His statement was that we had said that there were compensation Acts passed in four of the provinces, and that some one else had said that such laws were in effect in either seven or nine provinces. What we refer to here is modern compensation laws. There never was a time, I think, in any part of the British Empire, when a servant had not the right to bring an action against his employer for damages resulting from the negligence of his employer. But several abuses grew up in England, as well as in some parts of Canada, where what is known as contributory negligence was brought in, where fellow-servants were brought in, where it was held that if a man were injured while in the employ of another man through the negligence of a fellow-servant he could not recover anything from his employer, because when he hired to his employer he took his chances of any negligence that a fellow-servant might be guilty of. I do not think that principle was ever adopted in the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was a very erroneous principle, but it grew up in Ontario to such an extent that they have held there that a sectionman working on a railroad was a fellow-employee with the superintendent of the road living in Chicago, and if he were injured by reason of the negligence of the superintendent in Chicago he could not recover anything because of that fellow-servant principle. This Compensation Act has done away with contributory negligence altogether, and with that principle or doctrine of co-service, a fellow-service, fellow-workmen or fellow-servant. But, as I said a moment ago, there never was a time when under the common law of England a servant could not recover from his employer for negligence by the employer himself. Well, it was thought a hardship that he could not recover where the negligence was on the part of his superior officer, or the manager, or the superintendent of the road, and a Compensation Act was passed many years ago in Ontario—not what is referred to in the article quoted from as a modern Compensation Act, but one passed more than twenty years ago making an employer liable in certain cases to his servant for the negligence of a superior officer. But the modern Act, passed in 1914, does away entirely with the question of contributory negligence and the doctrine of co-service or fellow-service, allowing a man a certain percentage of the wages that he earned during the twelve months next preceding the time when he was injured. If he is killed his widow gets a certain amount of money per month while she remains a widow, and each child receives a certain amount per month until it reaches a certain age. So that these boards in Ontario have very little latitude after all.

Mr. BUREAU: Might I ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) to determine in the Bill what procedure will be followed in an action against the Crown? Will it be the provincial procedure, or the procedure followed in the Exchequer Court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not be the same as in the Exchequer Court, because he would not be suing in the Exchequer Court. He would be suing in the court that had jurisdiction in the province. The only question that comes up then is the question of service, and the ordinary law would apply as to what would be service for the Crown. In actions against the Crown with respect to railway claims under $500, special provision is made for service on railway agents on the line. This procedure would not apply in this case. I have not looked into the point to see just what would be service on the Crown, but that would be for the judge in the case to determine. I do not think it is necessary here to go to the extent of fixing what is service on the Crown, nor do I think it would be wise to legislate that service on officers of the Crown situated in far-off provinces, would be service, for the reason that this Act is so very wide, enabling suits to be lodged against the Crown by employees of any department whatever. I do not think it would be wise to facilitate service in such a way as to enable a man to serve some one at a great distance—perhaps a comparatively minor employee—and obtain judgment before there could be even notice upon those who were responsible to refute or dispute the claim. I think we had better leave it to the application of the ordinary law for the time being, and not provide means for facilitating service.

Mr. BUREAU: Will service be on the Attorney General?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Leave it to the application of the law. I would not undertake to advise what the law would be.

Mr. JACOBS: The matter of service is a very important one. In this case the proceedings would be against the Minister of Railways—

Mr. J. D. REID: It might be against any department.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, but notice would have to be served on some department. In the province of Quebec, when we wish to proceed against the Crown, a petition of right must be served on the Attorney General. Here a new Act is being brought into life. If you legislate in a substantive way, you must have the adjectival part at the same time the procedure indicating how the Act is to be carried into force. With all the statutes before us, we lawyers sometimes have the greatest difficulty in advising clients what to do. If no procedure is provided for the party who is asking for compensation will find himself in the midst of so many complications before he gets through that he may find this law will be of very little value.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not appoint a committee of business men—not lawyers—to fix it up?

Mr. JACOBS: Suppose we appoint ex-Ministers of Militia and Defence.

Mr. MOWAT: No more dangerous suggestion could be adopted than that of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs). Nothing is more dangerous than for one legislative body to interfere with the machinery of another. If there is any trouble in the province of Quebec, let the persons interested go to the Quebec legislature and get it remedied.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask—

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that the rule which says that the rules of the House must be observed in committee with the exception that a member may speak more than once should not be interpreted to mean that more than one member may speak at the same time.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend simply wanted to speak more than once.

Mr. MOWAT: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) is quite correct in asking that this clause be put through as it was drawn. He says that the parliamentary counsel, the solicitor of his department, and the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners assisted in drafting the clause, and it is not likely that by getting up one after the other in a haphazard way we can reasonably declare the law better than that tribunal of three. I think that some members who have spoken have not realized the difference between a court and a board. A court determines whether there is liability on the part of the employer; a board assumes that there is liability. In Ontario there is no question of whether there is liability or not; every employee has a remedy.

Mr. JACOBS: Certainly, it is the same all over.

Mr. MOWAT: The whole point is as to the amount of the compensation. The Government think that they should have a right to determine the compensation from time to time, and if in their opinion the boards are not proceeding on a proper basis, the Dominion, as the superior legislative body, should have the right to take action in the matter. That would not affect any railway employee, as some hon. gentlemen have contended, because his claim would be decided before any change was made.

Mr. BUREAU: In our province the court decides not that there is liability, but the amount of the damages. Liability is created by law, and the amount of compensation is limited. But what we want to know is how we are going to serve, and where. If I sue the Minister of Public Works, where am I to serve him? If I sue the Department of Customs, where am I to serve the Department of Customs? In such cases I am suing His Majesty the King; where am I to notify him that he is to appear? If we are to have an Act to help employees of the Government, let us give them the means of bringing the King before the proper tribunal in order that he may answer the demands made upon him for compensation.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I am surprised to hear the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), who represents such a large railway constituency, say that he is satisfied with the general provisions of this Act so far as compensation is concerned. The particulars of the Bill are practically the same as the terms of the resolution. I am not satisfied with the provisions of the Bill respecting compensation. I was glad to hear the Minister of Railways say that this is a measure of temporary relief, and that the Government propose to bring in a measure of compensation which will apply to the whole of Canada. The first objection I have to the general principle of this Bill is that the compensation which will be awarded to the same class of employees throughout the Dominion is not uniform. A man may be injured on a railway in Ontario and when he seeks compensation he is brought under the terms of the Compensation Act in force in that province. He then appears before a board, and that board determine whether or not they have jurisdiction over the action which has brought about the injury. Their decision is final and no further compensation or damage can be recovered against the employer, or, consequently, against the Dominion Government. In Saskatchewan they have not a modern Compensation Act, but an Act which places the administration of such cases in the hands of the district court. The man who receives an injury, even if he was slightly negligent, would be entitled to recover damages. The measure of the damage for accident to which he would be entitled is determined by the various clauses of the statute, and, in the case of death, the amount which his dependents could recover is limited, I think, to $1,800. In Ontario the limit is $2,500. We must note this distinction: Under the Compensation Act of Ontario, once the board assumes jurisdiction to determine the amount of damage, the amount which they assess is limited to $2,500 and there is no possible recovery beyond that. Under the Saskatchewan Act—the same Act is in force in Alberta—where a man is injured or where a man has been killed and leaves dependents the injured man or the dependents have the right to elect whether they shall proceed for the recovery of damages under the Compensation Act or in an action at common law. That is a matter of great importance to the dependent family. A man may be killed by the negligence of a railway corporation, and an action may be brought under the Compensation Act. In Ontario, $2,500 is the limit that can be awarded under the Compensation Act, but if an action were brought at common law in Saskatchewan or in the other provinces which have similar Acts, for that act of negligence, the railway corporation or the employer, whoever he or it might be, would be assessed in damages which would be adequate compensation; it might be $5,000, $8,000, $10,000 or $15,000 the dependents would receive. I believe that when we adopt the compensation Acts of the provinces we are taking away from the employees the right which they may have at common law, that is, assuming that this Government intends to give to employees the right to bring an action against the Crown. I think that whatever scheme of compensation is adopted by this Parliament for the benefit of Government employees in this country should establish, first, that they may have their remedy under the Compensation Act, if they so desire and wish to recover damages for something in the nature of an accident, or secondly, that they may bring an action at common law. I think the Minister of Railways, when he discusses this matter fully with the representative of the railway organizations, will find that that is the principle which they have in mind, because I have discussed this matter with a great many railway men in the West and know their viewpoint. While they appreciate, no doubt, what the Government is doing for them, I trust that when the minister has had an opportunity of looking into this he will introduce a compensation Act into this Parliament which shall apply to all employees of this Government throughout the whole Dominion.

Mr. CAHILL: Will this Act apply to employees of the Canadian Northern railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian Northern railway comes under the provincial Acts, just the same as the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 1, subsection 4—employees on Government railways must elect between Railway Provident Societies benefits and this Act:

Mr. WIGMORE: Does this mean that members of the Provident Fund will not share in this compensation?

Mr. J. D. REID: When this Bill was being drafted, I sent for representatives of the Provident Fund and discussed the matter with them; and we have had the Bill drafted so as not to interfere with their rights in any way. The Provident Fund Act was passed in 1907, and to that fund the Dominion Government subscribes $100,000 per annum. Members of the fund have a great many different rights; they are pensioned for life, for instance, and receive so many weeks' pay in case of injury, and so on. The object of this clause is not to take away any rights a member of the Provident Fund would have under the fund in the case of injuries or death by accident. There is a board of managers of the Provident Fund, and they have regulations governing the amount that shall be paid for different injuries, and I think there is also an amount payable in case of death. The Compensation Acts of the different provinces provide compensation only for injuries or death, whereas the Provident Fund has a long list of benefits. One of the representatives of the Intercolonial railway was here with the solicitor of the Railway Department for two or three days, and it was agreed to put this clause in and see how it would work out between now and next session. If it does not work out as we expect, then we can provide any remedy that is thought desirable next session. I do not wish to interfere with the members of the Provident Fund in any way. I want the railway employees to have all the benefits that are coming to them under the Provident Fund, but in case of death their dependents can go under the Provident Fund or under this Act, whichever they desire, but not both; that is the only object of this clause.

Mr. JACOBS: I am surprised at the Minister of Railways. He was posing a moment ago as a philanthropist who wanted to see the railway employees get as much as they could. Now we see him in a different light entirely. The Minister of Railways ought to know, or the law officers of the Crown ought to know, that a member of the Provident Fund pays into the fund a certain sum of money as insurance, and when this insurance becomes a claim, he is entitled to a certain sum of money, irrespective of any other sums he may receive from the Government. He pays for this insurance, and the Government has no right to ask him to elect whether he will accept one or the other. The Provident Funds of Railway Company employees and their rights thereunder have received judicial interpretation by the Privy Council in the case of Miller versus the Grand Trunk railway, and I am sure that if the law officers of the Crown had studied that case they would not have advised the Minister of Railways to bring before Parliament a clause of this kind, which is subversive of all the rules of law laid down by the highest court in the realm.

Mr. WIGMORE: The reason I asked my question was because I had the same point in my mind as my hon. friend. I do not think it is fair or just to discriminate against a member of the Provident Fund. While the Government are paying $100,000 into this fund, the members of the fund are also paying in a certain sum every month, or every year, and I do not think they should be discriminated against. They pay this amount every month just as a man may pay the premium on his insurance policy. I understand—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the majority of the employees of the Intercolonial railway are members of the Provident Fund, and some of them have been paying into it for years. I think this is a clear case of discrimination. I think they should be allowed to draw whatever benefit they have a right to derive from the provident fund, and should share also in any benefit they are entitled to share in under the Workmen's Compensation Act. I think it is clearly a case of discrimination against the men in the provident fund. The hon. minister says he has considered this very carefully with the employees of the Intercolonial and that they are satisfied with this. I am very much surprised to hear that they were satisfied.

Mr. J. D. REID: Before preparing this Bill, or deciding on it, I had the solicitor send for a representative of the Provident Fund of the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Not of the employees?

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course it was an employee of the Intercolonial who was a member of the Provident Fund Board. We discussed it at times during two or three days, and I understand they agreed to this clause, and were satisfied with it. The way we discussed it was this: we are paying $100,000 into this fund——

Mr. COPP: You pay that much each year?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes—and the idea was that if an employee were injured and received, as compensation for the injury, a certain amount from the Provident Fund, to which fund we were paying $100,000 per annum, and also received money under the Compensation Act, he would be twice paid for his injury. There was no intention—and I have no desire—to discriminate against the employees in the Provident Fund. We talked this over, and thought this clause was fair. This Bill may have been prepared hurriedly. I will have to take this Bill up again, probably in the recess, and see how it works, and if there is any discrimination or anything unfair in any way, shape or form, so far as the employees are concerned, I will remedy it at the next session of Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some years ago, I think in 1906 or 1907, a tentative Bill was presented in this Parliament by the railway companies. They wanted to avoid their liability when one of their employees had been killed or injured, if the family was receiving money from the insurance fund which was provided by the company. At the request of Parliament, the question was submitted to the Supreme Court, with an appeal to the Privy Council. I remember Mr. Justice Lennox, then member of the House, represented the railway employees. The matter came up before the Privy Council, and they decided to the best of my recollection, that the railway company—I think it was Miller vs. Grand Trunk—were liable, even where the family of an employee had received money from the insurance fund. It seems to me this case is absolutely similar.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have no other object in view than the one I stated. I have been trying to make the Bill fit in with the law of the provinces in regard to other railways. If there is nothing in the way, other than the difficulty which has been suggested, I would remedy that at the very first opportunity, at the next session, and, therefore, having gone into the matter with the little time I had at my disposal with the official of the railways—

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the employees?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes; I cannot remember the names of the employees representing the Provident Fund, but it was a railway employee—I am not going to take any advantage in any way, but would like to have the Bill passed in its present shape, and see how it works from now until next session.

Mr. WIGMORE: The Canadian Pacific railway have an organization the same as the Intercolonial, a provident fund you might call it, and yet, when it comes to a question of their rights under the Compensation Act of the different provinces, they receive the benefit under those Acts, just the same as if they were not receiving a benefit from the Provident Fund. It is exactly the same as the Provident Fund of the Intercolonial. Therefore, I claim this is a pure discrimination against the men in the Provident Fund.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: If the hon. minister wants to put the Government employees in the same position as other employees, why this clause? My hon. friend spoke of the case of Miller versus Grand Trunk railway. The same principle has been affirmed several times in cases against the Intercolonial railway or the King. In my own practice I have had a few cases of this kind, and the Intercolonial railway has always tried to plead this clause in the Provident Fund to get rid of the liability, but the Exchequer Court has always decided that the employee was entitled to the damages, as well as to the amount due from the Provident Fund. This Provident Fund is a sort of natural insurance. The employee is paying for that, and it is not optional either. The very day a man enters the service of the Intercolonial railway he becomes a member of that insurance fund. He must be a member of the insurance fund, and every month a certain amount is kept out of his salary by the treasurer of the railway. Why should there be a discrimination of this kind against the employees of the Intercolonial railway, when the employees of other railways are entitled to both the compensation and insurance, which they must receive when their death is caused by an accident? The hon. minister is not improving the position of the employee by this clause. He is taking away something to which they were entitled before this legislation.

Mr. McMASTER: In comparison with the $100,000 paid by the Government into this fund, what do the men's contributions amount to?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not tell you this evening.

Mr. COPP: The hon. minister has stated to the House that the employees or their representative had been conferred with, and had agreed to this section. If that is so, I will not have very much more to say in regard to it, but I really think that they must have misunderstood the situation or they would not have agreed to such an unreasonable proposition being placed upon the statute book, which would take away from them the very equitable right that they should have in a case of this kind. I am glad to hear the hon. minister say that he will remedy the matter, if any difficulty occurs. I have not had any communication from the railway men whatever, and if I were Minister of Railways I would be very sorry to take the responsibility of taking away from the railway employees the rights they have had for so many years under this Act.

Mr. J. D. REID: Instead of taking away any rights, I believe it gives them more rights than they had before. Some gentleman, a stranger, was introduced to me, and said he was a representative of the Railway Provident Fund. We discussed the matter two or three times. He was an employee of the Intercolonial railway, as I understood. I am only stating the matter as I gathered it from this gentleman. We agreed on this proposition in the meantime. We agreed on this in the meantime and if it is not fair or right we can remedy it next session.

Mr. JACOBS: In the face of the decision of the Privy Council, does the hon. gentleman persist in forcing this Bill through the House?

Mr. J. D. REID: I persist in doing what I believe is fair and right and what has been agreed upon by the employees of the railway.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. gentleman think that the Privy Council is doing what is fair and right?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am not doing any thinking now in regard to that; I am only thinking of what is fair and right to these employees.

Mr. McMASTER: I think there should be some saving clause in this Bill to protect rights acquired prior to its sanctioning. As I apprehend the meaning of subsection 1 of section 1 of this Bill, a man's rights will be limited to the recovery of what he could recover under the Compensation Act of the province in which he resides. Thus, in the province of Quebec he could receive $2,025. I am aware of one claim in that province where the litigants believe they have a right under the laws that now exist to a substantially higher amount, and I would suggest to the minister that rights which have been acquired prior to the sanctioning of this Bill be protected.

Mr. J. D. REID: They have not any rights prior to this Act at all.

Mr. McMASTER: The case to which I refer is one in our own office. We believe we have. The judge may find that we are wrong. This is not dealing with the railway, but with another department of the Government. A man was killed, and his widow and numerous family believe that they have a right to a substantial indemnity or damages. We purpose to try the matter out. If this Bill should pass it might possibly affect the rights of the parties in this case, and as there is this case that I know of, so there may be others. I would suggest that the following be added as clause 2:

The present Act shall not prejudicially affect or limit any cause of action existing prior to the coming into force of the present Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see any need of this amendment. In the first place, it is not the judgment of the Government, at all events, that there has been a right of action against the Crown at all heretofore existing for injuries such as are covered by this Bill. In the next place, even if there had been, this Bill does not take away any right without substituting another and a fair right. I do not think my hon. friend, as a lawyer acting for his client, would have any great cause for complaint if we took away the very shadowy, nebulous right which his office thinks it has in this case and provided him with the substantial and very certain right which he would have here.

Mr. McMASTER: The nebulous right is a right in satisfaction of which one department has offered $2,000, but we consider it is sufficiently devoid of nebulousness to warrant us in pressing for $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Many a thousand dollars has been paid by the departments in respect to losses as an act of grace on the part of the Crown and not as a matter of right. It is the same in this case. If there is a right taken away it is of a character that has not yet been established and there is substituted for it a fixed and definite right.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I believe that this legislation is good, but I would not like the minister to imagine that previous to the adoption of this measure a workman on the Intercolonial had no recourse against the Crown. We have been suing the Crown time and again as a result of accidents. Recourse was more difficult than it will be now. We had to prove statutory negligence. When there was no statutory negligence proved the action was dismissed. We have obtained compensation for employees of the railway in many instances and it was not all a matter of grace on the part of the Crown, as the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) suggested. These cases have been carried to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council. Section 20 of the Exchequer Court Act states:

> The Exchequer Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or property and every claim against the Crown arising under any law of Canada.

I think it would be well to insert in subsection (1) of this Bill the words " notwithstanding anything in the Exchequer Court Act."

Amendment (Mr. McMaster) negatived.

Mr. Meighen moved:

> That there be added to the said Act, as clause 2 thereof, the following words: "The Governor in Council may make regulations as to the title of the defendant and the effecting of service of process in proceedings under this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals), Bill No. 52, to amend the Department of Railways and Canals Act, was read the second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 20—Stores Accounts, Limitations.

Mr. J. D. REID: The object of the Bill is simply to increase the amount of stores which the Canadian Government railways may keep on hand at one time from $1,500,000 to $6,000,000. The reason for the change is this: When the Railways and Canals Act was passed a number of years ago, the Government only owned the Intercolonial railway. Since then the Transcontinental, the Intercolonial and other railways have been added to the Government system. Requirements have increased to such an extent that we could not possibly operate these railways without increasing the amount of stores that we may have on hand. For some time we really have been operating almost in violation of the law in the extent of the stores that we have been carrying, and the Auditor General insisted that we should have a vote sufficient to cover all requirements. On the eastern lines at the present time Stores Account is as follows: Fuel, $1,110,000; ties, $200,000; General, $1,706,400; making a total of $3,016,400. In the case of the western lines the Stores Account stands as follows: Fuel, $1,176,000; ties, $10,700; General, $1,026,000, a total of $2,212,700 and a grand total of $5,229,100. We are getting in large stores of coal for the coming year, and for that reason we are asking Parliament to increase the amount to be voted for that purpose.

Section agreed to, Bill reported and read the third time.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Conciliation and Labour Act, including publication, printing, binding, and distribution of the Labour Gazette, and allowance to correspondents and for clerical assistance in preparing tables of statistics $35,000.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: Is the Labour Gazette sent to the various labour organizations free of charge?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, it is sent free to the secretary of every labour organization in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: Was the number of strikes settled last year in excess of the number for the year before?

The CHAIRMAN: I think my hon. friend's question would be more in order under the next item dealing with the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. McMASTER: The item before the committe is very broad in its terms and it is very hard to know just what is covered by it. How many boards of conciliation were appointed last year?

Mr. CROTHERS: As the Chairman has just suggested, these boards are all appointed under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and perhaps it would be better to give the information asked for when we reach that item.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act applied only to public utilities.

Mr. CROTHERS: Two years ago, by Order in Council, we extended the scope of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act so as to cover all enterprises manufacturing goods for our own forces, the British forces, or the forces of the Allies, including ships, munitions, and anything of that kind.

Mr. BUREAU: I see that the item has reference to preparing tables of statistics. Now, this afternoon a Bill passed the House creating a Bureau of Statistics, and according to my understanding the Minister of Trade and Commerce explained that all statistics henceforward would be compiled by that department. Will the minister explain what particular statistics are here supposed to be gathered, and whether they are to be handed over to the Department of Trade and Commerce, or will the publication still be continued of statistics compiled by the Labour Department?

Mr. CROTHERS: The Bill introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) this afternoon was not intended, as I understand it, to interfere with the statistics that were being gathered in the several departments. Our statistics are confined largely to wages and the prices of commodities, and matters connected with labour organizations. It is not intended by the Act that was passed this afternoon to take any of that sort of work out of our department.

Mr. BUREAU: If I understand the matter aright, all statistics pertaining to labour will be collected in the Labour Department; those pertaining to agriculture will be gathered by the Department of Agriculture. The statistics pertaining to the Department of Trade and Commerce are now prepared in that department, and we get them monthly or bi-monthly, I cannot say which, in special issues. My idea is that all statistics having reference to the Dominion should be within the jurisdiction of the Statistical Bureau which is being organized by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If we are going to be compelled to go to the various departments to get statistics as heretofore, I fail to see the necessity of the bureau which is being established. If that bureau is to obtain the statistics of this country, I do not see the use of statistical branches in the other departments.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon explained the object of his Bill. The hon. member knows that the Customs Department, for instance, issue a blue-book every year of customs statistics, and the Trade and Commerce Department issue another, and other departments issue their own statistics. The object of the bureau is to compile them altogether. Each department, of course, must gather its own statistics and hand them over to the Trade and Commerce Department, and there they will all be compiled in one volume. In that way, you have them all together under one department to be put before the public in book form. That was the object of the Bill. The hon. member will quite understand that, in each of the departments where it is necessary to compile statistics, you must have employees to gather these statistics.

Mr. BUREAU: Then it would come to this, that the Department of Trade and Commerce is establishing a bureau which will publish a résumé of the statistics of all the other departments. Why not leave it as it is now if you are not going to get any more information?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not see how that can be discussed now. The Bill was reported to-day, and will come up for third reading to-morrow. Then will be the time to renew the discussion and get any further information. But the hon. member, I think, will understand that the object of that Bill is as I have stated, instead of having every department publishing blue books, with statistics, some probably not agreeing with those issued by another department, and thus misleading the public, to have the bureau co-ordinate them all. Some men have said to me, comparing the statistics of trade issued by the Customs Department with those issued by the Trade and Commerce Department: They are not the same; you should get the different departments together, see that they are right, and then publish statistics that are accurate. That is the reason why the bureau will have supervision of all statistics.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not discussing the advisability of the Bureau of Statistics. As the Minister of Railways says, the Bill has been reported. But now comes a discussion as to whether these appropriations for departmental statistics are advisable or not. If we are to have a bureau of statistics—and I think we should have all the information we can get—why should we duplicate its work in the Department of Labour or in the Department of Agriculture? Now is the proper time to discuss the necessity for this particular item, and I do not see that it is necessary. I admit that this bureau is one where you will have all the information you require from all the departments of the Government. If that is so, and I think it is properly so, why should we have a repetition of the same thing in each department? That is the reason I want information. If it is not necessary, I do not desire to see an item for statistics go through for the Department of Labour. If the minister can show the necessity for this work to be done in his department, in addition to the work of the bureau which seems to be an improvement on the present system, we will have to let the item through. Otherwise, I do not see the necessity for it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BUREAU: We would like to have some information on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister not answer and show us the necessity for this vote?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I have already said enough to show the necessity for gathering statistics in the Labour and other departments. The bureau provided for in the Bill introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon did not pretend, for instance, to gather the statistics that are known and gathered in the Department of Agriculture, or in the Customs, or the Post Office, or the Labour Departments. We keep track, for instance, of the strikes that occur, and it is not intended at all that the bureau should undertake to report on all the strikes in Canada, or the boards of conciliation, or the wages, or the food and other prices, or the exports and imports of this country. I do not remember whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned it this afternoon, but I know it is not his intention to undertake the work now done in the several departments.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $25,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that the hon. minister is bringing in some amendments to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and when his Bill comes up for second reading, and is in the committee stage, we will talk about the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to repeat the question I asked in regard to the previous item. What number of disputes were investigated and adjusted by the department during the last year?

Mr. CROTHERS: There were about thirty boards of conciliation appointed under this Act.

Mr. McMASTER: How does that compare with the year before?

Mr. CROTHERS: There were not quite so many last year as the year before.

Mr. McMASTER: Would there not be room then for a decrease in the amount of the estimate, economy being the watchword we all have before us?

Mr. CROTHERS: The probabilities are that the expenditure under this item will be larger than it has been owing to the fact that, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, the scope of the Act has been very materially broadened so as to take in the enterprises I referred to.

Fair Wages and Inspection Officers, $15,000.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the special purpose of this appropriation?

Mr. CROTHERS: We have, I think, five fair wage officers. They are called fair wage officers, because when they were originally appointed their work was largely confined to fixing schedules of wages on public works. We are not doing very much by way of public works now and have not been for some years, neither has their work been confined to that sort of thing. They are largely employed in settling disputes and differences between employers and employees before these reach the stage where a board of conciliation is applied for. For instance, we have a man located at Vancouver. Some six years ago we had only two of these men, both located at Ottawa. These differences between employers and employees often arise in a few hours, and previously, if they occurred at Vancouver or Sydney, a big strike might be on before our men could get to these distant places. One of the first things I did was to send to Vancouver one of the best men we had, so that he would be right on the ground to hear the rumblings of labour disturbances and to check them before they became serious. This man has saved the Government many thousands of dollars; he has kept men at work who would otherwise have been on strike and, on the whole, has rendered very valuable service by being on the ground. We appointed other men at Calgary, Winnipeg and Saskatoon, and they did valuable work in assisting in the maintenance of industrial peace. We have been especially fortunate in keeping our working people at work; no serious disturbances have occurred in Canada since the outbreak of war. That speaks well for the employers and employees, as well as for those officers who have devoted their best efforts to keeping things running smoothly. These are the men mentioned here as fair wage officers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The fair wage clause has certainly been a boon to labour. The unfortunate thing is that it applies only to public works, not to private industry.

Mr. CROTHERS: Except by consent of the parties

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. Was not an arrangement made between the Government and the munition factories for the application of the fair wage clause in munition works?

Mr. CROTHERS: There is an understanding between the Imperial Munitions Board and the Department of Labour that we shall co-operate for the maintenance of industrial peace. We inquire into any complaints made by workers in munition factories, and the Imperial Munitions Board assist in settlements. The Imperial Munitions Board have gone so far as to cancel contracts in cases where we advised that employers were not paying fair wage or treating employees fairly. Contractors have come to understand that the Imperial Munitions Board will go that far if necessary; consequently no very serious disputes have arisen in munition factories since they began operation in Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it only when complaints are made by workers that the inspectors make inquiry and report to the minister, or do they keep in touch with the various industries, ascertain the labour conditions and whether the men have any complaints to make, and so on?

Mr. CROTHERS: The fair wage officers do not wait until complaints are made—that is, if they are not busy at something else. We endeavour to keep them going. For instance, our fair wage officer in Montreal is instructed to visit the various industries in that city from time to time, even if he is not called upon to do so by complaints. We are doing that in the city of Ottawa. If we hear that there is likely to be trouble in Toronto, for instance, we send one of these men there.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand the minister to say that he is doing that in Ottawa now?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not say that it is being done to-day, but we ask the inspector to go out occasionally and find out how things are.

Mr. MURPHY: I thought my hon. friend referred to some special case.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, no.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, the House adjourned at 11.02 p.m.

Wednesday, April 17, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SECRET SESSION OF THE HOUSE.

The House, in conformity with a resolution, agreed to on motion of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister on Monday, the 15th day of April inst., went into secret session, until the House should otherwise order.

At the conclusion of the secret session, the following report of its proceedings was issued under the authority of Mr. Speaker.

"The Prime Minister, on a motion to go into Committee of Supply, made a full statement surveying the present war situation, treating of the military position, the supply and production of foodstuffs, and the problem of merchant shipping and the submarine, with especial reference to the man-power position of the British Empire and the Allies.

"He stated that the Government, being impressed with the desirability of giving to the House the fullest possible information had communicated to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom its intention to move for a secret session and had requested from Mr. Lloyd George a statement of the present position which might be made known to the House. Mr. Lloyd George's message in response to this request was then read.

"The Prime Minister then presented other information and considerations bearing on the situation. The military position confronting the Empire was explained in detail. The enemy had clearly disclosed his intention to make a supreme effort to destroy the British army on the western front as an effective fighting force. To this end he had adopted measures placing every man in the German Empire between the ages of 17 and 60 at the disposal of the Government, reducing the age limit for military service, and re-organizing his formations in the field. His forces and reserves for striking at the western front had been enormously increased by the withdrawal of Russia from the war. The employment of Landwehr and Landsturm formations for the defence of the eastern front, the use of these formations to supply individual men as drafts to replace casualties in France and Flanders, their places being taken in turn by the youngest recruits for purposes of training, the cessation of war wastage in the East, and the transfer in addition of large numbers of Austro-Hungarian troops—considering all these factors, the Russian withdrawal had increased the potential enemy strength on the western front, including Italy, by possibly as many as 1,600,000 men without taking into account the reserves which would otherwise have been necessary for the Russian front.

"France had made already enormous sacrifices, and she would continue her heroic and glorious effort to the end.

"The Government of the United Kingdom had accordingly initiated the most drastic measures for maintaining their effective forces and providing the necessary reserves for the future.

"The military effort already made by the United Kingdom, France and the Dominions was shown by means of detailed confidential information as to the strength of the forces which have been raised by each.

"As to the position confronting this Dominion, it was apparent that an attack upon the Canadian Army corps in full force must be expected. No one could say when, but in view of the strategic value of their position there could be no doubt they must be prepared to meet any attack launched by the enemy and the country must be prepared to provide the reinforcements to make good all losses. The Government had been in communication with the overseas military authorities, and as the result of the most careful consideration the clear conclusion had been reached that if the Canadian Army corps was to be maintained as an effective fighting force, additional measures must be taken. The Canadian Army corps must be maintained; no one could question that. There was therefore no other alternative before the Government but to propose further measures for recruiting the needed reinforcements. These measures had been formulated and announced.

"With regard to the shipping situation, the Prime Minister pointed out that allied and neutral ocean-going tonnage, estimated at 33,000,000 tons at the beginning of the war, had been reduced at the end of 1917 by a net loss of 2,500,000 tons, that is, about 8 per cent; while British tonnage, considered separately, had suffered a reduction of 20 per cent, the tonnage being 18,000,000 tons at the outbreak of war and the net loss, taking into account new construction as in the other case, being 3,500,000 tons.

"The strain on British shipping was illustrated by a citation of the very large proportion which is devoted to the special war services of the army, navy, the Allies and the British Dominions. The result was a very serious reduction in the amount available for supplying the United Kingdom with its essential foods and materials and the sacrifices imposed upon the people of Great Britain could not be overstated. The shipbuilding programme of the Empire and the Allies was explained. The important question of the world's food supply was reviewed and the House was made acquainted with information pointing to the vital necessity for stimulating increased production.

"In conclusion the Prime Minister urged that it must be recognized that the position was one of extreme gravity. In view of the issues involved Germany must be defeated. There could be no other alternative. And to this end Canada must provide all the assistance in her power. We must supply the men necessary to keep our divisions up to full strength no matter what casualties were suffered, and we must so organize our remaining human power as to maintain and if possible increase our agricultural production.

"Following the Prime Minister's statement a brief discussion ensued, those who took part in it being Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Sam Hughes and General Mewburn.

"The members of the Senate attended the session, that House having adjourned for the purpose."

And at five minutes past five of the clock in the afternoon, the House having so ordered, the doors were opened.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen, (Minister of the Inertior), Bill 39, to amend the Yukon Act, was read the third time, and passed.

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) Bill 32, respecting the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, was read the third time and passed.

COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways) moved: Third reading of Bill No. 51, to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duty.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers). It is provided by the Bill that Government employees of each province shall be treated the same as ordinary employees, coming within the Employers' Liability and the Workmen's Compensation Act. The question arose yesterday as to how we should designate the Crown when we desire to bring an action and desire to summon the King. The summons is in the name of the King, and it will be the King summoning the King. I would suppose that if a man worked for the Public Works Department the fact of his bringing an action against the Public Works Department would be sufficient without any service. Could the Minister of the Interior explain as to that?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: It was suggested that the Governor in Council might by regulation determine the title of the defendant and what should constitute service on the Crown. It would then be within the power of the Governor in Council to say that the department concerned might be the defendant. The reason I did not see fit to recommend that the suggestion be followed was that there might well be injuries sustained by employees who could not be said to be employees of any department, but still were employees of the Government of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: It is all left with the Governor in Council. Suppose a man is injured on a public work, where will he serve the King? Will it be the Department of Public Works?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is covered by the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I think the Bill is a step in the right direction, but the way in which the King ought to be summoned and the place where he should be served ought to be designated in this Bill. It is a question of procedure, and the provision should be in the statute so that we should not have to go to the official Gazette, or write to the Clerk of the Privy Council, to get a copy of the order, to determine by what procedure this law is to be put in force, or in what way the King can be summoned or where he can be summoned. A few words added to the Bill would make the required provision. However, if it is going to delay the passage of the Bill, I am willing to drop the matter.

Hon. J. D. REID: After the discussion last night, it was thought well that a clause should be inserted giving the Governor in Council power to say on whom the service should be made.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed some laxity in the proceedings to-day, in order that the hon. member might obtain the information he desires, but the minister, having moved the third reading, he has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to explain——

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has also exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): I desire to endorse the views expressed by the hon. member for Three Rivers with reference to this Bill. Hon. gentlemen can imagine for a moment an attorney conducting a case for a certain client, having to write to the Department of Justice, or to the Clerk of the Privy Council, for information as to whom he should address himself in presenting the petition in the name of his client. It would only require the insertion of a few words in the Bill. I understand this Bill is in aid of all parties who receive injuries on Government works, and I understand the provisions are in line with the compensation Acts of the different provinces. Under those Acts, attorneys or solicitors are limited in their costs; they simply draw up one petition, and address it to the court, and then the Judge sets the case down for hearing. But under this Bill we have to hunt around and find to whom we should address ourselves, and how we should obtain information as to the proceedings. Of course we should endeavour to save costs, in the interests of those seeking compensation. This matter should be definitely provided for in the Bill, and make it a precedent for all time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

RAILWAY BELT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill 54, to amend the Railway Belt Act was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Issue of patent for land held by deceased settler.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the object of this Bill to make the regulation, whether in the Railway Belt or elsewhere, conform to the amendment that we passed in the Dominion Lands Act the other night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. We amended the Dominion Lands Act this year, so as to provide that where the patentee died before the issue of the patent the minister would have power to have the patent issued in the name of the deceased person, the intention being to avoid the necessity of seeking out the heirs entitled to the real estate of the deceased. It is particularly applicable to provinces where the heirs are entitled to the legal estate of the deceased, and where the administrator is not entitled to it, and where the department would not be justified in having patent issued to the administrator. The railway belt of British Columbia and the Peace River district is particularly the place where the need of this amendment is most felt, because by the law of British Columbia we cannot relieve ourselves of responsibility by issuing a patent to the administrator of a deceased patentee.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. T. W. Crothers (Minister of Labour) Bill No. 48, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps the minister might give a brief sketch of the proposed amendments.

Mr. CROTHERS: The amendments do not propose any change in the principle of the Bill, but are suggested with a view to increased efficiency in the working out of the intentions of the Act. The amendments will explain themselves as we come to them. There is no opposition to the Bill so far as I know; the working people are in favour of it.

On section 1—employee or employer not to cease to be such for lockout, strike, etc.:

Mr. BUREAU: What change is there from the old Act?

Mr. CROTHERS: In several cases it has been held by courts that as the Act provides for an investigation of disputes between employers and employees, immediately there is a strike that relationship no longer exists. If a number of men went on strike yesterday, for instance, and applied for a board to-day, under this decision of the courts they would not be entitled to a board because the relationship of master and servant had ceased. This amendment aims at placing them in a position to apply for a board even after they have gone on a strike or lockout.

Mr. BUREAU: Under the old law they had to apply for the board before they could call a strike. The object of this amendment is to allow the men to apply for a board even after they have gone out on strike, and to extend the same privilege to the employer?

Mr. CROTHERS: That is the idea.

Mr. BUREAU: The amendment is for that object only?

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Minister to appoint boards on application:

Mr. BUREAU: Have any special cases not covered by the old Act been drawn to the attention of the minister, and if so, what is the nature of those cases?

Mr. CROTHERS: The first subsection of the old Act has been somewhat altered to give us authority to appoint a Board of Conciliation even in cases affecting Government railways, for instance. Under the Industrial Disputes Act, in a case of that kind proceedings would have to be taken under the Conciliation and Labour Act. These proceedings were very circuitous and unsatisfactory, and as the Industrial Disputes Act is very much more direct. I thought it would be an advantage to have the Board of Conciliation appointed under the latter Act rather than take proceedings under the former. Referring to subsection 2, cases often arise where applications are made for a board by people who are not lawyers. The officers of a labour organization for example, would send an application from Vancouver, we will say, and it would take it a week to reach Ottawa. Perhaps you will find, if you examine the application very carefully, that some of the provisions of the Act have not been strictly complied with. I take up these applications, and, if satisfied that in substance the requirements of the Act have been met, I establish a board, although there may be some technical objections to them because it would require another week to send the forms back to Vancouver, and a third week to get them back here again. As my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) knows, working people during his administration, as well as during mine, have often objected to what they call delay in having these investigations made. They insist, and very properly so I think, that the inquiry should go forward just as soon as possible after the application is made. I have found that employers in many cases where an application is made —written out by workingmen who are not lawyers and perhaps do not strictly comply with the provisions of the statutes—go to a court and ask for an interim injunction. An interim injunction is granted ex parte for a week or ten days, and then the matter comes up and is further adjourned perhaps for three months. In that way the object of the Act is entirely defeated. Now I think it would be a great advantage if employers, or employees either, were not permitted to go to court at all to determine whether or not the application justified the establishing of a board, and that they should have no power to question the boards procedure. Lawyers do not appear before these boards; they are supposed to hear the evidence and act upon common sense principles, and settle the matter, if possible, in a manner satisfactory to both parties without so much regard to legal forms.

Hon. gentlemen will notice that in the section as it formerly stood it was declared that the finding of the minister should be final, but notwithstanding that courts have held that they have a right to inquire whether or not the facts warranted the establishment of a board. I am now proposing to make the Act so strong as to prevent any interference. It is a matter, I think, which may be safely left to the Minister of Labour as to whether the circumstances warrant the inquiry provided for by this Act, and personally I feel very strongly that it is a very proper provision. We have several examples of similar legislation. In substance the findings of the Board of Railway Commissioners are not to be reviewed by judges.

Mr. BUREAU: Are they not reviewed by the Governor in Council?

Mr. CROTHERS: Well, practically they are not.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there not an appeal on questions of law to the Supreme Court?

Mr. CROTHERS: Only in certain cases. Speaking generally, the findings of the Board of Railway Commissioners are final, and are not reviewed by any court. Furthermore, in my recollection, there has not been a change made by Order in Council during the last six or seven years. In certain cases, as I already said, an appeal may be made to the Supreme Court on points of law, but, speaking generally, there is practically no appeal from the board's findings. The Workmen's Compensation Act in the province of Ontario contains a somewhat similar provision to what is proposed here. There is no appeal from the decisions of the board, those decisions are final, the courts have nothing to do with them. That was thoroughly threshed out when the recent Workmen's Compensation Act was before the legislature of Ontario, and I think the legislature was unanimous in reaching the conclusion that it was not a case for any appeal, but that it was very important that decisions should be made promptly, and that the decision of the board should be final.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Although the amendment seems to be very drastic, yet I realize that in the application of this law, and in its administration, the hands of the minister should be strengthened in order that the purpose of the law may not be defeated by technicalities or trivial objections. I remember a case in Montreal some years ago where objection to the constitution of the board in the matter of a strike or lock-out, I forget which, resulted in court proceedings which extended over months and months, even years, and thereby the object of the law was frustrated. I believe that the spirit of this legislation is well understood by the people at large. They understand how desirable it is that capital and labour should come to an understanding by the best available means, and the best available means is that they be brought together before a board of investigation and air their grievances, and the publicity of the report of the board cures the evil in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Therefore, in my judgment, although the minister is taking very drastic powers, yet having regard to the spirit of the law, its popularity with the people at large, and its success in practical operation, we are warranted in giving such powers to the minister. After all, you want to bring the interested parties together. That was the great difficulty in the past. Under this Act you bring them together, you investigate the grievance which exists, and if the parties concerned are not bound by the report, public opinion will compel them to accept the decision of the majority of the board.

Mr. McCREA: Whilst the Bill may appear to be drastic I do not think it is quite drastic enough. At this particular time when the Government is passing Orders in Council very easily, and perhaps with good reason, I think it would be well advised if it passed an Order in Council, as a war measure and operative during the period of the war, making it an impossibility either for men to go on strike, or for employers to force a lock-out. Now just to emphasize what I mean: At the present time when there is a scarcity of labour and an urgent demand that every man should make himself useful, the idea of tying up a business because somebody is dissatisfied with his pay or with the conditions of his employment, is altogether wrong. I do not mean to say that the labourer should be compelled to continue working at his present wages if he is dissatisfied, but it is open to him to make application for redress to the board appointed to deal with these matters if he thinks fit, and in the meantime he should be compelled to continue at work. As a further illustration of what I mean let me say that I was in Fort William on the first of last October when six or eight hundred elevator men went on strike. I asked some of those interested what was the cause of the strike. They told me: There are thousands of cars of grain standing to-day on the siding here, waiting to be loaded or unloaded, which cannot be released owing to this strike. There are also some twenty vessels tied up at the docks waiting to be loaded and yet nobody can be got to do anything. Now at a time when carriers are hampered in the effort to give satisfactory transportation to the public, whether by water or by rail, it is a very serious matter to tie up thousands of cars which should be in operation and performing that service which is urgently needed. It is a very serious matter to tie up the services of fifteen, twenty or more vessels simply because a few hundred men are not satisfied with their working conditions. I think the Government will be well advised if they would pass one of these Orders in Council, which seem to be very handy, making it a criminal offence for men to go out on strike or for the operators to lock out. These differences can be settled: If the employers or the labourers are not satisfied, let them apply to the board; let them get a ruling from the board, and meanwhile keep on doing business. It is in the interest of the business of this country that strikes be one of the things we must not have during the war.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I do not approve of the contention of my hon. friend (Mr. McCrea) on this subject. I think that labouring men should be free to make their request; and that perhaps it would be better that the employer should measure up to the present situation and be forced to pay to labour what is due for its work. I think that would be the proper remedy in this time of stress. Labour should be protected, and the point of my hon. friend, in my opinion, is not well taken. I believe that the Minister of Labour should provide all the law necessary to protect the labouring man. They deserve it. I think, therefore, the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) should not be accepted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let me say to both hon. gentlemen who have just spoken that, if they will look at the Act itself, they will find exactly what my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) wants. There is a provision in clause 56 of the Act prohibiting all strikes and lockouts prior to or pending reference to the board. There is a penalty provided for violation of this prohibition by either side to the dispute. I understand my hon. friend from Sherbrooke referred to a matter of grain transport. Well, that is a matter of public utility which comes under the operation of the Act, and there is a penalty provided in the Act against any one striking without first submitting the difficulty to a board.

Mr. BUREAU: According to the present Act, I see that the minister is the final judge as to whether or not an application is in due form, and also as to whether such application does not relate to a dispute which is the subject of a reference under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Conciliation and Labour Act. Those words do not appear in the section as amended by the present Bill. May I ask the minister if there is any particular reason why these words were left out?

Mr. CROTHERS: I tried to explain that a few moments ago by pointing out that the provisions of this Bill are more direct and more convenient for the investigation of such disputes than those of the Conciliation and Labour Act. If my hon. friend had the Act before him he would see that the procedure is very circuitous and unsatisfactory.

Mr. BUREAU: The amendment then would cover all cases of railway and other disputes?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think so.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Additional matters may be referred to board.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister give a case in point?

Mr. BUREAU: What necessitates the addition of that subsection?

Mr. CROTHERS: The men, when making an application for a board, set forth the grounds upon which it is based, the grievances and so on. During the inquiry carried on by the Board of Conciliation, it may appear that there is some other question which ought to be determined at the same time, and the suggestion here is that the minister should have the power, if such circumstances should arise, to direct the board to go on and hear other matters more or less directly connected with the grievances set forth by the men themselves.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

On section 5—Publication of reports—additional matters upon which minister may require opinion of board:

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the minister why it is being provided that the reports of these boards shall not be published in the annual report of the Department of Labour? This section provides that these reports are to be published in the Labour Gazette. For the same purpose as we have recently established a Bureau of Statistics, I think it would be well if these decisions by the boards were published in the annual report of the Labour Department which would contain the decisions of the fiscal year in one volume. If the reports are published only in the Labour Gazette, which comes out once a month, it is necessary to go through the file for a whole year, and it is therefore not as easy of access for purposes of research as if the procedure under the old law were to be followed.

Mr. CROTHERS: The Act as it now stands requires that the whole report of a board shall be published both in the Labour Gazette and in the annual report. If it were published only in the annual report, they would have to wait a year for it.

Mr. BUREAU: I did not say that it should be published only in the annual report; I was inquiring why the annual report should be cut off.

Mr. CROTHERS: Sometimes these reports are very voluminous. Not long ago a man who was very fond of talking and of writing was chosen by the two parties to act as chairman, and he wrote out a great many pages containing a discussion of the whole question of capital and labour and all kinds of suggestions for the determining of disputes between employers and employees. If I had strictly followed the statutes, I should have published all this matter, but I say frankly that I did not. Many reports concerning questions that arise between operators and miners involve considerable detail, with page after page of particulars as to the pay of individual men, and so on. The present proposal is to confine the publication to the Labour Gazette, and to avoid any repetition in the annual report. The Labour Gazette is sent out every month to all labour organizations, the members of which have an opportunity of reading the reports of these boards. On the other hand, if the reports were published in the annual report only, members of these organizations would not obtain them until the end of the year. We are endeavouring to economize in printing, and it seems to me that to publish all these awards month after month both in the annual report and in the Labour Gazette would be a waste of time and of paper. The suggestion is that the minister have power to publish the substance of the report, so that such matters as I have referred to, which have nothing to do with the report, may be omitted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If there was an appeal from the decision of the board, I would suggest that the report be published in full, if it is not too bulky. Many labour organizations are interested in those reports. Moreover, I receive many letters from people in the United States and elsewhere, who think that I am still Minister of Labour, inquiring about the operation of this law, which is followed with a great deal of interest by universities in the United States and other countries. I agree that when the report is too bulky, a fair summary could be handed to the editor of the Gazette and published as the report of the board. My hon. friend might, perhaps, amend the section to provide that the summary shall be submitted to both sides and agreed upon. I know that no better man than Mr. Acland, the deputy minister, can be found to prepare the summaries of these reports. He has had large experience in journalism and in literature generally, and he is so familiar with the operation of the Act and so conscientious and painstaking in its administration that I should have no hesitation in entrusting to him the preparation of such a summary.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister puts me in the position of insisting on more printing being done and more expenditure being incurred. That was not the idea I had in mind. He has put in this amendment a provision whereby he may determine what matter shall be printed—whether the report shall be published verbatim, or in the form of a summary. I do not object to the word "summary," but the information I want is this: The idea is to create a bureau of statistics to facilitate access to any information desired by the public. If the decisions of the board are published only in the Labour Gazette you have to go through twelve publications in order to find them, and they are more difficult of access than if they were published in the annual report. If the minister desires to curtail expenditure by summarizing the reports, why should he not compile them in one volume, so that access may be readily had to them? In this way he will get the same amount of economy, because whether the decisions are published in the Labour Gazette or in the annual report, everything may be omitted that is not required to give an intelligent statement of the decision of the board. I call the minister's attention to this so that he may not be at variance with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose idea is to facilitate access to all information which may be desired by the public.

Mr. CROTHERS: The Labour Gazette is bound in one volume every year, so that my hon. friend would not have to look through twelve separate volumes.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a good deal in the Labour Gazette that is not published in the annual report.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—minister may in certain cases, with or without application, order a board or recommend an inquiry:

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister explain why these subsections have been added to the original section?

Mr. CROTHERS: 63A is intended to meet two or three sets of circumstances. For instance, there is the case where feelings become strained between employers and employees, but neither apply for a board of conciliation. The proposition is that if a strike or lockout takes place in any municipality, and neither party applies for a board, the municipality itself or an official of the municipality may apply to the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Labour may—he is not obliged to do so—on such application, establish a board. If neither of the parties, nor the municipality, nor an official of the municipality, applies for a board, the minister may of his own motion constitute a board of conciliation. That condition confronted us in Vancouver island some years ago. Another object in view is, where there are a number of workmen, perhaps all belonging to one organization but working for five or six or eight or ten employers, to enable us to provide that a conciliation board may be appointed to deal with the situation. Under the old Act, a conciliation board could not be appointed in such a case, unless all the employers consented to have one man act for them, because each employer would be entitled to have a representative on the board. We had a case of that kind in Thetford Mines, where there was a considerable disturbance. Another case was in the Cobalt district, where there were forty different employers with a large number of men, all or the majority of whom belonged to one labour organization. We were unable, as the Act then stood, to appoint a conciliation board under the circumstances. This subsection is intended to meet a case of that kind.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On clause 6--Minister may in certain cases with or without application order a board or recommend an inquiry:

Mr. JACOBS: When the committee rose at six o'clock, I was about to explain that I was in favour of the principle of this amendment and would go further and extend its scope. The clause reads:

"Where in any industry any strike or lock-out has been long continued."

I do not like the expression "long continued." The word "long" is liable to cause a good deal of misconception and misapprehension, and should not be used in this connection, because it is too indefinite and elastic to suit the circumstances. In dealing with a subject of this kind, full explanation should interpret what is meant by "long" or "short." In the case of a lock-out the employer might consider the time was very short, while the employee, who is locked out and who probably is starving, might consider the time very long. I move to strike out the words "has been long continued, and in the public interest or for any other reason." It would then read:

Where in any industry any strike or lock-out it seems to the Minister expedient.

And so on. I understand the minister only interferes in cases of this kind where he is invited to do so, but it seems to me it should be his duty, in case of strike or lockout, to exercise his authority forthwith. The scope of the Act ought to be enlarged in such a way that the minister could really do some actual and tangible work in the matter of seeing that these strikes or lockouts are brought to an end within the shortest possible time. At the present juncture in our history, as hon. gentlemen know, labour and capital must come together more closely than they have ever done in the past. We know in England the labour party practically controls the entire situation, and it is right they should do so. We heard the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) state this afternoon, if I may be permitted to refer to it, that a very large majority of the men enlisted belong to the labouring classes, and we ought to see that the men belonging to such class are given all the protection possible. That also enures to the benefit of capital. It should be the duty of the minister to put an end to these strikes, if it is within his power to do so. At present we permit the strikes to continue as if they were diseases, we allow the fever to spend itself. The minister by this amendment only asks that he be permitted to interfere with matters of this kind when a strike has "long continued." Why "long continued?" Why not have him act at once? If he is capable of doing anything at the end of the chapter, why not have him do it at the beginning, or, in any event, make an attempt to do it? I am sure the duties of that department are not so onerous that the minister could not give his attention to matters of this kind as soon as the trouble develops. We know that when strikes occur bitter feeling is provoked at the beginning, and it continues until, towards the end, very often we have riot and bloodshed. If the minister were to obtain power to at once endeavour to bring the various factions togetner, it would be a splendid thing for both parties and would be an excellent thing for the community in general. Therefore, I move that the section be amended in the way I suggested.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would not be put quite in that form. The hon. member desires the section to read in this way?

Where in any industry any strike or lockout has occurred.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend has not read the whole section.

Mr. JACOBS: I think I have.

Mr. CROTHERS: Then I do not think the hon. gentleman has comprehended it. It is not confined to a strike or lockout at all. It says:

Or for any other reason.

The minister does not require to wait for strike or lockout. He may do this of his own motion at any time. That appears in the sixth line.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that not governed by the words "has been long continued?"

Mr. CROTHERS: The clause says:

or for any other reason it seems expedient to the Minister, the Minister may on the application of any municipality interested, or of the Mayor, Reeve or other head officer or acting head officers thereof, or of his own motion.

He does not require to wait for any one. However, I have no objection to the amendment proposed.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is to strike out the words "been long continued" at the beginning of paragraph six, and insert in lieu thereof the word "occurred."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and amendment read first and second time and concurred in.

ORGANIZATION AND CO-ORDINATION OF EMPLOYMENT OFFICES.

On motion of Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour) the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the following resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of Employment Offices, and for these purposes to appropriate and pay out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada during the fiscal year 1918-19 the sum of fifty thousand dollars, during the fiscal year 1919-20 the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, and during each succeeding fiscal year the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and to provide that the moneys appropriated for each year shall be allotted and paid to the government of the respective provinces in the proportion which their expenditure for the maintenance of employment offices bears to the total of the expenditures of all the provinces for such purposes, but in no case shall the allotment to a province exceed the amount expended for the maintenance of employment offices by such province; and, further, that the payments shall be conditional upon agreement between the Minister and the government of the province and subject to the approval of the Governor in Council; and that such officers as are required to carry out these purposes may be appointed under the laws relating to the Civil Service, and their salaries and expenses paid out of moneys appropriated by Parliament for that purpose.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Explain.

Mr. CROTHERS: These labour exchanges are of several kinds; for instance, there are national, provincial, municipal, private, philanthropic and semi-philanthropic exchanges. Five of the provinces—Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia—have already established labour exchanges, but their operations are confined entirely to the particular province. It has been thought well that their labour exchanges should be linked up with a clearing house at Ottawa, and that we should contribute to the expense of establishing and maintaining them. The object of this legislation is to encourage the provinces in establishing these exchanges, and to assist in co-ordinating the work of the several provinces. No other country in the world that has established a national system of labour exchanges is at all situated like Canada. In England, New Zealand, and, perhaps, some of the smaller countries of Europe, there is a national system of labour exchanges, but on account of the vast extent of this country it has not been considered wise to establish a national system here. Sometimes interprovincial questions will arise in connection with having labour transferred from one province to another, and it was thought that if we had a clearing house at Ottawa to receive reports from the clearing houses of the several provinces we should here be able to get a bird's eye view of the labour situation in Canada, and could issue bulletins so that the people throughout the whole country would know exactly what labour conditions were in each locality.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The House will expect a fuller explanation on the second reading of the Bill, but the principle of the resolution will, I think, commend itself to the judgment of the House. Upon two different occasions—last session and the session before—I moved a resolution with the object of having my hon. friend introduce legislation similar to this. I do not know whether he was in fear of a certain lady who was very active in the proposed organization of labour bureaus, but he certainly was not very responsive to the requests which I then made.

Mr. CROTHERS: She has disappeared since.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am told that the lady in question, much to the relief of my hon. friend and possibly of the Prime Minister, is now in the employ of the Department of Labour in Washington. I certainly think the minister is taking a proper step in introducing this legislation. National labour bureaus were first started in England where they have met with very great success, as shown by statistics which I have given to the House on two different occasions. Labour bureaus have also been established in Australia and New Zealand, and to-day they are perfecting their organization in the United States. I am quite sure that in Canada, especially in view of conditions that will prevail in this country when demobilization takes place, and when the munition factories will be idle and the works of peace begin again, such bureaus will be absolutely needed in order to open the necessary channels for labour, and particularly for our returned soldiers. I am quite sure that when we have had an opportunity to examine the provisions of the Bill it will commend itself to the judgment of the House.

Mr. FIELDING: From the terms of the resolution I would understand that it is not contemplated to have any Ottawa organization, but that this money is to be appropriated entirely to the provincial governments.

Mr. CROTHERS: These particular sums are to go to the provinces, but the Bill will provide for the establishment by this Government of one or more clearing houses.

Mr. FIELDING: The resolution says that the moneys appropriated for each year shall be alloted and paid to the provincial governments. I take it that it is intended to give them $50,000 the first year, $100,000 the second year, and thereafter every year, without limitation, $150,000. There is no limitation so far as I can see; it becomes a permanent grant.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is the proposition.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think there is a limitation based upon the expenditure by the different provinces.

Mr. FIELDING: But the resolution does not seem to me to provide for expenditure in any other way than by the provinces.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the hon. gentleman is quite right.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the object of distributing this money to the provinces and having them pay it out?

Mr. CROTHERS: The object is to encourage each province to establish these labour bureaus. In Quebec to-day there are three or four of these labour bureaus —one at Montreal, another at Sherbrooke, and there may be two or three others. In Ontario there are eight or ten. Our object is to have these labour exchanges established through all the provinces.

Mr. JACOBS: Why should not this department handle the matter direct?

Mr. CROTHERS: This country is so very large that it would be a great undertaking for the Government to establish labour exchanges throughout the country to see that men were sent, say, from Halifax to Vancouver. We thought it better to assist the provinces, as five of them have already engaged in this work.

Mr. JACOBS: If I remember correctly, some years ago the Government were opposed to handing over various sums of money to the provinces for the building of highways, on the ground that the central governments should handle that matter themselves.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken; if he looks up Hansard he will find a different story. I think the idea of this legislation is this: The provincial governments have already established labour bureaus in many of the provinces, and it would be an unwise thing for the Federal Government to duplicate that endeavour and establish labour bureaus themselves. They cannot interfere with what has been done by the provinces. On the other hand it is desired to encourage the movement. Therefore, following a conference with the provinces on the subject, it has been decided to give them this much assistance for the purpose of extending the movement within each province.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand then the Government has changed its policy in connection with the payment to the provinces of sums of money out of the federal treasury?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Agricultural Aid Bill which was passed some time ago, he will find that this is precisely along the same lines.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. Crothers thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 57, to Aid and Encourage the Organization and Co-ordination of Employment Offices.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. C. C. Ballantyne (Minister of the Naval Service), for third reading of Bill No. 49, respecting the Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act 1911.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I do not intend to oppose this Bill, far from it, but simply to explain what is involved, to some of the members of the House who appeared a little nervous as regards the power given by this Bill to the various navies of the Dominions. I think it was my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) who said the other day that he did not accept with great complacency the idea that our own men should be court-martialled in time of peace by, say an officer of the Australian navy. I am bound to say that for my part I am pleased that this legislation is at last brought before Parliament. It is in my judgment a vindication of the policy inaugurated in 1910 by the late Laurier Administration, and I am surprised that the Bill was not introduced long before. I congratulate the minister for having brought forward this measure, which is simply implementing the resolutions adopted by the Imperial Conference of 1911. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that in 1909 the Canadian Parliament unanimously passed a resolution in favour of the establishment of a Canadian navy, and the following year the then Prime Minister introduced a Bill based on that resolution by which the principle of a Canadian navy was launched, which, in cases of emergency, was to be placed at the disposal of the Admiralty. The Bill, for reasons which I need not explain now, was opposed by those who favoured the very principle of that legislation. However, the Bill was passed and the Canadian Navy was created in consequence of that legislation. During the summer of 1911 an Imperial Conference was held in London, and at that conference the Prime Minister of Canada was present accompanied by the late Sir Frederick Borden, and the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Hon. Mr. Brodeur. I have before me the précis which deals with the regulations which were adopted concurrently by the Imperial and the Dominion authorities as regards the organization of the Canadian Navy. I make bold to say, Mr. Speaker, that this policy, agreed upon by the Imperial Government and the Governments of Australia and of Canada, was the most progressive, and let me say the most wholesome, policy that has ever been adopted as between the Imperial authorities and the Dominion authorities. At that conference it was decided that the naval service forces of Canada and of Australia would be exclusively under the control of their respective governments, and the second paragraph of the resolution on the navy deals precisely with that discipline of the naval forces of the dominions which this Bill regulates. It reads:

> The training and discipline of the naval forces of the Dominions will be generally uniform with the training and discipline of the fleet of the United Kingdom, and by arrangement, officers and men of the said forces will be interchangeable with those under the control of the British Admiralty.

And, Mr. Speaker, here is another paragraph which is also very interesting for us Canadians:

> The ships of each Dominion naval force will hoist at the stern the white ensign as the symbol of the authority of the Crown, and at the jack-staff the distinctive flag of the Dominion.

I have read on many occasions in the Ottawa Citizen and elsewhere that Canada had no flag, and that it was preposterous to assert that she had one. Well, the Imperial authorities think otherwise because it is declared that "the ships of each dominion naval force will hoist at the stern the white ensign as the symbol of the authority of the Crown, and at the jackstaff the distinctive flag of the dominion." I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this arrangement was a most progressive one and should make every Canadian proud of the navy which was then created. At that same conference, for the first time in the history of Canada, the British Government conceded to the Canadian Government the point that our navy would have charge on the Pacific ocean and on the Atlantic ocean of certain zones which are now before me on the map annexed to the report of the proceedings of the conference in question. We remember how the modest beginnings of the Canadian navy were treated. We remember how our friends on the other side of the House, some, not all of them, spoke of the tin-pot navy.

Mr. R. H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): What is the meaning of the term "jackstaff"?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought my hon. friend came from the Maritime Provinces, and that, after speaking as a naval expert the other day, he knew what the "jackstaff" was. I was pleased when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that the Niobe and the Rainbow had been exceedingly useful during the present war. If the policy adopted by Parliament in 1910 had been carried out by the succeeding Administration possibly the coast cities of British Columbia would not have had to depend for protection upon the Japanese navy when the war broke out. Be that as it may, I am pleased to learn that the Minister of Naval Affairs has cheerfully accepted the legacy of the Laurier Administration, and is living up to its policy; a policy so Canadian and at the same time so British, and so sanely Imperial as was the Laurier naval policy. The Bill which is about to be read the third time simply carries out the policy arrived at at the Imperial conference of 1911, and I shall support it cordially.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

SALARIES ACT AMENDMENT—INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden moved second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Salaries Act, and the provisions for preserving the independence of Parliament.

Mr. J. BUREAU (Three Rivers): Before the motion carries I wish to tell the Prime Minister that I do not exactly agree with the principle of multiplying departments and handling salaries as has been laid down by the Government. Two or three new ministries have been created, leaving aside various commissions that have been appointed, some to work in conjunction, some under the control of, and others apparently absolutely independent of any department of the Government. We understand that the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is created for a purpose. It is created for all time, but I hope that the existing conditions which make it a necessity, or if not a necessity, at least an expediency, to multiply the number of departments will not exist forever. Another new department has been created by the subdivision of the Department of the Interior, which already had a slice taken out of it when the Mines Department was cut off and placed within the Secretary of State's Department.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was formerly under the Inland Revenue Department.

Mr. BUREAU: The Department of Mines?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Then I was mistaken and I accept my hon. friend's correction. But, after it was taken away from the Inland Revenue Department, the fact that it is being merged with the Customs Department would not be a sufficient reason at the present time, because, before the Inland Revenue Department was merged with the Customs, this branch of the Inland Revenue had been taken away and put under the Secretary of State, if I am correct in my facts. I read the other day a statement made in the British House of Commons on the eve of the Christmas adjournment, wherein the ex-Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, commenting on the situation in replying to a review that had been made by Mr. Lloyd George, said that there was one great danger in the multiplicity of departments, that this policy tended to over-centralization. I believe we have had an example of that tendency here; we have had more than an example, we have seen it in operation. With the multiplicity of departments, the heads of departments attempt to take authority from the Governor in Council in matters which ought to be submitted to it, and to put themselves in the place of the Governor in Council, constituting themselves judges of final resort or sole arbitrators in cases which heretofore had to go before the Governor in Council. This over-centralization is gradually taking away from the representatives of the people the privileges which it is their duty to exercise in this House. As a matter of principle, on the score of expediency there may be justification for the creation of these departments. I do not know but that one of them could be dispensed with. Referring to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment, I believe that the best authority to deal with any matter concerning soldiers is the Department of Militia. Since we have taken away from the Minister of Agriculture the control of food, and given it to a commission under his direction, which, however, I understand, reports to him still, I do not see why it would not be as well to have a commission directly under the supervision of the Minister of Militia and Defence to deal with these military matters—I mean the Minister of Militia in Canada, not the minister for the British Isles, nor the minister for France, if there is one; there may be, I do not know. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I want to put myself on record as being against overcentralization, the multiplicity of departments, the assumption of the rights and privileges of Parliament, even of the Imperial Parliament, by the passing of certain Orders in Council, which I hope it will be my privilege to discuss further in this House.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to endorse what my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has said with regard to the principle involved in the creation of so many new departments. But there are two other principles in this Bill to which I also object. One of these is the selection of new ministers, and the payment of salaries to members of Parliament, without submitting these members to re-election. It is the constitutional theory that any man who is selected as a new adviser of His Majesty must have his choice ratified by the people, through the electors of the particular constituency which he represents in this House. I think that is a sound principle, and I do not see why there should be a deviation from this safeguard and guarantee of popular representation and of the sovereignty of the people. This is being done as a war measure, but I do not see how the fact that a minister is to be exempted from having his selection ratified by his electors is a step which conduces to the winning of the war. Another principle to which I object is that contained in section 2 of the Bill, which provides not only that new departments are created by Parliament, but gives to the Prime Minister authority to appoint new ministers without any department having been provided for by Parliament. The Prime Minister on his own authority will have the right to select one or more ministers not exceeding three, and to pay salaries to these ministers. Of course, this will be done by Order in Council, but the point is that it will not be provided for by Parliament. Parliament must remain supreme in a matter of this kind. Departments must be created by Parliament; the business which will be transacted by these departments must be provided for by Parliament, and surely we should not deprive ourselves of our rights in that respect and appoint the Prime Minister as the real dictator of the country. The Executive must not be the masters of Parliament but must remain its servants. I think there is a very bad principle involved in section 2 of the Bill, and for these reasons I object to the second reading.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like to say just a few words chiefly in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe). I would call his attention to the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was appointed on the 12th day of October, 1917, and he since has been elected to this Parliament. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization was appointed on the 12th day of October, and he since has been elected to Parliament. The Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is a member of the Senate, and, unlike the unfortunate mortals who are members of this House, he does not require election.

Mr. BUREAU: Might I be allowed a question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Two.

Mr. BUREAU: We are not taking particular exception to the present ministers. But supposing the Prime Minister desires to appoint another one? That is one of our reasons for objecting.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will get through with the present budget and then come to the other matter in a moment. The Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was previously the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence. He simply changed from one position to the other. My hon. friend is aware that under the provisions of the Act respecting the Independence of Parliament, and the Act relating to the salaries of ministers, if a minister resigns in one department and within thirty days accepts office in another, it is not necessary in that case for him to be re-elected. That is as to the present. Now, as to the future. It does provide, in Section 2, that:

> —one or more other Ministers, not exceeding three, Members of the King's Privy Council for Canada who may be named by the Governor in Council, may be paid such salaries or other remuneration as Parliament may from time to time provide, and they shall not, by reason of anything contained in the Acts mentioned in subsection two of section one of this Act or in any other statute or law, or by reason of being paid or receiving the said salaries or remuneration so provided by Parliament, be ineligible as Members of the House of Commons, or disqualified to sit or vote therein.

It is provided that this section shall continue in operation only during the present war and for one year thereafter. It is purely a temporary provision, designed, as I explained when I made a further motion in Committee not long ago, to cover the case of the present Acting Minister of Finance (Hon. A. K. Maclean), who is Vice-Chairman, virtually Chairman, of the Committee on Reconstruction and Development, and who in that position has imposed upon him duties just as arduous and important as those imposed on any minister of the Crown. Senator Robertson is Chairman of the Subcommittee on Labour Conditions, and, in addition, is Chairman of the Canada Registration Board, which is undertaking the task of accomplishing a registration of all the men and women of Canada above the age of sixteen. In the capacity of Chairman of the Subcommittee on Labour Conditions, Senator Robertson has already given value to the country ten thousand times greater than any salary that is involved, by his indefatigable efforts in bringing about agreements between employers and employed in very important industries. Of course, the arduous duties imposed upon him as Chairman of the Canada Registration Board will last only a few months. So the purpose of this legislation is plain enough. We have not any leisured class in this country, we have not men who are able to enter the Government and discharge such duties as these without reasonable remuneration. I think all will agree that the remuneration of a minister of the Crown in federal affairs is not excessive, and we have accorded to these gentlemen the same remuneration accorded to other members of the Government. If their time was not fully occupied; if they were not doing important work and fulfilling important duties, there might be some ground for criticism. Under the conditions as they are, it seems to me that this temporary measure might very well be accepted by the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1, subsection 1—salaries:

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that it is Senator Robertson's duty to act in labour matters which affect returned soldiers?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, he is chairman of a sub-committee on labour. The Order in Council appointing him as such and defining the duties of the position has, I think, been laid on the Table. Senator Robertson has been associated with labour organizations all his life, and has had a great deal of experience in composing disputes that have arisen from time to time between employers and employed. Before he was a member of the Senate and long before he was a member of the Government he rendered very valuable service—about two years ago, I think—in settling a very difficult and important dispute between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and its employees in western Canada. Not very long after that, in the autumn, he was appointed a member of the Senate, and when the new Government was formed in October last he was made a member of it, as specially representing labour organizations. Later a sub-committee of the Reconstruction and Development Committee was formed, upon which it was intended to place men who would be in close touch with labour, men connected with labour organizations, in order that the Government, and especially the Department of Labour, might be in closer touch with organized labour throughout the country. Senator Robertson's work has been in connection with that committee and is carried on in perfect harmony and in the closest consultation with the Minister of Labour.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. BUREAU: That is exactly the point. This afternoon we gave the Minister of Labour absolute power to determine what should constitute a case for arbitration in labour disputes, and whether or not he himself should step in and force employer or employee to submit to arbitration. It would appear that Senator Robertson has the same duties. This afternoon I understood from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) that the inspectors whom we were giving him power to appoint would be expected to go round the country and inquire about labour conditions generally. Senator Robertson's duties appear to be in the nature of a buffer between employers and labour men, his qualifications for which are based, I understand, on his past relations with labour unions, as Chairman of the Telegraphers' Association of Canada. Is there not some overlapping here?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, none whatever.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not understand what the powers and duties of Senator Robertson are. This afternoon we gave the Minister of Labour carte blanche to do anything to improve conditions of labour, to make inquiry into them, to prevent and to settle strikes, to try to bring employer and employee together whenever occasion required. If Senator Robertson has the same duties, this would appear to be another case of duplication. Of course, I do not say that there is anything wrong in it. Not knowing the extent of the duties of Senator Robertson, or the exact work of the particular board of which he is going to be the head, I do not want to be understood as criticising his ability, qualifications or capacity. I am simply discussing the principle of this double authority. The Prime Minister says that there will be no overlapping, but there must be a perfect union of mentality and aspirations on the part of the two Ministers of Labour if they are going to act in absolutely the same field, come into contact with each other every day and at the same time not have any, I shall not say friction—this is no time for friction—but overlapping of authority in the scope of their duties and rights under these Acts.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can assure my hon. friend there is no overlapping. For example, one purpose, out of a great many that might be suggested, would be this: The Minister of Labour might, in respect of the last section of the Bill that was passed here to-day, refer to the committee which is studying labour problems and the relations generally between employers and employees, the question as to whether he should intervene, under the power of that section, in relation to some particular labour disturbance.

Mr CANNON: In subsection 1 is mentioned the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What are the exact duties of this minister? Canada is a colony and all our international or diplomatic affairs must be transacted through the Imperial Government. Have we a new standing or a new arrangement with the Imperial Government whereby we can deal with such matters directly?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I might refer my hon. friend, if he desires full information on the subject, to his leader who some years ago established that department by a statute which is available to any person who may desire to read it. It was established long before 1911. The Department of External Affairs is concerned with all matters of communication with the Government of the United Kingdom or with the Governments of other countries. It deals also with communications with the other Dominions. I suppose that, during the past three years, seven or eight thousand telegrams have annually passed through that department in respect of external affairs of one kind or another. Everything that relates to the external affairs of Canada passes through that 9 p.m. department. It gathers up, for example, from all the other departments any matters on which they are required to report, to express their opinion, to make a recommendation, and which have relation to the external affairs of this country. The appointment of consuls in this country which is subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, communications with the British Embassy at Washington—all these are dealt with in that department. Under ordinary conditions the work is not, of course, so great as it is at the present time. During the past three and a half years it has been onerous and exceedingly comprehensive.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On section 1, subsection 3—ministers not ineligible to be members or sit in House of Commons:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Subsection 2 of section 2 should be added to this section also, that is, that the provisions of this section shall only continue in operation during the present year and for one year thereafter. As subsection 3 of section 1 stands at present, those gentlemen who will be appointed as Secretary of State, Minister of Immigration and Colonization and Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment will never have to be re-elected.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does my hon. friend mean that those officers should be temporary?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. BUREAU: When we were making our argument, the Prime Minister told us that we need not worry for the future, because this Act would be for the war and one year thereafter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was speaking of section 2.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it the intention of the Prime Minister, if, after the war, he should choose to take a member of the House for one of the positions named in this subsection, that such minister should not go before the people to have his position ratified in accordance with the existing law for preserving the Independence of Parliament?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. BUREAU: The restriction applies only to section 2?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought I made myself fairly clear with regard to the matter. I shall try to do so again. The office of Secretary of State for External Affairs is not a temporary office, it is a permanent office. The position of Minister of Immigration and Colonization is not a temporary office; it is a permanent office. As regards the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Parliamentary Secretary of that department, I explained to the House, when the resolution went through, that while these are not intended as permanent positions, nevertheless it is impossible at the present time to define any period within which they should cease to exist. I pointed out further that, under an Act which has passed this House during the present session, it is possible to dispense with them at any time, or to amalgamate that department with some other department.

Mr. BUREAU: I think the Prime Minister does not understand the objection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps I do not.

Mr. BUREAU: I shall try to make it again. The answer made to my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) was that this Act would be only for the war and one year thereafter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That applies only to section 2.

Mr. BUREAU: And at any time after the war subsection 2 and subsection 3 of section 1 will be in force.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Subsection 1 will be in force certainly.

Mr. BUREAU: Subsection 3 says:

> Nothing in the Dominion Elections Act or in the Senate and House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapters 6 and 10 respectively, or in any other Statute or law, shall render ineligible any person accepting or holding any of the said offices of Secretary of State for External Affairs,—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think I understand what is in my hon. friend's mind. He thinks this provision is destined to prevent the necessity of an election.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, after the war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not do anything of the kind.

Mr. BUREAU: What does it mean then?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It means simply that men appointed to those positions in October last need not be elected again, because they have already been elected. But if any gentleman in this House was appointed to one of those positions in the future, he would have to go before his constituents for re-election.

Mr. CANNON: The subsection says "accepting or holding." The argument of my right hon. friend would apply to the ministers who are holding office at present, but not to those who will accept office later.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly, it does not disqualify a minister from accepting or holding office, otherwise he would not be in the House of Commons; but when he accepts one of those offices he must go back to his constituency and be elected, the same as any other minister.

Mr. CANNON: If the hon. minister who is holding this position at present disappears, and a new man is chosen, this section would apply?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: And the new minister would not have to be elected?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He must go back and be elected.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. CANNON: He would not have to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not disqualify him, but he must go back and be elected.

Mr. BUREAU: If it does not disqualify him from sitting in the House, he need not go back for re-election. Under the old law, when a man accepted an office in which he received money from the Crown, his mandate from the people ceased, and he was no longer a member of the House. This section says:

> Nothing in the Dominion Elections Act or in the Senate and House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, Chapters 6 and 10 respectively, or in any other statute or law, shall render ineligible any person accepting or holding any of the said offices.

Under the old law, if he accepts a position where he receives emoluments from the Crown his mandate as a representative of the people ceases, and he must go back to be re-elected. But this section provides that nothing in these Acts shall hereafter disqualify him, if he occupies one of the specific positions mentioned in the section. Then we have the saving clause as to the time the Act will continue in operation. My impression of the Act is that after the war is over if you choose to appoint a members of this House to one of the positions he is relieved by this section from the necessity of going before the electors to have his selection ratified.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not understand that such is the meaning.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The old law used the same words with the following: "Whenever elected while holding the office." This would read as follows:

> —shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein whenever elected while holding the office.

That is the law as it exists to-day, and those words do not appear in the present clause.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no intention to make any change in that respect. The Bill was drafted by the Parliamentary Counsel, and I do not understand that the clause has the meaning my hon. friend suggests. If it has it should be amended, but it was not the intention to make any such change.

Mr. BUREAU: Leaving aside the fact that the Bill was prepared by the Parliamentary Counsel, if other members of the House agree with the interpretation given by my right hon. friend, I am willing to submit, and I will say there must be something wrong with my interpretation of the English. I do not rise to criticise at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Let it stand.

Section stands.

On subsection 4—salaries to be paid from first appointment:

Mr. BUREAU: I think the same objection applies here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why?

Mr. BUREAU: The last paragraph says:

And such payment shall not render the persons receiving same ineligible as members of the House of Commons or disqualify them for sitting or voting therein.

After they are appointed they can receive emoluments from the Crown, and disregard the provision of the statute which says that they cannot do so until they have gone back for re-election.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This particular section refers in its terms to those who are now holding office. It is not intended that they should be disqualified inasmuch as they have been elected and I do not think the subsection has any relation to any one else except those who now hold office.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Why should we not insert there the same words that are in the existing law: "whenever elected while holding the office"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Because we know perfectly well they have been elected.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But some one else might be appointed to the same position.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He would not come within the terms of the section.

Mr. DAVIS: Would the insertion of the word "heretofore" or "hitherto" after the word "persons" in the first line make it clear?

Mr. BUREAU: Between the words "person" and "holding"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no objection to the insertion of the word "now" between the word "persons" and the word "holding" in the first line of subsection 4 of Section 1, and I move that that word be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Should we not repeat the word in line 18, between the word "persons" and the word "receiving"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the one amendment will suffice.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Three additional Ministers may receive salaries if same voted by Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move

That clause two of the Bill be amended:
(a) by substituting the words "authorize" and "authorized" for the words "provide" and "provided" in lines twenty-eight and thirty-two, respectively;

(b) by adding the following clause as sub-clause two:—
"(2.) The provisions of this section shall be deemed to have come into operation on the twenty-third day of October, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, and to apply and extend to the Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Labour Problems and to the Vice-Chairman of the Reconstruction and Development Committee, and they shall be deemed to have been named by the Governor in Council under the provisions of this section on the said date, and shall each receive a salary of seven thousand dollars per annum."; and
(c) by changing the number of sub-clause two to three.

Mr. COPP: Have only two been appointed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: The Government has authority to appoint three.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no intention of utilizing that power at present.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I would suggest that if a third is to be appointed the Government should create the position of Minister of Fisheries, making it distinct from the Department of Naval Service.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will give the suggestion very careful consideration. We have had suggestions along that line already.

Mr. COPP: I would further suggest that he be appointed from Prince Edward Island.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 1—salaries:

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps it might be better for the Prime Minister to reserve subsection (3) for further consideration. Amending Bills of this nature are sometimes a dangerous thing, and I think there is something in the contention of my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) that the clause goes beyond what the Prime Minister intends. It might be just as well to reserve the Bill for further consideration, after consultation with the Parliamentary counsel.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend suggests. We do not have it in mind at all that three ministers of the Crown should have this immunity from seeking a new mandate from their constituents. If the section does not mean what we intend it will have to be amended, and I am quite ready to accept my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. FIELDING: It is debatable.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There may be some question about it. As a matter of fact, I am not quite sure that all the provisions of the Bill were necessary. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) points out that in section 12 of chapter 10 there is a provision that,

> Nothing in this Act shall render ineligible any person holding any office . . . . which is hereafter created, to be held by a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada and entitling him to be a Minister of the Crown.

I do not know whether the attention of parliamentary counsel was directed to that particular feature of the Act relating to the Senate and the House of Commons. Some of the provisions of the Bill seem to be possibly superfluous. I am quite content to let the Bill remain in committee and we can deal with subsection (3) of section 1 on some future occasion.

Progress reported.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAUGHTERED ANIMALS.

On motion of Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture) Bill No. 56, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Compensation for slaughtered animals increased:

Mr. CRERAR: I beg to move that section 1 be amended by substituting the word "seven" for the word "six" in the first line thereof; it is an error in the printing.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

[Mr. Fielding.]

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Militia and Defence—Allowance Active Militia, $50,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Before we proceed with these estimates, may I ask when we may expect to receive the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report which is supposed to contain the detailed expenditure of the Department of Militia?

Major General MEWBURN: I cannot answer with respect to the Auditor General's Report, but a memorandum on the organization of the whole department, which was spoken of the other day, when the Militia expenditures were referred to, is in the hands of the printer and I understand will be available at the end of this week or the beginning of next.

Mr. BUREAU: The Auditor General's Report, containing the details of the Militia expenditure for last year, is what we are asking for. It contains the only data we have upon which to base our criticisms of the estimates for the present year.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does the hon. gentleman say that the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report has not yet been brought down?

Mr. BUREAU: It has not been laid on the Table and has not been distributed.

Mr. J. D. REID: In that case it may not be available for some time.

Major General MEWBURN: The report of the Militia Council has been brought down, and also the memorandum to which I referred. The latter does not contain any data as regards expenditure, but deals more with the organization of the whole department.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister give us some explanation of the reduction of $30,000 as compared with the estimates of last year? How is the item made up?

Major General MEWBURN: As my hon. friend is aware, having been in the Militia, the militia units in Canada have had very little assistance since the war started. In 1914 and 1915 the Active Militia units were the basis and foundation for the whole Canadian Expeditionary Force, and last year they were pretty well knocked to pieces all over the country. After providing for organization, allowance for pay, instruction, care of arms, and so forth, it is estimated that we can do with $30,000 less this year than last year.

Mr. COPP: Where are these arms stored?

Major-General MEWBURN: They are kept in the armouries of the corps. A very large number of the Militia units have kept their organizations together, and last year and the year before they were parading and drilling, particularly the city corps, at least once a week and keeping up to their old peace establishment. These units are mainly composed of men who are medically unfit, and they carry on their summer training. This is not so much the case with the rural corps, because they have not been in camp.

Mr. POWER: Is it the minister's intention to see to it that all militia officers now employed in the active militia are given the opportunity to serve overseas if they wish to?

Major-General MEWBURN: They not only have been given the opportunity; they have been urged. In fact, I think the Militia officers who have held commissions since 1914 will probably be a little more than requested to join the ranks in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Since the Military Service Act came into operation, no commissions have been given in the active militia, none at all. That clause in the proposed amendment embraces those who did not get to the actual theatre of war, and militia officers within the ages called. In fact, I am glad to say that a very large number of these officers have joined the ranks.

Mr. COPP: Did I understand the minister to say that a large number of officers in the training corps are still employed training men who are medically unfit to go overseas?

Major-General MEWBURN: No; I said that in several of the city corps throughout Canada the corps have given far more than their establishment to the overseas service. Then, in these regiments, there are still a considerable number of men who were medically unfit or over or under age who still retained their identity with the active militia. These units in many cases have filled up their ranks with other men. For instance, members of Canadian and Rotary clubs joined these militia units at the time of the home guard movement, and have carried on their training without any pay, and have done a certain amount of musketry training on Saturday afternoons in the summer. In this way, many units have kept their organization together, and they were very largely the organizations which helped so well with voluntary recruiting.

Mr. POWER: A large number of these militia units could be very easily abolished, and the expense of their training saved. We have in Quebec a composite battalion composed, I understand, of the old 8th and 9th Battalions. I suppose there are some ten or fifteen officers and three or four hundred men. If the men are fit, why not send them overseas? If they are unfit, why keep them in uniform?

Major-General MEWBURN: For the information of the hon. member, so far as the unit he speaks of is concerned, any men in it who are medically fit will go overseas. Those who are not medically fit in all these units—there are some in Quebec and in other districts, some of which are known as Special Service Companies—we are organizing now what is known as a Garrison Regiment, which will absorb any of these men who are not required for overseas service. I hope that the unit referred to by my hon. friend will disappear off the horizon altogether.

Mr. POWER: I did not refer to the Quebec unit only. I understand there are a large number of militia units.

Major-General MEWBURN: They have been very materially cut down. There has been one on the Welland canal, and one at the Soo.

Mr. POWER: And one at Lachine canal.

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not know. There is one at Sault Ste. Marie, and there is a corps on the internment operations at Kapuskasing and at other points. And there were some that we have relieved and done away with in British Columbia. There is still a corps at Esquimalt and one at Halifax, but these have been practically reduced to nothing.

Mr. VIEN: Is the expense incurred by their maintenance under this heading?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, it is not.

Cadet services—For pay of instructors, expenses of teachers qualifying at Military Schools and contingent expenses—$75,000.

Mr. COPP: Will the minister explain what that item is for and what is going to be done with this money during the present year?

Major-General MEWBURN: The object of this vote is to maintain the different cadet units and encourage the cadet services throughout the country. It includes pay and allowances and transportation of organizers and inspectors amounting to $27,000. The instruction allowances total $47,000; physical training course for school teachers, $600; and contingent expenses $400. The expenditure for the year 1917-18 was estimated at $90,000, and this year a saving of $15,000 will probably be effected by a reduction of the instruction allowances It seems in the interest of the country that these cadet corps, which are a very good organization all over Canada, should not be allowed to go to pieces.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many are in the cadet corps in Montreal?

Major-General MEWBURN: I would not like to give the actual numbers; I think there are about 150 or 160 corps throughout Canada. In some places they are stronger than in others. They are really run in connection with schools and colleges.

Mr. VIEN: The organization known as the Boy Scouts does not come under this vote?

Major-General MEWBURN: No.

Mr. VIEN: Is there any money paid by the department to the Boy Scouts?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, there is not. A good many of the Boy Scouts are members of the cadets.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are these cadet corps furnished with rifles and other necessary equipment?

Major-General MEWBURN: A number of the Ross cadet rifles are furnished to some of them. Of course, these rifles had to be taken away from the cadet corps to be used for training purposes, but I am glad to say they have been handed back to the cadet corps. They are in charge of the different schools.

Mr. PEDLOW: What was done with the Ross rifles taken from the rifle associations? Are they available now? If so, the rifle association of the town of Renfrew would like to receive their rifles back. There is a corps there of 100 members, and they have done good service. I would like to know if these rifles will be returned to the association.

Major-General MEWBURN: I would not guarantee that they will. The rifles which had been loaned to these associations had to be withdrawn, and it may be possible to give some of these associations the loan of some rifles this summer.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Mr. PEDLOW: The members of the association have been disappointed because the rifles were taken away from them.

Major-General MEWBURN: The rifles were required and the Ross cadet rifles also had to be withdrawn from the cadets for training purposes, and there are other reasons which I do not think I would be at liberty to give, but I would be glad to explain them to my hon. friend.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am greatly interested in this question, because I was captain of the association at Renfrew for many years. Many members of our association enlisted and have done good service at the front. Are these rifles to be made available again, so that the organization may resume its work?

Mr. JACOBS: The minister could obtain a large number of rifles from the Montreal Home Guard Association, an institution which was stifled in its birth. My rifle is available if my hon. friend wants it.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The rifle that the home guard were using is not at all suited for active service.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not useful for target practice?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is not very good.

Mr. PEDLOW: It is called the Savage rifle—the name is rather significant. While the Ross rifle Mark III was not so efficient for actual service at the front, it was very useful for target practice.

Mr. CANNON: Who is inspector of cadets for the district of Quebec?

Major-General MEWBURN: Major Paquet.

Mr. CANNON: What is Major Paquet's military record? Has he been overseas?

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand that he was declared medically unfit.

Mr. CANNON: Was he not in command of an overseas battalion a few years ago?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am informed that he was in command of an overseas unit at one time, but that he did not proceed overseas because of his being medically unfit.

Mr. CANNON: Did his battalion proceed overseas?

Major-General MEWBURN: In drafts, I am informed.

Mr. CANNON: If he is physically unfit, how can he hold this position?

Major-General MEWBURN: He is only a cadet instructor, drawing no pay or emolument.

Mr. COPP: Is any school or college throughout the Dominion that makes application entitled to allowance in respect of cadet corps?

Major-General MEWBURN: Any school that has a cadet corps officially organized and authorized can get the allowance.

Mr. COPP: Who authorizes the organization of the cadet corps?

Major-General MEWBURN: It is recommended in the usual way to the Minister of Militia and Council and approved here.

Mr. COPP: By the Minister of Militia or the department?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: I have seen the boys training at Mount Allison University in my own town, and I have wondered whether they were receiving assistance from the Militia Department. What is the extent of the allowance?

Major-General MEWBURN: One dollar per cadet, and fifty cents each for those in excess of fifty in each corps.

Mr. COPP: That applies to any cadet corps properly organized, which makes application in the usual way to the Militia Department?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is inspector of cadets for the Montreal district?

Major-General MEWBURN: My deputy informs me that there is none at present.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it the intention of the department to have one?

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand that one of the staff officers of Military District No. 4 is temporarily carrying on.

Mr. COPP: Is there an inspector of cadets in New Brunswick?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think there are eleven inspectors altogether, one in each military district. New Brunswick now constitutes Military District No. 7; it formerly formed part of Military District No. 6—New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CANNON: Is there any truth in the report that some of the cadet corps have been deprived of their rifles?

Major-General MEWBURN: Mark III cadets rifles were called in all over for use in training in the C.E.F. We have taken steps to have these all replaced. The cadet corps only were not deprived of rifles; the rifles were withdrawn from all militia units throughout Canada for the same purpose.

Militia and Defence—departmental library, $1,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Are the honorary colonels admitted to the library?

Major-General MEWBURN: The library may be open to all respectable citizens of Canada, but I am not aware that any honorary colonels have ever taken advantage of the opportunity of studying military law.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister's answer prompts another suggestion. Since we are in the midst of a multiplication of departments and boards, would it not be well for the minister to appoint a board to make —what shall I call it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: A cleaning up.

Major-General MEWBURN: Grading.

Mr. BUREAU: No, I would not grade them; I would clean up a few hundred of them. This board might inquire whether these honorary colonels are going to continue to parade round the country without rendering any military service.

The reason I say this is that I do not think it is fair to those men who are real, genuine colonels, who devote themselves to the defence of this country and who work for the country, who have other men, who are only honorary colonels, graded with them. I do not mean to say that the honorary colonels are not honest citizens; I do not mean to say they do not deserve the rank they have been given, but I do not like to see a man who has never opened a law book in his life proclaimed Doctor of Laws by a university. It is not fair to those who have studied law, and I am sure the minister, who has been before the courts, hammering away at law practically all his life, will agree with me. The same thing ought to be true with regard to the genuine colonel and the "Turkish rug" or "parlour carpet" colonel. It would be a good move to appoint a board of examiners and have a clean-up of these honorary colonels.

Militia and Defence—engineer services and works, $430,000.

Major-General MEWBURN: There has been a reduction of $135,500.

Mr. CANNON: Will this include any work that might be done to the walls of the city of Quebec?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes. The item covers ordinary repairs and works; Halifax defences, Quebec defences, Esquimalt defences and so on. The upkeep of the Quebec defences is estimated to cost $26,000.

Mr. PARENT: How is the work done?

Major-General MEWBURN: By day labour.

Mr. MICHAUD: Was any money spent at St. John?

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not think so.

Mr. VIEN: Why is it that those repairs on the Quebec defences amounting last year to $50,000 were carried out by day labour instead of tenders being called for?

Major-General MEWBURN: As we have our own engineer services in charge of the work, probably that is the cheapest way in which, so far as the Government is concerned, it can be done. It is probably cheaper than having a regular contract.

Mr. VIEN: Is it not the general policy of the Government that, for any work amounting to over $5,000, tenders must be called for and contracts let? Is there not an Order in Council to that effect?

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not think this $26,000 is for one particular piece of work. It is for all the work on the permanent defences.

Mr. VIEN: I understand that every year a certain amount, exceeding $10,000, is spent for repairs on the walls. Why was that work not given by tender and contract? Is the minister not of the opinion that it would save the Government a great deal of trouble and the public 10 p.m. a great deal of expense if the policy was adopted of letting all that repair work by tender and contract instead of having it done by day labour?

Major-General MEWBURN: In some instances, owing to military exigencies, it is necessary to have work done in a hurry, and it might be quicker to have it done by day labour, and I am informed that in ordinary repairs more economy is shown by having the work done through the engineer services. I quite agree with my hon. friend that in the ordinary course work ought to be done by tender and contract.

Mr. VIEN: I am not aware of what goes on in other cities, but during an election campaign, for instance, on the day immediately preceding an election, I have seen an army of labourers working on repairs to the walls of the city of Quebec, and the very day after the election the repairs were stopped. If the minister looks into the matter, he will find out from the accounts of his department that my statement is correct.

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall be very glad to look into the matter, but probably some of the work belongs to another department. Is my hon. friend referring to general work?

Mr. VIEN: I am referring to the work done on the fortifications of Quebec.

Major-General MEWBURN: I thought my hon. friend was referring to general work.

Mr. VIEN: No. I could make the same remark as regards the Marine and Fisheries Department or the Public Works Department, but I am now referring to the fortifications of Quebec. I do not object to the labouring classes of any city in Canada getting work during an election or at any other time, but it would be good policy to see that such work is not used as a political bribe.

Mr. JACOBS: I am rather surprised that this work should be done in Quebec during the election. I thought work of this kind was done only in doubtful constituencies.

Mr. VIEN: I see in the details of this item that ordinary repairs and works will amount this year to $269,000, as against $345,500 last year. Will the minister give us some explanation as to this item?

Major-General MEWBURN: These estimates are for ordinary repairs and works in Military District No. 1, $10,000; Military District No. 2, that is Toronto, $23,000; Military District No. 3, $12,000; Military District No. 4, $20,000; Military District No. 5, $40,000; Military District No. 6, $10,000; Military District No. 7, $5,000; Military District No. 10, $14,000; Military District No. 11, $6,000; Military District No. 12, $4,000, and Military District No. 13, $5,000. Those are the estimated requirements of the various districts. The amount has been cut down to what is estimated as the lowest possible minimum.

Mr. VIEN: I wanted to get from the minister the details of the items that come under that title.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have just given them.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. minister has given the expenditure in each district.

Major-General MEWBURN: No, the estimated expenditure that would be required.

Mr. VIEN: I would like to know what is meant by "ordinary repairs and works" What work, and what repairs?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am more familiar with military district No. 2, and I may say that we have repairs to armouries, Stanley barracks, and such as that. There are many armouries where local repairs are performed by engineers. Some of the main repairs, for instance putting on a new roof or anything like that, would be chargeable to Public Works, but the engineer service has the care of all the armouries throughout the various districts, and the expenditures has been much heavier particularly while the war is on. This year they can be reduced considerably. One or two armouries have been fitted up with bunks, and so on, which has been done by the engineer service.

Mr. VIEN: Would that include roads? For instance the road from Quebec to Valcartier camp?

Major-General MEWBURN: No. When we speak of roads, the only road I know of, off hand, is the road at the barracks at Kingston. I think there was work done around there.

Mr. VIEN: I think the same remarks I made a minute ago, as to the defences, apply to those repairs and works. Will the minister be prepared to say that no repairs or works involving an expenditure of more than $5,000 has been done by day work, and that such works have been carried on by tender and contract?

Major-General MEWBURN: My experience in the districts is that any expenditure over $5,000 has always been awarded by contract, we have always had three independent valuations.

Mr. VIEN: Will the whole item of $269,000 be expended?

Major-General MEWBURN: I would not say it would all be expended. Where we have the engineers in the camps and sapper labour, a good deal of the work can be done much more expeditiously by them.

Mr. VIEN: The small works could be more expeditiously or properly carried out by day labour, but when it comes to any amount over $5,000, I think the House would like to have assurance from the minister that no expenditure will be authorized before tenders are called for.

Major-General MEWBURN: I can assure the hon. member, so far as my knowledge goes, that I think—I will not say positively, because I am not speaking with perfect certainty for the past—that in all cases of $5,000 or over contracts have been let. Where a contract has not been advertised, there have been at least three independent valuations, which have been submitted to headquarters, before being accepted, and the job has been done by day work as a rule. But while the war is on there have been many matters of an urgent nature which come under the engineer service. I know of many urgent cases, such as the fitting up of military hospitals. Take the case of the Exhibition Camp in Toronto; the work has been done by the engineers and sapper labour, and we simply bought the material. If we had let the work by contract, it would have cost more money, and would not have been done as rapidly.

Mr. VIEN: I suppose the repairs to public works at the Engineers' Camp at Lévis come under that item?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think so.

Mr. VIEN: Could the hon. minister tell me how much was expended last year on that camp?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have not that information before me.

Mr. VIEN: I will cite that case to my hon. friend. Almost every year several thousand dollars are spent at the Engineers Camp at Lévis. I do not complain of that, but I complain of the fact that it is always done by day work.

Major-General MEWBURN: The hon. gentleman thinks it had better be done by contract?

Mr. VIEN: Surely, and I think that is the policy to be adopted for every expenditure coming under the control of the department. We are at war, and are spending tremendous amounts of money lavishly for all sorts of things. I know for a fact that in various instances money has been badly spent, and works have been constructed that had to be torn down. I am quite sure that if a proper supervision of the expenditure had taken place hundreds of thousands of dollars could have been saved, and I think the Empire would be just as safe, and Canada would be better off. I submit to my hon. friend that in future this policy should be carried out. Can the hon. gentleman tell me whether any of these expenses, amounting last year to over $345,000, covers any expenditure concerning the Ross rifle in Quebec?

Major-General MEWBURN: Not at all.

Mr. VIEN: Or repairs to or changes in the building?

Major-General MEWBURN: No.

Mr. VIEN: I understand some expenditure was made in connection with the Ross rifle. Can the hon. gentleman tell me under what vote it comes, and if it is shown in the estimates.

Major-General MEWBURN: I know of nothing in the estimates except that we have an inspection branch in the building, the expense of which is charged to the appropriation, but nothing in these estimates.

Mr. VIEN: I know the Ross rifle in Quebec has been discarded to a certain extent, and they are now used at the barracks by the men. Under what head in the estimates come the expenditure incurred in connection therewith?

Major-General MEWBURN: That is a war appropriation estimate—nothing to do with this.

Mr. POWER: I understand that in connection with these engineering works the department is obliged at times to make certain purchases. I presume that they would have to purchase pickaxes, shovels, paint brushes and that kind of thing. Will the hon. minister express the laudable intention of some the other ministers, notably the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), and tell us whether or not in his department he intends to abolish the patronage list? I know that for many years in Quebec they had patronage lists, and when any purchases were to be made by the Militia Department certain men were asked for tenders. On looking over the Auditor General's Report this year, I am sorry to find the same principle seems to obtain. For instance, all the plumbing was done by one man, and almost all the painting by another man, and so on. I would like to suggest to the minister that he give a similar statement to that made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that in future all patronage whatsoever will be abolished.

Major-General MEWBURN: I will go a little further and say that when I took office as Minister of Militia on 12th October last, I did abolish all patronage, and I intend to follow out that policy as long as I have the honour to be in office. As far as I am aware those purchases were made through the War Purchasing Commission. And I may say, not only with regard to the purchases, but with regard to any other matter in connection with the Department of Militia and Defence, I certainly will hold up both hands for the abolition of patronage, and I intend to always carry out that policy.

Mr. POWER: I was referring to the small purchases made in the various districts. I understand these are made, as a rule, by the engineering officer in command of the district, or at his suggestion.

Major-General MEWBURN: That may have been some time ago, but not now.

Mr. VIEN: I am sure hon. members and the country will be glad to hear of the minister's declaration. When day labour is employed who selects the men? For instance, when repairs are made to the defences of the city of Quebec and the work is not done by contract, who employs the men? I know for a fact that everybody who applies cannot get work. There are foremen who have to abide by the list of the candidate or a friend of the Government.

Major-General MEWBURN: That is not the case now.

Mr. VIEN: Yes, absolutely. Only a few weeks ago day labourers in Quebec could not be taken on unless recommended by the ex-candidate or a friend of the Government. I am sure the minister is sincere in his wish to abolish patronage, and I mention this case to make more clear the necessity of doing work that involves a considerable expenditure by way of tender instead of by day labour. Who selects these day labourers?

Major-General MEWBURN: Work of that kind is left entirely to the engineer in charge. Surely we have to have confidence in our officers. If any patronage list is being used in my department it is news to me. I am heartily in agreement with my hon. friend as to the principle. As regards employing day labourers, the engineer in charge ought to be, and I think is, a responsible officer, not tied down by any patronage lists. I am not aware of any such lists and if my hon. friend will give me the details I shall be glad to have the matter investigated.

Mr. VIEN: Has the minister given instructions to his engineers in the different districts?

Major-General MEWBURN: There was a general instruction given out some time ago that there should be no patronage in the department at all.

Mr. POWER: When was that given out?

Major-General MEWBURN: It has been given out on several occasions, from the Militia Council and other places. I have never given any written order.

Mr. POWER: Was it given out before or after December 17?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think it was before the election in many cases. I determined when I took office I would have nothing to do with patronage.

Mr. POWER: Evidently the officers of the department in some parts of the country did not understand the intentions of the minister. I know a returned soldier who lost his job the day after the election for voting for me, and I only cite that as an instance of the lack of strict compliance with the instructions given by the minister.

Mr. VIEN: I hope the minister does not follow in the steps of his colleague (Mr. Reid), the Minister of Railways, who in a letter stated that Liberals and Conservatives who had supported Union Government would be equally provided for.

Major-General MEWBURN: There are no Liberals or Conservatives as far as I am concerned. The lowest tenderer gets the contract, no matter what his politics are.

Mr. VIEN: Did I understand the minister to say that no written instructions were given to his officers?

Major-General MEWBURN: I never gave any written order.

Mr. VIEN: Does not the minister think that a written instruction would make his intentions more clear to the local engineers?

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall be very glad to take that suggestion into consideration.

Mr. CANNON: I notice in the Auditor General's Report that a man by the name of Samson, of Levis, received $415 for removing snow from the road leading to forts in Levis. Was that work done by tender?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am informed that it was.

Mr. CANNON: I would suggest that the country might save money if this work was done by defaulters or fatigue parties.

Major-General MEWBURN: While they are in camp?

Mr. CANNON: Instead of placing the defaulters in a cell, why not make them work on the roads?

Mr. COPP: Every hon. member must appreciate the laudable determination of the Minister of Militia, but it is regrettable he does not implement it. Instead of simply making a declaration that he is opposed to patronage in his department he should go a step further and instruct his inspectors and engineers and those in charge of the different works of the department throughout the Dominion that all public works must be done without any patronage or pull. The minister, of course, is responsible for all work done under his department and he should see to it that the course he has determined on himself is pursued by his subordinates throughout the Dominion. I see that the first item of this vote refers to ordinary repairs and works. Has a very large amount of money been expended during the past year in repairs to different buildings throughout the Dominion? I have in mind particularly those buildings that are used temporarily as barracks for soldiers in training or waiting at different points in Canada for transport. Is that expenditure included under this item?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, that comes out of the $500,000,000 war appropriation.

Mr. FAFARD: How many of the engineers have graduated and how many have not graduated?

Major-General MEWBURN: I cannot say offhand, but all the officers of the Canadian Engineers are qualified—every one of them, and at least two-thirds of the rank and file are technical engineers.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: Referring to the question of patronage, I think the minister should state that he intends to write to all his officers or overseas, to all those men who have been in the habit of following the system of patronage in their district or city, that this practice has to be discontinued. I am sure that the minister means well, that his intentions are good, but we on this side, knowing how these things are done, are sure that the patronage system will not be discontinued until the minister issues strict orders to his officers that there must be no more of this system within their district. It is no use for the minister to tell us to-night that if he has the opportunity of meeting one of these officers he will inform him that the patronage system no longer exists in the department. That does not constitute a general order, and it would be more satisfactory to the House if formal instructions in accordance with the minister's well-meant intentions as expressed here to-night were issued by his department putting an end to the system complained of.

Major-General MEWBURN: I might say that I took occasion to have a conference in this city with all the officers commanding military districts in Canada, and with the members of the headquarters staff here, and I laid down the principles upon which I propose to carry on the Department of Militia and Defence. The patronage system was one of the strong points I took up at that time, and I made it clear that, as far as I was concerned, all patronage was abolished and I would not entertain the continuance of the system for a minute. There may have been some cases where the old system has been followed, but if so, I have no knowledge of it. I shall be very glad to take the advice of hon. gentlemen at any time for the betterment of the service.

Mr. VIEN: From the answers given in reply to several questions to-night, it is quite apparent there is confusion between what items come under the estimates and what items came under the war appropriations. I should like to know from the minister what class of items come under the one heading and what class come under the other. There must be a clearly defined line between them, and to enable us to thoroughly understand what is done I think this dividing line should be clearly explained.

Major-General MEWBURN: All expenses pertaining strictly to what is known as the Canadian Expeditionary Force—that is troops proceeding overseas, and all the work done in connection with them, for instance, the fitting up of barracks, which my hon. friend was speaking of a few minutes ago, and accommodation for troops, except in a few items where minor repairs are being done on the military buildings—are all charged to the war appropriation of $500,000,000.

Mr. VIEN: What about the permanent barracks?

Major-General MEWBURN: The repairs to permanent barracks, like Stanley barracks and other similar buildings are charged to Militia account here, but expenditures on temporary buildings—for instance, there have been a good many armouries erected all over Canada that were fitted up temporarily for the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the housing of troops where shower baths and other such conveniences have been installed, and special hutments constructed in camps—I understand these have all been charged to the war appropriation. Minor repairs to buildings are charged to the Militia Department, but large repairs, as I said before, are charged to the Public Works Department.

Mr. VIEN: Are there any expenditures charged to the war appropriation covering salaries for payments made to em ployees of the department?

Major-General MEWBURN: The salaries of temporary employees in connection with the war, that is all. There is one item, which I shall explain later on, in connection with the permanent force which is chargeable here. That is on a different basis.

Mr. BUTTS: There are one or two matters which I would like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Militia, in connection with naval affairs, not by way of criticism, but in order to afford the minister a little information. We all remember with a very considerable degree of regret the disaster which occurred in Halifax in December last. Naturally, that disaster occasioned a lot of talk, as would naturally be expected, and some things were revealed with respect to Sydney harbour that, perhaps, would not have come out had it not been for that disaster. Doubtless it is just as well that the minister should know this. Some short time after the Halifax disaster I was travelling on a train with a naval officer who spoke so familiarly with me, addressing me by name, that I did not care to ask what his name was. He told me that if the people round Sydney harbour had known of conditions as they existed during the past summer they might have felt very uneasy. Hon. gentlemen know those fellows that come around wearing brass buttons and that play tennis and attend five o'clock teas. They are not the men to look after a harbour, because in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred you cannot import men from across the ocean to look after conditions on this side of the Atlantic. Those " haw-haw " fellows, those " Geordies," as they call them down in our country, those " gaiters," to use another term, do not know anything about our conditions down there. Such men, for instance, as this man Pascoe, who has been down in Sydney for some time has no more right to be in charge of Sydney harbour than I have to be in charge of the Allied forces over in Flanders.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am very sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I fear that his remarks apply more particularly to the Naval Department. If he will bring this matter up when the naval estimates are under consideration it may prove very interesting to the members of the House.

Mr. BUTTS: It is purely a marine matter.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: We are not now considering the marine estimates, we are dealing with the estimates of the Militia and Defence Department.

Mr. BUTTS: These are Militia estimates?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. BUTTS: What I have to say relates to the naval service and to defence.

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled that the subject introduced by the hon. member is not in order. I certainly will not take back the ruling, but the hon. gentleman has the right to appeal to the House if he does not wish to submit to it.

Mr. BUTTS: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking now of militia and defence.

The CHAIRMAN: Well, we will hear what the hon. gentleman has to say about militia and defence.

Mr. BUTTS: Yes, and I was going to speak of defence particularly, and I think it would be well that my hon. friends the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Marine—for I have no doubt that they have some interest in defence—should know some of the facts that I have here before me; and it is purely a matter of defence that I wish to speak on. As you, no doubt, know, Mr. Chairman, from Sydney harbour—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Harbours have nothing to do with the Department of Militia and Defence. I have already given my ruling. I hope that the hon. member will respect the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. COPP: I understand that the whole item covering the $430,000 is being considered?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: There are one or two items in the $430,000 that I want to refer to. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia in regard to the Connaught rifle range—when this work was undertaken, in what condition it is now in, and the amount that has been expended so far, and how much will be required to complete the range?

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand there was nothing paid on the Connaught rifle range in connection with its completion during the year 1917. I am informed that the $40,000 voted last year was not spent at all, and that a similar amount was put in this year in case it might be needed, but the department is not sure that it will be.

Mr. COPP: Has the range been completed?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, it has not.

Mr. COPP: How much land was purchased for this range, what was paid for it, and how much work has been done up to the present time on the range?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am afraid I shall have to ask my hon. friend to move for a return; I have not the details here to-night.

Mr. COPP: Possibly the minister will allow the item to stand, and bring the information down when his estimates are again before the committee.

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall be glad to bring it down if you want to hold this item up.

Mr. COPP: I would like to get this information, Mr. Chairman. It is important, it seems to me, to have the information.

Major-General MEWBURN: Will it be satisfactory if my hon. friend discussed this matter under the war appropriation, when I would bring the information down?

Mr. COPP: I would as soon have the item stand. I may want to discuss it.

Major-General MEWBURN: Will the hon. member discuss it on the war appropriation? I understand some money was paid out of that appropriation in connection with this range.

Mr. COPP: I would like to have the opportunity of discussing it.

Major-General MEWBURN: I think some items in connection with it may come up in connection with the war appropriation.

Grants to Associations and Bands—For grants to Artillery and Rifle Associations, military bands and military institutes, $25,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Would the minister explain how this amount is divided among the various associations?

Major-General MEWBURN: This vote has provided for grants for maintenance of civilian rifle associations and for efficient bands of the active militia, and also for military associations of the different arms of the active militia, and for grants to Dominion and provincial rifle associations. The civilian rifle associations have been practically all disbanded temporarily, so that no payments will be made to them. Bands of the active militia have also been very much reduced in number, few grants having been made during the past eighteen months. For the same reason, grants to associations, such as the Dominion Artillery Association, Dominion Cavalry Association, etc., have been discontinued. Grants have been made during the past two years to provincial rifle associations, such as the Ontario Rifle Association, when the organization has been kept up. These also have been much reduced. The above estimate is based on the actual expenditure for the past two years, having been reduced from $50,000 to $25,000, which is the amount that may be needed.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood the minister to say that it might be possible to reorganize the rifle asociations during the current year.

Major-General MEWBURN: I hope so.

Mr. PEDLOW: If that is so, I would like to get busy on it.

Major-General MEWBURN: We would be glad to have the hon. member help it along.

Mr. CANNON: We have in the city of Quebec a most excellent military band attached to the R.C.G.A. Last year the band remained in the city during the summer months, so that public concerts could be given on the Terrace. But in former years, for some unknown reason, this band was withdrawn from the city at the very season when the concerts were usually given. I would call the attention of the minister to this fact and ask him if it is possible to see that these band concerts are kept up. The soldiers, I understand, are compensated to a certain extent by the city authorities. On account of the peculiar situation in Quebec city with the great number of tourists, soldiers and sailors there in the summer, I think it would be a good thing if the Militia Department arranged that the band shall remain in Quebec this summer.

Major-General MEWBURN: Was it not taken to Petawawa last summer?

Mr. CANNON: No, not last summer.

Major-General MEWBURN: I can quite appreciate the feeling of the hon. gentleman. I was under the impression, on account of all the artillery having been concentrated at Petawawa, that the band had gone there last year.

Mr. CANNON: It was there the year before.

Headquarters, Divisional and District staffs—For pay and allowances of the staff at Headquarters, and in the Divisions and Districts, $225,000.

Mr. POWER: There has been a good deal of criticism throughout the country with regard to the headquarters staffs. Ever since the war broke out members of headquarters staffs in the various military districts have paraded, particularly on Sunday, in staff cars. One of the greatest grounds for criticism, however, and the one of which we have heard the most, is that a large number of the men on these various staffs have not gone to the front—indeed have never set foot outside of the country so far as military service is concerned—while returned men who are quite capable of filling these positions are not called upon and are given no encouragement whatever to undertake such work. I quite understand that staff work is of a peculiar character, but it seems to me that it should not require more than five or six months' training to equip a man for looking after the staff work of an ordinary military district. Such training could easily be given to some of the returned men who have earned the right to wear the red tabs and gold buttons of which the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Butte) spoke.

Major-General MEWBURN: He was referring to the naval service.

Mr. POWER: They are prevalent also in the military service. What is the policy of the minister with regard to these staffs?

Major-General MEWBURN: My hon. friend, who is one of the fortunate ones who got over the top and got back again, must know that a large number of officers were retained in Canada against their will, by superior authority, on the assurance that they should be enabled to proceed overseas. These officers, who have been prevented from going overseas through no fault of their own have done dog's work in organizing, training and sending reinforcements overseas. It has been no nice, comfortable, pussy-footing job, as some people think. I do not say that that applies to all staff officers, but it does apply to the large proportion of them. The magnificent work done by members of headquarters staffs is shown by the results attained by the units which have gone overseas. These officers, as I said the other day, are entitled to consideration; it is their misfortune, not their fault, that they have not gone overseas. I have laid down the policy, and I am endeavouring to carry it into effect as rapidly as possible, that returned officers, non-commissioned officers and men of other ranks, having regard to efficiency, shall in every instance get the preference. Of the officers appointed on the depot battalions which are being raised in each military district to handle the men under the Military Service Act, over seventy-five per cent are returned officers, who have seen service overseas. Appointments of other than returned officers throughout Canada are being made only temporarily, with the distinct understanding that when a returned officer is available, the temporary incumbent must relinquish his position. With regard to the district staffs, there has been a good deal of replacement in some of the districts—not in all,—but I hope in due course there will be a large preponderance of officers who have seen service. I am out for efficiency—I think that members of the Committee will back me up in this—and simply because I have an efficient technical officer who was not fortunate enough to get overseas—in many cases they have been medically unfit,—I do not think any one would suggest that I should kick him out and put a returned soldier in his place. I am however, trying to carry out the policy which I have laid down, having due regard to fairness and justice to all concerned.

Mr. VIEN: Of those specially employed on headquarters staff at Ottawa during the war, how many are officers of the militia and how many civilians?

Major General MEWBURN: There are no civilians except those temporarily employed, such as stenographers and so on. Clerks do not come under this item.

Mr. VIEN: How many of the headquarters staff officers are regularly employed and how many specially employed during the war?

Major General MEWBURN: I understand that some eighty-two are permanently employed on headquarters staff and in the various military districts.

Mr. VIEN: How many on headquarters staff at Ottawa?

Major-General MEWBURN: Thirty-two.

Mr. VIEN: How many are specially employed through pressure of work on account of the war?

Major-General MEWBURN: Between seventy-five and one hundred, I understand; I have not the exact figures here.

Mr. VIEN: These are temporary employees?

Major-General MEWBURN Yes.

Mr. VIEN: How many clerks, stenographers, and under-employees?

Major-General MEWBURN: Some 3,200.

Mr. VIEN: These are attached to the headquarters staff?

Major-General MEWBURN: In the different branches of the headquarters of the department at Ottawa—Assigned Pay and Separation Allowance, Records, Estates, Pay, and so on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Sometime ago it was decided that no officer should be appointed permanently to any of the staffs or permanent corps. Has that order been carried out?

Major-General MEWBURN: No permanent appointments have been made since I came into office.

Mr. VIEN: Of the 3,200 employees mentioned a moment ago by the minister, how many are male and how many female? I want to know if among those 3,200 employees there are many who come under the provisions of the Military Service Act, and who should report for duty.

Major-General MEWBURN: After the Military Service Act came into force, every employee within the ages of those liable to be called out, had to report for service and undergo medical examination. I understand that in the whole department seven exemptions were allowed, and those were only temporary exemptions, and there will not be a single employee of military age who will not enlist.

Mr. CANNON: Were any officers of military age exempted in the city of Quebec?

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not know that any officers in Quebec were liable to service as privates.

Mr. CANNON: I could name a few.

Major-General MEWBURN: Who are liable? Who ought to go?

Mr. CANNON: Who will be liable to serve under the Military Service Act if they do not take advantage of the clause exempting them from military service as being militia officers. Has there been a change in the military command of District No. 5?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes. General Fages was temporarily holding the command while General Landry was overseas. General Landry, on his return, has resumed command of the district.

Mr. CANNON: Is General Fages still on the force?

Major-General MEWBURN: He has been retired on pension.

Mr. CANNON: Full pension?

Major-General MEWBURN: Having completed thirty-five years' service, he is entitled to his full pension.

Mr. CANNON: Has he been retired and is he receiving his pension now?

Major-General MEWBURN: General Fages has had thirty-five years' service. He was given leave of absence until the first of July when he will go on full pension.

Mr. CANNON: Did he ask for leave of absence or was he given it?

Major-General MEWBURN: There was no place to put him, and in view of his long and faithful service, he was considered entitled to leave of absence.

Mr. POWER: I wish to thank the Minister of Militia for the statement he made of his policy, but at the same time, I should like to ask him if it would not be possible to have some means of enforcing it. At the present time, we have, on various staffs, certain men. I presume, as soon as they see an officer who has returned from the front, they will not forthwith resign their position and say: "Here, Bill, take my job." Would the Minister of Militia make some arrangement whereby the returned officer would have the advantage, if not of being offered the position, at least of being made aware of the fact that his particular qualifications would be taken into consideration if he applied for a position at the time being held by some one who had not yet been overseas? While I quite appreciate the great services rendered to the country and to the Empire by those who remained here to train the troops, there is undoubtedly, in the country and in this House, a feeling that those who went overseas to continue their training in the trenches are probably more entitled to consideration than those who remained behind. For those reasons I would ask the minister to be more specific in his declaration of policy.

Mr. CURRIE: Hon members from Quebec perhaps have a certain hesitancy in asking this question. Is it true that the son of the Premier of Quebec has been in khaki since the beginning of the war and has not gone to the front? Is he on the Quebec staff, and, if so, how long has he been on that staff and why has he not gone to the war?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am informed that he is in one of the infantry regiments in the city of Quebec, that he has not yet gone, but that he is going soon with the next draft.

Mr. CURRIE: How long has he been in khaki?

Mr. LEMIEUX: A year last January.

Mr. CURRIE: Are the sons of the late officer commanding in Quebec, General Fages, in khaki, and, if so, how long have they been in khaki without going overseas?

Major-General MEWBURN: I believe he has a son who has been in khaki for some time and who has not gone overseas.

Mr. CURRIE: Who is he?

Major-General MEWBURN: General Fages.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In case my hon. friend would insinuate that the son of the Premier of Quebec was not in earnest, I might say, for his information and for the information of the committee, that he joined the forces with my own son a year ago last January.

Sir SAM HUGHES: More than that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He had an accident whilst on service in Quebec and he was operated on in New York. I came back with him from New York a few months ago, and I know he is ready and willing to go, and he will go soon.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I might say, in justice to this young lad, who is only a boy, that he was very keen. I know while I was minister, he was here trying to get his training, but owing to his youth and other circumstances he was not allowed to enlist.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He had not finished his studies in the college at Quebec.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He was just a boy.

Mr. CURRIE: The reason I ask this question is simply this, that I have received a large number of letters from the city of Quebec in regard to the riot there, and all my correspondents, some of whom were anonymous and others not, laid at the bottom of the trouble in Quebec the fact that the military staff there was packed full of young aristocrats who had gone into khaki and had been holding down "cushy" jobs since the war began, and my correspondents could not see why they should be drafted while the "higher-up" officers did not go. I am glad of and accept the excuse given by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) for Lt. Gouin.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not an excuse, it is the plain fact.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was my endeavour while I was Minister of Militia to get a number of these sons of what might be called well known families to enlist. I never found a particle of hesitation on the part of one of them. The son of Premier Gouin is a mere boy. When he first tried to enlist he was so young that he could not be taken.

Mr. CURRIE: What about Armand Lavergne? He was one of the leaders.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Everybody knows I have a very high opinion of Mr. Armand Lavergne in many ways, and I am not going to turn from it here. So far as my association with him is concerned, it is this: He has always, from his point of view, taken the constitutional aspect of the case. He took the ground in the nationalist campaign that, until Quebec had a voice and vote and say in the declaration of war and the making of peace, they could not, constitutionally, be sent overseas or volunteer to fight. Armand Lavergne has since that time repeatedly asked me, while I was Minister of Militia, to put him on, or order out the militia, for home service, so as to get over the difficulty of his breaking his faith with his fellow countrymen, and, once he was in uniform, to send him overseas. I pointed out that I could not do that under the law. I could order him out for home service, but I had no authority, until the present Act was passed, to send him overseas, and I pointblank refused to do so. I pointed out that he would have to volunteer of his own accord. He was anxious to go overseas. I am not prejudiced against Armand Lavergne. If what people say he has said is true, he should be treated in a different manner.

I have never yet heard, or never found any evidence—and I tried to get it—that he said anything except what might be called shooting off sometimes, when he got excited, and said things that were not absolutely constitutional. I have reason to believe that the young fellow, if he got an opportunity to-day, would go to the front and fight. I have a high opinion of him. I think he deserves credit, rather than condemnation, for his conduct in Quebec.

Mr. CURRIE: Is there a gentleman named Paquette and a Captain Durocher, who are on the staff in Quebec, who refused to go overseas?

Major-General MEWBURN: I could not answer offhand.

Mr. POWER: Aimé Durocher, of whom we heard considerable last week, I understand did very great service for the Government during the recent riots—at least reports from him were read to us, and we were told he was a very good character.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There was a Duroche over to the front.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is there yet.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do not confuse the men.

Permanent Force, $2,575,000.

Mr. CURRIE: Might I ask the hon. minister if the same policy is being pursued with reference to the members of the permanent force fighting in France, with respect to salaries, as has been adopted with respect to the men in the other departments? That is to say, a man belonging to the permanent force in France is paid according to permanent force scale. He is given certain allowances.

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: I understand an Order in Council is about to be passed that will make every man at the front dependent entirely on his military pay, without any additional pay from the Crown. Does that apply to the officers on the permanent force?

Major-General MEWBURN: That is the Civil Service.

Mr. CURRIE: They all belong to the Civil Service.

Major-General MEWBURN: It does not include the members of the permanent force.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not catch what the hon. member said. I saw in the paper the other day that an Order in Council had been passed the effect of which would deprive those members of the Civil Service who had joined the force in 1914 in the First Contingent, of certain pay. I have in mind the case of my own secretary, Major Verret, the Assistant Deputy Postmaster. He joined the force in 1914 and went abroad. I am speaking of civil servants who joined the force in 1914 on the understanding that they would get their salaries as civil servants, and their military pay.

Sir SAM HUGHES: With a guarantee.

Mr. LEMIEUX: An Order in Council was passed to that effect at the time. Major Verret was decorated by His Majesty the King on the field of battle. He received his pay as colonel. If I mistake not an Order in Council was passed a few days ago denying him this double pay. Is that a fact?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think there were several scales of pay. I am not quite positive. I think the men of the Civil Service—and this had nothing to do with the question brought up by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie)—who went overseas with the First Contingent in 1914 were to draw both military and civil pay, and I understand that there was a subsequent arrangement when men went over, I think in 1915 who got either their civil or military pay, whichever was the greater. I understand, if an employee in the Civil Service, is drawing so much in the service, and his military pay is less, he gets the higher pay of the two, but not double pay. I understand the large bulk of the men who went over in the First Contingent returned. They get the greater pay now. If the military pay is less than the civil pay, the difference is made up to them.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was just going to raise the point mentioned by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). Remember, when a man joined the service there was no condition whatever arranged. The Government and the various departments arranged the matter of their own free will, and an Order in Council was passed providing that these men should get certain pay. I must say it is rather strange to drop off now the few that are left, especially when we see the separation allowance granted to the wives and families of officers who have never seen France, who stayed in Canada. Some of these men could not be induced to go to France, and others were anxious to go, but I understand the separation allowance is now paid to the wives and families of men in Canada who have never seen the ocean.

Major-General MEWBURN: These men in France all get separation allowance.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not speaking of that. I am speaking of the waste of money. If it is a question of saving money on the one hand by cutting off the pay of the civil servant, or spending it on separation allowance to those in Canada on the other hand, I do not see why we should save money in that way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not say that I approve of the first Order in Council, giving the salary plus the pay.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But as a matter of fact an Order in Council was passed, and the men left with that vested right, that they would draw their salary and get their pay. I have just mentioned the case of Col. Verret. I have another case in mind, a namesake of mine in Montreal. After having raised two companies, he left with the first contingent on the understanding that he would get his salary, as he was in the Post Office Department, Outside Service. He went to Europe and was made a captain. He married a Canadian nurse over there, and is there yet. He has been there four years with that understanding—that vested right. Is it right that the Government should now pass another Order in Council, and say to that man: "While it is true you left on that understanding, we have now changed our minds, and you will get only your single pay." I do not say from the beginning I would have given the double pay, but, as the Government had done it, it does not seem right to withdraw it.

Mr. CURRIE: This discussion might perhaps more properly come under some other item, but I just wish to make this observation. Eatons, of Toronto, and other firms are still paying the wages of their men who went with the first contingent. While they are still carrying out faithfully the obligations they then undertook, the Government turns round and says to these men of the first contingent, "We volunteered to give you your pay but we are now too hard up." There are not many of them, and it looks to me very much as if the Government was not desirous of carrying out the pledge given to these men. I think this matter should be reconsidered, because I do not think the public will think anything more of the Government for going back on their pledge than if they had still continued to pay these men as they promised. The men of the first contingent are saying, "Oh, it is only in line with everything the Government does; it hits the men of the first contingent." The men of the first contingent did not ask for anything when they enlisted, but the Government voluntarily undertook to give them this pay, and I think the Government should keep its pledge to these men until the end of the war.

Mr. P. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I am very much surprised to learn that such a state of affairs exists. If there is anything this Government cannot afford to do, it is to break their pledge to the valiant men who are fighting for them. If it is a case of saving money, I think it would not be hard to find many places where you could pare off the small amount of money that would be saved by breaking faith with these men. I think it is an absolute—I was going to say, disgrace—that the Government after giving a pledge to these men who went over there voluntarily to fight for this country, should now go back on its pledge after the men have gone "over there."

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not think there are many of them, but what the hon. gentleman says certainly has my sympathy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are quite a number of them "over there" yet, and it seems to me that the minister should delay final action on the question until it has been reconsidered.

Major-General MEWBURN: Perhaps this might better be discussed by the Premier under the War Appropriation vote. I certainly think the proposal should be reconsidered.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is not only Eatons who are continuing to pay their employees, but many of the banks as well. If you go into the Bank of Montreal to-day the clerks are all girls, and the young men who have left the bank to go to the front are still being paid a large portion of their salary. If private institutions can do that, surely the Government, which has given its pledge to these men, should not go back on them.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the present Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) receiving his salary as a Cabinet Minister and at the same time drawing his salary as a colonel in the overseas forces?

Major-General MEWBURN: I am informed on very reliable authority that he has not drawn any military pay.

Mr. JACOBS: He is relying on his salary as Postmaster General?

Major-General MEWBURN: I could not say as to that.

Mr. POWER: In the permanent force of Canada there were a large number of n.c.o's who went overseas at the outbreak of the war and through good conduct on the field have won promotion. What is the policy of the department with regard to these men when they return? It would be extremely difficult for a man who was a corporal in the permanent force before the war, and has since become a major or colonel in the C.E.F., to return to his position as corporal, and I think it would be well to set the minds of these men at ease by a statement from the minister.

Major-General MEWBURN: No policy has been determined on yet. I do not know myself what is going to be done, but it is a problem that is confronting us and has got to be given very early consideration. There may have to be a complete reorganization; in fact, I fancy there will have to be a reorganization of all the forces. To-day we have the Canadian expeditionary forces, the overseas military forces, the permanent force, and the active militia, and at the present moment it is doubtful what the status of a good many of these men is. I have given the matter a good deal of consideration, and I am thinking of appointing a committee of different officers who are now out of the service, and who have a thorough knowledge of the old militia, to go into the whole question. I hope that some of the old militia units in Canada with a history behind them will not be obliterated. No definite policy has been worked out, because other more pressing matters are engaging my attention at the moment. No harm will be done to these chaps, however.

Mr. VIEN: Are the members of the Permanent Force who are now with the Canadian Expeditionary Force still being paid by the Permanent Force?

Major-General MEWBURN: That is one of the items I referred to. The men in the government corps are being paid out of what is known as the permanent corps vote, except the field allowance and the difference-in-rank pay, which they get from the overseas paymaster.

Mr. VIEN: They just get the difference from him?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes.

Salaries and wages, $260,000.

Mr. VIEN: What comes under this item?

Major-General MEWBURN: This vote is to provide for the salaries of caretakers of armouries, clerks, charwomen and messengers. Additional help of this kind employed since the war has been paid out of the war appropriation vote. The increase of $10,000 is accounted for by an increase in wages to some of the caretakers. I can give my hon friend the details if he desires them.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item be carried?

Mr. VIEN: No, Mr. Chairman do not let us be in too big a hurry.

The CHAIRMAN: No one is in a hurry, but if no honourable member rises, the Chairman must declare that the item is carried.

Mr. VIEN: I will ask the Chairman to be a bit more patient and to give us time to consider the items that come up for our consideration. I would like the minister to state whether any of these items have reference to the Ross rifle?

Major-General MEWBURN: No.

Mr. VIEN: Under what item of the estimates does the Ross rifle come?

Major-General MEWBURN: Under the war appropriation.

Mr. CANNON: Is Mr. McBain still the caretaker of the camp at Valcartier?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an old and familiar name.

Major-General MEWBURN: Is it Colonel McBain or Major McBain to whom the hon. gentleman refers?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know who the caretaker of Valcartier Camp is, but McBain is a very honoured name. It is enjoyed by the descendants of Major McBain who fought at the capture of Quebec and settled at Valcartier. Ever since that time the name has been an honoured one in the locality. I do not know the caretaker of Valcartier camp, or whether the office is filled by a McBain, but if it is the gentleman comes of a good family. Let me tell the committee that Colonel William McBain is a gentleman who has done yeoman service for this country since the war broke out. He has saved the department hundreds and thousands of dollars, and Canada, and the city of Quebec in particular, owes him a deep debt of gratitude.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: Speaking of Valcartier camp, did not this Mr. McBain make the expropriations of land there?

Major-General MEWBURN: It is not the same man.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have the expropriation cases all been settled?

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand that all but three or four cases have been settled.

Mr. CANNON: How much does Colonel McBain receive?

Major-General MEWBURN: The officer in question is not Colonel McBain, but Captain A. E. McBain, and as camp superintendent he receives a salary of $1,320.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. member (Mr. Cannon) asks what Colonel McBain receives. He does not receive anything.

Major-General MEWBURN: I beg the ex-minister's pardon. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cannon) to say the superintendent.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Let us be accurate about it, he said Colonel McBain.

Major-General MEWBURN: At any rate Captain A. E. McBain, superintendent of Valcartier camp, receives $1,320 a year salary. That is not one and the same person as the other McBain.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Now you have got it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He belongs to the same family.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He belongs to the province of Quebec, and to a prolific family.

Transport and freight—Transport of staff, $20,000; transport of permanent force, $15,000.

Mr. POWER: Transport of the staff is estimated to cost $20,000, whilst transport of the active militia is estimated at $15,000. The staff cost $20,000 for transportation and the troops only $15,000. These items appear to be funny, because surely there are more troops than staff to be transported?

Mr. VIEN: I understand that every time a staff officer travels he receives a requisition for transportation on the railway. Is that paid for in the item under consideration?

Major-General MEWBURN: That is all charged back to the department and has to be paid for out of this vote.

Mr. VIEN: Is payment made to the Government railways for the transportation of officers?

Major-General MEWBURN: To all railways.

Training Areas—Purchase of land for training areas in the various districts, $50,000.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister tell us what lands he intends to purchase for training areas?

Major-General MEWBURN: There is about $10,000 still to be paid on account of Valcartier camp. There are three or four small parcels of land to be purchased in Nova Scotia for defence purposes, probably costing between two and three thousand dollars. There are, therefore, at the present moment some $15,000 needed to meet existing engagements on account of land purchases, and a vote of $50,000 will leave $35,000 for any additional purchases that may be required during the year. It is possible that the negotiations for the purchase of the outstanding properties at Valcartier camp will be completed this year, and the payments consequently met from current appropriation. Nearly all these cases, however, are before the Exchequer Court and it is quite possible that court may not render its decisions before the expiration of the fiscal year, and therefore the Department of Justice advise that provision had better be made in next year's estimates for the payment of the compensation due.

Mr. VIEN: Can the minister give some details as to the expenditure of the $200,000 voted last year?

Major-General MEWBURN: That all appears in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. CANNON: According to the Auditor General's Report, much to my surprise, I see that Mr. Armand Lavergne has received a certain amount for legal services. Is he retained by the Militia Department?

Major-General MEWBURN: He may have been employed by one of the people whose land was taken, and judgment was given and probably this relates to his costs. I have no knowledge of his being employed by the Militia Department or any other department.

Mr. COPP: He is evidently on the patronage list.

Mr. CURRIE: Are there any payments for camp Borden in this vote?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, that comes under the war appropriation.

Mr. CURRIE: One of the members for Toronto wished to know if the Borden camp matter was likely to come up, as he desired to make some observations with respect to it.

Major-General MEWBURN: It will come up under the war appropriation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let us adjourn now, we have done a good day's work.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. J. D. REID the House adjourned at 11.33 p.m.

Thursday, April 18, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 58, respecting certain patents of The Dynamic Balancing Machine Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 59, to incorporate the Gospel Workers Church in Canada.—Mr. Middlebro.

Bill No. 60, to incorporate Montreal, Joliette and Transcontinental Junction Railway Company.—Mr. Denis.

Bill No. 61, respecting The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. Stewart.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General) moved:

That the special committee to whom was referred Bill No. 25, respecting bankruptcy, be granted power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 62, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of this Bill is threefold. The Insurance Act now provides that British and foreign companies shall maintain a deposit with the Department of Finance at least equal to their total liabilities in Canada. The purpose of this Bill is to require that the deposit shall not only equal the amount of their liabilities in Canada, but shall be in excess of their liabilities to the extent of 25 per cent. The second amendment proposed is to increase the initial deposit required of British and foreign companies prior to the commencement of their insurance business in Canada. The amount required to-day is $50,000, and it is proposed to raise that to $100,000. The third amendment proposed is to section 125 of the Insurance Act, which requires Canadian companies to maintain assets at least 15 per cent in excess of their total liabilities. The Bill proposes to raise the amount of this percentage to 25 per cent.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 63, to amend the Fisheries Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This Bill is introduced for two specific reasons. The first provision refers to the British Columbia salmon fisheries. Heretofore it has been the custom to have the packages or cases labelled to show that the salmon was caught legally, or that the salmon was caught during the open season and not during the closed season. The department has found that this provision of the law has not worked out as satisfactorily as was hoped, and the object of the Bill is to abolish clauses 22, 23, 25, 65 and 66, as a result of which no one will be allowed to catch fish outside of the areas that are closed during the closed season unless he has a license, or unless the boat is licensed. The Indians have a habit, during the closed fishing season, of catching a considerable number of salmon. While they are allowed legally to catch salmon for their own use, they are forbidden to catch salmon and offer them for sale either to the canners or the dealers. The object is to prevent any one offering salmon during the close season to any canner or dealer, unless either the boat or the man is licensed.

During the close season in Canadian waters it has been the practice of some of the Canadian lobster fishermen, and also of some of the American lobster fishermen, to catch lobsters outside of the territorial waters. It is proposed by this legislation, concurrent legislation being passed by the United States Congress, to prevent the Canadian and American fishermen from catching lobsters during the close season outside of the territorial waters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

MR. R. A. PRINGLE, K.C.

Mr. EULER:

1. On what Government Commissions has R. A. Pringle, K.C., officiated since October 1, 1911, and how much did he draw from each?
2. Is he still connected with the Price of Paper Investigation? If so, how much has he drawn from this?
3. What is the total amount drawn by said Mr. Pringle out of the public exchequer since October 1, 1911?
4. Does the Government contribute in any way to the rent of the offices at present occupied by the firm of Pringle & Co. in a building on Wellington St., Ottawa? If so, how much?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: The question is answered by a return which was tabled to-day.

ST. NICHOLAS STONE QUARRY.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Has the St. Nicholas quarry, which was purchased by the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, been worked since 1st May, 1915?
2. If so, what quantity of stone has been taken from said quarry?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. No.
2. No stone was taken out during this period.

DREDGES AND STEAMERS AT QUEBEC.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. What are the names of the steamers and dredges which were owned by the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec on the 1st November, 1916?
2. Have said Commissioners sold any of these steamers and dredges?
3. If so, to whom and at what price?
4. Did said Commissioners sell direct to the purchasers or was an agent employed to negotiate the sale of the steamers and dredges sold?
5. Have the Commissioners purchased other steamers and dredges since the 1st November, 1916?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Grain boat No. 1, Dredge No. 1, Dredge No. 2, tug "Aviso Courcelette," tug Diver, Clam Shell Dredge No. 6, launch Gossom.
2. Yes.
3. Grain boat No. 1 sold to St. Lawrence Navigation Corporation for $100,000. Dredge No. 1 sold to Compagnie Générale D'Entreprises Publiques for $185,000.
4. Both sold direct to purchasers.
5. No.

PURCHASE OF REMOUNTS IN CANADA.

Mr. ROSS:

1, What amount of money was spent in Canada on purchasing remounts by the Militia Department during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1917?

2. What amount was spent in purchasing remounts elsewhere, and where were they purchased?

3 What is the expense attendant thereon in each case, and on what basis was the expense incurred, by commission, or so much per animal allowed to buyer? Or how, if otherwise?

4. Who were authorized to purchase in Canada, and who outside of Canada?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. $261,042.73.

2. Nil.

3. For horses purchased in Canada, a buyer and veterinary surgeon were employed, for which they received $10 per diem for their services, for the period May 4, 1916, to September 23, 1916.

4. Mr. R. Graham and Veterinary Surgeon S. C. Tambin, under the supervision of Col. Sir Adam Beck, Remount Commissioner, purchased in Canada.

MR. J. P. JAFFRAY.

Mr. JACOBS:

1. What are the duties of J. P. Jaffray, who is in the employ of the Canadian Trade and Commerce Department, of Philadelphia?

2. What salary does he receive?

3. What are his annual expenses?

4. Since his appointment what results, if any, have come from his efforts in the position he occupies?

5. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce aware that Mr. Jaffray, since his appointment, contributes to newspapers, articles of a violent partisan nature?

6. Is the Minister aware of the opinion that results justify the retention of this gentleman in office?

Hon. Mr. CALDER:

1. Mr. J. P. Jaffray is Canadian Government agent and immigration inspector at the port of Philadelphia, and is employed by the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

2. $2,000.

3. $1,474.75 for the fiscal year 1916-17. This sum includes rent of office and travelling expenses.

4. It is impossible to tabulate the results of Mr. Jaffray's work. He is engaged in general publicity work, with the object of encouraging settlement in Canada. The department has reason to believe that Mr. Jaffray has been successful along this line. Prior to the cessation of European travel, Mr. Jaffray inspected a considerable number of immigrants and passengers arriving at the port of Philadelphia, destined to Canadian points. Mr. Jaffray's office is looked upon in Philadelphia as a general information office on all matters relating to Canada, and his services have been utilized to a considerable extent by The British-Canadian Recruiting Mission.

5. The Department of Immigration and Colonization is not aware that Mr. Jaffray has, since his appointment, contributed to newspapers, articles of a partisan nature. On July 31, 1917, the Hon. Mr. Proulx made a similar inquiry in the House. Mr. Jaffray was asked at that time for information and he denied, under date of August 6, 1917, having written or contributed any articles of a political nature since his appointment to a position in the Civil Service of Canada.

6. Yes.

SHIPMENTS OF BREEDING ANIMALS IN QUEBEC.

*Mr. TOBIN:

With reference to the Auditor General's Report for the year ending March 31, 1917, volume 1, page A-72, A. J. Lyster, Kirkdale, Quebec, freight charges on stallions, $43.45.

1. From what point were the said stallions shipped?

2. How many stallions were so shipped?

3. To whom were they consigned and for what purpose?

4. Were the said stallions used for work in lumber camps?

5. If so, was this done with the consent of the Government?

6. Where are the said stallions at the present time?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR:

1. Three were shipped from Richmond, one from Ste. Henedine and one from Point Levis.

2. Five.

3. The first was sent to the Association Ste. Genevieve de Batiscan. The second was sent to the Association at Ste. Marguerite. The third was sent to the Association at St. Georges. The fourth was removed from Association Ste. Marguerite, shipped from Ste. Henedine station to Richmond. (C. N. Lyster's.) The fifth removed from Association Neuville, taken to Richmond (C. N. Lyster's). These stallions were loaned to the associations for breeding purposes.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. The stallion shipped to Ste. Genevieve de Batiscan is still there. The stallion removed from Ste. Marguerite is now in the province of Alberta. The horse shipped to St. Georges is now at C. N. Lyster's. The horse shipped from Ste. Henedine (Ste. Marguerite Association), has been sold.

The horse shipped from Point Levis to Richmond has been sold.

*Mr. TOBIN:

In reference to the Auditor General's Report for the year ending March 31, 1917, volume 1, page A-72, C. N. Lyster, Kirkdale, Quebec, care of bulls and stallions, $1,947.08, freight, $104.10.

1. To whom was the sum of $1,947.08 paid?
2. From what point were the said bulls and stallions shipped?
3. How many bulls and stallions were so shipped?
4. To whom were they consigned and for what purpose?
5. Were the said stallions used for work in lumber camps?
6. If so, was this done with the consent of the Government?
7. Where are the said bulls and stallions at the present time?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR:

1. C. N. Lyster.

2. One bull from Ste. Christine de Bagot; one bull from Disraeli; one bull from Compton; two bulls from Coaticook; nine bulls from Point Levis; one stallion from La Prairie; one stallion from Matane; one stallion from Robertson station; two stallions from Point Levis.

3. Fourteen bulls and five stallions.

4. All with the exception of five bulls were consigned to C. N. Lyster to be cared for and conditioned. These five bulls were included in a car of eight shipped from Levis consigned to C. N. Lyster at Richmond for resorting. These five were left in the car and shipped on from Richmond to the Point St. Charles stock yards, Montreal, and sold for beef.

5. No.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Four bulls are in the hands of associations in the province of Quebec. One is at a feeding station at Ulverton. One is dead. Eight have been sold. Three stallions were sent to the province of Alberta in 1917 and loaned to associations there. Two have been sold.

MAJOR J. F. BELFORD.

Mr. TOBIN:

*1. Is Major J. F. Belford, of Richmond, Quebec, employed by the Department of Militia and Defence or by the Department of Justice at the present time?
2. If so, what salary and allowance does he receive?
3. Was he employed by either one of said departments in the month of November, 1917?
4. If so, what salary did he then receive?
5. When was Major J. F. Belford first employed by the Department of Militia?
6. What amount has been paid to him from that date to the present time on account of, (a) salary, (b) separation allowance, (c) travelling and living expenses, and (d) other disbursements?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Yes, by the Department of Militia and Defence.

2. Pay and allowances of his rank in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

3. Yes, by the Department of Militia and Defence.

4. Answered by No. 2.

5. May, 1916, but did not begin to draw pay until July 3, 1916.

6. (a) $3,431.75; (b) $964; (c) $528.18; (d) $1,661.76. Recruiting expenses not personal.

GRANBY POST OFFICE.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. What was the total cost of the Post Office building at Granby, in the county of Shefford?
2. When was the said building completed?
3. How much has been paid out for repairs to the said building since the first of October, 1911?
4. Upon whose recommendation were the said alterations and repairs made?
5. Has the Government been requested to increase the post office box accommodation in the said building?
6. If so, have any steps been taken to grant this request?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. $27,502.41.

2. Completed in 1903 and tower clock installed in 1906.

3. $3,065.83.

4. Recommended by the Clerk of Works for Montreal District.

5. No information.

6. Answered by No. 5.

BREEDING ANIMALS—SHERBROOKE.

Mr. HUNT:

1. Has the Government an office in the city of Sherbrooke, Quebec, for distributing live stock for breeding purposes?
2. If so, in what year was the office established?
3. How much has it cost each year up to the present?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to continue this office?
5. Who is in charge of same, and what salary does he receive each year?
6. How many persons has he in his employ?
7. Who are they, and what salary does each receive?

9. What has become of animals bought?
10. Has the Government many on hand?
11. If so, who cares for said animals and what price is paid?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR:

1. The live stock branch of the Department of Agriculture maintains an office in the city of Sherbrooke, in the province of Quebec, to facilitate the general work of the branch in that province, a part of which is to distribute live stock for breeding purposes.

2. December, 1915.

3. The total cost for all purposes is as follows: fiscal year 1915-16 (balance), $1,034,94; 1916-17, $3,790.74; 1917-18, $3,865.50. The cost is not apportioned to the different purposes for which the office is maintained. (Included in these amounts is the salary and expenses of the officer in charge, salary of stenographer, rent, cost of telegrams, telephone charges, etc.)

4. Yes.

5. A. W. Giard, present salary $1,900 per annum.

6. The office staff consists of one stenographer. Mr. Giard has also the supervision of a number of temporary inspectors.

7. The stenographer, Miss L. Boulanger, receives a salary of $600 a year. The inspectors are paid at the rate of $4 a day for such time as their services are required. At the present time the following are employed as temporary inspectors: G. F. Cowan, Scottstown; J. A. Marion, St. Edwidge; A. Genest, St. Bernard.

8. Answered by No. 3.

9. Animals purchased have been loaned to associations throughout the province and have been left on their hands as long as they were satisfactory for breeding purposes.

10. Yes.

11. Animals loaned to associations are cared for by caretakers on arrangements made with them by the respective associations. The terms vary with the districts and circumstances, but all are subject to the approval of the Dominion Live Stock Commissioner. Bulls which are shipped to feeding stations for refitting purposes are paid for by the department, at the rate of $7 per month or 35 cents per day for terms of less than one month.

3. Repair parts exported are subject to drawback.

MILK SUPPLY IN LARGE CENTRES.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is the Government aware that the undue raising in price of milk prevailing in large centres is causing untold injury and suffering to the younger children of the communities?

2. Has the Government taken any action on the report of the Milk Committee appointed by the Food Controller's Bureau, in the matter of reorganization of milk distribution?

3. Has any recommendation been made to the Government by the Baby Welfare Committee praying, that effective measures be promptly instituted to remedy the above conditions of affairs existing in the large centres of populations?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR:

1. The department is not aware that there has been undue raising of the price of milk. Milk has not increased in price out of proportion to the increased price of all foods.

2. The report of the Milk Committee recommended that no action be taken in fixing the price of milk to the producer. It recommended that the spread between the producer and the consumer be fixed, which has been done by Order No. 9, published in the 2nd Extra of the Canada Gazette, of December 27th, 1917. The report pointed out that the initiative for the reorganization of the distribution of milk should be taken by the municipal or provincial authorities.

3. The Baby Welfare Committee of Montreal, made representations in the form of a resolution, and it was pointed out to them that whatever remedy was possible lay in getting the municipal or provincial authorities to take action in the reorganization of the milk distributing business.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT TEMPORARY EXEMPTIONS.

* Mr. TOBIN:

1. Is the Government aware that a large number of applicants for exemption under the provisions of the Military Service Act obtained temporary exemption for a definite period of time?

2. Is the Government aware that in many cases the local Exemption Tribunals which granted these temporary exemptions advised the applicants that when the period for which the exemption had been granted had expired, they could, if they had sufficient reasons, make application for further exemption, or in other words, have the said delay extended?

3. To whom should those who have legitimate reasons to ask for an extension of their exemption, make application and submit the reasons why the said exemption should be extended?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.

2. The Government has no information on the subject, but if such advice was given it was correct.

3. To the appropriate registrar, under regulation 76.

MILITARY MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS.

* Mr. TOBIN:

1. Is the Government aware that many Local Exemption Tribunals and several Appeal Tribunals have refused exemption to men of military age without obliging them to undergo the Medical Examination required by the Military Service Act?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to draft said men without giving them the opportunity of undergoing the said Medical Examination?

3. In cases where men who have been refused exemption without a Medical Examination have since been examined and placed in Category B, C, or E, is it the intention of the Government to oblige the said men to report for duty?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The Government has no information on the subject.

2. No. Every man drafted will be medically examined.

3. Not at present if they were placed in category "C," or category "E."

MR. TUCKER.

Mr. PORTER:

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. Tucker, appointed by the Honourable the Minister of Agriculture, as agricultural representative on the Leave of Absence Board of No. 3 Military District, was in the recent Dominion Election a strong, active opponent of the endorsed Union Government Candidate in East Hastings?

2. Is it the policy of the Government to appoint such opponents to office?

3. If the Government at the time of this appointment was unaware of the fact stated in question No. 1, will it now satisfy itself as to the fact and take action? If so, what action?

4. Was any private member of the Union Government in Military District No. 3 consulted or advised with in regard to this appointment? If not, from what source was the information obtained to satisfy the Honourable Minister who made the appointment?

5. What were the necessary qualifications the Honourable the Minister of Agriculture, by inquiry, ascertained Mr. Tucker possessed for the position to which he was so appointed, enumerating them?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR:

1. No.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The policy of the Government is to select the persons best qualified to fill any office or position of trust. In selecting an agricultural representative on this and other Leave-of-Absense Boards the Government endeavoured to obtain necessary information from various sources as to the knowledge, experience and good judgment of the person proposed to be appointed. The Government is satisfied that Mr. Tucker possesses the necessary qualifications for the efficient discharge of the duties of the position to which he was appointed, and, as at present advised, it does not propose to take any further action in the matter.

3. Was it made on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, and what are the peculiar qualifications of the appointee which led to his obtaining the position?

4. Have any complaints been received from the people of the locality to the effect that they were seriously inconvenienced owing to the fact that the post office is situated far from the centre of the district?

5. What salary does the Postmaster receive? How much was paid to his predecessor?

Hon Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Lemuel J. Bell.

2. On the 5th January, 1918.

3. No. The appointment was made before the Civil Service Commission was authorized to make these appointments. The department is not aware that there was anything peculiar about his qualifications.

4. Representations have been made that the post office is inconveniently situated, and this matter is now under enquiry by the department.

5. $81 per annum His predecessor recieved the same salary.

ROYAL NORTH WEST MOUNTED POLICE—COMMISSIONER PERRY.

Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Has Commissioner Perry of the Royal North West Mounted Police resigned?
2. If so, what was the cause of his resignation?
3. Was there any correspondence between the Commissioner and the Government prior to the resignation? If so, will the papers be laid on the Table of the House?
4. Has Assistant Commissioner Wilson sent in his resignation? If so, what is his reason for resigning?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.

2. The reasons are set forth in the following telegram from Commissioner Perry:

"While I recognize the necessity of taking all effective members of the Force for overseas service, I maintain that they should have been sent as a unit and in view of the assurance contained in the Prime Minister's letter of 5th July last, that if more cavalry were required a regiment or regiments from the Mounted Police would be sent, I feel my position as Officer Commanding the Force has been most seriously affected, and therefore in the interest of the public service I should resign. I respectfully request that I may be retired to pension as soon as convenient to the Department. I am prepared to hand over command whenever directed."

Every effort has been made by the Government to arrange for the force going over and proceeding to the front as a unit but the military exigencies have been such that the military authorities in Great Britain have not so far been able to arrange it. Their request is for reinforcements for existing units.

3 No.

4. Yes; no reason given. He has offered to serve in any capacity the Government may desire.

MR. NAZAIRE LEBEL.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has Mr. Nazaire LeBel, a Preventive officer at St. Arsène, in the County of Temiscouata, made a report to the Inland Revenue Department, for each year since 1911?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to dispense with the services of the said officer who is at present incapacitated and whose work is absolutely needless?

Hon. Mr SIFTON:

1. Made a report in 1913.

2. Services dispensed with from February 1st, 1918.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

1. What is the value of intoxicating liquor imported into Canada since December 22, 1917?
2. What is the value of intoxicating liquor imported into Canada under the regulation made January 19, 1918, permitting the importation of intoxicating liquor purchased prior to January 31, 1918?

Mr. DECHENE:

1. What has been the number of clerks employed during each year from 1911 to 1917, in the following Post offices: Victoria, Vancouver, Regina, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, Montreal, Quebec, Fredericton and Halifax?
2. What sums have been paid as salaries to the clerks of the above offices in each year of the said period?

Mr. TRAHAN:

1. Has the Minister of Finance issued certificates permitting the offer and sale of debentures in pursuance of the Order in Council, dated 22nd December, 1917, in relation thereto?
2. If so, how many permits were granted or certificates issued?
3. To what provincial governments, municipal corporations, school boards or other legally constituted bodies were permits granted or certificates issued?
4. For what amount were permits granted and certificates issued, in each case?

Mr. TRAHAN:

1. Has the Minister of Finance refused to issue certificates permitting the offer and sale of debentures, in pursuance of the Order in Council, dated 22nd December, 1917, in relation thereto?
2. If so, how many permits or certificates have been refused?
3. What provincial governments, municipal corporations, school boards or other legally constituted bodies have been refused said permits or certificates, and what reasons, in each case, were given?
4. For what amount, in each case, was authority asked for?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of the correspondence concerning the resignation of Commissioner Perry, C.M.G., as head of Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That Government Notices of Motions and Government Orders shall have precedence on Mondays, until the end of the Session, over all business except questions by Members and Notices of Motion for the production of papers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think that we on this side of the House cannot be accused of obstructing the business of the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: So, I would be obliged if my right hon. friend would give us another Monday, making the motion commence with the first Monday in May.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Under the circumstances I accede to the request of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BUREAU: When the debate on the question of titles was adjourned I understood that a date would be set when that matter would be brought up again. Might I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention to fix a date when this question will come up again?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have not had an opportunity yet of fixing a date. I shall take the matter up in due course.

Mr. BUREAU: Will a date be fixed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I expressed my intention at the time.

Motion amended to read: "on and after Monday, the twenty-ninth of April."

Motion as amended agreed to.

THE WAR.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING MILITARY SERVICE.

On the motion being called for the resolution respecting Military Service Regulations:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is a very important motion, and I would expect that, as is usual, a day would be fixed to discuss it. I understand that my hon. friend wishes to proceed now, but I did not expect the resolution to come up to-day, and I ask if it would be possible to have it postponed until to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The matter is urgent, but in view of the fact that my right hon. friend has had but little more than twenty-four hours' notice of it, I do not think his request is unreasonable, and I grant it at once. But I do so in the hope that we may be able to conclude the debate to-morrow if possible.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the motion?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is the resolution with regard to military service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What about the preceding motion regarding the censorship of the official debates?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It stands.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think I can say to my right hon. friend that, on our side of the House the debate will close to-morrow.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crothers, Bill No. 48, to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1906, was read a third time and passed.

SALARIES ACT AMENDMENT.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 13, to amend the Salaries Act and the provisions for preserving the Independence of Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: When subsection 3 of section 1 was under consideration, the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) was good enough to call my attention to what is apparently an oversight in section 3. The point was that the section as drafted would permit the member filling either of these positions to take office without going back to his constituents. Clearly that was not the intention, and while I am not quite sure that the Act would bear that interpretation, nevertheless my thanks are due to the hon. member for bringing the matter to my attention, and I agree at once that the section should be so amended as to be perfectly clear. I have submitted to the member for Kamouraska the amendments which I propose, and they are:

That subsection 3 of section 1 be amended by striking out the words "accepting or" in the 26th line and substituting the word "now."

The section would then read, in the 25th and 26th lines, "any person now holding any of the said offices."

Amendment agreed to.

I move that the Bill be further amended by adding the following section as section 2 thereof:

Nothing in the Dominion Elections Act or in the Senate and House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapters 6 and 10 respectively, or in any other statute or law, shall render ineligible any person hereafter accepting and holding any of the said offices as Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment and Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him for sitting or voting therein if he is elected while he holds such office and is not otherwise disqualified.

Amendment agreed to.

I move also that section 2 of the Bill as introduced be section 3.

Amendment agreed to, and section 1, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported.

WAR GRANT $500,000,000.

House again in committee on Bill No. 38, for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1.

Mr. BUREAU: In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia when we were last in committee, some members made inquiries about the detailed expenditure which it was understood, should be contained in the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report. We were informed that this report was being printed and that it would be available within a short time. Some hon. gentlemen on both sides are asking when they may expect this report, so that they may examine the details of the expenditures and in that way be in a position to put intelligent questions to the minister.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am under the impression that the details of the expenditures, so far as they are available in a convenient form, are to be found in the Report of the Militia Council, which is before the House, and which has been printed for distribution.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend was not in the House when the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) was conducting some stage of the resolution. It was pointed out then in connection with expenditures that it was desirable that details of the amounts paid for publicity and advertising, the moneys which were taken out of the War Fund, should be given. The Acting Minister of Finance undertook to bring down statements of such expenditures under those items as are not contained in the published volume to which the Prime Minister has just referred, and which, as he says, has been distributed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, that has been distributed, and it contains details in a general way.

Mr. MURPHY: But the Acting Minister of Finance undertook to bring down additional details which are not contained in that volume.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have, with regard to various departments, some details with which I did not think it worth while to trouble the House. I could give those if that would be of any advantage. I think I already gave the details with regard to one department.

Mr. BUREAU: Either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia—I do not exactly know which—made a statement of the various amounts which would be appropriated to each department for war purposes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, and I have some particulars of the expenditures in the various departments.

Mr. BUREAU: I saw a statement of the expenditures in one of the departments, either the Department of Immigration or the Department of the Interior. The amount was small, and the statement just gave a list of names with the amounts paid to each individual. No further information than that was given. All that we knew was that a certain person had received a certain sum of money. That money might have been spent for war purposes, but we do not know whether it was or not. We should like to have that information. We desire to know how the Department of Immigration or the Department of the Interior is being connected with war service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: When the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn) was speaking on this subject some few days ago, I had not the honour of being present while he was taking up the question of the disbandonment of the 5th Division. In the year 1916, in order to get the Canadian forces properly organized with a view to meeting conditions that we expected to arise in the future, and that have since materialized, I drew up a memorandum recommending to General Sir Douglas Haig, General Sir William Robertson and Mr. Lloyd George—and I sent a copy of it to the Prime Minister of Canada—that Canada, to have a perfect force, should have two army corps each consisting of three divisions. The usual British army corps is made up of two divisions, each division being made up of four brigades, with odd battalions for pioneer and other purposes, and from time to time various additions to that have been made in the way of machine gun sections and so forth. Each brigade is made up of four battalions, each numbering 1,000 men. The British force had not at that time, as the Minister of Militia very properly stated, maintained any fixed standard, but two divisions constituted an army corps. Following that rule, Canada, from the moment we had four divisions organized, should have had two army corps in the field. I submitted my plan and I discussed it with Sir Douglas Haig, Sir William Robertson and all the leading officers. My idea was that we would hold, with six divisions or two army corps, no more trenches than we did with one army corps or four divisions. Our frontage would be exactly the same, and consequently our losses would be neither more nor less than they are now. In order, however, that the men might get proper rest, my scheme was that we should have one division in the front trenches, one division in support and one division in reserve, resting. I made plans for six divisions, constituting two army corps. My plan met with the approval of Sir Douglas Haig, Sir William Robertson, Mr. Lloyd George and every officer in Europe whom I consulted and whose opinion was worth anything. In fact, my scheme met with so much approval that six or seven or eight months afterwards the German army was remodelled on the identical system that I had the honour of devising beforehand. Later on, the British army, always conservative and slow in the way of taking up anything new, adopted a similar principle, and to-day the principle generally adopted in the British army is to have three divisions constituting an army corps. I shall not enter into the details of the composition of the army corps, but the standard which I had set was not lived up to. I had also planned that in addition to the men in the three divisions in each corps each battalion should have men in rest, and that at Havre we should have a camp prepared for reinforcements which we could send hither and thither as the need might become urgent. I merely point this out to show to the House and the country that the statements made here that the British army has not adopted the principle of three divisions to a corps and that the German army has not adopted it, are not in accordance with the facts. I do not hold any body here responsible for that because the statements come from the other side. I devised my scheme early in 1916, and the boys would have been much better off if it had been adopted. It would not have taken one man more than the present system because the area held by our forces would not have been any greater. If my scheme had been carried out, we would not have had some of the massacres that we have had at the front. I do not think anybody overseas in the Canadian service considered the matter sufficiently to be able to give an intelligent opinion as to what was really needed, or we certainly should have had two army corps instead of one.

Mr. BUREAU: Would that imply a reorganization of the present system?

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Sir SAM HUGHES: There are now four divisions. In 1916 I had four divisions in the field and two additional divisions, in all six, all ready to form into two army corps. The scheme was held up on my retirement, but I am in a position to say without fear of contradiction that with the exception of the first division, which was the best shooting division in the world, the fifth division was the best trained in the world. Upwards of six to eight hundred men in every battalion had received sufficient training to handle a machine gun section, and about eight hundred out of every thousand men were instructors. There were plenty of men to form another division. If that had been done we would have had two corps instead of one, and at the same time we would have had no more frontage to look after—no more men exposed to fire than now—but there would always have been one division in each corps in rest billets. Let me again emphasize that I submitted this proposal to Sir Douglas Haig and the British War Office and received their approval. The Germans have adopted the same system; it is only common sense to have one division in attack, one in support, and one in rest all the time. I had also plans for having a couple of hundred men in each battalion right at hand to fill up gaps, and then there was the training camp at Havre. All these plans have since been carried out in detail with the exception of forming the two corps. The British are also adopting the system of having three divisions to a corps. I want this to be made clear. The statement furnished by the Minister of Militia and Defence is not in accordance with the facts, so far as the British army is concerned, because they have already adopted the policy of three divisions to a corps.

Mr. MURPHY: The discussion to which I drew the attention of the Prime Minister a few minutes ago took place on the afternoon of Friday the 12th of April, in connection with the explanations given by the Acting Minister of Finance of the expenses connected with the Victory Loan. Referring to a request made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition the Acting Minister of Finance said:

> As he evidently desires that this information be submitted prior to the introduction of the War Appropriation Bill, I ask the leave of the House to make a statement which will give him the information he desires.

Arising out of the explanation given, some discussion of details took place, which are reported on page 711 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Pedlow: Do the items of $163,000 and $207,000 cover the entire cost of the publicity campaign? On what basis was that allotment negotiated? Was the price paid for that publicity at the ordinary commercial rate charged for the space used, or was it on a different basis from that usually negotiated in an ordinary commercial transaction?

I need not read the rest except that towards the end I asked this question:

Mr. Murphy: Will the details the Minister promised to give the house include the names of the firms and papers which received advertisements and the amounts paid?

Mr. A. K. Maclean: If that is desired.

Mr. Murphy: It is highly desirable to know the amount paid to each newspaper.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: You wanted the names of the newspapers?

Mr. MURPHY: As I understand it, the Acting Minister of Finance mentioned two amounts—$163,000 and $207,000—and I think he conveyed the impression that they were given to some agents. We wanted the amounts in detail.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will speak to him about it. In the meantime is there any other information wanted in regard to any other departments?

Mr. VIEN: When this Bill was under discussion some time ago information was obtained from the Government as to the authority of the Overseas Minister of Militia in connection with the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I understand there is a Militia Council in England, acting in an advisory capacity to the overseas minister. Has this council and the Overseas Minister of Militia full authority to appoint officers in the Canadian Expeditionary Force? If not, who has control of the appointments and promotions, and who gives commanders to the various brigades and divisions, even to the army corps? Does the Overseas Minister of Militia report to the Government by despatch or otherwise as to how our troops were ordered into action, and how they came out of action? Is the Canadian expeditionary force entirely under his control, and what is its relationship to the War Office? This is a most important matter, because if Canada is a nation, as we have often pretended, when we have organized an army of 500,000 men it seems to me we should be proud enough of ourselves as a nation to direct these matters ourselves and to have full reports sent to the Government as to the movements and organization of our army. I quite agree that so far as the higher command is concerned unity of action is essential, and that the troops should be under the supreme command of General Foch. On the other hand, I do not think Canada should abdicate her power; she should retain the right to direct and control the organization of the army. What is the power of the Overseas Minister of Militia and of his advisory council as to the appointment of officers, and what information is received from the commanders overseas as to the movements of our troops?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as our position as a nation is concerned, of course the military direction of the Canadian forces at the front under the commander of the British forces, and in common with the British and American forces our troops are under the supreme direction of General Foch. It would be entirely undesirable for us in Ottawa to interfere with military appointments at the front. These appointments are made on the recommendations of the military commanders at the front. The Minister of Overseas Service would naturally have these matters placed before him, but he would be wise enough, I hope, not to attempt to interfere on his own initiative, because he could not possibly have the same knowledge of the fitness of the men recommended as those who are at the front and who know what the service of each man has been, what his qualifications are, and his suitability generally for any position to which he might be appointed. It has already been explained to the House that the general policy at the front is to give promotion from the ranks to non-commissioned officers, and from non-commissioned officers to commissioned officers, and so on. The Government of this country has the same voice in respect to these matters that the Imperial Government has in respect to its own matters of a similar nature.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the Prime Minister had used the phrase "military direction of its forces" at the front, his statement would have been fairly accurate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is what I was alluding to.

Sir SAM HUGHES: So far as the appointment of junior officers is concerned, no one interferes with them; I do not suppose any minister would interfere with the recommendations made in the case of these men. But so far as the senior officers are concerned commanding battalions, divisions, brigades or a corps, I certainly feel there is a very great need of supervision of appointments. Let me give an instance of how these appointments have been made.

They have not been made, I am sorry to say, on merit. A very charming English lady undertook once to reason out with me why a certain officer should not have a promotion in connection with the service. She had made quite a canvass to secure the promotion of this officer, but I would not yield to her solicitations. I pointed out that the officer whom she named was entirely unsuited in many ways, that he might be a very fine courtier, or "pink tea" gentleman, but that he was not fitted for the position to which she desired to have him promoted. Finally she made the retort that she did not see what Canadian politicians had to do with the appointment of officers anyway. I told her that the people whose boys were at the front and who paid the money should be as much interested in it as the society ladies of London. I took that ground and I carried my point. I am sorry to say that my stand was not subsequently observed. The ground which I took was fully conceded by Lloyd George, when Minister of War, Sir William Robertson, General Whigham, Lord Kitchener and Sir Douglas Haig later. Nobody would desire that the junior appointments should come under this rule. I do not suggest that the minister could keep in touch with the battalion officers, but as to the senior appointments, in so far as promotion was concerned, I always took it upon myself to examine these men and to satisfy myself that the best men were put in positions of responsibility. I think that the subsequent career of the men I selected bear out the claim that I exercised very good judgment in the matter of promotions. It may be said that these senior officers should be promoted. That may be a proper principle as a general thing, but there are senior positions to which men should not be promoted on the basis of ordinary seniority. A man who may be a qualified battalion commander may not have the necessary qualifications for a divisional commander. I might go into this matter a good deal farther, but I think that I have outlined my ideas. I have no hesitation in saying that I think the authorities here have not always exercised good judgment. I think the authorities should assume the full responsibility and they should insist on having the say in reference to these senior appointments. The plan which was pursued by me was to get the recommendations of the officers concerned. I would consult the officers. It has been pointed out by the Prime Minister that the officer in command in the field must be in a position to know. I have no hesitation in saying that the army commander at the front is not in a position to know what sort of men the battalion commanders may be other than from the report which he gets from some sprig of a staff officer who may or may not be at the front. When General Byng pointed out that I was three thousand miles away while he was only forty miles away, I replied that I got my reports from different sources while he got his from a certain staff officer who never saw these officers and that my information was more accurate than his although it might take a week longer unless one sent a telegram. The Government should exercise, and the people will hold them responsible for exercising, a proper control over the appointment of senior officers, and seeing that society, clerical and other influences cannot get these appointments in the Canadian forces as they are got in the British forces.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have never heard of any society or clerical influence in regard to senior appointments. I think that General Currie's proposals in regard to senior appointments have usually been accepted here.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is all right; but they should be carefully reviewed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Of course, we would be venturing upon very dangerous ground if we should undertake to overrule the commander of the Canadian army corps in regard to matters of that kind. There was only one question that I found it necessary to take up with the British authorities when I was in England a year ago, and I took it up with Sir Douglas Haig, with the Secretary of State for War, Lord Derby, and with Mr. Lloyd George himself. I came to the conclusion while I was over there, after conferences with General Currie and General Turner, that the divisional and corps staffs did not have in their personnel a sufficient proportion of Canadians.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We had men who, in the course of a year and a half or two years experience, had obtained or could have obtained the training which would qualify them for important staff positions. More than that, we had men who, while they were not perhaps qualified to take the higher positions on the staff, might very well have been appointed to junior positions on the divisional staff or corps staff, and in that way might have fitted themselves for taking higher staff positions. The representations which I made to Sir Douglas Haig, the Secretary of State for War, and the Prime Minister, had effect, as I was informed subsequently, and I believe that in consequence Canadians are now represented much more fully than formerly upon the divisional and corps staffs.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: In regard to the Canadian force, a question which I desire to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence from curiosity, was stimulated by an article that appeared in the press some little time ago as coming from Ottawa. The article appeared at the time certain representatives of the "Originals," as they were called, the First Contingent, return to Canada. The question under discussion in the article was as to whether or not the power was vested in the Canadian Government to give these men, who had been granted a furlough, a further furlough in Canada, if that was desired. The despatch from Ottawa read:

> The Government is not likely to vary the conditions under which furlough was secured for men of the First Division. Resolutions, and also letters from individuals, are being sent here inquiring that as these brave men have done their bit and stood the brunt of very hard service for over three years, they should be allowed to remain at home.
> It is conceded that in many cases, sending them back involves real hardship, but when the announcement was made that they were coming it was accompanied by a warning that they would have to return to service.
> It was stated that this was a specific agreement with the British authorities, on the strength of which the respite was secured. If it is broken, then the department says it will be a case of good-bye to leaves of absence for other contingents. A hundred men who had their furlough have already gone back.
> An exception is likely to be made in the case of men who are physically unfit. In such cases, the weeding out will probably be done in Canada, rather than on the return to England.
> It is the agreement with the British authorities stipulating that the men were to return to service that now is particularly cited as a reason why the repeated applications for discharge cannot be granted.

That despatch would seem to lead one to the conclusion that the Government admitted that they had no authority to withdraw from Europe to Canada any men of the Canadian contingent without the consent of the British Government. I do not want to take a too narrow or academic view of this question but it would seem to suggest the question as to what the position of Canada in this war is. I always had the idea that in this war we occupied a different position from that which Canada has occupied in any other war. In the South African war we allowed our men to go but the British Government paid the bill and, they paying the bill, the contractual relation between the soldier and the British Government probably gave them the right to insist upon the retention of any man. But in this war, we are paying the bill. We are paying not only the wages of the soldier but we are paying for his maintenance and equipment in the field. True all the equipment is not being supplied directly from Canada. Some equipment is being supplied by Britain on our account, but the disbursement is being charged against us.

Now to put it briefly, and perhaps epigrammatically, the point I want to insist on is this: that we are there as allies and not as vassals. I think the Canadian Government should make it perfectly clear to the Canadian people that our men in Europe are under our control, not in relation to matters of promotion, because I quite agree with what the Prime Minister says that it would be ridiculous from three thousand miles away for us to endeavour to determine who should have promotion, but surely our men are under our control to this extent—that if there should be a disaster, or something should occur that the Canadian Government thought occurred from mismanagement abroad, we, as a Canadian Parliament, would have the right to ask the Canadian Government for an explanation, and the Government would be obliged to lay that explanation on the Table of this House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: And I resent a little the position that apparently has been taken, if the memorandum which I have just read is correct, because it seems to imply that we have no fullness of control over the Canadian army. That I think the Government should insist upon, and I believe the Canadian people will support them in that insistence.

Major-General MEWBURN: In reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston regarding the furlough granted to some men of the First Canadian Contingent, I might say that the matter was taken up last summer to see if some of the men could be brought back. Again last fall, after Sir Edward Kemp went to England, there was some correspondence on the subject. Negotiations went on for some time, and we finally, after a great deal of effort, arranged to get the married men of the First Contingent, who had families in Canada, three months furlough in this country. The Australian and New Zealand Governments endeavoured to make the same arrangement, but were not successful. These men were given three months furlough to Canada on the understanding, as any soldier who is granted a furlough knows, that it is his duty as a soldier to return when that furlough expires.

Sir SAM HUGHES: With whom was that arrangement made?

Major-General MEWBURN: The arrangement was made, starting with the Overseas Minister of Militia in London, England. It was taken up by the corps commander in France, and everybody knows that that officer is the supreme authority in the field over the men under him. General Currie took the matter into consideration, and it became a question whether he could afford to allow all these men to leave the front in view of the difficulty of replacing them by experienced soldiers. The idea was that when the first soldiers who had been granted furlough returned, additional men would be given the privilege; it was simply a matter of keeping faith with the men that were left at the front in the hope that it would be possible for them to enjoy a similar furlough. The War Office had nothing whatever to do with the matter; it was a question for the corps commander of the whole British force, of which the Canadian corps is an integral part, to deal with. Well, the condition was as I have described; it was a case to be dealt with by Sir Douglas Haig, who was Commander in Chief of the British forces in France, including not only the British army but the military forces from the Overseas Dominions—what we look upon as the British army. The forces are entirely under Field Marshal Haig's control; he has the right to say whether a man can be allowed to go on furlough, or be given any other privilege, and his power is absolute.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who is the army commander over the Canadians to-day?

Major-General MEWBURN: Do you mean since General Byng left? Our men are directly under General Currie.

Sir SAM HUGHES: General Currie is only the corps commander, who is the army commander?

Major-General MEWBURN: I could not state offhand. However, to continue, these men did get leave, and it has been a very big problem to know exactly what to do in the matter. My hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) knows of the large number of men that were brought back from the front since 1914. —officers on leave, and men on furlough— whose leave or furlough was extended from time to time, and of others who were permitted to remain in Canada. In this particular instance it is a very great hardship when these men come out here, these married men, to force them to go back at the expiration of their furlough, but I am glad to say there have been very few cases of men refusing to go back. When these men return to England before their furlough has expired, under our new organization, they are taken into one of the depot battalions in the district to which they go until the expiration of their furlough. A large number of the men of the First Contingent have returned to England before their furlough was up. In fact one of our good soldiers from the Emerald Isle, who went back before his furlough was up, when asked why he went back before he had to go, said he had been in a good many fights in which there was always a policeman to stop him, but in this case there was no policeman, and he desired to get back before the fighting was over. No doubt this is the view of a good many of our men. The Government, of course, has power to say whether these men of the First Contingent shall be discharged, or whether they shall remain and continue on military duty in Canada. We can take that action if we so desire. It is not a question of any action by the War Office, who have nothing to do with it; it is a matter of keeping faith with the men still at the front, and of having those who received a furlough go back when that furlough expires.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: How many men are there altogether.

Major-General MEWBURN: Altogether I think about nine hundred, a large number have already gone back.

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): In view of the statement of the Minister of Militia that the General in command of the forces in the field has supreme authority over our men and their movement, this would be an opportune time to call attention to several incidents which occurred during the recent general election, when a number of colonels and lieutenant-colonels were apparently ordered to come to Canada to conduct political contests. My own opponent in South Renfrew was a lieutenant-colonel in the construction battalion. I heard that officer himself state on the platform on several occasions that he was ordered home from France, or ordered by cable to report from France in London, and that when he arrived in London he was ordered to return to Canada to enter the contest in South Renfrew. I would like to know from the Minister of Militia upon whose authority Lieutenant Colonel Martin returned from France to London, and by whose authority that officer returned from London to Canada to enter the political contest in South Renfrew? I understand that this is only one case in a hundred of the kind. I understand that many colonels were ordered back from France in order to enter the contest during the last election, in various constituencies throughout the Dominion. Was that in the interest of the army in France? Was it by authority of the Minister of Militia that these colonels were ordered home to enter political contests, or was it by the permission of the general in supreme command of the British army in France?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it is pretty well understood both in this country and in Great Britain that where a man who is serving in the army is called upon to become a candidate in a constituency, he is granted leave of absence for the purpose——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know of no reason why men who have served their country at the front should not be elected to this Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If there is any good reason why they should not become candidates after they have performed a patriotic duty to their country perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pedlow) will tell us what it is. I think it was entirely proper that men, whether on one side of politics or the other, who might be desired as candidates in any constituency in Canada, and who were serving their country at the front, should be given the opportunity. So far as I am concerned I am prepared to take full responsibility for Colonel Martin, or for any one else, who has been brought back to this country for that purpose.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Colonel Martin was not ordered back.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I should think he would get leave of absence.

Mr. PEDLOW: The point I have raised has been missed, I think.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the point.

Mr. PEDLOW: The question I asked was who was responsible for ordering Colonel Martin back from the front, and by whose authority did he return from the front? Was it at his own personal request that he returned, or was it at the request of some one in Canada? My information is that Colonel Martin knew nothing whatever about why he was being called from France until he got to London. I heard him say it himself, that he was ordered from France to London, and until he reached London he did not know why he was wanted there. When he reached London he was ordered back to Canada to enter into the political contest. Now, I have no fault to find with military men entering politics in this country. I think they have every right to do so. But I do want to know by whose authority these men were ordered back from France—

Mr. MURPHY: When they did not have the disposition to enter the contest themselves.

Mr. PEDLOW: Col. Martin made the statement on every platform in the campaign that he knew nothing whatever as to the reason for which he was ordered from France to London until he reached London.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should be very much surprised to learn that any coercion was exercised upon him in London for the purpose of forcing him to go to Canada to take part in the election. As a matter of fact, I have no doubt whatever but that leave of absence was asked for in the ordinary way, and he obtained it, just as any other man would under the same circumstances.

Mr. PEDLOW: But the right hon. gentleman will make it more clear, if he will state distinctly by whose authority Col. Martin was ordered home. I know myself from his own lips. In my own hearing at a political gathering Colonel Martin stated distinctly that he was ordered from France to report in London. I have a letter from him in my own possession indicating that he knew nothing whatever about his being required to enter the contest here. As a matter of fact, the letter I have from Col. Martin is dated two weeks after his election address was dated and inserted in the papers of this country. My point is this: that Col. Martin was brought back regardless of his wishes or desires in the case. Now, I want to know from those having charge of the Military Service of the country, by whose authority were these colonels—I only mention Col. Martin as an instance; there were others—brought home to enter the political contest? The same question will apply to a number of others.

Major-General MEWBURN: In reply to the hon. gentleman, I will state, as Minister of Militia and Defence, that I gave no order to bring Colonel Martin back. I issued no order, or made no request, directly or indirectly, asking any officer to return from the front or from England. I had no knowledge of it. There was no order issued from my department ordering any person back from the front.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to ask the minister by whose authority do these men move?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The spirit moves them.

Mr. PEDLOW: Well, "spirits" have been moved from the province of Ontario by Order in Council, so we cannot deal with them any more in this section of Canada. But I would like to know by whose authority Colonel Martin came back. He protests he had nothing to do with it himself. I believe Colonel Martin when he makes the statement that he did not enter the contest of his own volition. As a matter of fact, his entry into the contest was announced two weeks before he knew it himself.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Chairman, the matter is quite clear——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Of course.

Mr. CURRIE: Possibly Colonel Martin would have had better success in the riding if he had remained abroad. The facts are these: the duty that a man has to perform is the duty his senior officer asks him to perform. From the time of Cromwell, no military authority has the right to prevent any man from attending to his duties as a candidate for Parliament, or as a member of Parliament. That is a matter of privilege. And, no doubt, as soon as Col. Martin was nominated for Parliament, it would naturally, following the ancient British custom, be the duty of his commanding officer, the corps commander, to notify him and tell him that he had to go home, and to order him home. Of course, if he wished to be relieved from that order, he could do so. But he had a perfect right to come here, and no military authority could stop him, once he became a candidate. I stand up for the privileges of the members of this House. I say there are members on the other side of the House who came home to attend to their parliamentary duties, and to run in the elections. There is nothing wrong about that. A man's supreme duty, over and above his duty in the war, is his duty to be here to see that this Parliament carries on the war, to see that it does its duty to the war. And if Colonel Martin happened to be so unfortunate as to run against the hon. member, and be defeated, I am sorry for him, and also that the people of South Renfrew did not know enough to send a soldier from the trenches to represent them here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PEDLOW: In reply to the hon. member from Simcoe, I beg to inform him and the House that we are not dealing with ancient history. Thank Heaven, men like Cromwell have nothing to do with the management of the military or governmental affairs of the present day. The member for Simcoe made the statement that, if a military man, doing his duty on the field of battle, had been nominated for a constituency in this country, he has a perfect right to return and enter the contest if he so chooses. I heartily agree with that statement; I have no fault to find with a statement of that kind. But, in this case, the facts are altogether different, as the hon. member for Simcoe will understand, if he will listen to me intelligently. Colonel Martin was not nominated for the constituency of South Renfrew until three minutes before the closing of the hour for receiving nominations. Nor did Colonel Martin receive the endorsation of the Unionist convention, when that convention was regularly called for the purpose of selecting a candidate to contest the riding. I can assure the hon. member for Simcoe that the people of South Renfrew have no regrets to offer to themselves or to this country for the selection they have made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PEDLOW: I can assure the hon. member for Simcoe that neither he nor any other member in this House, especially to the right of the Chairman, need shed crocodile tears over the result.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps the hon. member will say who did receive the Unionist nomination and what became of him.

Mr. PEDLOW: If the House will bear with me, I will, perhaps, enlighten hon. gentlemen on the subject of the circumstances surrounding the nomination in South Renfrew.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am quite willing that the hon. member should give the facts connected with the candidature of this military officer in the election of South Renfrew. But anything connected with the civilian candidates who took part in the election I do not think would be quite in order.

Mr. MURPHY: He is not going to do that; he is going to tell why Colonel Martin did not take part.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is not relevant to a discussion of the War Vote.

Mr. PEDLOW: In view of what has been said on the subject, it is necessary that I should go into the history of that nomination, and with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I shall cover the ground as briefly and as concisely as possible. At the regular convention called for the purpose of selecting a candidate——

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion is not relevant to the consideration of a vote for $500,000,000 to carry on this war.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The subject was introduced by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie).

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would suggest that the thing be settled by the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) delivering some of the speches he made on the hustings.

Mr. MURPHY: I delivered only one.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Well, give us that.

Mr. MANION: Generally speaking, when a man serving at the front goes back to England, on political business or otherwise, he does so not under orders from this side, but after making application to his commanding officer for leave. In the case of Colonel Martin, the officer to whom such application should be made would be the Brigadier-General, who would put the matter before the divisional commander or higher officer. I understood from Colonel Martin's own lips that he was at the front a year. I assume that he asked to get leave to go to England. I do not think that the militia on this side should be held responsible for an officer's return in a case of this kind, in view of the fact that application has to be made to the superior officer on the other side for leave.

Mr. PEDLOW: Colonel Martin did not ask to be returned from the front in order to enter the contest; he was ordered—that is his statement,—to report in London, and when he reached London he was ordered to Canada. I think this committee has a right to know who issued these orders.

Mr. EDWARDS: Was he brought over in bonds?

Mr. PEDLOW: His bonds were that he should enter the contest in South Renfrew, and that bond was doubtless negotiated before he left for the front. The member for Fort William (Mr Manion) has said that Colonel Martin was at the front twelve months. I know, as a matter of fact, that not more than four months elapsed from the time he left Canada until he returned.

Mr. CURRIE: That is more than you were.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am not of age. I assure the hon. member that I have done as much for the cause of Empire and of our Allies in the present war as he has done. I take second place to no man within the four walls of this building in that regard. I am not at the front, because the military regulations prevent my being there. I have done as much as any man in this building in proportion to my ability, and a good deal more, both in money and in work, than most members of the House.

Mr. MANION: I did not state that Colonel Martin was at the front a year; I said that he himself told me he was at the front a year.

Mr. H. J. MACKIE: I am posted on the Colonel Martin incident; I have talked it over with him fully and very often. Certain mails and cablegrams were despatched to a party in London, addressed to Colonel Martin.

Mr. PEDLOW: By whom were those cablegrams sent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: The member for North Renfrew (Mr. Mackie) has the floor.

Mr. H J. MACKIE: To save time I may say that cablegrams were sent to London, and a friend of Colonel Martin's in London cabled him in France asking him to obtain leave and to go to London, which he did. He was not by any means ordered.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Minister of Militia has more power than he thinks with relation to the Canadian troops. Under section 177 of the Army Act, soldiers in the Canadian service who are paid by the Dominion of Canada, including those in the fighting line—excepting the commander in chief in the field—are under the control of the Canadian Government.

Major-General MEWBURN: I was referring only to the men of the first contingent who were here on leave. The question was, whether we had power to discharge them here, or permit them to remain on this side.

Mr. COCKSHUTT We are voting a large sum of money for war purposes. I do not know where it is coming from but I assume it will be raised by loans. What I am especially interested in, however, is how this money is to be paid out. I represent a constituency that has sent a good many men to the front, and a great many cases of deferred payments have been brought to my attention. I assume that every member of the House has had the same experience. The matter of assigned pay and separation allowance may seem to be one of detail as compared with the large question of the management of our armies, but it is very important that the wives and mothers of the boys who have gone overseas should receive these payments promptly. There would appear to be too much delay in the distribution of assigned pay and separation allowance. I am not holding the minister responsible; he no doubt is making the best of a difficult situation. But I know of many cases in which payments have been delayed three, four, even six months, and I do think that an effort should be made to distribute this money more promptly. The assurance is always given: "the Government of Canada owes you this money, so you will be sure to get it." But that does not pay grocery bills or other liabilities that may accumulate. Moreover, that spirit is altogether too evident in matters dealt with by departments of the Government generally. My idea is that payments made by the Government should be just as promptly attended to as are collections for Government purposes. If the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments demand cash on the spot for goods received, the Government should exercise the same principle in making payments; they should discharge their obligation just as promptly as the individual is expected to discharge his to the Government. There is a tendency in many of the departments—the Militia is not the only offender in this respect—to delay payments unduly, and many private individuals suffer from time to time as a result. I speak on behalf of the returned soldiers, men who are wounded, men who are depending upon their military pay, when I urge that the payments to which I have referred be expedited to the greatest possible extent; that they be distributed whenever they fall due. I have no doubt the minister can assure me that improvement will be effected in the near future, as improvement is being made even now to a certain extent.

Major-General MEWBURN: I not only say it will be improved, but I can honestly say that it has been improved 90 per cent during the last two or three months. I made a statement in the House about a week ago with regard to the assigned pay and separation allowance branch, which pays out about $5,000,000 a month in separation allowance and assigned pay. I do not take credit for the improvement that has been effected; I want to give credit where credit is due. There has been a great deal of difficulty in that branch; many mistakes were made—there is no use denying it. But I can also say that during the last two or three months there have been very few complaints that the women have not received their cheques promptly.

The officer whom I have in charge there, Major Stiff, at my earnest solicitation, took that position temporarily, so that he might re-organize the department. He is anxious to get back to his own business. He has been overseas. He is a man of the highest standard in accounting and in business generally. He has surrounded himself with efficient help, and if any hon. gentleman in this House could spare ten or fifteen minutes, or even half an hour, to go through the offices of the separation allowance and assigned pay branch with Major Stiff, it would be an object lesson to him to see what has been and is being accomplished and the enormous quantity of work that is being done. I would appreciate it if any hon. gentleman would take the trouble to go through those offices, because hon. gentlemen receive letters from many of their constituents who have soldier relatives overseas, and we welcome any information in regard to delays. We are there for the purpose of straightening out any complaints. That branch has a big responsibility, as have many others, and I believe if any hon. gentleman would go through it with Major Stiff, he would get an eye opener.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yesterday, I had occasion to go down to the separation allowance and assigned pay office on behalf of a lady who lives in the northern part of my constituency and who had not received her separation allowance cheque for over two months. The probable reason for the delay in her case is that when a soldier goes overseas, separation allowance cheques are paid from the Ottawa office, and when the soldier returns from overseas the cheques are paid from the military district in which he is located. I have on two or three occasions visited the separation allowance and assigned pay office, and I have been very greatly impressed, not only with the enormous quantity of work which is being carried on there, but with the earnestness and efficiency evidenced. Yesterday morning, when I called at the office, I failed to obtain an interview with Major Stiff. His assistant was not in at the time, but a young lady stepped up to the counter. I told her what I wanted, showing her the letter I had received from this person in my constituency, and she took hold of the matter in a very businesslike way. She was a very bright and intelligent young lady. In the afternoon I received a communication from the office showing that they had taken vigorous steps to have the matter rectified.

In regard to this vast amount of money and how it is to be expended, I want to mention just one case as an illustration of the way in which I think money for military purposes is not being properly expended, or is, in a sense, being misappropriated. In the Department of Justice there is an official who acts as purchasing agent for the penitentiaries, and who has been receiving for that work a salary of $3,300 a year. From all I can learn, I believe he is quite an efficient man. I understand, however, that in addition to acting as purchasing agent for the penitentiaries, he was required to act as purchasing agent for the internment camps.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where is that officer?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know where he is—somewhere in Canada, I presume. His name is Dillon, and he is purchasing agent for the penitentiaries. I presume his head office is in the city of Ottawa; I do not know the street number. The hon. member can get the information by applying to headquarters. I do not know that the work of purchasing supplies for the internment camps added very materially to his other work, but if it did, it seems to me the proper way to deal with the matter would be for the Government to inform the House, and if this gentleman is not receiving as large a salary as he should receive, then his salary should be increased. Instead of that course being pursued, the very roundabout method was adopted of saying: This can be very easily fixed; we want to increase your salary; we shall simply make you a captain and give you a captain's pay. His salary was boosted from $3,300 to over $5,000 by the simple expedient of making him a captain.

An hon. MEMBER: Captain of what?

Mr. EDWARDS: Captain of the Lord knows what. I do not know what.

Mr. POWER: He must be the only captain who draws as much pay as that. I can assure my hon. friend a captain's pay is not as large as that.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it not eighteen hundred and some odd dollars?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps he is an honorary captain.

Mr. EDWARDS: If he holds the rank of honorary captain, one thing is quite certain, that if my hon. friend had been Minister of Militia at the time, Mr. Dillon would not have been given that rank; he would have been made an honorary colonel. My hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) was in the habit of making one batch of honorary colonels before breakfast and if his food agreed with him, another batch after breakfast.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was very particular in the matter of selecting men for the rank of honorary colonel.

Mr. EDWARDS: I cannot agree with my hon. friend in that respect. There are many military matters in which I do not think my hon. friend has been particular, and not only in regard to appointing honorary colonels but also some who were neither honorary nor honored. The ex-Minister of Militia says that he has a high and lofty regard for a certain man who holds the rank of colonel down in the province of Quebec. As to my hon. friend's regard for that colonel—well, the sky is the limit, it is so high. I refer to Colonel Lavergne, and the first article in Colonel Lavergne's political belief is that this country shall do absolutely nothing to help Britain in this or in any other war. Nevertheless, he was one of the colonels who retained his rank all the time my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) held the office of Minister of Militia.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I rise to a question of privilege? Armand Lavergne was not a colonel all the time that I was minister. He took his training, and then I made him a colonel. I did not make him an honorary colonel. I may say here again, that I have nothing to retract in regard to what I said about Colonel Lavergne. He has performed all the duties that have been assigned to him. He was ready to go voluntarily if certain conditions were complied with. It is due to Colonel Lavergne that my hon. friend sits on the right side of the Speaker to-day.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend permit me a remark?

The CHAIRMAN: Order

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member who is addressing the committee at the present moment does not owe his position in this House to Colonel Lavergne nor to the efforts of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I said "on the right side."

Mr. EDWARDS: I am not so much concerned as regards the opinion which the hon. member has of Colonel Lavergne, nor do I think the country will be very much concerned about that, because Colonel Lavergne is not the only one of doubtful character who has been championed in this House and out of it by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton. There have been men who have cut large swaths in the business life of this country and who have been anxious to make use of this war to line their pockets, and who have been championed by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Col. J. Wesley Allison—and I am just as proud of him as I ever was and I am not going back on Lavergne.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend must have some little conscience left that he catches on so readily to my allusion. However, he has a perfect right to be proud of anybody he likes. Col. J. Wesley Allison was at one time an honorary colonel, but I believe his rank was stripped from him for some reason or another. He was made an honorary colonel by my hon. friend, along with a great many others of like doubtful character and service to this country. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton may be proud of him, and proud to act as champion of Armand Lavergne, who says that his first article of political faith is that this country shall do absolutely nothing in the war. I wish him joy of his views along that line. As regards Col. Lavergne's desire to get overseas, who had a cable on him keeping him on this side of the water?

Some reference has been made by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) to interference in the handling of men overseas. I would ask those hon. gentlemen who are a little scared that this blessed autonomy of ours which so frequently crops up will be interfered with by something or other done over the water: what in Heaven's name has Great Britain ever done that we cannot trust her? When has she ever tried to put the shackles on this country, that some person is always getting up and saying we must keep the power in our own hands and not let the control be over there. Such a declaration always brings a round of applause from some hon. gentlemen, particularly from those on the other side of the House, who have never distinguished themselves by doing anything for Great Britain or Canada. That is the situation. What have the officers in this country connected with our militia ever done to make us think we could better rely on their judgment than on the judgment of the men who are handling the situation overseas? What has my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) ever done in the past that we should take his opinion on matters overseas, in preference to the opinion of the men handling the situation over there? Where has he buried his dead? Where is his private cemetery? If we had a man in Canada, including my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton, big enough in a military sense to go overseas and make his bigness felt, not only England but every one of the Allied nations would be only too glad to place him in supreme command, and the men of England and the men of France would take their orders from him without any fear of losing their autonomy. I am sick and tired of this cheeseparing in regard to what they do over in England and at the front in regard to our Canadian troops. England and France appreciate every effort that has been made by this country in the war, and they have no idea other than to be absolutely fair and just to the men who left our shores to help them in the fight. And it ill becomes us in this House to say anything which in the least savours of a reflection upon those across the water who have charge of the conduct of this war, and especially in connection with their treatment of our Canadian troops.

5 p.m.

Mr. CURRIE: To revert to the subject of the returned soldier, I know a number, in fact, virtually all, of the married men remaining of the First Division who are home on furlough; there are about 800 of them altogether. These men who have served in the trenches for over three years have been allowed to come back and see their wives and children, but I understand in a number of cases the ships they came over on were delayed in England on account of submarines to such an extent that some of the men have only had a week at home. I would appeal to the minister to extend the leave of all these men in this country by thirty days, and also to give them a medical board before they go back, so that we shall be sure we are not sending cripples to the front. They should at least be allowed a full month at home with their wives and families. There are not so many of them that it would cause any great difficulty. I know I am asking this in the face of a great battle in which our men may become engaged, but I understand a number of these returned men were in billets in England for a few days or weeks before they left. So I think I might ask the minister to soften his heart a little, and if he does, I am sure the cause of the allies will not suffer, because every one of these men has his heart in the war and is anxious to go back. I think it is only fair they should be given the full leave they have been deprived of by the submarine menace.

Major-General MEWBURN Arrangements have already been made for giving these men a medical board before returning, and an effort has already been made to have extended the furlough of those who were delayed in coming across.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: The other evening I promised that when the militia estimates were under consideration I would make a statement as to the duties of the Director of Public Information and the work he is carrying on. As his salary will be paid out of the war appropriation, this is probably a suitable time to make the statement. The work of the Director of Public Information, on the limited scale applicable to Canada, is similar in character to that being carried on by the Bureau of Public Information in the United States, and to the Ministry of Information in Great Britain. As the hon. members of the House are aware, in all the countries at war there are departments that deal with dissemination of information relating to the war among their own people, as well as branches of the service dealing with propaganda abroad, and the idea back of the creation of this directorship of public information in Canada was exactly the same. If we are to sustain the spirit of the people; if through the long and trying years of this struggle we are to retain their continued interest and enthusiasm in supporting the war effort of the country, we must endeavour to supply them with the fullest possible information in connection with the conduct of the war. One of the primary objects in creating this branch of the public service was to supply still fuller information to the people of Canada in reference to the progress of the war and Canada's participation in it. There has also been placed under the charge of the Director of Public Information the publication of the Canadian Daily Record for our troops overseas. This paper is edited and conducted by returned officers who have served at the front.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who is the head of this department?

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Nichols.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Late of the Montreal Daily Mail?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. Capt. Wallace is in actual charge of the publication of the Daily Record.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not our hon. friend from West York?

Mr. ROWELL: No, he is a newspaper man who has served overseas and is now back in Canada. The information is cabled over and the Daily Record is published for the information of the men in the trenches. News which would interest the men at the front is being supplied every day. I am informed that in so far as the supplying of home news is concerned, the Daily Record is recognized as being the best publication going to any of the troops overseas. The arrangements for the publication of the Daily Record and its supervision were placed under the direction of the Director of Public Information in January or February of this year. I am sure the members of the House will all agree that it is a wise thing that the men overseas should be kept in touch with what is going on in Canada, that they should have the news from Canada and that the home ties should be maintained through such a publication.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How many words are sent daily?

Mr. ROWELL: From 1,000 to 1,500 words of the general news of Canada are cabled daily.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is this the Record from which were omitted the names of certain soldiers who were candidates in the last election?

Mr. ROWELL: I have no knowledge of that matter. The supervision of the Record came under the charge of the Director of Public Information in January or February of the present year, some time after the election, and I have no knowledge of conditions prior to that time. The paper is printed in London and is despatched to the soldiers overseas. I suppose most of the members have seen this paper; it is a small publication of four pages. The Director of Public Information is also responsible for seeing that news which the Government receives in connection with the war and which can properly be made public reaches the press of the country.

Mr. ROSS: I understand that this Record was published before January. Under whose charge was it published before that time?

Mr. ROWELL: The news was being supplied by officers of the militia; I presume under the Militia Department. It was published in London, the information being sent from Canada. In addition, the Director of Public Information is responsible for seeing that news of important decisions of the Government, particularly relating to the war, reaches the public press. In the ordinary course, information as to the important acts of the Government, in the great majority of cases, is communicated direct to the press either by the Prime Minister or the ministers in charge of the different departments. But, it is the duty of the Director of Public Information to keep in touch with the various departments and to see that their important acts are communicated to the press. One of the difficulties of all ministers, and of departmental officers, is that there is such a pressure upon their time and attention, especially during a period of stress like this, that not sufficient attention is given to communicating to the public news of importance. The public is entitled to the fullest possible information as to what is being done by the Government, in order that it may be kept in touch with the situation. That is an important phase of the work which must be developed as time goes on.

Mr. POWER: Are the advertisements which appear in the Record paid for?

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot say as to that. It is published in England. All we are responsible for here is sending over the news.

Mr. POWER: Are you responsible for the advertisements published in it? For a period of about three weeks previous to the election, the Daily Record was plastered with advertisements asking the soldiers to vote against the friends of the Kaiser. Were these paid for, and, if so, by whom?

Mr. ROWELL: The Record was not under the control of the Director of Public Information at that time, and I have no knowledge of the matters to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. POWER: Under whose control was it?

Mr. ROWELL: It was published in England.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Power) if he has any objection to the advertisement to which he has referred?

Mr. POWER: I have an objection to the manner in which the words were used, and I have a grave objection to pointing out the people on this side of the House as being friends of the Kaiser. I have, as well, a particular objection to the members of the Government, who were candidates at that time, treating their opponents as such.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is there a complete file of that publication in the reading room of the House? If not, I think it would be wise to keep a complete file of the paper so that it would be available for reference, and so that we could check up the matters appearing in it.

Mr. ROWELL: I will make inquiries as to the point about which the hon. gentleman asks. I do not know whether there is a file or not. I have no doubt there is a file in the department of the publication since it came under the charge of the Director of Public Information.

I propose now to speak of the propaganda work of the Director of Public Information. The members of the House would not expect me to go into matters of detail in connection with the question of propaganda outside our own country. Yet, I am sure, they will recognize that there are conditions under which it might be desirable that Canada's war efforts, and what we are doing in this country, should be made known outside of Canada. We are one of the allied nations and it is important that the facts in connection with our participation in the war should be kept before other peoples as well as our own. That is becoming increasingly important in connection with our relations with our neighbours to the south. This is a matter which comes under the charge of the Director of Public Information. He is in touch with the American Committee of Public Information and they are rendering help and assistance to each other. He is also in touch with the British Ministry of Information and arrangements have been made for co-operation between the British Ministry of Information and the Director of Public Information here. They are placing at our disposal much of the literature which has been published there insofar as we desire to use it in Canada. Many pamphlets, of very great value, dealing with certain war conditions in Europe have been placed at our disposal for use and distribution in Canada. That arrangement was made only recently.

There is another aspect of the work of the department to which I would like to draw attention and that is what is known as the War Lecture Bureau, or what might be described as oral propaganda. I am sure we realize the invaluable service which the press of Canada has rendered during this war in placing before the people of Canada the facts in connection with the war and in sustaining the spirit of the people during the whole course of the struggle.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it in recognition of the splendid services of the press of this country in stimulating recruiting that hundreds of dollars have been paid out to Le Devoir for Government advertising?

Mr. ROWELL: The advertisements that have been printed in the newspaper to which my hon. friend refers do not come under the cognizance of my department, and, therefore, I cannot give my hon. friend the information he desires.

I was going on to say that we all recognize the value of the press, but nothing will fully take the place of the oral appeal, the living voice in appeal, to the people in connection with the war, and in communicating to them the facts bearing on the war. That has been one of the most important developments in the work of the Bureau of Public Information in the United States, and of the Ministry of Information in Great Britain. In both those countries they have organized volunteer speakers, who discuss the varying issues and phases of the war before the people in order that the whole nation may, so far as is practicable, be kept in the most vital touch, not only with the war situation, but with the efforts of the nation itself in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the personnel of the Bureau?

Mr. ROWELL: It consists of a travelling secretary, who is organizing these voluntary groups or associations in the various cities and towns. The workers are all volunteers throughout the cities, towns and rural sections of Canada. There is also an official who assists in the office with the work of this bureau, as well as with the press work.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What are the names of the officers who assist in the work here? I may as well confess that I am suspicious of the entire outfit.

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot help my hon. friend's suspicions; I can only state the facts.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like to get their names.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Frank Yeigh, of Toronto, is the organizing secretary of the War Lecture Bureau throughout the country, and Mr. LeSueur is associated with Mr. Nichols in the office. He assists not only in the work of the War Lecture Bureau, but also in the work for the press.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is he a son of the former secretary of the Post Office Department, the late Mr. LeSueur?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know the position of Mr. LeSueur's father, but this gentleman was identified with Y.M.C.A. work before he entered upon his present duties.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think he is the son of the late Mr. LeSueur of the Post Office Department, who died a year or so ago, and who was a member of the Royal Society of Canada.

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot say as to that, I would be very glad to give my hon. friend the information if I had it.

The procedure adopted in connection with the War Lecture Bureau is to distribute a weekly bulletin containing information and material for speakers. This information goes to the clergymen of all denominations throughout Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It goes to public school inspectors, to school teachers, and to all volunteer speakers in connection with the War Lecture Bureau's work. I understand that one hundred and fifty localities have been organized throughout Canada with speakers who undertake to give short talks, on the themes suggested for them, in moving picture shows, theatres, Canadian clubs, and societies of all sorts; the object being to reach the people in this way with the living voice through pulpit, school, theatre and club.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask, is this work along the same lines as that of the committee of one hundred sanctimonious gentlemen organized in Ontario as a general committee, with branches in every county in the province? Is this work along the same lines, and is it to be utilized for political purposes?

Mr. ROWELL: No, my hon. friend is quite in error. This bureau has nothing whatever to do with the committee to which he refers. Its work is just as I have explained. Perhaps I could not better define the work than by reading what President Falconer, of Toronto University, who is chairman of the advisory committee, has said. In a communication which I received from him in reference to the work, he states:

> Since the beginning of December leaflets have been issued at frequent and fairly regular intervals dealing with themes which we thought would stimulate the mind of the people and give them useful information in regard to the war. These leaflets have gone to all the clergy of Canada, and to a large number of teachers.

I have already stated that in some 150 localities between the Atlantic and the Pacific, these local committees have been organized in the object of securing volunteer speakers who attend at the places which I have mentioned where they have the opportunity of addressing what they describe as really great audiences.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Can they get audiences to turn out to hear this sort of stuff?

Mr. ROWELL: They do apparently, surprised as the hon. gentleman may be, and apparently the audiences enjoy it; I have a great many letters to that effect. However, this is what president Falconer says:

> The experience of these months has demonstrated that there is a wide field of usefulness for such work. We know that both the army at the front and the Government at home depend to a great extent upon the moral quality of the country. That quality is undoubtedly good, but under the severe strain which we are suffering at present endurance may flag unless it is stimulated. Courage and patience are needed in these critical months. The people must be informed and stimulated by telling them facts that will strengthen their resolution by keeping before them regularly the purposes of the war, by cheering them as to the accounts of its progress, or in times of darkness by buoying them up with hope, and by setting before them the plans of the Government which will contribute to the winning of the war. The hearts of the people must be kept high. Of course the debt that is owed to the newspapers is enormous, but there is need also of the spoken utterance, of the direct appeal to the people supported and authorized by the Government. We know what President Wilson has done in the United States and that Britain has appointed a Director of Propaganda. To this there are two sides, the press and organized public address.

President Falconer, and other men of like outstanding position in Canada, are freely giving voluntarily of their time and their ability to carry on this propaganda at home in order that the spirit of the Canadian people may be sustained clear and strong through these days of stress and struggle.

In order that my hon. friend may have some idea of the weekly bulletins which are sent out, let me draw attention to the last number issued in which the subject is headed, "A Lesson from the Napoleonic Wars." If any hon. gentleman wish to read this bulletin I shall be glad to have them furnished with copies. I venture to think they will not find anywhere a better summary of the critical situation which existed during the Napoleonic wars, and of the position which Great Britain had to face at that time, vastly more serious than that which she faces to-day. A message of courage and cheer such as this bulletin contains must necessarily be very helpful at the present time, and will reach thousands of people throughout Canada in a direct and effective way through the volunteer speakers of the War Lecture Bureau.

This particular article was prepared by one of the best known professors of history in Canada who is glad to give his time and ability to this work.

The work of this department commands the confidence and support of patriotic citizens all over the country, who are deeply interested in the success of Canada in the war and in sustaining the spirit of the Canadian people. My hon. friend wishes to know how it is appreciated by the clergy. All over Canada, the clergy of all denominations have expressed appreciation of these statements sent to them, giving them information in connection with the war and subjects bearing directly upon the war. I have here page after page of letters which have been received from clergymen all over Canada, expressing their appreciation of these bulletins. Among the thousands of letters, I have one from Rev. Charles E.

Coughlin, of Assumption College, Sandwich, Ontario, who wrote to the Bureau the following letter:

> May I state that I am firmly convinced of the necessity of prosecuting the war with undiminished vigour. This conviction is based not only on patriotic premises but also on the religious principles which I as a Catholic Priest approve. Whenever I have an opportunity to address my fellow citizens or co-religionists, be assured that I shall endeavour to inspire them with the "Win-the-War" spirit.

We also have letters from men like Principal Dyde, of Robertson College, Edmonton, who says:

> You address willing ears. I am willing to do all in my power in pulpit and platform and will place myself at the disposal of any committee or council which is, or may be formed. This is without reserve.

If my hon. friends are interested, I have pages of extracts from letters from the foremost clergymen of all denominations from the Atlantic to the Pacific, thanking the bureau for sending them these weekly publications which they say contain valuable information. Man after man says that it should have been established before, that it helps them in presenting the facts to their congregations. Many clergymen living in out-of-the-way sections of the country, away from metropolitan centres, where the large papers do not circulate so freely, say that the information contained in these statements is of great value and that they use it Sunday after Sunday in presenting to their congregations the war situation and the demand upon our energies and resources which each day makes more urgent. I will not trouble the House with reading these communications unless my hon. friends wish to have some of their contents presented to them.

Mr. CANNON: Are those publications translated into French and circulated also in the province of Quebec?

Mr. ROWELL: They are.

Mr. CANNON: By whom, may I ask?

Mr. ROWELL: They are translated here at the office; I do not know who translates them. But all the clergymen in the province of Quebec receive these statements, and they are translated into French for the benefit of those who speak that language. And may I say here that the department will heartily welcome the co-operation of my hon. friends from Quebec in getting these subjects, which are so cordially received in the other provinces, just as cordially received in the province of Quebec. And if any hon. member of this House has any suggestions to make as to how the bureau can carry on its work more effectively in order to get the real facts of the war situation before all the Canadian people they will be most heartily welcomed. For I think we must all recognize that in all sections of Canada there are still some of the Canadian people who do not appreciate the real seriousness of the conflict in which we are engaged. Anything and everything the Government can do, it is its bounden duty to do, to get before the Canadian people the real issues of this war, the urgency of the present situation, and the necessity for Canada to throw her whole strength into the struggle. It is in order that we may do this more effectively that this bureau has been organized, and the limited staff, such as it is, has been created. That is, in brief, an outline of the general situation. If there is any further information hon. gentlemen desire I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. PEDLOW: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Devlin): I promised to see the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton next.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was on my feet when the hon. member who has just taken his seat concluded, to dispose of another issue; and as I may not have the privilege of being present to-night until late, I will take the occasion now. I want to say a few words regarding the position in which Colonel Armand Lavergne stands before the people of Canada. I hold no brief for Armand Lavergne. But I have had Armand Lavergne's speeches reported when other gentlemen did not; I have had him interviewed when other gentlemen have not. Armand Lavergne's speeches and actions have been accepted by the party to which I had the honour to belong in the election of 1911.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And through the exertions of Armand Lavergne and others of his ilk the Liberal Conservative party came into power, for the welfare of the country. I shall not enter into further details now. Armand Lavergne is an impulsive young fellow, the same as my good friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and as your humble servant. On occasions, possibly, a little balance would do any one of us no harm. I have had reported Armand Lavergne's speech that I understand was made in Quebec on a certain occasion, with the object of taking it up with the department if I could possibly find that he was using language that could be construed by any lawyer into being treasonable. I have not failed—and as to this the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice will bear me out—to urge that, if there was any possibility of reaching him under the law, it should be done. So far as I am concerned, I have never yet found an occasion when he has uttered one treasonable word or one word that could be construed as any worse than lots of language that has been published in the Toronto Globe and other standard publications of that kind. I am devoid of prejudice in this matter. Because Armand Lavergne is a Frenchman is no reason why he should not have full justice. I have seen any number of these young French lads go over to the front and do splendid work there. And the trouble is not, as I view it—and I can speak ing frankly and fairly—because the French Canadian people are opposed to this war, but it is chiefly because of the influence of the ultramontane wing of the Roman church in the province of Quebec—not the old, broad, tolerant, Bleu or the progressive, steadfast Liberal, or the radical wing—that the idea has been disseminated, largely through the influence of Bourassa to whom every one bows, which have held up enlistments on the present occasion. I think that is the position. I have no corner to turn on the subject. And if my hon. friend from Frontenac has the evidence that he claims he has, his duty is clear, and complaint should be lodged against Armand Lavergne, and he should be arrested under the law and brought up for treason. So far as any personal references of the hon. gentleman to my association with Colonel J. Wesley Allison are concerned, I may say that history is already turning, the lane is being turned, and to-day J. Wesley Allison stands higher in the opinion of the British Government than do any of his detractors. He is consulted to-day by the British Government; he is of more assistance to-day to the British Government than all the gentlemen who have maligned him in this country or in the Empire.

He is of more importance in the eyes of the British officers to-day than are these gentlemen, or than any of them ever will be. The wheel of fortune, therefore, is taking a turn. I should not be surprised to see J. Wesley Allison a baronet if he keeps on.

As to the statement of my good friend the President of the Council, I will take the liberty of replying to it. In the first place,

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

I understand that the gentleman whom he has chosen for Director of Public Information is a half-brother to the Minister of Finance, and is the same gentleman who edited the Montreal Daily Mail and the Montreal Evening News, two papers which were started with the definite object of booming the Finance Minister to be Prime Minister of Canada, getting rid of a gentleman who, they claimed, had no backbone, and incidentally maligning your humble servant on any and every occasion. I could imagine from the line on which he conducted the paper that the gentleman in question could not expect to commend himself to a great many of the people of this country who held other views than those to which he gave utterance. I object to the principle with which my hon. friend has associated himself. I do not especially know the gentleman concerned, so I will not deal with that aspect of the matter. The thing is in harmony, however, with an organization which has been engineered, I understand, largely by the hon. gentleman himself—a very good organization, but it does not work—to go into the counties. For instance, I understand that the organization was to have a committee of a certain number of men—one hundred, I think—to work for a little time when people do not get their eyes open. People are connected in the city of Toronto with those in various other parts of the province, and when the button is touched, politics and all else swing into the line laid down by my good hon. friend. It was tried in my county, but it did not work. The people of that county were too well posted; we had preceded our friends with literature of another kind. All this solicitude may be good for the poor, innocent, ignorant people of the Dominion of Canada, but I have this faith and experience, that the good people living in the remote parts of the country are just as well posted on the causes of this war and how to carry it on as is the hon. gentleman who presides at the head of the Council, or many others of us who may think that we know it all and that these people do not know anything. There was one of those gentlemen who came into my riding. We took him out to the back part of the county to practise a little, and get his hand in, and he came back utterly amazed to think that the farmers could teach him many lessons in politics. The same thing may be found all throughout Canada. This attempted solicitude, this paternalism, this hypnotism, this chloroforming that is going on throughout Canada among the great masses of the people is, to my mind, absolute nonsense. The people are fully alive to the situation—those who could be impressed by this sort of thing,—and those who are not impressed must be reached by the legislation which we are bringing up to-morrow, bringing them out by compulsion. I have listened, of course, with great pleasure, to the complimentary remarks made by clergymen. I can easily realize how clergymen in the country districts would gladly get this stuff and unload it on their congregations on Sunday. It would save them the trouble of preparing a sermon, and would therefore be a very handy thing to have. However, so far as the practical use of it is concerned, it does not run in my line of practicability.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the answer given to-day by the President of the Council to the objections which I urged the other evening against the appointment of Mr. Nichols. Much as we are indebted to the President of the Council for the elaborate explanation he has given, I still submit that a better choice could have been made; indeed, that the post was not needed at all. It is, shall I say a libel?—it is a libel on the press of this country to say that people in the far-away districts are not well informed, and that there must be a central bureau in Ottawa to impart to them information about the war. Mr. Chairman, I am a reader of the press; I was a member of the press in my younger days. I read the press of the United States. I read some of the papers published in England and in France, and that of the various provinces of Canada. I daresay that there are no better informed papers than those published in the large centres of Canada, and in the rural districts as well. On the question of the war, surely you can open any paper published in the rural sections of Canada and get just as much information as you will get in the daily press. From that point of view, therefore, I do not think the appointment was needed. As regards the personality of Mr. Nichols, I have this to say: Mr. Nichols never impressed me as a successful man in his own business. It is a well-known fact that he killed two newspapers in Montreal because he could not gather the support of the Conservative party in Montreal by reason of his attempting to destroy my hon. friend the then Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). He was also, I must tell my hon. friend, mixed up in a very questionable business, when with his business partner he attempted to expropriate for this Government that hotel in Montreal known as the Carslake hotel. He asked the Government something like $600,000 or $700,000 for this building, which really was not needed by the Government, because the Post Office Department had a lot at a stone's throw from the Carslake hotel—a lot which was vacant, and had been purchased when Sir William Mulock was Postmaster General. Nevertheless, by his intrigues, he succeeded in landing that Carslake hotel on the Public Works Department. He was ready to get something like $700,000 from the Government, but when the expropriation proceedings took place in Montreal it was found that the whole building and the whole lot were not worth more than $150,000 or $200,000. I read the other day the sheet which my hon. friend held in his hands a moment ago. What is said there about Napoleon and Wellington and the battle of Waterloo as compared with the present struggle—why, it has been published time and again since the beginning of the war. The Prime Minister two years ago, in his speech delivered in this House, used exactly the same parallel. You can find it in any third-class school history. In any back concession third-class school you will find that history of Waterloo and Wellington and Blucher and all the details about how many men were gathered there, and so on. Surely my hon. friend will not try to convince me that this is a chef d'oeuvre. I believe that to incur this expenditure is a pure waste of money, when the people of this country are straining every nerve to pay their tax bills, their income tax, and their customs dues. It is quite right to vote the money needed for the carrying on of the war, but when it comes to creating fat offices for men who have been failures in their business, that is another matter. I am told by the ex-Minister of Militia that not only is this organization for giving information to the public on the question of the war, but that it is really nothing else but politics.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I correct the hon. member? I did not say that. I asked if it was in harmony with a kindred organization formed in the province of Ontario some years ago whereby my hon. friend would get in touch with the better elements of the country along certain lines, and then when he wanted to use them politically all he had to do was to push the button and the thing would go. I want to know the names of the men on the committee formed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. minister can explain that himself. One aspect of the question which does not please me at all is that of the publication of the Record. In view of the huge amounts we shall, during this week, be called upon to vote, how can you expect, Sir—and I appeal especially to the Prime Minister—to have national unity in this country, when you ask the taxpayers of Canada, Liberals and Conservatives, to vote money for publications in which one-half of the people of Canada are being libelled and slandered? After the last election I received from my son, who was at Witley Camp, a bundle of those Records containing the vilest statements about my right hon. leader and about the French Canadian generally. Do you believe, Sir, that the publication of that Record is a national necessity? The elections are over. The Record did its work in the trenches in the last campaign. Drop it, for Heaven's sake; we do not want it any more. If you want to have the respect, the backing, of the country for the huge sums which you are asking us to vote and for the stringent measures which you are taking in order to make the Military Service Act more effective, for decency's sake do not ask the people who are being slandered and libelled to say " amen " to such nonsense.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like very much to see the issues of the Record to which my hon. friend refers, and which, according to his conception, contained vile slanders upon the right hon. leader of the Opposition and upon French Canadians. They have never been brought to my attention. So far as this newspaper is concerned, I am not aware that any public money of Canada is paid out for its publication, except that which is expended in sending messages containing news from Canada for the men at the front. When the hon. gentleman talks about abolishing the Record, I should like to tell him that according to my information every man in the Canadian forces at the front would protest against the idea of abolishing the Record, because it is the chief means they have of getting home news from day to day. I think those who have served at the front will bear me out in that.

In regard to a question which was asked, I think, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), with respect to a list which appeared in the Daily Record of the candidates at the last election, I may say that that subject was brought to my attention some time ago by the War Veterans' Association, I think, and I made inquiry concerning it. The inquiry was made by the director of public information at my request. I sent for him and asked him to investigate. He has given me this memorandum in reply, and it is proper that the House should know it. This is a memorandum from Captain William Wallace, M.C., Officer in Charge for Canada, Canadian Daily Record, regarding publication of nomination list in the Canadian Daily Record:

On November 14, 1917, I received a cable from the Canadian War Records Office, London, asking me to see that a complete list of nomiations throughout Canada was sent overseas and to indicate the time it would be available so they could prepare for an enlarged issue.

I replied stating the Government was required by law to send a list of nominations overseas and that I was informed that the General Returning Officer would cable the list to Colonel Purney, c/o High Commissioner's Office, about November 20.

I suggested the list could be obtained from Col. Purney, my idea being to save cable tolls from this office. On November 15th I received a cable saying this arrangement would be satisfactory and that the Canadian War Records Office would arrange to get the list from Col. Purney.

Therefore, no official list of nominations was sent from this office.

When the question of the omission of certain names from the nomination list published in the Canadian Daily Record was brought up by the newspapers here, I cabled the Canadian War Records Office on February 27, 1918, asking if any explanation could be given why the names of McCormack, (Parkdale); Cockburn, (East York); McLaren, (West Hamilton); and Sutherland, (North Oxford), were not included in the nomination list published in the Canadian Daily Record on November 27th.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Was the name of Mr. Harry Cockshutt, of Brant, in the list?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am reading the memorandum. If my hon. friend will be good enough to withhold any questions until I get through with the memorandum I shall be pleased to answer them.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The Prime Minister is reading the names.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am reading the names, and it would be well to have the whole thing in consecutive order:

The London office replied that the nomination list published in the issue of November 27th was exactly as received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, through the courtesy of Col. Purney in London. The reply also stated that a second nomination list containing additional names was published in a special edition on November 29th and that this list was received through the same channel. The cable also pointed out that the distribution of the second list published on November 29th was exactly the same as the distribution of the first list published on November 27th.

On March 1st another cable was despatched from this office in order to ascertain positively if the names of the four soldier candidates were published on November 29th and stating that copies of this issue had not been received in this office. Replying on March 5th, the Canadian War Records Office stated the names of McCormack, (Parkdale); Cockburn, (East York); McLaren, (West Hamilton); and Sutherland, (North Oxford), were included in the issue of the Canadian Daily Record for November 29th.

The London office also stated that through an oversight, copies of this special edition had not been mailed to Canada, but the distribution among the troops Overseas had been the same as the edition of November 27th containing the previous list.

I may state that copies of the issue of November 29th have not yet arrived but should be received within a week.

(Sgd.) William Wallace,
Captain.

Since then this letter has been received by Captain Wallace from Captain J. Harold Watkins:

Canadian War Records Office,
14 Clifford St., Bond Street. London, W.I.
March 1st, 1918.

To Captain William Wallace, M.C.,
Department of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa.

Dear Captain Wallace:

We received a cable from you yesterday with reference to certain omissions from the first list of nominations published in the Canadian Daily Record of Novembtr 27th, 1917 I cabled you in reply as follows:

"Reference 5445 list published November 27 exactly as received from Clerk of Crown in Chancery through courtesy Col. Purney here (stop) Second list containing additional names published in special edition November 29 received through same channels (stop) Distribution of second list exactly same as distribution first list."

We received the list that was published on November 27th from Colonel Purney who was in charge of the election here, and I understand that he received it direct from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Two days later he sent us a revised list and we issued a special revised Nomination Edition of the Canadian Daily Record, which was dated Thursday, November 29th, and which contained all the names you mention.

The distribution was the same in each case, so that everyone who read the first list also had the opportunity to read the revised list.

I send you herewith a dozen copies of the November 29th issue in case you would like to send them to the newspapers who have taken up the matter with you.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd) J. Harold Watkins,
Captain,
For officer 1/c Canadian War Records.

My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has asked me about the name of one of the candidates in the county of Brant. The candidates in that county were, John Harold (Paris), Blackwell Doran (Burford township), and Henry Cockshutt (Brantford.) What appears to have happened is this: Under the Military Voters Act the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government were required to give certain recognition to candidates. Apparently the list which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery first telegraphed over contained only the names which were so recognized, and then he immediately afterwards telegraphed all the names. The first list was published on November 27th. The second list, which had exactly the same distribution, was published on November 29th.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: When did the second list circulate, and to what extent?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The communications which I have read state that the distribution of the second list was exactly the same as the distribution of the list of November 27th.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: At what time was it distributed? Probably after the elections were over.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not indicate the date on which the issue of November 27th was sent out, nor the date on which the issue of November 29th was sent out, but I suppose we might very well reach the conclusion that they would hardly prepare these issues and then store them somewhere without sending them to the men at the front. I assume that in both cases the issues were sent out as soon as printed, and I do not know of any reason which would lead me to a contrary conclusion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is Mr. Cockshutt's name in the list of November 27th?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it is in the list of November 29th.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: At six o'clock I was giving some explanation in regard to the issues of the Canada War Record of 27th and 29th November. I have nothing to add in regard to that. But, there are one or two words which I would like to say in regard to the Director of Public Information. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has found some fault with his appointment for the reason that he alleges he was connected in some way with the purchase of a property in Montreal, the value of which was not fixed by the Government but was fixed by the Exchequer Court. I am perfectly confident—I have Mr. Nichols' word for it—that he had no more interest in that property than had the hon. member for Maisonneuve and that he had no more to do with fixing the value than had that hon. gentleman.

Some comment was also made on the fact that he is a relative of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). I happened to know something of the way in which Mr. Nichols was appointed. My hon. friend the president of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) brought to my attention, and to the attention of his colleagues, the proposal for the establishment of a directorship of public information. He has set out the reasons this afternoon on account of which he thought that proposal would be a valuable one in the public interest. He mentioned to me the name of Mr. Nichols and I am in a position to state that the Minister of Finance had no more to do with the appointment of Mr. Nichols than any hon. gentleman in this House. Mr. Nichols was not appointed in any way on account of his relationship, nor did the Minister of Finance know anything at all about it until the matter was proposed in Council by the President of the Privy Council. I think it is only right and just to Mr. Nichols, and to the Minister of Finance as well, to make that public statement in this House.

Further, as to the editorial policy of newspapers in Montreal with which Mr. Nichols is said to have been connected, I am not in a position to speak or to give any opinion upon that policy. As a matter of fact, I do not have time to read newspapers at all except an occasional bunch of clippings that is handed to me by one of my secretaries. But I do positively assert that I am as confident as I am of my own existence that the Minister of Finance had no more to do with the editorial policy of any of these papers in Montreal than any hon. gentleman who is listening to me in this House.

Mr. ROBB: While the Prime Minister is discussing this question, would he have any objection to telling the House and the country who were consulted previous to the appointment of Mr. Nichols? Last week, during the debate, the President of the Privy council (Mr. Rowell), stated that before appointing Mr. Nichols he had consulted the best newspaper men in Canada, and that upon their recommendation he had appointed Mr. Nichols because that gentleman was known as a competent newspaper man. I understand that a great many of the best newspaper men in Canada say they were not consulted. Who were the newspaper men who were consulted?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Inasmuch as I was not the person consulting them, I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. friend the information. We were assured by the President of the Privy Council that he had made the necessary inquiry and he was so advised.

Mr. FORTIER: This Bill is to provide for a military expenditure of $500,000,000. I would like to know what portion of the total amount is to cover the expenses in excess of the war appropriation of 1917 and also the amount that is required for the military operations of this year. I understand that with the amount required for this year the Government is taking into consideration additional expenditures to be incurred by the amendments contemplated to the Military Service Act, 1917, which appear in the Government's notice of motion on the Orders of the Day the debate upon which has been adjourned until to-morrow. I maintain that this is not the proper time to discuss in Committee of the House the Bill providing for the appropriation of that large amount. We see by these proposed resolutions that the Government intends to make some amendments to the Military Service Act. It follows that the expenses of the current year will be increased if these resolutions are adopted by Parliament. I hope they will not be adopted by Parliament, but if they are adopted there is no doubt that the appropriation for next year will have to be increased accordingly. I should say that inasmuch as the appropriation of $500,000,000 is for the putting into operation of conscription, I am against it. I have been elected against conscription and I am against all forms of conscription. I would expect that the Government would defer the consideration of this Bill until the proposed amendments to the Military Service Act, now before the House, are taken into consideration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortier) will look at page 601 of unrevised Hansard he will find the estimate upon which this appropriation is based. I gave it a week ago to-day, but as the hon. gentleman has probably not had his attention called to it, I will read it again. It is based on the total force of 500,000 men from Canada, as follows:

First Draft, Military Service Act.. ..	100,000
Home Defence Force..	10,000
In England	150,000
In France	140,000
Discharged after service at the front Killed, died of wounds, etc	100,000

Mr. FORTIER: The right hon. gentleman has not answered the question that I asked. I would like to know from the Government what proportion of the $500,000,000 is to cover the expenses incurred under the War Appropriation of 1917.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman will look at the statement that I read in the House, page 597 of unrevised Hansard, he will see that the accounts up to the present time, as far as they can be furnished to us by the Finance Department, show a total of $306,488,814.63 from which it would appear that no portion of this sum will be needed to meet the expenditure of the last fiscal year. If, however, the accounts when they come in should swell the total to more than $500,000,000 this Bill provides that any balance may be paid out of it.

Mr. FORTIER: Is it contemplated to provide out of the $500,000,000 for the additional cost of carrying out the military law as it is supposed to be amended this session?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman probably is aware that the Military Service Act provides for raising a total force of one hundred thousand men. The estimate that I have already given takes into account the one hundred thousand men to be raised under the Military Service Act.

Mr. BUREAU: Has the Government any idea as to how the account of Canada with Great Britain stands to-day? I understand that we are paying for certain things on behalf of the British Government which are being manufactured or produced in and shipped from this country. I understand we are paying in Canada for certain things that ought to be paid by Great Britain. We may not be actually advancing the money because there is a somewhat similar financial process being followed on the other side in our interest. Has any balance been struck between the British Government and the Dominion Government, and does the balance stand to the credit or the debit of the British Government?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Early in the war the British Government made a loan, not a very large loan, to Canada. Upon the accounts as they stand at present I believe the balance is in favour of Canada, but I am not sure of the exact amount. What happens is this: the British Government pays accounts for us in connection with the maintenance of our troops at the front, provides supplies and so forth, which I suppose would run up to something like $200,000,000 a year, or very nearly that. On the other hand, we provide in this country credits for the British Government in payment for munitions, food stuffs, and supplies of various kinds, and those, of course, are charged against the British Government, just as the amounts that they advance are charged against us. Upon the whole, since the beginning of the war, the balance is something in favour of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: I understood from a statement made the other day, that the British Government was paying for our troops in France at the rate of six shillings a day per man, and that that covered munitions, equipment and everything. Is the British Government paying for our troops in England and is there, as in the case of the troops in France, a stated per capita amount which the British Government is advancing on our account?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The arrangement to which I have alluded applies only to the troops in France.

Mr. BUREAU: And the six shillings covers everything?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The six shillings covers everything, but I again remind my hon. friend that the other Dominions of the Empire have agreed to increase that to something over nine shillings, I think. We have not yet given our formal consent, but it is very likely that in all fairness we shall be obliged to do so, because of the tremendous increase in the use of shells and munitions of all kinds which has come about since that arrangement was entered into. I would like also to remind the hon. gentleman that the accounts have not yet been adjusted. When I state my belief that the balance is in favour of Canada, I make that statement subject to the final adjustment of accounts.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like the Prime Minister to take his pencil and make a calculation, because I have some figures that require explanation. I see that the expenditure during the first year of the war, 1914-1915, on account of naval service was $3,096,125. During the second year, 1915-1916, the expenditure in round figures was $3,274,000, and in the third year, 1916-1917, the expenditure was approximately $3,806,000, whereas last year, up to April the 8th, the expenditure on account of naval service reached a total of over $10,000,000 in round figures. There seems to be quite an increase there, and the committee is entitled to an explanation of why there is such a difference. I am simply speaking of the expenditure on the naval service, I shall have other questions to submit later as to the expenditure under other heads.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman's question is a very reasonable one, and I will give an explanation of it as far as it is possible to do so in the public interest. In the autumn of 1916, I think it was, the Government of Canada was called upon very suddenly by the Admiralty to take certain precautions in connection with the theatened submarine menace against the coasts of this country. We consulted with them, and steps were taken with very great promptness, and in the most effective way possible, by the then Minister of Naval Affairs, Mr. Hazen. Those steps involved a very considerable outlay at once in the provision of trawlers, patrol boats and other armed vessels, in order that the merchant marine of Canada might be protected so far as possible from any attack by submarines near our coasts. I do not know that I can go into the matter more fully at the moment, but I am confident that the minister in charge of the Naval Service will be very glad indeed to give the hon. gentleman privately much fuller information than it would be prudent to publicly disclose in this House. The expenditures of last year are grouped in an account which I shall be glad to send over to the hon. gentleman if he cares to look at it. It is not desirable, I think, that I should do more or give some information the publication of which is undesirable. Altogether, these expenditures amount to $10,662,981.02.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The expenditure in the Department of Indian Affairs in 1914-15, the first year of the war was $81.72; in 1915-16, $5,688.83; in 1916-17, $5,836.93; this year, up to April 8, $50,000. Might I ask the reason for that increase? I have other items to inquire about, but I would like to get the explanations seriatim.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not see the explanation as to the Department of Indian Affairs among my papers. Perhaps my hon. friend will go on with other items.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I take the Department of the Secretary of State. The first year of the war the expenditure was, in round figures, $16,000; in the second year, $21,000; in the third year, $54,000; and the last year, $66,354.32.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The estimate of the amount required for the coming year is $60,000. The expenditure last year was as follows:

Office of the Chief Press Censor for Canada.
Salaries at Ottawa	$11,937 97
Assistant Censors outside of Ottawa.	1,701 00
Travelling expenses	1,025 75
Printing and stationery	1,601 35
Newspapers and books	169 48
Translations	828 10
Sundries, including postage, telegrams, telephone conversations, cartage, etc.	1,079 40
Total for Branch	$18,343 05
Registrar's Branch—
Salaries of substitutes for employees on active service	$1,223 86
Extra clerical assistance	1,283 04
Total for Branch	$2,506 90
War Charities Act Branch—
Salaries	$1,068 77
Printing, stationery, travelling expenses, advertising, other contingencies	2,947 25
Total for Branch	$4,016 02
For the Department generally, the details are—
Salaries of substitutes other than in the Registrar's Branch, for employees on active service	$2,320 58
Extra clerical assistance	4,228 80
Visit of Marshall Joffre and M. Viviani	8,511 62
Investigations of suspected alien enemy businesses	9,988 49
Printing and stationery	31,355 40
Travelling expenses and sundries	895 19
Total	$57,300 08
Grand total	$82,166 05

The estimates for the coming year is $60,000. Printing and stationery is to be cut down by $29,000, and some of the other items slightly increased.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I find that under the heading of Agriculture, the first year of the war shows an expenditure of nothing; the second year, $5,000 in round figures; the third year, $12,000; and the last fiscal year to April 8, $21,579.22. Will my right hon. friend explain that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did read all these details a week ago to-day, but I will read them again:

Exemption representatives	$14,415 38
Bacon-Hog campaign.....	25,898 51
Salaries of substitutes.....	16,644 76
Representatives at Leave-of-Absence Boards	6,042 45
Total	$63,001 10

The Estimate for the coming year is considerably larger. The campaign for increased food production will cost $280,000, according to the estimate. It involves certain advances to provincial governments for work that they are to undertake. Salaries for substitutes are set down at $17,000; representatives at Leave-of-Absence Boards, $20,000, making a total of $317,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Under the heading Marine, nothing was spent in the first year of the war; in the second year about $1,500; in the third year, $2,000; and last year, $267,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would my hon. friend like to have the explanation of that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not all the details, but my right hon. friend might explain the reason for the swelling of the expenditure to that extent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the expenditure is really more than is given through the Department of Finance at the present time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is up to April 8.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, but I explained when I presented these statements to the House that they came from the Department of Finance, and that the statement from the department actually concerned might be larger. According to the statement from the Marine Department, which I have in my hand, the expenditure is as follows:

Extra clerks, $2,267.98.

Equipment of lake vessels for overseas trade. Under Order in Council of 1st June, 1917, the expenditure of $405,800 was authorized, of which it is estimated that $300,000 will be spent, $201,632.01 of the above amount having already been invoiced.

Shipbuilding program as per Order in Council of 24th December, 1917, of which $25,000,000 was to be spent during the year 1918, and of which there has already been spent $267,030; making a total expenditure for the fiscal year of $569,297.98.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I find that the Military Hospitals Commission in 1916-17 cost $1,378,000, in round figures, while last year the cost was over $9,000,000. What is the explanation of the increase?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is due to the fact that more soldiers are returning from the front.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many new hospitals are to be built?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Invalided Soldiers' Commission may have to extend its operations to the provision of sanitoria for a certain class of patients, and, on the other hand, the Department of Militia and Defence, which has taken over the hospitals for active treatment, will probably have to provide additional accommodation as the men begin to return in increasing numbers. The Minister of Militia and Defence will be in a position to give full information on that subject.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that the National Service Commission which cost $111,759.89 in 1916-17 and $117,771.07 last year—was the commission presided over by our late colleague, Mr. R. B. Bennett. Is that commission still in existence, or has it been abolished?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was abolished except so far as taking care of the records is concerned. That is not attended with any expense to the Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are there many employees?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are no employees.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Under whose management is it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not under any one's management at present; it is not carrying on active operations. About 1,750,000 cards were received. They were tabulated to some extent and certain use was made of them. They were placed at the disposal of the military authorities; they were also made use of for the purpose of finding men for different employments throughout the country as they were required. The work of that commission will be superseded by the registration which we hope to take next summer and which has a very much wider scope. It is proposed to keep the new registration up to date from time to time, under regulations which will shortly be laid on the Table.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the explanation of the amount of $22,718.30 under the heading: "Immigration and Colonization?"

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is almost entirely in payment of substitutes for those who have gone to the front. There is included an amount required for expenses of officials in connection with the enforcing of Order in Council No. 1433. This amount is used in paying travelling expenses, meals, board, etc., of inspectors on trains, and other sundry expenses. This Order in Council was the one which prohibited men of military age from leaving the country. A further amount of $8,000 is mentioned under the head of printing and stationery—that is, for printing the different permit forms and any stationery required by the officers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is an item of $399,266.89 under the heading: "Railways and Canals, reconstruction of Halifax." Was that for the emergency call when the Halifax disaster took place?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was for reconstruction to repair damage occasioned by the Halifax explosion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Newsprint Commission, $22,003.86. Is that matter settled?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it is not settled. The commissioner has not made his final report as yet.

Mr. ROSS: There has been presented during the war the greatest opportunity the department ever had, in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture, to encourage the horse industry in this country. If I am correctly informed, the department has not taken advantage of this opportunity. I believe that horses are being purchased for Great Britain in the United States, and have been going through Canada in thousands. I wish to call attention to the fact that in 1916-17 there was spent by the Militia Department on war account, according to the public accounts, the very large sum of $298,000,000. I put a question on the Order Paper as to what amount of money had been spent in the purchase of remounts for the Militia Department during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, and the answer was $261,042.73. I further inquired what amount was spent in the purchase of remounts elsewhere, and where they were purchased, to which the reply was "nil." In the public accounts for 1917, under the heading of "Details of War Expenditure by Militia Department" from April 1, 1916, to March 31, 1917, I find an item: Purchases of remounts, expenses of purchasers, etc., $3,440,761.64. I should like some explanation of that discrepancy and also some statement of policy.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already given that explanation a good many times, not only in this Parliament, but in the late Parliament. I gave it two years ago for the first time, and I have given it on several occasions since. When I was in England in 1915 it was arranged that all remount purchases for the Canadian Expeditionary Force should be made by the British Government. They had a very competent staff engaged both in Canada and in the United States for that purpose. Further than that, unless we arranged the matter in that way, we would be obliged to keep up remount stations at various points in Great Britain and also at various points in France; whereas, if the remount stations, from which we would get our horses, both in Great Britain and France were under one control, a very great expense would be saved to this country. The British Government agreed that they would put in the horses to us at bare cost. In fact, in their charges against the horses which they supplied to us they did not include what might be called overhead charges, which would necessarily have been included by this country if we had embarked upon a policy of having separate remount stations of our own both in Great Britain and France. Therefore, the expenditure to which my hon. friend calls attention is expenditure which has been made by the British Government for horses purchased in that way by a commission acting for both parties. The other item to which he alluded, namely, $261,042.73 is for horses used in the various camps in Canada and not for horses used overseas. I am informed by the deputy minister that 2,876 horses were purchased for the purpose of those camps.

With respect to the opportunities in Canada for the sale of horses, I have had very frequent correspondence with the British Remount Commission. From time to time since 1915 I have not failed to urge upon them directly and also through the British Government that there were good opportunities for the purchase of horses in this country, and that those opportunities should be taken advantage of by the British Remount Commission, and on every occasion on which I have taken up the matter with the Remount Commission they have given what semed to me to be a satisfactory explanation when they did not happen to be purchasing in Canada at that time.

Mr. BUREAU: I was asking, when the other questions were put, what arrangement existed as to the balancing of accounts between Great Britain and Canada. I see that the overseas forces which are now in England are paid for by Canada. The Prime Minister, the other day in making an explanation, said that the expenditure overseas was under the supervision of the Auditor General. Has the Auditor General a staff overseas auditing those accounts which are paid by the Overseas Minister of Militia? If so, when is a return made to the Minister of Militia at Ottawa so that he may control the expenditure which is voted for war purposes or for supplying the troops which we have in England—that is, in addition to the balance which we have to strike with Great Britain with reference to the troops that we have in France? The current accounts of the Minister of Overseas Military Forces, I understand, are controlled by the Auditor General. The ultimate control comes to Ottawa, and I suppose that the Minister of Militia, as I said the other day when I was expressing my astonishment at this duplication, is responsible to the House for that. Can we have an explanation of the system that is followed?—how these amounts are controlled overseas, how the return of this expenditure is made, and to whom it is made?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Just the same as in any other department. The accounts are audited overseas by the Auditor General. I do not think he has any staff in Great Britain at the present time; that is, for the reason that he does think it necessary. When I spoke to him a few days ago, he said that his officer had returned from England; that his officer was not there during the winter, and he did not consider it necessary to keep him there. That is a matter which we leave to his own judgment. He had an absolutely free hand to have whatever staff was necessary, according to his best judgment, to make a thorough and complete audit of all the expenditures overseas. The statements come forward from that department just the same as from other departments, and I believe, besides that, a monthly statement comes to the Department of Militia and Defence as well as to the Auditor General.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not say this in the way of criticism, except that I cannot get through my head this double Ministry of Militia, particularly in regard to the Overseas Minister. What is the approximate amount that has been handled and expended by the Minister of Overseas Military Forces?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The expenditure overseas from 4th August, 1914, to 31st of March, 1917, amounted to $171,137,853.86. That, of course, did not include the expenditure in France to which I have already alluded and which is made by the British Government on behalf of the Canadian Government.

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps the information about which I am going to inquire has already been given, and if it is in Hansard, I do not wish to have the right hon. gentleman repeat it. I presume this appropriation, which is necessarily a very broad one, included expenditures in connection with the mission at Washington?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be included in this appropriation.

Mr. FIELDING: The mission at Washington is one of the many new things which have been created during the war, and the public would like to have some information concerning it. I would, therefore, suggest that, at a convenient date, not necessarily at the present time, the right hon. gentleman might give us some information as to the number of persons composing the mission, their salaries and the nature of the duties they are called upon to perform. Some part of their duties may have a bearing upon military matters and, of course, the information in regard to that cannot be given. I put my question with that reservation. I am sure the subject would be an interesting one.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon friend perhaps did not observe that some time ago I placed upon the Table an Order in Council which gives the principal part of the information to which he alludes. Mr. Lloyd Harris is the Chairman. There are at the present time only three other gentlemen upon the board, namely, Mr. Rolph, of Toronto, Mr. Macmaster, and Mr. Scott, of Montreal. They are all serving without any salary whatever, though of course they have a clerical staff, and there will be some expense incurred for rent, which unfortunately is very high in Washington at present. The duties are defined in a general way in the Order in Council, a copy of which I shall be very glad to send to my hon. friend. I shall be very glad after that, to go a little more into detail, as to the particular purposes which this War Mission is carrying out. They have very important duties to perform. Those duties are more directly concerned with communication between the very numerous commissions which have been established in Washington, and which have to do in a very intimate way with the trade relations between this country and the United States as they are affected by the war, the import and export of articles, the restriction of importations to articles of an essential character, the utilization of industries of both countries for purposes that are essential for the war and not for other purposes, and a great many other matters which I shall be glad to explain at some later date.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: When the committee rose at six o'clock the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) had given us a statement with reference to the Director of Public Information, and had discussed among other matters the sending overseas of the lists of the candidates who were running in the recent elections. Now, lest the Prime Minister should deem that his answer was entirely satisfactory in that regard I feel compelled to say a few words. I understood the Prime Minister to say that the list was sent over by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a gentleman whom I have not the honour of being acquainted with, but an officer of the Crown, I suppose. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery sent over imperfect information, according to the Prime Minister's own statement; that is, he suppressed the names of a considerable number of the candidates who were then properly in the field for the Dominion election. I understood the Prime Minister to say that the leader of the Opposition and himself had initialled certain candidates who were running in the interests of either one or the other, and that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery transmitted only the names that had been so initialled.

9 p.m.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I said I presumed it had occurred in that way. I have not seen the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on this subject, but apparently the names that were telegraphed over in the first instance were of candidates mentioned as having been recognized by either the leader of the Opposition or myself.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If the Prime Minister is not aware of it, I can tell him that there were other names in the list that were initialled neither by the leader of the Opposition nor by himself, and those names appeared in the first list.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was not aware of that.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But it is correct, because I know that the name of the candidate in my riding who was running against me was on the list. There were three candidates in that riding, and the names of both my opponents appeared in this first official list, as well as my own. This is war time, and I am not disposed to raise any trouble, or give this Government any trouble that can be avoided, but the element of fairness cannot be overlooked even in a war-time election; and I must say that the Prime Minister's explanation so far as those names are concerned, is not satisfactory to me. Other names went over that were not so initialled. I can give the name of one, and I believe there were five or six others. To say that the list was reprinted and sent over two days later does not cover the ground at all. This document, which I understand the President of the Privy Council is responsible for, is the official mouthpiece of the Government for the soldiers at the front. It was sent out containing certain names. We are told it was sent out in the first place on 27th November, and that after the mistakes were pointed out, it was reprinted and another copy sent on 29th November; but we do not know when that copy sent out on the 29th reached the front, or whether it ever reached the front. What we do know is that the soldiers began to vote on or about 1st December, although the election was not until the 17th, and I believe in my heart that there were a lot of soldiers who never knew what candidates were running in that election. I feel that that was the case, and I say it was not necessary for the purposes of Union Government, of which I am a strong friend and backer, even though I make this criticism, that the names of their candidates should be known. The soldier ballot had four divisions in it—one for the Government candidate, one for the opposition candidate, one for labour, and one for an independent candidate.

Mr. PROULX: I think there were five divisions.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: In the fifth space the name of the candidate was to be written, or else he got no vote at all. So the soldier voted for or against the Government, but where a candidate's name was suppressed the soldier, of course, had no opportunity of knowing that this man was running at all. I do not like to accuse the powers that be of doing anything unfair or unjust, and in war time when we are fighting with our back to the wall and our boys are dying by the thousands at the front it is no time to raise trouble. I want to back the Government for all I am worth in all war-time measures, but I do say that I think they were derelict in their duty. I did not even hear the Prime Minister say this afternoon that he had given the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a crack over the knuckles for omitting the names of these candidates—names which I believe were deliberately omitted by some one. If that is the case it is a serious thing. It is all right for the Government and the Opposition to endorse their candidates, but in a democratic country, where a man is properly nominated and is of sufficient standing in the community to get the nomination, I think no Government and no Opposition has the right to suppress that man's name as a candidate for a seat in the House of Commons. I do not want to go into this matter very fully, and I do not want any of my friends to take any particular notice of it, because a member of my family was one of those concerned, but I do say that this kind of thing would only pass in the strenuous times through which we are passing; that is the only ground on which we can keep quiet about a thing like that. It is the strenuous times in which we live that closes my mouth tonight, but I think it is up to me to let the Prime Minister know—yes, and the President of the Privy Council too, because I believe he was privy to the matter—that I thought at that time before this action was taken that it was going to turn out just about the way it has, that certain men were marked for slaughter, and that is how it did turn out. Whether this was a deal between the gentlemen I am not in a position to say, because I am not in the inner circle, I am only a back-bencher. But I feel it my duty to say to the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council that if it were not that winning the war demands our every exertion, I could not support them on this occasion. The Prime Minister may have other reasons up his sleeve which he did not adduce why these names were omitted. He may tell me as soon as I sit down that I am talking entirely aside from the facts, but I thought it my duty to say that in my judgment his explanation given in regard to the lists of candidates sent overseas was entirely inadequate to the situation, and will not be at all satisfactory to the gentlemen whose names were suppressed from the official lists.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall not follow my hon. friend's advice, however much inclined I might be to do so. I shall merely tell him that I was not in Ottawa at the time. If he supposed that during that election I had nothing else to do but follow around the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and see that all his telegrams were correct, then I can only say he has a very imperfect appreciation of the burdens that were laid on one at the head of public affairs in this country, when he was called upon at the same time to carry on as best he could the work in connection with the greatest war that humanity has ever known and also to carry on an election campaign. If the hon. gentleman intends to suggest—and I do not know whether or not he did intend to suggest—that I was privy to any unfairness towards him, or any member of his family, or any one else, I want to give him the strongest denial that parliamentary usage will permit.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Did the right hon. gentleman write a letter asking a certain gentleman to run and afterwards turn him down?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I did in this sense, that I suggested to him, at the request of an hon. gentleman, a member of the Senate, just about the time the Union Government was formed, that he might run. That gentleman wrote to me afterwards and said that he would retire if I asked him. I asked him to retire and he did not do it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That gentleman offered to retire in favour of a certain other gentleman, as the Prime Minister very well knows, but not in favour of the one who was crushing him out of the field where he had been properly placed. The Prime Minister, if he wanted that letter read here, would find it very necessary to give me the direct statement that he has given just now. The letter was fairly and squarely written and it contained that statement. Whether the Prime Minister did it unknowingly or whether he did it with the intention of asking him finally to retire, I cannot say, but it seems to me that we have not been played fair with. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) has just raised another question which involves more or less the same matter. One gentleman who was concerned in this matter has been rewarded with the chairmanship of a commission at Washington. How that comes about I cannot say, but that has been revealed to us.

I have been a friend of the right hon. gentleman all my political life; during all his political life I have supported him in every way; I have supported in every possible way the winning of the war, and I take no back seat, although I am a back bencher, even to the Prime Minister himself in regard to the heartiness in which I have endeavoured to help win this war. The Prime Minister, knowing what my family has done in this matter, should cast no reflection on me in that respect, as I rather think he did. He seemed to say: You think I have nothing to do but help to win elections. I made no such assertion. I say that in my judgment those names were suppressed by somebody—I do not know by whom—and the clerk of the Crown in Chancery, if he were in any way responsible, should have received a crack over the knuckles for sending out an imperfect list. I have not heard the Prime Minister say one word of disapproval, or whether he disapproves of an imperfect list being sent out. He has not the right to read me a lecture, even although I am a back-bencher; I am a pretty old hand in the political game. I was in it before he was. I ran my first campaign over thirty years ago. Although I do not often speak in this House, and although my views may not carry very much weight, even with the Prime Minister—I am aware of that—I still have my views and they are held just as strongly as are those of the Prime Minister. In so far as the winning of the war is concerned, I believe that my heart is in it just as much as his is. Our object is to win the war and that was the object with which we went into the war-time election, but even a war-time election should, in my judgment, be characterized by all the elements of fairness.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was just that suggestion on the part of the hon. gentleman that I did resent because he seemed to imply that there had been some intentional unfairness on my part through which these gentlemen's names were not included in the first telegram. I repeat that I resent as strongly as I can any unfair suggestion from him or any one else in this House. I have told him—he is at liberty to take my statement or not as he sees fit—that I was not in Ottawa at the time and knew nothing until months afterward about any names being omitted from the list. I repeat that I was far too busily engaged at that time to follow up the details of any such matter as this. The task of selecting candidates in the various constituencies of this country who should be recognized by the Government was an invidious and distasteful one. Few hon. gentlemen can realize how invidious and distasteful it would be. I did the best I could with it. I appointed a committee in each of the provinces composed of men who previously had been opposed to each other in political affairs, and I asked them to make the best selections they could. As far as I remember, I followed their judgment in every case; I do not recollect any case in which I departed from it. Whether I might have done better by giving more personal attention to the matter I do not know. I do know that I did what I thought was right and what I thought was best in the interest of the country and without any desire or intention of being unfair to any man, whether he was recognized or not.

Mr. ROWELL: As the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has mentioned my name in connection with this matter, as well as that of the Prime Minister, I wish to state just as clearly and emphatically as the Prime Minister has stated that I had absolutely no knowledge of the matter until weeks after the election. The first I learned of it was from a statement which I saw in the press some time after the election that these names had been omitted from the list. I, like the Prime Minister, had been absent from Ottawa, and I never had any communication of any kind with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. He is not in my department and I had no communication with him. On learning of this report after the election I asked for an explanation from the general returning officer and I got one similar to that which the Prime Minister has given the House this afternoon. I had no knowledge about it in any shape or form, direct or indirect, until long after the election.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Does the minister approve or disapprove of the action of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in omitting those names?

Mr. ROWELL: I absolutely disapprove of any names being omitted. I am absolutely sure that they were omitted by mistake although I have no personal knowledge of it. Every one would disapprove of any names being omitted. Every one should have a fair show; the names should all be made public.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I omitted to say the same thing. I regard it as most unfortunate that the names were omitted and if it were owing to any intentional neglect on the part of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery he would be subject to the severest reprimand and probably something more than that.

Mr. MOWAT: I desire to say a few words to the committee in regard to the effect of this omission. I will confine myself to that. It appears that owing to the information telegraphed by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery certain names were omitted. That was corrected two days afterwards. The two issues of the Record were on the 27th and 29th November. If there was any objection to that action, or if there was any injustice, some complaint would have been made from France or England regarding it by the friends of the candidates whose names were omitted. But was that done? No, it was not. It was not until two months after 27th November that the matter was mentioned at all. And how did it come to be mentioned at all? It was mentioned by a newspaper in Toronto which had taken a very strong stand on behalf of what it called the "soldier candidates." The Prime Minister said this afternoon that he had received some complaints with regard to the matter from the Great War Veterans, but I desire to correct him to some extent in that regard. The Great War Veterans as a body, wisely it seems to me, decided to take no part in party politics; their interests, they thought, required that they should stand neutral; but an ambitious gentleman in Toronto who runs a newspaper had different views. He has always been very distinctly antagonistic and hostile to the Union Government. Holding such views and having no chance with the Opposition he could not satisfy his inordinate ambition to become a political leader unless he had some sort of a party. The only party he could think of to get was the Great War Veterans. Now the resolution of the Great War Veterans to take no part in politics stood as a bar to their becoming followers of any body, himself or any body else. Therefore, the gentleman in question got an employee of his own newspaper, who happens to be the secretary of a local branch of the Great War Veterans, to have the resolution of the main body sitting here in Ottawa rescinded, so that the Toronto branch of the Great War Veterans' Association should be able to engage in party politics in this contest. The Great War Veterans are a fine body of men as a whole. They are men who went to serve their country, and some of them have come back maimed or nervous as a result of shell shock. The trouble is that being nervous and somewhat sentimental they art apt to be misled, and in this case they were misled, it seems to me, not by one of their own number, not by a soldier, but by a person who wished to use them for his own purposes. Perhaps I am a little discursive, but I wish to point out that the effect of this mistake in not publishing these names in the first number of The Record cannot have had any real or practical effect. In the first place, as I say, no attention was called to it for months after 27th November, and furthermore, during the election the same band of civilians who wished to intrude and make a sort of a third party as part of their election campaign, said to the people: "We have sent over cables to the soldiers at the front." They did send many cables and in one election of which I have knowledge they said they spent something over $200 upon cable tolls. "Therefore," they said "don't be troubled by the fact of endorsation by the Union Government, but vote for our candidate and you will find that a vast number of soldiers at the front will join with you and he will be elected." Well, with the expenditure of $200 in the case of one candidate, one would have thought that the soldiers at the front would have been informed of the exact state of affairs. What do we find? According to the election returns, a copy of which we got a few days ago from Mr. O'Connor, in the particular constituency I refer to the endorsee of the Government got 3,300 overseas votes. How many do you suppose were cast for the soldier candidate, to whom not only the particular issue of The Record had reference, but in whose interest there had been an expenditure of $200 in sending cablegrams to soldiers at the front. As against 3,300 votes for the Unionist candidate, the soldier candidate only received 13 votes in the whole of France and in England, so the omission referred to cannot have had much to do with the result.

There is another constituency, represented by my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Foster). That hon. gentleman was subjected to vicious attack. I make no complaint whatever of any attack made upon me in the election. If my opponents consider such attacks are fair politics, all right. I make no complaint, whatever, especially as I won by a jolly good majority. But in the case of my hon. friend from East York as vitriolic and acidulous an attack was made upon him as was ever known in Canadian politics, and he was deprecated in every form as a miserable civilian running against this nominee of the new party that I have referred to. Well, the result in his case, where antagonistic cablegrams were also sent over to the front, was more extraordinary than in the case of the other constituency I have mentioned; because, while my hon. friend received more than 2,700 votes in England and in France, the soldier candidate who ran against him did not get one single vote. So it was a case of 2,700 votes to nothing. The point of my remarks is this: despite the mistake made—I am sure it was a mistake, because nobody could be a party to actually misleading the electors over there—the actual fact is that the soldiers were not misinformed, they knew who was running, but they deliberately marked their ballots for the Government because they knew that would suit their purpose far better than any other course they could take.

Mr. REDMAN: I cannot but regard it as unfortunate that the hon. member who has just taken his seat should have seized this opportunity to ask for the sympathy of the House in regard to the election which he ran last year. I cannot but resent the statements which he has made in regard to the Great War Veterans, and, as I take it, the soldiers generally. It strikes me that his remarks were in very bad taste. The fact that a soldier ran against him in that election should not give him any reason to come here and single out that soldier, or the Great War Veterans, for comments in this House. He has stated that the soldiers who have returned from overseas are sentimental and nervous. Doubtless the hon. gentleman is an authority on this subject, and when he states that the soldiers returning from overseas are sentimental and nervous, possibly the hon. gentleman knows what he is talking about, and possibly he does not. However, I do resent very much the hon. gentleman making any statements of the kind. It does seem to me that if the Great War Veterans' Association, or any of their members wish to run a candidate in this country, or to exercise their rights as citizens, they are perfectly free to do so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: When this matter first came up a few hours ago the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) was making a statement with regard to the Director of Public Information. I asked him then as to who was responsible for the omission of the names of certain soldier candidates in the last election from the Canadian Daily Records sent to the soldiers, but I little thought at the time that my question was going to create the debate that has taken place. I regret very much, indeed, that the time of the House should be taken up with a matter that now can do no earthly good, because this is war time, and we have men at the front who are making greater sacrifices possibly than any one who have remained in Canada, no matter how hard such persons have laboured.

I intend, therefore, to touch upon one phase of the question that appeals to me, and that is on behalf of a certain soldier candidate in the last election; who was the first man to volunteer in the county of Oxford, who went overseas with the First Contingent, who raised two battalions in the country, was twice wounded, came home, and returned to the front crippled but determined to go. He was nominated as a candidate when he was at home on sick leave, and told the people that, if his election depended upon his returning to Canada while the war was on, he did not want to be elected. Now, for some strange reason, this candidate's name was omitted from the official list sent out by the Government in this official organ which we are asked to support in this vote which is now before the House; and, so far as I am aware, there is no disposition on the part of the Government to fix the responsibility where it properly belongs and to see that the guilty suffer for their misdeeds in this regard; at least, we had no expression of that kind from the Government to my knowledge. Men who are absent at the front fighting for us are not in a position to take up their cause in this House or in the country, or have not shown any disposition, or made any request, that the matter should be brought to the attention of the House, and, so far as I am aware, no complaint has been received from those men with regard to that matter. Now, the President of the Privy Council has just made a further statement that he knew nothing whatever with regard to this matter, and I accept his word. He says that he was busily engaged at the time, and he does not know anything with regard to the matter. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) brings the War Veterans into this debate, endeavouring to make it appear that they renounced their rights during the last election. The War Veterans in Oxford county called an open convention to nominate a candidate, and I believe there were some six hundred people present to nominate a Unionist candidate. On the other side, his opponent was selected by the executive of the Liberal Party, and endorsed by the Government as the Unionist candidate in opposition to the man who had been nominated in an open convention called for that purpose. There is a feeling abroad in the country among returned soldiers that this Government is not in sympathy with the soldiers, that they are not doing certain things that they ought to do with regard to the returned soldiers. When you find things of this kind happening right under your eyes, I do not feel that it is my duty to sit still and allow statements of that kind to go unchallenged. Further, I believe that there was a deliberate effort on the part of some one to see that certain soldier candidates were not elected, and who ever is guilty—and there is certainly some guilty party—must be punished or else professions of being in sympathy with the soldier and with winning this war will stand for little. The men who are doing these things are entitled to consideration. When the campaign was nearing its close, certain correspondence was published with regard to one of these soldier candidates, in an endeavour to make it appear that he was not endorsed by the Government or as favouring Union Government. But his opponent, who had been selected by the executive of the Liberal party, was endorsed by the Government as the Unionist candidate. What do we find? On the 5th day of November, a letter from the secretary of the President of the Privy Council was published shedding more light on this matter, and making it practically impossible for that candidate to be elected in that constituency. I am going to read the letter; it has been published, and no denial has been made with reference to it to my knowledge. The Prime Minister has told us of his efforts, and of the work that was entailed upon him in endorsing candidates. I have not the slightest doubt of that. I appreciate the tremendous responsibilities that press upon the head of a Government, particularly during war time. It is beyond my comprehension how he could do as much work as he did; consequently, he must have had to delegate a great deal of his work to others. I do not think for one moment he was responsible or that he would do anything of that nature. But I want to point out that the soldier candidate to whom I have referred did not receive a fair deal in the last election, and that a letter was sent to the secretary of the Conservative Association for the North Riding of Oxford, asking that the nominee of that party should be withdrawn. I understand that he was communicated with and offered to withdraw in order that the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) might be elected for that constituency which he represented in the legislature. He offered to stand aside and allow that hon. gentleman to run in that riding. Later on,—he was nominated at this open convention. In the meantime, however, a letter was published in the press which had considerable effect upon his prospects of being elected. Now, I must read the letter, because I am going to read one that was sent out afterwards. This is written from Uxbridge on November 26, 1917:

Dear Mr. West,

I had hoped to speak in North Oxford but the time at my disposal would not permit. Under the circumstances I think it my duty to ask my friends in the North Riding of Oxford to support loyally and effectively Mr. E. W. Nesbitt, the candidate named by the Government under the Military Voters' Act. His support of compulsory military service and of the proposals for a Union Government has been all that could be desired. We are asking Liberals in a great many ridings of Ontario to support Conservative Union candidates. It is equally the duty of Conservatives to support Liberal Union candidates in the ridings for which, under arangement with my Liberal colleagues, a Liberal Union candidate has been selected.

Believe me,

Yours faithfully,

R. L. BORDEN.

I can quite understand, with the multitudinous duties resting upon his shoulders, how the Prime Minister was anxious to give way in matters of this kind in order to arrive at some mutual arrangement by which the difficulties could be overcome. The party who received the letter did not make it public apparently, although I understand that he acknowledged it. Shortly afterwards, when the campaign was nearing a close, he received from the private secretary of Hon. Mr. Rowell a letter as follows, a copy of which was also sent to the press of the constituency:

Mr. Wesley West,
Secretary, Conservative Association,
Woodstock, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

I am directed by Mr. Rowell, who is in Northern Ontario, to say that before leaving for the Maritime Provinces on Sunday, Sir Robert Borden furnished Mr. Rowell with a copy of his letter to you regarding the North Oxford situation.

Sir Robert's intention was that this letter should be made public by you, and it is Sir Robert's desire that this should be done.

Yours very truly,
MAIN JOHNSON,
Private Secretary.

This letter was sent out by the private secretary of the President of the Council. The private secretary states that the Prime Minister intended that the letter should be made public. Then the private secretary evidently gives it to the press, because it is published in the papers; that is where I first saw it. I think that in view of his connection with this matter the President of the Council should ascertain who was guilty of omitting these names from the published list.

It may be said that this circumstance did not have any effect on the election results, but I contend that it is a remarkable coincidence—the efforts to make it impossible for this soldier at the front to get the votes of those at home who were favourable to Union Government, and also of the soldiers overseas, by omitting his name from the records. You may say that the list was published on the 27th, and that a supplementary list was published on the 29th. But the men overseas would naturally be anxious to know who the candidates were; they would look over the first list, and would not take the trouble to go over the second and see whether any names had been added or omitted. The first would be the one that would receive their attention; we do not know when the second was circulated. I am sorry indeed that I have to refer to these things in this way; it was not my intention to have done so. In the course of half a dozen words I asked a simple question, and I do not consider that I received the answer to which I was entitled. The minister may not have been responsible for the acts of this Director of Public Information at that time, but somebody was certainly responsible, and that is what I want to emphasize. I do not wish to make trouble for the Government, but I must insist upon my rights in this House and upon the right of those who are not here to see that justice is done. I submit that the guilty party in this case should be punished.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. NESBITT: I regret exceedingly that my name has been drawn into this discussion. Above all things I always try not to appear personally in a public way any more than I can possibly help. I have nothing whatever to say against my opponent; he had as much right to run as I had. He was first the candidate of the Conservative party. My hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) said that I was nominated and brought out by the Liberal executive. It is true that I was nominated some two years ago by the Liberal party in the north riding of Oxford. In the last Parliament I took a certain position with respect to the Military Service Bill, and when the elections were brought on last fall I called the executive of the Liberal Asociation together and made a statement to them of the position that I had taken in that respect. I told them that, on account of the position I had taken, it was absolutely impossible for me to take any other course during the coming campaign than that of endorsing the Union Government. The executive of the Liberal Association were kind enough to say that they thought I had taken the proper course, and that they would endorse it and support me during the coming campaign—an offer which I very gratefully accepted. That was on Saturday. That evening the Conservative Association called a meeting of their so-called executive and pretended to accept the resignation of my opponent as Conservative candidate and to nominate him as Conservative-Unionist candidate. On Sunday afternoon they got hold of the secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association—remember, I have nothing to say against the Great War Veterans' Association, or against the great war veterans—. The member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) interrupts me. I want to tell him that it is not because he suggested anything that I say this, and we can settle it right now, or outside if he likes.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not want any insinuations from him at all. On Sunday afternoon the Conservative clique in Woodstock got hold of the secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association—who, by the way, has never been at the front—and got him to call a meeting of his executive that afternoon and nominate my opponent as their candidate. That Sunday night the same Conservative clique in Woodstock called another meeting of their so-called executive, withdrew the resolution they had passed nominating my opponent as the Conservative-Unionist candidate, and endorsed the Great War Veterans' candidate. It was a little trickery on the part of the Conservative clique in Woodstock, that was all; and it was so recognized by a great many of the Conservatives in the north riding of Oxford. As to the men in France and England not knowing that my opponent was running, let me say that my opponent had been in France, had been wounded and was home. He spent six months at home canvassing against me on the pay of this Government. He was not a cripple any more than I was, or half as much as I was, so far as that is concerned. He went back to England, not to France, and he was in England at the time the election was on. I have no doubt that he was doing the best he could for himself in England, and I do not blame him for that; that is his privilege. But I have letter after letter from men who were in France and England, saying that his name was posted on the bulletins and that they did know that he was running at the time. So I contend that those who voted for the Union Government or for me personally, as the case might be, knew that my opponent was running, and knew that he was a soldier and at that time in England.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: Is it a fact that the hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt) wrote a letter to the German voters in his riding canvassing them in the election, and repudiating Union Government and the War-time Elections Act?

Mr. NESBITT: It is a fact that I wrote letters to some constituents in my riding, but not by any means repudiating the Union Government, I was opposed to the War-time Elections Act, and I was opposed to it during the whole of the last session. I would be absolutely hypocritical if I said that I was not opposed to it, because I did oppose it on the floor of the House as energetically as I could, and everybody knows it. I may tell the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that I voted for the Military Service Act, and he knows it.

Mr. ANDREWS: The daily bulletins sent to the troops in the field from home are very highly appreciated by all ranks, and to discontinue them would be an unnecessary hardship. I suggest that these bulletins should be speeded up, if anything, and that they should be delivered regularly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I disagree with my hon. friend. I will take the case of Sir Allen Aylesworth's son, who is in the trenches. In one issue of that sheet a cable from the President of the Council in Canada is published, with the following heading:

Sir Allen Aylesworth's son. Your Old man Has Gone Back on You.

Mr. ROWELL: May I ask my hon. friend the date of that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The 27th of November.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend knows that I stated in the House this afternoon that the publication of the Record was not transferred to my jurisdiction until January or February of this year. Until that time I had no more to do with it than my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend, this afternoon, assumed the responsibility for the publication of this sheet.

Mr. ROWELL: I did from the time it came under my jurisdiction.

Mr. BUREAU: Somebody was responsible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have listened with a great deal of interest to this little family squabble, and I notice that some of my hon. friends are very touchy when their names are not mentioned in that Record. For instance, my hon. friend from Brantford, Mr. Cockshutt, was incensed because his brother's name was not published in the Record, and there is some other squabble in regard to Oxford County. Well, if my hon. friends get angry because their names are not mentioned, what about Sir Allen Aylesworth's son who is in the trenches and who sees his father's name branded as it was in that paper in which it was cabled from Canada?

Sir Allen Aylesworth's son. Your old man has gone back on you.

It tells the fake story that a sergeant said to the audience at a political meeting:

Think of it. Picture Sir Allen's son over there in the midst of it all. See him in the trenches holding a field telephone to his ear—

A nastier way to hear it.

—asking why reinforcements have not come up to him, when he needs them so sorely. Then comes the answer: Aylesworth, your old man has gone back on you.

A ministerial, an official publication, distributed amongst our boys in the trenches!

Mr. MURPHY: To win the war.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Sir Allen Aylesworth, one of Canada's most prominent men, has given his only son to fight in the trenches, and his son has to read that literature.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: And we have to pay for it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend from Winnipeg says: Speed up, speed up; it is too bad they do not receive this Record soon enough. I do not wish to be too personal, but I desire to nail a lie published in that sheet during the last election, which was read by my son and forwarded to me:

Fighting officer's nomination. Hon. R. Lemieux's petition for rejection is discussed. Daily Record Cablegram, Quebec, Wednesday.

A despatch from Perce, Gaspe, announces that the petition of the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, for the rejection of the nomination of Major L. P. Gauthier, the Unionist candidate, because he is at the front, was dismissed by Judge Tessier. There will be a straight fight in this constituency between the two principal parties.

That, Mr. Chairman, is nothing but a lie. That article was sent by Canada, paid for by Canada, paid for by your humble servant as well as by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Mr. BUREAU: What is the date?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, just in time, the 29th of November. I said this afternoon that the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who pays just as much as the Prime Minister for the publication of this sheet in England, who contributes his share as a taxpayer, had been slandered and libelled by that sheet during the whole election campaign. What do I read on November 29th?:

A victory for Sir Wilfrid Laurier, therefore, would mean that Canada would have to drop out of the war.

This is a lie. Sir Wilfrid Laurier never appealed to his fellowmen on those lines.

Many of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's supporters have gone so far in opposition to it as to pledge themselves, if elected, to disband 100,000 men who have already been called up under the new scheme. That is to say, they have undertaken to wreck the Canadian Army Corps at the most critical moment of the war.

I am in earnest about this. Let by-gones be by-gones. Are we going to pay in the future for such literature to be distributed amongst our boys at the front? At this critical moment, when the right hon. gentleman is making a supreme appeal to this country to unite to win the war, are we going to be called upon to pay for such literature as this? You will never get united effort, national unity, if you go on with such a publication. This is a deliberate insult to one-half of the people of Canada. The Liberals are represented as traitors, quitters, slackers, as desirous of wrecking the army. I have some confidence in my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). I have no confidence in this Record, and much confidence as I may have in my hon. friend, I do not believe that he is a recording angel himself.

Mr. CURRIE: Before this very interesting debate is ended, I desire to make a few observations. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) stated to the House that, during the election, he did not repudiate the Union Government. I hold in my hand a letter which my hon. friend issued to his constituents in a certain section of his riding, that is, in Tavistock. I do not think he will deny this letter:

Dear Sir, I am taking the liberty of writing you to say that I would like you to give me your support on election day, Monday the 17th, and get as many others of your neighbours to do as you can. I have, as you know, represented the Riding for the past nine years, and, I hope, satisfactorily to you all. I have been a consistent follower of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and still consider him the foremost statesman in Canada.

Not a word there about the leader of the Union Government.

I have never differed with him except on one question and have been a strong opponent of the new War-time Elections Act—

That is the very Act that helped to elect him. This is the beautiful part of the letter:

—which aimed to disfranchise a certain number of my German friends, and if elected will use my best efforts to have the same repealed, as I look upon them as among our very best citizens.

That is to say, the German element in the West are our best citizens.

I also was a strong opponent of the Canadian Northern Bill, and, if elected, will endeavour also to have that rectified.

We shall doubtless hear from him about that later on.

I hope, therefore, that I can count on you for your hearty support and assistance in any way you can. Hoping to hear from you favourably, I am,

Yours very truly,

E. W. Nesbitt.

That is the letter that was sent to one part of the riding. A very touching appeal was sent by the same hon. gentleman to the men in the trenches. I have not that letter here, but I have a copy of it also and no doubt it told very much in his favour over there, because he said he was in favour of the war, he was against the German element in Canada and all that kind of thing. This is neither the time nor the place to bring up these questions, but after all is said and done, this Government has won and is in power notwithstanding those who are lukewarm behind it, and who were saying nice things about their German friends. I want to say one word in conclusion in reference to the Great War Veterans. Everybody knows that the Great War Veterans' Associations before the election, were manned largely by officers in the employ of the Government.

Any man who became president of the Great War Veterans' Association was given a job on the Hospitals Commission or something of that kind; however, the association has its heart in the right place and is probably more anxious to win the war than any other organization in this country. The action which that organization took before the election was that it would not as a body support any particular party, but would leave to local organizations perfect liberty to exercise their own judgment in selecting candidates. The Great War Veterans' Association selected candidates in a number of constituencies. They had a candidate in the Toronto riding represented by the hon. gentleman who has spoken this evening, and I might say that that is one of the strongest Tory ridings in Canada. I know, and everybody in that city knows very well, that if that gentleman had not had the endorsation of the Union Government and the support of the Conservative machine behind him he had no more chance of winning than a snowball. The Great War Veterans' Association opposed him simply because there was a man in the field who had served his country in the trenches, and had not gone around in clothes masquerading as a soldier, and they had a perfect right to do that. As far as I am concerned if it is ever my duty to vote for any one in an election I am going to vote for the man who fought in the trenches, regardless of what party label he wears, and that is the right thing for those who have seen service to do in my estimation. If this war meant anything in the last election, it was a call by the Government of the day to the people of this country to support the men in the trenches, and I think the action taken in Ontario in some cases smacked very much of old-time ward machine politics.

10 p.m.

Now, about the Toronto Telegram, the widest-read journal in Ontario. The editor of that paper, a great journal—

The CHAIRMAN: I think I must rule that out of order. What we are discussing is clause 1 of the War Appropriation Bill, and not the journalistic doings in the last election.

Mr. CURRIE: I shall endeavour to confine my remarks to the question before us, but the hon. member for Toronto has attacked the editor of the Toronto Telegram on account of his attitude in the last election, and the connection between that and the subject before us is so close that I did not think I was out of order in discussing the matter. However, I do not wish to go into any lengthy remarks, and will only say that I have noticed that the editor of the Toronto Telegram is quite capable of taking care of himself on every occasion, either on the platform or in the columns of his paper.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to interrupt this entertainment but before this act came on I was doing business with the Prime Minister. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has just read from a publication which is distributed in the trenches and paid for by the people of Canada, and he seemed to charge the President of the Privy Council with responsibility for this publication. The President of the Privy Council denied that he was responsible, and said that the publication in question was issued on 29th November, whereas he only took office as manager of the paper on 1st January. The other evening when the Prime Minister was making a statement about the appropriation for 1918-19 he seemed astonished because I took exception to certain matters in connection with the Overseas Minister of Overseas Military Forces who is three thousand miles away from us, and he invoked solidarity—I think that was the word, whether a minister was in France, India or China, it did not matter, as the ministers were all jointly and severally responsible for everything that happened in any department. Consequently, it seems strange to-night that the President of the Privy Council now he is confronted with the misdeeds of his confreres, should say that he did not become responsible until the 1st January, because only the other day we put through a Bill at the request of the Prime Minister which appointed the President of the Privy Council to his present position in the Government, dating from the month of October last. I mention this just to show how this question of solidarity works.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is in error. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve said that this document emanated from the office of the President of the Council, and I said that was incorrect as the publication had not come under my jurisdiction until a later date.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that the excuse that my hon. friend is making?

Mr. ROWELL: No, I was simply correcting my hon. friend from Maisonneuve on a statement of fact, and was saying he had not correctly stated the matter.

Mr. BUREAU: The statement that my hon. friend now makes is that the responsibility was thrown on him. He says he was not President of the Privy Council at that time.

Mr. ROWELL: I have to correct my hon. friend again. The hon. member for Maisonneuve read a statement which he said emanated from the office of the President of the Council; as a matter of fact, he said it had been sent from that office. That was not correct, as the paper was not under my jurisdiction at that time. It was purely a question of fact I was correcting.

Mr. BUREAU: Under whose jurisdiction was the publication? Who was the assignor when my hon. friend became assignee of this job?

Mr. ROWELL: I explained this afternoon that what is done in Canada is the telegraphing over to the other side of Canadian news. That has been done by an officer who has served overseas, and is now here in Canada in charge of that work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is his name?

Mr. ROWELL: Captain Wallace. He was in the Department of Militia prior to his coming under the Director of Public Information.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In what capacity in the Department of Militia?

Mr. ROWELL: He was looking after the sending over of information; I do not know whether he was directly under the Minister of Militia or not, when he was employed in connection with the Canadian War Records in the Old Country. I do not know the arrangement under which he was operating prior to coming under the Director of Public Information.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not answer my question. The hon. gentleman is in control of this publication now, or at all events, whoever edits the paper is under his jurisdiction.

Mr. ROWELL: No. The Director of Public Information reports to me; he is an official under the charge of the President of the Council. Captain Wallace who transmits the news to this publication to England is now under the Director of Public Information.

Mr. BUREAU: And the Director of Public Information is under the jurisdiction of the President of the Council?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to get this clear in my mind, as I do not want the President of the Council shirking his responsibility.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not want to shirk anything.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to know who handed this Bureau of Information over to him, and by what process it was handed over.

Mr. ROWELL: The Bureau of Information was not handed over. The officer in charge of this publication came from the Department of Militia, but I do not know what position he occupied in that department.

Mr. BUREAU: That is immaterial. The point I was making was that if solidarity should be invoked by the Prime Minister in one case it should apply in every case, and the President of the Council is just as much responsible as any other member of the Government for allowing these statements to go abroad.

Mr. JACOBS: A little more so.

Mr. BUREAU: Perhaps. He is a great inspirer, I am told, and his inspiration may have filtered through to the Department of Militia; however, if this family quarrel is adjourned I will now renew my question to the Prime Minister. Does the Victory Loan of last November and all things in connection with it come under the Department of Finance?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before answering the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau) I would like to say one or two words in reply to certain observations made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). He seems to make a great deal out of very little. Here is an item of which he quoted only a part in the Canadian Daily Record of November 27. It simply gives an account, which has been published in the Canadian press, of an incident that took place at a political meeting at Beaverton. That is all there is about it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is pleasant news for the son of Sir Allen Aylesworth.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Whether it concerns the son of Sir Allen Aylesworth or any one else, it is an item of public news which is proper to be made known to the men in the trenches as it is proper to be made known to the people of Canada generally. I do not know that telegrams describing what has transpired at public meetings in Canada are to be censored from the standpoint of any individual in the trenches. I would regard that as rather an extraordinary proposal. My hon. friend gave another quotation in regard to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I never saw it; yet I venture to think that nothing more would be found in regard to that than I have found in regard to the item on which he lays so much stress. It has now been placed in my hands and I find it is simply an advertisement in the Canadian Daily Record publishing an article from the London Daily Mail. It is upon these two extracts that my hon. friend would endeavour to build up a case for attacking this newspaper. I have already explained—some hon. gentlemen do not seem to understand it—that the Canadian Government does not pay out anything in connection with the Canadian Daily Record except for the news transmitted at the cost of this country overseas for the information and benefit of the men in the trenches. I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House will begrudge the very moderate expenditure of public money for enabling these men to know what is transpiring in the country they have left in order that they may fight for its continued existence.

Let no hon. gentleman imagine from what has transpired here this evening that the candidates who had served this country at the front were overlooked. I have examined the list just now and I find that about twenty men, most of whom, I am glad to say, are sitting in this House and who saw service either at the front or here in Canada or in the United Kingdom, were recognized as candidates on behalf of the Union Government at the last election.

In regard to the question which has been put to me by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), the method of procedure under the War Appropriation Act is this: it is not a vote to any particular department. I have explained this at every session of Parliament since the war began. My hon. friend has overlooked it. I have explained it altogether about fifteen or twenty times from first to last. This is not a vote to any department of the Government; it is a vote to the Government as a whole, and therefore no portion of it can be expended by any department except under Order in Council. When any particular sum of money is appropriated to a department out of the war appropriation, that department has power to utilize those funds to that amount and no more, subject to the audit of the Auditor General and to all the precautions in regard to the expenditure of public moneys that would prevail if that particular sum of money had been voted to the department in question by Parliament in the first instance. That is the only way it can be carried out, and that is the way it is carried out. We have felt that where so large a sum of money is voted to the Government as a whole we should take rather extraordinary precautions to see that we understand the purpose for which it is to be expended, and that the accounts are properly and carefully audited.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Lest there should be some misunderstanding in the minds of hon. gentlemen regarding the Daily Record, I will give the history of it. Early in the war it was found, as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) has told the House, the boys were anxious for news from Canada. Accordingly we arranged to send over, I think it was one hundred words a day. We got a grant for one hundred words daily, and we sent that to the boys of each corps along the whole line. There was no advertising, and it was just in "flimsy." We extended it to three hundred words later, and it was under the charge of the Department of Militia and Defence. We put it under the management of two of the best newspaper men we could get—and they are all good. I may say here that the newspaper men of both political parties have played the game like gentlemen from the drop of the hat during this war, and that they have given us every legitimate assistance that they could give. One of these men was Mr. Grange and the other was Mr. Wallis. They were men who would be satisfactory to every hon. gentleman on either side of this House. We sent this news over continuously day after day, but it was on flimsy. Later on it was printed. I do not know anything about it since that, but I think it is desirable that it should be continued, because I can back up what the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) said as to the great service it is to the boys at the front. They need it badly. I have no doubt it will be kept free, and that no side issues will be allowed to crawl into it.

With regard to the other question spoken of by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), I have no hesitation in saying that I am teetotally opposed to employing any gentleman in the capacity of a sort of newsvendor to the ignorant people of this country, because we have none of the class that can be moved by any such process as that. It is nothing but an insult to the intelligence of the people of Canada for a lot of these fellows to go around preaching to the people, telling them to do this, and to do that, and to read Napoleon. The selection of a man who has shown himself so prejudiced and so unworthy of public confidence as this gentleman who has been selected by the President of the Privy Council, is a mistake of the first magnitude. As to the others in the department, I know nothing concerning them at all. They may be all right or all wrong. But if they belong to the type I have indicated, all I can say is that I have never yet seen men of that type do anything to build up the country. As far as I am concerned, I am totally opposed to the action of the President of the Privy Council in establishing this department at considerable expense to the country. I have no hesitation in saying—and my belief has not been changed in the slightest degree by anything that has been said to-day—that the organization of that department composed of these gentlemen, has not for its object the education of the people along lines connected with the winning of the war, but has for its object the education of the people along the lines that will be convenient for certain gentlemen in case they want to use them politically later on.

Mr. POWER: In regard to the history of this sheet, the Canadian Daily Record, at one time overseas, I received that paper, or rather a collection of typewritten sheets, which I read with considerable pleasure. Because, after all, the home papers arrive, as a rule, two or three weeks late. This sheet, I understand, was instituted at the time that my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) was in charge, and consisted of about one hundred words.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was suggested by the notorious character, Max Aitken, Lord Beaverbrook, who had the interests of the boys at heart then the same as now.

Mr. POWER: I agree with my hon. friend as to the notoriety of his friend. However, whatever one thinks of Max Aitken, or any other of my hon. friend's friends, the news which reached us at the time, amounting from one hundred to two hundred words, consisted mainly of reports of the ball and hockey games. Everybody settled his bets by the comic cuts that we received from Canada, and everybody was pleased to get them. But I imagine that the people of Canada would have no objection to furnishing, besides items of this character, news of political events in Canada to the boys at the front. But what, I imagine, the people of Canada—particularly the one-half who voted for us on this side of the House—object to most sincerely is paying for a paper which seemed to have as its particular object the defeat of those candidates who, in the recent election, endeavoured to put before the Canadian people at home, and before Canadian soldiers at the front, views that they thought were straight and honest. I am not speaking because of any personal grouse, though I have one, but from the standpoint of every man who sits on this side of the House. We have no objection to any one on the other side telling us that we are traitors, because we are here to answer the statement; we have no objection to the newspapers, bought with money that came from God knows where—it did not come from this side—but we do object to your loading the dice and stacking the cards against us with the boys overseas. When I see in a paper issued by the Canadian War Records Office, towards which a certain portion of the war vote of $500,000,000 is devoted, as was ably explained by the President of the Council this afternoon, this question asked of Canadian soldiers, "How Would the Kaiser Vote? Vote for Union Government," then I say, Mr. Chairman, one-half of the people of Canada should be consulted as to how this money should be spent, and should be asked to endorse that expenditure.

There is, Mr. Chairman, one more word. In answer to my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). the Prime Minister stated that these articles—I am not talking now only of the advertisements, because if it were only advertisements I suppose we could not have very great objection—cabled from Canada, mentioned something of the election. But, Mr. Chairman, every word of the headlines in this paper, if they said anything to the man who thus poisoned the wells for the soldiers, said that he was a good poisoner, that he was surely entitled to a seat in the Cabinet of any Government which did nothing to allow the people of Canada to have a free expression of their views, and to a position in any Cabinet which would impose such a law as the War-time Elections Act. Read in the Canadian Daily Record of December 1, 1917, the reference to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig), under the caption:

Archie was willing, but—
Others refused to let him become M.P. by acclamation.

The paragraph itself reads as follows:

Chatham, Ont., Friday.

Despite the efforts of the sympathizers of the Win-the-War Government, Kent County, Ont., will have an election. This has been brought about by a decision of the Laurierites here. The Unionist candidate, Mr. K. W. Plewes, offered to drop out of the fight and give Mr. A. B. McCoig the election by acclamation if the latter would sign a statement agreeing to support the Union Government.

Mr. McCoig put the matter before his supporters, who scornfully refused to do any such thing.

All true, probably, but the headlines and the way it is put to the soldiers to make them think that my hon. friend from Kent was "one of those traitors, one of those slackers, one of those friends of the Kaiser," that is what we complain of. Every one of the articles here is tainted with the same hand, the hand of the man with a brain equal only to the brains of the poisoners of the middle ages. I am sorry that any attack should be made on this paper, because I am sincerely convinced that nothing could be better for the troops at the front than to get news day by day from their homes and the people in Canada. The only objection there is to it, and it is a serious objection, is that apparently whoever is in charge of the Record, and whichever member of the Government is in charge of the paper, is guilty of debauching the news from Canada in order in this time of stress to win some political advantage for himself and for the Government of which he is a member.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Was not the article which the hon. gentleman first read an advertisement?

Mr. POWER: It was an advertisement and I stated it to be such.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that.

Mr. POWER: We have never had any statement as to whether any moneys have been turned in to the Canadian Government, or to the Canadian War Record Office, for advertisements printed in this paper during the period of the election.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As a matter of fact the Canadian Government does not expend any money upon the publication of the Canadian War Record at all. The only money that it does expend is in sending telegraphic news messages, and, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said as to the character of the paper I am under the impression that he has not made a very careful study of its columns, or he would not have committed himself quite so absolutely as he did. For example on the very page from which my hon. friend, the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) quoted I find this:

Denies all knowledge.

Sir Wilfrid makes reply to Premier on recruiting.

(Daily Record Cablegram.)

Ottawa, Monday.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has issued a statement replying to the Premier's speech at Sydney, when Sir Robert said he had asked the Opposition to co-operate in regard to recruiting.

In his reply, Sir Wilfrid Laurier says he has no knowledge whatever of these invitations.

A correction, according to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's ideas, of a statement I had made at Sydney. I would suppose that any hon. gentleman looking at a page of the paper—

Mr. POWER: Would the Prime Minister like to have a photograph of that paragraph, as well as of the paper, shown to anybody in this House? If a photograph were taken of it it would surely be shown that it was an imputation with respect to the honesty of the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I must confess that I can hardly enter into the state of mind which would attribute any such imputation as that to the article that I have just read. I shall not discuss it; hon. gentlemen can see it for themselves, as they have heard it for themselves. According to my limited powers of understanding, I should say it could not by any possibility whatever convey any such imputation as the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. BUREAU: The Prime Minister said just now that we should not begrudge the money we are spending for that publication. It is the same old game. When we get up, and there has been a family quarrel, I am surprised that they do not yell "Quebec." We on this side of the House do not begrudge any expenditure for the soldiers. If you want to have unity, and have us join hands with you in everything, it is high time that these imputations should stop, and when anybody on the other side is in a hole it is sufficient that he cry out: "Oh, well, you have to cry, because this is an expenditure for war purposes." Nobody on the other side can complain that we have embarrassed the Government in any way since the beginning of the session, even when they brought in bad measures, or measures that would be obnoxious to any man who desired to keep this a democratic country if it was not a time of war. We do not want to have any trouble, and it is for that reason that we object to these imputations that have been made against us for the last year or more. As my hon. friend has said, the Canadian Daily Record has contained some shameful posters and literature, which was published in the Ontario papers, and the title "Union Publication Committee," telephone such a number, and such an address, appeared on the sheet. Now, I have no objection to sending this publication to the trenches. The Prime Minister says it does not cost a cent to send it. I say go on and spend money on it, and let the boys in the trenches know what is going on in this country. It is not the spending of $200 more a week or a month that will cripple this country. The object is to keep them in contact with their people. I suppose its not costing the public anything is the excuse for making it a political sheet to be sent to the trenches. We are onto the game, and we won't stand for it, and are determined that these imputations shall go on no longer. The Prime Minister told me that this amount of $500,000,000 is appropriated to the Government as a whole. That being so, I want to see the report of the whole Government as to that Victory Loan. The reason is this: On page 597 of unrevised Hansard, the Prime Minister made the statement that the war expenditure for the Finance Department for the fiscal year 1914-15 was $149,630.09; in 1915-16, $72,000; in 1916-17, $54,000; in 1917-18, $6,000. Now, before 31st March last, the Victory Loan was floated, and my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) told us the other night that the cost of floating that loan was about three millions of dollars.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Five millions.

Mr. BUREAU: And might increase to five millions. My hon. friend is here to correct me. He said that the cost so far was about three millions, but that when all his friends were satisfied it would amount to five millions. I would like to know from the Prime Minister where this five millions representing the commission paid for the raising of the Victory Loan of $300,000,000 is going to be charged.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the advertising.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought I understood that covered all the expenditure incurred in the raising of the Victory Loan.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On the occasion to which my hon. friend refers, I gave to the House all the information that was available in connection with the cost of the last Victory Loan. The expenditures in that connection, so far as known, amount to $3,620,395. But I said there were additional expenditures to be accounted for, and I am very sorry they are not yet available. But they will be available in a few days when I shall be able to lay on the table of the House a complete statement of the expenditure. It will approximate nearly five million dollars, but the total cost of the loan will amount to one and one-quarter per cent, which is an exceedingly low rate.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not criticising that; I did not rise in a spirit of criticism. I wanted to find out how it is that, according to the Prime Minister's statement, the expenditure for the Finance Department for the fiscal year 1917-18 is $6,024.02, when we know that the floating of this loan is costing the country over four million dollars.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that has any connection with the loan. I am not very familiar with the administration of the Department of Finance but my impression is that, with respect to all loans floated in this country, the cost is deducted from the proceeds of the loan. Perhaps the Acting Minister of Finance can say if that is the case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That has been the practice, I think, in the past. My hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queens can give the House more information on that point than I can.

Mr. FIELDING: I have not followed the argument just now. Speaking generally, the hon. gentleman's statement of practice is correct.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to afford the information that the hon. gentleman desires, if I can give it to him. I did not understand his question. Would he repeat it?

Mr. BUREAU: The Department of Finance has raised a loan of $500,000,000, if I understand it aright, by means of a Victory Loan from the people. This loan has cost a certain amount to the country. My method of keeping books would be to charge the cost of that loan somewhere. Now, if you are going to pay $5,000,000, you won't get $500,000,000; you will only get $495,000,000. I understand from the Prime Minister that the country will be credited ith only $495,000,000, is that correct?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: $398,000,000 is the proceeds of the loan.

Mr. BUREAU: I am using $500,000,000 for the sake of argument. There is a discrepancy in the amount realized of $5,000,000. There has been realized from the loan $495,000,000 and there have actually been issued bonds or certificates to the amount of $500,000,000. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, but what is wrong about it?

Mr. BUREAU: Nothing is wrong with it. But if the Finance Department have been handling this loan, where is the cost of floating it shown? The Prime Minister says that this is a loan which is made to the Government as a whole. Is it distributed among the various departments? Do I understand that the Militia Department, for instance, get $200,000,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend misunderstood the Prime Minister.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was talking about the appropriation, not about the loan.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All war appropriations are made on behalf of the Government. Ordinarily our estimates appropriate money to the different departments for different purposes, and each department has control over the money voted. But in the case of war expenditures, the appropriation is made by the Government, and the Government is responsible, not the department actually making the expenditure. I informed the House the other day as fully as I could of the exact cost of the Victory Loan. I am sorry that complete and exact details of the expenditure are not available; I hope, however, that they will be available next week, when I shall lay them on the Table. The Victory Loan was in charge of a committee whose headquarters were at Toronto, and the expenditures were incurred by that committee. We must rely upon them to submit all the details to the Department of Finance. We are promised the particulars this week.

Mr. BUREAU: That will be in the public accounts?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The cost of the loan will be deducted from the proceeds of the sale of the bonds.

Mr. BUREAU: There will be that discrepancy between the two sides of the books.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The books of the department will show the total receipts and the total cost of making the loan.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman said that there was a committee in Toronto. What committee was that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some members of the committee were from Montreal and other parts of Canada, I believe. I am sorry that I cannot inform my hon. friend as to the membership of the committee.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will my hon. friend get that information?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: In the return which my hon. friend promises to bring down, will he give details of the various items of expenditure under the different headings—newspaper advertising, and so on?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The information I propose to lay on the Table will disclose the exact amount paid for publicity, and the amount paid to each newspaper in Canada.

Mr. PEDLOW: Will it contain the amount paid for publicity through the newspapers as distinguished from publicity through other means?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: I listened with great attention to the statement made by the President of the Council this afternoon with regard to his scheme of propaganda throughout Canada and his explanation of the publication in different books and magazines of the reasons for the war and the aims of the Allies. I was not, however, in any way convinced that this country ought to spend so large an amount as the cost of the scheme proposed by the President of the Council would involve. I submit that if the press, not only of the province of Quebec but of all the other provinces as well, were allowed to state exactly the views of the people of the country the people would be thoroughly acquainted with our aims in this war and the objects which we wish to attain. The President of the Council told us that he had appointed as head of the Bureau of Public Information a gentleman by the name of Nichols. I do not wish to repeat what the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said, but if what he said is true—and it has not been contradicted either by the President of the Council or by any member on the other side—Mr. Nichols certainly is not competent to be placed in such a position as that which has been assigned to him by the minister. Mr. Nichols edited two newspapers in Montreal; what happened to those newspapers? Well, they attacked the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) for what purpose I do not know.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I know, though.

Mr. CANNON: The ex-Minister of Militia thinks he knows. I hope that after I have finished these few remarks, he will explain why he knows.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did.

Mr. CANNON: While the member was Minister of Militia he was conducting the military affairs of the country as best he could. I do not say that I approved everything he did; as a matter of fact I fought some of his decisions and disapproved of part of his policy. But I wish to say one thing for the ex-Minister of Militia: whatever he did, he did in earnest, and it cannot be said of him, as it can of other people in this country, that he was a hypocrite. He may have been wrong, but whenever he was wrong he never claimed that he was right. Another thing I liked about the hon. member is that whenever he had friends he stuck by them—and that is one thing I cannot say for many members on the other side. The ex-minister mentioned this afternoon two of his friends, the first of whom was Mr. Armand Lavergne. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) attacked Mr. Lavergne. I am no friend of Mr. Lavergne, politically speaking, but I wish that the member for Simcoe had the same love for his country, Canada, as the honourable—I correct myself—as Colonel Armand Lavergne seems to have for his country. He may be wrong; his ideas may be exaggerated or false, but he has convictions, and he sticks to them. He does not alter his principles, and when he does anything or means anything, he says so. Some people in Canada do not do that. We have before us a Government composed of supposed Liberals and supposed Conservatives. Are the supposed Conservatives Liberals, and are the supposed Liberals Conservatives? I do not know. But I know one thing: if we had on the other side the same amount of sincerity, conviction and good faith as exists on this side, things in Canada would be better by far. This afternoon I heard, with great surprise, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) speaking of autonomy as if it meant nothing. It may mean nothing to him. If so, I am sorry for him. I would refer the hon. member for Frontenac to one bright work among the classical works of English writers. I refer to the work entitled the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, by Gibbon. I would refer him to the second volume of that work, and if he is not too busy, he might go through that second volume and find out the true answer to this question: Why did the Roman Empire fall? The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), I see, is laughing. I may say to the Minister of Labour that I put the question for this reason, namely, that the greatest empire which has ever existed in the history of the world since the Roman Empire is the British Empire, and therefore it would be very prudent for statesmen like the Minister of Labour to inquire as to the causes of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, so as to prevent the existence of similar causes in regard to the British Empire. Why did the Roman Empire fall? The Roman Empire fell because Rome thought that she had not to consider the mentality, the aspirations, the hopes, of her dependencies, and whenever the Roman emperors declared war, they would simply call on the provinces of Gaul, or Asia, or Africa, to contribute so many thousand men, and those men had to come into the field and fight for the Roman Empire. How long did that condition last? A very short period of time. We are here to legislate, not so as to shorten the life of the British Empire, but, if possible, to lengthen it, and any measures introduced by the Government of the nature of that which is submitted to us to-night are certainly not of a character to improve the political relations of the colonies towards the British Empire. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) told us to-day that when he was our Minister of Militia, when he was at the head of our army, an army which now numbers over 400,000 men, he had practically nothing to do with the conduct of the army. Such a condition of things should not exist.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I correct the hon. member? It was assumed by Canadians, the Canadian High Commissioner and others, that we had nothing to say in the matter. When I laid the matter before the British Government, I did so very clearly, and Viscount Kitchener, Sir Douglas Haig, Sir William Robertson, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Bonar Law and others recognized our position exactly as I laid it down.

Mr. CANNON: I understand from what the hon. member says that our official representative in England, our High Commissioner at London, was under the impression that we had absolutely nothing to do with the conduct of our army the moment it landed in England?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: Our Minister of Militia at that time maintained the contrary. What was the result? The Commissioner is still there, and the minister is out.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Happy, though.

Mr. CANNON: Happy to be out. Maybe the ex-minister is happy, but if the ex-minister contended for the maintenance of our autonomy, I may say that I am not happy that he is out, because the stand taken by him is the stand that should be taken by every true and sincere Canadian. We are subjects of the British Empire, it is true. I would be the last man to forget that I am a British subject; I would be the last man to preach, in my province or in my constituency any disloyalty towards the British Crown; but on the other hand, I would be the last man to say that I am the slave of England or of Downing street.

Mr. HAY: What about the American forces in England and France at the present time?

Mr. CANNON: The American forces have been placed by their Government at the disposal of General Foch as Commander-in-Chief of the Allied forces, but our Government never had anything to do as to our troops once they went overseas. That is the difference.

I was astounded, I was amazed this afternoon when the Minister of Militia declared that he did not even know who was the army commander of the Canadian corps at present. Where do we stand? We are no longer in 1760. We are no longer at the stage when this Canada of ours was merely a small colony which a few thousands of people were trying to open up to colonization and civilization. This Canada is a country and the Canadian people are a nation. We are not a Crown colony. What is our status? When you take a country like Montenegro, which has contributed to the Allied forces in this war a force of about 10,000 men, whenever there is a military conference in Paris or in London the representatives of Montenegro are called in to give their opinion. And at such conferences, where is our Canadian representative? When England decided to declare war on Germany and Austria, was the Prime Minister of this country consulted? Did the Prime Minister of this country receive a cable from the Imperial authorities? If he did, I should like him to let me know. We were not consulted as to the declaration of war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may tell the hon. gentleman that we were in constant communication with the Imperial authorities for days before war broke out.

Mr. CANNON: Constant communication with the Imperial authorities possibly, but if the Prime Minister wants to be sincere he will admit he never was consulted as to whether this Empire should declare war on Germany or not.

Mr. CURRIE: This Parliament did take action.

Mr. CANNON: It was never consulted as to the declaration of war.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CANNON: I know what I am talking about.

Mr. CURRIE: No, you do not.

Mr. CANNON: I do not wish to carry on a discussion with the hon. member along these lines. Ignorance is no argument, and he can keep his to himself.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think that a great deal of useless discussion would be avoided if the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), who now has the floor, would bring his remarks a little nearer to the Bill under consideration.

Mr. CANNON: I will ask the Chairman to read the clause now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN (reading): "This Act may be cited as The War Appropriation Act, 1918."

Mr. CANNON: The preamble has not been adopted, has it?

The CHAIRMAN: No, it has not. According to the rules of the House, consideration of the preamble has been postponed until the clauses have been considered.

Mr. CANNON: Therefore, all clauses are subject to the preamble, which reads as follows——

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have just stated that the discussion on the preamble has been postponed until the clauses have been considered. If the hon. member does not wish to submit to my ruling he can appeal to the House.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I understand that according to the rules I can state my position.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to inform the hon. gentleman that according to the rules, the hon. member cannot state his opinion after the Chairman has made his ruling, and the only recourse is an appeal to the House without discussion.

Mr. CANNON: What is the Chairman's ruling?

The CHAIRMAN: It is that we are discussing the short title of this Bill, and that the remarks now being made by the hon. member for Dorchester are not in order, as they do not relate to the clause now under discussion.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman. I understand that this is a Bill to grant to the Government $500,000,000 for war purposes. I have listened to the discussion and have heard the hon. member for North Ox-
11 p.m. ford (Mr. Nesbitt) complain as to the choice of candidates, and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) complain of the way his opponent was called back from Europe. I have heard the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) giving his ideas as to the conduct of the war and the many mistakes that have been committed, not by himself evidently, but by other people. I have heard the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) attacking the hon. member for North Oxford, and have heard attacks on the Roman Catholic clergy, and all kinds of other things, and I now wish as briefly as possible to answer these attacks, if they are not irrelevant to the clause under consideration. When the chairman after an interruption by the hon. member for North Simcoe called me to order, I had just stated that Canada had had nothing to do with the declaration of war. Another question I would raise is, have we anything to do with the conduct of the war? A few months ago the newspapers announced that an Allied Council has been established at Versailles, composed of representatives from England, France, Italy and other Allied nations. Was Canada represented at that Council? Has the Government of Canada been consulted as to that Council? I do not know, but judging from the official statement of the Government, I do not think this Government was consulted.

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Once again, and for the last time, I call the hon. gentleman to order. He is now discussing the principle of this Bill—discussion which might more properly have taken place on the second reading. In any event, it certainly is not in order on the clause under consideration,

Mr. CANNON: With all respect for the Chairman of this committee I wish to——

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CANNON: On the second reading of this Bill it was distinctly understood——

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VIEN: May I ask the Prime Minister if it was not distinctly understood that we could discuss the principle of the Bill in committee just as on the second reading?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not so understand.

Mr. VIEN: There was something of that kind understood.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will look it up and see what it was. I remember that I said I would give a great deal of information in committee which I might otherwise have given on the second reading.

Mr. VIEN: The Bill was given its second reading to rush matters, but on the distinct understanding that we could discuss its principle in committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not aware of that.

Mr. VIEN: That is what we gathered from the Prime Minister's remarks the other day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman will find what I said on page 596 of Hansard. I said that it was not necessary to discuss the principle and therefore I did not propose to discuss it, but would give information on the second reading. The leader of the Opposition said:

> The suggestion of the Prime Minister, in so far as the method of giving information to the House is concerned, is quite acceptable. In order to facilitate business, the information which is usually conveyed to the House in a resolution was postponed until the second reading of the Bill. We on this side of the House shall reserve our right to criticise the main features of the Bill, after the information promised has been received, when the Bill comes up again for discussion.

There was nothing said about discussing the principle.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your decision. The honourable the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) this afternoon gave us a statement as to the great scheme he had to open up the minds of the people of Canada as to the object of the country in this war. If we are to believe the remarks made by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and which were not contradicted, if the Government wish to carry on a propaganda of the same character as that which was carried on in England during the election and if the Liberals of Canada are to be represented in these official papers as the Kaiser's friends I do not think it would be fair for any gentleman on the other side of the House, not even for the President of the Privy Council, to ask us to pay for papers that are libelling us all the time. The President of the Privy Council says that his sole object is to unite the population of this country and to increase our strength in fighting Germany. As far as that is concerned, we are always unanimous.

Mr. EDWARDS: In theory.

Mr. CANNON: In theory and in practice.

Mr. EDWARDS: Not to any alarming extent.

Mr. CANNON: We may differ as to means and methods but I think our spirit is the same. I think that our ideas are in common and that on both sides we wish to win the war and to prosecute it with the greatest possible vigour. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that this propaganda that is being carried on has certain dangers. Why should the people of this country who are divided in their political views be called upon to pay the expenses of publications, lectures and meetings when the views expressed in these publications, lectures and meetings may not be in the interest of unity or of the country generally? As far as the President of the Privy Council is concerned, I have not the pleasure or the honour of knowing him personally, but I have known him casually through reports published in the papers and through speeches made in the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: If any hon. member wishes to interrupt me I would ask him to rise. These publications may be good, but judging by those which have been issued in the past, I do not think it would be fair or just to the people of this country to ask them to pay for them. In England, in France, and among our overseas troops, these publications have been issued absolutely for political purposes. If the Unionist party wishes to promote its aims and to improve its chances of being elected, should not the Unionist party pay its party and election expenses instead of the Government bearing these expenses? It is not fair, just or equitable. I notice in memorandum No. 3, which is being distributed to the members, a statement published on page 60. This statement contains one item to which I wish to call the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister. It is an item as to the Ross rifles. According to that statement, we have spent $8,360,358.32 for the period covered by the memorandum. What has become of those Ross rifles? The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), I understand, was a firm supporter of the Ross rifle. He was a very convinced believer in the qualities of the Ross rifle as a war weapon. Last year, without any warning, the workers who were employed at the Ross rifle factory in Quebec received notice that their services were no longer required.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. gentleman know if there is any truth in the rumour that for the purpose of carrying on the war they are trying to manufacture a cannon in Quebec that will shoot three thousand miles?

Mr. CANNON: I do not know if such a gun is to be manufactured, but if it were I think it would be very useful to the hon. member because he does not fire very far.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will the hon. gentleman undertake to raise a battalion to operate such a gun from his constituency?

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member may think he is very funny. If he is of that opinion I am not going to disabuse his mind of the idea, because when a man wishes to be funny I like him to enjoy his own jokes. But I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that we on this side are not here to make jokes. We are not here to laugh, but to discuss as seriously as we can the problems which are submitted to us, and we are thoroughly in earnest in our resolution to do so. If the hon. member does not agree with me I am very sorry for him. I do not wish to be funny, I desire to be serious and I hope he will adopt the same attitude. I was remarking to the Prime Minister that the Ross rifle factory in Quebec is closed. The closing of that factory was a real calamity, because it deprived thousands of labourers of employment and forced them to leave our city and to go elsewhere to seek for work. I would like the Government to give us an explanation as to why the Ross rifle factory was closed, because the explanations offered by the Government at the time were incomplete and unsatisfactory. The people of Quebec are asking why that factory should have been closed after the Government had made such a large expenditure as they did in connection with the manufacture and purchase of Ross rifles. I will not take up time in unduly discussing this matter, but I sincerely hope that the Government, before this discussion closes, will vouchsafe a satisfactory answer on the subject.

Mr. DAVIDSON: If the hon. gentleman would apply to the former member for Edmonton, Mr. Oliver, he would get all the information possible on that subject.

Mr. CANNON: That is indeed a very bright suggestion on the hon. gentleman's part.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: May I inquire if the military publication known as "Knouts and Lashes" is published by the department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I never heard of it before.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does the Government grant any subvention to that publication?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. VIEN: This afternoon I asked for some information from the Prime Minister as to the management of the Department of Militia Overseas. I did not want at the time to interrupt the trend of the discussion that was immediately afterwards started by other speakers on other subjects, and which served to divert attention from the point which I raised, but I now wish to press for an answer, because the point involved is most important. If we wish to continue to consider ourselves as a nation we must deal with our army as a nation does. The Prime Minister told us that in the direction of military operations the Canadian commander in the field had to receive orders from the Commander in Chief of the Allied Armies. In that arrangement we all concur, but in our expeditionary force there are regiments, brigades, divisions and army corps. We have staffs for the regiments, and also brigade and division and army staffs, and we have the army council advising the Minister of Militia Overseas. But it seems to me, and the same idea occurs to a great many members of this House as well as to a large number of our people, that such being the case, promotions in and appointments to the Canadian Expeditionary Force could be easily followed, could be easily recommended, and easily kept under the control of the Minister of Militia Overseas, who should be required to report these matters to the Canadian Government for the information of the House. If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, he told us that the military operations were under the control of the War Office and the Commander in Chief of the Allied Armies, but he did not advise us as to how the appointments or promotions in the regiments, or on the brigade, division and army corps staffs were made. Neither did he answer the other question I asked, which was whether the commander of our army in the field reports either to the Minister of Militia Overseas, or directly to the Government, how our troops are ordered into action and how they come out. This information I also deem to be of importance. Field Marshall Haig, the commander of the British troops in the field, now acts under the supreme command of General Foch, but that does not prevent the former from sending despatches to his Government as to how the troops go into action and how they come out. I, therefore, wish for information on those points: First, as to the appointment of officers and as to their displacement; secondly, as to the orders given to our troops to go into action or to come out of it, and whether the commander in the field has any orders to report to the Government by despatches in that respect.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already explained, and I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not grasp my statement, that in so far as appointments and promotions at the front are concerned, they are carried out practically by the military commanders in the brigades, the divisions and the army corps. We do not interfere at all, and I think the public would regard us as practically insane if we did in this instance attempt to do so. In the case of the higher commands word is sent to us, but naturally we feel that those who are in command of the troops understand better the qualifications, the experience and the ability of the men selected for a particular post.

Mr. VIEN: Who appoints the higher commands?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the case of a brigade, there would be a recommendation from the commander which would, I presume, require the approval of the divisional commander and the commander of the corps. In the case of a division, the divisional commander would make his recommendation to the commander of the corps. It all goes in that way. Inasmuch as the commander of the corps is responsible in the last analysis, why, naturally his approval must be secured. And then in the case of important commands—

Sir SAM HUGHES: We cannot hear a word.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was saying that the commander of the corps must approve, as I understand, because he is, in the highest degree, responsible. As to important commands, we have been consulted over here. But we have never attempted to over-ride the recommendations made from the front.

Sir SAM HUGHES: While what the Prime Minister says in practice may be true, surely the Prime Minister does not for a second dispute that he and his Cabinet have the final say in the appointment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Absolutely, we have, and I have said so repeatedly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is quite possible for a gentleman living in Ottawa to know quite as much about the capacity of these officers as a gentleman thirty miles in the rear of the fighting line.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I would like to ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia if French-speaking recruits will be sent to the trenches as a unit; that is, will they be merged into French regiments like the 22nd Battalion? I understand that the 150th Regiment was broken up in England. It was commanded by Colonel Barré, a good officer, who has received the medal of the Legion d'Honneur. I want to impress upon the Minister of Militia that in my judgment it is important that French Canadians should be kept together. Last week the minister said that he regretted very much that owing to the necessities of the situation a certain regiment which came from a certain province had to be disbanded, and that it would have been better for the spirit of the corps if it had remained together. I think that special steps should be taken to see that French Canadians, a great number of whom do not understand English, shall be commanded by officers who can speak French. Sometimes orders may be given of extreme importance, and it would seem to me that these instructions should be given by officers who can give the necessary explanation in their language. I would strongly and energetically urge that French Canadians should not be merged with English regiments, because they will have sufficient hardships to endure without the added difficulty of language.

Mr. MORPHY: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I am just finishing; I won't be long. I noticed in a Montreal paper a statement by Colonel Mignault, who has been to the front, and is, I presume, well known to the Militia Department, in which he argues along this line, that the French Canadians should be kept together as a unit.

Major-General MEWBURN: I think I said some days ago in the House that the whole organization is on the territorial principle, that in England they have some regiments linked up with those overseas. Any recruits coming from Military Districts No. 4 and No. 5, taking in Montreal and Quebec, go over and are put into the reserve battalions, and from these they are gradually sent over as reinforcements to the units in the fighting line coming from their home districts. There are several regiments at the front known as Quebec regiments. I won't say that they are filled completely with French Canadians, because, I think, in some instances, that they were unable to keep up their reinforcements. But the 13th, 14th, 22nd, 24th, 5th, and the 87th are all known as Quebec regiments coming from the province of Quebec, and the reserve units in England take care of these men, and they go from there to the line regiments in the front.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: Will the hon. minister promise the House to put himself into communication with the Imperial authorities to see that French Canadians shall be kept together as much as possible? It is not an evasive answer that I wish to have.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Probably the Minister of Militia would allow me to answer the hon. gentleman's question. We all know that the 22nd Battalion, which has covered itself with so much glory at the front, is entirely a French Canadian battalion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not entirely.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think so. As the French Canadians go from Montreal to England and as the Minister of Militia has pointed out, they are put into what is known in England as the 10th Reserve Battalion under Colonel DesRosiers. They are all French Canadians there; I was in that camp and saw them. So I wish to assure my hon. friend that the French Canadians at the front are kept together in the 22nd Battalion and officered by French Canadians.

Mr. VIEN: The right hon. Prime Minister answered the first question. He will perhaps be able to tell me whether the Government received any despatch from the commander of the troops in the field as to how they were ordered into action, and how they came out?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Officer Commanding the corps in the field reports to us through the Minister of the Overseas Service. We receive very frequent reports. As far as ordering them into action or out of action is concerned, of course, the Government sitting here in Ottawa has nothing to do with ordering them into action any more than the people in the War Office have to do with directing General's Haig's movements. These things must be done by the military commanders at the front.

Mr. VIEN: My right hon. friend said a minute ago that before the war broke out the Government was in constant consultation—

Mr. DAVIDSON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I want to call your attention to the fact that speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite have flagrantly violated that rule this evening.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee, and also of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia, it was understood that all questions relating to the administration of the forces and all expenditures connected with this Bill should be discussed in committee. I do not think that the hon. member has wandered far enough away from that aspect of the matter under consideration to warrant my calling him to order.

Mr. VIEN: I assure my hon. friend that I do not want to delay the procedure unnecessarily. I simply wish to obtain from the Prime Minister such information as will enable us to appreciate how things are managed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: For about a week, or perhaps more, before the war broke out the Government of the United Kingdom were in constant communication with us. I was away from Ottawa—I left, I think, on 23rd July—and these communications, the purport of which was transmitted to me, were of such a character that on July 30th I came to the conclusion that I should return to Ottawa. I arrived on the morning of August 1st, and went over the communications which had been received. A great many more came during the next three or four days, until war broke out. We were kept constantly advised. On 1st August I took upon myself the responsibility of advising the Government of the United Kingdom that if war did unfortunately break out this country would stand with the Mother Country and the other dominions of the Empire to the end. I further sent them a confidential telegram, which has since been made public, stating that I believed we could send a division over almost immediately. The question whether or not Parliament and the country would stand behind that declaration came up in the first instance at the session of Parliament which opened on 18th August. On that occasion this country, through the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled, decided that the course which I had taken was the proper one and they would stand behind it without a dissenting voice.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Prime Minister has left out a very important point—that Britain did not ask Canada to support her. The action of Canada was purely voluntary.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I certainly desired to be so understood. The telegram which I sent on 1st August was not in response to any appeal; it was a voluntary offer which I made on behalf of the people of Canada, and which was afterwards ratified by this Parliament.

Mr. VIEN: I asked for this information because I understood the Prime Minister to inform the member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) that for over a week before the war broke out he had been in constant consultation with the Imperial Government. I gather from what the Prime Minister says that the Government was in constant consultation with the Imperial authorities so far as our participation in the war was concerned, but not so far as the declaration of war itself was concerned.

Last year the Ross rifle factory was closed down. I was not in the House at the time, but I understood from a declaration made by the acting Prime Minister of that time, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that the Ross rifle factory had been closed down on account of the rifle having been discarded, and that the Ross rifle factory would be transformed into a factory for the manufacture of Lee-Enfield rifles. What has been done with the Ross rifle factory, and what steps have been taken to convert it into a Lee-Enfield rifle factory?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No arrangements have been made to convert the Ross rifle into Lee-Enfield rifle. Speaking without any expert knowledge, I doubt very much whether that would be possible. The troops were being armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and it was not considered desirable to proceed with the manufacture of more Ross rifles. The best disposition possible was made of those on hand.

Mr. VIEN: What has been done with the machinery that was in the Ross rifle factory?

Major-General MEWBURN: Some parts of the machinery that were not required for the manufacture of rifles have been sold; I could not give the exact quantity. I understand it is not the intention of the Government to continue the manufacture of Ross rifles. Some scraps of machinery and material that were not further required have been sold.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: At what price was the Ross rifle factory appropriated by the Government?

Major-General MEWBURN: An Order in Council fixed a maximum price on the expropriation of $3,000,000.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is it the intention of the Government to manufacture Lee-Enfield rifles in the Ross rifle factory?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We had a great deal of correspondence with the British Government as to what rifle would eventually be used throughout the Empire. It was recognized at the Imperial War Conference, that it was desirable that all troops of the Empire should be equipped and armed, as far as possible, in the same way. It is still quite uncertain what type of rifle will eventually be used. One thing is certain: that at the end of this war there will be a very much greater stock of rifles on hand than the Empire will require for peace purposes. Under these circumstances it is obvious that we could come to no conclusion as to the manufacture of any particular type of rifle in this country in the immediate future.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there any proposal to turn the Ross rifle factory into a plant for the manufacture of machine guns for a foreign Government?

Major-General MEWBURN: There was a suggestion in that regard, and some negotiations took place, but nothing came of them.

Mr. VIEN: Are the details of expenditure in connection with the expropriation of the Ross rifle factory published officially?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are available in statements that have been made in the House.

Mr. VIEN: I do not think any statement was laid on the Table so far as the expenditure incurred is concerned.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There was in the memorandum alluded to a statement as to the expenditure during that particular year.

Mr. VIEN: I understand the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) told us the other day that he expected the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report to be available in a few days, or, at least, that he could tell us shortly when it would be available. Can the minister tell us now when we may expect the fourth volume which contains a great deal of information and details as to the expenditure? The House will not find our inquiries too extended or obnoxious, because $500,000,000 was voted last year and have been expended, and as insufficient reports have been laid on the Table of the House, I think our inquiry is justified.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree that the hon. gentleman's demands are proper. I am sorry I cannot give him any further information this evening, but I shall do so to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. JOS. READ: I just want to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the very great danger to which they have been exposing the Empire by not sticking to the truth, especially in those publications. Take for instance, that publication that is still under discussion. In that sheet which my hon. friends had circulating amongst our boys, it was stated that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the right hon. leader of the Opposition, won the election, it would mean that Canada intended to quit. Did ever any hon. gentleman opposite think of what moral effect such a statement would produce not only upon our boys at the front, but upon the Imperial forces? Supposing Sir Wilfrid Laurier had won the election, what a state those people would have been in. Hon. members opposite must remember that the morale of an army is of as much importance as its ability to fight, and yet at the risk of lowering the morale of our army, my hon. friends, in order to win the election, go to the extreme method of publishing an absolute falsehood. My hon. friends want to be careful what they do.

Mr. VIEN: I would suggest to the Prime Minister that in view of the fact that we have not the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report, and in view of the fact that the report of the Military Service Council was distributed only to-day, the consideration of the clause under discussion should be postponed until another day, and that the committee should rise and report progress. There is not immediate urgency, and we shall not by any means unfairly delay the discussion of these matters, but it is only fair that, before the title of the Bill is carried, we should be put in possession of the documents and details.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not quite see the relevancy of the report of the Military Service Council to the appropriation under discussion. The report of the Militia Council, I am informed, was laid upon the table of the House about a week ago. Perhaps my hon. friend is confusing the one with the other. There are two distinct reports. One is the report of the Militia Council, which does contain a great deal of information relative to the appropriation that is now being asked for. The other is the report of the Military Service Council, an absolutely different thing, which has to do with the enforcement of the Military Service Act. According to my apprehension, that has very little relation to the appropriation that is now being asked for. I was not aware that the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report was not brought down. If the fourth volume contains his report respecting the Department of Militia and Defence, that, of course, is very relevant to the subject under discussion.

Mr. VIEN: It contains all the expenditure overseas, and especially the latest expenditure. The expenditure made by the Military Service Council comes under the War Appropriation Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know it does, but the report deals with methods, not with expenditures, and therefore, notwithstanding the suggestion of my hon. friend, I venture to impress upon him that it really has very little relation to this appropriation. The other two reports which he has mentioned have very direct relation to the appropriation.

Mr. VIEN: In view of the fact that the fourth volume of the Auditor General's Report, containing important details and information, is not available, I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We had better pass this section. We have been at it for two days, and as it consists of only one line, if we should take as much time for every other line in the Bill, we would get through with this appropriation by next September. I hope we shall get through a little earlier than that. I should like to say further that when my hon. friend suggests there is not some urgency about this matter, he is not thoroughly well advised. Since the 31st day of March, we have not had any money to carry on this war, and while it is perfectly true, I suppose, that bills and accounts have not yet come in to any great extent, we may expect them to come in very soon, and until this measure is passed, there will be no money with which to meet them. Therefore, while I do not desire in any way to restrict discussion, but rather to invite it, I hope hon. gentlemen will not be under the impression that there is no urgency in connection with this measure.

Mr. PARENT: Will the Minister of Militia be good enough to tell the committee what procedure must be taken to enter the Royal Flying Corps?

Major-General MEWBURN: Applications are made to the Officer Commanding the Royal Flying Corps in the Royal Bank Building, Toronto. General Hoare is the Officer Commanding, and when he is travelling between Texas and the Canadian camps, applications may be made to the Officer Commanding the Royal Flying Corps at Toronto, where the headquarters is.

Mr. PARENT: My reason for mentioning this matter to the minister is that I have had occasion to hear of a couple of cases of young men in the city of Quebec who wanted to apply for a commission in that particular corps and who were not able to succeed for one reason or another. The men are fully qualified in the way of education, physical capacity and so on.

Major-General MEWBURN: The Royal Flying Corps is not under our jurisdiction; it is under the Imperial War Department. They have their head office at Toronto. They have several camps in this country; they will be opening up at Camp Borden next month or probably the end of this month. If the hon. member finds any difficulty in getting information, I shall be glad to give him all information possible.

Mr. PARENT: Has the minister nothing to do with the corps?

Major-General MEWBURN: Nothing whatever. The appointments are all made through the officers of the Flying Corps around here.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To my personal knowledge the branch of the Aviation Corps in Montreal is under the charge of Mr. Lightall, and he has done excellent work in Montreal. I have sent many young men to him myself, and after examination at his office, where an Imperial officer is present, these young men are enlisted. I was surprised to see how rapidly it could be done.

Major-General MEWBURN: I presume my hon. friend is referring to young men who want a commission in the Flying Corps. The Flying Corps have offices all over the country—in Montreal, in the West, and in the United States—and applications are received through any of these offices. I was speaking of the headquarters of the Flying Corps in Toronto.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would suggest that the minister get some of his officers to ascertain just where these offices are, and have the information published in the newspapers so that these young men would know where to apply.

Major-General MEWBURN: We pass these applications right along.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Let the newspapers publish the information so the boys will have the data.

Mr. PARENT: I think the minister said the Government had nothing to do with the Royal Flying Corps, but I find on page 61 of Memorandum No. 3 that the flying officers are paid at the rate of $6—I do not know whether that is per day or not—and an allowance. Apparently this money is paid by the country, so the Government must have something to do with the Royal Flying Corps.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman probably did not hear the explanation which I made. There was some allowance made by this country to officers who went into the Flying Corps and lost pay on that account.

Mr. PARENT: My only object in bringing forward this matter is to facilitate the enlisting of men in the Flying Corps. For some reason at the present time there is a great deal of red tape to be gone through. I think if the minister would look into this matter it would help considerably.

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall do so with pleasure. I know the Flying Corps are only too glad to get recruits, and I am surprised to hear there is any red tape in the matter.

Mr. CANNON: I asked the Prime Minister some time ago to state the reasons why the Ross rifle factory was closed. I do not know whether he forgot about the subject.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I certainly could not have forgotten about it, because I gave the reasons, but perhaps my hon. friend did not hear them. I explained that the Ross rifle was not now used, that the men were armed with another rifle, and therefore it would not be in the public interest to continue manufacturing the Ross rifle.

The CHAIRMAN: Before passing clause 1, I should like to remind the committee that it was on this clause that all these questions concerning expenditure were asked. If any hon. members have any further questions of that nature to ask, I think it would be a proper time to ask for the information before this clause passes.

Mr. VIEN: I understood from the Prime Minister's statement that further questions could be asked when the full volume of the Auditor General's Report was available.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Let me relieve my hon. friend's anxiety at once. If the Chairman has no objection, I see no reason why we should not continue this discussion, in so far as it is relevant, on any other clause of the Bill. There is no reason why information could not be given on any other clause. But I hope it will not be found necessary to have a discussion of quite so comprehensive a scope on the other clauses. I would suggest that the discussion be a little more relevant, but so far as relevant information is concerned, there will not be the slightest objection to giving it on any clause of the Bill, or even on the preamble, which we have not yet reached.

Mr. VIEN: The Prime Minister will render us this justice: That so far as relevancy is concerned, this side of the House has kept to the point as closely as hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was not intending to draw any comparison whatever.

Section agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 12 midnight.

Friday, April 19, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Amendments of Defence of Canada Order, 1917.—Hon. C. C. Ballantyne.

Statement issued by the War Cabinet of the United Kingdom, at the request of the Board of Admiralty, showing for the United Kingdom and for the world, for the period August, 1914, to December, 1917: 1. Mercantile losses by enemy action and marine risk. 2. Mercantile shipbuilding output. 3. Enemy vessels captured and brought into service; together with diagrams showing mercantile losses and shipbuilding output for the United Kingdom and for the world for the same period.—Sir Robert Borden.

[The Chairman.]

THE LATE JOHN McMARTIN, M.P.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It is appropriate to refer to the loss which the House has sustained in the death of one of its members, John McMartin, member for Glengarry. Mr. McMartin had been elected by acclamation and took his seat on the first day of the session, but I had not then the privilege of meeting him. I am sure that the sympathy of all the members of the House will go out to his family and relatives who are called on to mourn his loss. Mr. McMartin had no opportunity of taking part in the proceedings of the House, but we know that he was a man of strong character, of wide business experience and great business ability, and I do not doubt that these qualities would have made him a most valuable and useful member of the House. I am sure that all of us deplore the loss which the membership of the House has sustained in his death.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I associate myself with the expressions which have been uttered by the Prime Minister concerning our late fellow member. Mr. McMartin was an old friend of mine, and I can testify to the high character which he always bore. The fact of his election by acclamation in the county in which he resided was excellent testimony as to his worth. I had the pleasure of meeting him when he was here on the first day of the session, and it was evident then that the hand of death was already upon him. We extend our sympathy to the members of his family.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, to amend the Indian Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The main purpose of the Bill is to make less difficult the enfranchisement of Indians, that is to say, it provides for the withdrawal of Indians in special cases from their present condition and their erection into the condition of citizens.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

MILITARY SERVICE.

MOTION BY THE PRIME MINISTER ENACTING REGULATIONS BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL FOR THE CALLING OF MEN TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that regulations respecting Military Service shall be made and enacted by the Governor in Council in manner and form and in the words and figures following, that is to say:

P. C. 919.

At the Government House at Ottawa.

Present:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

Whereas there is an immediate and urgent need of reinforcements for the Canadian Expeditionary Force and the necessity for these reinforcements admits of no delay;

And whereas it is deemed essential that notwithstanding exemptions heretofore granted a substantial number of men should be withdrawn forthwith from the civil life for the purpose of serving in a military capacity;

And whereas, having regard to the number of men immediately required and to the urgency of the demand, time does not permit of examination by exemption tribunals of the value in civil life, or the position, of the individuals called up for duty:

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, and in virtue of the powers conferred on the Governor in Council by The War Measures Act, 1914, and otherwise, is pleased to make the following regulations which shall come into force as soon as approved by resolution of both Houses of Parliament, and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly:—

Regulations.

1. In these regulations,—

(a) "Minister" shall mean the Minister of Militia and Defence.

(b) "Act" shall mean the Military Service Act, 1917.

2. Class 1 under the Act shall, in addition to the men included therein as in the said Act mentioned, include all men who,—

(a) Are British subjects; and

(b) Are not within the classes of persons described in the exceptions mentioned in the schedule to the Act; and

(c) Have attained the age of 19 years; but were born on or since 13th October, 1897; and

(d) Are unmarried or widowers without children; and

(e) Are resident in Canada.

3. Class 2 under the Military Service Act, 1917, shall, in addition to the men included therein as in the said Act mentioned, include all men who,—

(a) Are British subjects; and

(b) Are not within the classes of persons described in the exceptions mentioned in the schedule to the said Act; and

(c) Have attained the age of 19 years; but were born on or since 13th October, 1897; and

(d) Are married or widowers with children; and

(e) Are resident in Canada.

4. The words "In any theatre of actual war" in the fifth exception in the schedule to the Act shall not include the high seas or Great Britain or Ireland and the said exception shall be interpreted accordingly.

5. The Governor in Council may direct orders to report for duty to issue to men in any class under the Act of any named age or ages or who were born in named years or any named year or part of a year and any exemption heretofore granted to any man of any such named age or year of birth shall cease from and after noon of the day upon which he is ordered so to report and no claim for exemption by or in respect of any man shall be entertained or considered after the issue to him of such order, provided, however, that the Minister may grant leave of absence without pay to any man by reason of the death, disablement or service of other members of the same family while on active service in any theatre of actual war.

6. The age stated in any claim for exemption made by or on behalf of any man or in any other document signed by the man shall be conclusive evidence as against him of his age and year of birth.

7. The Minister may, from time to time, direct that no orders to report for duty be issued to men who have been examined by military medical boards and placed in such medical categories as are specified in such direction.

8. All men included in Class 1 by virtue of the provisions of these regulations shall report to the Registrar or Deputy Registrar under the Act as required by Proclamation; they shall be subject to military law as in such Proclamation set out and shall, in the event of their failing to report, be liable to the penalties specified in the Act and the regulations thereunder.

9. (a) Any man now unmarried, who at any time hereafter attains the age of 19 years and is then a British subject resident in Canada and not within one of the exceptions in the Schedule to the Act, shall; and

(b) Any man who, having attained the age of 19 years, being then a British subject resident as aforesaid and not within one of the exceptions in the schedule to the Act, becomes a widower without children, shall, if the class within which he then falls has been called out on active service,

Forthwith become subject to military law and shall within ten (10) days thereafter report to the Registrar or Deputy Registrar under the province or the part of a province in which he resides. He shall be placed on active service as provided by the Act, by the regulations thereunder or by these regulations, and shall, until so placed on active service be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

10. Where under or pursuant to any treaty or convention with any foreign Government or any country provision is now or may hereafter be made that the subjects of such Government or the citizens of such country resident in Canada may be made liable by law to military service, such subjects or citizens of such Government or country may be called out by Proclamation and shall report, be liable to military law and be placed on active service as may be specified in said Proclamation or in the Act or the regulations thereunder.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to make this motion under circumstances of peculiar gravity. Since the 21st of March last a battle has been proceeding on the Western front, in France and in Belgium, which may continue for months yet and may ultimately decide the fate of the world. Up to the present, the attack has been principally made upon the British army, and it is beyond question that the object of the enemy is to destroy that army before any considerable forces from the United States can be brought into the battle line, and thus bring this war to an end under such conditions as will enable Germany and Austria-Hungary to impose their will not only upon the Allied nations, but upon the world.

It might be worth while, I think it is worth while, to impress upon the House and the country the effort which the Central Powers are making in this war. Germany in November, 1916, passed a law which placed all male persons in the country, between the ages of seventeen and sixty, at the disposal of the Government for military service. It is not necessary to go into the details of the Act, it is sufficient to say that it brought under military service no less than 1,700,000 men; and other additions augmented the man-power of Germany for war purposes in the spring of 1917 by no less than 2,100,000 men. To that extent Germany a year ago increased her armies in this war, or at all events created reserves which could be drawn upon in case of need. The annual addition to Germany's man-power each ensuing year by young men reaching military age is about five hundred thousand men. In Austria it is about four hundred thousand, and in France something less than three hundred thousand men. Moreover, Germany, as we know, has practically enslaved tens of thousands of Belgians who are forced to work in that country in order that men of German birth may be brought into military service. She has made drafts upon the population of Poland, and we cannot doubt that in the immediate future she will make corresponding drafts upon that population, numbering about fifty-five millions in all, comprised in the newly acquired territories which she has conquered from Russia.

The defection of Russia in this war, her practical disappearance as a fighting unit, has had otherwise a most important influence upon the power that Germany is able at present to exercise upon the Western frontier.

A statement was made in the British House of Commons on January 14 last by Sir Auckland Geddes, Minister of National Service. Hon. gentlemen who are interested in it can read it in the English Hansard for themselves. It is only necessary for me to state the result at which he arrived by a series of deductions that are to be found in his speech. As a result of Russia's defection, according to his statement which seems to be based upon sound premises, Germany, in the spring and summer of 1918, will be able to throw upon the Western front an additional force of not less than 1,600,000 men. But she will be able to do more than that. She will be able to hold her Eastern frontier with inferior troops; she will be able to send there her new levies in order that they may be trained and hardened for work on the Western front, and she will be able to supply her battalions, brigades and divisions on the Western front from the reserves thus established and trained on her Eastern frontier.

Now, what have the Allied nations done, and what has the British Empire itself done? I need not do more than refer to the effort of France in just a word or two. According to the statement of the British Prime Minister, made not long ago in the British Parliament, France has put into the fighting line one-sixth of her entire population. If Canada did the same it would mean at least 1,500,000 men. I may be pardoned if I quote from the speech of a distinguished American general, who has recently returned from France, giving his estimate of conditions there and of the extent to which the population of that country has been called upon to fight in this war. General Wood says:

> When you think of perhaps twelve million, or even more millions, of men on a single unbroken battle-line, running over three hundred miles in length, and twenty miles or more in depth; every village full of artillery; every house full of soldiers; every road covered with transports, you begin to realize what this war means. If you go a bit beyond in the country to the rear you find great hospitals full of wounded; and if you go into the cities you find every man of proper age in uniform. If he is not in uniform you look at him critically to find out why he is not in uniform, for there men have learned that they owe the country service in war. Half of these that you see are cripples, and yet no one is talking of stopping. They are fighting for something vital to humanity; they are waging a war in which you have long been expected to help, and they are glad that you are now beginning to come. God helps those who help themselves. This is a war against efficiency, a degree of efficiency which the world has never before witnessed. Do not under-estimate the strength of the enemy you are sending your men against; he is skilled in war, trained in arms, wonderfully well led, and also brave and enduring. We may damn his methods, and condemn his morals, and denounce the object of the war, but do not let us make the mistake of under estimating his value as a fighting machine.

What has our own Empire done? I quote again from the statement of a minister of the British House of Commons, who, on the 14th January last, gave this statement of the forces that had been sent to the front or raised for service in the United Kingdom and in the various Dominions of the Empire: "The actual strength of the forces "to-day obviously only represents a part "of the call that has been made on our "man power. To it must be added our "losses in killed and wounded, missing and "prisoners, and in maimed and invalided "men who have been discharged. Taking "this into consideration, we may say that "the effort which the British nations have "made in the one item of provision of men "in the armed forces of the Crown totals "6,500,000 men, and of that 4,500,000, or 60·4 "per cent have been contributed by Eng-"land; 620,000, or 8·3 per cent have been "contributed by Scotland; 280,000, or 3·7 "per cent, have been contributed by Wales; "170,000, or 2·3 per cent, have been contri-"buted by Ireland; 900,000, or 12 per cent, "have been contributed by the dominions "and the colonies. The remaining 1,000,-"000 men, composed of native fighting "troops, labour corps, and so on, repre-"sent the splendid contribution made by "India and our various African and "other dependencies." I gather from other information that the computation which Sir Auckland Geddes made in that statement, so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, covers not only the troops who have actually been raised since this war began, but also the forces that comprised the standing army and the naval forces of Great Britain when war broke out. I am not quite sure that his computation of 900,000 men from the dominions and colonies does full justice to the figures that might be established. I am inclined to think it would be at least 1,000,000 men, but, even so, the figures speak for themselves. A certain force must, of course, be retained for the defence of the United Kingdom against that German attack which has been prophesied ever since the war began, and which may yet be attempted as a last desperate resort on the part of Germany, even if she does sacrifice a considerable portion of her fleet in the attempt. But I venture to assure the House, from information in my possession, that the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland has put into the fighting line in France and other theatres of war not less than four million men up to the present. As to the other dominions, I have figures in my possession which I am not permitted to give to the House to-day, as they were imparted to me under the seal of confidence. But it is not too much to say that Australia, in proportion to her population, has put more men into the fighting line than Canada; and that New Zealand, in proportion to her population, has put a far larger number of men in the line than we have done up to the present.

Now, what have we done in this country? It is desirable that I should place upon the pages of Hansard some information which will be available for purpose of reference, and which ought to be communicated to Parliament and to the country. A portion of this information has been given from time to time. It has not been brought up to date, at least; and probably some of it has never yet been placed before Parliament. Up to the 31st March, 1918, we have despatched overseas—and it is the force sent overseas that counts in this war—364,750 men of all ranks, of whom 16,033 were officers and 348,717 were of other ranks. I have the details which are as follows:

Sailings by Arms of Service up to and including March 31st, 1918.

	Officers.	Other Ranks.	Totals.
Infantry	9,282	242,957	252,239
Cavalry	629	13,222	13,851
Artillery	964	31,371	32,335
Engineers	508	10,573	11,081
Pioneers	101	3,015	3,116
A. M. C.	3,179	11,937	15,116
A. S. C.	360	9,128	9,488
Cyclists	55	1,489	1,544
Forestry	400	12,769	13,169
Railway and Construction	408	12,156	12,564
Miscellaneous	147	100	247
Totals	16,033	348,717	364,750

By districts our sailings have been as follows:

Military district No. 1, Headquarters at London	25,533
Military district No. 2, Headquarters at Toronto	76,597
Military district No. 3, Headquarters at Kingston	39,393
Military district No. 4, Headquarters at Montreal	32,463
Military district No. 5, Headquarters at Quebec	8,389
Military districts Nos. 6 and 7, comprising the Maritime Provinces	37,205
Military districts Nos. 10 and 12, comprising the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan	75,503
Military district No. 11, British Columbia	36,475
Military district No. 13, Alberta	33,192
Total	364,750

The following is a classification by occupation of the men who went overseas, up to March 31, 1918:

Professional men	13,676
Employers and merchants	6,529
Clerical workers	52,124
Skilled labourers	160,198
Unskilled labourers	67,078
Farmers	51,284
Ranchers	3,210
Students	10,651
Total	364,750

By clerical workers is, of course, understood those engaged in clerical work of various kinds, in banks, mercantile institutions, companies and various similar activities throughout the country.

As to country of birth, the following statement has been furnished to me by the Department of Militia and Defence:

Canada, of British descent	147,505
Canada, of French descent	16,268
England	121,571
Scotland	37,496
Ireland	12,657
Wales	3,574
Other British possessions	3,648
United States	12,000
Other countries	10,031
Total	364,750

It is desirable that the House and the country should know the sacrifice entailed upon our forces in casualties from the beginning of the war up to the 31st March last:

	Officers.	Other Ranks.	Totals.
Killed in action	1,235	24,677	25,912
Died of wounds	381	8,290	8,671
Died of disease	101	1,855	1,956
Wounded	4,308	101,877	106,185
Prisoners of war	141	2,595	2,736
Presumed dead	117	3,821	3,938
Missing	35	755	790
	6,318	143,870	150,188

The total of those killed in action, of those who have died of wounds or disease and of those presumed dead is 40,477. If we add to that a reasonable proportion of those who are missing, we find that not less than 41,000 Canadian have given their lives for their country in this war up to the 31st March last.

I am not permitted to state the exact number of the Canadian forces in France at present, nor am I permitted to give the House information as to the portion of the line our troops are holding. It is, however, permissible to say that the Canadian forces at the front were never in greater strength or in more confident spirit than they are at this moment. It is permissible also to say that they are holding a portion of the line which has not yet been forced back, and I venture the opinion that so long as their flanks hold good the Canadian line will never be forced back by any numbers that the Germans can send against it.

Our forces have not been attacked up to the present, as other forces of the British line have been attacked, in overwhelming numbers; but it would be too much to hope that the attack will not come, and we must be prepared for it. What it will mean when it does come, none of us would venture to forecast. We may—we must—realize that in all probability it will be attended with great loss, even if the effort of the enemy is unsuccessful. At the second battle of Ypres the first Canadian division lost about 6,000 men, or some 40 per cent of its combatant strength. It is for a fight like that, on the defensive against great odds and against all the terrible methods of warfare which the Germans have been employing during the past three years that we must prepare.

Canadian casualties in 1917 were 84,347. In April, when our troops took Vimy Ridge, we lost 13,461 men in killed, wounded and missing. In May, in the attack upon Lens, the casualties were 10,134. In August, when we took Hill 70, the casualties numbered 10,080. In November, in the attack on Passchendaele—a most difficult and wonderful task, splendidly accomplished—the Canadian Army Corps lost no less than 24,530 men. Thus, in one month of victorious fighting our forces at the front lost nearly 25,000 men. That will give us some realization of the trial which may immediately lie before our men in meeting the German attack.

I now come to the proposed Order in Council which this House and the Senate are asked to sanction. I shall take it up clause by clause and make apparent the reason why those who are invested with the responsibility of administering public affairs have reached the conclusion that in no other way can the need be met. The proposed Order in Council recites:

> Whereas there is an immediate and urgent need of reinforcements for the Canadian Expeditionary Force and the necessity for these reinforcements admits of no delay;
> And whereas it is deemed essential that notwithstanding exemptions heretofore granted a substantial number of men should be withdrawn forthwith from civil life for the purpose of serving in a military capacity;
> And whereas, having regard to the number of men immediately required and to the urgency of the demand, time does not permit of examination by exemption tribunals of the value in civil life, or the position, of the individuals called up for duty.

Then it proceeds to enact certain regulations to which I shall come in a moment. Before speaking of them, however, I admit at once, and all members of this House understand, that the Military Service Act of last year was based upon the principle of exemption by tribunals. We established many thousands of tribunals throughout the length and breadth of this country. I cannot at the moment say how many thousands were established. The duty was undertaken by men having had no previous experience in any such task, and naturally and inevitably the result of the decisions of the various tribunals was attended with great inequality and sometimes with marked injustice.

The purpose of the Act was to correct any such result by creating appellate tribunals and, in the end, a central appeal tribunal. In some parts of the country exemptions were granted in astonishing numbers, and it became the duty of the Government to appeal from those exemptions to the extent of, I believe, 80 or 90 per cent. The result of all that has been great delay, and one must admit at once that in that regard the results which have been obtained by the Military Service Act of last year have not been so satisfactory as was anticipated at the time it was passed.

The Order in Council to which we invite the sanction of the House departs from that principle as a corresponding principle has recently been departed from in Great Britain; but departs from it along a line which is not precisely the same as that pursued in Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen will remember that at present all men between eighteen and fifty years of age in Great Britain are liable to compulsory military service, except in Ireland, to which it is now proposed that compulsory military service shall be applied. More than that, the exemptions in Great Britain have proceeded more along the line of occupational classes than along the line pursued in this country; but Great Britain has recently found it necessary to revise her arrangements, to wipe out some of these occupational exemptions, and to comb the population of that country to the last degree, in order that the British forces at the front may be maintained at full strength.

The proposal embodied in these regulations is somewhat different, because we have never followed the line of occupational classes, which has been pursued in Great Britain, except in so far as in the regulations made under the Military Service Act, direction has been given to pay particular attention to those engaged in the industry of agriculture. The line upon which this Order in Council proceeds is to confer upon the Government power to select men of certain ages and to abolish any exemptions which they have heretofore received or to which they might hereafter be entitled. The Order in Council, therefore, proceeds as follows: The first clause defines the word "minister" and the word "Act." The second clause provides that Class 1 shall include not only unmarried men and widowers without children between the ages of twenty and thirty-four, both inclusive, but all unmarried men and widowers without children who have attained the age of nineteen years and who were born on or since the 13th day of October, 1897. The effect is to bring men of nineteen years of age into Class 1, so that under these regulations, Class 1 will comprise men from 19 to 34 years of age, both inclusive. The third clause of the regulations does the same thing for Class 2. It provides that Class 2 shall include married men and widowers with children who have attained the age of nineteen years and who were born on or since the 13th day of October, 1897.

The fourth clause is designed to bring within the operations of the Military Service Act men who have gone overseas to the United Kingdom, but who have not otherwise entered any theatre of actual war. A number have gone overseas to the United Kingdom and have returned to Canada without entering any war theatre. The purpose of this section is to provide that if those men are within any class that has been called out, and if they are physically fit, they shall be liable to compulsory military service, just as other citizens of this country.

Clause 5 is the most important clause in the regulations and perhaps I should read it. Clause 5 reads:

> The Governor in Council may direct orders to report for duty to issue to men in any class under the Act of any named age or ages or who were born in named years or any named year or part of a year and any exemption theretofore granted to any man of any such named age or year of birth shall cease from and after noon of the day upon which he is ordered so to report and no claim for exemption by or in respect of any man shall be entertained or considered after the issue to him of such order, provided, however, that the minister may grant leave of absence without pay to any man by reason of the death, disablement or service of other members of the same family while on active service in any theatre of actual war.

The power thus conferred upon the Governor in Council is undoubtedly very wide, but it is not, according to our conception, wider than the present need does actually demand. It must, of course, be exercised in a reasonable way. I have discussed with the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn), and we have both discussed with our colleagues, the proposal which will probably be carried out under this Order in Council if it should receive the sanction of the House. The Minister of Militia and Defence proposes, in the first instance, to call out those from twenty to twenty-two years of age, both inclusive, and later he may be obliged, if the need should demand it, to call out men of nineteen and of twenty-three years of age. It is estimated that from the men available in each year called out, at least 10,000 men physically fit for service for the front might be obtained.

The sixth clause of the regulations provides that the age stated in any claim for exemption shall be conclusive evidence against the man making the claim.

The seventh clause directs that:

> The minister may, from time to time, direct that no orders to report for duty be issued to men who have been examined by military medical boards and placed in such medical categories as are specified in such direction.

Clause 8 provides that all men included in Class 1 shall be subject to military law and must report as in proclamation directed. That is to say, Class 1 has been called out; men have been added to that class, and a proclamation may issue directing that men so added shall report for duty. It will be incumbent on them when that proclamation has been issued and when they have been so ordered to report for duty, to report as if they had been included in that class in the first instance.

Clause 9 provides, in a few words, just this: that men attaining the age of 19 years in the future shall thereupon be included in Class 1 or in Class 2, as they may belong to the one or the other, and they must report if they are included in any such class called out.

Clause 10 provides that when a treaty or convention is arranged with any foreign government under which the subjects of that government resident in Canada may be made liable to compulsory service in this country, then the Military Service Act shall apply to them and they may be called out by proclamation and ordered to report for duty as if they were British subjects. Such a convention was made some weeks ago, and is now receiving consideration in the Senate of the United States, but it cannot come into operation until it receives the approval of the United States Senate. Great Britain has, I believe, such conventions with other nations, France, Italy and Russia, for example, and the Government of this country has asked the Government of the United Kingdom, to have such conventions, if they are in force or now under negotiations, made applicable to the citizens of those countries resident in Canada.

I realize that the proposals which we are placing before Parliament for its approval invite discussion and we shall welcome that discussion. It may be urged that we are abolishing exemptions which were provided for in the Military Service Act, 1917. That is perfectly true, but I do not know of any other means by which the need can be met, and I can assure the members of this House that the need is most urgent and most imperative. It may be said that these regulations will interfere with production. I hope they will not seriously interfere with production, for I realize that production is necessary in order that our troops may be supplied and the civil population fed. But production alone will not suffice. The stern task remains to the allied nations of overcoming the enemy on the field of battle, and what are we to say to our men at the front? They have gone out to fight for their country; they are there overseas; the need is urgent, so urgent that without this Order in Council I do not believe we could provide them with reinforcements after the first day of July next, and if the attack comes, as it may come, within the next two weeks they might be left without any reinforcements after the first of June. I have heard the statement that we should rely on other countries to provide fighting men and further reinforcements. I have seen our soldiers at the front, and I can realize the impression that would be made upon them if the people of Canada should declare: "We will devote all our "future energies to production, and leave "you to shift for yourselves with such rein-"forcements as you may procure from the "British Islands or from United States of "America." For not one moment would the people of this country from Atlantic to Pacific stand for any such policy.

It may be said that the proposed Order in Council will create hardship and inequality. Humanly speaking, it is impossible to avoid these in war. Did these men —three hundred and sixty-four thousand of them—think about inequality and hardship when they went to fight our battles for us? The Government of this country is bound to do everything in its power to prevent inequality and hardship as far as that is possible, and I shall welcome any suggestion from any hon. gentleman to that end, and so will every one of my colleagues and so will every member of this House. But it is not humanly possible to avoid it. The proposals of the Government will provide in the immediate future adequate fighting forces for the support of our forces, and it is the duty of this Parliament upon its responsibility to the people of this country by whom it was elected, to see that these reinforcements are provided.

Then it is said that it is useless for us to raise more men because the United States of America have more men than can be transported. I may tell hon. members that we have the assurance that all the men that can be raised under these regulations can and will be transported. More than that, if they cannot be transported in the immediate future, they can be trained here in Canada and sent forward when ships can be provided. No one who has not been at the front can realize how our men in the battle line are sustained and supported and nerved for the fight that is before them by the very thought that their countrymen at home are behind them. The present battle, as I have said, will continue for months, and the final issue may depend upon what Canada does now.

I have not endeavoured to elaborate these considerations. I have stated them to the House in the simplest and most direct language at my command, but I hope hon. gentlemen will realize that I am speaking from the most profound conviction and with all the earnestness of which I am capable.

In conclusion, may I point out that, on the one hand, the Government has been subjected to strong reproach upon the allegation that its administration of the Military Service Act in the province of Quebec has been too lax. On the other hand, it has been subjected to equally violent reproach that its administration of that Act in Quebec has been too stern and severe. It is our belief that each of these reproaches is equally undeserved. The purpose of the Government has been in Quebec, as well as in each of the other provinces, to administer the Act impartially, considerately and firmly. In that purpose we shall persevere to the end. The law has been enacted according to the will of the people, and the law must be obeyed.

As to our duty, the first line of defence is held in France and Flanders; the second line of defence is here. Will those in the second line desert and betray the first? If such an outcome were possible, it would be to the everlasting disgrace of the Canadian people. Only those who have been among the men in the fighting line can realize with what faith and confidence the Canadian soldiers rely upon us for that aid and support which are their due; only those who have been among them can realize how intense a bitterness and disappointment would possess their souls if that aid should fail them. I beg you to remember that in this country we are all in one sense in the battle-line; that we must all discharge our duty with the same indomitable spirit as those who are holding back the German onset. May we not estimate that duty in the words of a great Frenchman: "La vie n'est ni un plaisir ni une douleur mais une affaire grave dont nous sommes chargés et qu'il faut conduire et terminer à notre honneur"—"Life was not intended as either a pleasure or a sorrow, but as a great duty committed to our charge and which we are bound to carry on and fulfil by the standards of honour." If that is true of the individual life, is it not equally true of the national life? What we inherit from the past we hold in trust for the future; let us see to it then that Canada's honour is maintained and her escutcheon kept untarnished to the end.

Germany has practically reverted to paganism in this war. The ideals of the old faith of Thor and Odin dominate her people to-day more really than the dictates of Christianity. Otherwise no such reversion to barbarism could have been witnessed as that with which she shocked the world's conscience and brought so many of its nations in arms against her. Confronted with such a menace, we dare not stay our hand. The descendants of our pioneer forefathers have good cause to be proud of their ancestry. They never had greater reason for just pride than to-day, when men of the races from whose loins they sprang are fighting side by side in defence of the freedom of both. Is the cause worth fighting for? Can you not see what rests on the issue? Are your institutions, your ideals and liberties, the honour of your women and the sancity of your fathers' graves worth fighting for? Women of one of those races have been systematically,—not in isolated cases, but systematically,—subjected to nameless outrage and sent in thousands behind the German lines for that purpose. If this cannot, I know not what can, arouse the fighting spirit in the hearts of all men in whose veins the blood runs red.

We have in this country a population separated by differences of race, or language, of religion. Unfortunately these differences run very largely along the same lines. I for one should resist as strongly as any man a proposal to deny to any portion of our people their constitutional rights in respect of language or otherwise. But we must realize that difference of language does create a profound division, especially when it is accentuated by grouping on the line of race and creed. Lack of understanding through difference of language is not easy to overcome, and it is in lack of understanding that the difficulty chiefly arises. For this very reason an imperative duty rests upon all of us to aid as best we may in removing unfortunate misunderstanding and quieting dangerous controversy. The world has been striving for hundreds of years to learn the lesson of tolerance in matters of religious opinion. The task has been a slow and painful one and the lesson has not yet been fully learned. Let us do the best that is in us to help our people learn that great lesson. No good ever came to mankind out of the bitterness of religious controversy. I especially beg of the press, both English and French, not to indulge in utterances that are calculated to provoke and perpetuate bitterness and discord. If we do not all worship God at the same altar, let us be tolerant and charitable; above all let us respect the sincere convictions and ideals of others. If the press fulfils its full duty, it will not be slow to learn this lesson which might with advantage be studied by members of this House on both sides. Thus and thus only can we create in this country a true national spirit; thus only can our united efforts avail in building up a great nation securely founded upon the heritage which God has given us.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in his concluding remarks observed that it was with a great sense of earnestness and profound conviction that he proposed the resolution which he has laid before the House. Sir, it is with a sense of duty no less profound, and a conviction and earnestness no less sincere that I rise to oppose this motion. My hon. friend will perhaps understand that I, myself, realize even more than he does the truth of the observation of the great Frenchman which he quoted, that life was not intended as either a pleasure or a sorrow. I know the views of those who support the Government; I know they are behind the resolution proposed by the Prime Minister, and it would be more of a pleasure to me were I able to agree with them in the resolution which has been proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister in the performance of what he believes to be a great national duty. I shall endeavour, in what I have to say, to be moderate in the expression of my views, if sometimes I find it impossible not to be severe.

4 p.m.

The resolution which we are called upon to sanction involves a wide departure from the enactment of the Military Service Act. It involves, I am sorry to say, a still wider departure from the principle of constitutional government, of which at one time we were proud, and which we have always considered a safeguard of the people against the encroachment of the Executive power. We pretend that we are fighting, and indeed we are fighting, for the freedom of the world. As to this there is no difference of opinion on either side of the House. We are fighting for the freedom of the world. It is our aim and our hope that we may crush out Prussianism from Europe and from the world. But, Sir, I will ask the House to consider this: Are we not, while we contend that we are fighting for the freedom of the world, introducing more and more into our system of government a wedge which will admit the entrance of the system of Prussian autocracy? Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that last year we passed the Military Service Act. This year, while Parliament has been in session, during the last three weeks or so, the Government undertook to alter the disposition of that Act by Order in Council. Sir, in my humble judgment, and I submit it to those of my hon. friends who differ from me on this question and who still entertain Liberal principles, in that change of the disposition of the Military Service Act, so made, there is certainly a wide and absolute departure from the system of British Government. What authority has the Governor in Council to alter an Act of Parliament? What excuse was there for the Governor in Council to pass such an order when Parliament was in session? If the Parliament had not been in session there might, perhaps, have been some excuse, though they would have no constitutional right to do what they did. But this is what they did: Consequent upon the riots which took place recently at Quebec, they passed an Order in Council in which this declaration is made:

> Any male person who takes part in any riot, insurrection or civil disturbance, incited, instigated or caused by way of opposition to the enforcement of the Military Service Act, 1917, or the regulations thereunder, shall if declared or found guilty of so doing by sentence of a court-martial or of a competent civil court, be deemed to have been called out for military service under the said Act, whether or not he be within any class of persons which has been called out for military service by proclamation, or within any class of persons to which the said Act or regulations apply, or within any of the exceptions of the schedule to the said Act.

What right, I ask again, had the Government to make such an alteration in the Military Service Act—because this provision orders nothing less than that a new class of conscript shall be formed in the community? I repeat that if Parliament had not been sitting there might have been some excuse for passing such an Order in Council, though there would be no right. But Parliament was in session. Parliament might have been consulted, and should have been consulted, and, I ask, is there any possible excuse for not consulting Parliament? Is there any possible excuse why a measure was not brought before the House? What can be the reason? Did the Government fear that the majority behind them would not agree to such a drastic measure, or was it done simply in sheer wantonness of autocratic authority?

To-day we have another Order in Council —or, rather, not an Order in Council, but an embryonic Order in Council, because, as I understand, the Governor General has not appended his signature to the document as yet. At all events, in this matter Parliament has to be consulted, and the Government will have to go one step further than their own executive action if they want to give to the proposals the force and effect of law. Again I repeat: An Act of Parliament cannot be amended, or altered, except by Parliament. If an Act of Parliament has to be amended a Bill has to be introduced, and the procedure with respect to this Bill follows many rigid forms. The Bill, first of all, must be introduced and leave for that must be obtained from the House. Then the Bill has to be read a first time, it has to be read a second time, it has to be examined closely and scanned in Committee of the Whole House, and it has to be read a third time, and even yet its passage is not complete. A final motion has to be made that the Bill pass. Are these vain forms? Are these idle rules? And does it suffice simply to have a resolution of the House to give us a law of such far-reaching importance? These forms are not idle, they all have a profound meaning, and the meaning which they have is that they afford ample opportunity for discussion, for revision of opinion and for improvement in the legislation submitted for enactment. Well, Sir, if it be thought advisable to-day, as proposed by the Government, and just explained by the Prime Minister, that the Act which was passed last session should be amended, and improved or otherwise, why are not the forms prescribed by Parliament observed by the Government, and why is not Parliament consulted?

What reason can be given by the Government that we should dispense with these formalities and these rules, which are the rules observed by the British Parliament, and would not be lightly departed from in that centre of constitutional authority? If the British Parliament would not depart from these rules, why should they not be observed in the Canadian Parliament as well? If the Act is to be changed, notwithstanding all the reasons which have been given by the Prime Minister why the Act should be altered, I submit to the sense of this House that there should be an adherence to the prescribed rules. Otherwise what becomes of constitutional principles? Sir, I submit that this resolution should not be passed as proposed, but that if it is to go into effect that it should be dealt with in the usual way, and the House called upon to dispose of it by a Bill, to become when authorized an Act of this Parliament. What is the reason for this proceeding on the part of the Government? I have heard no reason given. Some time ago I had occasion to challenge the Government for having passed the Order in Council consequent upon the riots in Quebec, but no information and no answer was vouchsafed by them. To-day, Sir, I rise to ask that if we are to fight Prussianism in Europe, it shall not be introduced into this Parliament. This matter is important indeed and I express my sorrow that the customary procedure has not been followed. Having said that, let me proceed at once to the main subject that we have now to discuss.

The Prime Minister states that we must have more soldiers at the front. He proposes, as he has told us, to extend the Act to some classes which were not included last year. He proposes that these new classes should be deprived of all the clauses which they were empowered to advance when they thought they should be exempted from the Military Service Act. Under the resolution which we have now before us, every young man from the age of nineteen to thirty-four years will be included in the service, but he will not be able to urge any reason why he should not be taken for service, even though he enjoys that privilege under the law as it exists to-day.

Well, Sir, this is only an aggravation of the Act which was introduced last year. When the measure was submitted at that time I thought it was a mistake, but, unfortunately on that question some of my friends, some of my best and dearest friends and myself could not see eye to eye. Either they were in the right or I was in the right. At that time the success of the proposed measure was purely conjectural. Only after a trial of the Act could it be determined whether my friends were in the right or whether I was in the right.

The Act has been in force for some time and we have to-day the admission from the Prime Minister that it has not realized all its expectations. That is exactly what I was afraid of, and I told my right hon. friend and the House at the time, on my responsibility as a Canadian citizen, just as much in earnest as any man could be to win the war and to destroy the infernal power of Germany, that the Act was not calculated to accomplish the end it had in view. And, Sir, the resolution which is introduced to-day is certainly a strong argument for the view which I stated at that time.

We have been asked: what have you to substitute for it? I believed then, and to-day I believe it more than ever, that if we had kept on with the voluntary system we would have had more soldiers to-day at our disposal than we actually have. What are my reasons for speaking as I do? What reasons can I give the House to induce it to believe that, after all, it would have been better, if we wanted to win the war, to continue with the voluntary system? I made certain allusions some time ago upon the floor of the House, and the Prime Minister challenged my evidence upon this point. My evidence for the belief which I entertained is contained in an answer which was given last June by the Minister of Militia of that day. On the 11th June, Sir Edward Kemp, in answer to a question put by this side of the House, gave us the exact figures of enlistments from the month of January, 1916, to the month of May, 1917, as follows:

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

1916.

January	29,212
February	26,658
March	32,819
April	23,289
May	15,090
June	10,796
July	8,675
August	7,267
September	6,357
October	6,035
November	6,548
December	5,803

1917.

January	7,721
February	7,644
March	6,670
April	5,270
May	6,520

It will be observed that commencing in May, June, and July, there was quite a falling off. Up to that time the recruiting each month had run about 23,000 to 29,000. It fell off in May, June, and July from 15,000 to 10,000 and below. What was the cause of this falling off? There must be some cause for such a falling off as that. The question was debated last year, and we heard the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), who had been Minister of Militia in the first months for which I have quoted the record, say in the presence of this House, openly and squarely, that he had been ordered by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance to ease up on recruiting. That statement was made by my hon. friend from Victoria once or twice, certainly once in my hearing, and I have yet to know that the statement was ever denied. So that—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The right hon. gentleman's memory is not very good. I said what I had to say about it at the time. I did deny it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In a qualified way, I admit.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In no qualified way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very well then, let it be so. I leave it between my right hon. friend and the member for Victoria.

But, Sir, take the twelve months which follow the month of May, 1916, and I will again repeat the figures:

1916.

June	10,796
July	8,675
August	7,267
September	6,357
October	6,025
November	6,548
December	5,803

1917.
January	7,721
February	7,644
March	6,670
April	5,270
May	6,520

After the pronouncement which had been made by the Prime Minister that recruiting had come to a standstill yet in these twelve months more than 85,000 men were recruited voluntarily. Therefore, in the face of those figures I am justified in my opinion that if we had followed along the line I have just indicated we would have had more men at our disposal than we have secured by the enactment of the Military Service law. But we proceeded differently. The Act was passed and was put in force. And then, Sir, what took place? I call attention to this: my right hon. friend has waxed eloquent upon the necessity of enforcing the conscription of every man in the land. He gave us the examples of the United Kingdom and of France, and the example of Germany herself. Well, the hon. gentleman passed an Act that every man should be conscripted, but sometime in the month of December last the Government passed an Order in Council, which I quoted on a former occasion and which will bear quoting again, in which a large class of the community was practically told that they should not be conscripted at all.

On December 3 last the Government passed an Order in Council giving power to the Minister of Militia to exempt farmers. Let me call attention to this Order in Council:

> His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, the Prime Minister and under and in virtue of the provisions of The Military Service Act, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that in any case where a person engaged in agriculture has applied for exemption and such exemption has been refused, the Minister of Militia and Defence, if he is of the opinion that the services of such person are essential for promoting agricultural production may, by order under his hand, discharge such person from military service.

The Prime Minister has emphasized today that the contest which we have on our hands is such that there should be no departure from universal military service, and that every man should be called to the colours; yet on December 3, one whole class of the community was told that they might claim their exemption.

An hon. MEMBER: That was before the election.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That was during the election, not before. Shortly after the election, the Minister of Militia gave to the press a most significant interview. On January 4 last, the press of Ottawa contained this interview, which had been given to the whole miiisterial press, by the Minister of Militia:

> "The Minister stated during the election campaign that, notwithstanding the machinery of the Military Service Act, if bona fide farmers effectively engaged in the production of foodstuffs, failed to secure exemption and were called up for military service, he would consider it his duty to relieve such men from military service, in order that they might return to their work on the farms and increase the production of foodstuffs.
> "It is pointed out that it was not intended, nor was it within the power of the Minister of Militia, to abrogate the provisions of the Military Service Act, and the executive action above referred to could not in any case be taken except when men were actually called up under the Act.
> "It follows, therefore, that farmers who failed to secure exemption at the hands of the local tribunals should prosecute their appeals in the usual manner, as provided in the Military Service Act. Applications for leave to appeal should be addressed in all cases to the Registrar of the district concerned.
> "If a farmer who has actually joined up still considers that he has grounds for exemption he should state his case to his commanding officer, who will take necessary action on his behalf.
> "Farmers claiming exemption should take advantage of the advice and assistance of the representatives of the Department of Agriculture, who were appointed under Order-in-Council in each county. These representatives will take cases up with the district military representative, and will prosecute appeals on behalf of farmers wherever they think it necessary to do so.

Let me call the attention of the House again to these words:

> Farmers claiming exemption should take advantage of the advice and assistance of the representatives of the Department of Agriculture, who were appointed under Order in Council in each county. These representatives will take cases up with the military representative and will prosecute appeals on behalf of farmers wherever they think it necessary to do so.

So we have the spectacle of the Minister of Militia trying to obtain recruits and the Minister of Agriculture trying to obtain exemptions for them. The Government is a House divided against itself; the Minister of Militia, on the one hand, wanting to get soldiers, and the Minister of Agriculture, on the other hand, wanting to get farmers. There is not a man in this House who does not know that the last election was carried on the implied, if not the distinct, pledge that farmers would not be amenable to the Military Service Act. I could point to more than one-half—three-quarters—of the gentlemen sitting before me who were elected upon the direct or the indirect pledge that the farmers in their constituencies would not be amenable to military service. What are we to conclude from that? We are to conclude that it was the intention of the Government at the time of the election—I do not want to make any captious objection; I will go further and say that they were sincere—that farmers should be exempted. They did not proclaim it as publicly as I should have liked, but still they did it. What is the position to-day? Conditions have changed, and the Prime Minister says that the circumstances in which our army finds itself are such that no exemptions should be allowed and that all classes, farmers and everybody else, should be made amenable to the Military Service Act. Well, we are in this position. Last week we had an appeal from the Prime Minister of England to send all the men we could, and also an appeal from Lord Rhondda, the Food Controller in England, to send all the food that we could. What are we to do, Sir? What counsel should we follow; what advice shall we accept? Let us examine the situation as it is. England requires more men; England requires more food. How can we best help England in this matter? This is the 19th day of April; we are at the beginning of the seeding season. If we pass this resolution to-morrow, all men between the ages of 19 and 34 will be liable to conscription. You may derive from this class 30,000, 40,000 or 50,000 men; when will they be able to give assistance to the British Army? Will they be of any assistance in the battle that is now going on? Will they be of assistance within the next week, or the week after, the next month or the month after? I appeal to every man's sense of honesty and fair play when I submit that, do what you may, these men cannot be in England and in a position to fight within four months from to-day. Moreover, if you take these men from activities connected with food production, what is the result? You take from the active work of food production 30,00, 40,000 or 50,000 men. What is it best to do? Shall we take these men from civil life and make them soldiers, although they cannot do any fighting for at least four or five months; or shall we leave them in civil life, where they can at once engage in the production of food for the Allies? Under the circumstances there are no two ways of looking at the question. If you want to help England in the present emergency, leave these men to produce the food of which she stands so greatly in need. That is the way I approach this question, and that is the way I think we should approach it.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Last year the Prime Minister appointed a National Service Board, the object of which was to prevent men who would be of service in the production of food from going to the front, even if they were desirous of enlisting. Well, the position has not changed. I repeat that I am as anxious as any man in this House to help in the great fight in which we are engaged. But exercising my judgment, and appealing without prejudice to gentlemen in office and those behind them, I submit that we can best discharge the duty we owe to our own selves, to the Mother Country and to the cause of civilization, if we approach this question not under the influence of emotion, but simply in the face of the facts as they are and do our best according to the conditions that prevail.

The last words of the Prime Minister brought the real kernel of this question to the attention of the House. He paid a great deal of attention to the province of Quebec. Well, Sir, I have no objection to that; I rather welcome a discussion of the position of Quebec in this war. It has never been my habit to run away from a difficulty; I rather court a difficulty. I know in what manner the election was fought last autumn. It is within the record of history that the election was carried on chiefly by the successful party on this ground: "You must not allow Quebec to rule Canada." Sir, Quebec does not want to rule Canada; Quebec does not want to rule anybody, or to be ruled by anybody. Quebec wants to take its place in this fight as a member of the Canadian Confederation. We have been in the Confederation for fifty years, and we shall remain in it. There is nothing to separate us from the other members of the Confederation. The great point of difference to-day is that which exists between Quebec and Ontario, but Quebec and Ontario, though racially separated, are geographically united. We cannot be severed; we must go on in the Confederation as we are, and as God has made this land.

I know that there is a great deal of prejudice in Ontario against Quebec, and a great deal of prejudice in Quebec against Ontario, but I am impressed by the conviction that the time will come when Ontario will do justice to Quebec and when Quebec will do justice to Ontario.

It is along national lines that we must approach this question. Let me go one step further. I have not seen this so much in the press, but it has been whispered from ear to ear: We must make Quebec fight. That has been going around in all parts of Canada. We must make Quebec fight! Sir, the men of Quebec who are to-day at the front, who have enlisted and who have been called upon to do their share of the duty which they owe to their country, have shown that they can fight. They can fight and they will fight when they are appealed to in the proper manner. If a different method of approaching them had been employed, better results would have been obtained. But many will ask: How is it that men who pride themselves on belonging to such a brave race have not done more for the cause than they have done? I have myself, and many before me and many after me, have represented the peculiar conditions of the French Canadian. The French Canadians have no relation at all with France. Of the English-speaking members of this House, I presume three-fourths can count near relatives in England, but there is scarcely a man here from Quebec who has any relatives in France to-day. That has created a condition of things which—I am sorry to say it, but so it is—makes the people of Quebec not appreciate the reality of this war as our friends of British origin do.

Further than that, the men who are to-day on the Treasury benches cannot forget that they have a load of responsibility for the attitude of Quebec. They cannot get away from the elections of 1911, when they made an alliance with the Nationalists who taught and preached that, under no circumstances, should Canada ever participate in a war of Great Britain. The election was fought upon the Naval Bill of that day, and, as a consequence of the attitude they took, that under no circumstances should Canada take any share in any war of Great Britain, they also used the Naval Bill to preach the doctrine that there should be no conscription. They stated that the naval policy of the Laurier Government led to conscription. We, of the Liberal party, then in office, said that we did not want conscription, and were not in favour of it. Therefore, the two parties in Quebec preached the same doctrine that there should be no conscription in Canada. You cannot undo, in a single hour or a single day, or even in many hours and many days and many months and, perhaps, many years, the mentality which has been formed under such circumstances.

There is, however, another way of approaching Quebec, and that is to appeal to our sense of right, to our imagination, to our hearts, and to our reason as well, because there is no saner people than the French Canadians. May I, Sir, give you an example which has just come before my notice? It is upon the question of prohibiting the traffic in liquor. Quebec and Ontario and other English-speaking provinces have been at variance on the question of prohibtion, but the question was approached by way of education, by way of enlightenment, and what is the consequence to-day? The cause of prohibition has made such progress that, whilst upon many occasions the people of Quebec refused to listen to the cause of prohibition, still to-day Quebec is in line with the rest of the provinces and has a law of her own to enforce prohibition. The French Canadian people upon that question have given evidence that they are always amenable to reason, and it is in that way that I, for my part, want this other question settled. Let me say to my right hon. friend; let me say to those new members who sit in this House of Commons: We cannot be separated; we must be united; and let me ask: how shall we bring unity about? Shall we do it by compulsion, or shall we not rather do it my the method of conciliation, and of appeal from man to man? If you want to have soldiers from Quebec, the thing is easy enough. Appeal to them; appeal to their imagination; appeal to their racial feeling; give them good officers and they will follow those officers into the very jaws of the German hell. They will not hesitate to do their share. This, Sir, is the method in which I approach this question. I am sorry to say that upon this matter, which is of such importance, I have to take the position which I do; but if I do so, it is from the same profound sense and earnest conviction, as that in which the Prime Minister spoke in his concluding remarks, the conviction that we can conserve the country better; that we can help to win the war better by methods of conciliation and by appealing to the best sentiments of all the citizens of this country than by doing what we are doing now.

There is in this resolution something which does not appeal to me at all. Apart from the ground which I have taken, I do not understand what is meant by this power which, under the resolution, is given to the Minister of Militia. If the principle that judges are to be the arbitrators is to be departed from, by all means let us have no power at all; let everybody be treated alike; but do not put it in the power of any man to give exemption to this one and to refuse it to the other one.

If you do that, you cannot avoid having difficulties and bickerings, and all the evil results that follow bickerings.

In regard to this matter, I have said all that I have to say, but I shall add one word more. In this matter, as in all matters, I have always, since I have had a seat in this House, even before I occupied the official position which I now occupy, approached every question which has come under discussion, never from the point of view of my native province, but always in the broad view which could appeal to all Canadians whatever their race or their origin. Upon this occasion I shall speak for the province of Quebec since it has been brought into the discussion, more than I have ever done before. I shall say this to the Government and to the country. The people of Quebec, while they are opposed to this law, will make their objections and their protests as behooves the free men that they are. But when the verdict has been pronounced, they will, as behooves the free men that they are, loyally accept it and carry it out, because if it is the right of every citizen worthy of British freedom, to combat any measure which he believes ill-advised and ill-timed as this measure is, it is his duty, loyally to respect and to abide by the law, and to take to himself the consequences whatever they may be, however much he may disapprove of the law. It is with that feeling that I appeal to the House on the present occasion, if it is not yet too late, not to go further with this measure, but to consider it carefully, and weigh it by all the methods provided by the British system of Government which we enjoy. Then let Parliament make its decision.

Hon. NEWTON WESLEY ROWELL (President of the Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution moved by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. In answer to the request of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that a further reason should be given for the presentation of this resolution to the House at the present time, I say that the answer is contained in a much better form than I could give it in the order of the day issued in the midst of the present great conflict by Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Currie to the Canadian forces at the front, and bearing date the 27th day of March, 1918. I shall read that order:

> In an endeavour to reach an immediate decision the enemy has gathered all his forces and struck a mighty blow at the British Army. Overwhelmed by sheer weight of numbers the British divisions in the line between the Scarpe and the Oise have fallen back fighting hard, steady and undismayed. Measures have been taken successfully to meet the German onslaught. The French have gathered a powerful army commanded by a most able and trusted leader and this army is now moving swiftly to our help. Fresh British divisions are being thrown in. The Canadians are soon to be engaged. Our Motor-Machine-Gun brigade has already played a most gallant part and once again covered itself with glory.
> Looking back with pride on the unbroken record of your glorious achievements, asking you to realize that to-day the fate of the British Empire hangs in the balance, I place my trust in the Canadian Corps, knowing that where Canadians are engaged, there can be no giving way. Under the orders of your devoted officers in the coming battle, you will advance or fall where you stand facing the enemy.
> To those who fall I say: "You will not die but step into immortality. Your mothers will not lament your fate but will be proud to have borne such sons. Your names will be revered forever by your grateful country and God will take you unto Himself."
> Canadians, in this fateful hour, I command you and I trust you to fight as you have ever fought, with all your strength, with all your determination, with all your tranquil courage. On many a hard-fought field of battle you have overcome this enemy and with God's help you shall achieve victory once more.

When our Canadian troops under the inspiration of that noble appeal of their commander are on the battle line holding back the Prussian invaders, the responsibility rests upon the Government of Canada to ensure that our brave soldiers are adequately reinforced and supported. If the leader of the Opposition wishes to know the reasons for the introduction of this resolution to the House, the answer is: This Government is pledged to the House and to the country to maintain our divisions at the front with adequate reinforcements to repel the onslaughts of the Teuton hordes.

We cannot consider the issue before the House and the country to-day in the light of the situation that existed a year ago. We cannot consider it in the light of the conditions that existed even when this Parliament opened one month ago. The whole world situation has changed within the last thirty days. We must be alive to the present conditions and face the situation as it exists, and, as honest men, meet the situation by measures adequate to the need. This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason, and I submit, the all-sufficient reason, for the resolution now before the House. We must consider it, as I have said, in the light of the present war situation. The Prime Minister has pointed out the effect of Russia's withdrawal from the war; that it has resulted in an addition to the Germanic forces on the western front of possibly not less than 1,600,000 men. But that is not all. When the attack of the Teutonic forces upon the Italian army in the latter part of last year broke the Italian line, and the heel of the conqueror stood upon the soil of northern Italy, Britain and France, with their reserves already not too adequate to meet the situation on the western front, had to send forces to Italy to help strengthen the Italian resistance, and to break the attack of the Austrian and German armies. Every one who has followed the course of events knows that the expeditionary forces sent by France and Britain to Italy greatly stiffened the Italian resistance, and enabled our valiant Allies to regain some of the ground that had been lost. But the effect of sending those forces to Italy was to weaken the reserves of the Allies on the western front at the very moment when Germany was strengthening her forces there by hundreds of thousands of men. We must recognize in the success which has so far attended the German arms the real effect of that great augmentation of German forces on the one hand, and of the diminution to some extent of the forces of the Allies on the other. The war can only be won and the cause of civilization saved if the forces of the Allies on the western front are sufficiently strengthened to enable them to stem the German tide until our troops can be augmented sufficiently to achieve final victory. It is in the light of these events that we must view the present situation.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has spoken of the constitutional aspect of the resolution. He has said that the passing of the earlier Order in Council bearing on the Military Service Act, and now the submission of this Order in Council to the House, is a wide departure from constitutional government. Just one word as to that. Under the War Measures Act, passed to give the Government power to deal with an emergency, the Government exercised the power given it to pass the first Order in Council to which my right hon. friend has referred. All will concede that if time was not of the very essence of the emergency the ordinary parliamentary procedure would be to introduce an amending Act in the ordinary way. But under the conditions that existed when that Order in Council was passed; in view of the critical situation which had developed owing to the Quebec riots, time was of the essence of the situation, and to prevent further bloodshed and to deter further outbreaks the Government exercised its power under the War Measures Act to pass that Order in Council, and so far as we can see the result has been beneficial.

Coming to the present Order in Council my right hon. friend says that the proper course is to introduce a Bill. Again I say, that under ordinary conditions that would undoubtedly be the procedure but here again time is all important. My right hon. friend says you cannot get the men before a certain date. The very fact that it will take possibly three or four months to give these men the necessary training, and to get them organized, transported and trained to go into the battle line, makes it of the utmost urgent importance that there should not be a single day's delay. That, I say to my right hon. friend, is the reason for presenting a resolution to the House, which can be disposed of in a day, rather than to consume possibly weeks of time by the ordinary parliamentary procedure of putting a Bill through both Houses of Parliament. In this case Parliament has all the liberty of action it would have in the consideration of a Bill. Parliament has the proposal submitted to it, and if it sees fit, it can amend that proposal. The resolution is before the House and the country, and the House is called on to pass judgment upon it.

The power which the passage of this resolution will give to the Governor in Council is no larger than the power which the Governor in Council now enjoys under the Militia Act of Canada. Under that Act the Governor in Council is empowered to call out compulsorily all the men in Canada between the ages of 18 and 60, put them on military service, and send them out of the country for the defence of Canada. Under the Militia Act it is not necessary to submit even a resolution to this House, or ask for the approval of Parliament. The only condition is that if Parliament is not in session it must be called within fifteen days. And, Sir, the Militia Act has been on the statute book for years.

Mr. MORPHY: When was it placed on the statute book?

Mr. ROWELL: I am coming to that. I desire to point out—and this is one of the reasons why I have never been able to understand why in some quarters there should be such strong objection to compulsory military service,—that we have had under the Militia Act, ever since its enactment, compulsory military service in Canada with respect to men between 18 and 60 years, whenever the Government of the day saw fit to call them out for service for the defence of Canada. That Act was introduced in the House by a distinguished French-Canadian, Sir George E. Cartier. It was enacted by the Canadian Parliament in 1868, just fifty years ago. In the year 1904 it was revised and amended under the administration of another great French Canadian leader, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), himself. The fundamental principle of that Act is the obligation on every male citizen between the ages of 18 and 60 years to serve his country in a military capacity when the Government of the day calls upon him. This resolution embodies no new principle. It is simply calling upon the young men of Canada to perform the duty which they owe their country. There is not a young man, of military age, in any province of Canada, who was not born under a law which requires him to give his life, if need be, in the defence of his country.

We must consider these resolutions, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the law of our country, and of the serious situation which we are facing to-day in the life of the nation. My right hon. friend may say that the Militia Act only authorizes calling men out for the defence of Canada. To prevent any misunderstanding, let me quote from the remarks of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, then Minister of Justice, in the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. In 1904, speaking on the Militia Act and the power of the Governor in Council under it, at column 8083 of Hansard, he said:

> The hon. member for Kings did not want the Governor in Council to have the power to send troops beyond Canada even for the defence of Canada. That was his position. What is ours? It is that we are prepared to give the Governor in Council a blank power of attorney extending over fifteen days. The Governor in Council may send the militia of Canada out of Canada at any time, when deemed necessary for the defence of Canada. If in the opinion of the Governor in Council, it should be necessary, because of a war going on in India to send our militia out there for the defence of Canada, they may, in the exercise of their discretion, do it, because they are the sole judges of what is necessary to be done in defence of Canada.

That, Sir, is the power of the Governor in Council under the Militia Act, as defined by the then Minister of Justice. He proceeds:

> But we do not think it advisable that that power should be absolutely and unrestrictedly in the hands of the Governor in Council. We think it advisable that the period during which they may exercise that power should be restricted, and that Parliament should be called together and be consulted at the earliest opportunity. Parliament must be summoned in fifteen days, and then the whole matter will be in the hands of the people's representatives.

The Government, had it been deemed expedient, need not have come to Parliament at all with this resolution. It could have exercised its power under the Militia Act and called out Class 1, trained them and sent them for service across the sea. By the Bill put through the House in 1904 by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with the full consent of Parliament, representing all the provinces of Canada, that power was placed in the hands of the executive in Canada. Under that Act provision is made for calling the men out in classes and it might be argued that if we called them out we would have to call all of Class 1—that is those between the ages of 18 and 30—and then ballot for the number we require of the class. The Government deems it wiser in the public interest, rather than attempt to do that, to operate, as far as possible, under the Military Service Act, and call out only the men of certain ages, those whom they believe can be best spared, with the least inconvenience to the necessary industries of the country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while one would ordinarily agree with the view presented by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that the constitutional procedure would be to introduce a Bill and put it through the House, I submit that in the present emergency, in order to get men as speedily as possible, the Government is adopting not only a wise, but a thoroughly sound and constitutional course, and that the proposal of my right hon. friend does not aid or help in any way to meet the situation.

After listening to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, for whose character and ability I have the greatest admiration and respect, the difficulty I see is that he proposes no solution of the present situation. Suppose that all my right hon. friend said about the past were true, how would that help our gallant men at the front, and how would it help to stop the advancing German forces? How would his suggestion help to protect the homes of Canada and the people of Canada, if the German forces broke through, compelled Britain to conclude a peace, destroyed her navy, and crossed the ocean to invade our country? We must face the danger as it is and, Sir, it is a real danger. We must face the situation as it exists now in this year of grace, 1918, and at this very hour.

I wish to emphasize, for a moment, another matter which we must keep in mind. It is sometimes said that Canada has done enough, or that Canada should not send further help, or that we should let the United States help us now. I desire to present, clearly to the House and to the country my view as to that, and I believe that my view is the view of the great majority of the members of this House. Sir, I say that this is Canada's war just as much as it is Britain's war, or the war of France, or the war of Belgium. We have sent our men across the seas with the unanimous consent of the Parliament of Canada, to join in defending our civilization against the most powerful military autocracy the world has ever known. And the moment we sent men across the seas to defend ourselves against Prussian aggression we constituted ourselves one of the belligerent powers, and we must accept all the consequences and all the responsibilities of a belligerent nation. There is no duty resting on Britain, on France, on Belgium, that does not rest equally upon the Canadian people in this great conflict.

If we had not been part of the British Empire, what would have happened? It is said that we have gone into this conflict because we are part of the British Empire. This is true; we were glad to take our place side by side with Britain, in the struggle, but I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that had we been an independent nation on this half of the North American continent, we would still have been compelled to take up arms to defend our liberties, and to protect the lives and the property of our citizens. We would have been forced into this war just as the United States has been forced into it. As honest men, loving liberty and loving free democratic institutions, we would have gone into the fight, and I believe we would have gone into it at perhaps an earlier stage than our neighbours to the south. Perhaps not, but at all events, we would have gone in side by side with the United States to help preserve liberty, democracy and civilization. The Hon. Mr. Lane, one of the members of President Wilson's Cabinet, clearly stated the issue when he declared this was a war between autocracy and democracy, between freedom and the forces of Prussian tyranny, and it must be fought out on either one side of the Atlantic or the other. Would we rather fight it out and achieve victory on the plains of Europe where the war is far away from our own homes or would we prefer fighting it out and settling the issue here. I believe, Sir, that the judgment of the people of this continent is that they prefer fighting it out, and settling the issue in Europe rather than that war's horrors should desolate this peaceful land. For this further reason Canada must be in this war to the end.

My right hon. friend has suggested that it is for us to send food rather than men, and that Canadians should be left to agricultural pursuits rather than bear arms on the field of battle. I am unable to agree with my right hon. friend and for this reason: Our duty is not to send food "or" men, our duty is to send food "and" men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: And I venture to think that Canadians would wholly mistake the seriousness of the world struggle in which we are engaged if they should think they had done their duty by limiting themselves to either the one or the other. Every nation involved in this struggle has had to gather together all its energies and resources, and throw them into the scale to help achieve victory. Our duty in Canada is to send men, food, ships, munitions and money. Canada's duty is to do everything that she can do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: We entered the struggle and we pledged our future on the issue. Canada has staked her liberty and all her resources on the outcome of this war, and it is our duty and our glorious privilege to throw all our energies into it to help restore peace and security to this war-cursed world. My right hon. friend has said, that the people of Canada were promised that the farmers would not be taken. I can speak for myself, and I think in this respect I can speak for my colleagues: If there was one clear pledge the Government made to the country; if there was one clear mandate the Government received from the country, it was that Canada should maintain our divisions up to strength and provide adequate reinforcements.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: We do not wish to take men from the farms. The Government did not decide on the form of this Order in Council without considering the food situation in all its aspects, without considering its possible effect upon agriculture. The Government did not decide on this Order in Council until they became convinced, that our gallant men could not be reinforced nor the cause of liberty made safe, without this Order. In view of that paramount necessity, individual preferences and every other consideration must be laid aside to provide the necessary men. Every hon. member of this House knows that many men in his own riding will be affected by this legislation. I represent an agricultural constituency in the province of Ontario, and I recognize that many of my own electors will be called out for service under this Order in Council. I know it will not be popular, I know it will cause distress and sorrow in many a home; I know sacrifices must be made, but, if, in a great national crisis, the Government entrusted with the responsibility of guiding the destinies of Canada were to be swayed from the path of duty because a measure may be unpopular, or because there may be individual sorrow in a home, when the sanctity of every home in the land is imperilled, and were to neglect the sacred duty they owe to their country, that Government would be unworthy of the confidence of the Canadian people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: I say, Mr. Speaker, with great respect, that while I recognize that this proposition will cause inconvenience, and in many cases real hardship, I do not believe that on the whole, if the people of this country receive it in the right spirit, it will seriously diminish our agricultural production this year. Let us look at the situation and test it by what other nations have done; and I make these comparisons, not with a view of minimizing our effort, which has been magnificent, but rather to encourage our people by a knowledge of what other countries at war have been able to achieve.

Take first the situation in Great Britain. The Prime Minister has given figures of the number of men called to the colours up to January of this year, for both the army and the navy in the different portions of the United Kingdom. Those figures give a total of 5,600,000 men which the United Kingdom has contributed up to the month of January last. Under the new Man Power Bill they are raising five hundred thousand more men, and they also passed another Bill in January last under which a substantial number have been called to the colours. But even if we take the figures at five million six hundred thousand, it means that the Old Land has put into the battle line, or called up for service in the army or navy over twelve per cent of her entire population. If the same standard were applied to Canada it would mean that we would send almost a million men. Britain has called out that large force of men, and at the same time she has increased her agricultural production. She has organized and developed a gigantic munitions industry, and has millions of men and women engaged in producing munitions; she has increased her shipbuilding, and while doing all these things, she has increased her agricultural production. How has she been able to achieve this remarkable result? By organizing the man-power and the woman-power of the nation and by throwing her whole strength into the struggle; I believe, Sir, that Canada will show the same spirit, that the broad-minded and patriotic men and women of Canada will rise to meet this emergency.

If there is one thing which the people of Canada are determined to do; if there is one thing they proclaimed last election in tones that could not be misunderstood, it is that Canada will never desert the gallant men who to-day in the trenches of Flanders are fighting for her liberty.

Now, let us look at what Canada's war effort has been in the past, so that we may consider what the resources of Canada are to meet the demands of the present and the future. The Prime Minister has pointed out that we had sent overseas up to the 31st March, of the present year, 364,000 men. We have been in the habit in the past of discussing Canada's contribution to the war on the basis of our total enlistments. That is interesting and valuable as indicating the spirit of the Canadian people, but it does not help us to measure our real war effort or to determine the force withdrawn from civilian life for that effort. Our real military contribution is measured by the men we send overseas, plus the number we have available to be sent overseas. And, measured in that way —and I am now speaking of our splendid force—Canada's war effort is something fewer than 400,000 men, approximately about 5 per cent of our population, if you reckon our population at about eight millions. Many men who enlisted have been discharged in Canada for various causes, physically unfit, too old, or because they have been too young, and some have deserted. These have all found their way back into civil life, and they are all part of the whole producing army, and not to be counted as part of Canada's Military effort. Compared with Canada's 5 per cent of her population Great Britain's effort is over 12 per cent of her population and she is now calling for 500,000 more men. I quite recognize the fact that a very much larger percentage of the people of Canada is engaged in agriculture than in Great Britain, and that if we drew upon Canadians to the same extent that they have drawn upon the people of Great Britain, we would seriously cripple agriculture. But no one is proposing to draw upon the people of Canada to the extent that the people of Great Britain have been drawn upon. No one is proposing to increase our forces by 600,000 men. What I submit to the House and the country is that we can send the additional men necessary to reinforce our men at the front, and, at the same time, by utilizing our forces at home, the man-power and the woman-power, we can maintain agricultural production and all other essential industries.

Let me give some figures with respect to the other portions of the Empire. As the Prime Minister has intimated, the recent confidential information the Government has received as to the contributions of the other portions of the Empire cannot now be given to this House or to the country. I have taken a very deep interest ever since the war began in the military contributions of the different portions of the Empire. I have endeavoured to keep in touch with the number of men raised in each dominion, and almost a year ago I obtained from the Australian High Commissioner in London, and from the High Commissioner of New Zealand, approximate figures of their contributions in men and in money up to that date. About the same time I obtained information from South Africa in reference to its contribution. While I cannot speak of the situation to-day, I can tell you of the situation as it existed a year ago, and then I will make one or two comments with reference to it. If you compare the number of men actually sent overseas up to one year ago, it would have been necessary for Canada to have sent overseas up to that date two hundred thousand more men than we had sent in order that our contribution should have equalled that of Australia. I think the relative situation of Canada has improved since that time; the discrepancy is not so great to-day. One of the reasons is that Australia has not been able to keep up her monthly reinforcements on the scale she contemplated, because compulsory service was rejected in Australia. Consequently the situation to-day is that Canada is steadily gaining on Australia, and the difference is not so great as it was a year ago. But taking the situation as it exists to-day, from information gathered, not from confidential sources, but from statements in Australian papers and by Australian public men, if we sent across the seas 100,000 more men, even more than 100,000 more men, our contribution in men in proportion to our population would not then exceed Australia's contribution up to the present time.

New Zealand with a population of about 1,100,000, has maintained one division at the front since ever the outbreak of the war. On the basis of population, that would make at least seven divisions for us, and we would have to send overseas between two and three hundred thousand more men to make our contribution equal to that of New Zealand in proportion to our population.

If we take into consideration the men that South Africa put into the war in German Southwest Africa and German Southeast Africa, as well as the men she has sent over the seas, we would have to make a still larger contribution in order to be on a par with South Africa.

What I want to say to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and to the members of the House is this: if the Motherland—Great Britain, Ireland, Scotland—if the great Commonwealth of Australia, if New Zealand, and if South Africa, the youngest member of our commonwealth, composed of men of divers races which, until recent years, were warring against each other, could send into the fighting line for the defence of the flag and of liberty these great numbers of men, should the largest, oldest and wealthiest of all the dominions of the Empire hesitate in this hour of the Empire's crisis?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: And, Mr. Speaker, I would be false to the situation as I believe it to be at the front, I would be false to gallant men I saw overseas a year and a half ago, I would be false to what I believe to be my duty to Canada and to the cause of liberty, if I did not, with all the energy of my being, urge this legislation upon the House. I said Britain had met the situation by mobilizing woman power and resources. How many women do hon. gentlemen think are employed in war services in Great Britain? There are 2,852,200 enrolled in war service in Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: They have in banking and finance, 63,700 women; in the Civil Service, 163,000; in commerce, 820,000; in munitions, 700,000; in national factories, in the metal and chemical trades, 819,000; in shipbuilding in July 1917, 16,500; in agriculture, 270,000. They have also organized their women to serve behind the lines in France and to help the soldiers at the front. In February, 1917, they organized the Women's Auxiliary Army Corps. Within less than a year recruits for this service were being enlisted at the rate of 10,000 a month. The "Waacs," as they are familiarly called, are part and parcel of the British army, working under military rules and regulations. They are in service both in France and in England, and engaged in these occupations: cooks and waitresses in military camps; clerical work; signalling; drivers in motor transport service; salvage—the conversion into useful material of the debris of the battlefield; postal service; the care of soldiers' graves. Then they have the Women's Royal Naval Service, familiarly called the "Wrens," who are performing similar service for the navy. The women of Britain know what the women of Belgium and Northern France have suffered. They know that their homes and liberty are in peril. They know that their husbands and brothers laid down their lives in their defence, and whether it be on the farms or at home, or behind the battle lines, the women of Great Britain are with the men of Great Britain to see this war through to a victorious conclusion.

Sir, the women of Canada wish only the same opportunity. When our gallant men went overseas, with the first, second, third and fourth contingents and subsequent units—the hearts of the women of Canada went with the soldier boys to the front, and to-day the hearts of many of the mothers of Canada lie buried with their boys in the graves of France and Flanders. We have only to speak the word and the mothers and sisters of our soldiers will undertake any work that this nation calls them to undertake, in order that the boys may be reinforced and victory achieved. The women have said to the Government: "Give us the chance to serve." The Women's Conference held some weeks ago with the War Committee of the Cabinet submitted a list of occupations upon which the women of Canada would be glad to enter if the nation wished them to serve. I say that we can reinforce our men at the front; we can send all the men that are needed; we can send more than we can get by calling up the class mentioned, and yet have sufficient labour at home for maintaining all the essential industries of Canada.

What I said of Great Britain is equally, if not more, true of France. One who has had the opportunity of visiting France during the war cannot but be moved by the service which is being rendered by the women of France. The women of Europe do more work on the soil than do the women of Canada or the United States, but in France women who had not previously been engaged in farm work were working on the farms early and late. The French Minister of Agriculture a month after the war broke out, when he thought the struggle would be over in a few months, called upon the women of France to gather the harvest and prepare the soil for the coming spring, so that when their husbands and brothers and sons returned from the war they would find the soil ready for the sowing. But the husbands, brothers and sons have not returned. The women of France sowed the grain in the spring of 1915 and gathered the harvest of that year. They prepared the soil in the autumn of 1915; they sowed the grain in the spring of 1916, and when I was there in the summer of 1916 they were gathering the harvest. I did not see an able-bodied young man in all the fields of France; the harvests were being gathered by the women, the boys and the old men. I went into a great munition plant in Paris, where I found thousands of women employed in making munitions. I said to the director: "Where did these women come from? Who are they?" He said: "They are mostly the wives and sisters of soldiers at the front." These women were making shells in order that their sons and husbands and brothers might have the means of defeating and driving back the foe, and might thereby the sooner return to their loved ones at home. Do you mean to tell me that the women of Canada will not do for their country what the women of Britain and France are doing for theirs? In Britain and France the less essential industries have been cut out. When it is suggested that we cut out less essential industries in Canada, the question is at once asked: "What will your workmen do? You should not stop an industry until you know whether there is work for the men." I submit that, without detriment to any vital interests, we could close up many of the non-essential industries of Canada and relieve the men therein engaged for war work. Canada has not yet got down to this war as the nations of Europe have, and the time has come when we must realize the urgency of the situation and be prepared to deal with it.

France, as the Prime Minister has said, has given one in six of her entire population to this struggle. She has poured out her life-blood like water in order that she may defend the homes and liberties of her people. When I was in France they had just received word of the Lille deportations, to which the Prime Minister referred, when the wives and daughters of the French people in the conquered territory were forced from their homes and sent behind the German lines. Do you wonder that there was no talk of peace in France? Do you wonder that every man you met said: "There is only one thing for France, death or victory." The gallant men of France have been inspired by that spirit. I would that in Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we should all be imbued with the spirit of France, and that, with her, we might cry, "Until death or victory."

The leader of the Opposition has spoken of the splendid fighting qualities of the French Canadians at the front. With every word that my hon. friend says in that respect I am in cordial agreement. No men ever fought better at the front than the men who have gone from the province of Quebec. Shortly after the Somme battle I received a letter from a Toronto officer who had been engaged in that fight. In the capture of Courcelette the battalion that held the apex of the advance was the gallant 22nd from the province of Quebec. A Toronto company went in to relieve them in the midst of the battle, and this officer, who was himself wounded a few days afterwards, wrote me this letter from a hospital:

> I would like to tell you about the French Canadians at Courcelette. The official eye witness story is nothing compared to the facts. My company relieved the 22nd on the 17th September, and I saw their work and know what they did. No troops, not even the Guards, could have done better. Even if Quebec has been slow in recruiting, the courage and heroism of Colonel Tremblay and his men in that fight atones for a lot. When I relieved him, he had only two officers besides himself and eighty men left out of his battalion, and they were fighting like devils still.

When this officer returned to Canada for a period of convalescence he related this further incident in connection with that battle. On the 17th of September, or the morning of the 18th, just as the relief was being made, the Germans started to come over the trenches again. Colonel Tremblay, with but two officers and eighty men left, came to this Toronto officer, after they had been fighting for days there without relief, and asked, if they could not stay with him to see it through again? That is the spirit of the gallant French Canadian soldiers who have gone across the sea.

We have heard this afternoon of the unity of Canada. I believe Canadian unity is possible, and I ask: How can we achieve Canadian unity? We can achieve it just as our English and French Canadians achieve it at the front—by marching together to a great objective, seeking to serve and to sacrifice together, and if, under this resolution, the sons of Ontario and Quebec go forth to fight for the homes and liberties of Canada, and if they fight and die together on the fields of France and Flanders and mingle their blood in a common grave, the men who return to Canada will put an end to racial strife in this country; they will stand together for a united Canada. We cannot unite by arguing; we can unite by working together for a great objective in which we all believe. I believe that with the cheerful acceptance of this proposal, with the going forth of the men of Ontario and Quebec, you have started on the course of real and lasting unity; you have started on a course which will bind together the conflicting interests, the different races and the different creeds in this country.

Canada stands at the parting of the ways. The situation at the front is, as the Prime Minister has said, grave beyond description. Our boys have fought with a courage and a heroism unsurpassed in history. The generals of the Allied armies on the western front agree that there is no finer fighting corps on the whole western front than the Canadians. Some go further and say that it is the best. Our Canadian soldiers are giving their lives for us. What are we going to do for them? They went overseas with the pledge and promise of the people of Canada that we would stand by them; that we would back them up; that we would send them reinforcements, that we would not desert them. Are we going to keep our pledge to those gallant men? That is the question you and I must answer at this hour. From the Atlantic to the Pacific throughout the Dominion of Canada there is but one answer in the hearts of the people, and that is: Canada must and will stand by her men to the limit of Canada's power and resources.

The issue may determine our future, our liberties, the cause of humanity, civilization. Each of us has the great privilege, in this critical hour of human history, to make a contribution to the future welfare, not only of Canada, but of the human race. Shall we do it? Shall we do it as men? Shall we do it as our fathers did over a century ago? The German must be defeated.

Right must triumph. The cause of liberty must prevail. Canada will not stain her glorious record; Canada will add a new and glorious chapter to her history; Canada will fight to the last for the sacred cause of liberty, for British freedom, for civilization.

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will bear with me for the short time I intend to occupy, as a plain and unassuming member of this House, in order to put in a few simple words my position regarding the resolution now before the House. As one who comes from an agricultural constituency in the Far West, and in the face of the methods that were used by my opponent in the last election and by those who supported him on the very question that we have before us to-day, I fail to understand this sudden right about face on the part of the Government. It appears to me that this is a breach of faith on the part of the Government because men throughout the length and breadth of the land were led to understand that those of our countrymen who followed agricultural pursuits, if they supported the Government, would be exempted and would be allowed to pursue the even tenor of their ways. That statement was made in my county from door to door, and I am sure the same course was pursued in every county in this Dominion. The people of western Canada accepted the word of the Government; they accepted the word of the Minister of Militia, and I, as a Canadian, knew what the Minister of Militia meant, when coming in from one of the outlying districts I was handed a copy of the Free Press in which the minister was reported as stating that those connected with agriculture would be exempted; that the Government would see to it that they were exempted. The word went out throughout the length and breadth of the land that those men would be allowed to remain at home. On the strength of that statement, what did the people at home do? Farmers, in Manitoba and in other parts of western Canada, and, I am sure, in eastern Canada as well, mortgaged their very future on the appeal that was made to them as true and patriotic citizens of this country, I want to say here that every man and woman whom I know in this country is a true and patriotic citizen. Those who could not go to the front, including those who had sent their sons overseas, said: We shall do something for the war. As this Government and as the whole country knows, they prepared to increase production. What has this Government and every member of it said to the people? Increase production. What did we hear within the last two or three days? We are facing a world famine. There was written by an able citizen, Mr. Ewart, an article which was entitled "The World Famine." We know for a fact that, the world over, there is a shortage of food. Practical farmers in western Canada are going to sow the crop, but what are we going to reap? No one knows. But we shall endeavour to reap a crop. What is the first move this Government is making? The people to-day are seeding wheat which is the first grain sown in western Canada. I would refer every member of this Government to an article in an organ that supported them through thick and thin in the last election. The article is dated April 16, and it gives a summary of conditions regarding seeding in western Canada. What does it say regarding the labour situation in the province of Manitoba?

> Labour supply seems fairly satisfactory; twenty-four points report "sufficient"; six report supply "fair," "adequate" or "good"; five points report help very short and remainder "barely enough" or "normal."

What is the report from the province of Saskatchewan?

> In regard to labour supply for the land, 35 points reports "sufficient"; 12 report "short" or "scarce"; only three points state labour plentiful.

What does the province of Alberta say in regard to the labour situation?

> Farm labour is given as "sufficient" at eight points, "scarce" at four, and "good" at one.

Every farmer from western Canada will bear me out when I say that we are paying a higher rate of wages than we ever paid before. We all admit that and we are willing to put up with it, because we know that labour is getting scarce. It is also reported on the same page as the article from which I have been reading that although labour is fairly sufficient for seeding there is no provision for the harvest. We all hope the harvest will be an abundant one in the interest of the Allies and of this country. The more bountiful the harvest will be, the greater will be the burden upon the people of this country to harvest it and ship it to the Old Country when that time arrives. I say it is a mistake for the Government to take the boys of nineteen to twenty-three years of age from the farm, particularly at this time of the year. Western Canada has done its share pretty well so far as this war is concerned, not only in the matter of production but in the number of men they have sent to the front, and some of their best will never come back. I say it is taking the people of the country by the throat at this particular time. After all the turmoil of the last election, the thing was simmering down pretty well; it was simmering down in my county at all events, and I said to the people of the county of Provencher: "Abide by the law," as every true citizen would have done. After the promises held out by the Government before the last election I say it is a deception to conscript the farmers now. It is not in the interest of the Canadian people to put these regulations into force and rob the farmers of the help which is now all too scarce. What are we going to do in the fall if we take away the experienced Canadian boy who can hook up and drive six horses at any kind of work, or the farmer's son who can take hold of the tractor or his father's threshing machine and run it as good as any man? I repeat this is a mistake. There are able men in the Government but I say to them in all common sense they are making a big mistake in pursuing the policy they now propose to carry out. Who else considers it a mistake? A member of the Government; the Minister of Agriculture in the plainest words in the English language says it is a mistake. I have known him a long time and have great respect for him. Let me quote from an interview with the Minister of Agriculture which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of April 17th. It is well worth reading, but I will quote only the last paragraph:

> Despite the difficulties, we must produce more food than we have ever done before. Set apart all your land fit for growing crops, and plant as much wheat as you can. Let me add one word about next year.

He was thinking not only about this year but next year too, which he had a perfect right to do. He goes on:

> Plan to bring as much new land on your farm under cultivation for another crop as possible and thus increase your acreage for next year. It will be needed then just as much as now.

It will be needed more than now There are other authorities in western Canada besides the Minister of Agriculture, with all due deference to him. In the same issue of the Ottawa Citizen there is a statement by Roderick Mackenzie, secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, and a candidate for Parliament for the constituency of Brandon in the last election but later withdrawing in favour of the Union Government candidate. He says:

> The farm labour situation will be affected and production will be interfered with by the new Military Service regulation. He would not go so far as to say that the new measure would be opposed. He believed it was in the interest of the country that those farmers between the ages of twenty and twenty-three who had previously been granted exemption should be permitted to remain on the land. It had been shown, he declared, that increased production was now a vital factor from the point of view of winning the war. To take these producers from the land would consequently interfere with the policy outlined.

Were the young men to be taken from the land, what would be the situation in this House to-day? Gentlemen on this side of the House would be on that side, and gentlemen on that side would be on this side, and nobody knows that better than the practical men from western Canada who are now in the Government. I have lived in the county of Provencher for forty-one years and have had a little experience mixing with the people, and I know a man in this House—I caught his eye only a moment ago—who said to me during the heat of the last election contest. "The people will not vote for conscription; the farmers are all against it." The farmers were all against it, and now the Government is doing what I said they would do at that time. The farmers were led away by the Government's promises. For my part, so long as I live I will never be led away by the promise of any politician. What arguments did the Government use in the last election? They would go to a man who had two sons at the front and say: You vote for Union Government and your boy will come home. Then they would go to the other man who had nobody at the front and say: You are a farmer; you vote for Union Government and your boy will stay at home. That was the situation. I have never done anything, nor will I do anything, to interfere with this Government in carrying on the war; I am in this war heart and soul, just as much as any other man, and how could it be otherwise? I say the present policy of the Government is a mistake; there is no occasion for it at the present time. Everybody knows that the situation is desperate, but the Government would do better to follow along the lines laid down by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. The present policy of the Government is simply deceiving—that is the only word to describe it—the people who loyally supported them in the last election. It is tightening the screws on conscription more and more, now that they have a big majority. I want to support the boys at the front and I am going to support the war; I have always supported the war. But I say to the Government, in the name of everything that is good try and do something; and I believe there are men in the Government big enough to do something. For God's sake stop dividing the people as you are doing from day to day. A man is now to be branded as a traitor who might have his heart and soul in the war simply for expressing an opinion. I do not question one word in the statement of my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council. I made the same appeal as he did last November to people to help win the war, and I am willing to do that now. I had hoped this thing had gone by for the time being, and that I could come here and give this Government honest, straightforward and independent support on everything in connection with the war, but it seems that they want to load it on and load it on from day to day. I disagree with them and I am going to move the following amendment seconded by the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Read):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The House regrets that the proposed Order in Council departs entirely from the principle of the Order in Council of December 3, 1917, allowing the exemption of those whose services are essential for promoting agricultural production; and the House therefore declares that the proposed Order in Council should be amended so that it shall provide for the exemption of those who are now actually and effectively engaged and so urgently needed in the production of foodstuffs upon the farms of Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on rising to address the House this evening on what I consider the most momentous question which has ever been discussed in a Canadian parliament, I shall try to confine my few remarks to what I consider the very gist of the question, and in doing so I wish not to hurt the feelings of any person, and yet I must declare the principles which, in my judgment, have actuated the Government in passing this Order in Council and proposing it to Parliament; and when that is done I consider I have performed my duty. I have listened to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in the very reasonable criticism which he offered to this proposal this afternoon, and I listened also to the argument of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Molloy) who has moved the amendment to the proposed resolution. My right hon. friend claimed, in the first place, that the Government was departing from all the well-recognized principles of constitutional government in Canada in passing an Order in Council of such tremendous importance as the present one when Parliament was in session. With that statement I have not the faintest quarrel in the world. I realize that such a course has never been adopted in Canada before. I realize that, were this proposal made in peace time, no government would be justified in adopting it. But I could not help thinking all the time my right hon. friend was discussing this matter that he was forgetting the real situation and the real reason why this Order in Council has been passed. He was forgetting the fact that the civilization of the world is trembling in the balance, and there is nothing in this world which will save the situation in France and Flanders except men. My right hon. friend talks about the Prussian militarism of the Government in passing a law to provide—because that is what it amounts to—for the immediate and effective reinforcement of our troops at the front. I am not going into any long dissertation as to the necessity for the reinforcement of the troops. The Prime Minister has given figures which I think ought to convince any one that there is a real necessity for reinforcing Canadian divisions—not so much perhaps for reinforcing them at present, but a necessity which may arise at any time. That necessity may be arising to-night. Mr. Speaker, we have no idea what is going on in that horrible battlefield now; the whole Canadian army corps may be wrapped in a life and death struggle with the Huns; it may be that thousands of our men have been slain to-day, or will be slain to-morrow. But if the Canadian army corps is not in this condition to-night, and will not be in this condition next week, we know the British army has been under the most terrible strain under which any army has ever been in this world. We know the conditions are so serious that a portion of the French army had to be withdrawn from other spheres of activity and sent to the relief of the British, and we know that was not done without the very strongest reasons imaginable. I do not have to argue with this House, or with any intelligent man or woman in Canada, as to the necessity for men in this titanic struggle. But without labouring the question, I would like to ask my right hon friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and other gentlemen opposite if there is any difference in the principle between taking the opinion of the House of Commons and the Senate on a resolution, and taking the opinion of the same bodies by the ordinary circuitous method of passing a Bill? The only difference I can see is that if the principle of this proposed Order in Council be adopted it will become law to-morrow. If you introduced a Bill in this House it might become law in four weeks from to-morrow. That is all I can say. I cannot see any difference between the House of Commons voting upon a principle of this kind once, and voting on it four or five or six times. That is all it means. Under the ordinary methods of procedure as outlined by my right hon. friend this afternoon, a Bill gets its first reading, its second reading, goes into committee and comes back for third reading. It then goes to the Senate and goes through the same procedure there, and we know that, even if we apply closure at every step we take, which the rules of Parliament provide for, it is doubtful if the Bill could become law in three weeks, and it might take four weeks. In the meantime the Canadian army corps may be cut to pieces. "But," they say, "you cannot get the men there for four months." If you lose one month it will be five months before you get them there. Therefore, as a member of the House of some years standing, as a man who, I think, knows something of constitutional rights and privileges, and one who holds them as dear as any man in Canada, I make no apology, and I have every justification for the course we are pursuing in taking the opinion of the Parliament of Canada at the earliest possible moment, and getting the men to the front as soon as we can. Therefore, I do not wish to discuss this any longer. I lay down the principle that the first and only duty of this Government and Parliament is to stand by the men at the front and to see that they are reinforced and supported in every possible way.

Now we come to the real question at issue, and that is whether or not we are justified in forcibly taking men from the ordinary avocations of life and putting them in the army. We fought out this question a year ago. We spent over two months in this Parliament discussing it, and the Parliament as then constituted declared by a very substantial majority in favour of the principle, and the people of Canada by an overwhelming majority declared in favour of the same principle when the question was submitted to them a few months later. Therefore, I say that constitutionally this Government has all the justification and all the authority which any Government requires to go ahead and produce the necessary recruits in the most effective and expeditious manner. But my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Molloy) comes in with an amendment, the substance of which is that instead of passing this Order in Council, we should amend it so as to provide that exemption be granted to practically every person who belongs to the agricultural part of Canada. I represent perhaps one of the most complete agricultural districts in the Dominion of Canada. Probably three-quarters of my constituents—I do not know but nine-tenths—are of the farming population. I realize that this Order in Council is going to take many men whose labours will be lost to the farm and whose labours are needed on the farm. What is true of my constituency is true, I suppose, of three-quarters of the constituencies in Canada. I do not doubt for a moment that there will be some dislocation of agricultural labour in Canada. It may be possible that a few farms will not produce as much, on account of this resolution, as they would have produced if the resolution had not been passed. Do not think for a moment that the Government has not canvassed this matter from every possible standpoint. Do not think for a moment we did not realize that there might be some dislocations. But every time we discussed it we have been brought back to one proposition—which is required most in the battlefield to-day, men or wheat? If I believed we could not raise wheat if we sent these men, then I would hesitate very, very seriously before I would vote for this resolution; but I want to tell hon. members that the labour possibilities of Canada are not nearly exhausted, and I want to tell the hon. member for Provencher that if we adopted his amendment we would be right back to the condition of affairs which existed in Canada since the month of October last. We started out last October to get 100,000 men by the combing out process, by allowing exemption to very many different classes of people, by allowing people to come forward and say: It is necessary I should remain on the farm, and it is necessary for business reasons, for family reasons, and for one reason or another, that I should be exempted.

The result is that these exemption tribunals have gone on, the appeal tribunals have followed them, and in four months we have not succeeded in getting more than thirty thousand men by the circuitous, cumbersome machinery that was enacted last year. If we go on under the present conditions for four months longer we would not probably get thirty thousand more. Now it comes down to the hard question of expediency. Are we going on with the present method and allow our sons, brothers and friends to be slaughtered at the front, and possibly allow the war to be lost, or are we going to act as sane and courageous men ought to act? If it be necessary to sweep away some of the safeguards of the constitution, then sweep them away and get the men; there is no other course to pursue. I take it, Sir, that the man who has not the ability, the man who has not the will, to meet a situation of this kind and meet it with a hand of iron is not fit to hold a position in any government in any country in times of war. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) talked about voluntary recruiting, and gave figures for 1917 and part of 1916 to show what had been accomplished by that method. Up to the month of July or August last there was no more warm advocate of the voluntary recruiting system in Canada than I was. I have stated in Parliament, and I repeat now, that, perhaps, there is not a man in Canada to whom the word "conscription" is more repulsive than it is to myself. I wanted to exhaust the recruiting system to the very limit before I decided to differ with my old leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), whom I have always loved and have not yet ceased to love. It was one of the most serious situations of my lifetime, and one which comes to few, I am glad to say, in the political life of Canada. Yet, Sir, looking the matter over, realizing that in the whole of 1917 out of some seventy-five thousand volunteers, less than twenty-five thousand of those were volunteers for the infantry, one could appreciate the seriousness of the situation. You cannot wage this war, or any war, without infantry. We did not get as many infantry as we lost in the month of November last in the way of casualties. We found that voluntary enlistment had absolutely fallen down as a means of securing the troops we need. Consequently, there is no other way in the world to get men except by the method we are now adopting.

No man regrets to a greater degree than I do the fact that it is necessary to call upon farmers' sons and take them away from the farms; no man realizes more clearly than I do what that means to the fathers and mothers of these young men; no man, I believe, realizes more clearly than I do, the necessity of having men upon the farms. But I want to tell my hon. friends that if we do not adopt this resolution we would simply be going over and over again along the circuitous route, which has proved such a dismal failure as a means of bringing in men. It has been said by some person, the remark is not original with me, that the Military Service Act as it is now enforced is a splendid exemption Act, but a very poor conscription Act; it has produced something like two hundred thousand exemptions and about thirty thousand soldiers. I want to ask my hon. friends opposite, can we go on and win the war under these conditions? That is all there is to it. Is it better that we leave these young men on the farms, and not only on the farms but in the workshops, and all the different avocations of life in Canada, than do as we propose to do?

My hon. friends are talking about exempting farmers. That only touches a certain percentage, not a very large percentage either, of the men who will be taken under this Act; and the moment you adopt your system of exemptions in order to exempt the farming class, you will have practically the same results as we have had in the past. But, Sir, I am not as pessimistic over the agricultural situation in Canada as my hon. friends opposite seem to be. It has been pointed out this afternoon, and it is within the knowledge of every member this evening, that in France, in England, in all the European countries, people are working upon the farms and producing foodstuffs who never thought of doing such a thing until this war broke out. There is an enormous quantity of labour available for the farmers that has never been touched heretofore. I am not very well acquainted with the conditions in western Canada, and therefore I am not in a position to personally gainsay the statement made by my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Molloy), but I know something about the conditions in eastern Canada; and I tell my hon. friend that there are hundreds and thousands of men in eastern Canada who can be impressed for work upon the farms if this Government has only enough courage to go on and do it. We have made a start,—and I am speaking now with some sense of responsibility. We have passed an Order in Council which makes it a criminal offence, under certain conditions, for men to be unemployed. But the Order in Council hardly goes as far as I would like to see it go. Still, I am always thankful for small favours, and once we have adopted the principle it will not be very hard to extend it. You can go round the city of Ottawa, or the city of Montreal, in fact any city in Canada, and you will find young men attending the moving picture shows in the afternoon, you will find them loafing in the parks, you will find them standing on the street corners, you will find them in all conditions and avocations in life, men who may be taken and impressed for farm service. We are taking a registration of the man and woman power of Canada, and we hope to complete it by the middle of June. Up to the present time we have not decided, we have not gone so far as to say these men shall be conscripted to work. We think they ought to be at work. I think, Mr. Speaker, if this Parliament adopts the principle of taking a certain class of men without exemption and putting them into the army to fight, there cannot be very much difficulty in getting the people of Canada and the Parliament of Canada to stand behind us and say that men shall work where they ought to work. I am not laying that down as a settled policy of the Government, I am only giving my own views; but it follows as logically as night follows day. Why, Sir, if a man had said to me four years ago that I would be standing up here to-night advocating the conscription of men to go into the army I would have said he was an arrant fool, and I think that is practically true of every man in this House. But four years of war have produced a wonderful change in the sentiments of members of this House, and a wonderful change in the sentiments of the people of Canada. The people of Canada to-day are prepared to stand for things which they would not have dreamed of standing for four years ago, and they will stand for still more drastic measures inside of four months if the necessity arises. Therefore, I want to give notice here, so far as I am concerned at least—and I think I am pretty well voicing the sentiments of my colleagues and of the supporters of the Government, and, I believe, of the people of Canada—that if it becomes necessary to impress for service on the farm certain people who have not been farmers heretofore, the people will stand by us and the Government will not hesitate to do its duty in order to see that production is increased to the requisite extent. I am not going to advocate to-night that women should labour on the farm, although women can do so. Women can run machinery and can do many things on the farm that they have not hitherto done. The boys who are attending college can be taken away from those colleges and put on the farms. Young men who are loafing on city streets can be taken and put on the farms; and with all the resources in eastern Canada at least, and with the powers of the Government and the will of the people exercised as they should be, I have no doubt whatever as to what will take place so far as farming is concerned. Therefore, I have no hesitation in voting against this amendment. I realize that in doing this I am not going to please a great body of my constituents, but I think that my friends around me who are ready to vote for this resolution, feel the same as I do. The time has gone by when any man has any right to consider what may be popular or unpopular. The one great question which every man in this Parliament should ask himself to-night is this: What is necessary in the interests of this country at large; what is necessary in order to see that Canada does her full duty with a view of bringing this war to a successful termination?

There are certain duties cast upon a Government in any country in times of stress such as these are; and in addition to that there are certain duties cast upon every good citizen of a country in such times as we are passing through now. I realize that up to the beginning of this war we had so much freedom in Canada that the ordinary man and woman could not understand or realize what it meant when any of this freedom was taken away from him. We had never been taught war in Canada; we never believed it would be necessary to teach our people their duty in time of war. And, when it became necessary to teach them, I can quite understand that it was hard for them to realize—it is hard for people in Canada to-day to realize—that the first duty of every citizen in a time of stress and danger is to stand up for his State. They have been taught differently from that in European countries, and while we all abhor the necessity of it, yet we realize that in Europe for decades they have been taught that when a nation is at war the first duty of every man is to respond to the call of the army. As I said before, I realize that it has taken a good deal of education to beat these things into the heads of the people of Canada, but our people have risen to the occasion, I think, in a manner which calls for the commendation of every man who gives it serious consideration. When you realize, Sir, that over four hundred thousand men have voluntarily given up their homes and all that is near and dear to them, and have gone into the army ready to make the supreme sacrifice, it proves that there is a splendid public sentiment in Canada, a public sentiment above and beyond what any of us imagined.

But there is no use in trying to hide it. Practically all the men in Canada who were willing to volunteer and take their chances have been recruited. If you want evidence of that, all you have to do is to look around and see what has been done by the remaining people of Canada to evade military service under the conscription law. And I want to say here, as publicly and as forcibly as I can, that the attempts to evade the conscription law are not entirely confined to the province of Quebec. A great deal has been said in this House during the last four weeks about that province. From the figures given here by the Prime Minister this afternoon, we must all realize that the number of French-speaking Canadians who have enlisted is not very great. I am not here to find fault or to criticise; I have not a word of condemnation to say to them. It is a bald fact that stares everybody in the face. But there are thousands and tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of people in the rest of Canada who have tried as assiduously as they could to evade military service. Among the farming classes, every device has been resorted to which the ingenuity of man could think of. Men by the score have been practically adopted by their neighbours on the ground that it was necessary to work their farms, and through that have obtained exemption; and the next day these young men have gone away from that farm as if it were a pest house, with no intention of ever returning to it. This thing has gone on in English Canada to my knowledge. I do not believe there is one section where it has not gone on. Therefore I think I ought to say that it is just as necessary that we have some method of securing these men in the English portions of Canada as it is in the province of Quebec. It may not gather in as many men—possibly not; but the principle is the same, and the same law that applies to the one will apply to the others.

There are duties cast upon a Government in times like these which no member can refuse to look in the face, and the man who is not willing to look them in the face and grapple with them had better get out of the Government and hand the duties of government over to some man who has the courage to perform them. We have known this situation since last January. We could see at that time that the Military Service Act was not producing the men required. We have tried to speed it up, have tried to enforce its provisions; we have tried to get men, and have failed to a very great extent. I dare say that, if we went on with all the appeals now pending before the central appeal judge, we might get more men; but we would never get 100,000 men or anything like it. Therefore it became the duty of this Government either to face the situation, or hand it over to men who would face it. We decided to face it. After careful consideration we have brought down this measure. We have placed it before you and we ask you to adopt it. We know there will be criticism in the country; thousands will not like it, there is no question about that. We know it will be as displeasing to many of our followers as it is to many of our opponents. Nevertheless, it is a stern necessity staring us in the face, and we are not going to flinch from it. I have no doubt whatever but that it will be carried by an overwhelming majority; I wish it could be made unanimous, I had hoped that it would be carried unanimously. But I will go further, and say that if this measure did not pass in this House, I would not give up the fight. There are other ways. I would not give in until everything had been done that possibly could be done. Notwithstanding that this measure will not be popular in the country, I would not hesitate to go to the people and ask them to pass judgment upon it, and I have every faith in the world that the verdict would be as favourable as it was in December last.

Now, sir, I do not think that I should argue the necessity for getting these men. We are all reading the papers every day. There cannot be a man or woman in Canada who is not aware of what has taken place in Europe during the last four weeks. On the 21st of March the enemy, after concentrating all the forces which he could possibly draw from the eastern front after the collapse of Russia, after withdrawing all the men possible from the Italian and every other front, made up his mind that he simply had to break through the British line or throw up his hands. And the result is that the British army in France and Flanders has been subjected to the most terrible ordeal which any body of troops has ever been subjected to in history. The most terrible onslaught which human ingenuity could devise has been hurled upon that army. While they have gone back, they have not broken. But it is no use for any man to hug himself and say: "Oh, the British army has always won, and, somehow or other, they will win." They have accomplished wonders, and no man is prouder of his country and nation than I am of mine to-night. There is no man who realizes the perilous situation to a greater extent than I do. If every man in this House and in Canada realized the situation in France as I do to-night, we would not be standing here and arguing as to how we shall get men. When I think of the horrible consequences which would follow if Germany should win, when I realize what would have followed had they succeeded in carrying out their object, and how nearly they did succeed in breaking through, I almost tremble. Do hon. gentlemen realize what would have happened if they had broken through, or if the British and French armies had been separated? The British army would have been forced to capitulate. When the Germans had reached the channel ports and the means of communications between Great Britain and France had been cut off, France would have been forced to surrender also. Do people want German guns in the St. Lawrence river, or German guns along our Atlantic coast, to wake them up to a sense of their duty? That is what will happen if they break through our line. Nothing on this earth can stop them from breaking through that line except men, more men, and still more men. I hope that no one will think that I am drawing upon my imagination in this respect, and trying to make the picture darker than it should be, because I am endeavouring to present my view as it impresses itself upon me. I do not think that my conclusions are unreasonable; I do not think it is unreasonable to assume that if the Germans do break through, the things may happen which I have suggested to you. And should that be the case, what would be the use of your farms? What would be the use of your property? What in the world matters if that happens? Does any man here want his family and his female relatives subjected to the degradation which has been heaped upon the people of France and Belgium? All these things might happen, and probably would happen, in such an eventuality as I have mentioned.

I know that I shall be called an alarmist; people will say that I have tried to scare the public into accepting this measure. I am not doing that; I am simply giving my honest opinion, which I have arrived at after very careful reasoning; and I think that hundreds of people in Canada, if they speak out their minds, will tell you that they have come to a similar conclusion. I have never been a pessimist. I have always believed that we shall win this war, and I believe so still. But I have always tried to look this matter in the face and to realize what might happen in case we did not do our duty and this war should be lost.

I took the trouble this afternoon to look up a few of the remarks I made in this House on the 27th day of June last, on the second reading of the Military Service Bill. The question under consideration at that time was whether this matter should be referred to the people of Canada by means of a referendum, or whether the Bill providing for compulsory military service should be adopted by the House. When I voted with the then Government and against my own leader and many of my friends, I reasoned the matter out just as I am trying to reason it out to you to-night. I want to read simply one paragraph from my remarks, which will show you that my mind was travelling along the same channel nine months ago as it is to-night. I said:

> Sir, I am not the keeper of my brother's conscience; I am the last man in the world to force any other man to vote with me who does not wish to vote with me. I hope I am big enough to give any man who differs from me the credit of being just as honest in his convictions as I am honest in mine. And I have just as much respect for the honesty of the man who declares he will vote for the referendum as I have for my own. But I cannot help asking: Should the referendum be defeated, what then? That is a question I cannot get around. I do not say it will be defeated. I do not say that Parliament ought to pass a law if it is sure that in doing so it is going against the will of the people. But again I come back to my first proposition: This country is at war and must have men; this country must go on doing its duty. Again I say: Suppose the referendum is defeated, what then? And, not being the keeper of any other man's conscience, I have no fault to find with the man who says he is willing to take this chance. But so far as I am concerned, I can only say, it is not good enough for me.

These were my considered views nine months ago; they have since then been substantiated, strengthened, and modified to some extent. I say now that the question is not whether the majority of the people are in favour of a referendum or of conscription, but, what is the duty of the Government and Parliament in view of the conditions which exist in Europe to-night? I am willing to brush aside all my preconceived ideas of constitutional rights in times of peace, and to say frankly and openly that, no matter whether it be popular or unpopular,—I would go so far as to say, no matter whether the majority of the people are behind it or not—it is our duty to go on and get every man we possibly can get without crippling the ordinary affairs of the country. Entertaining these views, my duty is clear, and I hope that I shall be able to convince every man who listens to me to-night that his duty lies along the same path as mine.

A splendid sentiment has been exhibited by the people of Canada. I said a while ago that over 400,000 men had voluntarily answered the call of duty, had gone to the front, and had faced conditions of which no man can have a proper conception unless he has been there to become familiar with them. I regret to say, however, that something else is required in the sentiment of Canada to-day to make it what I should like to see it. Everything is not as lovely as the sentiment expressed by the action of the 400,000 men who voluntarily offered their lives, if necessary, for their country. I am very sorry to say that there is a sentiment throughout the country which does not measure up to that high standard. There are people who have used the war as a means of getting rich to an extent which they had never dreamed of. There are men who come to the Government—"patriots" who want to help win the war, but to win it in some way by which they can make themselves rich—and want everything in the world one possibly can imagine. There are men who come to the Government and want things for which they have no right to ask. There are men who come to the Government without asking for a moment where the money which their proposals involve is to come from. There are men who never consider for a moment what the revenues of the country are or what is the extent of the debt which is being piled up. "Patriots" come to the Government every day who want to build everything from a ship down to the smallest article of commerce, and who want the Government not only to furnish the money to do it with, but the money which will make them rich for the rest of their lives.

While I am on this subject, there is a class of men to whom I want to address my respects to-night, and that is the labouring men of Canada. I know that what I am going to say may not be very popular. I do not wonder that the labouring men of Canada are making a demand for increased wages every day in the week, when their employers are getting rich beyond the dreams of avarice. But I want to say here to-night—I give this not as the opinion of the Government, but as my own private opinion—that no man in Canada is justified in laying down his tools and saying: I will not work at any necessary industry in this country. No man is justified in saying: I will not mine coal; I will not produce steel; I will not run a railroad; I will not do other things necessary in the ordinary affairs of the country. They may have grievances, and those grievances could be remedied; but they should never quit work, nor should the employer ever cause the conditions to be such that they can quit work. I know that this is beyond the question under consideration, but as I am speaking of the sentiment of Canada, I cannot resist the temptation of making these statements. They may not please many people, but they are not made for the purpose of pleasing. They are made with a view to causing a few more people in Canada to think who have not thought in the past. I am sorry to say that thousands of men in Canada to-day have looked upon this war as a God-given opportunity of getting rich beyond their former dreams. I may be saying something which is unpleasant to myself and unpleasant to them, but in doing so it is possible that I may cause some people to think of things to which they have not given consideration before. I hope that the people will rise to the occasion and realize that this is not a time to get rich; that this is not a time to quibble over small things; it is a time when every man, and every woman, and every child almost, should say: What can I best do to play my part in putting Canada in a position to do her full part in winning this war?

I do not wish to say more than I ought to say, nor do I desire to leave anything unsaid which it is in my heart to say to-night. I am sorry that my hon. friend has moved this resolution and that he proposes, as I imagine, to divide the House upon it. If this amendment be carried, we shall simply have the old question of exemptions tried over again and the whole purpose of the resolution will be defeated.

I hope my friend the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will not think me rude if I say to him that I was disappointed this afternoon at the concluding part of his remarks. It is true he did what I, knowing him as long as I have, realized he would do. He said to the people of his province that they must obey this law. I would have been very much surprised if he had said anything else, but I wish he had gone further and said to his people: Not only is it your duty to obey this law, but it is your duty to come forward without this law. I wish every one of my hon. friends opposite, every one of my hon. friends on this side of the House, and, in fact, every hon. member, would say to the people of his constituency, no matter who they may be: We are living in the greatest crisis this world has ever known; we are living in a time when nothing but the strong arm and the blood of the men of Canada can save the situation; it is not a question of obeying the law when the minions of the law come and take the men, but it is a question of saying to the young men: Turn out like men; do your duty like men; assume the responsibility of citizenship without being compelled to do it; take your share, play the part which the 400,000 men who have gone before have played in this gigantic conflict. I am not given to poetry; perhaps there is less poetry in me than in any other man who has ever lived, but I wish to put on Hansard for the third time a few lines which were written by a soldier at the front, and which were quoted in this House on two former occasions:

> Take up our quarrel with the foe,
> To you from falling hands we throw
> The torch,—be yours to hold it high;
> If ye break faith with us who die,
> We shall not sleep though poppies grow
> In Flanders' fields.

I can only say in conclusion: God help the man on whom is cast the responsibility of playing any part in carrying on the Government of this country who breaks faith with the 40,000 men who have given up their lives on Flanders fields, and the 100,000 men who have been wounded and who have gone through pangs which no man can conceive unless he has had a like experience. The responsibility is a terrible one. I have sufficient faith in the people of this country to believe that they will hold the torch on high; that they will not break faith with those men, and I have sufficient faith in them to believe that they will pass this law; that they will nobly and sincerely uphold the Government in enforcing the law. Those men who are enlisted under it will go to the front and add more lustre to the name of Canada. They will make Canada a country upon which every man and all our children and children's children will be proud to look back and say: When the terrible stress came, the people of Canada did not break faith with the men who fought and died for them, but they stood up like brave men and fought, and, if necessary, died themselves in order that civilization might live upon the earth.

The House divided upon the proposed amendment of Mr. Molloy:

Amendment negatived.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was paired with the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. JAMES M. DOUGLAS: I was paired with the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Hunt). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. McCURDY: I was paired with the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. MOLLOY: I voted by mistake, as I was paired with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements). I voted, of course, for the amendment.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James, Montreal): As I was opposed last session to conscription of all kinds, and as I was re-elected as an opponent of conscription, the members of this new Parliament will not expect me to vote for an extension of the law which I opposed last session. This resolution goes further than the previous law and sets aside all the exemption rights that men have acquired by judgment or otherwise, often at big legal expenses, and extends the age to bring within the law young men of nineteen. To be consistent, and true to my electors, I now beg to move, seconded by Mr. Deslauriers (St. Mary):

That this resolution be not now adopted, but that the consideration thereof take place this day six months.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is an error in the announcement of the vote which has been taken. The figures are: Yeas, 70; nays, 118. The 70 yeas include the vote of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy), who desires his vote not to be counted, but the rule is that a vote once recorded cannot be withdrawn.

The question is now on the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe).

Lanctôt,

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was paired with the hon. member for East York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT (1913) AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) Bill No. 50, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Assay Office certificate prima facie evidence of ingredients, etc., in article.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move to amend the section by adding after the word " by " on the fourth line the words " the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Mint or by ".

The CHAIRMAN: The section as amended will now read:

An official certificate by the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Mint, or by any Dominion Government Assay Office in Canada that any article to which this Act applies has been assayed by such office shall be prima facie evidence that the ingredients and quantities stated by the certificate to be contained in the article are contained therein, and in all legal proceedings had in pursuance of this Act shall be receivable as evidence of the facts set forth in the certificate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The change that is made is this: The section as it at present exists in the Act provides that in cases of analyses of ingredients the evidence shall be the assay at the Branch of the Royal mint at Ottawa. The amendment is designed to add to that branch the Assay Office of the Royal mint in British Columbia, so that the assay of that branch shall be evidence as to the ingredients the same as is the assay of the branch of the Royal mint here.

Mr. MURPHY: How many of these assay offices are there?

[Mr. Tremain.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is the branch of the Royal mint here, and the one in British Columbia.

Mr. BUREAU: When any of these ingredients are assayed does the print of the office appear?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Would it not be well to enumerate in the Act, if the analysis is going to be treated as prima facie evidence, the assay offices that exist in the Dominion? It may be stated, for instance, that it was an assay of the Vancouver assay office, but that would not be evidence before a court that there was an assay office in Vancouver unless we prove it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We say any assay office.

Mr. BUREAU: There is the trouble, the offices ought to be enumerated in the statute to facilitate matters. You should enumerate your offices whether in Vancouver, Montreal or Ottawa, so that the court would know that there is an assay office there.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think that is necessary. The parliamentary counsel has made the amendments, and, of course, he understands the legal significance of the provision.

Mr. FIELDING: Would it be better to say the certificate of the Ottawa mint, or the certificate of the officer in charge of the mint? I am thinking of the person as distinct from the office. I imagine that in the general law respecting the mint that is provided for, but the point is worth a moment's thought as to whether this provision should be equally specific.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not the person in charge, but the branch that is mentioned in the original Act.

Mr. FIELDING: I thought the point worth calling my hon. friend's attention to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have never experienced any difficulty in that regard.

Mr. BUREAU: Where is the Royal mint of Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Royal mint is in London, but there is a branch of it in Ottawa.

Mr. BUREAU: Then it is not a Canadian institution?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, and no.

Mr. BUREAU: How do you explain that the office in Ottawa is only a branch of the Royal mint in London?

Mr. FIELDING: For good reasons, explained at the time, it was thought expedient that it should be.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a branch of the Royal mint at London, and at the time it was thought expedient that it should be so. It is in one sense a Canadian institution entirely. It has been put up by Canada, the gain or loss is Canada's, but it is under the management—and I am glad it is—of the experts of the Royal mint of England.

Mr. BUREAU: Will my hon. friend say if it makes any difference whether the assay office is designated in the statute or not?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the certificate is there, that is quite sufficient.

Mr. BUREAU: Does it bear the stamp of the assay office?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose so.

Mr. BUREAU: The assay offices are enumerated in some other statute, I suppose, or are they created by Order in Council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think they are created by Order in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the point I want to come to. If I produce something in court as evidence, and it is not in the statute, how am I going to prove that this assay office is really the genuine thing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no doubt that my hon. friend as a lawyer will be ingenious enough to do that.

Mr. BUREAU: I may lack the genius. I would sooner have it specified in the statute.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I prefer to take the amendment as framed by the law officer.

Mr. BUREAU: We have had things like this before in this committee, and the Prime Minister, who is a lawyer himself, has seen fit to change them. With all due respect to these law officers, most of whom are excellent men, there may be some things that escape their attention when they have a rush of work. It is no reason for throwing aside a reasonable suggestion that a law officer has framed an amendment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will not throw it aside as unreasonable, but I think it is sufficient as it is. If it is not, I will advise with the Department of Justice and it can be fixed in the Upper House.

Mr. BUREAU: We have not much confidence in any fixing being done by the Upper House.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) Bill No. 63, to amend the Fisheries Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister explain what effect this will have on those who are in the business?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At present the practise is for Americans and Canadians as well to fish outside of territorial waters for lobsters during the close season.

Mr. FIELDING: Outside of the territorial waters?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Outside of the territorial limits. Representations were made to the American Government regarding this and on March 15 last a Bill was introduced in the House of Representatives to prohibit the importation of, and the bringing into or landing in the United States, of lobsters taken in waters outside the territorial waters during the close season. When legislation is passed by the American Congress and the Canadian Parliament neither Canadians nor Americans will be allowed to fish for lobsters outside of territorial waters during the close season.

Mr. FIELDING: Apart from this question of the fishing outside of territorial limits, the Bill does not deal with the lobster question at all. The hon. gentleman's department, as the public know, is contemplating some change in the lobster regulations, but that matter will be dealt with, I suppose, in the form of regulations, and not in this Bill?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Quite so.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As the House still seems to be very fresh, we might take up some Supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If there is any decided protest, and if hon. gentlemen feel overworked, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MURPHY: Monday is private members' day?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.39 p.m.

Monday, April 22, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Volume IV of the Report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31st, 1917.—Sir Robert Borden.

Certain information in connection with Bill No. 53, relating to the Civil Service.—Sir Robert Borden.

Copy of Orders in Council in reference to appointment of Colonel Langton as Paymaster General in Militia Department.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

Return showing what bluebooks have been printed during the years 1916 and 1917.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 65, to amend the Companies Act.

Mr. MURPHY: Explain.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: The amendment is to one of the sections of the Companies Act. That section requires that the original instruments creating mortgages and charges upon properties of the different companies concerned should be deposited with the Secretary of State. Several lawyers practising in the province of Quebec have called my attention to the fact that, inasmuch as in that province large numbers of these classes of deeds require for their validity to be executed notarially, it is not possible to comply with the provision of the statute as it now stands, the originals of the instruments, having, as is well known, to remain with the notary. The purpose of the amendment is to provide that in cases of that kind a notarially-certified copy of an authentic instrument of that nature may be deposited with the Secretary of State, and shall avail as the original for the purpose of the deposit.

There is also another amendment, to insert the word "hypothec." The section as it now stands provides for deeds of mortgage, etc. As in Quebec, many of these charges are by hypothec, which is a different thing to a mortgage, it has been thought wise to insert the word "hypothec" also.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

NATURALIZATION ACT, 1914.

(Correction of clerical error in French version.)

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 66 to correct a clerical error in the French version of the Naturalization Act, 1914.

He said: The purpose of the Bill is to correct what upon its face is a manifest error in the translation. The section sought to be amended is one which provides that, where a person who is a British subject ceases by declaration of alienage or otherwise to be such British subject, any minor children of his, who by reason of his being a British subject are also British subjects, shall likewise cease to be British subjects. The English version makes an exception to that for the case where the minor child, by the ceasing of its parent to be a British subject, does not become under the law of any other country a citizen of that other country. In that event, where that consequence does not follow, the child would remain a British subject. The English version itself is, perhaps, not very felicitously expressed, and it is probably in view of the form in which it is so expressed not to be wondered at that the error was made in the translation. The translation as it now reads makes a child cease to be a British subject, not unless he does not, but unless he does by the operation of the law of some other country in consequence of his parents ceasing to be British subjects, become a citizen of that country. It is, however, precisely the other case that is desired to be excepted.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as the Bill is intended to correct a clerical error in the French wording of this Naturalization Act, would my honourable friend be kind enough to explain the proposed change in my mother tongue?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): I have not here the statute in question, but I think that in comparing the clause as it now reads with the proposed amendment, the reason of this change will become more apparent; it will also be realized that this amendment is absolutely necessary in order that the French version be in accordance with the provisions contained in the English bill. The law we have passed here is exactly the same as the one voted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and the error I have mentioned has slipped into the French translation. To the general rule that, whenever the parent ceases to be a British subject, any minor children of his shall also cease to be British subjects, the Bill, as worded in English, makes exception in cases where the minor child, though its parent has ceased to be a British subject, has not become under the law of any other country a citizen of that other country, while the French text, as it is now in the statute book excepts the very case where the child becomes a citizen of another country.

The purpose of that section is to conserve British citizenship to every child whose father ceased to be a British subject whenever, under the laws of the country to which his father has emigrated, the said child has not become a citizen of that other country, and who, unless an exception were made in his behalf would lose thereby all citizenship. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

12. "Lorsqu'une personne, étant sujet britannique, cesse de l'être par une déclaration d'extranéité ou autrement, tout enfant mineur de cette personne cesse en même temps d'être sujet britannique, sauf dans le cas où tel enfant ne devient pas, en vertu de la loi d'un autre pays, par le fait que telle personne a cessé d'être sujet britannique,, naturalisé dans cet autre pays."

I admit, Sir, that the translation is not of the nicest, but as the English wording is not itself very elegant, it was not possible for me to give a translation of it both correct and beautiful.

Mr. BUREAU (Translation): The reference here is, no doubt, to countries that do not recognize the naturalization of minors?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Exactly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have not observed that the new regulations with regard to the censorship of the press have been laid on the Table. If not, may I ask when they will be brought down?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understood that they had been brought down.

Mr. DOHERTY: I laid them on the Table on Friday, I think.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 7, respecting The Canadian Indemnity Company.—Mr. Allan.

Bill No. 23, to incorporate Merchants Casualty Company.—Mr. Andrews.

Bill No. 6, respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 34, respecting The Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company.—Mr. Morphy.

Bill No. 10, to enable the Western Power Company of Canada, Limited, to own and operate the railway of the Western Canada Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Stacey.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 58, respecting certain patents of The Dynamic Balancing Machine Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 59, to incorporate the Gospel Workers' Church in Canada.—Mr. Middlebro.

Bill No. 60, to incorporate Montreal, Joliette and Transcontinental Junction Railway Company.—Mr. Denis.

Bill No. 61, respecting The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. Stewart.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks].

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

Mr. MacNUTT:

1. What is the total number of "draftees" under the "Military Service Act," up to 1st of February, 1918?
2. How many were exempted for farm work?
3. How many were declared "medically unfit?"
4. What disposition has been made of the "medically unfit?"

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Some little time ago I asked if the hon. gentleman would be good enough to make somewhat clearer what he contemplated by the word "draftee." Does he mean those who have passed through the Military Service Act and who have been ordered to report, or does he mean men actually taken into the force, because his conception of the meaning of the word makes a difference both as to the answers that ought to be given and as to the department that ought to answer the question?

Question stands.

TORONTO CENTRAL POLICE BUREAU.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware of the fact that on or about the 29th of March, 1918, in the City of Toronto (Trinity Street), detectives of the Central Police Bureau searched and found a large consignment of firearms, revolvers, and swords?

2. Has the Government taken any steps towards investigating this matter?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: The Government has no information. Inquiry is being made.

HARBOUR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. CROWE:

1. What has been the cost, respectively, of (a) dredging, (b) construction of wharves, (c) breakwaters, and (d) repairs, in connection with the Harbours of Halifax, N.S., St. John, N.B., Victoria, B.C., and Vancouver, B.C., since October, 1911, to the present date?

2. What has been the total expenditure in connection with the construction and repairs of dry docks in the harbours of Halifax, N.S., and St. John, N.B.?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL: This question has been referred to my department, and it has, so far as my department is concerned, been answered, but certain expenditures by the Department of Marine and Fisheries have to be added to the answer.

Question stands.

MOTOR-BOATS FOR SALMON FISHING.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to pass legislation to compel motor-boats used for salmon fishing to be equipped with mufflers?

2. Is the Government aware that motor-boats, as actually used, prevent salmon from getting in rivers to spawn?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Under consideration.

2. No.

CLAIMS AGAINST CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

Have any claims been preferred against the Government in connection with the C.N.R. that were not specified at the rate of purchase; if so, what is the gross amount of such claims?

Hon. Mr. REID: No.

MAJOR J. W. MARJESON.

Mr. POWER:

1. What position does Major J. W. Marjeson hold in the Department of Militia and Defence?

2. What is his salary?

3. Is any separation allowance drawn by any person on his account?

[Mr. Doherty.]

4. What amounts were paid him during the months of November and December, 1917?

5. What qualifications does he possess to justify him holding his present rank?

6. What qualifying course has he followed in order to obtain that rank?

7. By whom was he recommended for his present position?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. President, Separation Allowance Board; Chairman, Refund Adjustment Board.

2. Major in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and is paid, in addition to pay and allowances of his rank, $1 per day extra duty pay and 80 cents per day subsistence allowance.

3. Yes, separation allowance is paid to his wife at Major's rate.

4. Answered by No. 2. (He was on leave from November 20 to December 20).

5. He was a Lieutenant in the 75th Regiment, having taken a course at Aldershot in 1910. He was appointed Paymaster 25th Battalion, C.E.F., with the rank of Captain, and, after 18 months' service overseas and in Canada, was given the rank of Major. Under P. C. 447 constituting the Separation Allowance Board, the President must be a returned soldier, a Field Officer and a person having legal knowledge.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. By the then Accountant and Paymaster-General.

JAS. STARRATT MARSHALL.

Mr. POWER:

1. Has there been since August, 1914, a person named Jas. Starratt Marshall, of Spa Springs, Annapolis county, in the Active Militia of Canada?

2. If not, when did he leave the service?

3. If so, when did he join the service, and what has been his occupation?

4. What amount has he received during the period in which he was employed?

5. Has the Government any information as to whether or not whilst in the service he carried on the work of laundryman either in his public or private capacity?

6. If in the former capacity, what extra pay did he receive?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: When the hon. gentleman asked this question the other day, the minister suggested that if the hon. gentleman would give further information, he might be able to answer the question. The hon. gentleman has not yet given any further information.

Question stands.

EAST CACOUNA WHARF.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Does the Minister of Public Works know that the wharf, which was constructed at East Cacouna in spite of much local opposition, is an obstruction to light-craft navigation and is of no public usefulness whatever?

2. If not, is it the Minister's intention to investigate the matter with a view to avoiding needless expense in connection with said wharf in the future?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL: No, and nothing in the departmental records show that there was opposition to the construction of the work. The District Engineer states wharf is not an obstruction to light-craft navigation, but is of public usefulness by providing a landing at high tide for small craft crossing from upper end of Notre Dame des Sept Douleurs.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY SHARES.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

Has the Government acquired the five-sixths of all the shares of the Canadian Northern Railway as authorized by chapter 24 of the Statutes of 1917? If so, when?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, as of October 1, 1917.

ORPINGTON MILITARY HOSPITAL.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

1. Does the Government contribute to the maintenance of the Ontario Military Hospital at Orpington?

2. If so, to what extent?

3. Is there any agreement or contract to that effect? If so, what is it?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL (for Major-General Mewburn):

1. Yes.

2. The Province of Ontario contributes £30,000 sterling annually towards maintenance; the balance, if any, is chargeable to Canadian Funds. This latter information is being obtained by letter from the Overseas Ministry.

3. Yes. The Ontario Government provided and equipped the hospital, to be under the administration of Canadian Army Medical Services during the period of the war; after which the premises and equipment are to be handed over to the Ontario Government, and the Canadian Government assume no further liability.

HIGH COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE, LONDON.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

At page ZZ-227 of the Auditor General's Report for the year ending March 31, 1916, we find that the sum of $367,443.39 was advanced by the High Commissioner's Office to the Chief Paymaster, London, and that said sum is a balance of advances unaccounted for.

1. Has an account of said advances been rendered since the Report of the Auditor General was tabled?

2. If not, has the Government endeavoured to obtain such an account justifying or explaining the disposition of said amount?

3. Who was in charge of the High Commissioner's Office, at London, during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1916?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL (for Major-General Mewburn):

1. Yes; accounting will appear in the Auditor General's Report, year ending March 31, 1917, which is now in hands of the printer.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Sir George Perley, acting High Commissioner for Canada. Mr. W. L. Griffiths, secretary.

SICKNESS OF SOLDIERS ON LEAVE.

Mr. CURRIE:

1. What steps have been taken to establish a safe routine for dealing with the numerous cases of sickness of soldiers while on leave?

2. Has the Government in contemplation the extending of any compensation to the families that have suffered by the lack of such a system?

Hon. Mr. REID (for Major-General Mewburn):

1. In the General Instructions concerning hospitals immediately to be issued, the following appears:

"No Officer, N.C.O. or man will be treated at his own home, but will be transferred under the direction and supervision of a Medical Officer to a Military Hospital, except when, in the opinion of his medical attendant, it will be unwise to move him."

2. No, but individual cases receive consideration as they arise.

FOOD CONTROL DEPARTMENT EXPENSES.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

What was the cost of operating the Department of Food Control, including salaries, temporary employment, travelling expenses, services of all kinds, equipment, rent, etc., from the date on which the Branch was organized up to December 31, 1917?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: $105,159.17.

ANNUAL REPORTS IN FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

*Mr. ARTHURS:

1. What is the custom of the public departments with regard to the preparation of annual reports? Are they principally written in English and later translated into French, or vice versa?

2. What is the proportion of reports that reach the Editorial Committee in (a) English, and (b) French?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. The custom of the public departments since Confederation seems to have been to prepare all annual reports in English.

From the printed English version, the French translation is made.

2. All the original reports with which the editorial committee has had to deal during the six months of its existence have been in the English language.

EDITORIAL COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Who composed the Editorial Committee respecting the Printing of Public Documents?
2. How many persons form this Committee, and of what nationality are they?
3. What are the duties and salary of each person?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Fred. Cook, assistant King's Printer; F. C. T. O'Hara, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce; F. C. C. Lynch, Superintendent, Natural Resources Intelligence Branch, Department of the Interior.

2. Answered by No. 1. Mr. Cook, English-born, but has been a resident of Canada for thirty-six years; Mr. O'Hara, Canadian-born; Mr. Lynch, Canadian-born.

3. The duties of the aforementioned, in addition to the duties of their respective offices, are to consider all reports and publications of various kinds submitted by the various Government departments to the King's Printer, with a view to eliminating as far as possible the publication of what is considered unnecessary from the standpoint of economy both as regards the cost of printing and distribution of public documents. In general, to carry out the wishes of Parliament as expressed in the report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the printing of Parliament, presented on September 12, 1917.

The members of the Editorial Committee have not been paid any remuneration for their services as members of such committee.

Their salaries for their regular duties are as follows: Mr. Cook, $4,000; Mr. O'Hara, $5,000; Mr. Lynch, $2,700.

*Mr. CURRIE:

According to an Order in Council recently submitted to the House, provision is made for the appointment of an Editorial Committee, which works under a Sub-committee of Council of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is Chairman, such a Committee having been recommended by the Joint Committee on Printing last Session. Has the Right Honourable Minister any report to submit to the House on the operation of this Editorial Committee?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The report is now being prepared and will be laid on the Table in the future.

[Mr. Burrell.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CURRIE:

1. What are the names of all persons employed in connection with the work of preparing the Votes and Proceedings, the Order Paper and the Journals of the House, (a) in English, and (b) in French, and the salary and other remuneration paid to each?
2. What number of each of these documents are printed, (a) in English, and (b) in French, and the cost of printing and binding the same for the fiscal year ending the 31st of March, 1918?

Mr. CURRIE:

1. What are the names of all persons employed in connection with the work of reporting and translating in the House?
2. How long has each been so employed?
3. What is the rate of remuneration paid to each during the past year, with the total amount paid to each class of persons?
4. What number of copies of the Debates of the House have been printed during the past year, (a) in English, and (b) in French, specifying the number of the unrevised and of the revised editions, respectively?
5. What is the cost of printing and binding the same for each year since 1900, inclusive?
6. What are the amounts paid in addition to the above, in each year since 1900, inclusive, for (a) reporting, (b) translating, (c) typewriting, and (d) printing proceedings before Parliamentary Committees?

Mr. McMASTER:

What amounts have been paid by the Government for printing or advertising to the Globe, Toronto, and the Devoir, Montreal, during each of the fiscal years ending March 31, 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918.

FEDERAL ELECTION DOCUMENT.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for Mr. Archambault) moved:

For a copy of envelopes Nos. 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 39, 53, 56, 59, and 99, polling booth No. 9, Barracks of St. Johns, Quebec, used in the Federal Election of 17th December last and placed in Military bag No. 446 of the North American Continent Military Votes. Also, a copy of the envelopes Numbers 65 and 70, polling booth No. 4, Barracks of St. Johns, Quebec, used in the Federal Election of 17th December last, and placed in Military bag Number 451 of the North American Continent Military Votes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Stand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might we have some explanation why this motion is allowed to stand?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): My colleague asked that this motion be allowed to stand, because it will be necessary to look into the effect of it. I do not want to say at the present moment that the papers cannot be brought down, but I would point out this: In order to produce the copies which the hon. member is asking for, it will be necessary to withdraw the documents referred to from the sealed packages in which they are contained in the custody of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Now, all the provisions which are contained in the statute with regard to these documents convey the idea that these seals are not to be broken except upon an order for a recount, when they would be broken by the judge or in his presence, and after he has done with the papers he would be bound to seal them up again. There is also provision for the production of documents of this kind upon the order of a court when there is some proceeding pending before that court in which these documents are necessary evidence, or when there is a petition in contestation of an election pending before such court. In these cases, provision is made for an order of the court for the production of these documents, which involves, of course, the breaking of the seals, and that is done in the presence of the court. The law prescribes that in such cases the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall obey such an order of the court, but it specifically orders him, when he receives these election documents, which are under seal, to retain them for a period of one year and then destroy them, unless within that period there has been contestation of an election, in which event he is to retain them for a year subsequent to the decision of the contestation.

There is also a specific provision in the Dominion Elections Act—it is true, it mentions ballot papers only, because then there was no question of envelopes of this kind—that none of these ballot papers are to be inspected by anybody while they are in the possession of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. So, as I read the statute, the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is to keep those sealed packages sealed, subject to their production upon an order of a competent court, which order is to be made only when there is some proceeding before that court in which these documents may be necessary. For the moment, I do not think it is necessary to go into the question whether Parliament might be included as being a court in a proper case, but I would point out that there is absolutely no proceeding pending before Parliament in which it is made to appear that these documents are required. The motion is simply to procure copies of these documents—I have no doubt for some proper purpose—and it seems to me we should look more closely into the effect of the motion before passing it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will ask the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) to read the minister's explanation.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR:

For a return giving an abstract of all claims, with the names of the claimants and the amount of each claim filed against the Department of Railways and Canals, on account of the freezing of shipments of potatoes on the Prince Edward Island Railway or on the docks at Charlottetown, Pictou, Summerside and Point du Chene, during the year 1916. Also a return giving the same information for the year 1917, including the above-named railway and docks, the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway and the dock at Port Borden.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR:

For a return giving an abstract of all claims, with the names of the claimants and the amount of each claim, made against the Department of Railways and Canals for breakage and pilferage on the Prince Edward Island Railway in 1917.

ALIEN LABOUR IN CANADA.

MOTIONS ON ORDER PAPER BY MR. CLEMENTS, MR. W. F. MACLEAN, AND MR. G. B. NICHOLSON DISCUSSED JOINTLY.

Mr. SPEAKER: The first resolution on the Order Paper is one by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) dealing with alien labour in Canada. Before putting the motion, I may say that to prevent unnecessary overlapping, it has been deemed advisable to join the discussion on resolutions Nos. 4 (Mr. Clements); 18, Mr. W. F. Maclean (South York), and 20, Mr. Nicholson (East Algoma). While they are not exactly similar, there is sufficient similarity between them to enable discussion to take place on the one resolution, which I believe meets with the approval of the movers of the respective motions.

Mr. H. S. CLEMENTS (Comox and Alberni) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, all the regulations and Orders in Council respecting Alien labour in Canada should be consolidated into one uniform law but that in framing such legislation due regard should be had to the local conditions and needs of the different parts of the Dominion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to propose the resolution which stands in my name, I think I need offer no apology for taking up the time of the House unnecessarily. I am not a new member and I should regret at any time bringing to the attention of the House a question which I did not deem to be of paramount interest to the country at large. Unfortunately, a good many members do take up time unnecessarily in the discussion of subjects which do not fall within that category. The question which I am going to bring forward, as the resolution itself indicates, deals with the alien situation in Canada. I think that question is a most important one and that it merits every consideration possible from the Government, especially from a strong Union Government, who should deal with the situation with an iron hand.

Shortly after the elections in December last I drew the attention of the minister representing the province of British Columbia, and of my fellow-members from that province to the alien situation as regards western Canada, and more especially the province of British Columbia, which I have the honour to represent, a very large territory, and in each and every case I received in reply a very sympathetic letter practically agreeing to the programme which I proposed. Now, Mr. Speaker, as far as I am personally concerned, I desire something more than personal sympathy, I want action taken as regards the alien situation in this country, and especially in western Canada. I might say at the outset that the Order in Council brought down a few days ago by the Prime Minister, dealing with idleness in the Dominion, to some extent meets the object of my resolution, but I must frankly state that that Order in Council will not be worth the paper it is written on unless it is carried out with a strong iron hand, not by any commission, but by the best police authority that can possibly be obtained. To my mind to entrust its enforcement to a commission would not meet the situation at all; there have been too many useless commissions appointed in the past. I believe that one good business man, in a good many cases, would have given better service and accomplished far more than some of these commissions have done. The main purpose of my resolution, and the advice I wish to offer to the Government and to the country, is, that whether you take a census of the man-power of Canada or not, and I believe that is very essential, it is imperative that an absolute census should be taken of every alien in Canada, regardless of their sex and regardless of their nationality or their holdings in Canada. If that were done it would show, in my opinion, that there are in this country very disturbing elements, a fact which this Government does not adequately realize, but which calls for strong and prompt action on the part of the present Union Government. If such action were taken by the Government it would show that they mean business, and it would inspire the alien element to which I refer with greater respect for Canadian citizenship, greater respect for the institutions of the country, and a greater appreciation of the magnificent means of livelihood which they can command at any time in the Dominion. In the second place, it would be of the very greatest advantage to the present Government, or to subsequent incoming administration in this respect: They would be in a position to know what kind of immigration should be admitted into this country in the future; for I am bound to say that in the past the Federal Government has been by far too lax with respect to this subject. Greater precautions, in my humble judgment, should be adopted in the Dominion with respect to the admission of immigrants, and if a census is taken such as I am now proposing it will be very advantageous not only at the present time, but in the future, as regards immigration. I must say that I appreciate the difficulties, not only of an international nature but otherwise, of conscripting the many thousands of aliens who are within the borders of Canada to-day. I listened with a great deal of attention to the Prime Minister's remarks last week when he referred to the thousands of Belgians who have been conscripted by Germany in the interest of that country and the maintenance of her industries. Personally, I see no reason why every alien enemy in the Dominion should not be conscripted and placed at work doing something for the State, instead of being allowed to run at large as disloyal aliens and pro-Germans are now doing to the disadvantage of Canada. I would not go so far as to say that any aliens should be conscripted and placed in the firing line, or conscripted at $1.10 a day for labour purposes. I think that due regard should be had at all times to labour conditions and to the views of the labour organizations of this country. I believe in the organization of labour just as much as I believe in the organization of capital, but I also hold that both of them should be reasonable in their demands. I believe the enemy aliens in Canada should be conscripted and put to work and given a fair wage for the sustenance of themselves and families, and that the balance of their wages, due regard being paid to the value of their labour, should be taken and applied for the benefit of the State, or for some fund to be devoted towards ameliorating the conditions of our gallant soldiers who have returned incapacitated from the front. That is my view so far as alien labour is concerned.

I have heard many people make the argument, including several sound business men, in connection with what may be termed the shortage of labour in this country, that the importation of fifty thousand or one hundred thousand coolie labourers from China should be permitted. I am absolutely opposed to any such idea, and I see no reason for it. So far as the development of our national industries, or the acceleration of the production of food stuffs is concerned, if the present strong Union Government take hold of the situation, as I think they ought to do, and properly distribute the available labour, whether it be male or female, and put the new Military Act into proper effect, I believe that ample labour will be found to take care of our industries and to meet all our requirements in the way of increased food production.

There is a very large element in this Dominion who, up to the present time, have apparently not realized the seriousness of this war or the obligations of their citizenship. I refer now, not to aliens, but to our own red-blooded citizens, to those who are loyal Britishers, but who do not appear to realize the gravity of the situation. Possibly born with silver spoons in their mouths and possessing bank accounts, they have shown little, if any, appreciation of the duty which devolves upon them of doing something in the interest of the country and of the allied cause. Because they have a bank account, or are otherwise favoured by fortune, that is no reason why they should go Scot free. I believe that every man from the age of twenty to sixty, including the class that I refer to, if he is not already in service should be conscripted and made, if necessary, to don a pair of overalls and cotton shirt and drive a binder or a plough on the prairies in order to bring about greater production. That is what I would recommend in so far as that particular class is concerned.

With reference to the conscription of labour, there is no doubt that in British Columbia the lumber and other interests have made very serious complaints about the labour situation. There would be no serious shortage of lumber in British Columbia but for the activities of alien enemy, pro-German, agitators who are creating disturbances in the different camps and at the different mills. Their propaganda is assisted by the fact that the mill owners have been endeavouring to keep the country a white man's country and not to employ Asiatic labour. A mill owner will get a crew together and at great expense will transport that crew from Vancouver or Prince Albert to a mill 100 or 300 miles distant. Shortly after the men have reached their destination one of these enemy alien agitators will appear on the scene and make demands upon the employer that cannot be granted. The result is that the mill is closed down. If time permitted I could give the House absolute evidence of instances in which agitators have appeared and, when questioned about their nationality, claimed to be Russians or Italians, when as a matter of fact they were Austrians. This element, and there are only a few hundreds of thousands of them in this country, ought to receive the attention of this Government. They ought 4 p.m. to be compelled to assume the duties of citizens of this country whose protection and liberty they enjoy. I want to be absolutely fair in my remarks in regard to these people. I am speaking with particular reference to the situation in Northern British Columbia, because I know the conditions there better than I know them as they exist in the prairie provinces, but I assume that the situation I am discussing is somewhat similar all over the Dominion. There are thousands of Austrians in Northern British Columbia who are working in the large plants there, who realize their position as aliens and who are absolutely peaceful and harmless. They are not doing any harm, but they are doing their best to develop our natural resources and to promote the Allied cause. Therefore, I have nothing to say against that peaceful element in this country. But, if this Government are not strong enough to deal with the element to which I have particularly referred, who are agitators, German sympathizers, and, in fact, just as much pro-German as the Kaiser is, then it is not worthy of the support that it got from the people of this country. I care not whether the reason advanced for not dealing with these people be international law or not; I say that the time has arrived, in the great stress of this war, when international law might very well be forgotten, and when even the Act of Confederation might be overlooked, if necessary, to meet the situation. The situation is not what it has been in the past and changed circumstances call for extraordinary remedies.

As far as the distribution of labour is concerned, there are in British Columbia large Austrian, Italian and other elements who are naturally railroad builders and who could be very well conscripted and brought to the prairie provinces, or any other provinces, of this Dominion to repair the roadbeds which are so necessary to meet the transportation needs of the country and to help in winning the war.

I regret to have to refer to the province of Quebec. I would like to say personally that I was brought up with French Canadians and I have always had the highest regard for many of them, although I must confess that because of the recent attitude of Quebec I have not had the same regard for them as I had in the past. We heard the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the other day pleading the cause of Quebec and telling us why the men of Quebec had not enlisted as we had expected they would do. I see no reason why 20,000—yes—75,000 French Canadians, with their narrow farms, 100 yards wide in some instances, should not be conscripted, taken to British Columbia and placed in their natural element, the lumber woods. Whether this be done under the Military Service Act or not, I mean to suggest that their work should be done under military supervision and that they should be employed in the production of spruce lumber particularly, which is so important from the aeroplane point of view and therefore important to the allied cause. If 75,000 French Canadians in the province of Quebec were conscripted, taken into the province of British Columbia and kept there for six months or a year, I believe that when they returned to Quebec they would be better citizens and would educate the balance of that province.

At every meeting I had the honour of addressing throughout that great country that I have the honour of representing, two paramount questions were put to me. There was represented in those meetings the red blood of both the former political parties, and they united in supporting me as the candidate of the Union Government. One point these people insisted on was that this Government should deal with a strong hand with the alien enemies I have referred to. The second was that each province, in so far as the enforcement of the Military Service Act was concerned, should be standardized and should give its quota according to its population. I am here to advocate that and to do my utmost to carry it out regardless of whether the Government of the day sees fit to do it or not.

Speaking for the northern part of British Columbia, I desire to say that the red blood of that country responded to the country's call irrespective of the Military Service Act. Every available man coming within that category enlisted voluntarily and, I regret to say, in many cases, made the supreme sacrifice. They came forward without any hesitation and offered themselves for their country's cause and the cause of civilization. If time permitted, I could point to dozens and dozens of men fifty-five and sixty years of age who gave a wrong age so that they might get to the front and do their duty.

But I say it is galling indeed to the fathers, mothers and daughters of those who so gallantly responded to the colours, to see these seditious elements surrounding them at every point on that coast, watching and waiting like a hawk watches a bird, to take advantage of the positions that these gallant men filled before they left for the front, waiting to swoop down upon every fishing or other privilege that they enjoyed. On several occasions I have brought these matters to the attention of the officers of the Government, and have referred to these seditious elements who are always skating as close as possible to the thin ice so as to avoid arrest. Finally, some one would plead that he was a naturalized Canadian, it may be an Austrian living in our country as a naturalized citizen. The officials have told me that, under those conditions, it was impossible to deal with such individuals owing to their being naturalized. Well, Sir, if we have not the machinery to deal with them, it is high time that the Government instituted some machinery. There are thousands upon thousands in this country who should be dealt with with an iron hand.

Now, that is about all I have to say upon the subject. I hope that the few moments I have occupied this afternoon, in my feeble way, will give a great deal of food for thought to this Government in their efforts to deal with this very grave situation. The leader of the Opposition the other day invited the solution of the problem of unison in this Dominion. He was referring at that time to the difficulties between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It is all right to carry out an obligation, whether it be a private note or an international pledge, but, as I mentioned in my opening remarks, these are not times of peace, these are strenuous times for the Empire and the Dominion. While I am not speaking for the Government, I will say in conclusion, that if I had the power placed in my hands by the Almighty this afternoon, I would give my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition the solution for unison in this Dominion, which will be for the best interests of Canada in the future whether in one province or another. If I had it in my power from the Almighty this afternoon, I would say this, Mr. Speaker: Before the clock tolled twelve to-night, I would institute in this country one flag, one school and one language.

Mr. R. C. COOPER (South Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of this House I rise with due humility to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements). If there was an apology necessary, it is absolutely done away with by a date to be found on that calendar behind your back. On that date, three years ago, our men made history for Canada at Ypres. To-day, I find an attempt, supported from Halifax to Vancouver by every branch of the Great War Veterans' Association, by many manufacturers, by many other associations, and by many independent men and women, to bring the enemy alien under some control. On this subject I wrote on the 11th April to the right hon. leader of the Government, asking if he would give me an expression of the intention of the Government on this matter. I have not yet received an answer. On March 26th, a petition was handed to the Prime Minister and the Government by the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada. I propose to read this to the House, and it will show what these men ask for.

March 26, 1918.

To the Right Honourable
Sir Robert L. Borden, P.C., K.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister, Ottawa.

Sir,—

May it please you to hear and give consideration to the humble petition of this gathering of representatives of the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada, which follows:

Whereas there are in Canada a great number of people of alien origin.

Therefore be it resolved that it is our opinion that the aliens of enemy origin in our midst should be employed in work of National importance or in industries essential to the winning of the War, under proper surveillance, and their employer for the time being made responsible for them; and that their earnings over and above an amount equal to the pay and allowances of a Canadian soldier be taken by the Government for War purposes: or, failing their being employed that such alien enemies be interned.

Further that measures be taken at once to make the Military Service Act applicable to all allied aliens in the same manner and to the same extent as to the citizens of Canada, either by negotiating the necessary treaties or conventions with the remaining Allied countries, upon similar lines or the same as those provided for in the conventions recently adopted between the United States of America and Great Britain, or, failing the obtaining of such treaties or conventions, that such allied aliens be forthwith given the option of enlisting voluntarily in the Canadian Forces, or being deported to their country of origin as is being done by the Government of the United States under the Alien Slacker Bill just passed by an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives at Washington.

Further that no steps should be taken to call out the second or other class under the Military Service Act, or to return to France married men of the First Contingent, C.E.F., until the question of the disposition of the aliens has been settled in a manner satisfactory to the citizens of Canada, and that we urge the Government to take up and deal with these questions without further delay.

I would say, Sir, that the Government failed to take any notice of these representations. In my own province of British Columbia, there have been large mass meetings held for the purpose of making the Government at least look into this matter, if it does nothing else. To-day, in British Columbia alone, we have a matter of more than 60,000 enemy aliens, who are practically allowed their liberty, who can do as they like, and over whom there is no control. I ask you to-day, with our young men going overseas to defend our shores in France, what is our position going to be if these aliens are left in practically uncontrolled freedom? It is not possible that we may have a repetition of the scenes enacted in Northern France, in Flanders, in Serbia, in Montenegro and in Northern Italy? It is possible. It may not be likely, but I commend it to the attention of the Government. What has been done to handle this question? I noticed in a paper the other day that it was proposed to form a garrison battalion. Presumably that is the only way they could be handled. Some of our industries in British Columbia, notably the railways and the mines, are practically controlled by enemy aliens of Austrian or German origin.

These men have absolute liberty, and they earn anywhere from $4 to $10 or $12 a day. What do they contribute to the country? How do they help the country to carry on this war, which was saddled upon us by their own people? Absolutely nothing. In a few cases they have been persuaded, I believe, to subscribe to war loan, but war loan is a good investment. If these men, particularly those in the coal mines, feel it incumbent upon them to work and earn a nice, daily wage, they do so. On the other hand, if they want to play baseball or go out into the woods on a sunny day, they do so. They care nothing about the fact that the people of Eastern Canada and the prairies are waiting for coal to keep them from freezing.

The Government has an anti-loafer law. What penalty does it provide? One hundred dollars and costs, or in default, six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Such a penalty may be all right for men of British birth, but it is not all right for the type of men who work in the mines and on the railways in British Columbia. These men have been taught from their earliest infancy that only by force can they get what they want, and I submit that they should be controlled by force. If six months is the penalty for offences against the anti-loafer law, then I think that in order to deal with the enemy aliens we must have a much more severe penalty than that. What is the penalty in Germany? It does not start at a minimum and work up to a maximum; it starts at a maximum and works down to a minimum. But the maximum penalty in Germany with our prisoners, is death, and I see no reason why the enemy alien here in Canada, should not, under similar conditions, be forced to pay that penalty if necessary.

As a reason for not handling this situation the Government say: we have an agreement with the labour unions of this country. Only last Friday the Prime Minister, when he was giving certain figures of enlistment, said that 227,000 skilled and unskilled labourers had gone overseas. These men from the labour unions who have gone to fight are surely entitled to some sort of consideration when they come back. To-day the ranks of labour are full of enemy aliens. I venture to say that at least one-third of the total membership of the labour unions in Canada consists of enemy aliens or aliens of neutral countries. Labour represents in Canada some 200,000 men. The number of men that Canada has so far sent overseas is 364,750. The balance, therefore, is as two to one, and I submit that the men who have gone overseas are more entitled to attention and consideration from the Government than those who remain behind to work and earn big wages.

It may be suggested that if we insist on enemy aliens in this country working, our prisoners of war may be badly treated, or worse treated than they are now. I have under my hand a letter which I received this morning from the father of one of my men who was taken prisoner at Ypres three years ago the day after to-morrow. He says:

> Now as regards the boy. We have received a picture of him a few days ago, and a letter was the first in which he really made a murmur, and that was only, "Believe me, my chum and I have certainly been through the mill." He looked pretty good, a little hard round the mouth but still as "straight as a die." The poor lad with him looked terribly ill.

This boy of nineteen, who went over with me, had no hard lines about his mouth when I saw him three years ago, but he has to-day. If you say that any action on our part to deal with enemy aliens in this country will affect our Canadian prisoners of war, you forget that Canadians in Germany cannot be subjected to greater indignity than that to which they are now subjected; that no more insults could be heaped upon them; that they could not be more starved than they are to-day. Their position, therefore, cannot be made easier by our being lenient with enemy aliens in this country. Our men in Germany to-day are earning thirty pfennings a day for their work. Thirty pfennings amounts to threepence—six cents—and the enemy alien in Canada, who has absolute liberty, earns $3, $4, $5, $10, $14 a day, and he does not care a snap of his finger about our authority.

Then, the Hague Convention. What is the Hague Convention? It has meant a good deal to the Allied powers; what has it meant to the Teutonic powers? Nothing at all. The Prime Minister on Friday mentioned the deportations from Lille; he spoke of the women who were sent back of the German lines in France. Yes, and I can tell you of a monument that has been raised at Bac St. Maur, a place now in the hands of the Germans, to the memory of four women of France who in 1914 were raped by the Germans; they were then covered with gasoline and burned. That is possible in Canada if we allow these enemy aliens uncontrolled freedom.

In my country, in the fisheries especially, we have many Scandinavians. Well, there are Scandinavians and Scandinavians. We know that the Norwegians are friendly to us; they are more likely to help us than anything else. But what of the Swedes? These men are openly antagonistic to us; yet they go round filling our men's places and giving nothing in return for the liberty that is accorded to them. On Friday the leader of the Opposition denounced autocracy in no uncertain tones. That may be all right from the standpoint of the citizen, but as a soldier I say that as long as this war continues, long live autocracy. It is the only way you can conduct a war. Think what would happen if, when an officer commanding a division gave an order, his brigadiers and officers consulted whether they should obey the order or not. Take the case of Russia. Russia consulted the people as to what she would do in the war—and look at her to-day.

I wish, in conclusion, to quote from the Prime Minister's speech on Friday last these great words:

> As to our duty, the first line of defence is held in France and Flanders; the second line of defence is here. Will those in the second line desert and betray the first? If such an outcome were possible, it would be to the everlasting disgrace of the Canadian people. Only those who have been among the men in the fighting line can realize with what faith and confidence the Canadian soldiers rely upon us for that aid and support which are their due; only those who have been among them can realize how intense a bitterness and disappointment would possess their souls if that aid should fail them. I beg you to remember that in this country we are all in one sense in the battle-line; that we must all discharge our duty with the same indomitable spirit as those who are holding back the German onset. May we not estimate that duty in the words of a great Frenchman: "Life was not intended as either a pleasure or a sorrow, but as a great duty committed to our charge and which we are bound to carry on and fulfil by the standards of honour." If that is true of the individual life, is it not equally true of the national life? What we inherit from the past we hold in trust for the future; let us see to it then that Canada's honour is maintained and her escutcheon kept untarnished to the end.

Those are great words; but what are the feelings of our 364,000 men who have gone overseas if they know that here in Canada there will be no room for them when they do come back; that the enemy alien is protected in every way, and that the enemy alien and the neutral alien hold the fat jobs? Will they not feel that, although the Government have courageously enforced the Military Service Act and sent men overseas to aid them in the fighting line, they have been deserted in their home life, in regard to which they are entitled to some consideration just as they are entitled to be reinforced? The Government should seriously consider this question. There must be some means whereby the Government can control the present practically uncontrolled liberties of the enemy alien in Canada. There must be some means whereby the Government can make those enemy aliens contribute something towards the cost of the war which is being waged against us by the country of their birth. The Government should grapple with this matter without delay, because the people of Canada, and, more especially, the people of the West of Canada, are tired of procrastination, and must insist on the Government dealing immediately with this question.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some surprise to the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements). I have followed his career since he entered this House many years ago. He disappeared for a while. He left his good old county of Kent and went West. He followed the advice of the great American editor, "Go West, young man;" but I am sorry that, in coming back East, he has brought with him very strange notions in regard to the unity of this country. At first sight, the object of his motion is very commendable:

> That, in the opinion of this House, all the regulations and Orders in Council respecting Alien Labour in Canada should be consolidated into one uniform law but that in framing such legislation due regard should be had to the local conditions and needs of the different parts of the Dominion.

The last portion of the motion could not be understood had the House not heard the comments made by my hon. friend, but the first portion of his motion is commendable. When the hon. gentleman undertakes to state how the enemy alien should be treated, he goes a little too far. The enemy alien must, in Canada as elsewhere, be treated according to the tenets of international law. No one is above international law, and no civilized country which took part in the Hague convention in 1908 is above the regulations which were framed there by the representatives of those civilized nations.

Mr. CURRIE: What about Germany and Austria?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Germany is without the pale of civilization. My hon. friend (Mr. Clements), I am sorry to say, discards international law. So did Bethmann Hollweg, Chancellor of Germany, when, in 1914, he said to the British Ambassador that the treaty, which was binding on England, France, Russia and Germany, was a mere scrap of paper. When again the German Chancellor said: "Necessity knows no law," and "We must hack our way through," he was doing exactly what my hon. friend stated a moment ago—he was discarding international law. He was speaking the same language as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) interrupts me by saying: What about Germany? What about Austria? A British soldier speaking in that way! Germany committed the awful murder of Edith Cavell and that of Captain Fryatt. Would my hon. friend say that it would be right for England to follow Germany's example.

Mr. CURRIE: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, it would not be right for England to follow Germany's example.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend cannot quote from the Hague convention any clause dealing with aliens. He is setting up a straw man and arguing from that. I should like him to quote the clause.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I listened to my hon. friend (Mr. Clements) and I heard him state to the House that as regards our treatment of aliens he made light of international law, because Germany knew no international law. My answer is, that just because Germany is putting herself without the pale of civilization, Canada, being a civilized country, should not imitate Germany. We have, unfortunately, in Canada some people who are bound to out-Prussian the Prussians. The War-time Elections Act, passed by Parliament last year, was a Prussian act, nothing more and nothing less.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are sitting on the other side of the House gentlemen who stated it a few days ago.

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order. It is not the first time that an hon. member has been expelled from the House of Commons for reflecting discredit upon the House of Commons, and I say that the hon. gentleman, in the manner in which he has stated his opinion in regard to the War-times Elections Act, is reflecting discredit upon this House, and he should be asked to take it back.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I hardly consider the point of order well taken. I did not judge from the expression used by the hon. member that he intended to reflect any discredit upon the House of Commons. If he did so, he should, of course, take it back.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last year, Sir, the Government disfranchised the Galicians who, although they came from Austria, were far from sympathetic with the Central Empires. The Galicians should not have been deprived of their right to exercise the franchise as they came to Canada, they, the victims of the Austrians in Europe, solely to enjoy here the freedom which they had been denied for centuries under the Austrian flag. That is what I meant a moment ago when I qualified the War-time Elections Act as being nothing else but a Hunnish and Kaiser-like measure.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. Mr. Speaker, not the hon. gentleman. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) has spoken about the aliens, but he forgot to refer to the Japanese. Surely he should know that the Tories of British Columbia at the election of 1908 made the same splash over the Japanese as my hon. friend has made this afternoon, and that they were elected on the slogan of "A white British Columbia." Will my hon. friend tell me whether the Japanese are still coming to British Columbia? Will he not admit that his friends in British Columbia were wrong in advocating that drastic policy in 1908, if he remembers that at the beginning of this war the coast of British Columbia, which is the coast of Canada, was protected by Japanese warships? My hon. friend, who, I am sorry to say would make a poor diplomat, when speaking of aliens referred to the French Canadians, of course. In the minds of many, naturally, the French Canadians are but aliens. I do not know how many centuries ago the forebears of my hon. friend came to Canada, but I do know that every French Canadian can claim three hundred years of ancestry in Canada; so, for any one to refer to French Canadians as aliens, is simply to display his ignorance or his fanaticism.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I wish to correct my hon. friend. I did not refer to the French Canadians as aliens at all, but referred to the unpatriotic sentiments of the French Canadians, and I still stick to that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend evidently refers to his Nationalist allies of 1911—probably to the Postmaster General, who in 1911 went through the province of Quebec shooting holes in the British flag and was taken into the Tory Government and is still a member of the present Unionist Government. Aliens as the French Canadians may be, to my hon. friend, he was cute enough to suggest that they should be taken from their smiling fields in the province of Quebec, where for generations they have been farming on those narrow strips of land, living a happy and prosperous life, and should settle in a certain bankrupt province at the extreme west of Canada. Yes, that would increase the population of British Columbia, and would probably fill the holes which the late Administration left in the exchequer of that province. I might remind my hon. friend that the province of Quebec, settled by these habitants, these alien farmers, is the most prosperous province in all the Dominion. The bonds of the province of Quebec are sold at par on the New York market to-day, and I can tell my hon. friend that the French Canadian habitant would not exchange province of Quebec bonds for those of British Columbia. Moreover, as long as there are gentlemen in British Columbia who treat the habitants as aliens they will remain in old Quebec staunch Canadians as ever. My hon. friend repeats the old stock phrase of our Milner jingoes in Canada, that the time has come to have one flag, one king, one language, and one Empire. Well, I do not object to having one flag—the British flag. We have it to-day, and cannot replace it, and I would not if I could, nor would any French Canadian. We pray in our churches every Sunday for our good lord the King of Great Britain and of the Dominions Overseas, in the words "Domine salvum fac regem." One Empire? We cannot have two empires, unless, indeed, the ideas expressed by my hon. friend this afternoon were to be generally accepted by a section of the people of this country, and then we would have alongside of the present Empire a Prussian Empire; but, thank Heaven, British statesmanship will never accept such narrow ideas as he has expressed this afternoon. One language? There would be no British Empire if it had not been built on a broader basis than that. Sir, the British Empire is the mother of many languages and of many races. The Maltese in the Mediterranean have kept their Italian language, the Welshmen their Welsh idiom and their national schools, and the Highland Scotch the language of their forebears, and as long as there are Highlanders in this world they will speak the language of Auld Scotia. The type of Empire of one language is the German Empire, and the methods advocated by my hon. friend this afternoon are the very methods pursued by the Germans in Poland, where at Posen the young Poles were deprived of their national schools, where the lands of the farmers were taken and the farmers deported, as my hon. friend would have the French Canadians deported from Quebec and where all were forced under the lash of the school master to speak and to pray in the German language. In conclusion, I will not say, Mr. Speaker, that there are strangers in the House, but after having heard the language used by some hon. members this afternoon I will say that there are Prussians in the House.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): The resolution submitted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) opens up a very wide question. So far as I am concerned I am not going to weary the House or extend the scope of the discussion to the extent that the hon. member from Maisonneuve did. I do not consider that that phase of the subject requires to be dealt with in any sense while we are considering a resolution affecting labour in Canada. The question, however, of organizing and co-ordinating the labour forces of this country is, to my mind, second only in importance to that of conscripting men to reinforce our troops at the front—the most vital matter that we have to deal with. Everything we are endeavouring to do, our effort to maintain and increase food production, our efforts to continue the production of war material, our efforts to increase the efficiency of, or at least to maintain, our transportation systems, all hinge on our ability to organize the labour forces of this country up to one hundred per cent of its capacity. That fact has been emphasized many times during the present session by hon. members on both sides in dealing with such questions as, for instance, the fuel problem, the shipbuilding problem, and the many other vital issues that confront the country at the present time, and it is unnecessary that I should weary the House by repeating any of those arguments. As a matter of fact the whole war problem resolves itself into the question of manpower, and if we are going to do our part, as I believe we all desire to do it, we must organize that power.

I am particularly impressed by an address which I heard a short time ago by a man who had just returned from the front after spending two years in France, in which he gave a description of the organization of the forces at the front, starting with the front line trenches and taking in succession the second line and supporting trenches all the way back to the most remote ammunition depot in the far rear. That description of the wonderful way in which every part of that machinery worked, just like one well oiled machine, could not help but grip one, so to speak, with the efficiency of the organization. The thought that struck me was that we have so far failed to carry our supporting lines back far enough; and I say to you, Sir, and to this House, that those supporting lines will not be carried back far enough until they are extended to the most remote farm, mine and factory in the farthest corner of Canada. We must organize our man-power if we are going to be successful in carrying on the war. I believe that we are all fairly well agreed in regard to that. It is, however, when they come to the question of methods, and the manner in which we are to attain the object aimed at that there seems to be a fairly wide divergence of opinion. There are those—such for example as the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, if I understood him aright—who would introduce a complete measure of conscription of the entire man-power of this country. There are others, as per example the hon. member who seconded the resolution, if I correctly gathered the purport of his arguments, who would confine that system to the aliens of this country. There are others again, and I have met a good many of them, who will say to you: Leave the situation just as it is. Let the labour problem work itself out. Give each individual the right to work where he likes, and to do what he likes, and to work or not, as he pleases. I am not in accord with either of these three. I will include the question of the conscription of all working men, and the conscription of aliens under one head for the purpose of making a few remarks on that phase of the subject. I do not believe that it is practicable to conscript any class of working men, and in the last analysis it is practicability that we want, what we require to secure from the men of this country is one hundred per cent of efficiency in man power, whether they are aliens or whether they are Canadians, let me repeat again: I do not believe that it is practicable to conscript men in the manner in which you would conscript an army, put them to work in groups and get efficiency out of them. I may be asked, if you can conscript men for one service, why can you not conscript them for another service? For instance if you can say to one man, your duty is to don khaki, shoulder a rifle and go to the front, why cannot you say to another man, your duty is to don overalls, take a monkey wrench and hammer and go to work in a machine shop. The answer I give to that is simply the conditions of service. In one case you have an army of men, every single one of whom is engaged in the same business, working under the same environment and under the same discipline, and with the age-long traditions of the army to back them up. On the other hand you have a group of civilians—an army of civilians if you will permit me to use the term—engaged in a multitude of different classes and kinds of employment, from the janitor in the apartment house to the high salaried official in some of our large industrial and financial institutions, each one working in his own way; and if we are going to be successful in connection with these organizations and industries the element of personal initiative and adaptability is the one thing that is going to mean success. So that on the ground of practicability, I say to you that the conscription of men for industrial pursuits is, to my mind, simply out of the question. I am speaking as one who had something to do with the labour problem, in one form or another, during the whole of my life. I appreciate very much what one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke this afternoon said with regard to the aims and desires of the Great War Veterans Association, but in the last anaiysis I believe that the representations that have been made by that association, and the position they have taken with regard to this question, is very much the same as that taken by any of the rest of us, who may have a heart interest in this war through the fact that some near relative is at present engaged in it. But after all, the view we take from that standpoint is purely sentimental, and you cannot deal with a subject such as this on sentimental grounds. It would be very nice indeed if we could accept and gratify all the sentimental desires of those who have relatives at the front, or of the men who have returned from the front, What we want to do is to find some means by which we can in the best way possible, support these men at the front. It is not as I said, after all, a matter of sentiment; it is a matter of finding some means by which we can, if possible, get 100 per cent efficiency out of the working men of this country and put every man to work in some useful form of employment.

That leads me to a brief consideration of the Order in Council that was laid on the table of this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) on the 5th of this month. I am not going to criticise what has been done; nor do I wish to anticipate anything that may yet be contemplated in that regard. With the main principle embodied in that Order in Council I am in full and complete accord. I believe that the time has come when every able-bodied man in this country must go to work without regard to where it is or who he is. He must become engaged in some useful form of employment. It may be said that this does not harmonize with the view that I have already expressed. You cannot conscript men. The idea of conscripting a man in the form in which you ordinarily conscript men and the idea of saying to a man: You must get into some useful form of employment, leaving it in the latter case to the individual to voluntarily find any employment he sees fit to choose, are absolutely and entirely different matters.

As I have said, I am in full accord with the main principle of the Order in Council laid on the table of the House by the Prime Minister. But, Sir, it seems to me that the Order in Council, in at least one or two particulars, does not go far enough. The first to which I would refer is that relating to strikes. If I can read the Order in Council aright, there is a clause in it that leaves the door wide open to any group of men to strike if they wish and also leaves the door wide open to any wooden-headed employer who wishes to enforce conditions which would cause his men to strike and to force a tie up of his business. In war time I believe such a situation as that to be utterly illogical. Are we, or are we not, in earnest in connection with this whole subject? The question is: Are we determined to throw the whole weight of this country's power behind our men at the front? We have sent overseas almost 400,000 men, possibly more; I have not the figures, but that is neither here nor there. Every one of these men who volunteered went with the whole force of this country behind him as expressed by this Parliament. Every man who has gone there, or who may go as a conscript, has behind him the definite pledge of the great majority of the people of this country that they are going to support him to the last. What then would be the result if with all of these men over in France, the locomotive engineers on the Canadian railways, on the first of September next, should decide to tie up our transportation system? What would happen to our men at the front? If I am properly informed there is at this moment—or if there is not at this moment, there was a short time ago—a strike on in Nova Scotia in one or two of the most vital industries of this country in so far as our war effort is concerned.

5 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he is entirely misinformed; there is no such condition in Nova Scotia.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I am very glad indeed to hear that. The newspapers of Toronto gave us the impression that the employees of the Nova Scotia Steel Company and one of the coal companies, were going out on strike. If that has been averted it has been a splendid thing for this country.

An hon. MEMBER: They did go out.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: An hon. gentleman says they did go out. They may have gone back to work again, but I submit that so long as the Order in Council remains as it is, the opportunity is right there to do just what I have said. It is open to some employer of labour, on the one hand, to put his men in such a position as to compel them to strike, or it is open to some group of agitators, such as has been referred to by the seconder of this resolution, to organize an effort that will make it impossible for the employer to carry on the industry on which he is engaged. Neither of these conditions should be permitted during the war. I believe that it is entirely unnecesary that they should exist.

There is one other clause in the Order in Council that, if the House will bear with me, I will read. It is:

> Useful occupation and reasonable distance shall be a question of fact to be decided by the magistrates.

If useful occupation or the distance that a man has to go to secure that occupation is going to remain a question of fact that can be decided by some magistrate, the door is thrown wide open for a repetition of the farcical drama we have seen enacted in many parts of the country in connection with the Military Service Act. All manner and kinds of excuses will be used and acted upon in order to keep men out of work and to keep them from doing the things that men should be doing in this country. Instead of that being left for some magistrate, or any other local individual for that matter, to say what is a useful employment or how far a man should go to accept employment, there should be some central authority to pronounce on that. If necessary, I say that he should be compelled to go from the Atlantic to the Pacific or vice versa. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) would say that it should be vice versa, and that he should be compelled to go from the Pacific to the Atlantic. There should be no limitation as to the place in Canada in which a man should be required to work if that is the place where workmen are necesary. In order that we may get away from the possibility of these difficulties, there must be some central authority set up to direct the course in which the whole labour effort of this country will flow if we are going to do the things we must do.

In that connection, I would suggest to this House and to the Government that the labour organizations should be utilized as one of the means by which this can be brought about. I, as one of those who have been following closely the course of events in this connection, was very much gratified when I learned that the Prime Minister, in following up the position that he had previously taken in inviting into his Cabinet a representative of labour in the person of the Hon. Senator Robertson, had called into council here in Ottawa, the representatives of some sixty-five labour unions in Canada. I, with many others, felt then that this was going to result in some real constructive effort to co-ordinate the forces of labour in Canada. But we were somewhat disappointed when according to the reports that were published in the Press and some of the statements made by labour leaders who were present, that the whole result of that conference in so far as the labour organizations were concerned was largely a negative one. I am not going to criticise the representatives of labour who participated in the conference. They were acting, I am prepared to admit, on their best judgment and doing the thing which they, at that time, believed to be the right thing. But negative propositions will never land us anywhere. Negative propositions will not win this war. We must get something constructive. And if the leaders of the labour organizations in Canada are going to take the part that their position in the community demands of them, they must get away from a negative attitude towards these great world problems.

Now, Sir, I am prepared to admit that there are reasons why the leaders of organized labour should be somewhat skeptical of any suggestion which has underlying it the idea that they are going to be drawn into the industrial life of this country, so to speak, or to be made responsible for carrying on the industrial work. There are two or three reasons for that. In the first place, it is only within the past dozen years, or possibly twenty years at the most, that it became in any way nearly fully recognized that labour had the right to organize. Prior to that such a thing as a labour organization was looked upon as an alien institution, and right up until the present time there are many employers of labour—men who are themselves leaders in what we may call "big business," who desire that they themselves shall have the right to organize large combinations of finance in order to carry on their business—who still say that labour has no right to organize. I have heard men say quite recently: "Just wait until this war is over and we get these fellows where they belong, and we will then show them what we are going to do with labour organizations." Now, Sir, I say to you that if there is an employer of labour anywhere in this country who believes that he has simply got to wait until the war is over until he can return to his former position of capitalizing the flesh and blood of his fellow beings in order that he may use them for his own selfish ends, he is living in a fool's paradise. My opinion is that that time will never return in this country again.

Another reason why organized labour is somewhat skeptical is that governments and parliaments in times past have not been any too ready to listen to the legitimate demands of labour, while they have, as a rule, I believe, been fairly ready to listen to the importunities of those who would make use of organized labour. We are passing out of that stage, and the leaders of organized labour must recognize that we are passing out of it. May I repeat, that, in order to attain the position I believe they are aiming at, they must be called upon to accept the responsibilities that go with the privileges they enjoy. Every advance politically that democracy has ever made has carried with it a corresponding responsibility, and the leaders of organized labour must accept that responsibility. One form of autocracy is not very much better than another, and the autocracy of lab ur would be just as great a curse to this country as the autocracy of the Bolsheviki. If the Russian peasants had the privilege of answering the question to-morrow, I believe they would say that they preferred the Czardom of the Czar to that of such men as Trotzky.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: And if we are going to fight just such a condition, we must call upon the leaders of the working forces of this country to take their positions and accept their responsibility in connection with working out the great problems before us. The suggestion I have to make to this House and to the Government is, that a commission, or a committee, or anything else you like, representing organized labour in Canada, and representing the employers of labour in Canada, should be given the responsibility of seeing that there is no such thing as a strike so long as this war lasts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: And I can go further and suggest something in the nature of a foundation upon which that may be built. I have before me the text of an agreement reached between the Director General of Railroads in the United States and the heads of all the railroad labour organizations in the United States, by which no such thing as a strike is possible for the duration of the war, or so long as the railroads of the United States are under the jurisdiction of the Director General. Now, if it is possible to bring that about in the case of American railways, I say that I do not think it is impossible to bring it about in every single industry in which this country is interested at the present time; and the responsibility for it can be laid directly on the shoulders of the men most vitally interested in the whole problem, the working men and the employers of working men. But, with this behind it: that the Government is going to see to it that every single man is put to work at some useful employment. I am not going to take up time in endeavouring to define what useful employment is, but I believe I can find a hundred men in Ottawa to-day who are blackening other men's boots. That is not in my opinion at least useful employment during the war; it is not making munitions or producing foodstuffs for our men at the front. I am ready to go so far as to say that the time has come for the Government to declare what are not useful employments, no matter whether or not they can define everything that is useful employment.

It may be said: What if the leaders of organized labour refuse to be drawn into that position? They were here in conference in Ottawa with the Government sometime ago, and, while I speak subject to correction, my information is that they did not arrive at any basis of constructive effort along the line of keeping men at work and avoiding industrial trouble. Be that as it may, I say that there is still room for another effort. Labour leaders, like politicians, sometimes do not accurately represent the will of their constituents. I believe we have had evidences of that in this country within the quite recent past. I think, if my memory serves me right, that I remember reading a speech delivered by a man who claimed to be a representative of organized labour in this House, on a certain topic, not more than seven or eight months ago; and I think that the answer the working men gave to that man's attitude is clear proof that labour leaders do not always interpret the will of their constituents any more than politicians do. And, as a man who has been a member of a large body of organized labour for thirty-two years, and who is constantly being brought into touch with the working men of this country, organized and unorganized, I say that the working men of this country do want to see their leaders take just such a position as I have outlined here this afternoon; and I challenge any labour leader anywhere to come before an audience of representative organized labour men and say that that is not the position that organized labour wants to take. There are without question certain individual agitators, men who live by agitation, who would take an opposite position; but the heart of organized labour towards this question is right, and I believe that I know it.

Now, as to an alternative. The question was referred to quite briefly in connection with the discussion as to the importation of coolie labour in British Columbia or any part of the Canadian West. I do not believe——

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. member permit a question. He is dealing with a vital point. He states that he knows what the will of the body of labour on a certain question is. He did not state what he understands the mind of labour to be on that certain point.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: My conviction from personal contact with workingmen throughout this country is that they desire to do everything they can to reinforce the efforts our men are making at the front to win this war, and the only way they can reinforce that effort is by going to work and staying at work. Do not misunderstand me: I do not speak in any official capacity for organized labour, nor do I wish to be understood as saying even that I represent a majority of organized labour. But I believe that I speak for the real feeling of organized labour in its best sense when I make that statement. I had the privilege recently of discussing this subject with a group of one hundred representative men of this country, drawn from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I put the question to them straight: Do you think that the representatives of organized labour in Canada are willing to bring about a system such as was brought about between the Director of Railroads in the United States and the representatives of the railway organizations there? The answer was: Emphatically, yes.

To pass to the alternative. As I have said, I believe that we can find in Canada sufficient men to do all the things that we are endeavouring to do, including the sending of reinforcements to our boys at the front, which is the most vital necessity of all. If we cannot do that, if our men or some portion of them fail to respond to the imperative call of going to work, then I say that the Government will be justified in importing labour from any part of the world where labour can be found. I have no hesitation in saying that 50,000 coolies from Northern China could be imported into Canada, if necessity arose, without jeopardizing to the slightest degree the interests of Canadian workingmen, because when their services were no longer required they could be sent back to the country from which they came. People who say that coolie labour should not be introduced into this country under any circumstances do so purely for sentimental reasons. Our boys in France never talked of going on strike because the ghourkas or the men from Algeria went into the trenches beside them. Nor do they raise any objection to the employment of 100,000 Chinese labourers in France, who are doing transport work and many other things necessary to the support of the boys in the front lines. The people, therefore, will not object if our boys are supported by coolies imported from other countries in order to produce foodstuffs, make munitions and war equipment, and do anything else necessary to assist in carrying on this war.

I am convinced that this House will support the Government; I am convinced that the people will support this House, in any measure, no matter how drastic it is, that may be found necessary to organize the industrial and productive work of this country up to the limit of its capacity. I therefore urge upon the Government the desirability of their taking any steps—I think I can speak for organized labour when I say that in the last analysis they will support the Government also in this respect—to accomplish that end.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the House at any length, but the question now under discussion is a very burning one in many parts of our great Dominion. Men fail to see the reason why their boys should voluntarily go overseas and work for $1.10 a day, while foreigners come in and take their places in the ordinary walks of life and earn $7 and $8 a day. This question is talked of and spoken about all over Canada. But we are to-day face to face with a somewhat different condition. On Friday last we passed an Act under which all the young men of Canada between certain ages are required to go to the front, whether they have business at home or not. The man who is to-day earning $20, $30 or $40 a week, the man who has a large income, will be required to accept the $1.10 a day of the soldier. Perhaps this man has a widowed mother; perhaps he has young sisters depending on him, who, when he is sent overseas, will have their ordinary source of income cut off, while Austrians or Germans will take up his work. The mothers and sisters of these Austrians and Germans will thereby receive the benefit of earnings which had formerly accrued to the men who went overseas. Some say that these foreigners are doing very little good in the industrial world; that many of them are agitators; that many of them are leaders in strikes and other activities not favourable to the prosecution of Canada's part in the war. Other men argue that we cannot do anything because these men are members of trade unions. I think, however, that the proper solution is somewhat along the line suggested by the member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) that we should come to some agreement; that this matter should be talked over by men who know their business; that some plan should be arrived at whereby we may obtain the services of these men and at the same time do equal justice to all.

The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said that we could not do anything along this line because of international law; that any action would be a violation of the arrangements made at the Hague tribunal. But I would call his attention to the fact that the bombing of open and unfortified towns is not in accordance with the conditions of the Hague tribunal. Moreover, it is against the ordinary canons of war to use gas; but the Germans have adopted this, and in self-defence the Allies have had to take the same course. If we take the same course with the German citizens of Canada that the Germans take with subjects of the Allies now in their country, no reasonable objection can be made by them.

The hon. member also dragged in a discussion of the Military Service Act. He had a great deal of sympathy with the Galicians who had come to this country, as he said, not because they were, favourable to, but in order to get away from, the Central Powers. It is quite true that many Galicians came here in order to better their condition, and the same may be said of many Germans. But may I ask the hon. gentleman this—he refused me the right to ask him the question when he was dealing with the matter—where are the brothers, the cousins, and the uncles of these men for whom he professes so much sympathy? They are fighting to-day against the Allies, and they are the men who are making these measures now necessary in Canada.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) also said something—I believe that was the one thing which brought him to his feet—regarding conscription or the Military Service Act in his own province. Well, that is not akin to this subject, and I have no desire to raise the question here. Let me say this: the great majority of the people of Ontario are willing to make any sacrifice and to put up with any adverse conditions in order to assist in the common cause, but they do demand that in the matter of supplying men necessary for the reinforcing of our boys at the front, equal justice be done to all classes in the community and that each province and each military district should supply its quota of men.

The member for Maisonneuve finished with the remark that he did not know whether there were any strangers in the House, but he was quite satisfied that there were Prussians. I am not quite satisfied even that there are Prussians, but if there are men playing the Prussian game in this House, and who have been doing so for some time past, they are friends of hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, the discussion this afternoon has, as it very properly should, taken a wide range, and because of the width of the discussion and because we have on the Order Paper three different motions dealing with this question, it is only fair that all sides should be heard. The speeches that have been delivered, especially those that have been delivered by the new members of the House, are instructive in regard to the situation. The most important question that came up in December in my election campaign, and, I suppose, in the election campaigns of most of the other members of this House, was the winning of the war, and the next most important question was what was to be our attitude towards the enemy alien living in our country. As far as I could gather from the meetings, there was, in the elections throughout Ontario, practically a unanimity of opinion that something must be done by the Government of this country in relation to the aliens, and, in particular, the enemy aliens, in Canada. The returned veterans had their view, and that has been expressed here to-day. Women voted in that election, and now that we are enfranchising all the women of Canada, they will be an important factor in coming elections. The women of this country, especially those who have soldier relatives, are convinced that something is radically wrong about our treatment of enemy aliens in this time of war, and the same view is held by our soldiers. Things are so bad in this country, and they have been so bad in the United States since that country entered the war, that it is absolutely essential that there should be a re-writing of the definition of what constitutes citizenship, of the definition of an alien, and of the rights of an enemy alien. You hear it said in all parts of the country, and it is a fact, as has been stated by hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon, that women do not like to see their boys going to the front as volunteers, or under conscription, and being paid $1.10 a day, when enemy aliens are being given their jobs, many of them being paid as much as twelve dollars a day. I know that to be the fact in shop after shop throughout my constituency. There are enemy aliens in this country and in the United States. There are many enemy aliens in Great Britain. The outstanding feature of the question is that in English-speaking countries, and especially where British law prevails, we have made a great mistake in the privileges we have given in regard to the settlement here of aliens, and, in particular of enemy aliens.

One of the hon. members who spoke said that the time had come when we should have further regulation of labour, and he mentioned "bootblacking" as a non-essential employment. In every city of this country there are Greeks blacking boots and carrying on pool rooms, who ought to be compelled to return to the land of their birth and to serve in their own army in the cause of the Allies.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Italians?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The Italians should be dealt with in the same fashion. These aliens are scattered throughout Canada. The people see this condition of affairs, and they are demanding that our laws be changed. We cannot wait until the war is over to change our laws. We ought to be taking action now. We are now in the fourth year of this war and we have not taken any such action yet. We were to have an enumeration of the man-power of this country, but we have not had it. It is under way now, but when will it be accomplished, and what will be the regulation and disposition of this man-power? We have recently been told in this House that, in order to harvest our crops, it is absolutely necessary that idle labour, or labour that is useless, such as labour utilized in blacking boots or in running pool rooms, ought to be made to take some part in cultivating and harvesting the crops. We should get busy in regard to that at once. It is the duty of Parliament to take action to cope with the situation. Are we going to deal with these matters at this session? Are we going to define what our citizenship is, what an alien is, and what are the rights of an alien enemy in this country? At the present time the enemy alien and his wife and family are treated just as citizens of Canada, and yet they are not compelled to do anything to help win the war. They ought to be conscripted in some way. They might be conscripted into the army, but that is a delicate question. They can, however, be conscripted in some way so as to be made to work. As I understand the argument of the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson), whose argument was very plain and reasonable, the proposal involves the conscription and movement of labour from one part of the country to another, and especially the conscription of enemy alien labour. We have to take this action now, and it is now we ought to take it.

We are in the fourth year of this war, and we have not yet had enumeration of our man-power. In England an enumeration of man-power was taken at an early stage of the war. We are beginning to take this action now, and perhaps Union Government will enable us to do it. Labour is well organized in the old country and the people say there should not be any strikes, but one-half of the efforts of the Prime Minister of England has been to prevent strikes, and it is a very difficult matter to cope with. We should have progressive legislation similar to that carried out in the United States in regard to labour. I believe the labour organizations of this country will assent to a proposal whereby they will agree not to have strikes during the war. In England, strikes have threatened and production has been limited as a consequence. England is full of all kinds of foreigners and the authorities do not know what to do with them. They have at last practically come to the point that they are going to make numbers of them return home so as to enlist in the army of the country from which they came. In England there is an enormous population of foreigners who claim certain rights under international laws and former treaties. Former treaties and international laws are all right so long as they suit the conditions under which they were made, but when we find conditions have changed and the winning of the war is being prevented because of those treaties and conventions, then it is the duty of Parliament to make the necessary adjustments, and, in some way, to waive international law aside. If the Germans break international law, we can, at least, measure out similar treatment to their fellow German subjects. While we have been told by prominent legal authorities in this country that we cannot violate international law, that we cannot violate conventions that Great Britain has made with different countries, and that we must treat all alike, that is not quite the fact. We treat our own fellow British subjects, the Hindoos, in a different fashion from that in which they are treated in England. We have put a head tax on the Chinaman, which is not the way in which the Chinaman is treated in England. A similar statement might be made in regard to the Japanese. I understand that we have in British Columbia to-day a law which prevents our Allies, the Americans, from going into the ports of that province to follow their trades. That being the case, international law, whatever it may be, and the conventions, whatever they may be, involved in treaties between different nations, must make the concessions necessary to the winning of the war and to controlling the actions of enemy aliens in this country. What strengthens the enemy alien in his misconduct in this country? We all know how the enemy aliens have acted. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) has said, they strike when they like.

They go and spend a day in the woods when they like, and do not care whether the people in the rest of Canada get coal or not; they get twelve dollars a day and work when they like, and what strengthens them is this. The outstanding thing in this war is the extent of German intrigue, which has permeated France and Italy, and the most appalling thing the American people experience to-day, although they do not care to admit it, is the extent of German intrigue in the United States. We have also seen a good deal of it in Canada, and there has been a good deal of it in Great Britain. What strengthens these enemy aliens in our own country is the knowledge that Germany has intrigued in every country in the world—that is what backs them up in their attitude and makes them insolent. They take advantage of all kinds of treaties. Enemy aliens all over this country are saying, "We do not have to serve or work except we like." And yet these people are enjoying the protection of this country! What makes them insolent and so independent is the existence of these so called conventions, and international law. The only law to-day is the safety of the state, the safety of liberty, the safety of civilization, and the safety of these things depends upon a strong force in each country that will make every one do his duty, and which will especially make the alien respect the law and take his part in the defence of his adopted country.

There are any number of these aliens in Ontario but they have not even been registered yet. What do they do on the continent of Europe? If you take up your residence in France or Germany, the first thing you have to do is to state what country you come from, your occupation, and your residence. We have been too free on this continent in allowing all kinds of nationalities to come in without registering them or finding out where they came from. We have not found out to any degree whether Germans were coming in or not. What have the Kaiser and his Government been doing for the last twenty years? They have been perfecting a law by which the German abroad shall have a double citizenship, but he is first of all a citizen of Germany. He may take the oath of allegiance in the country in which he settles, but he is first of all a German citizen, and is really under German instructions. We are finding out all these things, and are saying how bad they are.

In the last election the one thing that came up on every platform was the question of the alien enemy, and I pledged myself to the people of South York to bring the matter up in the House and I shall not rest content until I see some law put on the statute book dealing with the condition that exists in Canada to-day. Just what that law is to be, I do not know yet. We have very able lawyers in the House and we shall hear their arguments later as to the difficulties, but the main thing for us to consider is not the difficulties but how to overcome them, and how to meet the views of the ordinary every day citizen of this country. We have to supply labour of some kind for our farmers, especially now that all exemptions have been swept away. We must start in immediately to register the man-power of this country to find out what the young men and boys, and even the women of this country can do. If we even approach doing the things which the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has suggested we shall find some kind of a solution, perhaps not a perfect one, but the more we study the question and the more speeches we have about it, and the more we hear of the difficulties, the nearer we shall be to a solution.

But let us not sidetrack the question, as has been too much our experience in the past in this country. If we will only study the question we will be able to find a reasonable solution that will define citizenship and make it a law that every man who enjoys the protection of this country, be he alien or alien enemy, shall do his share of the work in hand. And the thing in hand to-day is to beat the Germans and their allies, and the way to do it is to make those who enjoy our protection bear their share. But they are not doing that in Canada to-day; they are not doing it in Ontario, or in the West in regard to the coal mines, and they do not propose to do it until we make them. What are we going to do with them? It is a difficult question, I admit, and there are legal impedimenta in the way, but a solution has to be found and we should have started out to find one long ago. We are now in the fourth year of the war and the end is not in sight. I do not think any of the law officers of the Crown have yet been assigned to the duty of revising the definition of citizenship, of alien, and of alien enemy; we have not yet started to register the man-power of this country. It is true we have approached the question of idle labour, but there should not be a single man idle now.

In view of the seriousness of the situation, when the necessity is so great for men and food and munitions and war supplies of all kinds we should be on the job right now and Parliament should not dissolve until it has found a way of enumerating the man-power and women-power of this country and made provision for utilizing that power in the most effective way. The thing I appreciated most last Saturday, as an ordinary farmer, was to have two young boys come to our place and say: "We have read in the papers that they are making a list of the boys who will work on farms; we want to work on a farm." And we took them on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They knew a good thing.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Yes, those boys were patriots in their way. We must start right now to register the man-power of this country; it is no good postponing the matter any longer. I heard more in the last election of the alien enemy question than of any other. Our people are absolutely dissatisfied with the large alien element in this country, who tell us they are not under our law and are not subject to our discipline because of certain treaty rights. They are in our country and under any laws we choose to make to win the war and to maintain our rights which are now in jeopardy. It is all very well to make the issue a matter of ethics, and in that connection I have just one criticism to make of two men so great as Mr. Asquith and President Wilson. For a long time in the conduct of the war Mr. Asquith, as Premier, made the issue largely an ethical one; he talked about morals and the German attitude, and put his case in very fine English. For two years the President of the United States was engaged in that same ethical discussion with the powers in Germany. Now what is the good of having a moral discussion with an unethical people like the Germans? They hung President Wilson up for two years, and are hanging us up now by discussion of international law and what we should do and what not do. The thing in practical politics is that Asquith should have made an issue with Germany much earlier than he did, and President Wilson should have taken action when the Lusitania was torpedoed, and yet we have had to wait for a long time in both instances. I am voicing no criticism, I am merely suggesting to the House that the time has passed to indulge in an ethical discussion with an unmoral people like the Germans, and it is wrong to discuss international law and the rights of aliens who happen to be in this country, and who say that they do not have to fight, and that they do not have to work in Canada only when they see fit.

These aliens have got to be made to work, and those of them in this country belonging to allied nations who will not serve in our army, and say they will not do so, have all got to get out of this country and serve in the armies of their own country, and if we are to be fair and square with our own boys who have gone to the front. One-half the alien labour in this country are engaged in some occupation or another which is not of a useful character. As I said, you will find one-half the Greeks in Toronto keeping poolrooms, or blacking boots, or running fruit stands, and the same with many other aliens. They should be made to get into some useful occupation, and my advice to the Minister of Agriculture, who sees the necessity of getting labour on the farms, is to insist on this enumeration and regulation of man-power. Let it be done right away; make every one of these aliens turn in and do something. I know it is a hard thing to do. You cannot, perhaps, intern them, but there is a way to deal with the problem. The Germans have found a way. They have found a way to make our boys, and our fellow subjects who have fallen into their hands, do something. More than that they have made them take small pay and they have ill-treated them. I do not propose ill-treatment or anything of the kind, but the people whom I represent here, think, that, in the tenor of the motion that I have on the Order Paper, to-day, there are lots of these people who should be made to work, and that the difference between the wages they receive and the soldier's pay of $1.10 per day should be devoted to some war purpose.

We have been told that you cannot control this labour, but I tell you how you can control it. What is the fundamental thing in connection with many of the problems of the war? It is the enforcement of the idea of licensing. If you want to carry on a business you must pay a license. If you are manufacturing, and especially if you are making munitions, you have to take out a license under the law as it is now, and things may get so bad in this country, because the war is not over yet, that we may have to require every manufacturer no matter what his business is, to take out a license. Under that license we can make rules and regulations concerning the men that the manufacturer employs in his work. As I say, that may reduce production somewhat, but it will put these people under discipline, both the employer and the man who works for him, and hitherto that has not been the case. As I said before, one of the most insolent things we find in the workshops of Ontario is the case of men who are getting from $6 to $10 and $12 a day. They work when they like, and they have been getting the preference, at least so I have been told, and hon. gentlemen who represent city constituencies will doubtless corroborate it. These foreigners are getting work in preference to the relatives of soldiers at the front. A great many hon. gentlemen in this House have had experience of that, certainly I have had, and the employers of this labour must be put under some kind of regulation, and under some kind of license. I have no cut and dried proposal to submit for the solution of these troubles, but the difficulties are with us for solution.

This is a Parliament fresh from the people of Canada empowered to deal largely with these war questions, and there never was so good an opportunity as now exists to define the word citizenship and define what an enemy alien is, and what we ought to do with all these aliens now in our country so as to make them contribute their share towards the winning of the war. Of course, there are any number of difficulties connected with the matter, but they can be dealt with and they have got to be dealt with one way or another. I agree with what the hon. member for E. Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) said, that we can get organized labour to join with the Government in working out some solution. Of course, the problem is a hard one to solve, but we have got to deal with it, and the United States have also got to deal with it. The war is not over, the question is with us, and people are talking about it at every opportunity. The women are talking about it most. The women are voters in this country, and even although it may be a question of sentiment, as the hon. member for East Algoma said, I am reminded of Napoleon's statement that, sentiment rules the world, and so it does. That being the case, I invite the House to have the fullest possible discussion on the matter. Let every hon. member state his experience and make suggestions as to what action he thinks should be taken, and let the Government maintain an open mind in connection with the subject, and then we will work out some solution of the very great problem now before the people of the country.

Mr. FRED. LANGDON DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss this question, I would like to make a few preliminary remarks on what has already been said. It is always exciting to meet gentlemen with an appetite for trouble, sometimes alarming, and alarm is my feeling at the suggestion, in connection with this question, of conscription. With the Union Government facing the question of conscription of soldiers, to add to its troubles the conscription of labour is quite too much. I do not want to see Union Government die of what I might term—coining a word for the purpose—conscriptitis. It may, however, be threatened with that complaint if an unwise course is followed, but there are other ways of dealing with the question. First of all, what is the idea which each member has in his mind with regard to the enemy alien? How many men has he acquaintance with who would come within that class? In Manitoba we have had many Austrians who are called alien enemies, offering for enlistment. A few we have accepted and some we have rejected. I know men of Polish, Hungarian and Galician birth who have given their lives for Great Britain on the battlefields of Western France. To-day, and I do not know whether I transgress any rule of the House in mentioning it, with three-quarters of the opposition to the present Government French Canadians, we are perhaps facing this situation: That we English-speaking people, with our usual insularity and self-sufficiency, are putting a tag upon a class of people whom we do not very well know, and whom we are not in complete sympathy with. One of the troubles I see to-day is that an hon. member from British Columbia, two thousand miles from Quebec, is proposing conscription for French Canadians. Well, it seems to me there is not only a great distance geographically between him and them, but also a great gap in the matter of sympathy and understanding. It does really seem as though we are separated to such an extent in the matter both of sympathy and of distance that we never can get together. Are we going to perpetuate such a situation with regard to the aliens who have come to our shores? Is it not well that we should look at the fact that perhaps a solid French Canada may some day extend her hand with special offers to people of foreign descent? Indeed, in Manitoba to-day we have a situation where the Galician population is already becoming assertive and reaching out for membership in our local House. How long will it be before they will demand Galician members in this House? As a matter of fact it seems to me it would be a good thing if we had two or three of them here to-day to inform the House as to what would be the attitude of their people towards the conscription of alien labour. I do not think the solution of the question lies in that direction at all.

I do not think that it lies in the direction of the conscription of any labour whatsoever. It does lie, perhaps, in the direction of the policy which already European countries and the United States have adopted. We know that in Great Britain and in France they have undertaken to restrict the less essential industries. In the United States they are doing the same. Have we not the courage to advance along the same line?

Before dealing with the question in that sense, let us look at the situation which faces us to-day, because, again, I think there may not be sufficient clearness in our minds as to the actual facts. Owing to the long seeding time we have had this spring, we are not very greatly in need of agricultural labour just now. More than that, from the best information I can gather, we need, perhaps 5,000 or 10,000 men for railway right of way maintenance purposes. Whether we need more men for actual mining or not I cannot tell; I do not know where to get that information. I have asked men from the coal mining regions and they have told me that upwards of 1,000 men have left the coal mining regions of Nova Scotia and gone to Halifax, where labour is in demand and high wages are offered. With regard to our western mines, the matter depends entirely, I believe, on the situation in regard to railway transportation and on how far the West will answer to the request that is now being made that we should lay in 70 per cent of our supply of fuel during the coming summer. If that is done we are going to need labour in the coal mines. The ordinary requirements of the West in regard to agriculture from the first of August to the 15th November are from 25,000 to 40,000 extra men. We have been getting them from the United States and the eastern provinces. But, as a result of conscription and of the enlistment of so many thousands of men, we find that in the last year or so we are not getting nearly so many; so that, in all probability we will find that we are limited there. Added to this will be the effect of the Order in Council brought down last week which will take, according to the estimate of the Prime Minister, 10,000 in each year called.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the hour for recess arrived, I was trying to summarize the present need for labour. I had mentioned that from 40,000 to 50,000 men might be required in agriculture; that in shipbuilding we should have 100,000 to 200,000 men engaged; that in railroad work, 5,000 to 10,000 men are needed for maintenance of way purposes; and that there is need for help in certain other essential industries. In the present situation possibly there is employment, or will be this fall, for 75,000 to 100,000 men.

We face that situation with practically one-seventh of the man-power of our state engaged in war or in war industry. We were told by the Prime Minister that our men sent overseas numbered some 365,000; and we know that in munitions work we have over 200,000 men engaged, besides many women. Added to these, will come the further draft upon our man-power under the recent Order in Council, taking, as the Prime Minister said, 10,000 men for each age-year that will now be called up, the three years, ages 20, 21 and 22, yielding 30,000 men. If, besides that, we are compelled to call up the classes of 19 and 23 years of age, we have for the latter class another 10,000, and for the former probably 55,000 or 60,000 men. Now, with this situation confronting us, we are endeavouring to carry on our industries as heretofore—"business as usual." "Business as usual" is no longer possible; and the state must, in some way, intervene.

I thoroughly believe in the principle of as little interference as possible with the life of the people. I do not believe in compulsion, or in fixing prices or wages, but in letting economic forces work. What then would be proposed? Just what would happen in the case of a depression. If we came to a depression, certain industries, essential and non-essential, would cut down their use of labour, and employment would be sought by many of these employees in other industries. In consequence, the suggestion that I would make is that we should now examine with care the less essential industries of the country, and, if not actually cut them off, at least curtail them. I know that its organization of an industry is of prime importance to an industry and that if operation be absolutely stopped, the skilled operatives, the management itself, and the organization fall to pieces, and it is not easy again to pick up and start. But take what has happened in just one industry. I understand that one piano firm, which was producing six pianos a day when the war began, is now producing and selling fifteen pianos a day. Similar expansion of trade has taken place in many of the less essential industries of our country. On such an examination as I can make of the census returns I estimate that there are 25,000 or 30,000 men engaged in such industries as I should classify as less essential. But we are not confined to our own judgment as to what the state might consider less essential industries. If you will turn to the last manual of the War Measures Regulations of the British Government, you will find at page 304 an order of the Minister of Munitions, providing that no man over the age of eighteen or under the age of sixty-one shall be employed, without license, in any of the industries named in a schedule attached to that order. That schedule contains some twelve classes of industries, and in order that the House may, without taking too much time, have some idea of what is there proposed, I will read a few of the items which are there specified. Among the restricted occupations are the following: Under the heading metals, machines, implements and conveyances, are included manufacture of furnishing ironmongery, including bedsteads and parts thereof; gas and electric light fittings; safes and steel office furniture; and the machinery for the trades mentioned. In woodworking, furniture and cabinet making and upholstery, are included manufacture of show cases and shop fronts and fittings. In the stone and slate trades, stone, marble and slate quarrying and stone, marble, granite and slate cutting and polishing are restricted. In these industries, we have in Canada some 1,200 to 1,500 men engaged, producing monuments in this time of great need, an industry that could very well be cut off, and afterward taken up when the war has ceased. In pottery, bricks and glass, we have the manufacture of bricks cut out. In house building and repairing, no building is permitted except on a permit from the Government, unless it is below £500 in value. We would, of course, cut that standard lower. House painting and decorating are also in this restricted list. In the paper and printing trades, bookbinding, letterpress and lithograph printing are restricted. We are going on producing books to no end, and at a time when industry is sorely needed in the production of foodstuffs. In the textile and allied trades, the manufacture of carpets, floor rugs, furniture hangings and upholstery materials, linoleum, oilcloth and table baize, are all restricted. In clothing—and here, I may say, we will have to make an exception for the benefit of the giant of the House, the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Mackie) who couldn't get a ready made suit to fit him—no clothing can be made to order, nothing but ready-made clothing. Millinery is in the same class. In food, drink and tobacco, the manufacture of aerated waters is cut out. We are employing some 1,500 men in this occupation. The baking of biscuits, the manufacture of sugar and chocolate confectionery, and the manufacture of cigars (which would again hit some of us hard) are restricted. In miscellaneous manufactures, we find the manufacture of games and sports, goldsmiths' and silversmiths' wares, and jewellery, the making of musical instruments and photographic apparatus, all restricted. I would like to read in full a list of occupations in the last two classication of the schedule.

XI. Commercial Occupations.

All foregoing trades. Distribution and sale of products of.

Other trades:—

Advertising agents.

Commercial travellers and canvassers, commission agents, hawkers and pedlars.

Shop assistants.

Clerks, except those with technical knowledge of a high order, or acting in a managerial or administrative capacity.

XII. Miscellaneous Occupations.

Flowers and ornamental shrubs and plants, production and sale of.

Domestic servants, indoor, including waiters and servants in clubs, hotels, lodging-houses, restaurants and cafés.

Domestic servants, outdoor.

Employees at theatres, music halls, cinemas, and other places of amusement.

Do not misunderstand me. I do not propose to cut these out, but to cut the men out of them, to let them be run by women. If in England they can draw from the ranks of women for operators of tramcars and for members of the police forces, why should not similar positions in this country be filled by women? I have given but a partial list of what is done in Great Britain. France has done the same; the United States are now going over their industries and treating them in the same way.

We must not for a moment think of treating our aliens as enemies. "Enemy alien" is a concept which has not a truth in it. These men have expatriated themselves for the purpose of becoming Canadian citizens; many of them have changed their names to Anglicized forms in order that they might be able to enlist. If we treat such men as men and brothers, it will make Canadians of them; if we treat them in any other fashion, we will make of them an alien element in Canada—and that, above all things, God forbid.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in sympathy with the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) when he tells us that he has not been able to find any complete solution for the difficulty which is indicated in the motion now under consideration. I myself have given a good deal of thought—with the application, perhaps, of less brains than the member for South York would apply to it—to the finding of a solution of the problem that would be satisfactory to me and that I would feel like urging on the Government.

The electors in every riding in the city of Toronto are hedged round by a foreign population which is contributing nothing to the conduct of the war, and which is living in ease, comfort and luxury. Some of them, indeed, are laughing at their English-speaking neighbours who have been forced to do their duty. I quite appreciate the difficult nature of the problem that confronts the Government, but it is a problem which, I think, we might be able to solve at least in part. A certain exasperation exists throughout Canada when men of English birth and blood see foreigners, neighbours of theirs, go to the tribunals—as they have been going in the city of Toronto—with a smile upon their faces, declaring: "I am not naturalized"; and upon the strength of that statement walking out free to do as they like and not bearing any of the burdens incident to the war. Take, for instance, the case of a man conducting a grocery store in the east end of our city. He was taken away from his occupation, and his store had to be closed. Across the way from him, a block or two down the street, was a Greek, conducting the same kind of business. This Greek remains, not only to carry on the business with the customers that he previously had, but to take over the customers of the English-speaking merchant who had to go and fight, at the soldier's pay of $1.10 a day. I am sure that this is a state of affairs that would exasperate anybody, and it is no wonder that in the district the member for South York represents, as well as in every other part of Toronto, this feeling has become so strong. I sympathize particularly with the member for South York, because he has in his riding what was formerly a suburb of Toronto, and which is now incorporated in the city—the district called Earlscourt. This district, which was at that time a distant part of the city, was settled by Englishmen who bought their little twenty or twenty-five foot lots by paying a dollar a month for them, built their little homes—some of them not much larger than a couple of packing boxes put together—and, as time went on, put up more respectable and more commodious residences, showing the splendid spirit of the Englishman to be independent. When the war broke out, that whole district was depleted of its men; thousands of them left that small section of our city. The women who have been left behind to carry on the work would have been just as glad to go to the front as their husbands, if it had been possible for them to do so. There is not in Canada any finer class of people than these men and women in Earlscourt. The men, on the day of the declaration of war, stepped out and announced their willingness to take their share of the burden; and the women were left at home, and voted in the last election. These are the people the member for South York has had to meet; they are the ones who made representations to me to try to have something done towards the conscription of alien enemies. It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that they should press upon me with great earnestness, even as they have pressed it upon the member for South York and the member for East York (Mr. Foster) and, indeed, every hon. gentleman who represents a Toronto constituency.

I respect international law, and believe that we should not ignore it. At the same time, however, one's respect for these conventions must be somewhat limited when he sees chaos approaching his country. If the Germans should win this war, it would be chaos for Canada; and if any good purpose, any great end, is to be served by modifying our observance of international law under conditions such as those which confront us, I join the member for South York in saying that steps in that direction ought to be taken. Just how far we should go, I am no more prepared to say than he is; but in view of the desperate state of affairs in which we find ourselves, we should take all necessary measures for the protection of our country and for the organization of our man power, whether of enemy aliens or of native and naturalized citizens, in order to get the very best results.

We have been informed that attempts are being made to arrange conventions with neutral countries in order that those who have come from those countries to Canada may be enlisted in our forces or be required by law to contribute their services to the State in some other way. I think that is a most commendable thing for the Government to do, and I most sincerely hope that they will press their efforts to arrange such conventions. We should at least be able to make such a convention with the kingdom of Italy; that of itself would mean a tremendous increase in man power, either by having men who came here from Italy enlist in their own armies, or by causing them to join our armies here.

How this conscription of enemy aliens can best be carried out, I have not determined, but I am still thinking about it, and perhaps I may be able to find some solution, if only in part, and submit it later if I have opportunity. But one thing we can do and ought to do is to follow the suggestion of the member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis) and cut down non-essential industries.

If I go into a hotel, I find twenty to thirty men serving victuals to the guests. Those twenty or thirty men could be better employed and could give better and more important service to this country than they are giving at present, and there is not one of them who could not be replaced by a young woman who would do the work quite at satisfactorily. I shall go further than that and say that fruit stores and confectionary stores should be conducted by women; that the Government should require them to be conducted by women. Work of that nature is surely not beyond either the physical or the mental powers of an ordinary intelligent woman. Out of those fruit stores, confectionery stores and other stores of that character, a large number of men could be obtained to be put at more important and essential work. If I were the Prime Minister of this country, I would go so far as to close up every pool room, billard room and bowling alley in the land until this war was over, for not only are young men required to conduct these places, but in a great many instances they are a resort for idlers, and they should at least be restricted, if not entirely done away with. Surely there are other forms of amusement in which men could engage without requiring the assistance of those who are at present employed conducting such establishments. I fail to see how any person can argue that those places of amusement are essential to the carrying on of the war or to the comfort, convenience and happiness of the people of Canada at this time.

My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) suggests that it might be a good thing to get a large number of French Canadians to go out to British Columbia to work there. I can give him a plan that will enable him to achieve that purpose if he goes at it seriously. We attracted a great many to the city of Toronto by paying them $6 a day. During the period of voluntary enlistment very large numbers came in, and as the young men of our city went into the ranks at $1.10 a day, the men from Quebec came in to take their places at $6 a day. They have been living very comfortably and happily, and they are very welcome in the city of Toronto. I have no doubt, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, they will go back to Quebec with broader minds and be better citizens because of this association with the English-speaking people of the city of Toronto. A good many of them went to Halifax. My information—and it was obtained upon the spot—is that from Point Lévis alone several hundreds went down to Halifax to engage in the work of restoring that city. Afterwards, according to the press, the military police went down to Halifax to find some men for whom they were searching, and they found a good many of those men who had left Point Lévis to go down to Halifax engaged on the restoration work, and at the same time carrying in their pockets exemption certificates on the ground that they were farmers. Perhaps the offer of $6 a day might secure the relief in British Columbia that my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni desires.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) state that the bonds of the province of Quebec are so attractive to the investors of this country. I have been reading of some parts of the province in which the bonds are not so satisfactory. If the Montreal press tells the truth, that great city, the greatest in the Dominion of Canada, has been upon the verge of bankruptcy. That statement was made in a number of Montreal papers, and it was also stated that the bonds are somewhat difficult to dispose of.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hesitate to call the hon. member to order, but I think he is wandering somewhat afield.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was merely referring to the statement made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve that the bonds had been so attractive, but they did not seem to be so because the city was put under a commission.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Is the hon. member aware that the bonds of that city, which he claims is bankrupt, were all underwritten by the Bank of Montreal?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is not germane to the discussion at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: It was not I who said the city of Montreal was bankrupt. I was quoting the Montreal press. If there is any way in which the enemy alien in this country can be conscripted for service, I am prepared to support such legislation in every way in my power, and I would urge the Government to go into this matter a little more thoroughly than they have hitherto done. If they consider they have gone into the question thoroughly, let them take it up again and see if some way cannot be found of using this alien labour for the benefit of the country. It is not enough to take the idlers—none of us will have any sympathy with that class, and so far as taking them goes, that is all right, but it is not enough for us to conscript the idlers and make them work. They are a comparatively small element in the Dominion of Canada. We have to go further than that and say that the men who are doing work that is of no advantage and is not essential to this country, must cease doing that and undertake work of greater importance.

I am not satisfied simply with dealing with man power in that way. The Government ought to go further and deal with woman power. The women of this country are capable of doing much more than they are doing at present. Many of them could engage in different forms of industry. Many of them could work upon the farms, not doing ploughing or other heavy operations, but carrying on some of the lighter operations, thereby releasing men for work requiring greater physical strength.

Conscription in any form is repugnant to every man of the British race. Until the present time, we have never had conscription for military service, but we are fighting an enemy that is using autocratic methods, and if we are going to succeed against him, we must have consideration for his methods and meet him in the best way we can. The people on Ontario do not like conscription any more than do the people of any other province, but they recognize that it is either conscription and service with the forces at the front, or defeat for the British Empire with the possibility of German possession of the Dominion of Canada. That is why we are willing to have conscription. The Government of this country, in addition to conscripting the men for the army, should seriously consider the possibility of extending this principle in regard to the carrying on of the essential industries and the greater production of things necessary for the winning of the war.

Mr. R. F. GREEN (West Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to detain the House at any length. It has not yet been demonstrated in this House that we have not sufficient man-power in Canada to attend to all the essential industries that we possess. The difficulty is that we, as a whole, have not yet realized that we are at war. We have not yet realized the necessity of production, not only of foodstuffs, but of everything else essential to the winning of the war. This debate is covering rather a wide field when one considers the substance of the resolution on the Order Paper.

My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) this afternoon took an opportunity to throw the usual brick at the province of British Columbia.

This is not the first time has has done so; it seems to be one of his chief pleasures, though why I am at a loss to understand. He said that we in British Columbia fought the 1908 election on a white British Columbia, and he is perfectly right; not only did we fight for a white British Columbia in 1908, but we are prepared to fight an election to-day for a white Canada. I believe that we have white inhabitants enough in Canada to carry on the industries of this country, and I think I can demonstrate to this House that it would be false economy to attempt to bring Orientals into our Dominion. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) said he felt the time might come when it would be well to introduce coolies from Northern China into Canada. That time may possibly come, but God grant that it may not, because we who have lived and suffered under Oriental labour know best what it means. I repeat it would be false economy to introduce Oriental labour into this country except as a last resort. You cannot compare Canada to-day with France, where every able-bodied man, and many who are not able-bodied, are in the ranks, and only the women are left to run the farms and the munition factories. In such a country at this time they might well introduce Chinese or anybody else to do their work. But we are not in that position, and until it is demonstrated that we have not sufficient white men in this country to do our work, I for one am prepared to fight every inch of the ground that would be taken by any one seeking to introduce Orientals into Canada. How can you possibly expect to build up an industry with a class of labour that you cannot assimilate and do not want to assimilate? A class of slave labour, you may call it, because these men come in under contract to superior Chinese and work as slaves until they have paid off the money which has been advanced to them at a large percentage of profit to the men who have contracts for their labour. These men come in and work at a wage a white man cannot live on. Suppose an industry is built up by that kind of labour, and then suddenly the time comes when you realize the detriment these Orientals are to your country and you want to get rid of them. If you send them out of the country the industry is then in a worse position than before, because it has been carried on under false economy; the products it has put upon the market have been produced by cheap labour. You cannot possibly get white men to take their place for the same wage, and the consequence is that the industry is bound to be ruined then and there. The only way to build up Canada is to do what we are trying to do in British Columbia—build it up with our own people, white people from other countries as well as from the British Islands, whom we can take into our families and assimilate, and who will grow up and become a part of us. An industry built up under those circumstances can live.

As to the alien enemy within our gates, I did not know the trouble was as widespread as it appears to be. We on the Pacific coast have the problem very close to us, because we have a great many of these people there. In my opinion a great many of the aliens are in very much the same position as the alien enemies. They are not troublesome; I do not agree with some statements that have been made this afternoon that they are always ready to make trouble wherever they are working. I believe these men are willing to work as long as they are paid the high wages that are being paid at the present time, but I do say they are not bearing their share of the burdens of this country while the war is on. While I do not wish to see anything done to make things worse for civilians of British or Allied birth, or for prisoners of war in Germany, I do hope that some solution will be found so that these alien enemies and aliens will be made to bear their share of the burdens of this war. There are in British Columbia to-day two or three internment camps. These men were given the opportunity of working at 25 cents a day, in addition to their food and clothing. This would enable them to buy a few luxuries, but the men had not been very long in the camps, which had been started in order to make some use of their services, before they made up their minds they were not going to work. They refused to work ,and from that day to this they have been kept in the camps and fed on the fat of the land; in fact, if my information is correct, they are better fed than a great many of the working people of this country. That is one of the places where the Government should put forth its hand; it should reorganize the conditions under which these men are interned. They have not, unless it is recently, I understand, been put upon rations, and I believe they are still allowed white bread, beef, and all such foods. I think the Government should take this matter up at once and see that these men are treated in a very different manner. The ordinary alien at large in this country, and the alien enemy who will not bear his fair share of the burden imposed by this awful war should be forced to do so. Like some other hon. members, I cannot state exactly how that should be done, but I repeat that these men within our gates enjoying all the privileges that the Canadian citizen enjoys, and making high wages as well, should be compelled to take up the duties of citizenship or else be told to leave this country, and until they do bear their full share of the burdens of this war they should not be allowed to use the food produced by the other citizens of Canada.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Parliamentary Secretary): With much that has been said in support of this resolution all will agree. Since the war has entered its present phase, I am sure that there can be only one desire in this country, that is, in what way, and in what manner, can Canada's striking force in the conflict be strengthened.

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) suggested that it should be done by co-ordinating the labour of the country The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Green) was of the opinion that the country is not short of labour.

I spent an interesting hour, a day or two ago, reading what happened in the United States during the Civil War, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will quote a paragraph from this book, issued by MacMillan and Co., entitled, "Social and Industrial Conditions During the Civil War." The writer states:

> Although the crops of 1859 were probably the largest in the history of the country up to that time, the production of wheat in that year was surpassed in no other year during the war. In this record year one hundred and thirty-eight million bushels of wheat were produced by the northern states, in 1862 one hundred and seventy-seven million bushels, and the leading agricultural states in three years doubled their output.

Their output was doubled during the time that the war was in progress, when conditions with regard to man-power were described by the same writer, to take a sample community in Wisconsin, to be as follows:

> A home missionary in Wisconsin wrote: "In common with all our frontier towns we feel the sad effects of the war. From this town of 250 voters 111 have volunteered, and from Westfield and Ironton about an equal number in ratio of population. In this village of 90 families, 20, or more than one-fifth, are those of volunteers."
> From Illinois another missionary wrote: "The township in which our church is, counts 147 men liable to the draft, and has now in the field or under marching orders 117 of these."

Now what does that experience show, Mr. Speaker? Simply that under the stress of wartime conditions a nation can accomplish what it will not accomplish in ordinary times. Canada, under the impulse of patriotic endeavour can expect greater productive results even without an increase in personel. To what extent can the Government aid in further facilitating production? Obviously the starting point is an inventory of human power available. Up to the present time there has not been sufficient data available for the Administration to know exactly what conditions exist with regard to man-power in Canada.

As hon. gentlemen doubtless are aware, the Government has already formulated a registration plan to gather this information. Under Order in Council No. 404, a copy of which has already been laid on the Table, passed on the 23rd of February, was appointed the Canada Registration Board as a sub-committee of the War Committee of the Cabinet. That Board includes the chairman of the Labour Problems Committee, the Director of Agricultural Labour, the secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the secretary of the Labour conference which was held at Ottawa in February, a representative of women's organizations, and the chairman of the Military Service Council. The duties and powers of the Board provide that they shall take such steps as are found necessary and expedient to have at all times as accurate information as possible respecting the man power and woman power of the nation; to obtain accurate knowledge of the extent to which the various classes of labour are employed by such industries, the hours of employment, wages, and such other information as is advisable; also to formulate plans, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, whereby the available men and women of the nation may be made readily available for such industries as are most essential to the prosecution of the war. This committee began its sittings on the 26th of February, and work has gone on uninterruptedly since. It is expected that before the end of June a registration will have been made of all males and females in the country over sixteen years of age, under regulations which have been approved by the Governor in Council, and a summary of which, Mr. Speaker, I will give to the House:

A day will be set by proclamation on which this registration will be effected. It is proposed that it be done in one day, and the same day, throughout Canada, excepting the district of the Yukon. As each person registers, the registrar shall issue to him or her a certificate of registration which is supposed to be always carried by the registrant. Every male and female, being upwards of sixteen years of age, including aliens, shall on the day appointed present him or herself at the registration place, or booth, and give the particulars required by the card of registration.

Provision is also made that when youths attain the age of sixteen subsequent to registration day, they shall register through the medium of the post office.

The only exceptions are persons upon active service, while they are on active service—and when they leave active service they must register within thirty days—cloistered nuns, and the inmates of certain institutions. The inmates of institutions will, however, be registered by the officers in charge of these institutions.

It is proposed to follow in the plan of registration, as nearly as possible the present polling constituencies of the country, and the plan is modelled after that of taking the vote at a general election.

The smaller provinces will each constitute a district under charge of a district registrar. The larger provinces will constitute more than one district, each district in charge of a registrar, all reporting to a central registrar at Ottawa. The district registrar will appoint a deputy registrar in charge of each constituency. Deputy registrars will appoint officers, similar to presiding officers in each polling subdivision and assistants will be employed so that as far as possible each clerk in the booth shall be called upon to register not more than 120 registrants during the day.

The handicaps of the previous registration for national service are probably known to the House. The difficulties in war time of undertaking to do anything in a comprehensive way, and still relying absolutely on voluntary service, are well known. Perhaps not the least of these is the fact that a sense of injustice is felt by some members of a community when, for instance, under voluntary recruiting, one man may feel it to be his duty to go out and fight while others, equally qualified, will stay at home. You thus have differences and inequalities and where inequality of that kind exists it always interferes with the operation of a plan, which to succeed contemplates the participation of every one in the community.

The registration, which is planned to be made in June, is a compulsory registration. Penalties are provided for failure to register. For instance, any person of the age of 16 years and upwards who neglects to register is liable,

(1) To a penalty of $100 and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month, and a further penalty of $10 per day for every day that he should have registered, during which he shall continue to be unregistered.

Then it is provided:

(2.) He shall, for so long as he remains unregistered, forfeit his right and be disentitled to vote at any Dominion election; and if he fails to register within thirty days, after the day appointed, he shall forfeit his right and be disentitled to vote at the next general election;

(3.) He shall, for so long as he remains unregistered forfeit his right and be disentitled to obtain or continue in any employment, or to receive or earn any salary, emolument or wages;

(4.) He shall, for so long as he remains unregistered, forfeit his right and be disentitled to the services of any person in his employment, although he shall nevertheless remain liable for any salary, emolument or wages earned by such person during that time;

(5.) He shall, for so long as he remains unregistered, forfeit his right and be disentitled to perform the duties of any office, Dominion, provincial or municipal.

(6.) He shall, for so long as he remains unregistered, forfeit his right and be disentitled to purchase, receive or have in his possession any railway, steamboat, or other public conveyance ticket, other than a tramcar or street car ticket, or to travel by any railway, steamboat or other public conveyance, except a tramcar or street car, unless for the purpose of any prosecution or execution of sentence under these regulations;

(7.) He shall, for so long as he remains unregistered, forfeit his right and be disentitled to board or lodging at any hotel, public house, inn, tavern, club, restaurant or boarding house;

Any person who employs or continues him in his employment while unregistered or pays him any salary, emolument or wages in respect of any period while he is unregistered shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a penalty corresponding in character and amount to that which the unregistered employee himself, shall, by reason of his non-registration at the time, have incurred.

Any person who sells, gives or delivers any railway, steamboat or other public conveyance ticket, other than a tram car or street car ticket, to an unregistered person after the time when the latter person should have registered, knowing such person to be unregistered; and any person in charge of any railway, steamboat or other public conveyance, except a tram car or street car, who permits any unregistered person to travel thereby after the time when he should have registered, knowing such person to be unregistered, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding $100.

Any landlord, proprietor, manager, clerk or employee of any hotel, public house, inn, tavern, club, restaurant or boarding house who knowingly permits any unregistered person required by these regulations to be registered, to board, lodge or be entertained at such hotel, public house, inn, tavern, club, restaurant or boarding house, after the time when such person should have registered, knowing such person to be unregistered, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding $100.

Every person who shall have registered shall at all times thereafter carry upon his person his registration certificate and shall produce it for inspection upon reasonable demand to any peace officer, police officer, or constable.

Any person who fails to produce his registration certificate without reasonable excuse shall be subject to a penalty of $20. Then, provision is made that a police officer may accost any person who is apparently of registration age. In case of default or misleading answers being given to any question which is submitted, there is a penalty of $500, and imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months. For a man who falsely represents himself as the holder of a certificate, not having registered, there is a penalty of $200, and imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months.

Furthermore, any person who afterwards marries or changes his place of residence, and who, without lawful excuse, fails within fourteen days to notify the central registrar of the date of his marriage, and of his place of residence, shall be guilty of an offence

The form of questionnaire makes provision for obtaining the information that is required by the Registration Board under such headings as name, nationality, age, physical disabilities, if any, number of children in the family, present occupation, length of experience in that occupation, and name of employer, if there is such. There are also questions to ascertain in what other line of activity the registrant would be useful if he left his present employment.

With this machinery it is confidently hoped that the Government will be put in possession of a record of the man and woman power of the country which is necessary to the further utilization of this power in the more essential industries; and for war effort. During the discussion this afternoon, many references were made to organized or union labour as such. Is it not possible that we should fall into the error of treating men as a class? General statements are apt to be misleading. I remember some time ago in connection with an investigation of conditions surrounding returned soldiers, visiting a plant in Montreal, where some 500 or 600 returned soldiers were employed. I asked the foreman of the shop, a most intelligent man, what had been his experience with the returned soldier as an employee. He said: "Come with me," and took me to a machine where a man was working with a great deal of dexterity, and said: "There is the best man in the whole shop; he is a returned soldier." There were perhaps two or three thousand employees in all. We went a little further, and he showed me a man working at another machine, and said: "There is the worst man in the whole shop; he is a returned soldier." So he had among one particular class of men at once the best man and the worst in the shop. From the employers' point of view I was clearly in error in suggesting any division by class alone. And it seems to me that in referring to unions as such, there is a danger of falling into a similar error. Neither labour unions, organized labour, or organized financial groups as such, can have any monopoly of patriotism. You find just as true a heart beating under the workman's jacket as under the frock coat of the employer, and, conversely, the same is true.

What has been done by Canada since the war began? In the matter of recruiting, who expected at the outbreak of war that we should have had upwards of 400,000 men coming forward voluntarily and joining the colours? Who, at that time, would have hazarded a prediction that after four years of war, Canada would have been able to float a loan of $400,000,000? The experience in the American Civil War and of Canada in this war, if it illustrates one thing more than another, illustrates that under stress of war conditions, with their stimulating effect upon the patriotism of the people, results can be achieved far beyond the standard of peace times.

So, may we not expect that, when the information is available, that this inventory of man power and woman power will yield, we can, even should we have to depend on the labour which is now in this country, further strengthen our war effort?

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be a very strong sentiment prevailing throughout the Dominion that something should be done with the aliens in this country. This is indicated by the fact that we have already on the Order Paper notice of resolutions by three members of this House, and possibly three other members had it in mind to bring forward similar resolutions. This sentiment prevailing from the Atlantic to the Pacific is not only confined to members of this House, but the press of the country has strongly urged that some action should be taken.

The Prime Minister told us a few days ago that he had about completed a treaty with the United States whereby Canadians in that country and Americans in Canada can be conscripted, or some action taken whereby they can do their part. And the same will apply to Canadians in the United States. But the Prime Minister stated that it would take months, or possibly a year or two, before a treaty could be effected to take in the nations of Italy, France, Spain or Russia. We must have some immediate action along this line, as has been mentioned this afternoon. What do we find in the city of Toronto? In one section of that city, there are about 20,000 Macedonians and Bulgarians; in another section, about 25,000 Italians. There are about 35,000 Jews, about 5,000 Greeks, and about 4,000 Chinamen. Throughout the city there are 70,000 or 80,000 foreigners. I venture to say that perhaps fifty per cent of that population has not been naturalized. Is it fair that these people should remain here, and at the expense of our own boys who are left, earn the very large wages—from $5 to $10 a day—that they are making? I venture to say that there are many members of this House who do not know how these people live, or how they hoard their earnings. I know that in some parts of the city, where I have had dealings with them, they earn very large wages and live on very little, perhaps fifteen or twenty-five cents a day. It takes two or three dollars a day to keep a Britisher, who spends his money furnishing his house and living on the best, keeping the factories going, and wearing good clothes. But what does the other class do? They wear the cheapest of clothes; they do not furnish or occupy houses as Britishers do, but herd together, perhaps ten or fifteen in a room, paying possibly, a dollar a week each to sleep in that room. They get their board very cheaply, and save the greater part of their earnings. As we know, the greater part of this population is not stable but floating. Why are there so many of them in Toronto? The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has explained that when you want to attract people you offer large wages. That is why so many have come to Toronto from all parts of the Dominion and outside of it. Thousands of these foreigners have been attracted to the city on account of the very large wages that are paid. To illustrate this situation: A few days ago an accident occurred to a foreigner, and when he was taken to the hospital the sum of $3,500 was found in his belt. In another case, $2,000 was found in the same way. In many cases we find that these people are comparatively rich, carrying large sums of money around. What have we done to get a share of that money paid back to the treasury of this country? We have not done anything. I think there should either be conscription of these people and part of their wages assigned, or that we should levy a war tax on what they earn. You would only have to levy a very small percentage upon their earnings to amount to millions of dollars. I venture to say that throughout this Dominion there will be 200,000 foreigners subject to war tax? If we levy a dollar a day upon these, it would run into millions of dollars, which would be easy revenue to the Dominion, and would come from a source where nobody would be materially affected, because these people earn large amounts and spend very little, and if times get better on the other side or in some other country they will float away. We have got nothing out of them, but they have done all they could to get money out of this country. Representations have been made to the Cabinet and to the Prime Minister by various portions of the Dominion that some action should be taken in this regard. Why should not we avail ourselves of this opportunity of increasing the revenues of the country, particularly when no serious hardship would result to anybody? In my district a man had to give up a splendid business, which has since been taken up by foreigners, among whose families may be found five or six husky young fellows whose services might well be devoted to securing some material benefit for the nation. But they are there, making a fortune, while our own men have been conscripted and taken away. Walking down one of the main streets of Toronto a few weeks ago I could not help thinking that it was difficult to tell whether I was in Italy, Jerusalem or Toronto—judging by the conversations of the people passing up and down the street. A few years ago a foreign voice was seldom heard in Toronto; to-day almost every second person you meet speaks a foreign language. I also noticed within three or four blocks thirty or forty husky foreigners, while very few of our own boys were to be seen. On the same day I met a lady who was much grieved that her boy, who on account of his delicate constitution had been brought up with a great deal of attention and care, had been conscripted, while hundreds of healthy, husky young foreigners were walking about, enjoying life and all that money could purchase. These young men earn large wages without any material hardship, because in the large factories, including many of the munition works, the strong, husky fellows are preferred to the more delicate or physically unfit. The Great War Veterans have taken this matter up and it seems to be becoming difficult to hold them under control and to prevent them from raiding some of the factories where so many foreigners are occupying important positions and earning much money, to the disadvantage of returned soldiers. It would appear that many of the manufacturers prefer the foreigners to the returned soldiers. Indeed, a few months ago a kind of raid was made on some factories; the men went in and took out foreigners who were working there. There have been many threats during the past week, and if some steps are not taken to deal with these alien enemies, I am afraid that trouble will develop. I should be very sorry to see it occur, but in this respect the responsibility rests upon the Government of endeavouring to solve the problem which confronts us. I do not say that I can solve it—indeed, I do not know that any of the members who have already spoken can solve it. I suggest that a special committee be named to go into the matter and make a recommendation to the House. That is what the public are looking for. Before the session is over some action should be taken, or we may have trouble in some parts of the Dominion. The feeling is that while we should treat these people justly, it is not right that they should be earning a tremendous amount of money which may at any time go from this country into some other country, while our own boys are fighting overseas. I trust that, having regard to the discussion which has taken place, the Government will, before the session closes, take some action in the matter, and thus prevent anything unseemly that might occur against these alien enemies.

Mr. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose taking up much of the time of the House, because this subject has been very thoroughly threshed out. The present condition in British Columbia is very much like that which has been described by the previous speakers. A young man leaves to fight for his country, and his position is taken by a foreigner, who strikes, has his wages increased, and is able to live very much better than the relatives of the man who has gone to the front. As a result, conditions are becoming very acute. Last week a thousand men and women marched to the Government buildings in Victoria and presented their case, demanding that the alien labour question be immediately taken up and that some remedial legislation be adopted. I am informed that a similar demonstration took place in Vancouver last Saturday. It is the duty of the Government, in view of the conditions to thoroughly investigate the whole situation at the earliest possible moment, with a view to providing a remedy. Whether that remedy should be in the nature of conscription or by means of additional taxation, I am not prepared to say, but whatever the remedy, a thorough investigation should first be made. The feeling throughout the country is that, after four years of war, nothing entirely satisfactory has yet been done in this connection. The conditions have become more aggravated from time to time, and will continue to do unless some remedy is applied

I was much surprised at the remark of the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) with regard to the glorious province of British Columbia. I can assure him that the people of British Columbia, as a whole, have the friendliest feeling towards the people of Quebec. The only argument we have with them is this: We have sent about 12 per cent of our man-power to the front to fight for our country, and we expect the province of Quebec and the other provinces of the Dominion of Canada to do their share. Hon. members on both sides of the House will admit that is only a fair request.

My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) spoke about British Columbia being bankrupt. That idea is ridiculous when one thinks of the wonderful natural resources of that province. The debt in comparison with those great natural resources is a mere bagatelle. I can assure my hon. friend that we shall not only take care of that debt, but continue to do our duty to the Mother country.

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) referred to the Asiatic question. This is a live question with us. I was brought up in the province of British Columbia, and for forty years I have been able to study this question, and, in particular, the Chinese question. In one city in that province I have seen the Chinese begin with a single store, and they have gradually spread out until they have occupied several blocks. They are to-day in several lines of business. They practically control the truck farming business of the Coast. Asiatics control the fishing in the Fraser river. Two years ago they declared a strike, and they told the white fishermen when they should go on strike and when they were ready to return to work. That is a very unsatisfactory condition in a country under the British flag. In the Okanagan valley and in several other sections in the interior of the province they have gradually been getting a hold. There are several objections to Asiatic labour. The Asiatics will not assimilate with our people. They disorganize labour, being able to work more cheaply than the white man can afford to do. The Chinaman who works for you to-day is your competitor a year or two from now and will undersell you in your business. In this way we find them a class of competition that the white man cannot properly meet, while continuing to live under European conditions. It would, therefore, be the height of folly to suggest the introduction of 50,000 Chinamen at the present time. Before a question of that kind is even considered, we should do everything in our power to make available every bit of labour in this country. If the Government does finally decide, as a war measure, that it is of actual necessity that 50,000 Chinamen be brought into this country, they should be brought into Ontario anything with the alien enemy. I have read a little international law, from the time of Erasmus down to that of Henry Ford, and I cannot find a single paragraph that says that we cannot intern the alien enemy, nor that we cannot compel him to work. I hold in my hand the "Manual of Military Law" issued by the British Government, and that manual sets forth the provisions of The Hague conventions which are referred to from time to time, but which nobody seems to be able to quote in this House. I have read the provisions of these conventions, and according to them you can, if necessary, conscript the alien enemy and compel him to work for you as long as you do not take away his personal property. The Hague convention, or conventions of war, consist of certain treaties and declarations. The first international convention relating to war is known as the Declaration of St. Petersburg of 1868, prohibiting the use in time of war of explosive projectiles under 400 grammes in weight. That is, explosive bullets. Then, the second are The Hague Declarations of 1899 respecting expanding bullets and the use of asphyxiating gases. We all know how the enemy has broken that convention, and how we have been compelled to break it also. The third is the Geneva Convention of 1906, which deals with Red Cross work, and has nothing to do with the question of prisoners or anything of that kind. It is unnecessary for me to quote that convention; everybody who takes an interest in Red Cross work knows what that means. Then, there is The Hague Convention of 1907. That is the one, no doubt, that everybody has referred to. A great many straw men have been set up in order to be knocked down, and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) put one up this afternoon. I asked him to name any clause in that convention that prevented us from conscripting alien enemies, but he could not refer to one for the reason that there was no much clause in the convention. People like my hon. friend from Maisonneuve are always talking about imaginary international law. The Hague Convention of 1907 provides first for what should be done upon the opening of hostilities. A declaration of war must ensue, and all that sort of thing. Then, second, there is a provision concerning the law and customs of war on land. That is pertinent to the very subject I am going to bring before the House. Paragraph 3 refers to the rights and duties of neutral powers and persons in war on land. It alludes to the duties of neutrals, and it provides what is necessary for the welfare and safety of the State, a neutral may be taken prisoner and interned. He may be ordered to register and to carry on whatever business is required of him. So, you see there is nothing in this convention that prevents us from doing what has been suggested by the motions even to neutrals.

Another convention was made in 1907 respecting Bombardments by Naval Forces of Open Cities and Towns. We all know how faithfully the Germans have kept that treaty which bore the sign and seal of the Emperor. The Declaration of 1907 also prohibits the Discharge of Projectiles and Explosives from Balloons. That is another convention that has not been observed by the Germans. There is no convention that the enemy will not violate. He will poison the springs, use expanding or explosive bullets, and do everything or anything to destroy life and property.

Now, let us turn to what is dealt with under the heading of "Treatment of Resident Enemy Subjects." A chapter of this book is devoted to that question. Every soldier is familiar with this book. The members of the Great War Veterans Association are conversant with all that is contained in it. I carried it with me in the trenches. It is necessary for the soldiers to have it with them in order that they may study it and in order that they may know what should be the relationship of soldier to soldier and soldier to the enemy. I wish to put on record this authority on the Treatment of Resident Enemy Subjects. This book was written before the outbreak of war, and if anything, it would err on the side of leniency. At page 236 of the portion treating "The Laws and Usuages of War" it says:

TREATMENT OF RESIDENT ENEMY SUBJECTS.

(11.) According to the British view, the first consequence of the existence of a condition of war between two States is that every subject of the one State becomes an enemy to every subject of the other. For it is imposible to severe the subjects from their State, and the outbreak of war between two States cannot but make their subjects enemies. It is, however, a universally recognized rule of International Law that hostilities are restricted to the armed forces of the belligerents, and that the ordinary citizens of the contending states, who do not take up arms and who abstain from hostile acts, must be treated leniently, must not be injured in their lives or liberty, except for cause or after due trial, and must not as a rule be deprived of their private property.

It is thus no longer considered admissible to detain as prisoners subjects of one of the hostile parties travelling or resident in the country of the other at the time of the outbreak of war.

(12) The view that such action was illegal except in grave emergency has steadily gained support. Article 5 of the Regulations annexed to the Convention, 1899, concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, 1899, permitted the internment of prisoners of war, and it was contended at the Conference of 1907 that the terms of the article afforded a strong argument e contrario, that the internment of enemy subjects not prisoners of war was prohibited. No vote was taken on the point, but this interpretation of the article was generally accepted subject to the reservation of the right which every State undoubtedly possesses of taking such steps as it may seem necessary for the control of all persons whose presence or conduct appear dangerous to its safety.

13. This immunity, however, cannot apply to persons known to be active or reserve officers, or reservists, of the hostile army—for the principle of self-preservation must justify belligerents in refusing to furnish each other with resources that will increase their means of defence.

Men of the kind referred to by these resolutions are men of military age, reservists of the alien enemy.

14. The expulsion of subjects of the enemy from the territory of the opposing State is in strict law admissible, but is usually not resorted to unless grave reasons make it advisable.

15. Belligerents have in recent years always acted in obedience to this principle. Thus expulsion has been decreed from seaports, fortresses, and defended areas, where special precautions were necessary, and from the actual or expected theatres of hostilities.

16. Should the expulsion of any person be ordered he should be given such reasonable notice as may be consistent with public safety, in order to make arrangements for the custody of his property and preparations for his departure.

Now, that is the statement of the case by the British Government in their own Manual, and whilst they say there is a strong trend towards preventing the internment, and interfering with the liberty, of alien enemies, still at the same time it is stated distinctly there that at the Hague Convention no vote was taken on this subject. So the argument that international law interferes is quite contrary to the facts and to all international law. Let us see now what the Hague Convention says further—and I am going to read from the Regulation respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, with reference to prisoners of war, chapter 2:

Article 4. Prisoners of war are in the power of the hostile Government, but not of the individual or corps who capture them. They must be humanely treated.

All their personal belongings, except arms, horses, and military papers, remain their property.

[Mr. Currie.]

This is the article referred to in the selection from the Manual read by me and applies, as you note, to reservists.

Article 5. Prisoners of war may be interned in a town, fortress, camp, or other place, and are bound not to go beyond certain fixed limits; but they cannot be placed in confinement except as an indispensible measure of safety, and only while the circumstances which necessitate the measure continue to exist.

Article 6. The State may employ the labour of prisoners of war, other than officers, according to their rank and capacity. The work shall not be excessive, and shall have no connection with the operations of the war.

So that enemy reservists in this country, that is men of military age, can be conscripted by this state, and can be compelled to labour for the state at anything but munition work.

Prisoners may be authorized to work for the public service, for private persons, or on their own account.

Work done for the State is paid for at rates proportional to the work of a similar kind executed by soldiers of the national army, or, if there are no such rates in force, at rates proportional to the work executed.

When the work is for other branches of the public service, or for private persons, the conditions are settled in agreement with the military authorities.

So that, the State has absolute control to fix the wages even of these men who are alien enemy reservists.

The wages of the prisoners shall go towards improving their position, and the balance shall be paid them on their release, deductions on account of the cost of maintenance excepted.

Article 7. The government into whose hands the prisoners of war have fallen, is charged with their maintenance.

In default of special agreement between the belligerents, prisoners of war shall be treated, as regard rations, quarters and clothing, on the same footing as the troops of the Government which captured them.

Article 8. Prisoners of war shall be subject to the laws, regulations, and orders in force in the army of the State in the power of which they are. Any act of insubordination justifies the adoption towards them of such measures of severity as may be considered necessary.

Then it goes on to deal with other matters of this kind. So, you see, Mr. Speaker, as far as the question is concerned in its reference to alien enemies of military age, there is no doubt in the world of our perfect right to deal with them as prisoners of war. There is no convention or regulation to the contrary. And I might say further that the Emperor of Germany has added his signature to this convention. I might say that these conventions are plain, ordinary worded matters of treaty, and any man of ordinary intelligence can read and understand them. Any of my friends who speak the French language, and who are not well versed in English, will find the French version parallel with the English in this volume. I think I have proved conclusively that we have a perfect right, as far as international law is concerned, to register all alien enemies, to even intern them, or make them prisoners of war, and that in so doing we are not contravening any of the Hague conventions. When this war broke out, we commenced to register these people, and a great many have been registered. A large number of them are good, honest men, Bohemians, Galicians, and men from the outlying provinces of Germany and Austria, who are doing good work in this country, going weekly to the registrar's, and giving notice to the police of their presence, and, on the whole, behaving themselves like respected citizens. Many are working in munition factories. If they should ever have to go back to their own country, God help them, because in doing that they are contravening the laws of their own country and rendering themselves liable to trial by court martial, with all that that involves. However, the question, as far as they are concerned, to my mind, is settled by the Hague convention, and there is no reason why the Government should not take action. Shortly before the election there was a feeling that in certain sections of this country these men were not registered. They were not registered in Waterloo county, and there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction in my province because the law has not been carried out as strictly as it should have been, in Waterloo, and I regret very much I should have to bring this matter up in the House at the present moment, because nothing has even been done in that regard since the election. There has been no attempt to organize this country as a military power, because after all Canada is the greatest of the secondary military powers, as all the other small nationalities have dropped out. We must recognize that the British Empire and the Allies regard Canada and its army as a separate identity, the glorious action of our men on various fields having stamped us distinctly as a nationality of our own, quite capable of taking our place in the sun with any other nation, even the great German Empire.

Now, such being the case, the splendid discipline of our people at home is evident. They have sat for four years here without hardly raising a word of complaint on account of the lack of organization at home and the lack of any organized effort to carry on our industries after the war. Even within recent days, when it is proposed to take the son of the widow, nineteen years of age, from the handles of the plough and put him in uniform, there is no complaint, even while there are 35,000 exemptions in Quebec still going through the courts, which no doubt, will not, perhaps, be reviewed or disposed of until about the time that this war has ended. The people are quite conversant with these matters; they are not quite so dull as some may think they are. They know very well that this Order in Council is intended to get a number of new men very quickly, but that it does not at all heal the differences that exist with regard to the men in Quebec who are over the age of 23.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope the hon. gentleman will not——

Mr. CURRIE: I am not going any further with that subject, Mr. Speaker. I have said enough. With regard to the matter of labour unions, hon. gentlemen have dealt with this question very ably and I do not think I can add to what they have said. I wish, however, to refer to one special class of labour which aliens in Toronto have entirely taken to themselves; I refer to needle work. Enemy aliens have gone into the clothing factories in Toronto, organized labour unions of their own, taken possession of these factories so far as the clothing business is concerned, and driven English and Canadian women entirely out of employment. No Canadian women can get employment in these factories dominated by foreigners. Take the case of a woman whose son or husband has fallen on the battlefield and who desires to add to her little pension; or the case of a sister of a soldier who has fallen. It is very hard for such women, who have been earning their living by doing needle work, to see husky Austro-Germans or Russians employed in these factories, sewing women's petticoats. Thousands of them are so employed in Toronto; the Government should conscript these aliens and make regulations as what employment they shall engage in. We ask these women to go to the land and produce. Hundreds of delicate girls of university education went out last year and worked in the fields in Grimsby, Hamilton, and elsewhere in Canada, helping to produce food, responding as best they could to the call of the Crown. This year they are further organized. In my own riding local organizations have been established in every municipality known as Greater Production Associations. All men and women in the respective municipalities belong to these associations, and they have taken a pledge that this year they will produce enough food to keep themselves and, if possible, to add to the Allied stores. The spirit of the people in that regard is splendid. But if we pass a regulation providing that alien enemies shall not be employed at occupations in which women can be employed, at least 25,000 able-bodied men will be released in Toronto alone and can be put to work on the farms of Ontario. In this way the labour problem would be partly solved—and the same would apply in the West and all over the country.

There are labour unions and labour unions. The members of such unions as the locomotive engineers, firemen's and trainmen's, and the like, are splendid citizens, loyal and true at heart, who work day after day and night after night with no rest and very little sleep, trying to do their duty to their country and to get the munitions to the seaboard. Other tradesmen, the shipbuilders and printers, too, are doing their best. But some labour unions have sprung up which consist almost entirely of agitators and with the foreign element as a backing and chief among them are unions connected with the great industry of mining. Sir, we have in Cobalt mines that are capable of producing enough minerals annually to pay all the expenses of the war and to pay our trade balances with other nations in gold. But we find that before the war was taken up by our Allies to the south, foreign agitators came from that country, entered these mines, and demanded such high rates of pay for the alien miners that most of the mines were crippled, and many were compelled to close down, not so much because the owners —who, in the great majority of cases, are loyal men—were not desirous of making big money, as because the workers demanded such high wages that the mines could be operated only at a loss. The result is that the minerals are not produced. I submit that the Government should take some action in this matter, not only with reference to the coal, but with reference to the gold and silver. As the Minister of Agriculture knows, wheat has been refused in exchange for our trade balance, but there is one thing that no nation will refuse to take or can, under the Hague Convention, or having regard to international usage, refuse to take, payment of their trade balance in gold. The efforts of the Government should, therefore, be directed to seeing that our gold and silver mines are operated to their full capacity, not standing still as many of them are to-day. If the owners do not operate them, then let the state operate them, as has been done in Australia and South Africa.

These foreigners who constitute the members of the labour unions to which I have referred are represented by very clever English-speaking talkers who come here, and who belong to what are known as the International Socialists Society. They speak in the name of labour; they do not want the foreigner conscripted, because they are sent here financed by the alien enemy, to talk thus to the Government. These foreign socialists think that the only great people in the world are the now Russian government, who have so greatly injured the cause of the Allies. They speak openly of socialism and revolution, but they are not interned; many of them have not done an honest day's work in years and have had nothing at all to do with labour in the true sense. Many of these organizations in Toronto and in other centres are purely Socialistic organizations, have no connection with true labour, and should not be listened to as the voice of labour. The true labour of this country, represented as it is by thousands of men in the trenches, is loyal and willing to do its share in this war; you never hear a complaint from them. I submit that during the war no man who is an alien enemy or a neutral alien should be permitted to join any association or organization that has to do with the military actions or industrial life of the country. That would stop a lot of the kicking about aliens. I do not believe that Canadian labour unions composed of Canadians are raising any objection to the conscription of aliens.

The registration of man power has been referred to by the member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy). I wish to refer to another registration which took place in this country. Two or three years ago the people were crying out for national service; they wanted the Government to organize such a system of national service as prevails in France, where every man, woman and child in the State must do his or her duty to the State. But in this country we always take half measures—half measures are what you can expect from an irresolute people. We had a registration which cost the country half a million dollars—the money might much better have been given to the widows and orphans. It is true that there is a card system to which we may refer for information, I suppose, but there was no real registration under that system. I listened very carefully to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCurdy) said about the further registration system which is proposed, but to my mind the people of the country are now saying that this registration business is nothing but camouflage—is that it is an attempt on the part of the Government to deceive the people into thinking that they are doing something, and they never intend getting anywhere with it. What is a real registration? There is a registration in Belgium, and, I think, in a number of European countries. The system of registration there is that, when a man becomes of a certain age, he has to go to the mayor of the city and register himself, and then he gets his papers. He cannot move out of his municipality unless he goes to the mayor and states what he is going to do, and gets a paper, or passport. By that method and form of registration, they have almost abolished such refined artists as we have in this country, such as burglar, because if a man is found outside of his own limits, unless that stranger goes and registers at the office of the gendarme, or the police, or the mayor, he is immediately arrested, it does not matter whether he is a Lord, a Duke, or what he is. The foundation of the registration of the man-power and woman-power, as well as the alien enemy, in this country should be in that form. What is the use of building pyramids on their ends? They will only topple over. If you are going to have a registration, instead of an Order in Council, for Heaven's sake, let us have a law. This Parliament is quite prepared to discuss a Registration Bill, consider it clause by clause, and pass it. Not only is this Parliament a very old institution, but it follows in its act the Mother of Parliaments, and Parliaments act in a certain way; they move just like the planets. Parliaments were organized and ordained hundreds of years ago that all laws should be brought in to the Table of the Clerk; that those laws should be read three times on three separate days and discussed. Since the days of Henry VIII, it has been the regulation, that on three separate days the law has to be read, argued and discussed, so that there should be mature judgment, discussion and action.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: I knew I would be kept close to the line. I am arguing for the very subject named in the resolution, I am taking exception to the Orders in Council and regulations to which reference has been made in the resolution and by the hon. member. I say, as a member of Parliament, that it is quite contrary to precedent to establish regulations of this kind by Order in Council, when the matter should be referred to and could well be dealt with by this House, after which it would become statute law of the land.

I again repeat that I have no hesitation in saying that the great majority of the people of this country, 90 per cent of them, are opposed to this form of legislation. The manhood and womanhood of this country are prepared to do their duty. The Government has only been moving behind the time. There are throughout the country hundreds and thousands of organizations that are doing exactly what the Government proposes they should do—encouraging production. A number of young men are going to be taken away. Their places have to be filled by somebody. We should register the alien, ascertain what he is doing and put him under Government control. Then the Government can take him out of employment in which women or old men could be engaged, and put him where necessary. That is the object of this discussion, and that is what the members of the Great War Veterans Associations require.

I have nothing to say about the men from Quebec. They have a perfect right to go to British Columbia, or Ontario, or any other part of the country in which they can find employment with sufficient remuneration for their labour. The people of Ontario, the mothers, sisters and daughters of the men at the front, resent, to some extent, the stranger coming in and taking the place of the men who have gone overseas, but somebody must do the work, and I take no objection even to the alien enemy accepting any position in the country which he is capable of filling, as long as he takes it with the knowledge and under the regulation of the Government, so that we may know where we are going and what we are about. The English-speaking women in the large cities, such as the city of Toronto, and certain sections of this city, are becoming alarmed, afraid. I have received a great number of letters, not only from men but from women saying that they are beginning to be terrorized by conditions as they exist at present, because we have not placed the foreigners under any control. For that reason I say it is the immediate duty of this Government, before it commences the registration of the man-power of this country, to proceed to the registration of the enemy alien; to open books in every municipality in this country, to see that he has fourteen or twenty days in which to register himself, to give him his papers, and then to have a duplicate of those papers sent down here so that we shall know exactly what employment he is in and whether or not we can place others in his employment. In the old country, what is the condition of the exemption law? It is not that a man is exempted because he is a farmer, or for a certain period of time during the war because he is in a certain occupation; the question is: Can this man's place be taken by somebody who is not of military age, or can his place be taken by a woman? We are not really in this war until we realize that is the rule that should govern us. Moreover, it is only right that in the promulgation of these regulations which are going to take our young men, exception should be made that the young men of nineteen, twenty and twenty-one years of age who are the only sons of widows, and especially those who are farmers, should not be taken and dragged from their homes to go to the war, leaving the work of operating the farm to the women. I do not hesitate to say that, because all the militia laws and conscription laws of the world say that the only son of a widow must be exempted. That is the French law, and it is a grand law. The Spanish law, the Prussian law, the Russian law, all make that exception. I do not think we would make any error or mistake in adopting the same principle. I have given my views on the subject. I am only voicing the sentiments of a very large element in this country—the female element and the element of the men who have gone to the war and who have returned.

Reference to the employment of the returned soldier has been made by my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) who is a Parliamentary Secretary in one of the departments, and virtually a member of the Government, and surely I can speak in regard to that matter. I want hon. gentlemen to bear in mind that, with very few exceptions, the soldiers who have returned are men who have been wounded, men who have been very ill, or men who are over age and who have done their share in the war. In many cases, their efficiency is not one hundred per cent, although the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has said it should be one hundred per cent. Their efficiency may not be that, and it takes quite a little while for their nerves and actions to become normal. The people of Canada are great and big enough and have enough common sense to realize that and to know that too much cannot be expected of those men at once.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I do not wish to be interpreted as having said that I feel that the returned soldiers when they return to work should bring their labour efficiency up to one hundred per cent.

Mr. CURRIE: I am very sorry I mistook what the hon. member said. I thought it was a slam at the returned soldier.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I have tried to make it very clear that I am not going to take off my hat to any man in this House in my admiration of the work the soldier who has returned or the soldier who has not returned is doing, and I do not think it is fair I should be referred to in that way.

Mr. CURRIE: I take back any reference I made to that subject. I know very well that very few of the men who have returned are capable of giving 95 or even 65 per cent efficiency, but 80 per cent of the men who will return from the trenches as, I hope, victors, will be the finest specimens of manhood this country has ever seen. They will bring a new influence, not only into the industries of this country, but into our national life. As men who have undergone army discipline, they will place discipline in our factories and industries such as we have never had before, and they will be capable of organizing and directing our various industries. For that reason I say that we who remain at home with our eye on the battlefield waiting anxiously for the moment when victory and the end of the war shall come to us, must act here to-day as if we were putting ourselves in the place of those men in the trenches, and we must ask ourselves the question as we would ask one of them: What shall we do with the alien here? Every returned soldier to whom I have spoken has said without any hesitation: Conscript them. The Germans have interned every one of our men. I am in receipt of letters that I could not possibly read in this House from men who are prisoners of war in Germany. They have not been treated by any means according to the Hague Convention.

Everybody knows that we have to send them food, yet by the Hague Convention these men should be furnished by Germany with food similar to the food their prisoners receive from us. I think the time has come when the Government will have to take steps in this direction, and what is the use of hesitating or pussy-footing? What is the element behind or in the Government that is preventing them from taking this patriotic action? I cannot conceive of any step the Government might take that would be more popular with the people of this country than to register all aliens in the country, and appoint a Board of some kind to supervise them and see that they are properly employed. Then our great national works, our coal mines, and our farms, would not be standing idle for lack of men so long as there was sufficient man power in the country, whether native or alien.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, that we have had trouble with the alien enemy and foreigner within our gates goes without saying, but everybody has been beating about the bush instead of going directly to the point. If a man comes to me with a pain in his side or some other ailment, my first idea is to find out what is wrong, and then suggest a cure. The foreigner is not so much to blame for this trouble as our own people. It is a very sad fact that very few people, not only foreigners but men in every walk of life, can meet with but a small measure of success without having their heads turned. That, of course, applies to the foreigner also. When war broke out I had the honour of being medical officer to the 106th Regiment of Winnipeg, and I had hundreds of applications from these men whom we now call foreigners, to enlist. They were the first men to come into the recruiting office, but through the orders of the G. O. C. for the district we hesitated to take them lest they might be spies, or at all events not turn out satisfactorily when they got to the front. We were asked for 500 men from our regiment, and we took 685 to Valcartier, and I am satisfied we could have taken a full regiment if we had been able to enlist men of alien birth. But now matters have changed; these men have been receiving good wages, they have taken the place of our boys, and are enjoying prosperity such as they never knew before; they have achieved a great measure of success and many of them have gained a competency. But that is not the only thing that has put them wrong. We have also to take into account the English-speaking so-called leaders of labour. Hon. gentlemen will all remember the time when, for whatever reason, the price of grain on the Winnipeg market went over three dollars a bushel. Three men at least that I could name in Winnipeg—so-called leaders and directors of trade unions—went down among these aliens and said: "Look at the tremendous price farmers are going to get for their wheat. Do not think of working for them unless you get five dollars a day during the harvest," and that disrupted the whole labour situation. We ought to have more stringent laws for dealing with seditious utterances such as these men have made. One of these men I had the honour of defeating in the last election; he has been converted since and is now in khaki; but the other two are still at it, though a little bit more quietly than they used to be. I think it is high time the Government took these men in hand at once; it would certainly relieve the situation for Manitoba. These aliens are open to persuasion. The I. W. W. may have worked some influence among them—probably in the way of German propaganda—but they are docile at heart. I have the honour of representing probably the most cosmopolitan constituency in this Dominion, for in Winnipeg North thirty-seven languages are spoken. I know these aliens well; they may fight among themselves, and many a head I have had to sew up, but they are not given to pursuing any aggressive policy against the English-speaking people who have been in this country for years; they are very amenable to argument and to direction, and have great respect for the law; they can easily have the fear put into them, and if these labour leaders who have set them wrong were put down for two or three years, or until the termination of the war, they would soon come right.

With regard to the curtailment of unnecessary industry, sixty per cent of the wheat in southern Manitoba is in the ground to-day; in probably three weeks more it will all be sown, and in ninety days more, which is the usual time from seeding to harvest, the fields will be ripe. There is therefore plenty of time for the Government to give careful consideration to what the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis) has said with regard to curtailing unessential industries. If these industries were closed down on July 31 that would give two weeks before harvest, which usually comes about the middle of August, for the men thrown out of work to rush to the farms and save the crops. We have heard all over this country talk of conscripting these men, and it comes mostly from people who have given very little thought to the subject and have little foreseen the consequences of enforcing conscription among the foreigners. If these men were conscripted to the farms we have no means of making them do a reasonably good day's work. It is an old saying that a volunteer is worth two pressed men, and these men would undoubtedly take life very leisurely unless we had some way of keeping them on the go. If some one suggests that a returned soldier be sent to look after one or two men, there are very few farmers who want to be bothered with three men to do the work of two. It is an impossibility to conscript these foreigners to the farms, as far as the West is concerned, and it is for the West I am speaking; only on farms where they could be used in vast numbers would the scheme be practicable at all.

I have said that these labour leaders were of English-speaking origin, and I think that applies not only to the leaders of farm labour but to the labourers in mines as well. There are two main things to which our attention should be directed, and they are food and men. I believe that the men will not be got by the application of conscription to the foreigners, but I think our system in Winnipeg of registering alien enemies is a fairly complete one; I do not think there are many alien enemies living around Winnipeg who have not registered at the district registration office. That is not the whole number though. I have no doubt that those who are alien enemies are being looked after, and that there will be no trouble, by means of a registration system properly pursued, in getting every man and woman in this country registered.

The member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews) has said he has had the pleasure of seeing France and England awaken, and I hope he is going to have the pleasure of seeing Canada awaken shortly. He has said that if the contemplated measures are put through we shall double our production by proper organization. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that such are the facts, and that by closing non-essential industries it will be possible to send many men to work on the land. It has been said that of the men who will come under this draft, aged from nineteen to twenty-two, sixty per cent will be physically unfit. That does not give any very alarming figures, when we think of the possibilities in connection with the cultivation of the land, as well as development along other lines, by registration, by direction and by proper organization. To turn men into channels which will produce the necessary food supplies is, to my mind, as essential almost, if not quite so important, as to secure the men.

Mr. T. HAY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I know the House is getting tired listening to this discussion, but it may be profitable in the end to pursue it a little further, and as I come from a constituency where there are a great number of foreigners I may, perhaps, be pardoned if I say a word.

I wish to state, first of all, that I have listened to the discussion that has so far taken place with pleasure, with interest and with profit, although I do not agree with all that has been said upon the subject. In the first place, I do not think it will be advisable to close up what we call non-essential industries, because the result would be, if that were done at the present time, to throw a great number of people out of employment that could not be utilized in any other capacity. To close up such industries would not only result in injustice to a great number of people, but would fail in achieving the desired object. The closing up of non-essential industries will not accomplish anything in the way of production at this time, and yet I suppose the object of taking such a course would be to compel the men now employed in those industries to go on the farm. Now a great many of these men that would thus lose their occupations, in the first place, would not and could not make good on the farms in Manitoba. In the second place, their labour would be lost, and any help they might have yielded from an industrial point of view would be lost by their being thrown out of employment. In my belief such a policy would not work in the interest of the country at this time. We must bear in mind that there is a period of reorganization coming, and if we dislocate the prevailing conditions by any such drastic method as has been suggested by some hon. gentlemen it will simply mean that we will have to reorganize later on in order to help the industries that would thereby be crippled to become properly and thoroughly established again. I feel that the Government is moving along right lines in obtaining a registration of the man-power and women-power of Canada. I am satisfied that through this means we will be better able to adjust labour and other conditions than by any other method, and we shall then know exactly where to lay our hands on the men needed for the different departments of agriculture and labour. Besides, in this way, we shall undoubtedly be in a far better position to deal with this question later on.

I want to say a word for the farmer before I close, or the alien enemy as he is called. There are a great many aliens in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and in the constituencies surrounding Winnipeg, and we can hardly call these people alien enemies because they are naturalized British subjects at this time. A great many of them are making good, and are now doing a great work in the interest of the empire; we do not want to forget that. These men are producers of food on a large scale, which is one of the things we want to see carried out at the present time. Furthermore, I desire to point out that we invited many of these people to come to this country to help us in building our railroads, and to help in solving the labour problem in Canada. We have been glad to have these foreigners here, and we want to show some consideration for them when they came here on our invitation. We should realize that they have done and are doing work that is in the interest of Canada. There is no shortage of labour perhaps at the present moment, but I desire to point out that from this out labour will be required in the upkeep and maintenance of our railroads, and we know that our railroads—and I believe in particular those that the Government are interested in—are in very bad shape at this time. We will need thousands of labouring men in this country to put our railroads into the shape in which we will be able to successfully handle the 1918 crop. We must utilize this class of labour for that purpose, and the Government should see that that labour is available when it is needed.

One word with reference to interned aliens. In my humble opinion, the men that are in detention camps at this time, the men that are disloyal to this country and are alien enemies in the true sense of the term, should, when peace is declared and we have won the victory for which we are now fighting, be deported by the Government to their own country.

The question dealt with by the resolution is a big one. It is one which will take considerable thought in order to solve the many problems connected with it arising out of labour conditions, and I hope that it will be thoroughly and efficiently dealt with in the best interests of the country.

Mr. F. B. STACEY (Westminster District): It has been said that the resolutions before the House present one of the most difficult problems that the Government and Parliament will have to deal with. Perhaps I might say that, in my humble opinion, it is the most difficult of all. I consider that it is easier to present and adopt the resolutions which passed the House last Friday than to digest and settle this big labour question, which is perhaps the greatest problem before the people and Government of Canada to-day. There are four resolutions, I think, before the House. I shall not attempt to speak with regard to all of them, but will merely offer a word or two concerning the first. Coming also from a province where the situation is most acute regarding Chinese labour, I do not think that the men in Eastern Canada can properly appreciate the great difficulties arising from that situation as it obtains to-day in British Columbia.

A man must go there and live for some years and then he will be convinced of the seriousness of the situation in regard to the question of Chinese labour. I sincerely hope that there will be no further importation of Chinese labour into that country for some time to come. Probably members of this House do not know that in certain cases the Chinese themselves are beginning to be landlords and that in some cases they engage native labour. The morals resulting therefrom cannot be discussed here to-night. I come to the resolution presented by my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson):

> That, in the opinion of this House, the marked shortage of labour for agricultural and industrial purposes in all parts of the country provides ample justification for the introduction of a complete and comprehensive system of compulsory registration and direction of the country's man-power.

As I understand it, the registration clause of the resolution has been provided for, I take it amply provided for, and that perhaps need not be further discussed. But, in regard to the last five words, "direction of the country's man-power," it seems to me that the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis), given as No. 29 on the Order Paper, is the solution of the problem, or helps at any rate to accomplish the result aimed at. It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the maintenance and increase of production of foodstuffs and war material requires national control and direction of the capital and labour of the people, in order that non-essential business may be curtailed and our wealth and work directed to serving the state.

It is quite evident that such a proposition as that, in order to be considered at all.

must rest upon some very serious national condition, and I need not detain the House at this hour to explain that the serious condition exists. We all know that. We all admit that. We went into this war, and we went into it from the sound conviction that it was based on justice and righteousness. In other words, we believe in the legitimacy, righteousness and necessity of our part in the war. Granting that position, I claim that everything else necessarily follows. I believe, Sir, that following the adoption of that premise, the dedication of the resources of the nation to the achievement of the object follows as a matter of course. I believe that everything that this nation possesses, every resource of manpower of material wealth at its command must in the last analysis be consecrated to adoption of the principle underlying the declaration of war. If that be so, and I do not suppose there is any disposition to dispute it, there should be no division in this House upon one side or the other. We are agreed, I take it, that although we may have differed in the past as to methods and as to the manner of approaching this subject, to-night, when we are facing the situation as it is on the continent of Europe, we are agreed upon the fact that we must unite. In order to unite, in order to make this a reality, I hang my hope upon a sentence uttered by the right hon. the Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden—"Industries essential to the winning of the war." I believe that phrase has been used also by other members of the Government. If that be done, then there must be, as I believe there will be, consideration given by the Government to the question involved in resolution number 29. Is there any man here who believes that all the industries carried on in Canada to-day are essential to the winning of the war?

The term used in the "loafer" law is "useful" but I do not think that is strong enough. There may be a great many useful industries in time of peace which are not essential to the winning of the war, and these are the industries which should be in some measure curtailed. I think we should curtail certain industries and thereby release a large number of men who could devote their energies to the prosecution of industries that are essential. It may mean a good deal of inconvenience, some rearrangement—perhaps a great deal—but suppose it does, are we not all inconvenienced, and have we not suffered more than can be expressed from all the inconveniences and losses during the course of this war? Nothing should stand in the way of setting aside certain industries with the view of releasing men, capital, and the resources of the country for the prosecution of such industries as are essential, more especially agricultural production, the making of munitions, and the manufacture of certain commodities for the clothing and feeding of civilians and soldiers. I claim that we should set aside the production of things that we can do without. Let me read a letter that just came to hand during the last few days and which is written by an ex-member of one of the provincial legislatures. It reads:

> During the last six days I have had no less than eight men here trying to sell oil and book my fall supply of gasolene. These men are not only wasting their own time, from a productive standpoint, but are wasting gas and oil and adding very materially to the cost of the very article which we must use, to produce more food with. I will venture to say that oil could be sold for at least ten cents a gallon less in the companies were all forced to take these men off the road. Gasolene and fuel oil could also be reduced from three to five cents per gallon. And surely in this hour when our nation is in such terrible straits for food as well as men, for all kinds of productive work, that these men could be better employed.
> I might say that at least three of these men were under 35 years of age. We are also deluged to death with machine men. All this must add to the cost of these articles and thus place a greater burden on the producing class, which is already heavily burdened.
> I think that as an addition to the Order in Council compelling all men to be usefully employed, that you should place some of these things as non-essential and thus drive the thin edge of the wedge to wipe this curse forever off the map.

That is the opinion and judgment of a man who is not in the House, who has not heard this discussion, and knows nothing of what has been going on here to-day. In regard to the alien question, I would only say that I do not see that it is wise or possible to conscript the alien for individual service. It may be advisable and possible to do so for national service, but it seems to me that there are great difficulties, indeed, grave difficulties, in the way of compelling an alien to work for an individual. It would take man for man to keep him at it. I am hoping that when we do know the mind of the Government on this question there may be such financial provision made that will apply to all men, perhaps in the way of a tax, perhaps in some other way, but formulated in some manner that will compel every man in this country to contribute his full quota towards the salvation of the country and the prosecution of the war. And I am prepared to give the Government every chance to work out such a scheme and not embarrass them unnecessarily. We have not yet heard from the Government as to their policy on this question, but I am disposed to believe that from the members thereof there will come such a solution as will satisfy the House and the country. Further, I may add that in my judgment it will be a very difficult thing, Sir, for the Government to introduce any legislation that in the opinion either of this House or the country at large will be too drastic. I think it will be a difficult thing for them, when we are facing the situation that obtains to-day, to introduce any legislation that, from one ocean to the other, will be regarded as too drastic. We are one, and whatever difficulties or differences may have divided us in the past, I claim, Sir, they should not separate us in the future, and I trust that there will be, growing out of this discussion, and out of the spirit which prevails among true Canadians, a better spirit of unity and harmony than has been manifest in the past in certain sessions of this House.

May I be permitted to say one thing more? I have in my constituency one district composed almost entirely of French Canadians. Let me say that during the campaign I received from no audience a better hearing than was given to me by that body—or as we call them in the West "bunch"—of French Canadians.

An hon. MEMBER: How did they vote?

Mr. STACEY: I will tell you how they voted. It may be a little out of order, but the question has been asked, and if you will allow I shall answer it. They told me, before going to see them, that it was not much use for me to go there. They said: "Stacey, they are going to beat you by a hundred." "All right," I said, "I will go and see them anyway, I won't hurt them; I will go and see them and talk to them." I did so to the best of my humble ability. And, behold, Sir, when the returns came in the majority against me was not 100, but only 38. So, if we get more of them in the West, perhaps we shall have a somewhat similar result. Leaving all jokes aside—and I may be pardoned for speaking earnestly on this question, for I have a reason for doing so—I sincerely hope that no man on either side of the House will in the future utter what in his after moments he may be led to regret, and compelled to say before he goes to sleep at night: "I wish I had not said that."

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all realize that we have had an afternoon and evening which has added a great deal to our stock of information, at all events as regards the interest which is taken in this question of alien labour, more particularly of alien enemy labour, and the treatment of the alien enemy, by those who are represented by the hon. members who have spoken; and perhaps, most of all we have learned what a variety of opinion may be entertained with regard to this highly important subject. We have had suggestions that are valuable. We have had some that, perhaps, at first glance, look more catchy and attractive than they may prove to be practicable and feasible. But, upon the whole, I am satisfied that the Government will certainly be glad to give in all earnestness its serious consideration to the different views that have been put before us and to look at them, and into them, sympathetically, having before it the same purpose that, I am sure, has inspired the hon. members who brought these different resolutions before the House and those who, from one point of view or another, have spoken upon them.

I do not desire to detain the House at any length, but I do think that it is worth while, in view of the apparent lack of knowledge on the part of quite a few hon. members who have spoken, of what has been done with regard to the control of the alien enemy in this country, that I should, for a few moments, point out some of the outstanding, leading and principal things that have been done in that connection. I venture to say that it is a mistake to assume that the Government since the outbreak of this war has been oblivious of the existence of the alien enemy in this country, and has been blind to the necessity of taking such steps and such measures in the way of precaution as circumstances might indicate to be necessary.

Let me recall to hon. members that at the outset of the war the Government took a position with regard to the presence of the alien enemy nationality within the country. We had an option at that time. It was open to us if we had thought, and those responsible for the Government of the United Kingdom and the general direction of the policy as towards foreign nations had thought, that it was in the interests of this country to seek to expel the persons of enemy alien nationality, I think it would have been quite within our right to take that course.

I think, too, that it would have been, and is to-day, within our right to intern the persons of enemy alien nationality within this country, more particularly, perhaps, those of them who being of military age and under obligation to do service according to the laws of their respective countries, might very properly be treated as persons that this State has an interest to see did not get away from this country and return possibly to perform those obligations towards their respective countries and take part in this war against us. Now, at the outset of this war, we took the position, not only that we would allow these people to remain within the country, but I might say at the suggestion—and I might even say upon the insistence—of the authorities of the Mother Country we took the position that these people, those of them at all events who were of military age, should not be allowed to leave this country. And, taking that position, not only consenting that they should remain but actually preventing their departure, we felt bound, under these circumstances, so long as they violated no law of this country, so long as they behaved themselves as good citizens within this country, to extend to them the protection of the law. We announced that to them. We announced to them at the same time that those of them who by act or word showed a spirit of hostility to this country, or who did not conform to the laws of this country, would be interned. And large numbers were interned.

Sir SAM HUGHES: For cause.

Mr. DOHERTY: Some of them for cause. Quite a number of them were interned more largely under the inspiration of the sentiment of compassion, if I may use the expression, than because of hostility. At that time, when the labour market was glutted and there was a natural disposition to give the preference in the matter of employment to our own people, thousands of these aliens were starving in some of our cities. There were thousands of them in Montreal, great numbers of them in Winnipeg, large numbers in Port Arthur. In many instances we interned these people because we felt that, saying to them, "You shall not leave the country," we were not entitled to say, "You shall starve within the country." However that may be, a considerable number for cause, and an additional number for the reasons which I have given, were interned, until at one time we had some seven or eight thousand interned aliens. So that we were not oblivious of the existence of aliens in this country, nor absolutely inactive with regard to looking after them.

Very shortly after the outbreak of war we established a very general system of registration. We established registration offices in the places throughout the country where there were considerable numbers of persons of alien enemy nationality. We summoned them to register—at Montreal, Sydney, Toronto, Winnipeg and cities throughout the West; among them, I think, two cities of British Columbia. We called for a general registration of persons of alien enemy nationality, and that registration was very thorough and very complete. But there came a time when the persons of alien enemy nationality were registered, and when the work was completed there remained only the task of supervising the reporting of those who had registered. We found that with one or two exceptions the work could be done as effectively through the police officers in the different localities, and we did not feel justified in keeping up offices and large staffs wholly for the purpose of taking these reports. Up to the present day, by the police officers in different parts of the country, under the supervision and direction of the Chief Commissioner of Police, track is kept of the alien enemies. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) referred to the county of Waterloo as a place where there had been no registration office. It is quite true that we did not have a registration office there, but the Chief Commissioner of Dominion Police appointed a representative to gather the necessary information with regard to persons of alien enemy nationality in that district and to take proceedings wherever that might be necessary. People who are familiar with the conditions in that county will, perhaps, see why we did not consider it necessary to establish a registration office there. The great bulk of the people of alien enemy nationality within that county were not people such as you have to deal with in the western provinces, or in the cities of Montreal, Toronto, and other places—that is, recently arrived immigrants. They were, in large volume—the bulk of them, I think—people who had resided there for many years, who were located on farms, established there, known to everybody. The purpose of registration is to acquire information about people, and when you are dealing with an old, settled community, where information with regard to everybody is easily procurable, there is not the same need to call for registration as there is when you are dealing with a floating or unknown population. However, whether we were mistaken in that particular—

Mr. CURRIE: Were there not many alien enemies in Waterloo of recent arrival? I understand that about twenty-five per cent of them had come to the country only within the last ten or fifteen years. I agree that a large number of them were old-timers, but were those registered who were of recent arrival?

Mr. DOHERTY: We did not establish a registration office in that particular county, but we did establish a system by which we were able to keep track of the alien enemy population there, just as throughout the rest of the country. It is well that we should have the suggestions which hon. gentlemen have thrown out as to what we might do that might be better; on the other hand, it is well also that hon. members should know that we have not been absolutely doing nothing, waiting to hear from them this evening.

Not only did we have that system of registration and of internment, but we had a very effective system by which the incoming and the out-going of the alien enemy was controlled. This was done under the direction also of the Dominion police, and largely through the instrumentality of the immigration officers. The coming and going was very closely watched and very effectively controlled. I must render testimony to the work of Sir Percy Sherwood. Ever since the war broke out he has maintained a most careful supervision over the action of alien enemies in this country. Reports were received from all quarters in the early stages of the war—in much greater number than they are received to-day—embodying suggestions of groups here and individuals there who were reported as being dangerous. All these suggestions were gone into and run to the ground, even in cases where on the face of them they appeared to be futile. The greatest possible care was taken. At the outset of the war, when we were apprehensive of trouble from the alien enemy resident in the United States—that country then being at peace—we had a most effective system of ascertaining what was going on there, and complete reports were received. That system, of course, is better when carried out quietly. As some evidence that we were not entirely idle, may I not say this: we are in the fourth year of the war; what have we had in the way of outrage or crime or violence from the alien of enemy nationality? When this war broke out, I was very apprehensive on this subject, and so was Sir Percy Sherwood who set to work to make plans to guard against such occurrences. It goes to show probably that our apprehensions were exaggerated; it goes to show that some of the fears expressed here to-night of what the alien enemy might do were exaggerated, but it also goes to show that effective methods to keep in touch with what was going on must have been resorted to. Strong testimony that there was somewhere an eye that was watching and a hand that was controlling is to be found in the fact that we have gone as far as we have, and that with this large population of alien enemy nationality, we have had so little of crime, of violence, proceeding from them in this country.

There are just two other subjects with regard to which I should like to say something. There is the question of our conscripting, or compelling to join in our military operations, persons of allied nationality residing in this country. That is a matter on which we have not been idle. Just after the conscription law was passed, following out a suggestion that had been made before it was passed and which, at that time, did not seem feasible, we took steps to make provision, and there is presently a law in force in this country, enacted by Order in Council, under which, if our allies were ready to take their men home, we provided the necessary machinery for rounding the men up and delivering them to their respective countries. That was passed at the instance of the Italian Consul, the French Consul, the Belgian Consul; and it was passed because we did not want to wait for a treaty. As hon. members all know, we are not in a position to make treaties directly. Everybody knows the slowness of diplomatic action. To get in advance of the treaties, we passed this law at that time in the full expectation that those respective Governments would be in a position to avail themselves of it. Our part is all ready, and we are ready to carry it out. What happened, unfortunately, was that the respective Governments were not able to find transportation for their men. The trouble is not for lack of our being ready to do our part. Shortage of transportation is the only reason why those have not been sent home to join the forces of their respective countries.

As to our conscripting them, that is something we cannot do until the treaties are carried out, and the treaties have to be negotiated and finally executed through the home authorities. As hon. members know, an agreement has been come to with the United States. It is delayed awaiting the action of the United States Senate. There is no means by which we can hurry it. We have done the best within our power to press it As regards the treaties with France, Italy and Belgium, the British Government has, I understand, entered into treaties with those countries with regard to the people of those countries within the United Kingdom. They communicated with us some months ago, and we replied asking them to see that the treaty was so extended as to enable us to conscript the men of those nations within this country. I, myself, personally, on more than one occasion have cabled and written pressing for action upon the subject. I am not saying that by way of criticism of the authorities in the Old Country. Doubtless they have many things to attend to at the present moment. I mention the matter only for the purpose of bringing home to hon. members the fact that we are just as anxious as they can be to get that system into operation.

Just one more word upon the subject of how we can deal with the person of alien enemy nationality in the way of compelling him to work. It has been said that we can intern him. Yes, we can. It has been said that we we can make him register. Yes, we can. We have made him register and we have interned him, in the measure which it seemed to us useful to do it. I may say, before I leave the subject of internment, that when we had seven or eight thousand of those people interned, it was costing this country something over $1,500,000 a year. We found that the sentiment of every man who came into contact with the Austrian who was interned was that he was absolutely not dangerous.

Mr. CURRIE: What about an outbreak of Austrians at Kapuskasing?

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall get the exact information.

Mr. CURRIE: It was an Austrian officer who led that outbreak.

Mr DOHERTY: The hon. member may be better informed than I am. Let us concede for a moment that one or two of them are dangerous. When I speak of the Austrian, I am speaking of the bulk of the people of that nationality. Although there was a glut in the labour market, conditions changed until there was, in this country, a crying need for labour; we had people from all parts of the country, as loyal people as we are ourselves, asking for the labour of those men, and we discharged them and allowed them to go out where they found employment. We felt it our duty then, in fairness to the working people of this country, to stipulate that these men should be paid the ordinary wage, and we also felt it our duty to stipulate, and we did stipulate, that they should not be employed where our own people were available for employment. It is over a year ago since these men have gone out, and we have had no word of complaint as to their conduct subsequent to their going. To-day our interned prisoners number from two to three thousand, and these are for the most part Germans; I regret that I cannot say anything like the same thing about them as I said about the bulk of our interned Austrians.

One hon. gentleman has spoken of these interned people in British Columbia as living on the fat of the land. I would be glad to show the hon. gentleman just how much it costs to feed these people in these internment camps, but I do not propose to say it here and let it go out to the public, because I do not want a despatch from Germany complaining that these men are not being properly fed. They are being properly fed. But if there is one thing of which we can speak with some pride it is the system by which this has been carried out and the results we have been able to obtain in the way of economy, while still treating these men in a way which leave us open to no complaint.

I just want to say one word on the subject of our compelling them to work. A good deal has been said about international law and there has been a good deal of contempt expressed for too great an anxiety to adhere to international law. I would like to point this out. In dealing with these people we are not dealing with prisoners of war, to which the citations from the Hague Convention referred which were made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). We are dealing, not with people captured in an act of nostility towards this country, but with people who came to this country peaceably, and who happened to be found in this country when war broke out. We had the right, and might have said to them, "Go away. We do not want you here." But, when we told them they could stay here, when we left them free to stay here, it became our duty, so long as they were guilty of no hostile act or deed and so long as we had no reason to suspect their readiness to obey the law, to treat them not as enemies but as people whom we have been willing to keep within our gates. That did not deprive us of our right to intern them if in any particular case there was ground for suspicion of their conduct; nor even if at a certain stage we had reached the conclusion that all of them were dangerous, did it prevent us from interning them all. It is open to us if we think it wise to intern them. When we did intern them, unless we are going to depart from the very well settled rule of international law, which I may say the United Kingdom has not seen fit to depart from, we have no right to compel them to work. The hon. member for North Simcoe read certain citations from The Hague Convention with regard to prisoners of war, and there is no doubt that he cited them correctly. If we were dealing with prisoners of war, with soldiers taken in performance of their duty as soldiers, and made prisoners of war, all those rules would apply to them, and there is no doubt that we have the right to compel men so taken to labour if we pay them the ordinary wage of a soldier. But the situation is absolutely different when you are dealing with civilian residents of this country, whom this country may find it necessary to intern by reason of the apprehension even of their being dangerous; you are not then dealing with a prisoner of war.

Mr. CURRIE: The extracts I read dealt with the rules governing alien enemies.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I understood the citations, the hon. gentleman was reading extracts with reference to prisoners resident in an alien enemy country.

Mr. CURRIE: It referred to clause 5. I read the whole thing.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman may have understood it differently from what I did, but I would suggest to him that if he will read over the rules of the Hague Convention carefully he will see that what those specific rules have in contemplation is the soldier prisoner of war, and they all indicate it; those rules state specifically that you must feed your prisoner of war the same as you feed your own soldiers.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the minister direct me to the clauses of the Hague Convention dealing with those who are not soldiers?

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that there is no clause in the Hague Convention dealing with civilian prisoners at all. We have to fall back upon the accepted rule of international law, that you may deal with civilian prisoners in the manner which I have indicated. You may say to him, "You shall not stay in the country." Or you may let him stay in the country if you choose, and if you let him stay in the country you are not entitled to punish for being a prisoner of enemy nationality. You may intern him for your protection, that is your right, but when you do that, and cut him off from the means of earning his livelihood, you have to give him his bread and butter and his clothes, and you cannot compel him to labour, as you can compel the soldier prisoner of war under the rules of the Hague Convention. I may state that we have had repeated remonstrances from Germany through the United States consuls charging us with subjecting these men to compulsory labour, and the answer we sent back—and, of course, it was the truthful answer—was that we were not compelling them to labour, their labour was voluntary. We did not feel in a position to question the doctrine laid down by Germany that these sections of the Hague Convention did not apply to civilian prisoners; we acquiesced in that view and Great Britain acquiesced in that view.

It might be interesting to the House to learn what they do in Great Britain in regard to compulsory labour. We have heard a good deal about what Germany does, but I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen do not intend to hold Germany up to us as the model that we should follow. I fully appreciate the absolutely natural feeling of irritation that we all share when we see the advantage that is resulting to these people from the fact that our own young men have gone forth to do their duty and fight. But, after all, is it not a part of our duty to control our feelings? Is not one of the things that we want to preserve through this war the reputation which we have been given to boasting of—too much, perhaps—the reputation for the spirit of fair play under all circumstances. I would rather point to the model of Great Britain, and I do not think Great Britain is treating these interned men in any spirit of mawkish sentimentality or because she wants to be ethical with an unmoral people, as one hon. gentleman said this afternoon. She is doing this, no doubt, in recognition of her international law obligations, and also under the direct menace of Germany that otherwise there would be reprisals and it would be worse for us.

It is all very well to say that our men over there cannot be treated any worse than they are. I do not want to extenuate many instances of ill-treatment that have come to our knowledge, but I do know this: that for the long period of time before the United States came into this war we had the advantage of having the German internment camps inspected by the United States consular officers in that country, just as those same officers inspected the camps in this country and reported to Germany. I must say that the reports were on the whole favourable. There were instances where there was ground for complaint and in some of those instances the complaint was listened to and conditions remedied. It is all very well for us sitting at home here to say: "Oh, we don't care. We are mad with the alien enemy here; let us get after him. They cannot treat our boys any worse than they are already treating them." But it is our boys over there who will have to bear the brunt of it. I am a stickler for international law, but I must confess that that argument appeals to me in the strongest possible way. I hold in my hand a despatch from London, dated March 5, 1918, telling how they treat these men in England. It is as follows:

Downing Street, March 5, 1918.

My Lord Duke,—

I have the honour to transmit to Your Excellency, for the information of your Ministers, a copy of a memorandum which has been prepared at the Home Office as to the procedure followed in the United Kingdom with regard to the internment and treatment of enemy aliens. This information has been furnished in reply to an enquiry made by the Government of New Zealand, and it is considered that a statement of the policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to these matters might be of interest to your Ministers.

2. In connection with the memorandum I should explain that interned enemy subjects are not compelled to work. A number of them work as volunteers for wages, both inside the camps on such industries as can be organized with advantage, and also outside the camps, in quarrying, roadmaking, farm work and reclamation of land. Some hundreds of interned civilians in addition have volunteered for the special working camps, where they are employed in timber-cutting and constructional and other labouring work. Besides these, between 1,500 and 2,000 have on their own application been sent out to employers on license from the camps, either singly or in small groups, for employment in farm work or industries of national importance. In every case the work is undertaken voluntarily, and the alien is at liberty to give it up and go back to the camp from which he came if he so desires.

3. As regards male enemy subjects who are exempted from internment or, in the case of those above military age, from repatriation, it was decided early last year that all these, if physically fit, must do work of national utility as a condition of retaining their exemptions, and measures have since been taken through the Ministry of National Service and the Employment Exchanges to place them in suitable occupations. Here again, however, there is no absolute compulsion; the alien, if unwilling to undertake the work offered him, has always the option, if of military age, of going to an internment camp, or if above military age, of being repatriated; and in no case is an alien enemy required, as a condition of retaining his exemption from internment or repatriation, to undertake work on munitions or other work of such a kind.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,
WALTER H. LONG.

Governor General
His Excellency
THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE, K.G., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O., Etc., Etc., Etc.

The great point that I want to bring out is the absolute recognition by Great Britain that work of that kind is voluntary. Now Great Britain is a better country for us to go to for an example as to treatment of persons of enemy alien nationality. Great Britain does not require these persons to work unless she sees good reason for it, and I call attention to the words employed in the despatch which this is described "as the policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to these matters". We must also keep in mind that we are not an absolutely independent nation, that the United Kingdom is the nation with which other countries deal, and that it would be becoming and proper that we should give some thought to the policy of the United Kingdom upon a matter of this sort. Because it must be remembered that reprisals will not fall on the Canadian alone; they will also be inflicted on the British subject from wherever he has come. So that I think that in so far as it is suggested that we should adopt a policy of compulsory labour to be imposed on the person of enemy alien nationality, there is very good ground at all events for us to pause before we decide upon it. Do we want to put ourselves outside the pale of the law? Do we want to put ourselves outside the pale because Germany is there? Do we want to be in the same class with Germany, or would we rather stand within the pale, and so standing be in the company of the Mother Country? But when you get down to the practical question, as one hon. gentleman from Winnipeg said here this evening, how are you going to make men work? You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink. What will be the result of your law if the alien does not want to work? You will have to send him to jail, or possibly intern him. Which is the best for this country, to have these persons of alien enemy nationality living in internment camps at the expense of the country at a time when there is a great call for labour here, or to have them working on productive labour which is to the advantage of Canada and supporting themselves, even if they get large wages? Of course, we may so control or arrange matters that we may see to it that these people do not unduly profit to the detriment of our own people; but upon the abstract question of conscripting the labour of persons of enemy alien nationality and making them work, while it sounds very satisfactory, yet when you come to carry out the idea and send them out to work, what kind of a day's work will you get from men of that kind? Surely it would not be suggested that we should send a slave driver out with the alien armed with a whip to keep him working; and, short of doing that, what course can you pursue? You can either, as I have already stated, send them to jail or you can intern them.

I do not say but that perhaps I would be anxious, just as anxious as any hon. member, to find some equitable and practical method by which everybody in this country, including this particular class, should be compelled to contribute to the support of our effort by taxation or by some other means. I think I can safely say, speaking for myself, and I think perhaps I am also safe in saying I can speak for the Government, that the different suggestions thrown out this afternoon will certainly have careful consideration. More than that they are the very things that are filling our own minds all the time, because we are seeking to discover methods that will properly and effectively deal with this exceedingly difficult question.

I have occupied a longer time than I intended when I rose, but I did think it worth while to remind those who knew it before, and to inform those who perhaps were not aware of it, of what has been done with regard to this matter, and of the very serious questions that arise in connection, at all events with one of the suggested remedies. Now there can be no objection to the motion passing, because it suggests only a consolidation of existing laws. There may be advantages in that, and there certainly cannot be any evil results from it. I would rather hope that good will flow from the discussion which we have had, inasmuch as it has furnished us with many suggestions that I believe will give room for profitable thought.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I desire only to detain the House for a very few moments in connection with this resolution. It is not very clear to me as a lawyer what is intended by the motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements). The only law that I am familiar with in connection with alien labour is the Alien Labour Act, and if that is the law that the hon. member wants to consolidate, its consolidation will not be effected by Order in Council. If there are other alien labour laws which required consolidation, or which should be consolidated, I am not familiar with them and the hon. gentleman did not allude to them. The resolution is a somewhat broad proposition, and having listened with the greatest attention to the hon. gentleman's remarks, I am forced to the conclusion that he had in his travelling bag a great many things that had very little relation to the subject. I cannot for the life of me see the connection, for instance, between this resolution and the conscripting of labour in the province of Quebec. It would simply appear to me that the hon. gentleman was making a stool-pigeon of the resolution with a view to having a fling at that province.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman was probably not in the House when Mr. Speaker announced that it had been decided to discuss all the resolutions on the Order Paper bearing on the subject at the same time as the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements).

Mr. McKENZIE: I have been for quite a number of years in this House with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and I have always found him to have enough to do in dealing with his own little affairs in his own way. I must remain convinced that my mind is still strong enough to persuade me that the hon. member was dealing entirely with his own resolution, and with what was in his own mind when the Speaker gave a wider scope to the discussion. And what I have stated was what he undoubtedly had in mind himself. However, before going any further into the matter, let me say that my mind is so constructed that I find it difficult not to criticize a man who is doing something that is not consistent with his history and with his career, and who does not seem to be straight and honest and open. If there is anything in the world that the member from British Columbia should keep mum on it is the question of labour, the question of aliens, and the question of colour and race and creed in respect to labour matters. I remember well when I sat behind the Government in this House up to the time of the change of Administration in 1911, that we heard a great deal from the Pacific province about a "white British Columbia." I remember it well, and I have with me the Hansard containing a report of a discussion in the early part of January, 1908, when the famous telegram of whether the Conservatives were for a white British Columbia, or were absolutely opposed to anything in the colour line, was sent.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman was not a member during that session.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps so, but he was here shortly afterwards if he was not here then. British Columbia sent us a solid representation of Conservatives in 1908. I think the hon. gentleman was here then; perhaps he was not. He does not say himself that he was not. I think the hon. member came here in 1908.

Mr. CLEMENTS: The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken; it was in 1911 that the solid representation came here.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite understand the reference. This telegram was the basis for sending a solid representation from British Columbia in 1908.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And then it was a forgery.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was said to have been a forgery, but it was allowed to do its work. It was not until after the election it was discovered to be a forgery. After the election, when we came to this House, there was some discussion, and it turned out that it was a forgery. Up to that time nobody in this Parliament had any knowledge that there was anything spurious or improper about it. But it was brought to the notice of the House, in the discussion on the Address soon after the election of 1908. The discussion is in Hansard, and any body who cares to read the speech of the then leader of the Opposition, now the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden), will find his reference to it. I believe my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni came here first in 1908. He does not dispute that. At any rate, my recollection of him goes that far. We had a telegram, whether proper or genuine or not, and these gentlemen came here basing their principles and their policy upon that declaration. When they were in opposition they were full of the fight. But the day came when there was a change and they found themselves behind a government which had power to do the things that they said our government had power to do. From that time down to this day, year after year, session after session, the same coloured races, the same Chinese, the same Japanese, were good enough for my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. We have heard not a word from him complaining about these laws. He has not a word to say about the consolidation of regulations which are good enough for him. But before that his party in the British Columbia Legislature, under the Government which he was supporting, passed forty-two fake Acts which they knew they had no business to pass, which they had not the slightest authority to pass. They were playing a fake game, and my hon. friend was behind them. He never raised a voice or a hand in protest against it. It was simply a scheme to deceive the people of British Columbia into supposing that they were passing laws and sending them to Ottawa when they knew that the Minister of Justice would have to advise that they were ultra vires of the provincial legislature as they were ultra vires of this House even if we attempted to pass them. But still they went on doing this with the knowledge of my hon. friend, doing it for political purposes and taking all the benefits that were coming to them from it. He never complained. But now, when there is perhaps enough foreign element in this Government to justify him in pulling out the old knife again, he is prepared to slash it around, to find fault, and to say that there must be a different colour. The sun must rise in a different way, the electric light in British Columbia must flare a different light upon the situation. Because, forsooth, there are a few Liberals, or men who were Liberals, and who, I hope, are Liberals still, in this Government, he thinks it gives him a justification to introduce this question again. I would say to the hon. member that if he expects labour to have confidence in him and his party, if he expects the man who has no capital, no backing, no strength, except the strength of his arm, and of the brain that the Lord put in his head, to be behind him, to believe him, and to have confidence in him, he must place himself behind legislation that is true, straight, honest and simple, and such that the man who runs may read. If he expects to enlist the favour of the labouring men of this country, he must show genuine earnestness in the support of the interests of labour.

There are new men here, whom I should not accuse of anything wrong, because I do not know their histories. But I know the men who have been here since 1908, and I know that they have been playing the political game as strongly as it could be played, and who care nothing for labour, except for the use they can make out of labour to further their own political ends and purposes. I submit to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that I simply regard this motion to-day as another scheme like the passing of these 42 or 50 nonsensical Acts of the Legislature which they sent here to be disallowed, and which were passed for the purpose of fooling the labour men and making them believe that something was going to be done. That is the history of the Tory party in British Columbia, and that is the history of the hon. member himself, in so far as labour in that country is concerned. Upon that history he must stand or fall. He cannot be allowed to come to us to be redeemed, washed, and made whiter than snow upon a death-bed repentance of this kind. I would not sleep well to-night if I should allow my hon. friend to escape with a history of that kind behind him, and not tell our friends from British Columbia and these new and zealous men who have come here lately, and who are, perhaps, ignorant of the history of their predecessors in connection with matters of this kind, what the actual facts are. For the betterment of the matter, I would tell them to begin at Jerusalem, begin at British Columbia. Establish a clean, straight, consistent record of your own in regard to the matter, and then come to us for the betterment of the situation. We can assure hon. gentlemen that we are with labour every time and will give consistent laws and regulations, in so far as they can possibly be given, to both capital and labour. It is of the highest importance for us that the best possible relation and the greatest degree of confidence should exist between capital and labour. There can only be confidence and consistency and true living and life in this country by all acting upon the square, acting in a straightforward way, saying what they think, and governing themselves accordingly. That is the spirit of life, that is the practice that I would like to see carried out, that has always been the policy of the Liberal party and that is why to-day everywhere in this country labour is looking to that grand old party for what is necessary for the upholding of its hands in connection with the industries of the country.

I have only one word more to say. As far as the province from which I come is concerned, we have no trouble with alien labour. I think that a great part of the difficulty with alien labour in other parts of the Dominion is due to the fact that, perhaps, a proper example is not set before it by the people who inhabit the country and who are really Canadians or English-speaking people. I say that with the greatest possible respect. The men who come to this country should familiarize themselves with our laws and be assimilated by and become familiar with the regulations, laws and practices of our own people. In the province from which I come we have a very excellent class of labour.

We have splendid characters in our miners, good, Christian, well educated people. And foreigners coming in have noticed what our own people do, how they observe the law, keep the Sabbath day, go to church, pay their debts, and dress well. They notice that these things are being done in Nova Scotia, and they dare not, to any great extent, depart from them. For that reason, within a few years after the foreigner comes to our province, he becomes a man who is hard to distinguish from the person who has been with us for a great many years. Unfortunately, when this terrible war came upon us, we had hundreds, if not thousands, of these people in our province. We had a few internments, but I think for reasons given by the Minister of Justice to-night, that they were not permitted to go away; and there was some fear, perhaps not greatly justified, that they should not be allowed to work in the mines, because any one wanting to be mischievous could make a great deal of trouble in a coal mine, causing disaster and probably loss of live, and it was thought that some of these foreigners might perhaps be willing to sacrifice their lives for the purpose of causing serious destruction; and there was fear, perhaps unjustifiable fear, on the part of our own men against allowing them to work in the mines. For that reason, some, not a great many, were interned. But, taking them all in all, we have no complaint to make. We have no trouble with them, and although hundreds and no doubt thousands of aliens are working in the steel works and coal mines and generally in our larger industries, I know of only one case where it was rumoured that one of them threatened or remarked that, "Some day the mine would be on fire." I do not know whether he meant anything by it, but he was interned. That is the only case of that kind that we have had, and that man is still interned in some part of the province. Coming from that part of the country and knowing these people, and sitting in this House while this discussion is going on, it is very likely, as many of them are watching events, that they would think ill of me if I did not bring to the notice of the House that in the province of Nova Scotia we have no such trouble as has been spoken of in British Columbia. And so far as general labour is concerned, as that subject has been touched upon, we have every reason to be proud of the conduct of the labouring classes not only in Nova Scotia but in every part of the Dominion and not only in the Dominion but in every part of the Empire. When we compare the way in which the poor man is exercising the power of his capital with the way in which the millionaire is exercising his in food production and other things, I think the labouring man is far superior in his patriotism and sacrifice to his wealthy competitor. He has nothing to put forward, as I said before, but the brain in his head and the strength in his arm. And, knowing, as we do, that they could have given us a great deal of trouble, I think we have reason to be proud and thankful, and to recognize with appreciation and praise what our labouring men in every part of the Empire, and particularly in Canada, have done.

If there is any necessity for the consolidation of any laws, or if any better condition of things can be brought about by consolidation of them, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection at all. But I must say that I do not know what I am agreeing to when I am agreeing to a consolidation of laws in respect of alien labour in this country, when, apart from the Alien Labour Act, I am not aware that there is any law at all. However, if there is not, no harm can happen.

I must congratulate hon. gentlemen who took part in this debate. I have watched it very closely, and I am particularly proud of our new members for the high tone to which they kept this debate and the very excellent manner in which they have expressed themselves. I am sure we have every reason to hope that while such men remain with us, not only the interests of labour, but every other Canadian interest, will be well maintained, and our reputation as a Parliament will not be impaired.

The SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion

Mr. H. S. CLEMENTS: In conclusion, I would like to say a word. I appreciate very much indeed the acceptance of the resolution by the Government, and I sincerely hope that legislation along the line of the resolution will be brought down ere long. I have no thought of replying to the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie), who has just taken his seat. I came into this House some four years before the hon. member did, and neither he, nor any one else, can accuse me of ever being a partisan in this House. I should like to have seen the hon. member for once in his life, when dealing with this resolution, get away from that partisanship which he always exhibits. That is all I have to say to the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

Motion of Mr. Clements agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. McKENZIE: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. SIFTON: The War Appropriation, probably.

Motion agreed to and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m., Tuesday.

Tuesday, April 23, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

Memorandum No. 4 respecting the work of the Department of Militia and Defence from January 1, 1917 to December 31, 1917. —Major-General Mewburn.

Copy of Order in Council dated 3rd April, 1918, respecting the reservation of Dominion lands for disposition under the Soldiers' Settlement Act.—Hon Mr. Meighen.

Copy of Orders in Council approving regulations adopted by the Canada Registration Board.—Mr. McCurdy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It appears that the resolution adopted by the House on the 18th instant with regard to the business of the House, in the form in which it was passed, does away with the Order for Private Bills on Monday. I therefore move:

That the resolution adopted by the House on 18th April, 1918, be amended so that it shall read:

That on Monday the 29th day of April and on subsequent Mondays until the end of the Session, Government Notices of Motion and Government Orders shall have precedence after Questions and Notices of Motion for the Production of Papers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was ready to proceed with two different matters under the heading "Notices of Motions," but at the request of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, I delayed them. I suppose that when the Estimates come up, the rule that we must not refer to questions which have already appeared on the Order Paper shall not apply.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the production of papers is desired, they can be procured through non-controversial motions. If hon. gentlemen desire to discuss any matter included in a Notice of Motion, the motion can be dropped and the matter brought up on the Estimates.

Mr. SPEAKER: The difficulty could be obviated by a motion on a future day that the Notice of Motion in question be discharged from the Order Paper.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE.

QUESTION AS TO THE EXEMPTION OF FARMERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): I have been asked by several of my constituents whether the Order in Council passed on December 3 last still stands. In view of the declaration made by the Minister of Militia at Hamilton last Saturday, when he emphasized the importance of food production, I should be glad if he would inform the House whether he will continue to release from military service farmers between the ages of 20 and 22, liable to the Order in Council recently passed, who are indispensable to the work of food production.

Major-General MEWBURN: My powers are limited entirely to the Order in Council passed last week; I cannot go beyond the powers therein defined.

Mr. PROULX: I did not understand that the Order in Council of December 3 had been repealed.

Major-General MEWBURN: Under the Order in Council recently passed, there will be no exemptions within the ages as called out. I assume that the Order in Council will still be operative in respect of those classes under the Military Service Act whose exemptions have not been specifically cancelled by the recent Order in Council.

WAR GRANT—$500,000,000.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 38, for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 2—payment of $500,000,000 may be made:

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am informed that, some time last fall, in the case of Charles, alias "Ti-Noir" Desjardins, that was pending before the police court at Montreal, the Government of Canada wrote the Department of Justice and deposited as security for bail—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend will pardon me a moment, with all deference to him, I do not think the matter which he proposes to bring before the committee can properly be brought up now. It can, of course, be brought up on the Estimates of the Department of Justice. It has, so far as I understand, no relation whatever to this appropriation. There will be ample scope on the Estimates of the Department of Justice for discussing the matter to the fullest extent desired.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am informed on reliable authority that the cheque which was deposited in the court at that time had the word "war" printed on it, and that is why I should like to bring up this matter at the present juncture, because it would appear, by the very fact of the word "war" being printed on the cheque, that the money would come out of the War Appropriation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not seen the cheque, and I do not know what was marked on it; but, even if that be so, the proper time for discussing this matter would be upon the Estimates of the Department of Justice. This appropriation is very urgently needed at the present time, and as there is a full opportunity to discuss the matter then, I see no reason why this appropriation should be delayed now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would it be possible for the Prime Minister to set a day or to give us some opportunity of discussing this matter, as we shall have no more private members' day this session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is not a matter pertaining to private members' day; it can be discussed, as long and as fully as the hon. member desires upon the Estimates of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am bringing this matter up now because, if I bring it up on the Estimates of the Department of Justice, the objection will be raised that it is a matter that appertains to the Militia Department, and I shall not be permitted to discuss it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can assure my hon. friend that no such objection will be raised.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Very well.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One man satisfied.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend has intimated that he has satisfied one man. I wonder if I can add another one to his list. The Prime Minister will recall that, when this Bill was under discussion last week, I asked for certain information which I assume he has not had time to bring down. I refer to the promise made by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) in regard to giving the details as to the publicity and advertising expenses paid out of the War Appropriation. If my right hon. friend has not had time to bring down the information I do not wish to delay the passage of the Bill just now, if he will be good enough to say he will bring it down.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Acting Minister of Finance spoke to me yesterday about it. He said it would be available today, but he has not sent it to me. There are other opportunities on which full information may be obtained, and we shall not interpose any technical difficulty to obtaining that information. We shall regard it as entirely an open matter.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

SALARIES ACT AMENDMENT.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

On motion of Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, Bill No. 13, to amend the Salaries Act and the provisions for preserving the Independence of Parliament, was read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT (1913) AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce), Bill No. 50, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act, 1913, was read the third time and passed.

ORGANIZATION AND CO-ORDINATION OF EMPLOYMENT OFFICES.

On motion of Hon. T. W. Crothers (Minister of Labour) Bill No. 57, to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—powers of minister:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who is the minister in charge of this Bill?

Mr. CROTHERS: Section 2 says that "minister" means the Minister of Labour.

Mr. CAHILL: What means will be taken to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices? Is it intended that the encouragement shall come from the minister or from the provinces?

Mr. CROTHERS: Section 4 provides that $50,000 shall be appropriated the first year for the purpose of encouraging the provinces to establish labour exchanges, and section 5 provides that the Federal Government shall not pay to any province a larger sum than is expended by the province itself in establishing and maintaining labour exchanges.

Mr. CAHILL: Upon what basis is the aid to be given as between the different provinces?

Mr. CROTHERS: The moneys to be paid to the governments of the respective provinces will be in the proportion which their expenditure bears to the total expenditure by all the provinces for such purposes.

Mr. CAHILL: Am I to understand that if one province spent the full amount of this appropriation it would get $50,000?

Mr. CROTHERS: Suppose that all the provinces together expended $50,000, and one province expended one-fifth of that, that province would get $5,000, or one-tenth of the appropriation.

Mr. CAHILL: Suppose one province spent $100,000 on labour exchanges. On what basis would you distribute this appropriation as between the provinces?

Mr. CROTHERS: That depends on circumstances. If one province spent $50,000 and the other provinces nothing, it would receive one-half the $50,000 we are appropriating for the first year.

Mr. FIELDING: When the resolution was before the committee, I called attention to a point which possibly was not well taken, but if it was well taken, it would apply just as much to the Bill as to the resolution. If the Bill contemplates the organization of offices at Ottawa, and I presume the Minister of Labour has that in mind, I would point out that this Bill provides for the entire appropriation being paid to the governments of the different provinces. Section 5 says that the "moneys appropriated for each year shall be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces," so it would appear to me that under this Bill not a dollar of this money could be appropriated for any organization work in Ottawa. If that is the intention, the Bill is all right; but if it is contemplated to maintain any organization at Ottawa and pay its expenses out of this Bill, I would ask the minister to consider whether this Bill gives him the power that he wants.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is the intention that the whole amount shall be paid to the provinces under certain circumstances. Whatever moneys may be required for the work done at Ottawa will be provided for in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Section 3 authorizes the minister to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices, and to promote unity of methods among them. If the underlying principle is to establish a system of public employment agencies, the Bill is all right, but as a means of meeting the immediate needs of the situation, in my judgment, it is not all right. I have had some little to do with employment agencies of one kind and another in a business way, and some little to do in endeavouring to keep in touch with Government-owned or Government-controlled employment agencies, and with all due respect to those who are responsible for their organization, I must say that they have not got us anywhere. If there is one vital question in connection with the distribution of labour throughout this country, it is to find some channel through which the employer and the man looking for work can get in touch with each other; and, so far as I know, in no system of Government-controlled employment offices in this country has there been any near approach to that desideratum. If we wait until we develop a complete organization for that purpose we will wait until the vital period, in my judgment, is passed. I hold no brief for any private employment agency or private institution of any description, but if it is desired to provide adequate machinery, and provide it quickly and effectively, by which the employer in the first instance may get in touch with the man looking for work, and the man looking for work may get in touch with the employer, the minister has that machinery right at hand if he will but take efficient control of the private employment agencies. Establish a central clearing house, if you like, for these private employment agencies, and pass regulations under which it will be necessary for them to report daily to that clearing house the number of men they are looking for to fill the needs of employers of labour, and, on the other hand, the list of men on their books who are searching for employment, to provide information as to where that employment may be found, how it may be reached, the rate of wages, and everything else in connection therewith, I say that you have ready made machinery right at hand that you can adopt for this purpose, without the establishment of anything new, without going into any comprehensive scheme of interprovincial employment, and agencies working in co-operation, or in co-ordination, with the Dominion. All that may be well enough in its way, but it will take too much time, and I suggest to the hon. minister that they will take control of the direction of the private employment agencies, and make use of the machinery that they now have at hand.

Mr. HALLIDAY: I would suggest to the minister that he make use of the Post Offices already established throughout the Dominion. A large board can be posted up in an office which will give the information. If a man wants to employ so many men, he goes into the office and buys a five-cent stamp for each man he requires, and his name is posted up, showing that he requires these men. If I require a position, I buy a five-cent postage stamp, and my name is posted up, to show that I require a position. We could have employment offices all over the Dominion, if we adopted such a system.

Mr. DEVLIN: I find by the interpretation clause that an employment office means an employment office operated by any provincial government, and by section 5 the manner in which the moneys are to be paid out is stipulated. I presume that this money will be paid out solely to the provincial government to maintain any employment offices they may organize. The minister, in answering the hon. gentleman from Queens-Shelburne, said that he contemplated the organization of a central employment bureau in Ottawa. I take it that this Bill does not cover that point at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is not intended that this Government should establish a Labour Bureau in Ottawa, but it is intended to establish a clearing house in this city. There are various kinds of labour bureaus. You have some national labour bureaus, provincial labour bureaus, municipal labour bureaus, private labour bureaus, and some philanthropic labour bureaus. No country so large territorally as Canada has established a national system of labour bureaus. Great Britain has done so, but in territorial extent Great Britain is small compared with Canada. New Zealand also has a labour bureau, but she is a very small country. No large country has undertaken to establish and maintain a national system of labour bureaus, and it was not considered advisable to do so here. In Canada, five of the nine provinces—Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia—have already legislated for the establishment of labour bureaus in the various provinces, Several of them have already established a great many labour bureaus. It was thought the provinces could more conveniently deal with these matters than the Dominion. My hon. friend will notice that this Act provides that agreements shall be entered into between the Federal Government and the provincial Government, setting forth the terms upon which they will be entitled to receive the sum due them under this section. We will provide for inspections, and so forth, in the agreement which will be something like the agreement that is made in agricultural matters between the Dominion Government and the provincial Governments—setting forth the conditions upon which they will be entitled to receive this money. In the province of Quebec already several labour bureaus have been established at different points, namely, the cities of Quebec, Montreal, Sherbrooke, and two or three other places. In Ontario provision was made three or four years ago for the establishment of labour bureaus. They have already established them in all the large centres in Ontario like Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, London, Fort William, Port Arthur and St. Thomas. They are doing the very sort of work that my hon. friend suggests ought to be done. Special provisions are being carried out by several of the provinces. Alberta and Saskatchewan have established temporarily for war purposes, especially for the purpose of getting the men on the land, these labour exchanges at various points in their respective provinces. At its last session, the legislature of British Columbia passed an Act to provide for the establishment of these bureaus, and they are proceeding to establish them right away. We expect to get from the clearing houses in the several provinces a weekly statement of labour conditions throughout each province at the different points, so that we will have, every week, in the clearing house in Ottawa a bird's eye view of the whole labour situation of Canada. It would be a herculean task for this Government to undertake to establish a labour bureau in each town and city in Canada, as five provinces have already legislated in that direction, it was not thought wise for us to attempt to establish a new system to conflict with that.

Mr. DEVLIN: Under clause 3 the Government has power to establish a clearing house. By clause 4 bonuses are given to the different employment bureaus in the province. By clause 5 the minister allots the bonuses in the proportion set out in that section, but there is no provision in this Bill whatever to pay for any of these clearing houses.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does my hon. friend refer to the clearing house at Ottawa?

Mr. DEVLIN: What do you mean by clearing house? There is no definition of it.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was trying to explain a moment ago that we are going to establish a clearing house at Ottawa for all Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: What do you mean by clearing house?

Mr. CROTHERS: A house that receives reports from all the provincial clearing houses tabulates and circulates them.

Mr. DEVLIN: Can the Department of Labour not do that, without establishing another clearing house?

Mr. CROTHERS: We may utilize the department for that purpose.

Mr. DEVLIN: But we are trying to save money now.

Mr. CROTHERS: As I said to the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne, the expense of this central clearing House and the preparation of the forms, and so on, will be provided for in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We understand what a clearing house in banking circles is, but I have not heard anything yet as to the way this clearing house is going to operate. What is the method of obtaining the information and how will it be distributed?

Mr. CROTHERS: That is a matter that will be more fully considered hereafter. We will establish a clearing house here to receive weekly reports from the various provincial clearing houses. They will give us a statement of conditions in each of the provinces and that information will be distributed throughout the country by some means—we have not yet determined exactly just how. That will be a part of the working of the clearing houses. The provinces will have clearing houses where information and reports will be received from various places. For instance, in Toronto, they will have a clearing house for the province of Ontario at which information will be received from St. Thomas, London, Windsor and other places. It may be useful for the whole Dominion to know that there are a certain number of idle men in a certain craft in Halifax and that a similar number of men may be required in Vancouver. The provincial bureaus would not deal with a matter of that kind. They would not report to their sister provinces but they would report to us. We are in a position to see the situation exactly and to give the information which it seems to demand.

Mr. BUTTS: In nearly every province they have Workmen's Compensation Acts or Employers' Liability Acts. Would it not be well for the Dominion to consolidate all these Acts and make one for the whole of Canada?

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend had been present one evening last week he would have noticed an Act passing through this House providing compensation for all employees of the Dominion.

Mr. BUTTS: I know; but these Acts are different in every province. If we consolidated them into one Canadian Act, would it not be better?

Mr. CROTHERS: Does my hon. friend suggest that this Parliament—

Mr. BUTTS: I think so.

Mr. CROTHERS: —has the right—

Mr. BUTTS: Sure, I think so.

Mr. CROTHERS: —to consolidate the various compensation Acts?

Mr. DEVLIN: If we are going to aid in the winning of this war in every way possible we must do so by conserving what we can of the taxes of the people and directing them towards war expenditure. The minister told me a moment ago that he could take some men in his department and utilize them for the purpose of collating the information that is to be got from the different provincial clearing houses. I can understand that. But what I want to direct the minister's attention to is the fact that he must have in his department employees who are at present free from work of any kind. I presume he must have had up to a few days ago. For instance, he had a cost of living examiner or commissioner. He found, for one reason or another, that he could dispense with this gentleman's services and he did dispense with them. I am not criticising the minister at the present moment for dispensing with his services. That may come up later. But we know that he dispensed with his services and he has given the further information to the newspapers in Toronto that he would not be inclined to take him back because he had submitted what he had written to the Commissioner and he had received certain answers. If the commissioner was not necessary he should not have been kept on. He could not have been necessary because he has not been replaced. If the commissioner was not necessary the staff employed by him cannot be necessary and therefore could easily be dispensed with. This staff, for instance, might be given the work of collating this information and some saving might be made in that way. On the other hand, we find that every time a Bill such as this is proposed, which purports to create some bureau or service, we have enormous expenditures. Take, for instance, the cost of the Food Controller's office. That is costing the country, I dare say, millions of dollars per year. There is a staff of hundreds and they are paid thousands and thousands of dollars, a great deal of which money could be saved to the people of the country and diverted directly to war channels. I would ask the minister if he has in his mind, as a result of the passage of this Bill, the idea of creating a new staff other than that which he has in his department in order to carry on the work of what he styles a clearing house, or if he will give to the House an assurance that no outside help will be taken in and that the work will be done by employees of this department under the salaries they are getting now.

Mr. CROTHERS: The position occupied by Mr. O'Connor would not have been created had it not been considered necessary for the administration of the Order in Council passed early in November, 1916. I thought it was necessary to have such a man as Mr. O'Connor in the department, and arrangements have been made for another man to take his place. I think the public interest will not suffer in the least by the appointment of the new man who is to take that place. I have no idea now of establishing a separate staff, but I am not in a position to promise my hon. friend that it will not be necessary to have one, or two, or three additional clerks in the department. I think I can assure my hon. friend that there will be nobody engaged in that department to do work who is not necessary, and when I tell him that the expenditure of the department has not increased in the last six years he will be satisfied that I am keeping the cost down as low as possible.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to have a little information from the minister as to the co-ordination of effort between the provincial governments and this Government. There is nothing here to compel a provincial government to establish an employment office or clearing house unless it wishes to do so. It must be by agreement, as I read the Act. Suppose a provincial government does not see eye to eye with the minister, does not create an employment bureau, or fails to come in to the clearing house, what provision has the minister against that? Does he propose to allow one-half of the Dominion to go without that operative machinery which will make a complete system? In case a province says: We will not have anything to do with this, has the minister any guarantee or assurance from the provinces that they will co-operate in this measure? Has the minister provided, in the event of the failure of a province to come in, that the Dominion shall open an employment office in such province so as to get the information and make the system complete? Has the minister any information from the provinces tending to insure the smooth and easy working of the Bill, which, on the whole, is commendable?

[Mr. Devlin.]

Mr. CROTHERS: I can only say that, so far as five of the provinces are concerned, they have shown a good deal of anxiety in this direction, and are moving forward quite rapidly. Two or three of the provinces I have no communications with. But I think that the inducement we are holding out in this Bill, substantially to pay to each province one-half of what it expends in this direction, will be sufficient inducement for them to do, as the other provinces have done, namely to legislate and establish labour bureaus. If they do not do so, it will be a matter for future consideration.

Mr. MORPHY: In that case, I would call the minister's attention to the fact that this whole scheme, if it is so necessary to be inaugurated now, would fall to the ground for lack of a comprehensive scheme covering the whole Dominion, and his Bill is only partially effective throughout the whole of the Dominion.

Mr. CROTHERS: We have practically six out of nine provinces now lined up.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have followed with a good deal of interest the statements of the Minister of Labour with regard to this Bill. I quite realize that the Department of Labour should be the department under which the placing of labour could be most appropriately carried on. On several occasions during the past few years, I have pointed out the conditions which have existed throughout the various provinces with regard to the placing of labour, and the abnormal conditions under which we are now living have intensified the situation, making it much more imperative to co-ordinate this system, and have a broad, comprehensive policy with regard to this question, rather than having it divided up among a number of Governmental departments under the federal and provincial jurisdictions. I thought, and have contended for years, that the immigration department should not be coupled up with the Department of the Interior. Heretofore, the placing of labour has been carried on, I believe, almost entirely by the Department of the Interior through the minister and the immigration officials. Lately we have had a separation, and a Ministry of Immigration has been formed, and estimates have been put through this House increasing the expenditure under that department. I did hope that this new arrangement would accomplish the object I have had in my mind for many years past, of co-ordinating and consolidating these various interests, but I am inclined to think that under the present proposal, we will be quite a little farther away from that idea than we were before. I do not believe it will work out to the very best advantage. The Department of Immigration, for instance, has in the province of Ontario, I believe, over one hundred officers scattered throughout the various counties. It also has officers in certain cities of the province to carry on employment work. Now, it is proposed to encourage the provinces generally to carry on similar work by making them a grant through a department other than the Department of Immigration. I believe that this method will hardly accomplish the best results. The placing of labour at the present time is a very important matter. It is referred to in clause 7 of the Bill, which reads:

That the offices shall endeavour to fill situations in all trades and for both male and female employees

The Department of Immigration receives reports constantly from its officers in many parts of the province of Ontario and Western Canada, which are published. By arranging to have another set of reports along similar lines come through the Department of Labour, in my opinion, will not accomplish the best results, but will be more confusing. I believe this matter should be consolidated as much as possible. With the situation arising because of the drafting of men for overseas service, and the need by reason of this fact which will arise to place men in other occupations, it seems to me that this is a matter which, at the present time, should be almost entirely under the Federal authority, instead of being delegated to the several provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I said the other evening, when the Minister of Labour introduced this legislation by way of resolution, that, on general lines, I approved of the policy of establishing labour bureaus throughout Canada. I stated then, and I repeat now, that my hon. friend seems to be a convert to this idea. On two different occasions during past sessions I brought the matter up by way of motion before the House, and on two occasions the minister made light of the question. This year, I am pleased to say, he has accepted the views which were held not only by your humble servant, but by many friends of labour in Canada and in the United States as well. My hon. friend intends to promote the establishment of these labour bureaus by a money grant paid out of a special fund which will be appropriated to that end, to those of the provinces which will accept the principle of this legislation. He states that already six provinces have labour bureaus or employment offices. The amount to be appropriated is not large, but I believe that if well spent it may produce good results. There is no question that, in view of the reconstruction period ahead of Canada, the establishment of labour bureaus will be very much needed indeed. The minister may well look to what has been done in this connection by the Mother Country and by Australia and New Zealand, where the labour element, I might say the Labour party, is to-day predominant. To any one of us who has read the speech delivered not long ago by that eminent British labour leader, Mr. Henderson, or the platform of the Labour party in England for the coming general elections, it is clear that in Great Britain labour will be the dominant factor before long, if it is not so now. My hon. friend, however, does not seem to do enough, in my judgment, for labour in Canada. I do not wish to play the demagogue, but in view of what must be done during the reconstruction period after the war, the Government should now take steps to provide for the interests of labour after peace is concluded. A more drastic and business-like policy should be adopted than that which is embodied in the present legislation, commendable though it may be. When peace is declared, industry in this country and all over the North American continent will be disorganized and dislocated. Men and women who since 1914 have been employed in munition plants will be removed from these activities and virtually left on the street. Employers of labour will be forced, so to speak, to empty factories and plants which have been engaged in the production of munitions; men and women who have taken the place of soldiers in industrial establishments and manufacturing plants will be turned out, and the plants themselves will have to be remodelled. As was pointed out the other day by an hon. gentleman who is affiliated with the Labour party, a remarkably large number of men engaged in industrial work enlisted in the Canadian overseas forces. Imagine the condition of things when peace is concluded. Men and women now employed will be on the streets; plants will be idle for a time owing to the necessity of their being remodelled, and the soldiers will be returning to Canada, many of them anxious to obtain the positions they occupied before they went away. It is good policy to provide for labour bureaus, but the Government must go one step further; they must foresee the conditions that will arise when peace is declared. The conditions affecting labour when this war is over will be much more serious than labour conditions were in England and in France after Waterloo and the Crimean war, and after other great wars. Conditions of labour and employment after a period of war are always such as require serious consideration and attention. If the soldiers who return to Canada are not provided with work; if the operation of manufactories and industrial plants is suspended or interfered with, there may be unrest; the times will be revolutionary. The Government, therefore, should provide now for the better equipment of the labour of Canada when the war is over. How could my hon. friend better serve the interests of labour than by giving to returned soldiers and to persons now employed in labour throughout Canada a better technical education? The Imperial Trades Commission, in their last report to the British and Dominion Governments, made specific recommendations on this subject. If Canada is to take a lead after the war in the industrial battle that will then be waged, our labour must be equipped to meet its rivals on that occasion. Some years ago the Ontario Labour Commission made similar recommendations, and I see now that the manufacturers and business men of Toronto are working on the same problem. Not later than this morning I received from the Canadian Industrial Reconstruction Association an outline of the work to be undertaken by that new body. It will endeavour to assist in the development and extension of technical education. It will maintain a sympathetic attitude towards projects of land settlement. It will extend co-operation among rural producers and endeavour to improve rural conditions. It will give its support to movements, whether directed by leaders of labour or employers of labour, which aim at establishing fair working agreements between workers and employers and improving relations between labour and capital. Recognizing the equal rights of citizenship which women have acquired, it will seek to improve their position in industry and to co-operate, so far as opportunity offers, with women's organizations in investigating and improving conditions which peculiarly affect the domestic, social and industrial welfare of women. My hon. friend can take a lesson from the programme of this Industrial Reconstruction Association. The Bill which we are considering is a good one, in a way, but the only power taken by my hon. friend is to grant to some of the provinces various amounts of money, based, I suppose, on population. Reports will then be made to the Labour Department in Ottawa as to the work of these labour bureaus. I do not see that it is at all necessary, in connection with the work of these labour bureaus to spend any money at Ottawa, because you have here the whole machinery of the Labour Department to collect the statistics which may come from the various labour bureaus in the provinces. It, therefore, seems to me that by this Bill my hon. friend does not materially assist labour and does not foresee the period of reconstruction which, I hope, is fast approaching.

I have just mentioned this Industrial Reconstruction Association programme. The manufacturers of Canada are wide awake. They are looking after the interests of labour; they are looking after the interests of the farmers; but, of course, they are, in their circular, also looking after the interests of number one. All this deep interest in the farmer and in labour is to conclude by the assertion of the rights of the Canadian manufacturers to get from the Government a higher tariff when the proper time comes. My hon. friend, therefore, should not be satisfied with establishing labour bureaus, he should also see that a proper allowance is made to the various provinces in order to stimulate the cause of technical education in Canada. We have, in every province in Canada, a most intelligent class of labourers. I am sorry to say that only a few of the provinces have promoted the cause of technical education. It is technical education which has given England, Scotland, Germany, France, the United States, their lead in the industrial world. If Canada is to follow that lead, Canada should do something towards equipping her labourers by imparting to them that very necessary technical knowledge. If you have in Canada a well equipped labourer, if he has, at the technical school, attained the secrets of his craft, you do not require a tariff for the employer or for the employee. The Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian labourer, provided the latter is given the technical educational assistance which the labourer in other countries receives, can compete with the world. I rose just to make those observations. I support the Bill, but I do not think that the Minister of Labour is doing enough for the cause of labour. I hope that the money grants appropriated by this Bill will not be wasted. There is no need for more officers in the Labour Department at Ottawa. This money is to be paid to the various provinces for the establishment of labour bureaus. Let my hon. friend, through his correspondents of the Labour Gazette, gather all the data, all the statistics, and the grant would thus be wisely spent. But once more I say: This is, it seems to me picayune legislation. My hon. friend should be bold, he should assert himself as the leader of labour in Canada, and see that for the reconstruction period our labourers get the technical education which the Governments of other countries are freely giving to their fellow men of the working class.

Mr. BURNHAM: It would be a great calamity if this legislation should not pass. It may be quite true that not all that could be desired is comprised within the four corners of this Bill, but if we are advancing we are doing something.

Section 3 states that:

> The Minister is authorized and empowered,—
> (a) to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices and to promote uniformity of methods among them;
> (b) to establish one or more clearing houses for the interchange of information between employment offices concerning the transfer of labour and other matters;
> (c) to compile and distribute information received from employment offices and from other sources, regarding prevailing conditions of employment.

Surely no one can object to that broad, general and comprehensive statement, and, at the same time, have a real idea as to the requirements and development of labour conditions in this country. If we do not have co-ordination, we have confusion. Co-ordination is, therefore, very plainly, absolutely necessary. It is also very plain that, in the past, we have not had co-ordination. That is one of the weaknesses of the Federal system of government. The rapprochement of the provinces with the Dominion is one of the most difficult of things to bring about. Therefore, everything that leads up to that, to the identification and consolidation of their aims and actions in a matter of this kind must surely be viewed with an encouraging eye. A clearing house for information is, of all things, the most necessary and the most sane. To sit down and discuss what is actually taking place means, with sane people, that the difficulty will shortly be removed. Not to have a clearing house means that when men sit down to consider the question they will not really know what they are speaking about, and their actions will be in the future as they have been in the past, very largely a misfit and a misfire. People, scientifically minded, will at once admit that your information must be accurate and carefully gathered. Then, if it is not properly dealt with, that is due to the mental weakness and incapacity of those who assume the reins of government. But it is impossible for the wisest man, for the man with the most acute intellect, to deal properly with anything on wrong premises, and unless such a clearing house is established no Minister of Labour can possibly do justice to labour conditions.

The third clause regarding the compiling and distribution of information follows from those preceding it. It enables the minister to deal with the problem of aiding and encouraging the organization and co-ordination of employment offices and the establishment of clearing houses, for the interchange of information between employment offices. The rest of the Bill, apart from the earlier provisions which I have mentioned, is merely a statement of technicalities. This is the first time, to my knowledge, that I have ever seen a determination upon the part of this House to clothe the Minister of Labour with ample power and to justify his existence.

When this Bill is passed and a clearing house is established, the minister will be able to find out just how and when and where labour should be employed, and he will have every means within his grasp for dealing with the labour problems of Canada. After he has made known to working men the conditions and circumstances throughout the country, it will be for them to come forward and deal with them in an individual way, and as loyal and enterprising citizens, as we know them to be, they will do it. But if we do not empower the minister to deal with these matters, we are simply asking labour throughout the country to look in vain to the directing power. To appoint a Department of Labour under such conditions is really to mock labour, and to show that labour conditions throughout the country are not regarded seriously. It would be showing an entire lack of a scientific grasp of the situation such as, if it were exhibited in medicine or in law, would result in anarchy in those walks of life at once. It has taken years and years to sweep away misconceptions and to make the slightest progress in the way of a sympathetic co-ordination of the various rival interests in the employment of labour. Now, we have the chance to empower a capable minister to look into these matters, and from the serene height of his federal position to tell the country what are the facts, and I say that to fail to give him this power and to back him up by such an Act as this, would be a calamity of the direst possible kind.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind hon. members that this is not a debate on the second reading of the Bill. We have had some excellent speeches on the principle of the Bill, but we are now in committee, and I ask hon. members to confine their remarks as closely as possible to the clause under discussion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was pretty late in the evening when the Resolution was introduced the other day, and the House had only a few minutes in which to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN: The second reading took place to-day.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I shall endeavour to confine myself to the clause under discussion. Before I heard the hon. member for Maisonneuve speak I was under the impression that this Bill was fairly simple, that it was merely to provide, if possible the means whereby the employer and the man seeking work could get in touch with one another. But after listening to the hon. member I think the House must have got the impression that this Bill had something to do with a variety of subjects other than what is set out in the Bill, because my hon. friend dealt with technical education, the tariff, the reconstruction period after the war, the relationship of the Manufacturers' Association to the industrial life of the country, and many other kindred subjects. However, the clause immediately before us is to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices, and to promote unity of method among them. The minister has told us what the province of Ontario has done in the direction of creating employment agencies at different centres. As the minister said, the number is confined to about five or six, located in Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, London, and one or two other large centres. I have no desire either to be captious or critical; I agree with every provision of the Bill; I think the Bill is vitally necessary at the present time, but I must say that the machinery which the provinces have so far set up is utterly inadequate to meet the situation which this Bill is apparently designed to take care of. I would again impress upon the minister the necessity of approaching the provinces in an effort to secure their co-operation in setting up provincial clearing houses for employment purposes, and making use of the machinery afforded by the private employment agencies until the Federal Government established a system of its own. The minister has said it would be impossible for the Government to establish a comprehensive system of employment agencies, taking in every town and hamlet in this country, but some such system as that must be provided if the men looking for employment and the employers looking for labour are to be given the information they must have in order to get in touch with each other. You will find that from one end of this province to the other—and I think I know something of what I am talking about—the large employers of labour are constantly in touch with the employment offices, not only in the large centres, but in the smaller towns and hamlets throughout the whole country, and it is only by that means they are able to get the necessary supply of labour, and that the men seeking employment can get in touch with the men desiring their help. I repeat, I do not wish to be critical of the provisions of the Bill, which I say is a step in the right direction; but if we want immediate results I would urge the minister to embody in his scheme the principle of making use of the things we have ready-made to hand.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: The principle of this Bill is a good one, but in my opinion the Bill does not go far enough. It only seeks to encourage the employment offices already in operation by the provinces. I would like to see this Government establish employment offices where now there are none, especially in places where there is a great demand for them. I know for a fact that these labour exchanges are rendering a great service to employers and employees, and they should be looked after by the minister with great care. An inspector should be appointed to look into their operation, for I know of many cases where there has been difficulty in getting work through these channels.

Mr. CROTHERS: Section 8 provides for an inspection.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Not more than a month ago a delegation from my county came to my office, and spoke to me regarding works that were to be constructed by the Government in Halifax, or, at least, to which this Government was contributing money. These people had to disburse to certain agents or bureaus to be permitted to go to Halifax to work. They had to get into communication with the Minister of Labour, and, for some reason or another, they got no satisfaction. They were called upon to disburse ten or fifteen dollars before they could be employed at all. Such dealings as these should disappear completely. In large centres like Montreal, for instance, different private bureaus charge the men for obtaining employment for them. After three or four days' work, these men are turned out. They have to come back again to the agency and pay perhaps two or three dollars—which means a lot to them—in order to secure employment. I simply draw these facts to the attention of the Minister of Labour. I endorse the statements of the hon. member for Maisonneuve in regard to technical education. It is a great thing for the country. The officers who are going to be appointed under this Bill should consider the question. It is absolutely imperative that this matter should be looked into, in the interests of the labour men. After the war is over, it will be very difficult to obtain employment. I suggest that a commission should be appointed as soon as possible to look into these matters, to ascertain how the labour men in this country may be employed after the war.

Mr. BUTTS: I have considerable sympathy with the remarks generally of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve. I come from a county where nearly all the people are miners, or steel workers, and the labour question, as a general rule, is a very prominent one. I think when the Minister of Labour comes to consider the matter he will find that the Bill he has presented to the House does not go quite far enough. In order to have a labour organization that would be properly conducted, I think the Government should consult the different provincial governments, and provide for a uniform system throughout the Dominion. Labour and capital are getting very wide apart. The antagonism between them is becoming too pronounced to conduce to a healthy condition in this country. It is pretty nearly time we began to realize the present condition of affairs, and endeavour to bring capital and labour closer to one another. In this way only can we bring about a healthy condition in Canada. Parliament should do something. I make a special appeal to the Minister of Labour, and urge him to get in touch with all the provinces of Canada and endeavour to frame a uniform labour law. In the local legislature we have been dealing, year after year, with the question of workmen's compensation, employers' liability, and kindred matters. These matters are important and ought to be taken seriously, without regard to politics. As sane men we should regard these matters as being pertinent to the well-being of the community and the Dominion at large. The Sydney Post records that a poor woman got a verdict from a jury for $35,000 for the death of her husband, who was as dear to her as if he were earning a million dollars a year; but that verdict will, of course, be appealed to a higher court. If the judgment had been for $10,000, possibly it would have been sustained. The other evening, when we discussed the subject of coal, some hon. gentlemen said they were paying $10 a ton for it, when I obtain it for $3.90. I told you the other day about a man who had a salary of $100,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I do feel that his remarks are very far from the clause under consideration, and I would ask him to address his remarks to clause 3.

Mr. BUTTS: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman, but we were talking about the matter of capital and labour.

The CHAIRMAN: This is not a discussion upon the question of capital and labour.

Mr. BUTTS: At the same time it boils down to that.

The CHAIRMAN: I will have to rule that the discussion of the question of capital and labour is out of order. I regret to do so, but hon. members, this afternoon, have certainly gone far beyond the latitude allowed in discussions in committee. Some hon. members do not seem to have understood me when I asked them to speak to the clause under consideration. I hope I shall not be again obliged to call attention to this.

Mr. BUTTS: I think that the discussion this afternoon has been largely a debate on the question of capital and labour. I will submit to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The debate so far would in some respects lead to that conclusion, but it has been out of order.

Mr. BUTTS: Will you give me a little latitude? You have given latitude to all hands this afternoon. I intended to speak of the debate that took place here a few nights ago. Perhaps I am altogether out of order, but as you have acknowledged yourself, Sir, that the whole debate has been out of order this afternoon. We had a debate the other evening about the high cost of coal, about which the people in Ontario complain. Just think of it—a Yankee comes over from the land of Uncle Sam and exacts from one of our small steel and coal companies $100,000 in yearly salary. What can you expect? You have to pay for it in your coal. Through this Bill you have an opportunity of doing something to alleviate the ill-feeling that exists between capital and labour. Every person knows perfectly well that nothing is more desirable than to bring about such a condition of things as will make it possible for capital and labour to go hand in hand together. If we can secure the adoption of a Bill which will result in a good understanding between capital and labour we will be helping the Minister of Labour to do something for the country that no one ever did before.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not quite understand how the minister expects to encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices. Is there any demand from the different provinces for this Bill? What would be the result if all this money were expended in one province? It would not in that case be of any assistance in the way of encouraging an interprovincial exchange of labour. On what basis is it expected that the money is to be distributed? Is there any encouragement to the provinces to bring about such an organization or is it the intention that there shall be any encouragement offered to them? What is the purpose of it?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am afraid I will not be able to throw any light on this subject beyond what is contained in two or three sections of the Bill itself. They seem to me to make it perfectly plain.

Mr. CAHILL: I am very sorry to say they do not make it plain to me and if it is plain to the minister perhaps he will throw some light on it.

Mr. EULER: I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Cahill). We have discussed this Bill for an hour and a half, or two hours, and I feel that the minister has not told us just what he expects to accomplish by its enactment. I do not understand what he is driving at. If it is the intention simply to relieve the provincial governments of the expense of maintaining labour bureaus we would like to know that. If, as clause 3 suggests, it is intended to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices in the various provinces, I think the minister should tell us a little more in detail as to what he has worked out in the way of co-ordination, and possibly co-operation, between the various provinces. I would like to see my way clear in a matter of this kind and I agree with him that a great deal can be done with proper co-operation and co-ordination of the different provinces. I would like to ask him whether he has himself, or with his officials, or with the officials of the provinces, worked out any definite scheme in detail by which he is going to proceed. If he could tell a little more about that I believe the Bill might carry quite readily and perhaps without such diffuse discussion as we have had here. Take, for example, the situation in our own city of Kitchener. We have there a labour bureau under the provincial government. We know very little about it in so far as the actual work is concerned of supplying employers with labour. That is done almost entirely by a private organization and the provincial body is very seldom heard of. If that state of affairs could be remedied so that we really received something for the money expended then I think this Bill would be useful. I would like to suggest that probably a good deal might be accomplished that would be in the interest of both employers and employees if the employees themselves, the workmen, whether through their organizations or otherwise, and the employers, were consulted as to the best means of working out the scheme which the minister has in mind.

Mr. CAHILL: We should have some light on this question from the Minister of Labour. At least, I am willing to sit here for some time until I do hear from him.

Mr. EULER: Would the minister describe the nature of the agreement which he is expecting to draw up with the various provinces, stating what points would be covered? Perhaps, however, these matters would more properly come up in connection with clause 7.

Mr. CROTHERS: I should be glad if I could throw any light on this matter that would help any hon. gentleman present to understand it, but it seems to me absolutely clear, so far as the disposition of the money is concerned. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Euler) asks about the details of the agreement which we are to make with the various provinces. I do not think this is the time to enter into details. We had better get authority to do something first by way of this Bill. Perhaps my hon. friend will remember the Act granting assistance to the various provinces with respect to agriculture. No details were set forth in the Bill as to the agreements that might be made thereafter, but agreements are made year after year between the Federal Minister of Agriculture and the Government of a province as to how the sum of money to be paid by the Federal Government shall be expended during that year. In the same way, the details will be gone into between the Minister of Labour and the provincial government when this Bill is passed, and we know that we are authorized to make a contribution.

Mr. EULER: I would ask the minister whether it is the intention of the department to make a grant of this money to the provincial organizations, and to leave the initiative of the work almost entirely as it is, or whether the Labour Department, or its officers, intend to take some action towards initiating new ideas and schemes in connection with the getting together of employers and employee, and, if so, whether some definite scheme has been worked out, no matter whether or not all the details are already arranged, or whether the Department knows exactly what it is going to do in connection with the legislation asked for?

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend will take the trouble to read section 7, he will get some idea of it. There have been several references to private agencies and to the use that might be made of private labour exchanges. These have not proved themselves satisfactory, generally speaking. One hon. gentleman mentioned some frauds perpetrated upon poor people by some of these agencies which charged them large sums of money. That matter came to our attention four or five years ago when I happened, for the time being, to be in the Department of the Interior. We made regulations then governing all these private agencies so far as their treatment of immigrants went. We had no authority to deal with them in any other respect. We cannot abolish them. So little satisfaction have private agencies given in some places, and so much dissatisfaction have they given, that the legislature of the province of Quebec has abolished them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Abolished what?

Mr. CROTHERS: These private agencies have been substantially abolished in Quebec by the imposition of such very large license fees as would practically put them out of business.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my right hon. friend will allow me: The law in Quebec was amended last session. Now, a fee of $200 is exacted from any one opening a labour agency. Besides that, there is a fee also imposed by the city of Montreal of $300 or $400 a year. There is a regular inspection also by the civic and provincial authorities. The effect is that only well-to-do people can open agencies.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, I had the advantage of speaking to Sir Lomer Gouin a few months ago about that matter, and he told me that, in substance, these labour agencies had been legislated out of existence because they had proved unsatisfactory. However, so far as that is concerned, we had no jurisdiction over them, except where they were dealing with immigrants, and we provided that all of them should take out licenses from the central Government to authorize them to deal with immigrants at all, and we fixed by regulation the limit of fee that they should be allowed to charge. It is not thought that private agencies are the best means of getting the employer and the employee together, and of securing for the workingman steady work. It is in the interest of the private agent to get the man out of work as often as possible so that he will come back to him and pay him another fee to get another job. Whether they are considered desirable or not, we have no jurisdiction over them, and we are not proposing to deal with them at all in this Bill. Neither are we proposing to deal with municipal labour exchanges, but only with exchanges operated by a province. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) spoke in favour of a national system. As I said earlier in the discussion, I know of no large country where any such system exists. In Australia there is no co-ordination whatever, each of the States establishes its own labour bureaus, and there is no linking up between the governments of the various states and the central government. There is a Bill before the Congress of the United States now, substantially like this Bill. Heretofore, the various States of the Union have established labour bureaus, but there has been no connection between the Federal Government at Washington and the State governments concerning these bureaus. The Bill now before Congress provides for such co-ordination as we are providing in this Bill. Apparently some insignificant points have caused the United States' Bill to be held up for some little time, and the Secretary of Labour has undertaken—(there is a vote of $250,000 appropriated for that purpose)—to establish these bureaus at different points in the country because of the war emergency. One has been established in Seattle, and a few others are in operation. In neither Germany, nor Holland, nor other countries, do they undertake to manage a national system, but the central governments assist local states and municipalities in defraying the expenses of these bureaus. It is not intended by these bureaus to create employment; it never was so intended in England or anywhere else. The intention is to facilitate the means of getting the employer and the employee together. We think that can best be worked out by the various provinces, and that we ought to assist them in that respect. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) said that I had been converted to this Bill. Nothing similar to this Bill has been brought up in this House during my time here. The suggestion was made that a national system should be established, but I thought that such a system would be too cumbersome. I was not in favour of it when the proposal was made, and I am not in favour of it now. I think that the hon. gentleman who has been converted is the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). It is astonishing how enthusiastically he now favours labour bureaus and technical education, although during the years that he was a member of the Federal Government and at the head of the Labour Department we heard nothing from him about labour bureaus or technical education. As soon as the hon. gentleman got on the other side of the House, however, he became very enthusiastic over these suggested reforms and denounced us for not introducing measures to carry them out right away.

Mr. PEDLOW: Does this Bill not provide for a national system? I understood that the system was to be a national one, with headquarters in the office of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. CROTHERS: My idea of a national system is the establishing of bureaus in all the large and medium-sized centres throughout Canada, to be operated and maintained entirely by the Federal Government. We are not proposing anything of that kind.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—money grants:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am under the impression that in Western Canada the Department of the Interior has control of the placing of labour, while in the older provinces this work is carried on by the Provincial Government. Is there any danger of overlapping as between the new Department of Immigration and the Department of Labour. The Department of Labour would naturally be expected to furnish information in all matters pertaining to labour and to see that quick action is taken by the authorities to ensure such placing of labour as is imperative under present conditions. The need for co-ordination was never more apparent than it is at present. We should have a uniform system. In Ontario the work carried on by the Federal and Provincial Governments has been overlapping to some extent. Sometimes you have, under the party system of government, a conflict between the two parties in connection with this work, and some jealousies may arise. But no effective system of co-operation with regard to labour conditions in Canada has been so far established, and I think that something should be done to accomplish this end as quickly as possible.

Mr. CALDER: There is no likelihood of conflict between the work done by the Department of Immigration and the activities of provincial bureaus which will be established under this law. Some time ago a conference of premiers of the various provinces was held at Ottawa, and this matter was discussed. No intimation was made by any of the premiers—all the provinces were represented—that this work should be undertaken by the Federal authorities. They all felt that the provincial authorities could handle the distribution of labour much better than any central body established at Ottawa, or than any bodies over which the central authority here would have control. In the past the Immigration Department has exercised only a certain amount of control over all labour bureaus established in Canada so far as the immigrant is concerned. That applies particularly to Western Canada. Immigration officers throughout the country have not interested themselves generally in the distribution of labour. The position taken by the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is, I think, the proper one; that this work should be centralized in offices established by provincial or Federal authority—and it seems to me that the work should be controlled entirely by the provinces. A conference was also held at Ottawa at which all the labour organizations of Canada were represented.

Meetings were held on two occasions; this subject was thoroughly and exhaustively discussed, and the conclusion was reached that the provincial authorities could handle the work better than the Federal authorities. As I understand this Bill, it simply lays down the principle that means should be provided, by the giving of money grants to the provinces, for the establishing of these labour bureaus on a common basis. That is the main idea that runs through the Bill. Section 7 provides for an agreement between the Federal and the provincial authorities whereby that desired end may be brought about. Of course, the details of an agreement of that kind can be worked out only through the course of time. It took some two or three years to arrive at the basis on which our agricultural grants should be made, and to come to a determination satisfactory to all the provinces. We may expect the same thing here. Representatives of the Federal Government or the Department of Labour must go to the various provinces, study the conditions, and enter into agreements with them. As conditions vary in the different provinces, the details of the agreements may differ, but if both provincial and Federal authorities enter into the matter in the proper spirit, no difficulty will be experienced in making arrangements under which this work will be handled much more satisfactorily in the future. The member for South Oxford can rest assured that the Department of Immigration will make every possible arrangement to prevent overlapping of work or duplication of expenditure. As the provincial authorities have agreed that this work should be undertaken by them, we should make an arrangement whereby they shall be left in entire possession of the field, so that duplication or unnecessary expenditure may, as far as possible, be avoided.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The appropriations to be made under this Bill are to be a matter of agreement between the Federal Government and the Provincial Governments. As I understood the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), he alluded to the necessity of having some uniform rule. I wish we could have some further enlightenment upon that point. Why could not the rule as to the amount of the appropriation to be expended be uniform and be put into the Bill? Let me call attention to section 6:

> 6. The payments hereinbefore authorized shall, as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the Minister and the government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes within the meaning of this Act upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and upon such agreement being approved by the Governor in Council.

The governing words of the section are those "conditions and purposes within the meaning of this Act." The conditions are very vague in the Bill itself. I wish my hon. friend would explain what he means by those agreements which are to be made between the Federal Government and the Provincial Government. He said that after a few years a basis was found. If a basis has been found, surely we ought also to have a basis for the application of those appropriations.

Mr. CALDER: I am personally not in a position to give the information desired by the right hon. member, because I have not paid any attention to the details of any agreement which may be carried out, but I can quite realize that if it can be found practicable to do so, information along those lines should be given to the House. The House should understand what the basis of this agreement is to be. I have no doubt that there will be no difficulty at all in working out an agreement with all the provinces. The main purpose of the Bill is simply to provide a means whereby the provincial authorities will take over the control of existing labour bureaus or establish labour bureaus where they do not now exist. That will have to be done under certain conditions. If those conditions are complied with, then the money grants provided by this Bill will be forthcoming, but I am not in a position to state what those conditions should be, because I have not given any consideration to that phase of the subject.

Mr. CROTHERS: Section 6 provides that an agreement may be made subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. The general conditions of the agreement are set forth in section 7:

> (a) That the offices shall endeavour to fill situations in all trades and for both male and female employees;

That is the whole object of the Bill, namely, to fill vacant situations.

> (b) That the offices shall make such returns and submit to such inspection as the minister may require.

Those are the two leading things to be contained in the agreement, the details of which will probably be arranged under the regulations, for which section 10 provides by stating that the minister may make regulations for carrying into effect the objects of the Bill.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Will the minister tell us why he proposes to expend $50,000 this year, $100,000 next year, and $150,000 the following year? Why not reverse the amounts?

Mr. CROTHERS: We expect that the various provinces will be stimulated to establish larger numbers of those bureaus year after year, more next year than this year and more the year after next than next year.

Mr. PEDLOW: Has the minister any idea as to how much the various provinces are at present expending on this department?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not able to give that information.

Mr. PEDLOW: That information might be a basis from which to judge as to the amount to be spent in the first instance.

Mr. CROTHERS: We are guarded to this extent that we are to pay only an amount equal to one-half of what is expended by a province.

Mr. PEDLOW: It would be germane to the question to know how much the provinces are at present expending on this work. Then we would know whether $50,000 was or was not sufficient to carry on the work the first year.

Mr. CROTHERS: If it is too much, it will not be expended.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—money, how allotted:

Mr. CROTHERS: As there may be some doubt as to the meaning of the latter part of this section, I am going to move an amendment. The latter part of the section reads:

> But in no case shall the allotment to a province exceed the amount expended for the maintenance of employment offices by such province.

That might be interpreted to mean that we are to pay the whole sum expended by a province. Supposing a province had spent $20,000, then if we were to allot as much as it expends, it would mean we would allot the whole $20,000. I, therefore, wish to amend the section so as to make it plain that we are to pay only one-half of the total amount that is expended. I, therefore, move certain changes in the wording of the clause, which will make it read:

[Mr. Crothers.]

> But in no case shall the allotment to any province exceed one-half the amount expended for the maintenance of employment offices by such province.

Mr. FIELDING: There are matters of detail which we cannot expect the minister to give at present. The minister, however, has to make a start in appropriating money to a province. For instance, the sum of $50,000 is to be paid in one year, and there is a proviso that no province shall receive a sum greater than its own expenditure. If one province were to expend $50,000, under that rule, it might be entitled to take the whole appropriation, but, of course, that is not what is intended. The minister will find it necessary, at the beginning, to make an allotment to the provinces subject to the conditions he very properly imposes. My question is: On what basis will that allotment be made? Will it be by population?

Mr. CROTHERS: It was not considered well to base it on population, but rather on the amount of money expended.

Mr. FIELDING: If at the time the first allotment is made no moneys have been expended, you cannot go on that basis.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is impossible to determine at the beginning of the year how much each province is going to spend. At the end of the year they will be paid on the basis of the money they have expended, if there is enough of this $50,000 to go round, but in any case the amount each province gets will not exceed one-half of what they have expended.

Mr. FIELDING: The allotment will only be made at the close of the year?

Mr. CROTHERS: That will have to be so.

Mr. FIELDING: And the local governments will have no knowledge of how much they will get until the year closes.

Mr. CROTHERS: They will not know exactly.

Mr. FIELDING: Not even approximately.

Mr. CROTHERS: They will know how much we are going to divide up, but they will not know what the other provinces are going to expend.

Mr. FIELDING: They know that at the most they can only get one-half of their expenditure, but they also know they may not get one-tenth.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I do not think there are any labour bureaus in Prince Edward Island at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is my information.

Mr. READ: Is this the same old game of robbing the little province by the sea to feed up the fatted calf in other parts of the Dominion? This is a very important clause, and it certainly does not show how the money is to be distributed. I would suggest that the minister look into it further.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Would it not be advisable for the minister to advise each province that this law is being enacted, so that they may take advantage of it?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think it would be a good idea to send them a copy of the Bill.

Mr. DECHENE: In some provinces, employment offices may do a great deal of work at little expense. In Montreal, for instance, the employment offices are run on a very small expenditure, and the same applies to Quebec, and no doubt to many other places. Under the present basis of distribution a province which spent a large sum of money in establishing a large employment bureau might get more than it was fairly entitled to, and might be doing not half as much work as the other provinces that were running their bureaus at less expense. I do not think the present basis of distribution is fair. Why not distribute the money according to population? Then each province would know how much it was going to get.

Mr. CROTHERS: The condition my hon. friend is afraid of will be guarded against by the agreement that we shall make, and also by the inspection. We shall ascertain from each province the amount they expect to expend this year. We can guard in the agreement against any exorbitant expenditure such as paying the head officer of a bureau an extravagant salary. Then we shall have one or more inspectors going around the country to see that these agreements are carried out faithfully, just as the Department of Agriculture has inspectors seeing that the provinces carry out faithfully the matters set forth in the agreement with regard to agricultural assistance.

Mr. DECHENE: There are only two clauses which we know will be in the agreement, and they are mentioned in section 7 of the Bill. The agreement may be one thing in one province, and another thing in another province.

Mr. FIELDING: The object of the minister is a commendable one. He wants to encourage local governments to do this work under proper supervision, but I am afraid the local governments will not know how much they are going to get, and consequently, the encouragement the minister intends to give them will not be effective. They would not know until the end of the year how much their expenditure was going to be; they would know that at the most they could not get more than half of what they expended. They know how much they are not going to get, but not how much they are going to get, because the $50,000 has to be distributed amongst all the provinces. I heartily concur in the object of the minister, but I am a little afraid this Bill will not give the encouragement to local governments which he desires.

Mr. CALDER: What the hon. gentleman states is perfectly true. The position, however, is this: At the conference in Ottawa, the provincial premiers felt that the time had come when labour bureaus should be under provincial control and not under the control of private individuals or corporations, and they intimated to us very clearly that they intended to embark upon that policy. I will go further than that and say that they never asked us for any assistance at all, but proposed to do this as a matter of policy in the interests of their own people. They felt that the labour situation in Canada was such at the present time, and would likely continue for some time to come, that it was absolutely necessary for them to undertake this work. Now for the purpose of endeavouring to have all these labour bureaus established as far as possible on a common basis, and to have them working along the same lines, we thought it advisable to make provision whereby we could give them a grant, and we hope as a result to attain some measure of control over them with the object of co-ordinating the work. One of the things we expect to accomplish is to receive frequent reports from the provincial bureaus, in order that we may have reliable information in Ottawa at all times with reference to labour conditions in the various provinces, and as to the manner in which these bureaus are meeting the conditions as they arise. I am quite sure that, in the working out of the details of this arrangement, means will be created whereby frequent reports will be made by the provinces, so that we will hear at all times of the situation as it develops in the provinces. What the hon. gentleman has said is very true, that at this time the provinces cannot know what sum of money they would require to help them out in this work. I think, after the proposed scheme operates for a year or so, the law may require amendment, but it seems to me that until the Act is in actual operation for at least a year, we will not know what the provinces require. They will have to establish bureaus in order to ascertain what their expenditures are, and the details of these agreements can then be worked out. It seems to me that all we can do at the present time is simply to adopt the general scheme, in the hope that, if the necessity arises, we will get the measure in better shape after it has been in operation for some time.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is there any serious objection to allotting the money according to population?

Mr. FIELDING: If the local governments are prepared to do this work out of their own good will, and do not attach any importance to the provincial grant, then the view of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization is right, but if the local governments are attaching importance to the federal grant then there is much uncertainty as to the amount which the Dominion is to give. My hon. friend (Mr. Calder) and I have been members of local governments and we know that these local governments are at no time indifferent to a federal grant.

Mr. CALDER: I did not say the provincial governments would be indifferent to receiving a grant, but when we had the matter under consideration they did not ask for a grant. It seems to me, if we are going to devise any plan whereby the labour bureaus will be established, as far as practicable upon a common basis and the federal authorities are to have the right of at least, some supervision over it, and if we are to ask them to furnish us with information, about the only way we can do it is by means of a grant. We cannot compel them to do it. We can lay down conditions that they will not obtain the grant unless they are prepared to do so and so.

Mr. FIELDING: That is reasonable.

Mr. CALDER: This is only a small grant; $50,000 will not go far in paying for the administration of the bureaus throughout the length and breadth of Canada. One of the main purposes of giving the grant is to place us in a position whereby we will be able to exercise some supervision over the work of these labour bureaus, and at the same time endeavouring to establish them upon a common basis.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. CAHILL: It would seem to me that the objection of my hon. friend might be overcome by stating just what amount each province would expect to get each year on the census basis. If it would amount to about $7,500 for each million people in the country, the province having two million could expect to get $15,000 this year and no more, and the province that did not avail itself of the generosity of this Government would not receive anything this year. In that way there would be an inducement to our friends in Prince Edward Island to establish such a bureau. After the first year the amount of the grant might be based on the understanding that other provinces were not in need of the money, and the grant to a particular province which required the money would be greater if these other provinces did not apply for it. If all the provinces apply for it, the province which receives, say, $15,000 this year might only receive half that amount next year. If we might limit the amount, and make it definite, it would be an inducement to the other provinces to establish the bureaus because they would be able to get this grant from the Dominion Government, provided they complied with the conditions, and I think each province might be limited to a certain amount.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I do not think the proposition to give according to population would be advisable, because the needs of the province depend sometimes on the centres of population. Montreal is a large centre for employees. Employees are sent from Montreal to different parts of the country outside the province, and Quebec may have to contribute more than another province and therefore Quebec should receive a larger proportion from the Federal Government. This is given as an encouragement to the provinces which may have a much larger population. After taking everything into consideration, I think the principle laid down by the hon. minister is a good one.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Archambault) is not taking into consideration the fact that if a province did not spend any money itself, it would not receive any. Consequently, the argument would not apply to that province. In Prince Edward Island, while we have not a regular governmental bureau, the people have been doing some work along these lines, but in a voluntary way. Last year I had the honour of being president of the Prince County branch of the National Service League, and we had a labour bureau connected with that league. Other people were doing the work voluntarily. They were paying their expenses, working for nothing and finding everything, and they were doing it to help win the war. But if the Dominion Government is going to set aside $50,000, why not set aside, in the way suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) an amount pro rata to the population, and if the provinces do not use it, they will not receive it from the Dominion. Then there would be that much more left for the other provinces. I think that our people will have a labour bureau, because the labour situation with us is more acute than in any other province of the Dominion at the present time.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—payments conditional upon agreement between minister and province and approval.

Mr. CAHILL: Perhaps the ministers are prepared now to give an answer to the question which was asked regarding section 5. Do they not think it would be advisable to work it out on some basis not to exceed a definite sum each year for each province? I think this allotment should be made on a percentage basis to the provinces and a definite sum stated for the first year.

If you pay one province this year $40,000, and then next year all the other provinces take advantage of this opportunity, the province that received the $40,000 this year, would only get $10,000 or $12,000 next year. If you put it on a percentage basis, according to the population of each province, you will be able to determine what each province will get if it earns it. If it does not earn it, it will not get the grant. As pointed out by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, that province will not expect to get any grant this year. Next year, if it gets in line, it will get a grant, but it will not know whether it is going to get any part of this expenditure because it may have to be extended to the other provinces.

Mr. CROTHERS: There is nothing to prevent the province of Prince Edward Island from getting a portion of this grant this very year. They can get it by doing something in the next two or three months to earn a portion of this grant. If you put it on the basis of population you might have one or two provinces doing nothing, and, of course, getting nothing. A proportion of this sum in that event would not go to encouraging the establishment of these bureaus. We would hold it here and it would not be used as we desire it to be used. We want to encourage the establishment of bureaus and we want to encourage it according to the work done in the various provinces. There is no probability that the condition suggested by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Cahill) will exist because there are five provinces which are pushing forward now under legislation to extend their systems by establishing a greater number of bureaus.

Mr. BUTTS: I do not think the province of Nova Scotia has any such expenditure as that, and if that is so, where would the fifty per cent come in? I know there was no provision made for it in the estimates.

Mr. CROTHERS: My information is that there is no legislation in Nova Scotia establishing such bureaus as these.

Mr. BUTTS: Then where would your fifty per cent come in—fifty per cent of nothing is nothing.

On section 8—appointment of officers:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has the minister made an estimate of the personnel which would be required for the carrying out of this Act?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not considered the matter in connection with submitting an estimate to this House. It is very difficult—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: All the more reason to consider it.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, it requires more consideration than I have yet given to it. This is a new departure, it will need a great deal of consideration and we will probably ask for a larger sum than will probably be expended.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not a good reason but we will accept it all the same.

Mr CROTHERS: We want to be sure we have enough.

On section 10—regulations:

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is usual to have the regulations approved by the Governor in Council. In this case the minister is going to make them off his own bat. I have no doubt he will make them wisely but that is not according to custom.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no objection to that. I move that the following words be added to the end of that section:

Subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported as amended.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 64, to amend the Indian Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Will of Indian devising property to be approved; land devised or bequeathed to non-resident on the reserve to be sold:

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister kindly explain this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As the law stands now, an Indian cannot devise his interest in the band property to any other than a member of the band. It frequently happens that his very close relatives are members of another band. This Bill will enable an Indian to devise his interest in the band property to any one outside of the band, but when that happens the Superintendent General is empowered to sell the devised property and distribute the proceeds to the heirs.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Do I understand that an Indian will be able to devise his land to any other person, even if that person is not an Indian?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He can devise in any way as set out in section 25 of the Indian Act. There is a restriction in that clause to the effect that the testator cannot devise or bequeath land in a reserve or any interest therein—unless to his daughter, sister or grandchildren—to any one not entitled to reside on such reserve. Consequently, his rights to bequeath are in no way restricted by this amendment. They are enlarged, but only to such extent as to enable him to bequeath to the same class of people, even though they do not reside in that reservation.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: They will have to be Indians, though?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The Superintendent General may sell the property devised to any other member of the reservation, and distribute the proceeds to whom it was bequeathed. That is to say, the heirs get it, but they do not get it in the form of land, because if they did they would have to go upon the reservation. They get it in the form of proceeds.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: No matter whether the heirs are white or not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The law is not changed in that particular. There is no wider range given at all, except to the extent of enabling them to bequeath to heirs outside of the reserve. There is no change in the nature of the Act.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It has been enlarged, because formerly, if I understand correctly, no devise or bequest could be made to any one not entitled to reside on the reserve?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: So it would have to be an Indian?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Under this change, the Indian will be able to leave his property to anybody, but such land will have to be sold, and the proceeds given to the heirs. Is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not made myself clear. The class of people to whom the Indian may devise is not altered at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that class defined in the Indian Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 25 of that Act reads as follows:

> Indians may devise or bequeath property of any kind in the same manner as other persons: Provided that no devise or bequest of land in a reserve or of any interest therein unless to the daughter, sister or grandchildren of the testator, shall be made to any one not entitled to reside on such reserve, and that no will purporting to dispose of land in a reserve or any interest therein shall be of any force or effect unless or until the will has been approved by the Superintendent General, and that if a will be disapproved by the Superintendent General the Indian making the will shall be deemed to have died intestate; and the Superintendent General may approve of a will generally and disallow any disposition thereby made of land in a reserve or of any interest in such land, in which case the will so approved shall have force and effect except so far as such disallowed disposition is concerned.

The only alteration made is this: that whereas under the present Act "no devise or bequest of land in a reserve or any interest therein unless to the daughter, sister or grandchildren of the testator, shall be made to any one not entitled to reside on such reserve"—that restriction is removed. He may bequeath to others even though they do not reside on the reservation, provided, of course, that the will is approved by the Superintendent General. But if he does bequeath to others who do not reside on the reservation the land must be sold and the proceeds only go to the devisees.

Mr. MICHAUD: Where an Indian has married a white woman, and has died without heirs, is the wife entitled to any interest in the land belonging to the band? Supposing the members of the band tried to send her away from the land belonging to her husband, and she wished to remain, is she entitled to remain there or not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has nothing to do with the amendment, but the law of the matter is covered by section 26 of the Act. If the hon. gentleman reads that section, which is a very long one, he will see what becomes of the property of an Indian who dies intestate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The object is to leave the reserve intact for the band?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and to give wider liberty of bequest.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—proof of assent to release or surrender.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Before whom was the oath formerly taken?

Mr. MEIGHEN: An attempt had been made to particularize; various additions were made from time to time, yet the provision seemed still to be insufficient, because many of the officials designated as persons before whom the oath could be taken were not within reach. We simply wish to provide an omnibus clause so that any one who can take affidavits in the province is competent to take an affidavit in this case. Notaries were not included in the list. We want the section simply to read: "Any person having authority to take affidavits and having jurisdiction within the place where the oath is administered."

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Indian may be summoned as witness:

Mr. MEIGHEN: In a certain investigation Indians were advised by some ingenious lawyer not to appear, and he made out a very strong case that they were not "persons" within the meaning of the Act. We wish to avoid lawyers' fees in any further cases of that kind.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—direction of expenditures of capital of band without consent:

Mr. LEMIEUX: The powers conferred by this section upon the Superintendent General appear to be very wide. As long as its deputy head is such a competent official as Mr. Scott, I have no objection, but we cannot always have Mr. Scott.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The powers go only to the extent of enabling the Superintendent General to arrange for the cultivation—not for the expropriation—of Indian lands for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I refer the hon. gentleman to the first subsection of this section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That merely provides for the utilization of a share of the capital of the band for purposes looking to the improvement of the conditions of the band and their property, not to the taking away of any of their property.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that if the band feel that the money should be used in a certain way, that the Superintendent General, who is the guardian of these wards of the nation, may decide to follow another course. Of course, the Governor in Council would not do anything contrary to the interests of the band. But these are very wide powers. I should have no objection if Mr. Scott were eternal, but unfortunately he is not.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Under the old Act, no such action could be taken as is contemplated by this section without the consent of the band. The Superintendent General could not expend the capital money of the band without their consent, even for the cultivation of the land or the improvement of the reserve. To this first section, I think, there is no objection; but subsection 3 provides that the Superintendent General shall have the right to grant a lease of lands in the reserve to a third party. May this not lead to serious trouble between the Indians and such third party? The Indians might object very strongly to strangers going on their reserve, even with a lease from the Government, to cultivate their land. This is a very important change. Previously nothing of this kind could be done without the consent of the band.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The departmental officials do not anticipate that trouble. Still, the hon. gentleman has a very correct appreciation of the change that has been effected in the law. It is putting it out of the power of what one may call reactionary or recalcitrant Indian bands to check their own progress by refusing consent to the utilization of their funds or vacant lands for their own advantage. The hon. gentleman is not quite right in his understanding that at present no such power in any respect is given to the Superintendent General. It is, in these two respects: For purposes, for example, of surveys or of drainage, the consent of the Band has already been dispensed with, or rather provision has been made that it may be dispensed with. We are simply extending that principle. It is necessary to do so now, particularly, in view of the production campaign that we have under way throughout the Indian Reserves of Western Canada. The Indian Reserves of Western Canada embrace very large areas of land far in excess of what they are utilizing now for productive purposes. We have well under way in that country a campaign for the utilization of those reserves, for stock raising, for grain production, and, for the present, of course, in many cases, merely for summer fallowing. But we do not want to have this campaign entirely at the mercy of the Indian bands themselves. We do not want to have those bands stand in our way and say to us: Notwithstanding the necessities of to-day, you must keep off all this vacant land unless we choose to give it up to you and ourselves forego the great privilege of roaming on it in its old, wild state. We want to be able to utilize that land in every case; but, of course, the policy of the department will be to get the consent of the band wherever possible, and to meet the bands in such spirit and with such methods as will not alienate their sympathies from their guardian, the Government of Canada. We do not anticipate that we shall come into very serious conflict with any band. It is only the more backward bands that offer any objections at all to the utilization of their land.

Mr. STACEY: In the case of a very large reserve in which the band has been reduced to very small numbers, is there any clause in the Bill making it possible for the department to appropriate a portion of their land—actually to take it out of their hands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, only to the extent of enabling us to lease it, paying them the fair rental value of it, less the value of the permanent improvements. The title is not taken away.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MOLLOY: The question of leasing Indian lands has just come up. On what terms are those lands leased? This is the first year in which the question of enormously increasing production has been discussed. Many persons have asked me for information in regard to the matter, and I have never received authoritative information. On what terms are the lands leased to actual settlers and stock raisers, and for what period of time are they leased? What goes with the lease as regards fencing? Will the department fence the land and charge a certain rental according to the number of head of cattle per acre?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot, for very obvious reasons, give the hon. member any information as to terms. The commissioner under whose supervision all this work in the West is being done is Mr. W. M. Graham, late inspector and agent at File Hills. Mr. Graham has been in the service of the Indian Department for between thirty and thirty-five years. He has made a most conspicuous success of his Indian settlement work and of his management of the agencies under his control. The Order in Council which gives him his powers is very wide. It necessarily was wide. It would otherwise have been impossible for us, at this end, with proper expedition to fix the terms in any individual case. Mr. Graham is given power to make leases himself on behalf of the department, subject, of course, to our approval. We depend upon him to get the best terms possible. We do not as yet know what terms he is able to secure. I have from him an intimation that, in respect of one reserve in which already there are existing rights, he is securing a per-head basis very substantially in excess of the per-head basis that we get from those who now have existing rights. It was his anticipation that he would get very substantial rentals in each case. It must, however, be kept in mind that his paramount object is to secure productive results, at the same time, of course, securing fair and adequate returns to the bands for the rental values of their lands.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: I wish to commend the minister for this section in the Bill. In the very centre of the district which I represent there is a large Indian reserve, possibly the most productive section of that country, served with railways and having every market facility. I should like to see this provision go further so as to allow the minister to give those lands for cultivation purposes as well as for grazing, because at this time, when we require so much production, lands adjacent to a market and a railway are much more advantageous for purposes of cultivation than those further back from business centres. I have listened to what the minister has said in regard to the powers of Mr. Graham. I have spoken to Mr. Graham in connection with his work in Western Canada. The only criticism I might make of his work there at the present time is that I am afraid he is going to get from the rental of those lands more money than they are worth. At a time when we need every effort put forth for the purpose of increasing the stock of this country as well as for the purpose of grain production, Mr. Graham, as I learned from my last conversation with him, is getting more for the grazing privileges of an Indian reserve than, in my judgment, the farmer can afford to pay. This, of course, is for the benefit of the Indians, and, from that point of view, no exception can be taken to it. I hope the minister will allow, or instruct, Mr. Graham to do all he can to lease this land on, say, a five-year term for the purpose of cultivation, because there are thousands of acres of land that are immediately adjacent to markets and that are lying absolutely idle and of no value whatever either to the Indian or to any one else.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Does not this provision include cultivation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was just going to say so. It includes provision for leasing for cultivation.

Mr. MICHAUD: Under the old Act, I understand, the Government and the Indian could lease a quantity of land for the term of one year for the purpose of cultivation. Under this Bill does the Government expect to make a lease for a term of one, two or three years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is wrong. Previously we could lease for any term within the scope of the surrender obtained from the Indian band.

There was no limitation to one year, and similarly, there is no limitation now. I believe that the leases are being made for three years, and possibly in some cases five years, the intention being to cover at all events the period of great need caused by the war.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is the consent of the whole band required or only the consent of the owner of the part leased?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the man were the recognized owner of the part leased he alone would have to be dealt with, but if the property belonged to the band the consent of the band would have to be obtained in compliance with the Indian Act.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it the intention of the department to make any provision for the Indians in cases where the larger part of the reservation is leased?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Indian is very fortunate; he has all he had before, and now in addition he has the rental for this land. I do not think we need waste any time in sympathy for the Indian, for I am pretty sure his interests will be looked after by the Commissioner.

Mr. CAHILL: The Indian has only got now what we left to him after confiscating what we wanted. Now we are proposing to take the balance of the rights we then reserved to him. The Indian may ask to be allowed to live on this land which he leases to the Government, but under this Act he will not be permitted to do so if the Government wish otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot agree with the hon. member that there has been any confiscation at all. I believe that the Indians of this country have been liberally and generously dealt with, and I believe it is the intention and spirit of the country to continue to treat them generously. That spirit is evidenced by this Act. Where the Indian does not cultivate his land we are providing that we may arrange for its cultivation, the title still remaining in the band. The Indian gets the benefit of that cultivation by way of rental.

Mr. CAHILL: But we are taking away his right of residence on the reserve.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no; we do not take that in any case.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Would it not be well to provide for cancelling the lease at the end of two years if the Indian decided to cultivate the land himself at the end of that time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would certainly have it in our power not to continue. We would be only too glad to have the Indian use this land if he would; production by him would be just as valuable as production by anybody else. But he will not cultivate this land, and we want to cultivate it; that is all. We shall not use it any longer than he shows a disinclination to cultivate the land himself.

Mr. PEDLOW: Suppose it is decided to lease an entire reservation, would the Indians still be allowed to trap and hunt over the reserve or would they have to leave the reserve entirely?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not provide for that. We provide only for leasing the uncultivated part. Of course, if there are no Indians on the reservation we might lease it all, but that is not what my hon. friend fears; he fears the Indians will be put off. They will never be put off under this Act, which only provides for leasing the unused areas.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Are these short-term leases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it the intention under this Act to expropriate the land that is not being cultivated and lease it to other parties who will use it for grain growing or grazing purposes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intention is to lease it without expropriation.

Mr. PEDLOW: It is practically the same thing. Then what becomes of the Indian?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He gets the benefit of all the cultivation that he has heretofore undertaken and the benefit of all the land that he has been using for grazing, and all the other benefits coming to the Indian under the law. Now we are providing an additional benefit by giving value to what had no value to him before.

Mr. PEDLOW: But will the Indian be allowed to trap and hunt if the entire reservation is taken? If not, where will he go?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will still leave him enough to trap on, but even if we did not thirty bushels of wheat to the acre is a lot better than a few squirrels caught by the Indian.

Mr. MOLLOY: Did I understand the minister to say that the land would be leased for the purpose of raising grain as well as stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MOLLOY: I am not going to raise any objection, but I must say that it is a great mistake to allow this land to be used for the raising of grain. Those of us who have lived any length of time in the West know very well that the moment you rent your land to a tenant, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he leaves the land in a poorer condition than when he took possession. There are millions of acres in the West which the man who is anxious to farm can get by paying a small homestead fee and complying with the requirements as to residence and cultivation, and it becomes his own at the end of three years. What will happen in this case is this: Syndicates, large and small, will come to the Government or to Mr. Graham and will lease the pick of the whole country. They will not farm the land, but they will mine it, and when grain goes down after the war they will leave the land in a worthless condition. We all know that the price of grain will fall after the war, but just how soon we do not know. The price of grain will certainly fall before the price of stock; that is conceded by every man in the grain or stock-raising business that I have met. But if this land were used for raising stock its value would increase and it would also help in bringing down the price of meat, and the price of meat, let me say, is going to remain high longer than the price of grain. Let me repeat: Syndicates will pick out the best of this land, will mine it as long as they can get $2.21 a bushel for wheat, and then when the price goes down to 40c. a bushel—that is the price I raised wheat for years ago, but we do not expect it will ever get down to that level again—or even 90c. or $1 a bushel, these men will leave the land in a filthy, worthless condition to be taken by some homesteader with a few dollars, who will spend two or three years fallowing it back into shape.

Mr. COWAN: The hon. gentleman does not understand the commissioner as well as I do, or he would not have made the statement which he has made. I have known the commissioner for thirty years, and I may say there is not a more competent officer. He will never permit any company, syndicate or individual to use the lands in any such manner as the hon. gentleman suggests. One reason why I support the Bill which the minister has brought in is because it gives Mr. Graham so much latitude. I know that the interests of the country and of the Indians will be properly looked after in his hands, and if there should happen to be any using of these lands in the manner suggested, he will quickly take the necessary steps to terminate the lease. I have been over a good many of the Indian reserves, and I know something about the hundreds of acres of land lying idle. I know that if any lease is terminated at any time for any cause hundreds of farmers would be only too glad to take the lease and work the farm successfully. It is all very well to say you should give all this land over to stock-raising. If the land were suited for it, that proposition would be perfectly good, but unfortunately, there are millions of acres of land in Western Canada in which grain raising is exclusively indicated and where stock raising would not be a success. A great deal of this land is of that nature. Therefore, I say, it is a perfectly proper thing to-day to give a free hand to Mr. Graham, and let him use the land for grain raising, if it can be so used, and use such parts for stock raising that are as suitable. I have no hesitation in saying that this whole question of handling the Indian reserves is very properly placed in the hands of the Indian Commissioner, Mr. Graham, and it will be properly looked after.

Mr. MOLLOY: I did not say anything regarding Mr. Graham, I know him by reputation but not personally, and I may say no better officer is in the employ of the country than Mr. Graham, but that does not affect what I said in regard to the renting of the land. He cannot control every man who uses that land. What would happen if he died? Somebody would have to take his place, and perhaps we would not get as good a man as Mr. Graham. Another point is that this land could not be used for stock raising, because a great deal of it is only adapted for grain raising. Any land that will raise grain will raise stock, but a great deal of land that will raise stock will not raise grain.

Mr. HENDERS: I have the honour to represent a constituency where there is a large-sized Indian reserve, and a number of the Indians on that reserve already own their land. The farmers adjacent to the land owned by these Indians are renting the land year after year and producing grain on it. I know further that that same reservation has a lot of the very best land in the country on it for grain purposes, but it is not suitable for stock raising because the water is not available. In order to raise stock your land must be adjacent to water, but you can grow wheat where you have not the opportunity of obtaining water. I have great pleasure in endorsing this measure.

Mr. J. F. REID: I congratulate the Minister of the Interior for going as far as he has gone. I know a great many Indian reserves. In the province in which I live thousands of acres are lying idle, and farmers having ranches alongside these reserves are only too glad to get leases of this land to raise grain and cattle. Perhaps there is a danger here that when we make an Indian a landlord and he rents out his land, he will sit back with his hands in his pockets and receive his rent, and it will tend to make him a little lazy. In regard to the land being polluted with noxious weeds, I do not think there need be any fear. That matter can be attended to. As to production, we have many Indian reserves in Saskatchewan lying quite close to our railway towns, and I am sure this measure will greatly stimulate production. I am very much in sympathy with the amendment to the Act.

Mr. CAHILL: If the only purpose of the Bill is to deal with vacant land, there are thousands and millions of acres of vacant land throughout the West owned by large corporations, and why we should take from the Indian his rights, where he is living on the land in his own way, to make way for settlers or renters, and leave to the large corporations their lands which they are holding for profit, is a mystery to me. I think if we are going to do any confiscating of land for the benefit of the white man, you should take the white man's land.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Under subsection 3, when these lands are rented or leased, is there provision for a tender?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not necessarily, because there would not be time to tender in every case.

Mr. J. F. REID: I do not wish to be misunderstood, and I may say I am not in favour of confiscating the Indian land, because I know by the last returns the Indian population is increasing, and there may be a day when the Indians will require all the land. But leasing and confiscating are different propositions.

Mr. CAHILL: It depends on how long you lease the land for.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Where people are living a couple of thousand miles away from these Indian reserves, it is natural for them to say that these reserves should be left untouched. We must remember, however, that there are hundreds of thousands of acres of the best agricultural lands in the Dominion in the Indian reserves in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, withheld from agricultural development. There are only a few thousand Indians, and if every Indian on the reserve would work day and night it would be absolutely impossible for him to cultivate more than a small fraction of these lands. In regard to raising stock on all these lands, the Indians would be unable to do it. They would not be able to finance themselves. Some criticism has been made of the production of grain. Some lands are not suitable for growing grain and some are suitable only for that purpose. If a man can farm successfully in any part of the Dominion, he can do so on the lands of those Indian reserves. In the early days when they were set apart, they were not accessible by railway. In the southern portion of Alberta there is the Stony Indian reserve, through which the railway now passes. The railway runs within five miles of the Sarcee reserve. It also passes right on the edge of the Blackfoot reserve, in which there are some of the finest agricultural lands in Canada. The Blood reserve at Cardston is in close proximity to the railway.

If a man can farm and make a success of it in Alberta he can certainly be successful on any of these reserves. It is hindering the development of the country to have this land withheld from cultivation. What affects the West affects every other part of Canada. I am sure that what is being done by the Government this year in opening up portions of these reserves will assist very materially in increasing the output of grain in these three western provinces. I think this amendment is entitled to the support of every member of the House, there being no question of the confiscation of Indian lands in it.

Mr. DAVIS: May I make reference to one part of the section that has not yet been referred to? This discussion, so far, has been based upon the question of leasing, but if I apprehend the rest of this section, it goes to this extent that the commissioner may speculate with the funds of the band to the extent of making improvements. If there are proceeds from such improvements, the band is ahead of the game, but if he has had the success that I have had as a lawyer in speculating in farming, makes a botch of it and loses money, the band would be out that much. I think this part of the section might more seriously concern the House than what we have been discussing as to leases. I am not much concerned about leases because they will bring in something, but when it comes to making improvements at the expense of the band it is something that must be considered because the band deserves the protection of this House.

Mr. HENDERS: Lest I should be misunderstood in regard to the remarks I made, I desire to put myself right. I would be the last one to interfere with the rights of the Indian in connection with his land. The remarks I made were not with the intention of doing the Indian an injury, but of conferring a positive benefit upon him. I want to follow up with this further remark, that I think that a considerable amount of the land held by Indians and ostensibly farmed by them is now in such a condition of filth, because of foul weeds and bad seeds, that it is impossible for them to work it. If this land gets into the hands of good, practical farmers, it will be put in a better state of cultivation and it will therefore be an advantage to the Indian rather than otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis) is rather apprehensive. There is no idea of speculating with the Indian fund. Subsection 2 provides that the capital fund of the band may be used for the improvement of the Indians' property. There is no intention of going further than that. Already we can do that for purposes of drainage, surveys, etc. The Indian is the ward of the Government still. The presumption of the law is that he has not the capacity to decide as to what is for his ultimate benefit in the same degree as has his guardian, the Government of Canada. Consequently, it has been affirmed that the fund of the band should be, and can be, used, with or without his consent, for the purposes I have named. This only goes to the extent of extending the principle further and enabling us to use the funds of the band for the purpose of making improvements to the Indians' property. That is all, and that clearly appears by subsection 2. In subsection 3, we have provided that we may lease and cultivate unused land. It may be that the hon. gentleman fears that, if we cultivate it, we may not cultivate it to advantage, that is to say, that we may lose money. But the Indian gets the fair rental value of the land. We are not speculating with his property; we give him the fair rental value. Consequently, the Indian cannot complain; and the country cannot complain because this is an attempt on a sound basis to increase production; and I do not think, therefore, that the House should further hesitate.

9 p.m.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: I do not think the people of the country would complain so much if provision were made for tenders. As my hon. friend from Neepawa (Mr. Davis) pointed out a minute ago, you could speculate with this land. Some friend of the Government may get some of this land. I think it is bad policy to depart from the tender system, and I do not think that the reason given by the minister a minute ago, that he had no time to do what was suggested, is a good reason. If there is no time this year, this land should only be rented for one year. The rights of the Indians should not be interfered with unless there is grave reason for so doing. This is a drastic measure, and the reason for it given by the minister is not sufficient.

Mr. MOLLOY: Mr. Chairman, I have not the fear that some of my hon. friends have that the Indian will be interfered with. I believe, as the minister states, that the Indian will be better taken care of under some such system as this than he will be if he is left entirely to his own resources. I come now to the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), who swung all around and about what I said and then had to come back and admit the truth of my statement, that if you rented this land to first-class; practical farmers, it would be very much better. I would say, take all the Indian lands, leave the Indians enough for purposes of habitation, and pay them a rent for what you take. If you are going to rent land, if you are going to do it in a hurry, and if you are going to do it without tender—and it was done without advertisement only two weeks ago—you are going to see Jim, Jack and the other fellow take it up while the prices of wheat and all grains are high, and then desert it, with the result that the country will be the loser. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. DuTremblay) when he says that the minister should rent the land for one year. I do not think that is fair. Take, for instance, the case of a stock man. He probably takes a section of land, he buys up 500 sheep, puts them on the land and if it were proposed to put him off the land at the end of the year it would not be fair. Neither would it be fair to a man who is entirely a grain grower and who, with the best of intentions, would start in and buy up horses, tractors, binders and other things, if he were only allowed to keep the land for one year. The minister and the department should take every precaution, as I am sure they will, to protect the people as well as the Indian. He should protect the neighbours of the people who are farming these lands as well as the people who are on the lands and, of course, the people of the country generally. I am satisfied that as far as Mr. Graham is able to do it, the work will be well done, but Mr. Graham is not infallible by any means any more than the rest of us. I am not opposing this measure but I am trying to improve it. It is a good move. The Indian, on the whole, will be better off; but, at the same time, let us see that the Indian, the department, and the people, are given every protection. There is no need of rushing into a thing and making a botch of it. If we are going to take it up let us do it right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to tendering, I am sure that Mr. Graham would call for tenders in every case where there is time and where the circumstances permit. There are large reserves where there are certain rights already, where it may be found well to lease a certain permit or privilege over a certain section of it, or perhaps found well to rent part of it for grazing, and so on. Under conditions of that sort, it does not appear to me that tendering is possible. It may be that some of the land will be leased to friends of the Government. In that very prosperous and intelligent country from which we from the West come they are all friendly to the Government, so that it is a contingency we cannot avoid. But it will be leased honestly all the same. I know there is a great deal in what the hon. member says, that land temporarily leased for cultivation and thereafter abandoned is very likely to deteriorate through weeds. That consideration has prevented us leasing school lands, and I have had to stand a good deal of abuse of the opposite kind to that to which I have been subjected to-night because we refused for that reason to lease school lands. But in this case the lands leased are those over which we have a system and machinery of direct supervision. We have an agent at every reserve, with sufficient power in his hands to supervise the leasehold, and if it should be that the land should be under cultivation for a time, and then no longer under cultivation, at least we will have the benefit of the fencing in the meantime, and then we can apply the method of farming which the hon. gentleman suggests; we can put the cattle on after that, because the fences are there, and they will take care of the weed situation in very little time.

Mr. J. F. REID: I would like to ask in regard to the leasing of Indian reserve land to farmers who will crop this land.

Will it be possible for the land so leased to come under the municipal law of the different provinces, so that the machinery of the municipal law will have effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That question is more than ordinarily difficult. My impression is it would not come under the provincial law.

Mr. J. F. REID: Would it not be better if it did?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not answer very well, because I do not know what the provincial law is in the province referred to by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. J. F. REID: In all municipalities in Saskatchewan there is a weed inspector who looks after noxious weeds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I think these leases will be subject to that law.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will it be the policy of the Government to have the land cultivated under the direction of the Superintendent General with the money of the Indian band when no lease is granted? The Government will have that authority under subsection 2 of section 4. The Superintendent General is authorized to expend the capital moneys of the band for the purpose of cultivating or improving the land, even without the consent of the band. I think there is danger of the condition arising referred to by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis). If the operations are not successful financially, the Indians will be the losers as a result of that expenditure. The Superintendent General himself could have the land cultivated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. But the Act provides that if we do, we give the Indian the fair rental value of the land leased, less such of the moneys as have gone into permanent improvements, of which, of course, he gets the benefit.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Not under subsection 2.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, under subsection 3.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Yes, but under subsection 2 the expenditure of the capital moneys of the band is authorized for the purpose of improving or cultivating the land. There is no provision that the Indian shall receive nothing. Of course, he will receive something if the operations are successful, but if they are not he will lose as a result of the expenditure of that money.

[Mr. J. F. Reid.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the purpose to expend the capital moneys on anything except permanent improvements, and the Act provides that these shall be only for such purposes as may be considered reasonable and proper. Then subsection 3 clearly indicates that the purpose of the expenditure of the capital funds is for permanent improvements only. In case we use the land, we pay a fair value.

Mr. CAHILL: If I may be permitted I would like to ask the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) what he thinks might become of the Indians on the Sarcee reserve when this Bill comes into force? About how much of the reserve is under cultivation at the present time?

Mr. TWEEDIE: The effect of this Bill will certainly be that the capital fund of the Sarcee Indians will be increased, because thousands of acres in that reservation which are not under cultivation, which are not being used for grazing purposes, and which are not producing one single cent to the Indians, will then be producing revenue. Under this system the Indians are bound to receive some money, and if the Government follows the policy of leasing the land to independent tenants, then the Indians receive that money without the expenditure of one single cent, and the general revenue of their capital fund will be increased to the extent of these rentals. On the other hand, if the Government spend money on the cultivation of the land, the Indians then will be in the same position, I take it, as an independent farmer, and if a profit is made out of the crop, as the Sarcee Indians made last year and the year before in raising grain, then their capital fund will be increased to that extent. It is a profit-making transaction from almost every angle from which you look at it. There is this possibility, that, if they invest their money in seed grain or build a fence, they get no revenue from the fence other than the protection of their crop. If there should be a frost, or hail, or a drought, there will be no crop, and they will lose the cost of their seed grain, and they will have put in their own services and their own energy, which will be lost to them, just as would be the case with any other farmers under similar conditions.

Mr. CAHILL: But will the Indian of the Sarcee reserve be satisfied? There is only a small acreage on that reserve under cultivation. The greater part is partially fenced, very poorly fenced, part of it. But the whole of it is fenced now.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: The reserve contains something in the neighbourhood of 70,000 acres. Will the Indians be satisfied that they are being treated fairly? Will they accept the conditions we are laying down, or are they dissatisfied?

Mr. TWEEDIE: Well, the Indian may be satisfied and he may not. My personal view with regard to the Indian is that he is the ward of the Government, and being a ward he is bound to accept the treatment given him. The treatment of the Indian should be the very best that can be offered him under the circumstances. But it seems to me that it is no part of the treatment of the Indian to allow thousands of acres of land to stay out of cultivation and not put to use for grazing purposes. It seems to me that the position of the Indian as a ward is almost the position of any other ward, and that the guardian of that ward is bound to exercise his judgment, as the Minister of the Interior points out, in the best interest of the ward. When we produce revenue for the benefit of the Indians themselves out of land which is now lying idle, I think that is the treatment which should be accorded to the Indians; and I believe it to be the duty of this Government to make use of the Indian lands for the benefit of the Indians themselves.

Mr. PEDLOW: It seems to me that this enactment is designed for the purpose of benefiting farmers whose land adjoins Indian reserves. It is not reasonable that an inroad should be made on Indian reserve lands in the West until the other lands throughout that country have been taken up. There is something in connection with this enactment which does not seem square to the Indians. The Indians are the wards of Canada, and deserve every consideration at our hands. I think that we should not too hastily approve this legislation.

Mr. MOLLOY: I have heard it stated outside the House that the department fences the land and then leases it to a rancher, who puts on the land so many head of cattle per acre. Does the department fence the land and then lease it, or does it not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is usually provided in the lease that the lessee shall fence, but under section 90 of the Act, as amended by this amendment, the department has power to fence and to charge the cost to capital account as permanent improvement. The cultivation could then be done and rental paid to the band on a fair value basis. In order to make it clear that no capital fund shall be used except for permanent improvement, I move:

That after the word "in" in the sixth line of section 4 there be inserted the words "subsection 1 of."

Subsection 1 clearly sets out that the improvements shall be permanent.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The Government are doing the right thing in protecting not only the general public, but their wards as well. But the Government have other landed wards who own, control, and hold out of use large tracts of land in Western Canada —I mean the big interests. What is the Government going to do about them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We feel that they are quite capable of taking care of themselves.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—taxation of dogs, protection of sheep:

Mr. MEIGHEN: The object of this clause is a very useful, though not a very lofty one. It is to provide for the curtailment of the privileges of Indian dogs. The Superintendent General is empowered to make by-laws for the taxation, control and destruction of dogs and for the protection of sheep; and such by-laws may be applied to such reserves or parts thereof as from time to time the Superintendent General may direct. For many years complaints have been made of the depredations of Indian dogs, particularly in the destruction of sheep. We have had no way of dealing with the matter. The Indians had power to make by-laws which would be ratified, if necessary, by the Governor in Council; but the Indian is very sensitive on the subject, and does not move very rapidly along the path of civilization in this respect. We want to take care of this dog question.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: No penalty has been provided?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the penalty can be fixed under the by-law.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—enfranchisement of Indians:

Mr. ARTHURS: Does this apply to all Indians in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS: Certain bands of Indians in Ontario have large capital funds under their control. In many cases the Indians are farming outside of the reserves, and have been, perhaps by common consent, allowed to vote. I understand that, according to legal terms, the word "may" means "shall," and I have no doubt that if this clause is passed and comes to their attention, many of these Indians will ask for and be entitled to receive their share of the capital funds. I do not think it is in the interests of the country that these shares should be paid to them, especially in cases where the amounts are large. The Superintendent General knows the cases which I have in mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nothing obligatory on the Superintendent General. The Indian must not only be willing to surrender his interests and receive his share of the capital funds, but he must make application to be enfranchised; he must have ceased to follow the Indian mode of life, and, most important of all, he must satisfy the Superintendent General that he is self-supporting and fit to be enfranchised. Similar provision was made in the Act heretofore, but it was hedged around by this restraint: that before an Indian could have the privilege of establishing his right to enfranchisement he had to be a landed Indian. That is to say, he had to be in possession of a share of the landed estate of the band. There developed a great number of cases. I have in my hand a long list of Indians who are self-supporting, who follow various lines of life, being druggists, constables, professional singers, actors, missionaries, religious teachers, and so forth, but who, having no landed interest in the reserve, cannot come within the provisions of the Act, and therefore cannot be raised to the status of citizens. This provision is to remove that restraint.

On section 7—illegal celebrations:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will the minister tell us what those illegal celebrations are which are prohibited by this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 149 of the Indian Act says:

> Every Indian or other person who engages in, or assists in celebrating or encourages either directly or indirectly another to celebrate any Indian festival, dance or other ceremony of which the giving away or paying or giving back of money, goods or articles of any sort forms a part, or is a feature, whether such gift of money, goods or articles takes place, before, at or after the celebration of the same, or who engages or assists in any celebration or dance of which the wounding or mutilation of the dead or living body of any human being or animal forms a part or is a feature, is guilty of an indictable offence.

We simply make this an offence subject to proceeding by summary conviction, in order to avoid the expense of proceeding by indictment.

Bill reported, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. T. A. Crerar (Minister of Agriculture), Bill No. 55, to amend the Meats and Canned Foods Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—establishment:

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is the difference between this and the old Act?

Mr. CRERAR: This clause, as it stands in the present Act, reads as follows:

> "Establishment" means any abattoir, packing house, or other premises in which such animals are slaughtered, or in which any parts thereof or products thereof, or fish, or fruit, or vegetables, are prepared for food for export or are stored for export.

The amendment to this section is the addition of the following words after the word "vegetables":

> Or any food or food product which may be named by the Governor in Council.

making the clause read as follows:

> "Establishment" means any abattoir, packing house, or other premises in which such animals are slaughtered, or in which any parts thereof or products thereof, or fish, or fruit, or vegetables, or any food or food product which may be named by the Governor in Council, are prepared for food for export or are stored for export.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is the idea of the amendment?

Mr. NESBITT: Why does the minister confine the provisions to export?

Mr. CRERAR: The amendment is simply an enlargement of the scope of the clause. It provides that any food or food product which may be named by the Governor in Council may be added to those foods enumerated in the clause as it originally stood.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I presume this refers to "boiled dinners" and that sort of thing. Canned mixed-food is exported by several factories, and I presume this refers particularly to them. Mixed food put up in cans is what is called " boiled dinners." Does not the minister know about that?

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the clause could be used to cover that.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister, I understand, says that this is an amendment to the Act, and the Act already provides for places for the preparation of food for home consumption. This amendment applies only to places in which food is prepared for export.

Mr. CRERAR: The Meat and Canned Foods Act was intended to apply only to the foods enumerated that were intended for export or for interprovincial trade. I think the point to which the hon. gentleman refers is covered by municipal and provincial inspection, that is, in relation to foods that are manufactured, say, at the point in which they are consumed. This Act does not apply to such foods, but if such foods are shipped either for export or for interprovincial trade, it does apply to them.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Exports or imports of uninspected articles:

Mr. CRERAR: I may explain that at present the regulations apply only to exported foods; they do not cover imported foods of a similar character. Their purpose, I am told, when originally passed, was to set a standard for Canadian articles exported to foreign markets, in order that we might establish a reputation abroad. But there is this curious anomaly, that there are no similar restrictions on foods imported into Canada, with the result that foods can be imported into this country without any supervision as to their quality. We are now asking for power so that the department may require proper certification of the foods imported into Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Who will carry out this inspection, and where will it be done?

Mr. CRERAR: It is intended to have the customs officials do it. When the goods are entered for import into Canada these officials will see that the proper certificates are attached.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Is the certificate furnished by the American or by the Canadian inspector?

Mr. CRERAR: The certification will have to be satisfactory to the Veterinary Director General or to the Minister of Agriculture, who may accept certification of United States Government officials as to the wholesomeness of the foods manufactured in that country.

Mr. NESBITT: There has been a good deal of talk, and I have no doubt the minister has heard something of it, about the quality of the canned fruit and vegetables put up by our canners for the army. Is there any inspection of these factories at the present time by the Dominion Government? If there is no inspection, there certainly should be.

Mr. CRERAR: There is an inspection by the officials of the Department of Agriculture. The inspector is not located permanently at the point of manufacture, but he can drop in at any hour of any day and examine the goods in the process of manufacture. The British authorities have instituted a very rigid system of inspection of all canned goods for shipment abroad for army purposes. The other day, when we were discussing the resolution on which this Bill is founded, reference was made by an hon. member to a case at Belleville. Curiously enough, I have received a letter from this manufacturer, who had seen the reference to his factory in the newspapers. I have confirmed by inquiry the following, taken from this letter:

> The facts are that all the vegetables manufactured in Canada for the British, French and United States Governments are rigidly inspected first by the Milton Hersey Company, whose headquarters are in Montreal, and who have a very highly trained staff of officials. They place in every factory where these goods are manufactured one or more inspectors sufficient to examine every pound of vegetables before they are manufactured, also during the processing, and after they are manufactured and packed. They stamp every package and every case and every sack in which these goods are shipped or transferred from the manufacturing sub-station to the central packing depot, and nothing can be delivered without the above regulation. The bills of lading and invoices have also to be all stamped by these officials. Then 20 per cent. of the invoice is withheld by the British War Office until the goods reach destination and have passed through a rigid examination and chemical analysis in France, which usually takes about four months after the goods are shipped from Canada, before we receive our pay.

That is the inspection that is carried on by the British Government officials of articles for army purposes. In addition to that, the officials of the Department of Agriculture carry on an inspection which is intended to cover all goods for export.

Mr. NESBITT: The reason I asked was that there was a gentleman here the other day who had a very interesting story to tell about some of these packing houses, and I think he is going to make it public some of these days; it will certainly be interesting to the members and to the minister, and I have no doubt his story is correct. He was accusing the factories of putting up stuff that was not fit to pack.

Mr .CRERAR: I have not, as full an acquaintance with this inspection as I intend to have when I am a little longer in the department. While the inspection is not as perfect as it would be if an inspector were located permanently in each factory to inspect every ounce of vegetable entering into the manufacture of these foods, nevertheless I think it is sufficient to afford a pretty fair check on their quality.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is the department taking any measures for inspecting small factories? There are quite a number of these small factories all over the Dominion, particularly in my province, putting up such foods as I mentioned a few minutes ago—"boiled dinners," which is a mixture of vegetables and meat, a well-balanced ration. These factories are up against very grave difficulties because they are not large enough to be entitled to an inspector. The Government provides that there must be an output of $50,000 or $60,000 worth of goods before an inspector will be appointed for the district. The result is that the small factories are put out of business by not being able to secure inspection. Has the Government received correspondence on that subject, and are they going to take measures to overcome that difficulty, and enable the small factories to compete with the big industry?

Mr. CRERAR: I will look into the point. I am not aware that we have had any correspondence on the subject; I shall make inquiry concerning it. I want to point out, however, that this inspection does not govern in regard to goods consumed in the province where they are manufactured. It concerns only factories which are manufacturing goods for export, or interprovincial trade, and such factories, if they are down in the province the hon. gentleman comes from, have the same facilities for inspection as other factories in other parts of the country.

Section agreed to.

On Section 17—False marking as to name.

Mr. McMASTER: Is there provision in the law for marking the true weight and contents of packages? Subsection 2 provides that no false information concerning the contents of a package should be given.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

I notice on many packages coming from the United States, the words: "This package contains so many ounces," or so many pounds, "exclusive of the package." It seems to me perhaps a rather wise provision to insert, in order that the public may be protected and know that they get what they are paying for.

Mr. CRERAR: Before replying directly to the question, I may say that the only change in this section is the provision that it shall apply to imports as well as exports. There is no provision, as far as I know, for marking on the label the exact weight of the contents of the can. The section merely provides that no package shall be marked with any label, brand or mark which will falsely represent the contents.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it not the intention to apply the inspection to food for local consumption under the Act? I think it would be a wise provision.

Mr. CRERAR: No. This Act is intended to apply to goods manufactured for export or interprovincial trade. The regulation as to the purity of the goods manufactured for local consumption is left to the municipal or provincial authorities, and they have charge of the enforcement of the Adulteration Act, which provides the necessary machinery for protection in the case the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I think the hon. minister is perhaps not quite correct about the Meat Act applying to goods for provincial use. I think the three Maritime Provinces are included in one section. You can export a carcass of pork which has not been inspected from one part of the Maritime Provinces to another, but you cannot export it to Quebec or Ontario.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. gentleman may be right, but I cannot say definitely.

Mr. J. F. REID: I wish to draw the hon. minister's attention to subsection 2, which reads:

(2) No package containing any article subject to inspection under this Act shall be marked with any label, brand or mark which falsely represents the quantity or weight or contents of such package.

In the West we get a very large quantity of canned tomatoes, and, as far as I know, they come very largely if not altogether from somewhere in Ontario. I do not believe we get any from Prince Edward Island. I have not noticed the stamp on the brand, but we certainly get a large quantity of water and a very small quantity of tomatoes in these cans. I hope this measure will apply to canned tomatoes.

Mr. SPINNEY: Is this Bill intended to cover all the fish products, as well as other food?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand, under legislation passed last year or the year previous, that the same provision applies to fish products, but the administration of that part of the Act is under the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Section 17 applies to all fish.

Mr. CRERAR: It applies to fish but that is under the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary Customs buildings and rentals, $3,890,000.

Hon. A. L. SIFTON (Minister of Customs): The amount of these estimates is exactly the same as last year. There has been a transfer of $25,000 from one column to another but the total is the same.

Mr. McMASTER: The cost of collecting the customs revenue has been raised very considerably during the last six years, not merely taken as a whole, but pro rata. I would be glad to know if the minister has any hope to hold out to us that it will not require so much to raise the revenue as has hitherto been found necessary.

Mr. SIFTON: I have shown evidence of not intending to raise the amount by only asking for the same amount as was voted last year. I have hopes that by a rearrangement of some of the work I may be able to make the relative amount, comparing it with the work that is done, less than it has been at some times in the past.

Mr. McMASTER: In the county that I know most about, it cost about twice as much the year before last to raise the customs revenue as it did during the year 1911-12. I never heard that the officers were over-worked. I remember having the figures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916, before me and they showed that there were about twice as many officers, and that about twice as large an amount in salaries was paid during that year as in 1911-12. I draw the attention of the minister to this fact because we are in hopes that in this era of economy we may see a very substantial improvement. I think there is room for it in certain parts of the country.

Mr. SIFTON: I will take great pleasure in looking into the conditions existing in my hon. friend's county to ascertain if there is the extravagance of which he complains. It does not go through the whole service, because in looking over the lists of salaries I do not think they are at all commensurate with the amount of work done. But if anything of that kind is found to exist in my hon. friend's county, I will try and see that the customs officers in that county shall be kept down to a reasonable rate if he insists upon it.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not want the minister to labour under any misunderstanding. I am not complaining so much about the rate of salary that is paid as the fact that it takes now about nine men to do the work that five did before, and although the nine men belong to the party that used to be called the Conservative party and the five who formerly occupied these positions belonged to the Liberal party, I do not think that the difference in intelligence would account for the fact that it takes nine men now to do the work that five did before.

Mr. SIFTON: Are the five still there?

Mr. McMASTER: No, the five disappeared, of course.

Mr. DUFF: In the minister's reply to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) he left the impression that this extravagance in the customs service was confined to one county in the Dominion.

Mr. SIFTON: All I said was that that was the first case that I had heard of.

Mr. DUFF: I think that perhaps every other member representing a constituency in this Dominion would say the same thing as the hon. member for Brome does. I do not wish to criticize the minister, because he has only been in charge of the department for a few months, but if he will investigate the work of the department at the different customs ports in all parts of Canada he will find that the service is overmanned and that hundreds of thousands of dollars could be saved. I would ask the minister to make an investigation during the coming summer, and I venture to say he will find a great many customs offices where there are twice as many men employed as are necessary to do the work.

Mr. EDWARDS: I doubt very much the accuracy of the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Duff), who has just taken his seat, and by the hon. member for Brome. It may be that there are certain localities where the salaries paid in proportion to the revenue collected are greater than they were a year or two ago, but, without having the figures before me at the present moment, I venture the assertion that during the last fiscal year, taking the Dominion over, it costs less per dollar, or per hundred dollars of revenue for collecting than it did in previous years. I doubt if the hon. member for Brome can substantiate the statement that the cost pro rata is greater than it was a year or two ago. My information is that, taking the country generally, it cost less in the last fiscal year to collect the customs revenue than it has cost in any year for a number of years back.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not want to leave the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) under any wrong impression as to what I did say. I was not comparing the cost of collecting the revenue in the fiscal year before last with what it cost two or three years ago. I was comparing it with the fiscal year 1911-12. I have not the figures under my hand as to what it cost to maintain the customs house in the county which I have the honour to represent, but I know that I am close to the exact, literal truth when I say that the number of customs house officers in that county was doubled and that the salaries were about one hundred per cent more than they were during the fiscal year 1911-12. I remember looking into the matter during the last campaign. That is the matter that I was bringing to the attention of the minister. I do not believe that there is greater human depravity in Brome than elsewhere, I am sure that the condition is widespread and that the customs has grown to be an overmanned service. I do not believe that under the former Administration, which was in power in 1911-12, the custom houses were in any degree undermanned, but I believe that there have been increases which have not been necessary, and I think this is a matter for the Minister of Customs to look into.

10 p.m.

Mr. SIFTON: I certainly will do so.

Mr. TWEEDIE: If the hon. member for Brome has any complaint to make in regard to the number of customs houses in his constituency, I would ask the minister to close some of them, and open some additional offices out in Alberta. We have a great shortage of them throughout that province, and I have not noticed any great extravagance on the part of the minister as evidenced by any desire to open up even the necessary customs houses in that province. There is one point there, one of the busiest industrial centres we have, Drumheller, a large coal mining centre, and to clear their goods the people have to go to Saskatoon or to Calgary. The minister might close up some of the Brome customs houses and apply the money so saved to the opening of a custom house at that point in Alberta. Another matter in which I do not think the Minister of Customs in this Government, or the late Government, could be charged with extravagance is the manner in which they have paid the employees of that department, and this remark applies equally to employees in all branches of the public service. There are many clerks working in the custom house in Calgary for a salary which is not commensurate with the services they render, or in keeping with conditions under which they have to live at the present time. We find some working for $50, $60, or $75 per month, and a married man cannot possibly maintain himself and his family comfortably on the wages which, in some instances, they receive. I think it is the duty of the Government in that department, and all other branches of the service, to increase the wages of the civil servants to a point where they can live decently and comfortably. I realize as much as does any member in this House that we must administer the affairs of the country economically, but I do not believe it is fair to the civil servants in the Dominion that we should practise economy at their expense in an endeavour in some degree to finance the heavy burden which is placed upon the country. Many men leave the Civil Service to receive wages twenty-five, thirty and even fifty per cent higher than they got from the Government. My view has always been that the Government should pay wages equivalent to those paid for similar service elsewhere, and by that means they would get as good a class of men as private individuals or corporations obtain for service in their various lines of business. I know of no reason why the civil servant is not entitled to the remuneration which his service commands, and he should not be discriminated against simply because he is working for the Government. I trust that the Minister of Customs will take this matter up, and give an increase of wages to all the employees of his department throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Then there is another condition to which I wish to call the attention of the minister and the Government; that is, the question of the permanent service. At the outbreak of the war we had a great many men leaving the service to go to the front, their places being filled by substitutes. The Government has undertaken to hold their positions for these men when they return from the front. But the point is this: that a substitute who is not on the permanent list is doing the work. Some have been working for three or four years, and not being on the permanent list they are consequently not entitled to an annual increase in wages or salary. While I would not want to see any man put on the permanent list to displace a man who has gone to the front, I think that, while a man is rendering service to his country in the Civil Service he should be entitled, meanwhile, to the benefit of all the conditions enjoyed by the man he is replacing. In other words, if there is an annual increase of $100 a year coming to the permanent man, the substitute should get an annual increase, and if there are other conditions to which the permanent man is entitled, the benefit should likewise go to the substitute. If the Government will take up this question and give these substitutes the annual increase which would normally go to the permanent civil servant, and give civil servants a general increase of salary all over this country, they will do something to which the civil servants are entitled.

Mr. JACOBS: I notice in Volume IV of the Auditor General's Report, ZZ p. 142, there is the following item:

Collectors of Customs, Quebec: customs duties $166,957.82.

This evidently represents sums paid by the Department of Militia to the Customs Department on goods brought into the country. Immediately following that item I see another, as follows:

Colley & Scott, Quebec: customs charges, $18,108.82.

This firm, I understand, are customs brokers who have charged the Government the sum I have just mentioned for passing these entries for the Militia Department. I understand that in the year previous the amount they received was something over $12,000. I would like to know why it is that the Government is paying out these very large sums of money to brokers for passing the entries from one department to the other. This work, I think, might reasonably have been done by young men in the employ either of the Customs Department or of the Militia Department. But that outsiders should receive the large sum of $18,108.82 for what is practically a mere matter of bookkeeping, from one department to another, taking the money from one pocket and putting it into another, on the face seems to be wasteful extravagance.

Mr. SIFTON: The payment was made by the Militia Department, not by the Customs Department. I have no knowledge in regard to it.

Mr. JACOBS: As I understand it, the sum of $166,957.82 is supposed to be received by the Customs Department from the Militia Department.

Mr. SIFTON: Certainly.

Mr. JACOBS: That is a most extraordinary thing. The Government is doing business with itself. Why the Department of Militia should pay to the Department of Customs this sum, I fail to understand. It may be argued that it is a matter of bookkeeping. But why a firm of customs brokers should come in at this psychological juncture and take out of the coffers of this country over $18,000 surpasses my understanding. It may be that, for the purpose of reference, it is necessary that the Militia Department should pay to the Customs Department certain sums of money. We are not "in" anything, and we are not "out" anything. But why customs brokers should receive $18,000 for this, certainly seems to me a matter which requires an explanation.

Mr. SIFTON: That is quite possible, Mr. Chairman, but not from the Customs Department. We did not pay it. I have not any idea why the Militia Department paid it. The Minister of Militia would possibly know.

Mr. JACOBS: That is not the point I am making, Mr. Chairman. The point is: why should one department pay any money to the other department at all? The entries could be made in the books. That does not concern me.

Mr. SIFTON: I think probably the hon. member is right, that the actual money did not pass into the customs at Quebec. Duties that are chargeable to departments of Government are charged in that way. It is quite likely that the Militia Department gave the Customs Department a cheque on the Receiver General, but no money was actually paid.

Mr. JACOBS: That being the case, why do we pay over $18,000 to customs brokers for passing the entry?

Mr. SIFTON: That is a point that I do not know anything about.

Mr. JACOBS: We are here for information.

Mr. SIFTON: The hon. gentleman cannot expect me to give information about everything that is done by the Departments of Militia and Public Works. If they paid out $18,000 that they should not have paid out, I have no doubt that they will explain it. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. FIELDING: Some years ago all departments were supposed to receive free of duty any goods which they required. It was thought that some abuses had arisen under that system. I do not say that they had arisen; at any rate, it was thought that the system was capable of abuse, and in a revision of the tariff for which I was in some measure responsible, provision was made that all departments should account to the Customs Department for duty on goods imported. As to the brokerage, I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Attention has been drawn to the fact that $18,000 was paid to customs brokers—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The minister has already stated that this payment was made by the Militia Department. It is entered in the report of the Auditor General in connection with militia expenditures, and I do not think that hon. gentlemen are in order in bringing the matter before the committee at this stage.

Mr. SIFTON: I am willing to give all the information I can, and anything that I do not know I am willing to make a guess at for the purpose of giving information. I do not know anything about this, however, and it would not be worth the while even trying to guess.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I wish to draw attention to a fallacy in the argument of the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in connection with the cost of collecting customs duties. The cost of collecting customs duties should not now be as large in proportion to the amount collected as it was when goods were very much cheaper. The fact that customs receipts are large is due in part to the increase in the price of goods, not entirely to the proportion of a larger quantity of goods. Most of the duties are ad valorem—few of them are specific duties —consequently, the higher value of the goods the greater the amount of the revenue. But it takes the same amount of clerical work to collect that revenue, whether it is less or more; consequently my hon. friend's argument is not absolutely sound.

Mr. EDWARDS: I admit the soundness of my hon. friend's argument, but I suppose he will admit, on the other hand, that we should take into consideration also, in arriving at the proportion of cost, the higher salaries paid.

Mr. JACOBS: In view of the fact that it cost $18,000 to put through customs entries the duty on which amounted to $166,000, would it not be well to consider the advisability of reverting to the old system referred to by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)? The various departments of the Government would not then be compelled to pay these large sums by way of brokerage charges.

Mr. FIELDING: The change in the system simply required that the Customs Department should receive, say, from the Railway Department, ordinary payments for duty. As to what the Railway Department does regarding brokerage charges, that is quite another matter.

Mr. SIFTON: I shall make inquiry, and if, as the hon. gentleman suggests, there are a large number of similar items, I will recommend very strongly to the Government that a change be made in one respect or in the other.

Mr. PEDLOW: What is the revenue at the port of Renfrew?

Mr. SIFTON: That will be found in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. PEDLOW: The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has said that customs officers in some parts of the country are overpaid.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not say that customs officers were overpaid; I said that in some customs offices there were more officers than the work required.

Mr. PEDLOW: I accept my hon. friend's correction; he says that some of the customs offices are overmanned. But the customs office at Renfrew is not overmanned, and, in my judgment, the collector of customs there is underpaid. His present salary is not in proportion to the revenue received at that port and to the salary which he received five or six years ago.

Mr. SIFTON: I shall be glad at any time to give the hon. member all the information he requires with regard to that or any other port in which he is interested. He is right in regard to quite a number of ports. Business has increased much more largely in some places than in others, and in some places no advances have been made in payments to officers. A number of things of that kind come up in a department like this, having regard to the fact that our country is growing all the time, and it will be necessary to make a constant effort to keep them on a fair basis. So long as I remain in charge of this department I shall make that effort. I do not expect to be entirely successful in all respects; that would be difficult in a country like Canada, which is spread over so large a territory. In a number of places where the salaries paid appear to be high, the reason may be found in the fact that the officers there are engaged not only in the collection of revenue, but in the prevention of smuggling as well.

Mr. PEDLOW: I repeat that the salary of the customs collector at Renfrew is not at all in proportion to the revenue received at that port, the business of which has increased four or five times over during the last five or six years. A case of this kind deserves the consideration of the minister.

Mr. CHISHOLM: In my county there are two vacancies, and I wish to know the policy of the Government in respect to filling those vacancies.

Mr. SIFTON: It is very easy to answer that question. At the present time the policy of the Customs Department, in the case of a vacancy, is to send a memorandum in regard to it to the Civil Service Commission and to ask them to fill it. That is all the connection we have with the filling of vacancies anywhere in the Customs Department in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. JACOBS: Was that policy followed in connection with the collectorship of customs in the port of Montreal?

Mr. SIFTON: No; that appointment was made the week before the present system was introduced.

[Mr. Pedlow.]

Mr. CHISHOLM: I wish to call the attention of the minister to a certain condition in my county. At Port Hastings the collector of customs died some months ago. He was a respectable old gentleman who had given satisfaction for the past twenty years. For the last two years he had been an invalid, and his son did the work of the office. One would suppose that the son would have been allowed to remain in the office until a permanent successor was appointed, because he had been in the office for nearly two years, and was managing it very well. It is surprising, however, that inside of a month after the old gentleman's death this young man was dismissed and another man was appointed. The only qualification that this other man had was that he was a very active politician. He is a man of seventy years of age, a very fine gentleman, but he certainly does not possess any qualification for the office to the degree that the young man has grown from experience. If it is the policy of the department to exercise patronage as in the past, I have, of course, no fault to find with the appointment.

Mr. PARENT: What year did that happen?

Mr. CHISHOLM: About a month ago. If it is the policy of the department to do away with patronage, they are, so far as the port of Hastings is concerned, going the wrong way about the matter. I cannot see why this man was appointed, not permanently, I presume, and why this young man, who had the experience and who was the only support of a widowed mother, was dismissed.

Mr. EDWARDS: How old is the young man?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Twenty-four or twenty-five.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is he healthy?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why is he not overseas?

Mr. CHISHOLM: He is probably medically unfit for service or exempted for some reason.

Mr. SIFTON: This particular appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission. I have no reason in the world for thinking they made this appointment because the man was a partisan. I do not know what motive actuated the Civil Service Commission, but they are entirely outside of political partisanship, and away above any such motives as that.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I really can scarcely accept that explanation. I have been too long in this House not to know a little about these things, and I would respectfully ask the minister to be good enough to look into this particular case. If it is the policy of this department to exercise patronage, to follow the course that has been pursued in the past, I am not finding fault; but if they pretend to get rid of patronage, and if at the same time they stand behind the Civil Service Commission and charge that commission with doing these acts, and still expect the people to look upon their policy as that of attempting to get rid of patronage, they are making a mistake, they are simply fooling with the matter. In this particular case, it is clear that this man was appointed for no other reason than that he was an active politician; I care not who appointed him, that is immaterial to me. I know the facts. I know he was appointed simply because he was an opponent of mine. I find no fault with him for that. So far as his qualifications are concerned, it would not reasonably be expected that a man of seventy years of age would, in an office of that kind, give as much satisfaction as a bright young man who had at least two years' experience in the office. For that reason I would respectfully ask the minister to be a little serious about this case, because I want to be able to tell my people why this appointment was made. I am telling the people of my constituency that the new Government that is now in power is supposed to have destroyed patronage for all time.

Mr. SIFTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am endeavouring to get them to believe that, although it is very hard for me to do so; I have a serious task upon my hands. If I am going to be met by such conduct as this, I think possibly I had better give up the endeavour. In the meantime, I shall await the minister's investigation of this case, and possibly I shall be able to go back to my constituency and continue the work I have been doing during the past month—viz., writing my people that this Government is doing away with patronage.

Mr. SIFTON: So far as that is concerned I was perfectly serious, and I would not for a moment make a remark, either humorously or otherwise that would prevent the hon. gentleman from carrying on the good work he has started in the education of the people who have sent him here. I do not think he could devote his time between sessions to anything better than to educating his people along the line he has mentioned.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Help me along.

Mr. SIFTON. So far as this particular appointment is concerned, I gave the hon. member all the information I had. I have not the slightest idea as to the name of the man who has been given the position. I do know the appointment was not recommended by me; it was not recommended by anybody connected with the Customs Department, and it was made on the sole responsibility of the Civil Service Commission. Since the passage of the Order in Council which was laid upon the table of the House a few weeks ago, I have made to the Civil Service Commission of this country no recommendations in respect to a single appointment in the Customs Department, and I do not intend to do so. I have not seen one gentleman connected with the Civil Service Commission, and, except socially, I do not expect to do so.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Customs wants good men appointed to the Customs Department in this country; but when he washes his hands of the appointments by throwing the whole burden upon the Civil Service Commission sitting at Ottawa, that is not quite fair to the country. I do not know whether the minister is in a position to give us the information, but I should like to know how the Civil Service Commission, sitting in the city of Ottawa, can secure sufficient information to appoint a competent collector of customs for the port of Port Hastings, Nova Scotia.

Mr. SIFTON: That would really be a matter for them to decide themselves. If under the old system I were going to appoint a collector of customs for Port Hastings, Nova Scotia, I would make inquiry from the men whom I happened to know who live in that neighbourhood and who were most competent to express a proper opinion. I would endeavour to get for the position of collector of customs the very best man of the available material in that neighbourhood and I would appoint him. I have no doubt in the world that the Civil Service Commission will go the same way about the matter, except that I presume they are going, as soon as they get the matter in proper working order, to hold examinations, which I probably would not have done.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I should like to know something about the examination. When is this examination going to be held, and how are the men who are anxious to secure this position or similar positions to know about this examination?

Mr. SIFTON: I did accidentally hear something in regard to that matter, and I am willing to give all the information I have. The Civil Service Commission are going to hold, at least twice a year, examinations in every reasonably large town in the Dominion of Canada. They will advertise those examinations considerably in advance so as to give everybody an opportunity of trying them. The Civil Service Commission have already started advertising for applicants for certain positions. I noticed the other day an advertisement for an Indian Agent and for other officials who were required. So far as I know they are going to make every effort to put the Civil Service in the best possible shape. I have no doubt that temporarily there will be trouble owing to the bulk of the work thus thrown upon them so suddenly, but I have no doubt also that they intend to work with the honest idea of putting the Service within as short a time as possible upon a basis where merit will be the sole requisite for office.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I notice that the building at the corner of Queen and Elgin streets, formerly the Grand Union Hotel, is now occupied by the Customs Department. Who is the owner of that building and what was the price paid for it?

Mr. SIFTON: I have not the remotest idea. These buildings are rented through the Public Works Department, not through the Customs. These are purely temporary premises. Any buildings in the nature of permanent premises are either built or rented by the Public Works Department.

Mr. MOLLOY: I understand that the old collector of customs at Emerson, in the county of Provencher, was dismissed a short time ago. Who took his place?

Mr. SIFTON: He was superannuated, I think. Nobody has been appointed in his place, but I have sent a man there temporarily from the Winnipeg office until the commission appoint a man; that is my recollection.

Salaries and travelling expenses of Inspectors of ports and of other officers on inspection and preventive service, including salaries and expenses in connection with the Board of Customs, $410,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. SIFTON: It is largely made up of the statutory increases in connection with the inspectors. The travelling expenses have also increased considerably, one of the vessels mentioned in a subsequent item having been taken over compulsorily, and that has necessitated more expense in connection with other means of doing the same work.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the minister made any investigation as to whether it will be possible to reduce the number of his officers? In my riding a man was appointed after the election of 1911, and he has been drawing a salary ever since and is drawing it to-day, though he has nothing at all to do. If the minister wants his name I shall be pleased to send it to him in writing to-morrow.

Mr. SIFTON: If my hon. friend will mail it to me to-morrow I will look into the case with the greatest of pleasure. I have heard of a few odd cases of that kind, and as soon as this session is over I am calculating to devote a considerable time to looking into the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments with a view to eliminating useless expenditure—not to get rid of men if they are necessary, but to put them where they will do the most good.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: There is no question that the Customs officers are underpaid, and I would suggest to the minister that he eliminate all the unnecessary men in his department and use the money thereby saved to increase the wages of the men left in the service.

Miscellaneous—Printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, etc., for various ports of entry, express charges on samples, stationery and forms, legal expenses, premiums on guarantee bonds, and uniforms for Customs Officers, $180,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I want to draw to the attention of the minister a matter which probably he has noticed himself, and that is the way in which the flag is abused. Instead of being hauled down at sundown, flags are left up in all sorts of weather and often present a very tattered appearance, which does not add to the dignity of the nation, and also means a certain amount of waste. This goes on continually on public buildings. I have seen flags run up on the flagpole and allowed to stay there until practically blown to pieces; that is not the way the national emblem should be treated.

Mr. SIFTON: It certainly should not. There is nothing, I think, better recognized than the fact that the flag should come down at sundown. That has been the custom for a great many years now, and I shall certainly take occasion to look into the matter.

Mr. MORPHY: Has the minister's attention been drawn to the very flimsy and inferior quality of the bunting in the flags? They frequently tear to pieces in one day in a big wind.

Mr. SIFTON: No, it has not.

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service, $75,000.

Mr. PARENT: What is the reason for this increase?

Mr. SIFTON: It is a decrease.

Mr. PARENT: What is the reason for the decrease?

Mr. SIFTON: Where the hon. gentleman shows so conclusively that he is in earnest in regard to this, and that he wants whatever is wrong on either side to be corrected, I am delighted to give him information. The decrease is because we cannot get the boat.

Salaries of officers and inspectors of Excise, and to provide for increase depending on the result of Excise examinations, $550,768.25.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether I am in order, but it has struck me that perhaps the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn) has just come in in response to a telepathic call from the Minister of Customs.

Mr SIFTON: Oh, no, I would not make such a blunder as that. There is a decrease in this and other Excise items partially owing to the possibility of joining some of the offices in such a way as to decrease expense. I have not been able in connection with these estimates—I think it is best to admit it frankly—to make the changes that I would have been able to make if I had had a little more time since taking over the Department of Inland Revenue, temporarily at least. But there will be very considerable changes in the way of uniting numerous small offices for reasons of economy.

For extra duty-pay at large distilleries and other factories, $16,000.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are these distilleries in connection with the Imperial Munitions Board?

Mr. SIFTON: The distilleries are still in existence and doing work, and they have to be watched just the same.

Mr. LEMIEUX: More than ever.

Preventive Service Contingencies, $18,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What are these contingencies generally?

Mr. SIFTON: The expenses of all the preventive officers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Travelling expenses?

Mr. SIFTON: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he should look over the last batch of appointments made by his immediate predecessor in office. Last year, before the elections, and before the Civil Service Act was amended, Mr. Sevigny made quite a number of appointments. I would like the hon. gentleman to comb the appointments as much as possible, because Mr. Sevigny gave very poor information to the House when he had to defend his estimates. I think my hon. friend, with his keen eye, will see to it that no officer who is not wanted for the public service will remain in it.

Mr. SIFTON: I will go further. Any one who is not needed will go.

Preventive Service Salaries, $130,000.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I have two other names which I will send to my hon. friend of preventive officers in his department drawing salaries and doing nothing.

Mr. McCREA: I am glad to hear the hon. minister say he is going to curtail expenses and that where men are not needed he will dispense with their services. In the customs at Sherbrooke there are three men, if not four, doing the work one man used to do prior to 1911, each of them getting more pay than the one who did the whole of the work in 1911. I do not think the service has increased in proportion to the increased assistance. I would be glad if the hon. minister would tell me how many men are connected with the customs service at Sherbrooke.

Mr. SIFTON: I could not tell you. They are all in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. McCREA: I think there are four men now doing the work.

Mr. SIFTON: It ought to be well done.

Mr. McCREA: What is everybody's business is nobody's business, and, as a rule, in such cases the work is not well done.

To provide for stamps, stationery, salaries, etc., in connection with War Tax, $75,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether the stamping of cheques falls within the department of the Minister of Customs, but the matter is in the Estimates. In regard to the matter of stamps placed on cheques, would it not be well for the minister to suggest to the banking world of Canada that, instead of having stamps that have to be affixed to cheques by the customers, they should issue, as they do in the Old Country, books of cheques already stamped for the use of private persons? That would be a convenience to the public and I think the suggestion from the Minister of Customs might have some effect on the banking world.

Mr. SIFTON: A great deal of it is being done now by arrangement between the customers and the banks.

Mr. McMASTER: I have seen dividend cheques coming from large companies on stamped paper, but I have not seen banks giving them to their private customers.

Mr. SIFTON: I will be glad to draw the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance, who does most of the business with the banking world. I have not much to do with the banks myself, and I do not know that they would take my advice.

Mr. McMASTER: The Finance Minister, being under obligations to the banks, is sometimes not in as good a position to deal with them as the Minister of Customs would be.

Mr. SIFTON: I do not owe them anything.

Mr. KENNEDY: I was not in the House when the question of overtime for customs men was discussed. Is there any increase for the men doing overtime?

Mr. SIFTON: No increase in this item. The item is in bulk. There has been some complaint in regard to the rate paid for overtime, but in most cases it appears to work out fairly evenly. There are some cases in which the work has been much more than it should have been, with the growth of business, and probably it is a little unfair to some, but the bulk of them are receiving fairly good treatment, as far as overtime is concerned.

Mr. KENNEDY: The only point I had in mind was in regard to the rate for overtime in the customs at our port, which is 30 cents an hour. The average man on the railroad as a labourer gets 40 to 45 cents an hour for overtime. When you consider the high cost of living, it is unfair that the man in the customs should be asked to work for 30 cents an hour when the railway labouring men get 40 to 45 cents.

Mr. SIFTON: On its face, it does not look right, but that statement does not cover all the circumstances of the case. The man may be working a couple of hours overtime, but he is drawing a salary of $1,000 a year for his work during the other hours of the day, during which time, perhaps, he is doing very little work. I do not say he is idle all the time, but there is part of the time he does not do very much. So that really, considering the work he does, he is not treated badly.

Mr. KENNEDY: The men at my port are busy most of the time.

Mr. KENNEDY: The men at my port are busy most of the time.

Mr. PEDLOW: Regarding inland revenue stamps, I would suggest that those stamps be used for that purpose and nothing else. I cannot understand how you can strike a balance as between the Post Office and Inland Revenue Departments, under the present system. I think it would be wise to keep these two departments entirely distinct and separate, and postage stamps should not be used for inland revenue purposes, nor on cheques. If you made a hard and fast rule of that kind you would be able to tell, at the end of the year, just what revenue you derive from the Post Office Department, and the revenue obtained from the Inland Revenue Department. Under the present system it is mere guess work.

Mr. SIFTON: No doubt in regard to that. That provision was put in the statute a year or so ago, and, in order to make a change, an amendment to the Act would be required. I have already brought that matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the Taxes Acts. The Department of Customs merely collects. The Finance Department arranges how much we are to collect, and all we have to do is to collect it. But the question raised has already been brought to attention, and I understand an Act may be introduced dealing with the matter.

Mr. EULER: In connection with the collection of customs, I should have asked a question when the excise items were discussed. At what point does the collection of excise take place? Is it after the product has been completed and goes into storage in the distillery, or does the collection take place at the time that the product leaves the distillery and when it is sold?

Mr. SIFTON: Nearly all the large warehouses are bonded warehouses and when the product is manufactured it is placed in a bonded warehouse. The duty is only paid when it is taken out for sale. Of course, they can take it out for other purposes if they see fit and put it in another warehouse, but it is usually left until pretty nearly the time when it is required for sale or consumption.

Mr. EULER: Is the minister cognizant of the fact that in a certain distillery in Waterloo some of the product went out, not by the usual channels, but that about $10,000 worth of whiskey was actually stolen from that distillery? In that particular case was the department able to collect excise on the amount that was abstracted?

Mr. SIFTON: I have no knowledge of the case but there is no doubt that the distillery would have to pay the same duty on that stuff as if they had sold it themselves.

To pay collectors of customs for duty collected by them, $5,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What is that for?

Mr. SIFTON: This is an item that we shall probably be able to get along without in the future, when we amalgamate the small offices. It is put in for the purpose of saving money. There were places where a small amount of inland revenue work was done, and instead of paying a man especially for that work we paid collectors of customs ten per cent on the amount collected I think it is limited to $200. We do the same thing in the Customs Department in connection with the post office. Occasionally we pay a postmaster instead of appointing a customs officer to collect the revenue.

Provisional allowance of not more than $150 each to officers in Manitoba and west, $12,000.

Mr. TOBIN: Why this increase to officers in Manitoba and the West?

Mr. SIFTON: It is not an increase; it has been in for a number of years.

Mr. TOBIN: What is the reason for it?

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. SIFTON: The reason that it was put in was the very much larger cost of living in that neighbourhood at that time, and even yet, in connection with rent and various things of that kind. It is in all the departments practically. It only amounts to $12,000.

Mr. TOBIN: Generally speaking, the cost of living in Ontario and Quebec and other provinces is about as high as it is in the West. The minister should make this increase general.

Mr. SIFTON: Rents are not as high yet except in large cities.

Mr. TOBIN: Is it because of high living in the West?

Mr. SIFTON: In some cases.

Weights and measures, gas and electric light inspection,—rent, fuel, travelling expenses, postage, stationery, etc., for weights and measures, $90,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the minister continuing the policy of the department with reference to the metric system?

Mr. SIFTON: I have not really adopted any policy in connection with that yet.

Salaries of inspectors and assistant inspectors of gas and electricity, $85,000.

Mr. KENNEDY: I notice there is a decrease of $8,500 here. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. SIFTON: There are several decreases in connection with these Estimates. It was found that the officers were not absolutely essential. Occasonally one will even die to help us out of a hole.

Provisional allowance of not more than $150 each to officers in Manitoba and west, for gas and electric light, $4,000.

Mr. TOBIN: I cannot understand why the minister allowe this increase to men in the West and does not allow it to men in the East. You may have the high cost of living in the West, but the cost of living has increased in the East also.

Mr. SIFTON: This is not a new item and it is put in on account of the high cost of living. It has been in for ten or fifteen years.

Mr. TOBIN: I know, but we have a new Government and we expect it to improve upon the methods of the old Government.

Mr. SIFTON: You do not expect me to cut down the salaries of these underpaid officials?

Mr. TOBIN: No, we expect you to treat people all the same.

Mr. EULER: What is the object of making a special arrangement for inspectors in Manitoba—to provide for the higher cost of living in the West?

Mr. SIFTON: Yes.

Mr. EULER: I would respectfully submit that the cost of living in the East, certainly in Western Ontario is fully as high as it is in the West.

Mr. SIFTON: I am very sorry to hear that.

Mr. EULER: If anything I believe it is in favour of Manitoba to-day.

Export of electric power, $1,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the policy of my hon. friend with regard to the export of power? I see there is a great agitation around Toronto about the hydro-electric and other questions relating to electrical power. The last report of Mr. White, of the Conservation Commission, deals in a very interesting way with this subject. Mr. White says that one of the most effective weapons in Canada's hands, in case, for instance, the United States sought to put an embargo on coal, is our wealth of electrical power. Mr. White suggests that we should restrict the exportation of power and that the Government should take means to secure for the public benefit all the water powers on the river St. Lawrence. I said a word about that the other day to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) but he seemed to think that the question was dead and that it had died long ago. Well, I think he is labouring under a misapprehension.

Mr. CARVELL: I think my hon. friend must have misunderstood me if he thought I said it was dead. I said that he need not lie awake at nights if he thought we were going to give away Canadian rights.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad my hon. friend has not misunderstood me. At all events, I think the Government should be wide awake on this question. There are interests presently at work at Washington and Ottawa to secure the Long Sault water power. Take the case of Montreal—I think I gave the figures the other day in the House. We have splendid water powers which can be developed and which would give the industries of that city all the power required, and much more. I find that some of the power developed around Montreal is being exported to the United States to the detriment of Montreal industries. Now, there may be some other occasion when we can discuss this question further, but I wish simply to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and of his colleagues in the Government to the necessity of being very careful not to jeopardize the interests of Canada in those water powers, but to keep for ourselves this effective weapon in case it may be needed against, say, an embargo on coal.

Mr. MORPHY: From what point this power is exported? The item is for the export of electric power, and represents only a very small sum, but the principle should be considered by the House.

Mr. SIFTON: This is purely an item for the cost of operation of that particular branch. It has nothing to do with the power that is actually exported. All the power exported, so far as this department is concerned, is exported from the neighbourhood of Montreal. There is only the one permit, so far as I know. Does the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) know of any other?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a portion of the Niagara power which is exported to the United States.

Mr. SIFTON: That is done by international agreement, and is a settled policy that this department could not interfere with.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that. But there was an agitation made by Buffalo interests to secure more of that power.

Mr. SIFTON: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And there have been many interviews between the federal authorities, the Buffalo interests and the Hydro Electric on that very question. The interests in the United States are looking for the opportunity to capture as much of our power as possible. That has some bearing on this item, although it does not bear exactly on the question of conservation, but the minister is indirectly connected with this subject.

Mr. CARVELL: As my hon. friend directed his remarks to myself, perhaps he will allow me one question, just to test him out. Suppose that some capitalist came along and said: We are willing to furnish all the money necessary to dam the St. Lawrence river at the Long Sault, and the United States will take its half of the power developed, and Canada will take its half, would my hon. friend have any objections to the United States getting its half under such conditions, or would he rather see the power going to waste rather than have any of it exported?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not studied the plan which is proposed.

Mr. CARVELL: Neither have I. I am just asking the question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If we could not develop that power without constructing a dam which would infringe on American territory, then I would say that such a plan as proposed by my hon. friend would be the best agreement possible.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope my hon. friend will realize that you cannot construct a dam unless it extends across the river, and it must touch the American side and the Candian side. If you construct a dam, it is possible to have one half of the power developed on the American side, and one half on the Canadian side. Would my hon. friend look upon that as an international catastrophe, or as being of some benefit to both countries?

Sir SAM HUGHES: There are some places in the St. Lawrence river where a dam could be constructed between the Canadian side and an island, without interfering with navigation.

Mr. ROBB: When the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) asks that question, he should not address himself to this side of the House. The Minister of Public Works has been a long while in Parliament, and, no doubt, he remembers the time when we sat until the grey dawn discussing just such a question——

Mr. CARVELL: And the next day, and the next night as well.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend should have turned to his friend on the right (Sir Sam Hughes), who led the opposition to the very plan that has been mentioned.

Mr. CARVELL: I was only asking as a matter of information.

Mr. ROBB: I might remind the House and the Minister of Public Works that the very gentleman, who had opposed the development of power for exportation to the United States, had scarcely taken office until the government of which he was a member, immediately concluded a contract whereby permission was granted to the Cedar Rapids Power Company to export power to Massena, N. Y., and I am told that there is now 90,000 horsepower from the Cedar Rapids power-house on the St. Lawrence river, between Coteau and the Cedars, being exported to the United States to drive machinery at Massena, and the permission to export that power was given by the previous government which had in the Cabinet a gentleman who had fought a similar proposition advanced by the Government in 1909 or 1910.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman reminds me that I have been in the House a long time. I remember the occasion he refers to distinctly. There was a proposal —not a proposal, but a discussion—which arose out of some rather unimportant rights on the Canadian side, but the discussion developed along the line of damming the St. Lawrence river where it is an international stream. That is not the case at the Cedar Rapids. That is a purely Canadian water-power, and as a matter of policy the former Government decided to allow certain capitalists to develop that water-power and export a certain amount of power to the United States. That is a matter which is under the control of the Canadian Government. I do not know what the conditions are exactly, but it is our property, and the export can be discontinued if necessary. But I am coming back to the question that my hon. friend put up to me about the Long Sault.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of course, if we have to dam partly on Canadian territory and partly on American territory, and if we can divide the resulting energy between Canada and the United States, certainly it is a good arrangement. But that is not the trouble. My hon. friend knows perfectly well what was the kernel of the whole question some years ago. I think that the men behind that scheme were mostly all Americans who wanted to get from the Government power to dam the St. Lawrence on both sides and to direct which way the power would go. That is where the objection was taken.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me one more question.

Mr. SIFTON: That has nothing to do with my estimates. I assure the hon. gentleman that so far as the export of power from this country to the United States is concerned, this Department will give special attention to the interests of Canadians first.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) whether he justifies the proposal he made some years ago to dam the St. Lawrence at the Sault rapids, under which five per cent of the water would come to Canada and ninety-five per cent would go to the United States?

Mr. ROBB: I do not remember that I made any such proposal.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sifton, the House adjourned at 11.21 p.m.

Wednesday, April 24, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council) presented the second report of the Select Special Committee appointed to consider and report upon the Pension Board and Pension Regulations for disabled and other soldiers; recommending that it be given power to print its proceedings from day to day.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell, the report was concurred in.

VACANCY IN ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF GLENGARRY AND STORMONT.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Glengarry and Stormont by the decease of John McMartin, Esquire.

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the name of Mr. Nicholson (Algoma) be transferred from the Committee on Public Accounts to that of Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; and that the name of Mr. Campbell be transferred from the Committee on Marine and Fisheries to that of Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

BOLO PASHA.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Is the Government aware that in a report from Perley Morse & Co., Accountants, of 61 Broadway, New York, to Merton E. Lewis, Attorney General of New York State, it was disclosed that Bolo Pasha, who was sentenced to death in Paris for treason, had transferred the sum of $170,068.03 from his account in the Royal Bank of Canada to J. P. Morgan & Co.?
2. Has the Government taken any steps to investigate the dealings of the said Bolo Pasha with the said Bank, or with any person or persons in Canada?
3. If not, will such steps be taken?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: No.

MILITARY SERVICE ARRANGEMENTS WITH ALLIED NATIONS.

*Mr. FONTAINE:

1. Does the Government intend to enter into any agreement with allied nations such as Italy and Belgium, in order to conscript their subjects coming under Class A of the Military Service Act, 1917, and living in this country?
2. Does the Government intend to revise the medical examinations or exemptions of men of Class No. 1 before calling in for service Class No. 2 under the Military Service Act, 1917?

3. Does the Government intend to propose, at this session, an amendment to the Military Service Act, 1917, in order to bring under the law young men who have attained the age of twenty, since the coming into force of the said Act?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. Information as to arrangements with Allied nations has already been given to the House, and the hon. member is referred to that information.

2. A board of medical review was appointed some weeks ago.

3. The Order in Council which has already been approved by the House is an answer to this portion of the question.

REFRIGERATOR COMMISSION.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

1. Is there a commission known as the Refrigeration Commission? If so, who are the members of it, and who is chairman?
2. What are the duties of this Commission?
3. Who appointed them?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: The Government knows of no such commission.

DOUKHOBOR LANDS.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the Government or any Member thereof been interviewed by, or on behalf of, J. A. M. Patriche and M. Kessicoff, regarding the sale of Doukhobor lands?
2. If so, has any understanding or agreement been reached, what are the terms thereof, and at what price per acre are the lands to be sold?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Dr. William Patrick and Mr. Cuzkoff interviewed the Minister of the Interior with regard to Doukhobor land matters and the purchase of such land.

2. No decision was arrived at. The matter is under investigation.

JAMES STARRATT MARSHALL.

Mr. POWER:

1. Has there been since August, 1914, a person named Jas. Starratt Marshall, of Spa Springs, Annapolis County, in the Active Militia of Canada?
2. If not, when did he leave the service?
3. If so, when did he join the service, and what has been his occupation?
4. What amount has he received during the period in which he was employed?
5. Has the Government any information as to whether or not whilst in the service he carried on the work of laundryman either in his public or private capacity?
6. If in the former capacity what extra pay did he receive?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have not been able to locate this gentleman. If the hon. member will give me a little further information, I shall look into the matter again.

Question stands.

[Mr. Fontaine.]

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING.

Mr. McCREA:

1. What is the total amount paid by the Government since 1911 to the newspapers and other publications in Canada for advertising and other purposes, giving the amount for each year up to and including 1917?
2. What amount has been paid to each paper or publication each year separately?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The information asked for in this question in respect of the years 1911 to 1916, both inclusive, will be found in the Auditor General's Report. The question, so far as 1917 is concerned, will stand as an order for return.

ROSS RIFLE FACTORY.

Mr. BALDWIN:

1. At the time the Government took over the Ross Rifle Factory, had the British Government stated that they were in a position to manufacture all the Lee-Enfield rifles needed?
2. If so, why did the Government then take over said factory?
3. What are the names of the persons selected to make the appraisal or valuation?
4. What experience had said appraisers in rifle factories or in rifle factory machinery values?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. The British Government had, at the time of the taking over of the Ross Rifle factory, stated that it was in a position to supply Canadian troops with the necessary rifles.

2. For reasons fully given by the Government to Parliament at the time, February 2, 1917, and contained in an Order in Council then presented.

3. The following officers of the Canadian Appraisal Company, Ltd., St. John street, Montreal, were actually employed on the work of appraisal at Quebec: J. L. Moon, 120 Broadway, New York; F. S. Addyman, Bordeaux, Quebec; M. H. Engh, C. Thompson, H. Robinson, J. McCarthy, K. F. McLean, W. I. Thomas, C. R. Smith, all of 17 St. John street, Montreal.

4. Sir Edward Kemp (then Minister of Militia and Defence) secured the services of the Canadian Appraisal Company owing to their knowledge and experience in appraisal work connected with large manufacturing concerns (including munition factories) in Canada and the United States.

LETHBRIDGE POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. PROULX:

Referring to the vacant position of postmaster at Lethbridge, Alta.—

1. In what newspapers is the Department inserting notices that this position is vacant?
2. What is the procedure to be followed in filling the position?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The department is not advertising.

2. The matter is being dealt with by the Civil Service Commission, which will follow its usual procedure.

PROHIBITION.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Prior to the General Election of December last did the President of the Council have an interview or interviews with Rev. Dr. Chown, Rev. Dr. Shearer, Rev. Ben Spence and certain other gentlemen regarding the question of temperance or Dominion-wide prohibition?
2. If so, did the President of the Council represent the Government at the said interview or interviews, and had he authority to act for the Government?
3. Was any understanding or agreement arrived at between the parties present at the said interview or interviews?
4. If so, was the said understanding or agreement to the effect that if the churches and organizations represented at the said interview or interviews would support the Union Government a measure of prohibition would be put in force after the election by the Union Government?
5. If the foregoing was not the understanding or agreement arrived at, what arrangement was made between the parties present at the said interview or interviews?
6. In any agreement or arrangement that was made did the President of the Council have the authority of the Government to enter into the same on behalf of the Government?
7. Was any other arrangement or agreement entered into between the President of the Council and the said gentlemen respecting any other measure of moral or social reform?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. No.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. Answered by question 1.

MR. J. H. LEWIS.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has one J. H. Lewis been employed in the Stores Branch of the Post Office Department?
2. Was the said Lewis promoted or appointed to another position in the said Department within the last year?
3. If so, what is his new position, and what are the duties and salary attached thereto?
4. On whose recommendation was Mr. Lewis appointed to his new position, and what was his salary immediately prior to the change being made?
5. How often has Mr. Lewis been in New York since receiving his new appointment, and what was his business there?
6. Did Mr. Lewis meet a Dr. Harris in New York, and if so, did he transact any business with Dr. Harris?
7. Was Mr. Lewis formerly the leader of the Regimental Band of the Governor General's Foot Guards? If so, was he then known as a German?
8. Within the last 18 years how often did Mr. Lewis secure leave of absence to visit Germany?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. For the last 32 years.

2. Yes, Mr. Lewis was promoted to a higher position.

3. Purchasing Agent for the Postal Service of Canada. His duty is to take charge of all contracts for stores and supplies other than those obtained through the Government Printing Bureau and Stationery Office. Salary, $2,800.

4. On the recommendation of the Deputy Postmaster General. $2,700.

5. Mr. Lewis has not been in New York since taking over the duties of his position.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Mr. Lewis was leader of the regimental band of the Governor General's Foot Guards. Not to the department, nor has it any knowledge he was so known to any one. Mr. Lewis is a British subject. See Hansard, page 2944, July 4, 1917.

8. Once, in 1902.

EXEMPTION TRIBUNALS; PAYMENTS.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Have the judges who presided over the different Exemption Tribunals in the County of Drummond and Arthabaska received payment of their fees?
2. If not, why?
3. At what date can these officers expect to receive their fees?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: With the exception of G. T. Prefontaine, Tribunal No. 84, the accounts of the above counties have been paid. Mr. Prefontaine's account will be passed for payment as soon as received from the registrar.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Does the Government know whether the judges, clerks and other officers of Exemption Tribunals in the County of L'Assomption and Montcalm have yet been paid?
2. If not, why have these persons not been paid up to date?
3. When can they hope to be paid for their services?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: All tribunal accounts for the above counties have been paid.

RENTAL OF REGISTRAR'S OFFICES.

Mr. DELISLE:

What is the rent paid by the Government, (a) for the Registrar's Office in the Drummond Building, Montreal, and (b) for the Registrar's Office in the Chateau Frontenac, Quebec?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (a) 7,480 square feet on rental at the rate of $1.10 per annum, which figures out approximately $685.65 per month; (b) This question was answered in Hansard of April 10, page 589.

CAPTAIN W. E. SCHNESTER.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. When did Captain W. E. Schnester, of Belleville, receive his commission, and what were his military qualifications therefor?
2. Was he ever overseas? If so, where and when, and how long did he remain overseas?
3. Did Captain Schnester ever take part in actual warfare? If so, was he wounded?
4. What were his duties in Canada, and at what rate per day was he paid?
5. How much was paid Captain Schnester up to April 20, 1918?
6. What is he doing now, and what is his present rate of pay?
7. Is Captain Schnester to be sent overseas? If not, why not?
8. Is Captain Schnester of German origin, and is he still wearing his uniform?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think there must be some mistake in the name, as we have been unable to find any record of it. If the correct name cannot be furnished, we will continue to make inquiries.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DENIS:

1. Upon whose recommendation was the Returning Officer for the County of Joliette, in the last Federal Election, appointed?
2. Were enumerators appointed in accordance with paragraph one, section forty-two, of the Dominion Elections Act, as amended by the War-time Elections Act of 1917?
3. If so, what are the names of the enumerators so appointed, when was the list of such enumerators sent, and to what person or persons was said list sent?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG:

1. What control has the Canadian Government over the operations of the Imperial Royal Flying Corps in Canada, and what Department of the Government would exercise this control?
2. Has the Canadian Government any Officers or representatives on the Canadian Branch of the Imperial Royal Flying Corps? If so, what are their names, and what positions do they occupy?
3. Does the Canadian Government intend to take over all the offices, plant, and equipment, of the Imperial Royal Flying Corps in Canada at an early date? If not, why not?
4. How many accidents and deaths have occurred in Canada, United States and Overseas among our flying men?
5. What is the nature of the investigations into these acidents, and where are the records kept?
6. Does the Government of Canada at the close of the war intend to establish and maintain a Canadian Flying Corps? If so, what preparations are under way, with this end in view?

[Mr. Doherty.]

7. How many Canadians and how many Americans have joined the Imperial Royal Flying Corps in Canada?
8. How many mechanics are employed by the Imperial Royal Flying Corps in Canada?
9. What amount of money has been expended in Canada by the Imperial Royal Flying Corps?
10. How many Canadian Officers who have seen air service overseas are in the employ of the Imperial Royal Flying Corps in Canada?

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING THE DOMINION'S ROYAL COMMISSION.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved for:

A copy of the correspondence and all papers generally exchanged between the Canadian Government, the Imperial authorities and certain portions of His Majesty's Dominions with a view to give effect to the conclusions of the Dominion Royal Commission.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Some of the correspondence is confidential and cannot be brought down. Otherwise I have no objection.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What are the names and addresses of the different deputy returning officers, enumerators, janitors and lessees of polls in the election of December 17, 1917, in the County of L'Assomption and Montcalm?
2. What amount was paid to each of the above parties for his services in said election?
3. Are all these accounts paid?
4. If not, which are yet unpaid, and why have they not been settled?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG:

1. What status have the Canadian recruits of the Royal Flying Corps in the Military affairs of Canada?
2. In the case of permanent injury or death of Canadians in the Royal Flying Corps in the discharge of their duties, what provision has been made to pension their dependents?
3. How many men came to Canada from England to establish training camps for the Royal Flying Corps; have any of these men returned to England? If so, how many have been replaced by Canadians?
4. What comparative results were obtained in training cadets at the training camps around Toronto and the camps located in Texas?
5. Did the Royal Flying Corps go to Texas and remain there at the expense of, and on the request of the United States Government?
6. Were the authorities of the Royal Flying Corps asked to give consideration to a location in British Columbia? If so, what was the nature of the request?
7. Is it not a fact that the weather conditions in Texas proved very unfavourable for flying corps training purposes?
8. What investigations of a technical character were made of the air conditions in Texas before selecting that place as a training ground for our airmen?

9. What investigations were made as to the atmospherical and climatical conditions in British Columbia regarding the locating of an air squadron training camp in that province?

10. Did the Imperial Munitions Board take option to lease a large area of land at Delta, near Vancouver, B.C., to establish winter training camps for the Canadian training squadrons of the Royal Flying Corps, and were tenders asked for materials, hangers, buildings, etc.? If so, why were these negotiations dropped?

11. How many deaths in the Royal Flying Corps training camps in Texas resulted from atmospherical conditions, which are unfavourable to the successful training of aviators?

12. Have any requests been made to the Canadian Government for assistance to the Royal Flying Corps either through appropriation or gifts of money for training machines? If so, what is the nature of these requests?

13. Where are the records kept of the causes of injury or illness of Canadian cadets and mechanics of the Royal Flying Corps?

14. Are the English-born drill sergeants exclusively employed in the training of Canadian cadets in the Royal Flying Corps in Canada?

15. What efforts have been made by the Canadian Government or individuals or organizations to develop and assist the Flying Corps in Canada, and has the Government extended any assistance to these individuals or organizations?

16. Has any part of the grant of $100 provided by Order in Council for each aviator trained in Canada to defray a part of the expense incurred in training been paid, or has any request for payment been made?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all correspondence and petitions passed between the Prime Minister and Civil Service Federation, concerning certain appointments made in the Post Office and Customs Departments since the 17th of December, 1917.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other papers exchanged between the Food Controller and the Winnipeg Civic Authorities concerning cold storage conditions at Winnipeg.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all papers concerning the Camp Borden expropriation.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a return showing the details of certain totals being the estimated cost of street sewers, etc., given on figures 29 and 30 placed between pages 96-97 of Rural Planning and Development written by Thomas Adams, being a report published by the Commission of Conservation dated 1917. The said totals being $35,584, $26,736, $20,748 and $23,533.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all documents, correspondence, papers, court proceedings and reports by the Honourable Justice Duff in reference to the investigation made by Judge Duff in the mattter of Jules Gobeil, of Baie St. Paul, against Magistrate A. Simard, of the said place.

RELEASE OF ROMEO BRAULT.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

For a copy of all papers, documents and correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Justice and officers of his department with one Romeo Brault, now detained at Burwash Farm, Ontario, or his representatives, relatives and attorneys, in order to obtain his release. Also a copy of all papers, documents and reports submitted to the Minister of Justice or his department from the military authorities in respect to the arrest and detention of said Romeo Brault.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to point out that by the well established practice of the House—the question has been up several times—it is not considered desirable that correspondence with regard to applications for the exercise of clemency under the Ticket-of-leave Act should be produced. Practically they are all considered to be of a confidential nature.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. KENNEDY:

For a return giving a copy of the various proposals submitted to the Government for the erection of a steel plate rolling mill in Canada, and the supply of 250,000 tons of steel plates for shipbuilding purposes in Canada.

Mr. COPP:

For a copy of all letters, petitions and communications received by the Acting Postmaster General or any official of his Department in reference to the closing of the Post Office at LeBlancville, in the County of Westmorland, New Brunswick.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence and documents exchanged between the Minister of Justice and his department and their representatives in Montreal in connection with obtaining the release on bail, and arranging bail and security for one, Charles, alias Ti-Noir Desjardins. Also a copy of all correspondence with the Minister of Justice and his department and their representatives in Montreal and elsewhere, and all other documents in connection with obtaining the release of and giving bail and security on behalf of the same man recently in Montreal.

ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARREST OF A PRESUMED DESERTER.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (translation): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to point out, for the consideration of the Prime Minister, an incident of a most serious nature which took place yesterday in Hull. It appears that some presumed members of the Federal Police have fired at a resident of that city, wounding him dangerously. I think it my duty, as representing that division, to call the Government's attention to the fact. I have met people who were witnesses of the incident, and they assure me that the suspected deserter might have been easily arrested without any resort to firearms.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is quite proper the hon. member should address the question to the Government, but it is not in order that he should enter into any discussion.

Mr. FONTAINE (translation): Then, I shall only ask the Government whether they intend to enquire into this matter and to dismiss those policemen who were surely over-zealous on that occasion. A peaceable city though it be, Hull will not tolerate any useless blood-shedding.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The matter to which the hon. gentleman has called attention has not been reported to me as yet. No doubt the Minister of Justice will be able, either to-day or to-morrow, to make a statement with regard to it.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: As soon as I have complete data in this connection, I shall gladly communicate them to the House.

MILITARY SERVICE; LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon and Chateauguay): I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the new regulations respecting the granting of leave of absence to men called up under the Military Service Act. Paragraph A of section 5 of Order in Council P.C. 919 makes certain provisions for exemption. There is great unrest, as no doubt the Government knows, throughout the country regarding farm labour, and I want to ask the Government with regard to the case of an only son of a widowed mother, who perhaps is tilling a farm of a hundred acres, and having perhaps twenty or thirty cows. Is it the intention of the Government to take the boy away from the farm?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That particular subject to which the hon. gentleman has directed attention has been discussed with the Minister of Militia and Defence, and we hope in a day or two to make an announcement on the subject.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I suggest in this connection that the Minister of Militia will confer a favour on everybody inside and outside the House if he will, on some occasion, when going into Supply, explain these regulations. I have them in my possession, and I may say that I think they are very much involved. If we had a discussion perhaps we could elicit from the Government exactly what is meant by them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no objection to that, if there be any difficulty about understanding the regulations. The particular matter to which the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) has directed attention is one that requires consideration. I am not certain at the moment if there is anything else in regard to these regulations which would require to be considered further by the Government. However, there is no harm in having the discussion and making the position perfectly plain.

MILITARY SERVICE—MEN MEDICALLY UNFIT.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): Are the men in class D exempted under medical certificates obliged to report under the new Order in Council which has been passed? My reason for asking is that I received a letter from a mother who has a sick son who is away from home, and she wants to know whether she has to call him back to report when the order is issued, or whether the exemption of the Medical Board would be sufficient to justify him in not reporting to the registrar.

Major-General MEWBURN: Under that Order in Council the registrar has to notify the men between the ages of 20 and 22 to report. Those notices are only to be sent to the men who have been already examined and found in Category A. It was not the desire to call back the men already examined and found in a lower category. The idea was not, if possible, to have these men come up for rehearing. We are anxious to get only the men who are medically fit. If later on the emergency increases, it may be considered advisable to have another medical examination, but our intention is not to disturb any of those men who already hold a certificate as being medically unfit.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 64, to amend the Indian Act, was read the third time and passed.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, Bill No. 65, to amend the Companies Act, was read a second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Quebec notarial copies to be deemed originals; mortgage to include hypothec:

Mr. McMASTER: I notice that the Bill says that a duly certified notarial copy of any instrument executed in the province of Quebec " and preserved in the records of a notary public " shall be deemed to be an original document. When a notary dies his records are in the keeping of another notary or at a prothonotary's office. Perhaps it might be well to say " and preserved in the the records of a notary public of the province of Quebec, whether at his office, or at the court." There is a possibility that has not been provided for. In the event of the death of a notary in our province his records are no longer kept at his office, or at his successor's office, but are transferred to the prothonotary's office.

Mr. DOHERTY: I recognize the possibility of that happening, but it is not clear to me that the wording would not cover it. At all events there is no objection to making it absolutely clear. I think it would meet the hon. gentleman's suggestion if we amended the section. I therefore move that:

That section 1, subsection 69M, be amended by striking out the word "notarial" in the first line thereof and by adding after the word "Quebec" in the fourth line of the said sub-section, the following words "or in the office of the prothonotary of the Superior Court in any district of the said province".

Would that meet it?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that the only place where they would be deposited?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the only place where they would be deposited that I am aware of. There are provisions for what happens if they are absolutely destroyed. Then it would be a question of using a copy from the registrar. But I do not think that we need look forward to that. That is the only place I know of and I think the honourable gentleman would agree that where it was an original document it would be kept on record. But, inasmuch as we are providing for a case where certification would be by the prothonotary and not by the notary, it might perhaps be well to omit the word " notarial " before the word " copy " so that it would read:

A duly certified copy of any deed, mortgage, hypothec or other authentic instrument executed in the province of Quebec and preserved in the records of a notary public or in the office of the prothonotary—

Because there could otherwise be no daily certified copy unless it was certified by the notary. We would have to provide for certification by the prothonotary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might I suggest that the object would be attained if the section were to read as follows:

A duly certified notarial copy of any deed, mortgage, hypothec or other authentic instrument executed in the province of Quebec.

The moment you get a duly certified copy admitted in a court of law, that is sufficient. If the notary is still living his signature gives authenticity but if he is dead the party who has it on record gives it authenticity and that is quite enough.

Mr. DOHERTY: While the usual notarial document is prepared en minute and filed in the office of the notary, it is not an unusual thing for notaries to prepare documens en brevêt. Then the original can be produced when it is needed. In dealing with these documents, it is usual for the original to be kept by the notary and produced when needed. If you make that a sufficient copy of any notarial document, I would be inclined to think that it would not cover those documents which are prepared en brevêt.

Section as amended agreed to.

NATURALIZATION ACT, 1914.

CORRECTION OF CLERICAL ERROR IN FRENCH VERSION.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 66, to correct a clerical error in the French version of the Naturalization Act, 1914, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1:

The first seven lines of the French version of subsection one of section twelve of the Naturalisation Act, 1914, chapter forty-four of the statutes of 1914, are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—

12. Lorsqu'une personne, étant sujet britannique, cesse de l'être par une déclaration d'extranéité ou autrement, tout enfant mineur de cette personne cesse en même temps d'être sujet britannique, sauf dans le cas où tel enfant ne devient pas, en vertu de la loi d'un autre pays, par le fait que telle personne a cessé d'être sujet britannique, naturalisé dans cet autre pays."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the minister read the Act as it is now?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps I had better read the English version, and afterwards the French version, because it is a matter of having the translation correct. The English version reads:

> Where a person being a British subject ceases to be a British subject, whether by declaration of alienage or otherwise, every child of that person, being a minor, shall thereupon cease to be a British subject—and this is the portion where, in the French version, the error occurs:

> —unless such child, on that person ceasing to be a British subject, does not become by the law of any other country naturalized in that country.

The French version as it now stands produces the opposite effect, as the translators agree, and it reads:

> Lorsqu'une personne étant sujet britannique cesse d'être sujet britannique soit par le fait d'une déclaration d'extranéité soit autrement chaque enfant mineur de cette personne cesse immédiatement d'être sujet britannique à moins que ledit enfant, par le fait que ladite personne cesse d'être sujet britannique, ne devienne de par la loi d'un autre pays, sujet naturalisé de ce pays.

Section agreed to and Bill reported.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir George Foster, Bill No. 20, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Hay and Straw Inspection), was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Hay grades Eastern Provinces.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This section re-enacts the grades as they at present exist in the eastern provinces, with one or two very slight changes which have been recommended by the Boards of Trade and by our inspector. The Bill as introduced will not be pressed through in its present form. All we propose to do is to establish grades of hay for the western provinces where there are now no legal grades, to re-arrange the present grades in the eastern provinces, and to make necessary provision for the inspection of hay. After carefully looking into the matter, we have come to the conclusion that it would not be advisable at present to provide for the compulsory inspection of hay throughout the Dominion. It is desirable, however, that legal grades should be established, so that people who wish to buy and sell by grades may do so—although they will not be debarred from buying and selling as usual.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There will be no compulsory inspection?

[Mr. Doherty.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. In the West during the last eight or ten years more or less dissatisfaction, confusion and loss have prevailed in such centres as Winnipeg and Vancouver, where a great deal of hay is bought and sold, because of there being no standard and no inspection. This difficulty will be remedied by the enactment of legal grades and the necessary provision for inspection. The present section is already embodied in existing legislation, with two exceptions: in paragraphs (d) and (f) the word "sound" has been substituted for "well cured".

Mr. BUREAU: Why has that been done?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a technical matter with regard to which we accepted the best expert advice we could get.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says that this classification is made largely to accommodate the western provinces.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, this classification is entirely for the eastern provinces. In a subsequent section we take up the grades for the western provinces.

Mr. BUREAU: The grades for Manitoba and the western provinces generally are different from those of the East?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. DAVIS: Should not paragraph (f) of this section provide that No. 1 clover mixed shall be at least one-half clover? If you provide that No. 1 clover mixed shall be at least one-half timothy, the grade might come under the class described in paragraph (c)—timothy with not more than one-third of clover.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think it is probably safe to take the grades as they have been fixed by those who are chiefly interested in them. I am not an authority on grades of hay, timothy or clover; my hon. friend may be. These grades have been approved by our inspectors in Quebec and Toronto and by the Boards of Trade, to whom the proposed enactment was submitted, and included in the membership of which, I suppose, are hay dealers and purchasers. If any hon. gentlemen considers that better grades could be established I shall be very glad to take his suggestions into consideration.

4 p.m.

Mr. LANCTOT: By whom has this legislation been suggested—by the hay dealers, or the consumers? The provisions regarding the grading of hay would seem to be in accordance with the regulations of the American Hay Association. I have no fault to find with the grades which have been established, but I notice further on in the Bill that all persons who press hay for sale are obliged to have a license.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will be content to discuss the Bill section by section, I think we shall get along better.

Mr. LANCTOT: I note that provisions have been inserted with regard to damaged and heated hay. That kind of hay should not be put on the market at all, if the reputation of our farmers in the markets of United States and Europe is to be maintained. In recent years quite a large number of cars of hay have been heated in New York, Chicago and all over New England. I realize that hay pressed during a severe winter might reach New York during the hot season, and would be very materially changed as a result. In order to prevent these conditions, I think the law should go further and say that if hay is pressed during a very severe winter those who press the hay should be the losers. But if you attach a tag, as the law to-day requires, and put a name on it, the proper name should be. not that of the importer, but of the holder of the property on which the hay was pressed, so that you would have a man who was responsible. I shall take opportunity to discuss the matter again. Will the minister be good enough to tell me who asked for this legislation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This legislation was asked for and placed upon the Statute Book about fifteen years ago, and it has been upon the Statute Book since that time. My hon. friend may have heard me say that there have been repeated demands from the western provinces for grades for hay. The legislation is brought down at this time for the sake of adding that provision to the Act as it at present stands. In order to have all the sections in the Inspection and Sale Act refer to hay and straw together, the simple device has been taken of repealing the sections as they stand and enacting all those sections with regard to hay and straw together, so that you have the Act complete in itself and in short compass, instead of one portion of it being one Act and another portion of it as an amendment. Under this system of enactment all the legislation in regard to hay and straw will be together and complete.

Mr. LANCTOT: I understand that in the old law there was no provision in regard to the western provinces.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. KAY: Is it the intention to compel the inspection of all hay?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I stated just a little while ago that was not compulsory. When we come to the section in reference to that, I shall explain the matter more fully.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Where and how will this inspection be made as to the percentage of clover? Will it be made before the hay is pressed or after? It is very important to know when the inspection has to be made. If you say that a certain percentage of timothy and a certain percentage of clover are allowed, if you are going to make the inspection after the hay is pressed, I do not understand how you will be able to make a proper inspection. Are you going to inspect it in the barn? It seems to be absurd to classify the hay if you do not make arrangements for determining what the percentages are.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will see that, under the old Act, the arrangements as to grades, and inspection upon those grades, have been proceeding in the Eastern provinces for the last fifteen or twenty years. There has been no compulsion that hay should or should not be inspected; but if an owner of hay sells his hay subject to grade and inspection, and if the purchaser buys it subject to that same grade and inspection, then there is provided an inspector who can inspect that hay. That hay will be inspected as arranged for or agreed upon between the seller and the buyer. It may be inspected in the barn and the certificate given as it is being baled, or it may be inspected after it has been baled. Quantities of hay are now inspected after being baled. It may be a little more difficult, but the inspector is a man who understands his work, and who is able to give his opinion as to the grade of the hay either in bale or loose.

Mr. SEXSMITH: According to that, a man has to depend upon his own judgment as to what grade his hay is or ask for an inspector after it is pressed. If he has a quantity of hay to press, and he thinks that it will grade No. 1, but he is not perfectly certain, he has to run the risk of being liable to a penalty or have an inspector come and inspect the hay.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Or have the inspector inspect the hay when it is brought into the market as it sometimes is, loose.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I was thinking of pressed hay. I do not think the inspection will have much to do with loose hay, because, so far as loose hay is concerned, the buyer and the seller usually come together and the buyer sees what he is getting. I do not see how you are going to inspect properly the baled hay. Clause (b) reads:

No. 1 Timothy shall be timothy with not more than one-eighth of clover or other tame grasses mixed, of good colour, sound and well cured;

Who is going to be the judge as to the percentages? Then clause (c) reads:

No. 2 Timothy shall be timothy with not more than one-third of clover or other tame grasses mixed, of good colour, sound and well cured;

It seems to me this puts the whole question of pressing and marketing hay in a state of chaos, unless you are going to have inspectors who will be willing and ready to go out at the beck and call of every farmer throughout the Dominion. Who is going to pay the expense of this inspection? It is all very well to be setting grades on hay, but the number of grades of hay may be legion. In this section we have eleven grades mentioned. Who is to determine these grades? The farmer is running the risk of having a penalty imposed upon him if he should press two or three tons of hay before the inspector arrives.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not see that it is putting the farmer under a penalty. My hon. friend has been living under this inspection law for the last fifteen or twenty years. This is the law now. He will still be under the same law, whether he objects to the passage of this Bill or not. It is up to the purchaser and the seller, who wish to buy and sell respectively on proper grades, to get the inspection. It is up to the inspector to make the inspection as required. The payment is by fee of so much per ton. At the present time the fee is twenty cents per ton. Under this Bill I am taking the power to have the fee for inspection made by order of the Governor in Council, because sometimes twenty-five cents per ton would be too high, and sometimes ten cents would be too low. The expense is largely due to the locality and to the quality of hay which is inspected in a locality. Most of this inspection, I imagine, is made by traders and dealers who are buying hay to sell upon the market, either according to grade or otherwise. If according to grade, they will take the best means in their power to have a thorough inspection made at the most convenient place, and the inspector will be paid for his inspection by fee according to the quantity of hay he inspects. A man who buys hay from a seller who is selling by grade will buy, say, No. 1, or No. 2, or No. 3, according to the inspector's certificate. If it has the inspector's certificate, the buyer, if he can rely upon the inspector, has his guarantee that he is buying the kind of hay he has agreed to buy, and so far as the inspection is concerned, his guarantor is the inspector. My hon. friend is not running up against anything new. We are simply making the application a little wider.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Then I do not see any necessity for the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are extending the provisions to the Prairie Provinces so that they may have the same advantages the eastern provinces have had up to the present time. This clause has been repealed and is being re-enacted so that we may have all the clauses with respect to hay and straw in compact form.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It follows, then, that the Act has not been very satisfactory in the past.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That does not follow at all.

Mr. MOLLOY: Would not the hay be sold like we sell our wheat in the West? In my opinion the proper way to inspect the hay would be both before pressing and after, although I can understand there are very many difficulties in the way. First of all it would be expensive; a greater number of inspectors would be required. The grower of the hay should be allowed to ask for an inspection as well as the dealer in hay.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS: Reverting to the point I raised a few moments ago, paragraph (e) provides that No. 1 Timothy Clover Mixed shall be timothy and clover mixed with at least one-half timothy and the remainder good clover, of good colour and sound. Now that might be 99 per cent timothy. With any admixture of timothy it will pass as No. 1 Clover Mixed. Furthermore, a mixture of timothy and clover could be classified under No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 Timothy, or No. 1 Clover Mixed. It seems to me that where the word "timothy" occurs the second time in paragraph (f) the word clover was meant.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will look into that, and if there was a mistake in the printing I will have it corrected.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Who provides the inspection?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not making any change in that respect; the inspectors will be provided under the Act as at present. For instance, in Montreal or any other large city the Board of Trade appoints a committee to examine candidates for inspectors, who, after certification, are appointed by Order in Council. The inspectors are paid by fees. Where there is no Board of Trade the Governor in Council has the power to name any district and give that district authority to have an inspection and an inspector. The inspection is not compulsory, but it enables those who wish to buy and sell according to grade and under inspection to do so.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there any appeal from the inspector in case he has not graded the hay properly?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no appeal under the Act, but there are methods of reinspection.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It might be possible for an inspector to compel a man selling hay to stand in with him.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He probably would not do that often.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not after he was caught. I might point out a little more clearly what I had in mind. When I was in South Africa a ship arrived in port with an officer of the Department of Agriculture on board and a very fine cargo of Canadian hay. The hay had been inspected— I do not say officially—but when part of it was unloaded it was found to contain stone and sand and things of that kind. A similar thing occurred during the present war and I presume that in both these cases the hay was sold subject to inspection. Suppose a dealer sells hay to a purchaser as grade No. 1 when it is not grade No. 1. What redress has the purchaser?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He has the redress that any one has against a person who has committed a fraud on him.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Suppose it was not a very bad case of fraud, and that the inspector had simply graded it as No. 1 when it was really No. 2?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the loss was not sufficiently serious to justify the purchaser in taking proceedings, he would not take proceedings.

Sir SAM HUGHES: But if he had suffered a serious loss, who would he proceed against? The inspector or the seller?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Where stones and things like that were put in hay, a conviction could be secured against the person who committed the fraud. But if it is simply a mistake in the grading of the hay, if the inspector does not give the grade called for—

Sir SAM HUGHES: But suppose he does give that grade, and the farmer finds the inspector was wrong. That occurs very often.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a matter that can be met by reinspection.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Suppose a farmer presses a carload of hay and decides in his own mind what grade it is, and does not have it inspected. It is shipped to Toronto and then found not up to standard.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the farmer decides on the grade in his own mind, that is not official at all. To make it official, the inspector has to affix his certificate, and if he does not affix that certificate to the car that was shipped to Toronto we will say that hay is not of the grade the farmer thought it was. It is not the idea which the farmer or the producer has with respect to his product, but the judgment of the inspector that counts, and the grade is based upon his inspection.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Suppose a man sells a hundred tons of hay that has been inspected and he is compelled to pile it up at the station exposed to all kinds of weather, before he can get delivery. In a week or ten days the hay may depreciate in value, but yet it would be sold as No. 1 or No. 2 grade, according as the inspector determined. I was passing by a station the other day and saw a hundred tons of pressed hay piled up in the open, and the rain had been falling on it for a week or ten days. That hay had the inspector's certificate on it as Class 1 Timothy. After remaining a week in the open air, and being shipped to its destination, it would be very much depreciated in value, but still it must be sold as Class 1 Timothy.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Let us follow that out. In the first place, the farmer has not lost anything. He has sold his hay as of a certain grade and got his money. The dealer has piled up the hay, as the hon. gentleman stated. He lets it stay out there until it begins to rot, and then it is forwarded to the man to whom it has been sold, or to the market in which it has been sold. When it reaches there it is rotten, and under grade. The man to whom this has been forwarded as grade so and so can, under the Inspection Act, apply for a reinspection.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Is there a provision in the law for that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. You can call for reinspection before the properly constituted authorities.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Where it has been once inspected, it might be piled up and allowed to become rotten, and, of course, would depreciate in value a good deal.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The dealer takes a great risk in that respect.

Mr. SEXSMITH: He sends it out in small lots and many people buy it. I am talking in the interests of the consumer. I know people who bought hay this year as of a certain grade, and after opening up the package they found it was practically of no use, although the outside looked all right.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the consumer looks at that hay, and sees that it is not No. 1 Timothy, he can apply for an inspection, and the inspector will report as to whether the hay has been damaged.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Under what clause?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Under the general Act you can ask for an inspection.

Mr. SEXSMITH: That would be asking for a re-inspection, because it had already been inspected and a certificate put on it. In transit it may become damaged, but it must be sold according to the grade given it on inspection.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are dozens of things that may be sold under inspection, and this is on an exact parallel with other goods. If damage takes place in transit, the damage falls on that person, under the contract, in whose charge the goods are during transit, and if it is the dealer he must protect himself by seeing his goods are kept in good condition when forwarded.

Mr. LEDUC: The minister said there should not be any appeal from the judgment of the inspector. I may say I have had an experience in this inspection. I think there should be an appeal from the decision of any of the inspectors who are inspecting the goods of any kind. A farmer has No. 1 hay on his farm, and it is supposed to be graduated when it is sold, but supposing, the farmer is dealing with a man not absolutely scrupulous, that man may say, that when the hay reached its destination it was really No. 2 although classed as No. 1." If there is no appeal from that judgment, in what position would the farmer be? I desire to point out an example in the case of meat inspection. I know for a fact that a few years ago, one of the inspectors appointed by the Federal Government in Montreal inspected a load of hogs at the east end abattoir. Twenty-five hogs were confiscated. We asked to be allowed to appeal, but the inspector said there could be no appeal. We took a veterinary surgeon, made an inspection, and found only three hogs should have been confiscated. If there were no appeal from that judgment, the dealer or the purchaser would be the loser in the matter. At any rate we came to Ottawa and asked for justice, and we got justice from the Minister of Agriculture. This inspector has been dismissed from his job because he did not know what he was doing. I think an appeal should be allowed from the judgment of any inspector, in order to ascertain whether he performs his duties properly. If I were to appoint an inspector I should make provision for an appeal from his judgment in the inspection of any goods whatever.

Mr. NESBITT: I presume the minister does not intend to interfere with the sale of pressed hay as carried on in the market.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not in any way. It is not interfered with now, and I am not interfering with it.

Mr. NESBITT: It is proposed to make every person who presses hay take out a license.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I made the statement that I did not intend to press that portion of the Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: Taking the illustration of my hon. friend (Mr. Sexsmith), the buyer brings in a quantity of hay, and on account of lack of transportation, or lack of accommodation on the railways, he has to pile it up at the station, from which he expects to ship it. If it deteriorated, it would be a great loss to the dealer and not through any fault of his. The Bill does not provide for anything of that kind.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. NESBITT: There is no clause protecting him against any loss he should not be forced to suffer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not see that he should not be forced to pay it. If you contract to deliver to me either hay, wheat or anything else of a certain grade or quality, you are bound to deliver that to me, and if anything takes place between where you sell it and the place where you deliver it which diminishes the quality of the article, you have to bear the loss. There cannot be any provision by which we can indemnify either you or your carrier who is under contract with you, if he fails to protect the goods in transit. You have your remedy against the carrier if you have a contract with him. You certainly could not make the buyer indemnify you for loss resulting from your own carelessness or the carelessness of the carrier.

Mr. MORPHY: Do I understand the minister to say he is not going to enforce the clauses in relation to the issuance of licenses?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. MORPHY: I have had some experience in regard to this matter. Last fall men travelled through the riding which I have the honour to represent, buying hay and making contracts to press it. A very large number of farmers contracted that their hay was to be pressed at a certain date, and these men made the contract, paid a sum of money and bound the farmers to sell them a certain number of tons. They ran riot over a large territory, making these contracts to purchase, take delivery and press the hay at so much a ton. When the time came for delivery, these men could not be found. The farmer, in good faith, had sold his hay to men who introduced themselves by name from the lower part of the province, in the neighbourhood of the county of Essex. A letter was written to them and attempts were made to get them by telephone but the result was that the hay was left upon the farmers' hands in dozens and dozens of cases. As a protection to the farming community against unfair dealing of that kind a license should be required. I think the Government should take control of men who are going to deal in that way so that the Government itself would know to whom they were issuing licenses. Irresponsible persons, rather than pay the license fee, would remain out of the business and the farmers' rights and interests would be reasonably protected. I am sorry to hear the minister say that he is going to drop that provision. What harm could be done by insisting that a license shall be taken out by a man who wants to deal in that way? It would be a protection against fraud if such persons were licensed. Not only should these men be licensed but I think a clause should be put in the Act penalizing a man for failure to carry out his contracts in so far as that can be done. I appreciate the difficulty. It might be a matter of contract, but where this Government is regulating the sale, pressing and moving of hay, and the dealings of persons with the farming community, I think there is a duty cast upon them to see what kind of men are allowed to run riot at any time of the year through the country. A license imposed upon these people would improve the personnel and make them more careful in their dealings with farmers.

Mr. NESBITT: A man who presses hay is usually like a man who operates a thresher; he simply presses the hay. He has no interest in the hay but he gets so much a ton for pressing it. That is why I object to that sort of a man being forced to take out a license before he can be allowed to do his ordinary day's work. Why should we penalize him? If the hay is not up to standard the farmer should have to see that it is up to standard and not the poor devil who presses it.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman has quite misunderstood me. These men undertook to provide for the whole thing; they were to supply the presses and do the pressing and everything.

Mr. EDWARDS: If you undertake to keep track of every man who bargains with a farmer for his hay, pays him a small amount on the hay with the intention of pressing it later on and then never shows up, I suppose you might carry that a little farther and penalize the man who pays $5 down upon a horse but never intends to buy and never comes back to complete the purchase. I presume the whole object of this is to protect the public against fraud, but the fewer regulations you have in regard to doing business the better. Regulations are only advisable when they are required to protect the public, and I cannot see where there is any protection to the public in licensing a man to press hay. Therefore, I must take an opposite view from that which my hon. friend has taken. I am very glad that that clause has been dropped out of the Bill, because I do not think that the forcing of a man to take out a license to press hay is going to protect either the man who presses the hay or the man who buys it. Inspection may protect them. The man who is engaged in buying hay in large quantities visits the various farms in the country at a time when he can form a judgment of the crop which has been produced on that or the other farm. He sees a pretty fine crop of hay. The farmer has, perhaps, fifty or one hundred tons. He forms his judgment of the class or quality of the crop and he says to the farmer: "I will give you so much per ton for your hay and you press it," or "I will give you so much per ton and I will get a man to press it." That is the way the bargain is usually made. At a convenient time the presser comes round. It may be some man who lives right in the neighbourhood who has a press at his disposal. With regard to inspecting hay, I do not know how you are going to do that satisfactorily when the hay is already pressed into the bales. I do not know how you are going to form an accurate idea of the grade of hay throughout the bale. Must the inspector be on hand when the hay is being pressed? If you require that it strikes me that it would be utterly impossible unless you flood the country with hay inspectors. There is another matter I want to ask the minister about, and that comes under section 340f.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must rule that the discussion for the last twenty minutes has been absolutely out of order. We have been considering this Bill clause by clause, but hon. members are anticipating by discussing a later clause. If the committee will allow us to adopt the clause under discussion we can proceed with some regularity.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask what clause that is?

The CHAIRMAN: 340.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was under the impression that the discussion had taken a general course in regard to the Bill as a whole, therefore I referred to that particular clause. However, I will wait until that clause is reached.

On section 340a—standard weights for hay and straw in Quebec:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is exactly the same clause as is in the law now. It was repealed and it is now re-enacted for the purpose, as I explained before, of getting these clauses all together.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does this only apply to one province?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It only applies to Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why is that?

Mr. DENIS: This applies only to the province of Quebec. It reproduces section 342 of the old Act, and we are perfectly satisfied with it in Quebec.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend from Frontenac asks why this only applies to the province of Quebec. It has only been asked for in that province. Very little straw is inspected or sold under inspection. This formed a portion of the old Act.

On subsection 340b—Hay grades Western Provinces and Northwest Territories—Cultivated grasses, wild grasses, no grade rejected:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I want to make an explanation as to how these grades have been arrived at. There have been, as I have said, no legal grades in the western provinces, including British Columbia, but since 1905 there has been more or less agitation to have grades established and inspectors made available, so that if people wished to purchase and sell upon grade there should be the legal grade, and inspection provided therefor. These grades were arrived at in this way: First by correspondence by the department with people interested in the West. After that had been carried on for several years and more or less information had been gathered, an officer of my department made a tour through the West, going as far as British Columbia, and took up the matter with the Department of Agriculture in each province. Information was thus gained personally, and an opportunity afforded the officer of the department to discuss the matter with those who probably understood most about it in these different provinces. Communications were also had with boards of trade, with people in the hay trade, and so on. To make a long story short, the grades established by the Bill have been agreed upon and approved by all the provinces through their Departments of Agriculture. Personally, I am no authority on grades of hay, more especially of western hay, and we have to arrive at decisions as best we can. I repeat that there is to be no compulsion in the matter. We are merely making it possible that the purchaser or the contractor shall have the opportunity of protecting himself in all arrangements which they have made between themselves for the sale and purchase of hay, that there shall be a grade established upon which decisions shall be based, and that there shall be an inspector with authority to say to what grade the hay offered for sale belongs.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not know whether the minister has done it intentionally or not, but I call his attention to the fact that one of the most common grasses grown in Ontario, and more or less in the Dominion, has been omitted from the list of grades in all the provinces, namely, what is known as Canadian blue grass. I do not see it mentioned in the Bill, and possibly the minister is classing it as a non-commercial hay. It is, however, a very valuable hay and thousands of tons are grown in Ontario. It is a grass that grows on sod that has never been ploughed, and it is to be found in all river bottoms, and so on. It grows from year to year without any re-seeding, and is to be found on all the lawns in our Canadian cities. The Kentucky blue grass, grown farther south, sometimes fetches a higher price on the market, but the Canadian blue grass is very good fodder for cattle, horses or sheep.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is it a tame grass?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is very tame. You can walk right up to it and it will not run away.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it is tame grass it is provided for in the Bill.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is as tame as can be, but I do not think it is enumerated in any of the grades established by the Bill, and I was wondering if the minister has purposely omitted it, and classed it as a non-merchantable hay, or whether it has escaped his attention, as there are thousands of tons of blue grass grown in the province of Ontario, at any rate, and I think more or less throughout Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am familiar with blue grass, and can recognize it when I see it, but I am entirely guiltless of any intention of depreciating this grass by not naming it in the Bill. However, the Bill has been prepared by those who are supposed to be authorities on the subject, and I would venture a leap at the explanation that the hon. gentleman may find it if he looks more carefully amongst tame grasses. It may be that blue grass comes in that category, as my hon. friend has assured me it is perfectly tame.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have looked through the Bill and have failed to find Canadian blue grass enumerated.

Mr. HENDERS: I would ask the hon. gentleman to define the distinction between Kentucky blue grass and Canadian blue grass and red top?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is a very different grass as I understand it.

Mr. BOYCE: Did you ever see it grown upon an extra good farm?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Not upon an extra good farm, but I have seen it grown on the best land in a good many parts of Ontario, and there is no doubt it is a very good hay when it is properly cured. Very large quantities of it are grown in our part of the province.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have a very great regard for my hon. friend from Brantford, who is a particular friend of mine, but I advise him not to get into any controversy with these farmers around him as to what blue joint grass it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do some farming myself and have grown blue grass, and I have had it foisted on me for timothy. A quantity of blue grass was shipped to a dealer who refused it on the ground that it was not timothy. I took it over and my man fed it to the cattle and sheep during the winter without waste and with as good results as if the stock had been fed with timothy. This blue grass was grown in our part of Ontario.

Mr. HENDERS: Blue-joint, redtop and Kentucky blue grass are in the same classification, and in our province are considered as good as timothy for feed purposes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Are they cousins, brothers or sisters?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But the seeds are different; if a dealer tries to sell redtop seeds for blue grass seeds, he will get into trouble. Blue grass is certainly one of the most merchantable of all seeds; it is used on lawns in Ottawa and in other cities throughout Canada, and the minister should not rule it out as being unmerchantable hay.

Mr. BLAKE: Why does the provision for the grading of hay in the West differ from the provisions in respect to the East?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The qualities are different in the two sections of the country.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Blue grass, as I understand it, is tame grass. There is as much difference between blue-joint and blue grass as there is between day and night. Blue-joint, as we have known it in Ontario, grows in the very lowest marshes, and there is a great deal of difference between the analysis made at Guelph of the blue-joint and that made of timothy and other kinds of hay. Blue-joint will not grow on anything but marshy ground. Red-top and bluetop are somewhat similar, but the varieties differ greatly. The kind the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) spoke about comes under the heading of tame grass; a great deal of it is raised in the vicinity of Toronto and it is considered to be a valuable hay. It does not grow so long as timothy grass and weighs very much heavier to the bulk, but for seed purposes it does not come far behind timothy. It is being produced and sold in large quantities in Ontario.

Mr. STACEY: I would commend to the minister the advisability of amending paragraph III to provide that it shall not be lawful, under the provisions of this Act, to offer for sale, (a) no grade
5 p.m. hay; (b) rejected hay. The sale of such hay as is classified in this Bill as "no grade," or "rejected," is a means of spreading noxious weeds. Moreover, when it is damp and unfit for storing, it is of no use for feeding purposes. I submit that such hay as is described in paragraph (b)—containing more than twenty-five per cent of foxtail or spear grass, hay heated or containing must or mould or otherwise damaged—should not be sold on the market. What the producer gets for this hay is "found money." It may be worth a little as manure, but it is absolutely of no use as nutriment for live-stock and should not be placed on the market. We have sufficient grades in paragraphs I and II to meet all the requirements of the producer, and he should not be encouraged to put on the market such stuff as is described in III.

Mr. HAY: To forbid the sale of no grade hay at a time when feed is scarce would work a hardship on stock men and others. "No grade" hay means hay that is damp or unfit for storage; but this hay may be very good for feeding stock. Rejected hay also may be used to advantage at times when feed is scarce. This is an important

[Mr. Blake.]

Bill, particularly as it relates to some portions of Manitoba, and we should be careful before we adopt rules and regulations. Will inspectors be appointed throughout the Dominion?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The provisions of the Bill makes the appointment of inspectors possible in districts where they are needed or asked for. The inspectors are to be appointed by the Governor in Council on examination and certification by Boards of Trade, who appoint committees qualified to conduct such examinations.

Mr. HAY: Are the inspectors to be paid salaries?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. HAY: Who will pay the fees?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The fees will be paid by the person—dealer, farmer or buyer—who asks for the inspection. In most cases I suppose the fees will be paid by dealers who are anxious to get grades and, on the basis of those grades, to make contracts with purchasers.

Mr. HAY: Will the inspectors have the power to compel farmers to have their hay graded?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not at all. The farmer can sell just as he pleases.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Replying to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stacey), who spoke about making it impossible to sell hay of no grade, I say that would be a terrible mistake. We in the East are perfectly satisfied with the grades that the minister has given us, and this is none too soon for the passage of this legislation. Hay that is classified as "of no grade," or "rejected," may be worth a good deal for certain things, such as for bedding, or for the feeding of sheep, as they pick out the good amongst it. It would be a very great hardship if a clause were inserted in the Bill making it impossible to sell rejected hay. As long as such hay is properly represented as rejected hay, there is no reason why it should not be sold. The principle of the Bill is, I understand, that the minister is making grades, so that when a man buys hay, he buys it by grade and he knows what he is getting.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He buys by grade if he wishes to do so. I might, perhaps, shorten discussion a little by replying to my hon. friend (Mr. Stacey). The purpose of this Bill is to facilitate purchases and sales along certain lines by the arrangement of grades and inspection thereon. The Bill does not pretend to say that a man shall not sell, and I do not think it would be pertinent to append to this Bill a prohibition against the sale of any commodity that the farmer might have to sell. I do not think we could go that far.

Mr. STACEY: I thank the minister for his explanation. Would it not be possible then to omit hay of "no grade" altogether?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will take any system of grades and inspection, take grain for instance, he will find that anything which is raised and which is in any way serviceable, should, from the point of view of economy, be put to some use. The grading by the inspector is to single out and put its proper classification, so far as nomenclature can do it, upon all grain that is raised. Then the purchaser can protect himself. If he says: "For purposes that are useful to me, I should like to have that rejected hay or grain," it is pretty hard to say to him: you shall not buy it; or to say to the seller: you shall not sell it. Of course, if the hay or grain is poisonous or deleterious, that is a different matter, and it would come under a different kind of legislation from hay or grain legislation.

Mr. ROBB: I understood the minister to say that inspectors would be appointed from time to time and for different places as the demand was made for them. This opens the door for an additional army of civil servants travelling about the country.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I want to correct my hon. friend. It does not open up any field for civil servants at all. These men are appointed in the most independent way in which they can possibly be appointed, at the same time, having them work in conjunction with a Government Act. If, for instance, the district of Montreal comes to the conclusion that its purchases and sales of hay make it desirable that an inspector shall be appointed there, the matter is put on the broadest possible non-partisan basis. Montreal has a Board of Trade. That Board of Trade, if applications are made to them by anybody, not necessarily the Government, for inspectors for the purpose of facilitating the purchase and sale of hay, then the Board of Trade appoints a committee of its members who thoroughly understand the hay trade. That committee advertises, and any persons who wish to qualify as inspectors of hay, get a certificate after they pass a satisfactory examination from the Board of Trade. Then the Government, by Order in Council, makes each of those persons an inspector. The inspector gets together an organization and arranges for fees for every ton of hay that he inspects. He pockets the fee and he looks after his own expenses. In the city of Montreal to-day the inspector appoints his own helpers; he pays all his own expenses; he receives what fees are collected, and out of those he pays his help and receives for himself the benefit of what is left over. So far as you can get away from the civil servants and the putting on of an army of semi-dependents on the Government, that is got away from in this Hay Inspection and Sale Act. It is as far removed from what you can call patronage as you could possibly get it. At the same time it is necessary to have some Government supervision which will give power to the inspector to inspect and to collect his fees and which will also hold over him dismissal or whatever penalty wrong conduct upon his part would rightly bring upon him.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has placed the matter in a different light from the impression he created, at least in my mind, in his answer to a question from his own side of the House. I was not objecting to the way in which the men are to be appointed. What I objected to was the policy, as I inferred from the minister's previous answer, that inspectors would be appointed wherever there was a demand for them. I can understand that in a large city, like Montreal or Toronto, inspectors are desirable, but I inferred from the minister's previous answer that inspectors might be sent out to inspect the hay in the fields. I think the minister left that impression on the committee.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did not mean to.

Mr. ROBB: In my judgment, the provisions of section 340, as to standard grades and weights and the manner in which hay shall be pressed, are very desirable, and they have been asked for for a number of years by men in that business. This objection has been raised by them from time to time: We go about buying hay; we know good hay; we go into a man's barn, look at the hay and decide whether it is No. 1 or No. 2 and buy it on the basis of what our judgment tells us the hay grades; we arrange for the man to press it, and then the hay is shipped to New England points. Perhaps such a dealer is buying from forty or fifty or sixty different men. Eventually a complaint comes back from the New England purchaser that some of the hay was stuffed; that it was not good all the way through. The dealer has no way of tracing that hay back to the farmer from whom it was purchased. All the protection necessary for the hay dealer, so far as export is concerned, is a provision by which the hay can be traced back to the man who pressed it.

Mr. BOYCE: I am in favour of this Bill. I have been raising and selling hay for the past thirty or forty years and I have never had any trouble yet, but I certainly agree there is need for inspection. Without inspection I would not be sure that the hay I was shipping to Montreal or Toronto would meet with the requirements. There is a great difference in hay, even in cull hay taken from our best meadows. We shall always have this low grade hay, partly on account of weather conditions. One hon. gentleman has referred to red top. Now our whole idea in farming in the section where I live is good seed, good cultivation, and haying and harvesting under the very best conditions, and where these requirements are met there will be very little trouble. I do not think it would be wise to cut out this low grade hay altogether because it is better than straw to enable a man to run over the winter. I repeat, I think inspection is a good idea, and I am therefore in favour of the Bill.

Mr. DENIS: This is a new law with regard to straw.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is a new grade for straw.

Mr. DENIS: No. 1 straw is not mentioned. Is there no such thing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have never been able to find it. That is the very question I put to my officers, and they say there is no No. 1 straw.

Mr. LANCTOT: I would point out that white straw is often worth 50 cents more than straw damaged by rain on the field. If the straw is to be used for bedding it makes no difference what colour it it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Referring to clause 340D, I am informed that number fourteen standard gauge annealed steel wire is the very lowest quality that can safely be used for baling, but as this clause stands no better quality could be used, and therefore I beg to move that after the word "be" in line 12 the words "of a strength and quality not below" be inserted.

[Mr. Robb.]

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I understood the minister to say that it was only in the large centres where there was a Board of Trade that inspectors were appointed. In that case many districts would be unable to get an inspection at all, and the inspection would have to take place at the point of delivery in the large centres.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What I intended to say was that where there was no Board of Trade the Governor in Council could name a district and similar provisions could be made for the examination and appointment of an inspector. But even where that is not done, an individual who thinks it is of moment to have an inspection, can send for the nearest inspector and have him come out. There are inspectors now in Toronto, Montreal and Kingston.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I suppose it is the intention to dismiss all the inspectors at present engaged.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have no such intention. Why should we dismiss them?

Mr. SEXSMITH: I thought you would have them properly appointed under the new regulations.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They have been working under the very same regulations that we are enacting this afternoon.

Mr. SEXSMITH: They were appointed by the Board of Trade.

Mr. DENIS: Paragraph 340D says:

> All inspecting officers shall where necessary enter in their books their detailed reasons for grading any particular bale or bales of hay or straw.

Now, I am relying upon these words "where necessary." It has been said already, if I understand aright, that there will be no appeal from the judgment of the inspector.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I qualified that statement afterwards by saying that any person not satisfied with the inspection might ask for and get reinspection, but there is no higher appeal board.

Mr. DENIS: Is it understood, if the second inspection does not agree with the first, there will be nothing else to do but go to a court of justice? What will be the value of the testimony of these inspectors before a court of law? For instance, suppose that hay has been inspected the first time, and one of the parties interested is not satisfied with the judgment of the inspector, and goes before a court, what will be the preference of the judge? Will the testimony of the inspector be considered as better than the testimony of other witnesses who are not inspectors, or is the inspector to be regarded as an ordinary witness? The Act does not provide for this, but I think it should not be overlooked.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have two answers to the question. In the first place, this system of inspection has been used more largely in Toronto and Montreal districts and portions of Quebec than anywhere else in Canada. So far as the department knows it has worked satisfactorily. Some differences like that may have occurred, but they have been settled in some way or another. At any rate, they have not formed the subject of complaints to the department, and it has not been considered necessary to establish a higher court or tribunal to deal with the cases. That is probably the best answer I can give to my hon. friend, because it is the answer of experience. As to what evidence the court would most rely upon, I would not like to venture an opinion. The court itself would decide. I am quite sure, however, that no practical difficulties have arisen as yet to justify the formation of a court of appeal. Of course a difference might arise—probably most of the differences would arise—in this way, that since the first inspection something had taken place which altered the grade of the product appreciably, so that it was not as good as before. The first inspector called in to make a reinspection would see whether or not the deterioration had taken place, and the purchaser would have his remedy against the contractor who agreed to deliver so much of such and such a grade. That would have to be delivered, or the purchaser would have his remedy.

Mr. DENIS: We cannot expect that these inspectors' testimony and opinion will be sustained by a court of justice, in opposition to all other witnesses. Consequently I start with the proposition that the inspector is merely a very competent non-partisan witness, and, on account of his position, his testimony should have great weight; but, on the other hand, it should not be regarded as conclusive. I find objection to the words "where necessary," because it leaves the matter altogether in the hands of the inspector. When is the inspector going to enter in his book his detailed reasons for grading any particular hay, and when is he not going to enter in his book those reasons? This would be left entirely in the hands of the inspector, and he would have an absolute discretion. I am now dealing with the case of an honest inspector and I will come to the dishonest inspector later if necessary. An honest inspector who is negligent thinks it is not necessary to take notes when he inspects the hay. Then comes the trial before a court of justice. The Government inspector, upon whom the seller or the dealer, or the party requiring him, will depend, appears in court and when called upon to give his reasons will say: "I have taken no notes and have made no entry in my books, because I did not deem it necessary, and according to the law I was not obliged to." I say the dealer who has been employing this inspector is not receiving sufficient protection, and, moreover, I always object to a provision like this in an Act, because it leaves too much to the discretion of the inspector. Why not say: "Mr. Inspector, you are paid so much a ton to inspect the hay; you will have books, and you will enter in the books the reasons why you are grading that hay No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3." It seems to me that would be of service to the dealers generally.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite understand the point that my hon. friend makes. The discretion is entirely with the inspector in this case. When he thinks it is necessary he has to give reasons in detailed form why he classed the product as a certain grade. The inspector has a quantity of hay to inspect, and inspects it, and everything is clear. He has not the least doubt in his mind as to what grade it is, and he puts that grade on it, and gives no further thought to it. Then he has to deal with other quantities of hay, and has to bestow a great deal of care on the matter, and is a little bit puzzled as to just what grade he should make it to protect himself. Where there is a doubt in his mind the inspector will put down the detailed reasons why he placed such and such a grade on that hay. That provision was in the preceding Act, and is in all our Inspection Acts. The object is firstly to protect the man himself, in case he is at all in doubt as to what grade he should mark on the hay, and secondly to prevent a lot of unnecessary trouble in putting down details as to grades as to which he has no doubt after his inspection. On the other hand, it may be too much to ask that the inspector shall always mark down the details of his examination. If there is no doubt about the grade he will not have to do very much writing. If the inspection is somewhat involved, he will have to do a little more writing in marking down the details, and it is fair that he should be asked to give his reasons for deciding on a certain grade. I discussed that with the officers of the department and they gave me as the reason about what I have given to my hon. friend.

Mr. DENIS: I would like to suggest that these words "where necessary" should be struck out, but, of course, I bow to the minister if he thinks better not to do it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will take a note of my hon. friend's suggestion and before the Bill goes through I will look into it a little more.

Mr. DENIS: The word "detailed" might also be struck out. If we strike out "where necessary" and also "detailed" it will read:

All inspecting officers shall enter in their books their reasons for grading any particular bale or bales of hay or straw.

That would not give the inspector much trouble. It would be done only to a limited extent, and a man could write the few lines necessary to state his reasons in two or three minutes. It now takes about two years in Montreal before you can proceed with a case in court. An inspector may be inspecting thousands of tons of hay, and if he is called in a case two years afterwards his record will be available and it will enable him to give much better testimony. I might take this opportunity of giving to the committee my humble opinion with regard to paragraph 6 of this section, which reads as follows:

All hay or straw facing doorway must be representative of the contents of the whole car.

If I understand that aright, it means that, the car being opened, the inspector will look at the hay which faces the opening of the car and it is required that this shall be representative of the quality of all the hay that is in the car.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is evidently the meaning, but this does not preclude at the same time the inspector from satisfying himself that it is representative of what is in the car.

Mr. DENIS: It seems to be imperative, unless I am construing the sentence wrongly, because it says "must be representative."

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is more in the way of a caution to the loader of the hay that he shall not impose, or try to impose, upon the inspector and the ultimate buyer by putting in the doorway the top layer, so to speak, or the best of the hay. It shall be fairly representative of all. This is not an essential clause but it is a reminder to the packer or loader of the hay, and at the same time the seller of it, that he shall not attempt to impose upon the inspector or the prospective buyer by misrepresenting in the doorway the quality of the general cargo.

Mr. DENIS: This clause seems to me to be imperative. If it is not imperative I would humbly suggest to the minister that he change the form of the clause because, as I read it, it is imperative. It says "must be representative." When the inspector inspects the hay he will form his judgment of the quality on the hay facing the doorway and I do not think anybody can ask him to go farther than that. When the inspector is brought before a court of justice to give evidence as to the quality of the hay he inspected, he will say: "According to law I have examined all the hay facing the doorway and I have not gone any farther." Then, supposing other witnesses come forward and say: "We have examined the hay facing the doorway and we have also examined the whole car" and it happens that for some particular reason the hay facing the doorway is not exactly of the same quality, would the evidence of these other witnesses be accepted being contrary to the testimony of the inspector, because the law says that what is going to be the proof is the hay facing the doorway and nothing else? As the clause now reads the inspection of the hay at the doorway would be the proof because the hay at the doorway would be the only part of the car that could be examined. My objections to this provision are twofold. In the first place, there is an injustice to the seller because, for some reason or other, during transportation, the hay at the doorway may suffer damage through no fault of the seller and it would be an injustice to him if this construction were given to the clause. On the other hand it might be an injustice to the buyer because, if the seller wanted to act fraudulently, he might place at the doorway hay of a better quality than that in the rest of the car. The minister has explained that this paragraph must not be taken too strictly but I would humbly suggest a different wording.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: With reference to the clause which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Denis) has just taken exception to, and which is clause 340d, as I would read it, the purpose is to give the inspector the privilege of grading one particular bale, or ten particular bales, or whatever the number may be in a shipment, differently from the whole consignment. If he does grade a few particular bales differently from the majority of bales in the shipment, he must then, of necessity, enter the grading and the reasons in a book. If it is found to be necessary to grade a particular number of bales of hay differently from the rest of the shipment he must make a record and give the reasons why he has placed a different grade on a number of bales from that which has been placed on the whole shipment. That is the way I would read that section.

Mr. READ: The section really has no reference to the inspector. Is it really not the man who loads the hay that it has reference to? What has the inspector to do with loading a car of hay? Evidently the object of the departmental officers who have advised the minister is to prevent fraud in the selling of a carload of hay by taking a man down and showing him the car when the door is opened. When the door of the car is opened the hay that is in sight is supposed to represent the contents of the car. The inspector has nothing to do with that. The only thing I see wrong in connection with the subsection is that it is put in the wrong section. It should be in a separate section altogether. I do not think it has anything to do with the question of inspection.

Mr. GERVAIS (translation): Mr. Chairman, I believe, that on the whole, clause 340d fairly meets the views of those engaged in the hay business. Paragraph 7 which reads as follows:

All inspecting officers shall where necessary enter in their books their detailed reasons for grading any particular bale or bales of hay or straw.

might be completed by adding to it that a statement of the grounds on which the finding is based shall be given to the purchaser. It is evident that the legislator's intention was to have the inspector state in writing his reasons for rejecting one or more bales of hay or straw. Why should not the inspector be obliged to give the purchaser a statement of his reasons for grading such hay or straw as he has done. That could be effected by adding to this clause: "and a copy of his finding shall be delivered to the purchaser." The latter would retain that copy, which would be preferable, I think, to the present system under which the inspector enters in a book the reasons for his grading, whereas this book may be destroyed or lost and there would then be no trace left of his decision or of the grounds thereof. I believe clause 6 is correct. It is a fact that pressed hay is rather sold on its appearance; it would be foolish to think of buyers cutting the bales open to see whether the grade is the same inside as it is on the outside. I therefore repeat that clause 6 is right in providing that the bales of hay or straw in the rows facing the doorway of the car must be representative of the contents of the whole car. I also believe that clause 1 might be adopted if it provided that in cases where bales of hay or straw of inferior grade are found in the shipment, such bales should be marked in a special manner, set aside by the inspector, and the reasons for which the inspector had thus marked those bales should be entered in his book and a copy of the said finding delivered to the buyer. I think that if this clause were modified in that sense, it would be a sufficient protection and that it might pass as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Boivin) (translation): Does the hon. member offer an amendment?

Mr. GERVAIS (translation): No, it is simply as a matter of suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Boivin) (translation): Then it is not in the form of an amendment?

Mr. GERVAIS (translation): No, a suggestion, merely.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) bases his objection to paragraph 6 of subsection 340D, which reads:

All hay or straw facing doorway must be representative of the contents of the whole car.

The minister himself will see that that provision is of no great importance, because hay is not inspected by a man opening the doors and taking a look at it. The inspector goes and cuts the bales open in different parts of the car, and that is the procedure upon which he bases his inspection. Therefore, the appearance of a carload as it presents itself when a man opens the door has nothing at all to do with the inspection of it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the paragraph is so worded as to give the impression that a glance through the doorway will afford a fair idea of the whole of the contents of the car so that the inspector, when he visits the car, shall merely inspect what is facing the doorway, and then consider that he has done his duty, that officer may be misled. I quite see that an inspection is not a proper one unless the inspector gets at the average quality of the contents of the car—

Mr. ROBB: Unless he cuts the bales open.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And he cannot determine that by looking through the doorway and making up his mind by what he sees from there. I cannot see what good purpose that paragraph represents; it does not seem to me that it strengthens the Act in any way, but that it may have the effect of causing a less rigid and thorough inspection than would otherwise take place. When inspecting a car of grain, that grain must be examined in different parts of the car, and the same thing should be done in the case of a car of hay. One cannot make up one's mind as to the quality of a car of grain or hay simply from looking at what faces the doorway. I also sympathize a good deal with what my hon. friend has stated with reference to the first clause. I do not see any particular reason why, after the inspector makes an inspection, he shall not enter into his books shortly the reasons why he adopts a particular grade. It may be unnecessary when there is no room for doubt, but on the other hand if this requirment is made a part of the Act it will probably make the inspector more careful in his inspection, and in the grade which he adopts, if a record is required at the time, which record may afterwards come up in the decision of any trouble that arises. I have therefore no objection to cutting out the words "where necessary," or "detailed," although I would rather maintain the word "detailed" because any reason is not much of a reason unless it is detailed. I would, therefore, be agreeable to cutting out the words first mentioned, and also the whole of paragraph 6, unless some one who knows more about the subject than I do thinks that this would be detrimental to the efficient operation of the Act. Accordingly I move that subsection 340D be further amended by striking out in the first line thereof the words, "where necessary" and the last two lines of the said subsection.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 340E—License required for pressing hay and straw for sale.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know whether it is worth while spending very much time about this. For the proper protection of the consumer—and after all that is what we are looking for, because the seller will look after himself—there is no doubt that a thorough system of license and inspection, added to grading, is the proper thing to do. But when one comes to look into the matter, one appreciates the difficulties that have to be overcome. For example, inspectors will be needed wherever hay is pressed, and a good many of them. The licensing requirement is not a difficult matter and for statistical purposes would be very beneficial, nor is the license fee important. But if you make inspection compulsory and require the appointment of inspectors wherever hay pressing is done, then you will add very largely I think to the costs of the exchanges or the transfers in this respect. Therefore, I think this year we might go only so far as to arrange the grades and let the Act run for a while in that respect. Perhaps later when we have experience of this law we may get a step further towards that ideal position where the consumer should be absolutely protected from frauds, in the shape of bad weights and bad grades.

Susbection 340E stricken from the Bill.

On subsection 340F—Bales to be tagged showing weight, etc.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move that this subsection also be struck out.

Mr. ROBB: Now the minister is taking away the whole real object of the Bill—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In one respect.

Mr. ROBB: Because, as I pointed out, a man may be shipping five or ten cars of hay that he has bought on his own judgment, to different people in the New England states, and he may receive a complaint that five of these cars were plugged. This is the only method he has of tracing that plugged hay and finding out who loaded it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend sees the other difficulty, does he not?

Mr. ROBB: What is the other difficulty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If you provide that every man who presses hay must have it inspected and tagged with the name, weight and grade, you are under the necessity of sending an inspector with every presser who goes about the country, and of paying that inspector. If this plan were followed, the expense would be multiplied, and on the whole I do not think that we should proceed in this way at present.

The idea is one which I have already spoken of and which my hon. friend would evidently like to see incorporated in the Bill, but this year I do not think we are able to carry it through.

Mr. DENIS: I think some plan should be provided by which the name of the person who pressed or shipped the hay might be readily ascertained. Perhaps this could be accomplished by providing that the label should bear the name of the seller or of the presser rather than the number of his license. In any case, I suggest that some scheme be adopted under which a buyer of hay in the United States or elsewhere may be able to say: this particular bale of hay was bought from so-and-so. If this could be brought about, justice would be done both to seller and to buyer.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DENIS: There is a great deal of good in this Bill, and, in fact, we have accepted the principle of it. I am afraid, if section 340F is struck out altogether, we shall, to a great extent, lose the benefit of the Bill. I therefore move that section 340F be replaced by the following:

340F. Every seller of hay or straw in Canada shall affix to every bale of hay or straw sold or offered for sale a tag, having thereon, plainly written and legible, the name of the seller and the weight of the bale.

This amendment does not go as far as the section drafted, but it retains the provision that on each bale of hay or straw there shall be the name of the man from whom it comes and the weight of the bale.

Mr. BLAKE: If these two clauses are struck out, the usefulness of the Bill ceases. The manner of issuing the license is very important, and the man who packs the hay should be entrusted with the power of grading it. He is there all the time the hay is being pressed, and he can very easily grade it satisfactorily. If he attempts to put the grade down too low, the farmer will attend to that. If there should be added to this Bill a section penalizing the packer if he gives too high a grade, any difficulty in this section would be overcome. If the name of the packer or his license number, and the name of the man who produced the hay and sold it, were on the tag, there would be something by which to trace the hay should there be any packing of straw or other objectionable material. These two sections 340E and 340F, are the crux of the Bill, and the usefulness of the measure depends upon their retention according to the suggested amendment.

Mr. GERVAIS (translation): Mr. Chairman, I fully concur in the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis). I look upon this clause as being so essential, that the Bill, to my mind, would be absolutely groundless without it, and the provision embodied in the Revised Statutes of 1906 would be clear enough by having added to it this particular clause with respect to identification.

The traders complain, and rightly so, of the fact that the hay cannot be identified after it is pressed, sold in big lots, and exported, and I know pertinently that the packers, confident that the stuff mixed up in the pressed hay will not be discovered, will go to the length of mixing with it a variety of things, such as husk, waste taken from the barn-floor or under the press, and so on. The best means to protect the trader, the good hay producer and the good hay seller, is to have an identification mark.

The owner of the pressed hay is a responsible man as a general rule, and the trader may reach him; so may the middleman, the big exporter as well as the trader.

Should this clause not carry—the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce seemed inclined to withdraw clause 340F a moment ago—I think the Bill will be groundless and we might as well withdraw it and be left with the provisions of 1906.

I come from a county where large quantities of hay are produced, and I may say that most of the leading hay producers in my county would have their hay identified and their packing recognized. They are not afraid that their goods be identified, but they want them labelled some way or other, and at the lowest possible cost.

I say, again, that I fully approve of the amendment submitted by my honourable colleague from Joliette, and I believe that this clause should be added to the Bill or that the Bill itself should be withdrawn in its entirety.

Mr. MAYRAND (Maskinongé) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I fully concur in all the remarks presented by the honourable member for Berthier and by the honourable member for Joliette, save one. The preparation, especially under the present circumstances, of an identification mark, is somewhat costly, and we are in war time. Why not have the hay labelled as in the past, by means of a pasteboard ticket introduced under the bales, and which is not lost at the time the goods are shipped?

Why should we oblige the farmers to pay twenty-five cents on every ton of pressed hay to give them exactly what they had before? Moreover, the offering of these tags will entail a certain amount of work, at whatever season of the year it is done. It seems to me that we should retain the label we had before, giving the name of the producer selling the hay and heartily endorse the remarks just made by the hon. member for Berthier.

Mr. DENIS: My hon. friend says that the tag should not be expensive and I have drafted my amendment to ensure that. I have used the word "tag" which, I understand, means any label. If the word "tag" means anything other than label, it might be replaced by the word "label".

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can quite see the necessity of retaining those two sections, if the Bill is to be worked out completely on the basis upon which it was framed. Unless we have compulsory inspection I do not see what good the proposed amendment would do. It is proposed to license every one who presses hay for sale in Canada or for export. There are a great many people pressing hay—a great many farmers, and a great many professional pressers each serving his district. What protection would it afford simply to have the name of the person who pressed the hay and the weight of the hay? There would be no grading at all. It is impossible for everyone who presses hay to be his own judge of the grade of his hay, or otherwise we should have a different grade for every person who presses, and consequently not having any official grade, there would be no authoritative standard, and you would have no redress. If John Jones, a farmer, presses his hay and affixes his name to it, that does not fix the grade; it simply indicates his idea of the grade it ought to be; that is really not a system of grading at all. It would not suffice in any court of law or be an authoritative grade on which purchase and sale could take place. So, unless you have an inspector to do the grading you get no redress by going so far. When you know that the hay you buy in Montreal or anywhere else was pressed in some district in Quebec, all you have is the empty satisfaction of knowing that although the hay is not up to standard it was pressed by such and such a person.

[Mr. Mayrand.]

Mr. DENIS: It is the name of the owner, not of the presser, that I propose to have on the bale?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That does not make it any better. Suppose we license every man who presses a single ton of hay, and make him put his name on it and the weight. Then some one suggests that he should also state the grade. What grade? The owner may think it is No. 1 or No. 2 or No. 3 or No. 4; that is simply his personal opinion. The last person to determine the grade is the man who owns the product to be sold. What kind of grades would you have in the grain trade if you allowed every grain producer to fix his own grade? It would not be official at all; it would be the interested party who fixed the grade, and the marking would be of no value whatever as part of a plan of grading. The mere fact of knowing that a load of hay that did not come up to your expectations was pressed in a certain district by a certain man gives you no redress. But if this House will stand by a system which will license every man who presses hay and make him affix his name and the weight and the grade—the grade to be fixed by a competent inspector—you will have a system which will protect the consumer, but which I think would be very burdensome to carry out all over the country. That is the reason why I abandoned for this year my project of having every hay presser licensed and of having every ton of hay tagged, not only with the name of the presser, but with the weight and the grade as well. By fixing a system of grades, with a chance for inspection all through the country, we are taking a step forward from the position we are in to-day. If I could take the whole step, and do it without overburdening the trade, I would gladly do it; but I am doubtful if I should be justified in trying to go that far this year. I therefore ask the House to take this one step in advance and by-and-by we can take another step.

Mr. ROBB: The minister brings in a Bill to regulate the inspection and control of hay and straw, the Bill gets its second reading and goes into committee, and now the minister is asking us to strike out the only clause in the Bill which will protect the shipper of hay and enable him to trace back to the presser any irregularities. He built up a case of John Jones, a farmer pressing hay, and asked what good it would be to know who pressed that hay if it was found unsatisfactory when it got to market. But unless you have such a provision as the minister himself put into the Bill in the first place, how are you going to trace back any two or three cars that may be unsatisfactory in a shipment of five or ten cars? If the minister is going to strike out this provision, we may as well drop the whole Bill.

Mr. LANCTOT: I understand the minister to say that grading by the farmers would be of no use either to the dealer or to the farmer himself, and I quite agree, but we all know that hay is being graded at the present time. I have been in the trade for the last twenty-five years. I buy hay from farmers—generally so much for the whole lot—and I sell it again to others according to the grade. If we know the name of the man who pressed hay that should not have been pressed, or who mixed hay that should not have been mixed that certainly would be an advantage, especially at this time when many hay dealers in Canada are suffering on account of the heating of the hay. If the information I received from a man who has war contracts with the Department of Agriculture is correct, many cars of hay were rejected at the wharf on account of heating. You can easily see how this would happen when it took trains five or six weeks to go from Canada to New York during the recent bad snow storms. If no precautions are taken by the farmers the hay is bound to arrive in bad condition, and in order to prevent that we ask that the name of the farmer who presses the hay be affixed to his product. If he is caught once he will take care not to be caught again.

Mr. BLAKE: I desire to propose an amendment to section 340E of the Act which will read as follows:

—said presser to grade said hay or straw, and for failing to do so be liable on conviction to a fine of not more than twenty dollars.

I am satisfied that will meet the case and will prevent any danger of improper grading. I think the man who sees the hay when it is being pressed, if he is accustomed to handling hay, will be as capable of judging the quality of the hay as any inspector.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot submit the amendment of the hon. gentleman to the House. He proposes to amend section 340E of the Act. That section was struck out by the unanimous consent of the committee this afternoon.

Mr. BLAKE: Then make my amendment to section 340F.

The CHAIRMAN: I am quite willing to propose the amendment in that shape. but there is an amendment before the committee, and when that is disposed of we will take up the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE: It might be put as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Not in committee.

Mr. MAYRAND (Maskinonge) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I entirely concur in the statements of the hon. member from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot). He told the House that an enormous quantity of hay is likely to rot.

By the way, the House will perhaps allow me to point out the usual conditions of the hay trade in our country places. The hay dealers vie with each other as to who will buy the crop beforehand, caring little for the quality. They have no worse enemies than themselves and they are to a large extent responsible for the poor hay which is marketed.

I must congratulate the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and before long, I am sure, that trade will show a great improvement and the quality of the hay which will be offered for sale will show a marked improvement. On the other hand, there is no denying the fact that hay dealers must mend their ways, cease competing with each other and look after the quality of the hay which they put on the market.

Mr. DENIS: I wish to close this debate with a few more explanations. When I proposed my amendment I meant that the owner of the hay should be required to put his name on the bale, and I feel that this method will afford means of redress in case the hay is not in proper condition when pressed. Some of my colleagues have mentioned the fact that it is just possible, not only possible but it often happens—and as a lawyer I have had cases of this kind more than once—that hay will be pressed in bad condition. If the hay is pressed in cold weather, say in the month of November or December, it will not rot at the time it is pressed, but it will freeze and may keep for two or three months in good condition and present a fairly good appearence until the next spring, as the hay traders know; but when that hay is transported to the United States or some southern country, and during transit the temperature becomes milder, then the hay will heat and rot. I have known of several cases where hay was sent by a dealer in the province of Quebec to the United States, say in January, and it was found, two or three weeks afterwards to be spoiled, because it had been pressed in bad condition. The experts who open up the bales can find out if the hay has deteriorated on account of being pressed in bad order, or because of exposure to snow or rain while the hay was in transit. If it be found that a man shipped hay which had a latent defect, then the man who receives the hay can get redress. Consequently, I think, if the amendment were carried, it would enable a man who buys hay at any time during the year to ship that hay anywhere, and if it turned out that the hay had been pressed in bad condition, he would have the right to go to the man from whom he bought it and say: "I bought your hay, and paid for it, and I am entitled to get my money back, because the hay you sold me had in itself a latent defect; which gives me a recourse at law against you." I propose the amendment with the object of preventing the clause as first drafted passing the House. I believe, right or wrong, that compulsory inspection of hay, with a license system, would be altogether too complicated and costly. Consequently, I am proposing this as a half-way measure, and if it be not accepted, I will withdraw it, and consent that the clause be struck out altogether.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite appreciate my hon. friend's idea. I take his statement to mean that if this is to be coupled with a compulsory inspection it would be so burdensome he would rather the clause should not pass. That is true. I cannot follow my hon. friend in his reasoning with reference to redress, or ground for redress, he would have under the circumstances mentioned. The farmer raises the hay and presses it. My hon. friend says that if it is pressed in certain times it is liable to have a concealed or latent defect, which, months after, would become apparent under certain circumstances. If my hon. friend wishes to propose an efficacious remedy he must prescribe by law the conditions under which, and the time at which, the farmer must press the hay, and must forbid the pressing of it at any other time, because if the hay is not pressed at the right time the fault in it is hidden, to break out afterwards and destroy the quality of the hay. My hon. friend is looking after the interests of the dealer. I think the dealer is quite able to look after himself. The dealer buys the hay, and the farmer himself cannot fix a grade upon the hay. The dealer has to protect himself by having the hay inspected, and if the hay inspects up to certain grades the dealer knows what he is buying. But what protection has he against the farmer in regard to whom there is no law prescribing the exact time and conditions under which he shall press the hay? What redress has he against the farmer who does not give any grade because he is not able to make a grade, and who consequently enters into no contract as to the quality of the hay he is selling, but simply presses his hay and sells it? The dealer can protect himself by saying to the farmer: "I will have that hay inspected first. If it goes up to a certain grade I will give you so much." That would be a protection to the dealer.

I do not see how you have any recourse against the farmer who is not obligated as to the conditions under which he shall press his hay and has no power to fix the grade under which he contracts to sell that hay. Consequently, I do not see that there is any redress in that respect. It is for the dealer to see that the hay he buys, perhaps to sell again, shall be inspected and that he shall get the grade for which he pays. After he buys the hay, it is for the seller to see that he delivers that same kind and quality of hay to the man to whom he contracts to sell. If I could see that it adds to the guarantee or certainty of the dealer getting what he supposed he was getting I would think that it would be well to have this amendment, but that does not appear to me to be the case. To put it briefly again, it is simply this: Here is your consumer whom we are first to protect. The consumer contracts to buy hay of a certain grade at a certain price. The dealer in hay, the seller, contracts to give him that hay of a certain grade at a certain price. The dealer has to go somewhere to get his hay. He goes to the farmer to see if he can get the grade he wants. He can get the grade he wants by having the inspector inspect the hay and fix the grade. Then the bargain is struck. I would like to meet my hon. friend if possible, but I cannot see how the amendment is going to affect the question in the way in which he thinks it will. There are only two things to be done. One is to make the system of grades and inspection compulsory all the way through, and the other is to fix your grades, appoint your inspectors and have the hay graded by the inspectors, and then the dealer and purchaser alike can protect themselves. The farmer does not contract to sell any particular grade of hay. There is his hay, and he asks a price according to the grade, the dealer gets an inspection, the grade is established and fixed, and consequently the contract is made.

Mr. McKENZIE: The point under discussion is a very nice one. I have always admired the certainty and authoritative style of the minister (Sir George Foster). On most questions he is positive, certain and authoritative. I would like to remind him, now that he is sitting between two very eminent lawyers, that he is dealing with a very intricate question of law. There is just one fallacy in his whole argument and that is that a man who sells any article, particularly an article of food for man or beast, contracts to sell a merchantable article. It will not do for him to sell, for instance, butter, looking nice on the outside, in a regulation keg or box, of the proper weight, colour, taste and everything all right as far as the eye can see, although that tub of butter is not merchantable. It is a common-law principle that the man who sells that tub of butter undertakes that he is selling a merchantable commodity fit for the purpose for which he is selling it. If the man's name is on the tub and it turns out that the butter is not merchantable, although it looks all right, or if it turns out not to have been put up in such a way as to stand the journey for which it was intended, not properly salted, or not properly coopered, there is recourse against him. What the hon. gentleman sitting around me want is that the man who sells a tub of butter shall put his name on it so that he may be held responsible. Applying that to the bale of hay, it is quite true that there is no time of the year specified when this man must press his hay; he can press it when he likes. But he must know that he is bound to press a merchantable article. If he presses it in a rainstorm, he must know that he is not pressing a merchantable article and that he is not putting it in the car in a condition to stand the journey. If he puts his name on it he takes that responsibility. It is no hardship to him to be required to put his name on that article. That is all that is required by this very simple amendment. Perhaps it would have been better to have gone farther, but I fully agree with the minister that the conditions should be made as simple as possible, and that it is not well to be piling up burdens on the farmer, or any other person who is working in connection with production. The burden should be as light as possible, but it is no great burden to ask a man who puts any commodity on the market to take the responsibility of attaching his name to it. If any person comes back on him that person assumes the burden of proving that the goods do not come up to the standard.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is purely a question of indentification?

Mr. McKENZIE: Largely.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not understand why the purchaser cannot identify it himself by putting a mark upon it.

Mr. DENIS: I come from a county where there is a great deal of hay being traded in, and this is the way it is done: The purchaser will buy hay from Mr. A, Mr. B, Mr. C, Mr. D, Mr. E, and so on—perhaps ten different persons. After he has bought the hay he leaves it until he gets cars. He does not get cars when he wants them. When he gets a few cars he goes out into the country and says: "Mr. A, will you bring me your hay to-morrow, or as soon as you can?" But he is not going to advise one person only, because it would not give him enough hay to load the cars at his disposal. Therefore, Mr. A, Mr. B, Mr. C, Mr. D, and Mr. E, will be called upon to load hay. Mr. A will load a car, Mr. B will load another car, and so on. But, when Mr. A is through loading, the car is only half filled and the purchaser takes the hay of Mr. B to complete the loading of that car. Another instance: Supposing Mr. A has three or four different grades of hay. The buyer will be loading the same grade of hay on the same car. He may have twenty bales of hay from Mr. A to load on that car, twenty bales from Mr. B, twenty bales from Mr. C and so on. For it is up to the buyer to assort the hay when he loads the cars. Generally a buyer purchases a whole lot of hay, as was stated here this afternoon. A farmer has, say, three grades of hay, and may sell grade No. 1 to one man, grade No. 2 to another man, and so on. But this very seldom happens; generally the farmer will sell his hay at so much per ton for the lot. The dealer buys the hay at a medium price and then assorts it to please himself, and the buyer under those conditions is forced to mix up hay which he bought from several persons. It will often happen that one complete carload will be loaded by one man. In such a case there is no possible mistake; but when two, three or four men load hay on the same car then the hay is mixed. If the name of the owner or farmer is on each bale and it happens that some of the hay rots, the bales can be opened up and it can be ascertained whose hay it was that was not pressed in good condition. To a certain extent it is like mixing bad apples with good apples. The bad hay will rot the good hay after a certain time, and the whole lot will be heated and injured; but if the whole consignment is not destroyed it can be ascertained to whom the bales that were injured belong.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not very familiar with the intricacies of the trade, or of the Bill, but it seems to me that if the purpose is purely to secure identification, the purchaser can put his mark on each bale of hay just as he can put his mark on a barrel of apples that he purchased from any person, and which did not happen to bear any mark that otherwise would identify it. If it is simply identification that is aimed at, it would appear that the purchaser can secure that identification himself if he desires to do so.

Mr. DENIS: If the purchaser placed the mark himself the point would not be so strong as it would be in the case of the seller marking his own name, for he could say: "I marked my name on such and such a bale, and this, or that, is not my hay." But how could a purchaser who is loading hay on cars and doing it in a hurry meet the requirement of himself placing the marks? For it takes some time to do this He would have to hire a lot of men with tags, and these men would write on the tags—what? The name of Mr. Smith or Mr. Jones. These tags would have to be placed on the bales of hay and in so doing the men engaged in that work might make mistakes. It seems very much more simple that the owner himself, while pressing his hay, should put his own name on the bale and so that he could say: "Here is my merchandise, now I can guarantee it."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What guarantee does he give?

Mr. DENIS: He guarantees that the hay has been pressed in good condition, and kept in good condition.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He does if he enters into a contract, not otherwise.

Mr. DENIS: That is the general guarantee of law. These provisions are not in the interest of the buyer any more than they are in the interest of the seller; I think the provisions are equally as useful to them both. But I am urging it more for the farmer's sake than for the sake of the trader. I am speaking for the farmers of my constituency and of the surrounding constituencies who produce a tremendous lot of hay, and I think, from what I have heard, they would be quite satisfied with the provisions I have suggested. It is just the same as a person who wanted to buy Maclaren's cheese; if he were shown a package which did not bear Maclaren's name he would not buy it. In the same manner the seller or producer is interested in having his name marked on the hay, and the man who buys that hay and finds out he has not been deceived—that the hay was just as was represented by the seller—will go back to the same farmer the year after when he wants to purchase a further quantity, and say to him: "The hay you sold me was correctly sold, it was equal to the representations which you made, consequently I can rely upon you." There have been complaints and disputes repeatedly between the seller and the buyer in regard to hay. A man will purchase hay and then find out that a few bales, or a certain quantity of it, is not what it should be, and yet he can not discover whose hay it is that he received in bad condition. All these things happen, and we have seen any amount of disputes about them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In such cases the hay is bought without inspection.

Mr. DENIS: Generally, in the country, the farmers do not have their hay inspected. It is very unwise for a man to sell his hay on grade. A man thinks he has a certain grade, and then the inspector comes along and decides it is another grade altogether. The method of trading pursued is something like this: "Here, Mr. Buyer, is my hay in the barn. Examine it, fix a grade yourself, and tell me what price you are going to give me for the whole thing." That is the way the hay is sold, and it is a very much simpler and surer method for the farmer than having an inspector come to examine the hay and grade it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have had a pretty long discussion over this provision, and I am quite willing to take into consideration what my hon. friends have so tenaciously put forward. Probably it would be just as well if the Committee rose now and reported progress. We will leave the matter over for another day, and if there is any way in which we can meet to some extent the point that my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) has in view, we will see what can be done towards meeting it. If not, we will complete consideration of the Bill. I move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MAYRAND: Mr. Chairman, I——

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but the rules of the House are very severe. A motion that the Committee rise is not debatable. If the hon. minister will withdraw the motion, the hon. gentleman may proceed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The subject can be discussed just as well when we again go into Committee.

Progress reported.

REPORT OF EDITORIAL COMMITTEE.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I beg to submit the annual report of the Editorial Committee on Governmental Printing, which was asked for the other day.

DANGER FROM EXPLOSION OF MUNITIONS.

Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go again into Committee of Supply:

Mr. J. ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Before going into Committee of Supply, I wish to call the attention of the House to a very urgent matter touching the safety of the public, and the avoidance of disaster through the explosion of munitions. I am informed that several fires have occurred at the plant of the Canadian Explosives Company at McMasterville in the county of Vercheres, where tons of t.n.t. are stored. On February 5 I wrote the following letter to the Minister of Militia:

Dear Sir,

I have been informed by several citizens of Beloeil, county of Vercheres, that since about a month, fires have started in the plant of Canadian Explosives, McMasterville. One of these fires was only stopped at about five feet from a large mass of t.n.t., another one caused an explosion a few days ago, which will probably result in death of two men.

I understand there is enough explosive in that plant to cause a disaster similar to the one of Halifax. The lives of the citizens are in danger.

Will you be kind enough to point these facts to your inspector of munitions plants and see that the regulations are observed.

I received the following answer from the Imperial Munitions Board:

Your letter of February 5th, addressed to the Minister of Militia, has been referred to this Board.

The Board has no connection with the plant at Beloeil, and no contracts with the Canadian Explosives, Limited, for the production of t.n.t. at that point. We are informed that the Company is producing t.n.t. for the United States Government.

About a week ago I put on the Order Paper the following questions:

1. Who is in charge of inspection, for the Government, of ammunition manufacture?

2. Who has charge of the inspection of the Canadian Explosives Company at Beloeil?

3. How many times since the 1st January, 1917, has the said company's establishment been inspected, and what are the dates of said inspections?

4. Is the Government aware that fires recently broke out in the said establishment and were extinguished only a few feet from storage containing t.n.t?

To which the following answers were given:

1. The Chief Inspector of Arms and Ammunition at Quebec.

2. No official of the Department of Militia and Defence is charged with the inspection of the Canadian Explosives' premises at Beloeil.

An examiner (under the jurisdiction of the Chief Inspector of Arms and Ammunition) is stationed at Beloeil for the purpose of inspecting such supplies of ammunition and explosives as may be ordered by this department from time to time.

3. The Government has no information.

4. No.

It may be added that the inspection of ammunition and explosives for the Imperial Government is carried out by representatives of the Imperial Ministry of Munitions of England, who are not under the jurisdiction of the Department of Militia and Defence.

I understand from this answer that when munition plants are not manufacturing for the Dominion Government, there is no inspecion. I should like to be informed by the Government with regard to 9 p.m. that matter, because if disaster occurs it will be too late to pass regulations for inspection. Does the Government intend to have this plant inspected in order that the safety of the public may be ensured? I understand that a very large quantity of t.n.t., which is a dangerous explosive, is stored at Beloeil.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman gave notice to the Minister of Militia that he intended to bring this matter up. Whether he did or not, it happens that the Minister of Militia is not here, and no other member of the Government who is present is familiar with the circumstances. I shall be very glad, however, to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Militia and to ask him to reply to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That will be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—Ottawa Parliament building—restoration—The plans for the said building and the method to be adopted for securing the reconstruction thereof to be subject to the approval of the Joint Committee appointed by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, $1,500,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the present state of this work, and when may we expect to be reinstated in the new building?

Mr. CARVELL: A week ago I invited the members of the House to visit and inspect these works, and I am very glad that a great many availed themselves of the opportunity and are thereby as familiar with the real state of the work as I am. Generally speaking, the structure of the building is about completed, excepting the main tower and six smaller towers, the steel of which has already been erected. The remainder of the work yet to be done is in the nature of finishing up. The plan of the new building is very different from the old. Along the front, from the outside, it looks about the same, but that is the only respect in which the plan is the same as that of the old building. I had hoped up to the last month or two that it would be possible to have the building completed so that it would be ready for occupation during the next session of Parliament, but I am afraid that that will be a physical impossibility. Two buildings, practically complete in themselves, occupy the sites of the old House of Commons and Senate chambers; these, for purposes of designation, are called office blocks. They comprise most of the three upper storeys of the building, the remaining part of that space consisting of rooms for committees and other general purposes. These office blocks are lighted on both sides from very wide wells, and will embrace, I think, eighty-four offices, each about ten by twenty feet. We anticipate that these will be completed by 1st November, and while it may seem like sacrilege, I confess that we intend to occupy this part of the building, when it is completed, by such members of the Civil Service as can be put in them. This course is being taken because the amount which we are paying for rent in Ottawa is simply terrible, and it is only good business to utilize every foot of space that is at all available. The building is being constructed by a committee, of which I happen to be chairman, by virtue of my office. All purchases are being made by tender and contract.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who are the other members of the committee?

Mr. CARVELL: From the Senate: Sir James Lougheed, Hon. Robert Watson and Hon. G. D. Robertson; from the Commons: Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, Dr. Reid, Mr. Calder and myself. I think that is all. The system followed is practically this: A board consisting of the two architects and the deputy minister meets from time to time and decides upon what is required in the immediate future. It then makes a recommendation to the Parliamentary Committee, asking the right to call for tenders. Advertisements calling for tenders are inserted in a number of the leading newspapers, wherever it is thought it will be necessary, and when the tenders are opened they are examined by the technical officers. A report is made to the committee, and the committee decide upon the letting of the contracts. Contracts have recently been let for the heating, the plumbing, the ventilation, the heating plant, the wiring, and the conduits. What I call the heating plant is the boilers and automatic stokers. Tenders have been called for for steel casements for the windows. That matter has not been finally decided. Tenders have also been opened for the furnishing of panel boards, switch boards, transformers and electrical supplies. Those have not yet been decided. I can only assure the House that every dollar that is being expended in that building is passing under the strictest scrutiny of the Parliamentary Committee, and the lowest tender is in every case being accepted, unless the very strongest reason can be given to the contrary. We have not accepted the lowest tender in every case, but if we have not, it is because there were reasons so potent that the ordinary man would not have accepted the lowest tender. The amount spent up to date would be in the vicinity of $3,000,000, or perhaps a little less; it was $2,700,000 some two or three months ago. It would be pretty hard to form an estimate of what it will take to finish the building, but it will run to at least $5,000,000, and possibly a little more, depending to some extent upon the character of the inside decorations. The House, I think, will agree with me that if we are going to finish the building we should finish it properly. If we come to the conclusion that, on account of the financial situation, we cannot put in the proper decorations, we should not put in decorations at all. It is the intention to finish the building as expeditiously as possible, making it more than a building for commercial purposes, a building that to some extent will be suitable for the capital of the Dominion of Canada. Some portions of it may be considered as a work of art. The public will agree, I am sure, if we are erecting new parliament buildings for the Dominion of Canada, we should build practically the latest thing in the architectural world to-day.

Mr. MURPHY: What system of heating has been decided upon? I ask this because, prior to the beginning of the work, in fact, before the selection of a committee to superintend the work, I wrote the then Minister of Public Works, suggesting that there be employed a certain modern method of heating which would do away with boilers and all that kind of thing in the building itself. The reply I received indicated that some such idea as that would be adopted. Later on I saw it was proposed to heat the building by electricity, but, judging by what my hon. friend has said to-night, that scheme has not been carried out.

Mr. CARVELL: As regards electricity, this is the first intimation I have received that such a method of heating was in contemplation. We would have to have another water-power practically equal to the Chaudière, in order properly to heat this building by electricity. Somebody has to devise a new scheme of electrical heating before it will be commercially feasible for a building of that kind. The contracts have all been let for the heating plant, which consists of a central plant on Cliff street, down from the Hill, near the old Supreme Court building. The plan provides for six large boilers with automatic stokers. It is to be a hot-water heating system. I am speaking now without any actual knowledge, but I think I am right in stating that the scheme is to send the steam up the hill in large pipes, this steam to be used to heat water in the building for circulation throughout the building. That is, we transmit the steam from the central heating plant to the building rather than transmit the hot water. It is a technical matter on which I am not in a position to pass judgment.

Mr. MURPHY: It is a hot water system.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but the hot water is heated by steam generated in the central plant. This plant will be of sufficient capacity to take care of the heating in the East Block, the West Block, the Langevin Block, the post office block and the Supreme Court buildings. As the system is on a unit basis, it might possibly be extended.

Mr. MURPHY: What has been decided with regard to the main tower? There appears to be provision made for a portion of it, but, though that has stood there for a length of time, yet either for reasons of convenience in connection with the rest of the work or because the plan has not been finally adopted, the work has not been gone on with.

Mr. CARVELL: That is largely because the architect has, as he says, been dreaming over it. There is no reason why he should not keep on dreaming for a few months longer. Naturally, and I think quite rightly, he wishes to have, from an architectural point of view in connection with the rest of the building, the best tower he can devise. The main tower will be built in front of the building as now erected, and it is to be 44 feet square at the base, running up that size perhaps 150 feet. I am speaking now offhand. It then tapers off to some extent. I am not architect enough to describe to my hon. friend all the beauties of this tower, but when completed it will be 260 feet from the ground level. The foundation will undoubtedly be laid this year and possibly some portion of the substructure, but I do not think it is the intention to complete the tower until another year. It is not a necessary portion of the building. There is, in my judgment, no reason to spending the money involved, a fairly large amount, until we have to spend it. The building could be completed and occupied without the construction of this tower, although it is the intention to proceed with it and complete it in the ordinary course of affars.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood the minister to say that by next November it would be possible to occupy a number of rooms in the new building for office purposes.

Mr. CARVELL: Eighty-four rooms.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister justifies that on the ground of saving rent?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Might it not be possible to do something of the same kind in connection with the chambers of the House of Commons and the Senate—not that it would result in a saving of rent, but it would result in Parliament meeting, so to speak, in its own building again. My hon. friend mentioned that the question of decorations had not been actually decided upon. I understood him to say that matter was still open, and he added that if the decorations were to be gone on with, it was desirable that they should be excellent in every respect, and, in fact, the very best that can be found in the Dominion. With that I entirely agree, but the two chambers might be sufficiently advanced for the purposes of occupation, and the decorations could go on in the recesses between sessions. I merely offer that as a suggestion to the minister.

Mr. CARVELL: I have a great deal of sympathy with suggestions offered by my hon. friend, and I can assure him that meets with a great deal of favour by different members of the Government.

Of course, we are, in the judgment of the House, very largely in connection with this national building. The only difficulty is that the contractors and architects say it is impossible; I do not mean impossible in the sense that it could not possibly be done, but practically, they say, it is impossible, and I would not want to urge my views against the professional views of such men as the contractors and architects of this building.

Mr. MURPHY: Impossible to have it ready for next session?

Mr. CARVELL: Practically impossible. I pressed it upon them very strongly—in fact, I commenced pressing it over three months ago—and other members of the Government have also pressed it, but the architects are very strongly of the opinion that it would be a very great mistake. Eighty-four rooms could be finished, and I think that would be quite sufficient for the use of members of the Government and hon. gentlemen, but the difficulty is there will be practically no offices ready for the officers of the House, and as my hon. friend knows, it takes a very large amount of space to take care of the requirements of the officers of the two Houses of Parliament. I am rather forced to the conclusion that it would be almost an impossible task to have the building reasonably ready for the next session of Parliament.

Mr. JACOBS: I trust that in the tower which the minister has described proper provision will be made for the lodgment of such state prisoners as we may have to take care of from time to time.

Mr. CARVELL: It is my intention to fix up a room in the basement of the tower for such characters as my hon. friend has described.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. JACOBS: That is absolutely unconstitutional. The proper place to put state prisoners is in the tower.

Mr. COPP: If I remember correctly, the work was to be done by force contract. Does that apply to the whole building?

Mr. CARVELL: That included the whole building from the basement to the top of the tower, everything on the outside and everything on the inside.

Mr. COPP: Would the contractors get a certain percentage on such work as the heating?

Mr. CARVELL: It covers everything one could imagine that goes into the construction of the building.

Mr. CAHILL: Is hot-water heating a good system?

Mr. CARVELL: The hot-water heating system passed the experimental stage years ago, and it is to be found in the large buildings and hospitals and universities in Toronto and Montreal and practically every American city. There is no question whatever about its economy and its usefulness. I cannot give my hon. friend exact figures as to what the architects think will be saved, but there will be a very great saving of fuel and in cost, and it will do away with all dust and soot. There is just as much difference as between the steam car and the electric street car. Every one knows that in a building heated by an internal plant there is a large amount of dust accumulating all the time, and this will be absolutely eliminated in the new building. From the standpoint of cleanliness and economy I think there is no question whatever as to the advisability of a central heating plant.

Mr. CAHILL: I was not thinking so much of the isolation of the plant as of the merits of the hot-water heating system.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know enough about the technical side of it to answer my hon. friend, but we all know that all over this country buildings are heated by steam or by hot water. Generally speaking, I think the hot-water system is not used in very high buildings. This question has been gone into very thoroughly by the technical officers, and they have decided on the hot-water system as being the best and most economical method of heating.

Mr. COPP: What percentage is paid to the contractor under this force agreement over and above cost?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not the contract with me, but from my recollection they get eight per cent up to $4,000,000, seven per cent for the next million, and I think there is no commission after $5,000,000.

Mr. JACOBS: Are any members on this side of the House assisting the minister in the plans for the new building?

Mr. CARVELL: I regret to say, there are none.

Mr. MURPHY: In that connection, and having regard to the question asked by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Copp) may I suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) who, I know, has not lost his regard for economy although he does not occupy his accustomed place on this side of the House, that he would see that the decorations do not form part of this contract on which the contractors are to get seven and eight per cent. I do not think that the present contractors, eminent as they are in their own line, occupy any particular place in the artistic world in Canada, and I think my hon. friend will be well advised to terminate the contract as soon as he reasonably can, and I would suggest that the decorations be made under some other arrangement. In any event my hon. friend will admit that the present contractors are not artists for decorative purposes, although artists in other directions, I admit, particularly in contracting.

Mr. CARVELL: I was not a member of the committee when the contract was made. I might go back and say that I think my hon. friend was a member of the committee at that time.

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. CARVELL: And therefore he would be in a much better position to speak of the exact terms and conditions than I would be. But whether my memory is correct or not, I think I am safe in saying, from what the building has cost up to the present time and from the contracts that have already been entered into, that the building will cost $5,000,000 exclusive of decorations, and as the percentage stops at $5,000,000, the point of my hon. friend is therefore not so very important. If there was not the $5,000,000 limit, the committee, I think, would be well advised in considering whether they had the power to terminate the contract at that point or not.

Mr. MURPHY: Suppose the actual construction cost was $4,500,000, that would leave a margin of $500,000, and if that is to be used for decorations, I submit that it should not form part of the original contract. My hon. friend will remember that my name did appear on the committee, but I never acted, for reasons which it is not necessary to go into now.

Mr. CARVELL: The word "decorations" covers a very broad field.

Mr. MURPHY: You will make it an elastic term.

Mr. CARVELL: It covers a very great part of the building. For instance, I would include in the word "decorations" the marble arches, whether the entrance be finished in an elaborate manner or not. If you finish that hall in marble, as I think a large part of it should be finished, that work must be done by just such men as the present contractors. If, on the other hand, we are to have a plain wall covered with valuable paintings, I think my hon. friend's criticism would be very much to the point, but I can assure him that it is not intended to finish this in painting, but in something very much more substantial, and I am satisfied that $5,000,000 will have been expended long before we come to the time of paintings and such artistic decorations as will be covered by that term.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was appointed a member of that committee two years ago, and, like my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), I resigned, after having attended the preliminary meetings of the committee, not that I found much to be criticised up to the time of my resignation, but when I resigned I found we were overstepping the mark. The Parliament of Canada had voted a certain sum toward the restoration of the buildings as they were before the fire, but then it was decided to raze what was left of the buildings and to erect a new Parliament building. I thought I had not been appointed a member of that committee to erect a new building, but to restore the old. Be that as it may, the construction has gone on, and I must say that I have no fault to find, from an architectural point of view especially. I think this new building will be a monument worthy of Canada. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Russell when he says it is quite a different thing to complete the artistic part of that building and the purely structural part of it. I believe that Peter Lyall and Company are a very reliable firm, and with regard to the erection of the structure itself, I think they stand well as the head of their profession in Canada. But with regard to the artistic end of this monumental building, I say that the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Russell should be accepted. The Parliament of Canada, comprising the House of Commons and Senate, is not an ordinary building. It is a national temple, so to speak, and will last for generations and generations. It has been my privilege to travel twice around the world, and I have seen many parliaments, and I may say that all parliaments are profusely artistic in their completion. We need not go beyond Canada. The Parliament buildings in Quebec are really a gem; but to proceed from one country to another, the Capitol in Washington, the House of Commons in England, the Palais Bourbon in France, and the new Parliament buildings in South Africa, are some of the most artistic buildings in the world. It seems to me that the young artists of Canada should contribute towards the completion of the interior of the building, and that we should imitate what has been done at Westminster, England, where you read on the walls of Parliament the whole history of the English people and of the English nation. You have there splendid paintings, and sculptures which are masterpieces. You have the same class of works in Washington and in Paris. We have a history behind us in Canada, and we have a great future ahead of us, and if a concours were established, it seems to me we would have something to stimulate the genius of our young artists, and at the same time to commemorate the salient facts and great periods in the history of Canada. It is not necessary that this commemoration, in view of the present financial crisis, should materialize at once, but plans can be laid out for the future, as a concours of that nature always takes months and years before being realized. I am just throwing out the idea.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think there is any question whatever that my hon. friend is right. I have not read over the contract, but it would take a great deal of argument to make me believe that the Parliament of Canada appointed a committee to purchase valuable paintings. As I view it, we are to erect buildings, and it may be a hundred years before the decorations are finished.

An hon. MEMBER: We can not wait that long.

Mr. CARVELL: No, perhaps we cannot wait. I do not think there will be any intention on the part of any one to pay a commission to the present contractors for supplying paintings in the future. I think my hon. friends can rest assured as to that At any rate, if I occupy my present position for a few years, hon. gentlemen can rest assured that we will erect the building, and let posterity take care of the artistic side of it.

Mr. COPP: When this contract or agreement was entered into, I understood the intention was to repair the old building. We all know that the architects reported upon the walls of the old buildings shortly after the disastrous fire, and stated that very large portions of them were good, and all that they could be repaired and built upon. After the information I received at that time, like many other, I was quite surprised on returning to Ottawa during the summer to find that the buildings had been absolutely razed, and that a new building was being constructed. I am not saying a word of criticism of the hon. minister in reference to the action he has taken, because this arrangement, I understand, was made by a committee of which my hon. friend was not at that time a member, and the agreement was entered into for the purpose of rebuilding the structure on what is known as a force contract. The builders were to receive 8 per cent profit on the cost of the work up to $4,000,000; and on the cost from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 they were to receive a profit of 7 per cent. I understand that somewhere in the vicinity of $3,000,000 has been expended?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, in that vicinity

Mr. COPP: That being so, the contractors have made a very handsome thing in the past year on this work. My hon. friend says there is an agreement in regard to this matter. In the present condition of business in this country it might be decided that a contract might be changed or varied to a certain extent and an opportunity given to others without giving too much profit to any individual. I have nothing to say against the contractors; they are men who have been in this business for years and as far as I know they have a splendid reputation for doing work of this character. There may be an argument that it would be better to construct certain public works under force contract rather than under the regular contracting system. That might have been so if the original intention had been followed of repairing the building, for changes might be found necessary in the course of the work and these could be more readily made under a force contract. But it is only up to a certain point, possibly in the construction of the stone work and the steel structure, that the work should be conducted in this particular way. When the committee asked for tenders for putting in the heating system, the ventilating system, the sanitary arrangements and the elevators, for which I understand contracts are let, there is no good reason why others outside of the contractors for these different classes of work should be given a percentage or a rake-off, in view of the fact that they have nothing whatever to do with the work. When the committee make a contract under which the builders will have a percentage on work with which they have nothing whatever to do, it seems to me that it is not in line with good business principles.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend knows I was not a member of the committee when the contract was made. I can only state what is known to a great many hon. members, and to the country generally, that when the main contract for the reconstruction of the building was made it was believed that a large part of the old walls were intact and could be utilized again. I think, however, my hon. friend will admit that the moment it was decided to put the Commons Chamber in the western end of the building and the Senate in the eastern, it became necessary to tear down a portion of the new work that had been erected in 1907-8. My information is, and I think it is correct, that when the engineers and architects made a critical examination of the building in the spring of 1916 they found they were in error in their first report that practically all the outside walls should be retained, and they decided to tear them down. The architects decided to tear them down. I believe without even the consent of the Minister of Public Works of that day. I would like to recall to my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) the fact that right up to February of this year the former member for St. John, now the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, was a member of that committee. I believe he has had as great an experience in public buildings and public construction as most men in Canada, and he heartily concurred in the decision of the committee. When he has such eminent authority as that, I do not think he ought to criticise me for at least following along in his footsteps, believing that whatever was done was done with the best intentions possible.

Mr. COPP: I distinctly said I was not offering any criticism of my hon. friend with regard to his course except at the present time. I recall the hon. gentleman as having taken strong ground that changes might be made in the interest of the country. In so far as blaming him for following in the footsteps of the former member for St. John is concerned, I may say that that gentleman has gone to a place of safety and he is not responsible to Parliament or to the people in this matter. If my hon. friend follows in his footsteps he must assume the responsibility as well as the honour.

Mr. MURPHY: In answer to a question of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a few days ago, I understood the Minister of Public Works to say that it had been decided not to include quarters for the Speakers within the new building. Is that correct?

Mr. CARVELL: That is correct.

Mr. MURPHY: Has any arrangement been made to provide quarters outside of the building?

Mr. CARVELL: No, none whatever. There is a building down in the expropriated area, known as the Manuel house, which the present Speaker has been examining, and it is just possible that it will be fitted up temporarily for the use of the Speaker until such time as some definite plan can be decided upon. Outside of that there have been no arrangements or even discussions as to what provision will be made for a Speaker's residence in the future.

Mr. MURPHY: There used to be frequent references in the press, in the initial stages of this work, to the scope that it was likely to assume, and I recall several very elaborate descriptions of a stack room underground on the face of the cliff or the Lover's Walk. Has that been decided upon as a part of the new building, or has anything definite been done in regard to it?

Mr. CARVELL: Nothing has been done about that whatever. I am speaking now without all the data before me, but I am sure that no decision has been made, and I do not think it probable that that question will come up in the near future.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the exclusion of the Speaker's chamber due to lack of space or to other considerations?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think it is so much for lack of space. There is an enormous amount of space in the new building. I think I am safe in saying that the architects, and a great many people who have investigated it, came to the conclusion that with the ceilings about 20 feet high an ordinary room would look more like a box turned on its end than a room. It would be an ungainly affair and you would have to have rooms with ceilings such as I have described unless you put the Speaker's quarters up on the third or fourth story. Personally, if I have any feeling in the matter, I would prefer to stick to the old custom of having the Speaker's house within the Parliament buildings. That may be only because I still have some veneration for the antiquities, the records of the past and the traditions of our fathers. But, after all, we are living in a progressive age, and because Speakers from time immemorial have had their residence in the House of Commons, both in the old country and in this, I do not suggest that we should still follow that custom. I must confess that it is an open question, and without having any strong feelings one way or the other, I think that in what I am saying I am voicing the sentiments of the gentlemen who were on the Committee and by whom it was decided that probably it would be better to forsake the traditions of the past and have the house for modern Speakers either maintained by themselves, or by the country, in some other locality.

Mr. FIELDING: I hope I am not lacking in veneration for the older things, but it is not on that ground alone that quarters should be provided for the Speaker. If it is a matter of principle that the Speaker or any official shall have a residence, there is something to be said in favour of it; and in that case there is an obvious advantage in locating the Speaker's quarters where he can be easily accessible. If the policy upon the matter has been settled, there is no use in discussing it, but if it is still an open question I certainly favour the idea that the Speaker should have an official residence, and that it should, if possible, be within the Parliament buildings. In the old Parliament buildings the trouble was, not that the Speaker had a residence in the building, but that quite a number of other people also had residence there, and if they were all to be again included I think the minister would be quite right and that there is no particular reason why the accommodation should not be used for other purposes. So far as the Speaker of the House is concerned, and I think the remark also applies to the Speaker of the Senate, if they are to have official residence, there is an obvious convenience in having them within the Parliament buildings.

Mr. CRONYN: I would like to say that not only should the Speaker be accessible during the session, but as he is charged with the oversight of a great deal of what goes on inside the House, residence on the spot would be an obvious advantage. Nor does it seem to me that in modern days, when buildings are equipped with elevators and so forth, there is any great objection to putting the Speaker's residence in an upper story. There are, indeed, advantages to be enjoyed under such circumstances, particularly with such a site as the one occupied by the Parliament buildings here.

While I am on my feet I would like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) when he expressed the hope that we might get into the new House before next session. Despite what the minister has said, I am inclined to believe that if sufficient effort were made we might be able to occupy and utilize the chambers and sufficient of the new buildings to carry on our work next session. Speaking as a back bencher, who, save when the House is empty, has not the luxury of a front seat, but has to sit on a wooden chair at a very awkward angle, it does not appeal to me that we should be condemned for another session to the present chamber. After all, though Parliament is the place for talk, it has also been well described as a factory for the turning out of the Acts which govern the country, and it strikes me that the plant of this factory is about as inefficient as one could find. Even this evening, and perhaps this is due to my own disability, I had the greatest difficulty in hearing what the Minister of Public Works was saying. He speaks loudly and distinctly, but in this chamber you often lose a great deal of what is said. I feel quite certain that the poor attendance of members in the House is at times due to these causes of discomfort and bad acoustics. There has been some talk of "ginger groups" in the House. I think if we formed a "ginger group" we might do something towards spurring on the architect with this work. As I understand it, the trouble is not so much with the contractor as with the architect. As the minister has said with regard to the tower, the architect desires to dream for some further days of its beauty. Well, let us finish the interior in some habitable way and let the beauty come later; there will be plenty of time for that. I would still have hope that something may be done to hurry things so that we might get into the new quarters next session.

Mr. McCREA: The contractor's commission, I understand, is eight per cent up to four million dollars, and after that seven per cent. What commission or remuneration does the architect receive for his work?

Mr. CARVELL: I think it is five and a half per cent.

Mr. McCREA: That probably accounts for his wanting to demolish the whole building.

Mr. CARVELL: I have never asked what animated him, and therefore I am unable to answer the question. I can, however, inform my hon. friend that there are two architects, and between them they receive, I think it is, five and a half per cent commission. They furnish all the technical assistants, with their clerks, and the five and a half per cent covers the total cost to the country of designing and supervising the construction of the building.

Mr. PEDLOW: I was one of the members who had the extreme pleasure of visiting the new Parliament buildings at the invitation of the Minister of Public Works a few days ago, and I enjoyed the privilege very much. In rambling through the buildings with the Minister of Public Works and the chief architect, the matter of the completion of the Commons and Senate chambers was thoroughly discussed, and I was given to understand in a measure that the completion of the chambers in time for the next session of Parliament was not such an impossibility as seems to have been conveyed to the House to-night, in fact, that it was not altogether impossible. I heartily agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) that, while grumbling at our surroundings may not come with a very good grace from a new member, especially in war times, yet when better conditions could possibly be provided by a little extra effort, that effort should not be lost sight of. I felt confident, from the assurances given me by the Minister of Public Works, that a strong effort would be made towards that end. My own views, on the occasion of our tour through the buildings, did not quite coincide with the ideas of the architect, who was disposed to take all the time possible in completing the structure, and was not disposed to hand over the buildings for occupancy until such time as he had put on the last flourish. However, I do not think the architect's ideas should prevail altogether. I suggested that the workmen should be concentrated from now on upon the completion of the Commons and Senate chambers. If that were done I think there should be no difficulty whatever in having those sections at least finished in time for the next session of Parliament.

The hon. member for London suggested that possibly the present House would be more comfortable if there were a few more "ginger groups" in it. An hon. gentleman on this side then made the suggestion that we had an exhibition by a "ginger group" not long since, occupying seats almost exactly where the hon. member for London at present is sitting, which was very much enjoyed by members on both sides, and also, perhaps, by a portion of the gallery. I think where the "ginger" is required is behind the architect. If the committee who have charge of this matter on behalf of the Government, and have the say-so, give the architect distinctly to understand what they want, and insist upon having both chambers finished in proper time, their views would in all probability be carried out.

Mr. EDWARDS: Reference has been made to Hon. Mr. Pugsley, the former Minister of Public Works. I did not see very much in that gentleman's record as Minister of Public Works to commend itself to me, but that may have been my fault, not his. We should, however, speak kindly of the absent, as we do of the dead. I am in agreement with the determination arrived at by the Committee to tear down what remained of the walls after the fire. I do not know whether any of these walls could have been utilized, but, though I had no special knowledge of the subject, I thought from the first that it would be a mistake to give the new building an appearance of patch-work by utilizing such walls as were not entirely destroyed. Our country is too big and has too great a future to justify our patching up such an important building as this. With regard to living quarters for the Speakers of the Commons and the Senate, I believe that no place should be provided in the building for that purpose. I would not provide quarters for the Speaker of the Senate, at any rate, because the Senate does not sit very late, and after the Senate rises the Speaker of that House might better be off in a quiet place by himself, resting for the duties of the next day. Why should we provide, in a building constructed for legislative purposes, living quarters for the gentleman who happens to be appointed Speaker for three or four years, and is succeeded by somebody else for a similar period? I would give the Speaker only such office quarters as are necessary, where he could be communicated with during office hours by members of the House who desire to see him. Perhaps some hon. gentleman can give me a reason why the Speaker of the Commons or the Speaker of the Senate should be provided with living quarters within the building or a residence outside; for my part I see none. As to our going into the building before next session, it is true that we should all like to do that. The acoustic properties of this Chamber are about as bad as they possibly can be.

If one happens to be facing the gentleman who is addressing the House, it is possible to hear what he says, but if you are behind, it is difficult indeed to hear. While we should all like to get into the new building by next session, it must be remembered that we are spending $5,000,000 in the construction of a home for the future legislators of our country, and we should not proceed with haste. We have had to put up with inconveniences here for a few sessions, and we can stand them for another session, if necessary. It is not desirable that the construction of the building should be unduly rushed, because as Canadians we all want to see the new building, when it is finished, the finest on the North American continent. It is not a question of a few hundred thousand dollars; the people of Canada are not going to quibble over the cost of this building, which should last for all time. I agree that the contractors should not make anything out of such things as pictures and decorations—I am glad to have the minister's assurance in that regard—but there should be no cheese-paring in the matter of the cost of the building. We want to make it as fine as architectural genius can make it; we want it to be something which may be pointed to with pride by the people of our own country and looked upon by others who come here as something worthy of this great country and its future.

Mr. MURPHY: With the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) I am in complete agreement as to the disappearance of the Speaker's residence from the Parliament building. I see no reason for an official residence for the Speaker within the building. The reasons advanced by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that the Speaker should be at all times accessible does not entail the placing of an official residence within the walls of the Parliament building. So long as the Speaker has an office there, like any other official of Parliament, and is accessible within office hours, that meets all the requirements of Parliament. The very presence of these quarters in the old building led to certain features that nobody would associate with legislation—some of which, I think, the member for Shelburne and Queen's had in mind when he made his brief remarks. For that reason, I hope that the present decision to keep the building free of an official residence for the Speaker of either House will be adhered to. I need not add anything to the suggestion made to the minister as to the general desire that exists for completing the building. At the same time, that advice must be qualified, as the member for Frontenac has said; we must not rush the construction of the building at the expense of its excellence. That, I am sure, is not in the mind of any hon. gentleman who has spoken this evening.

Mr. BUREAU: Would it be possible to have work on the chamber proceed to the extent that we could occupy it during the session, and to suspend the work on the building while the House was sitting? Of course, we are all anxious to get into the new building in order that we may have more comfortable quarters, but to rush the completion of the chamber itself might be detrimental to the rest of the building. At the same time, it would not be desirable for us to deliberate while the noise of hammers and saws was being heard around us. I think that we should go on with the work gradually, so that when we occupy the building we shall be not only comfortable, but quiet as well. As to the quarters for the Speaker, I agree with the member for Frontenac. It is not often that we meet on the same ground and shake hands, but tonight it happens that we entertain the same opinion. I do not believe that the Speaker of either House ought to have living quarters within the building. As long as they are where we can reach them, the purposes of Parliament can be served; if the Speaker has an office in the building that is all we want. He may live in any part of the city, and proceed to and from the House by motor car or other means of transportation; so that it would not be any disadvantage to members if he lived outside.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Tramway.

Mr. BUREAU: We may require him after the street cars stop running. It would be better for the country to pay for a motor car to be used by the Speaker than to establish quarters for him within the Parliament building.

Mr. MICHAUD: When my hon. friend speaks about the noise of saws and hammers around the House of Commons, does he include the Senate?

Mr. CARVELL: I am glad we have had this discussion, and I would not have objected had every member of the Committee to-night expressed his views upon these matters, because the Government as such is taking practically no responsibility over the erection of this building. We look upon this as the home for the future Parliament of Canada, and, as such, it is being constructed by the Committee of the Parliament of Canada, acting, of course, under the advice, to a very great extent, of the technical gentlemen who have been employed to assist it. The very fact that there has been such a difference of opinion expressed here to-night as to whether we should hurry on the work so as to occupy the building next year, and whether we should have the Speaker's quarters within or without the building, or anywhere at all, shows that the committee have some difficulty in deciding upon these very important questions. I have no objection whatever to the "ginger group" to which my hon. friend refers, in discussing the matter from every angle, and I would not care if there was a "dynamite group."

Mr. BUREAU: Have them on the lawn.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as the construction of this Parliament building is concerned, I would be glad to hear all the criticisms and all the suggestions which any hon. member can offer, because I realize this is not a contentious matter. It is purely a matter of getting the very finest building which we can get consistently with the reasonable amount of money at our disposal. But I am very much impressed by the suggestion made by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). He is usually pretty logical when he wants to be.

Mr. BUREAU: When he wants to be? That is a modification.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend suggests that it will be pretty hard to hold a session of Parliament with a hundred workmen working all around us finishing up the remainder of the building—for I do not believe it would be possible before next session to do more than finish up those 84 rooms, the two chambers and some of the corridors. There would have to be an army of workmen working in and around the building while the House was in session. There are other things hon. members are forgetting. This would give no accommodation for the working staff of the House. We must have accommodation for the officials of the House. If my hon. friends can devise any scheme whatever whereby they can hurry up the architect, or the contractor, or the committee, or any other person or body of persons having jurisdiction or power, I shall be very glad to carry it out. But it would not be good business to hurry up the completion of the building at the expense of efficiency.

Mr. MURPHY: As to responsibility in the matter, I would draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the contract is not made with the committee. The contract is between the Department of Public Works and the contractor. The contract was executed by the Minister of Public Works who represents His Majesty, the King, and the contractor, not by the committee.

Mr. CARVELL: I presume that is true because the committee would have no legal standing.

Mr. NESBITT: I just wish to endorse what has been said by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) with regard to the Speaker's quarters, and also with regard to hurrying up the erection of the building to the neglect of the work. Most of us are anxious to get into the new building—I am not particularly worrying about it; I can sit here as well as anybody, although the new building would be much more comfortable than this one—but I would not like to see the work neglected on account of too much haste.

Mr. EULER: Any one who has seen the stage to which the new building has been carried will admit that it is practically physically impossible to complete it in time for the next session of Parliament. I would just like to make one suggestion. I agree with all that has been said about the discomforts of this chamber. As a new member, possibly I should not pass my opinion, but it is quite true this chamber is not what it ought to be, and the suggestion I wish to make is this: that the authorities ought to endeavour to make it as comfortable as possible for the next session, if we do have to spend next session here. Perhaps one of the greatest difficulties with which we have to contend is in the matter of acoustics—we cannot understand the members as they speak. That difficulty can very largely be overcome if every hon. member who rises to speak attempts to speak as distinctly as possible, and I believe we ourselves can overcome most of the difficulties in that direction for one session at least. I would like to express the opinion that, when the seating arrangements of this Chamber were made, they seemed to be made with the one distinct idea of making them as uncomfortable as possible. I am referring to the chairs and the seating arrangements, and the matter of heating and ventilation. Many of us have perhaps acquired the first colds of this winter since coming into this House. It is quite possible, with a little care, to make the accommodation here a good deal better than it has been.

Mr. BUREAU: The fire alarm system in this building indicates by lights on what story a fire occurs. Should a fire start on the second story, a light of a certain colour will appear showing where the fire is. Is that the system to be adopted in the new building, or is the old system to be used?

Mr. CARVELL: I could not answer that question; in fact I do not think the matter has been discussed. The system installed in this building is certainly a very excellent one. It was installed by a gentleman who is employed on the staff, in fact, who has charge of this building. By pressing a button, it indicates by a light which floor the fire is on, and whether it be to the right or to the left of the main entrance. It shows the stand pipe and it is certainly a wonderful contrivance. As regards the new building the matter has not been discussed, but it would certainly be worthy of discussion.

Mr. MURPHY: The new building will be fireproof?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and I cannot conceive there will ever be a fire in the new building. That may be a violent assumption.

Mr. BUREAU: The Titanic "could not be sunk."

Mr. CARVELL: This is stronger even than the Titanic. There will not be a particle of wood of any kind or description in this new building excepting the doors, and, I think, base boards around the inside of the offices. There are no door frames as such; there are no wooden window frames or wooden sashes; everything is either metal or concrete. Therefore, while you might burn the desks and papers in a room, while you might possibly conceive of such a condition of affairs that would burn the doors, that would be the end of it, so that I am not bothering my head very much about a fire alarm in the new building.

Ottawa eastern departmental block—new fireproof roof, etc., $120,000.

Mr. CARVELL: This item has been carried along for a number of years, and it is very doubtful if any money will be expended during the coming year. In peace times it would be proper to expend this money, not so much to make the East Block waterproof because it is that very well now, but to make it fireproof especially that portion of the building occupied by the Finance and Treasury Departments. They have fairly safe vaults. Money is scarce, and the roof will have to be in a good deal worse state than it is now before we shall spend any money on it this year.

Ottawa—new public building, $1,000,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What has the minister in contemplation?

Mr. CARVELL: When I assumed the duties of Minister of Public Works, pretty nearly every morning a request was laid on my desk for more space, and the officers of the department were spending a good deal of their time hunting around the city seeing where it was possible to house the Service. The Service, of course, has grown very much of late and necessarily so; the war has brought additional responsibilities, and adequate quarters must be provided for the officials. I asked the deputy to furnish me at once with a statement of the number of buildings, their location and description, rented by the Government in the city of Ottawa. I have not the list here, but I can tell the committee in a general way that when this statement was made up some two months ago we were paying rentals in the city of Ottawa amounting to $657,000 a year. To be absolutely accurate, I should say that some portion of that covers heating and elevator service paid for by the landlords, but after making every reasonable deduction, I think I am safe in saying that the actual rentals paid by the Government in the city of Ottawa amount to $600,000 a year, and they run all the way from 40 cents to $1 and $1.25 a square foot—I know of one case where it is even more than that. There seems to be no plan or system upon which one can go. It is a question to some extent of location. Those new buildings on Sparks street, for instance, naturally command a higher rental than older buildings. But the Government has been driven to the point where it is not a question of getting the best building on Sparks street, but of going wherever the space can be had and paying almost what the landlords like to charge; we are about in the position that we have not anything to say about it. Now it was proposed by the officers of the department that we should erect a building on the block between Albert and Queen streets, on the west side of O'Connor street. That, of course, raised a question which has been discussed in the newspapers to a great extent, and I am finding no fault with that, because that is what newspapers are for; every member of the community has a perfect right to go to the newspapers and discuss matters pertaining to the public welfare. Some three or four years ago a commission was appointed to prepare and lay before the Government a general plan for the construction and development of governmental offices. That plan is now in our possession, and while I am not sufficient of a landscape artist to pass judgment upon it, it looks all right to me. But if we erected to-day a building in keeping with that plan, north of Wellington street, either west of the old Supreme Court buildings or on Sussex street, it would necessitate a pretty high type of building because I do not think the people of Canada would want those in authority to erect permanent office buildings on a grand scale unless they were built in keeping with the general architectural design submitted to the Government. I think I am safe in saying that it will cost 75 per cent more to erect a building to-day than it did four or five years ago or than it will cost probably four or five years hence. The question of time is also a very important element. I could not bring myself to believe that I should be justified as a business man in starting on the erection of a building in keeping with that general plan. We should be spending a very large amount of money for the space we obtained, and should also be losing a lot of valuable time, because we could not possibly have any one unit of a building of that class ready for occupation inside of two or three years. We therefore got the officers of the department to figure on an ordinary office building on the site which I have mentioned. I thought I expressed my wishes in fairly clear language; I think I have the faculty of making people understand what I mean as a rule, and I certainly wanted nothing but a real, good, substantial business block erected. The site we decided upon is 200 feet square, and we proposed to erect a building 200 feet long by 150 feet wide, with an opening in the centre 100 feet by 50 feet; that would give a corridor around the whole building, which was to be nine stories high, and every room would have light and air on one side. We asked the Chief Architect to make an estimate, and in the month of January he estimated that a building of this size containing 700 rooms and 140,000 square feet of floor space could be erected for $1,076,250. We estimated that the site would cost $200,000; so the building would cost altogether about one and a half million dollars. I took the matter up with Council, where it was discussed and decided upon as a matter of policy. Specifications were prepared and we called for tenders, but before the tenders were in for the main building it was thought—and I am satisfied we were correct—that we could do better by calling for tenders for the steel work ourselves, making a separate contract for that work. We received a tender from the Dominion Bridge Company for $334,000, and one from the Hamilton Bridge Works for $358,000. The architect's estimate was $325,000. We therefore accepted the tender of the Dominion Bridge Company, the lowest tender. When the tenders were received for the main building, by adding to that the tender we had received from the Dominion Bridge Company, we found that the building was going to cost —I do not want to give the exact figures here because it might affect future tenders —some four or five hundred thousand dollars more than we had been told it would cost. When those tenders were brought to me I naturally asked some questions, and going over the specifications I found that we were building a work of art instead of a business building. I found copper roofs, copper doors, marble slabs, in fact everything which a man could imagine from an artistic standpoint. But I did not find it very much better from a business standpoint, and therefore I gave instructions to cut things down and see what could be done. They are working at it now and producing wonderful results. The new plans will be ready for inspection probably within the next day or two, and if we can succeed in having this building erected on a purely business basis and for a reasonable figure, we are going to do it; if we cannot, we shall have to resort to some other expedient.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the site been purchased?

Mr. CARVELL: A portion of it has. The question came up about the value of this site. Personally I was in favour of putting it in the Exchequer Court.

However, we had a couple of good men in the department detailed to start it and see what they could do. One of these men especially had a large experience in a mortgage company in valuing both city and country property, and he has satisfied me at least that he is able to buy these properties perhaps cheaper than we could obtain them if we went to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is he?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. C. H. Hunter.

Mr. PEDLOW: This is not the property Mr. Acres made $22,000 out of?

Mr. CARVELL: No, that is another part of the city I can assure my hon. friend that nobody will make 22 cents commission on this purchase. We have settled with three parties for a sum in the neighbourhood of $125,000. We are still negotiating with the other parties, and I have strong hopes that some amicable arrangement can be made. Of course, if the owners of the land will not come down to what the department consider fair and reasonable, we will have to put them in the Exchequer Court; but I have strong reasons for believing it will not be necessary to do that.

Mr. MURPHY: In the meantime, some of the buildings have been torn down.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and a portion of the site, one of the most valuable lots, was owned by the Government heretofore, and occupied as a museum. That and some smaller buildings have been torn down. One or two of the lots were vacant. If the building is erected on the site proposed, there would be light on four sides. We will have Queen street on one side, O'Connor on the second side, and Slater on the third side, a fifty-foot open space on the west side between that and the next building; so there will be light on four sides, access on four sides, a well 100 feet by 50 feet in the centre, and a street car line going right by the building. In my judgment it is good business to erect a building of this kind, get into it and save rent, because the interest will not amount to anything like the amounts we are paying in rents, and it may possibly have a salutary effect on some of the landlords in Ottawa.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. MURPHY: Within that time is it contemplated that it will be completed?

Mr. CARVELL: We believe, in fact, we are sure, that had the former specifications been such that we could have let the contract upon them, the building would have been finished by the first day of June, 1919. We hope to have it ready for occupancy on 1st July, 1919.

Mr. EDWARDS: What floor space is the Government renting now?

Mr. CARVELL: Speaking generally, it is a little over one million feet. The Public Works Department have rented 885,000 square feet, the Imperial Munitions Board 77,000 square feet, and the Department of Militia and Defence 184,000 square feet, and those three items put together make about 1,146,000 square feet of rented space.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Dominion Government pay for the rental of the Imperial Munitions Board building?

Mr. CARVELL: No. I am simply giving, for the information of the House, the amount of space occupied by the public service at Ottawa. The Munitions Board finance themselves, and while, of course, a large amount of money is furnished by the Dominion to that board, it is really loaned to the British Government and charged up to them.

Mr. FIELDING: Some years ago the Government bought a large block of land lying west of Mackenzie avenue, between Mackenzie avenue and Sussex street, for building purposes, and on that block the Customs building was erected. Is there any remaining portion of that land not built upon? Have we vacant land there?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, we have a large amount of vacant land there. I might say it is being very largely occupied now temporarily for work shops and stone sheds in connection with the construction of the new Parliament building, but that is only a temporary arrangement.

Mr. FIELDING: Would that be the reason it could not be built upon, or is it because the character of the building already there is different from that which my hon. friend contemplates?

Mr. CARVELL: Both. I do not look upon the fact that it is now temporarily occupied as very much of a bar to using it for a building, if we desired to do so. That building could be moved to another part of the city, but I am opposed to erecting a building there, unless it be a building along the general plan reported or recommended by this commission to which I have referred, or by some other commission. My opinion—and I think I am voicing the sentiments of practically every gentleman in this House—is that when the Dominion of Canada starts out to erect housing accommodation for its officials, the building ought to be something in line with the splendid building which Parliament is going to occupy, and I am safe in saying—in fact we have lots of expert testimony from the officials of the department—that it will cost from 50 to 75 per cent more per square foot of space to erect a building of such a general character than it will to erect the kind of building which we propose to put up in another part of the city. I do not think anybody would feel justified in erecting a nine-story office building as a part of our permanent government institutions. I admit that, so far as I am concerned personally, I would never consent to erect a nine-story office building on any lands which we hope in the future will be the permanent home of the official staff of the Government of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman refers to the special plans. I fancy he has reference chiefly to the plans contemplated for the lands west of the Supreme Court, but the land to which I refer has already on it the Customs House, and I suppose any other buildings that were erected there would have to conform to the architecture of that building, and that might be very much more expensive than what my hon. friend has in mind. But I think the general plan—referring to the buildings that might be erected west of the Supreme Court—would hardly affect the class of building to be put up on land on Mackenzie avenue.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not the recommendation before me, but I can assure my hon. friend that the recommendation of the Federal Plan Commission did cover the land on Mackenzie avenue, as well as the land on Wellington street. In fact, they went so far as to cover the site of the Russell House —and it was "some" plan. However, I am not violating the plan; I am leaving that for other hands to despoil. I am trying to exercise real good horse sense in putting up an office building as cheaply and as expeditiously as we can.

Mr. FIELDING: The plans referred to did not deal with these buildings. It was a much larger matter. It was a plan for the creation of the federal district of Ottawa, and covered a pretty wide area. Or was there a distinct plan for building separate and apart from that?

Mr. CARVELL: I think they, in their wisdom, took into consideration not only what the Government should do, but what all the rest of the people of Ottawa should do. They even went so far as to say you should put an office building here, and a residence there, and almost put the ban on any person who decided to put an office building there and a residence here. However, I am not violating the Holy Writ of that plan. We are simply trying to put up an office building in that portion of the city where other office buildings are, and where it can be used to the best advantage by the Service at large, for the least possible money.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would hesitate a good deal before erecting another building on Mackenzie avenue, as mentioned by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). I am told that, if the truth were known about the money sunk in the foundation of that building it would be a case where truth is stranger than fiction.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course, I know it cost some money.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand they began building that foundation on the side of a mountain, that it was slipping down from time to time, and that instead of making some inquiry and finding out where the foot of the mountain was, they kept building until what they had built slipped down to the bottom. That is a very expensive way of getting a foundation.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid my hon. friend is drawing on his fertile, Scotch imagination, because the Customs building is certainly a very excellent building. It is true it cost a great deal of money and there is no doubt that they found a very unsatisfactory foundation and were compelled to go down to a very great depth. I do not know that that had much to do with the decision to erect this building on Queen street, because I understand that, as they went north on Mackenzie avenue, they found that the foundation became very much better, and that in the opinion of the engineers the remainder of the space referred to by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) would be quite satisfactory for the erection of any kind of public building. The thing that weighed with the officials of the department, myself included, was the fact that we did not feel we would be justified in putting up a fairly cheap business block on that portion of the Government grounds, and we did not feel justified in going to the expense of undertaking the erection of a permanent building in accordance with a general plan in the present financial stringency.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am told that the foundations of the new Montreal Customs house are on a par with those of the Customs Department in Ottawa. I am told that it is impossible to find a solid bottom. There has been any amount of money sunk there too.

Mr. CARVELL: "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. CAHILL: If I am right in my calculation, you are paying about sixty cents a square foot for the space now occupied. Do you expect to make any saving on that by the erection of this new building?

Mr. CARVELL: We are paying very much more than sixty cents a square foot for such accommodation as this new building will furnish. We are paying probably, on the average, from 85 to 90 cents for the accommodation such as this will be. It was figured out in the report which I read to the House a while ago that a million and a quarter dollars, the total cost of this building, including heating, elevator service, and everything in connection with it, would represent about 68 or 69 cents per square foot of area.

Mr. CAHILL: Including depreciation?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, that takes in depreciation and interest upon investment. That takes in everything that the ordinary commercial company or individual would consider if they were erecting a building as a business proposition. If the building were going to cost half a million more than that, I would have to reduce my figures to that extent. I can only say to the House that we are not going to erect a building to cost half a million dollars more —that is all there is about it.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it not on a cubic foot basis that the cost of buildings is estimated instead of on the square foot basis? Another question. Have you taken into consideration whether the fire protection service in the city of Ottawa will reach the top of a building nine stories high?

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: I have not personally investigated that, but I can only say that if the fire pressure in the city of Ottawa was sufficient to reach the top of the Parliament Buildings at the time of the great fire, there cannot be much difficulty about it reaching the top of a building 110 feet high down in that part of the city. It is only a nine story building, and you will find buildings on Sparks street, a couple of blocks away, from 25 to 30 feet higher still. I do not think there is any question about that. As to the other question raised by my hon. friend, it is true, I believe, that when architects are estimating the probable cost of a building they take the cubic contents, but it is also true that when they are renting buildings it is done upon the basis of the floor area, taking the actual inside measurements of the offices themselves and disregarding the halls and elevator space. When I quote the figure of 141,000 square feet at a certain price, I refer to 141,000 square feet of actual office space exclusive of corridors and elevator space. By the same method of calculating, you arrive at the cost per square foot of the buildings which are being rented by the Government in Ottawa.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the minister erects this large building, will he be able to give up any of the buildings which are now rented, or will he require this building in addition to what we have now?

Mr. CARVELL: I certainly think so. If my hon. friend will take the figures which I gave, he will see that this building will contain a little more than ten per cent of the total space of the rented buildings in Ottawa. My judgment is that from this day forward the amount of space required will decrease rather than increase. For instance, in one branch of the Militia Department, nearly 300 employees have been dispensed with in the last two months. The work of co-ordinating the different branches has progressed to such an extent that they can dispense with the services of a great many clerks, and I think that will be true of very many departments of the public service. There is no question that the addition of 140,000 square feet of space will release at least that much rented space and probably very much more than that.

Mr. KAY: I understood my hon. friend to say that the Parliament buildings would not be completed for the session to be held in January, 1919. Does he know when they will be completed?

Mr. CARVELL: We have had expert evidence from about twenty-five hon. gentlemen here this evening, and there was such an extreme disagreement among them that I would not like to venture an opinion, but I think I would be safe in saying to my hon. friend that if he lives—and I hope he will—until the session which will probably begin in January, 1920, he will have a seat in the new House.

Mr. KAY: Has my hon. friend considered the possibility of using this Museum for office space when we have vacated it? If the Parliament buildings are ready for use in January, 1920, we would vacate it, I think, early in the spring of 1919, and it would be available for office space.

Mr. CARVELL: That depends very largely on my hon. friends. You know that under our system of Government it is the Opposition that determines the length of sessions, and if my hon. friends want to get away early in the spring of 1919 they will not find any objection from this side of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: We have had bad examples in the past.

Mr. JACOBS: We are not an Opposition; we are merely friendly critics.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not considered the possibility of using this building for office space, but I think the suggestion is well worthy of consideration. I see no reason why all this space, in time of war and for some time thereafter, should not be occupied as office space until such time as we can get more permanent quarters elsewhere.

Harbours and Rivers—St. John Harbour, improvements, $250,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This item is full of reminiscences, full of thoughts of past great men, or at least great men who have passed out of this House.

Mr. CARVELL: Not passed away, by any means.

Mr. McKENZIE: There were two set speeches that we always used to get upon any item relating to the harbour at St. John. They were magnificently well-framed and well-delivered speech of the present Governor of New Brunswick, Mr. Pugsley, and the effective reply of the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Hazen, who is now the Chief Justice of the province. Whenever we heard the one, we were positively certain to hear the other. And to-night I am saddened by the thought that we shall not hear the one or the other.

Mr. CARVELL: We will keep away from Courtney bay to-night.

Mr. McKENZIE: I remember distinctly that the last time an item of this kind was up for consideration, just for devilment, so to speak, I took issue with the gentleman who is now the Chief Justice of New Brunswick by telling him that there was no harbour in St. John at all, it was only the place where there was a continuous battle royal going on between the St. John river and the bay of Fundy. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works on what battle front he proposes spending this money?

Mr. CARVELL: I will be just as frank with my hon. friend as he has been with me. I have a slight recollection of those set speeches to which he has referred; they were always well-worded, and they always arrived at the same destination. One sure thing is, I am not going to land in Courtney bay to-night. I am sorry to say I cannot tell my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) exactly where this money will be expended, or whether it will be expended at all. There was an appropriation of a million dollars in the Estimates last year for the harbour of St. John, and when I assumed office a contract awaited signature for the construction of a breakwater between the end of the present breakwater and Partridge Island, which would have cost three-quarters of a million dollars. I did not feel that I was justified, in view of the present financial stringency, in going on with that work. I decided that in so far as it was possible I was going to retrench to the very last dollar, and I did not know of any place that would be as good a place to start that policy as at home. Therefore, I refused to sign that contract. Now there is a very great deal of agitation that that work should go on. There is also a great deal of agitation that work shall go on in the remainder of the harbour; and I tell the committee frankly that I am not in a position to-night to state exactly in what portion of the harbour this money will be expended, or whether it will be expended at all. I sincerely hope it will. I hope things may be so arranged that we will be able to expend at least that amount of money, but I want to assure my hon. friends that if it is expended it will be on behalf of the transportation interests of the country and not to carry out anybody's pet schemes or theory.

Mr. COPP: And not on force account either.

Mr. CARVELL: And not on force account either.

Quebec Harbour, Champlain Dry Dock, $355,000.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the work of the Quebec dry dock?

Mr. CARVELL: This work is at Lauzon, but I christened it the Champlain dry dock. I thought it was very fitting that a big dry dock at that portion of the river St. Lawrence should bear the name of the great explorer.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Champlain is also somewhat of a New Brunswick name.

Mr. CARVELL: That is true, Champlain was in New Brunswick before he went to what is now the city of Quebec. I may say that the work is practically completed; it merely requires some finishing touches, although of course, it will take some time to finish up many of the details. This is simply the item which it is estimated will finish up the work and pay the drawback and other items in connection with it. I do not mean to say by any means that the sum of $355,000 will be required for the new work. There is still a large amount of drawback in the hands of the Government, and to complete whatever is required will take the large amount of money estimated.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From what quarry is the stone taken for this work?

Mr. CARVELL: I am informed that the granite comes from Megantic. I do not know that there is very much stone used in the dry dock. I was there in December —some question having arisen between the Government and the Davy Shipbulding Company over the purchase of land, and spent half a day on the work. I was very much interested in the amount of work completed, and also in the magnificent dry dock I found there. It is practically a concrete dock, and I do not think there will be very much granite or stone of any kind used in its construction. I was informed, however, that whatever granite was used came from Megantic.

Mr. POWER: Can the minister tell me whether the price of the land is included in this vote or the amounts previously spent?

Mr. CARVELL: I can only say that the price of the land is included in the amount previously given, but what that amount was I am not in a position to state at the present time. This estimate is intended, or expected at least, to entirely cover and pay off everything which will remain to be paid in order to finish the dry dock with its power plant,pumping arrangements and everything in connection with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think it is very important that the work should be proceeded with as soon as possible, because I was told yesterday by Mr. Davy, who happened to be in Ottawa, that the partial blowing up of the Halifax dry dock would bring a lot of ship repairing business to Quebec; in fact, that the shipyards of Quebec and Montreal would have to look after mostly all the business of ship repairing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope that my hon. friend, or any other members of the House either, will not get the idea that the Halifax dry dock is out of commission. That dock was put out of commission by the explosion which occurred last winter, and I may as well state here, and I am glad to have the opportunity of doing so, that the Minister of Railways and Canals and myself spent three or four days in the city of Halifax after the explosion. At that time there were eight or nine ships in the harbour which would have to enter the dry dock, and we at once entered into negotiations with the owners, the dry dock being a private institution. The owners claimed that they were unable to finish the dock, and would not finish it. They wanted us to buy it, which we did not feel like doing, and we started in to make repairs. The owners are to pay towards the cost the amount of their insurance, which is $11,000, and we are putting up the balance, an amount which will not be very great.

However, the first thing was to get this dock in commission, and it has been in commission for nearly two months. The ship that was in it was repaired and sent out, and I believe that another has since been taken in, repaired and sent out. The Halifax dry dock, therefore, is operating just as it was a year ago. But that does not obviate the necessity of placing the Champlain dry dock in commission at the earliest possible moment; in fact, it could be operated almost immediately. This dock is in two compartments: there is a gate in the centre which can be closed so that one end may be used as a dry dock and the other to contain water, or vice versa. The outer section could be, and, I imagine, is, being used to-day. In addition to that, we have the old dry dock, which has answered the purposes of the St. Lawrence during the last twenty or twenty-five years. I can assure my hon. friends that the work will be pushed forward as rapidly as possible, and will be entirely completed within a few months.

Mr. McKENZIE: I should like to know what the policy of the Government is in the matter of building dry docks. Do we own a dry dock at Esquimalt?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and one at Kingston.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The dry dock at Esquimalt was passed over from the Imperial Government to the Dominion.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not aware that the Government owns any dry docks on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. CARVELL: No. The Government has no particular policy with regard to the construction of dry docks except that which is embodied in the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, which was passed in 1908 or 1909 and subsequently amended. The dimensions of a first-class dry dock have been increased to 1,150 feet in length, and a guarantee of interest is provided at 4½ per cent for a period of thirty-five years on an amount not exceeding $4,500,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Attempts have been made by different Ministers of Public Works to make the Dry Dock Subsidies Act more attractive than it was at the beginning, but so far no business concern has taken advantage of its provisions. If the Government are going into the business of building dry docks, private companies will not take advantage of this Act, because they would then come into competition with the Government. I suppose there is not much use in suggesting any large public expenditure just now, but I wish to point out that the harbour of Sydney, with its proximity to Newfoundland and its importance in connection with trans-Atlantic traffic, is becoming a great shipping and commercial centre. But, excepting a marine railway, no facilities have been provided there to take care of ships. I understand that the matter has been discussed in the other House by Senator McLennan, who comes from practically the same place that I do. I should like the enterprising Minister of Public Works to take into consideration the fact that we have great need for a dry dock in that part of the country, particularly in view of the presence there of large steel works; and I hope that he will remember this, if the policy of building dry docks is to be carried out by the Government.

11 p.m.

Mr. CARVELL: I appreciate everything my hon. friend has said about the harbour of Sydney. It is certainly a very beautiful sheet of water, especially in summer, and I hope that some enterprising citizen or citizens in that part of Nova Scotia will come forward with a business proposal under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act. If they do, I assure him, they will receive every encouragement that the department can give them. The same applies to similar proposals which might be made in other parts of the country. A floating dry dock has been built under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act by the Vickers people in Montreal.

Mr. McKENZIE: That was imported from the Old Country?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. Another floating dock which was brought from the Old Country, has been built at Prince Rupert under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act. I think these are the only two which have been built under that Act. However, the Act is there, and it is open to any body of capitalists who wish to invest some of their own money in these public enterprises to take advantage of its provisions. I should like to inculcate a spirit of giving into some of the capitalists of Canada. I have watched them very carefully during the last fourteen or fifteen years, and I have observed on their part a great willingness to receive public money; I hope that I can now cause them to realize the importance of the duty of giving money to the public. I should like to see these gentlemen put up some of their own money to build these works, accept Government subsidies, and become real patriots. By doing this they would build up a better public sentiment than we have in Canada at present. I do not say that the Government will or will not adopt any particular policy with regard to the construction of these docks, but I throw out the suggestion to many capitalists who have grown wealthy during the last three or four years, that they come along with a real business proposal for the construction of dry docks in the large centres of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Vickers people have been very enterprising. I happen to know that firm because their works are located in my new constituency of Maisonneuve. Although they had invested a large amount of money, for many years they did little work. Since the war began, however, they have been fortunate, and at the same time they have rendered valuable service to the British Admiralty. During the first year of the war I saw there two or three cruisers which had taken part in the famous naval engagement off the Falkland Islands. The Vickers have been growing and developing, and I daresay they have to-day one of the largest shipyards on the North American continent.

Mr. CARVELL: They come within the class of men whom I should like to see doing business in this line.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I call attention to the danger which exists of our crippling the shipyards of Canada if we apply not only the spirit but the letter of the new Order in Council concerning conscription to employees of ship-building establishments? Conscription is the law, it is true, and must be obeyed. But I was speaking yesterday to a prominent shipbuilder who was at a loss to understand how the Government could deprive his shipyard of from one hundred to two hundred of his hands—riveters, heaters, riggers, shipwrights, plumbers, furnace men, boilermakers, draughtsmen. Although it seems rather easy for any one to become a heater or a riveter, yet this shipbuilder was explaining to me that it took not months merely, but several years of training for a man to become a good heater or a good riveter. I beg to draw the attention of the Government to the necessity of protecting, I shall not say the shipbuilding of the country, but the ship-repairing that will take place during the months to come. I was just mentioning the case of one or two cruisers which took part in the engagement at the Falkland Islands and which were repaired at Vickers during the first year of the war. Since then, this has not been made public, but the Vickers Company in Montreal and the Davy Company in Quebec have done a quantity of work for the Imperial Government; they have built submarines, destroyers, chasers and trawlers. They have contracts with the Imperial Government, the Dominion Government and the governments of the Allied countries. They have cancelled some contracts which they had with neutral governments. We should treat this question as business men and see to it that this industry is not crippled at this very crucial moment of the war.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite appreciate what my hon. friend states. I realize the importance of those shipyards, as I had the pleasure of going through them in December last. I was very much impressed with the evidence of business which I saw there. I shall be glad to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Militia and Defence to the statement made by my hon. friend this evening.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: What is the total cost of the Champlain dry dock, including land?

Mr. CARVELL: Speaking roughly, about $3,400,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: On the 25th of March the minister, in answer to a question of mine, stated that the cost of the dry dock was $3,077,460.28.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend probably was not in a few minutes ago, when an item of $355,000 was passed by the committee to take care of work that has yet to be done, the drawback and things of that kind. I am speaking roughly, but the total cost of the work will be around $3,400,000.

Mr. PARENT: This amount of money is very well spent. For years past, I remember, the shipping interests have made every effort with the Government to secure a dry dock to accommodate big ships, should an accident occur. Special efforts were made after the disaster to the Bavarian, a large ship which was coming near Quebec when an accident happened, and which could not be repaired on account of lack of a dry dock to accommodate it. Quebec now affords possibly the best harbour in the world, comprising an area of about twelve square miles with a depth of water of about 150 feet. There is no other port in Canada that can boast of having such a fine harbour as that of Quebec. Will the minister express his opinion as to the possibility of utilizing such a nice harbour as Quebec harbour as a free port?

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid my hon. friend is asking me to answer something which I would not feel in a position to answer. I have not given the matter any study. Possibly at some future time I might give him a more studied opinion upon it.

Quebec Harbour—River St. Charles—improvements to navigation, $15,000.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Has the contract placed with Quinlan and Robertson, of Quebec, been cancelled?

Mr. CARVELL: The contract has not formally been cancelled, but the works were closed down early in the summer of 1917, and, I think I am safe in saying, with the consent of the contractors and of the Government as well. The contractors have been paid off practically everything coming to them, and this $15,000 it is hoped will be sufficient to settle up the matter to date. The contract has not been cancelled and closed up because Quinlan and Robertson, like many other contractors in Canada, are claiming they are entitled to compensation for the closing down of the work. They base their claim on various grounds which, perhaps, it would not be proper to discuss here. There is the closing down of the work, and they want us to buy their plant, and so on. Those matters have not yet been settled, but I hope they will be in the near future. This item is purely for the purpose of paying them the amount of money which we believe will be due to them when the accounts are finally straightened out. It is only an estimate; the amount may be more, it may be less.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: If I ask this question, it is because last year it was rumoured that Quinlan & Robertson had made a demand on the Government to cancel the contract. The Quebec Board of Trade, also the Quebec City Council, at the time interviewed the Hon. Mr. Sévigny, who stated that a demand had been made to the Government, but that the matter had not been settled and that the work would go on without interruption.

Mr. CARVELL: I entered the department only in the month of October, and I really do not know what decisions were arrived at before that date. If that was the policy early in the summer of 1917, there must have been a change of policy before October, because I know it has not, since the month of October, been the policy of the department to proceed with the work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When did Mr. Sévigny make the promise?

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Last spring.

Mr. CARVELL: There must have been a change of policy during the summer.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is the minister aware that the city of Quebec, to obtain the work on the St. Charles river, made considerable sacrifices in placing a contract with the Government, and that the work was to be proceeded with without interruption?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not aware of that, and I want to say to my hon. friend that we have not by any means abandoned the work. It was simply not considered strictly essential work during the present financial stringency. My hon. friend from West Quebec (Mr. Parent) has just boasted of the splendid facilities of the harbour of Quebec, all of which is true, and as this was intended to take care of local shipping more than of ocean-going shipping, it was felt it would not be justifiable to spend a large amount of money under present conditions. I have always understood that the construction of those works would be of very great advantage to the city of Quebec in providing a great trunk sewage system. However, that does not play a very great part probably. I can only say that the work has not been abandoned; it has simply been closed down, and I hope the time will come when it can be finished. Many other works in Canada are in just the same position.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Have precautions been taken to preserve the work already done?

Mr. CARVELL: Every precaution has been taken.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I understood the minister to say that this work was not of very great importance to Quebec. On the contrary, it is of first-rate importance. The city has already spent $200,000 for a market along the St. Charles river, but we cannot use it until this work is completed.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite appreciate that, but if my hon. friend sits here for the next fortnight and listens to these estimates being discussed he will see that these same conditions prevail in practically every city in Canada. In the next item, for instance, for the Toronto Harbour Works, he will find we have applied the axe much more vigorously than we did in Quebec. There is no doubt that there are local reasons in all these places why these works should go on, but we have tried as far as possible to apply the same rule on all public works in Canada, unless they are absolutely essential for war purposes.

Mr. POWER: I would point out to the minister that altogether some $700,000 has been spent on improvements to the river St. Charles, and that to preserve the work that has been done we are spending less than $15,000, because I understand that out of this $15,000 a certain amount goes to the contractor.

Mr. CARVELL: Practically all of it goes to the contractor if it is found on settling the accounts that it is due him. We are not voting any money in this item for protecting the works.

Toronto Harbour improvements, $550,000.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I just heard the minister say that he had applied the axe pretty well all over Canada in regard to public works. I think he applied it too vigorously to the Toronto Harbour improvements. I think he will remember that late last fall he visited the harbour of Toronto, and while I was not able to accompany him on that inspection I understood from the mayor that the minister was impressed with the necessity of a large expenditure this year to protect the work already done. The minister knows that the Harbour Commission proposes to spend about $13,000,000, the city of Toronto about $2,000,000 and the Public Works Department about $6,000,000, altogether about $21,000,000. There has already been expended on these improvements between the Government, the city, and the Harbour Commission, some $7,000,000. I think the minister will remember that a few days ago he was advised of the condition of the harbour by telegram from the mayor and the Harbour Commissioner spoke to him of the possible loss of a great amount of property. The commissioner said that it was our duty to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the destruction of a large part of the shore property, the cellars in houses facing the shore being flooded by the heavy storms from the southeast which had washed the shore away. What the minister's answer was I do not know, but I do know, after the millions that have been spent on these improvements, it is necessary for the minister to be more generous and bring down a revote for a large amount to protect the work that has been done. Take, for instance the work that has been done in the west part of the city, from the Humber east to the Island, and then continuing to Munroe park—a frontage of some six miles on which the Government has undertaken to build a breakwater to protect the harbour and the shore. To the west, the crib-work is down to the zero level and now it is necessary to place the cement structures on that to prevent the storms from destroying the shore, but I understand that not sufficient money has been granted for that purpose. If the land is not protected to the west there is danger of the work that has already been done—such as filling in along the shore—at an expenditure of some millions, being destroyed. Then we come to the Island shore, which is partly protected, but to the west of the island again last year the shore was awash right up to the buildings and some of the splendid residences there were in danger; the sidewalks were washed and gas pipes were affected, and the city had to put up some temporary cribs to protect the shore for the time being. Then we come to the east. This year, on account of the high water and the storms, a great deal of the shore property has been destroyed already, and the Harbour Commission and the city council say it is up to the Minister of Public Works to do something at once to protect the shore. Surely the minister after his inspection of these improvements and after admitting the splendid work that has been done and the necessity for protecting it, will bring down a more generous grant for protecting that work. Then we have what is called the ship channel. You come in at the eastern entrance. Last year that work had to be pulled to pieces, some $800,000 worth of work. Changes are now being made and there is a great necessity for that work being completed also. The Harbour Commission has reclaimed some two or three hundred acres of land at a cost of some millions of dollars, and we have located there some of the largest industries in America and there is a demand for more sites; but if the Government is not going to protect the work that has already been done and is now under way it will not be possible to carry on the work to advantage. It is a disadvantage alike to the Harbour Commission, the city of Toronto and the Government—the three parties concerned in the proposed expenditure of some $21,000,000. Surely, in the face of conditions in Toronto the minister is not going to stop at this proposed grant of $550,000. I should like to have some expression of the minister's views as to the necessity of doing something to protect the work that has already been done. Conditions may arise any day whereby millions of dollars worth of work might be destroyed and surely this is too serious a matter to allow to happen for the sake of economy. It is not economy; it is false economy. The minister is saving half a million dollars on the expenditure of last year, but his economy may cost him a couple of million dollars. He is taking all the chances imaginable.

The minister must know the position we are in there with our Island. With those southeast storms there is great danger of immense destruction, which may occur any day, and after all this money has been expended, if we are not going to protect that work, I do not see that we can give the minister much credit along the line of economy, when he proposes to save $400,000 or $500,000 compared with the expenditure last year. If the work had been completed it might have been a good economy, but not at this stage. The Harbour Commissioners prepared an estimate of $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 as the cost of this work. The city is going on with its share of that work at a cost of from one-half to three-quarters of a million. If the Harbour Commission of Toronto is going to spend this amount, realizing the necessity of it, surely the Government must see the real necessity of performing their part of the duty which lies upon them. While the minister might have applied the axe advantageously to some other facilities for harbours where there is not that danger of destruction which there is in this case, where the work is partly completed, it might be economy, but in this case it would be false economy to say we are going to forego that expenditure for the sake of conserving large expenditures, because he really knows, having been over the ground and made the inspection, what has been done, the amount expended, and the great danger. Realizing that, surely he is not going to leave the city, the Harbour Commissioners and this Government in the position that we are going to take the chance of the destruction of a couple of million dollars' of work. I hope the hon. minister will assure me that, after making his recommendation of half a million dollars, he will supplement that by another half million to protect the money already expended.

Mr. SHEARD: I would like to emphasize what the hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) has said, especially in connection with the Island shores. The Island shore adjacent to the harbour fluctuates considerably from year to year, and I know that last year and the year before there were considerable inroads by the water into the Island shore, so much so that the water came up to the fences around the houses, although there used to be a distance, I suppose, of 250 feet in the lake shore as formed. The Government some time ago put out some temporary groynes to protect the shore near Gibraltar point, but they have not been at all effective. Since that time the eastern shore has been considerably inundated just to the east end of the harbour. I understand that this spring several houses have been damaged, not only the cellars flooded, but the foundations impaired. Therefore, I join with my hon. colleague from East York in the appeal to the hon. Minister of Public Works to be as generous as the exigencies will allow and in impressing upon him also the very urgent importance of carefully scrutinizing the economies that are being practiced in that particular regard.

Mr. McKENZIE: I noticed that the hon. gentlemen who speak largely on behalf of the city and harbour of Toronto have touched upon a subject that is an old one in this House as to provincial, Dominion or municipal obligations. We from the different parts of the country have been very exacting in our demands for public moneys for public purposes, but I must remind my hon. friend that we never went to the extent of asking public money for the digging of cellars and putting of walls around houses. The hon. gentleman tells us tonight we must be careful to protect the walls of the houses in the city of Toronto, to see that the sidewalks in Toronto are not interfered with, and that the end of the sewer pipes are well protected by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. SHEARD: As promised.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman may not understand the situation, but in the province from which I come we have had experience in matters somewhat akin to this. We have seen the public roads being eaten away by the action of the tide along certain portions of Nova Scotia, but the people here, whichever government was in power, absolutely refused to give us any money to protect the roads along the harbours in Nova Scotia. They said, "That is a local matter; if it is affecting a town or city, it is a matter the town or city must look after; it is a municipal affair, and you will not get Dominion money for it." If it was outside of a town, the provincial government would have to look after it, as they held it was a provincial matter. I am simply drawing the attention of the minister to this. If, by any false understanding of the position of the Department of Public Works, or by false kindness or by excessive zeal, the predecessor of the present minister in the kindness of his heart, and in return for favour lavished upon him from a political standpoint by the city of Toronto, has undertaken to point the walls of the different houses, put sewer pipes under the houses, and generally look after them all round—put them to bed and cuddle the clothes around them—I think he has gone too far, and that the present minister, particularly in war time, has enough to look after to protect the harbour because it is public property and supposed to be, and is no doubt, for the general benefit of the Government at large. But when it comes to fixing sidewalks, putting foundations under houses, and seeing that they have a proper system of sewage, I draw the line and protest against the moneys of Canada being used in that way for Toronto or any other city.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) quite misunderstands me, and I am sorry for it. I thought I made it quite clear. It may be the hon. gentleman does not understand the situation, he may think the city is asking for favours from this Government. The city is asking for no favours from the hon. Minister of Public Works or any other minister, it is only asking that the Government carry out their undertaking. And we are not asking them to build sewers or point foundations; I made no such statement. I am surprised the hon. gentleman makes such assertion, trying to mislead the House, suggesting that I was not familiar with the necessities, and that I made a statement I did not make. I said that, on account of this wash which is caused through there being no protection, damage was done. As I understand it, the lake shore is owned by the Dominion, and not by the provincial government. The in-shores are owned by the provincial government, but the lake shores which stop at the Island, are owned by the Dominion.

Mr. McKENZIE: In so far as they are used for shipping purposes, but not beyond that.

Mr. FOSTER: The Government has already spent large amounts there to protect the shore. The cribwork is ready for the concrete construction to prevent the wash on the shore, to save the shore, and to save this property I speak of, and which the hon. member for Toronto South spoke of three weeks ago. Our city engineer tells us the responsibility is with this Government, and the Minister of Public Works—whether he is right or not, I do not know, but I think he knows what his responsibilities are,—knows we are asking for no favours. We are not asking for something unbecoming a great city. We are not suggesting the frivolous things spoken of by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). After the minister's inspection, I think he will understand my explanation and he will appreciate the fact that the west shore of the Island is affected by these heavy storms. He understands from the work they have already done the great necessity of further work to protect what our engineers tell us would be a very heavy damage for which the Government would be responsible. Surely it is false economy for the Government to make this small grant when there may be a further damage of a couple of million of dollars. I hope I have made myself clear to the minister.

Mr. SHEARD: In order to remove the impression that appears to have taken possession of the hon. gentleman opposite, I wish to tell him that there are no sewers anywhere near, and I think I am correct in saying that these inroads have been largely made upon the Government property adjacent to and immediately west of the Government light-house and the Government light-house property. It is true that a gas main runs along that right of way which, I believe, is a Government road. The water has washed away the foundations of the gas main. As to the eastern portion to which I referred, I believe the Government have a breakwater already partially under way, and at that particular point it is intended to protect the lake shore. The storms have been exceedingly severe, and they have cut into the roadways to a very unusual extent. I mention these facts in order that hon. gentlemen opposite may be quite assured that we are not seeking particular favours for the city of Toronto, however much we might feel entitled to consideration—I may say that we have never received very much either from the Department of Public Works or from any other department of the Government in so far as I am aware.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no fault to find with the statements made by the hon. gentlemen who represent the city of Toronto, excepting that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Foster) must have been misinformed when he said that I told the mayor anything, because I have never spoken to the mayor of Toronto in my life. I never saw Mayor Church.

Mr. FOSTER: Not on the inspection?

Mr. CARVELL: He was not there, and I did not advertise the fact that I was going to Toronto.

Mr. FOSTER: You were there?

Mr. CARVELL: I was in Toronto, and I will tell my hon. friends all about it—not all, I would not tell them all, but I will tell them some things about it. I do not know Mayor Church, I did not meet him when I was there, and I left for Hamilton in the afternoon. I would have been very glad indeed to have met the mayor if I had had the opportunity, but I had not. I never told him of the necessity for large expenditures, or anything in connection with it, and I am satisfied that Mayor Church will bear me out in that statement, if he is asked. I did get a telegram from the mayor three or four weeks ago, stating that the breakwater was being destroyed. Perhaps I did not take it sufficiently seriously, because, very much like my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), I feel that it is not a burden cast upon the Federal Parliament to protect private property belonging to a province or a municipality. While in some cases it is done—and I am not finding fault if it is done—it is not done as a matter of right, and I do not accept responsibility for it. Every once in a while in the spring of the year I have a slice of my farm taken away, and I always repair the damage myself. I never felt that I had a right to come to the Federal Government and ask for redress. However, I admit that when it comes to the island in front of the city of Toronto, probably a different principle should be applied. I have always understood, during my somewhat length parliamentary experience, that it was the duty of the Federal Parliament to look after navigation, and that we were justified in expending public moneys wherever necessary and in such amount as they could be obtained if it was going to do anything to help trade and navigation. Very often members press their views upon Governments to such an extent that they depart from that very proper principle. I am not quarrelling with that. I am only pointing out what I consider to be the general principle which should guide the policy of the Federal Government in regard to matters of this kind.

Since I assumed the duties of the office which I now occupy, I have received requests and delegations from the city of Toronto regarding these harbour works. I was waited upon by a number of gentlemen, and while I was busy, I thought that it was really necessary to spend a few hours going over the work. I did so in company with the chairman, the chief engineer and another gentleman in connection with the Harbour Commision, the representative of Stewarts, the contractors, and one other gentleman whose name I have forgotten.

Perhaps I shall be pardoned if I take ten minutes to explain to the committee the proposal with regard to Toronto harbour, because it is a matter that has been discussed in the House many times in the last four or five years. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) referred to the fact that 800,000 feet of this work had to be done over again. It certainly was not a very creditable piece of work for the parties who were interested. The department demanded that the work which was so defective should be made good, and it was made good. On my inspection I was more than satisfied with the character of the work as it stands to-day. The general scheme was a very elaborate one and it was divided into three parts. The first part was the protection work in the east, or that part in front of the island which lies opposite the city of Toronto. The idea was to build a breakwater all along the shore in front of the island to prevent any further erosion by the waters of lake Ontario on the southern side of the island. The second part of the project was the building of a breakwater five and a half miles long extending west from the harbour and running out to the Humber river. When I was there no work had been done on the eastern scheme as far as I know, but about 3,000 feet of cribwork had been completed in connection with the scheme at the western end of the breakwater near the Humber bay, and also some cribwork just near the entrance of the harbour. My information is that the cribwork is now within two feet of the top, and that it has cost about $150,000. The contention is that if the work be not proceeded with it may be lost either partially or wholly. The Harbour Commissioners of Toronto were working in conjunction with the general scheme and they had dumped a very large amount of material from the lake in behind the proposed breakwater with a view to creating an esplanade, something which will be of general utility to the city of Toronto, or, I should say, a general improvement. The idea was that there would be a lagoon inside of the breakwater and that beyond the lagoon there would be this belt of land which is being made by dumping sand and gravel from the bed of the lake. When it is finished it will certainly be a very splendid proposition, a great acquisition to the city of Toronto, and no doubt it will beautify the city to a great extent. I think the city is very well justified in spending the money it is doing in carrying on this work.

The third part of the proposition consisted in dredging a channel four hundred feet wide, which channel would be about a mile and a quarter long, practically through the centre of Ashbridge's Bay, to a depth of twenty-four feet. The spoil dredged out of the channel was to be thrown over on either side and would raise the level of the land above the water, because, as it was, Ashbridge's Bay was practically level with the water—sometimes it would be overflooded and sometimes there would be dry land—and by throwing out this material and building it up four or five feet it created, no doubt, very valuable industrial sites, on which one very large plant has been erected. Others are under contemplation, and I believe in course of erection.

Now, I have outlined to the committee the general scheme of the Toronto harbour improvement. When I went there, as I said before, I found nothing done on the eastern end, but three thousand feet, or upwards, of cribwork had been sunk on the western end. The intention was to put concrete coping on the cribwork, bringing it up five or six feet above the level of the water. Now it is contended by the Harbour Commissioners that because this cribwork has not been covered, and has not been extended, some of the material which they have dumped in behind the proposed cribwork is being washed away by the action of the waves, and there is a loss to them in that way. That I do not know anything about, but I am told so by responsible engineers, and I accept it as being correct. This work would have required, I am satisfied, if I had gone on with it, at leasts $3,000,000, and as Minister of Public Works I had to face the question, whether I was justified in going on, or was the department, or was the Government—because, after all, I am only the mouthpiece of the Government so far as this work is concerned—were we justified in expending $3,000,000 on a scheme which in no way contributed to the navigation or transportation facilities of Canada? Now, I am not criticising the action of any of my predecessors. If it had not been for the war I would have considered it my duty, and an obligation which I would not try to get away from, to carry out the contract of my predecessor to the limit. But I say again that the problem I had to face was this: Was I justified in recommending the expenditure of $3,000,000 which did not add to the transportation facilities of this country? I gave the matter very careful consideration. I was pressed very strongly by the gentlemen who accompanied me as to the necessity of going on with the work. I am not in the habit of saying things to people which I do not mean, and, therefore, I do not think the gentlemen who accompanied me will say that I made any promise to them as to what I would or would not do.

I came back to Ottawa and discussed the subject with the officers of the department, and I finally decided that the work at Ashbridge's bay was of some benefit to the country in the prosecution of this war, because munition plants had been established and others would be established on the reclaimed land. As I said before, this channel of about a mile and a quarter long is four hundred feet wide, with industrial sites on either side of it. Cribwork had been sunk, piles had been driven in front of it, concrete was placed on top of that again, and I think I am safe in saying that three-quarters of all that work on the mile and a quarter channel had been completed. At the further end of it was a turning basin, in round figures about a thousand feet square, which also was to be dredged out to the extent of twenty-four feet, and was to have some cribwork and concrete coping around it the same as around the channel. I came to the conclusion, that as there were munition plants established along that canal, and there would be more munition plants as I was informed, and as it really was of some advantage to navigation because if the canal were finished vessels could come along lake Ontario, through the harbour of Toronto, and along that canal to the works, and thus effect and assist the transportation of materials for industries along its shores, I would not be justified in closing down works so far as that canal was concerned. So, I gave instructions to go on and finish it. It is intended to finish it, and I believe the concrete work has all been completed, up to the present time. It now remains to dredge out the canal to the depth of twenty-four feet, which will to some extent make further industrial sites, which I hope may be built upon, and I am sure will be of benefit to the city of Toronto, and also of benefit to this country in trying to prosecute the war.

I could not see how the construction of these breakwaters, which were purely for other purposes, and not for navigation purposes, could in any way assist the country under our present stress, and I could not see how I was justified in expending nearly $3,000,000 under present conditions. I arrived at that conclusion by reason of having investigated the matter myself, and after a very careful discussion with the officers of the department. I may have been wrong, I do not put my judgment up as being infallible under any circumstances, but I do think I have got a reasonable amount of business common sense, and when I look at a project like that I consider it from every standpoint, and I could not see that the completion of these works at either end was a necessity under present conditions. In doing so I applied exactly the same rule of conduct for that work that I did to works in the city of St. John, in the city of Quebec, and in the city of Vancouver, and in fact, nearly every other place in Canada where public works were going on. I am still satisfied that I was right in my judgment, and I am still satisfied that it was proper to go on and finish this canal, and that it would have been improper to have gone any farther. I can only say to my friends from Toronto what I have said to my friends from Quebec: We have not abandoned the work; I hope the day may come when the Dominion of Canada will be in a position to carry out all of its moral, as well as its legal obligations. And when that day comes I can assure my friends, if I occupy this position, it will give me the very greatest pleasure indeed to carry them out. But as I view my responsibilities, and as I view the financial conditions of Canada to-day, I would not be justified in recommending the expenditure of this money in Toronto, Quebec, St. John, Halifax, or anywhere else. We are compelled to spend money in Halifax on account of the recent explosion there, to a much greater extent than many of us would like to do, but it is one of the things that cannot be helped. Halifax is the port of departure for all the great ocean liners carrying our own troops, as well as the troops of our Allies, and, therefore, that work must be prosecuted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have given the committee the facts exactly as I understand them, and as explicitly as I could, and I do feel that the members representing Toronto, when they come to think the matter over, will arrive at about the same conclusion as the Government has, that while we exceedingly regret the necessity of closing down works of this kind, yet we would not feel justified in spending $3,000,000, or even a portion of that sum, for any work that is not absolutely necessary in the interests of navigation and the carrying on of the affairs of the country, at a crucial time like the present.

Port Arthur and Fort William—harbour and river improvements, $350,000.

Mr. MANION: What is this amount for?

Mr. CARVELL: It is required for dredging under contract at Port Arthur, repairs to revetment wall, Grand Trunk Pacific basin, Port Arthur, harbour surveys, and so on. It is for the ordinary harbour works which we believe are absolutely necessary to take care of the grain business.

Mr. MANION: Is this dredging to be done in the Canadian Northern basin at Fort William, or is it for the removal of lot 10?

Mr. CARVELL: There is an item for the removal of a portion of lot 10.

Mr. MANION: What about the turning basin above the Canadian Northern dock?

Mr. CARVELL: It is intended to go on with that.

Vancouver Harbour—improvements, $150,000.

Mr. CARVELL: No new works are being undertaken in Vancouver or Victoria harbours. This amount is chiefly for a second shed on one of the big wharves at Vancouver, and to complete wharves now under construction. The amount for Victoria is for the purpose of building a wharf and closing up the present scheme.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Carvell the House adjourned at 12.04 a.m. (Thursday).

The House met at Three o'clock.

A YOUNG PATRIOT.

LETTER FROM A SIXTEEN-YEAR-OLD BOY READ BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

On Motions being called:

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): May I ask the indulgence of the House for just a moment while I read a letter which reached me on Saturday last, and which I think expresses so admirably the spirit of the young men of Canada that it is desirable to give it publicity at this time. I shall not give the name or the address of the writer, a boy of sixteen years, because I know he did not write the letter in order that his name might come before the public. It is as follows:

Toronto, Ont., April 18, 1918.

Sir Robert Borden,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

I am asking you a favour to help me get in the army. I am only a boy of 16 years and want to give my life for my country. I have tried many times but failed. Why I am asking you is because you are like a King to Canada and if you said a word it would help me more than anything else. My dad has been to the Front and now he is back again, and you have taken my brother, and now I am the only one left to do something for my country. And, Sir, if you only knew how I am going crazy to do something to gain honour. I am strong and healthy, I have never had any sickness in my life. I was just reading the paper this morning and saw what you said "Canadians must hold the line." They cannot do it without men. Please will you give me a position in that line. I don't call myself a man but I might help to hold that line. So please give me a chance, the line is more valuable than my life.

Yours very truly.

The boy lived on Melinda street, in Toronto. Two sentences struck me as really remarkable—the one in which he says, "now I am the only one left to do something for my country." He might naturally and most reasonably have said, "I am the only one left to do something for my family," but he did not say that; he said, "I am the only one left to do something for my country." And then observe the last words of the letter, "the line is more valuable than my life."

I am sure that that letter does indeed express the spirit of the Canadian people, and as long as that spirit endures, and I am confident it will always endure, we need have no fear for the destiny of our country whether in this war or after the war.

Public Works:

Halifax old Graving Dock: This dock was built in 1889 by the Halifax Graving Dock Co., Ltd., and has received from this department, under authority of Act 45 Vict.,

ch. 17, an annual subsidy of $10,000 for the twenty years ended 30th September, 1909. Damages caused by the explosion of 6th December, 1917, are now being attended to and paid by this department; expenditures to 31st March, 1918, $15,745.

Halifax new Graving Dock: Preliminaries, etc., $4,451.52.

This department has expended no money on any graving docks at St. John, N. B.

ST. LAMBERT POSTMASTER.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Has the Government been made aware that in the federal election of 1917, liquor was stored in the home of the Postmaster of St. Lambert, in the county of Lévis?

2. Does the Government know that said liquor has been seized by Excise officers?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. No information.

2. Answered by No. 1.

JAS. STARRATT MARSHALL.

Mr. POWER:

1. Has there been since August, 1914, a person named Jas. Starratt Marshall, of Spa Springs, Annapolis County, in the Active Militia of Canada?

2. If not, when did he leave the service?

3. If so, when did he join the service, and what has been his occupation?

4. What amount has he received during the period in which he was employed?

5. Has the Government any information as to whether or not whilst in the service he carried on the work of laundryman either in his public or private capacity?

6. If in the former capacity, what extra pay did he receive?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Yes.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Appointed to the 69th Annapolis Regiment as 2nd lieutenant on the 8th September, 1896, and is now a captain in that regiment.

4. No record of this officer having been given any special employment other than as an officer of the regiment when called out for annual training during peace times, when he would receive the pay of his rank.

5. No.

6. Answered by No. 5.

ENLISTMENTS UNDER THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

Mr. VIEN:

1. How many men, per province, enlisted under the voluntary system, from the beginning of the war until the proclamation putting into force The Military Service Act, and how many of such men were British born, and how many Canadian born?

2. How many men per province, enlisted voluntarily since the said proclamation to the present date, and how many of such men were British born, and how many Canadian born?

3. How many men per province, were liable to Military service under the provisions of The Military Service Act?

4. How many of these men, per province, reported for Military service up to the present date?

5. How many, per province, claimed exemption before the Local Exemption Boards?

6. How many claims, per province, were granted by the Local Exemption Boards?

7. How many appeals were taken by the Military authorities against such exemption?

8. How many men, per province, claimed their exemption and were subsequently ordered to report?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Militia and Defence: Enlistments under the voluntary system from the beginning of the war until the proclamation putting into force the Military Service Act, i.e., 13th October, 1917, are not available, but the following are the figures to 31st October, 1917:—

Ontario	191,632
Quebec	48,934
Nova Scotia and P.E.I.	23,436
New Brunswick	18,022
Manitoba	52,784
Saskatchewan	26,111
Alberta	36,279
British Columbia and Yukon	42,608
	439,806
Nationalities—
Canadian born	197,473
British born	215,769
Other nationalities	26,564
	439,806

2. Militia and Defence: Voluntary enlistments since the said proclamation up to and including March 31st, 1918, are not available, but the following are the figures from 31st October, 1917, to 31st March, 1918:

Ontario	8,081,	inc. from	U.S.A.	5,618
Quebec	3,727,	"	"	1,611
Nova Scotia and P.E.I.	636,	"	"	1
New Brunswick	763,	"	"	212
Manitoba	2,966,	"	"	1,208
Saskatchewan	98,	"	"	....
Alberta	415,	"	"	88
British Columbia and Yukon	2,021,	"	"	1,118
	18,707			9,856

Included in this number are 6,775 Class 1 men voluntarily reporting since the said proclamation.

At the present time information with regard to country of birth of these men is not available.

3. Justice: The information asked for will be found in the Report of Military Service Council laid on the Table and distributed to members.

4. Militia and Defence: Number of men who have reported for military service who were liable under the provisions of the Military Service Act up to and including March 31, 1918:

Ontario	13,295
Quebec	3,284
Nova Scotia and P.E.I.	1,709
New Brunswick	1,502
Manitoba	4,149
Saskatchewan	2,609
Alberta	1,632
British Columbia and Yukon	2,888
	31,068

5, 6, 7 and 8. Justice: The information asked for will be found in the Report of Military Service Council laid on the Table and distributed to members.

SENATOR BRADBURY.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. Is Senator (Lt.-Col.) Geo. H. Bradbury receiving a pension from the Pensions Board in Canada?
2. If so, what is the amount per annum he is receiving?
3. On what date was the pension granted? Was it before or after Union Government was formed?
4. What is the reason given for granting the pension?
5. Did Lt.-Col. Geo. H. Bradbury serve in France?
6. If so, for what period?

Mr. McCURDY:

1. Yes.
2. $780 per annum.
3. February 27th, 1918. After.
4. For disability incurred on service.
5. Yes.
6. About two weeks.

EXPLOSIVES ON SHIPS.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What companies manufacturing explosives have loaded their products on board ships in the harbour of Montreal during the last season of navigation?
2. Is the Government aware that on account of a fire which started in one of the ships in the harbour of Montreal, a disaster somewhat similar to the Halifax disaster was barely averted?
3. Is the Government aware that on another occasion, in the harbour of Montreal, when explosives were being put on board, a large quantity of said explosives fell to the bottom of a ship, through the breakage of a cable, thereby again exposing Montreal to a great peril?
4. If so, will the Government bind these companies to effect their loadings outside the limits of Montreal for the present season of navigation?
5. Is the Government taking necessary steps towards protecting war munition depots, as well as the people residing in their vicinity, by establishing lightning rods or adopting some other means of counteracting the effects of lightning?

[Mr. Burrell.]

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. The Government have no information.
2. No.
3. No.
4. Under consideration.
5. The Government will continue to protect munition depots.

CROW'S NEST PASS COAL COMPANY.

Mr. DECHENE:

1. What amount, if any, was paid April, 1917, to the Crow's Nest Pass Coal Company?
2. Who recommended said amount to be paid to the company?
3. Under what authority was said amount paid?
4. For what purpose was it paid?
5. Is said amount to be refunded to the Government?

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS:

1. $18,559.88.
2. The Minister of Labour.
3. That of the Governor General in Council.
4. To enable the prompt payment to the miners for the period November 16, 1916, to February 5, 1917, of the wage bonus recommended by a commission appointed to report on the cost of living. This action was taken with a view to lessening the danger of a cessation of work in the collieries concerned, such cessation involving a public calamity.
5. The amounts were advanced to the different mining companies concerned on the understanding that the money would be so far as possible collected from the consumers, the mining companies not being themselves in a position to increase the prices for coal which had been delivered. A considerable amount has been collected from the consumers, but it has not been possible in dealing with the sums received always to determine if the dealings of a particular consumer have related exclusively to a particular colliery.

CAPTAIN W. E. SCHUSTER.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. When did Captain W. E. Schuster, of Belleville, receive his commission, and what were his military qualifications therefor?
2. Was he ever Overseas? If so, where and when, and how long did he remain overseas?
3. Did Captain Schuster ever take part in actual warfare? If so, was he wounded?
4. What were his duties in Canada, and at what rate per day was he paid?
5. How much was paid Captain Schuster up to April 20th, 1918?
6. What is he doing now, and what is his present rate of pay?
7. Is Captain Schuster to be sent overseas? If not, why not?
8. Is Captain Schuster of German origin, and is he still wearing his uniform?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1 (a) Appointed 1st March, 1916, and posted to Forestry unit; (b) apparently possessed technical qualifications.

2. Proceeded overseas 30th May, 1916. Returned from overseas January, 1918.

3. Complete record of service is not available, as documents have not been received from the overseas military forces of Canada. There is, however, no record of this officer having been wounded.

4. Previous to proceeding overseas, he was employed on recruiting duties and arranging despatch of technical equipment of 224th Forestry battalion. He received the pay and allowance of his rank.

5. This information will have to be obtained from the overseas military forces of Canada.

6. Not now employed in any military capacity.

7. No, services not required.

8 (a). This officer was born in Canada; (b) No, not so far as the Department of Militia and Defence is aware.

MR. W. F. O'CONNOR, K.C.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. Was Mr. O'Connor, K.C., late Cost of Living Commissioner, at the time of his appointment, required to report to superior authority in case of trouble with or change in his staff?

2. Was the said Mr. O'Connor free to make and make public, and as a matter of fact, did he make and make public such reports as he deemed it necessary to make as said Commissioner?

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Mr. O'Connor was and is a secretary in the Department of Justice, as to part of his time, was loaned to the Department of Labour without any reference to "superior authority."

2. Yes.

LT.-COLONEL H. B. TREMAIN, M.P.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is H. B. Tremain, M.P., for Hants, Nova Scotia, in the employ of tht Militia Department?

2. If so, what pay is he drawing?

3. When was he appointed?

4. What amount of money has he received?

5. Is his wife drawing separation allowance?

6. If so, how much has been paid to her to date?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Lt.-Colonel H. B. Tremain, M.P., is an officer of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and is at present on leave without pay.

2. No pay.

3. November 9, 1915.

4. This information is being obtained from the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.

5 and 6. Separation allowance has been paid to the wife of this officer, from November 3, 1915, to April 30, 1917. Total payments, $1,076. The account is now closed.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. Who is the secretary of the Minister of Labour?

2. What is his name?

3. When was he appointed, and at what salary?

4. What is his salary now?

5. Where is he from?

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS:

1 and 2. J. C. McKellar.

3. April, 1912; $1,600.

4. $2,000.

5. St. Thomas.

PRICE OF CHEESE AND CONDENSED MILK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. F. GLASS (Middlesex East): I wish to make an inquiry of the Government with reference to an article in this morning's Montreal Gazette relating to the matter of fixing the price of cheese in Canada for 1918. It is reported that the Dairy Produce Commission yesterday, in Montreal, authorized that the price of cheese be fixed as follows for the year 1918: 23 cents per pound for No. 1 grade, f.o.b. steamer at Montreal; 22½ cents per pound for No. 2 grade, and 22 cents for No. 3 grade. After fully considering the whole situation, the commission unanimously approved of the proposal. A committee was also appointed to take into consideration the matter of fixing the price of condensed milk. The price of condensed milk has an important bearing on the price of cheese, and I wanted to inquire—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot enter into a discussion of the matter. If he wishes to put a question, he may do so.

Mr. GLASS: Am I in order in reading the statement as it is?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think so. The hon. member may call the attention of the Government to the statement, and put a question with regard to it.

Mr. GLASS: May I ask the Government whether the facts as reported in the Gazette are correct? Is it the intention of the Government to fix the price of other dairy products so that they will be on a parity with the price fixed for cheese?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I cannot say definitely whether the report is correct or not; I assume that it is so far as the fixing of the price of cheese is concerned. I will call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the remaining portion of my hon. friend's question.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. PREVOST (Terrebonne) (translation): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to point out to the Government the following facts as they were reported to me in a letter which I have just received.

It is in further reference to the brutal unjust dealings of the Federal police officers in the carrying out of the Compulsory Military Service Act. Here is the letter addressed to me by a notable citizen of Terrebonne, in my own county, and which is dated April 24.

Mr. J. E. Prévost, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Sir,

Since this morning, on the 23rd, there are in Terrebonne—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order. If he wishes to put a question to the Government, he may do so; he cannot read a letter.

Mr. PREVOST (translation): With your permission, I shall ask the Government whether they have any knowledge of the facts which are pointed out to me in this letter. There would have been in Terrebonne, in my county, since the 23rd instant, some twenty-five Federal policemen who are, so it is said, looking after some shirkers under this Act. On the 23rd, they arrested a young man who was the bearer, since the autumn previous, of a certificate of exemption from the local tribunal of Terrebonne. This certificate was taken away from him, at noon, while he was going back to his work, and they refused to return it to him under the pretence that it was worthless. When he passed by in the evening, he was arrested and detained, as a prisoner, until a late hour in the evening, when certain interested friends of his telephoned to the registrar, Mr. Godin, who ordered his release. They also attempted to take away the papers from another youth who resisted and refused to part with them as he would then have been without any means of showing that he was not transgressing the Military Service Act. Several of these officers are thus overzealous in apprehending young conscripts. The young man, whose exemption papers were thus taken away from him, resides at Saint François de Sales, in the county of Laval and Two Mountains. I do ask the Government whether they are cognizant of these facts and, if not, whether they propose fully investigating them. Moreover, I suggest that they should see to it that an end is put to such ruthless proceedings in the carrying out of warrants. They are in themselves an explanation of the dissatisfaction which is widespread throughout the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask hon. members not to abuse the privilege which allows questions on urgent matters to be put before the Orders of the Day are called. Quite frequently questions are put which should more properly go on the Order paper in the ordinary course, so that the Government may have notice of them. There can be no objection to an important question regarding a matter of policy. But matters dealing with individual cases should not be brought up on the Orders of the Day.

MILITARY SERVICE—MEN MEDICALLY UNFIT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): I desire to call attention to an error in the Hansard report. Yesterday I put the following question to the Minister of Militia:

> Are the men in Class "E" exempted under medical certificates obliged to report under the new Order in Council which has been passed?

The report says class "D", but what I wanted to know was whether men in class E, medically unfit, were required to report under the new Order in Council. As the question is reported, some confusion might be created. I understand that men in class D are those temporarily unfit, while those in class E are permanently unfit for service. Further on, speaking about the medical certificate, what I meant—and what I think I said, though it may have been misunderstood—was would the medical certificate of the Military Board appointed for the purpose be sufficient to exempt a man declared medically unfit. From the reply made to me by the minister, I think he understood my question aright.

Major-General MEWBURN: I understand the hon. gentleman to refer to men in the lower category—I think he said E.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Major-General MEWBURN: Category E consists of men not likely to become fit within six months; that is the regulation laid down by the medical people. What I intended to say in answer to my hon. friend was this: in calling up these classes of 20, 21 and 22 years, we were not asking to report at present those men already registered, and who had not been put in class A by the Medical Boards. All we require is men of class A who are fit for service at the front. The categories laid down by the medical board are: A, fit for general service; B, fit for service abroad, but not for general service—that would be forestry, and so on; D, temporarily unfit, but possibly becoming A or B within six months—that is, men in convalescent homes, and so on; E, not likely to become fit in six months.

Mr. BUREAU: E is the class I was referring to.

Major-General MEWBURN: We had no intention of calling them. If things get worse, some of these men within the ages of 20, 21 and 22 may have to undergo another medical examination. We have, however, no intention of disturbing any of the men already declared not to be in class A.

Mr. PREVOST: May I expect an answer from the hon. minister relative to the facts which I have stated?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): Had not the hon. member from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) so hastily interfered, my intention was to answer my honourable friend from Terrebonne.

I must say that the Government have no knowledge of the two incidents referred to by the hon. member. If he will give us the names of the interested parties or the names of the officers—should they be known to him—that would help us a great deal in taking the necessary steps, so as to ascertain whether his statements were true. As to the necessity of giving orders so that there should be no high-handed dealings, I must say that all the officers have received the most express and formal instructions to avoid all that could be even described as partaking of the nature of such behaviour on the part of men so inclined.

SMALLPOX IN CAPE ISLAND DISTRICT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence to a matter which may be of more than local importance? Reports in the press indicate that there has been a considerable outbreak of smallpox in the district of Cape Island in the western part of Nova Scotia and that the disease has been taken into that district by returned soldiers. I venture to suggest that the hon. gentleman will, through his medical officers, make inquiry into the matter not only in justice to the people of the district at present concerned but because, if the report be found to be correct, it is evident that there is danger of similar troubles occurring in other parts of the country to which returned soldiers go. I deem it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the hon. gentleman as, if true, it indicates that there is need of a more rigid examination, first, on the part of the quarantine authorities at the ports of landing and on the part of the medical gentlemen connected with our own Department of Militia and Defence. The hon. gentleman has probably not heard of it and all I desire to do is to call his attention to it and to ask that the matter be investigated through his medical officers.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): I most assuredly will do what my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) suggests. I have not had my attention called to it so far. If the hon. gentleman could give me any further information that he has I would appreciate it.

Mr. FIELDING: My only information is that which I have learned from the public press. The trouble has occurred in the district of Cape Island in Shelburne county in the western part of Nova Scotia. Cape Sable Island is in my district although it is not to be confused with Sable Island, the graveyard of the Atlantic. It is in the southern part of Nova Scotia where Cape Sable juts out into the Atlantic. There, quite a number of cases have occurred. It is treated, as a matter of course, as if the disease had been taken into that district by returned soldiers. That assumption may not be well founded. I am not asserting that it is but I merely ask my hon. friend to see that the matter receives attention.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 66, to correct a clerical error in the French version of the Naturalization Act, 1914—Hon. Mr. Doherty.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 20, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Hay and Straw Inspection), Mr. Boivin in the Chair, continued from April 24, 1918.

On section 340f—bales to be tagged showing weight:

The CHAIRMAN: We had reached clause 340f of the Bill and Sir George Foster had moved that the clause be struck out. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) had moved in amendment:

That clause 340F be replaced by the following:

340F. Every seller of hay or straw in Canada shall affix to every bale of hay or straw sold or offered for sale a tag, having thereon, plainly written and legible, the name of the seller and the weight of the bale.

Amendment negatived and section 340f stricken from the Bill.

On subsection 340 H—How railways are to facilitate inspection:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move to strike out this subsection.

Motion agreed to.

On subsection 341—Governor in Council empowered to prescribe fees for inspection:

Mr. DENIS: The present law provides that a fee of twenty cents a ton shall be charged by the inspector. I am at a loss to understand why the present law is not maintained, and what reason there is for making the proposed change under which the Governor in Council is given power to prescribe fees. Is it the intention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to so regulate matters that different fees will be charged in different sections in the country?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has, I think, the right idea. Sections where inspection may be carried out may differ very largely as to the quantity of hay which is inspected in each district. An inspector is paid by fees, but it is impossible to get an inspector, or to keep him, unless he derives sufficient remuneration from those fees, that being the only payment made to him. It may be impossible in some districts to even get an inspector, although he may be wanted there, unless a higher fee be fixed than in a district requiring a large number of inspections. That is one reason. The other reason is this: If there are many inspections and the experience of the year shows that after the expenses have been met and a fair remuneration made to the inspector there is too large a surplus, so that the inspector may be getting more than he ought to, in that case the fee may be reduced somewhat so as to bring the amount derived up to a reasonable remuneration. That is the object sought to be accomplished.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. DENIS: My opinion was that in certain cases the fee was high enough, or even too high.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. DENIS: The minister's explanation is quite intelligible to me, and therefore I have no objection to offer.

Mr. MAHARG: Are we to understand from the minister that the inspection fee may vary according to districts?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MAHARG: Does the minister not think that that is a very unfair principle? It does not apply to other products of the farm, for example, all kinds of grain and stock. In such cases the inspection fee is a flat rate, and I understand the inspectors are paid a fixed salary. If there is any shortage the Government makes good the deficit, and if there should be a surplus it stands to the Government's credit. I think the change proposed will work a hardship and prevent an inspection from being had where it is really wanted.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The whole system of inspection, so far as this Act is concerned, is based on its not being compulsory; no one is obliged to pay the fee unless he so wishes. The system is also based on the principle of payment by fee, and not by salary, so that my hon. friend (Mr. Maharg) will see that in some cases unless the fee were fairly good it would be impossible for the district to get the services of an inspector, whilst in other districts, where there was a large quantity of hay to be inspected, a fixed fee might take more from the sellers than would be advisable and might yield a larger salary to the inspector than he should reasonably ask. Taking into account the differences in districts, it is almost impossible to prescribe a fixed fee unless you give a salary which shall work equitably. That is the reason for the provision to fix the fee by Order in Council. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Maharg) will see that unless you pay salaries there is no other equitable way by which in the first place you could get good inspectors, and in the second place make provision that the inspectors should sufficiently be paid in certain cases, and not paid too much in others.

Mr. GERVAIS: Mr. Chairman, after the discussion raised by the remarks of my hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctôt) in connection with section 340f of this Bill, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has deemed it proper to strike out that section. After further discussion, it was thought proper by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) to move an amendment to that section providing for the identification of hay when it has reached its destination. The hon. minister thought it proper to have the discussion adjourned on this motion.

Section 341 now under consideration deals with such fees as shall be charged by the inspector. I have read the Bill through over and over again, and I must confess that, apart from section 341, the Bill under consideration does not in any respect differ from the Act passed in 1906; the only requisite provision and the one which is the most essential—I mean the clause providing for identification of the hay—has been cut out by the honourable minister himself, and he has also discarded the clause which provides for the official grading of hay and of straw. I cannot see what is the use of a Bill like this which is really a repetition of the Act passed in 1906. If the intention is only to change the inspectors' salaries, why not proceed in the usual way, i.e., by amendments or by Order in Council?

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is very desirable that the fees to be charged by inspectors should, if possible, be enumerated in the Act. The minister himself doubtless understands that the interested parties would like to have the fees to be charged inserted in the Act, and, of course, the cost of inspection is a very important part of the proceedings. Now the sellers on consulting the Act, if passed in its present form, will be unable to learn how much the inspection is going to cost them, or what the Act means, unless they get a copy of the Order in Council which is referred to. It is always desirable to have an Act of Parliament complete in itself and to embody all its requirements within its four corners. I would, therefore, urge upon the minister to carry out my suggestion. Let the Bill stand over for a few days until the nature of the Order in Council has been determined, and then incorporate in it the requirements of that Order in Council. I am sure that the whole country will then appreciate very much better the provisions of the law, and the interested parties be saved the trouble of looking around in order to ascertain what may or may not be in the Order in Council. It might be fixed in this way: in the schedule of fees the amount could be fixed at so much per ton, not to exceed so much per day. If a man, at the rate of 20 cents a ton, would make too much pay for one day, a maximum amount which he could not exceed could be put in the Bill. And, if there is not sufficient tonnage to be inspected to yield a fair day's pay at the rate per ton, there could be a provision in the schedule that he is to receive not less than a minimum amount per day. If a man requires an inspector to inspect, say three tons of hay, it could be provided that the inspector would receive half a day's pay or more, as the case may be.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Who will pay that?

Mr. McKENZIE: The man who hires the inspector.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In that case, if the man hires the inspector on a day that there is not much hay to be inspected, he will pay the inspector a large amount. If he gets his hay inspected on a day when there is a large amount, then he will get the inspection for a very small amount. My hon. friend will see that it is practically impossible to let the Bill stand over for a day, or several days, on that account. Take, for instance, my hon. friend's own locality. There is a difference between Sydney, or North Sydney—which is the hub down there—and Montreal. You appoint an inspector for Montreal, and say that he shall receive 20 cents for every ton inspected. Montreal, I suppose, in the course of the season may possibly handle 30,000 to 50,000 tons of hay. Sydney would require inspection for comparatively a much smaller amount. It is impossible to fix in the law the amount which would be reasonable for Montreal and which would also be reasonable for North Sydney, and it is impossible to find out just how many districts there may be with varying capacities of hay to be inspected, and to fix the fees according to the capacity of inspection. I think my hon. friend will see that, with all the desire possible to have everything in the Act that can be put in, it is impossible to put the fees in the Act and have an equitable arrangement.

Mr. McKENZIE: I cannot see, Mr. Chairman, how it is possible to put an equitable fee in an Order in Council which it is not possible to put in an Act.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will explain. My hon. friend, or the people in North Sydney, demand an inspection district. We get, as far as possible, statistics with reference to the amount of hay that is sold on the market in North Sydney, and an estimate will be made from that as to what proportion of that hay will be inspected when it is sold, because inspection is not compulsory. The Order in Council will then fix the fee at a rate which would give the man who is to be appointed as inspector at North Sydney a reasonable amount for his time and labour. You could not get a man in any other way, it seems to me. So, you have to take the circumstances of the district into account in fixing the fee. That you cannot do in the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it—and I am not familiar with the old Act—the present fee is 20 cents a ton. Perhaps the minister has had some complaints about it. I have not heard of any general complaint about that fee being too small or too great. It is evidently regarded as a fair charge. Why change the condition?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will tell my hon. friend. We hope and I think everybody wishes, that more and more we should get into the habit of appraising our hay by standards and selling it by standards, and on inspection. It is better for the farmer, the dealer, and the consumer as well. It gives the latter a protection. At the present time, inspection is only carried on at three places in Canada, namely, Toronto, Montreal, and, I think, Kingston. It is only at these large centres that we have had any experience as a basis to work on. You fix the fee which may be proper for these large centres. Then a small district applies to have inspection put in force. It finds the fee fixed in the law but you cannot get a competent man to do the work in the small section, with a small quantity to be inspected, for that fixed fee. Then if it is necessary and considered advisable to arrange an inspection district in that other district, you would have to grade the fee according to the probable amount to be inspected, with a view to giving the man something worth his trouble for inspection. That is the reason.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understand that, and am not going to press the matter. I am still of the opinion that what I suggest would carry out the idea, and enable a seller to get an inspector. In the larger districts, 20 cents a ton has been found to be a satisfactory and workable fee under the Act. But, I suppose, the minister does not wish to be bothered creating new districts every day. He is prepared to create a new district, and to arrange from time to time a rate of fees for inspection in that new district. But, if he had a maximum and minimum charge for any district in the Bill, all he would have to do would be to create his district, and the fees would come into effect. In North Sydney, where there is not very much inspection of hay, if the inspector has twenty or thirty tons, or even less, to inspect, the farmer knows that quantity will take perhaps half a day, and he knows he will have to pay at the rate of 20 cents a ton, but at the most not more than two or three dollars to the inspector. Where the rate per ton would not be sufficient remuneration, there is the minimum charge for a day's work provided for. My particular desire is that this Bill should be complete in itself and have all the machinery in it. So far as I am personally concerned in my county it does not concern me very much, but I do know as a lawyer that a law should be as complete as possible.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it is possible.

Mr. LANCTOT: Inspection is carried on at Montreal for the hay purchased by the Department of Agriculture at the present time, I understand. In the local market my experience is that, in very few cases, have we been obliged to go to an inspector. The difficulty is always settled without an inspector, if the seller knows hay and the buyer knows it too. During the discussion of this Bill yesterday, many opinions were expressed, one especially by an hon. member from British Columbia. I think I may be permitted to refer to the whole discussion in a few minutes, if possible. We were discussing one clause regarding stained hay and rotten hay. Some hon. members from this side of the House claimed that that sort of hay should be allowed on the market. I object to that, Mr. Chairman, because I stand for the reputation of Canadian hay. It does the farmer no good to put poor or rotten hay on the market. Now, the minister seems to be struck with the inspection phase of the matter and nothing else. The dealers and the farmers do not care much about the classification of hay, because, as I said yesterday, that is made by the dealer. We sell by the grade. But what we want left in the Bill is the clause which has been struck out, No. 340f, to hold the farmer responsible for the hay that he has pressed from his barn. You know very well, Mr. Chairman, that the dealer buys the hay from the farmer, and in my section of the country 95 per cent of the farmers have presses of their own. When there is a large crop of hay in our section or in the whole country, we have stacked hay all over the country. We buy the barn hay and the stacked hay on condition that the farmer will pay attention to the pressing, and do it when the weather is fine. Supposing a presser comes to a farm to-day, and the weather is fine. The farmer tells him to put his hay press near some stacks of hay which he has in the field. The presser does so, and he starts the machine. The next day it rains perhaps only a very little. The presser, who may have three or four men working for him, says: It is true it is raining a little, but we are going to finish pressing this stack to-day. They do so. That hay is then put into the barn, and perhaps owing to the scarcity of cars, which we have had in this country for the last year or two, that hay may remain in the barn all winter. What will happen? That hay, if it has been pressed in bad condition, will freeze in the barn when the cold weather comes. When it is finally taken to the car, a man who knows his business can immediatly tell if the hay is in bad shape or not, and he will say: the bales are like pieces of ice or iron. But if a man who does not know anything about hay, is handling it, he will simply take the tally of the hay and throw it into the car, and it will be taken to Chicago, or New York, or elsewhere. Three or four weeks later, the man to whom the hay has been delivered will make a complaint that the hay is in such bad shape that he cannot sell it for sufficient to cover the freight and duty. The farmers throughout the country should be made aware of this Bill for their own benefit in the future, so that they will not press hay when the weather is unsuitable, and so that they will press hay only when it is in good condition. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) is a farmer himself and he knows I am speaking for the benefit of the farmers of this country.

Mr. CARVELL: How is the hon. member going to stop the farmers from pressing hay?

Mr. LANCTOT: If some one is there. I am speaking, however, for the hay dealer who buys hay over a section of thirty, or forty, or fifty square miles.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. LANCTOT: The reputation of Canadian hay is being very hard hit on the American market to-day on account of so many cars of frozen hay that have been sent there during the last four weeks. Last Monday, in Montreal, one of my friends from the United States was telling me that our choice No. 1 Canadian hay would not fetch as much as it did before that frozen hay was put on the American market. Take a big New York liveryman who purchases ten or twelve cars of hay. If, after he has put that hay into his loft, he finds that it is unsatisfactory, he will ask: Where does this hay come from? If the reply is that it came from Canada, he says: In future I shall not buy any more hay from Canada unless I am certain it is all right. This affects the good reputation of our hay. Bad hay should not be sent on to the market. Section 340f was the best section in the Bill, and the name of the farmer should be put on the tag. Any kind of hay, so long as it is sound, may be marketed, because there are so many different grades. I know I am out of order, so I shall not discuss the matter further.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not desire to interrupt the hon. member, but the very interesting address which we have just heard has absolutely nothing to do with the clause 341 which is under consideration, and which refers only to the fees.

Mr. LANCTOT: I have spoken for the benefit of the farmers.

Mr. DENIS: I accept at once the principle that it would hardly be fair to have an equal standard rate throughout the country, and I think every one admits that; but, as suggested by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), the law should be made clear. Before Orders in Council are passed determining the fees that are to be paid in different sections of this country, information will have to be gathered. This information may already be available to the minister. Consequently, for the sake of having a clear and good law, and a law in which the fees will be well determined, why not, if the information is available, fix the fees now, and have a schedule at the end of the Bill, or dispose of the matter in any other way in which the minister may see fit, so as to determine what the fees are to be? Otherwise, we shall not know what the fees are. As a lawyer, I should be in an awkward position if a man came to me and said: I have some hay on my farm in a certain locality, and I want to know what the fee is for inspecting it. I should not know what the fee is unless I wrote to the Government for the information.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member will only have to keep on file a copy of the Canada Gazette, and I imagine he does so.

Mr. DENIS: Yes, but supposing I could answer the question, the average trader could not do it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The average trader is not likely to have a copy of the statute. My hon. friend, of course, always keeps that by him.

Mr. DENIS: When the fees are written in the statute, the matter will always be plain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is absolutely impossible, because my hon. friend goes on the assumption that we have mapped out this country into districts, and that we have obtained the information with reference to the different districts.

4 p.m.

We are not going to map out and form any district unless there is a local demand for it. This is an enabling Act. I have no idea, and there is no information in the department as to whether North Sydney, or any other district, or how many of them will ask for an inspection district to be created, so that it will be impossible to have the information ready so as to put in the schedules with the fees appropriate to each schedule. The information is not available, and if we were to schedule every district in the country, we would be doing a great deal of work which would be altogether superfluous.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: This clause, as it stands, is correct. It will obviate a similar difficulty to that which I brought up yesterday in reference to canned foods. One of the difficulties in regard to small factories is that there is no inspection because the quantity turned out is so small. I understand such small factories have no regulations. If in the Bill that was passed yesterday with regard to canned foods there had been a regulation like this one, the difficulty of which I was then speaking would be obviated. Similarly, in the case of hay, there are numbers of districts that will produce fifty, one hundred, or two hundred tons of hay, and in order to have an inspection there, it would be necessary to fix a higher rate than that at a place like Montreal in which a thousand or two thousand tons a day are inspected. A maximum and a minimum fee might be set, but it would destroy the effect of the Bill to make the amount too small, because, in that case, you would not be able to get an inspector at all.

On clause 342—penalty for putting foreign matter in bales:

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the minister regard the introduction of No. 2 hay into a No. 1 bale as putting foreign matter into the bale? Would that bring a man within the penalty prescribed by law?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The case is not for decision, and I do not know what the opinion of the judge would be. Personally, I think foreign matter would mean straw, bundles of weeds, dirt, stones or anything of that kind. These things have been put into baled hay more than once; I do not know that it is a very common offence, but it is certainly a very nasty one and deserves a heavy penalty. I do not think foreign matter would include hay of a different grade. A case of that kind would be covered by the inspection.

Mr. McKENZIE: The clause says that any foreign matter which improperly increases the weight of the bale or prejudicially affects its quality, will render a man liable. The introduction of a lower grade would, in my judgment, certainly affect prejudicially the quality of a bale of No. 1 hay.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You would also have to consider whether that was foreign matter or not. I should think it would be an offence against the Act to introduce hay of inferior quality into a bale of good hay.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Huntingdon mentioned the other day that that sort of thing is done. A man may see a beautiful mow of hay in a barn and arrange to buy it and have the farmer press it for him, but when he gets it, he finds that it has been mixed with an inferior class of hay. I think this clause was designed to provide to some extent against such an offence.

Mr. GERVAIS (Berthier): The Bill provides a penalty for the person putting any substance or foreign body in hay. How will you know when the hay is in a foreign market who has put in a stone, for example?

You have rejected the identification clause. How are you to know who owned the hay when the stone was placed there?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The penalty is for a general offence in the way of fraud, and whoever tried the case would exercise his judgment as to the kind of fraud that was intended. There are a thousand things that might be put in, but it would be impossible to cumber up the Act with all these details. I think we cannot do better than to allow the person who tries the case to say whether the offence comes within the Act.

Mr. DENIS: One of the reasons why I insisted so strongly on my amendment last night was to make the present clause more effective. John Jones or Tom Smith would not know who had committed the fraud unless his name appeared on the bale.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The imposition of a penalty tends to lessen the liability of the offence being committed.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 340C—grades:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The question was raised yesterday as to what constituted No. 1 grade of straw. I have been in communication with the Department of Agriculture and they have made this suggestion, which I think is a very good one: that there is a kind of straw, probably not very plentiful, which could be clearly defined as No. 1 and be made a merchantable grade. This straw is of good feeding value. I therefore beg to move that after the word "follows" in the first line of clause 340C we insert the following:

No. 1 straw shall be bright, clean, well-saved oat straw suitable for feeding purposes.

I think this would be a good straw to fix as No. 1.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move:

That 340C. be further amended by adding after the word "straw" in the second line, the following words: "from all cultivated cereals."

Amendment agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To correct an error in the printing, I move:

That 340 be amended by striking out from line 22 the words "of fair colour and sound," and replacing them by the words: "of good colour, sound and well cured."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. COPP: I was unable to be present yesterday when this Bill was under discussion, and I have not had an opportunity of reading the remarks made by different members in regard to it. Since the matter came up this afternoon I sent for the original Act of which this is an amendment, but so far I have been unable to obtain it. I hardly know just what changes are made by section 340.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In general, the changes made under the amendments just adopted are almost nil. Practically, the substance of 340 is the same as the old Act.

Mr. COPP: In what we call the dike lands in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, an exceptionally fine quality of marketable hay is grown which is not strong in timothy, as the upland hay is. I refer to the counties of Albert and Westmorland in New Brunswick, Cumberland, and possibly the Annapolis valley, in Nova Scotia. I fear that hay grown on these dike lands will not measure up to the standard of grades 1, 2 and 3 timothy, and as a result of this legislation, an excellent quality of hay may be forced on the market at a lower price than would otherwise be the case.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is it within my hon. friend's knowledge that this has actually resulted?

Mr. COPP: No, we have had no inspectors there. For instance, a quantity of hay shipped from that section of the country to North Cape Breton and Victoria might be turned down by the inspector there because it did not contain the specified proportion of timothy. Could some words not be added to the Bill with reference to this hay grown on dike lands?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will communicate his suggestion to me in writing, I shall be glad to have the officers of the department take it up, and it may be considered in the Senate.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Buildings, Nova Scotia—Amherst Drill Hall, $10,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this a new building?

Mr. CARVELL: No. The amount is to cover some small expenditures necessary to finish the building, which must have cost about $150,000.

My recollection is that there is a little flooring to be put in, cleaning up and general finishing.

Mr. McCREA: Is it the intention of the Government to build any new drill halls? I understand there are several that are built and that it is a bill of expense to keep them warm and looked after, although nothing is doing and there has not been for years.

Mr. CARVELL: I suppose that practically everything in connection with war time is a bill of expense. You cannot measure the value of a public work in war time by the expense it has been to the public. I think the true measure would be the service which these public buildings have rendered to the army in the last three or four years. But, to answer my hon. friend's question, I do not know that there is anything in these Estimates providing for new drill halls. I am pretty sure there is not and, if there is, while I will not ask the committee to strike it out, I will give the assurance that there will not be any new works undertaken along that line during the coming year.

Halifax—Quarantine station on Lawlor's Island—water supply, $10,000.

Mr. CARVELL: This is for the purpose of boring an artesian well at Lawlor's Island. They have had a great deal of difficulty in providing a suitable fresh water supply at the quarantine station there. Half of this amount is a revote.

New Brunswick — St. John — Dominion buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $5,000.

Mr. CARVELL: This is just the general vote to take care of the small repairs that became necessary in public buildings.

Mr. LEGER: Has the minister any intention of continuing the work of erecting a public building to provide for the post office and custom house in the village of Buctouche in the county of Kent? An appropriation was made for that work a few years ago and a certain amount of work was done. Is it the intention to go on with the work?

Mr. CARVELL: I find nothing in the Estimates for that. It has not been brought to my attention before. I do not know whether anything has been done except the purchase of a site some time before the war. However, I must say to my hon. friend that at the present time I can hold out no hope of erecting a public building for him much as I would like to do so, because Buctouche, I realize, is one of the most progressive towns in the whole province. But, on account of the present financial stringency, I would not feel justified in starting any new expenditures of that kind.

Mr. LEGER: An appropriation was made for this work two or three years ago and we expected that it would be continued. I think the war was on at that time. Buctouche is a very important little town. There is a great lumbering business done there and also a large mercantile business. There are two grist mills and the country surrounding Buctouche is important from the agricultural point of view. It is a fine farming country. Therefore, I feel justified in bringing the matter to the atttention of the minister in order to find out if anything is to be done. I know that some money was expended there. The site was bought, but I do not know how far it went beyond that.

Mr. MICHAUD: The Minister of Public Works is aware of the fact that in the town of Edmundston there is great need for improvement in the post office accommodation. During the past ten years this town has contributed $400,000 to the revenue of the country. It has had receipts from customs and post office to the amount of $40,000 a year and this amount has been paid into the public treasury. As my hon. friend is aware, Edmundston has a population of about 3,000. At the present moment we are building pulp mills which will cost some $3,000,000. We need a new post office very badly. There is practically no accommodation at the present moment. In view of the amount of money which this town contributes to the revenue of the country, and in view of the prospect of it having a large increase in population in a short time, it must be apparent that we need better accommodation. My hon. friend is aware that this is a very important town in many ways. He has visited it on many occasions and he knows where the present post office is situated and the great inconvenience we have in sorting and distributing the mail three or four times a day. In view of all the money that we have paid to the treasury of the country, we are surely entitled to consideration. I hope my hon. friend, who knows the circumstances and locality very well, will not hesitate to come to our rescue and give us a public building.

Mr. CARVELL: In reply to the very modest request of my hon. friend from Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) I would say it is true that I know the location of the post office in Edmundston. I have been there many times and I only wish I were in a position to bring before Parliament a vote of $15,000 or $20,000 for the erection of a public building in that very thriving town. Without any exception at all there is no town, or city, in New Brunswick, possibly with the exception of Bathurst, which is progressing as rapidly as Edmundston. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that it has a population of about 3,000 people. Probably that population will increase by 1,000 or 2,000 the next two years. The only post office accommodation which they have for a town of that size is a room in an ordinary dwelling house. Only a few days ago I received a letter from a very influential resident of the town outlining to me what he considered the necessities of the case, but I have not had time up to the present to investigate the real facts and see how much the postmistress is receiving in the way of rental, because, after all, the amount which she is receiving as a rental ought to a very great degree to decide what kind of accommodation should be given. I have no hesitation in saying, from my own personal knowledge, that the citizens are entitled to better accommodation than they are now receiving. I will take the matter up with the post office authorities and see what I can do. In the communication which I received they asked for the expenditure of the modest sum of $400, which they stated would practically give the whole lower portion of the dwellinghouse for the purpose of the office, and would provide a place for the people to even come inside out of the rain, because as it is to-day they simply come to the door, no matter what the weather may be, and stand until they get served with their mail. I think I can go so far as to promise my hon. friend that if the Post Office Department will not properly take care of this matter I will be able to find at least $400 in order to give better accommodation than exists at present, but as to a new building I can only give him the same answer as I gave to my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Leger).

Mr. MICHAUD: The minister will not forget that our revenues are sufficient each year to warrant the building of a post office.

Mr. CARVELL: That may be true, but I do not want the hon. gentleman to forget that after all that money has been expended we have got to borrow four or five hundred million dollars more to carry on the affairs of the country.

Maritime Provinces generally—Dominion Public Buildings—Improvements, repairs, etc., $25,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: In view of the great advance in the cost of living, has the Minister of Public Works made any provision for augmenting the salaries of caretakers of public buildings in Canada? I have reference particularly to my own province, but the question is just as applicable to other parts of the Dominion. Before the war, and even for some years previously, prices were soaring and under such circumstances janitors of public buildings must have found their salaries which do not exceed at most $300 or $400 quite inadequate. Some of these men in the country districts have five or six children to maintain, and now that the cost of living has doubled, in some cases more than doubled, it has been made pretty manifest that these people find it exceedingly difficult to live on the small salary paid to them. I would be pleased to know if the minister has granted these caretakers any advance, and if not, would he give the matter his consideration and see that such a salary is paid as will enable them to live fairly comfortably.

Mr. CARVELL: This matter has received a great deal of attention during the last six months. I am told, and I believe it is true, that on the advent of every new minister of Public Works practically everybody in the service puts up a demand for more pay. This has not only happened recently, but it is a general occurrence. These demands came in shoals almost in the months of November and December last, and realizing the force of just such arguments as the hon. gentleman has been giving to the committee this afternoon, we endeavoured to place the salaries of all these caretakers on some sort of equitable basis. We found that in some cases the salaries were not properly adjusted, and we therefore took $1,000 as a basis of what a man's salary should be. We then deducted from that amount what would be the reasonable value of the privileges accorded him in the way of rent, light, heat and water, all of which, of course, are primary necessities in the cost of living, and gave the man the balance in the form of salary. I think, therefore, that if my hon. friend will make inquiry he will find that practically every caretaker in Canada is treated exactly upon the same basis. I am not sure as to the actual details, but I think that in the big cities the basis is a little larger than $1,000, and if that be the basis in large cities it is somewhat less in the smaller towns, because, naturally, rent would be a heavier item in a large city than it would be in a small town. I can assure my hon. friend that we have tried to work out this question of the salaries of caretakers on a fair and equitable basis, and so much so that I do not think that there has been a complaint or request on that score put up to the department in the last two months. If there has been any, it has escaped my memory.

Mr. LEGER: Is there an appropriation for repairs to the post office at Richibucto in the county of Kent? I understand that it is intended to provide a concrete walk to the post office, and as that would cost only a small amount I would draw the attention of the minister to the desirability of this work being undertaken at an early date.

Mr. CARVELL: In looking over the accounts I find we spent about $200 upon the public buildings in Richibucto last year. I cannot say offhand whether it is intended to spend any more money out of this vote upon that work, but I will make a note of my hon. friend's suggestion. We will have the matter investigated by our architects and endeavour to do all that we can to meet his wishes.

Mr. LEGER: The money expended last year was devoted to painting part of the front of the building; the sides and the back of the building were left unpainted. What I am now urging is that all the painting should be finished, and the present wooden sidewalk leading to the building, which was laid many years ago and is in a bad state of repair, be replaced by a concrete pathway.

Mr. CARVELL: I will take a note of my hon. friend's suggestion.

Province of Quebec, Dominion Public Buildings—Improvements, repairs, etc., $35,000.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: To what buildings in Quebec does this item apply?

Mr. CARVELL: The item covers practically all the public buildings in Quebec province; and is utilized by the expenditure of a few dollars here and a few dollars there. The money is intended to cover unforeseen expenses in conducting the public buildings of the province, and no minister could state offhand exactly how he proposes to distribute this vote of $35,000. Money is voted for this purpose every year to be expended as the officers of the department think proper.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is $35,000 sufficient to keep in repair all the public buildings in Quebec?

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: There are other items devoted to special buildings. The vote under consideration is intended to be used as thought best to keep the public buildings generally in a state of repair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is applicable in unforeseen cases.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Am I to understand that when there are large repairs tenders are invited?

Mr. CARVELL: Wherever it is possible to have work done by tender that course will be followed. This vote has reference to small repairs the need for which develops in the operation of the year's work. I can assure my hon. friend that if any of these works are of such a nature as to permit of tenders being called, that system will be adopted.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I understand there is a list in each city of the names of contractors or employees, and those who get the work are selected from these lists.

Mr. CARVELL: I have heard of that myself.

Mr. McKENZIE: Surely not.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course, I am going back a long time now, but my memory is fairly good. I want to assure my hon. friend (Mr. Du Tremblay) that that method has been abolished, and forgotten I hope. In future any work such as the hon. member describes, which must be done by day work, will be done under the direct supervision of the engineer in charge of the work, and he alone will have the right of choosing the men or firms to carry it out, and then we will hold him responsible that it is properly done; I think when the responsibility is put on the shoulders of the proper officer we will come pretty close to getting the best results that can possibly be had.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think that the regulation laid down in the Public Works Act applies to repairs. If it is necessary to spend more than $5,000 it is obligatory to call for tenders. At all events, I have no fear, with the present minister in the Public Works Department, that any money will be spent contrary to the public interest. If there is one thing more than another which has produced a salutary effect on public opinion it was the announcement made by the hon. gentleman that he has done away with patronage lists in his department. After all, people, whether Conservatives, Liberals, or Unionists, are all taxpayers, and in these days of financial crisis, we want to get the best work done in the cheapest and most honest way. The minister is right in stating publicly that the local engineer of the department, in Montreal and Quebec, shall follow his own best judgment in these small repairs, and select the best men to do them, and to see to it that it is not a question of picayune patronage to be distributed to A, B, C, or D. I see that several items have been struck out of the main Estimates, and my own county of Gaspe was among the sufferers. I did not raise any objection to the striking out of the items, because I understand the difficult financial condition of the country.

I, for one, would not object if the Estimates were cut in two. We could dispense with fifty per cent of the expenditure. If our people knew the straits we were in they would certainly applaud if the Government had the courage to cut down the expenditure. At a time when we are spending $500,000,000 to carry on the war, I do not see why there should be any frills in the way of patronage around the country. For my own part, I would be ready to vote to reduce the Estimates by 50 per cent.

Mr. McCREA: Has the minister been long enough in harness yet to discover that there is a larger number of employees of one kind or another in the public departments than there is work for, or who are receiving salaries above the value of the service they are giving? Without mentioning any particular place or office, I have one in my mind, and it has been a puzzle to me for some years past to know what its employees are doing. That office has a staff of an engineer and several assistants, and I am very curious to know how much work they are superintending, or what the value of the work that they look after is compared with the amount of salaries paid. I think this same condition applies to many offices all over this country. What I would like to know from the minister is whether he has discovered that the offices in his department are a good deal overmanned?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I was not very long in the department before I learned many of the things that my hon. friend is alluding to, and I can assure you it has given me more trouble than almost anything else to arrive at a fair and equitable way of rectifying the condition. It is a hard thing for any man who professes to have a heart in him to simply say to a man: "Your services are no longer required; get out." Yet it may come to that. I can say to my hon. friend that for the last four months, practically since the New Year, the department has been obtaining the most reliable reports it could possibly get on every officer in the public service. We have these pretty well codified now, and all over the Dominion, I regret to say, there are a great many in official positions who, I do not think, are rendering very much service for the money they are receiving. It is a very unpleasant duty, forced upon a new minister especially, to relieve these men of their positions, and perhaps throw them out, knowing that many are not in a position to enter a new business or profession. The Public Works Department has just recently taken over the construction of all works heretofore carried on by the Military Hospitals Commission. We feel that very many of the officials who have not very much to do, as there are no ordinary public works going on, can be utilized in connection with inspection and other duties in this new work, and I am in hopes that in that way we may absorb a very large number of them. Quite a number have already been dispensed with. These are the men who practically were performing no services whatever on account very largely of the reduced expenditures. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that we have given the subject our very best consideration, and the House may rest assured that within a very few months these people will either be absorbed in some work for which they will be giving valuable services to the country or they will disappear from the pay roll.

Mr. McCREA: I was glad to hear the minister say that his department was overmanned, but I was rather sorry to hear of his being so chickenhearted that he did not feel like dispensing with the services of those employees for whom there is no work There have been times in the history of this country when it was quite a hardship for men to be thrown out of a job, for the reason that there was nothing for them to do. But this particular time is not one of those times.

At this particular time a man who is out of a job need not be pitied, because there is plenty of work to do, and there is no necessity for keeping a man in the Government employ, or in the employ of any other party, if there is no business for him to do. I hope the minister and all the other members of the Government will realize that this is the country's money we are spending, and that the country is very short of money just now. I hope they will lay aside their tender heartedness and dispense with the services of every man who has nothing to do and who is not earning money for King and country.

Mr. CANNON: Is there a staff of architects looking after repairs to public works and buildings?

Mr. CARVELL: We have a staff of architects in every province, and we have staffs in different districts of certain provinces.

Mr. CANNON: In the Auditor General's Report, page V-30, I notice a Mr. J. P. Ouellet last year received $2,196.08 for work done in connection with the maintenance and construction of buildings for the Public Works Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where?

Mr. CANNON: In the city of Quebec. Is there an architect looking after public works in the city of Quebec?

Mr. CARVELL: My information is that the gentleman referred to is an architect who received a certain commission by way of remuneration for his services in looking after the erection of a public building in the city of Quebec. That would not be a regular employment. He received the salary last yar. He might receive something this year, although I think not, because the building has been practically completed. The position is not a permanent one. The gentleman has received simply a commission. The practice has grown up—I am not condemning it, neither am I advocating it—of handing the inspection of important public buildings to certain architects on a commission basis. They get their pay while the work progresses, and, of course, they cease to be officers of the department after the work is finished.

Mr. CANNON: Is there in the city of Quebec an architect to look after the work done on public buildings, and, if there is, why is Mr. Ouellet employed in his stead?

Mr. CARVELL: There is, in the city of Quebec, Mr. Pouliot, who is called clerk of works. I have no knowledge of his professional qualifications, and at this moment I really could not answer my hon. friend as to why the other gentleman was employed. I know, as a fact, that the other gentleman was employed in his capacity of architect, and that he received his pay by way of commission.

[Mr. McCrea.]

Mr. CANNON: In the same item to which I have referred there is a special amount paid to Mr. Ouellet, reading:

One and one-half per cent. for verifying C. P. R. accounts, $83.42.

I do not see why the Government should pay Mr. Ouellet for verifying Canadian Pacific Railway accounts.

Mr. CARVELL: I understand the Canadian Pacific did some work for the Government in connection with the immigration building at Quebec, and this gentleman certified the accounts and supervised the work. He received the usual commission for doing so.

Mr. CANNON: Does the minister not think those accounts should be verified by the accountant of the department?

Mr. CARVELL: They must be verified by the accountant. The only question is one of principle of policy, whether it is the proper way to pay the man who performs the services. I am rather of the opinion that, in future, those services will be performed by the permanent officials of the department. That is my judgment. There may arise cases when we shall have to vary from that policy, but, as a matter of policy, I think it is best to encourage the men in the employ of the department, cast the responsibility upon them, let them realize that the department is going to hold them responsible for the proper performance of that work, and I believe we shall get more loyal service and better results all around. That is only a question of policy. I want my hon. friends to realize that I am not here to condemn matters of policy of my predecessor. I am willing to take all reasonable responsibility, but there is not much use in asking me why things were done. I am only too happy to give any information which I can, and I shall not have very much difficulty in telling my hon. friends what my policy will be in the future.

5 p.m.

Mr. CANNON: I am not asking these questions in order to criticise the minister, because I know he is not responsible for what may have happened last year, as he was not then at the head of the department. I understand, however, that now while the Estimates are on, is about the only occasion given to members of this House to get certain information that it might be interesting for them to know. That is why I am putting these questions.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope my hon. friend will not, for a moment, think I am finding fault with his method of obtaining information. Go ahead. We shall give the committee all the information we possibly can. I hope nobody will have the idea that I am objecting to any set of questions or the obtaining of any information desired.

Mr. CANNON: In this item for Mr. J. P. Ouellet, I see he has received $258.95 for supervision of sundry work; plans, etc., for $34,500 contract, $1,207.50. What was that contract and to whom was it given? Where was the work done?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not in a position to give the information now, but if the hon. member will write me a letter, giving the page and the account in such a way that there will be no question about its identity, we shall at once send him back a letter giving him all the information, and we are willing to do the same in regard to every subject in the Auditor General's Report, relating to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. CANNON: I have no objection to corresponding with the minister, but on the other hand when answers are given in the House they are published in Hansard and the information is not of a private but of a public character. It is much better for the public that the answer should be given in the House if the minister is in a position to give it. The deputy minister is here. Perhaps he can enlighten the minister on the subject.

Mr. CARVELL: I regret I am not able to answer the question. I may say to my hon. friend however, that any letter I write to him will be public, and he is in a position to put it in the newspapers or make any use of it he desires.

Mr. CANNON: To close up this incident, I wish to tell the minister I drew his attention to this item in the Auditor General's Report only because it struck me as being most extraordinary that the department should pay a large sum to an architect when there is already in the department a staff of architects paid by the country to do the work. I do not say that Mr. Ouellet was employed because he happened to be a political friend of the late Government. I know the gentleman who was Minister of Public Works last year, would not be induced to employ this gentleman's services on that account, but nevertheless it strikes me as rather strange that such a large amount should be given to Mr. Ouellet when the department did not need his services at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I happen to know the situation in Quebec. The resident engineer appointed by the Department of Public Works is Mr. Decarie, a man of exceptional ability, very conscientious, and very hard working—an absolutely safe man, with a staff of well trained officers under him. With such a man as that in the department, I do not think that the minister is justified in paying large sums of money to outsiders such as have been mentioned by my hon. friend from Dorchester. Mr. Decarie, because he was an honest, painstaking and capable engineer, has been completely ignored, and the result has been that the reconstruction of the Quebec post office, a work of only reasonably large dimensions, which was commenced in 1911 or 1912, has not yet been completed. Why? Because the department has simply let matters drift, and every ward politician in the city of Quebec has had his finger in the pie. I do not know how many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been sunk in that post office, and it is not yet completed. If Mr. Decarie had been put in charge of the work it would have been completed long ago and at much less expense.

Mr. CARVELL: My attention was drawn to this matter some months ago, when I made an investigation. I find that the contract is for a lump sum, and therefore the exceedingly long time during which repairs have been going on does not perhaps mean so much to the department as one might think. I thank my hon. friend for the information he has given me. I have met the gentleman he has referred to, and have every confidence in his ability. I thought that this particular contract was finished; but if it has not been it will travel pretty fast in the next two or three months.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a scandal to think that a building not half the size of this Museum, and which has been under way for six or seven years, should not have been completed before this. If Mr. Decarie had been in charge of the reconstruction it would have been completed four years ago. The minister, if he will investigate, will find that there is a regular mine of scandals connected with that building.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the city of Quebec postal accommodation at the present time?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Where, then, is the urgency for completing the work?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The building is being reconstructed; it is not a new work. The reconstruction was begun in 1911 or 1912.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not see that that is any great crime, just because it happens to be in the city of Quebec. Other places are suffering the same inconvenience.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend misses the point.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend is complaining because a certain work in Quebec has not been completed; it is a shame and a scandal, and so on. In reply to that part of his remarks, I say there are lots of places in this country where buildings have been left in an unfinished state owing to the necessity for avoiding all unnecessary expenditure while the war is on. But if any work is dropped east of the Ottawa river, a howl is raised about it at once. If there is any part of Canada where buildings should be completed, it is in the section west of the Ottawa river.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend missed my point altogether. The contract is for a lump sum, and was given six or seven years ago. The money has to be spent anyway. My point was that if the reconstruction had been under the supervision of the resident engineer the building would have been ready long ago. It is a small building, relatively speaking, but large for the city of Quebec. I was asking why we should pay architects to superintend the work when it is not being completed? I was not making any such complaint as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend has mentioned this Museum building that we are meeting in. If the building they are putting up in Quebec is going to be like this one it would be better if they took ten or fifteen years more to complete it. This building was constructed during the time my hon. friend was a minister of the Crown. By some, the building is regarded as absolutely unsafe. Only a short time ago they had to take part of it down to prevent the whole thing from coming down. I presume the plans for this building had the hon. gentleman's approval when he was a member of the Government. Therefore, when he recommends an architect as able to carry out a work to perfection in a very short time, I take his recommendation with a very large dose of salt, in view of what his architects have done. Here is a building with cracks in it; it is going to pieces, sliding down the hill into the canal or somewhere else. This building was put up at a time when the hon. gentleman had a say in the erection of public buildings.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This Museum building was erected long before I became a member of the Government. My hon. friend knows the reasons for the cracks in it.

Mr. CARVELL: The contract for the reconstruction of the post office in Quebec was for the lump sum of $385,000, and was given on the 23rd of March, 1913. Extra work was authorized to the amount of $21,501, and there is extra work now under adjustment amounting to $3,000. So the total probable cost is $409,501. Up to the 14th of March last the contractor had been paid $400,032, leaving a balance required to fill the contract of $9,468. It is possible that other small portions of the work will have to be finished up. A wall of some kind is being removed by the department, and it is suggested that this work should be done by the contractor; that will require adjustment. In order to be sure that this matter will be cleaned up without delay, we are asking for $15,000.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Was a claim sent in to the department by the contractor on account of the loss occasioned to him by the increased cost of labour and material?

Mr. CARVELL: A claim was sent in either by the contractor or by his solicitor. It was not paid. Hon. gentlemen can rest assured that we will treat this matter purely as a business proposition.

Mr. CANNON: Who looks after the valuation of land expropriated by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. CARVELL: An estimate of the value is made by some one in the locality considered as an expert and, if it can be arranged, an agreement is made with the owner for the taking over of the land on a reasonable basis. If such an agreement cannot be made, the matter goes to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. CANNON: I see in the Auditor General's Report that a gentleman named Amyot received the sum of $1,000 in full and final settlement of all claims in connection with the expropriation of a land site. Can the minister give me the particulars of this $1,000 payment?

Mr. CARVELL: This man was the owner of part of a site, and a settlement was made with him. That is all the information I have, but I will furnish all the facts connected with the matter if the hon. gentleman so desires.

Grosse Isle Quarantine Station—Boiler houses, new boilers, etc., $30,000.

Mr. DECHENE: Is this for a new boiler house, or for repairs to the old one?

Mr. CARVELL: I understand that this is for additional boilers. Quarantine stations are under the control of the Department of Agriculture; the Public Works Department erect the buildings for them. During the last session a lengthy discussion took place in the House with regard to the voting of $115,000 or $120,000 for the erection of new buildings at Grosse Isle. The Department of Agriculture informs me that it is absolutely necesary that the quarantine station there be completed before the troops begin to return in large numbers. During seven months of the year the troops will have to come by the St. Lawrence, and necessary quarantine accommodation will have to be provided. I threw all the obstacles I could in the way of the erection of this building, but the officials of the Agricultural Department persisted in saying that the expenditure is absolutely necessary, and, therefore, I cannot refuse it. If we go on with the new buildings it may not be necessary to instal this new plant, but if we do not the additional amount for heating plant will have to be spent. The work will be done by tender and contract. As presently advised, I think it will be necessary to proceed with this work on a large scale during the coming summer. Nearly four years ago tenders were called for part of this work; they amounted to about $150,000. In all probability we will not have to construct the whole work as has been proposed, but there will at least have to be the main administration building and two units in the place of wards. It has not been definitely decided to do so, but in all probability we shall proceed with the work in the near future.

Mr. DECHENE: I understand that the foundation of the new quarantine station has already been laid and part of the work done.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. DECHENE: Is it known that the pillars were not amply protected and that, through the influence probably of water or frost, some of them are tipping over?

Mr. CARVELL: That is news to me. I have asked my deputy about it, and he says that it is news to him also. We will have inquiry made into the matter at once, and if my hon. friend's information is correct, we shall see who is responsible.

Mr. DECHENE: One of the men who is in charge of the foundation work came to my office last winter and told me that he had observed that some of the pillars were somewhat tipped over. He suggested that they might have to be rebuilt, and asked me, when I should go to Ottawa, to point out that this deficiency was not the fault of the contractor; that the pillars were not sufficiently protected.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not understand that. If the pillars were properly constructed frost would not interfere with them. It would be a reflection on any man if he erected buildings or works of any kind under these conditions. I can assure my hon. friend that we will have this matter investigated and find out what the facts are.

Mr. DECHENE: There was a complete foundation in some places and in some other places there were just pillars set in the ground. Of course they had to make a deep hole to reach a solid rock foundation. The hole was filled with ice and water during the winter and probably that caused the trouble with the pillars.

Mr. CARVELL: I find from the notes placed before me that tenders were called for these foundations early in the autumn of 1913 and that a contract was let on the 21st November, 1913, to J. B. Gallibois of Montmagny for $20,753. The total amount that was finally paid to the contractors on the 3rd August, 1915, was $22,541. There was a payment of $20,750 on the contract, plus $2,788, allowed for extra piling. These are all the facts I have. I am very much interested in what the hon. gentleman tells me and I shall certainly have the matter investigated.

Mr. DECHENE: Will the new boiler house and boilers be connected with the new hospital or are they to supply power to the old building?

Mr. CARVELL: I think I was in error in the statement I made a few moments ago. The proposed boilers are for the disinfecting plant and for necessary purposes at the wharf. They are at the old building and I think they will have nothing to do with the new hospital referred to in the other item.

Mr. DECHENE: I see an item for "improvements and repairs to buildings and fittings, furniture." Are these fittings and furniture supplied by contract or by day's work under direction of the commanding officer?

Mr. CARVELL: I can only say again that if any of these works are such that we can properly call for tenders, tenders will be called. You can quite readily conceive that there may be a condition of affairs, such as tearing down and rebuilding, under which it would not be possible to properly specify the work. It is pretty hard to call for tenders for that kind of work but every portion of this work which is new, or which is well defined, or for which a proper specification can be intelligently prepared, will be done by tender and contract. The remainder will be done by the officials of the Public Works Department who are responsible in that part of the province of Quebec.

Mr. DECHENE: I do not ask this question with the idea of making trouble. I understand that during the last few years there was a contractor in charge of work in connection with the quarantine station there. He was supposed to look after the furniture and fittings in the Government buildings. Last year, I understand, some work was done by the labourers under the supervision of the commanding officer. I would like to know why there was a change and if any money was saved as a result of it.

Mr. CARVELL: That portion of the province of Quebec is under the control of a gentleman named Tremblay who lives at Montmagny and, while I am not acquainted with the details of what took place last year, I will say that any work done by the Public Works Department, which requires the employment of temporary labourers, will be done under the officials of the Public Works Department, no matter what may have been done in the past, and we will hold them responsible for seeing that it is done properly. When it comes to a question of the buying of furniture that probably will be done by the War Purchasing Commission under the new arrangement. I can assure my hon. friend that it will be done properly no matter by whom.

Mr. DECHENE: The work which is now done under the supervision of the commanding officer was formerly done under the supervision of a civil engineer, Mr. Tremblay. Generally, Mr. Tremblay took charge and saw that the contractor was doing his business properly but I understand that last year Mr. Tremblay had practically nothing to do with it and that the commanding officer just ran it as he pleased.

Mr. CARVELL: I have never heard of this before. A system has grown up during a great many years past by which different departments have been constructing public buildings and looking after them. It may have been due to this system that the commanding officer took charge of the work at the quarantine station. I am not aware of the details but I can assure my hon. friend that the public works of this country in the future are going to be constructed by the Public Works Department and that the officials and nobody else, are going to be held responsible for the due execution of these works.

Mr. DECHENE: I have heard that it was the intention of the Government to build a new wharf to accommodate the new building that is to be located on the lower part of the island. There are two wharves, one at the upper end of the island and one at the lower end next the new building. Is it the intention of the Government to enlarge this wharf or to leave it as it is now. The Government steamers do not stop at the lower wharf but always go to the upper wharf.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no appropriation in the Estimates this year for any enlargement of that wharf. The matter was brought to my attention during the last three or four months and the information I have received is that eventually the wharf will have to be enlarged but I do not think I can hold out much hope to my hon. friend that the work will be undertaken during the coming year. We may be compelled to embark on the construction of the immigration building proper as a matter of necessity. But I think the wharf will have to get along as it is at present.

Montreal General Post Office—remodelling old building, $20,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The General Post Office was enlarged some years ago. The old building of the Montreal Gazette was purchased and the post office was extended. Every one who has to go into the general post office realizes that it is a very small building for the business that is carried on there.

Mr. CARVELL: You mean simply for the employees there, do you not?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are any number of employees there.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what I thought.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There were seven hundred employees in 1911, or thereabouts, and in less than three years the number was duplicated. I think there are from fourteen to sixteen hundred employees there at present.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a very important office I know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The business has not increased correspondingly. I understand that for the repairing of mail bags, sacks, boxes, and so forth, the department, some years ago, rented another building opposite, on Craig street. Has the lease of that building expired, or is the Government going to continue it?

Mr. CARVELL: That raises a question that has given me a great deal of thought during the last three or four months. To answer my hon. friend's question categorically, the lease to which he refers is still running, and I cannot tell him exactly when it will expire. However, this raises the same question with respect to the city of Montreal that we were discussing last evening in connection with the city of Ottawa. The public services in Montreal are scattered round in quite a number of places, but with the difference that there are not nearly the same number of employees in that city as there are in Ottawa. But it has been impressed upon my mind very strongly that just as soon as the finances of the country will admit of it, the Government should either erect or purchase a building in some central locality in the city of Montreal in which to house all its employees. I have examined the rentals that are being paid for offices, and I find that whenever you send out a Government official for the purpose of obtaining quarters for himself he first makes for St. James street; he thinks he should be provided with bank premises right in the middle of that thoroughfare. When you argue with the official for a while he states: Well, I will be satisfied if I can have one of the best corners on St. Catherine street. The result is that we are usually paying for the best corners, and paying prices that are not necessary and not justifiable. Under present conditions, where these offices are separated and spread all over the city, it is a pretty hard matter to control them. I do not care who the Minister of Public Works may be, when he is compelled to hunt around for offices he is very often forced to take that which he would rather not have. For that reason I believe that in the city of Montreal we require a centrally located and Dominion-owned building for the housing of all the officials probably to a greater extent than in any other part of Canada. I believe that would be a good policy to adopt in all the big centres. The matter has been forced particularly upon our attention lately, by reason of the necessity for making provision for the collection of the income tax. Offices have been opened up in many of the large business centres of Canada, and, of course, the Government officers, as I said before, in Montreal want to get on St. James Street, and in Winnipeg they want to get—

Mr. LEMIEUX: On Main Street.

Mr. CARVELL: Or a street equally as prominent, and none of them want to go upstairs. They say, "We must have bank premises on the best business corners there are in the city," which is only human nature. I tell them they do not require such expensive buildings as these, and I am having my way to some extent. I also tell them that wherever there is a vacant room in a public building there is where they ought to go. They are filling up these rooms now, and there will not be much vacant space left hereafter in the public buildings in those cities where these officials are located. However, it only emphasizes the point I am making: The moment the Government starts out to rent space in any city or town, it is going to pay a much higher figure, proportionately to what the business community pay for similar accommodation, than it ought to, and, therefore, in my judgment, the Government should own its own building, not in small places, but in large centres like Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and possibly the Pacific Coast. The business in these cities is of sufficient importance to justify the Government in having its own accommodation. Under present conditions that is impossible, and all that is left for us is to go on and do the best we can, discontinuing some of these rented premises when the leases expire, if possible, and making the best business arrangement we can.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I want to draw the minister's attention to the needs of Outremont, with a population of about fifteen thousand persons, and distant about three miles from the general post office in Montreal. Outremont has no post office, whereas Maisonneuve, Westmount, and other communities in the environment of Montreal, are well provided for in that respect. It is very inconvenient for the people of Outremont not to have proper postal facilities, and I hope the Minister of Public Works will be in a position at an early date to supply what is lacking in this respect. If the finances of the country do not permit it this year, I hope that next year the minister will be able to appropriate a reasonable amount to erect a good postoffice, because I can assure him that one is absolutely necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: It would give me the very greatest pleasure if I could erect public buildings for everybody, that is if they are necessary, and I have no doubt that a postal station for Outremont comes within that category. I think I have had some correspondence with a number of people about the provision of a station at Outremont. Nothing has been done and I am afraid that nothing can be done while conditions continue as at present. Just as soon as the financial affairs of Canada will warrant, it will give us great pleasure to do everything that ought to be done in order to meet the necessities of the public.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps it is the fault of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Du Tremblay) that the condition of which he complains exists, because had he not defeated the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) provision would have been made for a post office in Outremont. We were discussing a moment or two ago the question of the Government obtaining land in the city of Montreal for the purpose of building. I understand that the Government has a large block of land on McGill street, which was purchased several years ago from the Grey Nuns, and a portion of which was used for the erection of an examining warehouse for the Customs Department. The Government also went to the expense of piling the vacant land for further building when required. It seems to me that is an ideal place for a public building, and there ought to be no reason why the Government should cast about looking for other property when they have this land in their possession.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a fact that the Government owns a very desirable site on the location referred to by my hon. friend, one portion of which is occupied, I think, by an examining warehouse.

Mr. LEMIEUX: One portion is occupied by the new examining warehouse, and the other is intended for a customs house.

Mr. CARVELL: The other part is intended for a customs house, I think. The matter has been discussed as to whether that would not be a proper site on which to erect a large office building. We do not want any work of art, but simply a good, plain, fireproof office building, and one large enough to house all the public officials of the Federal Government in the city of Montreal.

Mr. JACOBS: The Government might be able to explain why it was that they went to the expense of piling that immense piece of vacant land for a building to be erected at some future time unknown to even the Government. There was an immense expense incurred in the piling of that ground at the same time when the piling was done for the building which was erected on part of that lot.

Mr. CARVELL: My information is that the work of constructing the foundation of the examining warehouse was done by the Foundation Company, a well-known contracting firm, and it was thought advisable at the same time to prepare a foundation on the adjoining lot so that whenever it was decided to go on with any extension that part of the work would be completed. This lot requires piling to ensure a suitable foundation and we have it.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the minister know that the interest on the money cost of piling this ground has been running on for years, and the Government does not, even now, know if they are going to put up any building on it. It does seem to me that it is very poor business to pile ground for some future occasion which may never arise.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, my hon. friend knows that the war has upset many of our calculations, and I have no doubt that when that work was done it was not anticipated that the conditions would be as they are at the present time. I know nothing about it, except the information which I have given my hon. friend. It is true we are paying interest, but if we had put up an expensive building we would be paying still more interest. However, that is just one of the incidents and exigencies of the war.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As a matter of fact, the piling was started during the war, but not when my hon. friend was head of the department. Perhaps that explains the whole thing.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps the minister can tell us how much the piling on the unused portion of the ground cost. I suppose the information is available?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, yes, but I have not got it here, as there is no item in the estimates for that work.

Quebec Post Office—Enlargement and alterations, $15,000.

Mr. CANNON: The minister told us that a contract had been awarded for a given amount. Is this in addition to the contract given?

Mr. CARVELL: It is to close up the existing contract.

Three Rivers—New Public Building, $20,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will this item be cut out?

Mr. BUREAU: Might I ask a question?

Mr. CARVELL: I have some doubts about the expediency of this item.

Mr. BUREAU: So have I. That is why I rose. I would like to inquire if all Dominion officers will be under that roof when that building is completed?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know how many officers we have in Three Rivers. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will not be any vacant space in it, and if there are not more officers in Three Rivers than will fill up this building then all the public officers in Three Rivers will be in the public building.

Mr. BUREAU: The reason I inquire is this: the plans for this building were prepared before 1911; tenders were called for after 1911, when there was a change of Government. The lowest tenderer at that time for the original plan, which was large enough to accommodate all the Dominion officers in Three Rivers, was a firm of Liberals.

Mr. CARVELL: What were their names?

Mr. BUREAU: I think Collins, Giroux and Baptist.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it John Collins?

Mr. BUREAU: I think so, but not the one the hon. gentleman uses.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps that is the reason they did not get the contract.

Mr. BUREAU: Am I right in my statement as to the names of the original tenderers?

Mr. CARVELL: No, they were not the lowest tenderers. Verrette, McLeod and Ferron were the lowest.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the second tender. When they saw that the gentlemen I mentioned were the lowest tenderers, the plans were changed, and another tender was called for, and Mr. Verrette, who was a Tory friend of the Government, got the contract. He got it quite low, I understand. Mr. Verrette could not finish his contract. I would like to know how that matter was settled. The contract is now being finished by Mr. Bourque.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is he from Hull?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: He is a very good contractor.

Mr. BUREAU: I have no doubt that he is, judging by other work he has done in Three Rivers. He built the drill shed there. I do not want the information now, as the matter I refer to happened before my hon. friend took office. I would like to know how the Verrette company got out of the contract. I do not state this as a fact, but I understand they had a deposit with the Government as security for the contract, and that the progress estimates on this contract were largely exaggerated, and that even by forfeiting their deposit they were still overpaid for the contract when not one-quarter was completed. The information I want is, how was the Verrette contract settled? As to the Bourque contract, I have no doubt as to its being all right, and as to the work it is being properly done.

Mr. CARVELL: On February 19, 1917, an Order in Council was passed authorizing the closing of the contract with Verrette, McLeod and Ferron, who asked to be relieved of it, stating that they were not able to finish the work at the price agreed upon, namely, $163,495, due to the increased cost of material since the outbreak of the war.

Mr. BUREAU: Has the minister any information about the suspension of the work from 1913 to 1917?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not find any in the note I have before me. The contractors also claim that, owing to a delay caused by a protest of the city of Three Rivers re an encroachment by the contractors on land owned by the city and used in connection with the construction of the building, they were unable to close with the sub-contractors for materials, and when they were ordered to resume work, war had been declared and prices had greatly increased. The final settlement was as follows: Value of work done by contractors, $96,462.05; value of extra work done by contractors, $13,501; total amount paid to contractors, $109,963.05. New tenders were called for the completion of the work.

Mr. BUREAU: What was the value of the work done?

Mr. CARVELL: $109,963.05.

Mr. BUREAU: How much will you pay the new contractor?

Mr. CARVELL: The new contractor gets $87,500 for completing the work. There seems to be something else required besides that. The fittings would account for the extra amount. The expenditure to March 31, 1917, is $126,110. The probable expenditure for 1917-18 is $100,000. I do not know how much of that was expended, but, I presume, the most of it, because I see the revote is not very large.

Mr. BUREAU: The building is going on very nicely now.

Mr. CARVELL: The vote asked for now is $20,000. That will make a total estimated expenditure of $246,110, or practically a quarter of a million dollars. We confidently hope this amount will be quite sufficient to finish the building. If the building be sufficiently large to accommodate all the public services in that city, they will certainly be housed in that building.

Mr. BUREAU: The building, as first planned, would have been amply large to accommodate all Dominion officials in Three Rivers for the present, and also to have an examining warehouse and a Customs house with all the necessary additions. Every office was provided for. Each department was asked how much space it would require, and that information was given. The first tender amounted, I think, to $256,000.

Mr. CARVELL: $163,000.

Mr. BUREAU: I mean the first tender of all, not the Verrette tender. Tenders were called for twice. The first tender was cancelled because some Liberals were members of the firm that tendered lowest. Then the plan was cut down; the size of the building was reduced. You will now have to rent outside buildings to accommodate your officials, because in the present building, there is not enough room. I think a couple of the departments will be left out. When you accommodate the Inland Revenue Department, the Customs Department, the Post Office and the Public Works Department, you will have no room left for the personnel of the St. Maurice works, or for your engineers, and you will have to rent buildings. The original price was no more than it is going to cost for this smaller building. The minister tells me that the department has settled with Verrette, and I see the Order in Council recites that they could not go on because of a protest from the city council of Three Rivers. The firm had a shack which they used as an office. Part of that shack was on part of the property belonging to the city of Three Rivers. The shack was about 100 feet from the building. It had nothing to do with the building. The firm were driving horses and putting machinery all around. There was no excuse for doing so. They took the contract knowing they could not carry it out. They took it relying on being able to get extras. They got at loggerheads with the present Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin), who is in Europe, and the extras were not recommended, and they stopped work. This work was stopped for three years without any reason or justification. During those three years they had carved in stone on the side of the building "Revenue de l'Intérieur," spelling "Revenu" with an "e" at the end of it. Then they took out the stone with the letter "e" on it, and I suppose they faced it around. I am told it cost the department $396 for a man to get up on a ladder, take the stone out and put it in again. They put a hitching post on the corner for the contractor's horse. I am mentioning these things, because, if the department wishes to throw away a quarter of a million dollars, we have a right to get a building worth that amount. The first plan that was prepared and for which tenders were called and submitted, and a contract practically let except for the fact that there were Liberals in the firm, was for a building worth $250,000, and it would have been one of the finest buildings in the province. I do not want to bother my hon. friend with those details. I know he is not responsible. I would, however, like him to get them from the department, and I ask for them publicly, because I know there has been, in the building of that post office at Three Rivers, "red-handed" robbery on the part of Tory firms in that city and their supporters in the Government.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall give my hon. friend every bit of information in regard to the matter there is in the Public Works Department.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Three Rivers—New public building, $20,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to point out that the official name of Three Rivers is Trois Rivières.

Mr. BUREAU: The name has been changed on account of there being a Three Rivers in Michigan.

Kingston R. M. C. — Enlargement of educational block, $150,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Has that work been started?

Mr. CARVELL: No. I have had no opportunity of discussing the matter with those who are particularly interested, and I need more information than I have at present to justify me in starting this work. I am not saying that it will not be started, but very strong reasons will have to be given for this amount of work on the Royal Military College at the present time. The college has done a splendid work in the past, and I hope it will continue to do good work in the future, but what it will do in the next three or four years will not be of very much value in the winning of the present war. I will ask the House to vote this item, on the assurance that before spending anything we will seriously consider whether it is absolutely necessary at this time.

Ottawa departmental buildings—renewing metal covering on Mackenzie wing of West Block, $2,500.

Mr. MURPHY: Why is this item carried over from year to year?

Mr. CARVELL: It was too late in the season to have anything done last year, and we are therefore asking for a revote this year. The work is necessary, and I think will be done this year.

Ottawa Government Printing Bureau—freight elevators, $9,500.

Mr. CARVELL: These are being installed at the present time under contract with Otis-Fensom.

Mr. MURPHY: In what part of the building?

Mr. CARVELL: I understand in practically the same location as the old elevators. The price struck me as being pretty high when the contract was signed, but we have found in calling for tenders for elevators in the new Parliament building that elevators are an expensive item, and we cannot get them any cheaper.

Mr. MURPHY: In view of the congestion at the Bureau I was wondering whether a shaft was going to be erected outside the building for these elevators.

Mr. CARVELL: I think not.

Toronto—Postal station "A," $300,000.

Mr. CARVELL: The Public Works Department is bearing a certain percentage of the cost of the new station building on Front street, Toronto, part of which will be used by the post office. This is our share of the cost this year.

Edmonton—Government's share of cost of permanent pavement on Jasper Avenue crossing Government property occupied by Alberta Penitentiary, including interest thereon at 5 per cent., $21,200.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister explain this item, and say why interest is included?

Mr. CARVELL: It seems that a pavement 80 feet wide and practically a mile in length was constructed in front of the penitentiary property on Jasper avenue in 1914. The total cost of the whole frontage was $34,919. The share assumed by the city was $9,103, the Government's share being $25,815. There is another item of 3,766 feet of which the Government's share is $18,008, the interest on which, since January 1, 1915, amounts to about $3,000, the total being $21,159, and we are asking for $21,000. An arrangement was made under which we should pay a certain proportion of the cost of paving the street, and this is to close the transaction.

Mr. MURPHY: Why was the money not paid before in order to save interest?

Mr. CARVELL: I think the work was done by the city, and perhaps they were so wealthy in Edmonton that they did not require the money and only lately realized the fact that they were entitled to it. However, if we had paid the money three years ago we should have been out the interest, so it is the same thing.

Victoria—Old post office building—to pay taxes due the city for the year 1917, $1,578.47.

Mr. McKENZIE: What taxes are these?

Mr. CARVELL: This is an old building now leased by the Government to private individuals. When the Government owns property which it leases to other parties, I understand it pays the taxes. Personally I never could see why the Government should not pay taxes on all property which it owns throughout the Dominion. I am not laying that down as the policy of the Government; I am only stating my private views on the subject.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the revenue from this property?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not that information, but I will get it for my hon. friend. This item has been voted yearly since 1900.

Yukon Territory—Dawson post office—vault, $10,000

Mr. COPP: Is that work to be done this year?

Mr. CARVELL: The vote was taken last year, but the money was not expended. In Dawson difficulty is experienced in obtaining proper foundations for such works as vaults. The population of Dawson is decreasing, and a Bill has been, or is to be, introduced by the Minister of the Interior providing for the reconstruction and rearrangement of governmental affairs in the Yukon Territory. I hope that there will be a very great reduction in the expenditure there. I am not in a position, therefore, to say positively whether or not this work will go on, but I am morally certain that it will not.

Ottawa public buildings—Dominion Observatory and Geodetic Survey building—heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, $230,000.

Mr. CARVELL: In all probability this item will not meet the expenditure. I wish to place myself on record in this respect, because the cost of fuel is advancing rapidly. It may be necessary to put an item in the Supplementary Estimates under this head. We have purchased 10,000 cords of wood and intend to see whether we can heat these buildings, at least to some extent, with wood during the coming winter. The wood is really costing more than coal, having regard to its heating value.

Mr. TOBIN: How much per cord?

Mr. CARVELL: It is $10 or $11 for hardwood. That is less than the price in many parts of Canada.

Ottawa public buildings—Repairs, furniture, grounds, snow and street maintenance, etc., $450,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a very large item.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a large item, but I do not know of any way to reduce it. If my hon. friend can tell me some way of cutting it down I will be very glad indeed to take his suggestion.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CHISHOLM: Less furniture and cheaper furniture.

Mr. CARVELL: Unless you can find any cheaper furniture than we have around this room, or than you have in the ordinary rooms occupied by members, you cannot find any fault on account of extravagance there. This is a sample of the furniture that is being purchased by the department all over the city. To be serious about it, the difficulty is that the Civil Service has increased very materially since the beginning of the war and they all require furniture, rugs and things of that kind to make their offices habitable. This item also includes repairs. I suppose the ordinary man is very much like the ordinary woman. When a man rents a house the first thing his wife wants is to have new paper on the walls, to have the house painted and to have everything rearranged. It is about the same thing in the departments. When they get into an office building they want the old partitions torn down, new partitions set up and painted and the walls kalsomined. I do not know of any way of stopping it. I am putting on the brakes as best I can, but I do not see much hope of reducing the item to any great extent.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Is this sum expended just in Ottawa or all over Canada?

Mr. CARVELL: Just in Ottawa.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: You are maintaining the streets here?

Mr. CARVELL: No, just public buildings.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The item says "street maintenance, etc." If I could have the city of Montreal made the capital we would have lots of money expended in our city for removing snow and doing all those other things.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a large portion of Wellington street, extending from the Chateau as far as the old Perley Home, which has been built and is maintained, at the expense of the Government. This also includes certain expenditures in the parks, taking care of the walks around the different buildings, the driveways and things of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the lawns?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, it covers the lawns too.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I see that in 1917-18, $450,000 was voted and spent for this purpose. How is it that you again need $450,000 for the same service? If you put the street in good order and provided furniture for the departments, why should you need $450,000 again?

Mr. CARVELL: I am very much afraid we require it.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: You are repeating all the time.

Mr. CARVELL: I would think that we were doing pretty well if we got through with that amount of money. I admit this is a large amount, but when you consider there are some 10,000 civil servants in the Government employ at Ottawa and that all of these people have to be housed, taken care of and provided with furniture, you will realize there is need for this amount. Then there is the annual maintenance of streets. That does not mean the building of new streets but the maintenance of streets. There is sweeping, cutting grass on lawns, shovelling snow and all those things which are an annual charge.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Are these civil servants exempt from taxes in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: Away back many years ago when the Improvement Commission was created, the Government granted very large sums of money and the commission started out upon a very extensive plan of improvement. In view of that the city of Ottawa agreed to forego taxes to a certain extent upon civil servants. I do not know exactly all the details but that is the general principle. I think the city also gives the Government free water and fire services. It is an arrangement that was made years ago between the municipal authorities of the city of Ottawa and the Government.

Telephone service, $62,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What is this item for?

Mr. CARVELL: This is for telephone service for the various departments, including this building. It is growing and, I think, growing faster than it ought to. I do not know whether there is any way of paring it down or not. I think there is, myself. I want to say, however, in justice to the Bell Telephone Company that the rates charged are very reasonable when you compare them with the rates charged in other cities of Canada and the United States of practically the same population. I do not believe there is any city in which the rates generally are as low as they are in Ottawa. But I think there are more telephones in use than there ought to be, that there is a very extravagant system in the management of the phones. The difficulty is that we have neither one thing nor the other; we have neither private branch exchanges nor direct service connections. In my judgment, there should be private branch exchanges everywhere. Unless you have private branch exchanges everywhere then they should be nowhere. Perhaps this is regulated better, in so far as the telephone system is concerned, in the Militia Department than anywhere else. There they have over 200 telephones that are connected with a private branch exchange, but they also have 25 or 30 direct service phones. That means 25 or 30 main lines going into the different offices. Then, again, another difficulty about having private branch exchanges all over the service arises from the fact that, on account of being so cramped for space, there is practically no department of the Government that is housed in one building or in two buildings alongside of each other. Suppose an arrangement could be made by which the Militia Department could have all of the Woods building and all of the Canadian building. Probably then they could have a private branch exchange, and only have sufficient direct wires—probably 15 or 20—to take care of the traffic. In that way you would very materially reduce the cost of the telephone service. But when you have your Militia Department in probably eight or ten different buildings, it is almost impossible to bring the whole service in under a "P.B.X." Then, again, there are many departments that have made no attempt to have private branch exchanges at all. Probably there is no greater sinner in that respect than the Department of Public Works. We are pretty well segregated in the Western Block. We have offices in a number of other buildings, but still the great majority of our telephones are in one block. This is a case where a private branch exchange could be economically installed, and in going over the list I think I could cut out about one-half of the telephones and save money by such an installation. In going over the list of telephones it was a surprise to me to find the number of people in my department who are enjoying the luxury of a telephone, not only in their offices, but in their residences also. Of course the higher officials should have telephones in their residences. I only had the opportunity during the last hour of going over this item, and it certainly has set me thinking. Another sinner in the matter of telephones is the Interior Department. They have no private branch exchange either. The Marine and Fisheries Department are also offenders. But probably the worst of all is the Inland Revenue Department. What on earth they want with all the telephones they have got in that department is a mystery to me, every one of them being a direct line from the Ottawa Central Exchange;—I am making a fairly open confession to-night. I have not had an earlier opportunity of going into the matter, but I think I can effect some saving next year in the matter of telephone service in the departments in this city. I cannot go as far as common business judgment would tell me to go in the matter of private branch exchanges, in view of the Government buildings being spread so generally as they are over the city. On the other hand, there are a number of private branch exchanges installed which never should have been installed. For instance, there are some cases in which ten or fifteen phones have got a private branch exchange. Well, ten 'phones at $40 each would only be $400, and it would cost $800 or $900 to run a private branch exchange of that dimension. The whole thing is, I am sorry to say, without any head, tail, or anything else; the idea seems to be simply go on and spend money. It is my hope that I will be able to reduce this item very materially.

Fittings and general supplies and furniture, $100,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: What are the fittings intended for?

Mr. CARVELL: This item, together with a number that follows, relates to the public buildings all over the Dominion. Demands arise, it may be for filing cases, or furniture of some kind, or it may be that a building has been partly destroyed by fire and the furniture has to be repaired.

Heating, $305,000.

Mr. CAHILL: How do you figure out reducing the cost of heating when the cost of coal is going up so much?

Mr. CARVELL: A great number of land offices have been closed in the West, and we will pursue a system of consolidation as far as we can. We have been giving this matter very careful consideration, and we have come to the conclusion that we can make a saving in this important item. I am informed that last year's vote was abnormally high because the department had got behind, and a pretty large amount was provided in the supplementaries to pay off the bills. Now we have practically a clean sheet, and believe that we can keep the expenditure down to the amount we are asking for.

Rents, $840,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Why have the rents increased so much? Does this amount provide for the whole of Canada, or is it limited to the city of Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: It includes buildings throughout Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: There is an increase of $65,000, what is the reason of that?

Mr. CARVELL: Every body who rents buildings in Canada will find that rents are going up. I do not know of any way of keeping them down.

Salaries of caretakers, engineers, firemen, etc., $600,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Are the janitors supposed to live in these buildings as a general rule?

Mr. CARVELL: It is intended that they should.

Mr. CHISHOLM: They do not always do so.

Mr. COPP: Does this vote apply to the whole of Canada?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Yukon Public Buildings—Rents, repairs, fuel, light, water service and caretakers' salaries, $55,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I am asking for that amount of money although I am very sure indeed that by the arrangements we have made we shall be able to reduce it. I think it will be possible to close up entirely one building at Dawson, and bring the offices into what is called the Administration building. The cost of maintenance of buildings in Dawson City is abnormally high, they have to be heated pretty nearly all the time, and, of course, salaries are necessarily larger there than anywhere else in Canada.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—Barrington's Cove, Sydney Mines—partial reconstruction of wharf, $1,100.

Mr. McKENZIE: In a terrific gale a certain block of this very useful structure was carried away. Does the minister think the vote is sufficient to finish the wharf?

Mr. CARVELL: This is an estimate that was given to me by Assistant District Engineer Cunningham on January 18 last. He gives the items, so many creosoted logs, so many poles, stone ballast, and so forth, and he puts the amount at $1,100.

Mr. McKENZIE: The block to which I refer was driven ashore and possibly can be got back into place again at a very small cost. Will the repairs be done by day's work.

Mr. CARVELL: The amount is so small I do not believe it can be done otherwise. It merely consists of putting in here and there a few logs and poles, and things of that kind. I think it must be done by day work.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would suggest that the work be attended to as soon as possible, otherwise the usefulness of this wharf will be impaired.

Mr. CARVELL: It will be attended to. Just as soon as the money is voted it is the intention to proceed with all these works at the earliest possible moment.

Feltzen South — Repairs to breakwater, $1,100.

Mr. DUFF: I regret to say that this item should not be necessary. This breakwater has been completed only five years. In my judgment, if the work had been properly done in the first place, by persons who understood the construction of a breakwater, it would not be necessary to spend this amount of money five years after its completion. Tenders were called for this work about six years ago, and a tender was put in for about $12,000. For some reason best known to the department that tender was not accepted. New tenders were called for, and the contract was awarded, I think, for $15,000. In addition to this, after the work was started, some changes were made, and the total cost amounted to $17,000. I might say that the reason the work is not satisfactory is because the contract was awarded to a tailor, the foreman was a mason, and the inspector a shoemaker. That is how the public money was spent. I was very pleased to hear this afternoon that the Minister of Public Works is making a change in the way such work will be done. I might say, as far as the engineer at Halifax, Mr. Morrison, is concerned, and Mr. Freeman, the gentleman who generally has charge of work in Lunenburg county, both are excellent men, and the minister is safe in taking work of this kind out of the hands of politicians, myself included, and leaving it in the hands of competent engineers. I would suggest to the minister that, on account of the conditions under which Mr. Freeman, the engineer, has had to work in the last few years, explicit instructions be given him not to notice politicians on either side. If that is done, it will satisfy me, and be in the public interest.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to assure my hon. friend that the engineer was notified some four months ago to do exactly the things that he is suggesting to-night.

Jamesville — Completion of breakwater, $2,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is an old friend of the minister and myself.

Mr. CARVELL: I don't recognize it, I am sure.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to know what he is doing about this breakwater. It was never any good, and never will be. It will have to be born again before it will be of any service to the country. I have always said to the minister that any expenditure on it should be dropped under its present plan of construction, and that it should be rebuilt. We had some correspondence about this work last winter, and last summer I had it up in this House. I stated then that there was no use spending money on it until there was a different plan and a new beginning. Last winter, whatever remained in the water of that magnificient structure was thrown over, and there is nothing at all standing there now, as I am informed by the people in that community. I advise the minister to get proper plans prepared, and to go about the work in a businesslike way. It was always too small a structure for the purpose intended. A proper plan was prepared in 1910 or 1911, and a vote put in the Estimates, as will appear in the records of the department. After the change of Government, the matter was dropped altogether. For political reasons, it was found necessary, in 1914, I think, to erect something that would look like a breakwater, and a small vote was put in the Estimates, and a frail structure was planned by the advice of some politicians, and that thing was put in the water. But the Bras d'Or lakes were not in sympathy with political connivings, they were unwilling to stand for any camouflage or fooling of that kind and the force of the tide smashed the structure. I ask the minister to go back to the proper plan of 1910. The work is a necessity as a shelter for the good fishermen of that portion of Bras d'Or lake. I would advise the minister not to spend more money on the 1914 plan, which is absolutely no good and serves no useful purpose.

Mr. CARVELL: I do recognize this as an old friend, now that my hon. friend calls attention to it, and have before me some discussion which took place in this House last September. I find from the records of the department that after the discussion a copy of Hansard was sent to Mr. Bernasconi, the engineer in charge of the work in that portion of Cape Breton Island, and the following is the answer which he sent:

With reference to the remarks made by Mr. McKenzie, M.P., on this subject, when discussing Public Works Estimates on the 4th September, 1917, I beg to say that the only portion of the breakwater which has gone to pieces is the unfinished section of the work, and with regard to the stability of the work, I fully believe that when properly completed it will be sufficiently strong to stand the pressure to which it will be subjected, bearing in mind that this work is on the shore of the Bras d'Or Lake and not on the Atlantic shore.

I am very much obliged, indeed, to my hon. friend for calling attention to it. Of course, he will understand that we are compelled to take the advice of the engineer of the department on matters of this kind, unless we receive information which shows us that the engineer's judgment is wrong. I should be very glad, indeed, to receive any information which the hon. gentleman, or any other member, can give us, because I do not want to spend money, even if it be a small amount, unless it is properly expended. There has been a great deal of correspondence over this matter, and really there is nothing to do but to stand by the engineer until I am satisfied that he is not worthy of my support.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister will ask the engineer for another report he will find that what I have stated took place since that report was written. What he has reported to the minister to be all right has gone to smash since.

Mr. CARVELL: Since last September?

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, sometime in the early part of the winter.

Mr. CARVELL: That is news to us.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was news to me when I heard it first, but it is not news to me now. I knew then I was right, notwithstanding the fact that the engineer is so devoted to his baby. He made a proper plan first in 1910, but he was forced to make a different plan, and the correspondence in the office will show that when Mr. Bernasconi was asked to make a plan of a breakwater there that would cost $5,000, he said it could not be done; that for $5,000 you could not put anything there that would serve any useful purpose. Political pressure was brought to bear upon him, and he was forced to make a report for a structure there to cost $5,000. He was driven from his original position. Now he is staying by his last report; he is trying to protect it. Since he wrote that report, I am informed by people in the community, the balance of this structure has gone to smash and I have no hesitation in putting myself against the engineer by stating that what remains of that structure cannot be of any service. I ask the minister to get an independent report on the structure if Mr. Bernasconi says that is going to serve any useful purpose. It will not; it is no good. That is the opinion of everybody in the neighbourhood. The minister can readily understand that Mr. Bernasconi, having been forced from his first position by political pressure of some kind, and having been obliged to report on this, is now standing by it. I am not blaming him for doing so as long as he can. He does not wish to admit that he was forced to advise the building of a structure that was of no use. Since he wrote that report a more violent gale has smashed the structure so that it is worse than it was before. That is the condition it is in to-day.

Mr. CARVELL: I can assure my hon. friend that independent advice will be taken upon the matter, and I shall see that no money is expended there until it is expended on a wharf that will be as permanent as a wharf of that kind can be made under those conditions.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is all very well to speak of this being on the shore of Bras d'Or lake. It is on the shore of the lake at a point where the lake is about 25 miles wide, and it is exposed to the full wind that you get over such an extent of water. That is no sheltered mill-pond.

Margaree harbour—repairs and improvements, $10,900.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What are these repairs and improvements?

Mr. CARVELL: This amount of $10,900 is asked for by District Engineer Bernasconi for works described as follows:

(a) To complete the construction of a square timber block, 200 feet long and 10 feet wide, back of weakened portion of breakwater, commenced during 1917-18. The sum of $4,800 was voted for 1917-18, for the construction of this work, but owing to the lateness of the season when the expenditure was authorized, it is not expected that more than one-half of the work will be completed during the present fiscal year. The estimated cost to complete is $2,400.

(b) The construction of a sand groin off beach on eastern side of harbour to arrest sand and prevent shoaling up of channel, work to consist of round timber cribwork, 550 feet in length and from ten to thirty feet in width. The estimated cost of the proposed work is $8,500.

The two items make a total of $10,900.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Is it the intention of the minister to go on with this sand groin immediately?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Have the repairs on the breakwater been completed?

Mr. CARVELL: No; $4,800 was voted at the last session of Parliament, and only about one-half of that amount has been expended. The engineer estimates it will take the remaining $2,400 to finish the breakwater, and $8,500 for the sand groin.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Every session for the last five years I have endeavoured to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the expenditure of money in the following year. I made, of course, no impression upon him. He proceeded every year to spend the money down there in October. Anybody, knowing anything about the shores of Western Cape Breton during the latter part of September, October and November, knows it is impossible to get fifty cents worth of work out of a dollar spent. The former Minister of Public Works knew this. I repeatedly told him, both privately and on the floor of the House. Last fall they began to spend this money in October. They proceeded with the work during the winter months. I think the greatest exhibition of incompetency I ever saw was the method pursued by the foremen on the work during last winter. Two or three foremen were there and half a dozen workmen. They were doing the best they could under the circumstances, because men would not go to work at that time of the year. They were working even in the severest weather, or at least attempting to work. When I left my home they were at work. Since then, I understand, they have ceased work. This method of procedure is absolutely absurd, and I cannot understand how the officials would permit it. I do not blame the minister because this is a small matter, and he cannot be expected to watch every corner and creek in the country. What I find fault with is that the officials of the department would allow this work to go on at this time of the year. I particularly blame district engineers, who are in charge there. There are engineers travelling back and forth. I made inquiry, and I was told that more work could be accomplished in the winter than in the summer. I am not an engineer, but I know something about the coast and about the work. I know that such a statement is absolute nonsense. I knew what would happen. The work is not finished, and it will not be finished for a while, but the money was spent, and I fear that the work already constructed will be carried away by the storms if not properly ballasted. The ice is the greatest safeguard we have for this work just now. A great deal of the new work is not ballasted, and any one knowing anything at all about work of that kind along the coast knows the danger of the whole work being carried away. I know I am appealing to a minister who will listen to me, and a man of business instincts, and I know he will see that those expenditures are not made at a time of the year when it is impossible to do the work and get value for the money expended. I protest for the sixth time against this method of expending the appropriation at this time of the year. I have repeatedly informed the department this fall what was going on with respect to this work but surmise the minister was not informed, and that my complaints were not put before him.

9 p.m.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the first time I have heard of this matter, and it is, of course, a surprise to me that work should be carried on under such conditions as my hon. friend has described. There again, I suppose we are compelled to rely upon the engineer until we are satisfied he is not competent. If evidences like this multiply sufficiently, drastic action may be required. I can, however, assure my hon. friend that this matter will be thoroughly investigated, and whatever work is to be done there in the future will be done in the summer time if men can be obtained. I do not know to what extent delay may be caused on account of the labour question. If the work cannot be done in the summer time, it will not be done at all; work will not be done in the winter time. I can also promise my hon. friend that in the future no foremen will be engaged on that work without labourers under them.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I would also ask the minister for his assurance that this fearful creature "patronage" will vanish from that part of the country.

Mr. CARVELL: I think my hon. friend had some evidence a few months ago that patronage had vanished so far as I was concerned.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I reported to the minister what went on down there, and he sent instructions to the foreman, but the foreman did not act on those instructions as faithfully as I desired, and carried on his patronage as usual both in the matter of labour and in the distribution of lumber. Favouritism in the selection of labour was quite evident, although pretentions were made that an effort was being made to carry out the minister's request. This lumber might very well have been supplied by the people around, but instead of that the job was handed over to two merchants and they controlled the distribution. It might, perhaps, be said that these men were more capable of supplying the lumber on short notice, but that is not true. The people who could supply it on the shortest notice were the people in the immediate vicinity, but these men were not given a chance to furnish the material. I regard this policy as unbusinesslike and partisan.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I would like to ask the hon. member for Inverness if any improvement has been made in the little harbour of the little island immediately opposite Port Hood. I had occasion to visit there several years ago, and I saw a very beautiful natural little harbour in the island being gradually filled up at the entrance. I took some interest in the matter and endeavoured to get the channel opened, but did not succeed at the time.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I must thank my hon. friend for his assistance at that time; I had his very active co-operation. There was some dredging done there, but very little. It is a natural harbour, and of great service to the people around there. My hon. friend is not likely to forget it, because he had an unpleasant experience there and lost a very valuable piece of property. There has not been as much work done at this place as either I or my hon. friend would like, but I have a strong feeling that something will be done in the near future. I am promoting the matter. I am also endeavouring to get the work of finishing the closing of the northern entrance of Port Hood harbour and am assured that this work will be resumed just as soon as the finances of the country will permit.

Mosher's Bay — Repairs to breakwater, $1,300.

Mr. DUFF: I see by the Auditor General's Report for 1917 (page V—151) that $3,697.61 was expended on this work last year. I see that S. G. Rawding rented his dory for ninety-four days at 25 cents a day; tools, June-October, 120 days, at $1.50; gasoline boat, 65 days, at $5. I really cannot see why it was necessary to hire this dory and gasoline boat. I do not know of any work they could be used for. I might also say, after reading some letters I received from my constituents last week calling my attention to the fact that this gentleman figured in certain tenders for logs for a breakwater in the county of Lunenburg, that in my opinion the logs could be purchased at a much lower price if new tenders were called for.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the tender price?

Mr. DUFF: I only have the information given in these letters.

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to have the information, and then I will certainly follow it up.

Mr. DUFF: I shall be very pleased to write to the minister about it.

Ross' Ferry—Repairs to wharf, $750.

Mr. McKENZIE: How will this work be done?

Mr. CARVELL: This is to renew the top of the outer block of the wharf built by the department in 1896-97. It consists of a small amount of round creosoted timber, native timber, etc. I imagine that the work will have to be done by day's labour. I doubt very much if it would be economical to have specifications drawn for a small work like that.

Mr. McKENZIE: There may be some difficulty in drawing specifications, but the wharf is in a very public place and it is easy of access. I have no objection to everybody getting a share of work of this kind in a country place like this, but I do fear that unless specific instructions are given to Mr. Bernasconi he will fall into exactly the same line he always finds it convenient to fall into. He is a very good engineer, but we have heard of a good man in the old days who had the leprosy although he was a very excellent gentleman. Mr. Bernasconi has the political leprosy; he cannot be anything else but a fearful Tory; that is what he is from start to finish, from Sunday morning until Saturday night.

Mr. CARVELL: We will try to make a benevolent Unionist out of him.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have never seen a benevolent Unionist yet, and until I do, I will not ask for the reconstruction of any one in that mould. I am not finding fault with Mr. Bernasconi; he thinks that nobody else is right unless he is a Tory; that is his religion; he was brought up that way. The minister might as well give up saying that patronage is abolished if he leaves matters in the hands of Mr. Bernasconi, because that gentleman will favour his old friends in the same old way. If Grits and Tories alike get this work, I do not object, but I am not satisfied that the old system should be followed while pharisaical professions with regard to the abolition of patronage are being made.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Bernasconi has received and will receive instructions which will convert him and make him a new man. I have no doubt that I have the power of persuasion to cause him to be converted, and that henceforth no cause for complaint will be found.

Mr. JOHN C. DOUGLAS: I agree with the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) that there is evidence of patronage in Mr. Bernasconi's office. For instance, the foreman of the Jamesville wharf had been a Conservative, but a few months ago, when Mr. Bernasconi had occasion to continue the work, he appointed a foreman who had acted in that capacity under the Liberals. If my information is correct, the recommendation for the latter's appointment came from the member for North Cape Breton.

Mr. CARVELL: It did not come from my department. I do not know what took place in Cape Breton; they have peculiar ways down there.

Mr. McKENZIE: The member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Douglas) is misinformed if he believes that I had anything to do with naming the gentleman who carried out the small repairs to the breakwater at Jamesville. In September last, before the present minister assumed office, and when the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) was Acting Minister of Public Works, I made the statement in the House that the work was not being properly conducted—and that was when I could not possibly hope to exercise any patronage in that connection. I was given to understand at that time by persons from that part of the country that the deficiency in the work was due to the fact that a man named McNeill, who was a good blacksmith, but knew nothing whatever about building wharves, was in charge of it. When there was talk last winter about starting the work again, Bernasconi told me that he had been asked to take on the same foreman. He admitted that this man did not know anything about building a wharf, and I said: I am not going to recommend a man; I do not know anybody in that district who is a wharf builder. He then suggested that a man named Campbell be appointed, who had been the first foreman on the work and had been originally given the position by the Tories. The member for South Cape Breton knows that not a log, a stick or a stone had been put on the foundation of this wharf in our days, and that he himself is the author—and possibly will be the finisher—of this Tory, picayune work that is going on in such a haphazard, incomplete and incompetent way. Campbell had been appointed under Tory rule, on the recommendation, I assume, of the member for South Cape Breton, who was running the machine in Victoria county at that time. For some reason, this blacksmith had been able to outdo Campbell and take the job from him—one Tory took the job from another. Campbell knew how to build a wharf, but McNeill did not. When Bernasconi suggested that Campbell be given the job, I said I did not care whether he was a Campbell or a Macdonald or what he was; that a good man should be obtained; so Bernasconi took Campbell on in connection with the small expenditure that was made last year. I had nothing whatever to do with it; he was no friend or supporter of mine and never had been.

Mr. CARVELL: A re-arrangement of the engineering services in Nova Scotia will be made in the very near future. I cannot say what will be done, because the department has not arrived at any definite decision. But I assure members of the Committee—Liberals, Conservatives, Unionists, Opposition—that if Mr. Bernasconi or anybody else cannot get along without playing the patronage game, I will move him somewhere where he will not be bothered with that sort of thing.

South Ingonish—To repair and reconstruct beach protection, $1,900.

Mr. McKENZIE: I say the same thing about this item: I hope that care will be taken to ensure a proper expenditure of the money.

Mr. FIELDING: May I be permitted to renew a request which I made of the minister some days ago? This list of repairs, so far as it goes, is all right, but it is quite obvious that the list is inadequate and incomplete. It was prepared some months ago, and since then later reports of the engineers covering damage during the severe winter, have been received by the department. I should be obliged if the minister would see that the later reports of the engineers are examined, and if additional urgent works and repairs are found to be needed, that—on the strength of the engineer's report, not because I ask it—the work be done.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a reasonable request. I am informed by the deputy that some works have been so reported on, and if it be found on investigation that the $60,000 voted for harbours and rivers generally, is not sufficient, I will ask Parliament in the Supplementary Estimates to make the necessary provision for the additional expenditure. Without some protection it is impossible for fishermen to carry on their vocation, and I am much in sympathy with the maintenance of these small public works. While I should not care to promise that any large sums of money will be expended, I will have investigation made and will ask Parliament to vote such additional sums as may be really necessary.

Prince Edward Island—Harbours and rivers generally, repairs and improvements, $14,000.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I assume that the minister will make the same promise with regard to Prince Edward Island that he has made with regard to Nova Scotia?

Mr. CARVELL: Most certainly. If it be found really necessary to do so, I will not hesitate to ask Parliament to grant money for the maintenance of the present services or the making of needed repairs.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Who is doing the dredging at the new Port Borden? Is that under the Public Works Department or the Railway Department?

Mr. CARVELL: That is under the Department of Railways and Canals.

Miminigash Harbour—Repairs to breakwaters, $2,000.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: What are they going to do at Miminigash? My information is that the breakwaters there are in pretty bad shape. I do not know what the repairs will cost. Have you had a report from the engineer lately?

Mr. CARVELL: The report which we have comes from the district engineer, Mr. Hyndman. He says that $2,000 is asked for repairs to the south breakwater and to reconstruct the inner portion of the northern breakwater. He states that the greater portion of the Miminigash breakwater is of very old and indifferent construction, going back to 1878. There are various items, such as covering planks, piles, timber, floor stringers and things of that kind.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is that a recent report?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, as late as January 30, 1918.

Summerside—Repairs to breakwater, $750.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: What are you going to do in connection with the Summerside breakwater?

Mr. CARVELL: This is to repair damaged and worn portions of the outer block, which is exposed to running ice—hardwood sheeting, piles, iron bolts, and some other items.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: What is the date of that report?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not seem to have the date in my notes.

Mr. BUTTS: Would the minister put into the Estimates a small allowance for a wharf that was destroyed at Sydney mines in December or January? It was built a few years ago. It is in the constituency of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) but it is very near my house.

Mr. CARVELL: I will settle this right off—we will build it.

Mr. BUTTS: Repair it.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, repair it.

Mr. BUTTS: That will do.

Mr. McKENZIE: I might remind my good friend, neighbour and constituent that we dealt with that this evening.

Mr. BUTTS: I was not in.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad to remind my hon. friend that I did not forget his front lawn while he was outside.

Mr. CARVELL: You see, I was overgenerous.

Cape Bald — Repairs to breakwater pier, $3,100.

Mr. COPP: What do you propose to do at Cape Bald breakwater?

Mr. CARVELL: An appropriation of $4,000 is asked by District Engineer Stead to construct four large concrete caissons to be placed about the outer corners of the pier, to reinforce the work which is partly broken there, and ten smaller caissons to protect the face of the work. The estimated cost of the four larger caissons is $400 each, and the total amount proposed to be voted is $3,100.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister the names of the gentlemen who have charge of the work?

Mr. CARVELL: I could not give the name of any one except Mr. Stead, the district engineer.

Mr. COPP: You have not the names of the foremen?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Richibucto Beach—breakwater—repairs, and improvements, $800.

Mr. LEGER: Is this supposed to be for the North Beach breakwater or the South Beach breakwater?

Mr. CARVELL: That is not the "sawdust wharf" you are referring to?

Mr. LEGER: Sawdust? No, the South Beach breakwater.

Mr. CARVELL: I beg your pardon.

Mr. LEGER: That sawdust wharf belongs to the old order and I would not refer to it here to-night. I am surprised that it is mentioned by the minister.

Mr. CARVELL: This amount of $800 is asked by District Engineer Stead who states that the ends of both breakwaters are being cut into by the ice and it is proposed to put in stone at a cost of $600, and also to build some breastworks to protect the beach works. He says that the appropriation for 1917-18 was $1,600. I do not think any work was done last year at all. Is this not the work that has been referred to so many times in this House as the "sawdust wharf?"

Mr. LEGER: The work is on the beach and it is three miles away from the "sawdust wharf." Are these the only items recommended by the district engineer for the county of Kent? The sum of $800 seems to be a pretty small provision to meet the public works which have not yet been completed in that county. For example, Richibucto Cape, Buctouche Beach and Kouchibouguac Beach breakwaters yet remain unfinished. There is also Little Gully breakwater, for the construction of which a large sum was voted three or four years ago. A large amount of material in the shape of stone and timber and other stuff was hauled to the spot and left there. This winter part of the stone was hauled to Richibucto Cape breakwater, a few miles away, and the timber was hauled away for firewood. There are lots of works needing attention along the shore, and I hesitate to believe that the reason why these works have not received attention is because of the change made in the representation from the county of Kent. I prefer to think it is due to war-time necessities.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as I know, this is the first request that has been made to me or to the department for any further expenditure of money in Kent county. I am not in a position to state what the engineer may have reported, or what may have been stated to the engineer. I take the items as I find them, and this is the only item which I find for the county of Kent. I would, perhaps, take it that public works have been so well looked after in the county of Kent of late years that probably no necessity exists for making further expenditures at the present time. There is a general vote of $40,000, which will cover small repairs for which necessity may arise during the season, and if any accidents during the winter have necessitated repairs I give the hon. gentleman the same answer that I have given to other hon. gentlemen to-night.

Mr. LEGER: I do not know what the expenditure on Richibucto Cape breakwater has been, but work on it was undertaken last winter and was in progress when I left in March to come to Ottawa. I agree with the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) that it is a poor policy to undertake such work in winter time; it is simply money thrown away. I do not think it is fair to limit the expenditure for work of this kind to $800 for the whole county when there are sixty miles of shore needing attention, many of which remain uncompleted. If the Government have determined not to proceed with these works all well and good, but as the representative of the county, I consider myself justified in asking that something be done to keep them in good repair. I do not blame the minister for neglecting to take proper measures; it is the district engineer who is responsible for all this work. That officer should have visited all these places and reported as to what was necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope the voters in the county of Kent will not blame their member. I have not heard anything from him until to-night, but we will try and make a proper distribution of the blame. I hope he is willing to take his share. I am perfectly willing to take mine, and I presume the engineer is in the same boat.

Mr. LEGER: The only reason the minister did not hear from me was that in view of the abolition of the patronage system I thought any representations which I might make would have very little effect.

St. John River and tributaries—To provide full and final contribution to local government, not to exceed one-half cost of certain wharves built by it in tidal waters, $5,923.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the item for?

Mr. CARVELL: For a great many years there has been a sort of partnership existing in the province of New Brunswick between the federal and the provincial authorities, under which each authority contributed one-half towards the cost of these works. During the past six or eight years however, a number of works were built wholly by the local government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In connection with the lumber business?

Mr. CARVELL: No, they are wharves on the St. John river and its tributaries. These wharves are used for steamboats which ply on the St. John river during the whole time the river is free from ice, which is about seven months each year, and every wharf was a necessary landing place for the steamers. A number of these wharves were built and the contributions were not made by the Dominion. When I assumed office I came to the conclusion that the work should be assumed entirely either by one Government or the other, and I take it that trade and navigation are matters within the purview of the federal authorities. I met the Minister of Public Works for New Brunswick, and we came to a settlement under which we agreed to pay them $5,923 to close up the transaction, and the wharves now belong to the Federal Government. The provincial authorities will pass the legislation necessary to confirm the title, and we will get rid of this hybrid partnership which has not produced very much benefit in past years.

[Mr. Leger.]

Quebec, Anse aux Gascons—Repairs to wharf, $10,600.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just a word, and then there will be a landslide with respect to all these items. I happen to represent one of these maritime constituencies, and found during my visit last fall that many of the most important works built along the coast had been partially washed away by the seas during heavy storms. I would not, under present circumstances, ask the minister to reconstruct all of these works.

During the past six or seven years the county has been very much neglected. I would not care to ask for the reconstruction of all those works that have gone to waste. But there are two works of vital importance to that coast to give the fishing community necessary shelter. I draw special attention to the wharf at Percé, which has cost the Government nearly $100,000. Half that wharf has been carried away. If a little patchwork had been done on it two or three years ago, the wharf would have been saved. Perce is the shire town of the county, and I would ask the minister to see that some repairs are made so that the steamers plying between New Brunswick and Gaspé will find proper accommodation there. The other point which is of special interest to the fishermen is called Anse au Beaufils. This harbour has been in existence for several years, but owing to the action of ice and storm, part of the work has been washed away lately. This harbour is a most useful shelter not only for the Gaspé coast fishermen, but also to those from Miscou, Caraquet and other places on the coast of New Brunswick. A few thousand dollars, a very few, would put this harbour in good condition. I make no plea at present for any other works, though the coast of Gaspé extends over a distance of two hundred miles. I emphasize the two works I have mentioned, the Percé wharf and the Anse au Beaufils shelter. From the general appropriation, the minister can spare a few thousand dollars, and his local engineer, Mr. Bertrand, a most painstaking and conscientious officer, can give him all the information on the subject.

Mr. CARVELL: The matter which my hon. friend refers to is, of course, unknown to me personally, but I certainly will give it my consideration and go as far as I possibly can, although, if it amounts to $40,000 or $50,000, I fear it would be a pretty serious undertaking. However, I will promise him that I will give it the very best consideration I can.

Chicoutimi—Repairs to wharf, $2,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Near Chicoutimi, the Northcliffe interests have put up a very large sulphite mill, at a point called Ha! Ha! Bay. The company has spent something like three or four million dollars. One of the works it has constructed is a wharf, but in ordinary times steamers cannot moor there. A company which has established such a large industry, and which has built a wharf of its own, is surely entitled to a little dredging around that wharf so that steamers can get as close to it as possible. I must say that the department, through the deputy minister, has always received favourably the requests of the company. They are employing I do not know how many hundred people, and are a source of wealth and abundance to that district, and the Department of Public Works should not be too chary in letting that industry have the use of one or two dredges on the river Saguenay to facilitate the landing of freight and the loading of sulphite on board the steamers.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the first I have heard of this matter. I am informed that the Government did the dredging at the site of the wharf. I will be glad to go into the matter, and do whatever is possible.

Harbours and rivers generally—Repairs and improvements, $75,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I would like to ask the minister to include in the Supplementary Estimates, or in this item, a sum for the partial reconstruction and repair of the wharf at Vercheres. In the spring of 1917 the wharf was carried away by the ice-shove. Since then, no repairs have been made. This wharf serves a farming community, which produced, last year, 300,000 bushels of grain and about 30,000 tons of hay. The boat that plies between Montreal and Sorel used to stop at Vercheres, and it is certainly a hardship for the farmers of that district to be deprived of steamship service. Vercheres is about thirty miles from Montreal, and it is practically impossible for the farmers to bring their products to Montreal in any other way than by boat. If the minister could find a way to set aside the sum of $6,000, the work could be done. I understand the district engineer, Mr. Dansereau, made a favourable report on March 23 last.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has spoken to me about this matter on a number of occasions, and if the wharf is not built, his constituents cannot complain that he has not been diligent, or that he has not done all that he possibly could. Now, there is a report in the department, and I want to confess to my hon. friend that I have never found time to go over it. He can understand that the ministers have been very busy. But, before the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, I intend to go over all these matters. Although I have no particular knowledge about it, it seems to me that the request of the hon. member is fairly reasonable. I assure him that I will give it consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister should remember that Vercheres is a historic spot. The statue of Madeleine de Vercheres is there.

Mr. CARVELL: This is a pretty cold-blooded proposition over here.

Laprairie protection works—maintenance and repairs, $20,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Is $20,000 enough to complete the work? Has the amount of $85,000 voted last year been expended? As the minister will know this is a very important matter for the people of the district of Montreal and the people on the South Shore. The work has been supposed to be in progress for some years. We have been waiting for two or three years for its completion, and we should very much like to have it completed.

Mr. CARVELL: This work, I shall admit, has been progressing for a long time, and really I have had very grave doubts in past years whether the federal Parliament was justified in expending money on a work of this kind. The principle, however, has been adopted; the work is very nearly completed, and I am going to see that it is completed so far as it is necessary to complete it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand the minister went there.

Mr. CARVELL: I went there, and I think I shall be my own engineer for the finishing up of this work; and I hope I shall please my hon. friends opposite and the people of that vicinity. I cannot understand why it has taken three or four years to build a dyke such as I found across the low lands at Laprairie.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The elections were postponed from year to year.

Mr. CARVELL: There may be something in that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the only reason. Look elsewhere.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot understand some of the methods by which it is being constructed. The work, however, is going to be of very great convenience, not only to the people of Laprairie and that portion of the South shore of the St. Lawrence, but to the general travelling public. I was there about a month ago, and at that time it would have been almost impossible for people to reach Montreal by ordinary means of conveyance if that highway were not there, because, after all, it is simply a dyke seventeen or eighteen feet high, upon the top of which is a highway. In going over it, I was impressed by a few things. The first was that I did not believe in the method of construction. I do not understand why it was necessary to build a concrete face up and down the whole length of that dyke, which must be a mile long, as a protection against the ice shock. If it had an ordinary rock embankment about one and one-half to one, that is all that would be required.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The best rock is Roch Lanctot.

Mr. CARVELL: On the river side, two-thirds of it I suppose, is now finished. Another thing that impressed me was that it was a great pity the embankment was not made two or three feet wider. It ought to be sufficiently wide to admit of a street railway track. It may be possible even now to put a track on the top of the embankment, but that would, to some extent, interfere with the ordinary highway for vehicles. That, however, is largely a matter for the Provincial Government and the people of that community, because, once this work is constructed, if I remain in this position, I think I shall have to take the position that it is purely a local work which rightfully belongs to the municipal or provincial authorities, and I would feel very much like washing my hands of it. I do not think, however, we would be justified, under present conditions, in carrying out the plans to their minutest details and putting a concrete covering over the whole surface of the road, especially when the road on either end of it is merely a macadamised road. It should be constructed up to the highest standard of a macadamised road to conform with the general conditions of the road on either end of it, so that if a man goes along in an automobile, he can make just as good time over the dyke as over the highway. When that has been accomplished, the Government of Canada will have pretty nearly done its duty.

10 p.m.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

I want to assure my hon. friends that we intend to prosecute that work just as soon as we can get through with this session of Parliament and I can look around and satisfy myself as to the most economical and business like methods of finishing it. We shall not put off until the autumn, we shall finish it up at once, and we shall give the people of that community just as good a road over the dyke as they have on either end of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend takes the right view of the whole situation. Many years ago Laprairie was a very interesting town. The first railway built in Canada started from Laprairie. One of the two old wharves which my hon. friend saw, was the terminus of the first railway built in Canada, in the forties. It ran from Laprairie to St. Johns. Then Laprairie ceased to be the terminus by the construction of the Grand Trunk. There was a time when this village was very thriving. There were two banks, and there was quite a big trade, and two steamers were plying between Montreal and Laprairie. Then the Victoria bridge was built, and one of the steamers disappeared. Later on, the Dominion Government gave the Grand Trunk new subsidies to rebuild the Victoria bridge, but unfortunately they gave the Grand Trunk powers to charge the poor farmers such tolls that I consider them being mulcted. From all those considerations, therefore, something is due to the people of that community. The land, as the minister has noticed, is very low. The river St. Lawrence forms a bay from the Lachine rapids down to the Victoria bridge, and every year Laprairie is flooded. I could not give an estimate of the property damaged or lost as a result of those annual floods. For years past, under the old Conservative Government, under the Laurier Government, protection works have been erected, but they never were completed. The present work will complete what was started very many years ago. The trouble is that this amount has been in the Estimates since 1911, but through purely political considerations the works have been postponed from year to year, because the elections were not forthcoming. The minister has now visited the district, and he intends to apply this amount, and to make the dyke as useful as possible. Let him finish the work as speedily as he can. Not only the people of Laprairie, but the people of Montreal will benefit by it.

Matane—Repairs to breakwater, $1,000.

Mr. BUTTS: I may be out of order, but can the minister say whether the St. Paul, which is reported to have overturned in an Atlantic port, was in Halifax harbour at the time.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not guilty. The boat was certainly not in Halifax harbour.

Murray Bay—Repairs and improvements to wharf, $2,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Murray Bay and myself are very deeply interested in these improvements. Murray Bay has become quite an international watering place. During four months of the year there is a big influx of American and Canadian tourists and the population increases I would say by at least two thousand in the summer. The improvements made by the late Administration were certainly necessary, and I hope they will be completed at the earliest opportunity. Several steamers call at Murray Bay. There is the Government steamer between Rivière Ouelle and Murray Bay, which is nearly always full of American and Canadian tourists, and then there are the Richelieu boats, now known as the Canada Line boats. The wharf, in the busy season is jammed not only with passengers but with vehicles of every kind, for the cliff is very steep, as its name implies,—Pointe-a-Pic—and carriages are necessary to take the passengers up the hill. The wharf, which was too narrow, has been widened, but now the railways occupy a portion of it with their tracks, and I hope my hon. friend will lose no time having the improvements completed.

Mr. CARVELL: We certainly intend to proceed with these improvements the moment we have the money. The improvements include pine sheathing, flooring and things of that kind. We will go on with the work at once and finish it up.

Pointe à Elie—Repairs to breakwater—wharf, $1,200.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is this in the Magdalen Islands?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What I said a moment ago about Gaspe applies equally to the Magdalen Islands. The county of Gaspé is composed of the peninsula proper, the main land, and the Magdalen Islands. A peculiar feature is that the county member, in order to reach a portion of his county, has to pass through the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. There is a thriving population of from six to seven thousand on the islands, and many good harbours, but the wharves and piers have been sadly neglected during the last two or three years owing to the absence of the representative of the county. The storms have been more numerous and severe during the last two years than ever before, and I am informed by many letters and telegrams that repairs and improvements are absolutely necessary. When the minister receives a report from the resident engineer I would ask him to see that the population is treated fairly.

Mr. CARVELL: I have his report before me, and I am carrying out his suggestions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Improvements are not only required at Pointe à Elie, but also at Amherst, Grand Entry, and at another point which I cannot recall at the moment. These places should all be looked after by the resident engineer, and I hope that if he asks for a few small amounts for repairs and improvements at these places, the people on the Islands, who are isolated for six months of the year, will not be neglected.

Rimouski—Harbour improvements, $100,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How far have you got with the new works at Rimouski?

Mr. CARVELL: My information is that this vote will finish the Rimouski wharf. We were reluctant to spend such a large amount of money, but in view of the fact that Rimouski is the landing port for ocean steamers on the St. Lawrence, it has been considered necessary to finish up the work, and we shall complete it as rapidly as possible.

St. John's—Reconstruction of booms, $1,300.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Which St. John's is this?

Mr. CARVELL: St. John's and Iberville, on the Richelieu river.

St. Laurent, Island of Orleans—Repairs to wharf, $2,700.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is this the full amount estimated for repairs and improvements?

Mr. CARVELL: The engineer asks for this amount for general repairs to the wharf —fenders, hardwood sheathing, cribwork, and so on.

Yamaska—Reconstruction of dam, $1,500.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I understand that the Federal Government has offered to cooperate with the provincial government in the construction of a bridge across the Batiscan river on the highway between Montreal and Quebec. My information is that the Federal Government offer to pay a certain proportion of the cost on condition that the bridge be built about a quarter of a mile above the road, while the provincial authorities want to build it directly in line with the road. In the press of yesterday it is stated that the provincial authorities and the people of Quebec are offered help by the Federal Government in this matter, and I should like to know what information the minister can give me with regard to it.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no knowledge that the Federal Government ever made an offer of that kind to the provincial government. They may have done so before I assumed office.

Mr. BUREAU: Approaches have been built there by the Federal Government.

Mr. CARVELL: They are possibly for ice protection. I never could understand why the Federal Government should build bridges across rivers within provinces. The Federal Government has assisted in building interprovincial bridges, but it would be opening a very wide door to start building bridges across ordinary rivers within provinces.

Mr. JACOBS: You built the Quebec bridge.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a different matter. We built a bridge across the Ottawa river many years ago, and now we are paying the penalty because we are being asked to assist in rebuilding it. If we violate this fundamental law, we will have to pay the price. I was approached by a high official of the Quebec Government about this matter some time ago, and as he was a good lawyer, I mentioned some of the difficulties that appeared to me to be in the way. If any promise was made by the Federal Government, it is unknown to me.

Ontario—French River—In full and final settlement of all claims of Jennings and Ross in connection with their contract for the construction of the substructure of the Big Chaudière Dam, including interest thereon at 5 per cent., $5,800.

Mr. CANNON: What claim did these contractors make?

Mr. CARVELL: They made a claim of $16,000. It was thought that if they were entitled to receive $5,115.97 three years ago, they are entitled to interest on it. I understand that an Order in Council was passed authorizing the payment of the money, and we are now asking that the necessary amount be voted to carry that arrangement out.

Sheguindah—Repairs to wharf, $1,000.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Has the department in contemplation any investigation of the conditions surrounding the wharves on the waters of Manitoulin Island and in the north channel adjacent to Manitoulin island having regard to the Government taking over what are now privately owned docks? My information is that many of these harbours have, within recent years, become important from the fact that the country has rapidly developed and is now very largely agricultural where it was formerly simply lumbering. The docks were purely private and many of them are still privately owned. This works a very considerable hardship owing to the fact that the man who owns the dock naturally controls the shipping. Has the department had that matter under consideration and, if not, will the minister undertake to have the engineers of the Public Works Department make an investigation and report on the advisability of the Government taking over the docks where the traffic that formerly was private has become public?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not heard of it before, although it may have been brought to the attention of my predecessors in the department. I could not promise my hon. friend (Mr. Nicholson)that I would ask the engineers to make a report or that I would act upon it, because that would be a question of policy for the Government to decide. However, I will go into the matter and give it the best consideration I can. It seems to me that there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says but, knowing so little about it, I really could not express an opinion.

Wendover—Repairs to wharf, $1,000.

Mr. EULER: Before we leave harbours and rivers in Ontario, I note that there is no appropriation included here for repairs to the wharf, or dredging in the harbour at Port Dover, or what should be the harbour of Port Dover. Port Dover is not in my constituency, but the improvement of that harbour will affect very materially the cities and towns north of that point right up into Waterloo county, including Brantford, Galt, Kitchener, Waterloo, Elmira, and various others. The minister will recollect that two or three weeks ago a large delegation of manufacturers and others from central western Ontario had an interview with him and pressed this upon him. The minister very kindly promised to take the matter into his consideration, but I find no appropriation and I would like to ask him whether he has looked into the matter further and whether we may expect anything in the Supplementary Estimates. The object of the request for the improvement of this particular harbour is this: Within the last two or three years a very efficient railway has been constructed from Galt to Port Dover. It is proposed to use that road for the carrying of coal. Coal can be brought directly across Lake Erie to Port Dover and distributed to the industrial towns and cities of central Western Ontario, including those which I have mentioned. As the committee knows, the cities and towns of central Western Ontario are very largely of an industrial nature. They are great manufacturing centres, and coal is absolutely necessary. During the last few years, and especially last winter, we have had a great deal of difficulty in obtaining coal, and we obtain it at a much greater cost than would be necessary if this harbour were placed in such a condition that coal could be brought across the Lake, discharged at Port Dover and then transported northward to these centres by this new road. The people of that section do not ask for any unnecessary capital expenditures, but they do ask that that harbour be put in such a condition, if only for the coming season, that it will facilitate the bringing in of coal at a much less cost. If the minister can give us any assurance on that point —possibly he has—he will remedy a very trying situation in Western Ontario. I cannot see from these Estimates that Ontario especially central western Ontario— is enjoying the expenditure of a great deal of money in matters of this kind. Port Dover offers the very best facilities for harbour purposes on the northern shore of Lake Ontario.

Mr. CARVELL: It is true a representative and very influential delegation waited upon me some time ago with regard to this very important harbour. I am not in a position to state what will be done, but I think I can state very frankly the position of affairs. Apparently in 1872, by some sort of an arrangement, this harbour became the property of the Grand Trunk Railway company with the provision that the Government could take it over at any time by Order in Council. The Grand Trunk have done practically nothing towards developing it, and fairly large sums have been expended by the Government from 1870 down to recent years. Some portions of the works are somewhat in decay and disuse. I have no doubt that everything that my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) says about the importance of developing the coal carrying trade over that electric road is in accordance with the facts. I will go so far as to say that I intend to ask my colleagues to take over this harbour under the terms of the Order in Council, and make it a public harbour. I think it will require $6,000 to put it in such a condition that it may be utilized during the coming year. I want my hon. friend to realize that if we attempted to carry out the plan suggested, it would take $300,000 or $400,000.

Mr. EULER: Only $260,000, I think.

Mr. CARVELL: No, my hon. friend is in error. It would be more than that if we carried out the whole scheme, and we simply cannot afford to spend that much money at the present time. It would take probably a couple of years to do so, and then you would not get the coal. Furthermore, I want the hon. gentleman to realize that there are four other big coal ports on lake Erie, and thus there is a pretty good inlet for the coal destined for that portion of Ontario, in addition to which there are the bridges across the Niagara river. However, I was very much impressed with the fairness of the delegation. It looked to me like good business, and I am at least making a start. I am proposing to take over this harbour, put it on the same general plan as the remainder of the harbours on lake Erie, and do whatever work may be necessary in order that vessels may go in there at the present time. I can only hope that when financial conditions again become normal we will be able to go on and develop that harbour, and meet what seems to be the very reasonable request of that portion of the province. While the hon. gentleman claims that the province of Ontario is not getting a very large amount of money, he must remember that that province is not a maritime country, in the sense that the eastern and western portions of Canada are. While they have the lakes, yet these do not approach in importance the Atlantic or the Pacific oceans, and if he figures up the amount he will find that Ontario is being very well treated. That province in these expenditures is getting more than all the Maritime Provinces put together, and about the same as the province of Quebec. I want to assure my hon. friend that in making up the Estimates, the question of whether this or that province was getting more or less appropriation never entered into our minds for a moment; it was purely according to what we considered the transportation necessities of the country.

Mr. EULER: I would regret very much if the minister felt that I was indulging in criticisms on the ground that other provinces were receiving an undue share of the public appropriations, because that was not my intention. I brought the matter up so that it should be decided purely on its merits, and for no other reason. I do not understand, however, from what the delegation announced when they interviewed the minister, and from other information in my possession, that the amount of $6,000 would put the harbour temporarily into condition, but in that view I may be wrong. If investigation has been made, and that amount of money will serve, we will certanly be all the more satisfied.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what our engineers report.

Mr. EULER: Then I will not go behind that report. I do not think it was the intention of the delegation to ask the minister now to expend the amount of money that would be required to put the harbour permanently into the condition in which it should be, but that something should be done this year to make use of the facilities that we would have, through the railway in question, to import coal. So far as other ports on Lake Erie are concerned, I do not think that for the importation of coal into the manufacturing centres, they are of any particular value. I think practically all the coal that now comes in comes across the bridge at Niagara Falls.

Mr. CARVELL: I think my hon. friend is correct. The delegation, according to my recollection, asked for the expenditure of about $70,000.

Mr. EULER: About $60,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, about $60,000, or $70,000.

Manitoba—Harbours and rivers generally—Repairs and improvements, $15,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this item for?

Mr. CARVELL: It is a general vote for the province just the same as has been voted for all the rest of the provinces. If any unforeseen expenditure becomes necessary, we have this small vote out of which to pay the expenses.

Mr. CAHILL: I hope the minister is not asking for this money just because it has been voted before, but because it is absolutely necessary. There does not seem to be any great number of harbours and rivers in Manitoba.

Mr. CARVELL: There are important wharves and works upon the Red River and upon Lake Winnipeg. I am not a judge of exactly how necessary those works are, but they must be kept in repair. If an accident happens unless we have a vote of this kind we have no way of meeting the expenditure.

Mr. CAHILL: Was the amount voted last year spent?

Mr. CARVELL: No, last year only $2,805 was expended.

Saskatchewan and Alberta—harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $20,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Can the minister state how much money was spent last year?

Mr. CARVELL: The sum of $2,377 was spent last year.

Mr. KNOX: In view of the size of the territory covered, have the points been defined where this money is likely to be spent?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is just a general vote taken for the purpose of safety. We hope that it may not be necessary to expend the money.

British Columbia—Fraser River (Lower)—Improvements, $21,500.

Mr. STACEY: The term "Lower Fraser" has a varied interpretation. Sometimes in certain circles it means that portion of the river below New Westminster city, and sometimes in other circles and under other circumstances it means that portion of the river below Hope. What interpretation does the department give, and how much of the Fraser river is actually covered by the vote?

Mr. CARVELL: This is what is called the "snag" vote, and the stretch to which it applies extends to Chilliwack above New Westminster.

Dredging—New dredging plant—Ontario and Quebec, $6,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CARVELL: This is for what is called the shipyard in Ottawa, the place at the upper end of the town where dredges, scows and things of that kind are repaired.

Dredging—Maritime Provinces, $200,000.

Mr. LEGER: Does this item include dredging in small rivers?

Mr. CARVELL: It includes all dredging, except where otherwise specially provided for. This vote is principally for the purpose of operating departmental dredges, not for contract work. It takes in river work, and all sorts of work. I may say that there are recommendations from our engineers for the expenditure of an amount of money that would stagger the House if I were to give it. With all these demands, it is a question of picking out those absolutely essential. I cannot tell now where this money will be spent. It is a general vote, and will be used only where absolutely necessary. The requests that have been made by engineers for dredging in the three maritime provinces alone would involve an expenditure of $3,315,000. Of course, it is impossible to comply with all of those requests.

Mr. LEGER: The reason I asked the question is that in the past year a certain amount was voted for dredging and breastworks in the Aldouane river in the county of Kent, N.B., to facilitate the taking by the farmers of mussel mud for fertilizing purposes from the bay up the river. I understand that there is much dredging yet to be done, and there is no other way of getting that fertilizer transported the five or six miles to where it is used except by water. By doing a little dredging, the farmers can get their oyster shell and mussel mud fertilizer from the bay onto the wharf built some years ago. Only a small amount will be necessary to do the work in this river, and the same also applies to the St. Charles and St. Louis rivers. There are certain parts of the St. Louis river, near the mouth, where the land is flat, and some dredging was done last year and the year before so that at low water boats could get through. I understand that last fall the channel had filled up in some places, necessitating further attention from the Government to facilitate fishing. My desire is to facilitate as much as possible the work of the fishermen who have long distances to go, and also to help the farmers to get as much fertilizer as possible. There may be no recommendation by the district engineer on this subject. He has spent a good deal of money in the past on these rivers, and if the minister called his attention to it a certain amount might be spent on this work.

Mr. CARVELL: I have never heard of this matter before, but it is out of a vote like this that such important works as my hon. friend refers to are paid. I shall certainly have the matter investigated.

Mr. LEGER: I thank the minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to remind the minister that in my riding, at the mouth of the arm of the sea called the Little Bras d'Or a very large amount of money was spent in dredging, in the years 1908, 1909 and 1910, and some of the work is still unfinished. What is left unfinished consists of ridges here and there through the channel. It is a splendid channel in some places, but these ridges constitute a danger to shipping. I think a very small amount of money would finish up the work. If the minister has not a report on it, I would like him to get a report of the exact condition of that work, as I do not think it is available to navigators.

Mr. CARVELL: I will make a note of it, and see that it is investigated.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is principally a harbour for a coal mine which is becoming important now, and it would be very much in the interest of the production of coal if they would get their shipping in.

Dredging—Ontario and Quebec, $200,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: How much of this will be spent from Montreal to the sea? This vote represents a large decrease compared with last year, when $550,000 was voted. How much is asked by the engineer of the department, and does the engineer think that it is safe to spend only $200,000 to keep the St. Lawrence channel open? As the minister is aware, the channel fills up quickly with sand.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps my hon. friend will pardon me. He is not an old member of the House, and there is what may seem to him an incongruity in the fact that the St. Lawrence ship channel is entirely under the control of the Marine and Fisheries Department and not of the Public Works Department. Therefore, no portion of the money we are asking for now has anything to do with the St. Lawrence ship channel. It is very much along the line of the similar vote for the Maritime Provinces, namely to maintain dredging plants which are owned by the department itself, which are sent around to places where work is needed, usually in small ways. It pays salaries, wages, coal, repairs, and everything of that kind. It would have nothing to do with the St. Lawrence ship channel. In answer to my hon. friend's question as to whether or not the engineers have been remiss in their duty, they have suggested that there should be over $4,000,000 worth of dredging done in Ontario and Quebec. I am only sorry that I am unable to accept all their suggestions.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: That money, I understand, was to be spent in Ontario and Quebec. Where is it to be spent?

Mr. CARVELL: It would take me, I was going to say, half an hour to read the names of the places, but they all want dredging done. It would be of great advantage to the transportation of the country if we could give them the dredging, but I am afraid we cannot comply with the request.

Nova Scotia telegraph and telephone lines—Cape Breton telegraph system—renewal of poles between Eskasoni and East Bay, $700.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I do not know that this is an opportune time to ask a few questions with regard to the policy of the Government concerning telephones. The minister will remember that last year we had a discussion on this subject in which he participated. There is only a limited mileage of telephones in Nova Scotia, but before now the telephones were distributed just where they would suit the politician. I made that statement last year; I made it the year before, and I make it again now. It is absolutely unfair, where a telegraph service has been converted into a telephone service, not to distribute the boxes wherever they are most needed. I shall illustrate a case. There is a line in the county of Inverness going through the districts of Upper Margaree, East Lakes, Ainslee and Whycocomagh. There is a doctor there who has to attend professionally the settlements all around. That doctor cannot get a box.

Mr. CARVELL: What is his name?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Dr. McDonald.

Mr. CARVELL: Tell him to wire me in regard to it.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Very good, I shall stop talking. If last year the former minister had done that, I would have been satisfied. In every case in which a man is prepared to pay for a box, why in the name of common sense does he not receive it at a reasonable rental, or free, as may be the policy of the Government?

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: Tell him to send a wire and he will get a box.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Very good. Now I am satisfied that justice will be done in this matter of telephones in my county.

Mr. BUTTS: I feel like asking the minister to be a little more generous. I notice that only $700 is to be appropriated for the telegraph system in that beautiful county, Cape Breton. I wish to call the attention of the minister to two very important matters that have for years been discussed among the people of Cape Breton county. One is the question of Glace Bay harbour. Perhaps the minister is not as familiar with the history of it as we people of Cape Breton are, but some years ago, through some action of this Parliament, Glace Bay harbour was taken away from the Government and given to the Dominion Coal Company, and since then it has remained practically a private harbour.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. gentleman referring to the installation of a telephone system there?

Mr. BUTTS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is out of order. I regret very much to call him to order.

Mr. BUTTS: I am nearly always out of order, but you, Sir, always look after me. Perhaps you might be a little generous with me.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman will be the cause of my being obliged to be very generous to other hon. members, and I shall, therefore, have to ask him to desist from his argument.

Mr. BUTTS: Perhaps I shall be able to get in under the roof in some way. It is in regard to this matter of $700.

Mr. CARVELL: Would it not be a good thing if the hon. member had a telephone line to Glace Bay?

Mr. BUTTS: It would be a great deal better if the minister would take over Glace Bay harbour and make considerable improvements.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am very sorry, but the hon. member is not in order.

Mr. BUTTS: I bow to your ruling. I was going to suggest to the minister that perhaps he might increase the amount.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this the total amount for telephone system in the Maritime Provinces? Last year there was a general appropriation of a considerable amount.

Mr. CARVELL: I might shorten this discussion by making a general statement. The telephone system has been a matter of evolution. A great many years ago it became necessary—and, I think, quite properly so that the Federal Government should construct telegraph lines to outlying districts which were entirely out of touch with the rest of the world unless some means of communicating were provided for them. That went on for many years, and, like many other matters, I presume it was to some extent abused. What may have been a necessity forty or fifty years ago ceased to be a necessity five years ago, but those telegraph lines were Government institutions, and it was pretty hard to get rid of them. Of late years they have all been converted into telephone lines, and a telephone line, if properly operated, is very much more useful to the average person living in an out-of-the-way district than is a telegraph line. I have never had the experience of living alongside of a Government-owned telephone line, and I do not believe they are necessary in many portions of Canada. Last year I listened to a great deal of discussion about the condition of affairs in Cape Breton Island. I have listened to the discussion here tonight. I know something about the condition of affairs in a small line in the province of New Brunswick. I am told that there are in the province of Alberta and Saskatchewan lines that are absolutely useless because they are practically paralleling telephone lines owned and operated by the governments of those two provinces. There is no doubt that these telegraph lines were necessary when they were originally built, and it is a pity that as settlements became more numerous some arrangement was not made by which this Government could have sold out or handed over the system to the provinces and thus get rid of this annual expenditure. In the northern part of British Columbia an entirely different condition of affairs prevails. The Government telephone system there brings people in touch with the outside world who otherwise would be completely isolated. This question is so big that I would not profess to express an opinion on it. I do believe, however, that there are other portions of British Columbia where there is no necessity for a Government-owned telephone system. I may as well state to the House frankly that I intend during the coming summer to have one of the best telephone experts in Canada go over the whole Government telephone system in this country and give me a business report, upon which I shall try to act in a businesslike way. I personally believe that all the Government telephone systems in the Maritime Provinces should be disposed of; either sold to the existing companies or given away to them if necessary; let us get some one to take them off our hands. I would certainly sell out the system in New Brunswick were it not for the fact that I am largely interested in the company that would probably have to do the buying. Therefore, I suppose I would not be justified in doing that. What I have said of New Brunswick is true of Nova Scotia. I do not know exactly what the telephone system is in Cape Breton Island, but it seems absolutely ridiculous that the Government of Canada should operate a telephone system in that island. The system should be operated by a local company, or by the Maritime Provinces Telegraph and Telephone Company, or by somebody else who would do it on business principles. In Quebec, I think an even worse condition of affairs prevails. We have telephones there in two counties, the county of Dorchester and the county of Quebec, and I think Quebec is a great deal worse than Dorchester. There are miles and miles of Government-owned lines in Quebec; I do not know what in the world they do with them all. There is one fellow down there who goes on building and takes his chances of getting his pay; you cannot stop him from building telephone lines. But we are going to try and make an impression on him in two or three weeks in order to get him to call a halt. In Ontario there is the Pelee Island cable. I do not know that there are any Government lines in Manitoba, but in Saskatchewan and Alberta there are important lines. Just think of the Government operating a telegraph or telephone line from Qu'Appelle to Edmonton through one of the most thickly-settled and richest portions of our great Northwest. Three other telegraph lines parallel that wire which may have been needed at first but it certainly cannot be a necessity now. To sum up, I can only say that I intend to have a business report made, and I am going to try and act on it from a business standpoint. I hope the House will pass the items which I am proposing. I am not going to promise to expend this money, but I can assure the House that if expended it will be expended under proper conditions, and with the firm belief that the expenditure is necessary.

11 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope the minister will not act with any degree of harshness in the county of Victoria, which I have the honour to represent and where I must speak with the greatest deference and respect of the Government—owned telegraph lines. In the old county of Victoria we have a settlement extending along the rocky Atlantic coast for about one hundred and ten miles, dotted here and there with fishing villages, and with no communication with the outside world, particularly in winter time and in the fall of the year, except by means of this small wire that was strung through the settlement some years ago by the Government of Canada. It serves a splendid purpose for these fishermen, because they can telegraph to Halifax and Montreal and other commercial centres about the price of fish. Nobody else in the world would build a line there, unless we got a railway down there, and then of course the telegraph would follow. Until there is something better coming to the people in northern Victoria than the small accommodation that this Government telegraph line affords, I hope the minister will not interfere with it, but will keep it in good shape and improve it as much as possible. There is a tendency to convert this telegraph line into a telephone line, and part of the line through the county of Victoria is part telephone and part telegraph. Personally, I think for that part of the county of Victoria, if we are to have either one or the other, the telegraph line is the best, because the fish merchant at the northern part of Victoria could then send a telegram from his fishing establishment to any part of Canada and he could not get the same service out of a telephone.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope my hon. friend did not understand me to say that I propose to take away from any people the privileges which they now enjoy. What I would like to do is to dispose of many of the lines that are unnecessary and put the rest of them on a business basis. If the Government is going to operate telegraph or telephone lines they should regard them as public utilities, and operate them on a business basis, and the people who use the service should pay something for the accommodation commensurate with what people in other portions of Canada are paying where they have to look after their own affairs.

Mr. CANNON: I see by last year's Estimates that the sum of $3,500 was voted for the construction of a telephone line through certain parishes in the county of Dorchester. I should like to know what amount of money was expended on the construction of these lines, and how far the work has been carried. I noticed when I was going through these parishes that the poles were up, but no wires and no boxes, and it is needless for me to insist on how useless the line is in that condition for the people of those parishes.

The parishes of St. Louis de Gonzague and St. Cyprien have no communication with the outside world, and telephone lines are of great service to the people who live there. As the lines are at present, however, they are absolutely of no use; the money spent last year will have been wasted unless the work is completed this year. Last year mention was made of the conditions in the parish of St. Luc—situated behind St. Germain—the people of which have no outside communication. When they wish to engage the services of a doctor, they have to drive thirty-four miles. If the minister intends to spend any money this year on telephone lines he ought to make some arrangement whereby St. Luc will be connected with St. Germain, because these parishes are in the same position as the other two in which work was begun last year.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no intention of spending more money this year on completing telephone lines in Dorchester county, but I do intend to put the wiring on the poles that have been erected and to carry out the arrangements made last year. The wire has been purchased, and must be on the poles by this time. Any new settlement in Canada has as much right to ask the department to erect telephone lines within its bounds as have the parishes my hon. friend has referred to. In my own province over one thousand settlers have gone into the country along the Restigouche river within the last four or five years. They are simply crying out for land; they are overflowing from the river St. John on the south to the St. Lawrence on the north. These people built their own telephone lines and made their own arrangements; they are not asking the Government to do it for them. They come to an understanding with existing telephone companies, or they organize local companies and obtain connecting rights with the larger telephone concerns. Think what a door was opened last year, and what a door I should open if I went on with further work of this kind this year.

Mr. CANNON: The principle laid down last year may be bad; I do not say it is good. As a matter of fact these telephone lines were started simply because they were promised during an election.

Mr. CARVELL: The election is over now.

Mr. CANNON: Yes, but the fact that the Government started to build these lines prevented local companies from doing the work. Any reasonable agreement proposed by the department to local companies would, I believe, be accepted.

Mr. CARVELL: I make this sporting offer to my hon. friend: if he can organize a local company we will sell the whole thing out for half what it cost.

Mr. CANNON: What is it worth?

Mr. CARVELL: I will tell the hon. gentleman what it cost and we will give it to him at fifty cents on the dollar.

Mr. CANNON: Before considering the minister's offer, I wish to point out that the gentleman who built this line last year—his name is Martineau—

Mr. CARVELL: The same gentleman, I think, who operated in Quebec county.

Mr. CANNON: Perhaps so. This gentleman actively engaged in building the lines, but he forgot to pay the men who did the work. Who is responsible for that, the Government or Martineau?

Mr. CARVELL: Martineau.

Mr. CANNON: What arrangement was made between the Government and Martineau I do not know. In any case, they have a complete telephone line in Dorchester now, and the people who worked on the construction of it have not been paid.

Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries—surveys in connection therewith and settlement of land damages, $125,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I propose to make a thorough investigation of this matter before the money is expended.

To pay Western Dry Dock and Shipping Co., Limited, of Port Arthur, a portion of the fifth payment of subsidy due them upon their completion of the work covered by the agreement ratified by Chap. 57, 3-4 George V., 1913, notwithstanding that the work is not completed, $35,641.50.

Mr. BUREAU: I notice that it is proposed to pay this company notwithstanding that the work is not completed. Is the work behind?

Mr. CARVELL: The work was not entirely completed and therefore we are paying them less than the amount that we would be required to pay them by statute. For that reason we are taking a special vote. Otherwise the department would go by statutory authority.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it almost complete or in a fair state of completion?

Mr. CARVELL: There are just a few machines that have not been placed but it is not completed to the extent that the engineer could give a certificate that it is finally completed.

Public Works chargeable to collection of revenue—slides and booms, $53,900.

Mr. BUREAU: Are these booms in the Upper Ottawa district?

Mr. CARVELL: That is in the same category as the Upper Ottawa Improvements. I intend to make a pretty careful investigation of this matter. It is an old custom under which the Government of Canada practically takes charge of transporting all the lumber down the Ottawa river. It may have been necessary a hundred years ago and it possibly may be necessary to-day but I would like to know a little more about it before we branch out to any great extent.

Graving docks, $68,300.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where are these?

Mr. CARVELL: There is the Champlain graving dock at Levis, the Levis graving dock and the Esquimalt graving dock.

Harbour and river works, $40,700.

Mr. EDWARDS: What position are you in with regard to the removal of the temporary bridge at Kingston?

Mr. CARVELL: We have taken out the draw and I think there was an arrangement made to sell the material to the city of Kingston at a pretty reduced price. It is practically understood that the city will take the material but we are getting something out of it.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is the department pulling up the piles?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, we are removing the piles and selling the material to the city. There was a delegation from Kingston here. I do not know that we concluded an absolute contract, but still I think it was pretty well settled between us.

Mr. BUREAU: I see that under the head of harbour and river works, there are the river Yamaska lock and dam, and Riviere du Lievre lock and dam. Are these locks and dams for navigation or for logging purposes?

Mr. CARVELL: My information is that they are for navigation purposes.

Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS: With reference to the item, "Burlington channel bridge," has this anything to do with the Burlington revetment wall for which a contract was awarded and in regard to which, I understand, the balance has been more or less in dispute.

Mr. CARVELL: That is at Hamilton, Ont.?

Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: This amount of $5,800 is required for staff maintenance and repairs in connection with the Burlington channel bridge which is to provide a crossing over the ship channel for vehicular traffic and the cars of the radial railway from Hamilton to Oakville and intermediate points. There are repairs, renewals, painting, staff, bridge tender and three assistants, etc. These items make up the total of $5,800.

Telegraph and telephone lines—land and cable telegraph lines, lower St. Lawrence and Martime Provinces, including working expenses of vessels required for cable service, $202,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a place called White Point in Victoria county, a very considerable fishing village, and it is about nine miles from the nearest telegraph line. They have never been able to get connection with the Government telegraph system. In summer time they can come from White Point in a boat five miles to a place called Dingwall, but in winter time they have to travel around the mainland about nine miles before they can send a message. For years they have been trying to get the line extended from Dingwall to White Point.

Mr. CARVELL: Are there any settlements between the two points?

Mr. McKENZIE: There are scattered farming settlements and the village is out on the point. They have been writing to me. When we had power ourselves, I made an effort to get this thing done, but I did not succeed. I had always hoped that I would be able to overcome the difficulty. This must appeal to the minister. Here is a little community placed out on this point and it is desired that they shall have communication with the outside world. A very small amount of money would string a line along the shore down to White Point and give them a telegraph office.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. CARVELL: It is very hard to resist my hon. friend's pleading, but I could not make any promise. I want to remind him that this vote is not for construction purposes, it is purely for maintenance. This illustrates the statement I made sometime ago when I said that it is costing this country $766,000 to operate these telephones. Of course there is some revenue, I do not know exactly how much, but nothing like sufficient to meet operating expenses, let alone interest on the investment. However, I will take into consideration what the hon. gentleman states.

Mr. McKENZIE: The expenditure involved is very slight, considering the accommodation it would afford to a deserving community.

Mr. CARVELL: It would involve the expenditure of about $1,000, I think.

Mr DECHENE: Does this vote take in telegraph lines starting from Quebec down?

Mr. CARVELL: This takes in the lines extending away down the St. Lawrence river, I think, to Chicoutimi and Belle Isle, as well as the line in Dorchester and Quebec counties.

Mr. DECHENE: Does it take in the quarantine telephone and telegraph lines at Grosse Isle?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. DECHENE I see that last year the District Superintendent, Mr. G. B. Pouliot, received $1,000 for salary, and there was also a payment made to him of $129.47. Apparently Mr Pouliot draws two salaries.

Mr. CARVELL: It looks that way.

Mr. DECHENE: Did the same man receive both payments?

Mr. CARVELL: It may be his wife, I am not sure.

Mr. DECHENE: It cannot be his wife, or the designation "Mrs." or "Madame" would have been used.

Mr. CARVELL It must be a payment for travelling expenses.

British Columbia—Mainland telegraph and telephone line—General repairs and improvements, $3,300.

Mr. CARVELL: This vote will probably have to be expended this year, but we intend to have a pretty careful investigation of the telegraph system of the Yukon made by competent authority, and various suggestions made with a view to effecting economies will be taken into consideration. In the first place, the line from Fort George to,

I think it is, Fort Fraser, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, is now paralleled by the Grand Trunk Pacific. It would seem unnecessary that there should be two telegraph lines running through a country with as little settlement and business in it as that district has. Then from Fort Fraser to Atlin, a distance of over three hundred miles, I am told, there is only one place where there is any business whatever, I think, on the Skeena river, a small trading post with only one or two merchants, and it requires an enormous amount of money to keep up that line. It is not so much the pay of the operators—although they have to have special residences built and stations are needed every twenty miles with a rest station between them again—but in the spring-time, when the ice and snow come down the mountain sides the poles are carried away and need renewing practically nearly every year over a large part of the line. Surely there must be some way of getting rid of a large amount of this expenditure and placing these lines on a business basis, and therefore I am going to have the whole matter thoroughly investigated.

Progress reported.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. CARVELL: I move, seconded by Mr. Calder, that the name of Mr. H. J. Mackie, member for North Renfrew, be added to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Carvell the House adjourned at 11.43 p.m.

Friday, April 26, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 67, respecting The International Bridge and Terminal Company.—Mr. Manion.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Hon. Mr. CALDER moved:

That the motion adopted by the House on the 24th instant adding the name of Mr. Pardee to the Special Committee to consider and report on the Pension Board and Pension Regulations be amended by adding at the end thereof the words "and that part of Rule 11 limiting the number of members to 15 be suspended in relation thereto."

He said: I might explain that the name of Mr. Pardee was added to the committee the other day, but there is a rule of the House which provides that there shall not be more than fifteen members on a special committee, and as there were already fifteen members on that committee, this motion is proposed.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO DRAFTEES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I observe that new regulations have been adopted by Order in Council with respect to the Order which was ratified by us some few days ago, providing for leave of absence to draftees and temporary leave of absence to farmers and farm labourers in categories lower than A. I would suggest to the Government that, either to-day or Monday such an important matter as this be brought up in some way—better, perhaps, in Committee of Supply—so that the public may be instructed as to the effect of these regulations.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) intimated that he would make a statement explanatory of the provisions themselves on some suitable occasion, not to-day, but probably on Monday.

MEDICAL SERVICE AND FORESTRY CORPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a cable despatch of a very serious nature published in this morning's Montreal Gazette. There seems to be a charge against the Canadian Medical Service to the effect that our wounded soldiers are not properly cared for in Canadian hospitals, and also in relation to the forestry corps, whose staff, according to this cable, is ridiculously overmanned. I shall read only one sentence about each of these charges.

There seems to be a lack of co-ordination in the medical services and too much deference to precedent, a fault everywhere in military services, where those are in power whose services antedate the outbreak of hostilities.

With regard to the hospitals:

There is a marked revival of the demand that Canadians be treated in Canadian hospitals.

Pre-war military training and services have not proven of great value in the Canadian Medical Corps.

Then, in regard to the forestry corps:

The Forestry Corps Staff is ridiculously overmanned. Sir Edward Kemp forced a slight reduction but more drastic action is required. It is felt the Forestry Corps staff is a refuge for personal friends of those in higher command, and appointments and promotions are not given for practical or technical knowledge or success in work.

Has the Minister of Militia and Defence read this cable from the special correspondent of the Montreal Gazette? Will action be taken to prevent any such treatment of our wounded soldiers as is indicated here? Will any report be made as to the forestry corps?

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): That is the first intimation I have had of it. I do not see the Gazette, but I will be very glad to peruse the despatch and take whatever action may be necessary.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—ALLEGED UNLAWFUL DETENTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I call the attention of the Government to a paragraph which appeared a few days ago in a paper published in this city, the Ottawa Evening Journal. It appears that some police officers were after some young men who were supposed to have deserted the service, or failed to report, and the paragraph to which I call the attention of the Government reads in this way:

Several other little farm-houses were visited but without results. A father whose two boys were supposed to be defaulters was brought to Pembroke and held as a hostage until the boys report.

Of course, it would be an absolutely illegal act to take a father as a hostage for the appearance of his boys. I would ask the Government to get some report upon that.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not observe the item. I should be very much surprised to find that it was correct, but I shall have it looked into.

Mr. HERBERT J. MACKIE: May I add a word of explanation?

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to say that the only thing that can be done on the Orders of the Day is to address a question to the Government. It is not in order to have any discussion, and if the hon. member were permitted to make a statement it would be a discussion. His only opportunity would be on the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

VISIT OF MINISTERS TO WASHINGTON AND NEW YORK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Earlier this week the newspapers announced that the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), and the hon. the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), were at Washington and New York. This morning's, and last evening's, papers announced that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) had gone down to either of these cities to confer with them. May I inquire from the leader of the Government if any unusual condition has arisen necessitating the presence of these three members of the Government in the United States, and if so, whether a statement can be made to the House?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The Acting Minister of Finance has not left the city and the item as regards him is quite incorrect. The Prime Minister is absent, but I do not think that there is any unusual circumstance that has necessitated that absence that could at the moment be stated to the House.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 65, to amend the Companies Act.—Hon. Mr. Doherty.

Bill No. 20, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Hay and Straw Inspection).—Sir George Foster.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 21, to amend the Penitentiary Act, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Definition of "Inspector" amended.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister kindly state in a few words the object of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are substantially two provisions in the Bill. The first is for the purpose of remodelling the system on which the penitentiaries are administered to the extent of providing for a superintendent and inspectors, instead of two inspectors. The second provision is a necessary consequence of the first, substituting "superintendent" for "inspector" where necessary, and defining the duties of the respective officers. The Bill also confers power to make regulations by which it will be possible to provide for the better employment of the convicts in each institution by the establishing and carrying on of suitable industries. The provision further makes it possible, where as a result of arrangements made to that end it would be found desirable and means were put at the disposal of the authorities for the purpose, to make some allowance in the way of remuneration to convicts for the labour they perform. While the Bill merely contains that empowering provision, what is contemplated is—if the system of useful employment should, by means of disposing of the products exclusively to other departments of the Government, produce a revenue—to make a certain allowance to convicts payable to dependent relatives, if they have any, and if there are no dependent relatives to enable the funds to accumulate in the interest of the convict himself, so that when he leaves the institution he may make a start in life with some little savings behind him.

Mr. MURPHY: That is what my hon. friend means by "providing remuneration to the convict?"

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Derived from the work which has been assigned to him?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Appointment of superintendent:

Mr. PROULX: Whom does the minister intend to appoint as superintendent?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the appointment were in the hands of the minister he might have an intention in that regard and be able to state it, but the hon. member must know that appointments are now required to be made upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. It is, therefore, not possible for me to have an intention as to whom I am going to name, because the appointment does not rest with me.

Mr. PROULX: I suppose the Governor in Council will act upon the recommendation of the minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: Ultimately it is a matter for the Governor in Council, but the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission is essential, and I cannot undertake to say what they may have in mind.

Mr. PROULX: Will an examination before appointment be required by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: It rests wtih the Civil Service Commission to prescribe the methods governing the determining of their own recommendations. I am not in a position to say what determination they have made, or, indeed, whether they have prepared a regulation which would apply to an appointment of this kind. However, the requirement that their recommendation is essential to the appointment would apply in this case as much as in any other.

Mr. PROULX: The section says that the superintendent shall be an officer of the Department of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Then I suppose the person recommended will already have acted as inspector?

Mr. DOHERTY: I repeat that the recommendation does not rest with the Minister of Justice, but with the Civil Service Commission. It is, therefore, quite impossible for me to announce what the view of the Civil Service Commission will be as to who is the best man to appoint for the position.

Mr. PROULX: But if the Civil Service Commission is requested to give a certificate to a certain gentleman, and if that gentleman has been an inspector, I suppose they will be satisfied that he is properly qualified.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no reason to doubt that the Civil Service Commission may consider that the gentleman who has been an inspector has the proper qualifications. But, again, it is not a matter of the minister recommending somebody to the Civil Service Commission, it is a matter of the Civil Service Commission recommending somebody to the minister, that recommendation to be transmitted to the Governor in Council. I cannot anticipate what the view of the Civil Service Commission will be as to the best method of procedure with regard to this or any other office.

Mr. PROULX: I am told that it is the intention to appoint Brigadier-Genral Hughes, who was inspector of penitentiaries prior to going overseas, and who is now drawing double salary as inspector of penitentiaries and as brigadier-general. I understand he is not now acting as brigadier-general on the other side.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am quite glad to learn what the intention of the hon. gentleman on that subject is. For my own part, I have reached no decision, and could have no intention. I have not heard from the Civil Service Commission that they had made up their minds as to their intention, without even waiting for this legislation to pass. I would be surprised if they had decided.

Mr. PROULX: Will the hon. minister say that Brigadier General Hughes will not be appointed?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot possibly say what the Civil Service Commission will do. I have no knowledge whatever whether or not the name of the gentleman who is mentioned has ever occurred to the Civil Service Commission. I should be surprised if they have made up their minds on a matter of that kind even before the legislation is passed.

Mr. PROULX: We know very well how these appointments are made—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that this discussion is entirely out of order. The appointment of any officer to administer this Act should be discussed on the estimates of the department. This appointment has nothing to do with the terms of the Bill itself.

Mr. PROULX: This Bill provides for the appointment of a superintendent of penitentiaries.

The CHAIRMAN: It does, but it has nothing to do with any particular person being appointed to that position.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is quite in order to discuss the policy of the Government with respect to any Bill; and the policy of the Government under it will be a strong element as to whether this House should pass the Bill or not.

Mr. EDWARDS: It seems to me that the course which will be followed in regard to this matter will be apparent to everyone. The Government has adopted as its policy, and there is no question about that, that the Civil Service Commission shall recommend men for positions. If that body, in their wisdom, see fit to advertise for applications for country postmasters to draw $50 a year, when it comes to selecting men for the positions under this Bill they will advertise in all the papers, they will be flooded with applications, and then they will make a selection, and some lucky man will get the job. There is no question about what the course will be.

Mr. BUREAU: Heretofore there were two Inspectors of Penitentiaries who saw to it that the law was observed and that the penitentiaries were properly conducted. If I may use the expression, they had concurrent jurisdiction, that is, there was no chief or senior inspector. I see by this Bill that the minister will have power to appoint not more than three inspectors. Will he tell us it will be the duty of the proposed superintendent to look after the inspectors, or will he himself act as an inspector by supervising all the penitentiaries and making to the minister such recommendations as to changes as he may think advisable? I have not ascertained by reading the reports of the Department of Justice that the penal population has increased of late in such proportion as to justify the appointment of three inspectors and a superintendent. I have not heard, either, that under the old system there was any complaint made against Mr. Stewart, or against Mr. Dawson, when he was inspector, that they did not perform their duties, or that there was any laxity in the administration of the penitentiaries. The work in the various penal institutions of the Dominion must be less than it was when construction was not well advanced, six or seven years ago. I understand that the inspectors had a great deal of work at that time, when many attempts were made by the convicts to get away. There were some escapes, and there is one name that comes to my mind, the famous Bill Miner, whose case kept the House sitting for a couple of days at that time. The work must be decreasing as construction is being completed, and I would like to have from the minister a definite statement as to the necessity for having this increase, and of having a superintendent when we have always got along well with two inspectors. The inspectors were thoroughly qualified, and no doubt the excellent results achieved are due to the good work they have done. When conditions seem to be improving, and the prison population does not seem to be increasing, can the minister justify an increase in the staff?

Mr. DOHERTY: As regards the number of inspectors, that is provided for by another section. If the committee is of the opinon that they are too numerous, I shall be open to consider that. The present section involves a change of systems, not necessarily an increase in the number of officers. We had two inspectors, and they had two functions which, I think I am correct in saying, were distinct functions. They had the inspection of the penitentiaries and they had the superintendence and direction of the carrying on of the penitentiaries. That created a situation that those two officers, not having the work divided between them—to one the inspection and to the other the superintendence and direction —were equal in authority and charged with this double function. Now, the necessities from the point of view of superintendence rather called for the presence here of the person or persons carrying on that direction, and the constant supervision by them of what was going on in all the different penitentiaries. The work of inspection, on the other hand, called for men to be absent from Ottawa to keep in touch with what was actually going on. Now, eliminating for the moment any question as to the number of officers, the principal idea is to separate those two functions, which, I think, on reflection, the hon. member will see are two perfectly distinct functions; and to have one officer who will have, under the deputy minister and the minister, the power of decision and the responsibility for the decision, instead of having two gentlemen of equal authority, with the possibility always that they might not agree, and with a situation in which no one person was responsible for the action ultimately taken. I submit that all the balance of advantage is in the direction of having one responsible head, some one person doing the deciding, so far as the deciding properly belongs to an officer of that class, and responsible for the decision come to, rather than in that of having two gentlemen who, if they happened to be here both together might not agree, and who, as they could not always be present together might have to decide successively upon questions coming before them. I do not desire to criticise the personal action of gentlemen who have been inspectors of penitentiaries; this proposal rests simply upon the considerations which I have pointed out. No one occupying the position that I do could fail to see the disadvantages that result from this anomalous and unusual situation.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister has not yet convinced me that he is right. This superintendent is being appointed to receive reports of inspectors, decide what action is necessary, and be responsible for the results of that action. Under the present system the inspectors report to the minister, who is the proper man to bear the responsibility of any action that is taken. If extra assistance is required in connection with the penitentiaries, by all means obtain it; but let the responsibility for action taken in the administration of penitentiaries not be saddled on any one other than the head of the department. Penitentiaries constitute a very important branch of the administration of justice, and repeated discussions have taken place in the House with regard to their management. The late Mr. Monk repeatedly brought forward resolutions regarding the segregation of convicts with a view to improving their lot. If one inspector is required, or if a division of the work of the inspectors is necessary—say, by provinces or districts—well and good; but I do not see why a superintendent of penitentiaries should read the reports of inspectors and then tell the Minister of Justice how he ought to think. This matter of the management of penitentiaries will have to come before the House in the near future with a view to a change of the whole system. I shall not go into that now, but I wish to emphasize my belief that the superintendent in this case should be the Minister of Justice, and that action taken by him should be based not on the report of a superintendent, but on the facts contained in the reports made by the inspectors.

Mr. EDWARDS: I rather favour the idea of appointing a superintendent for all penitentiaries in Canada, but I cannot see the wisdom of appointing three, or even two, inspectors. Defining the duty of inspectors, the Act says that they shall, under the direction of the superintendent, " visit, examine and report upon the state and management of the penitentiaries and the suggestions which the warden or officers in charge thereof make for the improvement of the same."

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If the hon. gentleman would allow us to reach that clause before he discusses it the procedure would be more regular.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not agree with your view, Mr. Chairman, but we must abide by your decision.

The CHAIRMAN: The rule is clear; all speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand that. I do not interrupt other members when they deviate from the rule by broadening out the discussion, and if I am to be kept in line with the rule, every other member should be kept in line also. In discussing this matter I intend to exercise my privileges as a member of the House, even though I am not a Cabinet minister. When a Cabinet minister or any other member deviates from the clause under discussion by making a general statement, I have the same privilege as he has.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman may appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but he may not discuss the ruling after it has been given.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have said all I want to say on that point; if necessary, I will appeal from the ruling of the Chair. A discussion of the appointment of a superintendent naturally involves also the question of the appointment of two or more inspectors. In the past we have had two inspectors, and we now propose to change the system. In my judgment, two inspectors are unnecessary. An inspector who is sent around to look over the seven penitentiaries of Canada can spend one month in each and still have five months to spare. What are two men going to do? Two inspectors are unnecessary when we have a superintending head at Ottawa. I am strongly in favour of a change in the whole system of penitentiaries, which will inaugurate a new era in the management of these institutions.

I have on former occasions suggested the advisability of doing some of the things which the minister purposes doing under the new system. It is really too bad that the innocent have to suffer when the criminal is taken to the penitentiary. We should avoid that as far as possible, and endeavour to ameliorate this situation so far as it is in our power to do so. I am, therefore, in entire accord with what has been suggested by the minister, namely, that a price be put upon the work of the convict. A price of so much a day is put upon his work now. I agree, if you like, that the first charge on that shall be his maintenance; but when he leaves the walls of the penitentiary, if he has not any one dependent upon him, he should be able to look forward to having a small sum of money which will keep him for a period while he is endeavouring to obtain honest employment. If, when he goes within the walls of the penitentiary, he leaves a wife and family behind him, a part of the money he makes in prison should go to the support of that wife and family. I see no reason why that should not be done, and I see many reasons to commend its being done. I believe it will have a magnificent effect on the convict's conduct. It will do more than any other thing one can mention to keep that man, while he is within the walls of the penitentiary, under control. He will know that, in being deprived of his liberty, he is being punished, and he will have an incentive to conduct himself properly, so that some of the money he may make by his work in the penitentiary will go to the support of his family to keep them from want. That suggestion is all right.

I welcome this idea of a superintendent for another reason. I think it was the late Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice or Prime Minister of this country, I do not know which, who conceived the idea of a separate institution for the boys, the young convicts imprisoned for the first offence. I am not sure that I am correct, but I think I am, in saying that he even went so far as to purchase a piece of land about midway between Kingston and Montreal, and some work was done on the foundations of a new building, but the work was not proceeded with. I am confident I am right in saying Sir John Thompson had in mind a separate institution in which the young convicts, the boys of sixteen, seventeen and eighteen, who were "first offenders," would be incarcerated. That is something which I have brought up in this House before, and which ought to have the attention of every hon. member in this House. Money spent on such a project would be money well spent. Even in the worst of men there is some good, if you have only tact enough to bring it out. May I be permitted to place on Hansard a letter which, I think, proves what I say. It may arouse the interest of some hon. members who, perhaps, look upon this penitentiary question as something not worthy of their consideration. I appealed to the minister some time ago, I think it was in 1917, to liberate a convict by the name of Alex. Rose. Rose was liberated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How old was he?

Mr. EDWARDS: I should judge, roughly speaking, he was a man about thirty years old.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think so. He was a comparatively young man.

Mr. EDWARDS: He said that if he were liberated, he would join the forces and go overseas and try there to redeem his past.

He went overseas. This is a letter from the front addressed to the mother of this former convict:

France, March 31, 1918.

Dear Madam:

It is with the deepest regret that I write to advise you of the death of your son, Sapper A. Rose, on the 28th of March, 1918. He is greatly missed in the unit on account of his cheery disposition and willingness to help out any situation no matter how hard. He has proven himself a man worthy in every way to wear the King's uniform. He was always fearless in the face of danger and his coolness inspired confidence in all who came in contact with him.

He was laid to rest in Barlin British cemetery on the 29th of March, and all his comrades stood by the graveside paying their last tribute to the brave. A minister was in charge of the burial arrangements and the Last Post was sounded by a trumpeter surrounded by the officers and men of the Company standing at the Salute. A dedication service was held today in a Y. M. C. A. hut where special hymns were sung and prayers said for your loved one and those who are left to mourn the loss of a brave fearless Canadian soldier.

A cross is being specially prepared for the grave and a wreath will be bought to forever commemorate the sympathy of the officers and men of this Unit for one who fell in action while doing his all to help a righteous cause.

Our sympathies go out to you so many miles away in your sad bereavement, and also my pledge that every one of us who are left will fight to the utmost of our ability to crush the fiend who has caused such deep bereavement to be suffered by the innocent ones in our dear home land.

All personal belongings which have been saved will be sent you as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

R. McKillop, Captain,
O. C. 13th C. L. R. O. Co'y.

I read that for two reasons: First, I think it is no more than fair to pay that tribute to a man who formerly had misconducted himself so that he came within the walls of the penitentiary; secondly, because it bears out what I say, that of those men behind the walls of the penitentiaries there are none who are not worthy of our sincere consideration in trying to better their conditions and make men of them. This man went overseas and did his bit and received the commendation of all with whom he was associated. He was honoured by his officers and comrades for his conduct in this war.

I wish the Government would seriously take into consideration a separate institution for the young convict, the young fellow of seventeen or eighteen, who has violated the laws of the land and who is sent to the penitentiary. It is positively criminal on our part to place that young fellow alongside of a man who has spent, perhaps, one-half of his life in penitentiary, cracking stone, day after day, week after week, and month after month. When we allow that sort of thing to continue in this country, I do not think we can consider ourselves guiltless, for I firmly believe there is some good in even the worst convict, and especially is that true of the young fellow who is sent to the penitentiary for the first time. Such a young man should receive some consideration. He is not getting a fair show when he is put into the penitentiary alongside of men who have been criminals for one-half of their lives. And in so far as we are responsible for not giving him a fair show, that is something not to the credit of hon. members of this House. A good deal could be done in these institutions to uplift these men. I have, on a former occasion, called attention to the great number of men engaged in nothing better than breaking stones—and at the same time breaking their own spirits. Why should this be? Only last night in this House we were passing Estimates and considering the cost of furniture for this, that and the other building throughout the country.

Why should we not have standard furniture for the several classes of offices? When post offices and custom houses here and there throughout the country require furniture, why should we depend upon the whim of an official who prefers this kind of furniture to that kind? Why go out and advertise for tenders on things like that? It has been said that if these articles were made by the convicts it would interfere with free labour, but I do not think that that argument will hold water for one moment. If you like, place upon the convict's labour a price commensurate with the prices paid outside; I would rather do that than let him sit in idleness within the walls of the prison. I maintain that there are many things used in Canada and paid for by the Government, such as office furniture, mail bags, rural route post boxes, and a dozen other things, that could be made by convict labour to the financial advantage of the country and, certainly, greatly to the advantage of the convict. I think that is something which is deserving a very serious consideration, and I would like to see it done. A superintendent with supervision over all these institutions must necessarily be in Ottawa a great part of his time, and I think it would be a good idea to have a man to generally supervise all these institutions. He could have an inspector to visit the several penitentiaries from time to time, report to him on the conditions and get his orders. Perhaps two inspectors might be required, but I am certain three would not be necessary; however, I do not hold that opinion so strongly that I am not prepared to change it for good reason. The minister may have reasons which may induce me to favour the appointment of two inspectors, but at the present time I see no reason why a superintendent and one inspector could not do all the work.

4 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN: The address just delivered by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) would have been perfectly in order upon the second reading of the Bill. Fearing that he might attribute a second interruption to personal animosity of some kind, I have waited until this moment to make a special request to all the members of the committee to assist the Chairman in securing a strict observance of the rules. Upon many occasions during the present session, the second reading of a Bill has been carried without debate and attempts have been later made to discuss the principle of the Bill in committee. This practice is in direct violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the minister intend to confer any additional powers or vest any additional functions in the superintendent beyond those now existing in the case of the inspectors?

Mr. DOHERTY: The powers are specified in a subsequent section of the Bill. I do not know that they go beyond those presently existing in the case of the inspectors. I have endeavoured to make clear to the hon. gentleman that the purpose is to separate two functions, which, in my judgment and in that of the inspector of penitentiaries, with his many years of experience, could be better administered by different officers. With regard to what the hon. member for Frontenac has said, both upon the subject of the number of inspectors and with regard to the work that might be done by convicts in penitentiaries, and as to developing what is good in all of these men—and I quite share his view that there is no man so bad that there is no good in him—I should like to say a few words, but in order not to depart from the ruling of the Chairman I would suggest that what I desire to say be deferred until we come to a subsequent section with regard to the powers of the superintendent, which will give me an opportunity to make some observations on the remarks of the hon. member as to the general system.

Mr. EULER: The minister stated that these appointments can be made by the Government only on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. Has the Government discretion to accept or reject the recommendations that may be so made, and could they continue to reject them until a recommendation was made that was satisfactory to them?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know that there is any absolute provision either in the Order in Council or in the proposed legislation further than the provision that the appointments are to be made on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. The position that would be created in such a case would be that the Government would either have to leave the positions vacant or act upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. If for some reason there might be very serious objection to the party recommended, to which the attention of the Civil Service Commission might be called, I suppose it would be within the function of the Government to make that representation, but I think I may safely say that the intention was to make the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission necessary before any individual could be appointed. While I am not aware that there is a provision imposing the absolute obligation upon the Government, certainly it is the duty of the Government to fill the vacancies in the public service so that public business may go on, and when there is a provision that the vacancies are to be filled on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission I do not believe there is reason to apprehend that their recommendations will not be acted upon.

On clause 15—Inspectors:

Mr. MORPHY: Is the minister going to put in a provision that these appointments shall go to returned soldiers? I notice a great many appointments being made all over the country in connection with various boards and commissions, and I understood that these appointments were to be given to returned soldiers, but the big-paid fellows are not returned soldiers. I should just like to clinch the matter here and get the minister's views.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I pointed out, the appointments will be made on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission who will follow, no doubt, their usual pro cedure. In the Order in Council making provision for requiring the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, wherever feasible, as the result of competitive examination, it is expressly provided that preference is to be given the returned soldier, even to the extent of over-riding the purely competitive feature. The provision runs—I am speaking from memory—that where several people have passed the examination, the returned soldier may be put at the head, and, in fact, I think, shall be put ahead, of those who have a greater number of marks, providing he has passed his examination in a manner to indicate that he is competent to fill the position.

That gives a distinct preference to the returned soldier. These positions, as all positions in my department, will be subject to the rule laid down, that this preference is to be given. There are occasionally positions for which the returned soldier available does not happen to be suited. I am sure no hon. gentleman would suggest that we ought to put a returned soldier into a position for which his previous training, education, or occupation, have not made him reasonably fitted. But with that exception, I understand it to be the absolute rule that preference is to be given to the returned soldier. That will be a matter in future to be dealt with by the Civil Service Commission.

Sir SAM HUGHES: By "returned soldier", I presume you mean one who has faced the music. There are returned soldiers, and returned soldiers. There are a great many gentlemen who are occupying very nice positions across the water, but who have never been in the trenches, and I certainly would not recommend any preference in such cases. I have never seen any difference between the man who is eating his heart out in Canada because he cannot get an opportunity to go, and the man who has crossed over and who occupies some clerical position in England. I think that the fellow who has been forced to stay at home and who is anxious to go has just as much right to consideration as the man who has never been at the front. But the man who has faced the music and has risked his life in the firing line is the one I would recommend to special consideration when we are speaking about returned soldiers. There are a great many officers and men who have not been able to go across, and I have known men who have worried themselves almost to death because they could not get over and who are just as much entitled to recognition as those who have sailed across and remained in England.

Mr. MANION: As a representative of the returned soldiers in this House, I would like to support very strongly the ideas expressed by the two hon. members who have just addressed the Committee, and particularly that expressed by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Sir Sam Hughes) that preference be given to returned soldiers who have faced the guns of the enemy at the front.

Mr. BUREAU: Without prejudice to my right to rise again in discussion, I desire to ask a question in order to obtain information. We are now discussing Bill No. 21, and the sections of the Bill are numbered. We are discussing section 4.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 3, section 15.

Mr. BUREAU: It is section 3 until it becomes section 4. I see section 4 on page 3, and under section 3 the minister has seen fit to change a lot of sections in the old statute. What I want to ascertain is this: Are the numbers of the sections of the old statute to govern, or is the Bill under consideration to govern? If it is the old statute, we have to take the sections one by one, 14, 15, 16 and so on. If it is the present Bill, we would consider all the sections together. A number of the sections contained in clause 4 deal with the duties of the superintendent and his powers over the inspectors. They come one after the other, and it would make the discussion easier and quicker if we were to take them up together rather than if we were to follow the order of the Bill as it stands, and discuss section 3.

Mr. DOHERTY: Section 3 of this Bill repeals sections 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the Act.

Mr. BUREAU: Repeals sections 14 to 23 and re-enacts them.

Mr. DOHERTY: And re-enacts them. We might have followed our regular course of dealing with these proposed sections, 14, 15 and so on, as distinct sections. It is only to abbreviate that the repealing clause is all put in one section. We might have proceeded by saying that "section 14 is repealed and replaced by the following," and made another section. And so with the others. In effect, section 3 deals with a number of sections, repealing them, and substituting a new section for each section repealed. Our regular course would be to deal at the present moment with the proposed section 15.

Mr. BUREAU: This is section 3 of the Bill. What is under consideration before the Committee is a Bill, and section 3 of the Bill which provides that sections 14 to 23, inclusive, of the Act as it now reads, shall be amended. I want to be sure whether the numbers of the sections in the statute are going to rule, or whether the Bill under consideration is going to rule, before the Committee.

Mr. DOHERTY: My submission is that we should consider the proposed repeal of each separate section of the Bill and the substitution of a new section as being a clause to be dealt with by itself.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that clause 3 being a re-enacting clause, each section of the Act which it proposes to repeal and replace by a new section, should be considered separately by the committee. It is, however, the privilege of any hon. member to move that any number of clauses or re-enacted section be considered together. If the hon. member for Trois Rivières (Mr. Bureau) wishes to so move, I will be pleased to submit the motion.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not desire to offer any obstruction or create embarrassment, but my contention is that we have a right to discuss with section 3 all the re-enacted clauses. We have to consider the Penitentiaries Act only because that Act is referred to here in this Bill, and sections 14 to 23 of that Act are included in section 3 of this Bill, and my contention is that while we are discussing section 3 all these sections are one and the same for the purposes of this discussion. I suppose I could move that all these clauses be considered together, but I cannot make any motion having reference to anything except the clauses as they are numbered in this Bill. I am not going to move that clause 14, or clause 15 of the Penitentiaries Act be considered. I can only move with reference to the clauses of the Bill as they are numbered and submitted to the committee at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has a perfect right to move that all the sections re-enacted by clause 3 be considered together.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member, without discussing whether he can make a motion or not, thinks that all these separate substitutions should be made by separate sections, or if he says that any advantage would be gained by taking them altogether, I have no objection. I have not the slightest objection to anything that, within reason, will appear to facilitate a thorough understanding of this measure. But it did seem to me, and it still seems to me, that it would be more convenient and we would get our work through with a perhaps clearer understanding of it, if we should take the Bill with these proposed substituted sections of the Act one by one. But I have no desire to insist upon it if the hon. gentleman thinks it will be an advantage.

Mr. EDWARDS: Subsections 14 to 23 were put into one section for the reason, I suppose, that they were related one to the other, but I find a difficulty in undertaking to discuss a matter which should properly come under section 3 of the Bill when I step outside of the sub-sections referred to. The very fact of the two subsections in question being included in one section seems to give weight to the argument of my hon. friend that the whole section should be opened up. Will the minister kindly state what salary the inspectors receive at present?

Mr. DOHERTY: The present inspectors, whose duties, of course, are different from those of the old inspectors, have both, I believe, reached the maximum of their class in which the salary is from $2,800 to $4,000. It is obvious, I think, that the new office of inspector will not be nearly as important as the old office was, because there is withdrawn from the office the duty of direction and superintendence, which is perhaps the principal duty.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know just how both the inspectors attained the maximum $4,000. I can understand how that happened with one inspector, because he has been in the service for a long time. In the case of the other, doubtless, duties performed by him in other capacities in the penitentiary branch were taken into consideration and had to do with his advancement. I have already said that I could not exactly see the necessity for appointing two more inspectors, and one reason is this: For the last two or three years one man has been performing the work of inspector and that of superintendent also, while the other inspector has been overseas. In other words, all the work which will, under this Bill, be divided between a superintendent and two or more inspectors, has for the last two or three years been performed by Inspector Stewart. That being the case it seems to me that one superintendent, with one inspector to visit the institutions, would be sufficient.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no desire to insist upon the appointment of three inspectors but let me point out that the provision is not that there shall be three inspectors, but that the minister shall have power to name not more than that number. I would like to give the reasons why it seems to me we ought to have an inspection force larger than, looking at it purely as an inspection force, was required in the past. If the regulations, for the making of which power is asked in section 18, are carried out, it will involve the carrying on of operations which, I hope, will, in the not very remote future, assume some considerable importance in the different penitentiaries, and which are likely to call for closer and more frequent inspection of the different institutions and render necessary, perhaps, a more absolute keeping in touch with them. Under the plan which it is proposed to adopt, the superintendent will do the directing from the administrative centre here. There is one power conferred to go and look into conditions in any penitentiary, but that, properly, is not his function. The new conditions render it important that he—and through him the department and the minister—should be kept informed, and adequately informed, as to what is going on in the different penitentiaries. I do think—and I may say that I have so felt since I have been charged with the ultimate responsibility of the administration of these institutions—it is highly desirable that those who have that responsibility should, so far as possible, be kept in touch with the conditions as they exist. I would say that that should be done from day to day. Perhaps that is an exaggerated requirement, but it indicates the importance that I attach to the necessity of those at the administrative centre being kept, so far as possible, informed of and in touch with what is going on in the different institutions.

It was the anticipation of making the inspection of these proposed industries more important, and the value that I myself attach to the necessity of those who are here at the centre, and who are responsible, dealing with these matters with knowledge, and knowledge that is up to date, that led me to suggest that the minister should be empowered, if as a result of future operations that was found necessary, to appoint as many as three inspectors. The observation has been made that for the last two or three years one gentleman has been carrying on the inspection duties. That is true, but I am perfectly free to say, without intending any criticism of the individual, that it has not been a satisfactory system. It is not satisfactory to myself, as being responsible for what is going on in these institutions, that two or three years should be allowed to elapse without having a thorough inspection. Now the duty of superintendence and direction really does take the time of one man, and it will be difficult to carry on operations if one man is to be continually going through the country on the necessary duties of inspection. Whether as many as three are or are not necessary, I am not prepared to say, except to this extent, that I did not have it in contemplation at present to appoint that number. My idea was to appoint two, but I had thought that it was well worth while, when we were dealing with the subject, to take the power, in case the development of the work we are looking forward to should make it necessary, to appoint a third inspector. However, I have no desire to insist upon that if the committee is of opinion that there should be only two inspectors, or for that matter only one, although I think we could hardly work out the scheme satisfactorily with only one inspector. In connection with the work of inspection, and as a further reason for the number contemplated, let me say that if you have but one inspector you infallibly have a system under which the movements of that inspector will necessarily become known. That being the case—I am not making any suggestion with regard to any officer, but we know the tendency to "window-dressing" characteristic of human nature—when an inspection is anticipated the natural desire is to have all things look as nice as they can. There is, at all events, a temptation to have things look better than, perhaps, they do every day in the week, when they know the inspector will come. What I had in contemplation with regard to these officers was that the whole of their time would be on inspection, going at irregular times, not necessarily taking the penitentiaries in regular order. I would not assign a particular district to either inspector. I would have, through the superintendent, either inspector sent when a case presented itself, and if thought desirable, to any of the penitentiaries. One of the reasons for having men to do nothing but inspection is that I do feel very strongly that close contact on the part of those responsible in the department, and, as far as possible, close contact on the part of the minister, with what is going on, is a most essential thing, a thing which also will prevent the growing up of abuses which are very likely to grow up under the administration of men when they fall into the routine of running an institution of which they are the heads and naturally get to be quite satisfied with their own view—unless they feel that there is some one constantly keeping an eye upon them. Now, these are all the reasons, and I submit their sufficiency to the consideration of the committee, that led me to think it wise to provide for the possibility of appointing three inspectors if the work developed. I did not for a moment contemplate appointing more than two, and if the committee think it wiser to substitute two for three I shall not insist on the provision as it stands.

Now, while I am on my feet, I will refer to what the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said as to the desirability of diversifying or increasing in number the useful employments to which the convicts may turn and the good effects that we may hope for from providing some remuneration for their labour, and of arriving at a system whereby the younger and less confirmed criminals should be separated from the influence of the older, or at all events the more confirmed criminals. The views which he has expressed have my thorough sympathy. I may say that it has occurred to me that it would be a better method to attain that result if, instead of seeking to make special provision for the less hardened, we considered the advisability of gathering together in one, or say two, institutions, those of our convicts who may be looked upon as falling principally under the designation of hardened criminal, and then endeavouring to conduct the other institutions on lines that might be more suitable to the case of the younger offender or, in any event, the less hardened. I would be disposed to believe that the greater number might fairly enough be classified among the less hardened; and, if we had one or two of the institutions set apart as the prisons in which were to be detained and punished those with regard to whom—I would not like to say we have no hope—but those for whom we have less hope, we might then regulate the respective institutions in view of the character of the criminals detained within them. I do not think even with the best thought that can be given to it—and that has been generally agreed to—so long as you have all sorts of criminals within the same institution, it is practicable to segregate them into classes in such a manner as to produce any real effectual result. If we had some classification of institutions, that would seem to me a very desirable thing, and that is one of the things which I hope to be able to get started, at all events, and in practical operation. A difficulty in the way, which explains the delay, is, of course, the question of expense. To build separate and distinct new institutions involves the immediate expenditure of money. I have some hope that we may be able to do without additional institutions involving the immediate expenditure of money. I have some hope that we may be able to do without additional institutions by classifying the present ones and setting apart one or two, and so arrive at the desired result, or, at all events, to set such a system in movement.

Mr. MORPHY: I have listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. minister. If I may be permitted to use the expression, he seems to be begging the question to some extent. I appreciate that this is war time, and that we are really at war. The minister brings in what he conceives to be, and chooses to call, a reform as the basis of his justification for asking for authority to put upon the Civil Service list of Canada two or three extra men as penitentiary inspectors at a time when the country is demanding in every other department the most rigid economy. While the minister attempts to justify this under the guise of a reform, he has not shown us clearly enough that that basis exists for an increase of expenditure. I am led to believe—and if I am wrong the minister, I hope, will correct me—that the penitentiary population of Canada to-day is not nearly as large as it has been on the average for a long time past. I would like to ask the minister if that is so.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand there has been a reduction in the penitentiary population.

Mr. MORPHY: To what extent?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think about 20 per cent.

Mr. MORPHY: Then it does seem to me a most unfortunate and inopportune time, when the country's resources are so tremendously strained, for the minister, on a declining penitentiary population, to introduce a reform which is going to require money, not only in the meantime, but forever. The probabilities are that the discipline which our population has suffered under the Military Service Act will curb the criminal tendencies of the people in the future, and the number of convicts will be lessened rather than increased. While I am on my feet, that is one reason why I suggested that there should be something definite and specific provided in the Bill to ensure the appointment of returned soldiers of proper capacity to undertake such positions as these. Men who have seen the horrors and experienced the rigours of war will have their hearts touched with more or less compassion on account of what they have seen. Therefore, I believe that out of the returned soldiers' class the very best kind of inspectors could naturally be secured. They would know how to enforce discipline with kindness. How is the country to know exactly what view the Civil Service Commission will take in appointments of this kind? What is there in the Bill to assure that a returned soldier, in every way competent to perform these duties, will not be debarred because of his failure to spell some word correctly? I have every confidence and every faith in the Civil Service Commission. I believe they are men of large parts and keen observation. But what I want to get from the minister, if I can, is something more specific than the abstract suggestion that, as a matter of course, soldiers will get the preference.

There is no object in giving a returned soldier the preference for a position if he has to pass an examination which has no relation to the duties which he will have to perform. I suggest that the minister insert a provision in the Bill with regard to this, or give his assurance that if it is within his province or power he will request the Civil Service Commission to provide such examinations for positions of this kind that it will be easy for competent returned soldiers to obtain them.

Mr. DOHERTY: It will not be any more the law if I put it in this statute than it is already the law, as being of general application. Certainly I shall be glad, so far as I have anything to say in the matter and when I have occasion to deal with appointments, to call the attention of the Civil Service Commission to the consideration that should be given to returned soldiers in the matter of appointments.

Paragraph 15 agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 17—ex officio Justice of the Peace:

Mr. DENIS: Will these inspectors have jurisdiction all over Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: This clause is a reproduction of the existing clause, and confers upon inspectors powers similar to those which they now have. The purpose is to give them these powers in connection with the performance of their duties. Gentlemen who are fit to be inspectors of penitentiaries would necessarily be fit to be justices of the peace, even if they did exercise jurisdiction regarding matters not directly pertaining to penitentiaries.

Mr. DENIS: Are these inspectors to reside in some particular place, or may they reside where they choose? Further, will the territory subjected to their inspection be defined in the Act or elsewhere?

Mr. DOHERTY: Inspectors will not be allocated to any particular territory; they will be under the orders of the department to go where they are sent. At first glance it might seem convenient that they should reside in Ottawa, in order that they may be available when required, but circumstances might be such as to permit them to reside outside of Ottawa.

Mr. DENIS: Will these inspectors receive fixed salaries and travelling expenses?

Mr. DOHERTY: The statute provides a salary of $2,500. Any one travelling on the business of the Government has his expenses paid.

Mr. DENIS: Would it not be expedient to provide that these inspectors shall reside in certain localities as near as possible to the territories which they are to supervise? Otherwise, inspectors living in Ottawa might be sent to Vancouver, Halifax, or all over the country, at the expense of the Government, and their travelling expenses might be higher than their salaries.

Mr. DOHERTY: If you assign one inspector to certain penitentiaries, you rely absolutely on that one man with regard to those particular penitentiaries, and you have no check on his work. To make inspection efficient it is desirable that an inspector shall not be attached to a particular penitentiary, but shall be available to go to one penitentiary to-day and to another next month. When one man has inspected a penitentiary, it should be open to us to send another for the next inspection so that what may have been overlooked by one inspector may receive the attention of the other. Whether any material difference in the amount of expenditure involved would result from interchanging inspectors, it is difficult for me to say offhand. A man travelling frequently throughout a small district may spend as much money as if he went occasionally on a longer journey. Probably it would be somewhat less expensive to attach one man to a particular district. For the sake of economy, however, you would lose the most substantial advantage of the plan which is projected.

Mr. EDWARDS: If you have one inspector he can inspect each of the penal institutions seven times a year and spend one week on each inspection. If you have two inspectors, fourteen visits a year can be made, of a week each. But here is another feature of it. Portsmouth and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries contain about as many convicts as all the rest put together. If you divide the time of two inspectors according to the convict population, one inspector would spend practically all his time in visiting these two institutions; he would virtually become another official of the penitentiaries in question, and lose his usefulness as an inspector. That seems to be something worthy of consideration. The value of the minister's plan, as I understand it, is that this man shall be, not "the" inspector, but "an" inspector who will drop in at unstated times—to-day at Dorchester, next week at Stony Mountain, and so on—making unexpected visits. Therein will lie his value as an inspector. But if you have so many inspectors that their time is necessarily cut up, they must be practically like additional officers at one or two of those institutions.

Mr. COPP: The minister is asking for pretty large powers in requiring that every inspector of a penitentiary shall be a justice of the peace and have the powers of a justice of the peace in every city, town and parish in the Dominion of Canada. It may be perfectly right to allow him to act as a justice of the peace in connection with the business of the penitentiary which he is inspecting, but it is going too far to allow him to go into any locality and act as a justice of the peace in criminal matters.

Mr. DOHERTY: This is merely a reproduction of the existing law.

Mr. COPP: If the law is wrong, it should be changed.

Mr. DOHERTY: The section confers the powers. That is one thing. The time to go and exercise them is another. When we appoint an inspector we shall certainly take all of his time and pay him his salary, and as our officer he will not be allowed to go devoting himself to other business. The purpose of the section is that he should have those powers simply that he may be able to exercise them when occasion arises in the performance of his duty as inspector of penitentiaries. This has been the law practically ever since we have had an inspector of penitentiaries. I am not aware of any instance in which an inspector has tried to exercise his powers except on occasions on which it may be useful for him to exercise those powers in connection with penitentiary business.

Mr. COPP: While it has never been expected that an inspector would act as a justice of the peace in different localities in which he may happen to be, and while an inspector may never have so acted, still, if it is necessary for him to have the powers of a justice of the peace in connection with his office as inspector, those powers should be limited entirely to what use he may be required to make of them in connection with the penitentiary, and not in a general way, as is left by this section.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the minister define what is meant by "district" in this section?

Mr. DOHERTY: In different parts of the country you have the country divided into districts, counties, cities, towns and so forth, and you have mgaistrates for such a district or for such a county. The purpose in the enumeration is that the inspector should find himself, in whatever place he may be, vested with the powers of a magistrate in that locality, whether the magistrates who are in that locality be magistrates for a district, or magistrates for a county, or magistrates for a town.

Mr. MORPHY: The only thing that occurred to my mind was that it might not apply to what is known as an unorganized district which is part of the country in which an inspector might frequently want to exercise his duties.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should be disposed to think that the mere fact that the district was unorganized does not alter the fact that it is a district. Of course, the places in which there is reason to anticipate there may be occasion to exercise those powers are practically the places in which the penitentiaries are established, so that I do not know that any great evil could occur. An inspector of a penitentiary will rarely find himself in an unorganized district, because all of our penitentiaries are situated in thoroughly organized portions of the country.

Paragraph 17 agreed to.

On paragraph 18—superintendent to make rules:

Mr. FIELDING: Is this a new clause or a repetition of the old clause?

Mr. DOHERTY: The first paragraph (a) is a repetition of the old clause, which provides that the inspector shall, subject to the approval of the minister, make rules and regulations for all of the purposes mentioned in paragraph (a). Paragraph (b) is new. The purpose of it is to give power to make regulations for the purposes specified in it. I am not quite clear that it was absolutely essential that we should specially be empowered to do the things that are provided in this new paragraph, unless it be the provision for power to grant allowances to the convicts by way of remuneration for labour. The others I think might very possibly have come under the general power to manage, direct and control the penitentiary. To that second paragraph I may say I attach a great deal of importance for the reasons I have endeavoured to explain. In that regard I think I am reechoing what was said by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I do think the great need for the future is the provision of useful employment for the convict, employment that he will realize is useful and that will bring to him some measure of advantage by way of remuneration. That is important, in my judgment, from the point of view of the effect upon the convict, and the matter of making an allowance by way of remuneration is important also from the point of view of those who, in so many instances, although they are absolutely innocent, suffer more grievously by reason of the crime than does the criminal himself—I mean the absolutely dependent wife and children or other persons whose livelihood is cut off, and who, in many cases, are left in destitution and misery, because of the imprisonment of the criminal. That is important for their benefit, but it has also a further importance. When we are dealing with the question of clemency, the question of issuing tickets-of-leave, of allowing men out on parole, there are not a few cases in which, although one feels that the prisoner is undeserving of consideration, nevertheless, it is difficult, if not impossible, to steel one's heart against the representations that are made with regard to the abject destitution and misery of dependent wives and children. This provision will not only work as an improving influence upon the convict, in that it means benefit coming from labour, but will send him out after his years of labour, not with the feeling that his work has been a punishment and that he is going to do as little work as possible in the future, but with some sense that his work has started him on the path in which he may derive benefit from it, which I think is invaluable from the point of view of what we may hope for in his reformation. Then there is the effect that it should make it easier, I think, to maintain discipline within the penitentiary, because you might hope for less of a spirit of sullenness among the men you are dealing with. And then there is to my mind the very important consideration I have pointed out, that it will afford us the means of alleviating at all events, the suffering of those innocent ones who in so many cases have to suffer for the crime of those upon whom they are dependent.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite sympathize with the view of the minister; it was not to take any exception to the clause that I asked the question. What struck me was that the minister and the superintendent—practically, it means the minister only—is to have a very large power in making regulations. If that is the existing law and it has worked out well we do not want to be fussy, but as a general principle where regulations are to be made for the carrying out of an Act I think it is the part of wisdom that the power should not rest entirely in the hands of the minister but be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. That would be a protection to the minister himself, because, although going to the Governor in Council for approval in matters of this kind may largely be a matter of form, it sometimes gives a regulation greater strength and helps the minister to enforce it. But if that is the existing law I do not want to propose a change.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is the existing law. The only difference is that previously it read, "the Inspector" instead of "the Superintendent with the approval of the minister."

Mr. MORPHY: Would it not be better to use the word "granting" instead of "allowing" in the 27th line?

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite agree. I was going to submit to the committee an amendment to that section—it will also have the effect of meeting my hon. friend's suggestion—because I think the present wording implies that the remuneration to be granted shall be allowed to the particular convict engaged in the industry in which the money was earned. Now that was not the idea I had in mind. If we did that we would create a situation where those convicts who were fortunate enough to be working on something that we could dispose of and receive money for, would get remuneration, while the other man who might be doing work just as useful but which was to be used in the penitentiary would get nothing. The real purpose was that we should have power to remunerate convicts generally for their labour, and I therefore beg to move that section (b) of clause 18 be amended to read as follows:

The establishment and carrying on of any work or industry at any penitentiary as may be thought desirable for the useful employment or training of the convicts, for the employment of the convicts therein, for the disposal of the products thereof, and as well for allowing subject to such conditions as may be prescribed and payable in the manner and to such persons as may be designated by the regulations, remuneration for the labour of convicts.

Mr. BLAKE: Did any profits accrue from the work of the prisoners in the penitentiaries last year?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have not had any general system of industries in the past with a product of which it has been possible to dispose, and we are now taking specific powers in order to be able to develop a system of that kind. But even under the administration which we have had, we have found the opportunity to earn some money by means of the labour of convicts in the past year. We have had a very considerable agricultural production—I have not the figures—which has enabled us to provide in large measure for the wants of each penitentiary, and in some cases for the wants of others. Apart from that, we have done a certain amount of work in the way of providing clothing for the camps for interned enemy prisoners; we have furnished those institutions with goods amounting in value to $17,611.39, consisting of overalls, trousers, shirts, smocks, boots, repairs to boots, socks, suits, clothes and other work presently in progress. We have also produced for the Indian Department a considerable quantity of clothes consisting of some 212 suits, 220 shirts, 868 pairs of pants, 207 pairs of boots, and 207 belts. In addition to that, the women of the penitentiaries have done a considerable amount of work for the Red Cross Society, consisting of the making of pyjamas, socks and bandages. But all this has not been done under any regulated system by which we have received payment which would enable us to provide for an allowance, and the purpose of this amendment is to put us in a position where we can carry out that work upon a regular system, disposing of the articles exclusively to departments of the Government—we do not wish to interfere in any way with outside labour—and receiving the normal prices therefor, which would be applied in a measure to the upkeep of the institution and to which we would look for the means to provide this allowance for the convict.

Mr. BLAKE: I think one very important point arises out of what the hon. Minister of Justice has said. A prisoner is put at work, and the profits of his work are sent back to his dependents. The Minister of Justice says that the product of his labour will be sold to these different departments of the Government. The man is sufficiently penalized, as well as his wife and family, by his being imprisoned, without further penalizing them by not giving them the best return that can possibly be obtained from his labour. That is a point that should not be lost sight of. These products, no matter what they are, should be disposed of in the open market, free to any person who will offer the best possible price, because the wife and children of that man have as good a right to be protected as any industry or manufacturer. I think these products should be sold, not only to the departments of the Government, but to anybody who will pay a just and proper price for them.

Mr. DOHERTY: It will not affect the price if we sell to the Government, because if the hon. member had had experience of the prices Government departments pay, he would know that they do not get goods cheaper than anybody else. They never get them except at the highest price that can be got.

Paragraph 18 as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 19—annual report.

Mr. DOHERTY moved:

That the section be amended by striking out the words "copies of the annual" in line 40, and substituting the word "such"; by striking out the words "by such" in line 41; also, by striking out the word "June" in line 34 and substituting the word "September."

He said: it is represented to me that it is not possible to have the financial statement ready in June.

Paragraph 19 as amended agreed to.

On section 7—superintendent added to and replacing inspectors.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would like to move to insert, after clause 7, and as clause 8, the following:

Section 53 is amended by inserting the words "or imbecile" after the word "insane," whenever said word "insane" appears therein.

He said: This is merely to meet a difficulty as to the certificate with reference to different kinds of insanity.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—superintendent substituted for inspectors.

Mr. DOHERTY moved:

That section 8 become section 9 of the Bill.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 5 p.m.
