part of the winter, when the coal situation may be more acute. The campaign should also look ahead toward a large supply of wood for next winter when the coal situation may be more serious than this year.

Here we have the fuel administrator for New England saying that in his section of the United States, not so far from Pennsylvania, they will have to look for a more intense production of wood fuel to replace the coal they will be short of within a few months. If that is the condition in New England, surely there is all the more reason for us in central Canada to produce more wood. We have mill waste, generally speaking, in the large centres, but we all know that the production of the mills has been reduced considerably of late. The farmers, too, are not making such a large cut as formerly, because they are much more interested in their crops this year. There is, besides, the further handicap of lack of transportation facilities. I believe that the Government, jointly with Mr. Magrath, should have a forestry inspector appointed to encourage concurrently with the conservation of coal, the production of wood for next winter's fuel. This could be done by first of all encouraging the municipal authorities, on the lines adopted in Ottawa and Winnipeg last winter, to accumulate a reserve of wood fuel. Then there should be a commission of publicity directed by the fuel controller to restrain people from using coal between the 15th of April and the 15th of December. The farmers should be encouraged to make a larger cut, and the provincial governments should be asked to assist materially from the Crown lands. There is no doubt that the emergency exists. I also agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from Toronto in regard to the water-powers of this country. While I do not wish to discuss what some people call the confiscatory policy which is laid at the door of the Ontario Hydro Commission, I must say that the policy of the province of Ontario with regard to water-powers is very commendable, and I should like to have this Government see that the water-powers of this country are conserved for the consumers of Canada. I was surprised the other day to read of the enormous amount of power that could be developed in and around the city of Montreal. Our water-powers constitute one, if not the biggest, asset of Canada. The Montreal Herald says:

Montreal has an enormous source of supply right at her doors. For instance there is the supply developed at the Cedar Rapids. Although this supply is developed in Canadian territory 65,000 horse power, out of a total of 100,000 h. p., is being exported to the United States. "Few people," says Mr. White," have any conception of what the 65,000 h.p., now being exported to the United States from the Cedars, could do if widely distributed to customers of light and power. In 1916 a little less than 50,000 h.p., met the requirements for light and power of the 40,000 customers of the Toronto Hydro-Electric Power Commission. Including the requirements of the Toronto Street Railway, the Toronto Electric Light Company, and the Toronto Hydro-Electric Power Commission, 120,000 h.p., is now required for light and power in the municipality of Toronto. Therefore, the 65,000 h.p., exported from the Cedars would, if retained in Canada, supply, at cheap rates all the light and power required for a manufacturing city of 300,000 inhabitants. If distributed through Canadian municipalities it would supply light and power to some 35 manufacturing cities of 10,000 inhabitants each; or it would practically take care of one-third of the present demands of the Niagara system of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, which supplies over 100 municipalities and 100,000 purchasers of electricity.

The water-power development in Canada has been marvellous, and I am pleased to say that in my own province of Quebec it has been on a par with that in Ontario. Those of you who have lately visited the St. Maurice valley must have been surprised at the number of industries which have been established in that district, due to the intelligent work done by the Quebec government in conserving the water-powers of that river. Reading a report of the Laurentide Company, I observed that the president, Mr. Aldred, stated that some industries, which formerly had manifested a desire to establish themselves not far from the Niagara power, had changed their plans, and were now establishing themselves at Shawinigan and Grand Mere. My hon. friend knows these facts. It shows that with a comprehensive and aggressive water-power policy, a government can accomplish much. I say that by giving free hand to our fuel controller by a very aggressive campaign of publicity, we may conserve our coal; by the appointment of a forestry inspector, so as to accentuate the production of wood next winter, and, by adopting the policy of conserving and developing our water powers in the interest of the Canadian consumer, we may still be able to face the emergency of the future.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Mines): My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong), has brought up a resolution dealing with a subject of great interest to this House and the country, as he did last year, when he made a very valuable address to this House which was fully discussed. The gist of his resolution is that there should be more rapid and scientific development of our resources, and of our fuel supply, and especially in this time of war, the Government should take speedy action to utilize all the resources; and, as far as the resolution is directed to that end, I think the Government must be strongly in accord with its terms. My hon. friend ventured on somewhat severe criticisms of the department over which I have the honour to preside at the present time. I am quite convinced that any criticism which has been directed at the department were only designed to strengthen the weak spots that existed, and I am quite sure he did not intend his remarks to be taken as seriously as they appear to be taken by the hon. gentleman from South Toronto (Mr. Hocken), who suggested the appointment of a committee. I have had the honour of being Minister of Mines for a comparatively short period, and at the time when I took charge of that department it was decided to make a general appeal to the country and the ministers were called upon to leave their posts at Ottawa and absent themselves for several months. I do not think the hon. gentleman would imagine that under those circumstances the minister would be able to become quickly settled in the administration of so large a department. I wish to assure my hon. friend from Lambton that, in spite of the facts which I have stated, I can conscientiously say that I have given a considerable portion of my time and energy to the Department of Mines, which I think is of immense importance to the country, and which should render an enormous service to the country at all times, and especially in times of war. I am in accord with the hon. gentlemen that there is a certain amount of duplication in the department in reference to mining matters. Probably that is the case with all departments under democratic forms of Government. I would not have to go far afield to illustrate that. However, it should be our absolute duty to cut out these duplications, as far as we can, and corelate the work of the departments in such a way that there would be no waste of energy, for, I assure my hon. friend, I will endeavour to do my duty as far as my department is concerned. I wish to assure him we are endeavouring to keep in touch with what is being done by the provincial governments, and in other ways in the country. I had the pleasure of attending the meeting of the Mining Institute in Montreal, at which gentlemen from all parts of the country interested in mines were present, and very valuable discussions took place, in which we came in touch first-hand with the people doing the work from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I would also point out that we have kept in touch with the broader aspects of these matters. There has been, during the last two or three years, a good deal of legislation and discussion in the British Parliament in regard to minerals and mineral legislation. They are now forming what is known as the Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau, dealing with all the work of all the governments in the Empire, and with the endeavour, as far as possible, to keep within the Empire a control, as far as possible, of all the minerals essential for the war, and they asked us to send over a representative to act on the advisory board of that bureau. After taking the matter up with the Mining Institute and other bodies from other governments, we decided to send over a gentleman from Ontario, Dr. Miller, provincial geologist, a man of very wide information, a geological and mining expert, who will render a great service to Canada, when he goes over to represent Canada on that board. May I say to the House that the Department of Mines was only created as recently as 1907. The Geological Survey, which is now a part of the Department of Mines, has, of course, been in existence for a long time, in fact, since 1842. Six provinces own their Crown lands and deal with all these matters of administration and legislation in connection with the Crown lands and the minerals of their respective provinces. In Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and in the railway belt of British Columbia matters are different, because the Crown lands are in the Federal Government, and the Federal Government has to do, therefore, with the minerals and the Crown lands. But the administration of those have been left, and always were left, in the hands of the Department of the Interior. Therefore, the Department of Mines, as it exists now, and as it was created in 1907, is not administrative in character. I make no pronouncement as to whether some of the functions of the Department of the Interior should be handed over to the Department of Mines or not—I am not dealing with that question now—but I want to point out to the House that the work of the Department of Mines is not administrative but is investigational and educational exclusively in character.

The Geological Survey, a very important part of the Department of Mines, deals of course with the occurrence in various districts of minerals, secures accurate information in regard to our mineral resources in the way of exploration. Where development has taken place there are a large number of requests for detailed information and detailed work, such as deciphering the local geology, structure of ore deposits and problems connected with their form and extent and other work of a geological character. Anybody who knows the western country knows what happened in the great camp at Rossland. When they thought that they had practically exhausted their ore bodies at a certain level, owing to the work of the Geological Survey they discovered that larger bodies could be successfully developed at lower levels and since that time, largely due to the work of the Geological Survey, there has been a marvellous development in that camp.

Half of the work of the department, as it is done at this time, is practically concerned with problems of the war. The department is devoting itself to the working out of problems that are placed before it, sometimes by the Imperial Munitions Board and sometimes by the War Trade Board or other bodies. I could give one or two illustrations. In connection with ferro alloys, the laboratory work of the officers of the Mines Department has been such that the British Government and the War Office accept the decisions and judgments of those officers in connection with the selling and purchases of ferro alloys in Canada. In the chemical division there is a lot of very valuable work going on in connection with the analysis of fuel values of coal, of lignite, oil shales, peat, etc., and also in connection with the testing and analysis of gases from coal. There are other things that I would like briefly to touch upon that are important at this time. We are now endeavouring to make an effort to discover additional sources of platinum. The platinum supply of the world has been practically derived from the Ural mountains in Russia and that supply has, of course, been absolutely cut off during the war. Platinum, as hon. gentlemen know, has a value about five times that of gold and it is getting so scarce that the war authorities in all the allied countries are getting somewhat seriously alarmed. There is very little in the United States, there is hardly any in Canada and comparatively few ounces produced. Some of this has been discovered in the nickel matte from Sudbury in the refining process carried on. A small amount occurs in the ultra basic rocks in British Columbia and a small amount in some of the nuggets recovered from the placer diggings in the creeks of that province. We hope to make a special investigation of this work and have detailed some of our officers to examine the rocks in place in the hope of, if possible, getting a greater production of platinum which is an imperative necessity in connection with the war.

Pulp manufacturers have had great difficulty in getting suitable stone for their business. It was imported formerly by them. We have investigated carefully a large number of quarries to ascertain whether the stones in those quarries were suitable for this purpose and as a result we have brought the quarry owners into touch with the manufacturers of stones and have been instrumental in seeing a very large number of orders placed for pulp stones which were formerly brought from other countries.

I need not touch on other matters not directly connected with the war but which are of immense value to the country because the department is not only devoting itself to work in connection with the war but also to work which will be of importance in peaceful times after the war. We are taking up very vigorously the question of road materials. At the request of the provincial governments of Canada we are making an investigation of and testing an enormous number of the different road deposits on many of which we have reported. At the instance, especially, of the Ontario and Manitoba Governments, we are dealing with the question in connection with the construction of important highways such as that between Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton, and Ottawa and Prescott. Then, work is progressing and progressing along very suitable lines in connection with making a fuller examination of the limestone deposits throughout Ontario in the belief that we can relate these to the industrial activities of the country in a more comprehensive way than has been the case in the past. Another field of activity in which we have accomplished some useful work has been in the dry belt of southern Alberta. This work has been carried on by the Geological Survey branch. As hon. members know, there has been such a scarcity of water that it has presented one of the greatest difficulties that the ranchers had to deal with. The Geological Survey came to the conclusion, after mapping out the dry belt and giving close study to the question, that at certain levels north of the Milk river artesian wells could be successfully bored. One artesian well was bored to a depth of 600 feet, with the result that there was a flow of 4,000 gallons a day and about six weeks or two months ago another well was bored to a depth of 640 feet that gave a flow of 30,000 gallons in twenty-four hours. We are trying as far as possible to delimit the areas in which these operations may be successfully conducted.

I do not want to deal with all of the other activities of the department, but what I have said will show that this is not in any sense a perfunctory department. There is one phase of their work that I want to mention, and that is in connection with the ore dressing laboratories of the Department of Mines that were established some years ago. The result of that work has been of such value that the machinery has had practically to be quadrupled, and I think I am quite justified in saying that the value to the country of that work has amounted to millions of dollars. There is a complete plant for carrying on milling tests, analysing, assaying and so on, in both large and small quantities. When a test is made in small quantity we want to have not less than from two hundred to six hundred pounds, but if the test is to be carried out on a large, commercial scale, we want five tons or over. All the samples have to be sent to the department free of cost, these tests are thoroughly made, the results are made known to the people, and a lot of problems are tackled that probably could not be tackled or solved in any other way. As a result of the work of the Mines Department, we have practically placed the molybdenite industry on its feet in Canada. We have taken the molybdenite ores and treated them in our own laboratories and we have practically started a great industry, which will be of immense value to the country later on.

I would like to give one other illustration of the work carried on at these ore-dressing laboratories. In the fall of 1917 large scale experiments were carried through successfully on the problem of concentrating chromite ores, which are of great value in the production of high grade steel. They were carried out for the Quebec Asbestos & Chrome Co., St. Cyr., Quebec. The concentrates produced by the laboratory were of such high grade that the directors of this company have been encouraged to proceed immediately with the installation of their own milling plant. Incidentally, this work is of importance as chromium is an essential in the manufacture of armour plate, armour piercing projectiles, and various steel products that require a quality of extreme hardness and toughness. It may be noted that Canada, South Africa, New Caledonia and the United States are at the moment the principal producers of chromite in the world. I give these two illustrations as an example to the House of the very valuable work that is being carried on in this particular branch of the Department of Mines, and I express the hope that in the near future, if we can establish them, there may be branch laboratories built in Nova Scotia, and more especially in British Columbia, because the expense of bringing down large samples of ore from these two provinces, more particularly the latter, is so great that there are a great number of problems remaining unsolved simply because the prospectors and small mine owners cannot themselves undertake the expense of transporting ores for such great distances. I am convinced that if we can find the means of doing so we ought, at a very early date, to establish well-equipped laboratories for this purpose, and that if we do so we shall have the means of solving problems that present themselves to a greater extent than we have at the present time.

Before I resume my seat, and I do not wish to unduly occupy the time of the House, I would like to deal to some extent with the question of peat, which my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) raised last year, doing a good service thereby, and which question he has again touched on this afternoon. I may say that when I came to the Department of Mines, which had charge of this matter, it was one the first things that attracted my attention. I had some correspondence with my hon. friend about it, and promised that I would go further into the matter, and I want to assure the House that we are taking steps that we hope will go a long way towards solving the vexed question of when the great peat sources of this country can be commercially utilized, a question to which the high price of anthracite coal this year has given an added interest in the minds of our own people. The central provinces of Canada—classing as such Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec—practically, as we know, have no large coal deposits of economic value, but they do contain very large peat bogs, and peat does constitute a fuel of very great value. Numerous attempts have been made, involving the expenditure of very large sums of money, to convert peat into a commercial fuel possibility. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that there have been at least four million dollars spent in various experimental lines, and in the formation of peat companies to develop peat as a fuel, and that the sums thus spent have been practically wasted. It is true that peat cannot be satisfactorily substituted for anthracite coal in all its uses, but it has been found in practice to be a satisfactory substitute both in cooking ranges, in such stoves as Quebec heaters, and the stoves in use in British Columbia, and also in furnaces in mild weather and more particularly in open grates. It is very largely, however, a matter of education and of getting the peat cheap enough. We have been assisting in developments along both these lines. Some years ago the Department of Mines undertook a lot of work, both of an investigating and an experimental character. As the hon. member (Mr. Armstrong) has already stated, the Department of Mines investigated and mapped out, both as regards quality and depth, about one hundred and forty thousand acres of peat bogs, that will be suitable for the manufacture of peat, and we estimated the total tonnage from these bogs, and there are a great many others that have not been touched at all, as one hundred and twenty million tons. In addition to this a lot of work was undertaken at Alfred, about forty miles from Ottawa, where peat manufacturing machinery was installed and a number of experiments undertaken to see whether peat could be manufactured on a profitable and commercial basis. I do not want to go into the details of this work except to mention one or two things, for the reason that there has been great misapprehension in the minds of the public in regard to the matter. The peat supplied to this plant was excavated entirely by hand labour, and, of course, hand labour is not considered a serious handicap in countries like Sweden and Russia where they have developed the peat industry on a very large and successful scale. During the two seasons of 1910 and 1911, during which the Government operated this plant, 3,100 short tons of twenty-five per cent moisture peat fuel were manufactured. The cost of manufacturing peat fuel, as determined by the last season's operations, was $2.60 per ton on the field; $3.04 loaded on cars, and $4.04 per ton f.o.b. Ottawa. These figures were based on the assumption that the entire output was sold. I believe that exaggerated statements have been circulated as to the expenditure on this work, but the total of $18,000 represents the entire expenditure by the Mines Department on the whole operation at Alfred. I have heard people state that as much as $100,000 was expended, and that this money was all wasted. I think, therefore, it is well to have the correct figures put on Hansard.

Mr. E. PROULX (Prescott): Does the Government still possess the land at Alfred?

Mr. BURRELL: I was just coming to that point. In 1910 or 1911, operations were discontinued. The price of anthracite then was very much lower than it is at the present time, and the difficulties in connection with the problem—to demonstrate that peat fuel could be manufactured—having been solved, the department deemed its work to be done. It was thought proper not to proceed further, but to leave the rest to private enterprise. In the summer of 1911 a large part of the plant was taken over by Mr. Shuttleworth of Brantford, who also approached the Government with a view of purchasing the bog and the railway siding in order to erect an improved peat manufacturing plant. These were transferred to him in 1912, and he then began the construction of a mechanical excavator to do away with hand labour, hoping thereby to place the enterprise on a more economical basis. Mr. Shuttleworth constructed a mechanical excavator after the design of A. Anrep, Sr., of Sweden, who had been identified with peat development in Russia and Sweden for thirty or forty years, and his plant was finally ready for operation in 1913. It is too long a story to go into the whole of these details, but the gentleman who advanced the money for this enterprise went to England. In 1914 the war broke out. The promoters could not get sufficient capital, and, although for a certain time the manufacture of peat was successfully undertaken, a certain number of defects developed in the machinery, and owing to the shortage of capital and other conditions the company at last went into liquidation, and the bog was again sold. The bog and some of the plant was taken over by a syndicate which is still in possession. That was the position of affairs up to this winter.

It seemed to me, therefore, when the matter was brought to my attention, and considering the mounting price of anthracite, and the severity of a winter like last which brought home the fuel question to every one's mind in a startling way, that it was desirable to look into this more thoroughly; and for that reason we took the peat question up again, because the main difficulty in the way was the great expense of handling it and the absolute necessity of finding some kind of improved peat machinery that would do away with the large amount of hand labour, the whole question coming down, not to the matter of being able to make fuel—we can do that beyond question—but of handling the raw material, in the cheapest possible way, of getting it to the point of consumption so that it could reasonably compete with anthracite. With that idea, I consulted with Mr. R. A. Ross, the engineering expert who is on the advisory council, and with the experts in my own department, and later on I found that the Government of Ontario was very keen on the same subject and we went into the whole thing with them, and had a conference or two, the result of it simply being this: we came to the conclusion that it would be desirable to have two types of peat machines, or what we may call units, first, to take again the old plant that was used in 1911, which was based on the Anrep design, and improve it as far as it could be improved, utilizing such methods as were utilized at that time; and, in the second place, to try and bring out some entirely new type of machine, which Mr. Moore, the engineer who had been associated with Mr. Shuttleworth in 1911 had in partial process of design. The matter was taken up with him, and as a result of the whole discussion with the Ontario Government and the officers of my own department and Mr. Moore we have entered into an agreement with the Ontario Government to co-operate on some further peat experiments, building two types of peat machinery and operating them either at the same bog as before or some other bog, which matter is yet to be determined, each department of the Government, both federal and provincial, to bear equal proportions of the cost as to getting out designs, and the construction and installation of the machinery, for the purpose of seeing if we cannot once and for all solve the question as to whether peat can be handled in a cheap way in order to put it on the market if anthracite coal were to go down one or two dollars a ton from its present price. Unless we can do that, there is no stability or promise for development of peat manufacture on a very, very large scale. I would like to say frankly that anything that can be done this year cannot possibly do much to offset any possible fuel shortage next winter. Hon. gentlemen will understand that. But if we can get this machinery out in time to operate, or any information as to how to do it, even next year—but I hope to do it this year—if we can get it out and show that we can produce peat by this sort of machinery at a price which will justify its development on a larger scale, we will have done enough to justify the expenditure of the time and money spent on this subject which, as the hon. member for Lambton has said, is of immense importance to the country.

Mr. FRIPP: Has the minister investigated the Graham process?

Mr. BURRELL: I know very little about Mr. Graham's process. I have heard of him as being a great enthusiast on the peat question. Some time ago he submitted certain suggestions and processes to the department, which were not thought at all practicable by the officials. I believe Mr. Graham dissents from that view. Certainly, if he wishes to submit any other processes we shall be only too glad to give them our consideration. I understand he wanted some substantial assistance in the way of development, but we did not intend to do anything more than what I have mentioned, because that is enough for this year.

I want to say in conclusion that I appreciate what my hon. friend from Lambton has said. I would like to say that, as a comparatively new Minister of Mines, I quite admit it has been unfortunate for the department that there have been so many ministerial changes, because I quite understand that such conditions do not promote continuity of policy or of work or enthusiasm on the part of the officials. But, so far as my knowledge goes, in that department there are a very large number of exceedingly able men, thoroughly well trained, enthusiastic, thoroughly keen about their work, and just as anxious to help their country in these war times as anybody else. Where the department is weak, it will be my duty to strengthen it. If there are any mouldered branches they should certainly be lopped off. I shall bear in mind any criticism that the hon. member has made, and if, as a result of that, we can speed up our work, his resolution, as far as I am concerned, will not have been useless.

At six o clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, before the motion carries I wish to make a few remarks, not wholly upon the motion but upon a phase of the address of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong), and possibly of some of the addresses that followed. When I spoke on a similar subject on a motion by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) about a week ago, I did so merely as a substitute, called hastily to the task, for one of the other ministers, and speaking in that capacity I naturally did observe what I thought was a becoming reserve and, perhaps, hesitancy. What I shall say to-night will be entirely on that phase of the addresses that constituted something in the nature of an attack on the Mines Branch of the department over which I preside, and, consequently, I suppose I can speak with that freedom and clearness to which the House is always entitled. In order that hon. members may not have the question of responsibility confused, may I first of all draw this distinction: The Mines Department is a department under the ministry of the Secretary of State. As to that, I have, as a minister, nothing further to do than as a colleague. The Mines Branch of the Department of the Interior is an entirely different organization. That branch has to do with the administration of mining properties in so far as they belong to the Government of Canada; that is to say, wherever mines are found on lands, the property of the Dominion, those mines themselves are administered by the Mines Branch of the Department of the Interior. Consequently, Hudson bay lands, Canadian Pacific lands, and all lands granted before a certain date some years ago, in regard to which lands the patent carried with it all the minerals and mines, are in no way under the Mines Branch of the Department of the Interior, and with them, of course, we have no concern. These lands having been alienated and being now private property, their administration as such comes wholly within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. The Mines Department is an entirely different institution from the Mines Branch. Not only is it a distinct entity, but its character and its purpose are wholly different. Its object, as I understand it, is the development and the fostering of the mining industry in this country, the encouragement and the help of that industry. The Branch of Mines under the Department of the Interior has to do with mines themselves in so far as they are the property of the Dominion. That being clear, first of all, hon. members will have no difficulty in determining what are the references to which it is my duty to reply.

It has been alleged by the hon. member for East Lambton, not on his own responsibility—for his courtesy I wish to give him full credit and thanks—but on the responsibility of others, including two officials of the Mines Department, that there was laxity in the administration of the Mines Branch of the Department of the Interior, resulting in a very serious waste of gas in mines in the province of Alberta under the control and administration of the department. In this connection, the hon. member read a letter from the Deputy Minister of the Mines Department. That the quotation may be fresh in the memory of the House, I will read the letter again:

Ottawa, January 8, 1918.

Dear Mr. Armstrong:

Your letter of the 2nd instant to the Minister of Mines relative to the waste of natural gas in northern Alberta was referred to this office for attention.

I have consulted with Mr. D. B. Dowling of the Geological Survey, and from him I learn that the waste of gas is not nearly so large as you have been told.

There is, however, some waste both at Peace River and at other places in northern Alberta. At present the operators can practically do as they please, and it is high time that some regulations were formulated aiming at controlling their actions.

In addition to the waste of gas, there is also danger of faulty or careless boring injuring or destroying gas horizons by letting in water.

The great gas field in northern Alberta is under the control of the Interior Department, and leases to bore for gas or oil are issued by them. I have already drawn their attention to the pressing need of regulations to govern boring operations, and hope some action will be taken in the matter during the present winter.

Yours very truly,

R. G. McCONNELL.
Deputy Minister.

This official draws attention to what he calls the absence of regulations to prevent the waste of gas by mining operators in Alberta, to his efforts to secure those regulations, which efforts were all a failure, and to the resulting consequences, as he describes it, of operators doing practically as they pleased. Were that the circumstance in the Mines Branch under the control of our department there would be ground for criticism. And in referring to this letter, may I say, I do so with reluctance, but I owe a reference to the Mines branch, I owe it to myself in so far as the administration is reflected upon by the Deputy Minister of Mines. The fact of the matter is that the very regulations the absence of which is complained of in this letter are in effect fully and specifically, and have been in effect for some four years past. I will read our regulations at this point. Regulation No. 29, passed on the 19th of January, 1914, and ratified by Order in Council, reads as follows:

> In case natural gas is discovered through boring operations on a location, the lessee shall take all reasonable and proper precautions to prevent the waste of such natural gas, and his operations shall be so conducted as to enable him, immediately upon discovery, to control and prevent the escape of such gas.
> Failure on the part of the lessee to comply with the above requirements, or to comply with such other requirements as the Minister may consider necessary to impose in respect of boring and operating, will render the lease subject to cancellation in the discretion of the minister.

That is the regulation the absence of which is lamented in this letter upon which the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) relies. The House may be astonished to learn—I give it on the authority of head of the Mines Branch of the Interior Department—that in the framing of those very regulations the writer of this letter was consulted and the regulations received his approval. Further, no communication has come from him in relation thereto since the regulations were framed, which is four years ago on the 19th of January last. The regulations have been and are put into force to the extent that it is possible to put them into force, with the result that they have been as substantially and fully observed as such regulations well can be.

There was a reference in the speech of the hon. member for East Lambton to a waste of gas in the Athabaska district. As a matter of fact, in all the years of the administration of the mines of this country under my department, there have been drawn to the attention of the department only three cases of the escape of gas. One was as far back as about twenty years ago, and that is the case referred to by the hon. member, particulars of which he gave on the authority of Mr. Dowling, an engineer of the Department of Mines. Mr. Dowling lamented very seriously the escape of gas in that quarter. There has been some escape. The House may be amused to learn that the well in question was put down about twenty years ago by the very department in which Mr. Dowling is and in which he was then, and being put down, it was not so protected as to prevent the escape of gas which Mr. Dowling now so much laments. The Geological Survey is the department that put down that well, and it is the department that now makes the complaint.

Efforts, however, were made notwithstanding the faulty condition in which the well was left, to stop the outflow of the escaping gas, and very considerable expense was gone to in the way of cementing, but such is the porous state of the earth that carefully as the contractors had done their work, it has not been wholly successful. It is a matter of very considerable difficulty in a country of this sort to make anything in the nature of an absolute success in closing a mine like that. Different plans have been evolved and presented for taking care of and effectually coping with that well, and a late minister of the department, not in the late Government, but in the Government preceding, took those proposals into serious consideration, had a computation made as to what would be gained by putting them into effect, and the cost of the proposals themselves, and came to the conclusion, which he annotated in a record of the Branch, that the cost was so great that the amount to be gained was not sufficient to warrant the expenditure. There is some escape still, but that is the record of the minister of the department, and from that record there has appeared no decision at the hands of the officials derogatory to it. We are only too anxious to have a practical proposal that will effectually stop what was wrongly done twenty years ago under the officials who now make the complaint. I say this, as I said before, with reluctance, but I think that by common consent I might lay down this principle: It is not only very improper but highly dangerous for the officer of one department to take such a step with reference to the administration of another unless at least he thoroughly surveys the ground and knows fully what he is talking about first; and I can only hope that the officer who wrote this letter will show himself more efficient in the activities of his administration of his work than seems now to be in his understanding of the proprieties of his position.

There have been two other cases brought to the attention of the department recently. One was in the city of Medicine Hat, and I do not think it was referred to by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). As the members of this House, at all events those from Alberta, will know, a very large reservation has been made for the benefit of the city of Medicine Hat and placed within their administrative power, so far as the product of gas is concerned. Contained in that are, of course, the gas rights within the boundaries of the city itself and within those boundaries in connection with the gas rights which they now control—subject, of course, to the regulations of the Mines Branch—a well was put down in such a manner as to result in an escape of gas. That was brought to the attention of the department by our own officer just as was the other case, and immediately on that being done steps were taken and communication had with the mayor of Medicine Hat with a view to closing up that well. The department followed it up, very soon had a report that a number of men were being engaged and right steps being taken, suggested by the Branch itself, to secure the desired end; and it is only a few weeks since I heard from the mayor of Medicine Hat in my office that they were quite hopeful the gas would be wholly stopped in a short time.

The other case, in another district, was successfully coped with, but was of minor importance. I will dwell no further on the subject except to assure the House that the department realizes—and indeed the minister of any department would be unfit for his post if he did not realize it—that the gas resources of our Dominion lands are an asset not to be dissipated but to be conserved and developed for the public advantage, and wherever it appears that any step is within our power that will tend to that end we shall be only too glad to address ourselves to the task of achieving it.

With reference to a speech made, I think, by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Hocken) I may say that if it is his desire or the desire of any hon. member that a committee of the House look into the matter of mines administration I will be the last to object; but being a new member he may not be aware of the fact that we have had a committee on mines in this House ever since I can remember the proceedings of Parliament. There was a committee on mines composed of members of this House in existence through all the last Parliament. I do not know whether my hon. friend from East Lambton was a member of that committee or not.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At all events, there was such a committee, and I am told that in the whole six years of the last Parliament they met on only two or three occasions, so that unless the committee were to attend more sedulously to its work, or unless it had more work to do than had the last Standing Committee on Mines, I do not see how they would accomplish very much towards bringing the Mines Branch to a sense of its obligations.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) has made allusion to the existence of natural gas in northern Alberta and has dealt with the statements made by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). I do not intend to make much reference to the natural gas resources of northern Alberta further than to say that in perhaps the most productive coal region of Alberta there is also a great quantity of natural gas, and that in the city of Medicine Hat practically all the fuel is natural gas; and the same may be said of the cities of Lethbridge and Calgary. In the city of Lethbridge there are also the greatest domestic coal mines of Alberta; so there is no doubt we have plenty of fuel resources in that part of Canada.

I feel it my duty to-night to allude to the coal resources, particularly of western Canada. I am not going to give any figures, but I would like to point out that there is no doubt that the mines in existence in western Canada at the present time are capable of supplying all the needs of the western provinces, and undoubtedly they could supply some of the needs of eastern Canada. I am not quite sure, however, that it is feasible to ship western coal to the eastern market, because western coal up to the present time has been used wholly for the western market and it has not yet been established that it could be shipped and successfully compete with other coals in the eastern market. Its fuel quality is lost by storage and also by transportation, and from information I have I believe it would be a very costly coal by the time it reached Ontario. But I do feel this, that western coal could supply the market of western Canada and enable the eastern provinces to use a great amount of the coal that comes at the present time from Pennsylvania into the West. But difficulties are immediately met with. I do not know whether the members of this House realize that shipments of coal from Pennsylvania to western Canada have something to do with the rate on grain on the Great Lakes. The ships leave ports at the head of the lakes with grain from western Canada, but they want something to carry back, and at the present time they are carrying back Pennsylvania coal at a very cheap rate. If they were unable to carry Pennsylvania coal it might mean an increase in the rate of grain going east along the Great Lakes; there is that fact to be considered in this matter. There is no question, however, that the coal resources of western Canada are quite capable of supplying the western Canada market. I have frequently seen in the constituency I represent a field of grain, and with it a coal mine—not a large mine, but a mine that was supplying a good many farmers in that particular district.

We have mines of that character spread all through southern and Central Alberta, and I presume, also, through northern Alberta. Our western coal deposits start in Saskatchewan. We have in Alberta the Lethbridge fields, the Drumheller fields, and the Crow's Nest fields, which are largely steam coal and coking coal. Then we have anthracite coal west of Calgary and west of Red Deer. There are also great deposits of coal in the Edmonton district and west of it. So that Alberta is particularly rich in its coal resources, and no province of western Canada is more capable of increasing production of coal than Alberta. I might point out that during this past season, when there was a demand for Pennsylvania coal for eastern Canada, there was a greater export of it into western Canada than the year previous.

I have had occasion before in this House to refer to the difficulty in connection with the operation of the mines regularly during these years. You are always going to have difficulties with labour, because labourers demand steady employment, which they do not secure in the mines of Alberta, because the demand upon the mines of Alberta is made largely in the fall and winter months. The season slackens off in the early spring and summer, and the mines are not worked except on half or quarter time. Consequently hundreds of miners are out of employment during those months. If it were possible to store coal so that the mines could operate all through the year and store a supply of coal in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, it might be possible to operate the mines during the whole year, and provide steady employment for the miners, and I think the Government should direct its attention largely to this question of storage, because if it can solve that matter it will add a great deal to the production of coal the year round in Alberta. It is claimed that the coal produced in Alberta loses its fuel value when stored. But a number of propositions have been advanced which seem to me to be quite feasible, by which this can be overcome, and if it were overcome it would mean that the mines in that province could ship coal in the spring and summer months to large cities to the east of us and have it stored for use in the early winter; and this would enable them to keep up with the demand during the winter months. That is a matter to which I think the Government should pay considerable attention, and as there have been what appear to be very useful inventions made in connection with this matter of storing coal, I would suggest that the Government give the matter consideration. I have been discussing this question on several occasions in the House, and I do not know that I can say anything further. But I do not want the people of eastern Canada to run away with the idea that it is yet feasible to use western Canada coal in the eastern provinces. At the same time I would like to have that fact established, because the greater markets we have for our coal, not only in western Canada, but in eastern Canada, the greater would be the output from our mines, the more steady the employment of our miners, and the greater our wealth. But it is doubtful whether western Canada coal can be shipped to compete with Pennsylvania coal in the markets of eastern Canada.

Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I desire to congratulate the mover of this resolution on bringing this very important subject to the attention of the House. I do not, however, desire to follow him in the various aspects of the subject with which the resolution deals, but more particularly to consider that portion of the resolution which reads:

> That the deposits of bituminous and anthracite coal in Canada located in the extreme eastern and western portions thereof, be more fully and thoroughly utilized for the benefit of the residents of the central provinces.

I take it that, in that connection, the most important, or at least one of the most important, duties that to-day devolves upon the Government is in regard to the increase in the production of coal within our own country. If there are three things most important for us I submit, they are the question of the supply of men, the supply of food, and the supply of fuel; and it is difficult to put any one of these propositions as first ahead of the others. But it is to the production of coal, particularly in eastern Canada, that I wish, for the time being, to direct the attention of the House. It is said that Canada consumes about thirty million tons of coal annually. Approximately one-half of this is produced in this country, and of that production of coal in Canada approximately one-half is produced in the far western part of the country, and the other part, approximately seven million tons, is produced in the extreme eastern part of Canada. Coal production in eastern Canada is confined almost exclusively to the counties of Pictou, Cumberland, Inverness and Cape Breton. Further analyzing it, it is confined, in a large measure, to one single county in eastern Canada, namely, Cape Breton. It becomes particularly pertinent to inquire at this time whether or not everything is being done that ought to be done by the fuel administration and the Government to secure increased production of coal in eastern Canada. What I desire to submit for the consideration of the House is this: if the fuel controller, with his manifold duties, is charged only with the responsibility of borrowing coal from the United States, I would be inclined to think that, perhaps, he has not been entirely unsuccessful in his efforts; but if, as I take it, the prime duty of the fuel controller is to see that we in Canada produce our quota of coal and of fuel, then I say that, as far as eastern Nova Scotia is concerned, the fuel controller has not measured up to the occasion and to the conditions as they obtain. The facts are these: since 1913 the coal production in Nova Scotia has been gradually but surely diminishing. The coal sales in Nova Scotia for the five years past have been as follows:

	Tons.
1913	6,478,709
1914	6,164,600
1915	5,757,907
1916	5,933,710
1917	5,143,074

In other words, Mr. Speaker, since the outbreak of war, the results, with regard to production, during the four-year period from 1914 to 1917, were as follows:

	Decrease.	Increase.
1914	198,469 tons.
1915	626,001 "
1916		117,009 tons.
1917	692,811 "

And, taking the estimate for the provincial fiscal year of 1918, we find that the decreased production of bituminous coal in eastern Canada in comparison with the previous year will reach 600,000 tons. There has been a decrease in the production of coal in eastern Canada since the war broke out of upwards of 2,000,000 tons. Since the fuel controller took office in July of last year, there has been a decrease in production of 600,000 tons, and there is the estimate of a further reduction in output of 600,000 tons in 1918. Viewed from the standpoint of increased production—and that is one of the greatest questions that we should be dealing with at the present time—the fuel controller and the administration, in regard to fuel, have not been entirely successful. The decrease in output, in five years, amounted to 1,400,000 tons, and adding this to the decrease that is expected by the operators and the Mines Department in Nova Scotia this year, the total will exceed 2,000,000 tons.

The great question then, that we have to deal with in this connection is how we can increase the coal output in eastern Canada. This subject naturally divides itself under two heads: (1) Increase in the production of the mines now producing coal, and (2) the reopening of collieries not now producing coal. The collieries now operating might be made to produce a very considerable quantity of coal over that which is now being produced. You may ask me what is the reason why the Nova Scotia mines are not keeping up to their normal output. The reasons are well known, I am sure, to some hon. gentlemen here. I would say, that (1) production could be increased by compelling the coal companies and operators to more equitably deal with the employees under them; (2) by increasing the wages of certain classes of labour, particularly the underpaid men who are working in the collieries; and (3) by reducing the large overhead charges to which most of these companies are subject. I have one instance in mind of a company that produces 500,000 tons of coal and pays to its general manager a salary of $100,000. In other words, for every ton of coal produced by this company, the general manager receives twenty cents. Or, to put it in another way: this company does not market all its output; it consumes 400,000 tons itself; it has a little less than 100,000 tons of coal to be sold in the markets, and its general manager receives as salary one dollar for every ton of coal produced by this company and sold in the market. Can you wonder that, under these conditions, there should be such unrest as has characterized the coal mine operations in eastern Canada for the last few years and particularly for the past few months?

I further submit as a suggestion that improved mining machinery should be brought into the various operating mines in Nova Scotia. Some of the coal companies are making exhorbitant profits while some of them are merely getting along under present conditions. I submit as a principle, these being war-time profits, that the companies that are making profits should be obliged to put back into the operation of their collieries by improved development and by improved mining machinery the amounts that they have received in excess of what would be normal profits under normal conditions. More encouragement should be given to the miners in the line of production and instructions whereby they might be made more competent to carry on the several operations in connection with mining.

It may be said by hon. gentlemen, as it is said by operators, that one of the prime difficulties encountered is the shortage of labour. It is true that there is a shortage of labour for mining operations, but that is not the only reason why there has been such a decrease in production. I submit that in the course of the three and one-half years during which we have been at war there should have been ample time for the making of miners. You can train men to work on the farm, and it is not any more difficult to make competent and skilful miners although it may take a little longer time. Nevertheless, there is a shortage of skilled miners that might be offset by the fact that we have men of good physique growing up in the various occupations connected with mining who are capable of producing coal, running machines and performing the other operations in connection with mining. A man with a coal-mining machine can produce as much as 52 tons of coal a day. A hand-pick miner gets out a very few tons of coal per day in proportion. Why should there not be more mining machines introduced into the mines of Nova Scotia? As far as transportation is concerned, why should the companies not be obliged to have box car loading apparatus? I am told that one of the difficulties in connection with the shipment of coal is that connected with transportation. The mining companies say that they are unable to get coal cars and consequently are obliged to load their product into the box cars that are supplied by the railways. A small expenditure for the equipment of box car loaders would reduce the cost of fuel by from twenty-five cents to thirty cents per ton. The coal companies should modernize themselves and get improved machinery with the profits they are getting which are largely war-time profits. It is the duty of the Government and of the fuel controller to see that increased production is brought about in the mines of Nova Scotia.

What is needed in this country is a speeder-up. Just as they have in certain portions of the mining sections in England a speeder-up they ought to have a speeder-up here, a man with broad powers who is able to see that regulations, properly framed, are carried out with a view to increased production.

When you consider that the normal production of coal in Nova Scotia increased at the rate of ten per cent every year for the last fifty to one hundred years, and that only when war broke out the collieries of that province did not even maintain their usual output but went behind to the extent of at least ten per cent per annum, I venture to say that if a speeder-up, with power such as I have suggested, is placed in charge of the situation in Nova Scotia, he will bring back its coal production to the normal figure. He will not only do that, but he will gradually restore the increase of ten per cent which was witnessed for many years anterior to the war. I make that suggestion to the House, and I trust that the Government and the fuel controller's department, which is charged particularly with the responsibility of increasing the production of fuel, will give their best consideration to it.

Not only has speeding up been successful in England, but it has met with equally gratifying results in the province of Alberta. Owing to labour difficulties, Mr. Armstrong was placed in charge of the operations in one of the coal sections of Alberta, and what has been the result? I understand that there has been a great increased production in that section of the country. Bearing in mind the results obtained in England and Alberta, and with the prevailing situation in Nova Scotia, where there are two million tons less coal produced to-day than before the war broke out, it becomes a pertinent matter that the Government should be properly advised, and it becomes their paramount duty to consider the appointment of a satisfactory man to speed up production in that part of Canada. Not only does that apply to the mines now operating, but there is also a situation to be met with respect to the mines that are not producing coal. These collieries might probably be divided into two classes: first, the collieries that closed down before the war broke out, and second, the collieries that closed down owing to the war panic and to other reasons. Take the former class, and I submit that with proper encouragement they could be made producing collieries within a very short time. Let me give you one instance in support of that statement. The Greenwood Coal Company, incorporated with a capital of $50,000, last year produced forty thousand tons of coal as a result of the Nova Scotia Government advancing them the sum of $25,000 to open their property. Within two years they have been able to refund the amount so advanced by the local Government with interest, and last year, as I say, they obtained an output of forty thousand tons. I think that this year, with the daily output now exceeding three hundred tons, they ought to produce for the twelve months ninety to one hundred thousand tons of coal. The same policy if applied to other companies should be followed by equally gratifying results.

It may be said, what has this to do with the matter of increasing coal production or the re-opening of coal mines? Under normal conditions, I admit, it is properly the duty of the provinces to deal with matters pertaining to mines, and particularly to coal; but when we are dealing with war conditions, I submit, as a reasonable proposition which will be accepted by the House, that it becomes the duty of the Federal Government to develop a proper policy for the increased production of fuel. I could give many specific instances where increased production would be obtained; where in one case one hundred thousand tons of coal would be secured within twelve months, and in other cases lesser amounts. Suffice it to say that in the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness there are collieries not now in operation that could be made, within a year, to produce from three to four hundred thousand tons. So that I say there are two problems facing the fuel administration: one is to increase the production of the mines now operating, and the other is to put the mines that are not operating into a condition where they may be made to produce; and I think I am not over-stating the matter when I suggest to the fuel controller and his department that a man, almost an autocrat in the powers conferred upon him, should be appointed to take hold of the coal situation in eastern Canada—a man with power to make advances, to take over and operate collieries, to have supervision of methods of mining and so on. These suggestions, Mr. Speaker, I have made having in view increased production which I regard as one of the great essentials in connection with the war administration at the present time. I have not attempted to deal with the general subject, and perhaps my remarks have been largely of a local nature; but they have to be largely of a local nature, in view of the fact that one third of the coal that is produced in Canada is produced locally— practically in the town in which I live. So that if there is a local aspect to my treatment of the subject it is due merely to that fact; but on the broad, national question of increased production, I submit, the Government and the fuel administration should see to it that increased production is obtained by the appointment of an energetic man with large and broad powers, in order to ensure that in 1918 our output will be greatly increased over that of the past year.

Mr. H. H. HALLADAY (Bow River, Alta.): I had hoped that when the hon. minister at the head of the department having control of this subject was speaking this afternoon he would mention coal in some way in his discourse. He took up the gas and pulp question, but I failed to hear the word coal mentioned in his speech. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), when he says that Alberta is quite capable of furnishing western Canada with all the coal it requires; and this can be done without opening up a new mine or increasing the capacity of the present mines. The hon. member who introduced this motion gave us figures this afternoon of coal production in Alberta which are quite correct. We can produce in that province with the mines we have at present, twice as much if not three times as much with one extra shift. The scarcity of coal is not the fault of the mines, but is due to lack of transportation, as far as the Red Deer valley is concerned. We say that during the last three weeks we have been unable to get trains from Calgary to Drumheller, the spot where the Red Deer Valley coal mines are. This railroad has been operating some five years and every spring it has been held up from one to three weeks. They have not had a train over that railroad for three weeks on account of twenty small bridges being washed out. In conversation with the coal operators at Drumheller a short time ago, they advised me that with the present shift they could double their output if the Canadian Northern Railway would furnish the cars. They also said that if they were able to secure mine-operating machinery, such as box car loaders and diamond cutters, I believe they called them, they could double their output with the same number of men. It is not a question of opening up mines, but of being able to operate the mines we have and ship the coal. I would like to call the attention of the ministers to the fact that the operators need this coal-mining machinery, which is not manufactured in Canada. If some inducement could be offered to these people they would be able to purchase this machinery, but at the present high rate of duty they claim that they are unable to do so. I would go further: if they are unable to purchase this machinery, even with the duty off, it would be good business for the Government to purchase that machinery, sell it to the operators, and take payment in the shape of royalties. Coal is going to be needed. I understand that England shipped over to the port of New York some time last fall two shiploads of coal in order to coal vessels which were waiting to take back munitions. Now, if by taking the duty off this coal-mining machinery, or even by purchasing it to be installed in our western mines, and so bringing about the desired effect, I would very much favour that course.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have been for nearly ten years in the Chamber, a colleague of my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) who introduced this resolution, and gave one of the ablest speeches, so far as form and delivery are concerned, that I have heard from him. I have listened to him frequently with pleasure, and have always admired his activity, energy and attention to detail, but I have scarcely ever been able to agree with his conclusions; and the resolution of to-day is no exception to what has been the unfortunate experience of the past. I sincerely and profoundly wish that my hon. friend, with his great ability, would devote himself to the study of economics fundamentally and I am quite sure that I should soon have a very powerful colleague in the advocacy of free trade in this House.

Having for years endeavoured, with indifferent success, to carry economic light into the dark places of the other side of the House, I am not unwilling to make a slight attempt to explore the country which may be more thick and more difficult still. Mr. Speaker, a resolution like this and a debate like this on general principles are only possible in a protectionist country. The problem which seemed to engage the minds of the introducer of the motion and of my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) who followed him, was the problem of scarcity in the midst of abundance. And when one comes to think of it, Sir, it is a problem. We have enough coal in Canada, I heard some one say during the reciprocity debates—to last the world two thousand years. Perhaps that was a slight exaggeration. In those same debates I used to say that if that was the case we need not bother much about certain of the arguments against reciprocity, because, unless protectionists mended their ways, they would be getting their fuel cheap enough long before that time. With all that coal, Sir, in the earth, we nevertheless have had circumstances during the past winter in which the people have been strained to death to get coal to keep themselves warm, in a climate that frequently goes to forty below zero. Well, now, Sir, that is a problem. And it strikes me that thoughtful men, approaching that problem with an open mind, would at once see that there is something radically wrong with the economic thought of the people of the country, and that is exactly my theory about what is wrong. My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Douglas) has just told us that we have the melancholy spectacle in Nova Scotia of the amount of coal produced declining from year to year. There was a fine old member of this House, Mr. Carmichael, who enjoyed in an eminent degree the friendship of the right hon the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and he objected to a duty being put on coal and lost his seat for it in the province of Nova Scotia. Well, he would have had a better chance to keep his seat in western Canada. we have more enlightened people economically there. Personally, I prefer the heresy—if it was a heresy—of Mr. Carmichael to the present motion. You have, according to my hon. friend from Cape Breton, decreased production under a tariff. And yet we have a proposal brought before the House here to-day that another form of protection should be applied in the shape of what is practically a bounty. The tariff has decreased the production—no getting away from that fact; we have just heard it stated by a man who knows. You say: we cannot do it by tariff; let us give them some money to do it. Well, I daresay that any industry would be the better of any money you gave it, but my friend who advocates that, in what was a very able speech from his point of view—if you do not pay too much attention to what he said—also told us that it is more important to produce food even than fuel at this time. If I put it to him as to what he would say to me if, representing the western constituencies, I came here to-night and said: Let the Government go into mining wheat on a large scale we need food more than fuel—he would say: That is absurd, we are producing the wheat anyway. That is exactly the proper answer. If you will allow capital to take its own course under freedom you will produce, and produce all that your capital is capable of producing, by giving them markets in which to sell. There is no subject in the world on which there is so much confused thinking as on this question of protection and free trade. I remember during the reciprocity debates that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in a very long speech, a speech of four hours duration—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh, my!

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: —objected to reciprocity on one particular ground, and that was that the United States would exhaust the resources of Canada—our raw material would all be sent over to the United States. The other side of the confused thinking is that hon. gentlemen come to this House to-day, and they get into an awful state about a little bit of coal finding its way from Pennsylvania to Saskatchewan So that they on their part object to exhausting the resources of the United States. I am so good a patriot and so much a believer in cheap coal that I would say: Take the duty off coal altogether and get all your coal from the United States, and then you will conserve the Canadian product for future generations. You will keep all our coal; you will be all that to the good. You will get cheap coal from the United States. You will exhaust the United States supply, and then you will have all this 2,000 years' supply left. My hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan), defending himself needlessly in a very able speech against the charge of being parochial, said that he would desire to approach this subject not only from the local point of view, the provincial point of view, but as a Dominion-wide subject. Well, I thought to myself, my hon. friend is very near the kingdom; he needs to take just another step and he will become a bigger man than his thought, and his programme will be a better one. He wants to make his creed world-wide, and then he will become a free trader.

A tariff is, inevitably, an artificial restriction of production. We have had the results stated to-night, so that we have to give a bounty as well as have a tariff. What is the real promoter of production? Trade is the real promoter of production. People produce only what they can sell, if they are right in the top story. You cannot promote production by artificial means. Not only is trade the real promoter of production, it is the only promoter of wealth. We sometimes, and indeed, we continually hear at the present time of production as if it were an end in itself. Production is not an end in itself, and it is not even the source of wealth. Trade is the source of wealth and the only source of the development of great wealth. Let me give the House an example. A few years ago we produced in this country 300,000,000 bushels of wheat in one year. We use in this country only 60,000,000 bushels of wheat in one year. Clearly, the 240,000,000 bushels of excess product over what we were able to use that year in this country was not wealth until we could send it abroad and exchange it. It is only by being able to exchange it or trade it for something else that it becomes wealth. You have a still more striking illustration of that in Australia at the present moment. You have the product—wheat—of two years' crop stored in bags, and owing to the difficulties of transportation it cannot be exchanged, with the result that it is growing musty and rotting, and being wasted from the bags by rodents which are having access to it. It is so far from being wealth that it is an incumbrance in the hands of the people. Trade is the real promoter of production and the real and only promoter of wealth. I do not know, but I would suggest that the reason why they are not mining that coal in Saskatchewan, about which the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) has told us, is that they found it more profitable to mine wheat there. You do not need to give them money to make them wheat miners there. The market and the supply make them mine the wheat. It is possible in this connection to reduce the protectionist theory to an absolute absurdity.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman not believe in any such thing as control, food control, for instance?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I believe in control of my speech when I have not something wise to say. I was saying, Sir, that it is possible to reduce to an absurdity the theory of protection that was advanced in this debate, by inference, if not by absolute statement. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of this resolution have, all of them, gone on the theory that we should, if possible, produce in Canada all the coal we need. We do produce in Canada all the wheat we need. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) would certainly believe in producing in Canada all the agricultural implements we need, and the protectionist, who has any other goods to peddle, would believe in producing in Canada all of anything that we can use. But in that case, if it were possible to succeed, you would have a huge excess of all your products. Under the protectionist theory, what would you do with your excesses? The thing is so absurd on the face of it that I do not yet despair before I die of getting some light into this House. It is hard work, but I do not despair.

This is a serious, practical question for the people of this country at the present time, and while I am, as everybody knows, in favour of producing all we can for the conduct of the war, I do not want to go about the matter in a senseless fashion. I think my hon. friend suggested that free mining implements would be a good thing in this country. We are very slow in this country. In the Argentine Republic they have not had a duty on mining tools for years, or if they have a duty at all, it is merely a nominal one. Just imagine the wisdom of people who think they will mine coal more easily if they make dear the implements with which they do their mining. I would say: Have a trial of freedom along the line of mining implements, if the question of production be so important. There is the road to production. I pointed it out the other day in connection with food. The first step in increasing the production of food is to have free agricultural implements. I point it out again now, quoting the example of the Argentine Republic in connection with coal. Free the implements with which you produce coal; take off all the restrictions, but do not try to increase the production of coal by giving money away where the tariff has failed. The giving of money for the specific purpose of building up any specific industry by way of bounty, or whatever you call it, would, with the present demands on the public purse, be little short of an economic crime.

With regard to the coal question, I want to put in a word for the consumer. The protectionist is always looking to the producer. The only sound way of looking at this economic question is always to look to the consumer, because we are all consumers. We consume one hundred things where we only produce one, and if you look to the consumer and let capital take its free course, it will always find the line of least resistance. You will produce most in that way of all that your country is capable of producing, compatibly with marketing the produce.

At the present juncture, I am looking at this from the point of view of the consumer, and if one goes into the houses of Ottawa and talks to the rank and file of the common people, one finds that the hardships of the war are coming very close to them in this matter of fuel. I cannot imagine any more insensate folly than to keep a duty on coal in a country like this, where the temperature goes down to forty and fifty below zero, and where the people in the capital city last year had to suffer almost privation for the want of material to keep themselves warm; I cannot imagine anything more absurd. The geographical position of the two countries makes it an ideal case for no tariff. You have an imaginary boundary line between the United States and Canada of 3,000 miles. At one part of the boundary line you have coal to the south and you have not coal to the north, and at another part of the boundary line you have coal to the north and not coal to the south. Could anything be more foolish than to prevent the exchange across the line, and to endeavour to keep carrying the long distances in both the countries concerned? I cannot imagine anything more foolish under the sun, I repeat, than keeping a duty on coal at the present juncture.

Our people are beginning to feel the burden of the war. Why increase it to them? We are looking forward to a winter in which the privations of the people of Ottawa may be greater than they were last year. I recommend to the House that instead of giving away money along the old sweet path for the artifician promotion of any industry whatsoever, we should try first the simpler plan. One remembers in this connection the lines:

Oh, how unlike the complex works of man,
Heaven's easy, artless, unencumbered plan!

Free your implements. Free your coal; let it go across the border. The difficulties of the war, of course, enter into one's consideration; we cannot alter them; they are with us. But we can help them out, and if I wanted to make sure, so far as I can see into this question, that I was going to make it easier for the consumers of coal in this country next winter than it was last winter I would say, take the duty off coal altogether, and let them go at this coal in the United States, and keep our own for future generations if capital has not found it profitable up to date to mine it.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterboro West): Might I say in a brief and somewhat presumptous reply—if I may call it so—to my hon. friend from Red Deer, that he has proceeded on an entirely false assumption which utterly and absolutely invalidates his argument. If this world were composed of one nation; if the people were identical in their interests; if the different nations that exist at the present time were only different states of the same union his argument would undoubtedly be sound. But we are up against this fact: there exists in the world a certain human failing or weakness which is called business rivalry, and it is only necessary in order to prove my point to call the hon. gentleman's attention to one fact, and that is the death of agriculture in England. If Great Britain had properly protected her agriculture, and had not pursued the policy which the hon. gentleman has enunciated she would not be in the desperate position she is in to-day as regards food.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: While Germany is well off.

Mr. BURNHAM: She would be in the position of having developed and maintained a certain national industry, so that it would make no difference to her whether there was a German submarine policy or not, or whether Canada was in existence or not. But heretofore she has proceeded on the assumption of my hon. friend, and endeavoured to feed the world on her manufactures. You cannot live on Sheffield cutlery or on Manchester cotton goods, and the consequence was that when war came, the hon. gentleman's policy found that good old country in the desperate condition in regard to food that she is in to-day. Had it not been for that policy England would now be in a better position. It is one of the greatest possible catastrophies that such a policy as my hon. friend has just enunciated has heretofore obtained in England. My hon. friend must be a mathematician. He labours under the impression that free trade or trade policies are like the principle of the conservation of energy, that where something manifests itself there must be a compensation also, that there is a transformation but never a dissipation of energy. Now, that is not the case with regard to trade. Trade and the principles of trade can easily be suppressed, and the patent law alone ought to show him that the protection exercised by means of that law would itself dislocate all trade. You cannot lay down any such principles as he has laid down so long as you have national boundaries, so long as there is one country up against another, so long as you have a number of countries in close rivalry one with another. Sweep away these boundaries, make humanity one, and what he says is true, provided that you can correct that other weakness of humanity, native greed. If only people will be considerate of each other, if only the Turks will spare the Armenians; if only the Armenians when they send up their prayers to Heaven are considered by the Almighty worthy of being spared and are spared—but the trouble is, when they send up their prayers to Heaven, month after month and year after year, the Almighty turns a deaf ear to them, and Canada and the United States and every other country are asked to subscribe for their protection. Why, you ask at once, should we subscribe for their protection when the Almighty himself refuses to protect them? We must proceed to the bottom of this thing, we must investigate the fundamental principles, and the one fundamental principle is this, that so long as there is this national rivalry throughout the world an easy natural adjustment such as my hon. friend has referred to is altogether and absolutely out of the question.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I had not intended to intervene in this debate, but I cannot allow to pass unchallenged the economic fallacies which I have heard enunciated by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burnham). He first of all says that Great Britain in this war has been suffering from her free trade policy. Let me ask him this: Are the people of Germany or of Austria better fed to-day than are the people of England? I do not think so, unless our newspapers are leading us astray by wrong information. Let us review for a few brief moments the history of free trade in Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to restrict his remarks upon the free trade policy of Great Britain, to what application it may have to the motion before the House.

Mr. McMASTER: The question of coal is before the House. Surely, Mr. Speaker, as a preliminary observation, I can set the hon. gentleman right as to the economic principles, or rather the fallacies and the heresies which he has enunciated.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just as an observation.

Mr. McMASTER: By way of observation. We have in Quebec notarial deeds, and those deeds sometimes start out with what are called preliminary observations, and mine will be a preliminary observation. Before they had free trade in England the people were starving, and the question before the British people for the first half of the nineteenth century was whether the population of Great Britain and Ireland would emigrate, or whether they would allow free food to come in from abroad to feed the people at home, in exchange for the coal and manufactures of Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen will see that I have not departed far from the subject. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) says, that you cannot live off Sheffield cutlery. No, but you can exchange it for flour from the United States or Canada, and live on the flour. The British people were starving before they had free trade in England. The people of Great Britain had to have free interchange of foodstuffs for their coal and other articles before they could live. I desire to point out that Great Britain, through her policy of free trade in coal and other things, has been able, not only to finance herself, but, at the beginning of the war to finance the overseas dominions, including Canada, and also very largely her Allies. I think if there were anything required to show the sound principle of the fiscal policy of the Old Country, it was the way she was able to stand the terrible financial strain caused by the war. I would not like to think that all economic truths had to be administered to this Government by the back door. I should like to show them that there are economic principles to be enunciated which they must meet face to face.

Mr. A. McGREGOR (Pictou): As coal production is the burning question to-night, and as I come from a coal producing county, I desire to make a few observations with regard to coal production in the county of Pictou, which I represent. With regard to the price of coal as arranged by the fuel controller or his agents, I understand the prices for the Acadia Coal Company are $6.60 for screened coal, $6.35 for run of mine and $5.25 for culm. If a measureable proportion of this unreasonable increase went into the pockets of the mine workers, I would not complain and I believe the people would not complain. In discussing this matter with the accountant, who I understand went to Nova Scotia to investigate the cost of production at the different collieries, he gave the information that, in arriving at a price for the Acadia Coal Company, he estimated $100,000 for repairs or development work for the Allan Shaft mine, and $30,000 for another mine. The company to be reimbursed for said amount in three years. Also that he took into account the capitalization of the company which, I understand, to be five millions; that is three millions of preferred stock and two millions of common. In addition to this he has, no doubt, taken into account the large and highly paid official management of the company, which means very large overhead expense. I wish to object to the method of book-keeping as adopted by this expert. In the first place, the public, in my opinion, should not be called upon to reimburse the company to the extent of $130,000, or to pay dividends on the company's mistakes, or to pay dividends on millions of watered stock. Neither should they be called upon to pay excessive salaries to the management. It must be understood that the Acadia Coal Company are now producing only about 600 tons of coal per day, whereas, the official management is big enough for a company that could take care of the production of 6,000 tons per day. Taking the argument of this accountant, and figuring the cost of production on a basis of 600 tons per day, he has decided that the company should be paid $6.60 per ton for screened coal, $6.35 for run of mine, and $5.25 for culm coal. Following his methods and his contention, if the company further reduced their output to 300 tons per day, and closed down another mine, I presume he would fix the price at $13.20 per ton for screened coal, $12.70 for run of mine, and $10.50 for culm. One trouble with the Acadia Coal Company is that they have closed down two collieries; another is that their overhead expense is entirely too great, and entirely out of proportion to their production. Within the past three months from 300 to 400 mine workers have left the town of Stellar-ton because they could not obtain employment. It is true they have had trouble in the mines they are now operating. In the recent explosion which took place at the Allan shafts 88 precious lives were lost. I believe the county of Pictou sustained a greater actual loss of life in this explosion than the county has suffered in this great war up to the present time. A large number of widows and children are left homeless and penniless, and no investigation has taken place up to the present time, except a coroner's inquest, conducted by an aged medical doctor, assisted by two lawyers who are favourable to the company. In my opinion there should at once be a thorough investigation of all their mining properties by mining engineers of the first class. I have no desire to cause any injustice to be done to any of the coal mining companies in the county of Pictou; it is my duty to see that fair consideration is given to the coal companies, but consumers must be protected.

I know it is necessary for the companies to receive a fair increase in the price of coal, but I wish to protest in the strongest possible manner against the price of coal as arranged by the fuel controller for the Acadia Coal Company. The solution of the situation in so far as the Acadia Coal Company are concerned is for them to produce more coal and increase their output. They hold a blanket lease of large and valuable mine areas which they will neither operate nor permit others to operate. I suggest that this Government should co-operate with the local government, and take over the extensive leases held by the Acadia Coal Company and appoint a commission to operate the mines for the benefit of the public, or hand the said leases over to firms who are competent and willing to operate such leases and produce coal at a fair and reasonable price. If the company is permitted to impose the present prices that are in my opinion entirely unjustiable, it will mean serious hardship to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and especially to the people of the county I have the honour to represent. Such increase, if authorized, will embarrass the manufacturers and discourage further industrial development. I understand the Minister of Railways and Canals has fixed the price to be paid by his department for the coal required for railway purposes. The people will expect this Government to protect their interests and arrange that the prices to be paid by the manufacturers, the dealers, and the public shall be in keeping with the price paid by the Government for their requirements.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I listened with the usual pleasure and interest to the remarks of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and while I cannot agree with his point of view on trade matters, I am free to confess that the hon. gentleman is not only persistent in advocating his free trade principles, but he is also consistent in advocating them, and no person doubts his thorough sincerity in holding the views which he does hold. I am precluded from going into the question of free trade, I understand, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to trespass upon your good nature in that regard. I may say, however, that it does strike me that in a country such as we have in Canada we must, in framing our tariff policy, whether in regard to coal or anything else, take into consideration our climatic conditions as compared with those of other countries with which Canada has to compete. I will not attempt to follow that up any farther, but what I rose to say in regard to the coal question was this: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said that last winter there were actually people in the capital city of Ottawa who were suffering from cold on account of a shortage of coal, and that he regarded it as the height of absurdity to have a duty on coal when people were suffering from a shortage of coal. He said that when at one part of the continent north of the boundary line there was coal and none south of it, and when at another part there was coal south of the line and none north of it, it was, under such conditions, absurd to have a duty on coal. As I understand it, there is no duty on the coal that the people use in their furnaces and in their stoves. Anthracite coal passes freely from the other side of the line into Canada without any duty. The duty is only on bituminous coal. The tariff is as follows:

> Coal, bituminous, slack, such as 95 per cent will pass through a three-quarter inch screen, per ton, 10c; 12c; 14c.

These rates being the British preferential tariff, the intermediate tariff and the general tariff. Item 588:

> Coal, bituminous, round and run of mine, and coal, n.o.p. per ton, 35c; 45c; 53c.

These are not classes of coal that are used by people in warming their houses.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not want to make an unnecessary interruption, but I may say to my hon. friend that I am using a grate fire myself—the mornings are cold enough—and I am using both kinds of coal.

Mr. EDWARDS: That may be true, but the hon. gentleman does not dispute my statement that in so far as his argument applies to people who are using coal for heating purposes in their houses, it falls down in that there is no duty on that class of coal. We did have trouble in this country last winter, but according to my idea it was due to the fact that there was a shortage of cars, that the United States had some 25,000 cars which should have been in Canada—they had that many more of our cars than we had of theirs. The great difficulty in obtaining coal for heating houses lay in the fact of the shortage of cars, the extreme winter and the days of blockade upon the railways on account of snow. I have no objection whatever to the hon. member for Red Deer holding views on trade matters. I give him credit for being perfectly sincere in his views. He is, at all events, always consistent. He is an out-and-out free trader, and he wants to see free trade in everything. That is a consistent view for him to take. He may hold that view if he chooses, but I do not think his argument was quite correct in so far as coal was concerned, because it left the impression that it was the duty on coal generally used by the people that was responsible, whereas there is no duty on that class of coal.

Mr. S. J. CROWE (Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very many minutes of the time of this House, but having listened to the hon. members from Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and Alberta telling us what vast bodies of coal they have in those different provinces, I feel that I should tell the House that in British Columbia we have vast coal beds. Our climate is such that we do not require to burn so much coal as they do in Ontario, Quebec and some of the western provinces. If the people of these provinces have not sufficient coal next winter I would invite them to come to the Pacific coast, because we will have sufficient heat to keep them quite warm. We have vast coal areas on Vancouver island, and besides supplying the lower mainland of British Columbia with coal, we ship as far south as San Francisco from 1,500,000 tons to 2,000,000 tons per year. You see, therefore, that we are not short of coal. The only thing we complain about is that the fuel controller does not keep down the price of coal to what it should be. In the city of Vancouver we pay $9 a ton for coal, and they only have to ship it forty miles across from Nanaimo. I think that is a question that the fuel controller should look into and compel the mine owners to sell their coal at a less rate than they are charging. We have coal beds in the Nicola valley but we cannot ship our coal out from there because it costs too much to transport it to the larger centres of the province. We have coal in the Crow's Nest Pass from which they ship east. We have anthracite in northern British Columbia, in the Skeena river region. An American engineer has reported that there is almost ten times as much anthracite coal in the Skeena district as there is all kinds of coal in the whole province of Nova Scotia. I only wanted to inform the House that British Columbia is on the map when it comes to the question of coal.

Mr. J. A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Before mentioning the question of coal, I want to refer to one or two observations that were made by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). I would not have said anything in regard to his argument were it not for the slap that he gave to Great Britain. I think it is very unbecoming, to say the least, for any hon. gentleman in this House to abuse Great Britain at this particular time for the purpose of bolstering up the protectionist argument. It only goes to show that the protectionist is now, as he always has been, prepared to slap his very best friend at any time to bolster up his own argument in any way in which it can be done. If he had only taken the trouble to analyse the quantity of food that Great Britain had control of and disposed of since this war began, he would not have used the argument which he did use to-night. We all know what Great Britain has done in the matter of feeding her Allies, we all know what she did for years until the United States took over the feeding of Belgium, and we all know what she has done more recently in regard to Italy, and I think it ill becomes the hon. gentleman to use that kind of argument. He himself states that we should go to the bottom of this argument. The present is not the time for that, Mr. Speaker, but I only hope that opportunity will be afforded to us before the session closes of going to the bottom of the trade argument with the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). We will be very glad to do it if the opportunity is presented, and we will try very hard to kick the bottom clean out.

Coming to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), we all know his tendencies. I might not go as far as he would go in the matter of free trade, but I will say this: I will trade with anybody that will trade with me anything from a jack knife, to as far as you like to go, across the international boundary or anywhere else. It makes no difference to me what it is; if it is business I am prepared to do it. But I think the hon. gentleman has misinterpreted the meaning of the words that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) may have used, although personally I did not hear what that hon. gentleman said this afternoon. I may say this, however: People in Saskatchewan, eastern Saskatchewan particularly, are probably somewhat differently situated from the residents of Alberta. We have the long freight haul; the freight on the coal in eastern Saskatchewan amounts to practically as much per ton as the coal costs at the mine. We have, as has been stated, an abundance of lignite coal which when briquetted, we are given to understand, is quite equal in heating qualities to Pennsylvania coal. I understand the argument has been advanced that we should produce all our own coal within our own boundaries. I quite agree with that argument, providing it can be produced in an economical way. But in the province of Saskatchewan that cannot be done at the present time. It is true that we have anthracite coal in western Canada, and our friends in Alberta claim it is equally as good as Pennsylvania anthracite. That is a matter of opinion. Personally I like Pennsylvania anthracite when I can get it; but that is neither here nor there. The available quantities of coal of that particular quality in Alberta cannot be produced in large enough quantities to meet the demands in the province for that class of coal. We have got to have anthracite coal there in the winter time. If we did not have Pennsylvania anthracite coal at this particular time we would have to consign to the scrap heap our base-burner coal stoves that can only be used satisfactorily with anthracite, or similar type of coal. Briquettes, if we had them, would work very satisfactorily, and that is the argument advanced by the hon. member for Regina this afternoon. I understand, not that there should be a bounty, not that there should be protection, but that there should be an experiment as it were, or a demonstration that the use of this lignite is commercially and economically feasible. We have been working along that line for some considerable time, but is is largely private capital that has been used and it has been an uphill job. What is now asked is that the Government should undertake to give a demonstration on a commercial scale to show that that coal can be produced economically. We are given to understand that with proper equipment this coal can be produced at almost one-half of what we have to pay for the Pennsylvania anthracite, and that the two coals are about equal in burning qualities.

In regard to the fuel controller's restrictions I would like to say that, while I have not had it direct from the controller's office, press reports give us to understand that restrictions are to be placed on the amount of coal that the consumer may store at one time. I do not know whether such restriction is intended to apply to western Canada, but if it is, the fuel controller will have made one of the most serious mistakes that any man placed in charge of fuel, or anything else in Canada, has so far committed. I hope that the fuel controller does not intend to go that far. We in western Canada have got—and we have been educating our people to carry out this policy—to put in our winter supply of soft coal during the summer months. The statement is made that coal deteriorates in storage. There are some kinds that will not deteriorate to any appreciable extent in storage. There are large quantities of coal from southern and Central Alberta that will keep for months and months, for an entire year if you like, in ordinary storage; in a basement this coal will keep almost for an indefinite period. Some of the northern coals do not possess the same keeping qualities. However, the reason I have given is not the only one why such a restriction should not apply, at least to western Canada. I have another reason to cite in opposition to it. We consume immense quantities of coal in western Canada, and at the time the people have usually been filling up their bins with coal they have also been moving their wheat out. That works all right in so far as bringing in the anthracite coal is concerned; they can take that back in the cars from Fort William and Port Arthur, and it does not make so much difference. But when it comes to taking cars for the Alberta coal it is an entirely different matter, and the amount of power and the number of cars used during the months of October and November corresponds to about the power and cars required to move anywhere from eight to twelve million bushels of wheat to the head of the lakes. You will, therefore, see how important the restriction in question is from that viewpoint, apart altogether from securing a supply of fuel for the winter months. We had a serious situation in Western Canada some time ago, just as serious, if not more so, than you had here in Ontario last winter, and we have only prevented a recurrence of it by endeavouring to get our people to secure their supply of coal during the months of June, July and August. That surely should apply this year more than at any time in the past. Without doubt, immediately wheat starts to move in western Canada this year, not one particle of power, nor any cars, should be used in handling coal that could be avoided.

As I stated a minute ago, I have absolutely no objection whatever to bringing in mining machinery free.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (Simcoe): Mining machinery has been on the free list for ten or fifteen years.

Mr. MAHARG: I am glad to know it; it helps to make the argument all the stronger. There are a lot of other things that also ought to be free of duty. If it is a good thing to bring in the implements of one industry free in order to stimulate it, the principle should apply all the way round. I am very glad, indeed, to know that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to get back into the matter of protection at all. But our protectionist people are always ready to remove the protection on everything that comes their particular way. I will just give you one illustration. I was talking to a British Columbia fruit grower, and incidentally the matter of protection on fruit came up, and he wanted to know what the western members were going to do about it. Perhaps he had been a little terrorized, I am not sure, but he had an idea that we were going to do something in the matter of duties. I told him that I did not know what they were going to do. He said: "You can remove the duty on any old thing you like, but for heaven's sake don't touch fruit." He was an absolute free trader so long as free trade did not apply to fruit. If it did, he immediately switched around. That is about the position we are in in western Canada, in so far as the fuel situation is concerned. All that we are asking is that the Government will at least demonstrate that the large and almost inexhaustible lignite coal fields in southern Saskatchewan can be put on the map as a commercial industry in order that we may not be entirely dependent on American anthracite coal to heat our homes during the winter. We must have either anthracite, or a substitute for it, a fuel that will keep up a continuous fire anywhere from sixteen to twenty-four hours.

[Mr. Maharg.]

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have heard several hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia speak on this coal question, some of them offering their coal to the province of Quebec and to the other provinces of the Dominion which have no coal mines. After listening to these hon. gentlemen, I ask myself if they have made any practical suggestion in the course of their long or short speeches. Has it occurred to this Government, which seems to want to take charge of everything, to pass even an Order in Council to relieve the city of Montreal from a fuel shortage? I am speaking particularly of soft coal. The industries of Montreal depend on the mines of the Maritime Provinces for their supply of coal. They are compelled to bring in this coal during the season of navigation, although we know that just across the line, as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) has said, only an imaginary line, there is coal. I am going to make a constructive suggestion: why not blot out this imaginary line during the war? Are we not at war equally with the United States? If so, let us help one another. In this way we may save the situation and relieve Montreal of the problem of a coal shortage such as it had last winter. I propose, as a practical proposition, the removal of the duty during the war, so that we can get from the other side of the imaginary line the coal to satisfy the industries of Canada. I say that Montreal is suffering to-day from shortage of coal. We are paying more for gas and for light on account of this shortage. And we look to this Government, this Government of great men, to do something practical by blotting out this duty during the war. That is all I am going to say, because I do not want to be accused of making a long speech. But we are expecting something practical from the Government in the sense of what I have been talking about.

10 p.m.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think that British Columbia fruit grower, to whom my hon. friend (Mr. Maharg) referred a little while ago, who was satisfied to have free trade in everything but fruit, is typical of free traders, and, in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. L. A. Lapointe), who has just referred to Montreal and the coal situation there, let me ask him to recall the situation with respect to coal in the city of Montreal some few years ago. In the year when Mr. Fielding and the late Mr. Paterson went down to Washington to negotiate the reciprocity treaty, in the month of April, the city of Montreal called for tenders for the supply of coal for the city for one year. The Dominion Coal Company was the only Canadian tenderer. There were one or more American tenderers, and the city of Montreal bought its coal from the American tenderer that year at 31 cents a ton less than the Dominion Coal Company's tender, so I do not think Montreal is suffering so very much from this "imaginary line."

Now, I have been struck by a number of statements that were made by these free traders, and it was only when they announced themselves as such that I thought they were free traders, for they did not argue along those lines. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) says that trade is the basis of wealth. That may be. But how are you going to trade if you do not produce? I think production is at the bottom of the whole matter. I think my hon. friend has forgotten a few of the principles that he learned from Adam Smith, and it is pretty nearly time for him to reread the Wealth of Nations. I think, Mr. Speaker, when we come to consider the whole matter, as far as eastern Nova Scotia is concerned, there are one or two things that are at the bottom of our declining production. One is the matter of transportation. I know myself that, in the month of June, 1917, the Dominion Coal Company were in straits as to shipping. A certain amount of their shipping had been commandeered for war purposes, and I know that they were making very, very strong appeals to the Government of the day to have returned a number of their ships in order that they might transport their coal up the St. Lawrence. It is true that that may not have hampered production at the time; that might not have been the immediate cause of the slackening production, because at the time a large number of their men had enlisted, so that the Dominion Coal Company lost some thousands of employees, and perhaps had all their men remained there, together with the commandeering, the situation might have been very much more serious. The only reason in the world why they have not suffered during the two last years for the want of shipping, is simply that into Sydney Harbour comes a very, very large amount of shipping. Almost every week or so, thirty, thirty-one, and, as high as thirty-nine, ships, varying in tonnage from 7,000 to 17,000 tons, assemble there to be convoyed across the ocean. These ships all fill their bunkers there. Therefore, the question of transportation was not such a very serious one during the last year or two.

But with respect to the production of coal at least in Cape Breton county, there is a more serious question than that. The Nova Scotia Steel Company and the Dominion Iron and Steel Company are the two principal producers of coal in the province of Nova Scotia. They have coal areas so interlaced on either side of the harbour that the production of coal by either is hampered. So far as that is concerned, the suggestion of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. McGregor) is a very timely one, namely, that the Government might possibly co-operate with the local Government to see if there is not some remedy for an evil which has really been tying up and hampering the production of coal in the county of Cape Breton.

One hon. member referred to the overhead charges of some of those companies. Not more than a couple of months ago a financial paper—I forget the name—came out with a photograph of Mr. Crockard, the new general manager of the Nova Scotia Steel Company. Under the photograph was given the amount of his salary, $100,000 a year. One hundred thousand dollars a year to manage that little twopenny-halfpenny company—a larger salary than the President of the United States receives! As my hon. friend has pointed out, that represents twenty cents a ton on every ton of coal mined by that company, or a dollar a ton on every ton of coal that they sell, and they sell all they can over and above what they consume themselves in the steel works. The country has to pay for that. It is twenty cents additional on each ton of coal. That is only one case, for all through the company you will find officials with salaries growing gradually smaller, but still large. If you stood at the street car when the people began pouring out of the general offices, you would think there was staff enough to manage the Standard Oil Company. There are young men there by the dozen, and no one knows what they are doing. Probably they should be at the front.

The question of transportation is very important, for, after all, we ship coal from Sydney harbour, approximately only eight months in a year. Sometimes we can ship for nine months. On the northern side of the harbour the coal can sometimes be shipped for ten months. The fuel controller goes down to Nova Scotia, and he sets prices on coal regardless of the enormous, the stupendous blunders that are from day to day being committed by the management. Take, for instance, to-day the Nova Scotia Steel Company with four mines and nineteen mine managers. If you go down to their steel works at Sydney mines, you can find one piece of machinery which, when completed, cost $750,000, which has never earned a five dollar bill and which is now on the scrap heap. If they continue for a few more years their blunders for which the people of eastern Canada are paying every day, they will have more dollars in their scrap heap than in their coal seams.

An hon. MEMBER: They will require more protection.

Mr. BUTTS: They will require more protection from their own follies. Labour is another great problem there, and it is certainly hard to understand how, under present circumstances, we can supply an adequate quantity of labour. We do not wish to see an inferior class of people brought into the country. We want the country to remain the white man's country. We do not want to see coolie or Chinese labour brought in. We wish to see the standard of our population maintained as high as it is at present and, if possible, improved. The only solution I can see for the difficulty is to encourage production by having cheap mining machinery, as suggested by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. McGregor). Cheap mining machinery is something over which, as has been stated, the Government has no control, as at the present time there is no duty upon it. I wish to refer to some of the very peculiar statements that have been made. Great Britain, before free trade, was starving. The miners of Nova Scotia, before protection, were not very far from the mark. I wonder if my hon. friend can explain the paradox. It is a strange thing that but a short time ago an auditor was sent down to some of our mines in Cape Breton —I speak now for the consuming public generally. This auditor, on his return, stated that the Acadia Coal Company, for instance, was selling coal at the rate of $6.35 a ton net, run of mine. He made the further statement that the company was losing $1.50 a ton at that price. It may be very generous on the part of the Acadia Coal Company to supply the community at large with coal at a loss of $1.50 a ton, but such generosity, if it exists, is something that I should like to see explained. I should like, at the same time, any person to explain to me how it is that the cost of production of coal in any mine in Nova Scotia ever came to even $4 a ton. I have been buying coal now for a very considerable length of time, and I have yet to put in my cellar the first ton of coal that ever cost me $4.50. At present I can put coal in my cellar at $3.60 a ton, and the coal company is not selling at a loss. Yet this auditor tells us that he has set a price for them of $6.35 per ton of 2,000 pounds. It is not very long ago since the Dominion Coal Company was able to put over their wharves at Sydney, after transporting it by rail for 17 miles from their mine, coal at $1.12 a ton. The only way the problem can be explained is that the companies down there took this auditor out for a walk.

I think perhaps the only real suggestion I have heard in the course of this debate, with reference to the coal product of eastern Canada, came from my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. McGregor) who suggested that this Government get in touch with the Nova Scotia government and see if some changes could not be made in the mining laws of that province to change the leases and facilitate the mining of coal, and perhaps remove a great many of the obstructions the coal companies have had to contend with up to the present time. There is considerable talk in the newspapers from time to time about a merger between the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Nova Scotia Coal and Steel Company. I do not know whether it is likely to come to anything or not, nor do I care just now to say whether on general grounds it would be a good thing or not, but I do say that it would at least be a cure for the interlacing of leases, and in that way might materially increase the production of coal. Possibly the conscripting of labour might be looked into when we are considering what can be done to increase the production of coal in this country. There is room for a great many more mine hands and coal workers. The occupation, of course, requires a very considerable amount of skill, particularly the underground work, and it occurred to me, when our western friends were talking about their miners working only one-half or one-third or one-quarter time, that perhaps the best remedy might be for them to send down to eastern Canada a lot of their very best miners, and we will give them employment the year round.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not going to make any extended remarks, but it seems necessary to say a word or two in this debate. The speakers have travelled over wide ground, and I am not going to follow them, especially along the lines of a free trade or protectionist discussion. We never would know the particular virtue in my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) unless in the course of his speech he drew a little from the fountain head and source of the economic instruction which he got in Old England before he came to this country. We would lose a great deal of his fire and vigour and peculiar force if he did not drink of that fountain and give us the results of the stimulation gained therefrom. After all, my hon. friend from Red Deer must once in a while settle back and think something like this: Is it possible that all the rest of the world opposed to me is wrong and that I, with those who agree with me, am the only one who is right? He has had a long period in which to indoctrinate the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and with all his vigour he has attempted also to indoctrinate the gentlemen on this side; but I think it will be a long, long while before he gets every one to agree with him that his particular brand of economics is the only true and genuine one. However, I am not going to carry on the discussion along the lines of free trade or protection, because that is not particularly the thing for us to consider at this time. We have come up against a set of circumstances in our country into which very many different factors enter, and we cannot see the whole question properly unless we take a pretty broad view of all the facts. To simply take one and follow it up and found an argument on that will lead us, I think, to a mistaken conclusion. It is very difficult indeed for us to get an all-round view and come to the proper conclusion to be drawn from such a view, but I am just going to mention two or three things that occurred to me during the debate.

Some one raised the question as to what the fuel controller was appointed for, and came to the conclusion that his chief duty was to stimulate and increase the production of coal. Now I do not think that was the object in view in appointing the fuel controller. We are peculiarly situated here. Bring out all the coal we possibly can from west, middle and east, but such are the circumstances of this country as regards distance and transport that unless we have a large importation of coal from the United States we shall have difficulties before the season is over.

In that country, to which we look for a surplus of coal to make up our deficit of fifteen or sixteen million tons, there are also peculiar conditions. My hon. friend from Montreal thinks the whole thing would be solved by taking the duty off coal and letting it come into Montreal and other parts of Canada free. So far as preventing a shortage of coal in this country is concerned, that would not affect the present situation one single bit because the trouble in the United States is to get the supply of coal that we require to keep up the motive power of our industries and the warmth of our dwellings. So whether there was a duty or not, it would not help to provide that amount in the United States which we require. The fuel controller was primarily appointed to see by all possible fair means that we so put our case before the United States authorities that we would receive an allotment of some 16,000,000 tons of coal a year for every year this war is on. That was his primary duty; that duty he set himself to perform, and that duty both last year and this he has absolutely well and perfectly performed. I would like the House to remember that. Unless we had succeeded in putting our case in such a way, and arranging matters in such a way, that the United States might use that allocation, we would have been in very great trouble and at very great disadvantage. We have certainly been saved from that position, first, by the eminently fair and sympathetic way in which the United States authorities have met us, and, secondly, by the way in which—and I think the perfectly good and reasonable way in which—Mr. Magrath, the fuel controller, approached the United States authorities, and put Canada's case before them. As to that part of his duty, I do not think any hon. member in this House who has any spirit of fairness at all—and we all have that—will find any fault with the fuel controller. Outside of that, the duty of the fuel controller was, as far as possible, to see that the distribution of this imported coal went to the districts that needed it, in such equitable and fair proportions as would give to each district its due, without congesting any, or starving others. In that respect, I think the fuel controller's exertions have been rewarded with success. Remember it was not the duty of the fuel controller to pick up a ton of coal somewhere in the United States and land it in the cellar of the man in Canada who wanted to burn it. He was to provide the coal, so that it could be available for the transport man, and the merchant to bring away, so that the importer and the dealer would have his supply of coal. It was not Mr. Magrath's duty at all to provide for the transport of that coal, and I think he has been somewhat unfairly criticised, because different transport conditions prevailed last year from those which had heretofore prevailed, and caused a great proportion of the disadvantage and confusion, and of the shortage, and in some cases the privation, which occurred in the supply of coal in this country; but in so far as the supply of coal itself was concerned, Mr. Magrath obtained last year for Canada within a few tons as much as she had the preceding year. Some people have expressed their anxiety lest this year we should be in privation and have trouble again. If things go on ordinarily well—the word "ordinarily" being taken in conjunction with these present disturbed conditions in both countries—and if there is not greater trouble in transport and other things than last year, Canada will get her allotment from the United States for the year 1918-19, and the fuel controller will see to it, as he did last year, that that coal is equitably, rationably and reasonably distributed where it is wanted. Then, outside of the duty of making provision for the imported coal, and the distribution of it, it is also the duty of the fuel controller to control as far as he reasonably can the prices, and he is given authority by Order in Council to fix the prices, and the principle upon which prices are fixed is exactly the principle upon which prices are fixed in the United States. As far as is possible, the fuel controller there, as here, gets at the cost of production in the several mines, and different mines have different costs of production. In the United States, as in this country, different prices are put upon the coal as it is produced from different mines, because of these generic differences in the mines themselves. The principle is this: You find the cost of production and then allow reasonable amount for the profit of the distributor, seeing that distributors do not multiply the profits, one from the other, and the profit of the producer. The fuel controller of this country is carrying out the same principle, and he is fixing his prices upon the very same principle as that adopted in the United States. If mines differ, and if there be faults in human agencies, as there will be, it may very well happen that a fuel controller, attempting to fix the prices in the different sections and mines of this country, having to depend, in the first place, upon the calculation of cost, and adding the prices or profits that are reasonably allowable, may make mistakes. If he does, he has a chance to revise, but in the majority of instances it will be fair to assume that if his calculations of cost are correct, then, as a matter of course, the prices that are fixed, with the reasonable profits added to the cost, will be what may be called reasonable and equitable prices. With reference to production, not only has the fuel controller these principal objects in mind, but he is doing every thing that one man can possibly do to speed up production. But his powers of speeding up production are not as large as they possibly might be, and it may very well happen that one fuel controller is not able to handle the whole business that I have been talking about, and at the same time effect what my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McGregor) describes as a "speed-up." I cannot speak from an intimate knowledge of the whole mining industry, and my statements are merely impressions, but from what I have learned during the last two years, I think there is need for more co-ordination and for some general principle of directive power to be brought to bear upon the coal-mining industry in this country, to make sure that coal mining is carried on in a scientific way, with a due regard to economy of production, and to scientific methods of production. There are also, I am led to believe—and I think it may be true—certain anomalies in the relation of certain coal-mining companies to other coal-mining companies, and if what has been stated here as to the matter of salaries is correct, it may very well be that there is some anomaly in that respect, and we ought to have some overhand directive power to correct it, if it is necessary to do that. I think that a fair method of co-operation between the provincial authorities in Nova Scotia, which have so much to do with mines and have such an interest in them, and the Dominion authorities might very well be aimed at, in order to get at the best result. We have on the 17th of this month a conference of all the operators of labour connected with the industry, and of transport people connected with the carrying and distribution of coal here in the city of Ottawa. That has been called for the purpose of taking the whole question into consideration and arriving at some method by which better results than we have had hitherto may be obtained for this year and succeeding years. But we must remember that we have difficulties in labour, difficulties in transport and difficulties in distribution in this country. It is impossible for us to forget it when we are taking this whole question into consideration. In reference to what the Government should do, or may do, we all know that there is a good deal said that is very general in its character.

Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS: I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he can inform the House as to what the estimated increase in production is in the United States for 1918 as compared with 1917?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I could give my hon. friend only a general idea. In the United States, from circumstances that have arisen there, they require at least one hundred million tons more to be produced this year than last year. So far as it goes from month to month, there is sometimes a decrease and sometimes an increase compared with the same months of last year. I noticed just to-day that in the month of March there was a considerable increase in anthracite coal as compared with March of last year. My impression is, however, that, on the whole, they will have an increased production in the United States this year, if things go as smoothly as they hope in labour and in transport matters, of fifty million tons, and they are trying to eliminate waste and restrict use so as to make a saving of another fifty million tons. But the thing changes so very rapidly from week to week and month to month that it is pretty difficult to get at anything more than a merely approximate estimate. I do not know whether I have satisfactorily answered my hon. friend, but I have made a dash at it.

I was speaking about the ideas that are put forward as to what the Government should do. It is such an easy thing to say that what the Government ought to do is to see that there is the greatest possible development of electrical energy, that there is the greatest possible production of gas—I mean gas for motive power purposes—that there is the greatest possible need for production of coal and for saving and the like of that. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is anxious that the people should be taught to gather wood and burn that. Excellent advice, but the Government is not able to do all these things.

Some arguments fell from hon. gentlemen this afternoon from which is deducible the idea that we should go to work and open coal mines and run them, open gas wells and run them and develop electrical power and things of that sort. When the Mines Branch was under discussion there seemed to be a drift on the part of some hon. members towards the view that the Mines Branch was to be a general operating, working and developing piece of machinery which would have money at its disposal to develop whatever mines were necessary after the deposits had been found, and that it would become a great working force. Well, I think there is some point at which we must make a stand in that respect. There are some things that Governments can do and some things that they cannot do. In this time of war what this Government cannot do is to put money into the development of iron properties, or platinum properties or any other great properties and, with their own work and their own capital, develop them and sell the proceeds. It seems to me that what the Mines Department is for is to search out diligently and find the deposits of value, explain and elucidate these, their qualities and extent, make them known generally, and then allow capital to go to work and develop them. That is the aim of the departments as they are run in Ottawa and I think in every country.

Now, the Government proposes to go a little farther than that in the matter of coal. We have heard discussed to-day the quality of the low grade lignite in Saskatchewan which, if it is amenable to the process of successful briquetting will solve the question in so far as briquetting goes for the whole of the lignite coal of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The Government proposes, in co-operation with Manitoba and Saskatchewan, to put in an experimental unit or two for producing briquettes at or near Estevan. From the investigation which was made by the Department of Mines, by the Advisory Council of Scientific Research, and after careful study by other forces and elements in the country, the conclusion has been arrived at that it is as nearly certain as it can be that there is a process by which that coal can be put into a condition where it will rival anthracite and do the work that anthracite now does. The Government in a case like that thinks that it is justified in taking that up and, as an experiment, trying to put it upon a commercial foundation and proving its practicability. I think it will then be a matter for consideration whether it will carry it on as a government industry, whether the local governments will carry it on as a local government industry, or whether, having demonstrated the feasibility of the process and opened up the field to capital, municipal, corporation or otherwise, it will be left for the usual channels of business to develop it and carry it on.

Mr. MAHARG: Do you propose doing that in the near future so that we will be able to reap some benefit by next winter?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I suppose that it will take a year to instal the whole of the equipment and get it into working order but it is the intention of the Government to organize it at once and go on with the experiment. What has been proven by laboratory work, and what is a little more extensive than ordinary laboratory work, is that you can take this lignite at Estevan, carbonize it, put it into the shape of briquettes with a suitable binder and you can do it at a cost of somewhere between $6 and $7 per ton of briquettes. The value, as compared with anthracite, I think, is about equal. If you can do that at a cost of $7 at Estevan, you can put it into Regina at a cost which will certainly be less than that at which you can put anthracite there. Free trader or protectionist, I do not care a hang which, every man will hold up his hand for that as being good business. If you can do that out of comparatively worthless coal near your own doors and save to these three provinces $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 instead of having that money go out of your country, if you do that by developing the lignites in your own country, give the people a better coal, do away with those long hauls which are so uneconomical, and if you can get the stuff you want with a shorter haul, surely it is good business to do it. That is what the Government proposes to do in that respect. If the Government does that, and does nothing more, and if it proves to be a commercial success, it will have given a great boon to that country for all time to come. It will put the people out there in the position where they can have that kind of coal which is not only tidy and neat, but which is pleasing to the eye and grateful to the body for the warmth which it gives. It will give them these advantages from the coal right in their own district, which is inexhaustible in quantity.

I do not want to prolong my remarks. I felt that it was necessary to say something with reference to the matter, particularly with reference to this last question, which is a practical thing. My own idea is that there was a great deal of wisdom in the remarks that were made by my hon. friend from Cape Breton, and that there is a possible way in which, gradually but surely, we may bring the coal mining industry in this country where it will serve our own wants and make us independent of any contretemps, any situations which might possibly arise in future as between us and other countries of supply. In a way it is a fair thing for Canada to think that the coal measures in the United States are not inexhaustible. Canada has coal measures, which, of their kind, are practically inexhaustible, and in the years of the future she will have to depend more upon herself; and it is well that this country should begin as quickly as possible to put her producing machinery in order to co-ordinate the use of coal and get along towards the point where she will supply herself.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): I merely wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. I followed him very closely in his explanation of the duties of the food controller up to the point where he had arranged with the United States authorities to set aside fifteen or sixteen million tons per year for the use of Canada. The controller's next step was to distribute that quantity of coal, and I would ask the minister how far the distribution goes, whether it is to the provinces, towns, or localities, and how closely the controller follows that distribution.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He follows distribution in this way: He does not either create or call into being coal carriers or coal distributors—they are in our towns and cities and outlying places. The system of gathering information tells him about the needs of each one of these communities —what they had last year, and what they have for this year—and he sees as far as he possibly can that each one of these sections gets its reasonable quota as compared with the preceding year. That is the way the system operates: It follows along in a natural channel, but it also is guided by the controller in the distribution to these centres of supply.

Mr. COPP: And the dealers will look after getting their orders filled, and getting the coal to their locality?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. And the controller holds a supervising power over the dealer from the time the coal gets into this country until it reaches the consumer. He holds the power of preventing unreasonable charges, and there is also this power that he has: If it so happens that in a district one part of that community may be in the way of filling its cellars while another part of the same community has but little or none, the controller has the power to say how much shall go, or the maximum quantity beyond which it shall not go; and if there is hoarding, and it comes to his knowledge that one person is suffering and has nothing and the other person has his bin full, he has power to take out from that bin and distribute a portion of the coal to the suffering one. Those are his general supervising powers.

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie, Sask.): I intended to submit a question but I am very glad indeed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by his statement, has relieved me from the necessity of doing so. It was with reference to an item that appeared in the Saskatoon Star of April the 10th, stating that the Dominion Governmen, in unison with the Governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, were establishing a plan which the minister has just told us they have already entered into. I wish to congratulate the Government on that policy which will be received by the people of the West with a great deal of cordiality, because we have in Saskatchewan, as the minister said, an unlimited amount of lignite coal which should be capable of being utilized to the very greatest advantage.

I understand the fuel controller has sent orders to the coal dealers in the West not to sell to any one person more than one-thirtieth of the annual supply of coal which he requires. If such is the case it will work very great hardship in the West.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: With my hon. friend's permission I will say that I do not think there is any such regulation as that, or that any regulation is set down in that way at all, but, I think, there is general supervising power. There is another thing, if my hon. friend will excuse me for a moment: A fuel controller cannot sit at Ottawa, or any other one place, and stretch his hand over the whole of this country and look after every supply centre. He is working in conjunction and with the cooperation of the provinces, and so each province is asked to, and has consented, to appoint a fuel supervisor, and each municipality has been asked to appoint a fuel commissioner. These all work together from the place of demand in each municipality, city, town or province, as to the amount which is to be allowed, as to what may be given for one section and may not be given for another; and it will depend very largely upon the recommendation and thought of the one who is nearest to the centre of demand. That probably explains part of the question my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. J. F. REID: I am very glad to have this information. It was very plainly stated by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) that in the West during the summer months it is absolutely necessary for us to stock up with our supply of coal for the year, because at that season the freight and box cars are standing idle, and we may as well have the use of them as far as possible in bringing in coal. If transportation is interfered with and the settlers are crying out for coal in the fall when the cars should be carrying our wheat to the East, it will be a very serious thing.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend need not have any fear about that, because the fuel controller is just as anxious that coal shall be got in early during the summer months as any person out there could very well be.

Mr. SPEAKER: I feel it my duty to remind hon. members that the House has not got into committee.

Mr. J. F. REID: I hope you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker. I am a new member of the House, and I shall be glad to be corrected at any time if I fall into error.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was I whom Mr. Speaker was correcting, and I deserved it too.

Mr. J. F. REID: I want to make a reference to the statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Butts), who said we did not want Chinese or coolie labour. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that this is an opportune time to make that statement, because I understand that at the present time we have over in France some 80,000 or more Chinese labourers, and it seems to me that it does not matter very much whether they are building railroads to aid us in bringing this great war to a successful conclusion, or mining coal for us in this country. And I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that if this war continues, Canada will be very glad to have coolie labour to do our work while our boys go to France to fight our battles. I do not think that I have anything more to say, and I am very glad indeed to hear the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to the briquetting plant.

Motion agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not sure whether there was any hard and fast arrangement that we should take up any thing more to-night. We have spent a goodly portion of the day on this burning question, and perhaps my hon. friends opposite are satisfied to adjourn now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The only arrangement was that which I made with the right hon. gentleman the leader of the House at the beginning of this evening's sitting, which was that, for the time being, I should drop motion No. 5, but that I should proceed with No. 7. If we do not go any further this evening, I am afraid that the Government will be taking Mondays. If my hon. friend will say that we will have Monday next week as Private Members' day, I shall not proceed to-night.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend should be satisfied when I say that we will try to squeeze him in.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Tuesday, April 16, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House has added the name of Mr. John Harold (Brant) to the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. T. A. Crerar (Minister of Agriculture), the House went into committee on the following proposed resolution; Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act, chapter twenty-seven of the Statutes of 1907, and to provide that an establishment as defined in the said Act shall include any abattoir, packing house or other premises in which any food or food product which may be named by the Governor in Council is prepared for food for export or is stored for export; and that all fish, fruit or vegetables, or products thereof, or any food or food products which may be named by the Governor in Council, used in any establishment where these articles are prepared for export, shall be sound, wholesome and fit for food; and any such articles or products found in the said establishment unsound or unwholesome shall be confiscated and destroyed in such manner as may be provided by the regulations; and also that no person shall offer or accept for export or import, or shall export or import any articles subject to inspection unless the requirements regarding inspection and marking have been complied with in respect to such articles, and every person offering any carcass, or portion or product thereof, or fruit or vegetable, or products thereof, or food or food products named by the Governor in Council, for export or import, or exporting or importing such carcass, portion or product, or any fruit or vegetable, or products thereof, or food or food products named by the Governor in Council, shall furnish such proof as is required by the regulations as to whether the articles so offered for export or import, or exported or imported, are subject to inspection or not; and, further, that no carcass or portion of product thereof intended for food shall be imported into Canada unless proof satisfactory to the Minister accompany it that the same has passed Government inspection in the country of origin, and any such carcass or portion or product thereof imported into Canada shall be subject to such further inspection, and shall confirm to such requirements as the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe; and that no fruit or vegetables or products thereof, or food or food products which may be named by the Governor in Council, shall be imported into Canada or exported from Canada, unless the same conform to such requirements as the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe; and that any carcass or portion or product thereof, or fruit or vegetable or products thereof, or food or food product, that does not conform to the requirements of such regulations shall, upon condemnation by any inspector, be forfeit to His Majesty, and may be disposed of as the Minister may direct; and, further, that no article subject to inspection shall be offered or sold for export or import, or exported or imported, under any name intended or calculated to deceive as to its true nature; and that no package containing any article subject to inspection shall be marked with any label, brand or mark which falsely represents the quantity or weight or contents of such package; and that no package containing any article subject to inspection shall be marked with any label, brand or mark which falsely represents the date when the articles or goods contained therein were packed.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: The main object of this resolution is to apply the same regulations to imported foodstuffs, in the way of meats and canned goods, as now obtain in regard to the manufacture of similar articles in Canada. It is also intended to broaden the application of the regulations to include, for instance, such articles as condensed milk, which I am told was not manufactured in Canada at the time the Act was originally passed. It also provides the conditions under which these foods can be admitted into Canada, in the sense that the regulations governing their manufacture in the country of origin may be accepted under proper certification. We are in rather an anomalous position. At the time the Meat and Canned Foods Act was passed, I understand the purpose was to establish a standard or reputation for our manufactured goods of this kind exported to markets outside Canada. We have not, however, applied the regulations to similar importations, with the result that American manufacturers, for instance, are permitted to export and sell in Canada goods which they are not permitted under their own laws to sell in the United States. An instance of that kind occurred in British Columbia a year ago when a considerable consignment of beef affected with tuberculosis and slaughtered in the States was shipped to British Columbia and sold there, when it would have been quite impossible for it to have been sold in the United States. That is mainly the idea of the legislation that is intended to be founded on this resolution.

Mr. BUREAU: I think this is the longest resolution I have ever read, and if the object the minister wishes to attain is simply what he says, he could have attained it by a much shorter resolution. I understand the Minister of Agriculture does not want slaughterhouses doing business in the United States to import into this country meat which is not subject to the same regulation as the meat which is slaughtered in Canada. Is that one of the objects of the resolution?

Mr. CRERAR: Not quite. We want to put ourselves in the position that we can refuse admission to Canada of products not properly certified to by the inspection system of the country in which they originate.

Mr. BUREAU: From which they issue?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, where they are manufactured.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought the object was to make all such importations into Canada, subject to the same inspection as that to which the product of the Canadian manufacturer is subject to, and I think such a resolution would be more equitable. If the meat is to conform to the degree of inspection which is required by the country from which it comes, how are we going to control it? I understand the minister to say that if meat is imported from the United States, he desires the United States standard to be applied to the meat so imported.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Why so? Does the minister not think it would be fair to apply to any commodity imported into Canada the same standard as is applied to the Canadian producer? If you are going to have a system of inspection for Canadian produce, why not subject the importation of similar produce to the same standard? If we are going to consume imported products in Canada let us have one standard that will protect the consumer, and let it be the Canadian standard, instead of the standard of the exporting country.

Mr. CRERAR: We can absolutely control our manufacture in Canada by our own system of inspection. We obviously cannot send our inspectors to the places where these goods are manufactured in the United States. We can examine their regulations as to the purity of the article manufactured in the United States, and if we are satisfied that those regulations sufficiently guard the purity of the goods, then we can admit the article under the certification that it is manufactured under such regulations.

Mr. BUREAU: The resolution seems to go a little further than that. It says:

> And also that no person shall offer or accept for export or import.

If a Canadian dealer is going to accept for import those goods coming from the United States, why not subject him to the same inspection as the man who is producing in Canada? My hon. friend says we are going to examine their regulations, and if we find their regulations protect us sufficiently, why should we require an inspection on this side? My answer is that the regulations may be all right. You are making regulations in this country. Why do you appoint an inspector? Your regulations may be the best in the world, but what would those regulations be worth unless they were complied with? And how will you know they are complied with, unless you have your inspector who will inspect the produce and see that the produce which is offered on the market complies with the requirements enacted by my hon. friend's department for the protection of the consumer? That is what I think was intended by the resolution. Otherwise why should the words, " or offer for import " be necessary? It would only be necessary to say, " shall not be imported," if the theory of the hon. gentleman is to hold good. My objection is to the acceptance of any regulation made by the United States, and the fact that, if you find the regulations satisfactory you are going to conclude they have been complied with. It is not the regulation, so much as the compliance with it, that protects the consumer.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps I am not making myself perfectly clear. As I understand it, it will work out in this way: the inspectors in the United States factories would inspect and supervise the manufacture of these articles.

Mr. BUREAU: American inspectors?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, they would attach the certificate of the American regulations to the manufactured article, and the article could be imported upon such certification. At the present time the American manufacturers can ship into Canada goods that have no certification or inspection whatever.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that perfectly.

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend suggest we should send our inspector to the United States to supervise the manufacture of these goods there?

Mr. BUREAU: No. I say that before such goods are placed on the market, they should be subject to inspection of the Canadian inspector. If I go to the United States and buy twelve cars of beef—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Or oleomargarine.

Mr. BUREAU: —or oleomargarine—why should I take the certificate of the American inspector? I presume it is all right, but my hon. friend has just stated they were shipping diseased cattle into British Columbia, and one of the reasons why this Act is proposed is to protect the Canadian consumer from the tuberculosis-affected cattle of the adjoining United States territory. If the ordinary Canadian trader thinks Canadians can be fed on tubercular cattle, there might be some United States inspector who would hold the same opinion. I think it would give more confidence if we had the same inspection, and standard and certificate for meat which is imported from the United States as we have for meat produced in Canada.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL: I might be permitted to say one word on this subject. I think I am within the mark in saying that the proposition of my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) would not be practicable, for the reason that there is an immense trade going on between the United States and Canada, and between various packing establishments in both countries. They would be very seriously interfered with if there were a multiplication of inspection duties, and for a great many years practically the same system has been adopted in the officially-inspected establishments in the United States and the officially-inspected establishments in Canada. Those regulations being framed according to the very best practice, so long as the article coming from the inspection establishments of either Canada or the United States bear the stamp of the inspector, showing that they have been inspected, there is free ingress and egress to and from both countries. But what the Minister of Agriculture is aiming at is to control those imports from the United States and have them subject to the same drastic regulations employed by their official inspection in their establishments, and such examples as he gave, for instance, as meat coming into British Columbia affected with tuberculosis, is quite a vivid illustration that that particular class of product was not subject to the official inspection of the bureau of the United States. We therefore should have some control of all those unregulated products and exports to our country. But I think it would be a mistake to demand such a sweeping measure as not to permit or recognize the official inspection of the United States, because, if you did that, they would immediately refuse to accept the official stamp of the inspectors of Canada, and you would find a very serious interference with the immense trade of the countries in these products.

Mr. ROBB: In this matter, I support the views of the Minister of Agriculture and of the Secretary of State. I infer from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture and the Secretary of State that this will be a reciprocal arrangement with the United States and that they will accept Canadian inspection?

Mr. CRERAR: They do now.

Mr. ROBB: I understand that under the old law we controlled domestic and export trade, but not import trade. The only difference I can see now is that by this legislation we are controlling the import trade.

Mr. CURRIE: Before this resolution carries I think we ought to ask the Minister of Agriculture to let us know one or two things. As I understand the Inspection Act in Canada, the public is the goat. We have been inspecting all the stuff we send out of Canada, while a lot of stuff that is consumed in Canada is not inspected at all. For instance, the people of Canada can be supplied with beef from animals suffering from lumpy jaw and all that sort of thing. Is there any meat sold by retail in Canada that is subject to inspection?

Mr. BURRELL: For interprovincial trade.

Mr. CURRIE: If it is sold for interprovincial trade, it is inspected, but if it is sold locally, it is not inspected. The same applies to a great many other things that the minister is now taking into consideration. The people of Canada have to take their chance as to the food which is supplied them, but if it goes out of the province, or to a foreign country, it is inspected, and protection is thus afforded to the people of another province or to the foreigner. I think the time has come when the people will demand that there shall be an inspection of all meat that is consumed in Canada, except in the case where a man kills an animal himself and sells the meat by retail. Even in that case some action should be taken. We do not go far enough. We protect the English and the American consumer by a rigid system of inspection, while we allow our own people to be fed with cancerous beef and mutton from abroad and from home.

In reference to the cold storage warehouses. Some years ago we had that matter under discussion, and it is a very warm topic at the present time among the people of this country. This idea of permitting cold storage warehouses to keep eggs and chickens and meat in cold storage for eight or ten years and then unload them on the public when the price is high, is something that should receive our immediate attention. The minister should take unto himself the power, as they have in Australia and other countries, to fix a date beyond which it shall not be permitted to keep meats in cold storage. If I get a deer in Muskoka and I put it in cold -storage, I have to take it out of cold storage at the first of the year or I am liable to a fine. Why shouldn't other meats be treated likewise? The way in which the public has been imposed upon by the cold storage warehouses is an outrage. I do not wish to mention any particular name, and it is unnecessary for me to do so in so far as this is concerned, but I do say that the time is ripe for the minister to take action so that regulations may be provided by this Government and this House, which is the moving spirit of the Government, providing that anybody who puts food into cold storage shall be required to take it out before it becomes embalmed.

There are other matters connected with this same problem which, had I known this subject was coming up this afternoon, I would have discussed. For instance, there is the resignation of Mr. O'Connor. Everybody in Canada knows that Mr. O'Connor was right on the job in reference to these cold storage warehouses that are referred to in this resolution. Mr. O'Connor tried to do his duty with the result that the public supported him in his administration of the law. He endeavoured to curb these cold storage warehouses, control the profiteers and compel the marketing of products held for storage in them. But, what do we find? We find that Mr. O'Connor, who has been giving such good public service, has been dismissed, or at least takes his own dismissal—I do not know why or very much about the subject. The public have made up their mind that the interests that control these large warehouses have got this Government and this Parliament by the throat. I think it is time for the members of this House to speak out in no uncertain tone.

Mr. TOLMIE: In regard to the import and export of meat, there has long been an understanding between the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States and our Health of Animals Branch to exchange certificates. The only proper place to make an inspection of meat is on the killing floor, where the offal can be thoroughly inspected at the time the animal is slaughtered. It would be quite impossible for a man to make a thorough inspection of a dressed carcass. I think it would be asking too much of a Canadian inspector to ask him to inspect the contents of an American sausage. Some of these articles are rather mysteriously made at times. In regard to the inspection of meat, all the meat intended for export or for interprovincial trade, is killed in slaughter houses under inspection, a brand is placed on the meat passing inspection and you can always be assured of securing good meat if you get meat bearing the Government brand. All the other meat killed in local slaughter houses, if inspected at all, should be inspected by provincial governments or municipalities.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if this resolution covers a case which was presented to me the other night from Toronto. A gentleman there, a dealer who bought eggs largely and retailed them in the city, said that he had reason to believe that eggs were imported from the United States into Canada subject to export. He understood that some privilege had been conceded by the Department of Agriculture permitting of the candling of these eggs in Canada. The result is that Yankee eggs are unloaded on the Canadian market and good Canadian eggs are exported. I would like to know if the Canadian public are now getting candled Yankee eggs and if they are taking the place of good Canadian eggs which are sent out for export. Is that possible under the regulations?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think the legislation intended to be passed under this resolution covers the point that the hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) brings up. It is intended to cover the inspection of meats and canned goods under the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Sir SAM. HUGHES: It says "foods."

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) who has had a great deal of experience in the administration of this Act, has very exactly, I think, stated the situation. It would be obviously impossible to send our inspectors over to closely examine all the material that entered into canned goods manufactured in the United States. But we can, under the arrangement we have with their Bureau in the United States, admit these goods to Canada under their certificate and be, I think, assured that we are getting only wholesome and proper food. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the other suggestions that are brought up by some hon. members might be discussed in committee on the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We are in committee now.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like to make my point clear. The eggs that are imported from the United States are brought into our cold storage warehouses. A gentleman from Toronto told me the other night that the citizens of Canada were being fed on eggs imported from the southern States subject, under the law, to export. They are brought in under some suspended clause of the Inspection Act permitting these eggs to be examined and candled and if any are found bad they can be replaced by Canadian eggs.

He had reason to believe, he said, that these eggs were being unloaded on the Canadian market and the Canadian eggs sent on for export; in other words, giving the importer the opportunity of bringing in Yankee eggs and sending our Canadian eggs to take their place on the English market. I have heard that the same thing under similar rules has been done with oleomargarine: it has been brought in and mixed with the Canadian product and disposed of in this manner. I take this apportunity of bringing the facts to the notice of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the Minister of Agriculture under consideration the requiring of Mr. O'Connor's services in regard to the condemnation of any food supplies in packing houses?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think that the hon. gentleman is quite in order in asking who will administer the Act.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: This is a matter in regard to which I think the Minister of Agriculture should go a little further. He undertakes to protect the consumers of Canada in regard to goods that are imported into this country. That is very well so far as it goes, but I think he should also protect Canadian consumers against the existing method of supplying food products to the people in the large cities of Canada. For example, we have some very large abattoirs in the city of Toronto, as well as branches of Chicago houses, and we have established there a municipal abattoir. Previous to its inception there were many small abattoirs scattered through the city causing a serious nuisance in the residential districts. However, by the establishment of a municipal abattoir, the killing of various kinds of live stock was centralized and made subject to inspection. That policy has helped a great deal, but it is only applicable to Toronto. You may go outside that city and in a good sized town find a small establishment carried on as an abattoir, but not subject to inspection. The same statement applies to the canning of goods. Let me give an illustration of what occurred a few years ago in Toronto, and I think is still occurring today in Chicago. You go to a merchant to purchase canned goods. You may be desirous of having for dinner canned chicken or possibly canned turkey, and you buy what purports to be chicken or turkey, and pay the price demanded for such articles. But what do you get? You get a substitute for turkey or chicken in the shape of immature veal, or calf perhaps only a couple of days old. This kind of canned goods is not subject to inspection, and yet I understand the object of the minister in bringing the present measure forward is to protect Canadian consumers against this shipment into Canada. Why should the Americans, who themselves inspect and reject and prohibit the consumption in that country of immature veal and inferior pork and beans be allowed to send such goods into this country? Inferior canned veal and pork and beans, and goods of that nature will not pass inspection in the United States but they are held to be quite good enough for Canada.

The Government cannot be too severe in checking such methods of sending inferior goods into Canada.

At the same time our people should be protected against some of the methods adopted in this country. In my opinion the Minister of Agriculture should go a step further, and provide that all meats consumed in Canada shall be subject to inspection. The appointment in each village or small community of an inspector may be objected to as expensive; but under a proper regulation that could be done and the expense would not be material. It is simple enough to provide that in a certain township the killing of hogs, sheep, cattle, calves, and other live-stock shall be subject to inspection. The people of the township, knowing that inspection was obligatory, some central point could be fixed where the killing might be done and one inspector could devote three days to inspection work in that township. By a proper apportionment of the time it would be possible for the same inspector to cover several townships, and in that way the expense would not be very great. By such a method you could prevent improper and unhealthy meat from reaching the consumer.

In the case of live stock coming to the Toronto stockyards, an unscrupulous drover who was aware of the strict inspection in force would realize at once that he could not market his animals on the stockyards, and therefore he would immediately ship them to some outside section, where they could be slaughtered and the flesh prepared and afterwards consigned to the Toronto market, and thus escape inspection. Again, in the case of the individual farmer, he might kill seven or eight hogs, a couple of head of cattle, and half a dozen sheep and dispose of the meat on the Toronto market without undergoing inspection, a thing which could not be done in the case of animals slaughtered at the stockyards. The fact that there has been no inspection reduces the market value of the meat, but a speculator might obtain full value for goods that merited condemnation. Therefore, I say the Minister of Agriculture should go far enough to protect the Toronto consumers that are consuming Canadian goods which have not passed inspection, and that can be done at very little expense.

So far as goods that are being imported into Canada are concerned, the minister cannot be too strict in enforcing inspection. If that were done the consuming public would be satisfied. Not only should there be such a system of inspection, but I think that all canned goods, whether meats, fruits, or products of other kinds, should have the date stamped upon the can. The longer such goods are kept the less value they possess, and the consumer purchasing canned goods bearing the stamp of the manufacturers would be able to see from the date whether the goods were one year old or entering upon the second year. Such goods depreciate every three or four months, until after a short time they become of no value, but if the date of manufacture is legibly placed on the can the consumer can see just what he is getting.

I repeat, that in my opinion the minister is going in the right direction, only he is not going quite far enough. When the Bill goes to committee I have no doubt we shall have some further suggestions from him, and, perhaps, amendments will be forthcoming which will meet the approval of the House and the community at large.

Mr. MARSHALL: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Thomas Foster) is entirely wrong in his statements with respect to the inspection of canned goods. I want to tell him that we have inspectors for canned vegetables, fruit, and also poultry, and have had them for years. I am connected with a company that has been in business, more or less, for thirty years. We did not have our products inspected during the greater portion of that period, but for the last six or seven years there have been inspectors. These inspectors remain all the time in the factory until the Government stamp is put on the cans, and under this system the public is adequately protected.

The hon. gentleman has spoken of the necessity of stamping canned goods. I want to tell him that if canned goods are properly packed and kept in a proper place the quality will be as good years afterwards as it is at the time the goods are put up. With respect to fruits and vegetables we do not want to put the dates on the cans. because any one going into a store, if they see goods two years old, would not want to buy them, even though they are just as good as the day they were packed. We have in our factories, for instance, corn which we have kept for twenty years on purpose to see how long it can be preserved. The only difference you can see in corn kept that long is in the colour. But, as I said, Mr. Chairman, if you want to destroy the canned goods business, simply put the dates on the labels, because the consumer in buying canned goods will naturally look for the goods packed that year. Canned goods are as good five or six years after packing as the day they were packed. I know this, because I have been canning for a long time, and we have made the test for our own satisfaction. I would be very sorry to have the minister put the date on the labels of canned goods for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see that the Minister of Agriculture is taking steps to have a more thorough inspection of meats, food and food products. An hon. gentleman stated a few moments ago that some of these goods were mysteriously prepared, and I sincerely believe that he is right. I shall endeavour, if I may be permitted, to give a brief explanation of this matter. But before doing so, I would like to ask the minister if it is the intention to have qualified veterinary surgeons act as inspectors of live stock, or if anyone else may be appointed to such positions? I may say that while I was in the legislature of the state of Montana, in 1901, I was the father of a similar Bill providing for the appointment of inspectors of meats and food, and the Bill provided that up to the time that the cattle went on the killing floor the inspection was to be made by a veterinary surgeon, and no one else. For the inspection of meats in the refrigerators, or in the markets, it provided that a man well versed in meats was to be appointed, one knowing all the stages from the time the animal is killed until the meat is sold to the consumer.

Now, coming to the preparation of ham, one of the reasons why that should be well inspected is simply because the packers are taking advantage of all the opportunities which are given them, and even if the opportunity is not given to them they take it. Take, for instance, to begin with, the brine, which is composed, of course, of water, salt, brown sugar and preservaline; and we all know that preservaline contains acid. Preservaline is put in in order to preserve the meat a longer time. When it comes to the smoking process, instead of smoking it twenty, thirty or forty days, the length of time required to smoke a good ham, it is simply put in a receptacle of some kind with colorine in it. This colorine contains acid also. These things are not very good for the stomach, still the consumer has to take the product. Now, the reason why these things are done is because the ham requires but very little smoking if it is coloured, and it has a very transparent colour, a very nice colour indeed. If it was smoked thoroughly, the ham would drip, that is, the brine in it would drip off, and it would lose weight. Hence the necessity for the packer not to smoke it in order to retain the weight. The same process is used in regard to breakfast bacon. I may say a word or two about sausages.

Mr. SIFTON: Oh, don't.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is the article which is the most mysteriously prepared, I believe.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PELLETIER: As a rule, to begin with, they take from fifteen to twenty per cent of pork fat, and then from twenty-five to thirty per cent of beef scraps, or bits of whatever they can find, trimmings as we probably term it; and then about twenty per cent of Victoria or potato flour; and the balance is water. You have about thirty per cent of water in your sausages, and twenty per cent of potato or Victoria flour. When a consumer gets sausage, he pays for the potato flour, the water, the scraps of beef, etc. But when he comes to put the sausage in the frying pan it almost walks out; it won't stay there until the water is all out of it. For these reasons, and there are a great many others that have been given by other hon. gentlemen, I believe that we ought to have a very thorough inspection of meats at all times, and I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will do his best and finish the good work that he has started along this line.

Mr. McCOIG: I do not see very much objection to the adoption of the resolution. I am heartily in accord with the minister in his endeavour to do everything possible to ensure that the people have better service from our cold storage systems and also from the abattoirs of the country. I merely wish to add that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pelletier), in naming over the different methods of curing bacon, hams and sausages, forgot to mention the one well known during the past election, as post-curing. That is one method which it might be well to have drawn to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, so that when this resolution is passed, and when legislation is introduced along this line, any person, whether in high standing in this country, or an officer of the Government, whether connected with abattoirs, cold storage, or other great institutions, will be prohibited from using a method of that kind. When legislation is passed providing for the appointment of inspectors, only men who are capable and fearless probably will be considered by the minister. He should not overlook the fact that Mr. O'Connor who occupied the position of cost of living commissioner in this country has the respect of the people of Canada, and not only their respect, but their confidence. Mr. O'Connor fearlessly carried on the duties of his office. Yet we now find that he is allowed to be relieved of office, while the man who is chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, and an officer of the Canadian Government, still holds office. I do not believe that there is a man on either side of this House, Independent, Liberal or Unionist, who could have stood upon the public platforms throughout Canada in the last election and said that he would support the dismissal of Mr. O'Connor.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I ruled a few moments ago that the dismissal of Mr. O'Connor should not be introduced into this debate. My hon. friend is going altogether too far.

Mr. McCOIG: I am quite willing to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I did not tion. The remarks of the member for North Simcoe was referring to the matter. If the officers selected under the Bill to be based upon this resolution properly carry out its provisions great benefit will result and the measure will operate more efficiently in the best interests of the country.

Mr. MURPHY: Lest the discussion should veer round to a discussion of hereditary titles, I had better intervene with a question. The remarks of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) must have convinced the Minister of Agriculture that, so far as food is concerned, what is uppermost in the minds of the people is home protection against home production. For that reason —and I have regard to the language of the beginning of the resolution—I desire to ask the minister whether it is intended by the Bill to be founded on this resolution to widen existing authority or to confer new authority to deal with such cases as the one which arose in Winnipeg—I need not discuss the details at the moment. I refer to the destruction of a large quantity of food in one of the packing houses there, which had become unfit for human consumption.

Mr. CRERAR: The resolution was not intended, I think, to cover such a case as the hon. gentleman refers to. I quite agree that it is an appropriate matter for discussion, but I think it is outside the scope and intention of this resolution. Any regulations to prevent such an occurrence would come under another authority rather than under the measure now proposed.

Mr. PORTER: I have not sufficient information to enable me to discuss the practice or procedure in regard to meat and meat products, but I have information regarding the treatment of vegetables and fruits which, I think, may be of some advantage to the minister in dealing with this question of provision for inspection. It had previously been the practice to inspect prepared vegetables, prepared soups, and the like, at the time of shipment at the seaboard—Halifax, Montreal, St. John, as the case might be. As a result, manufacturers incurred very heavy expense and were liable to loss, because if the product was condemned it had to be shipped back and disposed of to the best advantage. That was brought to the attention of the minister, and I was responsible in some measure for the change that was made. Afterwards the department appointed inspectors resident at the different manufacturing points, who were supposed to see that the products turned out by these manufactories were at least fit for human consumption. My attention has been particularly called to some cases that occurred since the war broke out. The Government entered into large contracts for the supplying of vegetables to the armies overseas—and I speak particularly of vegetable soups, which have been shipped overseas in very large quantities. Under the system of inspection that now prevails, these products are inspected at the factory and go to the front without any further examination, and with no possible chance of loss to the producer. But I heard a returned soldier upon the public platform say quite recently, in the presence of the manufacturer, that although the soldiers went over to Europe to kill the Huns, when they ate that soup they felt more like killing the manufacturer than like killing the Huns. Evidence was forthcoming to show that in the manufacture of these goods, which had passed the inspection of the officer appointed by the department, celery had been used which had been lying in the warehouse from the days of the South African war. It was ground and prepared, but not shipped, and it had become the habitation of rats, mice, cobwebs, flies, and all sorts of other unnecessary ingredients. This was used in the manufacture of soup supplied to our soldier boys at the front. Testimony to this effect was made by men who were actually employed by the manufacturer; yet the inspector appointed by the department had failed to discover that, or had overlooked it.

4 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: What department of Government appointed this inspector?

Mr. PORTER: The Department of Agriculture, I think. I am not quite certain about that.

Mr. CRERAR: Were these Canadian products?

Mr. PORTER: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Where were they manufactured?

Mr. PORTER: In Belleville, Ontario, I am sorry to say. If the inspectors appointed by the department permit such a condition as those described to exist, it is high time that some steps were taken in the matter.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is my hon. friend himself not somewhat responsible for that condition? Did he not recommend this gentleman's wares in the early part of the war—of course before he knew he was wrong?

Mr. PORTER: Yes, before I found him out. I am complaining not of the man himself, but of what he is doing or permitting to be done in the manufacture of food for the soldiers at the front. I understand that the same inspector is not there now. No doubt this firm will be endeavouring to obtain contracts from the Government, or renewal of contracts, and the Government should take special pains to see that such an occurrence as this is not permitted again, and, if necessary, that the inspector who has so far neglected his duty be removed from any further opportunity of permitting what I would describe as a fraud upon the public. Perhaps the minister had better amend this resolution so as to enable him to appoint an inspector of the inspector—because I think that he needs inspection as much as any one.

Mr. BUREAU: The Minister of Agriculture did not answer the question that was put by my hon. friend from Matane (Mr. Pelletier) just now, as to the standing of the men appointed as inspectors. I also wish to put a question. This resolution is introduced because it involves the expenditure of public moneys. Now we have not heard a word as to the purpose for which this money is to be expended. Is it because a greater number of inspectors are to be appointed, or because the inspectors will be of a higher standard and will require bigger salaries?

[Mr. Porter.]

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think this legislation will involve any additional outlay of public money. I take it that the customs officials who pass these goods in the ordinary way will simply have the added responsibility of seeing that the goods are properly certified to in the country of origin. My attention is drawn to the fact that an additional inspection may be demanded, but it is not contemplated that such will be necessary. The United States to-day have precisely a similar law. They permit importations from Great Britain, for instance on the certification of the proper British authorities. We are simply endeavouring here to apply the same conditions to importations into Canada.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is it intended to have the smaller factories inspected? I understand that a great number of the smaller factories putting up canned meats and that sort of thing have been put out of business because they were too small to get an inspection made. Several instances of this have occurred in my own constituency; perhaps the bigger concerns have something to do with it, but at all events these smaller factories have been put out of business.

Mr. CURRIE: Before the minister brings in his Bill I would suggest that he provide against meats being kept in cold storage warehouses beyond a certain period. I trust the minister will provide in the Bill for giving the people of this country control over these cold storage warehouses, which I understand are the main factor in the tremendous increase in food prices. If the cold storage warehouses were compelled to market the goods they have in storage at stated periods, after being put in, instead of being allowed to carry them for two or three years, the people would get food a great deal cheaper. It is an injustice to the public to permit such a monopoly as this to spring up. If the minister would look at the Acts that have been pased in the province of Victoria, Australia, I think he would find something to help him in framing an Act that would be of some benefit to the public. Canned goods, if properly canned, will last for ten years, but if not properly canned, they will not last ten days; that is the whole sum and substance of the trouble. But this is to be borne in mind. A great quantity of the canned goods coming into this country are imported from other countries than the United States. A vast quantity of beef, for instance, have been imported from the Argentine Republic, and no doubt it is still finding its way into this country. Eggs from China are also coming in, some of them twenty years old, no doubt. The minister should take these things into consideration and should be empowered to provide regulations from time to time to cover cases as they arise, such as the bad chicken that had to be cremated in Winnipeg. The minister in Australia has power to frame regulations and stop these abuses. I know the Minister of Agriculture is desirous of doing everything he can to protect the public and we must all give him credit for his sincerity in that regard. I am sure he will be fearless in doing his duty.

Mr. CLEMENTS: Is it intended that every manufacturer of canned goods shall have his monogram or the firm's name on every can of his product? I have heard a good deal said about cold storage warehouses this afternoon, and, am bound to say that if some of the gentlemen who have referred to cold-storage abuses had gone into the subject a little more fully, they would have realized the benefits of cold storage better than they do. The reason I ask the question is this—on the Pacific coast, and on the Atlantic coast too, there is a very great difference in the grades of fish caught at different places along the coast. A certain fish, whether it be a chum salmon, a dog salmon or a cohoe salmon, is of very much better quality in one section of the province of British Columbia than in another, and it would be very unfair for a manufacturer putting up chum or dog salmon along one section of the Pacific coast of British Columbia to have his pack compared with, say, a northern or a southern pack. I have always contended that the manufacturer should place his name or his firm's name on every can, whether it be in the province of British Columbia or in any other province, and I sincerely hope that the minister will see that every manufacturer of canned goods in Canada stands behind his own brand and has his name printed on every can in his product.

Mr. EULER: I should like to refer for a moment to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Thomas Foster), that this Bill does not go far enough. As I understand it, this Bill deals only with the inspection of foods intended for import or export, and it has perhaps escaped the attention of the Government that a great proportion of the meats consumed by the people of this country are not imported. In not only the smaller cities but the larger cities as well a good proportion of the meat is slaughtered by the farmers in the country and is brought into the city markets and there disposed of to the consumer

Of that food, I think, there is absolutely no inspection and no guarantee that it is fit for human consumption. I am quite ready to admit that in most cases there can be no fault found with the kind of beef and pork that is brought into the markets of the cities. In the city of Kitchener, from which I come, the suggestion has been made at times that all foods brought into the city for sale should have some kind of inspection. We considered that matter for years, and were not able to find a solution, largely because the matter of inspection led to too great an expense, and placed a heavy burden either upon the farmer who produced the food, or else upon the consumer, and under present conditions, where foods are very expensive, and especially meats, perhaps it is not the time to deal with the matter. I would like to make the suggestion that if the Government could direct its attention to that phase of the matter, so that all meat which ordinarily would require inspecion should be inspected with possibly the assistance of the Department of Agriculture, I think a great service would be rendered to the consumers of the cities and towns. Perhaps this is not the place to make that suggestion, but I do so because the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Thomas Foster) mentioned it, and because I believe it is very well worth considering.

Mr. CRERAR: I might say, with respect to the observation of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and of some other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject that the scope of the Meat and Canned Foods Act is to cover the inspection of articles for interprovincial trade or for export. No matter how desirable it may be to extend the scope and operation of the Act to cover all goods offered for sale, there are obvious difficulties in the way. For instance, a man manufactures sausage, bacon or ham, and brings it into his local market to sell. Very practical difficulties are presented in the creation of a Dominion system of inspection that will adequately inspect, and I believe such inspection for consumption within the province where it originates is under provincial regulation, and quite within provincial and municipal power, and the purpose has been to secure a safeguard in that respect through municipal and provincial regulation, leaving to the Dominion the matter of controlling inspection where the article is for provincial trade or for export.

Mr. BUREAU: I should like to get an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier). I listened with astonishment to the statement made by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter). Goods were manufactured in Canada for export and were shipped across the ocean, to be consumed by Canadian soldiers. It is very painful to have to hear such statements as that made by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter). Can we not get from the Minister of Agriculture a statement of what he intends to put in his Bill? I think it would be proper he should define the qualifications of the inspectors, if he is going to have any. The Bill is generally prepared at the same time as the resolution. The discussion on this resolution is to enlighten the House, or to suggest to my hon. friend certain things which occur to the minds of hon. members of this House, according to the knowledge they are able to impart. Why not tell us what will be the qualifications or requirements necessary under this Act for the man to be appointed inspector in order that the people of Canada may expect good service, and have good men in this most important position? Because, after all, the health and welfare of the community depends a good deal upon these people, their honesty and technical knowledge. The hon. gentleman from Matane (Mr. Pelletier) asked, in the case of slaughter houses, if licensed veterinary surgeons would not be appointed. Why not put it in the Bill that, for certain classes of inspection, only men of certain qualifications shall be appointed? This would, at the same time relieve the minister from the burden of patronage. In spite of all the confidence I have in the Civil Service Act, which will be discussed in a few days, I am afraid there will be some loopholes yet, where some fellows will have enough brass, in spite of the law, to walk up to the Minister of Agriculture and say, "I want to be appointed inspector of this or that," and if the applicant does not come within the four corners of the statute, my hon friend will only say, "I cannot appoint you, there is the law." It will help him, and will give a great deal of satisfaction to the consumers of this country.

Mr. CRERAR: The regulations at present in effect governing the control and inspection of Canadian products provide for the very point my hon. friend raises. Every abattoir or packing-house established in Canada is required to have qualified veterinarians to supervise the work. They are assisted by lay inspectors who need not be qualified veterinarians, but whose qualifications must be such as to satisfy the Dominion Director General of Veterinary Service that they are fit for the position. It is not expected or contemplated under this that additional inspectors will be created. There will not be any need for it so far as I can see. The admission of products from other countries can be supervised by the customs officers who will see that the proper certificates are attached to the article before it is admitted. I appreciate just as fully as my hon. friend the importance of having these goods thoroughly and properly inspected. I assure him that, as far as the possibility of patronage entering into the administration of this Act is concerned, I have no hesitation in making the declaration that it is absolutely not going to enter into it, as far as my administration is concerned. We have suffered considerably in Canada from the injection of the patronage evil into Government service, and it is time in my judgment that it was eliminated from it.

Mr. ROBB: So far the Minister of Agriculture and all the other members of the Cabinet have dodged the issue raised by the hon. member for West Hastings. I think the condition of things exposed to the Canadian people to-day deserves a statement from the Government. If such conditions of inspection exist in one factory, as stated by the hon. member for Hastings, I would be ready to believe the same condition existed in other factories throughout the country. Had the question been raised on this side of the House, the Government might have thought it was a political attack, but it has been raised on the other side of the House, and I think we are entitled to a statement on this question.

Mr. CRERAR: I would say, in reply to the hon. member for Hastings, that, of course, I have no knowledge of the case cited by him. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that such condition of affairs should not be permitted to exist. I take it that this happened some time ago, and I shall certainly take the opportunity to investigate the matter and obtain all the information I can upon it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This subject is undoubtedly a very technical one, and I believe, after a discussion of an hour and a half, we do not yet understand fully the extent or purport of the resolution. The hon. gentleman from West Hastings has brought before the House a case in which the law was violated. Of course, it may have been the result of an accident, but as to what the facts are we are not very clear. But the fact to which I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture is that this cannot have the effect of improving the law as it is now but rather of emasculating it. If I understand this resolution aright, it will not make the law more rigid but it will reduce the rigidity of the law and make possible its evasion. The law we have to-day, the Act passed in 1907 provides that all food, whether animal or vegetable, shall pass inspection. There is no exception to it. Here is the letter of the law, section 3:

All animals intended for slaughter in any establishment shall be inspected as provided by the regulations.

No animal shall be allowed to enter the parts of an establishment where slaughtering is carried on, unless it has undergone such inspection and been found to be healthy and fit for food.

Section 13 of the Act reads:

All fish, fruit or vegetables used in any establishment where these articles are prepared for export, shall be sound, wholesome, and fit for food; and any such articles or products thereof found in the said establishment unsound or unwholesome shall be confiscated and destroyed as provided by the regulations.

Under these two sections all animals, fish, fruit and vegetable foods must go into an establishment. By the Act the word "establishment" is defined and what is the definition?

"Establishment" means any abattoir, packing house, or other premises in which such animals are slaughtered, or in which any parts thereof or products thereof, or fish, or fruit, or vegetables, are prepared for food or export or are stored for export.

Again we find the definition of the word "food":

"Food" includes every article used for food or drink by man, and every ingredient intended for mixing with the food or drink of man for any purpose.

This means that all kinds of food, without any exception, which are to be exported, shall have to pass through this examination. No exception is made. What, however, is the principle of my resolution of my hon. friend? Instead of having this rigid provision that all food must be inspected, that there may be no exception, the law is to be emasculated by substituting the will of the Governor in Council for the rigidity of the law and the will of Parliament. Here is the resolution and I call the attention of my hon. friend to it.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1907, and to provide that an establishment as defined in the said Act—which I have just read—

—shall include any abattoir, packing house or other premises in which any food or food product which may be named by the Governor in Council is prepared for food for export or is stored for export.

This means that instead of, as we have to-day, the rigid letter of the law that all food for man must be inspected and must pass through this establishment, the Governor in Council has it in his power to say, in his wisdom, that any kind of food shall, or shall not, be inspected. It may be poultry, it may be bacon, it may be anything else; the Governor in Council has the power to except from the provisions of the law any food that he thinks it proper to except. That is not making the law more rigid than it was before. It is giving to the Government a dangerous power because it seems to me that there should be no exception at all and that all food should be inspected. The Governor in Council should not have the power to except any food from that inspection. In that respect the resolution is certainly emasculating the Act as it is at present and I call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to it. For my part, I have no doubt of his good intentions; I give him every credit for them, I do not think he has been the draughtsman of this resolution, I think he should take into his very serious consideration the question as to whether he should ask Parliament to adopt such a provision as that.

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure the committee that it was not the intention to have the construction put upon this resolution which the right hon. the leader of the Opposition attaches to it. It is possible that the resolution may be faultily draughted, but I shall read the amendment which it is proposed to make to Section B of the Act, defining the meaning of "establishment." Paragraph B, as it stands at present: is:

(B) "establishment" means any abattoir, packing house, or other premises in which such animals are slaughtered, or in which any parts thereof or products thereof, or fish, or fruit, or vegetables, are prepared for food for export or are stored for export.

With the addition that is proposed to be made, it will read as follows:

(B) "establishment" means any abattoir, packing house, or other premises in which such animals are slaughtered, or in which any parts thereof or products thereof, or fish, or fruit or vegetables or any food or food products which may be named by the Governor in Council, are prepared for food for export or are stored for export.

If I understand the argument of my right hon. friend, it is that the addition of the words "or any food or food products which may be named by the Governor in Council" limits the preceding words?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not the intention. The idea we had in mind was to cover all additions to these present categories of food; that is to say, some food that might be manufactured or invented and which would not be covered by the preceding words. Take, for instance, condensed milk. Condensed milk would not be included under the definition as it previously stood. At any rate, that was the purpose of the addition to the definition of the term "establishment." I shall be very glad to take the suggestion of my right hon. friend, which, I admit, is a very important one, into consideration and discuss it with the officials of the department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would be very glad if my hon. friend would do that. But, let me call his attention to the fact that condensed milk is an article of food. Let me again refer my hon. friend to the definition of "food":

"Food" includes every article used for food or drink by man, and every ingredient intended for mixing with the food or drink of man for any purpose.

This includes condensed milk. The objection I have to this provision is that the Governor in Council takes it into his power to remove from the disposition of this Act any kind of food whatever. The law should be left as it is that all food should be subject to inspection.

Mr. MORPHY: What is the necessity for changing the law as it stands?

Mr. CRERAR: I take it that the hon. gentleman was not in when I gave my explanation at the commencement of the discussion this afternoon?

Mr. MORPHY: No.

Mr. CRERAR: It is necessary to widen the scope of the Act so that the regulations may apply to food imported into Canada as well as food manufactured in Canada. That is the object, broadly speaking. In reference to the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, I take it that it would be met if the words "which may be named by the Governor in Council" were eliminated?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall take it into consideration.

Resolution reported, read a first and second time and agreed to.

Mr. Crerar thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1907.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE RESIGNATION OF MR. W. F. O'CONNOR.

CORRESPONDENCE LAID ON TABLE BY MINISTER OF LABOUR.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): With the consent of the House I desire to place upon the Table a return to an Order of the House re the O'Connor correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there be unanimous consent by the House there is no objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does the return comprise the whole of the correspondence, including the reply of Mr. O'Connor?

Mr. CROTHERS: The correspondence is up to date.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I cannot ask more than correspondence that is up to date.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know whether my right hon. friend has any information in advance of what I have, but the correspondence is all there up to date so far as I know.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As to that I am in the hands of the minister.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAUGHTERED ANIMALS.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar (Minister of Agriculture) the House went into committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, chapter seventy-five of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1913, and to provide that the Governor in Council may order a compensation to be paid to the owners of animals slaughtered under the provisions of the Act, the value of the animal to be determined by the Minister or by some person appointed by him, but the value, except as otherwise provided by the Act, not to exceed in the case of grade animals two hundred dollars for each horse, eighty dollars for each head of cattle and twenty dollars for each pig or sheep, and in the case of pure bred animals five hundred dollars for each horse, two hundred and fifty dollars for each head of cattle and seventy-five dollars for each pig or sheep. These amendments to remain in operation for three years.

Mr. CRERAR: I think a word of explanation will suffice for this resolution. At the time this Act was originally passed the values upon which compensation was based for the slaughter of condemned animals were fixed by statute, in the case of cattle $60 per head and for pigs and sheep $15 per head, and the compensation allowed when animals were condemned and slaughtered was two-thirds of the value set by statute. Owing to the increased value of these animals at the present time, the compensation allowed when they are ordered to be destroyed does not adequately compensate their owners. The intention of the Act when originally drafted, as I understand it, was to encourage the reporting to the proper authorities of animals which might be affected by some contagious disease, so that they could be properly examined, and, if found a menace, destroyed. I think it is only proper that now, when the value of these animals has increased, and in some cases doubled, beyond what it was at the time the Act was originally passed, that the limit upon which compensation can be fixed should be raised, and that is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. MURPHY: Under the old Act, was there any distinction made between grade and pure bred cattle?

Mr. CRERAR: There was.

Mr. MURPHY: But not as great a distinction as exists here?

Mr. CRERAR: The value of the animal was based upon the market values prevailing at the time the Act was passed. I am not at the moment able to say whether that applies to pure bred cattle or not. I am of opinion that it does not, but that is a point that can be taken up by the committee.

Mr. MORPHY: Can the minister state the amount of money that has been paid, say, for the last fiscal year, for purposes of this kind?

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry that I cannot give that information at the moment, but the officials of the department estimate that the change in the regulations suggested here will probably involve an additional outlay of $10,000 a year.

Mr. MOLLOY: Will the valuation under the proposed legislation be $200 and the compensation two-thirds of that amount, as against the valuation $150 and a compensation of two-thirds under the old Act?

Mr. CRERAR: That applies to horses.

Mr. MOLLOY: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: The proposed change does not affect horses; it only applies to cattle, swine and sheep. I omitted to point out a moment ago that the value upon which compensation would be based in the case of horses was changed a year or two ago; I am not certain of the date.

Mr. WM. SMITH: I would like to congratulate the minister upon having taken a step in the right direction. The owner of live animals found to be suffering from contagious disease may not be at fault and therefore he should be recouped in some way or other. I do not find fault with the minister's figures so far as thoroughbred animals are concerned, but I do not think he has gone far enough in connection with the grades. The compensation fixed for grade horses is all right. But it does not take much of an animal, in the case of cattle, to be worth $80. The minister should have gone at least $120. In the case of swine, we all know that, at 20 cents a pound it does not take much of a hog to represent $20. I would suggest that that amount be raised to $30, leaving the compensation for sheep as it is. I would suggest to the minister that, when he introduces his Bill, it should be on the lines indicated here to-day.

Mr. McCOIG: I agree with the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) that there might be a slight advance made in regard to grade cattle. I feel satisfied that the minister is taking a step in the right direction, but I question if he is going quite far enough. The great difficulty we have had in Ontario in regard to swine and cattle which is condemned at different abattoirs, is that a percentage is deducted from the buyers, and the buyers deduct it from the producers. That has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction. The Government have inspectors in the abattoirs where the stock is slaughtered, and when a diseased animal is condemned, the cost comes back either on the buyer or on the seller to the extent of one-half of one per cent, which is deducted by the buyer from all the purchases that he makes throughout the country. Some buyers deduct from the seller; some stand the loss themselves. But the abattoirs exact that percentage from all the buyers irrespective of whether it comes out of the farmer or not. I believe the time is opportune for the minister to extend his legislation a little farther, and since the condemning is done by his own officers, instead of a deduction being made from an innocent party it would be well if the Government were to make an allowance to overcome that, and so do away with the inconvenience, annoyance and dissatisfaction which occurs from time to time. I believe that last year, or the year before last, the packing houses, when extracting one-half of one per cent for this purpose alone, made a net profit of $165,000 above the value of what was really condemned, judging from figures which I have secured from the Department of Agriculture. This is a matter which I would be very glad to have the minister give his serious thought and attention to, and if he can effect a reform, it would be heartily appreciated and accepted with good-will by all the producers throughout Canada.

Mr. ROBB: In introducing this resolution, the minister stated that he did so on account of the increase in value of animals in recent years. That statement is right enough, but it seems to me that the result of his arithmetic has been defective, because, as stated by the hon. member for South Ontario, the compensation allowed for a horse is altogether out of proportion to that given for a good dairy animal, that is, in proportion to their earning value today. The value of a horse has not increased since the previous regulations were put in force; it has rather decreased. But the value of dairy cattle has increased enormously, and it seems to me that the minister might readjust that and give a fair compensation for dairy animals.

There is another feature of this matter which is deserving of consideration by the minister while he is dealing with this subject, and that is the prevention of tuberculosis. I am told by stockmen that there are many ways in which tuberculosis is spread throughout this country. One way in particular, which is a grievance of the stockmen, is in the importation of cattle from the Old Country. Take, for instance, cattle shipped from the Old Country to the United States via Canada. These cattle arrive at the quarantine station at Lévis, and they are there tested, and if there are reactors in a herd they are not allowed to enter the United States, and they are not shipped back to the Old Country, but they are earmarked and allowed to go about through the herds in Canada spreading disease among Canadian animals. I think the minister should give that matter his serious consideration, and stop that practice.

There is another matter which has been pointed out by stock men which might prevent somewhat the spread of tuberculosis in dairy animals, and that is that any man calling an auction sale—when a man buys at a private sale he is running certain chances, but that is his own business—should be compelled to give a certificate that the herd is free of disease. I submit these suggestions for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. BOYCE: Mr. Chairman, being fairly well versed in the value of dairy cattle, I am of opinion that the compensation of $80 placed on these animals is altogether too little. It is a well known fact that the price of dairy cattle this last year has risen from twenty-five to forty per cent. We cannot get any kind of dairy cattle at the present time for less than $140 or $150, and even up to $180. I think that the man who has the misfortune to have disease enter his herd should not be paid off with $80, when it has cost him double or treble that amount for his animal. I think the minister might go a little further, and put the amount at $100 or $120; which would, to a certain extent, meet the loss sustained. So far as the compensation for horses is concerned, I have no fault to find with that, but in the case of other animals, especially swine, the compensation is hardly enough. The compensation to be paid for dairy cattle is a very important consideration, especially in eastern Ontario, at the present time. I have no doubt but that, when the minister thinks the matter over, and takes into consideration the prices we have to pay, he will raise the amount of compensation for dairy cattle.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: I would like to bring a matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, when drafting the Bill which is to be presented to the House, in order to obviate an injustice which I think was done to a resident in my constituency. I was not a member of this House when this was brought to my notice, and I have not all the details in my memory now, but I remember that this farmer told me the circumstances, which entailed a heavy loss, in the neighbourhood of $2,000, compensation for which was refused by the Department of Agriculture. This man had a large herd of hogs, and a representative of the Government claimed that his hogs were infected with cholera. Against the protestations of the owner, the hogs were slaughtered. The inspector first slaughtered a couple, but did not find any indications of cholera, as the farmer informed me. I understand that when a hog has cholera the disease is shown in the lung. Although he did not find any traces of cholera, he insisted on slaughtering the entire hundred hogs. Afterwards, he stated that he would make a report to the Government, and that the man would be paid for his hogs. At the time this man was speaking to me, he had not heard what had become of that inspector, nor had he been paid for his hogs—and this was eight months ago. Apparently the inspector, seeing he had made a mistake, made himself scarce, and I do not know whether even the department knows where the man is. Would it not be well, in drafting this legislation, to provide that when a veterinary or inspector condemns a man's stock he should, before destroying it, give the owner a certificate so that the owner will have something to show that his stock has been condemned and slaughtered? There should be some way of providing against such an injustice as that to which I have referred.

Mr. BOYER (Vaudreuil) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I approve entirely the principle of this resolution, but that I cannot accept the opinion of the hon. Minister of Agriculture as regards one of its provisions. I find that the fee, under the terms of that legislation, in the case of dairy cattle slaughtered, is not sufficient, the resolution provides that in the case of grade animals, two hundred dollars will be allowed for every horse and eighty dollars for every head of cattle. I am satisfied that this amount is inadequate especially at the present time. The price for dairy cattle has considerably increased of recent date and such increase will be more in evidence in the near future; the reason is that the supply is much more restricted for that kind of stock than it is for horses, for instance. As a matter of fact, it is much more difficult to get good dairy cattle than any other kind of farm animals. Considering the enhanced prices for dairy, I am of opinion that a higher rate of compensation for dairy cattle should be fixed and I trust the Minister of Agriculture will duly consider this suggestion.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 56, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved second reading of Bill No. 32, respecting the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

He said: At the time of the adoption of the resolution upon which this Bill is founded, I said I would make some explanation of the Bill on its second reading. I shall do so as briefly as I possibly can. The Bill does not institute a new department; the amendments are designed to improve and broaden the Act and ensure its better working. Perhaps I might outline briefly the development of our statistical work in Canada from the time of Confederation —without, of course, going into history. Our statistics at first centred upon the taking of the decennial census. The first census was taken in 1870. Legislation was enacted for the taking of that census, but no permanent census or statistics office was established. Again in 1879 there was legislation for the taking of the decennial census, and three censuses were taken on that legislation. In 1905 there was a complete revision of the Census and Statistics Act. The office was made permanent; the staff was made permanent and the scope was broadened so as to include general statistics. The work went on with a gradual accretion and extension in the different departments, and in 1912 the branch was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce. No uniform and co-ordinated system of statistics had been established, and the method was not at all in keeping with the necessities of the case. A departmental commission was appointed in 1912, composed of Richard Grigg, Commissioner of Commerce at that time, Chairman; Professor Adam Shortt, Civil Service Commissioner; Ernest Henry Godfrey, Census and Statistics Branch; W. A. Warne, Statistical Branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce; Robert Hamilton Coats, Department of Labour, and John R. K. Bristol, Department of Customs. This commission instituted a thorough examination of the system, as it affected both Dominion and provincial work and summarized their conclusions. I do not think I could do better than read an extract from the report of that commission, which briefly states the general situation.

5 p.m.

Though many of the statistical reports issued by various departments are of undoubted excellence, there is apparent in the body of Canadian statistics, considered as a whole, a lack of coherence and common purpose. This is traceable to imperfect appreciation in the past of the fact that the statistics of the country should constitute a single harmonious system, with all divisions in due co-relation. Under the British North America Act, 1867, the Dominion is given specific authority to deal with "statistics," and while this must not be regarded as precluding statistical activity on the part of local governments, it does apparently imply that statistics are a matter of national concern and may therefore properly come under the general co-ordinating authority of the Federal Government. No such viewpoint or function, however, has in the past been assumed. The effect statistically has been to inculcate routine and the neglect of opportunities for furnishing wider information and service. While this detachment has characterized the departments of the Dominion Government, still more has it been evident as between the several provinces and the Dominion, and between province and province, notwithstanding that the national importance of many of the functions of the provincial governments under confederation calls urgently for statistical uniformity and homogeneity. This general condition we would consider to be the fundamental defect which must be met and overcome in the existing situation. Some of the unfortunate results which have followed may be briefly indicated:

1. The scope of Canadian statistics has been restricted. On not a few points of vital interest to the country little or no statistical information exists. There has been no general answer to the question, what statistics should a country such as Canada possess? What are the phenomena requiring the scientific measurements supplied by statistics if Canadian national development is to proceed to the best advantage?

2. Where the statistical activities of several bodies working along similar lines are virtually independent, duplication is inevitable.

3. The statistics are unequal in quality and value. The absence of leadership is nowhere more apparent than in the varying extent to which statistical methods have been developed in the different branches.

4. The restriction of outlook has impaired promptitude in the issue of reports.

5. Lack of unity and co-ordination prevents true comparisons between Canada and other countries. The recent growth of international intercourse has rendered such comparisons more than ever necessary, and they have become indispensable to the national progress of Canada.

That, in short, is a characterization of the impression which was left on the commission after its examination was completed. A remedy was suggested by the commission, and I will take the liberty of reading a short extract to give the essentials of their recommendation. They suggested:

1. That there be created a Central Statistical Office to organize in co-operation with the several departments concerned, the strictly statistical work undertaken by the Dominion Government. The object of this organization should be to co-ordinate the statistics of Canada under a single comprehensive scheme and so to extend them that they may meet the present needs of the country and follow the probable course of its development. To borrow a phrase employed in a similar connection by an eminent statistician, the object of such a reorganization should be primarily to constitute a "central thinking office" on the subject of the statistics of Canada. Describing the possible functions of such an office Mr. Bowley wrote: "Such an office must have cognizance of all the statistics of more than departmental importance which are published officially. Misleading statistics must be suppressed, overlapping must be stopped, careful plans must be devised for filling in the gaps at present left, and preparations made for investigation of matters likely to become of public importance. All bills involving or affecting the collection of statistics should be considered by it. Publications for the use of the public should in some cases be edited by it, with careful definitions and with short analyses and criticisms, stating accurately and intelligently the purport and meaning of their contents. In other cases, where a department already exists for such publications, there should be co-ordination with a view to carrying out the purposes already indicated."

This so well expresses our own views as to the scope and functions which the proposed Canadian office should assume that we cannot do better than allow it to stand as a part of our report, adding that the examples of Germany and Austria show that the idea is both practicable and valuable.

2. In order to give effect to this recommendation it may be necessary to enact further legislation or to amend the present Census and Statistics Act.

The House has now before it the condition of things as it appeared to the commission, and their recommendations as to what should be done to remedy that condition. Since that time different steps have been taken in respect of modelling and preparation for broader work, and for more co-ordination between the branches gathering statistics. What was found and hinted at by the commission was this: A system of gathering general statistics over and above the departmental or administrative statistics had gradually grown up in some departments, and in consequence there was overlapping and lack of uniformity in method, and that took away from the authority of the general conclusions arrived at. What was also taking place was that outside of Dominion statistics the different provinces were gradually branching out into statistical work necessitated, in the first place, by their administrative wants. Different branches under provincial administration, say Mines or Fisheries, were gathering and distributing statistical information in order to meet their departmental or administrative necessities, so that at the time this report was made nearly all of the provinces had more or less extended statistical branches at work upon different lines of examination, gathering and selecting and distributing information. There were three or four different bodies gathering statistics on crop reports, for instance, and agricultural production, doing the work separately, province by province, and not having the same basis for their questionings, different results were obtained, and it became very difficult indeed to place authoritative reliance upon the statistics as they were gathered, in so far as they affected the Dominion as a whole. The Dominion was also preparing crop reports and making returns of agricultural production, and there was a difference in method between the Dominion Government and the provincial governments. In consequence, not only was there overlapping, but a condition of things came about in which the outside world, and in fact the people of Canada, did not know on which set of statistics to rely.

The outside world was in doubt as to what was authoritative, and it also had its contradictions within the Dominion itself. As soon as the commission's report was made, steps were taken in Canada to work it out along the lines of the principles laid down for organization by the commission. In the first place, conferences were held between the Dominion Statistical Branch, and the statistical branches of the various provinces; Mr. Grigg, in his time, travelled from one end of the country to the other, and had conferences with the different statistical branches of the provinces, and they canvassed the whole question, and came to certain conclusions as to agreement and co-operation. That resulted in calling a Dominion conference of the statistical heads representing the provincal and Dominion authorities. At that conference, statistical methods, in so far as they affect the provinces and the Dominion, were canvassed, and certain agreements were come to. These were to be worked out by the central statistics office here, and afterwards to be submitted to the provincial authorities, which has been done. Again, in 1915, on the demise of Mr. Blue, Mr. Coats, from the Department of Labour, was appointed Dominion statistician and he took up the work as he found it at that time, and proceeded with it upon the same lines. Since then the endeavour has been to co-ordinate the work in the departments at Ottawa that were gathering statistics, to prevent overlapping, to get uniformity, to secure the best method, and to ensure as great economy of working as possible. On the other hand, the same system of conference and co-operation was carried out, with reference to the provincial authorities, and at the present time I may say, with reference to all the branches of statistical information, selection and distribution, that there is complete accord and harmony between the Dominion statistical office and the statistical offices of the different provinces. Where the provincial organization is apparently the most reliable for gaining the information, it is availed of. Where the Dominion plan or organization appears more reliable, that plan is adopted. There is agreement on both these points as to the selection and tabulation of the information. In nearly all cases the tabulation is done in the Dominion statistical office, where we have the greatest facilities for doing it, and the information, when tabulated, is returned again for the use of the agricultural and other statistical departments of the provincial governments, whilst of course the same information remains with the statistical office here in Ottawa. These have been the lines along which the Dominion statistician has been working, with the results I have just mentioned. It is proposed to call this a bureau rather than a statistical office, because the word bureau widens the meaning somewhat, and is more in accord with similar institutions in other countries. The main idea is that, so far as the gathering of general or economic statistics is concerned, it shall be the work of the bureau itself, but departmental statistics for administrative purposes remain with the departments. In so far as, by co-operation, mutual advice and direction, the gathering of the statistics in the administrative departments can be made to fit in with the general plan, and can conduce to economy and accuracy of selection, that co-operation and co-ordination takes place between the central office and the statistical branches of the different departments working along their lines of administrative records and statistics.

With regard to what has been accomplished, the Dominion statistician and his higher staff in that office have been making a series of very thorough investigations and examinations and have been laying out the field for a general statistical operation. It might be interesting to the House, if I were to briefly mention the different fields or divisions of work that are now being prepared for, and which have been or will be put into operation.

In the first place, we keep our old decennial census. We have each ten years been taking the census of the Dominion, with the collateral information, outside of statistics of population, which has been gathered hitherto and which may be easily gathered in a census of population. Agriculture and population go together in the schedules which result in the information gathered in the decennial census.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will those last figures be quoted in the agricultural reports, or will they appear in the Year Book?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have spoken of the decennial census of population and agriculture, but it has long been felt in this country, and in this House, that a ten-year census of the condition, or the situation as regards agriculture is not quite sufficient for these times through which we are passing. Therefore, in addition to the decennial census of population and agriculture, it is proposed to add an annual census of livestock and crops, the record of marketing, and the statistics of butter and cheese production, so that each year we shall have an up-to-date statement as regards the condition of agricultural work, so far as that can be interpreted by statistics, which will supplement the information which is got in the decennial census with regard to agriculture itself. We have been having a kind of crop report, but it was not very widely based, and consequently has not included sufficient information to enable reliable estimates to be made. The idea underlying this yearly census is to develop the sources of information, to distribute more widely the area of information upon which we draw, and to make the estimates approximate, as nearly as possible, to the actualities of the case. In June, our crop reporters, who were selected and distributed throughout the country, gave us a statement as to the areas under cultivation, the crops sown and the number of live stock. These were followed up in the succeeding months by reports upon the condition of the crops, the live stock, and the like of that. The wider you can get the basis of the information upon which you can apply your final estimate, the more reliable the result will be. That is where co-operation is taking place between the Dominion and the provinces. I do not know that I can do better than just read an extract from the plan to show the improvement that has been made and the benefit that will arise therefrom:

As to the crops and livestock the statistics are issued monthly, the basic data relating to crops and numbers of live stock are obtained in June on a card designed to reach every farmer in Canada.

A specimen card is appended here and can be seen by any hon. member who desires.

The specimen card is issued in co-operation with the provincial departments of agriculture. The arrangements for co-operation differs slightly in the case of each province. For example, in the case of the provinces of Quebec, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the cards are distributed and collected by the provincial authorities through the rural school teachers and then returned to this office for compilation.

By the co-operation of the educational authorities in these provinces, the teachers, in the first place, are prepared by an instructional circular which is issued to them for the kind of work which they are expected to facilitate. Then this card, prepared by the central office here, is sent out and approved of. The card is made out after consultation between the provincial authorities and our statistical office. These cards are then sent out to the departments in the three provinces. These departments, through the educational branches of the governments, forward these cards to the school teachers in every district. The cards are then distributed by the scholars and brought back to the teacher, a lesson having been given to the scholars in the meantime as to the significance of this operation and as to the public service involved, and as a result they are interested in it. These cards are then brought back by the children, are sent in to the provincial authorities, and by these are forwarded for compilation purposes to the central office.

In British Columbia the cards are mailed by this office to individual farmers and returned to the provincial department for compilation. British Columbia has had a system of sending direct to farmers a form that is the basis of estimates as to crops. They consider that the best way of doing it and they are doing it in that way rather than through the teachers. Ontario and Manitoba this year are coming in practically on the same basis as British Columbia. The details are already settled. The Maritime Provinces have agreed to the principle of co-operation and the details are to be arranged during the present month. It is interesting to note the results for 1917 in the case of Quebec, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. In Quebec returns have been received from 29,000 farmers; in Saskatchewan from 35,000; in Alberta from 14,500, and in British Columbia from 6,900.

Under the old system of crop reporters we had only an infinitesimal fraction of that number; consequently, our basis was that much curtailed. Here the basis upon which the estimates are to be formed from the whole country is widened very largely.

Passing from the census of population and of agricultural production, with the addition of the annual statistics gathered, to keep up to date between the decennial periods, we take up the next division; that is, the census of production. We propose to do for industrial production, taken in its widest sense, what has hitherto been done with regard to agricultural production and population. Hitherto all we have got in respect to industrial production has been what we have been able to gather at the decennial census. In addition to the difficulty of getting an adequate industrial census by means of the schedules which are distributed for the decennial census, and which must include so much other matter, we had no further information for each of the nine years intervening between decennial periods. That is not what is necessary in these days and particularly in the face of Canada's largely increased and increasing industrial activity. What it is proposed to do is to take in each ten years a general census of industrial production, taking it in a different period from that at which the decennial census of agriculture and population is taken and then basing upon that, just the same as is done in the case of the agricultural census, a postal census of the industrial production each year, to keep up to date, in so far as it can be done, with the progress that is being made in our industrial activities. We shall be doing for industrial production in this respect what is done for agriculture in the other division.

In that there will be combined fishing, mining, lumbering, forestry, manufacturing—all the great basic industries of Canada. One will see how necessary that is when it is stated that some twenty-nine departments, under Dominion work and under provincial work, have been publishing statistics of production during the last number of years with all their different methods, in a fragmentary manner more or less, and without uniformity or co-ordination. Between all these departments and the central statistical office there is now a plan of co-operation; each taking its own part in a co-ordinated plan, and all working together for the general result, which I anticipate will be excellent.

The third division takes in statistics of trade and of commerce. At present these statistics are under the management of the Customs Department, the Trade and Commerce Department, and the Statistical Department—three departments. What is proposed in respect of these is, by co-operation and co-ordination to prevent overlapping between these three departments; to hit upon and carry out a system which shall be carried on with the greatest economy and with the greatest efficiency, and without one department overlapping in any respect the work which is being done by the other.

Then there is the division of transportation, which, of course, is intimately connected with production—with natural production and industrial production—and the statistics with reference to which are absolutely necessary if we shall come to any correct interpretation of the forces at work in Canada contributing to the business and trade and national prosperity of the country.

Vital statistics are also to be taken up in a new and adequate way. Up to the present time vital statistics have been chiefly gathered by the provinces. Some provinces have none; some provinces have more or less well developed plans. Complete accord has been reached between the statistical office here and the vital statistics branches of the different provinces, and a plan of gathering and distributing these vital statistics has been arranged for and will now be carried out. Members will see how vital this is to our country, as it is considered vital to all progressive countries. There has been a great lack of complete vital statistics in this country up to the present time, and we now propose to have that lack remedied.

Criminal statistics are being gathered in a way, and have been for a number of years, but I do not think any one will contend that they have been satisfactory; they have not been broad or thorough enough. The gathering of criminal statistics will be enlarged and carried out, I hope, with greater advantage to the country at large.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Enlarged in what way?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, for instance, that there will be a wider range selected. Criminal statistics are published in part; we have a publication of our own on criminal statistics. Several of the provincial governments have also statistics, more or less, that they are gathering. These will be enlarged to take in all that is necessary for a well founded system of criminal statistics, and then all will be brought together and published, or distributed, in a form in which you will get everything that is vital to the understanding of the subject, instead of having to rummage round through the different provinces, and here in the Dominion, to gather the information and pick it out from these different sources.

Then there is the division of wealth, and debt, and taxation, which will take in governmental, municipal, corporation, and private finance. Not very much attention has been given to the collation and co-ordination of such material as already exists, but which exists without being put in a form where it can be readily of use. The Union of Municipalities has been very insistent upon the improvement, or the creation, of a system of statistics for the Dominion which shall aid them in their municipal work; and with the co-ordination of the municipal authorities, the provincial authorities and ourselves, it is proposed to enlarge that system of gathering statistics, and to collate it in a form where it can be easily got at and be readily usable.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the minister give an example as to what he intends doing, for instance, by the collation of municipal statistics?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend knows that pretty nearly as well as I do myself. All our municipalities govern themselves. They have their system of expenditures and of revenues; they have their debts and their tax systems, everything of that kind, and each municipality knows what it itself is doing, and it knows to a certain extent the plans along which it is working, but there is no collation of this for the municipalities as a whole, and therefore for the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. DEVLIN: I understand. It will simply be the embodying of the yearly financial statements of the municipalities.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will be that, but it will also be something more, because the moment you begin to do that and to show the different systems which are at work in one municipality and another, it gives a chance for a comparison which is not feasible when the operations of each municipality in its own department appears alone.

All I have to state in addition to what I have already said deals with the editorial and publishing phases of these general statistics. We have, as hon. gentlemen know, a Year Book, which was instituted in 1886, and which has been improved from year to year, until to-day I think I can say that Canada has a Year Book which it is not ashamed to let go out into any country in the world. We have had from other countries, I may say, very strong commendations and expressions of approval as to the Year Book as it is now published. The publications, of course, will take in matter which is gathered in any of these different divisions with such annotations and analyses of them as it is really the highest work of the statistical office to accord in connection with facts once they are gathered.

I have troubled the House a little longer than I had anticipated, but I have been under the impression that probably not enough attention was given to the importance of statistical work in our country, and that not as much attention has been given to it as ought to be given to it in this House. Everybody will admit that a system of broad, well-based, accurate information running out into all the possible sources of activity of our country is not only a good, but an absolutely necessary thing to have in these days. Everything we do—I mean morally, spiritually to a certain extent, and to an absolute extent in the way of business, trade and finance is based upon facts. Facts constitute the foundation upon which they are to be based if results are to be satisfactory.

All our activities more or less demand a foundation of accurate and particular information. Not only do we need that for our country and its own business, but we are side by side with the progressive countries of the world, whose statistical systems during the last ten or fifteen years have been wonderfully improved, and if Canada is to do her work and perform her part in the world of nations, she must have a statistical system, which, so far as possible, will not only be adequate to her needs, but which will bear comparison with that of other nations and be for the benefit of the country in its relations with other countries. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more as an introduction to the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. CRONYN: Might I ask the minister if, in the use of the word "economic' in this section, it is the intention to cover the case of financial companies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The division which takes in "wealth, debt," etc., and municipal statistics, covers that.

Mr. CRONYN: I notice that in section 34 there is a subclass of statistics called "Public and Private Finance." There seems to be no special provision covering financial concerns in the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think when we come to that section the explanation will satisfy my hon. friend that that is what is to be taken in.

Section agreed to.

On Section 4—Dominion statistician appointment and duties—Officials.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would like to ask my hon. friend if it is the intention to increase the personnel of the Bureau? I suppose he has a plan prepared for that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is a reproduction of the clauses of the old Act in the main. It provides for the appointment of an officer to be called the Dominion Statistician. The Dominion Statistician has already been appointed, and is in office. So with reference to all the officers who are at present employed. As the work enlarges it may be possible, of course, that more help will be needed, but nothing is contemplated at the present time in this Act other than the staff that we at present have.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Commissioners, enumerators and agents.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out to the committee that the rule is that the clause is called and the marginal heading read. If the committee desires that the whole clause be read, the Chairman, of course, is willing to do so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I might make a brief explanation when the clause is called, and then perhaps it will not be necessary to read it in all cases. With reference to this clause, it is an exact reproduction of the old Act, except that it provides for all appointments to be made by the Civil Service Commission. And my right hon. friend will recollect that the previous practice has been that the major part of the help employed in the Census and Statistics Department was by appointment by the census officer himself and was not under the Civil Service Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If this clause is drafted with the good intention of dispensing with patronage, it will be all right.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is absolutely all right.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Oath of office.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You had better read this section, Mr. Chairman.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This section provides—

The CHAIRMAN: Order, there is a request that I read this section.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did not hear the request.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The explanation may suffice without the reading of the clause. My hon. friend might go on.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall proceed with the explanation, and then if my right hon. friend wishes the section read it can be read. This is the oath which was formerly not included in the Act, but was provided by Order in Council; and it is placed here as a section in the Act because then it becomes enacted, and it is seen when the Act is read. I think it is much better there than in an Order in Council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is a wise improvement.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Rules, regulations and forms.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Section 7 reproduces Section 9 of the old Act, except that the old Act requires the assent of the Governor in Council to the schedules and their publication in the Canada Gazette. This has proved wasteful of time, and the assent of the Governor in Council was very often perfunctory. The preparation of these schedules is a technical thing, and the officers of the Census really are the persons who know, and they, with the minister, prepare these schedules. It was thought unnecessary to have them go before the Governor in Council.

Section agreed to.

On Section 8—No discrimination.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the same as subsection 3, Section 19, of the old Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is to be no discrimination by the minister or by the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The section reads:

8. The Governor in Council shall not, nor shall the Minister, in the execution of the powers conferred by this Act, discriminate between individuals or companies to the prejudice of any such individual or company.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has this been submitted to Mr. Fripp?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, now, Mr. Fripp is not in the Dominion Statistician's office.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—arrangements with provincial governments:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is a re-arrangement and enlargement of section 20 of the old Act, providing for a scheme of co-operative Dominion and provincial statistics. It is largely copied from the Australian Act, in which it is provided that a Central Statistical Bureau work to a considerable extent through the provincial departments.

Mr. CRONYN: Is the power in this or any other section of the Bill to compel provincially incorporated companies to make returns of statistics that may be desired? Some years ago we endeavoured to secure Dominion-wide statistics relating to trust and mortgage companies, but we found, if my recollection serves me aright, that some of the provincial governments had no machinery for the collection of these statistics and it was impossible to get anything like a satisfactory census, as one might call it, of the activities, investments, etc., of these companies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Who was the collecting authority in that case?

Mr. CRONYN: A private authority.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of course, they could refuse a private inquisition, but the statistical office has inquisitorial powers, and it can get information from any company or concern.

Mr. CRONYN: Even provincially incorporated companies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. But if information is secret, it is used in the mass, not individually.

Section agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Sir George Foster.]

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 22—statistics of Commerce and Navigation:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These provisions are adaptations from clauses in the legislation of Great Britain, Australia and the United States.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—domestic trade:

Mr. MURPHY: Is it the intention to circulate these monthly reports as previously?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 34—general statistics:

Mr. MURPHY: In the phrase "Public and Private Finance," to what does "private" finance extend?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Private banks, for instance.

Mr. MURPHY: But not to individuals?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think so.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

On motion of Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) Bill 51, to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1, subsection 1—compensation to be same as under law of province where accident occurs.

Mr. CURRIE: In Ontario there may be a liability on the part of some of the railways coming under the operation of the Government, and a board has been created which takes the place of workmen's compensation legislation in that province. Is it the intention of the Government to contribute to the funds of that board? The Ontario Government have done away with the old Employers' Liability Act, and a department of the government deals with this question. Every employer pays so much money into this fund annually. No doubt the railways will be taken over shortly, and there is a large mileage of railway in Ontario. Has the minister considered the operation of the compensation board in Ontario, or will this clause cover the whole thing?

Mr. J. D. REID: The intention of this Bill is to bring not only the railways but all Government employees on public works under a compensation Act. I may say, the railway employees prefer the Dominion Act, but it takes some time to work it out, and therefore I am introducing this Bill and placing all the employees in exactly the same position as the employees of a private railway. The Bill has been framed on that basis. The hon. gentleman asks whether it is the intention of the Government to deposit an amount with the Ontario Government, under the laws of that province. I may say it is not necessary for the Government of Canada to deposit any amount to ensure that any judgment under that Compensation Act will be paid. I do not know whether the law compels the Canadian Pacific or Canadian Northern to deposit any money, but it is not the intention of the Government to do so. In case of accident, injury or death, any liabilities will be paid in accordance with the amount the employees would be entitled to in any province.

Mr. CURRIE: The Ontario Government's officers will assess the damages to the person injured, and this Government will pay it?

Mr. J. D. REID: The court, or whatever the tribunal is.

Mr. CURRIE: There is a board?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. The Dominion Government Railways will go through the same procedure as the Canadian Pacific, in case one of their employees is injured.

Mr. COPP: Has the substance of this Bill been submitted to representatives of the labour organizations on the Canadian Government railways for their approval?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, we have discussed it with some gentlemen representing some of the organizations. There is a clause referring to the provident fund, and it was with some of those connected with that fund we discussed it. The employees on the Intercolonial railway are satisfied, because they have this additional security.

Mr. COPP: The last line or two of this subsection says:

—shall be determined in the same manner and by the same board, officers or authority or by such other board, officers or authority, or by such court as the Governor in Council shall from time to time direct.

Why is it necessary to establish another court? Why take it out of the hands of the regular courts?

Mr. J. D. REID: As I understand the provision of the clause, its purpose is to enable us to follow the law that exists in each province. I suppose the hon. gentleman wishes to know why it is necessary to appoint any board by Order in Council?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID: I understand that in Prince Edward Island, for instance, they have no board of arbitration, and no law such as we have in Ontario, and it might be necessary to appoint some board in that province similar to the boards in other provinces. That is the reason that clause was inserted.

Mr. CURRIE: The province of Ontario has a compensation board, with a staff of officials; and manufacturers, or others employing over a certain number of persons come under the regulations of that board. There is a certain expense every year which those who come under that board have to pay into the treasury for the maintenance of that board and to pay its inspectors and officers. I should think it would be advisable, if the Government railways come under the operation of that board, that they should pay a certain amount into that fund annually, the same as any one else. It would not be fair to have an organization work for the Dominion Government for nothing, because this service examines into these cases, and sends its inspectors to various points. When the award is made the Government will pay the award but it will not pay any of the expenses of the men who have gone out to investigate. I do not know whether the Bill makes any provision that out of the consolidated revenue fund there should be any payment besides the award that is paid to the person injured.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is this Bill to be made retroactive?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not retroactive.

Mr. MICHAUD: Take the case of employees on a gravel train, or in a sand pit, and working for His Majesty the King, who are insured against accident for an amount of $250. If some of them sustain injuries are they entitled to compensation under this Act? It seems that parties who are injured cannot put in any claim for damages beyond the amount for which they are insured. I remember a case in my own constituency where a man had his two legs broken. I made an appeal to the solicitor of the Intercolonial railway at Moncton and he told me that the Government was not responsible beyond the amount of $250. I ask the minister whether or not this man by signing an agreement can prefer any other claim beyond $25?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I might venture to answer the question of the hon. member (Mr. Michaud). If the party injured is an employee of the Government railway, he is entitled to just the same remedy, and subject to just the same restrictions, should this Act pass as if he was employed on an ordinary railway. The law of the province applies in just the same way as it would if he were employed on another railway. In the other case the hon. gentleman brings forward, if under the law of the province in which the man resides, an insurance fund would be deducted from any amount he might otherwise receive, or would not be deducted, it would be deducted or not deducted according to his agreement. That would be the result in an action where the party was employed in the Government railway. I think that is clear.

Mr. MICHAUD: Under the present law, is that young man entitled to any compensation from the Government outside of his $250 insurance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. gentleman mean by "present law"—Dominion law or provincial law?

Mr. MICHAUD: The present Dominion law. He cannot come under the provincial law if he is working for a Government railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the present law, if I understand it—I may be wrong—compensation is paid by the Crown as an act of grace. There is no law governing the exact amount that shall be paid. This Bill establishes the principle of liability under the provincial law of the province where the man resides.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understood from the solicitor of the Intercolonial railway at Moncton that His Majesty is not responsible for any accident to any of his employees. Is that right?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: Therefore, a widow and children cannot bring action against the Government for the death of the husband and father?

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. J. D. REID: No. This Bill, however, makes it possible for them to get compensation. In the hon. gentleman's province, in case of an accident on the Canadian Pacific railway, they can bring action against the company under the Compensation Act and get damages. But they could not do that if the accident happened on the Government railway. This now puts the Government railway in the same position in that province as the Canadian Pacific would be. In case of injury, an employee of the Government railway will be in exactly the same position in regard to compensation as would the employee of a railway company.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I am afraid that this Bill constitutes an encroachment on provincial rights. I see the minister smiling, but that is the construction I put on section 1. It says that the amount of compensation shall be determined by—> —the same Board, officers or authority, or by such other board, officers or authority or by such court as the Governor in Council shall from time to time direct.

I understand that if there is no board, officers or authority, or any court, the Governor in Council may appoint a board, officers, or authority to deal with these cases. Why not make this clause clear, so that there will be no misunderstanding? Make it read:

> Such compensation shall be determined in the same manner and by the same board, officers or authority, if any, or, if none, by such other board, officers or authority as the Governor in Council shall appoint.

My opinion is that in a province where there is already authority constituted the Governor in Council, under this clause, can appoint another authority.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It did appear to be somewhat facetious to suggest that this Bill encroaches on provincial rights. If this Bill does not pass the law in the matter is that no court in any province has any jurisdiction whatsoever. No court established by a province has the slightest jurisdiction in regard to any cause of action that is under the purview of this Bill. Then, obviously, there is no provincial right encroached upon. There is no provincial right now. In so far as this Bill affects provincial rights, it enlarges them. It, in effect, gives to the province the power to determine the liability of this Dominion in respect to causes of action against a Dominion railway. It gives to a provincial board, unless replaced by a board established by the Governor in Council, the determination of the amount based on the principle that the provincial legislature established. Consequently, whatever might be said for my hon. friend's contention, it could not be suggested that it encroaches on provincial rights.

Mr. GAUTHIER: This Bill will give jurisdiction to the authorities constituted actually by such other authority as the Governor in Council may appoint. Now to make my point very clear—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is very clear now.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I beg the hon. minister to listen. To make my point very clear: I am always afraid of the explanations given by the hon. minister. When we were discussing the Military Service Bill he told the House that the province of Quebec should not be agitated by it because it would be the least affected; now the province of Quebec is supposed to be the most affected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid my words in that regard were only too true, but at present we are not discussing the Military Service Bill. I hope I may be as well within the mark now as I was on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman has referred What the hon. gentleman argues for is this: That the Governor in Council should not take the power to establish a board which would have the determination of, and the application of, a provincial law in fixing this amount. But even though we do take this power, I was pointing out we do not encroach upon any provincial right, because there is no provincial right to encroach upon. I submit that we ought to take the power for the following reasons: The principle objection that could be raised against the Dominion putting itself in this position is that it places itself within the power of a province to establish a board over which the Dominion has no control whatsoever, and no right to interfere with it in any way whatever, and enables that board to assess against the Crown in the right of the Dominion such compensation as may seem fit. Now it was thought right that the Government place itself under the same principles as apply to the province, that we should have the power to determine the nature of the tribunal which would apply those principles and assess the damages against the Crown. As the Minister of Railways has pointed out, there seems to be a special need of the exercise of that power now in the province of Prince Edward Island, and there may be need of it elsewhere. It may be thought fit to order that in all cases of claims against the Crown in the right of the Dominion a superior court should exercise jurisdiction, or it may be thought fit to establish in each province a board which, applying the law of the province, would determine what the amount should be. It seems to me only just that that right should be reserved inasmuch as we go to the extent of putting it within the power of a province to fix the principles and the law upon which we must pay damages.

Mr. KEEFER: Might I ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) for a little more light on this subject? My reason for doing so is that I pledged myself to the railway men of my riding that I would see to it, as far as I could, that such legislation as was in their interest should be passed. In the constituency of Port Arthur we have the three transcontinental railways and nine divisional points where the engines and the crews are changed. Those railway men are the civil soldiers of the country, and they should receive, not any greater consideration, but as great consideration as any other class in the community now receives. To-day they are labouring under two or three disabilities, and I have promised to use my influence to remove those disabilities. This is one of them; the employees on Government railways are asking to receive the same rights and the same amount of compensation for injury given to the employees of any other railway. If we do not establish that principle the result is going to be that we shall lose the good men in the railway service to the other railway systems that are not owned and operated by the Government. I have heard them say that if they cannot get the same rights and protection as other railway employees they would go to work, for the Canadian Pacific railway, for instance, where they would enjoy those rights. They want the Government railways not operated politically but operated by a commission absolutely divorced from politics, so that a man may rise by merit and merit only. I have pledged myself to do what I can to bring about that result.

A third matter I wish to bring up is that the railway men want the right to vote on election day so that if they are going out on duty they can come in and vote just as soldiers were able to vote at the last election. These men have to get up at four or five o'clock in the morning, or earlier, to attend to their duties, and cannot record their votes because they are off guarding His Majesty's mail, or carrying food and war supplies, and so forth, in doing which they are discharging their duty to the country. These three grievances the railway men want remedied, and I seek to enlist the sympathy and support of this House on their behalf for that purpose.

Now, as regards this section, the Minister of the Interior has explained, if I understand it aright, that it is desired in some way to keep control over the provincial legislature in the way of how it may legislate. If I understand the position correctly it is this: First of all there is the principle of law that the Crown is not liable in any action by any suppliant without its permission, which is the well-known and right principle. Now we are making an inroad into that principle by this legislation, and rightly making it. Then the principle as to liability, as I understand it, is, that if the province has not Workmen's Compensation Boards, and so forth, there is a common law liability, under a well known and celebrated case that every lawyer knows, by which if a man is engaged in a hazardous undertaking he is entitled to recover damages, which damages must be reasonable in amount. Under the provincial law, as I take it—the Minister of the Interior will correct me if I am wrong,—any court in a province where they have not these workmen's compensation boards, would decide the matter upon the principle of common law. Now, is the railway man in any way to be deprived first of all of his right under the common law where there is no board or tribunal, or otherwise? Or is he entitled to go to the tribunals of the land—or in case of his demise, have his widow and children that right—and sue for damages, thus being put in the same position as any other railway employee? That is the point I want to make clear beyond possibility of doubt. If that were not so, and there was not the common law liability, then the Crown might want to step in and create some tribunal, but it would be only in case, I should think, where the common law liability is not retained; otherwise I should think it would be a dangerous proceeding to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Crown to step in and constitute a special tribunal. I would like that point made clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand the hon. gentleman to ask whether or not the former common law liability will be retained.

Mr. KEEFER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no former common law liability as against the Crown.

[Mr. Keefer.]

Mr. KEEFER: I mean the same common law that applies to other subjects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no common law liability now against the Crown. But I would say that the common law liability as it exists in any province as applied to a railway corporation may now, if this Bill passes, be utilized against the Crown, and will be in effect unless it has been displaced by provincial legislation.

Mr. KEEFER: That is perfectly clear.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I endorse what has just been said by the hon. member from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) as to the importance of and necessity for this legislation.

There is certainly no reason why the State should not be treated or considered as an ordinary employer of labour. I know of many injustices which have been done to workmen on the Intercolonial railway because of the lack of such legislation. The other day, when the resolution which preceded this Bill was discussed in committee, I enquired whether there were Workmen's Compensation Acts in all the provinces, and I was told that there was such legislation in all the provinces. A gentleman well posted on labour questions has told me that there are several provinces where no such legislation exists. If the hon. minister has the information as to that he should supply it to his colleague, the Minister of Labour, because I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Labour Department last year entitled "Labour Legislation in Canada," and I read this:

> In 1916 laws in the field of labour legislation were passed by the Federal Government and by the legislatures of all the provinces except Prince Edward Island. The outstanding feature was the enactment of workmen's compensation laws in the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia, following the passage of compensation statutes in Ontario in 1914 and in Nova Scotia in 1915. In the autumn of 1915 the British Columbia Government appointed a commission to investigate the subject of workmen's compensation, which reported favourably in time for the passage of the Act at the next session of the legislature. The enactment of modern compensation laws by four provinces brings Canada fairly well in line with the rapid development of legislation of this kind throughout the world.

This would indicate that as far as the Labour Department is concerned they are not informed as to whether such legislation exists in all the provinces of the Dominion. On the other hand, the information given there is certainly incomplete, because I know, as a matter of fact, that in the province of Quebec a compensation law was enacted in 1909, the first labour compensation legislation in the Dominion of Canada. If the province of Quebec comes last on woman's suffrage, it was the pioneer as far as labour legislation is concerned. So, if the information of the Department of Labour was wrong as to Quebec, it may have been wrong for the other provinces as well. I would like to know, and the Committee is entitled to the information, whether such legislation exists in all the provinces?

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think the hon. gentleman realizes what the compensation laws of these provinces mean. In the provinces generally, under the common law, I think a man could bind himself outside of compensation. That is, I could hire a man and make an agreement with him under the common law that if he sustained any injury he or his heirs could not ask for any compensation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is not good law.

Mr. CURRIE: Then there was another law passed in England—I think it was called Lord Campbell's Act—the lawyers in the House will correct me if I am in error, because I do not speak as a lawyer but as an employer of labour——

An hon. MEMBER: You are not talking good law.

Mr. CURRIE: However, there was a law passed there which made it so that a man could not contract outside of the operation of securing compensation. Supposing a man was killed, his family could sue regardless of any agreement made with the employer. That is the British law. Now, all the provinces passed statute laws of that character, and the law the hon. gentleman refers to in Quebec is along that line. In the province of Ontario the insuring of the employee is taken entirely out of the hands of the employers, and a board is set up which insures every workman who seeks employment with a corporation or individual, and if he is killed or injured, the Government has a number of inspectors who visit the man or the place of his employment and take all the evidence in the case, and the workmen's compensation board at Toronto fixes the degree of liability and the compensation, whether it is to be an annual payment extending over the lifetime of the widow, and so on. They fix it, and the Government pays it, and they charge that up generally to every business or employment in the category. All kinds of businesses are categorized. For instance, munitions is in category C; farming will be category A, and so on, all the way down the line, and the compensation is in accordance with the category; but practically the amount paid into this fund annually is in accordance with the risk. I might say in that connection that in the province of Ontario in the year 1916 in a munitions plant that I know of the premium was something like $350. Previous to that the amount paid to the insurance companies would run about six or seven hundred dollars. So we find the Compensation Act works a great reduction in the cost of carrying the risk of the workmen. Previously, the workmen could get practically nothing at all. The employer paid into a liability company, which employed every lawyer it could get to keep the workman from securing damages, and their whole business was to prevent him from obtaining damages. They stood behind the manufacturer and said: If you incur any damages, we will pay them, but we will put the workman and his wife and children through all the courts in the land before they will be able to collect anything from you. That was a vicious principle in itself. Now, these boards fix the compensation. But, like the high cost of living and everything else, the amount paid into the province of Ontario last year as premiums increased three hundred per cent over the previous year, and there is a great deal of grumbling about that. It is claimed that the board has assessed the figure for the year far too high in order to accumulate a large fund for itself. In the province of Quebec, I think there is not a board of that description; I understand there is not. But the province of British Columbia has adopted the principle, having largely copied from the law of the State of Washington. The other provinces down by the sea have also adopted a similar system; it is a splendid system for both employer and workman. But unless boards are established, I think the law will stand, not the old common law, but the general law of all the provinces, that a man cannot contract himself out of his right of claim upon his employer in case he is injured. Under the old common law he could not do that, it being held that he was a free agent.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If it is intended that the law of the province with respect to the amount of compensation and the manner of obtaining it is to govern, the section as it now stands is a little obscure. The wording of the clause is as follows:

—and the liability for and the amount of such compensation shall be determined in the same manner and by the same Board, officers or authority, or by such other Board, officers or authority or by such court as the Governor in Council shall from time to time direct.

If we cut out the alternative clause, it will read as follows:

—and the liability for and the amount of such compensation shall be determined in the same manner and by the same Board, officers or authority, as the Governor in Council shall from time to time direct.

There are no similar actions at all, because it is within the authority of the Governor in Council absolutely to determine the board. I would suggest that the clause be amended in this manner:

—and the liability for and the amount of such compensation shall be determined in the same manner and by the same Board, officers or authority, as similar actions for compensation are determined under the laws of such province, or by such other Board, officers of authority or by such court as the Governor in Council shall from time to time direct.

Mr. BUREAU: Striking the alternative out?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: No, there is no alternative. As it reads now, the section says: "shall be determined by the same board as the Governor in Council shall direct." I suggest that after the word "authority," in the third line from the last, there be added the words: "as similar claims for compensation are determined under the laws of such province." Then, if in any particular province there is no board for the purpose of determining compensation the alternative clause will apply and the Governor in Council may appoint such authority as is deemed expedient.

Mr. J. D. REID: The parliamentary counsel, our railway solicitor, and, I think, the Chairman of the Railway Commission, all assisted in drafting this clause with a view to having it right.

Mr. JACOBS: In the multitude of counsel there is wisdom.

Mr. J. D. REID: My whole object is to get this Bill in such shape that in cases of accident employees on Government railways shall have the same rights as employees of other railways. Under the present law, if a man is injured or killed, I have no way of providing compensation for his family. Cases have been dealt with in the estimates, but it is not fair to me or to the family that I should have to decide the matter in that way.

Mr. FIELDING: Does this not mean that the minister, the Government, or the department desires to put itself, in every province, in the position of a private corporation, and then to come under the operations of the compensation law of that province?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is what I have in view.

Mr. FIELDING: That is an object with which we can all sympathize. My hon. friend has had half a dozen lawyers preparing this clause, and it must be right, I suppose. The object is certainly a worthy one, but I should not gather it from the reading of the clause as it stands.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Suppose that during the course of his employment a 9 p.m. man receives an injury which does not come within the terms of the Compensation Act, and the compensation board in the particular province refuses to take jurisdiction over him, what remedy is open to the dependents of that man? If a man is killed, perhaps through the gross negligence of the railway itself, does this Act purport to give a fiat for the bringing of action against the Crown for damages?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I take it that my hon. friend means a case in which action would lie against a private company in the ordinary courts of the land, but which would not come within the special compensation law of the province. The effect of this legislation would be to give the family of such a man action against the Crown in the ordinary courts of the land.

Mr. TWEEDIE: According to that, then, the Act does not limit the right to recovery under the Compensation Act of the provinces. A private individual would have a perfect right to bring an action against the Crown, just the same as against a private company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is my understanding.

Mr. TWEEDIE: If that is a correct interpretation of the Act, the provision is an excellent one.

Mr. CURRIE: In view of the suggestions which have been made, the law clerk should be asked to go over this section very carefully. While the marginal notation may read all right, I confess that a few more words seem to be necessary in order to make the clause absolutely clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was impressed by the point raised by the member for North Grey

(Mr. Middlebro). It is more a mistake in English, I think, than anything else. Perhaps I may be pardoned for saying here that I did not draft this legislation. I move that the following words be added after the word "authority" where it first occurs in the 13th line:

—as that established by the law of the province for determining compensation in similar cases.

Mr. BUREAU: If a man is injured in Ottawa, does that imply that he may go before the Exchequer Court instead of before the ordinary Superior Court, or whatever you call it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He could not go before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the meaning of these words?—

—or by such other Board, officers or authority or by such court as the Governor in Council shall from time to time direct.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is only for the purpose of providing for the appointment of a board in any province where no Compensation Act has been adopted. I believe that would apply to only one province—Prince Edward Island. If a man were injured while employed on a Government railway in Ontario, the Ontario board under the Compensation Act would determine the compensation to be paid.

Mr. BUREAU: In that case, what harm would there be in adding after the amendment just moved by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), that in case no such board of officers exists in the province, or in the absence of any compensation law in force in the province, the Governor in Council may determine before what board or court the injured person may come?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I endeavoured to state the point of view of the Government before. We do not wish to take the authority and apply it only in cases where there is no provincial law so as to fix Dominion liaright to establish a tribunal in any case that we see fit, or in all cases that we see fit. The distance Parliament is going to in placing it within the power of the province to establish the laws and the principles upon which we shall pay damages seems to me to be a long way indeed, without asking us to go the further length of placing ourselves wholly within the jurisdiction of such tribunal, of whatever character, as the province may establish for applying that law and determining the amount of compensation. It may be that in no case except where there is no tribunal, shall we exercise that right, but we wish to reserve it, and it might be that the Governor in Council might see fit to enact that only a Superior Court in any province should apply the provincial law so as to fix Dominion liability.

Mr. BUREAU: I entirely agree with what was said a few moments ago by my hon. friend from Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer). He asked the Government to put the railway man working for the Government in exactly the same position as the ordinary man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to law.

Mr. BUREAU: That was his idea, if I understood him correctly. But this goes further. Supposing a man gets injured while working on a Government steamer or on a public work; under this Act he would be entitled to compensation, whether he was working for the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Railways, or the Minister of Public Works. My hon. friend said he was afraid it might not be the judge of a Superior Court who would take cognizance of the case. I suppose it is the same in other provinces as in Quebec, where the jurisdiction of the judge is limited by the amount involved. In our province it is specifically provided that it is the judge of the Superior Court who shall take original cognizance of the case. Before an injured man can sue, he has to present a petition, and when that petition is presented, if employer and employee agree the judge renders judgment which has the same effect as if the action had been tried by the court in the regular way. I am not speaking on behalf of my district particularly, because we have no Government railways. I had forgotten; we have the Canadian Northern paid for by the Government, but not yet owned or operated by the Government. Under this legislation, the railwaymen working for the Government would not feel they were on the same footing as the men working for the Canadian Pacific or the Grand Trunk, because there would always be an uncertainty as to the Government creating a board to decide these compensation cases. But knowing the sympathy of the Minister of Railways for the working man, I do not think he would make any change which would be to their disadvantage; but we know he does change his mind sometimes, and we have precedents enough for that if we look backward.

There is another point. Would it not be well to mention in the Bill that the action may be brought against the department in which the injured man was employed? Because if the action is simply brought against His Majesty the King, we should see His Majesty King George the Fifth summoning His Majesty King George the Fifth to appear before the Superior Court of Three Rivers or elsewhere to answer to John Doe, who has broken his leg while in the employ of His Majesty. We might provide that when a man brings an action for personal injury, the fact of designating the department for which he was working will be sufficient to bring the Crown before the court. I remember that when we amended the Railway Act to allow people to bring claims up to $500 for cattle killed by the railway, a special board was appointed and the action was brought against this board and that was sufficient to make the Crown appear. The Crown has gone extensively into the railway business, and Government railways cover the whole country. Heretofore, Moncton has been the seat of railway operations by the Crown. In an action for damages, would the injured man have to serve notice on the minister or the deputy minister at Ottawa, or in the head office of the railway company, or in the resident engineer's office for the Department of Railways, or on the customs officer of the district if the accident happened to a man in the customs service? I think we should set out in the Bill who shall be sued when a man wants to sue the Crown for personal injury, and where the Crown may be served. Otherwise, if the labourer has to serve the documents in Ottawa or at some divisional point he might be put to considerable expense. On the Canadian Pacific, if an accident occurs, the injured man may serve the head office in Montreal or the agent at the place where the accident happened. Perhaps the minister would draft a paragraph embodying my suggestions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think the principle of this Bill is an excellent one, and I am certainly in favour of the Crown granting compensation to employees suffering injuries through the operation of the railways. I think this is the natural corollary of the legislation passed some years ago by which those who suffered from fires caused by sparks from an engine on the Intercolonial could sue to the amount of $200 before the courts of the province through which the train passed. I do not think the paragraph before us is quite clear. The Government first of all admits the jurisdiction of the courts of the provinces to adjudicate these cases, and accepts the various compensation Acts passed by the different provinces. The courts of the provinces, although created by the provinces themselves, are paid out of the federal exchequer. As the Government by this legislation accepts the compensation Acts of the provinces why not trust the administration of this Act to the Superior Court judges of the provinces? Why does the Government take power to create special boards in the various provinces? The Government will accept the compensation Acts which are provided for by the different provinces; it seems invidious that it will not accept the jurisdiction of the courts in the provinces and pass the administration of that Act to those special boards. You are creating an invidious distinction as between our judges in the various provinces, who are paid by the federal exchequer although created by local legislatures, whilst you admit the validity and the scope of our Compensation Act. If the Government were providing for special boards which would administer compensation Acts differently from the provincial Acts, I could understand this legislation. I say to the Government: The legislation is excellent; the principle is most excellent, but I do not understand why you do not trust the provincial courts in the administration of the Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Constitution of this country the greatest care was observed in providing for the establishment and the manning of our courts. The balance was well preserved between Dominion and provincial responsibility, and if all the provinces had referred the administration of their compensation law to the courts, then I do not apprehend that this alternative would have been inserted in the Bill. But a board established purely under provincial law, and manned only by provincial authority, is not naturally a board in which the Dominion would be likely to place irrevocably its destiny in these matters; at all events in the same way as we might be quite prepared to place it if the provincial law prescribed the court to adjudicate, instead of a board.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why do you not limit it to provinces where they have no board?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the reason that the province itself has not limited it. The province comes along, displaces the jurisdiction of the court, and establishes a board, and we would have, by Order in Council to re-establish the jurisdiction of the court and place our cases under their jurisdiction. Consequently we must take this alternative. Otherwise we are wholly within the power of a board constituted by provincial authority, manned by provincial authority, in respect of which this Dominion has no say whatever. My hon. friend asks: Why not at once remove the jurisdiction of boards, and place this wholly within the power of the Superior Court of each province? That might be done, but it was thought better to try it with the boards that now exist, and see how it operated, and what effect it would have. It is true they are in no way answerable to us, they are appointed by provincial authority, paid by provincial funds, and in no way in the nature of courts established under the provisions of the British North America Act. It might be well to try the operation of this law as administered by the board, but we retain power, not only to establish a board, or a court where there is none now, but to displace the board now established, if we see fit, by a court or a board which may sit through all the provinces, as the Governor in Council may see fit.

Mr. KEEFER: If I understand the position, we have now come down practically to what you might call a constitutional question, whether the Dominion of Canada shall or shall not be willing to submit itself, as far as this principle of liability is concerned, to the provincial courts. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) says: Yes, I want to see all the men employed in the Government railways receive the same treatment as men employed in any other railway. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), being a very able lawyer, and realizing much more fully the meaning of these words, practically says: No, I will only agree to the provincial authority, provided we are satisfied with it. Let us use blunt language in this matter; let us place the cards on the table. I think it would be a horrible mistake, when dealing with railway employees, to leave the matter in such a position that it could be argued in two or three ways. These men do not like to be deceived. I am a new member of the House, and do not know which is the proper course to adopt. They are both very far-reaching. It is a dangerous thing for the Federal Government to submit itself without reservation to the provinces. Canada stands to-day in a peculiar position in regard to railways. I hardly think any of us realize it. We are to-day the owners of about 15,000 miles of railway—the largest railway owner in Canada. We have seen fit, and rightly so, to take over these railways. Having done so, and having come into competition with other existing railways, it seems to me that we ought to take the liabilities incident to taking over the railways. Remember, these liabilities will be very far-reaching. We cannot stop at this matter. You have to take up the principle of municipal assessment later on, the principle of municipal liability for taxes, and so on, just as the railways have done. Heretofore the Government never allowed itself to be taxed, and rightly so. So that the matter cannot be disposed of very triflingly. It seems to me very unwise not to be able to say to the men: You are working on this railway for us; you are going to have exactly the same treatment as you would have working for any other railway. For that reason, I would like to see the Government so amend this clause that the principle would be clearly and well defined. It cuts into the principle that my hon. friend the hon. Minister of the Interior just enunciated. I should like to move an amendment—

The CHAIRMAN: There is already an amendment before the Committee.

Mr. KEEFER: In order that the Committee may be considering it, I may say that the substance of my proposed amendment will be to insert after the word " or " in the 13th line the following:

—if such board, officers or authority be not then existing.

That squarely defines the position, that if there is not an existing board, we will appoint one.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment now before the Committee is that proposed by the hon. Minister of the Interior.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Mr. KEEFER moved to add after the word "or," where it appears for the second time in line 13 of subclause (1), the following words "if no such board, officers or authority be then existing."

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: When I moved my amendment I had no thought of taking away the alternative from the Government. I do not think we are justified in placing absolutely and entirely in the hands of such a local board as a provincial government may determine, what compensation we should pay for any injury which may be sustained by any person within the limits of that province. What the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) says is quite sound, that we should give this Act a trial. It may be that when these provincial boards get to know that whatever compensation they allow in such a case is going to be paid by the Dominion Government, the amount of the compensation may very materially swell. I think it is well to have the reservation if for no other reason than that these boards will know that if they do not give reasonable compensation for losses, or the compensation that is allowed in similar cases in various provinces, if they do not do what is fair and square as between the claimant and the Government, it is within our power to withdraw the matter from their jurisdiction and place it in the hands of such other boards or tribunals as we shall appoint for that purpose.

Mr. KEEFER: We can always pass a new Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: For that reason, I say, give the present Act a trial and if it is satisfactory we do not need to change it. If it is not satisfactory, we can pass a new Act, as my hon. friend says.

Mr. J. D. REID: When I spoke a few moments ago I assured the committe that my object was to give the railway employees all the benefits which they would receive in any province in so far as compensation is concerned. This Bill allows the Government to do that. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) who has just spoken. If some province should appoint a board, or adopt a law, by which the railway employees would not probably get as much as we believe they would be entitled to, we would be in a position to appoint a board that would see that they received their just dues.

Mr. BUREAU: In that case we had better put it in the Bill.

Mr. J. D. REID: This Bill has been passed upon by the railway employees. I would like to give it a trial, and if, by the time another session of Parliament is held, it does not work out as we expect, we can amend it. I think that to give away our powers in so far as doing what is just and fair by the men is concerned would be to take a step that would hardly be justified.

Mr. COPP: The minister started out with the very good intention of putting Government railway employees in the same position as the employees of any other railway. But, apparently the multitude of his legal advisors have got him into a bad plight because he has, by the first part of this section, given the employees of the Government railways what they are entitled to, but every man in this Parliament must realize that he leaves the back door open, in the provision contained in the last line of the section, so that in case the award does not suit him he can withdraw the case from the board.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is not so.

Mr. COPP: That is as I understand it. I do not say that the minister intends to do that, but that is actually how it works out. The provinces, apparently with one exception, have compensation Acts each administered by what are known as arbitration boards, as explained by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) a few moments ago. A board is appointed by the provincial government to hear these cases, deliberate upon them and give their judgment the satisfaction of which becomes a charge upon the fund that has been raised by an assessment upon these large corporations. The amendment moved by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) is all right as far as it goes, but the Canadian Government railway employees will not be satisfied with a clause which says that the Government, if not satisfied with the way in which the case has been tried before the arbitration board in the province in which the claimant resides, can take it out of their hands and appoint a board of their own. They may get just as good and just a reasonable a board, and a board that would give a fair judgment, but nevertheless the employees of the Government railway will look upon it with a good deal of suspicion. I am absolutely in favour of the principle of this Bill, and I would like to see it adopted in such a shape that the Government would be protected as well as the employees of the road. But, this is how it will work out: Somebody is injured or killed on the Intercolonial railway and his dependents come before a board appointed by the legislature or government of the province of New Brunswick. The case proceeds, and the board, in the opinion of the minister, makes too large an allowance to the dependents.

Mr. J. D. REID: I never made any such statement, and the hon. gentleman knows that I did not.

Mr. COPP: I did not say the hon. gentleman did, but I was suggesting that that is how it will work out.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman is making out a case on supposition.

Mr. COPP: If a judgment has been given by the arbitration boards that is too large in the opinion of the minister, he takes the right, under that section, to withdraw the case from that board and to appoint a board of his own.

Mr. J. D. REID: No. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. COPP: Well, now, let us see.

Mr. REID: Oh, no.

Mr. BUREAU: For future cases.

Mr. COPP: For future cases, exactly. Now then, what would happen?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You cannot do that with respect to future cases.

Mr. BUREAU: You are changing your policy in that regard?

Mr. COPP: I think the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) understands the position. What would happen would be this: You must have a solicitor to look after the legal interests of the Department of Railways and Canals, and the solicitor of the railway, who would be against the employee, would practically appoint the board that would sit upon the case and that would bring in its decision. I say that is absolutely contrary to the object of the Bill as explained by the Minister of Railways, when he told us that it was intended to put the employees of the Government railways on a fair and reasonable footing with the employees of all other railways and corporations. I agree with him that is the proper thing to do; but I protest in the strongest manner possible on behalf of the employees of the Intercolonial railway particularly, who are very numerous in the constituency which I represent, against taking power away from the boards of the province of New Brunswick and placing it in the hands of a board appointed by the Governor in Council, for that will raise suspicion in the minds of the railway employees which will be beneficial neither to the Government nor to the railway. If there is no compensation board in any province and you appoint a court to deal with the matter, well and good, but to give this power to a board to be appointed by the Governor in Council does not seem to be in the interests of the railway employees themselves or in the interests of the country.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member (Mr. Copp) is afraid that the railway employees will not receive fair treatment if their case is tried by some tribunal appointed by the Dominion Government. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that a very large delegation of railway employees from all the different railway organizations came to Ottawa and urged me to bring in a Dominion Compensation Bill, and why? Because they claimed they were not getting fair treatment from some of the provincial boards.

Mr. COPP: A permanent board?

Mr. J. D. REID: The enactment of a Dominion Compensation Bill was what they wanted.

Mr. COPP: Exactly, providing for a permanent board.

Mr. J. D. REID: And my answer to the delegation was that we had not time during the present session to enact the legislation which they wanted, but that I would bring in a Compensation Bill that would fit in with the provincial laws for all the Dominion, and give it a trial, and at another session, if they so desired, I would be glad to introduce a Dominion Bill. Therefore, the railway employees were not only willing, but anxious, to trust their case in the hands of the Dominion Government. That is the stand they took within the last two weeks.

Mr. COPP: Then their faith is badly placed.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not agree with the hon. member. Now, as those men pleaded with me to bring in a Dominion Bill, I would not be justified in abandoning this legislation now, and, therefore, I ask hon. gentlemen to support the Bill before the House. I am giving them my word that this Bill is intended to dovetail in with the provincial laws throughout the Dominion, and I ask hon. gentlemen to support the Bill as it is. Let us pass the Bill and give it a few months' trial. Let it be tried until the next session of Parliament, and then if the railway employees say that the law is working out unsatisfactorily, let us do our best to perfect it. So far as I am concerned, my whole object is to try and secure the passage of a law that will be satisfactory to railway employees throughout the Dominion.

Mr. COPP: I can assure the minister that the provision embodied in this section will not be satisfactory, but will be absolutely unsatisfactory to the railway men. It is unreasonable for one of the litigants interested in the case coming up for adjudication to have the right to appoint the board. It would be just as reasonable,

I submit, to introduce an amendment providing that if the employees of the Government railway were not satisfied with the board appointed by the provincial government, or by my hon. friend opposite, they could apply for the appointment of an arbitration board of their own choosing. What is fair for one ought to be fair for the other. The Minister of Railways may pass the Bill, but I tell him that within twenty-four hours after it is enacted and it goes down to employees of the Intercolonial railway, and they realize what has been done, he will be flooded with protests against putting any such amendment on the statute-book. It is absolutely unjust towards the railway employees.

Mr. KEEFER: I think probably the wisest thing to do in the interest of the railway men is to carry out the suggestion of the Minister of Railways. He has come down to the House in perfect good faith with legislation to better the railway men's condition. I welcome this Bill as an improvement on the existing law. It may not go quite as far as we would like it to go, indeed it is a sort of experiment, and I agree with the hon. member from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) that it would perhaps be better to compromise and accept the Bill just as it is with these amendments. Then if it does not work satisfactorily, and the House is so disposed, the law can be still further improved next session.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman desires to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. KEEFER: Yes.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. BUREAU: The Minister of Railways made the statement that he had received a delegation representing not only the employees of the Government railways, but the employees of all the other railway systems.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. As far as I can remember they represented all the different organizations of railway employees.

Mr. BUREAU: Did I understand the minister to state that the delegation objected to the provincial boards and wanted a Dominion board appointed?

Mr. J. D. REID: No. What I stated was that a delegation of railway employees called on me and asked that a Dominion Compensation Bill be enacted, in other words, that the Compensation Act should apply to the same extent in one part of the Dominion as in another.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. BUREAU: I am not asking questions from captious motives, I simply want information.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, I recognize that. To put it in another way. What the railway employees submitted was something like this. An employee in the province of Ontario is injured and damages to a certain amount are awarded under the Ontario Compensation Act, whereas some of the other provinces have a law under which there is not the same amount of compensation. The delegation stated that the law should be similar in character in every part of the Dominion. I informed them that as the session was likely to be short I could not put such a Bill through, but that I would introduce a Bill under which the employees of the Government railways would have identically the same rights as the employees of other railways enjoyed. Now, so far as I am concerned, if any employee of the Government railways, between now and the next session of Parliament, should be injured or killed, the claim for compensation would be treated in exactly the same manner as it would be if the employee belonged to the Canadian Pacific railway. Let us see how this Bill works out in operation, and next session if amendments are needed we will be very glad to put them into effect.

Mr. BUREAU: I wish to say—

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but I promised the hon. member for South Renfrew that I would see him next.

Mr. PEDLOW: I will not take up the time of the committee to any great extent. I merely rise to offer a suggestion that I think would simplify the matter very materially. I cannot see any reason why matters of this kind should not be dealt with through the civil courts. I understand that such matters are dealt with through the civil courts in the province of Quebec. I am not a lawyer—and I may say in passing that I am glad of that seeing that lawyers are getting things mixed up so much. I am sorry for the Minister of Railways in that respect; I think he would have been well advised to have kept out of that. I am an ordinary business man, and my suggestion is that it would simplify matters if cases of this kind could be dealt with by the civil courts in all the provinces alike.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Chairman, the discussion on this Bill has proceeded largely on the assumption that it is confined largely to railway employees. It covers every man in the service of the Dominion Government, whether he is working on a railway, or a public building, or a dredge, or in any other capacity.

Mr. J. D. REID: It covers women too.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, women as well. Now, a suggestion has been made that it would be right and proper to leave this matter to the constituted courts in the various provinces. The legislature of Ontario, for instance, in their wisdom, have said that these are not matters that ought to be disposed of by courts. They have said that any claim arising in that province ought to be determined by a board specially constituted for that purpose, and not by a court. Now, one reason for that was this: we found in that province for many years that men having claims and finally succeeding against their employer would discover that the lawyer cabbaged all the damages and these poor fellows got nothing. One object in introducing the Compensation Act in Ontario was that the man or his widow, or his fatherless children, would get whatever they were entitled to without any cost. I am not familiar with the Compensation Act of the province of New Brunswick, but I fancy that it is in some respects at least like the one that exists in Ontario. There is not much left to a board—

Mr. COPP: It is left to the judge of the court there.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is determined by the statute that a man shall be entitled to a certain percentage of the wages that he earned for the twelve months previous to his injury or death.

Mr. BUREAU: That depends on the degree of the injury.

Mr. CROTHERS: —and is fixed by the statute. So that, if the law in New Brunswick or in any other province is like the law in Ontario, there is very little left to the board, and it is not worth while arguing that one board would award larger sums for damages than another. They are restricted by the terms of the statute to pay a certain percentage of the wages earned during the preceding year. That, however, is the case in Ontario. I rose, Mr. Chairman, to set my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) right. If I understood him correctly, he was attacking one of the reports of my department. I think he misread the clause altogether. He read the following:

> In 1916 laws in the field of labour legislation were passed by the Federal Government and by the legislatures of all the provinces except Prince Edward Island.

I gathered from what he said that he understood that laws affecting wages or compensation were passed. Well, he says he did not mean that, so there is no discrepancy. There were laws passed in 1916 affecting labour, but he spoke about the modern legislation. The article contained these words:

> The enactment of modern compensation laws by four provinces brings Canada fairly well in line with the rapid development of legislation of this kind throughout the world.
