SOCIAL INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE STUDY USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the same Standing Order. In view of the action by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) in forestalling consideration of the regulation of the use of social insurance numbers and the elimination of abuses in the use of social insurance numbers by the device of referring the matter to an advisory committee yet to be selected, and without a clear term of reference, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to immediately refer the question of social insurance numbers to a special committee of this House to investigate uses and abuses of the social insurance numbers, including the sale of official-looking social insurance cards by companies in Canada such as Frank G. Becquet of Mission City, British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT'S FORECAST OF REAL GROWTH

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will know that on Monday the Minister of Finance revised upward his estimate of inflation this year. He also said in that speech that as a result of inflation and high domestic interest rates, he expects that there would be negative implications for our economic growth. I wonder if our Prime Minister can tell us whether the government is also now revising downward its forecasts of real growth.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is what a leader looks like, Joe.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the support from my side. I think it is because I have been away from the House for the past two days.

An hon. Member: We have not noticed it.

An hon. Member: Nobody missed you.

Mr. Trudeau: I have some difficulty understanding it myself, Mr. Speaker. I was not in the House, I did not hear the speech of the Minister of Finance and I am not briefed on it. The excellent parliamentary secretary tells me that the Minister of Finance will be here in a few moments, and perhaps the question could be asked of him then. The Leader of the Opposition asked me specifically whether the Minister of Finance covered the rate of growth. I do not know if he mentioned that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clark: If it is agreeable to the House, I am certainly prepared to delay my questioning in the first round until the Minister of Finance finds it convenient to come to parliament.

REQUEST THAT HEADS OF LARGE CORPORATIONS GIVE COMMITMENTS TO HOLD DOWN PRICES AND PROFITS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As he knows, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, yesterday and the business pages of the press in most cities across Canada, today demonstrated astronomically high increases in the profits of corporations and, therefore, in the prices of almost every sector of the Canadian economy.

Considering that almost every Canadian makes a purchase from one of the large department stores, and considering specifically that their profits went up some 89 per cent—we know what that means for prices—will the Prime Minister take some concrete action and call in, for example, the head of Simpsons-Sears, the head of Hudson's Bay—

An hon. Member: It is the same person.

Mr. Broadbent: —and the head of Eaton's, and get from them specific commitments to hold down prices and profits in the coming year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am informed that the figures given by the hon. member and those which were published are not final, that they are subject to revision. Indeed, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity has already revised some of its higher figures and has shown that they were considerably lower.

The point remains, however, that there are profits, sometimes substantial profits, in various sectors. Members on this side have indicated their reaction to it and this is my reaction: we are glad that there are profits. I would even say that the government is probably largely responsible for the fact that there are profits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We introduced budget measures which were designed precisely for that, Mr. Speaker, to increase incentives for investment and, hopefully, to accelerate growth in the business world with profits and more jobs for Canadians.

An hon. Member: It did not do that.

Mr. Trudeau: I know members of the NDP are unhappy that companies make profits. This has been their policy all the time. They do not seem to realize that when business is not losing money, it is able to go on to invest and to create jobs. That is too complicated for the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand your impatience, but if I am heckled you have to let me give my answer.

An hon. Member: Not forever and ever.

An hon. Member: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker Trudeau.

Mr. Trudeau: There is a lot of skittishness on the other side; I am not sure why. What is happening, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that wage and salary increases last year, in 1978, for Canadian workers were only up slightly more than 6 per cent, and considering that a couple of weeks ago the Prime Minister lectured women bank clerks, who are amongst the worst paid in the country, is he now saying to the people of Canada that firms such as those in the retail sector which have had astronomical profit increases well beyond their increase in sales are justified in that course of action, and is he going to defend unlimited profits and attack ordinary workers who want a decent income? Is that what he is saying?

● (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about attacking ordinary workers and lecturing bank clerks. I put it to him that he has said this a few times and that he is distorting the facts. He may, in his tunnel vision, not understand what I have been saying; I will repeat it. But surely that is not what I said.

I said that it is good there are profits, and that it is important those profits be used to create growth in the economy. I said inside this House, outside this House and when I met with the business leaders, that it is of great concern to the government that having made profits—which shows progress in the growth of the economy—they not be used just for the benefit of the shareholders, but that the corporations have a responsibility to see that the distribution of those profits is for the good of all Canadians. Apart from the shareholders, the corporations have to consider the consumers, the workers and the growth of the enterprise itself. In other words, they must reinvest the profits to make more jobs for more Canadians. That is the position of the government. We are not apologetic about profits; we are glad that there are profits.

Mr. Forrestall: We don't need a lecture on economics.

Mr. Trudeau: We are very happy that the workers can get increased wages as a result of those profits. What we are saying is that the corporations should not expect, if they are going to give increased wages to their workers and increased dividends to their shareholders, to be able to turn around and get increased prices from the consumers just as a result of their largesse to themselves.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in the Prime Minister's long answer he made one of his red herring accusations. He knows as well as I that this party has never opposed unreasonable profits.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I notice that the Prime Minister is smiling. He is aware of my point that, for example, we have governed in the province of Saskatchewan which has the lowest cost government in this country, per capita, and it favours reasonable profits.

Considering that in the United States both President Kennedy and President Johnson, when they saw that the steel sector was making more than reasonable profits and indulging in price-gouging, called the companies in and forced them to reduce their prices and profits. What I am asking, in this context, is that the Prime Minister put up or shut up. Will he do the same in this country on behalf of Canadian consumers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party said that his party has never opposed unreasonable profits; is that right?

Mr. Broadbent: Reasonable profits.

Mr. Trudeau: So he is opposed to reasonable ones?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member has gone back into the history of President Kennedy and others and has said that they called in the steel industry. We did the very same thing: we set up the Estey commission, called in the steel industry and had an inquiry to which they responded. The hon. member did not like the report, but that is what we did.

● (1425)

I repeat the position of the government: the profits are welcome, but it is important that those who get the profit consider that the Canadian economic society as a whole has helped them to make that profit and, therefore, it should not only be for their shareholders nor, indeed, for their workers. If the workers can get an increased share of the profits, that is fine with the government. We just do not want these companies or corporations, particularly those which are regulated, to seek to justify higher rates by saying, "We need more money and we shall get it out of the consumer or make these profits". That is the position of the government. I should like to hear the Leader of the NDP state his position with regard to these profits.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES PREVENTING CANADIANS WITH CRIMINAL RECORD STAYING IN UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the secretary of State for External Affairs.

On January 1, 1979 an agreement was concluded between Canada and the United States whereby every Canadian who has a police record, no matter how trivial or how old, is forbidden to enter the United States unless he obtains a special authorization certificate.

Can the minister substantiate this agreement with the United States and tell us if it is a one-way agreement or if the same thing applies to an American citizen who wants to come to Canada?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In view of the complexity of the question and the importance of answering it precisely, I would appreciate it if the hon. member would allow me to take it as notice. I will get a reply for him as quickly as possible.

Oral Questions

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

IDENTITY OF PERSON WHO RECEIVED DOUBLE PAYMENT UNDER BOEING CONTRACT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Yesterday, in reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition as to the name of the person or persons to whom Boeing executed two consulting agreements in Canada, the Solicitor General clearly identified the recipient as a Boeing consultant who was working as a consultant of Boeing in Canada in connection with the sale of Boeing aircraft in this country.

The hon. gentleman has identified the recipient by his position. Would he now drop the other shoe and give us his name?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): I purposely did not provide the name yesterday because there was no evidence of any impropriety in terms of the payment to that gentleman and I saw no purpose in providing the name.

Mr. McKinnon: I presume that if there was no impropriety, the gentleman would not mind his name being known in this respect. However, in yesterday's answer, as from today's, it seems clear that the Solicitor General knows the name of the person who received the double payment. Can he advise us whether there is any law in Canada against this practice, and did the hon. gentleman consult with the Minister of Justice to determine what charges might be laid?

Mr. Blais: Against what practice?

Mr. McKinnon: Against the practice this consultant engaged in, of taking two payments from the corporation for doing one job. In the deposition set out by the company itself in the District Court of Columbia, it is pointed out that the purpose of such a practice was to enable the agent to bank some of the money in foreign banks.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member did not indicate whether there is evidence that two payments were paid to the gentleman, and whether there were or not, the information I have is that all the allegations which were adduced before the SEC in the United States have been investigated, and the reply I have given in this House two days running still stands.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY WHETHER USE OF MARIJUANA TO BE LEGALIZED

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions dealing with youth that I should like to address to the Minister of Justice. They arise from the answer he gave on Friday in response to a question dealing with marijuana.

Since as far back as 1972 all parties in the House have indicated their support for decriminalization in the case of simple possession, why has the government failed to take any action, and why has it allowed Canadians to get criminal records in this area when the matter could have been cleared up by passing two orders in council, one under the Narcotic Control Act taking marijuana out of schedule 3 and another under the Food and Drugs Act putting marijuana into schedule G?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): I think the solution put forward by the hon. member is not as simple as he would like us to believe. Passing the orders in council might remove the possession of marijuana completely from the category of offences. Our position is that possession of marijuana should still remain an offence, though not one that would lead to retaining a criminal record.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, after passing two orders in council, if the minister then brought in a bill to make the offence subject to a civil penalty, or some other penalty he might contemplate which would not result in a record, does the minister not feel that it would pass very rapidly in this House?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the hon. member indicates his party would co-operate in a speedy consideration of a bill which might be introduced in this House. I will consult with the other parties. If the hon. member can assure me that he really speaks for his party when he speaks like he does, then we will be very happy to consult to see how fast we can proceed.

SPORTS

AUTHORITY FOR GRANT TOWARD DEVELOPMENT OF ARENAS FOR PROFESSIONAL HOCKEY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). On March 25, 1977, at page 4337 of Hansard, the minister was asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca, if her department had the authority——to grant funds for the upgrading for stadia used by professional teams of one kind or another?

Her reply was a definite no. Can the minister please explain where she suddenly gets authority to grant $18 million for development of hockey arenas for professional teams, while at the same time cutting $5 million in grants for amateur sport in Canada?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, naturally the authority comes from the cabinet. I want to make it quite clear—

An hon. Member: It never does.

Mrs. Campagnolo: —to the hon. gentleman that these are for municipally-owned and run arenas and not for privately-owned ones. The restriction is extremely clear, that unless these arenas are available to amateurs, the money will not be forthcoming.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister will show us her authority on some occasion. In 1977, when speaking at the Canadian National Exhibition on Sports Day, the minister asked herself the following question:

What role should the federal government, either alone, or jointly play with the provinces, relating to pro sport?

She answered her own question in this way:

An answer is necessary, not to have the authority to direct or control pro sport, but to help clear up the financial responsibilities on the amateur side of sports such as hockey, football, golf and baseball which are heavily professionalized.

What consultations has the minister had with the provinces which lead her to offer $18 million for professional sports in her efforts to assist amateur sports?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I have had much consultation with the mayors of the cities involved—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: —and their views are extremely well documented in all of their visits to me. Incidentally, for the hon. member's edification, he should consider that the WHA cities particularly have been under a Catch 22 provision in their attempts to receive and attract an NHL franchise. Catch 22 works like this: the NHL says to the WHA teams, "If you get some extra seating in your arenas, we will consider your application." We in the government say to them, and the provincial governments, in some cases, with the exception of Mr. Levesque who has found a new enchantment with federalism—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: —"We will give you the seats if you get the NHL franchise." This government has taken an active step in removing that Catch 22 provision so that in consideration of any expansion of the National Hockey League there will be no impediment as to the number of seats that will be in the arena which, as I say, is municipally-owned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CROWN CORPORATIONS

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON DISPOSAL OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In Monday's Ottawa Journal, the president of Air Canada is quoted as saying that the government is considering selling Air Canada to the private sector. In that article, Mr. Taylor gave several good reasons why the government might make this decision.

In view of the fact these reasons could apply equally well to other Crown corporations, is the government prepared, or is it considering divesting itself of and selling off some of the 400-odd Crown corporations it now possesses?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, the government has made no decision at this time to sell of any of its present Crown corporations.

FINANCIAL CONTROL OVER CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of that, and in view of the 1976 Auditor General's report which was highly critical of the degree of financial control over Crown corporations, which led to a Privy Council study which in turn led to a promise of amendments to the Financial Administration Act in the fall of 1977, my question to the President of the Privy Council is: Where is the bill? Where are the amendments to the Financial Administration Act so that we might try and straighten out this mess which the Auditor General pointed out three years ago and which is costing Canadian taxpayers millions?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the bill is not on the order paper, nor do I expect to put it there in the near future.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REASON QUEBEC NOT CONSULTED RESPECTING AMENDMENTS TO FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

With reference to Mr. Denis Lazure's statement that the Canadian government is penalizing Quebeckers who are social welfare recipients, is it true that the child tax credit is penalizing these Quebeckers, how much money is the province of Quebec losing this way, and why was the province of Quebec not consulted before the relevant amendments to the Family Allowances Act were introduced?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the child tax credit is to the advantage of mothers who are on social welfare, for they will provide Quebec mothers with $60 million more in 1979. On the other hand, 75 per cent of all Quebec mothers are fully or partly entitled to the payment of this new cheque.

This program is associated with the federal tax system and does not work to the detriment of Quebeckers, and as a minister whose province of origin is Quebec, I can assure the hon. member that the problem is essentially that of a province which wants to collect from the poor and destitute the money which is paid directly to Canadian citizens.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PASSING OF SALES TAX CUT TO CONSUMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In November, the government cut the manufacturing sales tax by 3 per cent and, in essence, handed over $1 billion to the corporations. Statistics Canada said today the industry selling price index for manufacturing was up 10 per cent this year over last year.

The minister said on January 23 when we questioned him in the House that he would look into this matter to see whether or not the sales tax cut was passed on to consumers. Can the minister tell the House what specific action the government is taking to make sure the sales tax cut is passed to consumers as intended?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out when I answered the question on a previous occasion, the inventories that are benefiting from the tax cut only came on the market about the middle of January; they were not on the market before Christmas, as alleged in the question the hon. member put earlier and as the Canadian Consumers' Association alleged.

Since these inventories came on the market only recently, we are watching them closely through the 50 offices of our department across the country, and by working with CSIP which has the analytical manpower to analyse any situation which seems to be out of line. Thus far, we have received very few complaints with respect to the fact that the cuts are not being passed on.

I might say that prior to the end of the year the AIB wrote to all of the companies reporting to it, asking how they intended to pass on this tax cut. That information was provided to the Minister of Finance. Most companies set out their plans. We are watching the situation closely now. So far we have had no information that they are not, but it is too early to judge.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, again I ask the minister what mechanism the government is going to set up to make sure that this is enforced. In some cases, for instance, car prices were cut in December, but were raised by some companies in January. What mechanism is the government going to use to make sure these sales tax cuts are actually enforced, in view of complaints made by the Consumers' Association and others?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the mechanism was set out by the Minister of Finance in his budget when he announced the tax cut. Our department will act as the eyes and ears, taking in information from across the country. CSIP will be the group which will analyse the information and report, after their analysis, whether the cut is being passed on or not. If it is not being passed on, we intend to make that public, jawbone, and press for the passing on of the tax cut.

GOVERNMENT'S FORECAST OF REAL GROWTH

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance flows from his speech in Toronto on Monday in which he revised upward his estimate of inflation in the country. He indicated that the government's high interest policy, plus its failure to control inflation in the country, are likely to, and I quote, "have negative implications for our economic growth". Is the minister also revising downward his real growth forecast?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

STEPS TO NARROW CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The minister will know that Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada took the opportunity yesterday to repeat very strongly his view that Canada's current account deficit is too large. Can the Minister of Finance tell us if he has any new steps in mind to narrow the current account deficit, steps that have not been announced in the House?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I presented a budget on November 16 last which gave a lot of stimulus to the industrial sector in order to make it more competitive. I have made many speeches urging Canadians to ensure that the competitive advantages we have gained through the devaluation of the Canadian dollar are maintained. I have stated that if Canadians show restraint and responsibility in not asking for too much compensation or too big a profit, and if the profits are invested in a more productive and more competitive capacity, the gain we have made lately in the current account will improve. Last year we had a record surplus in trade of $3.5 billion. We expect it will be higher in 1979.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister did bring in a budget last November. His forecasts then were wrong, as his forecasts have always been wrong. Yesterday, Governor Bouey indicated to the economic affairs committee of this House that he believes he has done all he can on the monetary side and that fiscal policy is up to the Government of Canada.

In light of the failure of the government's fiscal policy to stop the fall of the Canadian dollar, will the minister tell us if he is planning any changes in fiscal policy and, in particular, in light of the failure of the November budget can he tell us if he is giving any consideration to the preparation of a spring budget?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the measures of the last budget were well received and we can now see the effects of them. There is a lot more economic activity in the land. In the past 12 months, 455,000 new jobs have been created for Canadians. As Governor Bouey said yesterday, he can only reply with regard to the monetary policy, and the fiscal policy is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. After the crying of last week, it was noticed by everyone that the Leader of the Opposition failed to appear to question Governor Bouey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister well knows that the understanding was that if the Prime Minister was prepared to show up as a witness, I would be there to question him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the minister is this. The governor indicated he has done as much as he thinks he can do with regard to monetary policy. He indicated we have very serious problems with the dollar. He suggested, although he is, quite properly, not going to comment on fiscal policy, that remedies lie on the fiscal side. Is the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for fiscal policy, planning any fiscal initiatives, or is he going to let the dollar keep on falling?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the governor is not called upon to make comments on fiscal policy. However, when the opposition insisted, he said very clearly that if I were to increase the deficit as proposed by the opposition, the situation would get worse. He said that if I were to accept the proposition of the hon. member—the professor—who has indicated we should have a lower interest rate, the effect would be to have a weaker dollar. The governor said there is some alternative. We could raise taxes. At the same time, he said that if we were to do that, it would have a negative effect on the economy.

Fiscal policy calls for judgments. We have made them. The economy is doing much better. If I were to follow the phantom deficit policies of the opposition, the dollar would be lower than ever. I think we have followed the best policy possible at this time. That is why many sectors of the Canadian economy have been operating at full capacity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVATE FORECASTERS' ESTIMATE OF REAL GROWTH

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance who, not having been in attendance at the standing committee meeting yesterday, obviously knows as little about what the governor said to that committee as he knows about the economy itself. My question is centred on the minister's statement to my leader that he anticipated a real growth as he had set out in the November budget, of 4 to 4½ per cent.

Is the minister aware that private forecasters feel that is an excessive forecast? In fact, Wood Gundy, in their latest study, said that they believed real growth will be 2.6 per cent this year. If that is so, why does the minister persist in overstating real growth figures, only to be proven wrong in months to come?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that it is quite difficult to forecast. Last year I was in agreement with the hon. member for Ottawa Centre in forecasting 5 per cent. The hon. member should talk with him.

[Translation]

I said, Mr. Speaker, that there is no need for me to revise my forecasts at this time because in the last two weeks we have had occasion to meet Canadian businessmen and in the course of our conversations with representatives of all sectors of the Canadian economy, from the east to the west, they told us that, despite the decrease forecast in the economic growth in the United States, their order books for their American clients are full, and that a confidence exists in the market that is nowhere to be found at this time in the ranks of the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my second question will be to the minister's superior, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. On February 1 last, the minister, in explaining his gifts or proposed gifts to certain members of the forest products industry in this country, stated with regard to their good cash flow to which he referred and their good profits:

> It is very much related to the temporary situation with regard to the Canadian dollar, a competitive advantage they enjoy now but one which I do not think anyone anticipates may last very long—

What substantive evidence does the minister have to give us that that is a fact, that the Canadian dollar is only temporarily low at the present time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, there are many people in the world who think that the Canadian dollar represents a figure that is undervalued and is, therefore, very attractive. In speaking to the forest products industry and quoting their own views, in making serious decisions about investments down the track and plants to come on stream two, three or five years hence, they quite wisely would prefer not to count on what I think is a temporary competitive advantage related to the Canadian dollar.

It is a very logical argument that they share, that they do not want to make forward investments of the magnitude that are required, in the neighbourhood of $3 billion, over the next five to seven years on that assumption.

COMMUNICATIONS

USE OF EARTH STATIONS BY CABLE TV OPERATORS IN REMOTE AREAS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. In view of the announced plans of the Department of Communications to experiment with individual roof-type earth stations on some homes in certain rural areas of Canada, can the minister tell the House whether this experiment may also be broadened in such a way as to allow cable TV operators in isolated areas such as northern Ontario to utilize suitable earth stations and thereby provide a much wider range of TV viewing choices to their subscribers?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that kind of experiment is designed precisely to allow people in remote areas to receive broadcast signals directly from the satellite to their homes. The reason Canada developed that particular technology through the Hermes satellite was in order to allow remote areas of the country to participate in the full development of this country.

However, at the present time, there is a need for more considerable use of the satellite for broadcasting, and cable operators and others are actively putting together broadcast programs for it. When this is done, the liberalization of the earth station policy will help all these regions to acquire this service at relatively low cost. The answer to the hon. member's question, in short, is that that is exactly the purpose of the experiment.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL WORKERS WHOM MINISTER WOULD FIRE—UNION AFFILIATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. The House will recall that the last time I asked him a question regarding what he felt was a need to fire some 500 postal workers in order to bring about efficiency in the Post Office, the minister wiffled and waffled: he said the number could be 100 or 1,000.

I do not want to charge the minister with seeking sensational press in order to antagonize unions or bamboozle the public, so I will ask him to come clean with the Canadian public. Has the minister a list of such persons and, if he does, does he know the unions to which they belong? That is a simple question which does not call for any long, rhetorical answers, which is what I usually get.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can answer the question, because of the way it was put. The hon. member for Hamilton West is a lawyer from a working town, and I would like to take this occasion to correct what he said the other day on a point of order. He said that the Post Office is under a closed shop status. There is no such thing as a closed shop at the Post Office. Postal workers are covered by the Rand formula, and that is the information I must give the hon. member. If they were covered by a closed shop, every time a union suspends a postal worker we would have to suspend him from work at the same time, and this is what CUPW has asked.

With regard to the 500 workers we are supposed to fire, I gave an answer to that the other day which I think was very simple. In a telephone conversation with the media, I said the number could be 100, 500 or 1,000. My job is not to defend workers or management; my job is to see that both fulfil their responsibilities, and that is the job I am doing at the moment.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I think I can now charge the minister with seeking sensational press in order to antagonize the unions and bamboozle the public. I related to the minister reports of pilfering, smoking pot, drinking and goofing off, and these reports have not been challenged. The reports indicate that the minister finds that he cannot correct these situations because of the rules.

Is the minister now telling the Canadian people that because of present rules, supervisors and managers find their hands are tied and that they are unable to manage efficiently and effectively? In other words, what is the sense of having a department if it cannot be controlled?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that we live in a democracy and not under a dictatorship. We try to see that our workers work well, but when we see headlines in the newspapers such as the one we saw this morning, "Post Office ordered to rehire two accused of drug trafficking", we have to accept judges' decisions in these matters. We do not like it, but we have to accept them. We have to abide by the rules of democracy.

However, as far as I am concerned, there is no backing off. If postal workers do not want to fulfil their responsibilities, and if they do not want to work honestly, we will see that they get out of the Post Office.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER CMHC WILL CONTINUE TO DEAL DIRECTLY WITH MUNICIPALITIES AND COUNTY COUNCILS WITHIN RRAP

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I should like to ask the minister if the changes that were made and are continuing to transform the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will result in authorizing it to negotiate directly with municipalities or county councils in the case of the RRAP?

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe the traditional responsibility of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is to help and support the construction of housing in Canada and in particular to renovate and rehabilitate housing. Whatever changes have been made in the administration of the corporation, that responsibility remains intact. On the other hand, as far as dealing directly with the municipalities is concerned, the CMHC powers have neither been increased nor, in fact, decreased. The Canadian government recognizes that municipalities are primarily a provincial jurisdiction and it intends to respect that jurisdiction.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechassse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this policy is continuing and that many applications for home renovation are pending, particularly in the rural areas I am more familiar with, could the minister indicate whether much more funds will be made available to those responsible for the implementation of this program so as to permit—for spring is coming, hopefully—a boom in the construction industry in order to create jobs while enabling a great many families to upgrade their homes?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the government is fully aware that we alone cannot meet the needs in housing renovation. For this reason we have proposed to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act to allow the private sector to step in and extend loans to people who wish to upgrade their home. These loans could be guaranteed by the government through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I hope the hon. member and his colleagues will give Bill C-29 quick consideration when it is before the House.

STATEMENT BY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA ON CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT—FORECAST OF MERCHANDISE TRADE BALANCE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. We were wondering where he had gone or where he could be. Was he not with us because he can't stand the fuss without getting briefed by Bouey?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I do not think he was briefed by Bouey, because of the inaccurate statements he made, but I want to ask the minister this: Since Mr. Bouey has said that progress in reducing the current account deficit in international trade will help return confidence in Canadian currency in international markets, and in view of the minister's forecast of last June 1 that our merchandise trade balance would be $5 billion in 1978, and his forecast on September 28 that it would be $4 billion and the forecast by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in December, still that it would be $4 billion and afterwards it turned out to be $3.52 billion, would the minister now give the House his estimate of our merchandise trade balance, what it is likely to be for 1979?

Would he also give his estimate of what our definition on the current international account is likely to be in 1979, not his Mickey Mouse forecasts but an honest forecast?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was probably because the hon. member was too much of a poet that he had to leave this job as minister in Newfoundland.

In the forecasts I made in September at my press conference here, I said that the trade surplus would be between $3.5 billion and $4 billion. It turned out to be $3.52 billion. The hon. members should read both parts of the press statement I made in September. I said $3.5 billion to $4 billion. I think that is a record surplus, and I said earlier today that the surplus next year will be even bigger than that for this year. It will be another record.

At the same time, I think we have to make sure that we maintain a very competitive position with our products. That is exactly what we are trying to do at this time. We have gained much in the last little while. We are doing very well with the fisheries of Newfoundland, with wood products, with pulp and paper, with steel, with shoes and with textiles, and I think that the economy is doing pretty well at this time.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, every time the minister does not answer, he only shows in what complete chaos his department is.

In view of the fact that the increase in the trade surplus last year was $600 million, but that everybody forecasts an increase in the current account deficit of at least an additional $400 million, something in the area of $4.5 billion, despite the $600 million increase in the trade surplus, which indicates that we need to gain at least an additional $1 billion this year in our merchandise trade surplus to stay where we are in our current account deficit, can the minister now give us his estimate, or the estimate of the president of the board of economic eunuchs, or whoever's estimates, of what these figures are likely to be this year, not the wild forecasts of last year? Will he answer the question I ask him on the estimates of this year, not the pack of nonsense he got off with last year?

Mr. Chrétien: I have to repeat for the third time today, Mr. Speaker, that the trade surplus for 1979 is predicted to be more than $3.5 billion.

CONTRACT AWARDED TO WARREN F. LEE

Question No. 471—Mr. Wise:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,793 of the Third Session of the 30th Parliament, for what reason was Warren F. Lee given $2,533.44 "to package numerous pieces of research in suitable manner for publication" instead of having the Department of Agriculture's Information section package the material?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Warren F. Lee was contacted to prepare a research monograph integrating existing independent research papers on a variety of topics related to long-term farm finance policy. The objective was to provide a coherent work as a basis for public awareness and debate on the issues involved. An article based on the resulting paper will be published in the Canadian Farm Economics.

Mr. Lee had the necessary experience and expertise in the field of farm finance which was not available from information services of this department.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 238

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on October 17, 1978 I placed a question on the order paper, question No. 238. The question was:

As of March 31, 1978, was there an excess of $9 billion in the public service superannuation account and, if so, (a) in what instruments was the $9 billion invested—

We will be debating Bill C-12 today or tomorrow which has to do with pensions and indexing, one of the most important topics of discussion in Canada today, yet we do not have the proper information from the government to debate this bill.

To confuse the matter further, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is distributing literature in Ottawa stating:

—there's over $9 billion in the superannuation account of the Government of Canada at this stage.

He goes on to say:

There is a serious question about the fund itself being overfunded and within a very short time the Government of Canada is going to be embarrassed by the amount of money in the fund.

Mr. Speaker, we do not have any of this information. Also there are news reports, one of which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on January 27, stating:

Lloyd Francis, Ottawa West, said the superannuation fund, by the government's own figuring, could reach $40 billion by 1980 and $1.2 trillion by the year 2025.

This is not the time to be kidding people or misinforming Canadians, civil servants or the opposition about pension funds. This question should be answered immediately. My question has been on the order paper since October 17. I think we deserve an answer today from the parliamentary secretary, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) as to why they are refusing to answer the question, so we can properly debate the bill which will be put before us today or tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we always do our utmost to answer as completely as possible all questions asked and on the order paper. We try to provide as complete an answer as possible, regardless of House business. Therefore I want to assure the hon. member that his question will get the same treatment as all other questions, and that we will try and provide an answer as quickly and as completely as is feasible. However, as the hon. member is aware, there are hundreds of questions on the order paper which often require lengthy research as almost forty departments, agencies and Crown corporations must be contacted.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that this government is supplying some kind of information to one of its own members, namely, the hon. member for Ottawa West, but not supplying us with this information—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member made that point when he was on his feet a moment ago.

MR. NIELSEN—AMENDED TERMS OF REFERENCE OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a brief point of order in the form of a question to the parliamentary secretary. Now that the House has unanimously passed the motion to concur in the second report on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, which we did last evening, calling for expanded terms of reference for that committee, can the parliamentary secretary indicate when the government will bring forward those amended terms of reference so as to enable the subcommittee on penitentiaries to be reconstituted and to visit the major institutions in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we will review the text of the motion passed yesterday by the House and examine it in depth, study it, and see whether or not the committee should be given the authority to re-establish the subcommittee and give the specific mandate to the subcommittee on penal institutions to conduct an inquiry across the country. But beforehand we must examine the contents of the motion passed yesterday evening and the terms of the report adopted by the House; only then will we be able to decide whether the committee ought to be set up and whether it is necessary to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-2, the Health Resources Fund Act, which is to help provinces build better health training facilities. I see this bill as a microcosm of the problems we face in our country today. Here is a bill that came about as a result of a commitment which the federal government made to the provinces some 13 years ago. The particular agreement has another two years of life left in it. Before the time limit expired, the government withdrew its commitment and said, "We are going to terminate it before it is finished". That is a microcosm of the problems we face in the country today.

Yesterday the first ministers completed their meeting which was held just across the street from Parliament Hill. It was evident from watching and listening to the proceedings that one of the greatest problems we face today is associated with trust. The Canadian public has no confidence in the government because it has had too many successive agreements with provincial governments which have been broken before the ink dried. Perhaps the government can justify itself and say that the life of the agreement has been almost spent. Nevertheless, it is the principle of the thing. As the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) pointed out, the government unilaterally breaks agreements and cuts off the funding to the provinces.

Because of this example, when a provincial minister of health enters into any new agreement with the federal government, he becomes somewhat gun shy. That was evident on television yesterday when we watched the first ministers taking part in their discussions. The fundamental problem was that we cannot accept the word of the government at face value. We do not know how long an agreement will last. Will the government unilaterally cut off an agreement when it sees fit? Once the government has received what it wants out of a bargain, will it cut off its share of the funding? It is a typically centralist view of the government that it will establish a program because the omniscient central government knows best what should be happening across the country. It knows what the health standards ought to be in each of the provinces. Thus, the government designs a policy for the provinces, helps to fund it, and after a few years when the provincial governments are depending upon that funding and are hooked, unilaterally the federal government withdraws. No provincial government wants to enter into agreements of any kind with the federal government when that happens.

Having seen what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) tabled in the House, naturally I was very interested in the speech she made in Vancouver. I have a copy of the minister's speech which was made on January 16, 1979 to the Association of Professional Economists of British Columbia. It is entitled: "The Prophets of Doom are Wrong". The last paragraph on page one reads as follows:

> A favourite expression of the prophets of gloom and doom is "conservative backlash". Okay, let's look at this idea. The truth is that people don't like paying taxes, and when they do pay them, like to see that the money is well spent. So far, so good. That's as it should be. But people do not want us to cut down on government services, and in particular they don't want us to cut back on health and welfare benefits. On the contrary, Canadians welcome each new move to improve these benefits. I have heard this not once but hundreds of times from people across the country. What Canadians are saying loud and clear is that they have confidence in the future of this country. The difficulties of these past few years have not diminished their pride and compassion.

I should like to underscore the following sentence:

> But people do not want us to cut down on government services, and in particular they don't want us to cut back on health and welfare benefits.

That is what the minister said in Vancouver, but she did not tell those economists that legislation cutting back on health research programs in the provinces had been tabled in the House. The minister cannot have it both ways. She should have said in Vancouver the same thing she said here. The minister's distemper is showing somewhat, and I do not blame her; but at least she could do the House and Canada a service by being consistent in her statements.

> Some of the blame for this current of reactionary hysteria has to be taken by the official opposition in parliament.

I want to remind the minister that it was not the official opposition which tabled this bill. The official opposition did not cut off the $83 million to the provinces. The official opposition did not make the announcement last August 1 which led to this legislation. Yet the minister wants to blame the official opposition for the legislation. The minister continued:

> What makes the opposition's role troubling is, first, that they are highly visible, and second, that I don't think they are being completely candid.

I suggest that is the pot calling the kettle black. I remind the minister that perhaps one of the functions of the opposition is to be highly visible, especially concerning issues such as this one when the minister is not dealing candidly with Canadians. A few months from now when the minister is on this side of the House, she will know what it is like and she will do the same thing.

Mr. Danson: We will have a majority.

Mr. Friesen: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) will be dancing to another tune in a few months.

At page 6 of the minister's address, this appears:

Poverty isn't as blatant as it was when I taught school in a poor neighbourhood in Montreal. But it is there all the same. When medical researchers looked into conditions—

Because of the legislation being brought forward by the government, very soon there will be no medical researchers in Canada; they are going south. In fact, doctors are leaving my constituency and going to Portland because they want some freedom in which to operate; I do not mean that as a pun. Canada now places something like fourteenth among western countries in its commitment to any kind of research, yet the government has introduced more cutbacks. The minister will not have to worry very long because there will be no medical researchers left in the country. The address continued as follows:

When medical researchers looked into conditions in a single poor school district in Montreal a short while back they found that 21 per cent of the kids were retarded in physical development, 28 per cent retarded in physical-mental co-ordination, 39 per cent had family histories of diabetes and 20 per cent had family histories of tuberculosis. These are things you can measure scientifically, but there are harder to measure troubles for poor kids ranging from violent crime to depression to early death or suicide.

I agree that those are problems requiring attention. Pray tell, why is the minister cutting back funding which would provide for greater medical research in the province of Quebec? Such research would help the people who are facing the crises to which the minister referred. The illogical position in which the minister has placed herself staggers the imagination. On the one hand she said that we have inhuman medical problems in the schoolyards of our provinces. On the other hand she said that the government will cut back on medical research funding to the provinces. This cutback means that the provinces will not be able to provide the necessary health services to reduce illnesses.

At page 6 the last paragraph reads as follows:

The government did not feel it could wait for better times to take action. We began with the knowledge that the three major federal programs for children were weighted in favour of upper income families. These programs—the family allowances, child tax exemptions, and the $50 tax credit—actually brought more benefits to families with incomes of $50,000 than to families earning less than $5,000.

The money diverted from the federal coffers to the provincial coffers to be invested in medical research became somewhat anonymous. One really could not identify which dollars were federal, provincial or from private industry. There was not enough of a visible label for people to identify this as money coming from the federal government.

As the minister said, the government could not stand idly by, so rather than having that money come from the federal government to the provinces anonymously the government found a way by which it could be identified as coming from the Liberal government. What the government did was cut back on the family allowance from $28 to $20 and institute a child tax credit program. Now every family in the country knows when it gets that $200 cheque, or the $20 a month, not computing the amount on their little pocket calculators and, therefore, not realizing they are getting no more than before, that this money is coming from the federal government. The government hopes they will show their gratitude to the federal government at the next federal election now that the unanimity has been erased. People in Quebec, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, P.E.I. and Newfoundland will know when they receive these cheques, supposedly to help with their medical problems, that the money is coming gratuitously from the federal government. I know the people of Canada are sufficiently sophisticated that they will know this is an attempt to buy them, and they will not allow themselves to be bought in that way. They will just not allow that to happen.

I recall that just a few weeks ago, before the Christmas break, the minister had an interchange with the hon. member for Athabasca regarding health services for Indians. She said that Indians were not going to lose any of the medical benefits to which they were accustomed. I happen to know that if you go to some of the ridings in British Columbia you will find that native Indians have indeed lost some of the medical services to which they have been accustomed. I know that clinics have been shut down because of inadequate funding. Because these clinics now do not have sufficient staffs, this department is flying nurses into the areas. Given the kind of weather they experience along the course—

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask whether the hon. member is speaking of Bill C-2 which cancels two years before its end the health resources fund which has been used to a degree greater than 88 per cent in British Columbia. It has nothing to do with medical services. I want to put on record the fact that no medical services were ever cut in British Columbia or in any other place in the country.

An hon. Member: He doesn't know what he is talking about.

An hon. Member: Except for Indians.

Miss Bégin: No, that is not true.

Mr. Friesen: I notice that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is getting her prompting from the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand). Obviously she was occupied in trying to make sure the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) received enough help to get re-elected, and now that she knows that is not going to work she has entered into a discussion with that minister and is taking his prompting in order to enter into this discussion. I should like to point out that I am not talking about the province of British Columbia; I am talking about the responsibility she has to provide medical services at those clinics serving Indian reserves. That is not the responsibility of the province of British Columbia, it is the responsibility of her department. She has cut back on that funding and is flying nurses into those clinics which ought to have full staffs. Given the weather conditions along the coast, pray tell how dependable that kind of service is at those clinics.

Let me give one illustration. The hospital at Bella Coola was condemned four years ago. I was there a couple of years ago and some of the concerned people living there showed me that hospital. The United Church of Canada started that mission many years ago and performed wonderful and valiant services in the area. That hospital is staffed by people with a kind of pioneer spirit who like that frontier work. They are committed to helping the people. However, the hospital building has been condemned for four years. The minister says she has not cut back on the services to these people.

The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall) is not in the House, but he has not been running to their aid. The minister who is now promoting herself as the "minister of professional sports" has not been coming to the aid of these people. This hospital is understaffed and the people are not being looked after, yet this minister is content to cut back on these funds and this kind of service, leaving these people unattended.

There are people in my riding who can well use the research money provided by this fund. Let me name two of them. The Variety's Treatment Centre for Children, is a tremendous facility that is funded through the efforts of the people in the lower mainland. There are in the neighbourhood of 300 families whose children are being helped and given treatment in this very beautiful facility. These are children with cerebral palsy, muscular dystrophy and so on. This centre is not getting the kind of income tax break from this government it deserves in order to help those children. This Variety's Treatment Centre for Children could certainly use more research money in order to provide better treatment, yet the government wants to cut back on research facilities of this kind.

We have another facility, namely, the Seagull Centre. It uses a relatively new technique to help paraplegics and quadriplegics with motor problems. A machine has been designed that helps in a mechanical way to get the limbs of these people in motion. By this method it is possible that they can again become workers through the reduction or elimination of their paralysis. Several groups working in the lower mainland are using this method in their clinics. If the federal government were to continue funding in this field of research, hopefully help could be provided to these people who suffer from paralysis in their legs and/or arms. The minister is really not doing any service at all to the people of Canada by cutting back on these funds.

Let me go back to what I said at the outset. This problem is one that involves not just funding, although that is a very important and immediate concern. This problem is one that involves trust. How many times do we have to come to this government asking it to live up to its commitments? This agreement was supposed to continue for longer, but this government is unilaterally cutting back on funds, breaking its agreement with the Canadian people. That is the problem we face in this country, and that breach of faith is well illustrated and documented by the legislation we are debating today.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate today to touch on an area which in the past has not received the attention it deserves. I welcome the opportunity to bring some of our problems to the attention of members in this House.

Let me make a prediction. I suggest that 20 years from now there will be an older group of members in this House of Commons than we see today, because Canada's population at this time is an aging population. I say this because last Sunday in the town of Penetanguishene I attended a birthday party for a man named Michael Asselin, who was 95 years of age. He met me at the door. He is a very capable fellow and speaks both English and French, but mostly English. I was amazed at his wisdom. He had been raised in that area, was still able to walk and talk and he said to me that he still liked to dance with the ladies. This is the type of individual we are running into today.

As a matter of interest, it so happens that this man's forebears fought at the battle of Hastings in the Norman conquest of 1066, and a tombstone to a Lord Asselin can be found in England today. This gentleman grew up in French surroundings in the area of Perkins Field and Lafontaine. At various points in his life this man was a councillor, the reeve of his township, a warden of the county and the secretary-treasurer of his riding. He ran again for the position of reeve at age 78. People felt that he was too old, but he got elected and performed one of the best jobs as reeve ever done in that riding.

After that birthday party I went back to my home town of Orillia to the Free Methodist Church there and attended the celebration of two people, one who was 90 years of age and another who was 93 years of age. They were both walking around and shaking hands with the guests. I tell these stories to illustrate the point that people are living longer and healthier because of the prevention of infectious diseases in their youth or middle age.

I would like to go back to the turn of the century to further illustrate my point to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). There were two major scientific events before the year 1900, the breakthrough by Pasteur who found that organisms cause disease, and Lister's invention of antiseptic therapy in surgery. His carbolic spray cut down mortality.

In those times doctors came to the house, sat by the bedside and brought comfort and many times spiritual help, faith, hope and courage to people for the future. In that way they raised their patient's hopes psychologically in the hope that they would recover from their illness. The doctors in those days knew their patients intimately. Today the doctor walks into a ward accompanied by para-medical personnel, stops at one patient and gives him an examination, talks about him and then goes on to the next. There is no real contact with the patient.

In earlier days we also had infectious diseases such as scarlet fever, diphtheria, pneumonia, pernicious anemia and diabetes, which were rampant. I am sure that many doctors in this House have never seen a case of pernicious anemia. These were the diseases which killed in the early 1900s. Infections were the big killers up to 1935. If hon. members would like to take time out and are feeling a little spiritual and thinking about what may happen to them, I suggest that they go through old cemetery. What they will find are the tombstones of whole groups of children who died from diphtheria or infectious diseases simply because doctors had nothing to offer them.

The first diphtheria antitoxin used in the province of Ontario was in 1905. There were big families at that particular time. I can recall a family of 13 children, five of which died from diphtheria. That was the tragedy of those days, to see these infections hit whole communities. A similar disease was scarlet fever, but fortunately they developed antitoxins and from there they developed toxoids. We were well on the way to wiping out infectious diseases.

The discovery of insulin by Banting and Best in 1924 saved the lives of many young children who would have died before their twenties. I knew a young doctor by the name of Gilchrist who had diabetes in his youth, but went on to medical school and became an authority on that very disease. Two scientists by the names of Minot and Murphy at the University of Chicago discovered the cause of pernicious anemia, which was vitamin B-12. After that there was one discovery after another. Sulfa drugs were developed and used to control streptococcus. Penicillin was discovered and first used during the war in 1942. It was discovered quite accidentally from a mould.

This story of the field of medicine is intensely fascinating, and if I had the time I would tell some of it to hon. members, but time does not permit me to do so. There is the story of the golden antibiotics and what they did to curb pneumonia and other diseases. The mortality rate from pneumonia in the early 1940s was approximately 25 per cent. In most of the cases it was the breadwinner who perished, fellows who were out roughing it, leaving behind a widow with four or five children and no source of income. Today, however, pneumonia is considered a secondary disease with a mortality rate of between 3 and 5 per cent.

The next major disease was polio. It was found that it was an infectious virus carried by elements of the environment. It was very interesting at that time to note that the cleaner one became, the more paralysing polio became, particularly to people between 20 and 30 years of age. I saw many people die with respiratory paralysis before the development of the iron lung. I saw it in epidemic proportions. I can remember seeing a young girl being examined and the doctor saying not to turn her over because she would not be able to breathe. She died from respiratory paralysis.

The sadness and tragedy of all this was cured because of the research which was put into polio; and it returned millions of dollars of dividends on every dollar which was spent on it, so let us have no argument on that score. I know the minister will take this all to heart and immediately start hunting for more research money.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Now here we have a group of younger people coming around and they are getting older. Then we found out a new thing. We were running into chronic diseases. We were running into coronaries, we were running into cardiovascular disease, we were running into strokes, and those are disabling or total. We were running into maturity onset diabetes and many other diseases, arthritis particularly. Those were things that were crippling people in their fifties with a great deal of knowledge. I have learned one thing in getting old, and I thank the Lord for that. I remember that when I graduated at 31 I thought I had the world before me and knew it all, only to learn at my age that I know less and less. This is something we must keep in mind.

So here we have all these people with cardiovascular and chronic diseases. I do not want to make reference to anybody in the Chair, but you will know, sir, about cardiovascular surgery and the good it has done for thousands of people across this land, enabling them to go back to work and take their place in society, receiving pay for it and paying taxes, not only into the pension plan but to the government to keep things going and help the people who are less healthy. This is what we are doing with the research funds we have had to date.

But we have only begun, because our aging population today will bring about the need for increased care. Today there are well over two million people in Canada over the age of 65, and by 1990 there will probably be three million. Those people will go on pension. They will be drawing old age pensions but there will be a smaller group of people in the work force to pay those pensions. Here we come back to our problem. What we have to do is educate a new group of doctors who will be trained in the difference and the clinical values of chronic disease and how this can be handled. I hope the minister appreciates how important and necessary it is to train geriatric doctors who will understand these illnesses among people who are 50 years of age and over. I shall not go further into this aspect because I do not have time but there are a lot of differences between symptoms presented by a person between 55 and 75 and those of people aged 25 or 35 or 40 or 50. I could give a long list of differences which exist.

We have trained doctors who really do not relish the idea of looking at that old patient lying there in a bed who is crippled, who cannot move, who maybe has suffered a stroke. Maybe they need some treatment. Maybe they need physiotherapy. But it always seems to me that this is the case no matter what hospital I am in. I noticed it in my own clinic; there was only one doctor besides myself who made and enjoyed calls in general on these patients.

The government goes along with this because it says once a patient is chronic he does not need so much medical care. So the doctor knows sooner or later he is only going to be able to call on those patients once a week, or charge for it. I notice that calls are down because psychologically that doctor does not want want to picture himself thirty years hence, nor does the nurse. The person who is in the health care field looking after the cleaning or the serving of food does not want to stay too long with an old patient who is declining in health. They do not want to face the fact that some day they themselves may be in that chair or in that bed.

That is why I am saying to the minister, for heaven's sake, let us get on and provide these doctors who will be trained in the skills of recognizing what these chronic diseases are and preventing them as far as possible so that they can remain in the work field. I have seen people with coronary bypasses. I have a woman now who is 75 and who has had three heart operations. Just four years ago she quit being a private secretary. You can understand, Mr. Speaker, the contribution which was made there in the field of medicine and in the field of research. But the big research field is in the field of geriatrics. When you have three million people over the age of 65 you have a lot of people, and you have to consider also that some of those people will have to retire through illness because we have not learned to cure them or restore them to the work field. I want to say to the minister that we have those things. First, we have the homes and the hospitals. Right now the governments of the provinces are saying: we do not have enough money to pay for acute care, for chronic care, so we are going to make the chronic care patient in Ontario pay $9.50 a day.

We have a national health scheme which originated right in this Chamber, and how in the world they can tack that charge on in any province while the minister sits here and allows that type of thing to be done is beyond me. When this scheme was brought in, it was supposed to be for the poor who could not pay. There is something wrong with the conscience of those who do not rise up and rebel and say, no, this is not a national health scheme. If they are not going to do it, then change it so that people may know.

If the minister, has a copy of Medical Education in Geriatrics, I want her to take a look at it because on page 2 it says:

> From the federal level, an expression of interest in the development of specialty training programs and specialty standards be conveyed to such bodies as the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, the Quebec College of Physicians and Surgeons and the College of Family Physicians of Canada.

I should like the minister to listen to this recommendation:

> From the federal level there should be developed the means of providing funding support to some faculties of Medicine to develop as training centres for geriatrics—

It also says:

> While recognizing that some progress has been made, nonetheless the statement of the special committee of the Senate on aging made in 1968 that 'A serious bottleneck in the provision of health services for old people interested and trained in this field' is still applicable—

● (1550)

We must never dispense with that sentiment, Mr. Speaker. It brings a little common sense to some things we do here which are not done right. The shortage of personnel interested and trained in geriatrics is still applicable. This dilemma relates to both the undergraduate and postgraduate levels of medical education. Indeed, somehow the value of the system must be revised so that the care of the chronically ill will be as rewarding as the cure of an acute condition.

I want to refer to the other place. In particular, Senator Croll has done a tremendous amount of work in the field of aging and humanities, along with other senators. Approximately 20 years ago it was proposed that instead of taking a person's calendar age we should consider his physical and mental age, and people who are physically and mentally able to work should be given the opportunity to carry on. Labour unions as a whole were against that proposal but I think they will eventually reverse their position when it becomes evident that it will be necessary to do so. These labour unions said the proposition was 20 years ahead of its time, that the pill would not have that much effect because not that many people were using it.

It is interesting to note that this subject has been brought up and spurred on by the American Geriatrics Association to the point where a bill has either been passed or is in the process of being passed which will allow people 65 years of age and older, found to be physically and mentally fit, to carry on until they are 70 years of age. This is applicable to the labour classes. In the academic class the bill has gone further by saying that people can carry on as long as they are physically and mentally fit until the age of 90, which brings to mind the man of 95 who was so bright and of whom I spoke earlier. Look at the additional taxation the United States will receive by allowing these people to work.

I know of a medical teacher who retired because the clinic rules were such that retirement was mandatory at age 65. This man was the biggest workhorse I have ever seen. I have seen him start operating at seven o'clock in the morning and carry on until seven o'clock at night. I said to him once: "You are worse than a farmer", and he replied: "I was raised on the farm". At the time he retired he had a pension of $16,000 per year which was quite ample 25 years ago.

In another state because of retirement the seat of professor of surgery was vacant. However, it was tragic that on his way to take up his post the man who was hired died of a coronary. My friend, Pemberton, had been retired for a year at that point and was distraught because he was not working and had decided to do a little general practice, which he did for a short while. In the meantime the clinic knew that my friend was available and even though he was over 65 years of age they said they would hire him if they could find no one better who was younger. He was hired and his post was to be of a year's duration. The year stretched into six years and in that time his salary was in the neighbourhood of $50,000 a year. He was a great man, and I have many fond memories of him. One day I asked him if he liked working this way and he said that it was not for the money he received because the government took almost half of it in tax. He said it is the fact that he was contributing something to this world that had given him so much.

In conclusion, I want to say to the minister that geriatric chairs should be established across Canada. The province of Saskatchewan has one and there is one at the University of Western Ontario. Other universities are contemplating them. These were established not through any effort by the government but through the universities themselves. Canada is poorly equipped to deal with geriatric medicine and I want to see some action taken by the minister. I know she has a conscience. I am sure that when she looks at this dilemma and realizes how serious it is she will see that students must be trained in this field. If the minister needs further proof of this great need, all she has to do is visit the University of Ottawa and the faculty there will tell her that the need is vital. Not only do we need students for the future but we need them right now. If the field of geriatrics is not expanded immediately, this country will be in a jam financially because of the overwhelming burden of pensions. For the sake of humanity, for those suffering, for the prevention of illness, not forgetting people who are in homes and hospitals often not even thought of, everything must be done to prevent disease, enabling people to stay in their own homes, to keep working as long as they have the desire and the physical and mental ability to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on reading this bill I thought at first glance that it might not be important; but I am always astounded by the craftiness of this government, the cunning it shows in introducing those various bills. When it introduces a bill of secondary importance, or even a meaningless one, it brings it in voluminously wrapped, using many words that often mean very little; but when time comes to introduce a resounding bill, that often harms the people, it assumes a more modest or even extremely modest form. Well, I think that is what we are being presented with here today, with this eight-line bill which reads as follows:

No payment shall be made under this Act in respect of any cost incurred in respect of a health training facility unless payment of a contribution toward the cost thereof was authorized by the Minister pursuant to subsection 4(1) or 5(1) before September 9, 1978.

So, Mr. Speaker, here we are considering this very small bill, as I said a few moments ago. Some hon. members have talked about it this afternoon. I listened to most of them. Some have viewed it from the medical point of view, like the speaker before me, but I wish to stress the financial aspect of the bill because everyone knows that without money it is useless to talk about medicare. But this bill, Mr. Speaker, although it is a small one, has much value to the government because it will allow it to keep millions of dollars which normally would have gone back to the provinces.

The government pursues its war against the provinces with a pruning knife and that is precisely what I want to draw to the attention of the public. Federal-provincial agreements! What does this government do about them? It ridicules them. When it concerns joint financing agreements unanimously endorsed by the provinces, the federal government unilaterally decides not to respect them. I wonder where such dictating will lead us, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ouellet: You can't be serious!

[Mr. Rynard.]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I am quite serious!

Miss Bégin: It is a federal legislation and not an agreement with the provinces.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The provinces only have to yield—

Mr. Ouellet: The person who wrote your speech did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I wrote it myself, Mr. Ouellet, I do not have a secretary as you have to write my speeches, I take down my notes.

Mr. Ouellet: It shows, because you are entirely on the wrong track.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The provinces can only yield to the federal government and say: "Thank you, master for what you were kind enough to leave us." This is what the present Prime Minister calls federalism. It is promising for the future of Canada, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister basically wants a united Canada, but in practical terms he wants a single Canada. He has therefore decided to cut off all provincial channels which he considers a threat to that unity. He wants to despoil the provinces so that they will have to crawl before the almighty federal master to survive. For over ten years, we have painfully been on the warpath and the invader is carrying on his forays into the provinces. Honour, a given word or even the signature on contracts, everything is violated. Unilateral decisions are law.

This bill is another proof of the will of the government to dominate the provinces. They may well shout, protest, claim their rights, but it's no use. The Prime Minister replies that we need a strong federal government we need to establish a bureaucratic dictatorship and he does so by means of the so-called federalist system. Of course, the provinces did count on that agreement. Indeed, this two-year agreement with the provinces was designed to help them plan their spending in medical research and in the upgrading of premises. It should be recalled, Mr. Speaker, that we are not against the federal government withdrawing from joint programs or from agreements signed by both levels of government. On the contrary, we have favoured and claimed that for years and we would be most happy if the government ever decided—as the province of Quebec requires—and I quote La Presse from February 6, 1979:

Mr. Lazure asks Miss Bégin to transfer the entire jurisdiction of social security to the provinces.

In short, let the federal government get out of Quebec's business on the only condition we agree to, that the federal government give back corresponding taxation points to the province.

Miss Bégin: And the child tax credit.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): In other words, the day the federal government will once and for all get out of provincial jurisdictions, it will necessarily have to give back all the direct taxation items it has taken from the provinces under false representation. Besides, those were the very expectations of the former Liberal prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, who had told us when we were commending him for having cancelled several cost-sharing programs and given back the corresponding taxation points to the provinces, that if he still were prime minister for a few years there would be no more of those programs and therefore we would fully recover the direct taxation, and that there would be no more of those joint programs I have always described as many links to make the provinces dependent on the federal government which had managed to hoard on a silver plate all rights to direct taxation. Unfortunately for all the provinces, Mr. Pearson had to resign, and unfortunately again for the province of Quebec, Mr. Trudeau became Prime Minister, and under his administration joint programs have become the order of the day.

This bill brings back to memory those great many cost sharing programs that turn out to be more and more the creatures of the federal government which decides everything without consultation, particularly through Bill C-2. Apparently the federal government is trying to do away with provincial participation in medical research because it no longer believes in confederation but ony in one unitarian state. However, it will have to meet its commitments under past agreements. If it wishes to ignore them entirely, and make them void by a single stroke of the pen, as though the provinces' opinion did not matter, it should at least be honest enough to return to the provinces the tax points owed to them. I suggest this would at least be logical. One can readily understand that the central government asked for and received the power to collect taxes on behalf of the provinces. But it still has to fulfil its primary duty which is to comply with the agreements under that great power of taxation.

If they continue the way they have been going for the past ten years they are going to keep on breaking agreements, rejecting all cost-sharing programs, while at the same time keeping 100 per cent of all taxation rights. That will be profitable for the federal government, but not for our provinces. Indeed, the more the federal government refuses to pay its share to the provinces, the more the provinces will be forced to pay themselves the outlays that keep accumulating year after year and the less revenue the provinces will have, since the federal government will still keep the full powers of taxation it borrowed in 1942 while at the same time reneging on all the beautiful promises made at that time.

With such a power of taxation, without obligations in return, it becomes very easy for the central government to penetrate further into provincial jurisdiction on the pretence that the provinces that are not in an area are so burdened by the limitation of the field of taxation that they can no longer cover all the areas under their jurisdiction. That is how provincial sovereignty is being infringed upon through the control of taxation.

Bill C-2 is only the extension of all the legislation passed in the past ten years by this government to cancel the role of the provinces and get its out and out federalism. The government keeps rejecting its past commitments at the expense of the provinces by taking away from them any power of recuperating. Today, the government practices that sport which is dangerous for Canadian harmony in all sectors and the most sinister part of it is that government members who are mainly responsible for the present mess are saying there is a crisis.

The government headed by its ministers is spending millions on inquiries into that famous crisis. They want to know who is responsible for it. I ask the ministers and the Prime Minister to look at themselves in a mirror in order to find out who has really caused that famous crisis. First of all, the cause of that crisis is the lack of communications between the government of Quebec in particular, and the other governments. The federal-provincial meetings have been characterized by reversals, and public discussions. The provinces understandably resent the fact that the central government takes decisions without even so much as consulting them. We now have reached the point when ministers trade insults and call each other robbers and violators. That is not parliamentary language. For example, in an article which was published in a newspaper on February 2, 1979, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is reported to have referred to the Quebec Minister of Health as a robber! That is not very edifying, Mr. Speaker! And when the Minister says that "sometimes she feels ashamed that she is a Quebecker" . . . I am almost ashamed to sit in the federal parliament. This reaction was prompted, of course, by another cut in family allowances.

Another statement related to the Quebec minister's statement in which he denounced a 23 per cent drop in federal family allowances. The family allowances granted by the federal government will drop by 23 per cent, in Quebec as in all other provinces, for every child as of Janaury 1. This is the nature of a bill on this subject tabled yesterday at the National Assembly by Social Affairs Minister Denis Lazure.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) answered him at an impromptu press conference held yesterday in Ottawa. She said: Quebec has lowered to 5 per cent the welfare benefit indexation to get back the $200 annual tax credit granted to families with an income of less than $18,000. According to her Manitoba and Quebec are the only provinces which take into account this tax credit in establishing the rate of benefits. By failing to index the benefits at 9 per cent, as planned, Quebec is stealing from welfare recipients, according to the health minister.

Well, Mr. Speaker, for the edification of the whole population, here is what the Quebec minister Mr. Lazure said in reply: In deciding, unilaterally, to change the family allowance program, not only did the federal government renege on an agreement that goes back to 1974, but above all, it has singularly made life a great deal more complicated for a whole group of people. I did it with an election in mind, obviously, right on the eve of an election. By reorganizing a family allowance budget, to allow families whose income does not exceed $18,000 claim a child tax credit next April, the federal government penalizes welfare recipients.

Mr. Lazure enumerates the following in support of his contention: The Quebec government, or rather, the parents have to fill out a complex form. They also have to fill out some sort of income tax statement which many of them have never done before. That is true. I support him on that. The federal government threatens to upset the budget of the recipients by sending them a big cheque in April, perhaps in March, or in August, or even next fall.

Others will not get any at all because of the complexity of all that paper work. In April, they will no longer need it to heat their house or buy winter clothes. Criticizing the new program further, Mr. Lazure points out that, when she made a public statement last week, the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare forgot to point out the following: that Quebec is the only province to pay out family allowances, that Quebec is the only province where social assistance payments are automatically indexed on the cost of living. In 1969, that indexation will cost the government $67 million. Finally, Quebec is the only province that has an integrated social assistance program and therefore it is impossible to compare with the other provinces.

Well, Mr. Speaker, these are two opinions I respect, but to any Canadian citizen they certainly cannot be reconciled. There is between them the difference in figures, first in calculations, expressions and particularly the difference between the acts. And when I received the booklet from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), well, I met a lawyer and my accountant, and we looked at it. The lawyer told me: This legislation is so complicated that I think we shall never be able to understand it. As to the accountant, he said: If you take everything into account, the $200 tax credit and the decrease to $20 in family allowances, nothing is changed for poor children. We should—

Miss Bégin: No, it makes $140 more for each child.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I say that my accountant—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair has some difficulty to understand how the hon. member wants to relate the remarks he is making now to the bill before the House, namely Bill C-2. Maybe there is some relation to Bill C-2, and I would like to hear it at this time.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Maybe you find the example a little long. I was giving this as an example which, at the same time, was intended to help inform the population—

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member does not check his information and gives the view of the people on stupid examples.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): But I knew I was beside the question. I cannot go deeper into this matter . . . I may do so at a later date because I wanted to . . . The examples I give—-

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member's examples do not make any sense.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): When a lawyer tells you he is rather confused . . . The examples I give—

Mr. Ouellet: He must be a Social Credit accountant.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The minister says the examples do not make any sense. It so happens the example is taken from the minister's publication. If it does not make sense, according to the new Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet), it does for mothers—

Miss Bégin: The hon. member should say that this means more money for mothers.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Of course, the minister says that Quebec mothers may lose some money, but I have something else to tell her. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, like the other ministers, the Minister of Employment, for instance, who has just—and I am only saying this as an introduction, Mr. Speaker—who has just placed 250,000 unemployed on provincial welfare—On one hand, the government takes back benefits from the provinces, as in Bill C-2, on the other hand, it takes directly from—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, when I talk about Bill C-2, they shout that I am out of order. In my opinion, they do not know what subject we are discussing—

An hon. Member: We do not understand you!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): It is not surprising that you do not understand. Many others do not understand either. As I was saying, on the other hand, the government cuts back directly the income of senior citizens, as it did in the case of the supplement. Listen to this. By considering the Quebec pension cheques as an income, the federal government is able to reduce its pension supplement by taking 50 per cent of the Quebec pension cheques. This is another way—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please! This is certainly another way, as the hon. member suggests, but I would like to remind him once again that we are now discussing Bill C-2 which concerns authorization for terminating an agreement with the provinces. I invite the hon. member to limit his comments to this issue.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, you allowed the previous speaker to talk about pensioners over 65, as he did for half an hour, and I am talking about pensioners over 65 who need care and money and who have contributed to the Quebec Pension Plan and who receive their cheques from Quebec. Why is this cheque considered supplementary income?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on a point of order.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, the member who spoke before the Social Credit spokesman has had medical training and he talked about the urgency to train people in the field of geriatrics in Canada. He said that this could have been done if public opinion in the provinces had become favourable soon enough, and this could have been done under the health resources fund which is the subject of the bill now under consideration. He never spoke about the pensions! That is what the hon. member has been doing for some time only to make erroneous statements.

An hon. Member: Absolutely not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. This is very clear and this is why the Chair left the floor to the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). He was not interrupted during his speech. Once again I urge the hon. member to limit his remarks to Bill C-2.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that some doctors—I did not name them—dealt with the medical aspect and that I would deal with the financial aspect of this issue as it cannot be ignored. You need money to have adequate health services. This is why I think that the minister does not understand anything as regards financial matters. She may be an expert on other subjects but I want to refute her theory. When she says that the government of Quebec robs people on welfare I say that the government robs older people of 50 per cent of their pension, the Quebec pension. Is it not true?

Miss Bégin: How much did the province of Quebec get for health?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Now she recognizes it. She steals 50 per cent of their Quebec pension from older people. We agree on this. I do not want to deny what the minister said and I said earlier that you were right, but it does not mean that one is more in the right than the other and that you can rob older people who need health care.

Miss Bégin: The government of Quebec does that.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): It does not reduce the Quebec pension but the guaranteed income supplement.

Miss Bégin: Quebec pays Quebec pensions.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): No, Quebec gives the cheque and those who get the supplement have their cheque cut by half. I know the situation. Of course, Mr. Speaker, after all those discussions we do not agree on Bill C-2 and even less on the reasons for those cuts. They spend their time cutting programs and I object to that.

Bill C-2 is like a pruning knife. It means a loss for the provinces, Mr. Speaker, and that is what riles me. I am told to stick to the medical aspect of Bill C-2, but I must say that it is not the medical aspect which is important, it is the cutting effect which is important. The provinces are denied millions of dollars to prevent them from taking action in their own field of jurisdiction and as soon as someone criticizes that, Mr. Speaker, they shout. All the Liberal members here are shouting that it is contrary to the Standing Orders. They want this matter to be left untouched. They do not want the people to know the government is stealing 50 per cent from the pension cheques from Quebec. They do not want that but it hurts the elderly people and these same elderly people know it. How dare they blame the Quebec government for suppressing a 3 per cent indexation—

Miss Bégin: It's 4 per cent.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Fair enough, 4 per cent indexation at a time when the federal government steals 50 per cent from the cheques. Ottawa takes the lion's share. It is not 4 per cent but 50 per cent not giving what Quebec expects from the federal government, what it should receive from it anyway, they are going to syphon off from those who are getting money from Quebec in order to put it in the federal treasury. This is what we do not accept and this is what Quebec cannot accept.

An hon. Member: You do not have any member on the committee.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): There are Social Credit members on that committee.

An hon. Member: Stealing is a very strong word.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): No, I was not the one who used it first, the minister did.

An hon. Member: Not in this House.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): It was the minister as reported in a newspaper article. I read it. I had to quote the minister's words. The minister used the word "stealing".

An hon. Member: That is unparliamentary language.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I did not find it quite parliamentary either, this is why—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. If hon. members want to intervene they should address the Chair.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I realize the hon. member does not agree with the purpose of this bill, but I am afraid his words go beyond his thought when he accuses this government of stealing from Quebec senior citizens because, quite the opposite, we have increased significantly old age security pensions in the last few years. I would ask him to withdraw the term "steal".

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I only borrowed the terms used by his minister. I would never have used the term "steal" if the minister had not done so herself. And when he suggests—

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member said that the people in Quebec had said that the federal government is taking money away from them.

Miss Bégin: You have a lot of imagination.

● (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The minister on the same question of privilege.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Roberval would have this House believe he is using the minister's terms. The minister said no such thing in this House today. And I ask that he withdraw, because to accuse this government of stealing from Quebec senior citizens is both groundless and unparliamentary. I therefore ask him to withdraw.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Firstly, Mr. Speaker, I would withdraw on the condition that the government repay the 50 per cent they have been taking away from senior citizens for some 10 years. But I would first bring the minister back to reality by pointing out it is reported here that, according to the minister, by failing to grant a 9 per cent indexation as agreed, Quebec is stealing from welfare recipients. Those are the words used by the minister (Miss Bégin). I would not have referred to stealing had not the minister—

Mr. Ouellet: The minister never said that in this House!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): But I am sure that if he follows the minister, there will be no trouble at all.

An hon. Member: We are right, you are wrong!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Liberals are quite partial. They say that the minister is right but that I am wrong to use the same word. That is not fair, we must have equal opportunity. If the minister can use that word, I should have the same right and yet with more right because the robbery is much more serious and more extended.

Before the Liberals were in power, we remember that Quebec pensions were not treated as income. They have been treated as income only since Liberals are there to siphon off from our pensioners who are receiving a cheque. And you, Liberals, you should support us to return to the old legislation so that Quebec pensions not be treated as income. And I think the minister would agree with me on that point. Well, in concluding, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: But that is not robbery.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): No, it is finance. That is probably what the minister meant. She should have used the word finance. But since the minister used the word I thought I would be readily understood by the Liberals because they are used to hear the word robbery instead of finance.

Mr. Speaker, as my allotted time is going to expire, my 40 minutes have been used, you should give me an extra 20 minutes, they have taken 20 minutes from my time, Mr. Speaker. You should give me an additional 20 minutes to allow me to conclude my speech.

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member did not withdraw his words yet.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, anybody knows quite well that needs are ever more pressing in the health field and that the provinces will have to foot the bill themselves. Sincerely, is it not another way to punish Quebec? That happened since 1976, especially since that government is there because they do not like it. For example, if I do not like you, will I spend my time throwing things at you? But it is the Quebec people who have elected that government. Why should we punish it continuously and adopt legislation to cut assistance, to break contracts? They even cut back large contracts, the Laprade heavy water plant, for example. It is the same thing. Cutbacks everywhere to try to weaken Quebec's economy.

At the same time the central government gives tax breaks to multinationals, those monopolies which are heavy party fund contributors. This is theoretically to create more jobs, even though we are well aware that large businesses will use the product of the workers' income taxes to modernize and further reduce the number of jobs. That is why big wheels get more powerful under a Liberal government while ordinary folks just get weaker.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I participate in the debate on the bill before the House in a sense of both sorrow and outrage. Earlier the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said some nice and kind things about the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) with which I agree. There is no question concerning her integrity and desire to improve the lot of Canadians in terms of health care for the aged. She deserves full credit and marks for that. But I question the hon. minister's continuing acquiescence in the priorities of the government and her colleagues. While she may have argued and fought with her cabinet colleagues in caucus concerning restraint being applied to the health resources fund, it seems to me the minister should further attempt to change the minds of her colleagues regarding this legislation. While the minister has been a good trooper in attempting to defend and apologize for this measure, I know her heart is not it.

I am outraged and sorrowful that the minister and her colleagues participated in what I would call a "Proposition 13 syndrome". This mindless pact comes from the Conservative elements in North American society: government is too big, it is spending too much, it interferes too much in our lives, taxes are too high, the government is out of control. It is the restraint policies that are out of control. I never expected to see the day when the hon. minister would be party to such a syndrome or such mindless nonsense emanating from the conservative element in society, smart aleck editorial writers, financial page analysts and so forth.

When analyzing these demands for restraints and cutbacks, one must consider from whom they are coming. One will find that these demands come from the rich, powerful and comfortable. I have not heard any old age pensioners, patients in acute health care beds, veterans, poor people or unemployed say that the government is too big and spends too much money. But I have heard such complaints from people who are nicely and comfortably ensconced in $200,000 homes owning two cars, summer cottages and taking winter vacations in California. These kinds of people indicate that the government is too big and its taxes are too high. For any government to accede to such nonsense by placing restraint on health resources expenditures is not only unconscionable, but is giving in to appeals being made to the worst in people rather than the best.

Surely the hon. minister must agree that she should make one more attempt to change the government's mind to its everlasting credit. I see no reason in the government's priorities when displaying restraint on the health of Canadians. The government is cutting $84 million in 1979 and 1980 from health resources funds on the ground of restraint.

The minister said the Government of Canada had a difficult decision to make in applying major traumatic restraint on its own expenditures. I wish the minister would agree—and I do not see how she can fail to—that it must have been more traumatic for her, and everybody else in the cabinet and the Liberal caucus, to hear the government announce an increase in spending just a few days ago of some $400 million, some five times the amount of cutback from the health resources fund, including provision of $18 million to help professional hockey millionaires build places to skate and play their little games. The Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) tries to justify this by saying they are to be municipally-owned stadiums which will be available to amateurs. I have had some experience of playing amateur hockey with a professional team around, and I know that you can get ice time from seven to eight in the morning or from 11 to midnight, and from midnight until early the next morning. When the professional team wants to use the ice the amateurs and the kids cannot use it. This government can find funds for that.

Mr. Paproski: Why not ask the high-priced players and owners to provide these funds?

Mr. Benjamin: That is a good suggestion by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). It would be an excellent idea to have these high-priced players and owners provide their own damned rinks in which to play their games.

What about the announcement of $235 million for the pulp and paper industry? Surely the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not going to hold still for that. She is supposed to knock 84 million bucks from her health resources fund while agreeing to spend $235 million to help an industry that has increased its profits in 12 months from $160 million to $379 million. How can the minister hold still for that? How can any self-respecting Liberal on the government side hold still for that? It is incredible that we have people like the Minister of National Health and Welfare supporting a Liberal government that is implementing Conservative policies. That government not only accedes to the mindless chatter of those who demand restraint and government cutbacks; in its equally mindless desire to clutch and hang on to power it enlarges on those measures. This government has thrown its reputation into disrepute through breaches of faith and word, and its disregard for commitments and agreements with the provinces, beginning in 1966 with the health resources fund.

This program should not be ended prematurely. It should not have $84 million chopped off in its last two years of life. Rather, this program should be extended and enlarged with the provision of new funds, not just $500 million over the next ten years, but $1 billion. There is a great deal yet to be done.

I listened to the words of the learned and fine hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) who emulates the best traditions of a country doctor in this country. He talked about things that need to be done in a field in which he is wise, the field of geriatrics. I agree with what he said in that regard. I only wish he would talk to his colleagues in his own party in a number of provinces of this country. They have failed miserably to make adequate use or take adequate advantage of the health resources fund. Their activities in their own jurisdictions belie the words of the hon. member for Simcoe North.

That hon. member should ask the government of Alberta to refrain from charging $4 a day for medical services for people at levels three and four, most of whom are in what the hon. member for Simcoe North would class the geriatrics category. This is the charge in Alberta to those people who spend more than 120 days in health care centres. He should ask that government to stop collecting $5 a day for the admission of an individual requiring an acute care bed. That government should take full advantage of the health resources fund in order to do more research in geriatrics and to provide a greater degree of medical care through a shared program under the provincial and federal governments. Instead of that Alberta is taxing those who can least afford to pay.

I wish the hon. member would talk to his Conservative colleagues in Ontario who are charging $8.60 a day in what they call extended care user fees. My God, this sounds like Otto Lang! The Tories in Ontario call it a user fee, just as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) says that the user shall pay. In British Columbia another Conservative government charges $6.50 a day for extended care and $5 a day for acute care. The majority of the people who are paying these charges fall into a category the hon. member for Simcoe North would class as geriatrics.

I hope the hon. member for Simcoe North will match his demands of the federal government with equal demands of his Conservative colleagues in power in several provinces in this country, because their performance in some of the richest provinces, in fact in the richest province, has been shameful and miserly. The government of any province as wealthy as British Columbia, Alberta or Ontario that cannot or will not lead the way in health care and health ventures should be ashamed of itself.

Some of these Conservatives, with a capital "C", talk about more restraint and government cutbacks in health care. Some of them have the nerve to call themselves "Progressive Conservatives", which has to be the ultimate contradiction of terms. They propose things like deterrent fees. We experienced that under a conservative Liberal government in Saskatchewan for a number of years. Dr. Beck, a professor at the University of Saskatchewan, studied the effect of deterrent fees. His findings were that families least able to bear the financial burden cut back on the use of the medical care system. According to Dr. Beck, the wealthy were not noticeably affected. This is what all of us who oppose this kind of tax on the sick have been saying for years.

I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to give more thought to what needs to be done in respect of health care and research rather than to cutbacks. The health resources fund should be extended and enlarged. The $235 million for the pulp and paper industry and the $18 million for hockey rinks should be used to extend and enlarge this fund. It should be used to meet needed research in respect of prosthetics, for the provision of community clinics, acute care for the elderly, for research and the construction of new facilities.

We do not have enough dialysis machines for people with kidney ailments who must have their blood regenerated once or twice a week for the remaining years they have before them. People in the medical profession as a result have to make the terrifying decision of who can have access to the insufficient number of machines and who cannot. We have money for the pulp and paper industry with its high profits and for millionnaire hockey club owners, yet the government wants to cut off the health resources fund for its remaining two years.

There are new developments in portable dialysis machines which eliminate the necessity of patients having to attend a hospital once or twice a week year in and year out. Several thousands of these machines are needed and, therefore, the provinces should now spend money on the purchase of these machines and for their continued development with the aid of the federal government, which should absorb half the cost through a health resources fund.

The areas of preventive medicine and mental illness need much research. a high portion of bed occupancy in the health care delivery system is taken up by schizophrenics. The health resources fund could aid in the cost of the work needed in this area. I would like to tell the minister that we could do great things for the improvement and care of schizophrenics and that, if nothing else, it would help half the members of the Liberal party and three quarters of the members in the Conservatives party.

Miss Bégin: And all of the NDP.

Mr. Benjamin: The Conservative party would like to have it both ways. As my colleague from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) pointed out with regard to another item some time ago, that party would like to have it both ways. They are like the oldest profession in the world and would like to work both sides of the street. On the one hand they say that there must be cutbacks and restraint, so they pick on the health resources fund; but on the other hand they want to spend three or four times that amount of money on items which have no justification.

Surely the minister will ask her cabinet colleagues and her colleagues in the caucus to readjust their priorities and determine which is the more important—leaving the $84 million in the health resources fund to be spent in 1979 and 1980, or giving $235 million to an industry which has just doubled its profits. That is not dogmatic socialism or party dogma; it is just plain common sense. They must readjust their priorities.

The minister calls the withdrawal of this fund traumatic. Something should be done to ease the trauma. Such a comment indicates to me that she believes it is the wrong decision, because nobody deliberately has a trauma. Why one would want to have a trauma on purpose is beyond me. It is even more traumatic, this decision to end the health resources fund, in light of the spending this government would like to do on unnecessary and unjustified items.

One of the fundamental tests of how civilized and decent a society is is how it treats its old people and its sick people. Surely that is the best test of all. No society with any amount of conscience could justify—at least, I cannot justify it in my mind and I am sure that none of my colleagues in the House can either—this sort of niggardly, miserable, miserly approach to restraint through cutting back health resources. It flies in the face of the best that is in all of us, of decency and of trying to make this a better society and a better nation. It flies in the face of the concept of strengthening confederation and national unity.

This fund came about as the result of a commitment in 1966 which was to continue to 1980, and if that is not breaking faith with the provinces, I do not know what else it could be called. How can we as a parliament do such a thing? One wonders why there are obstreperous premiers. In listening to them speak on television during and after first ministers' conferences, one wonders why the provinces become so suspicious and why they say they have been once bitten and are twice shy about any further agreement or commitments from the national government, particularly when it breaks faith over a paltry $84 million as compared to a massive amount of spending in unjustifiable areas.

If the minister would like to restore confidence among the people and the provinces in the integrity of her government, and if members of this House would like to restore some confidence among the people and the provinces in the integrity of parliament, then this bill must either be withdrawn or defeated. Because it is breaking faith and who wants to be party to that? I do not think that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would like to be party to that. Surely, members on all sides of the House can agree, even though we may argue about other forms of spending, that the area of health resources should not fall to the meat axe of restraint. I am not suggesting that this money for health care and health resources should not be spent wisely and efficiently; that is the onus upon governments at all levels and goes without saying.

This is no area for cutbacks when there remains such a massive amount to be done. We should be spending hundreds of millions of dollars in preventive medicine, but we are only scratching the surface. In the long run these expenditures for curative medicine save society and the g[O]vernment. To me this piece of legislation is a pandering of the worst kind to what is supposed to be a massive majority opinion in our society about too much government spending. What is equally or more important than how much the government is spending is what the money is being spent for, how it is being spent and on whom it is being spent. That is of equal or greater importance than how much is being spent, and we should be directing our attention to examination, proposals and criticisms, not to this mindless reduction in such a basic and needed area.

I do not want to be party to the kind of thing which has occurred in other jurisdictions, in other provinces, and south of the 49th parallel. Rather than do so I would prefer to stick to my guns for maximizing and enlarging our health care services and health delivery services. I would rather be defeated for that than win by supporting attempts by a few rich and powerful institutions and governments to introduce cutbacks and restraints in this field. I would rather lose for doing something than win for doing nothing. I would be proud to face the people in my constituency and tell them we are going to spend more on health resources, that we are going to challenge the provinces, the medical profession and the research institutions to do more and do better. I would be proud to take that message to the people of my riding and they can judge me at election time. If they want to defeat me because I am advocating too much spending of that sort, I would be glad to be defeated because I would not like to represent such people in parliament. But I like my people and I have confidence in them. They will respect any politician from any party who says he will have no share in the kind of mindless proposition put before us today. This kind of thing should not be the lowest priority; it should not be a priority of any kind.

Consider the abysmal record of some of the wealthiest provinces, invariably those with Conservative governments. Their priorities are similar. They are the provinces that want to cut back. In Manitoba they have cut back and confined the increase in their budgeting for health services to less than 3 per cent, which is lower than half the cost increase due to inflation.

The new Conservative government of Manitoba showed restraint and, as a result, hospitals had to fire people. That is no way to cut back. Like everybody else who lives in Ontario, the Tory government there is proud of their province. They have a slogan which reads, "Is there any place you would rather be?" Well, when it comes to health care a lot of people in Ontario would say: "Yes, in Saskatchewan". What they are doing in Ontario to people who have to be treated in hospitals for lengthy illnesses is shameful. But that government is showing restraint. It is cutting back.

Here we find the Liberal government of Canada being party to the same sort of nonsense. Take Conservative Alberta, good old, rich Alberta. That government has increased medicare premiums to $184 a year per family. It felt the need to cut back, to show restraint. It continues to charge $5 per day for acute bed care. This is what they call restraint. And the Minister of National Health and Welfare is party to the same kind of nonsense. Patients will be charged $4 a day after 120 days. Mr. Speaker, anybody who is ill enough to be in hospital that long is a very sick person. Is that the time to drop over to the bedside and say: "From now on, we want $4 a day from you"? Yet that is restraint. That amounts to a cutback. They have cut back hospital funding to a 6.5 per cent increase, less than the increase in costs. That is what is happening in rich, Conservative Alberta and the minister is joining them in that kind of nonsense.

In Conservative Manitoba they say they will bring back medicare premiums and they have levied a new fee of $7.50 a day on extended care patients. Well, that is restraint; they are imposing cutbacks.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has been sneering at Alberta for being good and rich and praising Saskatchewan—for being bad and poor, I guess. If that is his thinking, let him explain why such large numbers of people are leaving Saskatchewan and moving to Alberta?

Mr. Benjamin: If the hon. member would check the population statistics he would find that such is not the case. But I want to tell him and the natives of Alberta and British Columbia that had it not been for the many good people from Saskatchewan who moved there neither of those places would have amounted to anything.

The fact is that over the last few years in Saskatchewan the population outflow has been reversed. The population has been increasing for the first time since the late 1920s. I do not know whether one can attribute responsibility for that to any party or government, but it does tell one something about where people would prefer to be.

I appeal to the minister to buttonhole a few of her cabinet colleagues. I am sure hon. members of the Conservative party will help keep this debate going until six o'clock, which will give her a chance to change her mind about this bill. After all, ministers over there have already exceeded their objective in connection with cutbacks. They have succeeded without this bill. If it is not proceeded with, they will still be in excess of the objective the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlined last September. So they do not need this legislation in order to live up to their commitments about reducing government spending.

I therefore appeal again to the House to reject this legislation. I appeal to the government, to members opposite, and particularly to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There is nothing wrong about changing your mind if you have second thoughts. You will not be condemned by members of our group if you are big enough to change your mind on this issue. On the contrary, I think you will be applauded by people across this land generally if you withdraw this bill.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I think it is worthwhile, as an introduction to my remarks, to note a statement by the minister. The hon. lady said:

> With the impending introduction of a medical care program and anticipated shortages of health manpower to meet program and population requirements for increased health services, the health resources fund was enacted on July 11, 1966, to run for the period 1966-1980.

Provisions of the act were to offer financial assistance to the provinces and territories in the planning, acquisition, construction, renovation and equipping of health training facilities.

Before addressing myself to the remarks made by the minister and statements made before the standing committee dealing with Bill C-2, it is only appropriate that I point out to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) that in the Barrett era of British Columbia history, if my memory serves me correctly, a well-known doctor from New Westminster was appointed to draw up a master plan for medical and allied care for that province. Upon its completion it was a ponderous document indeed. It was studied by people within and outside the medical profession and it had much to commend it. But like much socialist philosophy and theory, it suffered from overkill, so much so that this social document for improvement in the field of health gathered dust on the shelves of the provincial legislature in Victoria. I cannot recall one element of that particular tome being introduced by the Barrett government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I can tell you about all kinds of things.

Mr. Brisco: I would be interested in hearing from the hon. member if he can tell me all kinds of them. Fortunately none was of sufficient significance to have the impact on the province that they are still remarked upon today.

Mr. Benjamin: What about dental care for children?

Mr. Brisco: I would suggest to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre that he address himself to some simple mathematics. I recall him saying that the fee for medical coverage was something like $184 a year in Alberta. That was the figure he quoted—

Mr. Benjamin: For a family.

Mr. Brisco: —for a family. When we translate $184 a year, and he mentioned a family of four, it works out to the enormous sum of eight cents a day. Frankly I cannot see anything wrong with that, particularly in Alberta.

An hon. Member: It is zero in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Brisco: I know that in Saskatchewan they have a different plan, but times change and governments change. Unless the member is misled, or the House is concerned that the only province which has anything going for it in terms of medical care is Saskatchewan, then I think the member should more fully examine some of the other constraints, such as constraints of environment, population and geography. It is not fair to the other provinces to tar them with a broad brush.

No reference was made to the province of Manitoba. We have a fresh Conservative government there, but the NDP had all kinds of time to establish health care policies. We have not heard a word about that. However, let us return to the substance of the bill instead of debating points between parties here. After all we on the opposition side are opposed to Bill C-2.

In 1966 the prime minister and the government at that time demonstrated considerable foresight in establishing this fund. They must have recognized a need. It is unfortunate they did not demonstrate the foresight to see just what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of today and his wasteful wastrels, in other words his cabinet, would do with the financial state of this nation. If he could have seen that, then probably he would have escalated the sum well beyond its present limits. Instead of establishing it at $500 million, maybe he would have established it at $750 million. Perhaps he would have recognized that galloping inflation would diminish the value of the program. Perhaps too he would have considered additional sums were needed to address the social problems that have arisen as a result of the high unemployment in Canada at this time.

The Pearson government did not have that foresight. It did not have the foresight to see what the Prime Minister of today would do. It did not realize that the Prime Minister in a flight of fancy would travel to Bonn, bungle around and then meander to Morocco, and after having been struck by the sun return to Canada to tell the nation that he was fed up with inflation. What the hell is new? What an outstanding statement for the Prime Minister to make! That statement carried about as much credibility as the Prime Minister's statement about wrestling inflation to the ground. The Prime Minister suffers from a sore back. I do not think he has ever made it. Clearly he never will.

I caught the intervention just now of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) that the Prime Minister needs a chiropractor. I would be delighted to have him as a patient. I cannot say that he would show any immediate response to my treatment; I would rather suspect he would get worse.

The spending of $427 million in the view of the Ministry of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) virtually accomplishes the goal established by the Pearson government. That is not correct. All ministries of this government are suffering from restraint. All programs are suffering from restraint. There are programs which we on this side of the House agree clearly need restraint, but one should not mess around with the health of the nation or its people.

If we could establish a graph of the medical or health care facilities of this nation, that graph would rise from a zero point, or whatever point on the scale one might establish for the year 1966, to a high point in about 1974. From that point on it would stagger; sometimes it would go up and sometimes it would go down. It would go up with the whims of the minister of health in terms of funding the medical research community, and it would drop when the minister decided to extract something from the medical research community. I remember when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) discovered $2 million in his pocket for medical research. That graph will now go down and stay down until a Conservative government comes in and changes the ball game. A Conservative government will put the priorities back where they belong.

An hon. Member: You will never see that.

Mr. Brisco: On December 12 before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs I asked the chairman the following question:

● (1720)

—Dr. Law might tell me whether she believes what has happened in the field of medical research, in the field of treatment for disease, in hospitals or out, as it now stands, could have been entirely predicted 15 years ago. Do you believe the current level of medical expertise in the treatment of disease today, thermonuclear medicine or nuclear medicine, for example, could have been predicted 15 years ago? Yes or no? It is that simple. The answer clearly is no.

DR. LAW: I think no.

MR. BRISCO: No, all right. Therefore, do you feel that 15 years from now or 10 years from now we will be at the same level of medical and diagnostic treatment, expertise, that we are at now, that we are not going to advance any further?

DR. LAW: No.

MR. BRISCO: Therefore, would you not say that it is logical to assume that a government, federal government, would consider seriously the continuation of the type of program that is contained within the provisions of this bill.

At that point the Chairman interjected:

I do not know that Dr. Law would wish to answer that question.

I commented that was all right, but the answer is obvious.

What I am trying to demonstrate here is that in spite of the absence of support from this government, research in all fields of the health community must continue. I made reference to nuclear medicine. We are seeing some astounding advances in that field. Those advances will be made to a limited degree in this country because we provide only a very limited degree of support to the scientific community. The advances will be made substantially in those countries which support the scientific community.

In his speech today the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) dwelt for a considerable time on the subject of geriatrics. He rightfully pointed out that Canadians are living for a longer period of time. There is a desperate need for a more careful and more broadened understanding of the field of geriatrics, as the hon. member for Simcoe North pointed out. The hon. member said in honesty that there are those physicians who feel uncomfortable in the presence and in the treatment of the aged. I can understand that. It seizes their conscience. It is a reflection of the philosophy of today.

When I speak of that, I think of nations such as China, particularly Taiwan or the Republic of China, which carries on with the same philosophy it has had for centuries—respect for parents, grandparents and those most senior in the family. That kind of philosophy has eroded under the communist regime in Red China. It is not appreciated there. That kind of philosophy is in opposition to the state. However, it is still present today in the Republic of China.

That kind of philosophy is also seen in other nations, among other peoples. However, it has rapidly disappeard in this country. As a result, we are faced more and more with the need for extended care facilities, nursing home care and intermediate care. Call it what you may, it deals with the care of the aged and those who are approaching that era of sunset.

These problems are increasing daily. Because of today's society, children are no longer able to cope with their aged parents. They just do not know how. It will take a great deal of time to alter that philosophy. Those kinds of programs will be far reaching, reaching into the next century. We should be thinking of them today. They could well be encompassed in the continuation of this funding and an addition to the funding by means of another bill for an additional $500 million for another five, ten or 15 years. At today's prices it would have to be for five years.

There is another area of need that gives me cause for concern. Other members spoke on the subject of care of our Indians. I noticed the interjection of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She stated the bill did not have anything to do with the provision of medical care in terms of glasses, dentures and so on. That is true. I am not going to discuss that, at least for the moment; I will stick to the bill.

I suggest for her benefit that the minister review an article in the January 4, 1979 Globe and Mail entitled "TB considered serious problem in N.W.T. hamlets". I quote from the article:

Tuberculosis is a serious problem in the community of Rae-Edzo in the Northwest Territories and frustrated health workers are struggling against the disease with only mixed success, a health official says.

At least 48 of the twin hamlet's 1,600 residents are being treated for active tuberculosis and another 102 have been advised to take drugs because they risk developing it, said Dr. Thomas Covill, regional director medical services in the Northwest Territories for the federal Department of Health and Welfare.

Is the minister proud of those statistics? Is she concerned about the fact that for the first time in years we are seeing a rapid increase in the presence of tuberculosis in our Indian communities, a disease which was supposedly wiped out? What is the minister going to do about it? What could this government have done about it if it had taken the opportunity and given direction to the territorial governments, telling them they should be establishing a special clinic or hospital to provide facilities for the treatment of tuberculosis?

What is the tuberculosis rate at Lower Post? Does the minister have any idea how many Indians at Lower Post are afflicted by tuberculosis, how many are carriers and how many are potential carriers? Has anyone in this House heard the minister express any concern about the escalation of tuberculosis among the Indians of Canada? Does the minister know it is a direct reflection of the social conditions in those Indian communities? I have not heard a word from the minister about that. The article continues:

Others who asked not to be named said Dr. Covill's figures are outdated. They put the number of active cases at 57 or more and said more than 300 of the predominantly Indian residents have been told to take anti-TB drugs because of possible contact with the disease.

Dr. Covill acknowledged the incidence of TB is nearly 100 times greater in Rae-Edzo than in most of the rest of Canada. Rae-Edzo is about 80 kilometers northwest of Yellowknife.

● (1730)

In 1977, tuberculosis affected an average of 14.9 of every 100,000 people across Canada. In Rae-Edzo, the incidence was 14.66 of every 1,000.

Not every 100,000.

The situation was the same in the slums of any big city 150 years ago—

I point out to the minister that the situation was the same in the slums of any big city. What is the minister doing about it? Dr. Covill said, and I quote:

"Poor people suffer the disease of poverty and there is nothing medicine can do. Give them an adequate income, decent homes and economic security . . . then you are doing something."

[Mr. Brisco.]

Charlie Charlo, chief of the Rae Indian band and chairman of the Rae-Edzo hamlet council, said at least 20 homes are overcrowded. Many one-room dwellings were inhabited by eight to 16 people.

This is the responsibility of this government, and what has it done about it? It has sat back and waited for the rate of tuberculosis to increase to such a point that it equals the rate of tuberculosis in major cities in Canada 150 years ago, back in the dark ages. The chief said, and I quote:

Some of them may soon move into 18 newly built homes—

What will 18 newly built homes do for a community of 1,600?

But the problem was more complicated than that. Some residents were afraid to ask for treatment and others did not understand they had to take medication for as long as two years rather than just a few days.

Police have arrested known tuberculosis victims who refused treatment.

There lies another problem. If a tuberculosis victim arrested by the police knows his rights, we may well see a problem of confrontation. I agree with the actions of the police, and I am sure all hon. members would; but if a person afflicted with tuberculosis knows his rights, he may well appeal to the Human Rights Commission and say that he was arrested unlawfully.

Because tuberculosis is a communicable disease, it may well be that under certain legislation a person can be held, but he cannot be held indefinitely or until the tuberculosis is cured. At least I do not think so. Are we going to hold people indefinitely so that we can provide medicine for them for two years, and are we going to hold people who come into contact with people who have tuberculosis?

About $84 million is left in a program which has another two years to run. The program could be of enormous benefit in the treatment of tuberculosis, if nowhere else than just among the Indian people in the northern parts of Canada where the disease is most rampant.

I wonder if this government has ever looked at the programs of other nations where indigenous people such as our own Indians are provided with proper hospital care and the level of training needed so that they themselves can treat people of their own race, colour or whatever. Other nations are doing just that. There are provisions for the highest quality medical care and training. Where are the programs here? What kind of program could have been implemented by this insensitive government if it had not tampered with the most valuable element available to anyone, good health?

The minister allowed a few irresponsible people to manage a health care program in Saskatchewan. By her intervention today she demonstrated her frustration with regard to the provision of medical care for our Indians in terms of glasses, dentures and emergency treatment. I respect the minister's intervention because she is right. The matter did not relate directly to the bill, but I think the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) and our critic on Indian affairs were able to tie it in very nicely with the matters contained in this bill. The hon. member for Athabasca said that abuses are not committed by one group of people or any particular level in society.

He cited the experience he has daily working in the emergency ward of an Ottawa hospital.

What kind of department would allow a $12 million deficit in one province because of irresponsible management by officials? Let us make no mistake that it is the province of Saskatchewan which has triggered this reaction by this government. This reaction is the result of irresponsible officials who just did not know how to budget. They could not say no to someone who needed a tenth pair of glasses because the person had been in fights every month of the year. They could not say no to somebody who needed a sixth pair of dentures. They could not say no to somebody who wanted a free ride on an aircraft from La Ronge to Regina so that he could go out and get drunk.

I realize that those are the exceptions and not the rule, but the problem was that the people within the departments concerned, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of National Health and Welfare, did not have the guts to say no. As a result, in one province the department was $12 million over budget in one year, last year. We have not heard a word from the government about it.

In the committee, as recorded at page 7:21 of the report for December 12, 1978, the minister said the following:

> You want a simple answer, why were the provincial ministers not consulted on my cuts, because they are not elected in the federal portfolio; they have no accountability whatsoever of my budget to any Canadian voter and I really resent the suggestion of the member.

In other words, the minister was telling us that she runs the store and nobody else. There is no consultation, just confrontation. The word "confrontation" is not new to this government. I heard a beautiful example of confrontation on the radio the other day in Victoria. I suppose the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) thought no one would hear or recognize his voice. I suppose he thought no one would be able to come back to this House and say that a parliamentary secretary went on the radio publicly and said that the hon. Tom Waterland, a British Columbia minister, is a fool. That is the kind of confrontation problems we have with this government.

It is no wonder the provinces are upset with this government when an irresponsible remark like that is made by a parliamentary secretary. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary was speaking for his minister; perhaps he was. I have no way of knowing, but he said that clearly. I heard it with my own ears. God knows, I have heard the hon. member's voice in committee enough to recognize his voice. He received a proper introduction, and he said "the minister is a fool", referring to the hon. Tom Waterland. That was confrontation, and the statement by this minister was confrontation.

However, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare wants to run the store, I wonder why she did not tell the province of British Columbia, with reference to the Shaughnessy Hospital for Sick Children, that somebody in the provincial department sent her an application but that it was not signed. I wonder why the minister did not indicate that if the province of British Columbia wanted to qualify for assistance, it should have had its application in on time and made sure it was signed, and then the federal government would see that the province got the money.

The minister, instead, was very honest with them in Vancouver in June. She told them: "I will be winding down this program, so get in your applications in a hurry". I give the minister full credit for doing so. She told them in advance what was going to happen. They were slow in responding and as a result there will be a $4 million shortfall for the Shaughnessy Hospital for Sick Children in Vancouver to be borne by the taxpayers of British Columbia instead of the money coming from this program. It is correct that at least in part the province is responsible for that foul-up, but, after all, the minister herself said on December 12 at a meeting of the committee that she is responsible, that this is a unilateral effort, that the provincial people should not get involved and should not try to tell her what to do, that she is running the store—

An hon. Member: "Trying" to run to store.

Mr. Brisco: Yes, as my colleague says, trying to run the store.

I should like to comment on what the minister has had to say, as recorded in the proceedings of December 14 of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, at page 8:7. She said:

> No, I never said that, Mr. Chairman. My full time is consultation with these bodies. I said that for Bill C-2, I did not consult the provinces, there was no way I could consult the provinces—unfortunately.

She went on to say:

> These bodies would have pressed their provincial governments, not the federal government. The initiative rests with the provinces to submit to us whatever projects they want to see us pay for.

That is very true and the minister is correct. But what the minister has failed to do is to reconcile that statement with the other statement she made on December 12 at a meeting of the same committee, when she said that she herself runs the store.

Let me say in conclusion that I will vote against Bill C-2 because there is no question but that health care for Canadians is of prime importance and must continue. I hope that in the next few months we will have an opportunity to introduce our own program which will provide for the concerns that have been mentioned in speeches by members of the House.

I should like to say in closing that my observation of speeches of the minister both in the House and outside the House on television is that at times there is a conflict in what she has said, as was pointed out today by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen). At the same time, in the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the minister has demonstrated a degree of concern for the poor people of Canada of which I heartily approve. I feel that the minister does indeed have a heart, but I also feel that she is the unfortunate victim of policies inflicted upon the cabinet by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who, returning from Morocco, decided, during a heat stroke, to implement a program of restraint. All of a sudden he was smitten with an attack of nausea caused by the bug of inflation and advised the nation that he is fed up. I am just as fed up as the Prime Minister, indeed more, and because I am fed up I welcome the opportunity to vote against this bill and the opportunity, not too far down the road, to defeat this tired government.

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity to take part in this debate which relates to the fields of science and research with which I have been involved. I will speak about this some time later and bring out some of the specifics of the scientific aspects with which I have been dealing. But let me say first, as many of my colleagues on this side of the House have said before me, that I sincerely sympathize with the minister in her efforts to cover up the shameful cutbacks in medical funds which are outlined in this bill. She stated in her opening speech on third reading of Bill C-2 that:

There was a need to curtail certain levels of planned expenditures in current and future department budgets for which I am responsible,

Instead of saying this, why was it not stated that a directive has come directly from upstairs to cut the expenses down as much as possible and still come up with a program which will make it look as though this was a government of restraint, about which the opposition has been speaking for many years? Why did the minister not say ths was a directive which came out of some of the fuddle-duddled thoughts of her boss who, as my colleague has just said, saw the light all of a sudden? Was it because, as another hon. member said, Proposition 13 was very much in the air at the time? Or was it just the sunshine of Morocco which gave him a heat stroke at a time when the Queen was visiting the country? Possibly it was these thoughts that were going through his mind which prevented the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) from coming back to Canada and being an honourable host when the Queen visited this country to open the Empire Games.

The point I would like to emphasize in reference to Bill C-2 is not that the government has finally realized that restraint is important, but that its method of imposing this restraint by sudden, arbitrary cuts reflects nothing else but poor management of the whole situation. This was discussed briefly by my colleague, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), but allow me to elaborate in a few words.

Back on November 21, in my maiden speech to the House, I spoke on the subject of management in government circles. In addition to some nine years of studies into biochemical and nutritional science techniques, I have been involved, since I left the research field, with business circles for the last 20 years. I pointed out in my speech that good management must apply in government just as in business. The businessman who uses poor management and ends up with deficits year after year ends up in bankruptcy. This is just what is happening to the present government, and this is what is going to happen to Canada.

The restraints being put into effect by the federal government now are very much needed, as they have been over the last eight or ten years, but the fact should have been realized before this program was started in 1966. The inability to plan and to manage of the Trudeau government is now showing up, and all of a sudden savings must be made and spending cuts applied in a hurry. So we see the band-aid efforts that are in effect. This is the difference between good and bad government. Just as in business, a good government looks ahead and plans on a total financial basis for many years ahead, through wise judgment and planning on the part of wise, conscientious and knowledgeable politicians and administrators. They utilize their experience and wisdom to plan the best methods of achieving optimum results.

A bad government, on the other hand, gives little thought to the future. The plans and the budget are only loosely coordinated. There is little planning and there is little thought for optimization of finances and the ensuing results. This is the present state of affairs as it applies to Bill C-2. The years of poor planning and mismanagement of the present government have caught up to it, and now the country is in deep trouble. It is easy merely to take a pencil and erase figures in the budget for the immediate future. That would provide a turnaround; it is a very simple financial transaction. But even in the planning of such restraint, thought must be given to a method of maximizing the value of dollars being spent. This should have been done by the present Liberal government ten years ago, and it should have been continued as years went by.

At a time when dollar efficiency must be maximized, certainly it is a sign of poor management to cut research dollars. Surely a decrease of 17 per cent in the original research expenditure on short notice shocked those involved in the program. It is relatively easy to cut straightforward spending programs on a short notice basis, but research is an area which requires time to plan the general research program and to train personnel whose backgrounds are precise and specific. Also the necessary equipment for research is complex and costly. This area requires careful study to ensure optimum dollar effectiveness. Optimum returns to dollar expenditure may be realized in the area of research.

The ramifications of the proposed cut in medical funding portends grave implications for the quality of future health care in Canada. Largely, medical research is carried out under the auspices of universities and medical schools where the doctors of tomorrow learn the specialized skills of their professions. There is a direct link between research and practice in the field of medicine. Both are conducted under the same roof and reinforce each other. Any cut in medical funding lowers the standard of medical education which cannot help but result in diminished standards of medical care. The reductions in medical research caused by cuts in government funding in many instances will deprive physicians and surgeons of the consultation they require to perform their functions. In life and death situations good advice is crucial, and such good advice does not come cheaply. Yes, it is expensive but necessary. Fiscal restraint is not justified when the fate of a patient on the operating table is at stake. Practising doctors need the advice of researchers. Without it, severe limitations are placed on their capabilities.

The proposed cuts will have geographic implications as well. In the past, the lion's share of medical research funds went to institutions in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. Newer facilities in western Canada, which commenced the development of research units in the past five to ten years, will feel the pinch of such cuts proportionately more than medical institutions and schools in central Canada. Cutbacks will have a devastating effect upon programs which are just getting off the ground.

Canada has lagged behind other countries in the provisions of funds for medical research. For example, the United States spent more than $1 billion in 1978 alone, and that is only its federal government funding. The annual federal allocations in Canada pale in comparison to those in the United States. In 1978, some $63 million was expended by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and now we are faced with a cut in the health resources fund which will reduce medical spending by $84 million.

The bill we are discussing at the present time is a very important one, as spending in medical research and development is a large and significant factor when one considers the total dollar spending of government.

The cuts will have serious effects upon the quality of people in medical schools. Young medical researchers are most attracted to research institutes and universities offering opportunities to conduct high quality research in their areas of precise scientific and medical studies. These opportunities are reduced when medical research funds are cut by government. In that event medical researchers are obliged to look elsewhere, such as to the United States which seems wiser in this area and sees fit to support health research on a scale heretofore unknown in Canada. Is the government prepared to see an exodus of our best doctors and students south of the border? How much will it cost to recoup the actual and potential loss of medical knowledge and progress, which almost certainly will result from an $84 million cut? Is this the beginning of a trend whereby it will be necessary to import medical breakthroughs because the government blocked research money which would allow them to happen in Canada? Will we have de-medicalization as well as de-industrialization? My party has never been more serious in opposing a bill and its ramifications for the Canadian public than it is now.

The rationale of the quick change in thinking of the Prime Minister abruptly altered the lives of a great many Canadians. Perhaps it would not be so bad if it did not apply to the health of individual citizens. In one of the contributions on this side of the House, it was mentioned that the cost of polio research was only $41 million. The savings brought about by this one simple discovery amounted to over $200 million per year in Canada alone. How much money has this $41 million expenditure saved other countries around the world?

Polio is only one example. All members are aware of the efforts of one of Canada's foremost research teams in the years subsequent to the First World War. I am referring to Drs. Banting and Best who discovered insulin at the University of Toronto. Although the cost of that discovery was negligible, it saved Canada a large amount of money because now insulin is available for diabetics. Also it saved billions of dollars around the world.

As it is now six o'clock and I have further material to present, Mr. Speaker, I trust I may continue tomorrow.

Mr. Pinard: Filibuster.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRITICISM OF ENFORCEMENT OF AIR SAFETY REGULATIONS—CALL FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It arises from a news story by Tom VanDusen in today's Ottawa Citizen in which he quotes a government task force report that "enforcement of Canada's air safety regulations is generally unco-ordinated and often haphazard".

This is contrary to the answers given in the House by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) as recently as last Monday in which he assured that highest performance and safety standards were being followed. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House calls for the immediate resignation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and calls upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to order an immediate inquiry into all aspects of air safety.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Out, out!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Otto Lang said no.

POST OFFICE

UNION DISCIPLINING MEMBERS FOR OBEYING BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION—COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact the Letter Carriers' Union now is disciplining its own union members who crossed CUPW picket lines in order to obey the back-to-work legislation passed by the House, and in view of the statement of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) that this is only an internal matter for the union, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House direct the government to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to investigate and report on what action should be taken on this grave question of principle: does an ordinary worker obey the law of the union, or the law of Canada, when the two are in conflict?

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

MINISTER'S ADHERENCE TO OPEN-DOOR POLICY FOR WOMEN'S GROUPS SEEKING EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) told the House on January 26 that he was prepared to consult and meet with women's groups concerned about his department's undermining of employment services designed to assist women, but whereas on two recent occasions the minister categorically refused to meet with the Ottawa Women's Career Counselling Services, a successful Outreach project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House calls upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to keep his promise of an open-door policy and to meet as soon as possible with bona fide women's groups who do not want the minister to destroy employment assistance for women.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

LAY-OFFS OF LANGUAGE TRAINING STAFF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that, contrary to the allegations made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan), there is evidence that over 2,000 applications have been made to the government language school; considering that those applications have been filed but no acknowledgement nor replies have been sent; considering that in spite of those applications the minister still declines to keep the staff on duty to meet the requirements; and considering that the decision to reduce the training staff by almost 600 teachers is obviously based on inaccurate statistics, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the minister reviews his decision and, considering the applications effectively registered in relation to those which have been filed but have yet to be registered, that the minister delay the lay-off of teachers to the original date set for 1983.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT HOUSE URGE MR. BHUTTO OF PAKISTAN BE GRANTED CLEMENCY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on March 21, 1978, this House unanimously passed a motion proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) urging the government of Pakistan to commute the death sentence imposed on former prime minister Bhutto.

In view of the split decision of the Pakistan supreme court in considering the appeal and the announced intention of the government to carry out the sentence, and in view of the possibility of renewed violence in Pakistan if the sentence is carried out, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That this House, out of humanitarian concern for the stability and well-being of Pakistan, respectfully urge the government of Pakistan to grant clemency to Mr. Bhutto.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CALL FOR STATEMENT ON EXPORT POLICY OF FFMC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has been cultivating the Canadian market, attempting to get Canadians to eat more freshwater fish, and in consideration of the fact that the Independent Fish Company Limited of Winnipeg has been denied fish from the FFMC, with the explanation being that orders to foreign markets must be filled first, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment make a statement on motions today stating whether or not it is a policy of the FFMC to give priority to foreign orders before meeting the needs of the Canadian market, and further explain how this practice allows Canadians to follow the "Buy Canadian" policy.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SAFEGUARD PROVISIONS IN SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS TO ARGENTINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House direct that the negotiations entered into with the government of the Argentine for the sale of a second Canadian nuclear reactor be discontinued by AECL until it has been clearly established that materials from the present reactor sold by Canada to the Argentine are not being used for the production of nuclear weapons material, as suggested in a statement by Admiral Madero, president of the Argentine National Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON CONSUMER PRICES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who, as we all know, has spoken very fondly of his falling dollar.

Can he tell the House today some of the consequences of the fall in our dollar, consequences in respect of consumers in Canada? In particular, would the minister indicate to the House whether he is aware that beef is now selling in Omaha for $64 per hundredweight and the same type of beef is selling wholesale in Toronto for $78 to $80 per hundredweight, with the main difference between the two prices resulting from the discounted Canadian dollar?

If the minister is aware of this, would he indicate to the House whether or not his department has done any study to determine the effect of Canadian-produced beef on consumer prices in Canada and, if so, could he tell the House what that study shows?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said in committee this morning that I was well aware that the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, while providing many benefits on the production side and the export side, has had some bad side-effects on the inflationary side of the economy. I have said many times that it is not unexpected, when there is devaluation of a country's currency, to suffer price increases due in many cases to prices established on international markets. I do not deny that the government is preoccupied with this matter.

I believe that the effect of beef prices on production in Canada, however, is not only related to the devaluation of the dollar. Many people are of the opinion—and there is some truth to it—that perhaps beef prices were too low some years ago and, as a result, herds were depleted. Producers are in the process of rebuilding their herds and, of course, if prices are higher it helps those producers to achieve a better production level.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all knowledgeable members of this House realize that beef prices for a time were unduly low. Would the Minister of Finance not agree that possibly half the increase in beef prices in Canada has been due to the fall in our dollar?

Would he also indicate to the House what has been the effect of his falling dollar on lumber prices in Canada? Yesterday, we learned that companies in the forest products industry had their profits increase by 86 per cent. Would the minister explain to the House the fact that lumber prices have been going up because of his cheap dollar policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that there are in the devaluation of our dollar negative effects which are mentioned by the hon. member. However I would like to advise him that we now have a dollar which makes our industrial products much more competitive on world markets, made it possible to create 125,000 new jobs in 1978 in our industrial sector. We could also increase from 82 to 87.5 per cent the use of industrial capacity in Canada thereby putting 450,000 additional people to work in one year.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance speaks of the cheap dollar helping our exports, which is a nice way to explain that the Japanese now find that it takes half the number of yen that it used to take to buy the same amount of resources from this country. But manufacturing goods are not any more competitive, in spite of his cheap dollar.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Would the Minister of Finance, who tries to convince the Canadian public that his cheap dollar is a good policy, tell the House if they have conducted any study to determine to what extent Canadian retailers and other merchants have tended to increase their prices in response to higher import prices, as opposed to leaving their prices lower to take more of the Canadian domestic market?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am very amazed that the hon. member would want to compare prices in Canada with Japan. I am informed by the Minister of Agriculture that a pound of meat in Japan costs $15. I think we are producing very well in Canada. I do not want to repeat the explanation I gave for an hour and a half this morning in committee and again this afternoon, but I think it is quite evident that the weaker the argument of the hon. member, the louder he speaks.

ACTION OF MINISTER TO PREVENT INFLATIONARY SPIRAL

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the Minister of Finance. A non-answer in Canada is the same as a non-answer in Japan. The minister might as well use Japanese as English when he answers our questions.

As the minister sees it, the main risk in the economic situation is that the inflationary spiral will get under way again. That is what he said in his speech two days ago. There are many signs of domestic inflation, apart from the imports which are affected by the depreciated dollar. The wholesale price index increased by 11.5 per cent in the 12 months ending in November. The industry selling price index increased by 9.8 per cent in the twelve months ending in December. The non-residential building construction price index was up by 8.4 per cent, and the residential building construction price index was up by 10.8 per cent in the twelve months ending in December.

In view of these indications, would the minister tell us what steps he is now going to take to deal with what he himself says is the main risk in our economic situation? What is he going to do?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member forgets to mention that the consumer price index went down from 9.8 per cent in July to 8.4 per cent last month. The CPI is the composite indicator of all price levels in Canada.

I said in October of 1977 that we would end the controls and that we should have confidence in the marketplace, and in the speech I made in Toronto on Monday I said that everyone will have to fulfil his responsibilities. I said that I am not against profits but that profits should be used to reduce prices or be reinvested in productive capacity in order to increase it and to make Canadian goods more competitive on world markets. I think both labour and management have done quite well in this regard since the end of controls and I hope they will continue to fulfil their responsibilities in 1979.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to indicate that his only policy is a policy of jawboning, and if his jawboning is no more effective outside than it is in this House, we are in desperate straits.

Two days ago, in our House of Commons committee, the governor of the Bank of Canada said:

A substantial decline in the value of the Canadian dollar relative to the United States dollar had become inevitable because of the higher rate of price and cost inflation in Canada than in the United States earlier in the 1970s.

The minister's party was in power then and it is in power now. If that was true in the earlier part of the 1970s, is it not also true that if we have a higher rate of price and cost inflation this year, we will be in great difficulties again? The minister's forecast of price inflation, which has just been raised from 6.5 per cent to 7.5 per cent, is higher than what is expected in the United States this year. Does this not indicate a very serious outlook for us?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I changed my forecast from 6.5 per cent to between 7 per cent and 7.5 per cent. That is an increase, but I think the inflation situation in Canada will be as good, if not better, than the situation in the United States. It is at this moment, and that is why I made that speech urging all Canadians to show restraint and responsibility so that we can keep our faith in the marketplace and let the market forces decide the levels. However, everyone will have to show responsibility and restraint if we want to achieve our goal.

REQUEST THAT BANKS REDUCE CHARGES TO CONSUMERS IN VIEW OF EXCESS PROFITS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said, and the Minister of Finance just said, that profits should be used to reduce prices. We now have an excellent opportunity to test the integrity of the government.

The Economic Council of Canada released a report earlier this week indicating that consumers and businesses paid chartered banks up to $500 million in what were described as "excess profits" between the years 1968 and 1973. Since 1973 the Big Five Canadian banks have had even higher profits, culminating in almost $1 billion last year, a 33 per cent increase in one year.

Will the minister put into practice what he has just preached, call in the chartered banks, point out these excess profits to them and urge them to reduce their charges to consumers and, specifically, to roll back the announced increase to 21 per cent in Chargex rates?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is putting a little too much faith in the report from which he is reading, because there has been a disclaimer by the Economic Council of Canada that it does not necessarily subscribe to that study. According to my information, that study is quite old. Those figures are for three or four years ago. They have been debated in many places, and we cannot take them at face value.

I have said that we hope profits in Canada will be used to increase productive capacity and to help reduce price increases, but since October of 1977 and since I became Minister of Finance, I have said that there should be no more controls in the marketplace. The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party asked us to get out of controls. Now that we are out of controls, let us let market forces decide.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to question the honesty of the minister at this point, but I draw to his attention that I quoted figures from 1968 to 1973, which was under study. I also pointed out, as he should bloody well know—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Hold him down, Stan.

Mr. Broadbent: —that since 1973, profits of the banks have increased at higher levels than they were in that period. Given the fact that the minister just said to the House in reply to an earlier question that profits should be used to reduce prices, will he now implement what he just said and make sure that the banks, which have excess profits, give the Canadian consumer some justice at long last?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member believes there is no competition on the marketplace at the present time. For example, when we increased the interest rates because of a very high level of competition in the mortgage market, while short term interest rates went up very quickly because of the competition on the market, mortgage rates on houses did not increase because there was some competition. I am aware that banking costs increased in some banks where profits are not very high; some other banks, however, did not follow that initiative. Take the Toronto-Dominion Bank which increased costs for the Chargex card whereas other banks did not follow that example because they thought it undesirable for the customers.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have rarely heard such hypocrisy in all my life. The Minister of Finance just indicated to the Conversative party that, not those who are simply making profits or reasonable profits, but surely those making what the Economic Council has described as excess profits should be plowing them back to help the ordinary Canadian. He has the opportunity right now to take some action. He has backtracked completely on what he indicated he would be prepared to do just two minutes ago. The same report says:

> If no excess profits . . . had been earned by the bank shareholder . . . the cost of banking service would have been lower—

This means that mortgages, consumer, small business and farm loans could have been lowered. Is the minister now saying that all of these, which is to say Canadians from coast to coast, must be overcharged because he wants to protect the profits of the banks?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, at first the hon. member said that these are the figures of the Economic Council of Canada. If he reads the report, the Economic Council of Canada has a disclaimer; they say they are not responsible and they do not take that responsibility. The hon. member is not being very fair when he gives the impression that these are figures of the Economic Council of Canada.

I would like to repeat that the figures in that study are at least five years old and there is a lot of controversy about them. Of course, the hon. member takes them at face value. He will appreciate that, as Minister of Finance, one has to look into these figures before taking them at face value. It is the least a Minister of Finance can do.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REFUSAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN PERSONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It deals with the problem that cropped up as a result of the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act on January 1, 1976 concerning persons of 65 or over. As we know, judges made a ruling last November on that group of recipients and asked the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay unemployment insurance to those people, even though they had applied for a pension under the Quebec Pension Plan or the Canada Pension Plan. Can the minister tell us whether he has reached a decision and asked the Unemployment Insurance Commission to accede to the wish of the judges who ruled in that case?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we now have 36 appeals in that connection before the arbiters of the federal court. We have also suspended their overpayment collection.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary to the minister. I am trying to find out whether those people who were refused unemployment insurance in early 1976 will get the benefits to which they are entitled according to the judges?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we have received representations from the hon. member for Gatineau in that regard. We are now looking into the situation, but we must first get the result of the appeal after which we will take a decision.

LABOUR DISPUTES

UNION DISCIPLINING MEMBERS FOR OBEYING BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General and the Minister of Justice, I direct my questions to the Minister of Labour, keeping in mind that the back-to-work legislation with regard to the Post Office was introduced by his predecessor.

On January 31, my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, raised the fact that the Letter Carrier's Union was disciplining its members who crossed CUPW picket lines after this House passed back-to-work legislation. In view of the fact the Postmaster General said this was an internal matter only for the union, my question is: what law governs an ordinary union member in the federal public service, the internal law of the union or the law of Canada as passed by the House of Commons of Canada?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that is not a very difficult question to answer. Of course, it is the law of this parliament that governs the behaviour of citizens.

Mr. Fraser: When asked practically the same question by my colleague, the Postmaster General said, in effect, there is nothing the government can do; this is an internal matter. Will the Minister of Labour take the necessary steps to have this issue taken directly to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to investigate what is going on and come back with a report, so that the principle which I have just put to the Minister of Labour and to which he has agreed will in fact be the rule of law in Canada?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I am sure there is no divergence of view between the Postmaster General and myself. Second, it would be important to ascertain whether the incidents which are alleged to have taken place took place before or after the statute was passed in this House.

Mr. Fraser: It was after; that is what I said.

Mr. O'Connell: In any case, what I would like to say in reply is that I will discuss this matter with the Postmaster General before making any kind of commitment with regard to a referral to a standing committee of this House.

PROTECTION FOR POST OFFICE WORKERS AGAINST DISCIPLINING BY UNION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am in daily contact with some of the accused postal workers in the Hamilton area. They had always been under the clear impression that they would be protected if they went back to work, as indeed parliament ordered them to do.

As an answer to the minister, I can say that these alleged violations came after parliament's legislation. Does the Minister of Labour stand by a statement by the then minister of justice, when he said at page 344 of Hansard for October 23:

> Mr. Speaker, we have been, as has the Post Office, urging the return of these various employees to work, assuring them of every possible protection in the exercise of what is now their legal duty.

When the Minister of Labour is consulting with the Postmaster General, will he find out what protection the government is giving to them now that they face what is referred to in Hamilton as these kangaroo courts?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I heard the representation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief supplementary. Does the Minister of Labour stand behind the clear undertaking given in this House by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

RESTORATION OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): After that answer, Mr. Speaker, hope again springs eternal in the human breast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in connection with a matter that deeply concerns farmers, particularly those in western Canada. My question is, is any progress being made in connection with the International Wheat Agreement, 1971, being restored and brought into effect? After I have his answer in that regard, I would like to ask a supplementary.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as near as I could ascertain today, the group meeting in Geneva will probably break up tomorrow, not having reached an agreement. Whether they have decided to convene at a later date, I do not know as yet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is a death-blow to the western wheat farmer. Is the reason for the break-up the fact that the stand taken by Canada, and also by Australia, displayed an intransigent attitude on the part of Canadian representatives in one particular, and also the other country, Australia, to which I referred? What is the reason for the break-up? Is it stubbornness on the part of Canada, or just stupidity?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I like to think the Canadian negotiators are trying to negotiate the best possible arrangement for Canadian producers, having regard to creating security of markets and the best price that can be achieved over the long term for our producers.

ALLEGED WITHDRAWAL BY QUEBEC OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S MONTHLY PAYMENT OF $20 TO ELDERLY PERSONS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Is the minister aware that the Quebec government is using the extra $20 that guaranteed income supplement recipients have been receiving since January from the federal government to supplement its own budget and that it is retaining, in a rather dubious fashion, the increase that is supposed to be for all senior citizens living in that province's institutions? If so, does she intend to ask the supposedly social democratic authorities of that province to cease and desist from this shameful practice which seems to be built in that province's system and which is contrary to any good social democratic government?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, senior citizens living in homes have reported to us that rents have increased by the amount of the indexation for January plus all or three quarters of the $20 increase. I find this last increase unacceptable and unjustifiable by the Quebec government which is recuperating, through senior citizens, moneys to which it has no claim. I can understand that provincial governments take back the indexation added every three months to the GIS, because they must face increased costs in salaries, food, electricity and heating for those institutions. But in no way do they have the moral right to do what is unfortunately being done in Quebec and also Ontario, the two largest provinces, and what I consider an anti-social act.

IMPACT OF UI CHANGES ON WOMEN—REQUEST REGULATIONS BE AMENDED

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that six provincial advisory councils on the status of women, as well as the federal advisory council, have written to the minister drawing attention to the impact of UI changes upon women, and in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman has given an undertaking to change the regulations if the impact is serious, can he give an assurance to this House that he will, by regulation, amend the 20-hour provision?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): We are at the present time studying the recommendations made not only by that group but by many others. As the hon. member knows, having spent many hours at the committee meetings, we deliberately worded the regulation to read "up to 20 hours" so that changes could be made if the effect was detrimental. We are considering that section.

Mr. Rodriguez: We are, indeed, hopeful from the minister's comments that he is studying the effects of this 20-hour, part-time work provision.

Since these councils on the status of women are holding their meeting on February 21, can the minister undertake to expedite these studies so as to be able to inform the advisory councils of the result in time to enable them to plan further action?

Mr. Cullen: I am not sure we can meet that date, or even whether we will come up with the answer which the hon. member is suggesting. I did say we were studying the impact to determine whether it is having the result some people are suggesting. I am satisfied that some of the changes we made will have to be modified, but until a complete study has been made I do not want to commit myself.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRITICISM OF ENFORCEMENT OF AIR SAFETY REGULATIONS—CALL FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Bearing in mind the severe condemnation levelled against the administration and enforcement of air safety regulations by the government's own task force, and given the fact that the minister, on Monday, accused opposition members of being irresponsible and of having no basis for alleging that air safety was deteriorating in this country, would the hon. gentleman not consider correcting or withdrawing his statement of last Monday; or perhaps he might choose the more honourable course of resigning?

Hon Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The hon. member overlooks the fact that it was because of some concern about our total package of enforcement measures that we created this task force to look into the matter and see what could be done about the situation.

The hon. member refers, as he did in his proposed motion under Standing Order 43, to a report in the newspaper today which is wrong in at least one important respect: it says that the report from the task force has been presented to me. It has not. I do not know how much else in that report is wrong, but I would hope the hon. member would also notice that what the report addresses is the question of how much regulation, enforcement and punishment we are effectively putting in place in relation to the whole aviation system. The report notes that a great deal of the responsibility rests with the good sense and law-abiding feelings of pilots, owners and operators of aircraft providing services. This is very often a very sound basis on which to be secure about safety, given the high quality and high standards of these people. The industry can, indeed, be self-regulatory to a large extent. We are concerned about back-up measures, though, and that is why we are studying the matter.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister is really backtracking; I hope he does not stumble and fall. He may not have to resign, because the next election will take care of that. Can we expect this report to be made public, or will he attempt to smother it as he seems to imply in his answer to me?

Mr. Lang: If it is, indeed, the report which the Citizen has referred to, I suppose one might say it is obviously going to be made public in one way or another. Our tradition in a very open department is to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —place reports of this sort in our library, where they are indexed and available to the public, even if we do not feel they are necessarily of the sort that deserve to be printed. I say "a very open department", noting the "raspberries" from the other side, because they may not know that we have thousands and thousands of documents available in the library.

BOEING CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF EVIDENCE GIVEN BEFORE THE SEC

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Speaking of open departments, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: On Tuesday, the Solicitor General gave us some details from the testimony of a Boeing consultant given before the SEC in Washington. As there are still many questions having to do with this matter which are unanswered, will he table the testimony which the consultant gave to the Securities and Exchange Commission?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): As I understand it, there was a deposition by Boeing in an action commenced by the Securities and Exchange Commission. That is what I was referring to. Again, as I understand it, this document is in the public domain in the United States and could be obtained by the hon. member.

Mr. McKinnon: This is a very long way from the answer the Solicitor General gave when asked by the Leader of the Opposition to tell us the name of the person or persons alleged to have received these payments. He said:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker. The individual who testified before the SEC was a gentleman who was identified as a consultant of Boeing.

He was quoting from testimony, as he well knows. Since Boeing has admitted making double payments in Canada, which payments would inevitably increase the cost of aircraft, and since two of the organizations which purchased planes from Boeing are government organizations, these costs would inevitably be passed on to the taxpayer. I believe the taxpayer has a right to know how these extra costs are incurred.

To clear up this matter, would the Solicitor General refer the situation to the public accounts committee and give the committee authority to call the Boeing consultant as a witness?

Mr. Blais: Again, the hon. member indicates, as he did yesterday, that a double payment was made by Boeing to the consultant. I again invite the hon. gentleman to tell us what he is relying upon in making that allegation.

Mr. Gillies: Boeing said so.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRODUCTION—STEPS TO DECREASE DEPENDENCY ON IRAN

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, because some 24 per cent of the oil Canada imports comes from Iran, and since there has been very little production for months and not much indication that there will be a resumption of supply in the immediate future, would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources share with the House his assessment of the situation and tell us what steps Canada is taking to replace this oil and to decrease our dependency upon oil from Iran?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated in recent answers that the situation is a serious one and that there might well be shortages affecting eastern refineries. The corporation which owns these refineries has been making plans, running down its storage and inventories and making other arrangements for shipments. For example, a very substantial shipment arrived in Port Tupper today from Kuwait.

The most promising prospect, in my view, has to do with exchanges involving Canadian oil which would be moved through the Canadian system to Chicago, replacing oil which would otherwise be brought up to that city from the United States east coast. Instead of going to Chicago through the United States system, that oil would go to Canadian ports and refineries. I believe arrangements concerning something in the order of a million barrels have already been approved by the National Energy Board, and there may be applications involving as many as three million barrels under these exchange arrangements. This would provide, as a temporary measure, a degree of security for Canadian refineries.

EFFECT OF 1974 AGREEMENT ON INTERNATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAMS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): As the minister knows, I gave him notice this morning of a question along the lines of the one he has just received from a Liberal backbencher. I am sure the information was not leaked to that hon. member. As the minister also knows, Canada was a signatory to the 1974 agreement on international energy programs which, in effect, compels participating nations to share the consequences of any world shortage of oil production. Obviously, with the curtailment of Iranian supplies there has been a decline, certainly in this first part of 1979, of a significant amount of production.

Has Canada received any notice or, in turn, has Canada given notice to any of the other signatories or participating nations respecting this shortage? Are we being compelled, rather than the swap deal with the United States, to make up any shortage to the Americans, they to us or we to any other western nation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): No, we are under no obligation at present to make any shipments to any other countries, including the U.S. The arrangement which we have put into place—when I say "we", that is to say Canada and the corporations involved in the importing of oil—was made through deals that they have made with other companies in the United States, the submissions being approved by the National Energy Board under general Canadian government policy.

Those arrangements, we believe, will see Canada through the difficulties of the near-term. They are, I think, a sound way to deal with the situation. They are a temporary solution. I do not see, at present, any indication that the trigger mechanism of the International Energy Agency will be pulled which will obligate Canada under those provisions to provide a cutback. I think that was the import of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Lawrence: As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is well aware—I am sure he has been watching the same quotations as we have from the Americans, especially Mr. Schlesinger, regarding the policy of rationing in the United States—obviously, if we are part of an international deal which will require us to help them make up their shortfall, which is what parts 1 to 5 of the 1974 agreement call for, would the minister indicate whether, if that happens, we will automatically be going on a rationing system as well? What are the possibilities of this? Is there co-operation with them in that respect? Has the minister had discussions with his counterpart in the United States about rationing for North America?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the question is a little confused in that it suggests Canada would be under an obligation to export under the International Energy Agency arrangement. That is not the case. The obligation we would have, in the event that the International Energy Agency provisions were triggered, would to cut back our imports in the same way that other countries would be obliged to cut back their imports and their consumption, and I think the key question—

Mr. Lawrence: Domestic consumption.

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said we would be obligated to cut back our domestic production. We do not have the obligation to cut back our production. The hon. member keeps calling from the sidelines that we would have to share in the sense that we would have to export our production. That is not part of the obligation. As the hon. member knows, we are a net importer of oil at present and, therefore, we would have to cut back our consumption because we would not have as many imports available to us.

The other part of his question was whether I expect it will be necessary to introduce rationing in Canada and the hon. member alluded to some remarks of the U.S. secretary. We have a contingency plan in the event of that possibility, but I do not think at present it is any more than a possibility. I believe the arrangements that are in place at present will see us through. However, just in case, we have a contingency plan.

ALLEGED DISMISSAL OF STUDENTS FROM AIR CONTROLLERS' TRAINING SCHOOL AT CORNWALL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Everybody will recall that last October 25, 16 students from Quebec went on strike at the Cornwall Institute for the training of air traffic controllers. Following the grievances formulated by these students, the minister had deemed advisable to launch an inquiry. This inquiry had discovered unintentional discrimination, according to the minister, and the students went back to training when they were guaranteed a measure of justice. Is the minister aware that six of these students have received a notice of dismissal? If so, does he intend to take action and examine the case of these young people who have now been dismissed?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, after the report, various improvements were made in the way in which teaching is conducted at the Cornwall school. Obviously, notwithstanding that, there will continue to be incidents of students failing to complete the course. This is perfectly normal and to be expected; it happens regularly to a certain percentage of those attending.

There is now a review board looking into any such dismissals and each in turn is, therefore, examined very carefully. Up to this point I am satisfied that everything is proceeding according to proper academic principles.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister realizes the problem created by this situation; I suggest this has a lot in common with the whole situation of the Association des Gens de l'air, which issued a statement, namely that the Canadian Transport Commission is really in bad faith as regards this problem. In the circumstances, they demand an inquiry by the Minister of Justice. Would the minister responsible give serious consideration to the grievances expressed by these students on this situation which grows worse and inevitably represents a hazard? I believe the minister and all my colleagues from Quebec do understand the situation. For all these reasons, would the minister at least be prepared to recommend that these students can finish their course at the regional school in Dorval? I suggest they could be welcome there and be given the adequate tools to complete their course.

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the problem with the immediate use of any other institution is that of adequate facilities being available. I have assured the hon. member that I do take these matters most seriously and have been investigating them from that point of view and satisfying myself that, in fact, discrimination has ended and proper academic principles are being followed.

EMPLOYMENT

YOUNG CANADA WORKS GRANTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns yet another matter of double payment and relates to a Standing Order 43 motion which I raised earlier this week with respect to the allocation of Young Canada Works grants in British Columbia.

Is the minister in a position today to give the House an indication as to how these grants were allocated in British Columbia and why eight of the Liberal ridings received more than half of this year's allocation of $6.3 million?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that where the hon. member has tunnel vision is in his looking at British Columbia and not at Canada as a whole. I would recommend, with respect, that he look at some of the constituencies in Newfoundland where Conservative ridings received substantially more than Liberal ridings. I think this is a bum rap.

So far as the method of calculating the funding paid out under the Young Canada Works program is concerned, that has been made available to each and every member in a letter sent to him.

Mr. Oberle: What I have done, instead, Mr. Speaker, is consult the unemployment statistics in the province of B.C. and I have taken that as a guide to raise my criticism, because what I have found is a rather distasteful and ridiculous case of political pork-barrelling which indicates to me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FINANCIAL AID TO PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY—INQUIRY WHETHER PROGRAM WILL BE IMPLEMENTED SHORTLY

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Given the fact that the federal government has announced its pulp and paper industry financial assistance program and given the importance that industry has in the province of Quebec, given the fact that it is urgent to protect the 30,000 jobs that already exist and those which will be created and finally given the fact that this program is a two-tier program, that is the federal government and that of Quebec both have obligations as to its implementation, does the minister think it could be implemented in the next few weeks?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I can be optimistic and say that our negotiations are going quite well. The consultations which preceded the announcement of the program between my department and several departments in the governments of several provinces tend to indicate that the negotiations which are to lead to the signature of a formal agreement between my department and the Quebec government should be rapidly completed. So, we should be in a position to sign the agreement and offer the program to companies which will apply and want to take advantage of it.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF CANADIAN LAKES BY UNITED STATES INDUSTRIES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Environment. Statements made by the minister of the environment for the province of Ontario this week indicate that acidic rain originating for the most part in the United States is destroying the fish population in at least 140 Ontario lakes. This situation is posing a serious threat, not only to the environment but to the tourist industry of northern Ontario and, eventually, Quebec.

Has the minister urged his United States counterpart to crack down on the United States industries which are polluting our Canadian lakes? Has the minister been able to elicit the co-operation of U.S. authorities in a campaign to clean up the affected lakes?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will recall that when the Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Vance, was visiting Canada last fall, he and our Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that we would be signing an air quality treaty, with the United States. This announcement was made with acid rain and other matters in mind.

My officials, along with Ontario officials, have had meetings with United States officials concerning this very serious matter. We will be holding further meetings later this month. We are moving as fast as we can with United States officials to try to effect an appropriate agreement.

LABOUR DISPUTES

PROTECTION FOR POST OFFICE WORKERS AGAINST DISCIPLINING BY UNION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there is a question I would like to follow up respecting the postal workers in Hamilton. Since the Minister of Labour said that in fact he is standing behind the statement made by the Minister of Justice that these postal workers would be protected if they went back to work pursuant to the law passed by parliament, what action is the government taking in order to give those workers protection?

What steps are being taken to prevent the internal harassment to which the workers are being subjected? The actions being clearly illegal, what steps is the Solicitor General taking to investigate the matter and to follow up with charges in order to afford the substantial and de facto protection promised by the government?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that my name came up halfway through the hon. member's question, I trust that it was directed to me. I will take notice of the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA STUDY—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from answers given earlier today during oral questions by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). The minister said two things which are quite disturbing.

I made reference to a study produced by the Economic Council of Canada in which it documented what was claimed to have been excess profits in the period 1968 to 1973. Obviously I do not have the words of the Minister of Finance written down, but I am sure I can convey the accurate sense of what he said earlier today. He implied that the study had been repudiated by the Economic Council of Canada, and that an official disclaimer had been issued by the Economic Council of Canada. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, the minister was casting severe criticism on Professor Mintz who spent more than three years doing a study requested by the Government of Canada.

Would the minister confirm that it is the standard practice of the Economic Council of Canada, when a study is released in the name of one individual, to issue such a disclaimer? That is the standard practice. It is not exceptional for the Economic Council of Canada to make clear that a report is issued in the name of an individual. Surely the crucial point is that when the council makes such a statement, it is not dissociating itself from the findings. It is simply indicating that one individual did the work. If the minister is referring only to the standard disclaimer, it is an understatement to say I find it disagreeable that aspersions should be cast on the quality of work of a man who worked almost three years for a government agency. If the minister is referring to a more specific disclaimer which calls into question the quality of work, I am not aware of it, and I hope he will clarify that.

My second point is equally serious. The minister indicated that I was using outdated statistics in my question. That is false as well. I am not saying that the minister deliberately misled the House; I am saying only that he misled the House. In my question I referred to current statistics which were derived from official reports produced by the companies themselves. I do not intend to read all the statistics, but I should like to refer to two statistics for the years 1977 and 1978. The profits of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank of Canada and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce for 1977 increased by 10.6 per cent, which was well above average. For the most recent year 1978, their profits were up 34.4 per cent to almost $1 billion. In short, the trend to which Professor Mintz referred in the earlier period has continued up to the present. The statistics I used were accurate and current ones, and I resent the implication that I was doing something to the contrary.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I referred to the study, I was referring to the paragraph appearing on the first page which reads as follows:

The findings of this study are the personal responsibility of the author and, as such, have not been endorsed by members of the Economic Council of Canada.

The hon. member referred to the study and to the figures, but I should like to indicate that I have checked the tables used in that study. Some of the tables were for 1963 and the last year used was 1973. I made the point that the study contained data which were no longer applicable today.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) indicated that other up to date figures were used. That could be, but I just indicated that the background figures used in the study were old ones. The hon. member used other figures to show that the profits of banks had increased lately. I recognize that the profits have increased lately, but I should like to repeat that if there are good profits in some areas, they should be used to reduce prices whenever possible or to improve productivity.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, earlier I gave an answer provided to me by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) which has turned out to be not completely accurate.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Chrétien: I referred to the price of beef and I should like to clarify my answer. Sirloin steaks are selling for $5.62 U.S. per kilogram in Ottawa, compared to $6.37 in Washington, $9.74 in London and $14 in Bonn. Earlier in error I said that sirloin steaks were selling in Japan at $15; but I should have said that they were selling at an unbelievable $41.20 in Tokyo. When I said "$15," I was being modest; I did not want to create a false impression. Thus, I have referred to the figures which appeared in today's edition of the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. La Salle: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members will recognize that there was some misunderstanding between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). That misunderstanding has been cleared up, and what remains is a disagreement, not a question of privilege.

Also the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has given the Chair notice of a question of privilege.

MR. BREWIN—REFUSAL OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION TO DIVULGE CONTENTS OF MEMORANDUM

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I gave Your Honour notice of a question of privilege which involves the refusal of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to make available to myself and other concerned parties a written statement made by the minister and called a "clarifying memorandum". According to the minister's letter, apparently it was sent out to all offices of his department, including his regional officials.

● (1510)

The underlying facts can be stated very briefly regarding the so-called clarifying memorandum dealing with the admission and deportation of Chilean refugees.

An inter-church committee on human rights in Latin America, composed of representatives of the Roman Catholic, United, Anglican, Presbyterian and Lutheran churches, was anxious, in pursuance of its efforts to assist refugees of Chile, where terror and torture have been habitually used, to obtain copies of any directives issued by the minister's office bearing on this question of admission of refugees. I passed this request on to the deputy minister and to the minister, but no document was made available.

I can pass over the intermediate correspondence and say that on February 6 the minister wrote to me and said this clarifying memorandum, as he called it, was in fact sent out as an internal departmental document to regional offices, but the minister was not prepared, on the basis of a long-standing practice, to release an internal memorandum of this nature.

I point out to you first of all, Mr. Speaker, that the immigration policy by section 3 declares the policies of this parliament on immigration, and includes (g) which is to fulfil Canada's international legal obligations with respect to refugees and to uphold its humanitarian tradition with respect to the displaced and the persecuted.

You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, as members of this House are aware, that the exercise of this power under the act to admit refugees is covered by a series of discretionary jurisdictions conferred on officials of the department, so that when the minister sends out a memorandum dealing with the matter he in fact is giving directives as to how this power shall be exercised. It is obvious, therefore, in effect, that the memorandum was a directive to officials as to how they should exercise their discretion in respect of allowing refugees either to come to Canada or stay in Canada.

I submit there is a clear case here of breach of privilege. As a member of this House I am deprived of the ability to review the memorandum and the decision, and to advise those who sought my advice on the matter. I submit that the action of the minister in refusing to make this document available to me and, presumably, to other members of the House and to those who sought it, namely, the committee of the churches to which I have referred, is contrary to the purposes of the act which refer to the humanitarian traditions of Canada. I submit that it is a deprivation of would-be immigrants' or refugees' basic rights and elementary justice. How can a refugee state his case under the various provisions set out in the act and the regulations unless he knows what instructions the officer examining him may happen to have in regard to admission?

Again I suggest this is a shocking disregard of the right of members of this House to know what is done in the name of this House in dealing with a statutory authority given by this House. The minister, under the pretence that this is an internal matter, refuses to disclose what is a general document issued for the instruction of his officials. I suggest that this action of the minister shows his insensitivity to the need for co-operation with voluntary organizations, such as the churches, in looking after this obligation of Canada in accordance with its humanitarian traditions.

Furthermore, this amounts to a breach of the promise made on behalf of the minister, with the minister present, to a committee of this House, the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, which was examining the act. On that occasion a Mr. Tait, who is an official of the department, was stating the view and interpretation of the act, and in the presence of members of the committee and the minister he said it had been decided that basic directives of the department would be made public. Instead of that, we have this policy of continued, blatant secrecy, all too common in this House.

I therefore urge on Your Honour that this is a prima facie case of privilege and, if you rule that it is, I would move that the minister be instructed to divulge this document. The House could then deal with the matter following your ruling.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): First and foremost, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in sending me a copy of the letter he wrote to you indicating he would be raising this question of privilege today.

I have reviewed all the correspondence with the hon. member leading up to his letter to you of February 7 in which he indicated he would be raising a question of privilege. Quite sincerely, I believe we have acted entirely properly in our responses to the hon. member, and that we have provided him with all the information relevant to his concerns. I will provide you, Mr. Speaker, with copies of the correspondence.

I would further suggest that this so-called question of privilege should more properly be put as a notice of motion for the production of papers.

On December 8, however, I wrote to the hon. member in response to his request to myself and my deputy minister and provided full information on our policy regarding deportation to Chile of persons whose claim to refugee status had been rejected by the refugee status advisory committee. In that letter, after acknowledging the questions he was asking in his earlier letter to me, I said this:

> Our current procedure is that once the Immigration Appeal Board has confirmed our decision in those cases where this is applicable, the individual is allowed sixty days to leave Canada to a country of his choice. If the individual cannot or will not depart voluntarily to a third country, deportation to Chile is then carried out. However, the sixty-day period can be extended in those cases where approval to enter a third country seems imminent.
> Where humanitarian conditions are found to exist, the individual will be permitted to remain in Canada and permanent status approved.
> In summary, the commission has always carefully reviewed cases involving possible deportation to Chile. For some months in 1977-78 deportation was deferred in individual cases while additional information on the possibility of admission to a third country was obtained. In order to ensure a uniform understanding of the commission's position, as described above, a clarifying instruction was issued to all offices in September, 1978.

I gave the hon. member the full story so far as deportation to Chile is concerned, and the letter was based directly on an internal document, as I indicated to the hon. member. I indicated in the letter that there was nothing further to add to what I had put in my letter. Secondly, I made clear in my letters of both December 8 and February 6 that I did not myself issue any instruction or statement on this matter in August, 1978, or at any subsequent time.

I have been completely open and frank in providing the hon. member with information on this matter and do not believe his rights have in any way been infringed.

The hon. member raises a second question about a commitment made at the committee stage. In my letter of February 6 I commented on this as follows:

> Your letter makes reference to a commitment made before the Parliamentary Committee by the former Executive Director of Immigration and Demographic Policy. In my view, we have completely conformed to that undertaking and have made the Immigration Manual available for use by the Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Statutory Regulations. We have, as well, instructed that these documents be made available for inspection at our offices throughout Canada to members of the public, and have deposited copies with the Library of Parliament. I do not view internal working memoranda of the type you have raised as falling into the category of documents that must be released to the public.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have given the hon. member all of the information he requires. I indicated that it was based on an internal memorandum. I indicated that there was nothing else that needed to be disclosed.

We have tried to be open and above board with regard to this matter, because it is a matter of concern to many counsel who represent people who might be seeking refugee status in Canada. That information is certainly available to the public through the library and through our offices across Canada. If the hon. member feels that he has a case to put a motion for production of papers, we will debate that at that time, but I hardly think that his rights have been infringed upon.

Mr. Speaker: I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising. I want to tell him in advance that he will have to persuade me that this matter is distinct from any other application for a document from a minister resisted by the minister for his own reasons. In order to constitute this in any way as a question of privilege, there would have to be something which distinguishes it from an application for a document from the minister which the minister resists for his own reasons, whether I disagree or agree with them.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I accept your point as one that must be dealt with in supporting the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), but it seems to me there is a difference. First, the suggestion made by the minister that my friend should put his request in the form of a notice of motion for the production of papers would be futile since the minister has already said that he would refuse. There seems to be no possibility of getting anything by that method.

What makes this different from the ordinary document which a member tries to obtain through the order paper, it seems to me, is that in effect the clarifying memorandum is really an interpretation of the law. It is not good enough for a department to give to a citizen a statement of what is in the law or a précis of it. Citizens have a right to know what the law says, and that applies to acts which have been passed by parliament and to regulations passed under those acts.

What we have here is not a regulation passed under an act, but a departmental interpretation of the act and the regulations which in effect is the law covering the situation. It seems to me that on that basis the minister ought to be called upon to produce the document.

My hon. friend has suggested that he would be prepared to move a motion calling upon the minister to do so. If that suggestion is not acceptable, I have an alternative suggestion, that perhaps this matter ought to be referred to the committee on statutory instruments. If my case is valid, that it is in effect law, then I think that the document should be produced; but if that committee were to find that it was an internal document, then, of course, the minister's position would stand. Surely, the place for that kind of an issue to be settled is not in debate between the minister and the hon. member for Greenwood, but by some body which is competent to judge the nature of this document.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to deal with this point. If he is indicating that this is added in some way to the body of law that every citizen is entitled to know and to receive, then how can I consider it to be a breach of privilege by a member of parliament? If it is something that is in that sense in the public domain and, as the hon. member maintains, it is a right which any citizen may assert, how can I classify it as the right only of a member of parliament in order to qualify it as a question of privilege? It seems to me that I am caught no matter in which direction I move.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that it is a privilege only of the hon. member for Greenwood or members of parliament. I am suggesting that the privileges of the citizens of this country are affected by the denial of this document to a member of parliament.

This matter is somewhat similar to the case raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) just recently. He had requested a document, not just for himself but for a constituent. My friend would like this document, which he believes is part of the law, so that all those named, the church organizations and individuals, will know what is in it. He does not want the document for himself but so that the public will know what is in it.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Either one or the other, Mr. Speaker. Either the directives given by the minister are part of the legislation in which case they are public and the hon. member may have access to them; or they are not part of the law and then it is up to the minister to communicate them to the hon. member or not. When the minister suggests a notice of motion for the production of papers which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) assumes will be rejected, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should know that this alternative would give the opportunity to launch a debate of over one hour in this House during which each member may get a chance to express his or her views instead of doing so by raising the question of privilege.

So to me, Mr. Speaker, the alternative is very clear, very simple: either these directives are part of the legislation and then they are public and it is not a question of privilege, as you did mention, or they have nothing to do with the piece of legislation itself and thus are not part of the law. In that case, the minister may or may not release them. There is no doubt about that.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat, I am not in a preliminary way persuaded that there is any difference from a regular application for a document held by a minister, but I think I owe it to the hon. members who have argued and urged the case that I research it. I will endeavour to do so as quickly as possible and return with my ruling. I think I could give it by tomorrow, or at the very latest on Monday.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the deputy government House leader, today being Thursday, if he could deal with the House business. Before he deals with the general business could he tell us whether or not he has had consultation with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) as to whether or not it is the intention of the Minister of Finance in this session of parliament to bring forward amendments to the Municipal Grants Act. I do not know how far we could go in dealing with the matter, but I have made the suggestion that a bill be brought forward containing the appropriate amendments and the subject matter be referred to a standing committee of the House. Once there it could be examined and municipal representatives from across the country could be called as witnesses. It is a problem that is not only common to the national capital but to other parts of Canada. If he has not had an opportunity to consult with the Minister of Finance with respect to that procedure, would he do so and advise the House today at some point?

While the minister is on his feet, could he tell us the government's intention with regard to legislative business on into next week?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, on the first point regarding amendments to the Municipal Grants Act, there is no doubt a great deal of concern about this across Canada, and to myself as well in my association with the Pickering airport expropriation issue. This subject is of great interest to the government, and we are giving consideration to the matter at the present time. I am not in a position to make a statement on behalf of the government as to the procedure which would be adopted to deal with that matter. I have not discussed it specifically in terms of a strategy here in the House with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), but I will undertake to do so and report back as soon as possible.

On the second point with regard to House business into next week, it is our intention, as all hon. members know, to continue today with Bill C-2. Following its completion, which should be very shortly today, we would then go to second reading of Bill C-12 which deals with the superannuation fund, and following that we will deal with Bill C-37, the amendments to the Income Tax Act and borrowing authority and Bill C-29, dealing with amendments to the National Housing Act. Then we would hope next week, if agreement can be reached between all parties, to deal with Bill C-35, which is the government organization bill. We would hope to reach agreement on limiting the debate to two or three speakers.

We also hope to deal next week with Bill C-28, the Northwest Territories Act legislation, if we can limit that debate to perhaps one speaker per party. In addition to that, tomorrow is an opposition day, and agreement has been reached for an allotted day for Tuesday, February 13.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to discuss with the deputy government House leader matters with respect to Bill C-35 and Bill C-28. I indicate to him that there is no intention to hold up that legislation. I will discuss this with him.

While I am on my feet, there is one other matter which is important. I thank the minister for his undertaking with respect to grants in lieu of taxes legislation. It is particularly important because, as the minister probably knows, the Minister of Finance is planning a meeting with the mayor of the city of Ottawa on February 19, and it would be interesting to know how he will be dealing with that legislation.

However, there is one other item which I do not know how to handle. I do not know whether I should address this matter to Your Honour as chairman of a committee which does not exist now, or whether I should address it to the deputy government House leader. I will take a chance and address it to the deputy government House leader. It has to do with the special committee which Your Honour chaired in the last session with respect to the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons. There was considerable discussion in that committee—and I must say that it was very amicable—with respect to the possibility of permitting the broadcasting, either through House of Commons facilities or through private broadcasting facilities, of the proceedings of the standing committees of the House of Commons. That is something we could perhaps deal with.

The unfortunate thing is that in this session there has not been a reference to re-establish that committee, which was working reasonably well. I think that if it is important that the general public look into the House of Commons to see what happens here, the public should recognize that this is only part of our work and that the daily grind of work in parliament and the process of legislation does not all take place here but that it also takes place in the standing committees. Even as this parliament is ending, I think it would be appropriate if that parliamentary committee were reconstituted. It might be able to do something, at the tail end of this parliament, relating to the broadcasting of committees. It might be able to do that, but it certainly could prepare for another parliament in any event, and I think that would be very helpful.

With respect to this parliament, I am sure that if we talked to representatives of the television media we would find that they would be anxious, on an ad hoc basis, to go into the committees.

There is a whole host of matters with which we have to deal, and if the deputy government House leader is not equipped today, would he speak to his colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), to see whether that reference could be made so that that committee could be reconstituted under the chairmanship of Your Honour and we could get on with the work and finish it? If the minister cannot answer, would he give me an undertaking that he will at least speak to his colleague?

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Quite evidently, the government is very much interested in making sure that the public has access to the deliberations of the House of Commons. It was for that reason that we introduced legislation to make that possible, so quite evidently the broad question raised by the hon. member about the reconstitution of the committee is important. Not having had notice of this question, I will indicate that I am prepared to take this matter up with the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and my colleagues to find out what means might be best suited to the resolution of this question, and we will report back.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for that. There is one matter with respect to Bill C-35 which I should like to raise. There have been some discussions about the possibility of splitting that bill so that the fisheries portion of it would go to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and the balance to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. We are willing to do that if that bill is to be brought forward and if that could be arranged.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the various bills the minister has listed for debate for the next little while, and with respect to the two bills concerning which he thought there might need to be discussion, I would be quite prepared to enter into such discussions on behalf of my colleagues. However, since the point has now been raised here on the floor about the possibility of sending Bill C-35 in part to one committee and in part to another, we would go along with that. We think the House should take whatever steps are generally acceptable to proceed expeditiously with that bill.

While I am on my feet, I would like to ask the deputy government House leader if he, with all the urgency and concern he can command, will speak to his colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), and perhaps to other cabinet colleagues, about the desirability of bringing before this House, before something happens which might bring it to an end, at least some legislation respecting the veterans of this country.

There are three or four outstanding issues which are very serious. They should not be put over until the fall or to another year. Thus far there is nothing on the order paper. Nothing in sight is being done for Canadian veterans at this session, so I ask the deputy government House leader if he will raise this matter seriously and with concern with his colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the cooperative spirit which is being exhibited here today with respect to Bill C-35 and Bill C-28. In direct response to the suggestion that Bill C-35 be split and sent in two directions to two different committees, I am not in a position to be able to respond in positive terms to that suggestion at the moment but we will deal with it. I understand the disposition of the Conservative party in that respect and the agreement of the House leader for the New Democratic Party. Those two factors will be taken into account, and we will report back.

The second point raised is with respect to possible legislation dealing with veterans. This is a matter the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has raised with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in this House previously, and I think that the substantive question as to what should be done is something which ought to be dealt with by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in due course. Once a decision is made with respect to that, then the Deputy Prime Minister and the cabinet would have to concern themselves with the priorities which would be assigned to such legislation. When that is done, a report will be made in due course.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the confusion which is in the mind of the deputy government House leader, I am speaking with the consent of my House leader regarding the splitting of Bill C-35 to see to it that, as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) wished, the fisheries part would go to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and the balance to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. We agree to that. I think my friends in the New Democratic Party would as well. I do not know whether they have had any consultation in this regard, but I think that is the general feeling at this time, and I am sure—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what I said. We agree.

Mr. Cafik: Perhaps I was being overly cautious. It is my understanding that that is likely to be the case, but I do not like to stand here before the House and make an absolute commitment that that will happen without having certainty in my mind. I think that is the disposition. It has been discussed but I want to check into it further. I think all hon. members will not be disappointed with the final result, but I want to be certain before I make that kind of absolute commitment.

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 238—REPLY BY MR. FRANCIS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, as recorded at page 2986 of Hansard for yesterday, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) raised a point of order concerning myself. He said, and I quote:

—Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that this government is supplying some kind of information to one of its own members, namely, the hon. member for Ottawa West, but not supplying us with this information—

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the hon. member that if he had spoken to me privately, I could quite easily have cited to him the public sources which I used.

On October 10 of last year the answers to my questions Nos. 1,958, 1,959 and 2,003 were printed in Hansard. The statement in response to my question was very clear that as of March 31, 1978, the balance in the public service superannuation account was $9,053,353,887.

A question was also raised about projections for the fund. I put down question No. 624 in this session, the answer to which was printed in Hansard of January 23. The President of the Treasury Board has indicated the projection was $39,872,700,000 for 1990 and $1,197,387,800,000 for the year 2025. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has only to read Hansard. I would be delighted to assist him in doing a little more work in preparing for this debate which is apparently his concern. But the suggestion that there has been information supplied to me which is not a matter of public record for every member of this House is completely and totally false.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is constant confusion over these matters when the government refuses to answer these questions. In the literature the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is distributing he is giving the distinct impression that $9 billion cash is in this pension fund. If there is $9 billion there, the government should be answering the questions which I placed on the order paper last October 17.

I want to know the following: In what instruments was the $9 billion invested, and in what amounts? In what debt series are these investments, the issue numbers of the instruments and the rate of interest on the investment? The government is creating suspicion by not answering precise questions. The hon. member for Ottawa West is trying to give the distinct impression that there is cash there. We want to know whether there is cash in the fund or whether it is a non-funded liability. If it is a non-funded liability pension fund it means there is not one red cent in it.

MR. McKINNON—BOEING CONTRACT—EVIDENCE GIVEN BEFORE SEC

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) for remaining in the chamber to hear my point of order. My point of order concerns an answer he gave to me during the question period. I raised a question based on a detailed answer he had given to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on February 6 concerning the Boeing agent and his activities. There is quite a bit of information in that answer which is not readily available.

The Solicitor General in his answer said:

The individual who testified before the SEC—

—and I presumed he had the testimony that was given before the SEC. Today the Solicitor General claimed that it was obtained from a deposition given on behalf of the Boeing company in front of the SEC. That deposition came as a result of a civil action commenced by the Securities and Exchange Commission dated July 1978 against Boeing. The action was heard by the district court, and a judgment was given concerning this matter. In the judgment Boeing had to comply with several conditions. Among these conditions was a requirement to file form 8-K with the commission. In accepting these conditions Boeing agreed to disclose information in a current report on form 8-K for the month of July 1978. The document goes on to require "Any instances of the existence of two consulting contracts with the same consultant providing for payments of compensation under each contract for the same services designed to facilitate the payment of money into accounts maintained by the consultant outside his own country". This was duly filed on July 28, 1978. I have the document here and it is some 15 pages long. Nowhere in that deposition or indeed in any of the other documents I have quoted from is there any word about who the individual is. And yet the Solicitor General gave us to understand on Tuesday that he knew. Because the Leader of the Opposition asked the minister:

> —does he know the name or names of the person or persons alleged to have received those payments mentioned in the deposition from Boeing—

The Solicitor General answered:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker. The individual who testified before the SEC was a gentleman who was identified as a consultant of Boeing and who was working as a Boeing consultant in Canada dealing with the sale of Boeing aircraft to Canada. Payments were made to that consultant in the ordinary course of dealing with that company.

There is not one word of this in the deposition. It says that double payments were made in Canada to obtain the Canadian sales. I do not know, and the House does not know, where the Solicitor General obtained this detailed information about the agent. One would assume that he probably obtained it because the agent testified before a subcommittee of the SEC on March 24, 1977, some nine days after that sweetheart treaty was signed between the two governments protecting anyone who gave evidence which was likely to be disadvantageous to either government. I do not mind if the Solicitor General gets up and refuses to give the information because he thinks it will hurt the country or because he does not want to give it, but I do not like his claiming that it came out of some document it did not come out of. I would like the Solicitor General to clarify that point, if he would be so kind.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to do that. Indeed, I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that the identity of the individual could be obtained from the transcript of the hearings before the SEC. I never indicated that I have those transcripts. The hon. gentleman asked me to provide documentation. I have the documentation which he has identified today and he has pointed out that the name of the individual does not appear. I informed the hon. gentleman and the Leader of the Opposition that it was not my intention to reveal the individual's name. I know the name of the individual. Indeed, there has been a complete investigation.

The whole series of questions asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and the Leader of the Opposition, and I believe by other members of this House, were with reference to an investigation that had been conducted by the RCMP. The whole thrust of my replies pointed out that the investigation had been very thorough and complete. As a result of that investigation I informed the House that there was no evidence of impropriety relating to any member of the government, anyone working within the public service or with the individual who was hired as a consultant who would be subject to criminal prosecution. I indicated that clearly, and that is the position I advanced to the hon. gentleman.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette on a point of order.

Mr. La Salle: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because I feel deeply that I have been hurt in my privileges as a member of this House and as a Francophone this morning when sitting in a committee meeting.

I will explain right away, Mr. Speaker. Whereas the government does not hesitate, for example, to boast about its respect for the official languages, this morning, at the first meeting of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs held on Bill C-9, the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs brought in a document in English only. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is my duty, I think, to report this insult to every French-speaking members in this House, since that prevented us from carrying on the discussion and securing enough information for the questions we had to ask.

Under the circumstances, I could not provide you with the motion on time, but I would like, by this point of order, ask you whether I could at the same time be allowed to raise a question of privilege about what I would qualify as discrimination against French-speaking members of this House; once again I repeat that I have been insulted, as so many other Quebeckers I imagine, to see that they had not put into practice what they often preach, at the very least the respect for Francophones who sit in this House. Under the circumstances, if I could raise a question of privilege, I would do it rather briefly and as soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is obvious that I cannot make a ruling on that matter without knowing all details. However, I feel it is not a question of procedure, but I am not sure because it may be a grievance. It is difficult to establish if it is a question of privilege or just a grievance against the minister. There is no doubt that before going further we must wait for an answer from the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

Therefore, I must reserve the privilege in the minister's presence.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, if possible I would just like to reserve my right to raise the question of privilege on that matter when the minister is here.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, in the minister's presence.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I feel that what the hon. member for Joliette was also asking was whether he had a right to raise the question of privilege today even though he has not given advance notice as required by Standing Order 17.

I think that irrespective of the fact that it would be decent to wait till the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations is present, it would be advisable to consider the acceptability of that so-called question of privilege. If what the hon. member says is true, the incident would have occurred this morning in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs but he should have given notice an hour before the sitting today. He had plenty of time to give that notice, but he did not do so.

I respectfully submit that you should consider the acceptability of his question of privilege before automatically giving him the right to speak about it in the presence of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Once again, I draw your attention on the fact that the incident to which the hon. member for Joliette referred, that so-called question of privilege, is supposed to have occurred this morning, therefore he had lots of time to give the required notice under the standing orders.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. As I heard the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), he rose on a point of order to ask Your Honour's permission, since he was not able to give you the pré avis required to raise a question of privilege, to reserve his position. As I understood it, Your Honour granted him the privilege of raising that question of privilege in the presence of the minister of state. It is not a question of privilege that has been raised but a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I have taken for the moment the intervention of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle)—

[Translation]

I accepted the intervention of the hon. member for Joliette as notice for the moment. The parliamentary secretary will have the opportunity during the debate to support the position of the hon. member for Joliette and also to point out the breach of procedure. In addition, those problems occurred in committee and not in the House. Those are matters to be dealt with during the formal debate which of course should be held in the presence of the minister.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. It was indeed in committee. The minister was fully conversant with the facts. He did not feel at that time that he had offended any privilege. I am certain the minister would be willing to hear at any time from the hon. member, but I do not see this as a question of privilege in this House since the grievance was settled at that time by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know how I can decide that until I hear it. I will have to hear the point. At that time I will decide whether it is procedurally regular or otherwise, but I obviously have to hear it first. The hon. member is just giving me notice.

3. Travel claims for indeterminate employees, persons under contract, secondment and executive interchange are not kept separate by the Board. To have the voluminous number of files searched to segregate those claims for persons seconded would be both time consuming and costly. Therefore, precise information is not readily available to answer this part of the question.

4. Approximately six months.

FORESTRY RESEARCH

Question No. 617—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Has the government decided to reduce money allocated to forestry and wood products research and to turn some of the research over to private industry and, if so, will the government cut the forestry research budget as proposed, if privatization by April 1, 1979 has not proved realistic?

2. What steps are being taken to ensure that private industry is encouraged to take over forestry research?

3. Will the government see that all employees cut from its own forestry research programme are given every assistance in finding places in the private sector in Canada?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): 1. The money allocated to forestry research will be reduced by approximately $1 million in the fiscal year 1979/80. For forest products research, the federal budget will be reduced by $3.3 million. Co-operative arrangements are being developed to ensure direct financial and program management input by industry, while retaining federal financial and other involvement. It is expected that all steps to achieve these changes can be taken or firmly established in principle by April 1, 1979.

2. The Department of the Environment is involved in negotiations with the private sector regarding the establishment of a jointly-supported forest products research organization. The chairman of an interim board of directors has been appointed.

3. In the case of the forest products program, it is expected that the entire research staff will be employed by the new research organization.

NATIONAL FORESTRY INSTITUTE

Question No. 619—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Did the Minister of State (Environment) state on CBC radio at noon on November 3, 1978, that every effort will be made to locate those laid off from the National Forestry Institute of the Canadian Forestry Service in Petawawa and Ottawa and, if so, how many vacant positions does the Minister expect to have available within his department before March 31, 1979?

2. Are such positions suitable for those public servants being cut from the Forestry Service and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): 1. Yes. It is anticipated that approximately 300 vacant positions will become available with Environment Canada before March 31, 1979.

2. Of these 300 positions, approximately 65 may be suitable for those public servants being cut from the Forestry Service. The basic requirements of the remaining vacant positions are not compatible with the degree of forestry specialization common to both professional and technical employees who may be adversely affected by the organizational change.

Every employee who is declared surplus or laid-off will be accorded every opportunity for reinstatement in the Public Service in accordance with the Public Service priority clearance system.

Question No. 691—Mr. Forrestall:

As a result of the consolidation of the Forest Fire Research Institute and the Forest Management Institute at the Petawawa Forest Experiment Station, what is the exact number of employees of the Ottawa Institutes who will be laid-off or dismissed?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Thirty-five employees of the Ottawa-based National Forestry Institutes of the Canadian Forestry Service have received notification that their positions are surplus to departmental requirements.

FOREST PRODUCTS LABORATORIES

Question No. 692—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to the proposed privatization of the Forest Products Laboratories, which private interests, if any, have expressed to the government a willingness to donate funds for the continuation of the research work of the (a) Vancouver Lab (b) Ottawa Lab?

2. Which private interests, if any, have indicated an interest in extending contracts for specific research work to the (a) Vancouver Lab (b) Ottawa Lab?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): 1. The chairman of an interim board of directors has been named to establish a new forest products research corporation, to be jointly funded by public and private sector interests. An active program is in place to determine future funding, and an announcement will be made when plans are finalized.

2. See answer to Part 1.

U.S.S.R. SUBMARINES

Question No. 716—Mr. Jones:

What is the Department of National Defence doing about the NATO report of 1977 that the U.S.S.R. submarines have found a passage under the Polar ice to enable them to transit from their Northern bases to the ice-free waters of Greenland?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence cannot comment on the existence or otherwise of a report as stated in the noted question. However, the department recognizes that such a possibility exists and conducts an ongoing surveillance program in Canadian ocean areas.

NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Question No. 729—Mr. McKinnon:

In their final submissions for the new fighter aircraft contract, how many of each type did the manufacturers of the (a) F-14 (b) F-15 (c) F-18L (d) Tornado propose for $2.3 billion?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as the Department of Supply and Services is concerned: Cost proposals submitted by competing manufacturers to the government in the fighter aircraft competition are proprietary information and public release of this information, either directly or indirectly, would be a breach of confidence. It can be said, however, that three of the unsuccessful proposals (i.e F-14, F-15 and Tornado) were unable to offer sufficient aircraft to meet the Canadian fleet size requirement of 130 to 150 aircraft. The fourth unsuccessful contender (F-18L), although it may well have been available in sufficient numbers, was dropped from the competition for reasons not related to fleet size.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Question No. 813—Mr. Friesen:

1. How many persons are employed by the Corporate Systems and Technical Services Branch of the Public Service Commission and what is their classification in each case?

2. What is the percentage of employee lay-offs scheduled for 1979 for each classification?

3. Is the technical component of this Branch to be cut by half?

4. Will the Commission sell the equipment used by the employees to be laid off, transfer it to another department, keep it in storage, lease it out or other?

5. Does the Commission anticipate that work will have to be contracted out as a result of the lay-offs and, if so, what is the estimated cost that the Commission will budget for such a contingency?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1 and 2. POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 283

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have to get up so often with regard to the government's not providing answers to questions on the order paper. On October 17 last, I placed question No. 283 on the order paper. It is with regard to ten international airports not being up to standard. All week Your Honour has heard repeated questions with regard to air safety rules not being enforced. Therefore, I feel it is time that the Ministry of Transport answered my question with regard to these ten international airports in Canada that are not up to standard.

What concerns me more is that, after placing this question on the order paper, the minister's office telephoned to ask if I could provide them with a copy of the transport document which details these ten airports that are not up to standard. That is alarming. I feel they should inform the House and the public as to whether these ten airports have been brought up to standard.

In addition, a directive was sent out last year to air safety inspectors asking that they be careful about enforcing safety regulations as it might embarrass the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I hope that it is not the reason why my question is not being answered, the fact that it might embarrass the minister. I ask the parliamentary secretary to take immediate action on this question.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is true that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) called the hon. member. I can look into that. With regard to his question, I can assure him it was sent to the authorized persons; as soon as an answer has been received from the department or departments concerned, it will be transmitted to him without delay. We shall endeavour to give him as complete an answer as possible, as we always do.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to resume my comments on Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act to remove $84 million over a period of two years from medical funding programs in Canada. This bill reflects the callousness and irresponsibility of this government, not to mention its lamentable management ability.

When my time expired yesterday, I was recounting a few of the landmarks in medical research that had been achieved in Canada. I pointed out that the cost of a medical research breakthrough is negligible in terms of the benefits derived from such discoveries. I mentioned the discovery of insulin and polio vaccine in this context.

The potential for further discoveries of this magnitude exists right now here in Canada. In my constituency of St. Boniface, heart research of an internationally recognized high level is being conducted at the St. Boniface General Hospital. This group receives thousands of dollars from the public through the St. Boniface Research Foundation. Its work has been recognized by some of the most prestigious medical pioneers in the world. Dr. Jonas Salk, who developed the polio vaccine and Dr. Christian Barnard, the heart transplant genius, have both visited and spoken on behalf of the St. Boniface Research Foundation in an effort to raise funds for the prolongation of heart research at that institution. Just last year the Duke of Edinburgh spoke on behalf of research at that institution.

The same is true of the biomedical engineering program in that the dollar efficiency of funds invested in this area is very high. My colleague from Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) in a previous presentation cited a comment by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) when he was minister of national health and welfare to the effect that the handicapped must be given the opportunity to participate fully in our society. This goal, and it is a very worth-while one, can only be realized through advances in biomedical engineering.

Some three quarters of the health resources fund was earmarked for construction of facilities for training health professionals and acquiring research equipment. This latter specification would indicate that the cuts announced will affect support for biomedical engineering research. What has happened to the government's pledge of 1973 to help the handicapped become independent of institutions which had never been more than palliatives for their problems? Let me quote from a report in today's Globe and Mail in which doctors at several teaching hospitals are quoted. The article states:

● (1600)

Tight budgeting by Ontario's health ministry has left teaching hospitals hurting most and complaining loudest about their inability to keep pace with advances in medical science. Recent interviews with senior staffs at four teaching hospitals and two community hospitals in Toronto, Timmins, Ottawa and London have revealed that an absence of money for new programs and equipment is at the top of a list of concerns arising out of the budget squeeze.

Further, Dr. Wilbert Keon, chief of surgery at the Ottawa Civic Hospital, is quoted as saying:

Academically, doctors see no new horizons... Many new methods and techniques are happening in the medical field that you would like to apply but no way here. It gets discouraging.

And so on. These reports show that the statements originally made by the minister when presenting this bill that medical research and medical funding are up to requirements are not accurate. They demonstrate that experts in the medical field are already being hurt by budgetary constraints, that their work is being hamstrung and that they are falling behind. Now the federal government is proposing further cuts which will be heaped on top of the provincial health cuts.

Canada possesses expertise in health research, especially in biomedical engineering. Our interest in the subject is borne out by the fact that in 1980 the city of Winnipeg is hosting the Rehabilitation International Congress to which some 6,000 handicapped persons will attend. I submit that our expertise in biomedical engineering as it bears upon rehabilitation will not be fully exploited if legislation such as Bill C-2 is allowed to pass. How can we be sincere in conducting a conference on rehabilitation when our own efforts in the field are so constrained?

I should like to speak for a while on research efforts with which I myself am particularly familiar. In my own research field of nutritional biochemistry I was privileged to have been involved in some of the earlier work leading to the discovery of vitamin B-12, originally known as the unidentified growth factor. It has been shown that in the absence of this vitamin a condition of pernicious anemia cannot be overcome. In other facets of biochemistry and nutrition it has been shown that microfactors are important in the health control of individuals. Consider the position of a patient in hospital who has a particular deficiency. How would hon. members feel if it were shown that, because of lack of equipment or because a research finding was not available, that patient suffered severely? In many cases the result is the death of the patient. When are members on the opposite side going to get themselves out from under the yoke of this present flip-flop direction under a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who arbitrarily alters his horses in the middle of the stream? Possibly, the answer to my question will only be given by the people at the next election.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Hare: We trust this will be soon. On Bill C-2, it is obvious that the Liberal members feel some pangs of conscience. Although 23 speakers have come from this side of the House, only three on that side have spoken in support of the measure. This measure, a Draconian one, is weakly described as housekeeping. I suspect they are sitting on their hands, reluctant to be seen supporting it but afraid of opposing it because of repercussions in the caucus. I challenge members opposite to search their consciences, because any further action of this type affecting medical research is not going to be good for the future of our country.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the previous speaker. It is unfortunate that he did not discuss the legislation before us, though I must say he is not alone in that omission because the speeches I have read and the speeches to which I have listened bore little relation to the piece of legislation before us. I hope that if the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare) is ever called upon to make a speech in Manitoba on grain, he does not deliver a speech on apples. That, in effect, is what he has done today and it is what many members on the other side have done in the course of this debate.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Anderson: Might I have a minute? I realize hon. members have been dominating this debate, but might I at least have a minute?

The legislation before us is very simple. What does it say? It proposes to end an agreement which was initiated in 1966. Perhaps for the benefit of hon. members opposite I could throw some light upon the situation.

The legislation of 1966 was aimed at construction, acquisition, renovation and purchase of equipment and buildings for the individual training of health personnel. People are probably listening to this debate and wondering what members over there are doing, talking about research, when there is absolutely nothing in Bill C-2 which deals with research. The opposition has obviously not read the bill.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but in the course of the speech which I gave I referred to a specific document, signed by the minister, which indicates that $75 million had been assigned to research of national significance. I challenge the member to deny this.

Mr. Anderson: I am reading the bill very closely to make sure there is no mistake as to what we are doing, and just for the benefit of the hon. member I will read it again. We are dealing with the construction, acquisition, renovation and purchase of buildings and equipment for the training of health personnel. I realize that hon. members opposite, unfortunately, have not been talking about this piece of legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). I hope this does not turn out to be a point of disagreement.

Mr. Yewchuk: I find it rather astonishing that the hon. member should insist on trying to mislead the House and I hope he will smarten up.

An hon. Member: That is really dumb!

Mr. Anderson: To judge from the debate so far, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's remarks are in keeping with those made by his hon. friends on the other side—absolutely foolish and totally uncalled for. When the health services fund was established in 1966 there were 12 schools of medicine and 800 doctors graduating. What has happened since then? We are now graduating 1,700 doctors per year. We have spent considerable amounts of money upgrading medical schools and increasing their numbers. We have at the present time the capacity to accommodate 2,500 doctors in classes in the universities and similar establishments, but 1,700 are actually in place.

• (1610)

The opposition is saying that what we should be doing is spending millions of dollars to put up more buildings and provide more equipment in order to graduate more doctors. The situation is such in the medical profession, for example, that we could graduate an additional 800 because we have space for them. What the opposition is saying is that we should not see how many people we have there, let us just spend the money. The fact that we have now produced the plants and the facilities for doctors that are in keeping with the demand apparently has no meaning to the opposition. They say that regardless whether we have full plants in operation to meet Canadian needs, what we should do is to continue spending money on the expansion of these facilities. I find that very hard to accept from a party which claims it is looking for ways to cut down government expenditure, the same party which now says that regardless whether we have fulfilled our obligations, which we did, we should continue with that program even though the facilities are not needed.

It is a fact that the total number of dentists who graduated in 1977 was 350. That number has increased dramatically to the point that we are one of the best served nations so far as dentists go.

With regard to nurses, 7,000 graduated in 1966, and now 10,000 have graduated. The fact that we have probably no more jobs available for nurses due to the fact that we have one of the highest nurse-patient ratios apparently has escaped the hon. member who rose on a point of order. His proposal is, I suppose, that we should continue expanding nursing schools even though we do not need more nurses.

I point this out only because we are not proposing to cut down on essential services to people. Quite the contrary, the Liberal government established in 1966 a significant program to assist the provinces in providing facilities for doctors, dentists, nurses and dental assistants. The Conservative party and others say that regardless whether or not we achieve that, we should keep spending money to increase it. I say to hon. members that if they wish to debate the particular point of the necessity for added facilities for training doctors, nurses and dentists, then they should come up with statistics to show it.

I ask the hon. member who spoke before me this. I wonder what provinces have come forward since a telex advising the provinces of this program was sent out in September demanding that the federal government continue the expansion of teaching facilities. The silence is deafening. However, apparently this does not stop the opposition parties which say that we should still go on with the program.

I intervened for a few minutes for one reason only. Since we are dealing with an equipment and construction program which has served the people of Canada well, is it not foolish to continue with a program which is not necessary at this time? It might be necessary at some time in the future; additonal facilities might be required at some time. However, at this time when we as a government are attempting to be responsible in assessing where money is most needed, that particular area is not one with a high priority.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, if we can skip the last speaker, I should like to say how pleased I am to have the opportunity to follow the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare). In relation to the last speaker I should like to express my absolute and total surprise that someone would come to this House and make a submission that we have already spent all the money to give us the adequate number of doctors and dentists, and that we have a full complement of nurses, no more being needed. Certainly he must be a person who has not visited a senior citizens' home or a nursing home in recent years or he has not been around medical institutions recently. Because if he had, he would have recognized that what he said is a blatant misunderstanding of the facts of Canadian life. I might say that what he misunderstands are the facts of Canadian ill health in terms of the situation we would have, the need for nursing homes and the like.

He said that we had some of the finest medical facilities but that all this party wanted to do was to spend money. The truth is that it is not a question whether or not the federal government is spending money; it is a question whether or not the federal government is getting out of a commitment. This government has a commitment with the provinces of this country which it should live up to.

While the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) stands in his place and states that the government has no need to fulfil that commitment, that it spends money wisely—as is shown by Mirabel airport no doubt—I submit that it is not by chance that not one of the medical doctors on the government side of the House has chosen to speak on this bill. I think it should be pointed out that there are three medical doctors on the other side of the House. There is a doctor from the constituency of Halton (Mr. Philbrook), a doctor from the constituency of Hull (Mr. Isabelle) and a doctor from the constituency of Welland (Mr. Railton). Not one of them chose to speak. It will be interesting to see whether or not they are in the House when the time comes to vote.

What is more important, they have to ask themselves the serious question whether they will vote yes to restrict medical services in this country, being as they are in the profession of medicine. Because we have before us a bill to cut the contract by $84 million. The new title for the minister should now be the "minister of wealth and hellfare". Hers has been a Robin Hood attack upon the poor, leaving the rich to fend for themselves because, in her view now, they are the only ones who can.

This bill breaches humanitarian purposes. It is a bill which reflects bad faith in negotiations and contracts with the provinces. It restricts health services and facilities, and it has callous disregard for the health needs of this country.

The position of the government party has been that they are doing this out of a concept of restraint. Since we on this side have been a party which has always favoured restraint, the government party tends to say that there is a conflict therein. The problem is that there is only one taxpayer, whether he pays municipal, provincial or federal taxes. When services are needed, the options are simply these: either the federal government will pay for them or the provincial government will have to pick up the tab. If the provincial government does not, then the citizen at large will have to pay. The funds come from the same source anyway. If the citizen at large does not pick up the tab, you will have the simple and obvious result of inadequate health services.

[Mr. Anderson.]

I submit that what we have here in this bill is not a question whether we are saving or losing money, but whether or not we have a government that is in breach of contract. This is a government which has promised the provinces it will fund until 1981 a program which has some $84 million yet to be spent. The government is saying that it will now cut off that program without giving notice.

● (1620)

The fact that the government did not give notice caused some considerable damage. I should like to refer to some of the damage which has occurred across the country. Now the Government of Canada is faced with a more expensive situation than it would have faced if it managed to keep the program going. For example, at the time the program was cancelled, a druggist in Alberta had 14 prescriptions for native and Indian people, 13 of which were for children under the age of six. Because the program was cancelled, those people were unable to get their prescriptions filled. On the average the prescriptions cost $12, but because they are unable to get the prescriptions filled, their choice is a day in hospital costing $120. If the government assumes that this cutback will save money, it is just another example of not knowing the facts of the situation. Only two days' notice was given to the druggist that the plan would be abandoned, and the native people received no notice whatsoever. That is an example of harsh and callous treatment by a department in the medical health services field. Its principal objective ought to be a humanitarian one.

I could not agree more with the article which appeared in the Toronto Star on April 13, 1978 at page 10. It is entitled: "Research support 'scandalous' ". It fully documents that Canadian research is scandalous. Also I agree with the article entitled: "Boss Bégin's in trouble" which appeared in the January 27, 1979 edition of the Toronto Star. It attacked the administration of the Department of National Health and Welfare, now renamed the "department of wealth and hellfare". In part that article reads:

> —but disdain for her inability to provide direction and fiscal control.

> —her department is floundering under her scattergun approach and her indecisive dodging.

Further on it reads:

> But they all suggest it is not easy working with a minister who is so nervous that she has specifically ordered senior officials not to discuss her, who is suspicious of all those who hold opposing points of view, who often blames others for her errors and whose tremendous personal warmth and intelligence is marred by bursts of impatience and erratic concentration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is reading from a newspaper article. The fact he is reading it does not mean the content is true. I think that should be understood.

Mr. Malone: This is the first time I have heard a government member indicate that something appearing in a newspaper was not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: For some weeks now the government has been enjoying quoting from newspapers. Whether the article is true or not—

Mrs. Holt: If that is your only research, perhaps it is not very good.

Mr. Malone: I hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). The manner in which the government treated research means that now members of parliament do not have enough money to conduct any research. The government has abolished research in the country by cutbacks. There is no such thing in Canada any more.

Mrs. Holt: I am talking about newspaper research.

Mr. Malone: The federal government has a new scheme for saving money. It exports our best talent to the United States, which saves federal government research money. That is the manner in which the government keeps up the balance of payments. If there are any qualms about my research, it comes back to the fact that no funds are available for research in this country.

Mr. Friesen: The minister cannot translate documents, let alone do research.

Mrs. Holt: You are a member of parliament. You should be doing your own research.

Mr. Malone: As a member of parliament I can do my own speaking. Referring back to the January 27 article, it continues:

"But she's incompetent to run a department—she's making bad decisions because she doesn't have a sense of how to take charge and because she wants to be nice to everybody and not hurt anybody."

Rumour has it that the minister is now blaming her parliamentary secretary for the particular document from which I just read. Also the Toronto Star made some interesting observations in relation to research, which will be of great interest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare rises on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member made mention of the fact that rumour has it that the parliamentary secretary was responsible for the profile of the minister which appeared in the Toronto Star. Categorically I say that I had nothing whatsoever to do with it.

Mr. Malone: I can only say that I categorically believe the hon. parliamentary secretary. I said rumour has it. I do not accept that he is that type of fellow. I would be the first one to indicate that the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) is not in that category.

An hon. Member: Don't be a rumor-monger.

Mr. Malone: Returning to the article dealing with Canada's position on research, it reads:

"No other nation of the western world has treated biomedical research in such a disastrous way"—

The author of the article is referring to Canada. It continues:

—the budget of the Medical Research Council of Canada declined from .38 of the gross national product in 1967 to .26 per cent in 1976.

There is a continuing decrease in our research budget. It continues:

In the same period, the percentage spent on biomedical research of the total spent on health care in Canada went down from 1.12 in 1969 to .46 in 1976—

In other words, it was not cut to half, it was cut to approximately a third in less than a decade. The article continues:

"One of the results of this policy was that between 300 and 400 biomedical research workers were lost in the fierce competition for funds"—

Earlier the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) said that we have plenty of people, but interestingly enough he was not aware of Canadian medical needs. The hon. member is quite content to submit to an adequate situation when researchers are chased out of the country because of the $84 million cutback.

It is interesting to note that only a few Liberal members have spoken in favour of this piece of legislation, yet not one medical doctor on their side has risen. Also it will be interesting to see what the hon. member for Halton, the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Welland will do when the vote on this particular bill takes place.

The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) stated that the half-life of a physician's knowledge is somewhere between five and seven years. I would like to add that the half-life of a government minister is about six months, and it is just that—a half-life. This government though seldom awake is now celebrating one. In 1976 the federal government gave its word to the provinces through the health resources fund that there would be adequate health facilities, adequate funding for personnel and research and for the provision of a necessary health delivery system. With that commitment the provinces set out their programs.

I am sure we all know that there comes a time when you back off if the situation warrants it and you have mutual agreement. The fact of the matter is that the provinces were not consulted here. It is interesting to go through the data, province by province from the Pacific to the Atlantic, because therein you will find that virtually not a single province was consulted by this government on its decision to withdraw the remaining funds under this program. Sure, they received phone calls from someone who said: Hey, guess what; we are cutting the program. There was no consultation about a phase-out, or advance notice of the suggestion that this government was going to cut this program off at some future date, with a date specified.

What in fact has happened is that the provinces from sea to sea have made plans one or two years ahead for the construction of facilities. They have hired architects and put staffs into position on the basis of a commitment by the federal government in respect of ongoing funds through to 1981. The government now is simply slicing off $84 million with the net result that, while there has been consultation to the extent of phone calls, the provinces are left in the disastrous situation of having to curtail programs for which they have already committed the funds. What we have in essence is a game in respect of which the rules have been changed in mid-play.

This government has dealt a raw, rough and callous blow to the provinces of this country. The situation could have been different had things occurred as suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and that is with consultation with the provinces and agreement to cut the program back. That would have been a very different situation. However, to allow these provinces to go ahead and commit funds—I will document that in a few minutes—and then cut off the money without consultation, leaving provinces such as Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and the rest carrying the burden of the cost of projects to which they have committed themselves, can in no way be considered a savings for the taxpayers of this country.

The federal government has chintzied out of its obligations by saying it is saving money, only to force the taxpayers to fund these projects from another pocket because of provincial commitments. That is not fair, and certainly it is not fair government. It is about time this kind of tactic of pretending the government is cutting back, when all it is doing is shifting the burden of expense, should be made clear to Canadians from coast to coast, so that at the time of the next election they will know that if they put this government back they will have unfair government.

What this government has done is cut down on the number of dollars available for health care. As a result of this cutback the people have been given a choice. The burden must now be shifted to the provinces, municipalities or to family budgets, or, in the alternative, the public must put up with inadequate health and, in the final analysis, death itself. That is really what will be the result of this government's cutting down on funds available.

Since we are debating a bill relating to health, I should like to say it is very unfortunate that in the consideration of health care we have adopted programs that have been intact for years and essentially look after the health of Canadians from the epiglotis down. In other words, they look after you from your epiglotis to your toenails, but they are unconcerned with the human head. Our health programs do not look after the teeth or the eyes, will not provide a hearing aid if that is what an individual needs, and do not take care of psychiatric expenses. Under the Canadian concept one can have a perfectly healthy body but health programs do not cover the head.

It seems to me this has derived from some medieval thinking that if for some reason an individual is insane he should be put in a basket and spun about because this condition is not covered by health care. If this government thinks that is some reason for cutting back, perhaps it is time we started providing medical care from the larynx up, or started looking after the whole human being including teeth, eyes, ears and psychiatric needs where there is evident necessity.

I have often condemned this government for its failure to consult with the provinces. Let me refer to what some of the provincial ministers of health have stated in relation to the question whether there was consultation on the part of this government before it decided to cut $84 million from provincial services. According to Mr. Collins, minister of health for Newfoundland, he was informed only and not consulted. He said he was quite unhappy about Bill C-2 because Newfoundland has no more money now to help out with the health services centre at the university in St. John's. That is very unfortunate because this is money which the province has already committed. That will now become a burden on the taxpayers of that province.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a short point of order. It is my understanding that all agreements signed prior to September have been fully honoured. If the hon. member has any further information in that regard I would be pleased to hear it.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that the hon. member would raise that point of order when I have dealt only with Newfoundland. Since I am starting from the east and working west, with ten provinces there will be occasion for nine more points of order.

Let me now go to New Brunswick, because that province claims it was not consulted. The operations consultant of the province of New Brunswick, Mr. Swift, has said that they have received all their allocated money and that one project was under way with $4.8 million committed. That was money committed to the Saint John Memorial Hospital at the time this government decided to yank out its support.

Let me go to the province of Nova Scotia where Mr. Ruby is the acting deputy minister.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to correct one point the hon. member made with regard to Newfoundland and funds required for the memorial—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that parliamentary secretaries and hon. members will give the hon. member the opportunity to complete his speech, following which they can in turn seek the floor.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, just to make it easier for hon. members on that side, and so they do not have to raise so many points of order, the phone number of the last person to whom I have made reference is 424-7570. The hon. member can check directly with him. He said that programs for training and research under way or in the planning stage will have to be modified or eliminated. He said that Nova Scotia objects strenuously, and that they will lose $2.2 million on projects. I have only referred to three provinces and they all say they do not like this, because in the belief that this money would be available from the federal government until 1981 they went ahead as usual.

• (1640)

One does not build hospitals or hospital facilities overnight. One hires architects, does facility studies and need studies as to where the buildings ought to be located at least a year in advance. Money has been committed, but the federal government simply yanks it away, leaving the provinces with the alternative of letting the money go down the drain completely or picking up the entire bill themselves. If the provinces choose the latter, then this government is being dishonest when it says that it is cutting taxpayers' dollars, because what they are really doing is merely cutting their commitment, leaving it to the provinces to pick up the tab.

I would like to quote what the province of Manitoba said in this regard:

> We were notified but not consulted, very upset and attempted to meet with Ms. Bégin, but no co-operation.

As a result of the change in plans by the federal government, Manitoba expects it will have a shortfall totalling $7.2 million, money which is presently committed in the planning stage of proposed development.

Mr. R. H. McClelland, minister of health for British Columbia, said in a telegram to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin):

> New children's hospital and the Grace Hospital included in B.C. five year program has not been approved yet. The projects are committed. Provincially on the basis that the health resources fund were available. A shortfall of approximately $4 million on this new medical teaching complex presently under construction at a cost of $51 million.

The taxpayer is not saving money, he is merely paying out of a different pocket because the province of British Columbia—and I note that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) has now decided to leave the Chamber—will have to pick up the tab. The fact is that that province will have to pay out $4 million in committed funds because the federal government is not going to follow through on their commitment to the provinces.

Mr. Gordon Miniely, minister of health for Alberta, said that he was informed but not consulted. He goes on:

> The southern Alberta Children's Hospital in Calgary is in the middle of construction. Originally they were advised that it would qualify for commitment.

The federal government did not follow through on that commitment and as a result Alberta will have a shortfall of $3.5 million. The message from the other side is that the federal government is saving money.

Mr. Robinson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just mentioned that the Alberta children's hospital in Calgary was denied the sum of $3.5 million. That is totally wrong in that a project was approved—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must say that the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary is also totally wrong. In due time he can rise to his feet, seek the floor and make a speech of his own in which he can put forward his own interpretation. At the present time it is the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) who has the floor.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I stand by what I say about the province of Alberta. I will not mention the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Quebec and the others, except to say that the central message is that they were informed but not consulted. I will not document the particular facilities which they were planning on the basis of a contribution from this fund. Just about every province in Canada has made long-term commitments for development on the basis that the dollars would be coming, but the federal government in its callousness simply pulled the rug out from under them, leaving them financially high and dry and stuck with the bills to which they were already committed.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare stated in her speech in the House with regard to this particular bill:

> The government of Canada has a difficult decision to make in applying a major, traumatic, restraint on its own expenditures.

The government is not cutting back on expenditures, it is simply shifting them to another part of Canada; but the money will still come from the same taxpayers.

In closing, I would like to say that we are coming to the end of the debate, but not the end of the issue. This bill should be voted against for its failure to support medical research, which is disastrously weak and unacceptably low in Canada, and for its failure to consult with the provinces, which has become a habit of this government that has reached epidemic proportions. The government's approach is simply to telephone the provincial governments and tell them what they have unilaterally decided, and then turn around and call it consultation. Bill C-2 should be defeated for its attack on the poor, the aged and the invalid, all of whom are victims of Bill C-2 because they can least afford this cutback. This bill affects the very people who should be least affected in any way at all.

This government talks of a new constitution in which it would like to include a charter of human rights. There is no such thing as human rights when one does not have good health. The freedom to speak is really a useless right when one is in bed with fever. The freedom to worship is of little value if somehow your health has completely deteriorated. The freedom to assemble is of little value when one is confined to hospital.

Good health is a right which we should expect in this advanced technical and democratic society. I am totally amazed that the government would choose people's health as an area of restraint, throw the burden to the provinces and then pretend that it has done its duty. It is a facade which the people of Canada will see through and will say to the government that they will not accept this kind of nonsense any longer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question, may I make two very brief announcements to the House. I think the House is aware that I intended and was ready to make a brief pronouncement on the discussion of motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 this afternoon. However, the point of order was raised by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and he is unavoidably absent today. We will arrange to do it the first time he is back in the House.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Pensions

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1978

MEASURE TO CHANGE RETIREMENT BENEFIT PROVISIONS

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-12, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-12, like most pension documents, has a rather intimidating technical appearance. In spite of this forbidding facade, hon. members will find that the objectives of the bill are relatively simple and straightforward. Briefly stated, the main purposes of the bill, are, first, to implement the public service indexing modifications that my predecessor outlined in the House on March 9, 1978; second, to give effect to the agreement that the government reached in 1976 with the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers' Association that it would ask parliament to provide pension for the unique conditions faced by air traffic controllers who spend many years working in the stressful environment of air traffic control towers; and finally, third, to alter existing arrangements for amortizing actuarial liabilities, and to deal with a number of other technical matters.

Before discussing the substance of the bill, I would like to say a few words about the government's intentions with respect to the proposed effective date of the bill. As it now reads, Bill C-12 proposes that the amendment advanced in the bill take effect on January 1, 1979. When Bill C-12 was introduced in the House on October 26, 1978, it was the government's hope and expectation the bill could be enacted before the end of the year, so that it could be applied to the January 1, 1979, pension adjustments. This could not be achieved. So, the January 1, 1979, pension adjustments had to be calculated in accordance with existing statutory provisions.

Hon. members will recall that on December 12, 1978, I gave an undertaking to the House that the government would not attempt to alter public service pensions indexing arrangements in a retroactive manner. To give effect to this undertaking I will be proposing a number of amendments to the bill at an appropriate stage in the consideration of it. Virtually all of these amendments will concern themselves with effective dates: an effective date of January 1, 1980, for the introduction of the triennial pension supplementation arrangements described in the bill so that the first review and decision on these arrangements would apply to the 1980-82 period; an effective date of April 1, 1979, for implementation of the proposals respecting the deferral and prorating of pension supplementation payments and the commencement of the collection of extra current service employee contributions required by air traffic controllers for the improvement in their pension benefits which is proposed in the bill; and that all other proposals come into effect upon Royal Assent of the bill. Finally, I should like to mention that the delay in parliament's consideration of the bill has given the government an opportunity to carry out a general review of the bill. Accordingly, a few amendments will be introduced to clarify and improve several areas of the bill. I should add that none of the proposed amendments in this category involve pension benefits provisions.

Now I should like to turn to the objectives of the bill which I listed at the outset of my remarks. The most important one by far, in terms of principle and the number of people it affects, is the one concerned with modifying the arrangement under which the pensions of former public servants, military and RCMP personnel, and members of parliament now are automatically indexed with changes in the consumer price index. Bill C-12 proposes that the existing arrangement be changed in two fundamental respects. It proposes the removal of the automatic feature which now exists, and the removal of the continuing requirement that the adjustments be calculated in accordance with the consumer price index.

In my view these changes will go a long way toward resolving the central controversies in the public service pension debate. I think I speak for most members of the House when I say that resolution of the key public service pensions issues has been hampered seriously by some of the emotional and distorted arguments inflicted upon Canadians over the past few years on the costs and economic consequences associated with treating pensioners in a fair and humane manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Buchanan: For example, arguments have been advanced that if pensioners are allowed to purchase the same goods and services in times of inflation as in times of no inflation—and when boiled down to its essentials, that is what pension indexing is all about—it would be the death knell of Canadian industry, and it would create such immense inflation that it could bankrupt the nation. It is a tribute to the good sense of Canadians that there has been a general rejection of the shrill call to arms raised in some quarters that Canada should fight inflation by sacrificing the victims of inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Buchanan: I regret to say we have not seen the end of these emotional distortions. Indeed, we have just witnessed another one of the National Citizens' Coalition periodic newspaper ad diatribes on the subject. This latest outburst of the coalition indicates that the government has received a new report on public service pensions. The ad suggests attempts have been made to suppress the report which the coalition describes as a "shocker", because, in its view, it demonstrates public service pensions are costing or will cost taxpayers an extra $5,160 annually for each public servant, in short, an extra annual cost of over $1.5 billion, for a total over-all cost of $2 billion. What a pile of rubbish!

Let me outline briefly the facts of the situation. The report mentioned is not a new one. It was submitted to the government in December, 1977, and released to the public on March 9, 1978. The suggestion that the report was suppressed is ridiculous. Copies of the report were circulated to all members of the House, the Press Gallery, unions, business firms, interested associations, and many libraries across Canada. Even today, more than a year after its completion, the report is being sent to individual Canadians upon request.

The statement that public service pensions will cost taxpayers $2 billion annually is sheer nonsense. In this regard I merely point out the employer contributions underwritten last year by taxpayers for both basic public service pensions and their indexing amounted to $490 million. That works out to 10.8 per cent of payroll, not 34.4 per cent. Furthermore, if Bill C-12 were enacted, it will ensure that over-all employer contributions for public service pensions will be restricted to 10 per cent to 12 per cent of payroll, the average level wich prevailed during the 1950s and 1960s before public service pensions were indexed. In terms of its impact on taxpayers, in short, Bill C-12 turns the public service pension clock back to the same stage as they were in the 1950s and 1960s.

It is important to recognize the latest coalition ad for what it really is: a mathematically orchestrated exercise, replete with partial truths and innuendoes, to persuade Canadians to fight inflation on the backs of pensioners, widows and the disabled. This is a most odious and reprehensible form of discrimination because clearly pensioners, widows and the disabled, are the victims and not the cause of inflation. I am confident Canadians will reject the call to fight inflation by victimizing the victims of inflation. Indeed, I should like to take this occasion publicly to urge the coalition to use its considerable energy and resources to join other Canadians in working toward a fair and humane deal for all pensioners, widows and disabled Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Buchanan: The most serious consequence of the highly publicized campaign conducted against the indexing of pensions has been its effect in polarizing extremist opinion on the subject. This polarization has had the unfortunate result of distracting public attention from the more thoughtful and quietly expressed opinions of those with a genuine concern for both the welfare of pensioners and the Canadian economy. Those who have taken this balanced approach in the indexing debate have been correct in drawing attention to the fact inflation brings about increases, not only in the consumer price index but also in interest rates. This simple fact means that properly managed employer pension plans have a considerable built-in financial capacity to repair the damage inflation creates in the incomes of pensioners.

The fact inflation has an effect on both the costs and revenues of an employer pension plan effectively exposes the Achilles heel in the position of the indexing doomsayers. Nevertheless, it must be recognized that while extra earnings realized by properly managed employer pension plans, in times of inflation, go a long way to answering the concerns about indexing costs, they do not answer these concerns completely.

It must be stressed that inflationary pension fund earnings are capable only of meeting inflationary pension costs entirely if interest rates and other investment returns keep in step with the consumer price index. If inflationary earnings cannot keep up with inflationary costs, and if employer and employee pension contributions ear-marked for indexing are insufficient to close the gap, the inevitable result is a deficit which usually must be financed by employers. And when the employer pension plans are operated by government, the financing of these deficits falls upon the taxpayer.

The underlying thrust of Bill C-12, hon. members will recognize, is directed at meeting this concern by ensuring that the extra earnings of the pension program are sufficient to meet supplemention costs. To achieve this objective, the bill proposes to convert the pension adjustment features of the program into a money purchase approach along the lines that were described in the House on March 9, 1978. In other words, the bill proposes that public service employee pensions, in future, be adjusted according to the degree of supplementation that can generally be financed or purchased by the funds becoming available from extra interest earned on pensioner money in the program, and the special employer and employee contributions that have been made for indexing. The bottom line result of this approach is that it will provide taxpayers with a statutory assurance that the government employer contributions required of them to finance these supplements will be reduced and restricted to the order of 1 per cent of payroll. This, in my view, will place the program on a more financially responsible and equitable basis from the points of view of both those who will be receiving the supplements and those who will be paying for them.

Since the intentions of the government to adopt this new principle in public service pension arrangements were announced, there has been an encouraging show of support for this proposed concept. In this regard, I take particular satisfaction out of the degree of all-party support that was demonstrated in the House when the concept was first described here in March of last year. In addition, shortly thereafter, I was pleased to learn that the approach that was being proposed for the federal public service was similar to an approach being advocated for the private sector by the Cofirentes Plus Committee of business and government officials which has been examining public and private pension arrangements in the province of Quebec for the last few years. According to the April 8, 1978, edition of the Financial Post, the Cofirentes Plus Committee concluded that the dilemma of uncertainty that indexing creates for employers and that its absence creates for pensioners might be resolved by the introduction of legislation, and, I quote:

—to require at least partial indexing of private pension plans to the cost-of-living. The committee recommends that excess interest over the assumed actuarial rate on funds invested for pensioners should be used to improve pensions.

The approach also appears to have struck a responsive chord amongst some sections of the actuarial community judging from a statement that a prominent Canadian actuary made before a group of actuaries last summer when he said:

—it is now the perceived, conventional wisdom among private employers that only governments can afford it (indexing). The facts, I think, are rather different. Of course, indexing, especially open-ended unlimited indexing for the full increase in the consumer price index, is expensive, and the cost is not only significant but highly volatile because the incidence of inflation itself is so volatile. However, the cost is finite, not infinite, and the volatility can be controlled through appropriate limitations on full indexing and through a commitment to devote the inflationary element of investment income on pensioner liabilities to meeting whatever the costs may be.

That cheer from the lobby obviously means that the Canadians have scored a goal in the Russian-NHL Challenge Cup game. I can tell that I am running tough competition tonight.

An hon. Member: We should have shut down.

Mr. Buchanan: As I mentioned a few moments ago, Bill C-12 effectively puts public service pension supplementation arrangements on a money purchase basis, and so deals head-on with the issue of cost uncertainty that is generally associated with indexing arrangements. Consequently, if Bill C-12 is enacted, I think we will see a change occurring in the key question that is usually asked about the indexing of public service pensions; that is, with the enactment of C-12, the question "How much will indexing cost?" should gradually give way to the question "How much indexing will there be?" Indeed, like other members of the House, I am finding that this change is already taking place in the correspondence I am receiving on the subject.

Given the prospect that pension supplements would have to be curtailed if earmarked revenues are insufficient for full indexing, I feel it is important that other features of the program be re-examined so that we can assure ourselves that the supplementation arrangements, taken as a whole, are fair and equitable in terms of their over-all impact on different groups of pensioners. When such an examination is carried out, I think it must be concluded that some features of the program are not as fair as they could be.

One feature of the program that is widely regarded as being unfair is the provision which gives public servants retiring at the end of the year the same post-retirement adjustment as those retiring at the beginning of the year. No reasonable person, I believe, could take issue with the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on March 9, 1978, when he said:

This idea that a person can retire on December 29 or 30 on full pension, and then get a year's indexation two or three days later, just does not wash.

Bill C-12 proposes to correct this situation by prorating the first adjustment granted to new pensioners according to the length of their retirement in the first calendar year. With the amendment I will be proposing, new pensioners will in effect mean individuals becoming eligible for pension benefits on and after April 1, 1978.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): 1979.

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, 1979. I am glad to note that you are following this with such close attention.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I always follow the minister with close attention.

Mr. Buchanan: The savings resulting from this change will obviously make more money available for the supplements of other pensioners.

Another feature of the program that requires re-examination is the provision which, in some instances, allows individuals receiving pensions before the age of 60 to receive immediate indexing payments. Generally speaking, individuals drawing pensions before the age of 60, because of their younger age at retirement, will receive pension payments for a longer period than those retiring at age 60 or later. In these circumstances, we must ask ourselves if it is fair that those who draw basic pensions for the longest periods of time should, on top of this advantage, also be allowed to collect pension adjustments for a longer period than those who retire at age 60 or later. In other words, is it fair that "those who have, get, and those who don't, don't?" Bill C-12 deals with this situation by proposing the general deferment of pension supplement payments to age 60.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It depends on how long they live.

Mr. Buchanan: That is true, but actuarially they should all live the same average number of years.

Fairness, however, dictates that some exceptions be made to this change, and that the change itself be implemented in a fair manner. Accordingly, Bill C-12 proposes that payment of pension supplements not be deferred for individuals who have already retired; nor for current and future recipients of disability pensions or survivor benefits. The bill, with the proposed amendment I have described, also provides that the change be implemented gradually so that for those who leave the public service this year, on and after April 1, 1979, 56 would be the earliest age at which the supplements could be collected; for those who leave the public service in 1980, the earliest qualifying age for receiving the supplementation payments would be 57; for those who leave in 1981, the minimum qualifying age for receiving pension supplements would be age 58, and so on. The savings resulting from this change, like those resulting from the prorating change, would have the general effect of minimizing any curtailment that may be required in the triennial supplementation arrangements, particularly after 1982 when the change would be fully operative.

I want to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to say that the principle of fairness among pensioners is the principle that the government also intends to follow whenever the three-year reviews, which are required under the bill, produce forecasts of revenues from extra pensioner interest earnings and indexing contributions as defined in the bill that will be insufficient to finance fully indexed supplements. The bill provides that when such situations arise pension supplements must be curtailed to match income revenues. The simplest way of doing this, of course, would be on an across-the-board basis, that is, for example, by authorizing supplements equal to 90 per cent of the expected increase in the consumer price index if that is what triennial forecasts indicate is all we can afford. Although simple and easily understood, such an approach, in my opinion, would not be an equitable one for those on the lower end of the pension income scale.

As we all know, pensioners with low incomes have a particularly difficult time in coping with a reduction in the purchasing value of their incomes. Consequently, when revenue shortfalls require a curtailment of pension supplements, the arrangements established cannot, in my view, be determined solely on a cold balance-sheet basis. In short, I believe that fairness and equity require a measure of full indexing up to some minimum benefit level.

The periodic establishment and review of an appropriate benefit level for full indexing must, of course, begin with a realistic assessment of the amount of money that will become available from the earmarked sources defined in the bill. Once this assessment is made, some account must also be taken of the fact that employer pension plans are not designed and looked upon, primarily, as instruments for redistributing income among individuals. Many Canadians, I think, regard employer pension and savings plans as being generally similar in their objectives, and so consider that the benefits provided by employer pension plans should bear a recognizable relationship to the contributions, financial and otherwise, that individuals make to these plans and their sponsoring employers.

This notion of pensions being a return on the contributory savings of employees and pensioners is, of course, being reinforced by Bill C-12. In summary, I feel that the triennial supplementation arrangements that are authorized for public service pensioners must reflect a humane understanding of the situation faced by low income pensioners. At the same time, I think it must be recognized that there are limits on the degree to which supplementation payments can be divorced from the pension savings of individuals, and the earnings realized on their pensions savings or contributions.

I presented to the House earlier this month the proposed supplementation arrangements that would have been put in place if, in fact, this particular bill had received royal proclamation prior to the end of last year. Hon. members will recall that $7,000 would have been the proposed point for division. There would be full indexation up to earnings of $7,000, and above that the figure proposed was 8 per cent in 1979, 7 per cent in 1980, and 6 per cent in 1981.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Does that move back a year now?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks if that now moves back a year. It moves back a year in the sense that the triennial period will be 1980, 1981 and 1982. I believe I touch on this matter a little further down, but we think that the arrangements which can be made for pensioners could possibly be a little better at that time. My personal inclination is to look first at the report we receive from the government's chief actuary in the latter part of this year. The thought is that we may be able to move it up from $7,000 to $7,500 or perhaps $8,000. However, we will not be able to determine that until later this year.

Bill C-12 indirectly also requires that the triennial reviews and establishment of pension supplementation arrangements be carried with an eye to the future. This need arises from the requirement that any surplus or deficit realized with respect to any three-year period must be carried forward to the next three-year period. Consequently, triennial arrangements that are overly optimistic in one period could produce relatively restrictive arrangements and disappointment for pensioners in the future periods because the bottom line provision of Bill C-12 is that pensioners, not taxpayers, must meet any pension supplementation deficits.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the reverse?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks what about the reverse. There could not be a reverse. This fund is earmarked for pensioners. In other words, is the hon. member asking if we would go above full cost?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Suppose that the calculations were too pessimistic.

Mr. Buchanan: I don't think that would happen. It might be that one could change the arrangement in mid-stream, but the fund is earmarked and is, in effect, the property of retired pensioners. If they did not receive as much in one period, then they would receive a larger amount in succeeding periods. It is their fund, in the sense that it is earmarked for this special purpose. It is clearly identifiable and, therefore, if there is an inadequate amount paid out in one period, then we would have the option to make changes during that period or, certainly, the funds which had not been dispersed would remain in the fund and be available for future supplementation.

In practical terms, this means that to achieve fairness in treatment between current and future pensioners, it will be necessary that three-year reviews of supplementation revenues and benefits avoid optimistic and pessimistic extremes.

Taking all these factors into account, I am confident that when the review is carried out in the second half of this year of the revenues that will become available over the next three years from the pensioners' share of extra interest earnings and the special contributions that have been made by and for pensioners to the indexing account, it will be possible to establish an arrangement whereby the first $7,000 of annual public service pension, disability and survivor benefits, could be fully indexed in 1980, 1981 and 1982. If this were done, it would mean that over 95 per cent of recipients of disability and survivor benefits would have their pensions fully indexed. In addition, I am confident that the supplementation revenue picture will be such that it will still be possible to provide higher income pensioners with a reasonable return on their contributions to the program.

Much of my confidence in this regard, Mr. Speaker, is based on the healthy growth in interest earnings being achieved by the public service pension accounts, and the clear evidence that this growth will continue into the foreseeable future. Also it is based on the forecasts being made by reputable financial institutions for a moderation in inflationary pressures over the coming year. We believe that the meld of these two factors should allow us, as I mentioned a moment ago, to present a more attractive picture at the end of this year for the following three-year period. The actual amounts of supplementation authorized for 1980 to 1982 cannot, of course, be determined until the forecasts of revenues available for the supplements are received this fall from the government actuary.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the remaining portions of the bill. These portions of the bill directly affect less than 1 per cent of public servants, with the vast majority of them being air traffic controllers. The proposals contained in the bill to establish special pension provisions for air traffic controllers are designed to ensure the continued maintenance of high safety standards for air travel in Canada, and to provide income protection for air traffic controllers who may be detrimentally affected by the application of these standards.

These provisions are the product of an agreement which was reached with the air traffic controllers' union in 1976 to deal with the situation of air traffic controllers who failed the rigid examinations they must regularly take to retain their licences as air traffic controllers. The program agreed to with the controllers encompasses the provision of special training to prepare controllers for other work, the partial drawing down of pension benefits and, as a last resort, the payment of early retirement pensions earned by air traffic controllers who are compulsorily retired after a minimum of ten years' service in an air traffic control tower. In addition, the bill would allow air traffic controllers to draw unreduced pensions upon voluntary early retirement if they are at least 50 years of age and have a minimum of 25 years' service in an aircraft control tower.

I want to stress that all of the service requirements for these special pension provisions for air traffic controllers involve service in an air traffic control tower. In other words, if a 50 year old air traffic controller had 27 years of service in the public service but only 20 years' service in an air traffic control tower, he would not qualify for an immediate unreduced pension upon voluntary retirement. I also want to add that in return for these special pension features, air traffic controllers will be required to make an extra 2 per cent pension contribution, and this extra contribution will be matched by the government as employer.

The bill also contains a provision which would allow the government to follow the private sector practice of amortizing unfunded actuarial liabilities over a 15-year period instead of over a five-year period in the event the chief actuary should alter his economic assumptions or the actuarial method by which he carries out his evaluations of public service superannuation accounts.

The remaining provisions of the bill are directed at overcoming administrative difficulties and correcting benefit anomalies in various pension statutes which in total involve less than 50 individuals.

I would like to conclude by reminding hon. members, as my predecessor did on March 9 of last year, that the introduction of this bill does not represent a finalization of the government's review of public service pension arrangements. The scrutiny of these arrangements will continue, with future analyses and decisions taking account of the actuarial valuation of the program which is now being carried out by the department of insurance, the total compensation analyses which are being carried out by the Treasury Board secretariat, and the results of the government's review of the retirement income situation facing all Canadians.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in his speech the minister referred to the National Citizens' Coalition. All I can say is that because of the government's indecision and hiding of facts we have been lambasted, at least since 1976, because it was as a result of the government's lack of initiative in putting the true facts before the Canadian people that groups such as that coalition, in my view, have no understanding as to what is going on and take an irresponsible approach to a very sensitive subject.

We on this side realize that this matter is not as simple as the minister makes it out to be. There are a number of questions which have to be asked. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has had questions on the order paper since October 17, 1978, dealing with the actuarial niceties of Bill C-12, and they are unanswered as of this date. I do not think that is fair.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan) is an actuary, and he is extremely interested in this bill. He has had questions on the order paper since November 9, 1978, because he wants to know what is going on with regard to the actuarial soundness of this plan and its costing.

There is confusion. The minister tabled a document—I believe it was some time in November—and on the last page of that document there is scenario "E" which shows that if inflation were to continue to the end of 1980 at a level slightly above the experience of the past year, there would be a shortfall of the order of $30 million.

A member of the government party, for whom I have a great deal of respect, has been sending out newsletters. I can understand his concern because he represents a number of public servants. For that reason he obviously must take an even greater interest in this than I would.

I would like to quote from a recent postscript in the Ottawa Journal of February 7, 1979. I want to put this on the record because the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) believes there are billions around and that there is no need for this bill. This matter is not as simple as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) indicates. I appreciate the words the minister used. He says there will be a humane approach and that after study and if possible, the limit for people in the $7,000 bracket will be raised to $7,500 or even $8,000. That is all very good, but I want to put on the record what is causing all the confusion around here. I want to read from the Ottawa Journal for February 7. Under the headline "Fund Flush or Folding?" we find the following:

> It is difficult to figure just what kind of shape the public service pension fund is in. But maybe some of the answers will surface this week when a bill comes up in the House for second reading. Until then, it's anyone's guess whether the fund is embarrassingly flush or nearing the bottom of the barrel.
> In a document tabled in the House last week, treasury board president Judd Buchanan warned that the public service pension fund would be between $4 million and $30 million in the red within the next three years if a limit was not put on cost of living increases. That's a pretty scary prediction and one not universally accepted.

With all due respect, I know the interests of the hon. member, and we are going to have to get to the bottom of this. The article goes on:

> For example, in his January report to voters Liberal MP Lloyd Francis tells his constituents: "There is a serious question about the fund itself being over-funded and within a very short time the Government of Canada is going to be embarrassed by the amount of money in the fund."
> Francis says there is more than $9 billion in the superannuation account at the moment. He suggests that if no changes are made in the pension plan and factors such as inflation and wages increase at the rates predicted, the fund could reach more than $40 billion by 1990 and more than $1 trillion 200 billion by the year 2025.
> Granted, figures can be used to prove any argument, but the difference between Buchanan's and Francis' calculations is incredibly puzzling. The answer may be revealed in the House this week and it should prove quite interesting.

Well, we have not received the answer from the President of the Treasury Board. We will have to go to the committee to get all the answers, and I can tell the minister that I will be asking him many questions. I will be asking those which have already been asked in the two questions put down by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. Many of us will be asking questions because the minister has not given us any information whatsoever as to the soundness of the plan, what it is costing, where the money is coming from, or whether he disagrees with his colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West. We will get to that.

The Auditor General has been involved with a three-pronged thrust; as he puts it, the economy, efficiency, and effectiveness. He is including as well value for money, waste, and management. He is very concerned about financial management and control. At this time we must determine what happened in the past. But we have to determine what we intend to do for the future and what it is going to cost.

It seems to me that the President of the Treasury Board has accepted the thrust of the Auditor General and accordingly has now picked—and I have another word that I will use later—on the public service. What was the scenario as far as members of this House and public servants were concerned? There was a scenario prior to the speculation of the last election. Do you recall when the code of ethics was brought in

Mr. Speaker? Canadians were concerned about how public servants act. The vast majority are doing a tremendous job, at some sacrifice and inconvenience. But the public pressure, through organizations something like the coalition, had the government running scared. It was going to go to the people, so the government said: "We will tell them how to operate." Then, what was the next thing? The government brought in Bill C-12. That was months ago. The statement of the then president of the treasury board was back on March 9. Then came Bill C-28, which is now known as Bill C-22, that monstrosity which it could not bring forward because the government knew that it had concerned the opposition and the public service. Therefore it had to be changed. The government changed it in significant ways, but there is still some concern about that bill. The government was attempting to show strength before an election. But what it was doing, Mr. Speaker, was simply public service bashing. That is all there is to it.

We on this side of the House reject public service bashing and it being made a scapegoat for government incompetence and mismanagement.

Mr. Buchanan: And fire 60,000 of them.

Mr. Alexander: There he goes again. The minister says that we are going to fire them. We have never at any time used the word fire. This is the usual Liberal nonsense propaganda. We talk about attrition, and Bryce Mackasey tried to use public service firings as a platform here in Ottawa and lost the by-election. People in Canada do not buy that nonsense. You are the ones who are fired—

An hon. Member: Fired into flight.

Mr. Alexander: Time is getting short and I will continue with my remarks. I wish the President of the Treasury Board would sit still and shut his mouth, as I did when he was speaking, so that I can get on with my few words because I have not yet started.

I want to let the President of Treasury Board know what our objectives are. These may sound like clichés. There is something wrong when we find out about the antagonism that exists between this government and the public service, and between the government and the trade union movement in particular.

Our objectives are to gain mutual respect, to consult, and to co-operate, to treat as a partner and not as an enemy, to develop and maintain good will and to maintain good faith. Those are basic principles which this party puts before the House, the people of Canada, and the public service.

What does the public service say when it talks about good faith? I want to read from a brief that was submitted to the miscellaneous estimates committee by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada dated November 18, 1978. This gives some indication why the public service does not trust this government. I cannot think why anyone in this country would trust this government. At page 13 it says:

Pensions

The Institute feels that it cannot avoid expressing its concern and disappointment that a tacit agreement reached during discussions that took place within the forum of the Preparatory Committee on Collective Bargaining during 1963 to 1965, has been breached. There was no formal written agreement, and no formal record made, but a clear understanding was reached that, in return for the loss of the right by employees in the Public Service to negotiate any matters relating to superannuation under the Public Service Superannuation Act (the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act did not then exist), the government undertook not to make any unilateral amendments to the superannuation benefits. Clearly, if the SRBA had existed at that time, the understanding and agreement would have embraced it.

What we are talking about here, and what PIPS is talking about, is a breach of faith. That is why they have no trust in the government in terms of its initiative and its thrust. I feel sorry for the President of the Treasury Board because he has just recently been handed this portfolio and he will have to prove himself. He has not proved himself yet to me, but I am patient, and I know with proper coaching and with the staff that he has he will come up with what I can perhaps call a credible performance as President of the Treasury Board.

I want to read from a communique put out by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada. There are some statements in here which I want to place before hon. members in order to let them know what the public service was thinking about, particularly the Professional Institute, which I believe speaks on behalf of all public servants because they all have vested interests in this bill. I am reading from a document dated March 3, 1978, entitled "Communications" published by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada. It says:

Members should differentiate between the various opinions or comments being made by public figures, and any notice of intention to amend the acts by means of bills to come before the House of Commons. The one is part of the continuing debate, whereas the other constitutes warning of an impending change.

The impending change has to do with the indexation part. It goes on to say:

There are several pension studies in progress now, some federal and some provincial, relating to the over-all subject of pensions in Canada, with particular reference to comparisons between public service and private sector pensions, and including the Canada Pension Plan. The public service pension plan is a part of this over-all debate, and the subject is complex, not only in terms of the above noted comparison, but also in terms of what pension benefits should exist for Canadian citizens as a basic expectation. It is likely, therefore, that there will be continued considerable coverage of this subject in the news media, with many opinions being expressed. It is not likely that the subject will be resolved within a short time, even in respect of the public service pension plans alone, since this is only a portion of the much broader debate going on.

I kept rereading that particular paragraph. I was wondering whether we are even in a position to deal with Bill C-12 because the whole topic of pensions, within the public service and without, is under continual discussion, without any conclusions having been reached at all. What is important though is a question that was asked in this same document. It reads as follows:

A part of these discussions lies in settling the basic question of whether private sector pensions should be upgraded, essentially to give broad comparability with public service pensions, or whether public service pensions should be downgraded to give broad comparability with private sector pensions.

As I said before, and I have no hesitation or any equivocation whatsoever, this government—and I notice Mr. Speaker is nodding his head in the affirmative—has gone about bashing the public service. I asked a question of the then president of the treasury board on January 30, 1978. I asked whether it would be on an ad hoc basis or in what form they would bring it in light of the Tomenson-Alexander study. I read the reply from the then president of the treasury board:

● (2100)

Our position will require a great deal of analysis and thought. We have a commitment to consult with the bargaining agents and the advisory committee on public service pensions.

I do not know whether that consultation took place. In order for us to determine whether that commitment was met to consult further, if indeed there was any, we will ask for witnesses. I have a pretty long list here. The government is not going to bamboozle us with this bill as it did in 1973 and 1974.

We want to hear from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Professional Institute of Public Servants, the Association of Air Traffic Controllers, Canadian Forces Long Service Pension Association, the chief actuary, a representative from Tomenson-Alexander, management consultants, representatives or spokesmen from the RCMP, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Life Insurance Association and the Business Council on National Issues. Under that I believe is a Mr. Sydney Jackson, now the president of the Manufacturers Life Association, formerly president of the Canadian Life Insurance Association.

We want to hear from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the National Citizens' Coalition. That is one we must have. In fact, they should be first. My whip says bring in Brown. I do not know whether he will come or not. I hope he will. The propaganda being spread around this country is intolerable. I do not have any preference as to who is first or last. We are not only asking but demanding that these witnesses be called, as well as the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses. I would like to hear as well from the advisory committee on public service pensions and from a couple of other gentlemen for whom I have a great deal of respect.

I would like to hear from Mr. Leslie Barnes, who has written some excellent articles on this very serious issue. In my view, he has a lot of credibility and expertise. I would not mind hearing from Ed Finn, another person with a certain amount of expertise. That is the time schedule.

At a time when my House leader was absent from the House, I asked the government House leader what was happening with Bill C-12. I forget when it was I asked him. However, he stated that he wanted it before Christmas. I said there was no way he would get it before Christmas. I think I asked him that in October or early November. I gave him some indication as to the witnesses we wanted to hear. That is why the bill was not brought forward. The government knew that we were going to probe. We had the questions, we wanted the answers, and they were not prepared to go through that oratory.

An hon. Member: Ha, ha!

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Alexander: I hear the ha, ha! All I know is the bill was not introduced and the government did not get it before Christmas. I do not know whether it will get it before April. With all due respect to the President of the Treasury Board, he has not told us a doggone thing. The questions we have are exemplified by those on the order paper. I hope the President of the Treasury Board realizes we have a lot of work to do before we even start on clause 1.

We have come a long way from the days when pensions first appeared and were viewed as a reward for long and faithful service. Pensions are no longer a reward but a form of deferred compensation. They are no longer a privilege but a right.

I am glad the minister has indicated that he appreciates the fact that those in the $7,000 and $8,000 bracket make up 95 per cent of those about whom we are talking. We are talking of those at the bottom of the economic ladder.

One of the major problems that currently exists is the remarkably uneven nature of the changes that have occurred. Some persons must rely on CPP, OAS or QPP. Others have additional pensions. Some even have indexed pensions. This unevenness has created the current pension debate.

Accordingly, we should also direct our attention to the 60 per cent of the labour force that does not belong to any private pension plan and must rely on CPP, OAS and so on, and those who make private pension plan contributions but collect no benefits as a result of the problems of portability and so on. We must, as well, be concerned about mechanisms to allow the private sector to offer indexed pensions more easily. Therefore, that must be investigated. That is why I listed the many witnesses who would be able to give us that expertise.

What disturbs me is why we are having this debate now. I remember the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) going around this country and walking in and out of this House of Commons talking about how inflation had been licked, how it had been wrestled to the ground. Neither became a reality. We have inflation of about 8.5 per cent. I understand it is going to get worse. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) does not know what it will be. He has upped his November figure from 6.5 to 7.5 per cent. He does not know what is going on.

When government ministers brought in wage and price controls, or whatever they called it, their incomes policy, they told the Canadian people it would be down to 4 per cent by 1978. If they had done their job in terms of cutting government spending, we may have been closer to that figure. If they had stopped printing money, we would have been closer. However, they did not do that. They kept on printing money and spending. Not only that, but they continued to waste money. I need only refer to the Auditor General's condemnation regarding the government's management of fiscal and monetary policy. Therefore, inflation just took off.

We are nowhere near 4 per cent, and all economic indicators point to the situation getting tougher. Even the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada have implied that, although the minister likes to say that the situation looks great. He knows it is not great. We have 1,250,000 people out of work, and he is trying to con me? I have been around too long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: A lot of Canadians just do not accept that nonsense. As a result of not reaching that 4 per cent which was guaranteed by the government, they have had to ask Canadians to trust them. They do this even though they flip-flop. They deceived the Canadian people during the 1974 election. At that time they said wage and price controls would not work. They said they did not work in Great Britain and in the United States and, under no circumstances, would they freeze wages.

People therefore became concerned about the form, extent, and cost of indexing in the public sector. Because of government incompetence and mismanagement, the alleged uneveness and inequity became more worrisome, bothersome, and frustrating.

It is necessary to go into the history of indexed pensions in order that we be better advised as to the background and what must be done for the future. Before 1970, the pension benefits of retired public servants in Canada were adjusted on an ad hoc basis. The persistent and relatively high levels of inflation in the late sixties led the federal government to review its policy. An advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act examined various proposals for a special contributory plan and concluded that such a plan, financed by equal contributions of the government's employees, was feasible. The objective of the plan was to finance the cost of partially protecting the value of the government sponsored retirement and other benefits to the public service on a continuing basis.

An act to provide supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions from the Consolidated Revenue Fund was adopted in 1970. It provided that, commencing in the month of April, 1970, a supplementary retirement benefit would be paid to every recipient of pension, the amount of benefit to be calculated by means of a particular formula. The maximum supplementary benefit payable to public servants was tied to the indexation of the Canada Pension Plan as it read on January 1, 1970.

The benefit index of the supplementary pension plan was connected to the pension index of the Canada Pension Plan. The latter act defined the pension index as the average of the consumer price index for Canada as published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, as it then was, under the authority of the Statistics of Canada Act, for each month in a 12-month period ending June 30 in the preceding year or 1.02 times the pension index of the preceding year, whichever was less. In this way supplementary pension benefits of public servants were partially indexed to the cost of living, but only partially because the maximum supplementary benefit was limited to 2 per cent of the basic pension of the preceding year. The supplementary retirement benefit for public servants would be financed equally by the government and by the employee, each contributing half a per cent of gross salary to a special fund out of which payment would be made.

The 2 per cent limit to pension increases was eliminated by the Statute Law Supplementary Retirement Benefits Amendment Act, 1973, and the amendment substituted a new definition for pension index. I will quote it:

> Pension index with respect to any year means the average for that year of the consumer price index for Canada as published by Statistics Canada for each month of the 12-month period ending on the 30th day of September in the immediately preceding year.

Accordingly, any increase in the consumer price index would be fully reflected in escalation of benefits under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. I think it is important that this should be put on record.

Introducing the amendment to the House at the time, the Hon. C. M. Drury noted that the government had agreed to assume the cost of all escalation for all those who had retired before 1970 and, the balance of the cost of the escalation of pensions of persons retired since 1969, which had not been covered by matching contributions made by those persons and by the government in respect to them. Aside from this, the government intended to adhere to the principle of equal employer/employee contributions. Initially, this would increase the cost to both of providing the supplementary benefits from one half of 1 per cent to 1 per cent of gross salary, with a strong likelihood of future increases. As a matter of fact, the position of the government of the day at that time was, and I quote:

> In the long run the contribution of half of one per cent together with the government's matching contribution would almost certainly be insufficient to cover the cost of escalation for employees entering the public service with an average working life of 30 years in the service ahead of them. There is an assumption that it would be necessary to increase the contribution made in the very near future if, such an employee is to pay half the cost of his pension escalation after retirement. The assumption is that it would not be necessary to do so for a few years. The government is proposing to adopt a phased approach under which the present rate of contribution is to be raised by half of one per cent each effective January 1, 1977. What further increases might be required in later years will be determined by future parliaments.

I want to pause here to say that a public servant, a top level public servant with a high rank in the armed forces, called me to ask why, if it was thought the program was in trouble, the government had not asked the employees to pay a further one half per cent. I said I did not know. A moment ago I heard the hon. member for Ottawa West say it was not needed. I am simply throwing out the question. Why all this rigmarole? Why all the complexity? Why this frustration and uncertainty? At that time the basic reaction of the opposition to the legislation was that it was long overdue and not enough.

Rather than question a provision which was generally unavailable in private enterprise, a number of opposition members advocated indexing public service pensions to a wages and salaries index, or to an index based on the gross national product, much more expensive options than indexation to the consumer price index. I was here. Many members now in this Chamber were here. Most of us were here. But we really didn't know what was going on. We were conned in 1974 but we are not going to be conned again. I am not saying the minister has conned us. I am saying that what happened in 1974 led us to an impulsive conclusion. So we are now at the stage of full indexing.

It is no secret that the present provision of indexed pensions has, in recent years, come under increasing criticism from the general public and, of course, the public service is concerned about the attitude which the general public has expressed. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, we must get at the truth. Rightly or wrongly, the public perception is that the Public Service Superannuation Act in conjunction with the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act provides public servants with pensions which are among the best in the country. Essentially only large financial institutions are providing similar initial benefit levels. Exceptions exist at lower earnings levels for the very large industrial organizations.

Furthermore, on January 1 each year public service pensions are increased by the change in the consumer price index. Only about .6 per cent of workers in the private sector have pensions that are comparable. The increase on January 1, 1978, was 7.2 per cent. I am not too sure what it was on January 1, 1979, but we must always remember, Mr. Speaker, that there is a contribution by the public servant of 6.5 per cent of salary as a basic pension and one per cent for indexation, with matching done by the government.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate just how pleased we were to hear what the minister had to say. I want to quote him again. He indicated what would have happened had Bill C-12 come into effect when they thought it would come into effect on January 1. I will read this out as a result of my House leader asking that extremely important question. This is what the minister indicated:

> Basically our intent was to give full indexation for all pensionable incomes under $7,000, which I think amounts to something around 75 per cent or 80 per cent. Regarding amounts above $7,000, during the year 1979 we intend to index those at 8 per cent, in 1980 at 7 per cent and in 1981 at 6 per cent. I should point out, as hon. members will see when they look at the report from the chief actuary, that this was based on an inflation assumption of 8.8 per cent when in fact it turned out to be 8.4 per cent, so we are better off than we thought we would be. With a little good luck this provision hopefully will be even more generous for the years 1980, 1981 and 1982.

We now know that the ad hoc arrangement will not take effect until January 1, 1980. This does make a difference and we welcome that, but I do not think the minister had any choice. And I still have to think about the April 1 deadline which the minister wants to introduce. As well, there will be provisions he wants to bring in by proclamation. He is going to have to show us, though, why he did not go all the way with it and whether there are savings because in truth, Mr. Speaker, I do not trust the figures that this government throws out. Most of them come from the Minister of Finance and his department, and he's been wrong ever since I've been here with respect to growth, with respect to unemployment, with respect to inflation. We need, for example, other people to tell us what the inflation rate will be. We need other people to make guesses with respect to the wage rate and the interest rate. All of these things will have a bearing on this bill.

[Mr. Alexander.]

One of the major criticisms levelled against the indexing of public service pensions is that the current contribution rate—one per cent of salary by the employee and a matching contribution by the employer—is not sufficient to cover the cost of indexing when inflation rates run as high as they have in recent years. This is the issue.

A second major criticism of public service pensions relates to early retirement. Under the present system a person can retire with a fully indexed pension if years of age plus service equal 85. This system encourages those eligible to retire at the age of 55. Many of them have taken this option and have subsequently taken jobs with private industry, perhaps even as consultants selling their services to the government.

A third major criticism concerns a loophole in the existing legislation which allows a person who retires in December to collect a full year's indexing the following January.

This is what makes me so angry with the government. The Treasury Board initially reacted to the criticism of public service pensions by publishing in October, 1976, a brief about the basic facts on pensions in the public service in Canada. In this brief they attempted to prove that in the long run the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act would be sound. I want to quote from that document because some aspects of it have been forgotten. It is dated October 18, 1976, and is entitled "Basic Facts about Pensions in the Public Service of Canada". This is what is stated at the bottom of page 14:

> In other words, employer pension costs for the federal public service are expected to be reasonably stable, as long as the relationships observed in the past between rates of inflation, interest and salary increase remain substantially the same. Even with continuing inflation at 8 per cent—an improbable hypothesis—financial requirements for the public service pension plan would not diverge significantly from past experience if the normal long-term relationship between wages, interest and inflation were to be maintained.

On page 15 they give a couple of conclusions as follows:

> The public service pension plan is financially sound. All basic pension payments—about 80 per cent of the total outlays recently—are financed on what actuaries call a fully funded basis, through employee and employer contributions. The remainder of outlays—indexation payments—are partially funded with the funded elements expected to increase gradually over the years.

Item number 6 on the same page reads:

> New liabilities arising from the indexation of public servants' pensions are unlikely to increase the total pension costs of the government as a proportion of payroll. For one thing, the level of employee contributions to the indexation account is rising, and the average period of contribution is lengthening; for another, the basic features of the public service pension plan have been fairly stable, so that extra interest earnings might well be sufficient, in the 1980s, to meet actuarial deficiencies for basic pensions.

Perhaps that is what the hon. member for Ottawa West was talking about. But that was back in 1976. It was true then. That was the gospel, the bible. Now it is no longer the bible. That is why I say that I cannot trust this government.

On March 9, 1978, the Tomenson-Alexander report was tabled which points out that if the public service pension plan, including indexing, were placed on a fully funded basis, the plan, in addition to employee contributions, would require continuing government-employer contributions of 15.3 per cent of the payroll for current service and would face an initial unfunded actuarial liability of $5.9 billion for past service, most of which arises from the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

We will have to find out whether that is true. I will not just accept that. They will have to tell us how they arrived at that conclusion, why they arrived at it and what are the solutions. The report further indicated that if the unfunded liability were amortized over 15 years, an additional employer contribution of 19.1 per cent of pay would have been required in 1976, decreasing to 5.2 per cent in 1990, and to zero thereafter.

Besides the funding problems, Tomenson-Alexander also compared the public service plan with the private sector and found that while 80 per cent of plans in the private sector have provided some post-retirement adjustments, averaging 66 per cent of the change in the CPI, only 5.8 per cent are covered by formal plan provisions, and only 0.6 per cent by full indexing provisions. The average annual employer contribution per employee in the private sector in 1975 was $676 compared to $1,020 under the PSSA and SRBA for the same period. Under full funding, the employer contribution under the PSSA and SRBA would be approximately $4,350 per participant. Further, they indicated that most private sector companies will be unwilling to grant open-ended indexing and will not want skilled employees to retire at age 55 as is possible in the federal public service.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, let me read from Hansard of March 9, 1978, at page 3634. As reported in Hansard, a question was raised with respect to the private sector. Now that we are dealing with the public sector, we should be concerned as well about the private sector. A Liberal member of parliament asked the then president of the Treasury Board the following question:

> Does he have anything to say at this time about this other great concern with respect to indexed pensions, namely, the exemplary effect they might have on the private sector?

The then president of the treasury board indicated:

> I say quite candidly that they will have difficulties. It is one thing to say it is fair and just and should be done, but there is the other reality of the availability of funds and the method of paying for it. I cannot indicate to the hon. member yet what the findings of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare are, except that I hope they will be available very soon and will give some stimulation to the private sector.

It seems to me that the private sector cannot meet the standards set by this bill even at this time. I indicated earlier that the provinces are studying this problem, the federal government is studying it, and the Department of Finance is studying it. Everybody is studying the problem but no one has the answer. We still need mechanisms for the private sector. Where are the reports from the Minister of Finance and from the Department of National Health and Welfare?

In any event, the then president of the treasury board responded on March 9 by stating that the government would introduce legislation to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. The purpose of the amendment would be to place a curb on some undesirable practices that have crept into the program, to close off some loopholes in the program, and to fortify the financial liability of the program against unexpected financial setbacks that could conceivably arise in the relatively distant future.

The government had also introduced legislation in the last session, a bill to deal with total compensation comparability, Bill C-28. I think that is all tied in together, and of course we must know what we are talking about when we talk about total compensation comparability because pensions and indexation of pensions are part and parcel of that.

I think it is necessary to summarize the contents of the bill. The major provisions of the bill are as follows. Pension indexing would no longer be automatically tied to the consumer price index but would be determined three years at a time on an ad hoc basis. If sufficient funds are not available for full CPI indexing, the pension increase would be based on the amount credited to the fund, based on employer and employee contributions as well as interest earnings. Over the next five years, indexing would be progressively deferred so that by 1983—I do not know what the date would be now—public service pensions would not be indexed until age 60, rather than at age 55 as is presently the case if the public servant has 30 years of service. A pensioner's first indexing adjustment would be prorated to the month of retirement, rather than paying the full adjustment in January, regardless of what month retirement occurs as is presently the case.

The proposed legislation would also establish the special pension program agreed to in 1976 by the government for air traffic controllers in operational or tower service, bringing them increased pension benefits. An additional 2 per cent of salary would be contributed by controllers and matched by the employer to pay for these benefits. The bill, which contains a number of technical amendments, also proposes that the government be permitted, as in the private sector, to amortize unfunded pension liabilities, in some instances over a 15-year period, instead of requiring that all unfunded public service pension liabilities be amortized over five years.

We have been waiting for 11 months for the government to present its detailed proposals on indexed pensions flowing out of the general principles and policies laid out last March 9 by the then president of the treasury board. During the debate which took place last March, I indicated on behalf of my party that we agreed with the government's intention to endorse a form of indexing if it was actuarially sound. That has always been the position of the Progressive Conservative party and still is our position. As a matter of fact, on May 4, Mr. C. L. Lockhart, president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, was advised in writing as follows:

> My party is committed to the principle of maintaining the purchasing power of pensions. We have been concerned that people on fixed incomes, particularly those living on small pensions, can least afford to be caught by inflation, for which they are not responsible.

The letter stated further:

> However, protection against inflation must be achieved in a way that guaranteed an actuarially sound pension plan. The pension plan must be made to meet all future commitments to those who have made contributions and recognize the legitimate concerns of taxpayers.

But, even more important, the letter went on to say:

When specific legislation is introduced, my colleagues and I will work to ensure that there is full consultation with the public service on specific proposals.

The above views are those of my leader and are accepted by the members of the Progressive Conservative party. In my view, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about the position of my leader and my party with respect to the principle of indexation. However, I went on to say in my March speech that while the Progressive Conservative party supports the government's broad intentions, support for its specific proposals will have to await the tabling of the bill itself. Of course the bill cannot spell out all of the day to day details on how these principles and policies will operate in individual and special situations. This is extremely important, and the minister just touched on it. The bill cannot ensure that the changeover to the new rules will be carried out in a smooth and equitable manner.

There will be other hon. members of my party who will address themselves to a specific concern regarding the armed forces and the RCMP. It will be necessary for my party to lay out in some detail the background information which parliament requires in order to arrive at an informed decision on the proposals contained in Bill C-12 in terms of costing and financial implications. Of course this will be done. Further, we will have something to say on the proposals related to air traffic controllers. We accept the thrust and direction, but the hearing of witnesses is important to determine if the government's provisionary ad hoc approach is feasible, just, and sound.

Let me say at the outset that my party wants to see all of the relevant facts and figures brought out in the open. When full indexing was established in 1974, clearly parliament was not provided with sufficient information. If it had been, we would not be back here this evening altering the formula which was put in place approximately five years ago. We do not believe it is right that a person's pension, which he believes he is paying for with every pay cheque, should be forever dependent upon the whim of future public and government opinion.

Parliament and the public service have a right to know, before the bill is passed, just how much indexing can be provided in the future, not just three years in the future, but 15, 20 and even 30 years in the future, when the bulk of public servants working today will be reaching retirement age. The government's calculations and assumptions should be a matter of public record before the bill is passed, so that public servants will know with some certainty to what extent their pensions will reflect changes in the CPI when they retire.

In his speech on March 9, the then president of the treasury board referred to the proposed changes by stating they:

—are designed to firm up the financial undertakings of the program to ensure that we are not stirring up future trouble for taxpayers and public service pensioners.

Indeed this bill must achieve that goal. The minister must make public the actuarial calculations which lead to that conclusion. It is inconceivable that the government would introduce legislation, or that the House would be asked to approve legislation, without some idea of what will happen in the future. The type of information parliament requires will be spelled out more clearly by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, who is an actuary. He knows a lot about this bill and what it means to have something actuarially sound. I hope the minister or his officials do not expect to con or bamboozle members on this side. We have a top flight man who understands figures and how they can be manipulated, the hon. member for York-Scarborough.

Mr. Buchanan: You are the first speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, I am the first speaker. That is my right. The minister's speech was written by his officials. He did a very good job in that regard. I wrote my own speech. I want to put the position of my party on the table. I want the minister to know that I am not finished yet, and that a lot of questions require answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: All Canadians, including our public service, are tired of government flim-flam. They want honest, fiscally responsible approaches to these problems.

On March 9 the minister stated in his speech that he wished to "place a curb on some undesirable practices that have crept into the program." This has led to two amendments in Bill C-12. In order to reduce the number of public servants who leave the public service early but do not leave the labour market—in fact many continue to sell their services to the government on a contract basis—the government proposes to defer the indexing of public service pensions to age 60. A public servant could still retire at age 55 if he has 30 years of service, but he would not receive a cost of living adjustment until age 60. The proposal would be phased in over five years. The Progressive Conservative party supports the proposal to close this loophole, but we will raise certain questions in committee concerning situations where retirement is not of a voluntary nature or involves stress or risk of some sort.

In order to close a loophole which allows public servants retiring in December to receive a full 12-month cost of living adjustment the following January, the government proposes to pro rate the first adjustment to the month in which retirement occurs and thus reflect the portion of the year during which they were retired. The Progressive Conservative party supports this proposal.

Also, the minister spoke about the desire to fortify the financial viability of the program against unexpected financial setbacks which could arise conceivably in the relatively distant future. While the Progressive Conservative party supports this principle, it is the government's detailed proposals in this regard which lead to the most questions. Under the government proposal, indexing would no longer be tied automatically to the CPI, but would be determined three years at a time on an ad hoc basis. If sufficient funds are not available for full CPI indexing, the pension increase would be based on the amount credited to the fund, employer and employee contributions, as well as interest earnings. I am pleased to say that the first ad hoc arrangement would commence in the year 1980. The Progressive Conservative party is interested in the principle, but we are left with a large number of unanswered questions.

The Tomenson-Alexander report on indexed pensions tabled last March by the former minister recommended that an actuarial costing be undertaken and published before any major changes in the pension program are legislated. To my knowledge the minister has not given this information. Also, the report recommended that while the chief actuary might undertake the study, it should be reviewed by an independent group of three actuaries. We demand that the government provide parliament with this basic information, if it has not done so already.

On March 9 the then minister spoke of a desire to eliminate undesirable financial setbacks in the future. This is our concern also. We do not want to be back here in five years, or even 15 or 20 years, being asked once again to legislate possible reductions in public service pensions. We want to know now that this proposal is financially viable. We want to see the results of the actuarial costing recommended by Tomenson-Alexander. Indeed these results are crucial for the drafting of such legislation. We want to see the government's three-year projections, as well as its long-term ones. We want to put to rest once and for all the suspicions that this is a stop-gap measure, and that parliament might have to be called in to make further reductions in the future. We want the facts and figures necessary to give public servants some degree of satisfaction that these provisions will not lead to a situation where their pensions will be reduced drastically in the face of continuing inflation.

If there is a major problem with the bill, it relates to the decision to replace full CPI indexing with ad hoc adjustments to be made every three years. This provision requires that the President of the Treasury Board, with the advice of the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance, shall estimate the funds available for indexing in each three-year period. If the minister discovers there is not sufficient funds, he will advise the governor in council on the amount of indexing which should occur.

The problem is twofold in this regard. First, the minister can make this decision without seeking outside advice. Because of the number of actuarial assumptions which must be made, including an assumption about future interest rates, this gives a great deal of freedom to the minister. Slight changes in the assumptions can yield very different results. For instance, until last year when outside actuaries and accountants got into the act, the government was convinced there was not a problem with the indexing of public service pensions and, with appropriately chosen assumptions, it made it appear that there was no problem.

This leads to the second problem—the possibility the minister could use this provision for political purposes. The assumptions he chooses, and consequently the amount of funds available for indexing, could be quite different in an election year than in a non-election one. Accordingly we believe that amendments should be introduced to the bill. It should be ensured that the three-year actuarial valuation will be subject to review by independent actuaries as recommended by Tomenson-Alexander in its report. It should be ensured that any valuation will include long-term as well as short-term estimates. It should be ensured that any actuarial valuation and review are tabled in the House prior to October 31 for the purposes of the following three years.

My speech is somewhat lengthy because we are not going to have that many speakers. We are prepared to expedite the debate at second reading so that the bill can be sent to committee where it can be examined carefully, where expert witnesses, some of whom I mentioned earlier, may be called upon to give testimony, and where all facts can be brought out in the open. Also we will be asking for information about the proposals to deal with air traffic controllers which provide them with early retirement features at increased contribution rates. We will want to see actuarial valuations to support these proposals. Also we will raise questions concerning some of the technical amendments during committee hearings.

While the Progressive Conservative party is prepared to begin clause by clause study and hearing the witnesses, I must warn the government that future total support will depend upon the answers we receive in the days ahead. Sincerely we hope the facts and figures behind the bill will prove the bill accomplishes the stated goal of the minister to fortify the financial viability of public service pensions. Public servants should know with some degree of certainty that they are paying for and are entitled to receive pensions which reasonably reflect changes in the CPI, and that this will not impose any undue burden on the taxpayer.

At this time I should like to state that the provisions regarding air traffic controllers arise from an agreement reached in 1976 and are modelled after similar provisions in the United States. One provision deals with workers in control towers who work under stress. That is why I think you will be hearing from the armed services and the RCMP, because they also work under stress and at some risk. Accordingly, there was a certain provision made for control tower people. Under such circumstances regarding controllers, and if retaining or the obtaining of alternate employment fails, they could receive early pensions.

The provision provides for voluntary retirement at full pension at age 50 after 25 years' service in an air traffic control tower. If retirement is involuntary, it provides for an immediate pension based on the number of years of service after ten years, with no penalty at age 45 with 20 years. This will be financed by a 2 per cent increase in the contribution rate of air traffic controllers and a matching employer contribution.

There are a number of unanswered questions which must be answered regarding this bill. Tomenson-Alexander recommended that an actuarial valuation of the combined pension program be undertaken before any major changes are made.

Has the government undertaken any actuarial valuation of the combined plan? If so, what actuarial assumptions were used, what amount of indexing will be available to the public service, Canadian forces and RCMP in the three-year period from 1980 to 1982? What amount of indexing will be available in subsequent three-year periods?

The bill creates three separate funds for the public service, the armed forces and the RCMP out of which indexing will be paid based on an estimate of the funds available for each three-year period starting with 1980-82.

If estimates are too high in early years, could this lead to a situation where pensions will be reduced in the face of high inflation in later years? Will the amount of indexing for everybody coming under the SBRA be based on the calculation of funds available in the public service account? If so, is it not possible for one account to run out of money before the others? Alternatively, different groups might receive different amounts of indexing. Who will pay for any deficits? Who will pay for any deficits which might arise with regard to other recipients, members of parliament, judges and diplomats?

The bill proposes to transfer excess interest on the retired employee's share of the public service superannuation account to the supplementary retirement benefits account. What is the expected annual increase in cost to the government in respect of the public service superannuation account as a result of this decision? At present, the government credits interest to the accounts based on the interest rate on long-term government bonds. Will future interest rates be based on a more fair interest marker reflecting investment opportunities which would be available in the market? I think that is what the minister indicated. What asset mix will be used?

One of the greatest concerns with public service pensions relates to the problem resulting from phanton funding. In other words, all excess contributions each year go into consolidated revenue, and payments are made from consolidated revenue. There is in reality only a paper entry, not a real fund. Has the government considered actually investing part of the assets of the public service superannuation account in non-government securities and, if so, what portion of the funds is the government considering in this regard?

In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, I think I should conclude now because I want my friend from the NDP—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You might as well keep on going. I can make my speech on Monday.

Mr. Alexander: All right. The hon. member wants me to keep on going so I will pick up from where I left off.

By virtue of Bill C-28, now Bill C-22, the government has spoken a great deal about total compensation comparability, the principle now known as equitable comparison, with the representative selection of employers in the private sector. Has the government undertaken an equitable compensation study comparing public service compensation with private sector compensation? Does the government agree with the Tomenson-Alexander study which indicates that the excess value of the combined pension program over the average in the private sector is of the order of 9 per cent of pay? What impact will the amendments proposed in Bill C-22 have on that calculation? If an equitable compensation comparability is instituted, will unions be allowed to bargain changes in pension benefits?

The bill attempts to deal with the problem of early retirement by starting indexing at age 60 rather than age 65. What is the average age of retirement in each of the years 1972 to 1978? How does this average vary by annual salary level? What is the estimated impact that this provision will have on average retirement age, and is this fair in cases of non-voluntary retirement?

The bill provides an early retirement provision for air traffic controllers who work in control towers in high stress situations in return for a 2 per cent increase in their pension contributions. Has the government undertaken an actuarial valuation of this proposal and, if so, what were the results of such valuation?

Another problem which we must face relates to the conversion of the Post Office to a Crown corporation, and this leads to a number of questions. Will the Post Office employees continue in the public service superannuation plan, or will they have their own plan? How much money will be transferred if a new plan is created? How will Post Office employees who are now retired be handled? Will they move to the new plan or remain in the present one? What impact will all this have on the valuation of the combined public services plan?

Mr. Speaker, you can see how important this bill is and you will note that we do not treat it lightly, like some hon. members who were laughing because I was taking my time trying to put forward several questions which they cannot answer, in order that all of us in this House can determine whether the approach, the direction and the principle the government has taken are satisfactory, just, equitable, and actuarially sound ones. We are prepared to give this bill second reading in order to get it to the committee where we can hear witnesses and get the expertise and advice that I think is required before we can come to a rational conclusion in terms of whether this bill is on the right path. The public service demands this, we demand it, and the people of Canada demand it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening—

An hon. Member: Call it ten o'clock and we can watch the third period.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At what stage is the game, in the third period? Earlier this evening I felt I would be able to make my entire speech before ten o'clock, but as things rolled on I felt I might as well have gone into the lobby to watch the hockey game.

An hon. Member: Everybody else is there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I suppose this is one time when, if I suggested we call it ten o'clock, I might get unanimous agreement. However, this is a very serious issue and I am happy to speak briefly on it tonight with the understanding that I shall probably have to adjourn the debate at ten o'clock and continue when we get back to this bill next week.

There is one thought expressed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) and by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), in which I thoroughly concur; with them I decry the campaign, and particularly the nature of it, which has been against the indexing of public service pensions.

There are or have been enlightened insurance executives like Sydney Jackson of the Manufacturers Life, and the late William Anderson of North American Life, who have realized that pensions are not pensions unless they are indexed, and that the private insurance industry must address itself to that problem. I earnestly hope, with that kind of enlightenment on the private side, we will move in the direction of winning for all people in Canada adequate pensions and the indexing of those pensions, instead of having to listen to a campaign against public servants such as we have experienced for quite a considerable period of time.

I have referred to enlightened insurance executives. I am afraid that the others, those who wage the kind of campaign that was exemplified in an advertisement in the papers today, must face the suspicion that in times of inflation insurance companies gain if the pensions are not indexed, because they do not have to pay any more, but they make a lot more money in the interest that they earn on the funds which have been entrusted to them. The three of us who have spoken thus far are agreed on this issue. We have no use for the campaign which has been waged against the indexing of civil service pensions.

It is not particularly relevant at this point in my remarks, but having mentioned a couple of names, there are a couple of others that I would like to mention favourably. We are well served in the Government and Parliament of Canada by our public servants, and I know that it is a bit unfair to single out any particular individuals, but I think it would not be inappropriate for me to say that in this field, the whole question of the indexing of pensions and many other aspects of pensions, we were well served for many years by Mr. Hart Clark and the staff that surrounded him, and we are being well served today by Mr. W. A. Kelm and his staff. I hope it is not inappropriate for me to say that with Mr. Kelm in the gallery. After all, he has been there several days waiting for this bill to get started, and at least he should get credit for that.

I approach this subject as a firm believer in the right of older people, not only to have pensions for their retirement years, but also in their right to have those pensions keep up, at least, with the cost of living. I emphasize the words "at least". In my view that does not go far enough. The fact of the matter is that in their working years our people get a certain measure of the increase in productivity which takes place. They seek and have a right to seek wage and salary increases which bear some relation to the gross national product. It is not good enough to say to older people who have retired, "All we shall do for you is to make sure that your income will keep up to the cost of living so that at age 70, 75 or 80 you can buy the same basket of goods and services you were able to buy at the point when you retired."

The standard of living is increasing for everybody else in society, and one of the reasons for increased productivity is the contribution made by those older people. I hope the day will come when, instead of having to defend indexation in relation to the rise in the cost of living, we will be joined in the battle to get it improved so that it is based on the gross national product and therefore will enable retired people to enjoy their rights as full members of the Canadian family.

I suspect that members are getting used to, if not a little tired of, hearing me make personal references in these debates on pensions, but one of the facts of life is that I have been involved in this issue for a long time. I well remember that in 1944 I asked my first question about the pensions of retired civil servants. They were referred to as civil servants in those days, not public servants. I did so because some older persons who had been retired for a number of years came to see me at my home in Winnipeg and laid their plight before me. They convinced me that this was an issue that one should pursue, so I took it on in 1944. The members who were here a few years ago—there are no members here tonight who were here in 1944, the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was here but does not happen to be present in the chamber tonight—will remember the many times during question period, in debate, and during the late show, when I pressed this issue.

One of the few times in this House when I found it difficult to speak was toward the end of 1969. It was 25 years after 1944, and I was able to stand up in this House to welcome the announcement made in December, 1969, by the then president of the treasury board, the Hon. C. M. Drury, that the escalation of the pensions of retired public servants would be put into effect. I sometimes tell that story to some of my younger colleagues who say they have been around here for a full term or a couple of terms and have not accomplished much yet. I say, "Stick around a while, some things take a quarter of a century." The reason for throwing in that personal reference is to make the point that I believe thoroughly in this, and the fact that it took such a long time to win it, and the fact that we won it, I think, gives a certain moral sanctity to it.

Along the way we won the beginnings of the escalation of other kinds of pensions. It was in the mid-1960s that we got the Canada Pension Plan which had in it a provision for indexing pensions up to a ceiling of 2 per cent. We began the indexing of old age pensions, again up to a ceiling of 2 per cent.

I was here, too, in the famous years from 1972 to 1974. They have been mentioned by other members tonight, but I would like to mention that those were the years of a minority parliament when we got those 2 per cent ceilings removed and got the indexing of public service pensions, RCMP pensions, Canadian Armed Forces pensions, old age security pensions, guaranteed income supplement pensions, pensions of veterans on disability payment, and so on, up to the full extent of the rise in the consumer price index.

I know that I have indulged in this bit of memory and reflection a number of times, and I make no apology for doing so because I think that the Parliament of Canada has been at its best when it has done these things to make life better for our older people. By mentioning those other pension plans to which I have referred, I emphasize that my concern—and I hope the concern of all members of this House—is not just for public servants but for all the people of Canada. Our job is not to backtrack on this program but to go ahead with it. I thoroughly dislike, and I decry, as the two previous speakers have, the campaigns of those who try to turn back the clock in so far as the indexing of pensions is concerned.

I take my stand along with the two persons I already named, my friend, the late Bill Anderson of North American life, and Sydney Jackson of Manufacturers Life, who realized the social responsibility of private industry and of the private insurance business to move into this field. That is what we should be doing, not having to cope with a campaign against the indexation of pensions, but moving in two directions; first to see to it that indexing applies to all pensions, public and private, and, second, to see to it that this indexing is made more in line with the rise in the standard of living and the rise in gross national product.

I will be happy to say more on this matter on Monday, or whenever we come back to Bill C-12. In the meantime, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, tonight's debate arises from a question I put to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) two months ago. At that time I asked the Deputy Prime Minister what minister in his cabinet was going to put in place—like today—a new plan to arrest the current account deficit in this nation. The question was necessary because of the unsatisfactory answers received the day before from the super economic minister, sometimes known as the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras). That minister has simply said that the current account deficit was a problem of medium and long term and would have to be solved in that context. That is not good enough.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Unfortunately, the Deputy Prime Minister reiterated at that time that the problems were medium and long term, but gave no indication as to how to solve them. He did refer to the travel account deficit as being part of the problem and said that that problem was one which would have to be solved in a medium term sense.

The travel account deficit amounted to $1.8 billion last year compared with $29 million in 1968. Imagine, within ten years we shifted from a rather nominal deficit on the tourist account of $29 million to $1.8 billion last year, yet all the Deputy Prime Minister and the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers have to say is that that is a medium or long-term problem.

The fact is that the travel deficit alone represents 40 per cent of the current account deficit this year. Expressed another way, in the past four years the deficit on the travel account has represented $5.3 billion. Many authorities feel that that deficit may continue to increase. If we are looking for reasons why our diving dollar continues to dive lower and lower, we need look no further than the current account deficit of some $4.5 billion which we ran up last year.

Sometimes I feel that the government is unaware of the magnitude of what we are talking about. Let us look, for example, at what the Financial Post says in the current issue. It says that a foreign investment study in Florida has revealed that Canadians are the largest single group of foreign investors in that state. The study listed 45 Canadian controlled firms in land development in Florida and another 17 in which Canadians are partners. The reason I link the tourist deficit with the capital investment which is taking place in Florida is not just that the people are going down to sunny Florida as tourists; they are taking their money with them. They are investing Canadian dollars in that state in amounts which are estimated at $450 million at the present time, and it is anticipated that in the coming 15 years that amount will exceed $1.3 billion, yet here we have the Deputy Prime Minister and the superior economic minister opposite saying that this is a long-term or medium-term problem and, in effect, "Why bother with them?"

The magnitude of the travel account deficit, the interest and dividend deficit, and the resulting current account deficit, is that in the last five years we have actually had a total current account deficit of $18 billion. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) sometimes glibly says that we have always had that deficit. That is a straight misrepresentation. In the previous five years, the first five years if you like of this emperor's reign, there was a surplus. The surplus was something over $300 million per year, and yet here we have a government faced with a deficit of a current account nature for the last five years aggregating $18 billion and it has the audacity to tell us somehow that is a medium or long-term problem that it is not prepared to address at the present time.

Let me touch once more on that important question of the net direct investment outside this country. In the first six months of 1978, for example, we find that that net direct investment amounted to $725 million. That was in just six months. In other words, on average per month the net amount of money flowing out as opposed to coming into Canada was $100 million a month. That compares to net direct investment in Canada in 1968 of $365 million. In short, it is not just a coincidence—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question put by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on December 8. Let me begin by pointing out that historically Canada's balance of international payments has been characterized by a significant deficit on current account and a surplus on capital transactions.

Mr. Stevens: That is just not true, and you know it.

Mr. Martin: Current account deficits for Canada are neither new, in fact they are the rule, not the exception, nor are they in themselves a bad thing. In order to finance high levels of capital formation and enhance economic growth, Canada has traditionally supplemented its domestic savings by recourse to foreign capital markets. Deficits on current account are the necessary counterpart of this.

Nevertheless, under present circumstances the government would view a reduction in Canada's current account deficit as a favourable development. We are optimistic that this will occur in the future. The deficit in the third quarter was influenced by some rather disappointing figures for Canada's international balance on merchandise trade in July and August. There are grounds for believing, however, that the merchandise trade figures for the summer months are not indicative of a trend. Taking a longer perspective, since the first quarter of 1976, we have experienced a substantial improvement in our merchandise trade account and we expect further gains. Our competitive position in international markets, which earlier had been a cause for concern, is much improved and this should exert a positive influence on our current account balance over the coming quarters.

In our view, as has been mentioned on many occasions, attempting to affect the pattern of Canada's international payments by artificial devices would be counterproductive and would be treating the symptoms rather than the causes of a problem. Effective adjustment in the balance of payments is best promoted by following sound macro-economic policies, not by taking ad hoc measures in reaction to erratic movements in reported data for a particular quarter.

Mr. Stevens: You say $18 billion is erratic?

Mr. Martin: By concentrating on the fundamental economic problems of the country, by maintaining control over the money supply, by slowing the rate of growth of government expenditures, and by promoting structural adjustments where needed we believe that we have laid the foundations for an improvement in our economic performance which will be reflected in a balance of payments structure appropriate to our situation.

Turning to the claim that the current account deficit is the reason behind the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar, surely this is an incomplete analysis. It completely ignores the role of capital account transactions, which, in Canada's case are of fundamental importance. I should point out, as well, that an examination of the historical record reveals that, on occasion, Canada has experienced simultaneously a current account deficit and a rising exchange rate.

Finally, with reference to the question on the expenditure of international reserves intervention in the foreign exchange market has been carried out with a view to maintaining orderly market conditions rather than defending any particular level for the exchange rate. During a period of adjustment in the balance of payments, intervention may be sizeable compared to a more tranquil period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

• (2210)

Mr. Stevens: On a question of privilege—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. Questions of privilege cannot be raised during the late show.

Mr. Stevens: He has misled the House, Mr. Speaker, shamefully.

AIR TRANSPORT—USE OF EMERGENCY LOCATOR TRANSMITTERS IN AIRCRAFT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak with regard to a question I put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on Monday, February 5. I say at the start that the minister is guilty of a complete lack of concern for the safety of the flying public. He is arrogantly stupid. He is unwilling to act to safeguard the flying public. He is guilty of wilful and wanton misconduct in carrying out the duties of his office, and guilty of a cover-up that endangers the flying public. He is kamikaze minister. The difficulty is that he is not careless about his own life and safety, just the life and safety of everyone else who flies.

I will give the reasons why I say that. In 1975 the Department of Transport ordered private pilots to instal approved emergency locator transmitters on their aircraft. They had to have that completed by July 1, 1977. These ELTs or black boxes switch on automatically when a plane crashes. They then beam a powerful signal for up to 50 hours which enables rescuers in other aircraft to search and find them, even if they are completely hidden by trees, snow or whatever.

In October, 1977, the department ordered the complete removal of ELTs or ELT batteries from all aircraft. The reason was they had discovered that in two aircraft on the ground the lithium batteries which were used to power the ELTs had exploded, and that they might explode during flight. This, apparently, was due to a corrosion problem. If they corroded, they might explode.

That meant all aircraft, including the Churchill Falls jet, had to remove their ELTs. On December 9, 1977, when landing at Churchill Falls, the aircraft crashed about two miles short of the runway. There were two pilots and six passengers. It turned out subsequently that six of them died in the crash. The two who survived the crash died as a result to exposure to the cold.

The aircraft did not have an ELT. Two helicopters took off from Churchill Falls immediately. Because there was no ELT in the downed aircraft, and because it was snowing that evening, they could not find the aircraft. The aircraft was not found for two days. It was not discovered until December 11. The two survivors had frozen to death because they had not been discovered right away.

That was a bad mistake DOT made in ordering ELTs out of the aircraft, making a mandatory order that this be done. The Canadian Owners and Pilots Association says the department should have consulted with the industry and aircraft pilots and owners to find a quick solution to the problem. What they should have done was warned pilots and aircraft owners to check these lithium batteries and continually monitor them. It would be safer to have these ELTs on board, taking the small risk of the lithium battery exploding, something that would not happen if there was a constant check for corrosion.

In February, 1978, DOT changed its requirement and said that on a voluntary basis pilots could reinstate the ELT with a dry cell battery until a lithium battery was perfected. It is now a voluntary matter. That decision could have been made in October, 1977. If it had been on a voluntary basis on October, 1977, the CFL Co. aircraft would still have had the ELT and these two people probably would not have died due to exposure. Instead, it gave the order that they be all removed.

On Monday the minister confirmed to me that this is still voluntary. A year and some months later after this crash, aircraft are still not required to have ELTs on board, even the American type. All aircraft in the United States must have an ELT, but not here in Canada.

There was a magisterial inquiry into this crash which started in November in St. John's. Mr. H. Glynn-Reid of Moncton, chairman of the MOT operations group for air aviation safety, testified that the two who lived through the crash might have been found alive if the plane had been equipped with an ELT which would have given out automatic signals to aircraft. Another witness from MOT, Mr. W. R. Bowie, chairman of the flight recorder group, explained why the ELTs had been removed. There were two cases where batteries exploded, though both aircraft were on the ground at the time.

I brought this matter up in the House. I was the first to reveal it publicly on August 23, and I have been campaigning about it ever since. The minister's department changed the report of the Accident Investigation Bureau, changed the report of the Safety Bureau and the Independent Review Board, changed the wording—something which I will not go into tonight—so that the report no longer clearly blamed the department for ordering those ELTs off the aircraft and so the minister, on November 6, had to tell the House that he had made it clear to officials that they could no longer change reports coming to them from the Safety Bureau or the Independent Accident Review Board. The minister has gone that far.

Then, further in the magisterial inquiry, giving evidence several days ago, Captain Powick, in charge of air search and rescue at Halifax, said he could not think of one dangerous incident involving ELTs in military aircraft. He said, further:

> It is costing the taxpayer millions of dollars to search for aircraft which do not have ELT's on board. From my personal point of view I can see no reason not to have ELT's aboard the aircraft . . . sufficient time has elapsed to have found a suitable replacement (for the lithium battery).

All this illustrates the minister's complete disregard for the safety of the flying public. He shows no sense of urgency. More than a year after these incidents occurred they still have not found a battery. The reason the minister gives is that lithium batteries are not good in very cold weather. The weather in Canada is not always cold. If these batteries are good enough for the United States they are good enough for us, now.

The minister told us in this House on Monday that he could be "very assuring in terms of the performance of our airlines, our pilots and everyone operating the air travel system so Canadians need not be concerned." He said they need not be concerned about safety in the air, that Canadian safety levels are very high. Yet today there is a report in his department which says that air safety regulations are unco-ordinated and haphazard, that there is widespread ignorance and misunderstanding of the rules. A devastating indictment is contained in the report of his own department. Notwithstanding this, the minister comes to the House and makes misleading and false statements. I contend that he should resign immediately. As soon as that CFL Co. aircraft went down and it was discovered that there were two survivors who later died from exposure—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that I do not have equal time so that I can reply to the hon. member more fully. However, it will be noted that in the preliminary part of his presentation the hon. member discredited himself by the remarks he made with regard to the minister and the ministry. We see this all too often. Perhaps I may, through you, Mr. Speaker, make a friendly suggestion to the hon. member. If he would drop that approach he might enjoy more credibility when dealing with such a serious matter.

Mr. Crosbie: Answer the point!

Mr. Harquail: The hon. member fails to mention that Canada enjoys the best reputation in the world for demanding the highest safety standards in the air in terms of any operation conducted in this country. I think this should be mentioned.

Mr. Crosbie: Tripe!

Mr. Harquail: To respond to the hon. member's question, the airworthiness directive requiring the removal of all ELTs powered by lithium batteries is still in force. As the status report on this subject shows, replacement battery packs (with no lithium batteries) are now available for approximately 90 per cent of the current emergency locator transmitter systems in operation. Once all battery packs can be replaced, the original air navigation order calling for installation (where applicable) of a functioning ELT in aircraft will be back in force.

I am sure the hon. member is very much aware of the need for removing lithium batteries from aircraft. There are documented cases indicating the danger of using this type of battery for ELTs, although fortunately, there were no casualties in any of the reported cases. It was decided that lithium batteries used in ELTs presented an unacceptable high risk for use in civil aircraft. Therefore, an airworthiness directive was issued ordering their immediate removal.

In view of the serious situation arising from the removal of ELTs, and cognizant of the safety factors that guide our ELT policy, it has been the objective of the Canadian Air Transportation Administration to restore ELTs to service as quickly as possible.

There is evidence now that no alternate lithium based call would be available or proven safe for civil aircraft application in the immediate future. Consequently, the seven manufacturers of ELTs, who hold Canadian type approval, were formally asked to submit a proposal for a program to retrofit their manufactured ELTs with a substitute non-lithium battery. Five of these companies have received approval for a battery retrofit program. They represent about 90 per cent of the ELT population. There is the potential that the majority of ELTs will be returned to service over the period extending into later this year.

Returning ELTs to service represents an interim phase in upgrading their effectiveness. But it should be pointed out that the ELT system will be deficient in at least two areas during this interim period. The modified ELT with a non-lithium battery will not meet the operating requirements of minus 40 degrees centigrade for 100 hours. The ELTs prior to their removal from the civil aircraft fleet were experiencing numerous technical problems other than those involving their batteries. These deficiencies will continue to affect over-all ELT proficiency.

Operational efficiency of ELTs is a North American problem which has precipitated intense activity in the industry. Lead times required for research and development, regulatory change and implementation, mean that it will be some time before the desired high performance of the ELT system can be realized.

LOTTERIES—PROMOTION OF LOTO SELECT

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, during the question period on December 21, 1978, I asked two questions of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo), in her capacity as minister of lotteries. As reported on pages 2344 and 2345 of Hansard I asked about the purchase and disbursement by Loto Canada of some $17,000 worth of foil-wrapped chocolate candies. I also asked why and at what cost an American author has been commissioned to write a book about Canadian lottery winners. Why an American author?

I expect the parliamentary secretary will give full answers to these questions this evening. However, it was the closing assertion of the hon. lady which provoked me to call for this debate. She said:

> Canadian lottery winners are extremely intelligent in their investment in Loto Canada because they are able to maintain most of their dollars in their bank accounts.

I am afraid I do not understand the minister's reference to "intelligent investment", but I certainly have to question the intelligence of the decision makers at Loto Canada. How did they ever blunder into this foolish and ill-fated Loto Select fiasco? The losses due to unfulfilled contracts could run as high as $37 million. Indeed, one has to question the competence of the minister in view of her scandalous mismanagement of this multimillion dollar adventure into the world of organized gambling.

Why was Loto Select terminal equipment for the "dollar a shot" lottery ordered in such great haste last June? Why was a $23 million contract placed for 2,000 slot machines from General Instrument Company of the United States? Why were tenders not called, recognizing that there were at least ten Canadian companies fully capable of supplying such equipment? Why, when this hypocritical government was spending tens of thousands of advertising dollars urging us to "buy Canadian", did it go to the United States? Why did the cabinet not seek the concurrence of the provinces and of parliament before embarking on this foolish project? Why has the minister consistently refused to explain this remarkable circumstance to the House of Commons?

In addition to the millions wasted on the leased lottery equipment, other millions were spent to renovate, furnish and equip two major data processing centres, one in Vancouver and the other in Montreal. I have visited the Vancouver facility, which occupies an entire floor of the Bordiguon building, about 10,000 square feet. The renovation cost was over $300,000. Telephone trunk lines were brought in from all major cities in western Canada, costing about $1 million. A five year lease for the premises, at $9,000 per month, cannot be broken until next August, when a penalty of six months' rent amounting to $54,000 will have to be paid. Today, the Vancouver facility sits vacant except for more than $200,000 worth of furnishings now being sold off.

Over 50 employees were hired. They worked at Loto Select for only a few weeks. Each is receiving a severance allowance of about $10,000. At least one employee is back at his previous job, having picked up $10,000 in compensation without ever reporting for work with Loto Select.

The hon. minister regularly insists that Loto Canada plays a major role in supporting amateur sport in Canada. But what has Loto Canada really provided to the benefit of amateur sport? In 1977 the lottery took in $225 million, of which only $3.7 million or 1.6 per cent went directly to promote fitness and amateur sport. That is about 17 cents per capita. Of the balance, $25 million went to advertising and promotion, with the remainder going to wholesalers' commissions, prize money, and the Olympic debt.

It is high time for us to undertake a reassessment of the role and impact of Loto Canada. Does gambling organized by the state represent a veiled form of taxation which appeals most to those who can least afford to "play the games"? Those lower income Canadians who are more inclined to take a chance on the "big jack pot" are often those who impose the greatest burden on our social welfare systems. Personally I believe the federal government's involvement in lotteries is unnecessary, improper, and serves only to create a distorted sense of values, especially among our young people. Also it diverts the talents and energies of government ministers, such as the hon. lady, from the many really important problems which should be attended to in Canada today. I am pleased to see that at least two members on the government benches share my view, as expressed in the motion under Standing Order 43 moved last Friday by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) and seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni).

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on December 21, 1978, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon) raised from what he considered to be reliable sources the innuendo that chocolates have been absorbed by the staff. Also in his supplementary question on the same date he alleged that an American college professor was engaged to write a promotional book.

The reliable sources of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta have proven neither reliable nor accurate. Perhaps he would like to tell us the source. Contrary to the member's allegation, the gold foil wrapped chocolate coins had nothing whatsoever to do with Loto Select. It was a marketing promotion only. It was part of the regular Loto Canada $10 draw which had a prize of $1 million in gold.

The charge that Loto Canada absorbed huge quantities of the chocolate coins is probably sour grapes. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta is just complaining because this promotion scheme ended just before the cross-Canada gold bar tour reached British Columbia and the area which he represents. As far as costs of this promotion measure are concerned, the Crown corporation paid $11,000 out of an original $17,000 estimated cost for the project. Thus, the member's allegations are totally without accuracy. This is not the type of preparation we expect for questions by members of parliament.

With regard to the hon. member's supplementary question, yes, an American college professor was hired to write a survey report—not a book—on Canadian lottery millionaires. As a matter of fact, Mr. H. Roy Kaplan was chosen by the other three members of the survey team, who are also Canadians, because of his expertise in the field. Other members of the survey team were Daniel Koenig, assistant professor of sociology at the University of Victoria, Dr. Victor Tremblay of the University of Montreal, and Ms. Marjolaine Martin, a sociologist also from the University of Montreal.

Of course the hon. member has raised many, many more questions this evening which were not part of his original question and supplementary one. I suggest perhaps he will wish to have another late show question at a later date.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

RAILWAYS

PRESERVATION AND REVITALIZATION OF NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that representatives of all the railway unions of Newfoundland are meeting today with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) following a long campaign to have the minister become interested in the preservation and revitalization of the Newfoundland railway, led by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) in Ottawa, and supported by a unanimous resolution passed by the House of Assembly of Newfoundland and by about 100 per cent of all organized bodies and public opinion in Newfoundland, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the minister explain on motions on Monday the results of his discussions with representatives of Newfoundland railway unions, and that the government make a firm commitment that it will meet all properly audited and proven losses suffered by the Newfoundland railway division of CN and provide necessary capital funds for maintenance and improvement of facilities, and that a government commitment be made for the preservation and improvement of the railway mode of transportation in Newfoundland as is the case in the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ACT TO HOLD DOWN FOOD PRICE INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of dramatic food price increases—19 per cent last year—and continued escalation of meat prices in recent weeks, and noting that those people on fixed incomes, especially senior citizens, need help and protection from unfair price increases, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to take action to hold down food price increases so that senior citizens will not face hardship and a lower standard of living.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CALL FOR CONTINUANCE OF SUBSIDY IN RESPECT OF "HANSARD"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) yesterday announced discontinuance of the subsidy in respect of Hansard, a most picayune action.

• (1110)

In announcing the end of subsidies for Hansard, many Canadians will be effectively denied access to the report of proceedings of the Parliament of Canada, particularly those on low incomes. It is the only means by which Canadian people can understand what goes on in parliament, and that is their right. Today, Hansard costs $3 a year but it is to be raised to an estimated cost of $65, a preposterous action.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House instruct the Minister of Supply and Services immediately to rescind the announcement with regard to the discontinuation of subsidies to Hansard so that no Canadian may be deprived of continuing access to information to which he or she is entitled.

S.O. 43

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that the 1977 Privy Council study on Crown corporations indicated the government's intention to table an omnibus bill in parliament that fall, the fall of 1977, a promise confirmed by testimony of a Privy Council Office official before the Standing Commitee on Public Accounts, and in light of the response to my question last Wednesday by the President of the Privy Council indicating that the government no longer intends to introduce such a bill, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the President of the Privy Council make a statement on motions indicating that this House is no longer to believe the commitments given in the PCO study and clarifying the true nature of the government's Crown corporations' policy as it currently stands.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NEED FOR ADOPTION OF PROGRESSIVE LABOUR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister last week, in answering a question, defended Canada's comparative economic progress and referred to Japan's very favourable position as being in great part due to a policy of not laying off workers in periods of recession or stagflation, and in view of the fact that Canada lags far behind not only Japan but many western European countries in this aspect of employees' protection, and in view of the fact that the ideas of corporate social responsibility and workers' job rights remain practically excluded from our labour-management legislation in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

That the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour show some leadership on this issue and persuade their provincial counterparts to adopt this type of progressive labour-management relations.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

AVAILABILITY OF CRUDE OIL FOR EAST COAST REFINERIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The reduction in the amount of Middle East crude oil available for world markets is of great concern to Canadian east coast refineries dependent on foreign crude oil for production. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to prepare and present a plan to ensure the availability of crude oil for Canadian east coast refineries so that members and all interested parties can examine and assess the plan.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

INSPECTION BY AUDITOR GENERAL OF FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the charges that CMHC operates on a system of patronage, and the reported statement by the assistant secretary to the Ministry of State, "I'd hate to see an audit done on all things ordered by cabinet", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House immediately instruct the Auditor General of Canada to undertake a detailed inspection of the financial management operations of CMHC for the last, preceding fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED INEFFICIENCY IN SAFETY PRACTICES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Over the last two or three years, Canadians have been bombarded virtually daily by horror stories of inefficiency in safety standards in the air, on the water and on the ground. The matter culminated just this week in a further "leaked" report with respect to the difficulties with air inspection and safety measures.

● (1115)

I ask the minister whether this continuing story, that now embraces 18 or 19 serious major incidents in transportation in this country in the last two years, is the result of a breakdown in communications between the minister and his advisers, or is it a fact that the minister has not the time or the inclination to spend in order to ensure that Canadians continue to enjoy the right to safe travel or, equally important, the right to believe they can travel safely. What in hell is going on with transportation safety in this country?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy the choice the hon. member gives me in the way of explaining something; however, since the "something" does not exist, I do not make the choice.

The level of safety in this country is very good. Obviously, we cannot ever be content with that answer alone and we are working steadily on the question and making improvements with a lot of very loyal and effective people involved in the operation. The so-called report to which the hon. member referred, as I indicated in the House yesterday, was not a report at all but a working document submitted by one participant of a task force. The task force itself was set up because of our earnest interest in ensuring that the system of inspection and operation in the matter of air travel is constantly improving. We will go on improving it. But, Mr. Speaker, do not let the hon. member's words about travel safety worry Canadians needlessly, when in fact we do have a very sound system.

Mr. Forrestall: The difficulty with the minister is that he does not know what the hell is going on in this damn country. On every side—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would put his question.

Mr. Forrestall: If the minister is suggesting that the issuance of two pairs of snowshoes to the fire chief at Cranbrook would have saved the lives of passengers in that disastrous crash from toxic fumes, then he is sadly mistaken or badly advised.

Surely he is not denying that we are now in a very, very serious situation. We have gone from eight to thirteenth place in the standards of world safety. In fatal accidents, by any standard you want to apply, we have at least doubled, and nearly tripled, those of the western world. For the minister to imply that there is no trouble and that we are enjoying the highest safety standards in the world is simply incomprehensible.

I ask the minister whether there has been a breakdown. I am not questioning his care and concern for safe travel in this country. But has there been a breakdown with respect to the advice he is getting from his officials regarding investigations that need to be made, new legislation that should be introduced, the upgrading of existing regulatory authorities and powers to bring them in line with transportation in the late seventies and early eighties. Where has the breakdown occurred? If he does not know, will he cause—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, once again, the hon. member made a long speech about a breakdown which does not exist. Obviously, regrettable incidents will occur such as in the case of Cranbrook. The hon. member, in a quite unfair way, made some suggestion about a solution which I had never heard before. He made fun of it. It is easy to erect a strawman on any issue and then be powerful in destroying it. That is what happened. I take it that having destroyed one another over sovereignty association and phantom deficits, they are trying to find a safer issue.

Mr. Forrestall: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could we come to a very specific issue and ask the minister if he would take concrete action and urge his colleagues in Treasury Board and the Department of Labour to get on with accepting the principle of comparability of pay, so that a new offer can be made by Treasury Board to the air inspection officers and we will not continue to lose them, thus further eroding the safety factor in that specific area? Would he please urge his colleagues to get on with it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone needs to urge this government on the principle of comparability. That is exactly the principle we are trying to assert and to see in effect for people working within the government. Obviously, that is the very basis upon which all our negotiations proceed, and that applies to every group, including air inspectors.

● (1120)

STATUS OF INVESTIGATION INTO AIR CRASH AT ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a specific question. It is almost a year since the tragic crash in Newfoundland last June which claimed eight lives.

The delay in the release of the investigation report is causing serious problems in terms of insurance claims. Can the minister tell the House why there has not been a report on the cause of the tragic air crash which took eight lives in St. John's last June?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the status of the final report. My impression is the report was made available to the parties involved, for their final comments. I would want to check that.

Obviously, the report on the part of Transport into issues relating to safety is not necessarily decisive in relation to matters of settlement. Those ordinarily go before the courts in the usual way and quite a number of different issues arise in that regard.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, it is a major factor in the settlement of insurance claims, and so on, and until the report is released there can be no settlement. This is causing hardship for the survivors of that tragic crash.

In view of the concern, and rightly so, that there is in the country over what is happening in the minister's department with respect to the question of air safety and the seeming inability of the department to come to some satisfactory conclusion on this whole affair, will the minister tell this House why the government does not seem to be able to, or, indeed, want to set up some kind of independent tribunal to examine the causes of air crashes? This would remove any suggestion of conflict of interest which may exist within the Department of Transport in examining these crashes, because they formulate the regulations, they enforce them, and they have to investigate them.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been. We have put forward a proposal with regard to an independent accident board. In our usual way, we have had very thorough consultations with people in the industry and with the provinces on the subject, because some of the matters involved affect them. The hon. member knows that we are moving toward that legislation. Indeed, notice of the bill is to be put on the order paper today and first reading may be given to it on Monday or Tuesday. Instead of the usual obstruction by Conservative members of the transport committee, perhaps they would be willing to move the bill forward.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF SUBSIDIES ON CERTAIN FOODS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the minister was reported as saying that Canadians would have to put up with the high cost of imported food for a while to build a stronger economy for the future.

If we have to put up with the high cost of imported food, what about doing something on the domestic front? Is the government considering reinstating the subsidy on bread and skim milk powder which they took off in the last few months, as well as the subsidy on fluid milk which was taken off two years ago?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course we are preoccupied with the problem and we are looking at what can be done on that front. We must always balance the problem of production and prices in Canada against production and prices from abroad. As I say, we are looking at some possibilities in that regard.

In terms of the subsidies, there is concern about the expenditure level of the government, and sometimes subsidies benefit at the same time not only the poor but the rich. As was explained in this House not long ago by the Prime Minister, we have increased family allowances for the poor and we have given pensioners more money in order that they may cope with some of these problems. At the same time, we cannot introduce too many artificial distortions into the marketplace.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the government gives millions to the NHL and to the pulp and paper companies, but no money is given to subsidize skim milk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM OF RISING FOOD PRICES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my next question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister is quoted as saying in June that a new food policy would be announced within a few days. On Tuesday of this week he said, again, that a new food policy would be coming within days. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance said that we must put up with higher food costs for a while, while he builds a stronger economy. Is this the food policy of the government? Is this the only thing they can come up with?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I never said that a new food policy would be coming in a few days. I did say at different times that we would have some measures to announce with respect to food and food prices, and we did that. Last summer, the Minister of Finance asked the Anti-Inflation Board to conduct a special study into food price margins. The AIB did that and presented their report in the fall.

● (1125)

In addition, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture asked the marketing boards to increase their production quotas in certain areas, and they did that. The measures that I referred to last summer and last fall were announced and put into effect. The fact that they did not solve the total problem is, of course, something we are still dealing with. We will announce further measures in due course.

Mr. Nystrom: Despite that, Mr. Speaker, the price of food in this country went up by over 19 per cent the last year. The minister said he would be announcing a few new initiative in the next few days. The Minister of Finance said we must put up with the higher cost of imported food in order to build a stronger economy.

Is the government considering, as part of its food strategy or initiative, the possibility of increasing food self-sufficiency in this country, since if you take away grains we have a big deficit; in other words, promoting more growth of Canadian fruits and vegetables and a "Buy Canadian" policy which is similar to the policy of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when it comes to manufacturing?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the government will announce its policy when it is ready.

PENITENTIARIES

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO DECENTRALIZE WOMEN'S PRISONS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Solicitor General.

In a speech which he delivered recently at Simon Fraser University in British Columbia, the Solicitor General stated that his department is about to close the women's prison in Kingston, a decision surely taken as a result of a recommendation made by the special committee on penitentiaries. I congratulate him for doing so because it is quite an old prison which should not remain open in 1979. Could the minister tell the House whether his department intends, while closing that prison, to decentralize penitentiaries for female convicts?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Indeed it is the main objective of the decision I announced while I was in Vancouver some ten days ago. We have, Mr. Speaker, about 140 prisoners in Kingston. We want to bring them closer to their families. That is why we are negotiating with the provinces to get them to accept readily some prisoners who are now in Kingston.

I would like to point out that the province of Quebec has agreed to keep in provincial institutions almost 58 per cent of female prisoners under federal jurisdiction. Now we want to encourage that province to accept the rest of the prisoners. As far as British Columbia is concerned, that province has already taken almost 53 per cent of female inmates under federal jurisdiction and we would like that province as well as the others to accept more. We have also been dealing with Ontario to get that province to take some more.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor general.

I thank him for his answer, but I am still concerned about one thing, that is decentralization. If Quebec agrees to take so many female inmates and if British Columbia takes the balance, those from the prairies and other provinces will be just as far from their families. Can the minister tell us whether he discussed with any of the western provinces the possibility of having also a penal institution in the prairies?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, given the relatively small number of female inmates, we are not in a position to provide each province with an institution. Consequently, we are trying to come to an arrangement that would achieve the avowed aim of the hon. member.

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—INCREASE IN INFLATION RESULTING THEREFROM

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who will recall that on November 26, 1976, his present Deputy Minister of Finance, Dr. Hood, stated that every one-cent drop in the Canadian dollar would result, over a two-year period, in 0.3 per cent added inflation in Canada.

Oddly enough the dollar on that day was at par with the American dollar. It has since fallen over 16 per cent. I ask the Minister of Finance to confirm to the House that based on Dr. Hood's calculation, the diving dollar has now cost 5 per cent extra inflation in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I indicated on a number of occasions in the House and I confirm today that the fact that the Canadian dollar is losing ground to its American counterpart may be reflected within the Canadian economy by higher costs for imported goods, which, I repeat, is the price we must pay at this time for the new competitive position we have gained recently and which has made it possible for many sectors of our economy to boost their production to such an extent that the pulp and paper, wood, steel, footwear and clothing industries are now operating at nearly full capacity.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: What is the true consequence of the minister's faulty and fiscal monetary stance and that of his predecessor? Would the minister not agree that if he had structured fiscal and monetary matters in this country properly and held the dollar at, say, 92 cents, beef on average would be selling for 22 cents a pound less, and lettuce would be selling for 10 cents a head less? I could go through several other items, but would the minister not agree that that is true?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to see that the hon. member does not realize the progress the Canadian economy has made. The economic policies implemented by the government in 1978 resulted in the creation of some 450,000 new jobs for Canadians, which is more than in any previous year. While Canada was faced three years ago with a balance of payment deficit, it enjoyed in 1978 a trade surplus of $3.5 billion. Food costs are certainly high in Canada, but beefsteak prices in Ottawa were reported in newspapers yesterday as being lower than in Washington and 10 times lower than in Tokyo.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Finance what was the consequence for the consumer in Canada of the diving dollar and he told me everything else but what that consequence would be. The minister waxes eloquent about profits and increased opportunities for his pulp and paper friends—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: —but I would like him now to explain to the House what that means for products being sold externally. Is it not true that because our dollar is collapsing, the foreigner can now buy our produce virtually at half price?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would go to northern Ontario, B.C., Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, he would find that there are hundreds and hundreds of Canadians working in paper mills for good pay. The policy we have followed has put them back to work and increased the utilization of productive capacity to about 100 per cent. Let the hon. member tell them that is a bad policy.

I think that it is very important that we increase production in Canada in order to put more people to work. I have said many times that that would bring about a cost. Perhaps we have to pay a little more for some foods, but that is one of the difficult choices we had to make. We made it in order to make more jobs available to Canadians: that is our priority.

PROTECTION OF POSTAL WORKERS AGAINST UNION REPRISALS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Postmaster General follows exchanges in the House yesterday between the Minister of Labour, my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South, and myself. Now that the minister has had to swallow himself in comments to the media outside this House and admit, as have some of his cabinet colleagues, that reprisals against postal workers taking place in Hamilton are not "just an internal union matter" but that the law of the land does supersede the law of the union, can the Postmaster General say what initiatives he is prepared to take to safeguard the interests of his own employees?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I want to reassure the hon. member that we are keeping a close watch on the way this situation is evolving in Hamilton and Toronto. However, the issue should not be confused by far-fetched interpretations of our intentions.

[English]

Let us be clear and not confuse the subject. The legal adviser of the Post Office is in Toronto looking into the matter to see what we can do. We also have the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, who is a good member, pressing to see what is going on.

An hon. Member: That's a hope.

Mr. Lamontagne: I said last Wednesday that under normal circumstances, when workers cross picket lines in a legal strike situation, that is an internal matter between the union executive and the union members, but if the same union prevents a worker from going to work during an illegal strike—and especially after Bill C-8 last October—at that point I believe the union is preventing a worker from abiding by the law of the land.

We will look into this matter very closely, but at the moment I do not know any precise facts and I have heard no complaints from anyone. The only thing we can do is consult the Department of Justice and the Department of Labour and see what our legal adviser tells us when he returns.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to provide the minister with all the facts he needs about this very unusual case. In order not to make a hollow mockery of the guarantees given by the former minister of justice in this House with regard to protecting those who wanted to return to work, will the minister stop the trials in connection with last October's strike and will he call for an investigation into the circumstances of the affair as described by a number of letter carriers? These trials are impairing the efficiency of the post offices of Hamilton.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I just told the hon. member that I am in contact with the Department of Justice and we are doing everything we can to see what kind of union trial is involved. However, if the hon. member has facts and names to supply to me so that we can act, I am prepared to do so.

INQUIRY WHETHER MEASURES WILL BE TAKEN TO ENSURE CONTINUED SUPPLY OF OIL TO INDEPENDENT DISTRIBUTORS IN GREATER MONTREAL

Hon. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the minister's answers this week in the House concerning the supply of oil and the possibility of setting quotas for this supply, in view particularly of the numerous price increases which the major oil companies have imposed on independent distributors, especially in the greater Montreal area, can the minister advise the House whether he is prepared to take the necessary steps first to ensure continued supply for independent distributors, and second to avoid the inevitable loss of these distributors to the same multinationals through continued increases at the wholesale level, which increases affect only these smaller distributors but not the distribution network of the large multinationals?

● (1140)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as a result of representations from the hon. member and from Liberal members—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Gillespie: —my officials and I held a number of meetings with representatives of the industry. I have myself met with members on the supply side of the industry as well as with those affected by the situation in Quebec. I understand the situation and recognize that it is a serious one. It has been seriously aggravated by the shortages created by the Iranian situation, and undoubtely there is also a price squeeze which is affecting the profitability of the independent marketers in Quebec.

We are dealing with this question and hope to be able to provide some relief. I have received undertakings from some of the suppliers that they will revise or at least review their pricing practices. I believe my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, is also looking at this situation from the point of view of competition policy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SAFEGUARD PROVISIONS IN SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS TO ARGENTINA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The AECL is seeking to bid for a second nuclear energy reactor to be supplied to the Argentine.

In light of the fact that the Argentine government has not ratified the non-nuclear proliferation treaty and has so far balked at Canada's demand for full-scale safeguards on a bilateral basis, and in light of the admission by Admiral Madero, president of the NAEC of the Argentine, that the Argentine was contemplating the use of material from the first Canadian reactor sold to them for the reprocessing of material which would be used for nuclear weapons, will the minister give assurances to this House that Canada will not proceed with the sale to the Argentine of further nuclear reactors until full safeguards are secured?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish, as always, to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. Despite its technical nature, I think I can give him an assurance on the specifics. To be more precise, the agreement we have with Argentina is specific and states that all equipment, material and nuclear material and facilities subject to the agreement—and here I am quoting from it——shall be used for peaceful purposes only and shall not be used for the development, manufacture or detonation of any nuclear explosive device.

The second point is that the Argentines may not reprocess any material subject to the agreement without seeking Canada's agreement to do so; and, third, in the event of non-compliance, Canada may suspend co-operation and may request that Argentina immediately cease to use any Canadian supplies. If the hon. member would like me to send him more details, I would be glad to do so.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the minister. I referred to a tape recording held by the Washington Post of an interview held with Admiral Madero who is president of the NAEC. Has the hon. gentleman's department secured a copy of that tape? Is it available and, if so, will he table it? I am told it indicates a clear intent to use the products of the first Canadian reactor for nuclear weapons purposes.

Mr. Jamieson: In view of the questions asked earlier by the hon. member and others, including the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, I made inquiries as it was said the tape was available. Our embassy people in Washington asked for it and were denied access to it by, I think, the news person who was involved. Despite this, however, I can assure the hon. member and the House that indeed the agreement already existing prevents any use of Canadian materials for—as I believe the hon. member said—explosive purposes or war material purposes.

Oral Questions

EMPLOYMENT

JOBS FOR STADLER HURTER EMPLOYEES RETURNED TO CANADA FROM IRAN

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Has the hon. gentleman received application from the firm of Stadler Hurter to have his officials try to place the 130 employees of that company who were brought back to Canada from Iran? Most of them were directly associated with the pulp and paper industry.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unless contact was made through my officials, I would have to say no, it has not been brought to my personal attention.

Mr. Brisco: My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In his absence, I would hope that his parliamentary secretary is in the House.

My question is this: bearing in mind that Stadler Hurter, a Canadian company, has indicated that it is not able to pay its employees who have returned from Iran in accordance with all the requirements set out in the agreement with them, will the minister look into the fact that the Stadler Hurter parent company in the United States skimmed off $15 million directly into the United States from a company that is supported in Canada by the Export Development Corporation?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am sure my colleague would be able to give a more complete answer, but I think that the whole consequence of the move of Stadler Hurter and its employees from Iran will be dealt with fully. I suggest to the hon. member that most of these employees are very highly qualified and will have little difficulty settling into alternative employment. In any event, we will be looking at the settlements reached with these employees.

DAMAGE TO PARCELS AT GATEWAY SORTING PLANT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General? It arises from the extremely disturbing report in the Globe and Mail this morning and similar representations made earlier by members on this side of the House.

Is the Postmaster General aware that one out of every 20 parcels passing through the bulk mail section of the Gateway facility in Mississauga is damaged, and that one out of 50 packages has no chance of being delivered or returned? What action does he propose to take to remedy a situation in which 3,000 packages a day are destroyed during normal times, and during the peak season, around Christmas, probably 20,000 packages a day?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, personally I feel one can give any interpretation one pleases to the article published this morning or yesterday in the Globe and Mail. This morning I had a meeting with the general directors and managers of the various postal establishments across Canada, and I think that, as far as the article is concerned, there may be room for improvements which are already under way. For instance, when mention is made of a 10-foot drop from the conveyor belt handling parcels, I do think there is a slight exaggeration; it is merely a matter of having to change the design of the belt which should be done in the near future.

[English]

You know, you can interpret this in any way you like. When they say parcels are lost, it could be, for example, that books cannot be reconciled to their wrappings. At that point they say they are lost, but they are not actually lost. It could be a book on "The wonderful world of the Post Office." It is not necessarily lost. It could be claimed back.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the Postmaster General when he says that a great many of the parcels are lost or destroyed because of the fault of the sender. I would concur with him in this, since I have had the privilege of visiting that facility.

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he agrees with the report in the press that a major part of the fault lies with the design of some of the machines. I would also ask him whether he agrees that there are many more "drops" than there should be. Is he willing to give an undertaking that instead of just sweeping this matter under the carpet and being on the defensive when questioned in the House, he will look into providing remedies to the technical designs which presently require parcels to be dropped from as high as ten feet? I am not sure whether that is "high", but that is what the report says.

Will the Postmaster General now give serious consideration to this matter, at a time when 5 per cent of parcels at the facility, which handles 47 per cent of all Canadian mail, are destroyed?

Mr. Lamontagne: There is no question of sweeping anything under the rug as far as I am concerned.

An hon. Member: There is no more room, anyway.

Mr. Lamontagne: With regard to the statement that 5 per cent of the parcels are damaged, I should like to be more precise because this can be very confusing. The 5 per cent damage is related to non-commercial parcels. As far as commercial parcels are concerned—which is the great bulk of our parcels—it is only 1 per cent.

• (1150)

As far as the design of our mechanization is concerned, I can assure the hon. member that already it is planned to modify the design as soon as possible.

OTTAWA—GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Based on representations by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier and myself, is the minister in a position to give members of the House any further information regarding grants in lieu of taxes to the City of Ottawa?

Mr. Alexander: That is Walter Baker's question.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF EMERGENCY LOCATOR TRANSMITTERS IN AIRCRAFT

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that ELTs installed on Canadian aircraft were ordered removed or deactivated almost two years ago due to corrosion and explosion hazard associated with the lithium batteries used to power such transmitters, and that a safe, new alkaline type battery has been developed by a Canadian company and presently is used on approximately 200 aircraft flying in British Columbia, will the minister tell the House why the inventor of this new alkaline battery has been unable to receive flight certification for his safe, new battery after waiting several months? Why has the MOT failed to reply to the inventor's request of July 22, 1978, that his battery be subjected to the required certification testing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to find out why progress has not been made in this specific case. In conjunction with people in the scientific and technological fields, my department has been working on the issue of developing a variety of batteries for the ELT. Something like 90 per cent of the ELTs have batteries which, while not perfect in all weather conditions, are good enough to be used.

As a result of this, ELTs are back in quite a number of aircraft and more aircraft operators are being encouraged to go that route. We are not in a position to require ELTs to be replaced because of the deficiencies in their operation and the number which still require modification. Certainly, I will look into the specific case; I am somewhat surprised to hear about it.

NATIONAL REVENUE

OBJECTION TO FORMS USED TO CLAIM CHILD TAX CREDIT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Since the minister has had over a week to look into the question of forms prepared by his department so that mothers may claim the child tax credit, has he reviewed the problem? Is the minister ready to inform the House that he will withdraw these forms, which amount to a reprehensible means test, and allow mothers to make simple declarations as is done in the case of old age pension supplements?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I did not need a week to discover that the form was perfectly understandable and that it is being readily understood by many thousands of Canadians today. I urge the hon. member not to underrate the intelligence of his fellow Canadians.

Mr. Gillies: Do you understand it?

Mr. Abbott: Further, I point out that there are several provincial acts, such as the Alberta Rental Assistance Act and the Ontario act that assists renters, which use the Canadian income tax collection process and far more complex schedules. Over 700,000 forms are filed annually under the Income Tax Act by people who ordinarily do not pay income tax. I suggest the form is relatively simple and that it is being filled out now. If the hon. member will address himself to that and to helping his constituents rather than raising this red herring of a means test, he would do well.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. minister that my questions are based on the fact that thousands of telephone calls have been received by the constituency staffs of members on this side of the House. There have been literally thousands of calls.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Grafftey: Before this incredible form was put together, did the minister's department consult the Department of National Health and Welfare? If not, and since the form has been published, has the minister received representations from the Minister of National Health and Welfare to withdraw the form and allow a simple declaration as in the case of old age pension supplements? My question is based upon thousands of calls received by members on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, instead of using colourful phrases such as "reprehensible means test" or "incredible forms", I urge the hon. member to look at the form and he will see that the schedule is relatively simple. It asks four straightforward questions: What is the income of the wife? What is the income of her spouse? Do the two incomes, together, equal $18,000. If so, then they are entitled to enter that amount on the income tax form and receive their tax credit.

An hon. Member: How do you figure that out?

Mr. Abbott: Of course I have dealt with the Minister of National Health and Welfare on this matter; we have had several discussions. As I have acknowledged, it is true that in the rush I wish there could have been more time to advise taxpayers how to fill out the form. But at this point I dispute that the hon. member and his colleagues have had thousands of telephone calls.

BOEING CONTRACT—OUTCOME OF RCMP INVESTIGATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It being Friday, perhaps we can sum up the Boeing case in a few words. It is something the minister seemed totally unable to understand during four days of questioning.

Boeing has stated that it made double payments to a consultant or consultants in Canada to facilitate aeroplane sales. Boeing has admitted that the purpose of the double payments was to enable the consultant to have deposited the second payment in a foreign bank. The Solicitor General stated that he knows the name of the individual who received the payments. Can the Solicitor General now tell us what the holdup is? Is there a difficulty in finding a charge, or is it a question of jurisprudence?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated quite clearly the entire background and I do not think I have to repeat it. For the third day running the hon. member has indicated that there was a double payment.

Mr. Gillies: Boeing said that there were double payments.

Mr. Blais: I would like the hon. member to identify from where he received that information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: In terms of the investigation, the RCMP has conducted a very complete and thorough one. If the hon. member has some additional facts or some additional allegation which he feels ought to be investigated, I would be pleased to receive them. I invite the hon. member to provide me with any additional information. In terms of the information made available and allegations which have been identified, the investigation has been completed. The advice I have received indicates that there are no grounds upon which a charge could be laid.

NATIONAL REVENUE

BOEING CONTRACT—TAX INVESTIGATION OF CONSULTANT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the only allegation made in the House which is totally unsubstantiated by documentation is the one made by the Solicitor General on February 6 in reply to the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I trust the minister has been following this case with his usual accuity. Boeing has admitted making double payments in Canada. Such payments are made to enable individuals to receive the second payments in foreign bank accounts. The usual reason for the dodge is so the recipient can avoid taxes on part of his income. Has the minister had a tax investigation conducted on the individual who is well known to the Solicitor General and, if so, what were the results?

Hon A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, fortunately for the reputation the hon. member ascribes to me for accuity, if the income taxes of the individuals are under investigation, it is a matter of confidentiality and I could not answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

COPPER—PRICE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Last Friday, I asked the minister a question concerning Noranda and Texasgulf raising the price of copper and doing so in such a manner that the Canadian price for copper is higher than that charged to American buyers. In view of the profit increase of 44 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if hon. members could extend a little courtesy to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Symes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I understand the Liberals have reason to be rather agitated these days. In view of the profit increase of 44 per cent in the base metals industry, which includes a 154 per cent increase in the fourth quarter over the previous year, a trend which will continue with these recent price increases, has the minister determined whether the action taken by these two companies will be disadvantageous to Canadian industry and consumers relative to the United States?

● (1200)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, following the hon. member's question last week, I referred the matter to the people in our combines investigation branch, which is the appropriate thing to do. They are looking at the evidence, but I have not yet had a report from them.

NATURAL RESOURCES

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR BASE METALS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which relates to the issue of copper pricing.

Given the upsurge of base metal prices and the effect that this will have on the cost of manufactured goods in Canada, and given the strong world demand for base metals and the profitability of the companies concerned, has the government given any consideration to implementing a two-price system for base metals such as copper, lead and zinc which would enable our domestic market price to be lowered and thereby help consumers and give Canadian manufacturers an advantage over international competitors?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on every occasion in the past when suggestions of this kind have been made, at least that I am aware of, an examination of the issue would indicate this would be counterproductive, it would not serve the performance of the Canadian economy and would be administratively very complex and difficult.

In addition, in all probability it would be counterproductive to the mining industry, an industry which the hon. member knows is highly cyclical and which is just coming out of the doldrums of depressed metal prices, prices which have been depressed by overhanging inventories and a poor international market situation. I think the trend toward firmer prices should be welcomed because this will assist the Canadian industry to carry on with its development plans.

Point of Order—Mr. Alexander

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) in his capacity as deputy government House leader with responsibility for the business of the House of Commons. My question has to do with Bill C-29, the amendments to the National Housing Act, which for two weeks in a row now has been rather far down on the list of priorities of the government, according to the minister's answers.

Given the concern of the great majority of municipal governments about the delay in the implementation of this bill, and particularly the community services grants program which has such an effect on projects and planning of municipalities, will the deputy government House leader undertake to consult with the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in whose name these amendments stand to see whether it can be brought forward at an early time next week? I ask this because of the concern of municipalities all across the country over the delay that has prevented for too long consideration of this legislation.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would be very happy to discuss this matter with the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). In light of the question the hon. member has asked, I hope that we on this side of the House will be able to count on the support of all members in this House in dealing with this bill in an expeditious way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: It is quite evident there are a number of priority bills with which we have to deal. This is one we would like to deal with, and I hope we can make an arrangement, through discussion with House leaders, to deal with it at all stages in a very short, brief period of time.

MR. ALEXANDER—POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—DISCIPLINING OF UNION MEMBERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to follow up on questions asked by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott). This involves a very urgent matter, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) has indicated that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) is involved with this matter, with a trial now taking place, and given the fact that the Minister of Justice indicated at the time, as has the Postmaster General, that these employees will be assured every possible protection in the exercise of what is their legal duty to work, it seems to me it is incumbent upon the government to indicate when a decision will be made by ministers of the Crown. Obviously this is a matter of extreme urgency and we cannot wait during this procrastination and hesitation by the government, because the trial is liable to be over before—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member will have to justify that kind of intervention on the basis of our procedure.

Mr. Alexander: Because of its urgency.

MR. McKENZIE—USE OF PICTURE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL AND FAMILY IN LIBERAL PARTY CAMPAIGN LITERATURE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was stated in yesterday's Ottawa Journal that Liberal election material to be used during the next federal election campaign will include pictures of the Governor General and his wife. This appears to be a blatant misuse of the office of the Governor General.

I should like to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that I am giving notice of my intention to raise a substantial question of privilege on Monday. I will ask whether this document was printed in the House of Commons, and I would like you, sir, to inquire whether it was done with the use of House of Commons facilities, whether you authorized it or, if not, who authorized the printing of this Liberal literature using a picture of the Governor General and his wife. I hope that I can be informed this afternoon whether this document was printed with the use of House of Commons facilities, as it appears to be a blatant misuse of the office of the Governor General. As I say, I intend to pursue this on Monday.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the point of order being raised—and I do not believe it is a point of order at all—I would simply suggest that surely the office of the Governor General, representing Her Majesty, is an office in respect of which there is a common right of everyone in this parliament and in this country, an office of which everyone can be proud. I certainly do not think it is in any way partisan for a member of parliament to associate himself with this high office. I cannot think of a more reprehensible charge than to say someone who takes pride in the holder of that office is in any way playing partisan politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has asked me to look into the matter he has raised, namely whether something was printed under the auspices of the House of Commons. I will certainly be glad to do that and provide him with the information. Whether that would in any way constitute a question of privilege, I do not know, but I will give the hon. member that information.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM SAINT-MICHEL TO SAINT-MICHEL-AHUNTSIC

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montréal-Bourassa) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-460 respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the bill, the new name suggested for this riding would better reflect the representation and distribution of the population. I feel that, because of the new geographic boundaries, the people would feel better identified if this bill could be passed giving the riding the name of Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—EXPENDITURES ON ENTERTAINMENT

Question No. 189—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1977, what amount was spent on entertainment by the Department of Employment and Immigration?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): For the period April 1, 1977 to October 30, 1978: $336,627.20 (88 per cent of this amount is for Foreign Service Branch).

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Question No. 238—Mr. McKenzie:

1. As of March 31, 1978, was there an excess of $9 billion in the Public Service Superannuation Account and, if so (a) in what instruments was the $9 billion invested and in what amounts (b) what is the debt series of the investment (c) what are the issue numbers of the instruments (d) what is the rate of interest on the investments?

2. What are the full details as to the portfolio buying procedures?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): 1 and 2. As of March 31, 1978 the balance in the Public Service superannuation account was $9,041,851,849. The amount in the superannuation account is not held in cash or invested in securities, such as bonds. The account forms part of the public debt of the Government of Canada and is recorded in the statements of assets and liabilities of the public accounts. All money credited to the account is used by the government for general government purposes with interest being credited quarterly to the account or the use of the funds.

The quarterly interest earnings of the account are calculated as if the excess of receipts over disbursements in each quarter since 1924 had been invested in long-term (20 or more years) Government of Canada bonds and as if these amounts were reinvested at current rates every 20 years. Therefore the rate for the account as a whole is the weighted average rate of the amounts so invested in respect of each quarter. At present this weighted average amounts to an effective annual interest rate of almost 7.9 per cent.

DREE—REDUCTION IN CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 700—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to the $24,000,000 reduction in the level of DREE contributions, which sub-agreements will be affected in (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80?

2. What part of the $24,000,000 reduction will be made in each province?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Reductions to be made by the department relate to expenditures which have been planned for current programs, but which will not be made in the time period originally envisioned. It is anticipated that such reductions will be achieved through the cash management of programs in either of two ways:

(a) through a slowdown in spending under existing commitments for approved programs, which are largely in the form of federal-provincial agreements. This is sometimes possible because of a change in provincial priorities or because a province finds it impossible to proceed as quickly as planned with the implementation of an agreement.

(b) through a slowdown in the undertaking of further commitments for approved programs. This could mean, for example, delaying for several months a new initiative which would otherwise have proceeded more rapidly.

While the department fully expects to achieve these reductions in the aggregate, it is not possible to identify specific reductions with particular sub-agreements or provinces. Even when these reductions have been realized, they will consist of a considerable number of variances from previously budgeted expenditures, the net sum of which will accord with the over-all reduction announced by the President of the Treasury Board.

Order Paper Questions

DREE—BUDGET REDUCTIONS

Question No. 701—Mr. Forrestall:

Will any activities or projects be curtailed or terminated as a result of the $7,500,000 general reduction in the DREE budget and, if so, which ones?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of the Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Please refer to the reply provided to question No. 700, Fourth Session, Thirtieth Parliament answered this day.

GAO REPORT—U.S.

Question No. 731—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Is the government aware of the detailed and extensive report recently prepared by the U.S. Comptroller-General for the Congress which stated that "it is not the current United States Policy to convert from the present customary system to the metric system"?

2. Is the government co-ordinating Canada's metric conversion programme with that in the U.S. in order to minimize any costs and negative effects for our industries and, if not, for what reason?

3. Is the government aware of a survey in the U.S. Comptroller-General's report showing that 80 per cent of the businesses in the Fortune 500 list did not expect any significant change in exports or imports as a result of the metric conversion?

4. Has a similar survey been conducted for Canadian businesses and (a) if so, what were the results (b) if not, for what reason?

5. Is the government considering a moratorium on further metrication in Canada until the positive and negative features can be re-examined in light of changing attitudes towards metrication in the U.S. as reflected in the Comptroller-General's report?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The General Accounting Office (GAO) Report to the U.S. Congress prepared by the Comptroller General, entitled "Getting a Better Understanding of the Metric System" has been reviewed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Metric Commission Canada.

As stated in an article on page one of the "Metric Monitor" of December 1978 on this subject:

"The United States Metric Board does not share this opinion" i.e. that it is not U.S. policy to convert to the metric system.

That the GAO has misinterpreted United States policy is further stated in a letter dated Nov. 27/78 from U.S. Congressman Olin E. Teague, Chairman of the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Science and Technology, to Dr. Louis F. Polk, Chairman of the U.S. Metric Board. In his letter Congressman Teague states:

"It has come to my attention that the recently issued GAO report on the Metric System may have caused some misunderstanding of the legislative intent embodied in Public Law 94-168, the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 . . . contrary to the analysis in the GAO report . . . this (Act) . . . does, in fact, set forth a clear policy for metric conversion in the United States. That policy is to facilitate the conversion to metric use in our country to reduce the total cost and inconvenience to our people".

The full text of this letter is contained in the December 13, 1978 official report of the Proceedings (Issue 17) of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in the evidence given by Mr. D. R. B. McArthur, Chairman of the Metric Commission Canada.

2. Yes. This is the policy being pursued as said out in the White Paper on Metric Conversion in Canada (January 1970), agreed to by the House leaders of all parties.

3. The GAO report indicated that there are more significant reasons for increasing export markets than a metric changeover such as "competitive prices, high quality, superior technology and good reputation and reliability" but this does not mean metric conversion is not a factor in promoting exports. A majority (66 per cent) of the largest U.S. industrial businesses (the Fortune 500) who responded to GAO's questionnaire believe metric conversion is inevitable and would facilitate trade through a common measurement language. The breakdown of responses to the GAO question as to whether metric conversion will increase or protect the present amount of exports and work overseas is: 27 per cent (agree), 32 per cent (disagree), 23 per cent (does not apply), 18 per cent (no basis to judge).

4. One of the first activities carried out by Metric Commission Canada in January and February 1972 was to conduct a survey on the expected effects of metric conversion on Canadian businesses. A letter-questionnaire was mailed to about 100 national associations. Seventy-eight associations replied. One of the questions asked was:

"To what extent must your program be planned to take account of developments in metric conversion in the United States"?

(1) Is this relationship controlling?

(2) If not, can conversion be undertaken independently of action in the United States?

(a) The response to the 1972 letter-questionnaire was summerized as indicating 62 per cent of the companies responding expected to take into account developments in metric conversion in the U.S.A.

Only 39 per cent of this 62 per cent considered this relationship controlling. A good example of this is automobile manufacturing industry, and the majority of 1979 model year automobile parts are already being manufactured both in Canada and the U.S.A. to metric dimensions. Another example is the aircraft industry and here metric conversion is proceeding slowly.

About 38 per cent considered that metric conversion could be undertaken independently of action in the U.S.A. The Canadian Construction Association, the Canada Grains Council and the Fisheries Council of Canada are a few examples. Many sector plans express the view that metric conversion will assist export sales. For example sector 7.42 Sporting Goods in their metric conversion plan state:

[Mr. Horner.]

"It is felt that the introduction of SI Units will help the sporting goods industry to become more competitive in countries when metric measures have been established".

The working group on Metric Export—Import Trade (MEXIM) of Metric Commission Canada; which represents all Metric Commission Canada steering committees carried out a study in 1976 which indicated that 45 per cent of Canada's exports are metric sensitive. As a by-product of meetings of the MEXIM trade group a growing number of companies already have been identified as increasing their sales as a result of metric conversion. For instance, as a result of metric export opportunities to the United States, Canadian companies such as Intercomp Resource Development and Engineering Ltd. of Calgary, McGraw-Hill Ryerson Ltd. of Toronto, Spectrum Educational Supplies Ltd. of Markham, Science Research Associates (Canada) Ltd. of Willowdale, and Merlan Scientific Ltd. of Mississauga to name a few have exported for the first time to the United States.

5. No. The United States is proceeding with their metric conversion program and sector committees in the Canadian program maintain close contact with their U.S. counterparts. The U.S. House of Representatives recently defeated a bill seeking abolition of the U.S. Metric Board and the repeal of the 1975 U.S. Metric Conversion Act by a 4 to 1 margin which is the same margin of those in favour of the passage of the 1975 Metric Conversion Act. The first appropriation for the U.S. Metric Board passed the House of Representatives in 1978 by a 302 to 75 vote. These votes reflect the broad support for the U.S. program.

STUDY OF PROGRAMS

Question No. 589—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. To which programmes and departments was the President of the Treasury Board referring when he stated in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates on November 25, 1977, as recorded at page 2:26 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence that the government had or was in the process of subjecting "quite a few programmes and, in some cases, departments to a total review of their budgets in a form that" would be described "as being a zero based approach"?

POINT OF ORDER

MR. WHITEWAY—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 580

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, relating to question No. 580, which has been on the order paper since November 16, 1977. It is a question concerning the Canadian unity information office. I know that the minister responsible, after having gone through three ministries, has the answer. I cannot understand why the government refuses to answer this question. It relates to the cost and the number of the various packages of propaganda put out by the government. I cannot understand why, after all these months, the government would not put the answers to those questions before the House of Commons and the people of Canada.

The government talk of restraint, but will not tell us the cost of their propaganda office. I find it reprehensible that this minister would refuse to answer my question No. 580, especially when he has had his staff collect the information yet will not release it.

Mr. Wm. Andres (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is not true that the minister will not allow this question to be answered. The question will be answered correctly, but it is not quite as simple as the hon. member indicates. I will look into the matter to make sure that the question is answered.

Mr. Whiteway: When?

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FEDERAL INFRINGEMENT ON PROVINCIAL JURISDICTIONS

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the federal government having taken advantage of the weaknesses of the British North America Act (BNA Act) to infringe on provincial jurisdictions and undermine the sovereignty of the provinces, has failed:

—to leave the initiative of constitutional negotiations to the provinces, in accordance with the spirit of Confederation, by giving them the final say in the decision-making process;

—to discuss the introduction of economic rights for all citizens in a new Constitution;

—as well as to recognize that new constitutional arrangements may be ratified only by the population of the provinces through referendum held in the respective provinces.

—Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to move a motion which will interest to the highest degree, I am sure, the House and all members, and which reads as follows, and I quote:

—having taken advantage of the weaknesses of the British North America Act (BNA Act) to infringe on provincial jurisdictions and undermine the sovereignty of the provinces, the federal government has failed:

—to leave the initiative of constitutional negotiations to the provinces, in accordance with the spirit of confederation, by giving them the final say in the decision-making process;

—to discuss the introduction of economic rights for all citizens in a new constitution;

—as well as to recognize that new constitutional arrangements may be ratified only by the population of the provinces through referendums held in the respective provinces.

Mr. Speaker, as this is perhaps the last opportunity we have to put forward such a motion before parliament is dissolved, I think it is a good thing to look back on the road we travelled and even risk a little review on the 112 years of confederation in which we find weaknesses, of course. We are going to examine closely the actions of certain people or governments who took advantage of those weaknesses and even brought them about in order to create a climate of suspicion rather than of co-operation. We will then be suggesting ways which would enable Canadians to live up to their Canadian reality in that harmony which is indispensable to people who need to live side by side with respect and honour.

I want to indicate sincerely that although it is true that all members of the Social Credit Party of Canada now sitting in this House come from Quebec and have been for over a decade the official opposition from that province in Ottawa, the fact still remains that the opposition motion I have the honour to move today is based first and foremost on economic concerns.

Indeed, in the present state of affairs nobody will deny that it is more difficult to introduce economic legislation in Canada than in any other country and that is so because of our two-tier system of government. The problem stems from the fact that successive federal governments in the past have refused to face reality, and reality is that duality and regionalism have become the predominant features of our Canadian political and economic systems.

Besides, I believe that these past few years all Canadians have been able to witness the omnipresence of those features in federal-provincial conferences. The last one—and it was a typical one in that respect—only resulted in the concurrence in two of the four points on the agenda, namely the questions of family rights and of the monarchy—two minor subjects on which both levels of government had agreed long before the conference. Indeed, the importance of recognizing Canada's duality and regionalism was raised by the Task Force on Canadian Unity in its report entitled A Future Together in the following terms which appear on page 115 of the Pepin-Robarts report and I quote:

Consensus on constitutional patriation and amendment plus a limited number of matters unrelated to Canadian duality and regionalism would not, in our judgment, be a sufficient response to the constitutional implications of the present crisis.

Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the hon. members that this was not said by the Parti Québécois or by myself, but rather by a study group which was set up by this federal government and which worked for more than 17 months at the cost of $3.5 million to the Canadian taxpayer.

It is unfortunate to have to say this, but it is a fact that every time constitutional issues are discussed, the government can only suggest minor amendments. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this ad hoc approach cannot bring about any long-term solutions. For instance, at the recent federal-provincial conference, the federal government seemed willing to relinquish certain of its powers to the provinces in the field of communications, more particularly as concerns the issuance of permits to cable companies, but the Prime Minister is well aware that what the provinces have been requesting for many years is to be allowed to control program contents since each province has its own special needs. I sincerely believe, Mr. Speaker, that by continuously sticking to such a stand, the government is making this whole country dance on quicksand.

We of the Social Credit Party of Canada believe that the time has come to replace the British North America Act with a new constitution, the first one that the Canadian provinces would establish for themselves, which would include economic rights for all citizens, would be submitted to the approval of the population of each province and would therefore better correspond to the present situation. Indeed, this is what we want to explain today in this House, first of all by proving that the British North America Act is not an obstacle to the enactment of a truly Canadian constitution because this act can be repudiated today by Canada for the same reasons that it should have been in 1867 if we had been more careful. Secondly, we will clearly demonstrate the central government's persistent invading of provincial jurisdictions and its marked tendency to invoke the British North America Act to justify its misbehaviour, that is its obstinate refusal to exercise the specific authority provided for in this act. Once the need for a new constitution will have been shown, we are going to explain the basic elements of it and, finally, the need for that constitution to be approved by all citizens of the ten provinces by way of provincial and not federal referenda.

With regard to the British North America Act, I would say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as we are concerned, we consider it as an act passed by the British Parliament in London. But that is not where the problem is. Actually, all the hon. members in this House know quite well that the statement of reasons is an important part of any bill since it is useful for the understanding of the legislation, but when it comes to a private bill, it is essential that all allegations in the statement of reasons must be confirmed by reliable witnesses. The British North America Act was a private bill with reference to the parliament which adopted it because that Act did not concern the whole of the British Empire but only the three colonies named in the Act, Canada which included two provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That act was also of a restricted nature because it applied only to North America.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that the statement of reasons or preamble of any bill is very important because the terms of that preamble must be logical, and in accordance with the facts and any bill can be rejected if it can be established that such conditions have not been fulfilled. We have dealt with that aspect of the bill before the committee on the constitution during the summer recess.

Let us consider now the first condition with respect to the preamble. The language used in the preamble is quite illogical. And before going any further, I would like to read the first two paragraphs of the preamble of the British North America Act, and I quote:

> An Act for the Union of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the Government thereof; and for Purposes connected therewith.
> Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

I am puzzled when I read "with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom" given the fact that we have been told in committee that the United Kingdom has never had a written constitution. The United Kingdom does not have a written constitution! I therefore asked how Canada could have a written constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom and I received no answer and I am still waiting for one. Do we actually have a written constitution?

Before going any further, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to define two expressions: One is "federally united" and the other is "into one dominion". Are these expressions synonymous or are they the antithesis of one another? In his legal dictionary, Bouvier says that the expression "federal government" means the creation of a union or a confederation of sovereign states by virtue of a treaty or by mutual acceptance of a federative constitution. However, Mr. Speaker, this definition clearly establishes that sovereignty must precede the creation of the confederation and that the federal union is possible only with the consent of the states cosignatary to that constitution.

Let us get back now to the expression "into one dominion". Regarding this matter, I would like to point out that section 18(3) of the Interpretation Act of 1889 states that the word colony means any one of the dominions of His Majesty. It therefore appears that a dominion was no more than a colony. Mr. Speaker, could it be that these definitions indicate that a federal union and a dominion are opposed in principle and that one is the contrary of the other? How then could the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick federate themselves into one dominion? Is there not an obvious contradiction at this point? We are then wondering whether the terms employed in the outline of the stated purposes are in conformity with the facts.

In other words, have the provinces really expressed the wish to form a dominion according to the federal principle? Apparently not. And proof of this is this statement of Sir John Bourinot appearing in Chapter VIII, page 125, of his book "Canada Under British Rule", and I quote:

> It is interesting to note that in the original bill, the United Provinces were called the Kingdom of Canada, but in the bill brought before parliament subsequently, they were called the Dominion of Canada.

And Sir John A. Macdonald himself said to the author that this amendment did not originate with colonial delegates but with the imperial minister. It is therefore obvious that the British North America Act reduced our country to the status of a colony. Canada did not become a federal union of a confederation but a colony under the name of Dominion.

It now seems obvious that the terms dominion and colony were similar, that in order to have a federal union, an agreement was required among the provinces, that no pact or agreement was entered into by them. It was said that a federal union or dominion was impossible, that the provinces did not express the wish to become a dominion within a federal union. Following all those inconsistencies, I wonder how the appropriateness of the BNA Act preamble can be demonstrated. Furthermore, if it cannot be demonstrated today, how could it have been possible in 1867? Therefore, the bill should have been rejected.

In that case, we, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, contend that the British North America Act is invalid. And it is not the first time we make this statement in the House as, in 1938, the Social Credit member for Jasper-Edson, in Alberta, Mr. Walter F. Kuhl, raised the same arguments which were never seriously refuted. He reached the same conclusions as we did. It is perhaps time the representatives of all Canadian provinces listened to those who are in no way responsible for the disastrous situation facing us today.

To conclude this part of my speech concerning the British North America Act, I should like to quote the evidence given in 1935 by Beauchesne, a clerk the House of Commons, before a special committee on the British North America Act, as reported on page 131.

It is true that if we apply to the British North America Act the same principles that apply to ordinary laws, it must be said that this act does not constitute a pact between the provinces. This act was passed by parliament and does not contain even the substance of every resolution adopted in Canada or in London before it was passed by the British parliament which added to it some sections that the Canadian provinces had not asked for.

And further:

According to me, the Assembly should not sit in Ottawa . . .

—Outside of Ottawa—

. . . so that the federal authority will not appear to control or influence it . . .

The Assembly might also ask itself if it would be appropriate to change the Dominion into a Kingdom . . .

Since 1867, provincial rights have given rise to much controversy. When a new constitution is drafted, it will be necessary, it seems, to amend the distribution of powers between the Dominion and the provinces.

As one can see, Mr. Speaker, 40 years ago such sensible men as Messrs. Beauchesne and Kuhl had found a solution to our problem. What devilish force could prevent the nations making up our country from developing along the lines of that solution? It is high time we asked ourselves some questions. At this stage, I would like, if I may, to ask the hon. members to give me a few more minutes of their attention, because I am coming to the gist of my argument.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I have demonstrated earlier that sovereignty was the requirement of those provinces willing to enter into a confederative pact or a federal union. But what is the meaning of that sovereignty? Here again, I will refer to the second volume published by the task force on Canadian unity, because, if I am not mistaken, it is much more for us than for any other that the task force has clearly defined the terms of the debate. If this dictionary is not used by the legislators who sponsored it, I sincerely wonder who will use it? So, on page 14 of the book Coming to Terms The Words of the Debate, we find the following definition of the term sovereignty:

Sovereignty came to mean the right of the government of a state to decide in the final recourse, internally and externally, on the direction to give to its own collective actions, a right generally considered to be absolute in legal terms.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress that according to this definition sovereignty is an absolute right. Therefore, sovereignty admits of no restriction or quantification. A province cannot be more or less sovereign. It is either sovereign or it is not. Similarly, if sovereignty already legally recognized has to be negotiated, something is wrong, Mr. Speaker. First, let us see if the sovereignty of the provinces has already been legally recognized.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

In fact, provincial sovereignty is a vested right since 1867 and was recognized by all governments even up to 1942. In support of this, I will refer to the 1942 agreements entered into by the then minister of finance in the Mackenzie King government, when Quebec agreed to waive for the duration of the war its direct taxation fields which were its exclusive right. It says here, and I quote:

Whereas in order to allow for a maximum war effort on the part of Canada it is necessary that the federal parliament alone have the authority to levy directly personal and corporate income taxes . . . Whereas the Canadian government recognizes that the province, by entering into this agreement, relinquishes or waives no part of its sovereignty nor any of its constitutional rights, powers or privileges . . .

Mr. Speaker, I would emphasize this is a most important document in our wartime national history and especially in provincial history thereafter, and it specifies that the province of Quebec relinquished no part of its sovereignty. This therefore is evidence enough that such an absolute right was formally recognized to the provinces. In addition to supporting my suggestions that sovereignty has been a recognized right of provinces since the very inception of confederation, that section I of the 1942 agreements also explains why federal-provincial conferences have been increasingly less productive since 1942. The reason is the high robbery type of action by the federal government in refusing to give back the direct taxation fields borrowed from provinces for the duration of the war. And further, it took advantage of those new tax fields to get involved in matters of provincial jurisdiction such as education, health, agriculture and so on. Deprived of their main source of revenues, the provinces had no choice. They had to join the famous shared-cost programs where Ottawa was remitting one third only of the tax money it was collecting in the provinces, because it was either that or nothing. And what is Ottawa doing now? It is gradually stepping out of those shared-cost programs, leaving provinces with all the responsibility without giving them back the total fiscal points that go with it, those fiscal points that were borrowed in 1942.

Therefore, from that one third they were getting, the provinces' share is now reduced to nothing. Only yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we witnessed one such atrocity when Bill C-2 passed. The federal government got out of that two years before due date; it stopped helping the construction of a medical research centre, without any indication it was giving back to the provinces the funds needed to finance the whole of these programs. There are also measures such as Bill C-14, under which the names of 250,000 jobless Canadians were struck from unemployment insurance lists, and abandoned to the care of provinces—

Mr. Lachance: We are paying for that!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): No, you no longer pay. These unemployed are not on the lists anymore. The provinces must take care of them.

Mr. Lachance: We pay 50 per cent.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): You save 50 per cent and you do not give any tax point in return.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Actually, you pay 50 per cent but you charge 100 per cent—either through social welfare or through another form of provincial assistance. Here again the federal government has not given a penny back on the sums it received. The government is trying to convince the public it is a good father and there are even some French-Canadians in Quebec who believe that, they really do. How stupid! The federal government constantly robs the provinces and undermines their sovereignty. As a matter of fact, what is the use of having individual, linguistic, cultural or any other kind of rights if you cannot invoke them? That is the present situation in the provinces, Mr. Speaker. In general, the constitutional issue may sound more like empty words than anything else but in fact it is quite another thing. You can believe me because I am speaking from experience. As I have just shown it is primarily a money matter. I will not go any further on that subject since one of my colleagues intends to speak about that this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes remaining of my time, I would like to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has elapsed. However he may go on with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) may proceed.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank all hon. members for allowing me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I hope hon. members will finally understand why we of the Social Credit Party of Canada have tried so hard for 15 years even more to defend the provinces against the federal government's invasion. We have done that under all governments; we are not putting the heat on this one for the sake of it, we have done it with all governments. We did so for Quebec first since we represented that province. However, it should be recalled that the Social Credit members from other provinces who sat in the House in the past, used to speak the way we do today.

Mr. Dawson: They have been defeated!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I am told they have been defeated. They were not defeated by the people but by the financiers. These provinces like Alberta had no debt at all at that time and now they have record deficits.

In fact, any time we defended something we hoped to be able to convince members in the House that they represented above all the interests of citizens of their riding and of the province in Ottawa and not the interests of their political party. Obviously, despite all our good will, we are not in a position to overcome barriers such as partisan politics which have prevailed since the beginning of confederation. I believe that this was done to the prejudice of Canadians who today are faced with a crisis which gradually built up and that was hidden from them by their Ottawa representatives over the years. I could quote hundreds of examples, Mr. Speaker. I shall give but one or two:

I can recall the way we fought when Bill C-110 on students loans was introduced. I would like to quote an article by Mr. Paul Sauriol published in Le Devoir of July 15, 1964. As you can see, that was some time ago.

On Monday the House of Commons was nearly unanimous in moving first reading of a bill on student loans; in fact, the resolution was adopted on division because the Social Credit Party is against that new federal interference in provincial jurisdiction.

There again they should have given back to the province the tax points they had borrowed, but they use it directly on students, for education purposes.

. . . three of the four opposition groups joined the Liberals to approve that measure. This vote makes it possible to give a better interpretation to some recent speeches on co-operative federalism.

It is now clear that if all opposition parties had then voted against this and other similar legislation, the provinces would not have such a long way to go to reestablish their sovereignty. In 1966, another ultra vires legislation was adopted by the House, namely Bill C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services. That is still another area in which they have interfered. They said at the time that they would contribute 50 per cent, but they are taxing at 100 per cent. Another interference which prompted me in the House to make a prediction which unfortunately came true in the following years. This took place in 1966, and my prediction is coming true 12 years later. Here is the statement which I made in the House on October 17, 1966:

Mr. Speaker, I feel that as far as the Canadian community is concerned, its days are numbered unless we revert to a more honest dialogue. Federal-provincial conferences were invented in an attempt to dialogue, but one soon realizes that the federal delegates flaunt an obvious lack of good will. Whereas several provinces have voiced serious objections to the present bill, the government proceeds as if nothing had happened.

Just like today, exactly like today! Mr. Speaker, that is the prediction I made then, and those hon. members who are honest will have to recognize that this is still the case even today. Mr. Speaker, later on things went from bad to worse. As a matter of fact, the era of centralization was followed by an era of supercentralization under this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). From then on, that is from 1968 on, Ottawa has not only been robbing the provinces of their wealth, it has been harassing them and trying to provoke confrontations by all means.

To begin with, in 1973, this government launched an official language policy which was sound in principle but which was implemented in such an inconsistent and incompetent way, especially in the Public Service, that it sowed discord throughout Canada and pitted English-speaking Canadians against French-speaking Canadians. Besides, this strategy is being phased out in the sense that we have now reached the ultimate stage with the lay-off of 600 language teachers five years before the anticipated date under the pretence that there is no longer any demand for courses and that the Public Service is now completely bilingual. This matter has been settled! Let's see! Once more, the Social Credit Party of Canada is the only one to fight openly for these teachers and above all for the rights of our French-speaking Canadians.

So, after having launched this stategy in 1973, the Prime Minister entered the second stage and began treating the provincial premiers as minus habentes at federal-provincial conferences.

In 1976 particularly, this same Prime Minister began playing with the idea of repatriating the constitution, one thing he knew Canadians of both British and French origins would never agree upon. This created confusion, Mr. Speaker. Only a small spark was necessary to set up a conflagration. And what could have best suited the purpose than chastising the people of Quebec by insulting their premier publicly, saying he was a hot-dog freak? How can you explain otherwise that seemingly irrational gesture of a strategist of the present Prime Minister's stamp? Furthermore, this increased his prestige among the English-speaking elements of the country who saw in him the man capable of subduing the Quebeckers. This way, he killed two birds with one stone.

Once again sensing the great danger that was threatening provincial sovereignty, we, of the Social Credit party, in conformity with our action in previous years, took the following position which was to become the basis for the constitutional policy of our party afterwards, and which I stated clearly in this House on April 9, 1976 in the following terms, and I quote:

> We, especially Quebeckers, demand power of veto for our provincial government. We want it to demand not only constitutional guarantees in education, that is French language and culture, but also territorial and every other guarantee . . . Indeed, Quebec will accept only one right that is its right of veto on anything affecting the interior of Quebec and the unanimous consent of all provinces for anything that concerns Canada.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, might I say that is still what we, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, are asking today for Quebec and all the provinces of Canada.

Hon. John M. Reid (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, it is about five minutes before one o'clock. Perhaps the House would call it one o'clock and we could begin again at two o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 12.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

● (1410)

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) with great interest, hoping that he would throw more light on his proposals. But I listened in vain. He made a long speech on our constitutional history and matters of sovereignty without, however, saying much about the motion he put before the House.

The elements of his speech are indeed worthy of a long debate, and doubtless there will be one some day. However, I am sure he will forgive me if I limit myself today to speaking to the motion. Mr. Speaker, what does that motion say?

[English]

I think I should read the motion into the record of the House since the hon. member was not interested in doing so. Let me read what we are debating today:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the federal government having taken advantage of the weakness of the British North America Act (BNA Act) to infringe on provincial jurisdictions and undermine the sovereignty of the provinces, has failed:
> —to leave the initiative of constitutional negotiations to the provinces, in accordance with the spirit of confederation, by giving them the final say in the decision-making process;
> —to discuss the introduction of economic rights for all citizens in a new constitution;
> —as well to recognize that new constitutional arrangements may be ratified only by the population of the provinces through referendums held in the respective provinces.

At the outset I would like to indicate there are a number of things in the resolution with which the government has no quarrel and with which it is in agreement. Also there are a number of items with which the government is not in agreement.

Let me take the last proposition first, the question of a referendum as a means of ensuring that the population has the ability to decide whether constitutional amendments are accepted. This is not a proposition to which the government takes objection at this point in time. We have no position on whether a referendum should be used as a means of indicating the popular support for a series of constitutional amendments.

The position taken by the goverments that constitutional negotiations are well under way, that the traditional method of finding a solution to our constitutional problems should be followed, and whether a referendum is required or indeed necessary by the 11 governments of Canada is a question on which we have an open mind.

As hon. members know, the House of Commons recently gave second reading to Bill C-9, which is the federal government's proposition on a constitutional referendum. On that basis of fact, we are satisfied we will have that kind of weapon in our armament. We have not closed the door to the use of it for this kind of purpose, and indeed perhaps it could be used for this kind of purpose. But at the present time we have not made any determination. We believe the means of developing an amending formula would be a question of negotiations between the provinces and the federal government. At this time we feel it would be unseemly for the federal government to insist upon a particular formula for amending the contitution and thereby imposing it on the provinces. In fact, what has been going on in the constitutional discussions held with the provinces has been a precise and detailed exploration of possible formulae for amending the Canadian constitution.

As hon. members are well aware, at the present time the legal situation is that if the House of Commons and the Senate pass an address praying that the British parliament pass amendments to the British North America Act, in fact the British parliament will do that and the British parliament will not look behind the address to ensure the provinces of Canada have agreed to such an address. Their position is that the power to make constitutional amendments affecting the division of powers is that of the federal government. That is the constitutional provision as it exists today in the British North America Act.

We have proposed a number of formulae to the provinces as methods of amending our act. I suppose the most famous is the Victoria formula which would provide for agreement among a certain percentage of the population and certain agreements by provinces in particular regions. As the formula works out, it would require the assent of two provinces in the maritimes, two out of the four provinces in the west, and the assent of Quebec and Ontario, mainly because of the manner in which the Canadian population is spread from coast to coast.

If one takes a look at the manner in which the population is spread from coast to coast, one comes up with an unenviable situation: approximately 30 per cent is found in Ontario; approximately 25 per cent is found in Quebec; approximately 10.8 per cent is found in British Columbia; approximately 8 per cent is found in Alberta; Manitoba and Saskatchewan each have approximately 5 per cent of the population; Prince Edward Island has .1 per cent of the total Canadian population; and the populations of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick range between 2 per cent and 3 per cent. When one attempts to find an amending formula which will be just to all components of the country, one will discover there is no easy formula.

One of the formulae developed in the recent constitutional talks is what we have dubbed the "Toronto consensus" because it emerged out of our constitutional discussions there. The formula provided for a factor of 85 per cent of the Canadian population represented by two-thirds of the provinces. Also it involved two lists: a precise list where there must be unanimity when dealing with the question of natural resources and the amending formula itself; and a second list on which the second formula would apply.

We have had great experience in Canada with formulae to amend the Canadian constitution. What is the current status in terms of the recent constitutional conference? The current status is that the premiers came into this conference bound by the rule of unanimity. In other words, they would not agree on anything unless there was unanimity among the provinces. The federal government feels that on balance this is a policy which is an extraordinarily restrictive formula for amending the Canadian constitution.

Mr. Beaudoin: That is the puzzle.

Mr. Reid: I agree that unanimity requires perfection. We are human beings, we are not perfect. In some ways the hon. member is fortunate enough to come from a small caucus. He knows how difficult it is, even within his own caucus, to reach unanimity on many subjects. We on this side of the House know how difficult it is for us to reach unanimity on many subjects. None the less the premiers have bound themselves by the rule of unanimity. They have said in fact to Canadians that unless they can reach unanimity on all these subjects, they are not prepared to move.

• (1420)

I believe that if hon. members had looked at the results of the last conference of first ministers held on Monday and Tuesday of this week, they would have discovered that on almost all items we were dealing with a consensus of eight or nine provinces and the federal government. This is a significant level of agreement, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker. When you have eight or nine out of 11 governments agreeing on a series of propositions, that is significant agreement in principle.

I would go further and point out that had we adopted the Victoria formula, had we adopted the Toronto consensus, or had we adopted the American formula of three quarters of the states agreeing, people would have said this conference was a fantastic success because we would have had agreement on almost every item that was under discussion by the first ministers. In point of fact, because the provinces have bound themselves by the rule of unanimity, having said that all 11 governments must be unanimous before they will proceed the conference was seen as only a half success.

As a result of this rule of unanimity we must have more meetings of first minutes and further meetings of the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution. There will have to be a further meeting of first ministers, I would expect some time within the next eight months. At what time and at what place I cannot say, but I would think that the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution, which met three times, at Mont St. Marie, at Toronto and at Vancouver, plus an extra meeting of officials in Ottawa, will have—

An hon. Member: Why don't you meet in Quebec City?

Mr. Reid: I would think Quebec City would be an ideal spot.

An hon. Member: And Roberval.

Mr. Reid: Roberval, perhaps, but Quebec City attracts me. To get back to the point, we will require further meetings and discussions to see if we can refine the proposals we have made down to the point where we can deal with them all in a unanimous spirit. I want to point out to the House that this is not going to be an easy task since there are provincial governments which disagree with the propositions that have been advanced because they do not go far enough, or because they go too far.

I would point out to hon. members that the federal government on almost all items was part of the general consensus, and there was a feeling that the federal government, which had been considered to be too rigid in its approach to constitutional changes, had become much more open and much more receptive to the need for constitutional change.

The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) mentioned quite explicitly the Pepin-Robarts report. I take seriously the comments he made in terms of Pepin-Robarts. I used the lunch hour to go back over the propositions that had been suggested by Pepin-Robarts and to compare them with propositions that had been dealt with by the first ministers at their conference. I am prepared to say to hon. members that if they will look at what was discussed and at the texts they will find that in many cases the negotiations which had taken place on the part of governments before the Pepin-Robarts report came out were right along the same lines advocated by Pepin-Robarts.

For example, in respect of the Supreme Court, we had already come to the conclusion that the proposal advanced by the federal government in Bill C-60 was not appropriate and, that the proposition advanced by Pepin-Robarts was also not appropriate. Therefore, we are out of synchronization on that. But there were a number of other propositions, such as the one on natural resources, where we have gone far further through transfer of power from the federal government to the province than Pepin-Robarts advances. I think if you looked at all of these proposals, Mr. Speaker, and if you were to weigh them on the balance scale, you would propably find that we are, indeed, going along the same line as Pepin-Robarts.

I want to make it clear to members of the House that these actions were taken prior to the Pepin-Robarts report coming out. Furthermore, I think I should offer the opinion that, in terms of the over-all thrust of Pepin-Robarts, I feel that if Canadians could accept the analysis and diagnosis of Pepin-Robarts—not the recommendations but the analysis and the diagnosis—as a starting place for our discussions on national unity, and as a starting place for our discussions on constitutional change, we would for the first time in Canadian history have an opportunity, on the part of 11 governments and all people from coast to coast, to begin discussions on a very common basis in fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: Having been involved in these discussions for the last three months, that to me would be a significant improvement in the way in which Canadians have approached this very thorny problem.

The second opinion I want to offer on the Pepin-Robarts report is that, on balance, I feel I could personally accept the prescriptions advanced by Pepin-Robarts. My interpretation of their recommendations is that involved is a transfer of power from the federal government to the provincial governments in certain areas, but also an equal transfer of power from provincial governments to the federal government in certain spheres, that what Pepin-Robarts was seeking was a new balance in confederation. Consequently, looked at from that point of view—

An hon. Member: What have you to say about the statut particulier?

Mr. Reid: I want to deal with that in a minute. If we accept that kind of idea of transfer, as I say, I would be inclined to go along with Pepin-Robarts, if the provincial governments were prepared to do so. I think the concept is ideal, and I would be prepared to buy the total package because I believe on balance it would leave the provinces stronger in those areas where they want to be stronger. We would also have a stronger federal government in areas where I believe the federal government ought to be stronger.

I want to deal with the statut particulier, and I want to deal with it in terms of Pepin-Robarts as well. I do not see where Pepin-Robarts recommended a statut particulier for the province of Quebec or, indeed, for any other province. What they did say was that any government is free to exercise powers coming under its jurisdiction or not exercise them, and the fact that it may not exercise such powers is not a reason for any other government either to move into that sphere or not exercise its powers. In other words, governments are perfectly able and free to accept or to reject the opportunity the constitution obliges. For that purpose, if you look at areas of jurisdiction that are under provincial control, including education and welfare, you will see that each province has developed its own idea as to how to cope with these specific jurisdictions, and that is all to the good.

I think it is unfair for people to say that Pepin-Robarts recommended a statut particulier; in my judgment they did not. What they indicated was that certain areas of jurisdiction should be turned over to the provinces, particularly in the cultural field, and if the provinces chose to exercise that jurisdiction or not exercise it, or to transfer it to another body, that was perfectly within their powers. I accept that as the reality of the Canadian constitution today.

For example, we have that relationship between the federal government and Quebec at this time, and I would give two examples. The first example is that in terms of income tax, the federal government collects taxes for nine provinces and remits that taxation to the provincial governments. However, in the case of Quebec, it has chosen to collect its own provincial income tax, which it has a perfect right to do. The second area in which I think there is a difference is in the realm of family allowances, which again is perfectly natural and acceptable under our constitution. There is no reason why any other provincial government should not avail itself of such opportunities as well. I reject the suggestion that Pepin-Robarts has indicated a statut particulier for Quebec.

I want to deal with the question of language rights for minorities. This is a very important subject. I am one of those who believes that this is a guarantee to the Francophones of Canada that their particular linguistic rights and right to survive as a cultural entity would be preserved across Canada. I believe that it would be a disaster for this country if we did not have those linguistic rights protected outside of Quebec, because it would force all Francophones into a fortress Quebec, which would be disastrous for the future of Canada. The Pepin-Robarts report states, quite emphatically, that the ideal solution would be to have those linguistic rights embedded in the constitution, a proposal which the current government has made in its Bill C-60 and with which we have no quarrel.

But in a burst of what one may call real politics, the Pepin-Robarts group decided that that was unlikely to happen and, therefore, second best—not first best, but second best—would be to have the provincial governments pass language legislation. I want to point out a number of things to hon. members in that regard. The first point is that the only province at this time which is bound by the constitution to provide second language rights is the province of Quebec. The second point I want to make is that there was an attempt in the province of Ontario to proceed with a statute dealing in general with language rights, but it was not accepted.

I think that one can argue reasons for that which are understandable to people who are active in Ontario politics, but the point is that there is only one province that is bound by this obligation. It seems to me that there is no way that I as a federal politician can travel around this country and say that it is all right for Quebec to be bound by these services but that the Francophone minorities in other provinces should not have the same rights as the people who speak my language in other parts of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I disagree violently with the position taken by the Pepin-Robarts report. I think that they would have been wiser and would have done us all a greater service if they had stuck to their original proposition, which to me is the only valid one. It seems to me that in discussing constitutional renewal and the question of providing assurances to minority linguistic groups, we must as part of the majority not only be seen to be fair, but must make it clear that we are prepared to go overboard to be fair. Because all minority groups, wherever they are and under whatever circumstances they may be, have this fear that at any point in time the majority can turn against them. What we want to do is ensure that these people have their rights embedded as deeply as possible in the constitution, so that their rights are totally protected. I think that is the one area of substantive disagreement which I have with the Pepin-Robarts report.

I have one further point to make, Mr. Speaker, and that is to discuss the workload that the first ministers have undertaken. As hon. members know, when the conference broke up there was substantive agreement on almost every other item but there was not unanimity. At some point members of this House will have to face the question of what the rule of unanimity means and whether or not we are going to be able to move forward with substantive constitutional reform. For as long as one province has the power to block all others; then it seems to me that, while this may be convenient for the provinces concerned, it can have a deleterious effect on the country as a whole.

We as national politicians must think at all times of the welfare of our country as a whole. Those items which were discussed in the constitutional conference by the first ministers and not resolved will form part of the agenda of the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution.

In addition to that, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that the second list which was announced by my predecessor at the constitutional conference of first ministers in October would also be put on the table. I would like to run through that list to give hon. members an indication of the kinds of things that the federal government is proposing be discussed. It is important to remember that the first list which we went through on the division of powers was a list proposed by the premiers at Regina. The federal government accepted that list and also agreed to have intensive consultation, through the same process with the premiers, on the items in Bill C-60 with which they had some disagreement. That obligation has been discharged.

I would now like to read the second list presented by the federal government. I will read it out seriatim and then say a few words on each item. The first item deals with powers in the economic field to fight inflation, unemployment and regional disparity and to protect the dollar. The second item is the question of non-tariff barriers to interprovincial and international trade and investment. Third is the question of interprovincial and international movement of goods and services, including the right of passage of electricity, oil, gas and other minerals. Fourth is the question of barriers to the movement of persons for employment. Fifth is the regulation of competition. Sixth is the regulation of the Canadian securities market. Seventh is the question of marketing boards. Eighth is the problem of jurisdiction over minimum wages. Ninth is foreign relations and the role of provinces. Tenth is the question of the appointment of superior court judges and of the setting up of federal courts for the administration of federal laws. Lastly, Canada's native people and the constitution.

These are the items that the federal government has put on the agenda for the next round of discussions, in addition, as I said before, to the items that were not resolved in the previous discussions which have come to a conclusion.

I think that it is clear to anybody who has studied the Pepin-Robarts report that this list published by the federal government back in October, 1978, is virtually identical in the economic powers that it wants discussed to those items enumerated by the Pepin-Robarts report as to where the federal government should have an overriding authority in the matter of better government and better control of our economic union. It is interesting to note that the policies that have been followed by the federal government and the provinces in these negotiations have fitted in reasonably well with the proposals and the general spirit of discussion which the Pepin-Robarts report recommends.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the constitutional discussions which began last fall have to be regarded as a significant step forward since we have had a significant amount of agreement amongst the provinces; and, further, that we accept basically the general propositions advanced by the Pepin-Robarts report in terms of its analysis and diagnosis of the problems which Canada is facing today. Even the Pepin-Robarts report said that while it could indicate general approaches, by and large it would be the government entering into negotiations that would determine how division of powers would be made.

I would like to say to my friends in the Ralliement des Créditistes that I think they have proposed an interesting idea in that we should think in terms of using Bill C-9, the referendum bill, as a means of seeking the support of Canadians in the process of constitutional reform. This is a proposition which the government, up until now, has not considered. But I can assure them that it will be considered by the government, and I hope that it will also be considered by the justice committee which is dealing with Bill C-9 as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a question which is in the interest of historical accuracy. In other words, I wonder if the minister would agree that a correction ought to be made to something which he said in the very early part of his remarks. I believe that I am correct that he said that under the present system, when Canada wants an amendment to the British North America Act, we send a resolution from both Houses of our parliament to the British parliament. If the minister checks the record, I think that he will find that what we do is send a resolution from both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen—in other words, the Queen of Canada—asking her to place a measure before the British parliament. It may seem a minor difference, but there is a difference between our addressing the parliament of another country and our addressing our own sovereign.

• (1440)

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is correct. I am pleased he has made this correction now and I thank him for it.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) says that the Queen is part of the British parliament. I should just like to remind him that the Queen is also part of the Canadian parliament.

I can hear the jokes about Her Majesty the Queen from the other side. I hardly consider that to be a proper thing to do in this House or in this country.

Mr. Breau: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The record will show that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) mentioned my riding name. I hope she will permit me to make clear that I did not make any joke about the monarch.

Miss MacDonald: I accept that, certainly, from the hon. member for Gloucester.

I listened with some very real interest to the remarks of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid). While I was pleased to hear his speech I also considered it to be one of the telling factors about this government and the way in which their relations with the parliament of Canada are carried out.

While we had a very important first minister's conference this week which was held just across the street from this parliament, the chairman of that conference, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), did not see fit at the end of the conference to come into this chamber and make a statement on motions reporting what went on to the body to which he is responsible and accountable. Not once did he feel it necessary to get to his feet and report the findings of that conference to this chamber, or the work or the non-advance of that conference. What really interests me is that some time later in the week a junior minister is detailed to give the report that the chairman of the conference did not see fit to bring to parliament.

I was interested also in his remarks about patriation of the constitution and the fact that the premiers of the various provinces had insisted on unanimity. One of the interesting things that the Prime Minister said at that conference was—I paraphrase him because, of course, I do not have the exact words—that "we"—meaning all of the eleven first ministers there, "were in the bizarre position of having to produce unanimity one last time in order to achieve a less flexible approach in our constitution".

So I do not think that the minister should try to pass it off that only the premiers were making that claim to unanimity. That, indeed, was the position of the Prime Minister. That, indeed, would have to be the position of anyone involved in seeking amendments to the constitution, amendments which, of course, affect both levels of government. The hon. member for Gloucester questions that, but I trust he is not suggesting that a new amending formula could be arrived at in this country by the unilateral decision of the federal government. Would the member from Gloucester like to rise and say that that is the position he is putting forward?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I find it difficult to accept the procedure suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Breau: The answer is no.

Miss MacDonald: The member for Gloucester, even though he has perhaps intimated otherwise before, has now verified the position and has said no.

Sir, I would like to address some remarks to the motion which has been put forward today by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). I may say that the motion as put forward by the member for Roberval is one which we in this party reject, because the suggestion in that motion really runs counter to our system of federalism. If it was carried to its logical conclusion, it could emasculate the central government and, indeed, the parliament of Canada, by leaving the final decision-making power in all things up to the provinces. Quite frankly, I was not elected to parliament to participate in its demise, and neither do I think were the members of the party that introduced this motion.

This motion does not call merely for changes to our present system of federalism in order to improve it. Rather, it suggests such drastic changes to our system of interrelated governments that we would end up little more than a very loose alliance of more or less autonomous units strung out across the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I agree that the federal government acted too often in provincial areas of jurisdiction. That complaint was well expressed by the provinces themselves in the past and it should be of interest to anyone concerned with the political situation in Canada. However, the solution to those problems is not to lower the central government position to one of janitor in the present confederation. I think that would be going too far in the other direction.

[English]

There is the problem. It is right to ask what we can do now to put it right; but the answers will not come without a proper analysis of where the problem lies, and that proper analysis is something we have not had, either from the government or, as this motion shows, from the Social Credit party today.

That analysis of where our problems actually exist must incorporate an understanding of the reasons for the friction and the tensions which have developed between the federal government and all the provincial governments, something that has been developing over many years and certainly escalating over the past 30 years.

Perhaps the easiest way to understand what I am talking about is to look at the Canada that we had 30 or 40 years ago as it emerged from the Second World War, because that war fundamentally changed our federal system, making the federal government more powerful than ever before. The government assumed sweeping powers to regulate our economy and nationalize our resources for the war and, perhaps more importantly, for the future of our federal system. The federal government took over the great bulk of the tax resources in order to finance the military effort and that, sir, indeed was appropriate during that period of time—during the war.

But in peacetime such a system was no longer adequate for Canada's needs. We came out of the war with a very centralized system. The federal government was big. It had developed a large bureaucracy. The federal government was rich; it controlled the bulk of our tax dollars. And the federal government was already becoming arrogant; it increasingly assumed that it knew best, that the provinces were children needing strict parental guidance, that Canada would be strong only if the federal government was bigger than anyone else.

This approach, appropriate in the war years, could not last. Why is that? The critical problems facing Canada in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s—the major areas in which Canadians were demanding action—fell within provincial jurisdiction, according to the BNA Act. There were better health and social services, enhanced education opportunities for our children, better housing and modern highways, planned urban growth and rapid transit, development of our natural resources and careful management of our environment. The list seemed endless.

These were the urgent problems of a mature and industrial society and they fell either exclusively or predominantly within provincial jurisdiction. As a result the Canadian federal system became increasingly out of balance. Big government was in Ottawa and most of the tax dollars were there, but the real problems were in the constitutional laps of the provinces. The result was perhaps inevitable; tension, frustration and anger.

Much of our troubled constitutional history of the last 20 years has been essentially a search for a new balance, a new equilibrium between federal and provincial governments. Because of its cultural distinctiveness, Quebec pushed forward more vigorously in this search. But many of the fundamental, underlying problems and frustrations are shared by all provinces.

The tensions as I have observed them have been particularly noticeable recently in two fields: health and social services, and natural resources. In the case of health and social services the federal government, perhaps unwittingly, helped to plant the seed of provincial challenge. In the 1950s and 1960s Ottawa used conditional grants to cajole and prod the provinces into big programs, such as hospitalization and medicare. As a consequence the provinces had developed the expertise, the administrative capability and the self-confidence with which to challenge the view that Ottawa knew what was best for them. Conflict followed, as night follows day. The new financial arrangements between the two levels of government in this area reflect one fundamental fact: the provinces are increasingly insisting on their right to determine their own priorities and policy.

I mentioned natural resources as a second area of tension. The worldwide explosive growth in demand for resources over the last decades, a growth dramatized by the energy crisis of the 1970s, has presented Canada with both challenges and opportunities. But given the very important powers over natural resources allocated to the provinces by the British North America Act, a critical aspect of Canada's well-being depends on the skill and wisdom with which provincial governments approach resources issues. The federal government can no longer presume to be the unchallenged guardian of our economic future. There must be joint co-operation.

Canada today is very different from the Canada of 1945. It is important that we understand the forces of change. The linguistic and cultural resurgence of French Canada is one central force, but the emergence of broader provincial responsibilities is another, which has too often been overlooked.

[Translation]

One thing is certain, a strong and united Canada will have to find a new balance between the jurisdictions of both levels of government. We need to change our institutions at the federal level. Changes are also necessary in the distribution of powers, but it is also important to have a behavioural change in Ottawa. In the past, the relations between Ottawa and the other partners in confederation were too often marked by paternalistic and superior attitude. It is necessary to have those relations directed towards mutual respect in the future.

[English]

What is necessary is a new balance, a new equilibrium between the federal and provincial governments. Mention has been made in this debate today of the recently released report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. It has some very imaginative and workable proposals that would move in the direction of which I speak. Not all of the proposals in it can be or will be agreed to, but the emphasis that that report has placed on regional aspirations and power-sharing open up options that have long been closed in the mind of the current government. Many of the options that the task force speaks about were available a decade ago when relations between the federal government and the provinces were much less contentious. For instance, policies for opting out of federal-provincial agreements or for accommodating the distinct responsibilities of any province could have acted as safety valves in the growing federal-provincial conflict. But the valves were shut, the doors were closed and the country was directed down one corridor and one corridor only by a prime minister convinced, in spite of the danger signals, that his way was the only way. The lack of these safety valves has resulted in compression of the tensions and resentment; compression to the point of explosion.

The Pepin-Robarts report suggests opening doors that long have been closed—the doors of regional expression, of more provincial input at the centre and less control of the regions. Above all, it reiterates the definitive characteristic of any federal system. They say that the definitive characteristic of any federal system is—and I hope all of us would agree with this——the equality of status, under the constitution, of the two orders of government—

This is a characteristic which precludes unilateral action by the federal government in matters that concern the provinces, something of which we have seen all too much in the past decade.

[Translation]

The Pepin-Robarts task force stresses in its report the two distinctive features in this country: cultural dualism and regionalism. Those characteristics, which are often seen as negative realities, should and must be dealt with in a positive manner. As it is said in the report, we should learn to adapt ourselves better to them, to subscribe to them, to provide in Canada as a whole such opportunities for action that everyone will be able to take advantage of them.

[English]

I want to look particularly at the question of regionalism which the task force has identified as one of the major sources of tension in the country, but one with great potential for strengthening the country over-all. Regionalism is given two dimensions, and properly so. The two dimensions that are identified are the cultural dimension and the economic dimension of regionalism. The report recognizes that the powers necessary to reinforce the positive aspects of the cultural dimension can best be handled by the provinces. They make certain suggestions along that line. Similarly it recognizes that the powers necessary to reduce the negative aspects of economic dimensions are regionalism, that regional disparity can best be handled by the federal government, and it recommends a strengthening of that role. That, sir, is the kind of balance that we must be seeking in this country so that federalism does operate better.

However, the reconciliation of regional interests will only come about with a central government that is sensitive to regional needs: sensitive to the fact that restraint measures dreamed up in Ottawa and uniformly applied can cripple the weaker provinces; or that indiscriminate regulation of resource industries without regard to regulations in the provinces, where much of the responsibility truly falls, can regulate those industries right out of existence. The lack of such sensitivity in Ottawa is the root cause of many of the stresses and strains in our federal system. We will not have a strong Canada until that essential sensitivity is reintroduced.

To become more sensitive to the needs of the provinces is not to weaken the central government to the point where we give up the dream of a Canada of shared interests and mutual responsibilities. Rather, it is to build on those shared interests and responsibilities. It is to reconcile the dual impulses of a strong united Canada and strong, diverse regions within the institutions and processes of the central government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but her time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There seems to be a disposition to allow the hon. member to continue her remarks.

Miss MacDonald: I thank the House for its courtesy. This approach means remaking the central institutions to give them a new measure of legitimacy as genuine expressions of both regional and Canada-wide interests, in other words, to create a new equilibrium. I feel that has been the value of the Pepin-Robarts commission, to highlight the fact that this new equilibrium or balance, which for too long has been lacking, must be sought in order to hold this country together.

We are faced with very real problems in our federal system, problems which cry out for solution. But the problems must be analysed properly before any solutions can be reached. The facile suggestions in today's motion are not the answer. Nor is the government's referendum bill. That bill would create a new potential for federal-provincial relations. It would give the federal government the power to override provincial governments, any provincial government, and to go directly to the people on any constitutional matter that may be opposed to the wishes of a particular government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that when he said the other day that you could not assume that this bill would not be used against the province of New Brunswick. He singled it out particularly.

Mr. Breau: Against the government, not the people.

Miss MacDonald: That is a very interesting debate. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) is now in a position of denying the right of the legitimate, democratically elected government of any province to create legislation for that province. In that case, he says it is the federal government in Ottawa that makes the laws for the provincial dimension of New Brunswick. That has been the attitude of this government all along. If they could, they would abolish all provincial governments.

Mr. Breau: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Miss MacDonald: Yes, Mr. Speaker, when I finish. This new tool that the government has devised for itself is a weapon to be used against the provinces. It smacks of arrogance and parternalism, which has been the difficulty over the past ten years. It is hardly a solution to a problem that has come about because of the government's protracted arrogance and parternalism. That is no solution at all.

I have some very real reservations about the government's commitment either to federal-provincial relations or to the cultural duality of this nation when it can bring in a bill with such potential for division, and then when the minister comes before the committee and makes a statement he does not have the text available or translated into the other official language. Both of these events are symbolic of the government's clumsiness in the field of federal-provincial relations.

To return to the motion before us today, this country is made up of many parts. But its strength lies in the fact that these diverse parts are part of the larger whole. To retain and strengthen that whole, while remaining sensitive to the diversity of its parts, should be our goal. The motion before us today works against that goal and that is why we in this party cannot support it.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indicated she would be glad to answer a question at this stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Miss MacDonald: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Breau: In talking about the danger of a referendum against the province of New Brunswick, the hon. member came close to indicating that she thought a provincial legislature could not on occasion deal with this situation and constitutional questions and that the federal government or parliament should not in any way consult the people of that province. Does she realize that if she extends the logic of that argument she would be in agreement with Pierre Bourgault who says that the national assembly of Quebec could just, by a majority vote, decide the future of Quebec without any referendum, provincial or federal?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is inherent in the Prime Minister's threat against the province of New Brunswick, the fact that the federal government could move in to abolish the official languages legislation of the province of New Brunswick. That is what it means.

• (1510)

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): The motion being debated today seems quite appropriate to me in this age of redefinition of the powers under our constitution. Given the present political instability and economic insecurity, there is no doubt that solving that problem could result in true national harmony which can still be achieved if we use the appropriate means.

Today I would like to draw the attention of the House to one of the priority aspects of the solution to the constitutional problem, an aspect that is unfortunately forgotten too often in the debate. To prevent errors of interpretation I will refer to the document entitled Coming to Terms released a few days ago by the Task Force on Canadian Unity.

Here are the terms used by the task force to define the word "constitution", and I quote:

(2) the definition of the principal organs of government in all four branches—the legislative, the executive, the judicial and the administrative—their composition, functions, powers and limitations;

(3) the distribution and the co-ordination of powers between the two orders of government if the form of government is a federal one;

(4) the definition of relationship between the governors and the governed, particularly the rights of the latter.

The Task Force on Canadian Unity does say that a constitution includes in particular the rights of the governed, the rights of the citizens. That is quite obvious and logical since the human being is the most important creature in any society and any society is there to serve the interests of the people it includes. When you talk about basic human rights, everybody agrees about the following definition: A society must be organized so as to allow the enjoyment of such basic rights as the right to decent standards of living, health and most fundamental freedoms.

All this is included one way or another in the Bill of Rights and other statutes. For its part, the constitution does not mention these rights even though they are quite important. For too many people, these rights have remained theoretical because they had no access to them, and this is the main thrust of my intervention. The use of these rights and their accessibility cannot be fully recognized in practice if the people do not have the necessary financial means. In proof of this, one only has to look at the figures quoted by the Senate Committe on Poverty in December, 1978 which showed a disastrous financial situation for a large number of people in Canada, In 1977, 882,000 single persons, or 42.9 per cent of people in this category, were below the poverty line, 1,288,000 families of two or more, or 21.5 per cent of Canadian families, were living below the poverty line. If one considers that the average Canadian family has four members, this means that 6,034,000 people were living below the poverty line in Canada.

To live below the poverty line means that you are deprived of all the required health services, the necessary food products, decent housing, proper clothing, and numerous services which are essential to the exercise of basic freedoms and to happiness, which means that you are denied basic human rights in a normal and modern society. I want today to emphasize the fact that if the constitution must guarantee basic rights, it must also guarantee the possibility to exercise these rights. Any constitution will remain theoretical and lead to the present confrontation if it does not guarantee economic rights for individuals, rights which are clearly set forth in the provisions of the constitution so that no member of society, and especially no government, can dismiss their basic commitments.

When we talk about the basic human rights, that is food, housing, clothing, heating, health, and so on, we are talking about things that are essential to life and about the production of goods and services, and therefore about costs, prices, purchasing power and income. We are therefore talking about money and finance. It is quite easy to understand that the possibility to exercise these basic human rights is dependent upon the effectiveness of the financial system.

Let us see in this British North America Act which is considered as our constitution, how the financial system is dealt with regarding its functions as an enabling agent of the exercise of our basic rights. Section 53 deals with appropriation and tax bills. Section 91 deals with the Canadian parliament's responsibility over the public debt, the raising of money, the currency and the coinage, the banks and paper issue of money, and the interest on money. Section 92 deals with the provincial legislature's responsibility over direct taxation, the borrowing of money on the sole credit of the province. A great many sections deal with interests, provincial public debts, consolidated revenue funds, the transfer of the assets and the liabilities of the provinces, the responsibility of Canada over the debts of the provinces and the raising of taxes and so on. In this document which we consider as our constitution, no mention is made whatsoever of the rights of the citizens and, above all, the latter are not even guaranteed a single way of exercising such rights.

There is reference to the right of the government to borrow, to tax, to transfer debts and therefore the right of the governments to last and ensure their own subsistence, and finance their administration be it good or bad through the taxpayers. The future constitution of Canada which will have to emerge from the current debates will have to acknowledge the sound organization of the financial system from which depends the access to basic rights. This financial system will have to be recognized as the first essential public service, the one which provides access to all the others. The constitution will also have to spell out the responsibilities within that system and the limitation of its field of action.

Secondly, this new association which will emerge from a new constitution will have to establish its true sovereignty, namely the right of the people to their existence, to fundamental liberties as compared to other countries, to decent living conditions and these rights as well as those of the individuals will only be exercised if the financial system makes it possible.

The words "borrower" and "sovereign" are tantamount to an antithesis the elements of which are incompatible. A borrower loses part of his sovereignty which he surrenders to his creditors. He no longer is his own master. We have all seen what happened in the case of the cities of New York and Cleveland. When they suddenly are on the verge of bankruptcy, their creditors dictated their own terms.

We in Canada are heading for the same bankruptcy. Our governments are overmortgaged, a situation which is creating similar problems for the public.

I have before me a list of public debts. Public and private debts of Canadians in 1977

Federal debt:	$67 billion
Provincial debt:	$16,000,825,000
Consumer credit:	$25 billion
Credit to corporations:	$31 billion
Residential mortgages:	$13 billion
Total:	$152,000,825,000

It is to be noted that these figures do not include the debts of all municipalities in Canada. And we all know how deep in debt our municipalities are. The federal deficit alone increases by $822,000 every hour. This is ridiculous. Interest payable on total debt in 1978

Federal debt:	$6,000,500,000
Consumer credit:	$2,000,500,000
Corporations credit:	$3,000,100,000
Residential mortgages:	$1,000,300,000

This is where the present constitution has led us by giving us borrower status, debitor status, the status of seemingly prosperous people as in New York who owe the shirts they are wearing. Those figures show how much purchasing power deficiency our system generates relative to costs and obligations. The Canadian constitution should establish a Canadian financial system that would be responsible for the circulation of all the money and credit needed for sound economic performance. This implies that Canada must create a public financial service.

There is ample evidence of the current system's permanent divorce from current economic reality. Time has come to change that. And if an example were needed, we have the floating Canadian dollar. It is on a constant downslide.

I would now like to submit to the House proposals that should be included in the next constitution. A century and a half ago or even a century ago those proposals would have looked unreal. But modern times, our high degree of civilization, the high level of knowledge, the enormous productive potential, automation and cybernetics have brought us to the end of an old society concept and the eve of a new society. It has been proved that we now have the human and physical assets, the energy resources and productive capacity to enter into an age where the constant insecurity and poverty now rampant will be reduced to isolated cases rather than a system feature as is now the case.

The new constitution should include provisions for a national credit board responsible for determining the resources needed for the country to fulfil individual aspirations and for submitting from time to time reports on the efficient use of those resources. These reports would give an inventory of our society's assets and an evaluation of the percentage used. It is indeed important to know our potential, which can be made available to our citizens so that they can exercise their basic rights. And when we talk about public credit, we should really have a clear idea of its worth. Moreover, I think that the situation which makes Canadians run into debt with their government which is itself constantly borrowing from foreign capital should be reversed and that the Constitution should grant to every citizen the title of shareholder of this country. Therefore, in his quality as shareholder, every citizen would regularly receive dividends which would constitute an income supplement calculated on the basis of the net benefits of the economic association formed by Canada. This title and the privileges which would derive from it should be granted to every citizen simply because of his Canadian citizenship.

This provision would create a true economic democracy as the citizens would become owners of their share of the Canadian wealth and through the benefits they would realize, they would gain an ever-increasing ability to finance projects suited to their needs.

If this country belongs to its citizens and if this partnership is aimed at bettering the quality of life for everyone and providing more fundamental rights, it is only normal that every citizen benefit directly from this partnership. In the light of the foregoing, I should now like to make proposals which would enable us to achieve the goals pursued. The next constitution should provide that the primary role of a government is to guarantee by every possible means for every individual and family an adequate income so that they are reasonably well off.

The minimum income required to be reasonably well off could be determined on an annual basis. For instance, and this is one only example but a quite realistic one, it could be agreed in 1979 that the minimum "reasonably well off" income could be defined as the poverty line, as established by the Senate committee, plus 15 per cent. By the same token, the next constitution should provide that no person living below the "reasonably well off" line should pay any tax. However, it seems perfectly normal and in order. I cannot understand that the Income Tax Act should tax people earning $2,000 or $2,500 when they need at least $5,000 to $6,000 to live.

Those two proposals imply the setting up of an organization to set the minimum annual income required by single individuals and families to live decently and to exercise their basic rights. As a result of the present uncertainty, we have the opportunity of making our country the first modern nation with a constitution that really serves the interests of its citizens. Our country can lead the way for the whole world through a constitution based essentially on the respect of basic human rights and with very strict provisions defining the means likely to give access to those rights to everyone.

I would add that the new constitution should recognize that the government closer to the citizen can better serve him. In that spirit, with regard to equalization, a formula should be divised under which each entity (each province) would provide to the higher level of government on a voluntary basis the sums required for the administration of programs for which they have delegated the responsibility to the higher level of government for a period determined at their discretion.

The Canadian people can give themselves a constitution fashioned to human need. For hundreds of millions of people living in poverty and uncertainty throughout the world, we can become, by adopting an original constitution, a source of hope for a better future. Because of its international reputation, Canada is perfectly able to do this. In conclusion, I express the hope that all those who will participate at any level in the drafting of a new constitution will consider my remarks, because I am convinced, as well as my colleagues from the Social Credit party, that those proposals might prevent disputes and confrontations. It is our duty to prepare for our future Canada a system designed to ensure a standard of justice under which human beings will have precedence over financial interests. Then we might talk about a just society.

I am pretty sure that the procedure followed up to now with a view to drafting a new constitution could be improved. One only has to look at the result of federal-provincial conferences to be convinced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. However, he could continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I thank my colleagues, I shall be finished in a minute.

We should offer the Canadian people the advantage to participate through a referendum so that they have the right to decide whether one draft constitution or another is acceptable, no province being forced to accept the terms of a constitution on which it does not agree. However, if we proposed a model constitution which would guarantee everyone the "right to live", because it is an important right, there would be possible grounds for agreement in the best interests of the Canadian people.

● (1530)

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we could have hoped or at least expected that with the departure of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) the Social Credit Party of Canada would have left the winding paths of ultranationalism and the sinister maze of cheap casuitry.

We must unfortunately admit that the member for Champlain, his hysterical and furious messianism notwithstanding, brought a minimum of consistency to the interventions of his party in constitutional matters. The fact is that the wording of the motion now under consideration and standing in the name of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) is so confused and hermetic that I hate to try even to analyze its substance. It just may be that the member for Roberval himself agrees since not once in his intervention did he refer to it and neither did the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I cannot say I blame her.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that today, which is an opposition day, we have a motion dealing with an extremely important matter reflecting one of our major concerns, namely the constitutional reform and the direction Canada intends to give in the future to the reform of its institutions.

I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) for the wonderful speech he made earlier today, in which he frankly explained the problems facing us and reaffirmed our determination to succeed in this endeavour which means so much for the survival of this country and its institutions. I particularly appreciated his reference to the report of the Pepin-Robarts Commission, and the way he cleared up any misunderstandings that may have arisen from the presentation of that report and the unfavourable comments it attracted from the media and the politicians. Above all, I feel he deserves credit for emphasizing the outstanding job the commission has done in paving the way for a better understanding and identification of the Canadian problem.

Having said that, I should still like to speak to the motion before the House today if only in an attempt to see how some of the statements it contains can lead to confusion and in fact mislead Canadians. To my mind, the motion can be divided, at least at first glance that is what I gathered, into four parts. First, the introduction, where on the basis of the so-called weaknesses of our constitutional acts, and I suppose the British North America Act of 1867 is being referred to here, a denunciation is made of the outrageous intervention of the federal government in fields of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, later on I shall endeavour to demonstrate that this assertion, on which the whole motion is based, is completely false and unsubstantiated. On the basis of that assertion, the Social Credit Party of Canada, and particularly the sponsor of the motion, denounces three government initiatives or actions which, according to him, justifies the presentation of a motion, though perhaps not of censure still asking the government to act otherwise.

First of all, the motion claims that the initiative of constitutional reform should be left to the provinces, should be taken by them in accordance with the constitutive elements of the Canadian federation. So, the first question that comes to my mind is this: does that mean, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian state, that the federal government, which is also legitimate by virtue of our constitutive acts, cannot take the initiative of a constitutional reform and, as a corollary, cannot even, I suppose, initiate arrangements in its own institutions, within its own jurisdictions? To me, the answer is simple: the British North America Act gives the Government of Canada—the federal government—full jurisdiction to amend its Constitution and reform its institutions to give them greater flexibility.

The third aspect in this motion deals with the introduction of the economic rights of the people. I wonder what the mover of the motion means by that, Mr. Speaker. In my view, there are two possible interpretations: First—and this might be in line with the options which the Social Credit party has been advocating for years—writing in the constitution certain economic rights such as the guaranteed annual income thus making it mandatory for governments to provide for their people's basic economic requirements. But—as we shall see later—these are not the only rights. The right to work is also very important as well as the right to form collective associations and many others of that same type. The Socreds are certainly not the only ones who have made such proposals. Back in 1967, the then Minister of Justice who happened to be the right hon. Pierre Elliot Trudeau, released a document called the Canadian Charter of Human Rights, which dealt extensively with those economic rights.

By the way, there were many meetings leading eventually to the Victoria Conference, during which fundamental civil rights and freedoms, including economic rights, were thoroughly discussed by a sub-committee made up of the ministers of justice who finally decided that, in view of the present situation, more particularly the nature of our institutions and dual federal and provincial jurisdiction, economic rights could probably be better protected, and every participating minister agreed to that, if the constituent parties, more precisely the provinces, were allowed to legislate in this particular area because the enforcement of those rights requires positive government action and, that is why it seems more appropriate to let the provinces pass whatever legislation they deem necessary or are under pressure to adopt for the protection of such rights.

My fourth and final point, Mr. Speaker, is really current because it concerns referenda. The mover of this motion presumably supposes, that the provinces alone which make up the Canadian confederation, can, through public consultation accept or reject constitutional reforms. He also assumes that the federal government has no right to consult the people and hold such referenda. Again, I think that, despite the reservations expressed by certain parties in the House during the debate on Bill C-9 regarding the scope of the legislation, the types of questions to be put, the various areas of consultation which could lead to referenda, no one I think has suggested in this House, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government had no constitutional right to consult the people either at the national level, from coast to coast, or within a province, whether on an issue of general interest to Canadians or an issue relating to the specific interest of a given region.

And once again, I do not think that the fourth point listed in the motion is hardly worth mentioning except to say that the constitutional basis for the following statement, and I quote from the motion, Mr. Speaker:

> . . . new constitutional arrangements may be ratified only by the population of the provinces through referendums held in the respective provinces.

—ignores the true nature of our Canadian institutions.

But we are left with the preamble of the motion and I will read it again for the record:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the federal government having taken advantage of the weaknesses of the British North America Act (BNA Act) to infringe on provincial jurisdictions . . .

Mr. Speaker, I seriously question the historic sources used by the research staff of the Social Credit Party of Canada as a basis for that statement. Whether they be French-speaking historians to refer to the new terminology used since 1977, or English-speaking, or even American historians as Mason Wade, or even people who have nothing to do with North America and especially European historians, but to my knowledge, nobody has ever suggested that under the British North America Act initially has given priority to provinces.

And in that context, I could quote Mason Wade but I do not have the book with me. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to the report of the Senate committee session of 1939, when the government had asked the Senate to prepare an interpretation of the Privy Council judgment on sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act on joint powers. I got out some excerpts from the parliamentary debates of the Parliament of Canada before 1867, that is in 1864 and 1865, and at that time, Macdonald had this to say, Mr. Speaker, and I quote from page 144 of the document:

> But in the proposed constitution, all matters of general interest, all that concerns the provinces as a whole, will be left exclusively to the federal Parliament while provincial legislatures will deal with local interests which although they do not concern the whole Confederation, are very significant at the local level.

Later he went on to say, Mr. Speaker, and I quote:

> We have conferred upon the general parliament all the major legislative matters. Not only have we specifically and in detail conferred upon it any power inherent in sovereignty and nationality, but we have specifically stated that any area of general interest which is not assigned to local parliaments would fall under the jurisdiction of the federated government and that local matters would come under local governments. Thus we have given strength to the general government and parliament, and we have avoided this great source of weakness which has caused disruption among the United States.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the United States were then facing extremely serious internal difficulties following the secession war.

Does that mean, Mr. Speaker, from what was said by the father of confederation par excellence—and I add my own little touch of nationalism, by Cartier—does that mean, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Macdonald, soon to become the first Prime Minister of Canada, of the Canadian confederation, thought of something that was rather like a confederal institution, as it is understood today, or rather was it not straightforwardly meant that what was intended was almost a legislative union, and I use the word legislative advisedly, Mr. Speaker, because Macdonald himself wanted a legislative union, because he considered that it would allow better policy co-ordination in the interest of all the colonies in the British North America of that time, and in particular the opening of the west, the abolition of tariff barriers, the building of a railroad; finally, he did not see the necessity to give local institutions much more than a role of local regionalism befitting glorified municipalities, as they put it at the time.

Cartier could not accept, of course, as a Francophone, and as he wanted to protect the interests of Lower Canada, he said to Macdonald: Since we have to get rid of the Union because it is not working, that is the Union of Upper and Lower Canada, but since we have to try to keep the British colonies in North America together, let us do it but let us make sure that the institutions will respect the rights of the Francophones—and he was thinking specifically of the rights of the Francophones in Lower Canada. So, in spite of Macdonald's reservations, the principle of a federal union was accepted. But a federal union extremely centralized at the time, a federal union which in the mind of its designers, including Cartier, was to give the central government practically absolute preponderance. And it was only later, Mr. Speaker, with the pleas put to the Privy Council that that first concept of the Canadian confederation was gradually watered down to finally arrive at a federalism which resembles that which we have now because in its very essence it has not changed that much since the last decisions of the Privy Council despite a back and forth movement of the preponderance of the central government.

And in that sense, I would like to remind hon. members of the Social Credit Party that we are now, according to all serious analysts of the Canadian political situation, in a period where the pendulum is moving toward a preponderance of the provinces. For example, at present, if you compare the budgets of the federal government with those of the provinces, including those of the municipalities, which come under the responsibility of the provinces, you have a ratio of 1/3 to 2/3. Is that the sign of an extremely centralized federation where the central government only controls a third of governmental and "perigovernmental" budgets. I do not think so. Indeed, I think it is a very healthy development. I am not one of those who advocate, particularly in the Canadian context, an overcentralization of all powers. That would be contrary to the spirit of the BNA Act of 1867. That would go against the Canadian social and cultural reality, and it goes even against the Canadian economic reality which is based on regionalisms rather than true complementarity.

Speaking of complementarity, Mr. Speaker, if there is any direction we should try to give our efforts towards "re-confederating", it should be to take us back to the spirit that prevailed during the discussions leading to the Quebec and London conferences. At the time a whole series of factors existed which made our political men feel the need to unite. Some of those factors were political, and strictly political. For instance, the union of Lower and Upper Canada was in a political deadlock since 1840, with a whole series of governments falling one after the other.

Naturally that state of affairs interfered with the solution of the serious economic problems facing the colony at the time, including the development of the west, the need for considerable resources to build a railway, the laying down of the substructure of a maritime transport system to compete with the ones that were attracting both goods and their transportation towards the south, the United States. Another consideration was perceived at the time, namely the danger of the United States taking over, because of their power, their numbers, the various colonies located to the north. But one felt the need to unite for another reason. For many years already, privileges granted to the colony by the mother country had been reduced to the bare minimum, with the repeal of Corn Laws and others, so that Canada had to turn to the United States to carry on the majority of its trade and establish its own tariff barriers. Finally, Mr. Speaker, there are many more reasons, but most of them are mainly economic reasons and one must say that the Canadian federation such as it was conceived by its authors did manage to fulfil the economic aspirations of the Fathers of Confederation. The confederation or the British North America Act such as it is has led Canada to its present economic development. It has allowed it beyond all hopes. Laurier's big dream was that the end of the twentieth century would belong to Canada. Already he had visions of promises out west. These promises have been fulfilled, Mr. Speaker, not only in the west but all across Canada. And now, even in the poorer provinces, we had hoped—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is unanimous consent.

Mr. Lachance: I will conclude in a few moments. In the Maritimes, which for many were poor provinces, one sees the first signs of a rapid development, specially in Newfoundland, in New Brunswick, with the tidal energy of the Bay of Fundy. Mr. Speaker, this country is full of promises. We have problems but they are not really economic problems. Let us try to put an end to our social, linguistic and cultural problems. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that federalism—and that is why I am sitting here as a member of parliament—is flexible enough to accommodate the social changes that have been taking place already for the last 110 years in Canada and helped in particular the fulfilment of Quebeckers since 1960. But we will have to go back to the mentality which prevailed in 1867 and we will have to find again what made us unite and the motives behind this union instead of looking for motives to divide. Let us therefore set aside our differences if possible, and I think that was the aim pursued by the Task Force on National Unity, and rather concentrate on what basically unites us. Then we could have true consultation, we could truly complete one another because in my view this is the answer to the current Canadian dilemma, and it cannot be achieved without first considering economic factors.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure and great enthusiasm that I rise today to dicuss this government's performance in constitutional matters. Before getting on with my remarks, I would like to thank this House for this opportunity to resume the debate opened last week on national harmony. We, of the Social Credit Party of Canada have put forward a motion which reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the federal government having taken advantage of the weaknesses of the British North America Act (BNA Act) to infringe on provincial jurisdictions and undermine the sovereignty of the provinces, has failed:

—to leave the initiative of constitutional negotiations to the provinces, in accordance with the spirit of confederation, by giving them the final say in the decision-making process;

—to discuss the introduction of economic rights for all citizens in a new constitution;

—as well as to recognize that new constitutional arrangements may be ratified only by the population of the provinces through referendums held in the respective provinces.

I do not agree entirely with what the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) just said, namely that he does not understand the motion; he may not understand some paragraphs but generally speaking, after hearing his speech I think he agreed that there should be discussion to improve the new constitution we all want, including the English provinces, I think. It is certainly a great progress because, like everybody, I followed the latest conference held in Ottawa, and I think considerable progress was made towards consensus. I would not say towards unity because some people there, and I mean some of the provincial premiers, skated outside the rink but those who wanted to stick to the subject, demonstrated at least a lot of hope for the next discussions.

What concerns me today about this question of a new direction or a new constitution is that the federal government has gone one step ahead of the provinces by saying that it would hold a referendum through Bill C-9, but that it would reject outright any decision reached by those provinces which might have their own referenda. At this point I am referring to the Quebec referendum, to the provincial legislation providing for referendums in the province of Quebec. The minister stated yesterday before the committee on justice and legal affairs that the federal referendum legislation is meant to be a reflection of the provincial referendum, that is of the Quebec legislation on referendums.

I suggest that if we want Bill C-9 to be a reflection of the Quebec referendum, then we are on the wrong track. Firstly, our referendum provides that the decision of the electors is not binding in any way on the government to act on a majority decision. This means that it is not worth holding a referendum if it is so vague that the government is not bound by the majority decision. On the other hand, the provincial referendum legislation, which I know by heart, having read it maybe ten times, provides that when the majority decides on a given question to compel the government to take action, it clearly states that the government is then bound by its own act to take action. There is a whole world of difference here. The provincial government did not leave itself much of a choice, but it has reserved the choice of the question, mark you. I totally disagree on that because the question should have been stipulated in the provincial referendum act. That is the way I believe things should have been done. I for one, had I been a member of the Quebec National Assembly, would have voted against the referendum bill because I think the question should have been included in the act, because the legislation related primarily to the people's decision on provincial independence, because when you read and understand the act the way it should be read and understood, you can see that such is its intent.

Generally, however, I think the provincial bill was more complete and more specific than Bill C-9 now before the House. First of all, the federal-provincial constitutional conference of prime ministers has just been held. Generally speaking, the main matters in dispute remain unsolved because nobody wants to yield. It is certainly not easy to come out of a hundred-year deadlock between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians, Mr. Speaker. Many have come up against a blank wall. I am thinking more particularly of men like Maxime Raymond, Jean-François Pouliot, Lionel Groulx and Chaloult.

All these people wanted nothing more than equality for Quebec. I would like to quote now a few sentences by Lionel Groulx which I read this morning and which show what it all means. Lionel Groulx said about French-Canadians and about the province of Quebec:

We do not want to take anything from anyone. However, we do not intend anything to be taken away from us either. We are not preventing anyone from living their own life, but we also want to live our own.

Everyone was enthusiastic when they read these fine words, but nothing much has happened since. Canon Groulx died at the age of 87, 88 or 89. He had been fighting since the age of 26, 27 or 28 for the equality of Quebec with the rest of the Canadian provinces, but not very successfully because he died before this equality that every one of us wants could be achieved.

I believe that we must now discuss the means of achieving national harmony, and it is precisely in expressing and recognizing the linguistic, religious, ethnic and cultural mosaic of the whole Canadian people.

Later on, the House of Commons should report or amend the referendum legislation, which has now been referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs, in order to expand and clarify it. In its present form, this legislation bothers our minorities, especially in Quebec and certain other provinces.

One of my colleagues described today quite eloquently the tendency of the federal government in the last 15 years to interfere increasingly with matters of provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, in all federal-provincial relations during this period, the central government has kept interfering in provincial affairs. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) referred to the circumstances which led him to defend provincial interests at the federal level during his 17 years in the House of Commons. As he said so well, the federal government has consistently taken over the taxation fields which are the most profitable. It has gotten directly involved in financing education and taken the initiative to implement our first health insurance plan while knowing, of course, that the provinces did not have the financial means to make the first steps in this field. To my mind, that is outdated and the government should have withdrawn from those fields long ago.

In the past, a federal government had succeeded in monopolizing the field of direct taxation during the Second World War. Direct taxation was then the main source of revenue for the provinces who had gradually, come to rely on it. The constitution had provided them with the power of taxation at the time of the negotiations in 1867, this was the least important source of government revenue.

So, the federal government took advantage of a difficult situation to rob the provinces of their only important source of income. Having grabbed those taxation powers for itself, the federal government proceeded to use its dominant financial position to infringe upon some fields previously under provincial jurisdiction. Those encroachments account to a great extent, for the present constitutional crisis and now we can see a dynamic move from provincial governments to repatriate within their jurisdictions those administrative powers that the central government took away from them in 1867.

This brief review of federal government action leaves me to discuss a new legislation which seems intended to make the tense relations between Canada and Quebec even worse. According to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, Bill C-9 respecting the public referendum on questions relating to constitutional matters should allow all Canadians to participate in the renewal process of the Canadian pact.

I think it is true, as the minister told us when he introduced Bill C-9, that the provinces will get involved in the referendum as well as Canadians in every province, and that after such a federal referendum there will be a certain measure of justice.

By the way, I would like to tell you about an incident that occurred yesterday. I know that the minister is probably not fully responsible, but a small mistake was made. And I want to say that sometimes English comes more naturally. In the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, yesterday morning, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations made a statement in English. A member of the House, a Conservative member, asked if he had French copies of it. Quite honestly, the minister told him: I have no French copy, only English copies. So we adjourned the meeting since we did not have French copies. We realize that it is considered normal procedure to always work in English, and for the last eight years the government has shown an extraordinary openness as regards bilingualism in Canada. This has been going on for eight years!

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but you know as well as I do that Mr. Speaker took the matter under advisement until the minister had the opportunity of answering a question of privilege that would have been raised by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). I am sure that the hon. member might prefer to take part in this debate on the question of privilege when the minister is in the House and is able to answer.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, and there was no malice intended, but I merely wanted to show how hard it is to change 100-year old habits.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the remarks of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations when he said that only the province of Quebec guarantees under a provincial act equal treatment to its minority. Why is it that the other provinces have not done likewise? It is only natural for them, that is why. I do not want to irritate or upset anybody but it is a fact that for them, of course, English comes first, and then we get the translations. I wish to congratulate my English-speaking colleagues who are helping us get equal rights for the French language, those who have helped us in the past in this House and who are helping us in committee in order to have the right to speak in French.

For a long time, Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit Party of Canada has been asking for the holding of referendums in order to seek the opinion of the Canadian people on major issues of special concern to individuals. We have asked several times, for instance, for a referendum on capital punishment. All our requests to that effect have been flatly turned down in the past by the government. We have also shown initiative on constitutional matters by proposing a negotiation formula likely to foster understanding and public input. We have proposed the implementation of the required mechanism for the drafting of a Canadian constitution in the following order: first, every province would allow its population to express its opinion on the subject and would draft a master project stemming from this public expression of opinion which would then be submitted for public approval through a referendum. I am still talking about interprovincial relations. With a clear mandate, the provinces would then initiate interprovincial negotiations and submit the joint project for public approval a second time through a referendum. The federal government should stay completely out of these public consultations while reserving the right to discuss the final decision. At this stage, I would like to point out that if every time there is a provincial referendum, the federal government holds its own national referendum, we will then end up with a stalemate and nobody will ever make anything out of it.

Mr. Speaker, the federal legislation on referenda disregards provincial rights. This is mainly due to the fact that the government wants to get working tools similar to those of the province of Quebec with a view to ultimately thwarting the objectives of the Quebec government. The referendum would become the ideal instrument for federal intervention, enabling the government to impose its views to the provinces through the electorate. This policy would simply contest the sovereignty of the provinces. And yet the Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity in its report tabled in the House last week recognizes that a confederation would represent, and I quote:

—an association in which sovereign states are joined together by a pact or treaty of international law, or a constitution, in which they delegate specific limited authority, especially in matters of foreign affairs (defence and diplomacy), to a central agency.

According to the definition given by dictionaries, this means a union between sovereign provinces. Today one is not even allowed to talk about sovereignty and to say that provinces can be sovereign, without being labelled a separatist because from what I understand, and I said so earlier and again I repeat, that when one quietly belongs to a majority, why bother to recognize a minority, why bother to recognize its rights? Again, why recognize the rights of a minority?

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is up to the citizens of the province involved to chart their constitutional future. Right now Quebec is the only province which has a law on referenda and it alone should decide its future. The residents of the other Canadian provinces should not be called upon to decide whether Quebec should stay within confederation. Of course they can try to convince Quebeckers to remain within confederation, but it is up to them to negotiate the conditions of participation for each and every province within this union so that every Canadian may feel that he can develop freely, and is given the same opportunities. So the federal government has no right to force the provinces to accept its own views on what Canada should be, especially through the technicalities of a referendum which might deny citizens—as I said before—a free political choice which they might have made with an overwhelming majority.

Counteracting the threat of a referendum by another referendum will certainly not enhance the quality of the debate on the constitution, obvious as it is that Canada would never allow the province of Quebec to sever its constitutional links with the rest of the country on the outcome of a referendum. Judging from all the speeches of hon. members, it is obvious that the referendum is designed as a reply to a specific threat. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) made this point very clear a few days ago.

Most political parties in the House have tried to convince us through statements they have made here over the last few weeks that the referendum will stimulate popular thinking and the development of viable constitutional options. It would be very easy to hold a referendum on the issue of capital punishment. The choices would be easy enough to make and the voters would be more or less free to choose. But in a referendum to change the Canadian constitution, it would be a lot more sophisticated and very difficult to reply for some individuals.

We must therefore devise a means of consultation which would be much more sophisticated and much more careful, which could allow people not only to vote yes or no on issues explained in advance, but also to take an active part in the process of formulating the options to be negotiated. In its previous contributions to the debate on this opposition day, the Social Credit Party has suggested the use of a better method of public consultation. This method should apply first of all at the provincial level, and later on, when the provinces have agreed on the change they demand, the federal government could decide. The bill on referenda reserves—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please! I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He could continue, however, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Beaudoin: The bill on public referendums gives the federal government the right to hold such a referendum within one or several provinces or throughout Canada. This is, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, quite dangerous, because if the federal government is entitled to hold a referendum within a province, the Northwest Territories or elsewhere and since the cabinet is empowered to define the extent of the vote, it would be possible for the government to take advantage of the antagonistic interregional feelings now prevailing in this country to obtain the desired verdict.

The present wording of the legislation would enable, through devious procedures, the government to remove the right of a province to take part in a referendum if a very serious opposition was expected. This matter may be raised since there is no reference in the bill to the criteria used by the government to organize a provincial or national referendum. This is why the referendum, as a result of the reactionary haste based on the Quebec referendum formula, could become a political instrument through which the federal government could substantially distort the wishes of Canadians or Quebeckers.

One of the arguments that was most often heard in the oratory battle undertaken within the House of Commons on the referendum issue suggests that the House of Commons could always protect the public interest during the debate period reserved for members by section 3 of the bill. This section 3, Mr. Speaker, provides for 40 hours of debate, if there is no general agreement on a given referendum question. I think it has been said here by some members that these 40 hours would be enough. That would justify setting aside this matter of the referendum intended by the federal government. Those in favour of this formula were saying that there might be a consensus of the parties in this House on a given question. Here, I refer, for instance, to page 2045 of Hansard of December 12, 1978, where a member was saying, and I quote:

> If there is a particular referendum which we do not think is popular, the point is that we have the means in this House as an opposition to hold things up beyond the eight days. Indeed, if it happened that the government of the day, whether it be this government or any other, rammed through a referendum bill in the face of united opposition in the House of Commons, one does not have to guess what would happen. A referendum of that nature which did not have reasonable support and had to be rammed through would be defeated in advance. Any government would know that.

I agree on this point. But the hon. member is much too optimistic, I think, when he says that some day we might agree on a given question. We know the differences that exist between the objectives of the various parties in the House of Commons, and I believe that is a good thing, it is a beautiful mosaic, and that is what democracy is all about, but to simply suggest that we might all agree, one morning, on a given question, about which the government would like to hold a referendum, I believe that is mere wishful thinking.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I would say that the Canadian experience shows that plebiscites were never in the interest of French Canadians nor of the province of Quebec. The 1942 exercise demonstrates effectively the vulnerability of this province against the rest of Canada about problems differently affecting the French Canadian and English Canadian cultures. In 1942, the province of Quebec was vigorously opposed to the conscription for military service. The Mackenzie King Liberal government used popular consultation to squeeze himself out of a promise made during the preceding election. They held a plebiscite to stir up the sense of pride of the majority in the English-speaking provinces, knowing quite well that the opposing voice, which was concentrated in the province of Quebec, would be overwhelmed by the voice of the English-speaking Canadians living outside Quebec. That will still be a danger in the future, Mr. Speaker. I am referring to that instance, though technically speaking a plebiscite is quite different from a referendum, in order to urge hon. members and all Canadians to be cautious.

Language and cultural differences tending to polarize opinions within specific regions could considerably undermine the rights of the French-Canadian minority and persuade them to reconsider their partnership in the Canadian confederation. The implications of that federal legislation with respect to the whole Quebec community suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the rights of a linguistic minority might be ignored by the central government.

The Social Credit Party is therefore urging the people in the provinces to get involved in this constitutional debate. It is for them to decide upon the contents of a new association agreement between Canadians which would not allow the federal government to freeze, by means of spectacular statements, our constitutional institutions into their present state.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, among other benefits the motion now before us has given me the pleasure of hearing the explanations given by the Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations) (Mr. Reid) on the last conference on constitutional matters, and also on certain aspects of the report put forward by the Task Force on Canadian Unity. It has also given us an opportunity to hear the excellent analysis made by my learned colleague from Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) on the constitution and the current state of the national unity debate. I commend him for that.

This was the second or third time I had the privilege of listening to an analysis by my young colleague, and I must express my admiration for the method with which he presented his subject and his mastery of it. He deserves praise. I also received confirmation of a fact we are all aware of on this side of the House. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) supports the claim made by Mr. Pierre Bourgault that the province of Quebec and the Quebec Assembly have the power to unilaterally declare independence and withdraw from our Canadian confederation. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands refused to answer a question put by my colleague from Gloucester (Mr. Breau). This question was: "Do you agree with Mr. Bourgault that Quebec has that unilateral power?" According to the hon. member the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had suggested that a federal referendum might for instance deny a province unilateral action such as, for instance, New Brunswick proclaiming French or English the only official language. I very much regret that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands did not see fit to remain in this House to clarify her point. A good number of Canadians will not know what to think on this.

We also heard the other hon. member read his motion. I have no intention to delve into it myself, since my colleague from Lafontaine-Rosemont did so in his brilliant fashion. I submit the motion is inconsistent and unfounded and, as did my hon. colleague, I wonder who could have put such a thing together.

This motion also gave me the opportunity to hear the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) make some allegations on the referendum and other aspects of Canadian society. He started by asserting that among so many persons who have studied the difficulties and so-called inequities English-speaking Canadians are alleged to have caused French Canadians, the efforts, representations and battles some Canadians are said to have made, he mentioned Canon Lionel Groulx. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to attack the mystical Canon Groulx; however, I believe he had some responsibilities in the field of education, he should have accepted them, he should have won over my fellow countrymen and encouraged them to go into some fields that were practically unknown to French-speaking Canadians such as economics, engineering, geology and external affairs. He should have tried to convince them, especially the younger ones, to stop studying only for classical professions like law, medicine, priesthood, and look elsewhere. If that was the problem of French Canadians, I suggest it should have been pointed out, and Canon Groulx had the responsibility of selling his fellow countrymen the idea of taking up these careers. Still the hon. member for Richmond recognizes that the conference held in the last few days was a great step forward. Naturally there are so many differences of opinions, Mr. Speaker, that it would be illusory to think the minds will meet overnight and the heads of every province, jealous of the powers they received from their electors, will readily give up some of these powers in order to promote Canadian unity.

It is also an illusion to think that the leaders, those in charge of the federal administration, are also prepared to give up some of the powers which belong to the government of Canada. Therefore, this is why, and this is nevertheless an interesting evolution, Mr. Speaker, which gives us some hope, in the interest of the Canadian people as a whole, those in power, the leaders of that province will accept certain changes and mutations.

I come back to the point made by my colleague, the hon. member for Richmond, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members, with regard to the population of the provinces. In fact they should talk about the population of the country because in fact the people in Quebec are Canadian people, as they are in the city of Montreal. Therefore they are somewhat distorting the picture of our Canadian society when they talk about the population of the provinces. The population of the provinces is the population of the country. I might take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to remind my colleagues, and particularly my colleagues in the Social Credit Party, of our responsibility as hon. members in the House of Commons. I think that the mover and the hon. member who spoke next are not aware of that. In my opinion, the function of a member of the House of Commons is, in the first place, to look after the federal interests of his fellow citizens. Just as provincial members have the exclusive responsibility and obligation to look after the provincial interests of their voters. The same goes for members of a city council or of a school board. And each of us, Mr. Speaker, may rightfully pretend to represent, speak on behalf of, take action and adopt measures in the best interests, of the people we represent.

I do not quite understand, Mr. Speaker, why the Social Credit Party members will criticize the federal government's position and power. What I do undertand clearly though is how passionately the Progressive Conservative party is bent on decentralizing and weakening the central power, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has shown it. Mr. Speaker, we must see behind this an obvious scheme. Let us imagine for one moment that the central government is in a weak position, as some Conservative members would like to see it. It means that the whole equalization system would tumble down.

Of course, that is what the rich provinces could do, they would see advantages in not having to share their wealth with the have-not provinces. So as far as equalization payments are concerned, I want to warn the people in eastern Canada especially, including the people of Quebec, against falling into the trap laid by some Progressive Conservative members who are trying to convince and win people, and especially certain provinces, to move towards decentralization, which means the erosion or dilution of the central power and eventually the elimination of the equalization payment program which will result in low income Canadians being denied services either medicare or hospitalization of the quality which we are used to.

That is why I wish to remind the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that one of the Confederation's advantages is to make available to all Canadians, from all parts of the country, the same health hospital care, and educational standards and equal opportunity for post-secondary, under graduate and post-graduate education.

As I have already indicated, Mr. Speaker, let us remember the equalization programs and, all the programs through which the federal government is helping the have-not provinces, this would jeopardize them. Another hypothesis that could be considered is the one I am proposing: What would have happened to consumers in eastern Canada, east of the Ottawa river, if the oil price compensation program could not have been implemented because of a rift in the central power!

The federal government managed to convince the government of Alberta to share with Canadians in the less fortunate provinces the surtax Americans were and still are being charged, which made it possible for Canadians in all provinces to pay the same price, for oil much below the international price. In the province of Quebec, premium gas sells for $1 a gallon, while in all western industrialized countries, and even Japan, it costs twice that price and even more.

The implementation of this oil price compensation program would have been absolutely impossible for Eastern Canadians had it not been for a central power which is exercized by the government of Canada and allows the redistribution of wealth in this country. I remind the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that every Canada-Ontario, Canada-British Columbia or Canada-Quebec or Canada-New Brunswick general program was established with the help and co-operation of provincial governments. And the priority of everyone of those governments is to set their own priorities and determine which program they want to promote.

So those are examples of the way the confederation of Canada works now. Although it is 112 or 113 years old, it works very well even if a large number of Canadians like to disparage the constitution, the central government and their country. Around the world how many people are thinking of leaving their country to make a new life for themselves elsewhere. Canada is the favorite choice of those who want to leave their country. And imagine those people, those Europeans and even the people of Africa and elsewhere who want to come to Canada, reading in the papers and hearing those unfounded criticisms about our country—it is really unfair for a country like ours which offers so much.

And the climate of federalOK-provincial relations is also often decried. I ask my colleagues, in particular those from the province of Quebec to consider the kind of climate now prevailing in the relations between the provincial and the municipal governments, and between the provincial government and the Quebec school boards. They will see that the present government of the province of Quebec does not even bother to consult anyone in its handling of public affairs and imposes its own views at provincial-municipal meetings while the municipalities cannot make their voices heard or suggest ways to best serve the public interest. The party now in power in the province of Quebec must really be weak, Mr. Speaker, if it so readily abandons responsibility for protecting provincial rights to the Social Credit Party, and in the light of the arguments raised by those members, it seems to me that they do not have good counsels and that their cause is in bad hands.

I would like to go back to the arguments and remarks by the honorable member for Kingston and the Islands to the effect that the powers that are being held and used by the Canadian government date back, for the most part, to the years 1939, 1945, and 1946, that is the war years.

So, since she referred to that period in Canadian history, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind all Canadians that if they really look at what took place in Canada, the national economy had developed during those years while the central authority had grown and could take action or decisions without having to go through the process of consultation which can be quite lengthy and which prevents in reality the quick implementation of any change in the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, certain people, including the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), took the liberty of quoting from the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, the Pepin-Robarts commission. Of course, each one of us has a tendency to refer mostly to those things in the report with which he agrees. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I have certain doubts about this consultative process and this report, and this is the first opportunity that I have had to express my views publicly. To me, this report does not give a true picture of the Canadian reality because when such a group travels throughout a country, whether it be in Canada or elsewhere, to hear comments or criticisms about the direction that should be given to the country, it hears only extremist opinions. The middle-of-the-road views that are held by the majority of the people have not been heard, and the report reflects quite well, and quite faithfully in fact, the representations of the various movements heard by the Task Force. This is why, Mr. Speaker, we must take into account this weakness in the consultation process and realize that this can only give a caricature with extremist overtones and can falsify the image of the social climate of the country.

Aside from the activities of the Pepin-Robarts commission, Mr. Speaker, all of us in the Canadian parliament have the opportunity to travel throughout the country. For my part, I have had this opportunity since I was 18, or since 1940 or 1941 when I joined the Canadian Air Force, and I was able to meet Canadians of all ages, in every walk of life and in all the regions of the country. The situation and the conditions described in this report have been exaggerated, in my opinion. We could give numerous examples to prove the excellent relationship between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians.

I am in an excellent position to talk about it because I lived in several parts of the country when I was young, and I had the opportunity to see how Canadians in all parts of the country like Canadians from any social and ethnic group, and certainly, of course, French-speaking Canadians. That is why I view this report with reservations, Mr. Speaker, and I think, of course, that such an inquiry was not an exercise in futility, that it is an excellent way to know the extreme positions of our fellow citizens. However, I think it should not be considered as the absolute or exact truth on the situation of the Canadian mosaic.

Mr. Wm. Andres (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to take part in this debate. My intervention will not be lengthy. The motion before us appears to imply that the British North America Act has allowed the federal government to infringe on provincial jurisdiction and that the federal power should be decentralized to the extent that the initiative in constitutional negotiations would be left to the provinces. I cannot believe this is really the intent of the motion because who knows what can happen once we start tearing the country apart. We hear much of this outside the House but I could not believe initiatives would be taken within the House to fragment this country and to break up a strong central government.

The constitution is a flexible document, which is both advantageous and necessary. It also has, however, disadvantages for a country of this size and of this diversity. This country is made up of people from all parts of the globe. They have various needs and aspirations. The British North America Act and a strong central government have served this country well for over 100 years. Certainly changes are needed from time to time, and changes have been made to reflect the needs of people in various regions and provinces.

The constitution is more than just a written document. It involves a set of relationships between governments and between the federal government and its people. Over the past 111 years this country has grown and developed. In 1867 our constitution provided a centralized structure, but since then there has been a gradual erosion of federal power as that became desirable and necessary to the various provinces.

The pendulum has swung back and forth. The federal government has taken power to itself when required in the interest of national security, for example, during the Second World War. However, never has the central government abused its power.

Mr. Whittaker: Oh!

Mr. Andres: The power of the central government is in the hands of the Canadian people. The purpose of the central government is to serve the needs of the people. We will soon be going again to the people to seek their support and their decision. We will be wanting to know what their requirements are and what mandate there will be for governing the people of Canada. We will want to know their wishes regarding future generations and the future of this country.

• (1640)

The process of change is unpredictable. Flexibility is necessary to cope with unforeseen circumstances. This government has always reacted to circumstances in a flexible and open manner. In a country as large as Canada which has a scattered population there is always a tendency toward provincial and local adherences, and rightly so. Communities adhere. This is what has built this country and made it strong, but that happened under the large umbrella of the federal system. There is, therefore, a greater need for a strong central voice, a strong national voice, and this is what has kept this country together. This is what built this country, and to suggest now that there should be an erosion of this strength or a fracturing of this umbrella is beyond my comprehension. I cannot understand those in this chamber who would support that kind of move.

Canada is a land of diversity. There are various and conflicting interests, and the British North America Act embodies the hopes and aspirations of a growing country. Immigrants have come to this country in search of adventure, a home and peace. All of the aspirations of these people have been translated into the growth of this great country. This country has provided a home for people from all corners of the globe. This country is flexible enough to meet the aspirations of all people, no matter whether they be in the east, in the west, or in central Canada. The hopes and aspirations of all have been met. None have been disappointed except those whom some politicians would lead around by the nose telling them how bad things are.

This country has everything one would require. Many people want to come to this country. Because we can take in only so many at a time in order not to dilute the aspirations of the people, unfortunately certain restrictions have been put in place under our Immigration Act. I am pleased that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is here this afternoon. He recognizes people's needs. He knows what this country has to offer and how many people can be accommodated at any one time. However, the Minister of Employment and Immigration recognizes the needs of people who find themselves in frustrating straits.

We have a refugee program and, as the son of a refugee who came to Canada many years ago and found a home here, I am proud to be standing in this House. This country has meant much to my family and to my children. That is why I support the minister and his refugee program. Canada has always been open to people who are needy, people who are persecuted, and people who are looking for a home and adventure.

Without a strong national voice there would be no co-ordination between the various regions. We need a strong national voice.

When the British North America Act was brought in 111 years ago it was visionary in its approach. It recognized the needs of the people, and it has served the people well for over 100 years. There have been changes, and changes are now required again because hopes, aspirations, and needs change. This act is flexible enough to accommodate all people who have come to this country and made it their home.

The constitution requires updating. Consequently we have before us a bill to strengthen this country, to reflect the needs of the regions and to serve the citizens of Canada. Constitutional amendments affect all Canadians, and I was very pleased to be able to take part in the debate just recently on the referendum bill which is before this House. From time to time dangers lurk. The unity of this country is in danger. Some want to fracture this great country, and I am pleased that we have a referendum bill before us so that we can consult the people and seek their advice on what they want for the future of this country by way of laws which will govern it.

Constitutional amendments should not be to the disadvantage of any one region. This was alluded to by a member of the Social Credit party previously. At no time in the history of this country have the provisions of the constitution been intended to disadvantage any group of people or any region. The intention has always been to provide equal opportunity in all parts of the country. Indeed, we have always been fair in what we have tried to do through regional disparity programs to assist those parts of the country which have been in more need than others.

I am pleased to have been able to take a small part in this discussion this afternoon.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak on this motion. In fact, I had no intention of doing so, and I see that it is 4:49 p.m. by the clock, but I wish to take this opportunity since no other member of the opposition wants to.

In fact, considering the number of members who took part in this debate and the concepts that were analyzed and put forward by the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada as well as by some members of the Liberal party, one finds that those concepts were very well documented. Unfortunately, except for one intervention from the Progressive Conservative party, from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), I do not think that anyone from the New Democratic Party dealt with that issue. There was no real constructive input.

I feel this is a very good indication of the interest shown by the Progressive Conservative party, the official opposition party, in the constitutional issue. I am not surprised that they did not participate in this debate because the Progressive Conservatives have had some trouble to grasp the constitutional concept of our country as a direct result of their ignorance of what Canada really is.

This is unfortunate because when you come to a national crossroad, when you consider issues that are essential to the survival and the very existence of our country, you find that the official opposition party does not have the time to deal with those basic issues and to make its position known. We listened to the comments of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, but she spoke on her own behalf and did not state the position of her leader or her party. Besides, the points she made were not too clear. Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of representing a Francophone minority outside the province of Quebec.

My interest in constitutional matters goes back a long way, ever since my early childhood. I received my schooling in the Ontario French educational system which as you know, Mr. Speaker, since you were a graduate of those institutions, did not enjoy the benefits available to the Ontario or even Quebec English-speaking students.

I learned to survive as a French-Canadian outside the province of Quebec. To understand exactly what was my status as a Canadian, I had to be aware of the constitutional rights and guarantees provided in our constitution. It is obvious that some members opposite did not have that opportunity, because for them the constitution is merely a document. That is not the way to live. But for you and me, Mr. Speaker, the constitution was not only a document, it was a guarantee for us, French-speaking Canadians living in an English-speaking province. That is why we have given it a lot a thought and that I still look into it carefully, because all these constitutional amendments will greatly affect the guarantees of the French-speaking minorities living outside Quebec, as well as those of the English-speaking minority living inside Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, let us not make the mistake of thinking that these questions are incidental. On the contrary, they are very basic. The question of linguistic minority rights was of paramount importance to our predecessors, the Fathers of Confederation, and they entrenched these guarantees in section 93 and 133 of the BNA Act. What has happened, in fact, is that we have progressed. In those days, Canada was made up of only four provinces, while it is made up today of ten provinces which cover more than 3,200 kilometers from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

As a French-speaking Canadian, I want to see entrenched in the constitution the recognition of what I am, of what a French-speaking or English-speaking Canadian is. I should like the confidence felt by my forebears when they left the province of Quebec to move to Ontario, when they left Quebec as French-speaking Canadians to become part of Ontario and go on living there as French-speaking Canadians, I should like that confidence, which was based on the guarantees in the British North America Act, to also be that of my descendants who may want to move to Alberta or British Columbia; I should like them to have that same opportunity, of living there the way I live in Ontario as a Francophone. That is why the matter of the protection of the rights of the minorities is fundamental to our constitutional discussions.

I simply want to repeat that I cannot perceive the survival of our country if the constitution of the future does not guarantee the protection of the rights of the linguistic minorities, and that guarantee should not be left to the provinces; it must be entrenched in the constitution by requiring the provinces, by constitutional decree, to protect the linguistic rights of the minorities. That being so, another issue also becomes very fundamental as it relates to our attitudes towards linguistic minorities. I mean decentralization. Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned that some would have us believe that Canada must suffer even further decentralization.

• (1650)

It was quite accurate when speakers on the government side indicated that the initial British North America Act was a centralizing document. When one reads the text of the British North America Act, it becomes quite evident that the central government was going to be the paramount power. Under section 91 the residual power was left in the central government. There was a declaratory power which was left in the central government. There was le droit de désaveu, the power to disallow provincial laws, left in the central government. It was the governor in council, in the right of Canada, who was empowered to appoint lieutenant governors. Indeed, it was the governor in council who appointed all superior court judges. It becomes quite evident that it was a centralizing government.

If one looks at the constitutional cases, right up until 1896 there was even a greater centralizing interpretation given to our constitution. In 1896 there was a reversal, and we tended toward greater and greater decentralization when the privy council in Great Britain started identifying the needs of Canada as being those of regions and trying to distribute more and more of the powers to the regions. There is a coincidence in terms of that tendency toward decentralization and the question of the Manitoba school matter. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is present in the chamber. He will not recall first-hand the Laurier episode in 1896 which brought the Liberal government to power.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, I was not here then.

Mr. Blais: No, the hon. member was not here. In effect, it brought about a reduction in minority language rights in the province of Manitoba. If one reads any history books, one will see that at that time the country was in danger again of disaggregation because of minority language rights. As a matter of fact, if I recall correctly, the Tory government of the day was defeated because it had a bill on the order paper which would have disallowed the 1890 act reducing the rights of Francophones in the province of Manitoba. At that time there seems to have been a tendency toward greater decentralization. There was a tendency to afford to the provinces the rights relating to property, civil rights—

HOCKEY—REQUEST THAT DIFFERENCES CONCERNING CANADA CUP BE RESOLVED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that internal bickering by Hockey Canada and the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association has caused postponement of the scheduled Canada Cup series this fall, and because this announcement comes on the heels of the impressive Soviet victory over the NHL, thereby creating a somewhat non-sportsmanlike impression around the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House not only compliment the Soviets for their brilliant Challenge Cup Victory, but instruct the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) to take all necessary action in resolving the differences between the two hockey bodies which fall within her jurisdiction, namely, Hockey Canada and the CAHA, in order to give Canadians the opportunity to recreate the emotional and unifying Canada Cup series of the past, as scheduled.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The congratulatory part being secondary, as it is, I will ask whether there is unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRANTS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF AMATEUR HOCKEY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to make a similar motion under the same subject.

In view of the results of last night's hockey game in New York between the Soviet national team and the NHL All-Stars, and in view of the government's offer to squander some $18 million on privately-owned professional hockey teams, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That this $18 million give-away be withdrawn and be replaced with additional funding for genuine amateur hockey coaching which would include a close study of the Soviet and European hockey programs; and, further, that a special award be given to Mr. Roger Doucette for winning the battle of the national anthems.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS BY VARIOUS MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which warned that the loss of Quebec would spell the loss of Canada, and considering the contradictory nature of those statements when compared to recent remarks by the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) whose comments suggested that if a strong majority of Quebeckers voted for separation, the Liberals would have no choice but to let Quebec go, which again appear diametrically opposed to remarks by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) who said that the government would not negotiate sovereignty association, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House direct the government to clarify these contradictory statements by various ministers which breed uncertainty and lend legitimacy to the separatist cause in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

In view of the announcement by Statistics Canada that they will no longer publish the wholesale price index, which is the leading indicator of the cost of living trends in the Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemns the federal government for blatantly attempting to cover up any embarrassing figures reflecting its failures to deal with inflationary trends prior to the federal election, and calls on the government to reinstate this very important survey.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED DEMOLITION OF BUILDINGS AT FORT CHURCHILL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing importance.

In view of the fact that the Department of Public Works are planning a further demolition of sound, usable buildings at Fort Churchill, and in view of the fact that over $1 million has been spent on the demolition of usable buildings at Fort Churchill over the past three years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the government cancel plans to demolish the remaining buildings at Fort Churchill, and that these buildings be turned over to the local government district of Churchill for their future use.

LEGAL ACTION BY MINISTER AGAINST SOUTHSTAR PUBLISHERS LTD.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of legal action taken by the Minister of Transport in 1977 against Southstar Publishers Ltd. concerning a feature article on him in the Canadian Magazine, which article was not read in Saskatchewan because the minister threatened the Regina Leader-Post and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, who did not carry the offending magazine, and the obvious threat to freedom of information this action involved, I move, seconded by the member of parliament for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the minister explain on motions why he has not proceeded to trial with the action, despite filing of the defence in February, 1978, a year ago, and explain further how any article could have lowered any further his reputation in the estimation of right thinking people.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CALL FOR BOARD TO HAVE SOLE JURISDICTION OVER FEED GRAINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a motion under Standing Order 43 concerning the same minister, but it has nothing to do with bluffs; it has to do with policy.

In view of the fact that right now the Canadian Wheat Board is obtaining for farmers 58.5 cents per bushel more for barley, and 65 cents per bushel more for feed wheat, than the private enterprise open market, and in view of the fact that if all domestic feed grains had been handled by the board during the first four months of this crop year, $60 million more would have been put into the pockets of prairie farmers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, who took feed grain marketing away from the board, return feed grains to the sole jurisdiction of the Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROVISION OF HOPPER CARS FOR ACCELERATED MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board has calculated that another 10,000 grain hopper cars will be required for the delivery of western grain by 1985, and in view of the fact that previous contracts for the manufacture of hopper cars have gone overwhelmingly to firms located in central and eastern Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the CNR repair yards in Transcona, Manitoba, be upgraded to enable the manufacture of at least some of these required hopper cars, in the interest of creating linkages to the grain industry on the prairies where the grain is grown.

PROPOSAL THAT BANK OF CANADA BE AUTHORIZED TO LEND MONEY TO PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an extremely urgent motion of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Government of Canada has obtained from a syndicate of American and European banks a credit margin of $3.5 billion whose security is based on the productive capacity of Canadians and considering that such financing operations in the public sector make our debt heavier from year to year, something which cannot go on without dangerously affecting our national economy and prosperity and jeopardizing the survival of generations for whom we are now sacrificing ourselves, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That, as a solution to that serious problem, the Minister of Finance introduce in the House a bill aimed at amending the Bank of Canada Act to enable it to grant long-term loans to federal and provincial governments, such loans being based on the real credit of the country, as is the case for the security of loans granted by chartered banks in Canada and by foreign banks, but whose excessive interest rate is burdening the country for generations to come and compelling Canadians to reimburse $5 in capital and interest for each $1 borrowed, and that those loans be granted at a rate equivalent to administration costs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

URBAN AFFAIRS

FEASIBILITY OF EXPORTING PREFABRICATED SHELTERS

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs whether any studies have been done on the feasibility of assisting underdeveloped countries through the export of prefab shelters, particularly in light of our Habitat experience and the Habitat desk at MUSA following our international commitments at Habitat.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a series of studies have been made in relation to Habitat. I will have to check to find out if there is a specific one on this subject. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this conference took place some years ago, the preparatory work for it is now about five or six years old, so I will have to refresh my memory on this matter.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that under the conflict of interest guidelines affecting public servants, it is also obligatory to take great care to avoid the appearance of conflict of interest.

Would the minister give an assurance to this House that Mr. William Teron, in his dual capacity as chairman of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and as president of an international prefab company, will not be given preferential treatment by his ministry?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Speaker, indeed. The guidelines are there, and we will make sure they are obeyed.

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in a recent paper there was a statement made by Mr. Lorenz Schmidt, the assistant secretary to the minister, who said:

I'd hate to see an audit on all things ordered by cabinet.

In view of the alarming reports of millions of dollars being wasted, lost or stolen, is the minister prepared now to make an immediate reference to the standing committee to investigate these reports, or to call in the Auditor General?

COMPENSATION FOR FAULTY WORKMANSHIP UNDER AHOP

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs with respect to some of his domestic responsibilities.

Earlier in this House, under repeated questioning with respect to faulty inspections and the use of inadequate building materials in AHOP projects—specifically under the AHOP project at Virginia Park in St. John's—the minister said many times that CMHC is only responsible for inspections to ensure construction process for mortgage purposes. Yet, according to a confidential document prepared for the minister and CMHC, this statement is made:

> Provision of insurance entails appraisal and inspection of units and this served to provide a kind of guarantee to purchasers on the quality and workmanship of these units.

I ask the minister if this assurance to the purchasers on quality and workmanship with respect to AHOP units applies to the unfortunate people who bought AHOP houses in Virginia Park and now find they have depreciated in value because of deteriorating brick and inadequate inspection.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the people who live in Virginia Park, an offer has been made to them in an amount sufficient to repair deficiencies. These disbursements will be made as repairs are carried out.

The increase in the monthly payment which will eventually occur will be delayed for a number of months to make it easier for these borrowers to repay the amount. Therefore, the net increase in monthly payments will be postponed until the end of the first five-year loan. With regard to these people, a concrete offer has been made to help solve their problems.

Mr. McGrath: The minister is all heart, Mr. Speaker. These people have, rightly, declined that offer because on a house that has depreciated in value their liability would increase by increasing the mortgage. Therefore, they turned it down.

Virginia Park is merely the tip of the iceberg: we know of other faulty inspections and faulty materials being used in AHOP projects across the country. The minister will have to face up to this sooner or later. People in Virginia Park, through their solicitor, have rightly declined this offer which would merely add to their liability.

What are the minister and the department prepared to do for the people who bought these houses through CMHC in good faith, with the assurance they had had adequate inspection? The houses have now deteriorated because of inadequate inspection and because of faulty brick. We know there is an investigation under way into allegations of pay-offs respecting CMHC inspectors. What is the minister going to do for these people. Why does he not tell us now, instead of giving us all this rhetoric?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, there are basic errors in the remarks of the hon. member, which was not a question at all. First, he stated that these houses had been bought through CMHC. That is absolutely untrue. Second, he said there has been wrongdoing by some officials of CMHC. I think he is too quick in his conclusion. The investigation is not complete. Everyone should have the opportunity of a fair trial before being condemned, and not as the hon. member is trying to imply. Third, the hon. member gives the impression that this is only the tip of the iceberg.

During the last 15 years, housing worth millions of dollars has been built under guarantee by CMHC. This program has been a success all over Canada. Because there is a small problem in one project, we should not do as the hon. member is trying to do and create the impression that these homes built with the assistance of CMHC are bad and our program should be reprehended.

STATISTICS CANADA—REINSTATEMENT OF WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the wholesale price index, which is the leading indicator of cost of living trends in the economy, published on Friday showed a 12.5 per cent increase, can the minister indicate why the government at this time, prior to a federal election, is cancelling this very important index reflecting cost of living trends in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that question concerning Statistics Canada should be directed to my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I shall inquire and give an answer to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I know Statistics Canada comes under another minister, but it is the Minister of Finance who has the greatest responsibility for what the government does about the economy. This is the second important index that is being cancelled by the government, the other being the job vacancy survey.

In view of the importance of evaluating both unemployment and price trends in the economy, why is the government cancelling these important surveys just prior to a federal election?

Mr. Chrétien: On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, a great deal of explanation has been given in this House with regard to the labour survey. We are provided with very good information by Statistics Canada. Sometimes the information makes it difficult for us, like everybody else, but we have to live with that. We do not want to hide anything; we want to discuss all aspects of the problem.

I hope that one day some members will report to the House some of the good statistics that come from Statistics Canada, such as the fact that we created 450,000 new jobs in the last 12 months.

Mr. Orlikow: The wholesale price index rose half a per cent in December and was 12.5 per cent higher than in December, 1977. Can the minister indicate what action he intends to take, in view of the fact the minister provided $1 billion in sales tax reductions in his last budget, which should have meant a decrease in the wholesale price index and not windfall gains for Canadian business?

Mr. Chrétien: I am very pleased with the question, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member is saying that the half billion dollars' tax cut was not good, I remind him that the program of the NDP recommended $2 billion.

RATE AT WHICH CANADA OBTAINED LOAN OF $3 BILLION FROM AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN BANKS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who has now become the most important minister in light of the present economic situation of Canada. Could he tell the House the rate of interest on the loan of more than $3 billion Canada has obtained from an American or European bank consortium and against what collaterals did the country obtain such a credit margin?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have obtained that $3 billion credit margin from two groups. First from a Canadian group, but in American dollars, second from international banks under the leadership of an American bank. We obtained those loans by accepting to pay a certain rate of interest to maintain that credit margin, a rate I mentioned several times in the House. I do not have it here but I could provide it to the hon. member along with the collaterals we have given to our creditors. These of course are always the same, that is to say the country itself. That is the very best guaranty we can offer. Canada's credit is excellent everywhere in the world.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The minister has just given a formidable reply, except that he forgot to mention the interest rate, and Canadians will certainly wonder whether it is 10, 9 or 8 per cent. Of course the minister need not quote interest rates from memory, but in view of the fact that at the same time the province of Quebec, through Mr. Parizeau, its finance minister, has obtained a credit margin of several hundred million dollars, could the minister indicate to the House whether this credit margin from the same banks, from the same American or European consortium, has been granted with the same guarantees which the minister has just spelled out.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the government of the province of Quebec goes to the market like all the other provincial governments, and it borrows money from bankers which are constantly offering loans to Canadian institutions based on their credit ratings; I think that the interest rates paid by the provinces and especially by Quebec are higher than that paid by the federal government; to reply to the first question, I should add that as a rule the interest rate is already set when we borrow the money and that the interest rate in the case of international loans was less than half of one per cent over the rates charged by London banks.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the question, which you recognize as such since you allow me to ask a little supplementary question, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he could tell the House, since the government of Canada gets loans based on the Canadian credit and the government of Quebec also gets loans based on Canadian credit—can he tell us earnestly, I would like an earnest answer, whether it would not be advisable for our country to use profitably our Canadian bank, the Bank of Canada, to finance our country's credit at a lower interest rate than we have to pay when we have it financed by foreign banks. Would the minister be prepared to examine seriously that suggestion with a view to introducing legislation to amend the Bank of Canada Act and allow the bank to play this role at a lesser cost than we pay to foreign banks?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is proposing the theory his party has been advocating for a long time, that it would suffice to print money for all problems to be settled across the country. We have had the opportunity to discuss it very often since 1962, and I think the system proposed by the hon. member could not work in the present circumstances. No country in the world uses its national bank for that. When money is printed that way, the direct result is a very swift increase in the inflation rate.

AGRICULTURE

ACTION TAKEN IN DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL FOOD POLICY

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and its purpose is to establish the progress or lack of progress the minister has made on developing a national food strategy or a national food policy.

About a year ago, the Minister of Agriculture and his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, left at least the impression that great achievements and great accomplishments would be made toward the development of a national food policy. Since that time there appears to have been little, if any, progress. What action, if any, has been taken toward the development of such a strategy or policy which would encourage the growth and development of Canadian production, Canadian processing and Canadian distribution?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the hon. member's question because the question period does not give me the time I would need to deal properly with this question. I could cite to the hon. member about five pages of action we have taken as a result of what the food strategy conference said we should do. I believe that over half the requests made by those at the strategy conference have been put into action.

If the hon. member wants me to do so, I can have my office bring the five pages to me so that I can read them to him; or I could send them to him.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, I would be satisfied if the minister would just give me one or two quick examples.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lisgar.

CHAIRMANSHIP OF NATIONAL FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Knowing the minister's opposition to anyone outside the immediate farm community playing a prominent role in farm policy decisions, was it the minister's own decision to remove Mr. Paul Babey from the chairmanship of the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to replace him by Mrs. June Menzies, formerly of the Anti-Inflation Board, and is this part of the government's over-all food strategy proposals?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, one of the things we said we would do was put people from other parts of society on the National Farm Products Marketing Council. Mrs. June Menzies is from the province of Manitoba, another part of Canada. She has knowledge both of agriculture and of the consumer sector. I had a meeting with Mrs. Menzies this morning about the program of the National Farm Products Marketing Council.

Mr. Paul Babey, the former chairman of the National Farm Products Marketing Council, has a tremendous history of service to the rural community of Canada and to our whole society. He will make a tremendous contribution in the Farm Credit Corporation which is going through a reorganization at the present time. The knowledge Mr. Babey has will not be lost; it will be helpful to the agricultural industry in Canada and all around the world.

[Mr. Wise.]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, it is widely known that a national chicken marketing agency will be announced only after changes to the National Farm Products Marketing Council. That is the reason Mrs. Menzies is there, and that is also why Mr. Babey is in a different position.

Since the changes imply incomptence on the part of the marketing officials, and certainly some failure in terms of the minister's own policies, can farmers in this country assume that until an election is called, agricultural policy will be made in the office of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and not in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes many accusations and insinuations which are not true, because the chicken broiler people themselves could not agree on how many of them should join. I am sure the hon. member is happy that Manitoba saw fit to join on about the last day before the meeting was called here. I met with all representatives when they were in Ottawa. The hon. member should also have met with them: if he had, he might understand that they are not as unhappy as he tries to imply.

I am just saying that this organization will go ahead. It will be as healthy as the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, which is one of the most successful marketing agencies in the world at this point. The cost of eggs has contributed less to the inflationary factor than the cost of nearly any other food we eat in Canada.

POSSIBILITY OF NORTH AMERICAN COMMON MARKET

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Crosbie: He is not here; he is never around.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Halton.

Mr. Philbrook: My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Recently, in the New York Times, Mr. James Reston indicated that the President of Mexico told him that he will discuss with President Carter the possibility of a North American customs union or a common market.

Considering that our three North American countries, Canada, the United States and Mexico, can help each other a great deal in terms of energy, economic development and population work, can the minister indicate whether any such discussions are going on and whether he considers this to be a good idea and a constructive approach?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any discussions going on with respect to a customs union or a common market: I think those were the phrases used by the hon. member. Nor am I aware of any discussions with respect to a common market in energy, which might be part of the reason the question was asked.

There may be an interest in some quarters in the United States, but I think Canadians would want to be very chary about getting into any discussions on that kind of proposal because it seems to me that such a proposal would perhaps be no more than a disguise for a continental energy policy of a different kind.

SOUTHERN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR STABILIZATION PAYMENT FOR WHITE BEANS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture respecting the production of white beans under irrigation in southern Alberta. White bean production there on irrigated lands is new and very promising.

In view of the fact that bean producers there are very conscious of the recent stabilization pay-out in southwestern Ontario for reasons which also exist in the west, namely, low yields, spoilage losses due to bad harvest weather, and low prices, will the minister now authorize the same stabilization pay-out to white bean producers in southern Alberta?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member brought this matter to my attention in a conversation last week. I have asked for a report from the stabilization board. I have not received a formal report, but I have received a verbal report to the effect that we have never paid on seed beans, and there have never been any formal requests about which I know. That is the information I received in a verbal report, which might be incorrect.

When I receive a written report, I will let the hon. member know; but the information I have given was the information as of this morning at about nine o'clock. I have not been able to check this matter further.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there has been a pay-out in southwestern Ontario for white navy beans. So far, a similar pay-out for the same type of beans has not been authorized for southern Alberta. Also, there has not been an authorization for other varieties such as Pintos, Great Northern, and so forth.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that there never is a pay-out unless an official request comes from a particular province or from a producer organization. I will have to find out whether an official request has been made. But I point out that it is not uncommon that payments are not made if returns from different areas meet the formula used by the stabilization board.

Just because there is a pay-out in one place does not mean that there automatically will be a pay-out in another region. We recently made payments for potatoes in the maritimes, but no payments were made for potatoes in central or western Canada. A payment was made in British Columbia because the price received by producers there was below the price set by the formula used by the stabilization board.

TRANSPORT

AUTHORITY OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD TO PURCHASE GRAIN HOPPER CARS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. As the minister is aware, the Canadian Wheat Board has purchased a number of grain hopper cars. Has he checked fully the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board to make those purchases, and can he tell us whether or not there is any limit to the number of hopper cars that could potentially be purchased under whatever system there is authority to do so?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of their authority was checked both by the board's legal advisers and by government legal advisers as related to the kind of activity involved, and obviously is not related to any specific number.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I put my next question to the same minister, in great concern for the use of farmers' money. I should like to ask him what distinction might be made between the hopper car, the freight engine that pulls it, the railway beds on which it runs, or the terminal ports to which they deliver. In other words, simply put, can the Canadian Wheat Board use all the farmers' money potentially to purchase anything it wants for the use of hauling or servicing of the grain industry?

Mr. Lang: The answer to that question is no, Mr. Speaker; and, of course, it is completely out of the context of any reality to put it, except perhaps to create worry.

The fact of the matter is that in this particular instance, when there was an argument among reasonable people about whether or not there was the right number of cars or slightly less than the right number of cars available in late 1979 and into 1980, the Wheat Board concluded it was better from the point of view of the farmer to be on the safe side in order to have cars, particularly for the three key months of June, October and November. They may save as much in demurrage charges at that time or in the ability to make spot sales in the annual cost of these cars, and that is the reasoning they employed. I am sure that they and I would want to insist in general upon the obligation of the railways to provide adequate equipment to carry the goods.

Oral Questions

PROPOSAL OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD FOR ADDITION OF 10,000 HOPPER CARS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the same subject, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, and I use the word loosely.

Since the Canadian Wheat Board has made a proposition that 10,000 new hopper cars have to be added to the grain fleet during the next six years, and the board says that unless these additions are made over and above the 2,000 cars they are purchasing with farmers' money, exports could decline by one million tons a year, which would represent a loss of over $4 billion in the western economy, and in view of the fact that the board has said that lack of railway cars is the number one problem affecting grain exports, what action does the government intend to take about this Wheat Board proposal?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member can constantly turn what is a great story of progress into a pessimistic one. What we are talking about is expanding exports by one million to 1.5 million tonnes a year from a current record level of 21 million tonnes to a level of 30 million tonnes in 1985. That is what the cars are required for.

There is, of course, room for argument about whether by that time we will need 8,000, 9,000, 10,000 or 11,000 cars. But I want the hon. member to know that I immediately responded positively to the suggestion of the Wheat Board, and indeed I will be taking up the direct suggestion of the government of Saskatchewan that we set up a ministerial task force on the subject. It looks as though the messages from the premiers of Manitoba and Alberta may be read as being positive as well, provided we broaden the subject from just the hopper cars to the whole question of dealing with the over-all grain and transportation problem.

Certainly, at the Winnipeg meeting on January 8 and 9, all the premiers saw the facts. They emerged from that meeting positive that we could do the job of carrying this grain, exporting it and selling it, and that the important thing is confidence on the part of the producers so that they will produce it. So we will get that job done, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the whole point is that the projections are for a 50 per cent increase in grain exports provided there is the capacity to move it. That is the whole point of the proposal of the Wheat Board for 10,000 more hopper cars.

Since it is not good enough for the minister to say we are doing as well as we did last year, and since the system is strained now, I should like to ask the minister whether or not he will implement the Hall commission recommendation for the Government of Canada to pay the difference between the Crowsnest or statutory grain rates and the compensatory rates, and require the railroads to purchase the rolling stock, hopper cars and locomotives, or anything else that is necessary, and save the money that he will spend on improving branch lines, save the money he is spending on branch line subsidies and on numerous other matters and require the railroads to do what section 262 of the Railway Act says he should do.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, once again I find the logic of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre to be extraordinary. He suggests we should save the money we are spending on branch lines, save the money we are spending on hopper cars by giving the railways twice as much money, according to that suggestion of the Hall commission. What kind of logic that is, I do not know. At least the hon. member should not call it saving.

The fact of the matter is that the Hall commission has left us with a very serious dilemma still in relation to all of the products made from grain, and more and more people in the prairies are realizing that the discrepancy between freight rates on grain and freight rates on products, including meat, means they are at a disadvantage from the point of view of processing in the prairies. Indeed, studies which governments in the prairies have had commissioned have demonstrated this to them, although they have kept those studies secret. They have demonstrated that the prairies are being disadvantaged by this discrepancy, hence the suggestion by Mr. McMurtry—during an election campaign, it is true—that the province of Saskatchewan will be prepared to pay part of the cost in relation to products.

That is the issue which I will want to discuss further with him. I made the point to him that it seemed to me important that we solve the problem in the same way in Manitoba and Alberta as in Saskatchewan, but I was delighted that he recognized at this point—as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has never recognized—that the whole future of processing meat and products on the prairies depends on solving the whole problem, instead of responding to simplistic cries for giving the railways more money, thereby saving the money we are now giving the railways.

CONSIDERATION GIVEN TO PLIGHT OF INDEPENDENT SAWMILL OPERATORS IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister aware of the concern expressed by the northern Ontario independent sawmill operators as a result of the plans announced by the federal and Ontario governments to give massive assistance to the pulp and paper industry? These independent operators, who employ a significant number of people and are the economic backbone of many northern Ontario communities, are fearful of being caught in a squeeze play by the big pulp and paper companies.

Can the minister assure these independents that they will continue to have a key role in the emerging new strategy for the forest products industry, and can he tell us what steps are being taken now to take into account their interests along with those of the big corporations?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the concern expressed by sawmill operators and quite few other people in forestry-related industries. I can reassure them that what we have done, and what we are prepared to do, is in line with trying to cope with the difficulties which they have expressed to us.

In fact, the agreement dealing with forestry we have just signed with the government of Ontario is directly in response to the concern expressed to us regarding the threatening short supply of wood in Ontario, particularly threatening the existence of sawmill operators as well as the whole pulp and paper industry. So both programs have been developed in response not only to the concerns expressed by the operators in Ontario but also concerns throughout Canada.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON LABOUR SITUATION AT HAMILTON, ONT.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Postmaster General. I am pleased to note that he can flip-flop, in that previously he thought the problem in Hamilton was an internal matter and on Friday he indicated he was going to seek the advice of his legal advisers, of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour, and at the same time hold an inquiry into the matter. I ask the Postmaster General whether this inquiry has taken place and what he has found out.

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I stated clearly enough in the House the other day that utmost fairness is indicated with both management and workers, and that one should not become anti-union or anti-employer because of a case like that in Hamilton or similar ones. With regard to the allegations of harassment and abuse on the part of union leaders towards their members, I think that normal procedure, and indicating a certain amount of confidence in the sense of responsibility of certain unions, would be first of all to appeal to the regional leaders, then to the national ones and if they are not happy with the answer of the national leaders, they can then go to the Canadian Labour Congress with whom they are affiliated. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason to get upset if perchance they do not get what they want either from the national leaders or the Canadian Labour Congress. As the Minister of Labour said, we can see what should be done when that time comes.

● (1450)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, no one is nervous on this side: we just want to find out whether the government is prepared to keep the commitment it made to postal workers when it introduced the back-to-work legislation.

With all the gobbledygook, the minister still has not answered my question. I asked whether he has obtained advice from the legal advisers to the Post Office, whether he has discussed this matter with the Minister of Justice, and whether in fact he has gone further and discussed the matter with the Minister of Labour and has caused an inquiry to be made. That was the position we were left with on Friday, and I would hope the minister would stand up now and answer that question.

Has he taken the initiative to determine what can be found out in this regard, in order that we may be able to see whether anything can be done so that the government can keep its word; or is the government going to leave these postal workers out to dry? That is all I am asking.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, when it was time for the government to take its responsibilities, we took them, and Bill C-8 is proof of that. When the hon. member asks me when we will take the initiative, I would ask, in respect of what? Actually, disciplinary action has not yet been taken against Hamilton letter carriers, so what is he referring to in respect of which we have to take initiative? Let the unions take their responsibilities; if they do not take them, we will see what we can do.

PENITENTIARIES

OPTIMUM NUMBER OF PERSONS TO BE HOUSED IN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. In view of his recent statement regarding penitentiary services, will the minister advise the House whether he has rejected the submission of the subcommittee on the penitentiary service that institutions housing a maximum of 200 persons would be the most efficient and desirable in future planning?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I made a statement in Kamloops, I believe in the second week of December—if the hon. gentleman is not aware of it, I will send him a copy—in which I indicated what the present policy was in terms of penitentiary construction.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, will the minister report to the House on the results of his meeting with the mayors of central and upper Fraser Valley a week ago when the announced changes as they relate to penal institutions in that area were discussed?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the hon. gentleman has drawn attention to that particular meeting. Indeed, I was in Harrison Hot Springs roughly two weeks ago and met with mayors of the Valley at that time. In addition, I had the opportunity of observing for the first time the upper Fraser Valley, and I would congratulate hon. members here from the area for having such a lovely area in which to live.

Having said that, this was a meeting not only with myself but with my officials. From the report I received during the occasion of a luncheon I had with the mayors, I understand that all the differences there might have been prior to the meeting have now been ironed out.

FISHERIES

INTERNATIONAL CONFORMITY WITH CANADA'S 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. As the minister is aware, four members of the European Economic Community who are members of ICNAF, namely, West Germany, France, Denmark and Great Britain, served notice that they would be withdrawing from ICNAF effective December 31, 1978, on the assumption that NAFO would come into force on January 1, 1979.

Will the minister assure the House that fishing in 1979 beyond the 200-mile limit is being carried out by these countries in conformity with internationally agreed regulations and, if not, are these countries conforming to any regulations and is he still licensing them to operate within our 200-mile limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check on the number of signatories to the NAFO agreement to see to what extent it is operative at the present time. I apologize to the hon. member, and I will check and give him the information.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer. While he is checking his figures on the EEC fishing activities inside as well as outside the 200-mile zone, will he also check and give the House an up to date answer on quotas that have been arranged for Norway in respect of shrimp fishing off the Labrador coast, as that is a question which is still unresolved in so far as agreements are concerned with Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland—in fact, with the entire Atlantic coast?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, Norway is one of the countries—in fact, it was the first—with which Canada signed a bilateral agreement in respect of fisheries matters. There may be Norwegian vessels involved under charter, but I will have to check the exact facts. I know Norway could be a player in the Davis Strait. This is where Canada also has some interest.

ENERGY

OIL SUPPLIES FROM MEXICO AND WESTERN CANADA TO EASTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT PLANS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of Iranian oil supplies being cut off to Canada during the last couple of months, which amounted to about 24 per cent of our supply of oil from offshore, is the government planning to provide greater supplies of oil from western Canada? I should also like to know whether negotiations for Mexican supplies of oil are going on rapidly enough for those supplies to be available to eastern Canada this summer and fall without shortages.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, Canadian supplies from western Canada have been increased recently under temporary arrangements. These Canadian supplies are displacing crude to the Chicago market; that is, crude which otherwise would have been supplied from offshore to the Chicago market. That crude is now going to eastern Canadian refineries. So, in fact, additional quantities of Canadian crude are being moved into eastern Canada through this exchange arrangement.

As to the Mexican situation, a Canadian delegation was in Mexico last week to conclude the arrangements that were negotiated by myself early in January. This delegation, composed of Canadian officials including representatives of Petro-Canada, who are dealing with the national oil company of Mexico, have reported to me that negotiations are going very well and I am optimistic that it will be possible to announce an agreement in respect of a major contract with Mexico very shortly. I would expect that supply should begin to run by the end of this year.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUDITOR GENERAL'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON FORM OF ESTIMATES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The minister will be aware of a controversy at the public accounts committee meeting of last week in respect of a question as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury Board or the Comptroller-General would be responsible for implementing the Auditor General's recommendations on the form of the estimates.

Given the commitment made by the minister's predecessor during the debate on the comptroller-general bill, that the form of the estimates would be the responsibility of the Comptroller-General, will the minister indicate why the commitment was altered between that time last year when the bill was debated, and the recent past?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the commitment, in fact, has been altered. Obviously, there are overlapping concerns here. The question of resources is very crucial as far as the form of the estimates is concerned and this is a responsibility of the Treasury Board secretariat.

As the hon. member points out, the Comptroller-General is very concerned from the point of view of financial management, and form as well. These two gentlemen are discussing the matter and I am certain it will be resolved satisfactorily.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the minister to the testimony of his predecessor before the committee on miscellaneous estimates at the time the comptroller-general bill was adopted. At that time his predecessor, while refusing to have the responsibilities of the Comptroller-General written into the act, did make certain commitments as to his responsibilities.

What assurance will the minister give us now that there will not be any further erosion of the responsibilities that the Comptroller-General must have if he is to fulfil the important job outlined in the Auditor General's report?

● (1500)

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no intention to erode or undermine the responsibilities of the Comptroller-General. I would like to state very clearly that there is an overlapping of interests in the form of the estimates as they relate to the use of resources and financial management.

Mr. Alexander: Who is boss?

Mr. Buchanan: So both the secretariat, in other words, the Secretary to the Treasury Board, and the Comptroller-General have a very vital and ongoing interest in the form of the estimates.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ANTICIPATED DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY PIPELINE—CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a question to the one asked by the chairman of the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines. I have been waiting for two weeks to address this question to the minister responsible for northern pipelines, but in his absence and in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I will direct it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Given the minister's answer to an hon. member on his side of the House with respect to energy sources, and given the positive statements which have been made recently concerning delays in the construction of the Alaska Highway pipeline, can the minister confirm that there will, in fact, be a delay reaching into 1983, 1984 and 1985 before that pipeline is on stream? If he can confirm, on behalf of the government, that there will be at least a year's delay, will he inform the House whether it is the intention of the government to effect an exchange of notes between the Government of Canada and the government of the United States in order to amend the terms of the international agreement respecting that pipeline?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's concern over the pace of events. We, too, are concerned with the regulatory difficulties south of the border. Recently, I received advice that the federal energy regulatory commission had made a finding with respect to the processing costs of Prudhoe Bay gas, and this is one of the first steps which must be settled. This deals with what the net effect will be on producers of gas produced in Alaska.

That process has not yet been completed. I am told that the finding is reviewable up to, I believe, March 9 and then there is a further period of some two weeks available for further representations.

I very much hope that it will be possible for the United States authorities to settle on this basic question of what the price will be to the producers in Alaska, but until that issue is settled and until the issue with respect to the price to the consumers is settled, there will be difficulties and delays and it will not be possible for a financing plan to be put into place.

Mr. Speaker: I was in the process of recognizing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to conclude the question period when I allowed the previous question which, quite legitimately, took a little longer than I expected. I wonder if I could ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to conclude the question period with one question.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO IMPROVE PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Last Thursday, I put a question to the deputy House leader, urging him to use his persuasive powers with the government House leader and other members of the cabinet to get time in this session for some legislation relating to veterans affairs. I was told to present my case to the minister.

Therefore, I now put my question to the minister. In view of the fact that there are three or four outstanding items, such as the 48 per cent rule as it affects widows, revising the War Veterans Allowance Act, keeping the disability pension rate in line with the composite wage in the public service, and so on, with which it would be desirable to deal before this parliament ends, will the minister do his best to bring before cabinet one or more of these issues so that parliament can deal with them in the name of our veterans before this session ends.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member has a deep interest in veterans affairs, and I certainly appreciate it. With regard to the items the hon. member has mentioned, they are all under consideration and if anything can be done within the time he has mentioned, we will be more than glad to do it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKENZIE—USE OF PICTURE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL AND FAMILY IN LIBERAL PARTY CAMPAIGN LITERATURE—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Last Friday the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) gave notice of his intention to raise by way of a question of privilege a matter dealing with the printing of a document, which he then produced in the House, to determine first of all whether or not there was a question of privilege and, secondly, whether there was some responsibility in the administration of the House of Commons for the printing of the document. The hon. member followed up by giving me the text of a proposed motion which he would move in order that I could make a finding that the matter on a preliminary basis did touch the privileges of a member. His draft motion is as follows:

> That the publication by the Liberal party of the pamphlet entitled "Parliamentary Report" be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with instructions that the said standing committee study the format and subject matter of the said pamphlet and report back to the House as to whether the said pamphlet offends the office of the Governor General according to traditional usage and custom.

According to the hon. member's remarks on Friday, matter in question appeared to be election material used by the Liberal party and containing a picture of the Governor General and his wife. In addition, the hon. member indicated that this would appear to be a blatant misuse of the office of the Governor General. The hon. member asked whether the printing of the document was done by the House of Commons facilities or whether it was authorized by me, and if not, by whom.

I can dispose immediately of the matter as a proposed question of privilege. It has been said time and time again that the law of parliamentary privilege is restrictive in nature in that it consists in the main of rights which are necessary for the execution of the powers of parliament, that privileges are enjoyed by individual members in order that members may carry on their functions in an unimpeded way. In order to constitute interference with that privilege, there has to be an obstruction of the basic ability of a member to perform those duties or, alternatively, there has to be some kind of contempt.

Whatever else it may be, it is clear to me that the production and circulation of this particular document would not appear to constitute a breach of parliamentary privilege as such.

That having been said, the hon. member also asked me to determine the authorization for the printing of the document and interesting and important questions with respect to the provision of services by the House of Commons raised by this matter, in that the production of what we refer to as householder mailings is carried on as a service of the House to its members. I think all hon. members understand that this is a service to them to be taken advantage of up to four times a year in order that the member may provide information to his constituents, constituents of all political persuasions, about the events taking place here in parliament.

Bearing in mind that the function is informational in nature, that it is for constituents of all political persuasions and that it is provided not at party expense but at public expense through the estimates of parliament, it is obvious that the document must have certain guidelines which fulfil the expectations of this kind of program. Indeed, these guidelines have been established, and I believe that most hon. members are familiar with them, although it has been some time since they have been discussed here in the House.

Perhaps it would be useful to repeat that there are restrictions with respect to the size of the document, the number of pages in each and the total number to be authorized over a fiscal year. I will not go into details, but those are some of the basic requirements set down in the guidelines available.

In general, under these criteria a householder mailing is acceptable, provided it does not include a text which (a) requests adhesion to a party, (b) invites constituents to attend national or constituency political meetings or functions, (c) requests monetary contributions, or (d) contains election campaign material including election speeches, poll activities and lists—in other words, material which is more specifically the responsibility of party or constituency headquarters.

These guidelines, which are reviewed from time to time, have been put in place after the most thorough consideration by the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services and, in general, seem to have fulfilled their purposes well. I do not need to remind hon. members that the membership of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services consists of members of all parties in the House.

There is a continuing consultation between the committee and the offices of hon. members on the one hand, the printing service on the other hand, and, of recent years, between the party research units and the printing units along the same lines. In that respect the practice of consultation between the party research units and the printing units in terms of doing something of a general nature which might be used to the advantage of an individual member or of a particular party is not an uncommon practice.

I have inspected the document referred to by the hon. member carefully. It is a proposed constituency mailing which begins with a photograph of His Excellency the Governor General and Her Excellency on the occasion of the installation of the Governor General, with a space for a photograph of the member sending the document. It is followed by a further photograph of His Excellency together with a short biographical sketch and some opinions concerning the proposed attitude to be taken by His Excellency on the question of national unity. The remainder of the proposed mailing is quite in accordance with the usual reports made by members to their constituents dealing with topics such as the federal-provincial conference, various committees of the House, the legislative proposals before parliament and so on.

I was interested to find that this is not the first occasion in which mailings by members have alluded to the office and person of the Governor General and of Her Majesty the Queen.

The question I have to determine is whether or not the proposed mailing is in contravention of the guidelines as they exist at the present time. In my opinion, it is not. By definition, parliament is composed of the Governor General, the Senate and the House of Commons, and it would seem to me therefore that the publication is in essence parliamentary in nature. It seems to me, on inquiry, that the official in the printing unit who did not feel that the proposed publication contravened the established guidelines which would have resulted in his bringing the document to the attention of his superiors was acting within the guidelines as he understood them, and as I understand them.

As I have previously said, these guidelines, which have been most helpful to hon. members, are in existence as a result of careful consultation with the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services. The committee may, in its wisdom, wish to consider the guidelines again and be more restrictive, if that is their desire; but for the time being I must tell the hon. member that, according to the criteria now in force, the mailing is acceptable.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, not for a moment questioning the Chair's ruling that has just been given but merely to express my disappointment that you, sir, did not invite submissions on the question raised by the hon. member. It is, in my submission, a long standing custom of the Chair to hear submissions on the question whether or not there exists a substantive question of privilege for the Chair to rule upon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously, I do not want to prolong this, but I did indicate to the hon. member on Friday when he raised the point that I did not, in a preliminary way, see any way in which it came within the privileges of the House. I did undertake to look at it, however, and see if it did. I thought in the circumstances that there would be no point in indicating that I did see some way in which this appeared to come within privilege.

There may be other arguments about the content of the document and whether it conforms to the guidelines in the way that I have said, but I cannot see that it constitutes, even in a very basic sense, a question of privilege. I thought I ought to set that argument aside right away.

I put the other remarks on the record in terms of the printing of the document because it and other matters have come up from time to time about, perhaps, taste, quality and things of that sort. I think it falls squarely within the ambit of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services and the guidelines as we know them. I could not in any way pretend that it constituted a question of privilege.

MR. McGRATH—CMHC OFFICIALS—ALLEGATIONS OF WRONG-DOING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry that the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is not in the House because my point of order relates to his reply to my question, or what appeared to be a reply, although in fact he evaded my question. In replying he accused me of making accusations that there was wrongdoing on the part of officials of CMHC.

I have since checked the record, Mr. Speaker. I did not accuse anybody of wrongdoing; rather, I referred to the serious allegations of wrongdoing. The minister is supposed to be a lawyer and he knows the difference. I am sure that upon reflection he would probably want to correct the record.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will check the record myself. The hon. member said he checked it. If indeed it has to be corrected, I will correct it gladly.

MR. DIEFENBAKER—USE OF PICTURE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL AND FAMILY IN LIBERAL PARTY COMPAIGN LITERATURE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of your decision today, and in no way challenging it in so far as it went, I am very deeply concerned about this whole question.

I speak as one who has been here a long while. I have never brought up a matter like this before. I am the only living Canadian member of Her Majesty's Privy Council. The last was the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson. During his period of office he brought about a change whereby thereafter there would be no such award available to Canadians—he had already secured it—and that the title "right honourable" would apply to all prime ministers, the Chief Justice of Canada and the Governor General.

It is not with regard to the matters your Honour has dealt with that I wish to speak. This document is a shocking example of endeavouring to place the Governor General of Canada in a position of being—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They know they are wrong and that is why they are starting to groan. It is music to the gambler's ear to hear the suckers roar!

Since 1867 there has never been another example—and I have looked through the records—in which the governor general has been placed in the invidious position that he will be as a result of this document. It is entitled "Parliamentary Report", as your Honour said, and has a photograph of the Governor General and his lady on the front page. On the next page it reads as follows:

Dear Constituents:

Canada's new Governor General has announced that his first official action will be a tour across Canada to discuss national unity.

We Liberals applaud his decision. Unity is, of course, a pressing national concern. More importantly, though, we like his way of tackling the problem: by asking average Canadians what they think.

The Governor General is the representative of Her Majesty the Queen. No monarch of Canada or of the United Kingdom has ever been able to ascertain by personal inquiry and public visitation the thought of the people. The document goes on:

We call it "consultation".

I call it deception. It goes on:

It's something we've been practising for quite a while.

If they had, Mr. Speaker, this is the first time it has been revealed. The next page is headed "Canada's dynamic Governor General" and under a photograph the text reads:

Governor General Edward Schreyer promises to give a very different look to the highest office in the land.

He is the representative of the Queen and cannot do what the Queen cannot do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let that be clear and definite.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I just want to make sure that in proceeding on this subject we are in order. The hon. member raised it first as a question of privilege. I think the House can understand that I had an obligation to set it aside as a matter of privilege. It does not touch on a matter of privilege. The right hon. member now has the floor and I shall soon have to determine the basis upon which he is bringing it again to the attention of the House. He seems to be indicating that the text refers to some things that the Governor General may have undertaken to do which he cannot do. I do not know, but, if so, I must have some basis upon which I can, in the Chair of this House, receive these kinds of arguments in an orderly way.

● (1520)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I realized the difficulty when I rose. Parliament consists of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. The Queen has as her representative the Governor General, who cannot be brought into party politics. Otherwise parliament would be destroyed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The point I make is this. I realize the difficulty with the rules, but if the government is allowed to get away with this, it amounts to an endeavour on the part of the Government of Canada, by inference or suggestion, to lead people into believing that the Governor General is a close ally of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what it amounts to.

Mr. Speaker: With respect to the question of the right hon. gentleman regarding the recent installation of the Governor General, as he has pointed out, and as I said in my remarks, parliament consists of three institutions, the Governor General, the Senate and the House of Commons. If as part of a householder mailing a member of the House had proposed to put the picture of this installation on the front page and to report as a parliamentary event the entire installation proceedings, I think the House will realize that, if that is acceptable, then to indicate that some reference to that is not acceptable puts us in a position of making an editorial decision, which is an extremely onerous responsibility for the House officials to accept.

In my opinion, that is the crux of the problem. I do not see the procedural basis upon which we can interfere, unless there is some suggestion that we editorialize.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I realize that, but I come back to this point, that I cannot believe that the Governor General of Canada agreed to this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all the pamphlet quotes the Governor General as saying:

In accepting the office, Mr. Schreyer promised to be a travelling governor general, "the kind you'll see less in Ottawa and more in towns like Corner Brook and Meadowview."

It goes on to say:

On these trips, he will speak out on national issues—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Applause comes from those who are ignorant of the powers of the monarchy and its representatives. I repeat, the article goes on to say: "On these trips, he will speak out on national issues—such as unity"—he has no right to do that.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It continues: bilingualism—he has no right to do that—"and energy." This is the subject of controversial debate in every part of the country. The article concludes by saying: "—from the non-partisan perspective of a concerned Canadian."

Allow this unchallenged, sir, and you have the Governor General as a participant in political considerations which dare not be permitted; and I feel absolutely sure that the Governor General never consented to this. Who asked him whether this would be proper? What was his response? Sir, allow this and the Governor General is no longer the representative of the Queen. He will no longer occupy the position that governors general have exercised throughout the years. He has become an instrument where, by subtle wording, he is placed in the position of being an ally to one of the political parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Once again I have to restate that I am unaware of any procedural basis on which we can have this matter before us. In the interests of equal time, I will allow the minister to make some short contribution.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I rise with great deference to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), a person and parliamentarian for whom I have a great deal of respect, as he and I think all members know. He finds it rather shocking to think that use was made of the office of the Governor General to acquaint Canadians with him and his office and his swearing in ceremony. That is considered a partisan approach. I find that difficult to understand.

I would like to point out to the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the first time, as you have already pointed out, where householder mailings have used photographs and references to the monarchy of Canada. In front of me I have a photostat of a householder mailing put out by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) dated December 1977. At the bottom of the page there is a photograph of the hon. member, others and the Queen. Below the photograph, in what I think are rather presumptuous terms, it says:

Her Majesty enjoying a few moments with the Member from Hastings and others after the Official Opening of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cafik: I am not sure the Queen authorized the use of the photograph or would admit that it was a few moments of enjoyment to be with the hon. member for Hastings.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cafik: In addition to that, on the same page under the heading "The Queen's Visit" it says:

It was a pleasure and privilege to welcome Queen Elizabeth and her husband, Prince Philip, to the nation's capital for this great and historic ceremony.

I would suspect that it was not the hon. member for Hastings who unilaterally extended that welcome to the Queen and her husband.

An hon. Member: He did not appoint them either.

Mr. Cafik: Of course he did not appoint them. I should point out that it was not the Government of Canada that appointed the present Governor General of Canada; it was the Queen of Canada who made that appointment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: And we happen to think that she made a very wise choice in choosing the person she did.

An hon. Member: Are we expected to believe that?

Mr. Cafik: To say the use of such photographs or references to Her Majesty or her representative is drawing either the Queen or her representative into partisan politics, I think is doing a disservice to both of them. They would not be drawn into partisan politics in their lofty positions. I think the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert realizes that. There is nothing in this report, in my judgment, that makes any kind of suggestion that the Governor General is a Liberal. I believe traditionally everyone would suspect that he was not prior to taking office. There is no attempt whatsoever to draw the Governor General into any partisan role. It is the opposition that is attempting to draw the monarchy into a partisan role on this occasion, not the Government of Canada, and certainly not any member on this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we have gone as far as we can in the interests of equality. If the matter is to come back before the House it will have to be on some regular, procedural basis. I do not see any way within our practices that we can carry on this discussion any further at this time.

MR. HOGAN—LABOUR FORCE SURVEY—REPLY BY MINISTER OF FINANCE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who has left the chamber, would not want to leave the impression he did leave with the people of Canada today when he answered a supplementary question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) concerning the wholesale price index, which had shown a 12.5 per cent increase. The hon. member said that this was the second type of survey that had been dropped by the government prior to the election, the other one being the job vacancy survey. In answer the minister said there has been a lot of discussion and debate about the labour force survey.

The minister is not in charge of Statistics Canada, but the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is. He should know as the chief policymaker—if he still is; it is not quite clear what role he has in view of the establishment of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, although he is an ex-officio member—the distinction between the labour survey that was changed this year in which the population sample was increased and the job vacancy survey.

While there have been a lot of questions concerning the labour force survey, very few members have brought up the job vacancy survey, which is exclusively the measure of the demand side of labour. This survey was cut out. During the debate we had on unemployment insurance, as a member of the committee I asked the deputy minister of employment and immigration why the government cut out this job vacancy survey at this particular time. His answer was that he did not know, that he and the Department of Employment and Immigration had wanted it and that it was a decision of Treasury Board. Therefore, the minister should clear up for the House the distinction between the labour force survey that was changed, the taking out of the job vacancy survey and the taking out of the wholesale price index, both of which can be and have been very embarrassing to this government in the last year.

MEASURE TO CHANGE RETIREMENT BENEFIT PROVISIONS

The House resumed from Thursday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Buchanan that Bill C-12, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I got to my feet in this debate Thursday night, there were only about ten minutes left so I was not able to do much more than make some introductory remarks. I hope that even in those remarks I made it clear that we feel very strongly that the principle of the indexation of pensions is sound. We are glad that we have won the implementation of that principle, at least to some extent. We hope the day will come when it will apply to all pensions, both in the public and in the private sector.

So far as the public sector is concerned, we have full indexation of old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, other pension programs such as the Canada Pension Plan, the disability pension that is paid to war veterans, and the war veterans allowance. We also have it with respect to the family allowance, even though we lost some of the indexation when in January of this year the basic family allowance payment was put back to $20.

The fact is that we have a fair amount of indexation of pensions that are available, if they meet the conditions, to all the people of Canada. The indexing of pensions of retired public servants, retired personnel of the Canadian Armed Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and so on, is not the only example of indexing of pensions in the public sector.

As I say, we take very strongly the position not only that indexing of pensions is sound, but that, without indexing, pensions are not really pensions. What point is there to a person being given a certain amount to live on at the time of his retirement if the amount has to stay at that level no matter what happens to the cost of living? In the course of a few years, a pension that is not indexed can become no pension at all.

I urge very strongly that the direction in which we should be moving should not be to respond to the campaign that wants to cut out the indexing of public service pensions. We should be moving in the direction of finding ways to guarantee that the pensions of all Canadians, whether they are public or private, are subject to indexation.

As I said the other evening, another direction in which we should be moving is that of making indexation something that is related not just to the rise in the cost of living but to the rise in the standard of living. It is my view that it is not good enough to say to a person who has retired that he will get enough money to buy for the rest of his years the basket of goods and services he can buy at that point, when everybody else in society is winning wage increases and an opportunity to share to some extent in the nation's increasing productivity.

I know that once we talk about pension indexing of that sort there are those who come back and ask us what it will cost. We are shown long advertisements and given long treatises on the amounts of money that are in various funds and so on. After the years that I have been studying and dealing with pensions, I have come to the conclusion that these funds are really a myth. After all, in most cases so-called pension funds are figures on pieces of paper. What really counts when pensions are being paid is the productiveness of the economy at the time those pensions are paid.

If you grant to a person a pension of $1 million a year and there is no economy producing goods and services in which that money is worth anything, the pension is worthless. Pensions are paid out of current production.

What we do in our whole scheme of pensions is to set up machinery whereby the part of the economy that is working produces enough for itself, for its children who have not yet gone to work and for the older people who have done their share of the work and have retired.

This attempt to fall back on myths about funds is a false view of the whole thing. What we should be concerned about is the fact that it is our responsibility as a society not only to provide for the retirement years of all our people, but to provide for that retirement on a basis that will enable them not just to keep up with the cost of living, but to continue to share in the rising standard of living.

I used the phrase the other night that I wanted all Canadians to be part of the Canadian family. In any family situation, you do not distinguish between the different members of that family by age or any other characteristic. You do as well as you can with what you have for all the members of that family. We should do as well as we can for all members of the Canadian family. That means that our retired people are entitled not only to pensions, but to have those pensions escalated to enable them to share in the growing productivity which, after all, they helped to make possible through their years of work.

We are proud of the role we have played—and I had something to say about this in a reflective mood the other night—in getting the escalation of various kinds of pensions established. We decry as strongly as we can the campaign that some are waging to try and turn back the clock.

Having said that, may I make a few comments about the bill before us. In so doing, I should like to deal with some of its specific provisions. I begin by saying I would be happy if the bill were not before us at all; I would be quite happy if we continued with the present plan which calls for full indexing of the various pensions covered by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. However, there has been a vicious campaign and many people have been taken in by arguments that certain individuals are being favoured as opposed to others. So there is a campaign to do something. This bill is an attempt on the part of the government to answer that criticism, to retain the principle of indexation as applied to the pensions of all those covered by the plans under the aegis of the government, and yet to relate the payments in some way to the figures on the books which correspond to what persons have contributed out of their wages and salaries toward their retirement. In the light of that campaign which has gone on, I think the bill has to be described as one which it would be reasonable for us to accept.

There are some changes I should like to see made and there are some comments I wish to make during the committee stage, but one of the reasons I accept this measure is the suspicion that, if we fail to do so, then down the road we might get something worse. So we had better grab while we can a way of preserving the principle of indexation even if it means a slight reduction of the amount which some of those in the upper reaches of the public service are able to enjoy.

The bill covers three main areas affecting pensions of public servants, armed forces personnel and retired RCMP personnel, but perhaps I might say before going into this aspect that the other provisions in the bill are quite acceptable. I refer to the part of the bill which sets up pension arrangements for air traffic controllers and to the clauses which iron out a few technicalities in the Supplementary Benefits Retirement Act and related pieces of legislation.

Now to get to the three main things which the bill does with regard to pensions covered by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. They are, first, a change with respect to the amount of indexation one gets in the first January of his retirement. Then there is something with respect to those who are able to retire at age 55 after 30 years of service; and then there is the triennial scheme which is at the heart of this proposal.

As far as the change to a monthly or pro rata basis for the first pension indexation is concerned, I think this has to be regarded as reasonable. I know that some of the public service organizations which have produced briefs in connection with this bill have objected even to that. I read the briefs closely to see what those objections were. One was along the line that there are shortcomings in the plan as it is because pensions are based on a six-year average instead of three years or less, and that in a time of inflation retiring public servants do not get the amount of pension they should enjoy. In these circumstances it is argued that the ability to retire in October, November of December and benefit from indexation in January makes up for some of the shortfall they have suffered.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be far better to correct the mistakes and make changes where the amount of the pension itself is not good enough than to continue with a system which seems to involve a degree of unfairness as between employees who retire at different times during the year. I am certainly prepared to listen to those who want to argue against such a change, but on the face of it I think it must be said there is some argument in favour of it. The proposal is that persons who retired during the latter part of the year should get indexation in January on a pro rata basis in respect of the number of months they have worked in that last years. That seems reasonable.

The second thing this bill does raises some complications. A few years ago a provision was made that if a person was 55 years of age and had 30 years' service he could not only retire but could get immediate indexation. We understand, of course, that people can retire early under other conditions as well. The provision to which I have just referred has been in effect for a few years and there have been some rather notorious cases. I shall not put names on record; some of those names are too well-known. However, a few favoured persons with 30 years' service have been able to retire, get immediate indexation and then go straight off to other jobs.

It is to correct this abuse that the government has decided that from now on indexation will begin only at age 60. Even that statement has to be qualified. Persons already getting indexation at an earlier age will continue to receive it and people who would be getting it during the next year or so will be covered by a notch formula. It is still true, and will be true, that persons retired for medical reasons will receive indexation right away, as will widows of pensioners even though the person getting the pension is under 60. Nevertheless, public servants generally will not have the right which a few already enjoy. There were abuses there and it is not unreasonable for the government to take account of them and to correct them.

At the time we brought in this provision for retirement at age 55 after 30 years of service I had a good deal to say about the position of retired members of the RCMP and the Canadian armed forces. Though the same rule applied to them, many retired personnel from these two groups had not completed 30 years of service; retirement in their case was not voluntary, they were under contracts which made it necessary for them to retire, some of them as young as 49 or 50. So there was no possibility of their getting indexation until they had reached the age of 60.

I have argued for several years now that, it having been made possible for some top public servants to get indexation at 55, at least we ought to make the same thing possible for retiring RCMP and CAF personnel, especially if they are retiring involuntarily or because of the nature of their contract. I suppose there will be some hon. members opposite who will say that now that we have taken away the right of top public servants to retire at 55 and get immediate indexation, that ends the argument about RCMP and Canadian armed forces personnel.

I do not think it ends the argument at all. I think it still stands, and one of the things I want to look very hard at when we get into committee on the bill is this whole business with respect to persons who I think have a claim to early indexation. Let us not in the process of getting rid of one abuse create another piece of injustice. As I say, I plead the right of these people to be considered. If we do have delegations before the committee, I am sure there will be delegations representing the armed forces and the RCMP, and I hope we will listen very attentively to their case.

I now move on to the main subject of the change with regard to public service pensions, and that is this triennial scheme which is being proposed. The way it stands now, it is a full indexation guaranteed and automatic for life for everyone once it starts, but the new proposal is that every third fall there should be an assessment of how much money is on the books, not in the fund. There is no fund. There are just figures out there on the books, but how much is there, how much of it really belongs to pensioners who are out of the service and out there enjoying their retirement, how much interest is that money earning and how much extra interest is it earning because we are in a time of high interest rates and so forth? A calculation is to be made each third fall as to how much could be charged against the books in the next three years, and on that basis what pensions will be paid.

We are told that had this bill come into effect at the beginning of 1979, the calculations last fall were such that there would have been a guarantee of the first $7,000 of everyone's pension being fully escalated but that the amount in excess of $7,000 would be escalated at 8 per cent this year, 7 per cent next year and 6 per cent in 1981.

I welcome the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) the other night that conditions have altered a bit since last fall, and he says it is likely that when that kind of assessment is made this fall for the years 1980, 1981 and 1982, those who do the calculating may be able to do a little better. I think he said, for example, that what might happen is that the threshold might be $7,500 or $8,000. I hope it will be, and I hope that if the figures are better that is how it will be applied, and rather than a higher rate of interest on the upper increments of pension it will be applied to raise that threshold.

That is the scheme which is being proposed, and I wish the bill were not before us at all. I would rather leave it exactly as it is, but rather than run the risk of some drastic change in the whole scheme I would say that this bill is a protective piece of legislation and that on that basis it ought to be accepted. The other night the minister pointed out that if the estimates made every three years in the fall were too optimistic and too much money was paid out in the next three years, more than should have been, then that would be corrected the next time around.

I asked about the reverse situation, supposing there was too pessimistic an estimate, and the minister gave me an acceptable answer to the effect that if not enough was paid out in a three-year period, that would mean there would be more money on the books—let us not talk about funds; we know there are no funds around at all—and that it would be possible to pay better pensions later on. I am accepting all of this as a piece of protective legislation, and I hope public servants will see it that way.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

By the way, we have been told that the scheme which would have come into effect this year—something like that which will come in next year—would have covered about 60 per cent or more of the retired public servants themselves and about 90 per cent or more of the survivors and those who are out on disability pensions. Of course, the reason it is 90 per cent in the latter case as opposed to 60 per cent in the other case is that those pensions are that much smaller. But we are talking about an arrangement under which pensions of $7,000—perhaps $7,500 or $8,000—are protected with full indexation, and I am glad that that is true. Let it also be clear that the person who has a pension of $10,000 will get full escalation on the first $7,000, but then a little less escalation on the portion above that amount.

I am talking about all these figures and calculations, this triennial business and so forth, as though I regard them as fully valid, and no doubt before this debate is over figures in the millions, billions and trillions will be cited as though something really sacred attaches to them. We are moving on. When I first came here we talked of $500 million as though it was a terrific sum of money. Now we are getting into trillions.

I think these funds and these accounts are all a myth. I remember seeing in Hansard where C. A. Dunning told J. S. Woodsworth that we could not afford to pay a pension of $20 a month to our old people because it would break the country. But what are we doing now? Some would say we are breaking the country now. Not at all, as far as I am concerned. By providing these things we have made the country. I suggest that if we made up our minds that all our retired people on pensions of whatever kind were entitled to indexation, we could afford to do it out of current production. That is what we have to look at, not figures which are off in some musty books. What counts is the will to do it and the realization that we pay pensions out of current production because we believe our people are entitled to them.

One of the things I am hoping is that what we are now doing is simply going through a phase. It is a phase because, although we have indexation of public service pensions, old age security and the others I named a while ago, we do not have indexation of private pensions in the main but ought to. That day will come. Maybe there will have to be some sort of a tax element or government subsidy to make it possible, just as people pay into the supplementary retirement benefits account for public service pensions. Maybe there will have to be an account people pay into for the other, but I would say that the day will come when we will have extended the principle of indexing of pensions across the board. When that day comes we will be able to revise this triennial scheme which we have been forced to go into because of the kind of campaign we face, because of arguments about restraint and all the rest of it.

As I say, I wish the bill were not before us. I wish this triennial part were not proposed at all, but I think it is protective and has to be looked at favourably. I think we have to have hope and confidence that when we get beyond this period and move into the protection of all pensions by proper indexing, we will put this one back on the full basis as well.

There are two or three other things I would like to say, and if my time is running out I hope that if I make the point that we do not have any other speaker for this debate today, the House will give me an extra minute or two if necessary.

One of the things I would like to speak about is a touchy subject which is thrown around, and that is the extent to which persons who want to kill the indexing of public service pensions talk about the pensions of members of parliament. We are accused of having had some complicity in the indexing of our pensions. This is always a touchy subject to deal with but I think it should be brought right out into the open.

● (1600)

No one in the House has any doubt where I stand on the subject of what we receive as pay and as pensions. I happen to think they are out of line with what we ought to be getting. I am not arguing that point at the moment, but I am establishing it as the basis for what I want to say. I think there are some things wrong with the pensions available to members of parliament. I think they are too generous. I object to the fact that the provisions for our widows are greater than for other widows. That is not fair. I also think the business of members of parliament being able to get a pension at any age once they have been here six years is preposterous, and I will come back to that in a moment. But the one thing in the members' pension plan that I think is not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank you, sir, and I thank the House. I am afraid I put the House in a spot a moment ago, so that hon. members could not deny me extra time. What I want to say is that the one thing in the members' pension plan that I do not think is wrong is the business of indexing members' pensions, just the same as anyone else's pensions, provided that it starts only at the age of 60. Many people still have the notion that members' pensions are indexed as soon as the member of parliament leaves office. That indexing does not start until the age of 60.

As I said, I think there are things wrong with members' pensions that should be corrected, and I will indicate one or two of them right away, but that does not deny the right of members—just as I insist the right of public servants and elderly people, war veterans and people in the private sector—to have their pensions indexed in accordance with the rise in the cost of living. What we should be doing is to correct some of the things that are wrong.

The name of His Excellency the Governor General was dragged into debate a while ago in another context. I was pleased when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tabled some days ago copies of correspondence he has had with the Governor General, when he was just Mr. Schreyer, about his potential pension. Apparently the then Mr. Schreyer made the plea to the Prime Minister that he did not want to be in the position of being a retired Governor General at the age of 48 on full pension. He thought that instead that pension should be delayed until the age of 60. The Prime Minister's reply indicated that he was in agreement with that. He had some qualifications about disability or the possibility of his death and the leaving of a widow, but he agreed with the then Mr. Schreyer that it did not make sense for the Governor General to have a full pension at the age of 48 and that it should be deferred to the age of 60.

I think we should be doing that to our pension plan. If the Prime Minister is going to bring in legislation to correct the pension plan of the Governor General, I think we should correct this business of a member of parliament being able, once he has had six years of service, to draw a pension at any age.

There are a few other things which should be put closer into line with other pension plans, but it is these other things which stand to be corrected, not the right to pension indexation. I think that anyone, whether he is a member of parliament, a retired RCMP officer, a governor general or a CNR or CPR pensioner, if he is going to have a pension, should have one that would enable him to keep abreast of the rising cost of living and with the standard of living.

So, sir, I decry the kinds of attacks that have been made on the plans that are now in effect. But for the errors that I have just referred to in our own scheme, I think the plans generally are pretty good. There are a few things that are in the public service plan which should be corrected, and I am sorry they are not in the legislation before us now. A while ago I referred to the fact that the public service pension is based on the average of one's six best years. In a time of inflation that can rob a retiring public servant of a great deal of security. Certainly it should be reduced to three years or perhaps even fewer.

I raise again, as I have, not only for public servants but, especially for the RCMP and the armed forces personnel, the question of marriages which take place after one goes on pension. The present law in this respect is as archaic and outdated as it can be. If a woman marries a retired public servant or a retired army officer who has served his day and age, and he is in the 50s or approaching 60, she can be his wife for 20 years, he has paid into the fund, but there is no pension for his widow because he married after he became a pensioner. As I said, that situation should be corrected.

I have already referred to the case of indexing for RCMP and armed forces personnel in cases where they have to retire early because of the nature of their contract. I think also their particular superannuation acts should be corrected.

We still have left over the problems relating to the buying back of earlier service or the buying back of years spent in the armed forces. There are instances where this was made possible but the person affected could not afford it and passed it up, and then at a later date wanted to buy back earlier service to improve his pension position but the cost had become prohibitive. I think that also should be corrected.

There are still a few old timers around who transferred from one pension plan to another more than 50 years ago. I do not mean they were pensioners then; they were public servants in those days. They call themselves the "old originals." They do not have the advantage of the modern arrangements that are in our pension plans. I think we should not be drawing these kinds of lines. When people are retired, older people who have served their country in the public service, in the armed forces, in the RCMP or in the private sector, they should not be treated differently depending upon the time when they came into the plan, the time they retired, or what-have-you.

So there are all these various improvements that should be made in the Public Service Superannuation Act, in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and in the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and I hope we will make them. Perhaps I am asking the government to bite off too much between now and the end of this session, which has not many months to run, but that seems always to be the problem. Some of the things I have talked about, such as the six years' average, the late marriages, the buying back, and so on, have been talked about ever since I came here, and there is always some excuse why we cannot act on them. Sometimes the excuse is that the session is about over and it is time for an election. All right, some things are going to be done, if the session lasts long enough, and they are set out in this bill. We will have to look at them pretty closely, but I think these other things should be done as well.

With these comments, I say on behalf of my party that we are prepared to agree to the second reading of this bill so that it can be referred to the committee. Generally speaking, we approve of its tone because, as I said, it is a protective piece of legislation, protective in the sense that it keeps alive the principle of indexing of pensions. That is a principle which, in my view, must not only be kept alive but must be extended until it applies to all pensions in this country, whether in the public or the private sector.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to take part in this debate because I had been told that Bill C-12 should be referred to the committee as soon as possible. But I have only a few words to say since the previous speaker simply stated our agreement to have this bill referred to committee as soon as possible for further study as it concerns the indexing of early retirement pensions and the public service monthly rates.

With this bill, the government answers the criticisms of certain financial groups who have stated that the public service pension fund greatly exceeds that of private companies and that, in the long term, the cost of the program will exceed its revenue. Certain financial circles have progressively escalated their fight to the death with the government on this issue since the end of 1976. This is a sensitive question because on the one hand, some of the arguments of the private sector seem justified while, on the other, the Public Service Alliance has achieved a master stroke by obtaining the cost of living indexation of pensions to protect the purchasing power of their members and retired employees. To a certain extent, Mr. Speaker, the bill aims at reducing the pressures exerted upon many private retirement programs for which the benefits are much inferior to those offered by the public service. Indeed, it is a recognized fact that the public sector generally supports pension plans in which the benefits are 9 per cent higher than those of the private sector.

The proposals of the government mainly affect three areas: early retirement, the monthly rate and indexation. They amend two different statutes: the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act and the Superannuation Act. The government wants to reduce progressively over a period of five years the age for early retirement. This amendment would affect mainly employees between 55 and 60 who have or wish to retire before the maximum eligible age. Of course, we believe that this must remain optional. Contributors must still have the option to do as they wish. As for the monthly rate, those who retire in January would receive eleven-twelfths of the authorized annual cost of living indexation adjustment. Those who retire in June would receive only half and those who retire in November would receive an automatic adjustment of one-twelfth of the inflation cost devaluation. At the present time, the person who retires receives the total amount of the indexation whatever the time of the year of his retirement.

At the limit, an individual could retire on December 31, 1977, for example, and on January 1, 1978 get the full indexing for the entire preceding year. Ad hoc indexing would allow the federal government to take automatic indexing out of the pension plan. The adjustments required as a result of the increase in the cost of living would from now on be made on an ad hoc basis. The public service pension board would set the indexing over a three-year period and in direct relationship with the amounts of money available in the government's pension funds. More specifically, the interests collected on pension funds would be distributed to eligible pensioners. Full indexing would take place only when the interests on the capital accumulated in the funds would be sufficient to cover the costs. As far as unions are concerned, all hon. members know their position.

Early retirement relieves more or less older federal employees who must retire for reasons of health. That is where one of the biggest problems lies. The new legislation would deny workers the right to compensation in the form of early pensions. It would also affect people who in this time of budget cuts are forced to take an early retirement because of our personnel cutbacks.

Indeed, we know very well that a person 57 years of age, for example, will have great difficulty finding a new job because of his or her advanced age compared with a younger person who still has several years of employment ahead of him or her. So for certain people early retirement becomes an insurance that will allow them to continue to receive a salary even if they find themselves out of a job because of our cutbacks. So we say that that policy includes benefits for the older worker while it is futile for younger individuals who usually find themselves another job sooner or later. So the act as it now stands takes care of employees who need it most, because those who get a new job, although they are now getting their pensions, would not benefit because the difference would be taken away by income tax.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the adjustment of pension plans according to age is a coming thing, and the government will have to move toward lower pension age, that is 60 for all Canadians. Later on this will come down to 55. However, the time is ripe in my view to realize that the pension age should be lowered to 60 for everyone. During the last election, we obtained help for pensioners' spouses. This is not enough this year in my view to clarify the situation for those who get married with old age pensions.

I hope that during studies on this subject the government will seriously consider alleviating the heavy burden on our shoulders, with a reduction of eligibility age to 60 for everyone, perhaps with help at 55 for spouses and normal pension at 60. Mr. Speaker, those were the few remarks I had to make. I hope we can refer the bill to committee as soon as possible.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the basic purpose of this bill is to make some change in the provisions for the indexing of pensions of public servants. It is true that the bill does some other things: it progressively increases the age at which full escalation can take place on retirement from 55 to 60, it reduces the incentive to retire on December 31 in each year, it makes some changes in the period of time over which the government must amortize deficiencies arising from general adjustments in salaries, and it does something with pensions for air traffic controllers. But I repeat, the main purpose of the bill is to deal with the indexing of pensions, and this is what I wish to speak about today.

As hon. members will know, 9 per cent of the people of Canada are retired. These people take up roughly 5 per cent of the national income. The only possible way that they may continue to get the same cut of the national pie is to have their purchasing power maintained, and that means that their pensions must be indexed. If the pensions are not indexed these retired people, people living on pensions, widows, orphans and dependants, are robbed a little each year.

The suggestion that indexing pensions to maintain the same purchasing power will bankrupt Canada is so ludicrous that one wonders how people of good sense could give it a second thought. I am not talking about increasing the pensions according to the standard of living. That point was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). For the moment I am talking about maintaining purchasing power. If there was any evidence that inflation led to a decrease in national income in real terms, there might be a case for such an idea, but the reverse is true. Even though there is inflation, there is real growth.

Canada's real growth for this year will probably exceed 4 per cent, and there is no reason to believe that we cannot adapt our policies in such a way that we can still live with inflation and have real growth. This has taken place in Brazil and a number of other countries for some time. It is an affront to the intelligence of the average human being to suggest that it will bankrupt the country if we try to maintain the purchasing power of people who are retired.

The public service superannuation plan was adopted over 40 years ago. At that time the actuaries made their usual assumptions about age of retirement, rates of interest, contribution rates expected as a result of life expectancy and so on. They assumed that the average earning rate for the plan would be 4 per cent, and I am sure that they assumed that the benefits paid would represent stable purchasing power. In retrospect, those assumptions turned out to be erroneous because the cost of living has eroded benefits paid out and interest earnings have escalated.

Let us look at the problems dealing with supplementation. In 1970 the supplementary benefits retirement fund was set up by an act of parliament in order to establish a separate fund to deal with escalation. The anticipated rate of escalation was 2 per cent per year. The employees would contribute one half of 1 per cent of their payroll and the employer would match it. That was subsequently raised to a contribution of 1 per cent by the employee and 1 per cent by the employer. It is quite clear that this fund, while adequate for a 2 per cent or 3 per cent inflationary increase, is not adequate for a 9 per cent, 10 per cent or 11 per cent rate of inflation.

It is no great exercise to attack this fund and say that it is bankrupt or inadequate, or to make other derogatory comments with regard to it. We must admit that the fund by itself is inadequate and cannot deal with the problem. But we must also look at what has happened to earnings. The earnings of the other fund are now approaching 8 per cent per year and rising. The average rate of interest is a weighted average of the long-term Government of Canada borrowings. The last borrowing by the Government of Canada had a nominal interest rate of 10¼ per cent, and it was sold at a slight premium. The effective interest rate was in excess of 10¼ per cent. This means that the fund will continue to earn money at an even higher rate than was anticipated in the original calculation by the actuaries, which was 4 per cent. Indeed, this 4 per cent rate continued up until 1969. In the 1950s and 1960s the fund, in effect, was subsidizing the management of the public debt of Canada because it was an account in the books of Canada.

Pensions

In response to a question I placed on the order paper, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) has filed some replies which were tabled in this House on October 10, 1978. I wanted to know the amount of money credited to the public service superannuation account as of March 31, and then I mentioned certain years. In 1965 it was $2,161 million. In 1970, the fund had grown to $3,600 million and in 1975 it had grown to $6,420 million. In March, 1976 there was $7,312 million in the fund and by 1977 it had $8,147 million. As of March 31, 1978 the fund had increased to $9,053 million and probably by March 1 of this year it will have exceeded $10 billion. That is an enormous sum of money.

There are those who say that the amount of money in the fund is negligible. I believe that the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan), who is alleged to be an expert in this area as an actuary, has a question on the order paper referring to the phantom funding. The public service superannuation account is an account in the books of Canada. It is part of the national debt. It is not generally recognized that the public service superannuation fund and the armed forces superannuation account together represent over one quarter of the entire gross public debt of the Government of Canada. It is reported in the public accounts and interest is accrued to it. I suppose that the hon. member who asked this question would have been much happier if the government had issued bonds, hired a clerk to clip the coupons and put them in the bank regularly once or twice per year. Somehow this would make him feel that he was meeting the test of actuarial soundness.

To me these sums of money are so large that what the government is doing with them is all that can be done. The hon. member for York-Scarborough has asked in one of his questions not yet answered whether the government has considered investing in the private sector. If the government put, for example, $10 billion into the private sector it would make Petro-Canada look like peanuts. Who would be the first to cry about socialism if we were to buy private equities? The official opposition. The simple truth is the sums of money are so large and the problems of debt management if these funds were diverted to some other use so great that the government of the day would have no alternative but to deal with the account as this government is doing now.

It is worth noting that, with a fund of $10 billion and a rate of interest which is credited at 8 per cent, the annual interest earnings on that fund are approximately $800 million. I put some questions on the order paper for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You put them on for your own benefit as well.

Mr. Francis: —who says he does not have much information in this regard. I suggest that he look at Hansard for October 10 and January 23. I believe that the question he put on the order paper was answered last Friday. One of the reasons why questions are answered the way they are is because of the manner in which they are asked. If one asks a straightforward question, one gets a straightforward answer. If one asks a complicated question, such as actuarial evaluations and so on, a great deal of time and effort is involved to produce an understandable answer.

The cost of basic pensions for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978 was $252 million plus the cost of escalation, which was $113 million, a total of $365 million. As far as most people are concerned, when interest earnings are of the order of $800 million per year and total disbursements for pensions and escalation are of the order of $400 million per year, this does not project a disaster. Most people would say that is a fair margin of security.

The government hired Tomenson-Alexander Ltd. to do a technical study. There is no secret about that report although somebody suggested it was hidden. Mr. Colin Brown, in a full page newspaper advertisement, said that you could not get it. The minister answered that many copies were distributed. I have a copy and every member of this House has a copy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He can have mine.

Mr. Francis: I suggest the hon. member keep it, because it may be useful for a certain curiosity value. He might even find it more interesting when I am through with my comments today.

The people who did that study said the $10 billion is not enough, that it should have been increased by something like 70 per cent to be actuarially sound. Now, what does "actuarially sound" mean? Well, Mr. Speaker, it means that the actuaries tell us what the future is going to be—from the year 1990 to the year 2025. One of the great things we all have to learn, Mr. Speaker, is our limits. I recognize that an actuary can study the tables of life expectancy and mortality. I know actuaries have great skill and fine mathematical formulae. But when they project the rate of interest, not today but 25 years from now, 35, 45 years from now, may I suggest that that is not within their professional competence. When they have to project the rate of increase of wages in that period, they have no special claim to an expertise. When they have to project the rate of increase for the consumer price index, there is no special wisdom in their hands.

In making their projections and in stating that there was a $5.8 billion deficiency as of March 31st, 1978, they made the assumption that the average rate of inflation would be 6 per cent per cent, compounded, that the average rate of salary increase would be 8.5 per cent per year compounded, that the average rate of interest earnings would be 8.25 per cent compounded, and they assumed that the average retirement age would be 61.5 years. Well, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is a reputable economist in Canada who is prepared to say that the rate of interest is going to be 8.25 per cent and the consumer price increase 6 per cent between now and the year 2025? Tomenson-Alexander Ltd. did not hesitate to say it and made it absolutely basic to their conclusions.

I put a question on the order paper using these assumptions, and they are all contained in the notes of the Tomenson-Alexander firm in the department. I asked, using their projections and these assumptions with no change in the public service superannuation plan, how much money would be in the account in the year 1990. The answer was just about $40 billion, and if there were no change, in the year 2025 it would be $1,200 billion. They said that was not enough, that we had to increase the base by 70 per cent to make it actuarially sound. They would have had $2 trillion in the account by the year 2025, and $70 billion in the account by the year 1990; then it would be actuarially sound.

A question of professional integrity enters at this point. I question the professional integrity of a firm that puts in a $5.8 billion scare figure. When it came to writing in the projection for 1990 and the year 2025, they deleted that from their final version. They thought it might impair public trust, and they were right. It certainly would have impaired confidence in their work, Mr. Speaker.

I hope these experts will come before the parliamentary committee, and that Mr. Colin Brown will come before the parliamentary committee. I hope they will tell us why they feel these astronomical sums have to be even more astronomical. I hope they will tell us on what great scientific basis they can make these constant predictions of interest rates, changes in the consumer price index, average salary rates and even age of retirement, Mr. Speaker.

I am not at all sure that we are going to face this continuing decrease in average retirement age. I always look to my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who tells me he cannot afford to go to the Senate as he would have to retire too soon! I admire him. Sir, that is not a derogatory remark. My hope is that when I am his age I will do as well. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) still carries his load in this House. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that there are members who contribute to society in a very real way. The pressure that is on to retire at an earlier age is tempting for some and a matter of real concern to others.

I simply wish to raise the question in a time of falling birth rates, a time when Canada is going to have to think of the people who are employed and creating a standard of living for all of us. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said it eloquently not so very long ago. Whether or not that age might stabilize, I think there are good reasons why 65 should be an average retirement age for a person in good health and in possession of his or her faculties.

I am simply saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing terribly scientific about these figures thrown at us. When the actuaries claim to be experts on those matters in which they are not competent any more than anyone else, then they are being deceitful, and there is a question of professional integrity when they do not give us their working figures.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) says that I said we did not need the bill. It was the member for Winnipeg North Centre who said we did not need the bill.

What this bill does is change the basis of paying indexation. It takes the surplus earnings out of the big account—above 4 per cent—and makes them available to pay part of the cost of indexing, in addition to the money in the supplementary retirement benefit fund. Mr. Speaker, if we do not do that then we are going to look foolish. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows very well that the program is a target for completely false criticism—shallow criticism—if we do not do something like this to rationalize the two plans and put them together. One fund is earning excessive interest and is growing at a rate that is going to create an embarrassment of riches for the government, and the other is inadequate. There is a logical thing to do, and that is put the two together, and that is one of the essential elements of this bill. That is why we have to have the bill, Mr. Speaker.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the hon. member for Hamilton West. He said we would have to have a large number of witnesses. The list seemed endless. I hope that he is not saying that this is something of a filibuster on the bill. I hope that a reasonable number of witnesses will be called. I hope all the staff associations come; that goes without saying. I hope Mr. Colin Brown comes. He earned it, and I hope he has the courage to come and defend his point of view. I hope the experts who said all those dreadful things about the future of the superannuation plan, on the basis of the most incredible assumptions, will be there.

It is interesting to see how private industry is changing its points of view. I think there are two basic problems in the pension field that have not been properly examined. The first relates to the disposition of excess interest earnings. I can understand why a private employer without a plan would say, "This is an expensive business and we cannot afford it; there is no means by which I can put aside enough money to anticipate the possible changes in the cost of living". But where a fund exists, Mr. Speaker—and the case of the public service is a clear one—that fund will then gain from the changes in interest rates, and those windfall gains in interest rates provide a basis for paying for the indexing of public service pensions.

The bill says we will look at the situation every three years.

[Translation]

With this legislation the intent is to examine every three years the funds available for indexing pensions. This includes the amount on which interest exceeds 4 per cent. I am referring to moneys invested in Canada's national debt. This also includes the moneys contributed by civil servants as a percentage of salaries, and an equal amount contributed by the employer. The indexing rate will be lower than the interest rate. If it can be ensured that the interest rate exceeds the cost of living increase, the inflation rate, the public service superannuation fund will provide for this.

I would like to quote from a speech made by a spokesman from private industry, the president of the Crown Life Insurance Company of Canada. It is a most interesting speech and there are parts of it which I found fascinating. Mr. R. C. Dowsett in his speech of January 18 said:

> Post-retirement inflation is a frightening prospect for anyone living on a fixed income. Private sector employers have been reluctant to put in place automatic indexation schemes to increase pension payments in line with the consumer price index increases in the future because of the unknown future drain on future business profits.
> In recent years, many employers have granted ad hoc, after the fact, ex-gratia enrichments of pension payments to compensate in part, at least, for past inflation from time to time if, in fact, current company profit levels are big enough to allow such enrichment.
> But retired employees—gratefull for ex-gratia enrichments—still don't feel very comfortable about the future when the employer may not be inclined to be generous.

Mr. Dowsett then went on to say:

> —there is an inflation premium built into the rate of return earned currently by pension assets. Interest rates earned on pension fund assets in recent years have included such an inflation premium.
> What has happened to the earnings generated on pension plan assets by this inflation premium? They have been used to offset the cost of plan improvements—that is, to help improve level starting pensions for long service employees. They have been used to improve starting pensions for those employees retiring early.
> They have not been used to enhance the benefits payable after retirement to correct for inflationary erosion then occurring—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame!

Mr. Francis: I say it is a shame especially when I read about the earnings of the Crown Life Insurance Company of Canada in Saturday's Globe and Mail. Crown Life Insurance Company reported $1.32 a share for the year ending 1977. But the Department of Insurance said that that was not revealing their earnings fairly. They required a different basis for revealing earnings. If the new basis had been adopted they would have earned $6.22 a share in 1977. But for the year ended December 31, 1978 they are reporting $13.33 a share.

In the case of this company it is quite clear what has happened. It is not a mutual company. The funds invested have now earned at much greater rates than the actuaries had forecast. But those funds, the surplus interest earnings, have not been used to pay the extra to those who are drawing pensions from that company—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —whose money it is.

Mr. Francis: Whose money it is. I wonder if Mr. Colin Brown has any questions for the Crown Life Insurance Company. I wonder if he is prepared to go to them and say, "You have to find a means by which extra earnings on your investment as a result of the windfall increases in interest are going to be paid to people who are retired". That is all the Government of Canada is doing. It is saying that the windfall interest earnings on that huge sum invested of $10 billion are going to pay the cost of indexing pensions.

There is a basic doctrine in law, that you come with clean hands. Those who tell us that it is going to make the country bankrupt to pay an increased pension according to the cost of living to people who are retired at a time when they are pocketing such immense sums of money as this cannot have a clear conscience.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: I will listen with a great deal of interest to the person who will speak for the official opposition in this House. I know the opposition House leader, who is a very busy and humane man, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), has an understanding of this matter and is sympathetic to the plight of retired civil servants. I know that it is also true of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). I believe the people of this area have the right to know where the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. de Cotret) stands. Before coming into this House, he was chief executive officer of an organization that attacked escalation of pensions. That organization was the Conference Board in Canada. He said that it would break Canada if we paid for indexation and subscribed to the point of view of Mr. Colin Brown. During the recent by-election that same member for Ottawa Centre had a bit of a change of something; he said he was for indexation during an open line program. I invite the hon. member for Ottawa Centre to come into this House and tell us what he believes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: I know his constituents are anxious to know what he believes. Does he subscribe to the viewpoint of Mr. Colin Brown, that the fund is not actuarially sound, that there is not enough money in it, that we cannot afford to pay for indexation, that we have to cut it back? Who are the spokesmen for the official opposition? What is their position?

When I listened to the hon. member for Hamilton West last Thursday night, I was not sure what the position of his party was. On one hand they denounce Colin Brown, and on the other hand they say they do not know. They say there are not enough studies. They say there have not been enough actuarial reports. Members have the right to know what their policy is. Does the policy of the official opposition support indexation of public service pensions by putting together these accounts in the way roughly suggested in the bill before us? Does the official opposition have another way? Are they prepared to say to those people who are retired in this area that they agree Canada can afford to pay a constant amount to keep abreast of the purchasing power of the dollar after retirement?

We are saying that if there is inflation then pensions will be adjusted according to the cost of living. We know when a fund the size of the public service superannuation fund exists and that fund is earning money according to current rates of interest that there is more than sufficient money to do the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise here today to address one of the most emotional and misunderstood areas of government operations, amendments to the public service pension plans.

I referred deliberately to amendments to the public service plans in the plural because, as an actuary, I believe, along with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), that the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act are merely separate parts of the whole. They must be viewed together to get a clear picture of what is happening.

For example, the changes proposed in Bill C-12 are only changes to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. However, I believe that if these changes are put into place a significant extra annual cost in the order of $100 million may be incurred under the Public Service Superannuation Act. The cost to the PSSA is not mentioned in the bill; it is hidden. That is why the actuaries and I who reported to the government in the spring on these plans urged that no change be made to either plan without examining the effects and cost of the change on both plans.

On all sides we, as members of parliament and as members of the public, are being bombarded with facts. Most of these facts are one-sided presentations of the actual situation. Many are downright misrepresentations of the actual situation. Indexed pensions are available to the Canadian public as a whole. Both the old age security and the Canada and Quebec Pension Plan payments are indexed for the cost of living. However, very few private pension plans are fully indexed. The actuarial survey tabled in parliament last spring indicated that only .6 per cent contained a full indexing provision. On the other hand, 80 per cent of the plans in the private sector have some form of post-retirement adjustments. These average 66 per cent of the change in the CPI.

It is obvious that if the public service is to be treated equitably in our society there must be provision for some indexing. However, we in parliament have two publics to represent, the general public and the public service. We have an obligation to see that the public service receives a first class pension, a pension that we can be proud of providing in recognition of service to the state. However, we also have an obligation to the general public to ensure that we do not create a preferred class in society, a class with benefits so far beyond what is available to the general public as to create serious social inequity.

Fully indexed pensions for civil servants were introduced in 1973. I must admit that in reading Hansard quite frankly I was amazed to find out that from introduction of the bill on first reading the royal assent of the bill took a grand total of ten days. On second glance, Mr. Speaker, this probably was not all that extraordinary because even though the then president of treasury board indicated that a contribution of "one-half of 1 per cent to go with the government's matching contribution will almost certainly be insufficient to cover the cost of escalation", there was a clear implication in his remarks that the cost was unlikely to be too much greater. I say there was a clear implication. I certainly would draw that conclusion from the remarks. However, a close reading shows the president of treasury board did not state that the funding was almost adequate.

Last April we had an estimate for the first time of what the indexing provision would cost. The indexing suggests that the employer contribution is of the order of 8.5 per cent of payroll. In other words, the initial contribution was one-seventeenth of what was required to be set aside. The original provision missed the mark by some 1,700 per cent.

We now know that in those ten days we approved measures which established an initial unfunded liability—that is, the cost of the benefits granted—of approximately $6 billion. The total budget for the Government of Canada in the fiscal year 1973-74 was $23 billion. In this one bill we spent the equivalent of one quarter of the total government spending in the year without seeing so much as an estimate or projection. I suggest that presenting a bill of this magnitude without any serious financial warnings was either dishonest or seriously negligent.

Public opposition to these pensions developed over several years and much criticism, informed and uninformed, was aired. In October, 1976, Treasury Board released the "Basic Facts" paper. The stated purpose of the "Basic Facts" paper was "to assess the retirement benefits of federal public servants . . . To review how these benefits are financed and inform the House of Commons . . . of some preliminary conclusions".

This document sought to establish both the reasonableness of benefit levels and the soundness of funding procedures. However, this "Basic Facts" paper contained several of those misrepresentations that I referred to. It stated that the impression that public service pensioners typically received pensions greatly exceeding those of most working Canadians was a misunderstanding. It stated that recent allegations that public servants live in a pension paradise are devoid of factual basis. It also stated that basic pensions are financed with the same actuarial principles which generally apply to private sector plans.

Actuaries are a wary breed. They are not easily excited. They are noted for their sang-froid. However, when that basic facts paper was published the Canadian Institute of Actuaries representing all actuaries in Canada, including all federal government actuaries, took an unprecedented step. It decided to issue an unsolicited public statement. If I may quote in part:

> This document which was tabled . . . purports to defend the public service pension system . . . What is ironic is that the spuriousness or dubious validity of so many arguments . . . aroused the suspicion or outright condemnation of practically every professional actuary who has examined the document.
> We believe it is more constructive to address ourselves to two key questions.
> 1. Is the system being properly financed?
> 2. How do the benefits provided by the system compare with those of other Canadian employers?
> No attempt is made to recognize the currently accruing cost of indexing . . . In our opinion the value or cost of the indexing adjustments is systematically concealed and deferred for payment by future generations of taxpayers and public servants.
> The benefits provided by the public service system . . . are more generous (and in most cases much more generous) than those provided by . . . private sector employers . . . given a thorough . . . understanding of these benefits . . . Most private sector employees would be only too happy to contribute at a comparable rate if their employers would agree to provide comparable benefits.

In view of the furore created over this issue, the actuarial firm of Tomenson-Alexander was commissioned on March 23, 1977 by Treasury Board to determine the future cost implications, advise on the extent to which the compensation policy takes account of benefits under PSSA and SRBA, comment on the "Basic Facts" paper, assess other actuarial considerations and make recommendations regarding future actuarial investigations and reports. The report was sent to the then president of treasury board on November 30, 1977 and released on March 9, 1978, at which time several amendments to the act were indicated.

The report was very interesting. It indicated that no valuation of the plan had been made since December 31, 1972, before unlimited indexing was introduced. Not only had the government not found out what the plan was going to cost before they introduced it, but they had not found out what the plan was actually costing after they introduced it. This surely is the height of folly. If we are ever to convince the general public that public servants do not regard the public purse as virtually bottomless, as the Auditor General alleges, we must begin to subject ourselves at least to the rudimentary discipline of finding out what on earth these programs we have adopted cost or will cost.

The actuarial commission pointed out that the government was not funding its pensions in anything like the manner accepted in the private sector. In making comparisons with the private sector the government was even confusing the true cost incurred by the program with the smaller amounts that it was setting aside year by year.

In his introductory remarks to the House, the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) referred to the $490 million that the government is setting aside each year as the cost of these benefits. The point is that $490 million is not the true cost. They are not reporting the cost according to generally accepted accounting principles; that is the point. The government sets one set of rules for itself, rules that the private sector cannot possibly match, and then tries to pretend that the cost is much lower.

Another point in the initial address by the President of Treasury Board was that the government felt that private sector employers should be encouraged to introduce benefits along the same lines as public service pensions. If the private sector did that, it would have to conform to the rules of accounting for costs of pension plans available in the private sector. They would have to charge through an extra 10 to 20 per cent on salary. In other words, if they adopted these plans it would be equivalent to a 10 to 20 per cent salary increase on top of the regular salary increase.

A week ago we had the spectacle of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) hectoring the banks for giving bank tellers a total increase of 11.5 per cent. The President of the Treasury Board is suggesting they should get an additional 10 to 20 per cent on top of their normal increase to bring them up to the government's level. Who is directing the economic policy of the country? On one hand we have people saying—

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR THE PAYMENT OF A HOUSEWIVES' ALLOWANCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of having parliament adopt a measure authorizing payment of an allowance to housewives who remain at home to take care of their family instead of joining the labour market, the purpose being to ensure a global income corresponding to the family's needs by providing an additional family income to that earned by the father.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in February 1978, I had the honour to command the attention of this House by introducing a motion dealing with the subject matter that has just been stated. That motion, like the one now under consideration, was intended to provide a means for increasing family incomes by paying an allowance or whatever to recognize the merits of our Canadian mothers and thus increase the total family income.

Mr. Speaker, I recall that the majority of members who had participated in the debate on this motion agreed on the principle. They recognized the rationale of the motion and none of the members had said anything against it or found a way to oppose to it. However, the solutions suggested to achieve that purpose were somewhat different. Mr. Speaker, if I am back this year with the same subject, it is because the problem has not been solved and because 12 months later, I am more convinced then ever that this parliament must make a financial effort to acknowledge that housewives in our country play a very important part not only within the family itself but within the community at large and also because they contribute to the increase in our gross national product. It is a fact we must acknowledge. Mr. Speaker, this year is the International Year of the Child. When there is a child, there is a mother. Sure, we must recognize the children's rights but mothers have rights too. Their rights are recognized in well-off families with an adequate income to meet the needs of each member of the family. But we cannot and should not separate the rights of the child from the rights of the mother.

My main concern, Mr. Speaker, lies with families whose income is inadequate to meet the needs of all their members, with families with income below the poverty line. Mr. Speaker, we must be consistent and honest with ourselves. A few years ago the Canadian parliament itself set up a Senate committee under the chairmanship of Senator Croll to study the situation of Canadian families, the poverty level, the lack of money in a country as prosperous as Canada blessed by God with enough natural resources of all kinds to meet the needs of all its inhabitants.

Mr. Speaker, in the report from the Senate committee, poverty is defined as follows, and I quote:

The time has come to stop blaming the mirror for not being a window—

The French translation of that quotation reminds me of the story of the ostrich which sees the storm coming but pretends there is no storm and puts its head in the sand until the storm is over. We, in parliament, are not ostriches, and we would like to take our responsibilities. The quotation continues:

The time has come to stop blaming the mirror for not being a window, for presenting us with things we would rather not see.

Obviously, everybody would like to see a higher level of confort for all. But all cannot be equally well off. Even the communists who preach the theory of economic equality do not have that. That is a fact. But as democrats, as people who believe in a distribution system which is as fair as possible, we should concentrate on helping those in the lowest income brackets. We should make sure that at least the basic needs of the weakest in our society are met. So much the better if some people are better off. If my neighbour is well off while I am in dire straits, I can ask him for help. But let us least make sure the basic human needs are not. That must be our goal, and Canada can achieve it. The inquiry report said, and I quote:

The time has come for a little common honesty.

I believe that all together we are able to do that.

The poor, after all, are not poor of their own accord.

Of course, it must not be very funny! I was extremely poor once, and I was not so of my own accord. I accepted my situation because I had no choice. Like many of my fellow citizens, I experienced the depression years. Everybody remembers those extremely difficult years. It was far from pleasant. Since we did not know any better, we accepted our situation. But today, with all the media, with television which shows us all kinds of things, pleasant and less pleasant things as well as hateful things, everybody is well informed.

And further on:

● (1710)

The poor, after all, are not, as some still pretend, poor of their own accord. The poor have no uncommon moral flaw that sets them apart, let alone condemns them. They are casualties of the way we manage our economy and our society—and that fact is increasingly obvious to the poor themselves.

Mr. Speaker, there was a reason for spending money in trying to find out what the situation is and how to remedy it. So, in our society of 1979, we must do everything possible to discover the means to ensure poor families additional income and so enable them to live a bit more decently, without it impoverishing us collectively.

Last weekend—all the hon. members have seen similar cases I am sure—the head of a poor family came to my office to explain his situation. There are five of them in the family. The mother is sick; now sickness is not a fault; no one tries to be sick but when sickness comes it has to be accepted. And the father went on explaining how much medication costs him each month. Finally, I asked him what his income was. He works for an agency . . . now, what is it called . . . a security agency. In any event, he earns $3.37 an hour. On the basis of a 30-hour week, how much income does that make? Deduct from that the pension plan and unemployment insurance contributions, and what have you left? About $122 a week. That is not much more than $6,000 a year.

It is easy therefore to understand how difficult it is for him to meet his obligations. His wife worked and still does as best she can. If the state, in an effort to distribute more equitably the gross national product, helped to raise the living standard of those families whose income is below the poverty line, if an attempt were made to grant those mothers some allowance that could supplement the income of the father who goes out to earn his family's keep we would be no worse off for it.

Last year, when this motion was discussed, one hon. member said: Well, listen here, if the hon. member wants to pay his wife a salary, it's okay by me. But it isn't up to the state to do so. To talk like that is to distort voluntarily the real meaning of the motion I had presented. Obviously, if I were president of a company and had a salary of $50,000 a year, I could pay $5,000 to my wife to help her look after her household duties, if I wanted to. However, this is not the situation of the unemployed, nor is it the situation of the welfare recipient. And they are in great numbers today, Mr. Speaker, in our society. The essence of the motion is purposely being clouded. What does the hon. member for Bellechasse intend to achieve with his motion? He simply wants to implement in our country the altogether practical idea of a minimum family income to ensure that each and every member of a given family has at least the opportunity to satisfy his or her fundamental needs.

Mr. Speaker, in the spring of 1978 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cabinet introduced a measure to reduce the sales tax in order to help families with their budget and remove this burden of the sales tax on all items which are required in everyday life. Those were the arguments given by the Minister of Finance at the time. He submitted this was designed to exempt the largest families, those that consume most, from that sales tax burden in order to increase their net revenues. Second, it was meant to help this country's economy, because the increased purchasing power given to those families might boost consumption and thus allow our economy to perform at a more normal rate, through wider use of domestically produced goods. Such was the aim, to increase the purchasing power of individuals and families.

Mr. Speaker, last week I attended part of the first ministers' conference, between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the provincial premiers. There was a consensus, and I welcome this, that it was important for a new Canadian constitution to include in the first chapter the rights of individuals and families. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the individual is entitled to sufficient revenues from work and other sources where he is unable to support himself. The same thing goes for families, Mr. Speaker. Families are the cornerstone of our society, the basic cell created by the Lord, because as I said if it were man's invention it would have long since disappeared.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the name of Canadian mothers who really contributed and are now contributing to this country's development by giving our society boys and girls to fill important functions, I say we have an obligation, a duty to them, and I feel this is the time to try and show them that we, as managers of this country's affairs, recognize their important role in our society through economic and financial provisions.

Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to support alternative measures if they fulfil that objective. But my insistence is that we make an effort to compensate for the purchasing power lacking in families at or below the poverty line.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

As I said, Mr. Speaker, whether she be poor or a millionaire, the mother giving birth to a child contributes just the same. She puts the same effort and deserves the same recognition. If the millionaire mother has advantages, so much the better. But we as legislators should strive to compensate for the low income of families where the provider earns a mere pittance, or is unemployed.

Heaven knows if there are jobless now in this country. I do not want to blame anyone but I say that today it is disappointing for mothers who made sacrifices to enable their young daughters to attend high school, the CEGEP or university so that they may earn a decent living, when those young girls—and it must be the same thing for everyone in this House—when those young girls after completing their education apply to an employer with their diploma, whether in the federal government or the provincial government or in the private sector, and they are asked: Do you have any experience? Since the young girl has just finished school, she can only answer: No, sir, I do not have any experience but I am willing to try. The employer tells her: We only hire experienced people here. Those young girls make their way back home and tell father or mother: It's too bad, he would have hired me, but I have no experience.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like the government, the Parliament of Canada, to be aware enough of those situations—there are hundreds of them—I would not want my words to be distorted—to allow those mothers who voluntarily want to stay home, because their role is to stay there, not to be penalized, not to be punished for choosing that role as opposed to those who decided to go and work in industry, in business or elsewhere. We now have in the province of Quebec—I say so because I know what I am talking about—young girls, registered nurses, who are refused jobs because other people without a degree are being hired to do the same work for less. I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to tell me that my time is up.

I would have had so much to say in favour of mothers, but I want all mothers in Canada to understand that I wanted by my motion to show them that they are performing an important role in this country and that we have a duty to them. I urge all my colleagues in the House to consider that we should fulfil our obligations to them by recognizing a right—the right to a decent family income.

[English]

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend the customary commendation to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for bringing forward motion No. 15 respecting the payment of an allowance to housewives. Unfortunately, I cannot support the motion, although certainly I support the principle, as I am sure all members of the House do, of assisting families to meet spending needs which result from the presence of children within the family unit. I believe, however, that the measure recently enacted by this parliament to assist the lower middle income families in the form of a refundable child tax credit is far superior, both conceptually and practically, to the specific means of support suggested in the motion before us.

The hon. member would have the government consider a way of ensuring a global income corresponding to a family's needs. This is precisely the process that has been under way for several years and which led to the refundable child tax credit.

It surprises me that the hon. member would bring before this House a motion that is word for word the same as one he introduced previously and which was discussed in the House on two occasions last year, in one case by myself. The motion before us reflects none of the useful and constructive comments that were made by members of all parties in previous discussions. Most of all, it ignores the significant change which the new child tax credit represents in the way the federal government gives financial support to families with children.

In his motion and his remarks, the hon. member appears to recognize that many women have entered the labour force so that they and their families will be able to enjoy a decent standard of living. I wonder if he has considered how much money it would take to replace the lost earnings if these women were to stay at home as the hon. member would like them to. The figure would be in the billions of dollars. Where would the hon. member suggest we get this money? In December of last year, married women made up almost one quarter of the Canadian work force. Can the hon. member imagine the disastrous effect on the economy of this country if the contribution of these millions of women was lost?

Quite aside from any financial need to work outside the home, this government believes strongly that women as well as men, regardless of their marital or family situation, have an undeniable right to seek remunerative employment outside the home if they so choose. Suggestions such as the one implicit in this motion, that "a woman's place is in the home", particularly if reinforced financially as the hon. member suggests, lead to the creation of an atmosphere in which this basic right to a job can be questioned or denied. This is deplorable.

The motion would have us pay allowances to all "housewives who remain at home to look after their families." They are not even to be restricted to those with young children or to families in financial need. Clearly this is a measure aimed at keeping married women out of the work force. It is not clear why, in the absence of children, the performance of housework should by itself merit financial support from the government.

The hon. member has not yet given us any indication of how this allowance would be financed. Perhaps he would do this by taking away the family allowance and the child tax credit. He would be able to give those who stayed at home a bit more than they are getting now unless all the eligible women stayed home. Whatever increase he could finance in this way would not be large. It would not be large enough to persuade women from low income families to give up their jobs.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to respect the hon. member's time, but I would not like the population to be misled. The hon. member is saying that perhaps I would like to see the family allowances disappear and so on. I never said that; I never even thought about that. I said and I repeat that I would like people to be free to decide whether or not they will go out and look for a job.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I can understand that the hon. member does not like the comments made by the hon. member for Halton, but the fact is that one of his colleagues can rise and refute the hon. member's arguments later. The Chair cannot allow simultaneous and repetitive interruptions which can prevent other members from carrying on the debate.

[English]

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, may I just say, in the interest of saving time, that the first speaker suggested these things. I am asking questions, such as where would the money come from, and so on. But I would like to carry on.

As I said, many of these women will not give up their jobs, and their families would not have enough to live on. How would the hon. member explain to these women that he had taken away their baby bonuses and their tax credits to give the money to those who stayed home, if in fact that is what happened?

When the same motion was discussed in the House on February 27 of last year, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) expressed a view which I believe is shared by most Canadians. She said, as reported at page 3265 of Hansard:

> If there is work to be done in the home it should be paid for by whoever is earning the living, be it the man or the woman.
> There must never again be a Murdock case in Canada.

"Women and Pensions", a report produced last year by Kevin Collins for the Canadian Council on Social Development, adopted a similar view, concluding that the recognition of the value of housework should be enhanced through fundamental reform of the family law as it affects property. The report pointed out that current financial obligations between spouses are largely based on concepts on dependence and survival needs, rather than on a recognition of the value of housework or other unpaid contributions to the building up of family assets.

The principle of joint contribution to the acquisition of assets regardless of who pays the money out has not been widely established. This is, of course, an area which falls within provincial jurisdiction.

Pay for housework, the report also points out, does nothing to solve sexual division of labour inside and outside the home; it may simply serve to make it more rigid and to legitimize it. I would not want to see government interfere in family decisions in the way this motion suggests. To paraphrase an earlier statement of some renown, the state has no place in the kitchens of the nation.

I believe that the hon. member for Halton, that is me, Mr. Speaker, raised a very valid point in relation to this motion when it was last discussed in the House. It is a point which well bears repeating. Rather than trying to keep women in the home, he suggested the need for much greater variety in the organization of our work life. In particular, a greater use of regularized part-time employment could benefit parents and enable them to utilize their skills and contribute to the family income while sharing in housework responsibilities. In this way, one parent, usually the woman, would not be forced into the lonely, isolated existence which too often characterizes the lot of the housewife.

As I pointed out, many mental health experts recommend part-time work for young mothers to help them overcome the sense of deprivation of not using their education and prior training, and to cope with the lack of contact and stimulation which they experience when they become new mothers. If society and employers were to recognize the legitimate place of regular part-time work in the work world, this isolation could be reduced and, along with it, problems such as alcoholism, and emotional disturbances which are too frequently experienced by housewives. Greater availability of part-time work on a continuing basis would also allow more fathers to share more equitably in the performance of household tasks.

The motion presented by the hon. member for Bellechasse refers to an allowance for housewives which would provide "an additional family income to that earned by the father." The proposal neglects the plight of single parent families which are predominantly headed by women. I might add, however, that an increasing proportion of these families are being headed by men. As with most existing welfare systems, the proposal would evidently exclude such men from assistance. Even in the case of sole-support mothers, the proposed measure would be inadequate. Even though the member for Bellechasse has acknowledged in his motion and earlier statements that two incomes are often necessary these days to meet the expenses of a family, he would say to sole-support working mothers, "Sorry, if you want help from us, you will have to quit your job and stay home."

In contrast with this attitude, the child tax credit which has been enacted by parliament will result in about $106 million in payments to single parent families this year. These sole-support parents, of whom over 90 per cent are women, will not have to stay at home in order to receive this assistance. Of the money going to this group, $35 million will be a net gain to the lowest income single parent families, who are almost all headed by women.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

In total, $810 million will be paid to women in the form of the refundable tax credit entirely to those in middle and lower income families. Despite the reduction in family allowance payments, women, as a group, will be getting $120 million more this year in payments than they would have under the previous system. The measure proposed by this motion is intended "to ensure a global income corresponding to the family's needs."

Successive governments in this country have recognized for over thirty years that there is a need for intervention in the way in which the free market system distributes its rewards. As impressive as it is as a generator of wealth and income, the market system, if left to itself, does not ensure that all of our citizens will receive income adequate to their needs and those of their families. Wage rates are set without regard to the financial needs of their recipients. This is as it must be if the system is to operate efficiently. Clearly there is a role for the government in compensating for this market failure.

The Marsh report on social security in Canada recognized this over thirty years ago when it recommended the introduction of family allowances. The then prime minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, stated that society had a responsibility to assist in the costs of child rearing.

Child benefits delivered by means of the income tax system have an even longer history in Canada than family allowances. Child tax exemptions were introduced in 1918 only one year after the start of the income tax system itself. It is interesting to note that for a brief period during the Second World War the exemptions were replaced by non-refundable child tax credits.

Family allowances were introduced in 1945 to complement the tax benefits. The federal child benefits system grew in importance to the extent that, last year, it distributed about $2.7 billion to Canadian families, with most of this being paid directly to mothers.

It was recognized, however, that despite this assistance, there were still nearly 600,000 families with over 1 million children living in poverty. Studies of the children from such families have shown that they are more likely to be sick than children from other families. They are also more likely to be severely retarded in their physical development. As a result of these difficulties, children from poorer families are less likely to perform well in school and hence are too likely to end up in low paying dead-end jobs. They, in turn, are unable to provide adequately for the needs of their children, and the cycle begins again.

The social and economic costs of this tragedy are enormous. Pressures on government-provided social and health services are increased. The connection between poverty and crime and violence is also well recognized, particularly in our urban areas. We are all losers when thousands of our fellow Canadians live in poverty.

It was with these considerations in mind that the recent changes to our child benefits system were enacted. The effort was made to get more assistance to those families which most needed it. The government was looking for ways to reduce the level of government spending, and yet at the same time it recognized the need to help low and middle income families. The introduction of the refundable child tax credit combined with other changes was seen as a way of achieving greater fairness and doing a better job with the resources at our disposal.

As hon. members are aware, the child tax credit is refundable. This important feature will mean that benefits will be received by families whose incomes are too low to be taxable, as well as by those in the middle income ranges. Two thirds of Canadian families will receive benefits from this new measure.

There are admittedly some additional administrative costs associated with this new approach. Compared to alternative ways of concentrating the benefits at the low and middle ranges of the income scale, however, the approach adopted is a sensible one. Furthermore, the benefits to be derived more than justify the additional costs.

For recipients of the child tax credit who have not previously been required to fill out tax returns, there may be some initial confusion. The measures announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to assist people in applying for these benefits should go a long way toward overcoming this problem. Ways of simplifying the procedure are being examined for application in future.

It is interesting that the motion before us speaks of the global family income, because this is precisely the concept that is being used to determine the amount of benefit each family will get from this measure. This approach was adopted because the government wanted to make the benefit correspond more closely to a family's need for assistance than would have been the case with a universal payment or if only the income of one parent had been considered.

Despite the reduction in the level of family allowances, this program will remain the largest single federal child-related program and will continue to be the foundation of the federal system of benefits. It will also remain fully indexed to the cost of living, as will the new child tax credit.

The new system that we have adopted is significantly fairer than the one in place previously. Low income families will now receive greater federal benefits than will high income families. This was not the case in the past and was the object of justifiable criticism from several quarters, including the National Council of Welfare in their report called "The Hidden Welfare System".

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I think we are indebted once again to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for bringing this particular motion before us. In the previous debate which took place in this House a little less than a year ago the matter received support from all sides of the House, with a number of very definite reservations. I do not think that, in the main, these reservations have changed very much.

I am most intrigued by the government's response this year as compared to last year, at least if that is the one that can be measured by the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook). I think that hon. member has, at least in some ways, improved the response from the government side in respect of this measure. He needs a bit more practise, perhaps, in reading, as indicated by the fact that when he started to quote himself he began by saying "he". I think, more seriously, he should do a bit more research in the area of child tax credit, particularly when he asserts, as he did almost as the main part of his speech, that the child tax credit meets a particular situation in recognizing the economic and social benefits of women in the home. I think that we need to do more research in terms of its impact with respect to women.

I was interested to note that the major concern of the hon. member for Halton was that the motion would have an impact on taking women out of employment situations outside the home, that it would create pressure to take women out of the market place and the mainstream of the economy, thereby forcing them back into a home-making situation. If the hon. member thinks that that is a problem, I suggest that he look at the principle which was adopted in the child tax credit bill. I will not repeat it because it was dealt with at some length both by myself and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

There are problems which are created by the principle which the hon. member referred to, in terms of the global family income assessment. From the standpoint of making a determination of greatest need, one can find little fault with the approach. But it is not a matter of dealing with the husband and wife in a position of equal equity at this point, because it is well established that the average income of women in our society for the same kind of employment that a man might do is only 60 per cent of that earned by the male counterpart. This is an indication that we still have a long way to go with respect to any kind of income equality.

The implication which is very much a part of the child tax credit plan is that there will be subtle and, perhaps, not so subtle pressures created to take women out of the work force and to force them, against their will, back into a domestic situation. I think it would have been useful if the hon. member for Halton had raised as well the problems in connection with the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We are still hearing the repercussions of that exercise.

If the hon. member had read the briefs by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women he would have found a number of reasons why they object to the approach which is being taken and which was creating a number of problems for women in the work force. However, that is not the substance of the motion before us this afternoon.

Since the hon. member for Bellechasse presented his motion, there has been more up to date information which has attempted to put a value on the work created in the home. In a study done in May, 1978, by Queen's University, they came up with a value of $60 billion, or one third of the gross national product on work created in the home. A report by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women which came out in June, 1978, entitled, "Five Million Women, a Study of the Canadian Housewife", concurred with the finding, that the figure for work done in the home was very substantial.

The important aspect of the motion before us today, and which was before us last February 27, as I see it, is the recognition by society of the importance of the work done in the home. Quite obviously, this is the problem with which society and, up until now, the major organs of society, such as this House of Commons, have not adequately wrestled. As I said almost a year ago, I agree that more adequate economic and social recognition must be given to women who remain at home, indeed, not just to women, but men or women who remain at home.

I went on at some length in previous remarks on this same motion about the way in which lifestyles are changing to the point that increasingly men as well as women are taking on the domestic responsibilities in the home when they move out of the work force. Ideally, at some future point this is the kind of equilibrium we would like to achieve.

The hon. member for Halton quoted from a section of the Canadian Council on Social Development report having to do with women's pensions. His quotation bears repeating because it is the nub of the problem which we presently face, and that is that the pay-for-housework proposal does nothing to solve the sexual division of labour inside and outside the home. So far in this debate, this problem has not been referred to, but there is an acute and present problem having to do with elderly women in poverty as consequence of the many earning years they have spent at home raising families, looking after spouses and, as a result, not being eligible to contribute to pension plans.

According to recent statistics, the percentage of unattached women living in poverty jumped from 41.2 per cent to 45 per cent as of November, 1978. The percentage of unattached elderly over 70 living in poverty jumped from 58.1 per cent to 63.2 per cent, most of these people being women. Obviously there is a very pressing need to initiate some action with respect to the desperate straits in which older single women find themselves in our society, whether they are women who have worked for the greater part of their lives as single women, or women who have cared for families and who have been left in a destitute state in their later years.

In the advisory council report which was produced in June, they came up with a figure of some five million Canadian women who are performing up to 60 hours of work in the home per week. It should be recognized at the outset that the people who work in the home are not in a normal employment situation where they have an opportunity to report for work at a specific time, coffee breaks at mid-morning and mid-afternoon, or time off for lunch, personal duties, responsibilities, and so on. When we talk of women in the home, we are talking about women who work longer hours than in any other form of employment in our society, people who must work sometimes under extreme pressure, particularly during those years of heavy responsibility while raising a young family. Yet in no way have we tried to look at the responsibility of society with regard to people in the home.

The June report of the advisory council said that housewives should be compensated for their contributions and that economic ways should be found, including such things as guaranteed annual incomes, special provisions within the Canada Pension Plan or inclusion of housewives in general social insurance plans.

We are far removed from reaching that achievement. The closest we have come was in the discussions we had in this House last year with respect to the problems of taxation affecting farmers who, in many instances, employ their wives, or small businessmen who employ their wives and they are not allowed to make the proper income tax deductions which recognize the real contribution that spouses make in those forms of industry and activity regarded as small business. There has been a real failure by governments to examine their responsibilities with respect to the largest form of employment that exists, and that is the home. As the advisory council stated in June, "pension policies should take into account that pensions are assets and therefore should be included in the splitting of the marital assets based on the equal contribution of each spouse." The contribution would come from work performed both outside and inside the home. In other words, the advisory council on the status of women suggested that the time has come to place an economic value on housework to give it the basis which it deserves.

It is interesting to note that so far in the efforts to achieve recognition of the importance of housework to society, even the most minimal kinds of recognition have been ignored. Some members will recall that just a few weeks ago the National Council of Women was here to meet with the cabinet and respresentatives of all parties. One of their major requests which they have put forward on previous occasions was that homemaking be included as a recognized occupation under the occupational index of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we can go that far. I am sorry that so far this has not been referred to by the government side, but I would think that this is one matter on which all members can agree—a beginning of recognition of the importance of homemaking to the economy so that it could be included as one of the recognized occupations in the occupational index.

There is very basically an issue here which I think the hon. member for Bellechasse has quite rightly brought to our attention with repeated emphasis, and that is that women in the home make a contribution that in no way has been recognized, either in terms of any kind of allowance or compensation or tax recognition, or even in terms of the recognized pension programs that deal with the plight of elderly women in our society.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we must also recognize that if we were to enact this particular provision by itself, without recognizing the particular problems that women are presently encountering in maintaining their right to be a part of the over-all work force of our society, we might at this period cause a very serious dislocation.

As members will know, I and other members in this House have been troubled by the increasing references by members of the government to the problems that are created by the economy when women are increasing their participation in the work force. I think this does no credit whatsoever to the over-all economic strategy of the government in terms of trying to achieve greater employment opportunity for both men and women. I think that again this motion by itself would add only further momentum to the kind of misunderstanding and misdirection created by the government with respect to its attitude to women in the work force. However, Mr. Speaker, I think the essential principle—and that is the recognition of the contribution, both economically and socially made by people in the home, whether it be women or men—is rightfully brought to our attention. I would hope that in a further debate on this matter not only will we hear from the member for Halton, who is very interested in the issue, but also from the minister who has the responsibility for the status of women.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the hon. member. Since he is constantly referring to the report, I might specify that it is entitled: "Women and Work—Five Million Women: A Study of the Canadian Housewife" by Monique Proulx, published in June 1978. Is that right? While reading the report one of the things—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: First the hon. member must get the permission of the hon. member for Egmont.

[English]

Does the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, what I am interested in, what is of concern to me, is to know what exactly does the hon. member think of the famous question asked of a woman: Madam, do you work? That question is of concern to me because it has a rather difficult and embarrassing impact when statisticians are canvassing neighbourhoods and asking that question of housewives, or mothers as the hon. member said. Could the hon. member tell us what his position is regarding that question which is, I think, basic? Does he consider that the housewife, the mother, is doing unpaid work in the proper sense of the word? What is his own definition and how would he answer such a question asked of every Canadian woman?

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Very briefly, I think that given the fact that work in the home is the most prevalent occupation exercised by any individual in our society, and since I believe there are many occupations outside the home which are a lot less precise in terms of both their responsibility and activity which are defined in the occupational index, there could be devised basic criteria which would meet the question put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). I see no problem with that whatsoever, and I think that that would be the first step towards some real recognition in terms of its importance to the economy and to our society.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to see this motion talked out. Therefore my contribution will be very brief. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) criticized the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for putting down in exactly the same wording, the motion he has put down on previous occasions. May I congratulate my friend for doing just that, for staying with it. That has to be done around here, I can tell the hon. member that.

One of the other reasons why it is not necessary for me to speak more than a moment is because the issues have been well discussed by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). I agree with him that it is good to have this motion before us because it brings into focus the whole thrust of recognizing the work that women do in the home. There are various ways it should be recognized. One is by an allowance which, after all, is the family allowance made larger, and another is by proper pension recognition for work done in the home. The other points raised are also important.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, we have begun to move on this issue. We have moved slowly thus far, and I am glad the hon. member for Bellechasse is making a crusade of it. He has my support.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I have left I will take the opposite side. I feel that the changes in the benefits for children which have occurred since the motion was put on the order paper, and the changes which are going to assist low and middle income families, will pretty well do what the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) requests.

Contrary to the opinion of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), I would say that the problem is not a case of recognizing the obvious. All of us recognize the very important work of the housewife or the woman in the home. The problem is not so much financial reward, because I am sure we have other and better ways of ensuring they have enough on which to live. The main thing is to give the women a chance to get out of the house, to engage in work of a gainful character outside the home. The woman in the home is generally not so anxious for financial reward as to get out among other people.

There are a great many people in the low income category who never get a chance to go out and have a good time. As the hon. member for Egmont says, they do not even have a chance for a coffee break or to discuss what is going on in the world. They are absolutely house slaves. Just giving them an income and money would not get them out of that enslavement. They should have a chance, when they have finished bringing up the three or four children which is the family target in society, to engage in a gainful occupation so that they can hold up their heads with the male members of society.

At the same time, because of their restriction to the home and housework, we must recognize and admire their devotion. Of course it is obvious too, that some put in long hours but do not accomplish very much.

Because of their restricted life, I think women have a greater tendency to retire into senior citizens' homes than men do. As a consequence, they suffer a greater amount of mental depression than their male counterparts. I think this is due to the fact that they have not had the chance for wide contact with other human beings at all levels of society and with varied interests. This is because of the narrowness and bleakness of our culture, and their cultural possibilities. They would be far better off working 60 or 70 hours outside the home and all of them, as has been mentioned before, would do very well indeed to have at least part-time work for a certain portion of their lives.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is six o'clock. I am sorry I have had to give such a condensed summary of some of my points.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1978

MEASURE TO CHANGE RETIREMENT BENEFIT PROVISIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Buchanan that Bill C-12, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

[Mr. Railton.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): At five o'clock the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan) had the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying this afternoon, not only did the actuarial commission find out that the government had confused the true cost of the plan with the amounts it was setting aside, but the actuarial commission reported that the assumptions in the government's valuation were not realistic. In particular, they pointed to one specific pair of assumptions. First, even though pensions will be paid based upon final salary, no salary increases will occur, and second that although the fund was earning 7.6 per cent, it would only earn 4 per cent interest. In other words, the chief actuary was implicitly assuming that some of his assumptions offset each other. He was explicitly underestimating the cost of the plan by assuming that no future salary increases would take place, and hoping that this would be balanced out by explicitly underestimating the amount of interest earned by the fund.

I am sure individually these assumptions do not make sense. They do not reflect reality. It is even questionable whether taken together they make sense. But I would like to stress that at no time did the chief actuary ever indicate that the only interest required to be earned by the fund to provide the benefits was 4 per cent. He merely used this low interest rate, together with no provision for future salary increases, to simplify the calculation.

The consultants found that on the basis of their best estimates the combined cost of the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act for current employees was 15.3 per cent of payroll, and the current year's cost for past service benefits amounted to an additional 19.1 per cent of payroll. This 34 per cent compares with an average employer current service cost in the private sector of 5 to 6 per cent of payroll.

The consultants also found that no conclusion could be drawn as to whether the total compensation of the public sector was greater than the total compensation of the private sector, for a rather interesting reason. In spite of the fact that total compensation comparability was explicit government policy, and we still have a bill before this House saying it is explicit government policy, the government had never made a study to find out what the facts were. According to the actuarial report, the impression created by the basic facts paper that the value of pensions for federal public servants was no better than that found in the private sector was false.

The consultants made several specific recommendations; several of these affect this bill directly. They recommended that a valuation of the combined plan be made with each plan change. They recommended that these valuation assumptions be made as realistic as possible. They recommended that a valuation of the combined plan occur at least every three years. They recommended that the contributions to the plan should be made in line with the results of the valuation as is required in the private sector.

In response to the actuarial report, the then president of the treasury board indicated that he was going to make changes which were "just and fair in terms of their impact on taxpayers", however at the same time "the principle of maintaining the purchasing value of pensions . . . is a principle to which the government is committed and remains committed." It is rather interesting how he married these conclusions. He started by stating that there are experts who feel that we can count on seeing a long-term situation in which interest rates will be 3 per cent to 4 per cent ahead of the rate of inflation.

I find that interesting because the only five-year period over the past 55 years in which the real return was 4 per cent or above was the first five years of the great depression. I will admit that there are many experts who believe that this government's economic policies are leading us inexorably into the next depression, but surely that is not something the government wants to count on in setting up its pension plans.

On the other hand, it is possible that those experts reside in the Department of Finance. In fact, it may be that one of the so-called experts is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). After all, he has been feeding out highly optimistic financial estimates to this House since he took over the portfolio.

The fact is, there are experts and there are experts. Some, like the finance minister, have no credibility. Others are well respected. I believe we have a duty to find out just what well-known economists are predicting real returns at this level. In fact the only period that we have seen of real returns of over 3 per cent are years in which we had changes in the consumer price index of less than 4 per cent. This 4 per cent was the original objective under the anti-inflation program, but then that was just another of this government's over-optimistic forecasts.

In any case, having introduced these experts, the President of the Treasury Board indicated that he saw two basic choices; one was to continue the current plan and see which of these so-called experts were correct; the other was to introduce immediately a set of ad hoc adjustments. The minister of that time said that in his view the stakes, namely, the welfare of future taxpayers and pensioners, are just too high to gamble on continuing the current arrangements.

When the government introduced the new arrangements it was gambling as well, gambling with the lives of our public servants. Yet the implication in what was said is that somehow it has reduced the risk.

What we have before us now is something even more nebulous than what we were presented with in 1973. In 1973, we at least knew half of the equation, we knew what level of benefits our pensioners were likely to get. We did not know what it would cost.

With this legislation we do not have the cost estimates once again. But this time we do not have any idea what level of benefits will be provided in the future. The government is asking us to buy a pig in a poke, to pay an unknown price for a series of unknown benefits. We owe our public more than this. We have to find out what the price of these benefits is for the general public, and similarly we ought to ensure public servants that they will receive a decent pension, a pension reasonably related to future changes in the cost of living.

That is the purpose of the two questions that I asked in the House on November 3. I am concerned that these ad hoc arrangements will not deliver adequate benefits to our retired public servants. I am particularly concerned because of the way the plan is divided into the three groups consisting of the RCMP, the armed forces and the public service. Before we adopt any plan which changes this multi-billion dollar plan, we owe it to ourselves and to our public to ensure that in the future the plan produces reasonable benefits at a reasonable cost.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) earlier today spoke of his willingness to accept slight reductions in benefits at this time. We know that over the first three years the public servants would not be entitled to full indexing. However, we have no idea from this government what level of indexing will be provided for in the future. Will it be one half the cost of living or one quarter? Just what is the government proposing? What are the public servants likely to receive under inflationary conditions in the future? That is a question that must be answered before we vote on this bill.

The second part of my question of November 3 had to do directly with the cost of the program. As I indicated, it appears to me, and certainly I am willing to be corrected by the President of the Treasury Board, that the changes which have been introduced will place a greater burden on the public treasury to support the public service superannuation account, a burden which could be in the order of a hundred million dollars each and every year.

This transfer arises because of the use made of that arbitrary 4 per cent interest assumption. I mentioned earlier the fact that the chief actuary assumed a yield of 4 per cent on the money to offset the assumption that there were going to be no future salary increases. This did not mean at all that he only needed 4 per cent interest. He needed the excess interest earnings to offset the deficiency in the salary assumption. Yet what the government is proposing to do, Mr. Speaker, is to give these so-called excess earnings from retired pensioners' accounts to support their indexed pensions.

We heard the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) taking just one side of the equation today. He talked about the excess interest earnings, the windfall gains in interest that are made. If there are high interest rates in the future, it will likely be because inflation is out of control again. If there are high interest rates, there are high rates of salary increases. If there are windfall gains in interest, there are windfall losses because of the salary increases, because we guaranteed to pay a pension based upon the final salary. That is a very simple idea. One offsets the other. He cannot do what the government has just done and take the excess earnings on the interest, say that is for the pensioners, and the excess losses, because of future inflation, are for the taxpayer, yet that is what this government is trying to do in this bill.

We had serious questions raised in this House about the cost of the total plan, and particularly the cost of indexing. What the government appears to have done is primarily to transfer an unknown amount of money over from the Public Service Superannuation Act to support the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act and somehow pretend that everything is all right if the matching contributions plus these additional transfers make the indexing portion work. I think this is just a sham; it is a flim-flam. You cannot just transfer money from one side to another and say, "Look, the other side is now fine." That is Dagwood and Blondie economics. It reminds me of a situation where Dagwood and Blondie each have $30 and they both need to buy a $40 item. Blondie says to Dagwood, "Give me $10, then I will have $40 and at least one of us will be better off." In other words, forget what is happening on the other side. There is no more money created by this little exercise.

We have to look at both plans in combination and find out what is the additional public liability as a result of transferring these earnings out of the PSSA. Certainly it appears to me that what it will do is to increase the experience deficiencies of the PSSA dramatically.

In any case we do not know if it is still proposed to credit the pensioners with the excess over 4 per cent, since it is my understanding that the valuation which is being prepared will be made using realistic assumptions and the 4 per cent may not itself appear in the valuation any longer. We do not know, because the report due December, 1977, has still not appeared in spite of our requests that it be produced. Besides these two specific items, what the benefits will cost and what the benefits would look like, I have other reservations with the bill.

The bill should contain a provision to value the plan every three years, or prior to any subsequent plan amendment. This valuation should also include benefit projections.

In addition, question No. 556 that I placed on the order paper on November 9 was designed to give us essential information to judge this bill. How can we comment on the bill with no financial data presented by the government? In particular, I feel it is necessary to look at a projection on the amount of future indexing available for each of the three categories of employees separately, the armed forces, the RCMP and the civil service. I believe that what the government is doing in this bill is intrinsically weakening the funding basis for retired pensioners. It may well be that the ad hoc arrangements of their indexing come unhinged for one group before the others. If there is one group going to come unhinged, it will be the veterans. The House must find out when the indexing is going to break down.

Another question was designed to raise the point about the rate of interest credited to the fund. This has been a point of contention with public servants for some time. They feel they have not been credited with the rate of interest they could get if investments in private securities were allowed. Of course it is not necessary actually to invest in outside securities at all to credit a higher rate of interest. The current plan, after all, doesn't invest in real securities either; a hypothetical fund is set up to determine the amount of interest payable. The hypothetical fund could just as soon assume some other type of investment.

However, many Canadian actuaries have expressed great concern about our country's ability to pay for these phantom-funded plans because of the significant demographic changes which are going to occur in Canada over the next 50 years as the baby boom passes through into retirement. This is a point the hon. member for Ottawa West raised today. What is the difference? The difference is that with the phantom-funded plans we have now there are no real assets. The only asset we have is the future taxing power of the government.

With the demographic changes which will take place in this country, with the rapid increase in retirees as compared with the working population, I think we should give very serious consideration to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Ottawa West on a point of order.

Mr. Francis: I would like to ask the hon. member if he considers the public debt of Canada to be absolutely insignificant and worthless. Is not the asset of a Public Service Superannuation Fund just as real, just as valid, just as good as any security of the Government of Canada?

Mr. McCrossan: That is exactly what I have said. The point is that the rate at which we are building up debt is a source of concern to me because future taxpayers will be called upon to make good those obligations. And we owe it to the people of Canada to investigate just what that tax load is going to be in the future to pay off these obligations when they come due. For these reasons I ask whether any consideration is being given to setting aside some portion of the liability in real assets, not just hypothetical funds.

Again, the hon. member for Ottawa West said we had no choice, that we couldn't interfere in the private sector. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the hon. member takes the time to investigate he will find out that a reasonable portion—a small but growing one—of the Quebec pension plan is invested in the private sector. It is doing so without unduly influencing the private market. I am not suggesting that the whole fund should be invested in the private sector. Not at all! That would be quite another matter. But I think there is some merit to building up some portion of the fund in real assets.

I would like to make one final point in relation to this bill, Mr. Speaker. In Bill C-56, the amendments to the Income Tax Act, brought before the House last spring, the Minister of Finance restricted the rights of an individual citizen to retire before age 60 if they were funding their retirement plan with an RRSP. I talked today about the public perception that public servants have been set aside as a special breed in society. Here is another direct example. Public servants are allowed to retire on full pension at age 55. Individuals outside the public service are prohibited from having access to their retirement funds—their RRSP fund—for pension purposes until age 60. Not only that, the public servant receives a thousand dollar annual tax exempt income from age 55, while the RRSP policy holder, even if he takes money from age 60, does not get his tax exemption until age 65.

I am not for the moment suggesting that public servants should be restricted from retiring at age 60. However, I do believe the two acts should be brought into harmony. We cannot continue to have one rule for the public servants and another rule—designed by public servants—which is more restrictive for the rest of the public. We would be perpetuating an unfair discrimination between the retiring age at which members of the general public can have access to their pensions in the form of RRSPs and the age at which public servants can have their pensions. This House should consider directly harmonizing RRSP provisions with the early retirement provisions granted public servants.

This is a period of wide-scale cynicism and skepticism on the part of the public with respect to the government. What we have before us today is another bill to change the public service pensions, a bill for which so far we have no cost-estimates for the changes contemplated. On the contrary, we have what might be construed as a deliberate concealing of the cost effects of the PSSA. We have been provided with no benefit projections so that that public service might have some idea what they are paying for. The sort of cynicism I mentioned will only be magnified if the government continues to lay important financial bills in front of this House without providing any financial data.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, what I have been saying is that we face two obligations when considering any bill of the sort before us. We have an obligation to the general public, and we have an obligation to the public servants. In order to fulfil these twin obligations we must have some figures presented to us upon which to make an intelligent decision. In addition, we should ensure that from this point on such figures are provided us regularly, every three years, or upon any planned amendment, to ensure that parliament retains financial control over substantial expenditures. In the absence of any financial information how can we approve this bill? How can we commit the public of Canada and the public servants of Canada to this plan when we have no idea of what the plan actually is?

No wonder our economy under this government is in such dire straits today. Today we know that in 1973 we spent $6 billion. But we found that out only last year. Almost without thought we committed ourselves to spend that money. Today we are being asked to make future plans in the dark once again. Why? The real problem underlying this bill lies with inflation, not indexing. What we need to do is direct our attention to bringing down inflation. The hon. member for Ottawa West said today we have to learn to live with inflation. That is not something the party to which I belong accepts at all. That is Liberal philosophy. We have to take control of our financial expenditures in this country, and this bill is a good place with which to start.

I believe we must support this bill on second reading, if only to get it into committee. Then in committee the government will, hopefully, present us with some information on which to base our consideration of the bill. I cannot believe the government would present such a bill to parliament without evaluation, without benefit projections. Surely we have a right to see them. The public must be served. If we do not have the right to see them, if the government denies us this essential information, surely the public will condemn this government once more for its economic flim-flammery.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak extremely briefly on Bill C-12. I intend to do so because I support the bill strongly. I support the comments made on Thursday evening by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan), the speech by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the excellent speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis).

My reason for rising to enter this debate is the fact that early on when this became a public issue and the National Citizens Coalition started their campaign, I replied that I disagreed with their approach and that in my view it was full of error. I put together and distributed a statement, and some of the organizations within the public service which came across the statement thought it had a good deal of merit. They, in turn, circulated it across the country because it was supportive of adequate public service pensions and, indeed, of adequate pensions in general. I suppose it was because of this that the National Citizens' Coalition decided they should apply a lot of pressure to myself and they did so through a variety of means.

Therefore, I thought I should stand in my place this evening and put on record the essential points which were made in the statement I read some time ago in response to their original misrepresentation. I regret the National Citizens' Coalition did what they did. It developed a good deal of ill will toward public servants which they in no way deserve. In my opinion Canada is well served by its public servants, and the kind of insinuations made about them were very disagreeable for the public servants to bear.

At a meeting after this became a public issue I asked some people what they thought the average pension of a public servant really was. Some of the responses were $15,000, $16,000 or $20,000 a year. I think I am fairly accurate in saying that the average number of years a public servant works is 25 and that after that length of service his retirement pension is about $5,100 a year. When people understand that, they begin to think that the issue raised by the National Citizens' Coalition is pretty phony.

I think the National Citizen's Coalition is running a stalking horse in its intervention so that people in the private sector who resist setting up an adequate pension plan for employees in the private sector will not have to begin thinking in terms of putting together a pension plan which would provide adequate benefits for employees.

So far in this debate spokesmen for all parties—at least the principal spokesmen—essentially agree with the provisions of the bill. More importantly, they have joined in opposing the National Citizens' Coalition. However, I am not sure I can say that in all sincerity about the previous speaker, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan).

The hon. member for York-Scarborough represents the opinion which is expressed very often by supporters of his party. I hope hon. members opposite follow the lead of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and attempt to convince their supporters that his is the stance they should be taking. I am sure there are many supporters of the official opposition who will be amazed that the hon. member for Hamilton West should take such a moderate stand. I think he has taken a rather progressive point of view on this bill.

Mr. Alexander: That is what I am, a Progressive Conservative.

Mr. Milne: I congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West for doing that, but I am sure his stand is not in tune with some of the things which are being said by some of the supporters of his party who try to pursue the argument that somehow the public service has a very rich pension plan, that the private sector could in no way afford such a plan, and that somehow that would amount to a tremendous liability for the taxpayer.

There are really two basic questions at stake here. One is support for good pension plans, both private and public. The hon. member for York-Scarborough seemed to be putting forward the argument put forward vigorously by the National Citizens' Coalition, that we should be pulling down public service pensions rather than that in the private sector there is a need to increase pensions so that people working in that sector have adequate protection. It seems to me that many of those who associate themselves with that school of thought have never worked on farms or known the rural communities in that part of Canada where I was born and grew up years ago. People who were not owners of farms and who worked out as hired men did not enjoy favourable retirement conditions because they were very poorly paid during their working years. It was very difficult for them to put money aside for retirement. Anyone from that kind of environment has to be a strong supporter of adequate pensions.

I am delighted that the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre argued that point. They did so very well. The issue is adequate pensions for all Canadians, not tearing down the public service pension system which has been established.

The President of the Treasury Board established in his speech that the basic pension plan is very sound actuarially and that Bill C-12 would make the indexing provision of the plan actuarially sound. In the statement I prepared, a condition upon which I said I would support public service pensions is that there must be an adequate pension, but it must be actuarially sound. There must be a decrease in the pay-out to accomplish that, and Bill C-12 does that. That was the part of the argument of the previous speaker which I did not follow. He said that somehow there was no information available as to what this would cost if parliament should commit itself by passing this bill.

I think the President of the Treasury Board was very clear when he said in his speech that the question now would be how much pension could be paid with the money available, not how much it would cost, and I invite the hon. member for York-Scarborough to read the comments of the President of the Treasury Board because the answer to the very questions the hon. member was raising is the basis of the bill.

Another point I made in my statement is that, for the life of me, I cannot follow the line of argument which essentially says that we should not have good pensions. In the absence of good pensions the needs of people in their retirement years will have to be funded from the tax base. I am amazed that the National Citizens' Coalition should not support the argument that it is better to have employees contribute to an adequate pension plan for their retirement years during their employment years. If we argue against pension plans, then we must also argue that after retirement, when there is great need, the government will have to help in a substantial way.

I am sure we all remember that a few years ago the pensions of teachers, nurses and other groups were very modest and not indexed. After a period of inflation those pensions became very inadequate. There were strong representations to governments about how inadequate those pensions were, and after a time governments were obligated to put very large lump sum payments into those plans in order to improve them so that people on those pensions could go on. That is not a good way to go about supporting Canadians in their retirement years. However, that seems to be exactly the argument the National Citizens' Coalition has been making.

The major provisions in this bill regarding indexing not beginning until age 60 are fair. The proportioning of the amount of indexing available to a person at retirement, given the date of retirement, is very fair. We all know about the advantages enjoyed previously by those retiring in the last days of December. On January 1 of the following year they had the advantage of a full year of indexing. I think that is very unfair to those paying into the plan. I think it is taking advantage of the plan, and changing that should surely be accepted by the public service and supported by all hon. members.

The basic theory of the bill regarding the amount of pension the plan can afford is also good. I am pleased that the President of the Treasury Board feels that there should be a basic amount available so that people who earned low salaries and wages throughout their working lives can have at least a base upon which to operate rather than a completely comparative type of pension plan.

One question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West the other night was the question of why there has not been an opportunity for the public service to increase their contributions, given the fact that as an employee group they do contribute, on a percentage basis, as high a percentage as any employee group of which I am aware. That is a good point, but I think even the public service recognizes that the indexing provision of the plan at the present time cannot be actuarially sound and therefore there are two options, one to gear down the pay-out so that it balances, and another to contribute voluntarily over a year or so a higher percentage of salary so that there can be full indexing without any liability to the taxpayer. There may very well be good reasons why both those options were not offered, and I think when this bill is in committee this might be explored to see whether there is in fact a possibility in that regard.

I represent a very large number of air traffic controllers in my riding by virtue of the fact that Toronto International Airport is located on the boundary of my riding. I think the special provision in the bill for air traffic controllers is fair and just. It is a provision for which they have argued over the years, and I was glad to see that provision in Bill C-12 in terms of their indexing procedure.

I just wanted to make the point that for quite some time I have been upset by the approach of the National Citizens' Coalition and the kind of half truths which they have put forward. This has done a great deal of damage to the credibility of the public service. I want it to be put on the record that I support the provision of adequate pensions for all Canadians. The issue should be whether or not all Canadians have adequate pensions, rather than the argument that because public servants have contributed more than any other group on a percentage basis they should have a good pension. I wonder why the National Citizens' Coalition, and some of the people in the business community who support their argument as strongly as they do, do not see the value of my argument. It is far better to have an employee contribute to an adequate pension plan during his or her working years than to give him a small pension and have him look to the government to supplement it from the tax basis during his retirement years.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity I had to contribute to the debate briefly.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I intend to confine my remarks tonight to the RCMP and the manner in which this bill affects that force. I will be somewhat critical of certain aspects of it in so far as it concerns the force. I happened to hear the hon. member who has just resumed his seat refer to air traffic controllers. The bill contains a provision to establish a special pension program, which was agreed to by the government in 1976, I believe, for air traffic controllers in operational or tower service. In effect, the provisions bring them increased pension benefits, in addition to the 2 per cent of salary which is contributed by controllers once the bill takes effect and is matched by the employer in order to pay for these benefits.

There is a good reason behind those special provisions. Air traffic controllers in operational or tower duties operate, particularly at heavy density traffic aerodromes such as Toronto, Montreal and others, under very heavy stress. They have in their hands the lives of crews and passengers of literally hundreds of aircraft coming in and out of those airports daily. So there should be special provisions for them. They burn out.

A somewhat similar argument can be made with respect to those who serve in maximum security penitentiaries in the country, and indeed that is one of their annually recurring submissions with respect to their retirement plans. The stress factor applies even more forcefully to members of the police forces, not just the RCMP but any police force, particularly those in the larger metropolitan centres. I will quote briefly now from the Canadian Police Chief issue of January, 1979, from an article by inspector Charles Massey, police chaplain with the Ontario Provincial Police. The article begins as follows:

> The evening news has just ended. It's 11.30 p.m. She went in to check the kids and re-tuck them in. She returned to the living room, sat sleeping in front of the late movie and waited for Jack to return from the 4-12 shift. It was a good movie and she didn't notice the time passing. Later, glancing at her watch, she saw 1.30. "Where's Jack? . . . must have had a late call", she thought. Fifteen minutes later she heard a car pull into the driveway and its door close. Then the doorbell rang. " . . . must have forgotten his key." She opened the door and there stood the Detachment Commander and the Chaplain. "Mary, there's been an accident . . . Jack's been shot . . . he's dead . . ."

That is not an isolated sort of occurrence. That has happened so far, during 1978 at any rate, some 50 to 60 times in Canada. Just last week a member of the force was killed in the Yukon. What happens? There is a separate pension fund for dependants of members of the force, but the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, which has to be considered when considering this kind of legislation, is still in the dark ages so far as the treatment of dependants of officers of the force is concerned.

Consider this other example of an officer who was killed on duty who had over five years of service. Under the pension continuation act, the widow and children of that deceased member of the force are entitled to 50 per cent of his entitlement. If we refer to the pension superannuation act, we find that if a member of the force dies with less than ten years service, his widow and/or children receive a return of his contributions or an amount equal to one month's pay for each year of pensionable service, whichever is greater. Contribution of single members are payable to their estate. That certainly would not take a widow with three or four small children very far.

Let us consider another example, and I purposely avoid names here. This is an example of a member of the force in the maritimes who had served 21 years in the force and died of a heart attack. He left a wife and five children, the oldest was 16 and the youngest was two years of age. That widow and her five children are living on a pension of $490 a month. I believe—and I believe that that belief is shared by all members of the House—that that is a disgraceful way to treat members of a fine force such as the RCMP and their dependants in circumstances such as I have outlined. There is no way that a widow with five growing children can survive on $490 a month.

This is current data from which I will quote now. I am not going back to the days when my father received a grand total of $93 a month as his pension after 30 years of service. That sort of a situation cannot be allowed to continue, I suggest. Adequate provision must be made for the special nature of the force and for the dependants of the deceased members of the force who meet their end while serving or while on duty.

I want to say a word or two about the stress factor, but before that let me just quote one or two significant statistics from the force. During 1975 and 1976 there were 747 members who left the force of their own volition. They chose to do so prior to becoming eligible for a pension. Only 286 received a pension in the same period. In other words, it is more attractive to leave the force than to remain in until pensioned. There is no real incentive, pensionwise, for members to serve out their period in the force and go to pension.

The statistics are also significant for another reason. They show that the force cannot, I submit, be compared to other facets of the civil service, with the odd exception such as air traffic controllers in operational tower duty or, perhaps, prison guards. The force cannot be compared to other facets of the public service precisely because of the stress factor, shift work and the days off situation, particularly where families are concerned.

It is far too easy to say that a person knew the situation before he got the job, but complete understanding cannot be gained until one is completely immersed in the job. The police force job is not the same as an industrial job. A man in industry does not have to face the problem of having to stop a car in the middle of the night looking for a dangerous criminal, not knowing whether he will be met with a sawed-off shotgun. That man's wife is not wondering if he is coming home at shift end, two, three, four, 24 hours later, or never.

The stress factor is very well documented and I do not have the opportunity of going into it in any great detail now. The force, indeed, has commissioned a study which should be completed by now and should be made available to members as rapidly as possible in order that this kind of legislation will not appear before us again without some adequate remedies for the situations I have described.

At the present time in the force the pension of a member is based on the average salary over the last six years' service, but to state that at 35 years' service one is eligible to receive 70 per cent of salary as pension is very misleading. That, indeed, is not the fact. If one is to consider a sergeant retiring after 25 years' service with six years in the ranks, one is led to believe he is eligible to receive 50 per cent of his salary, when in fact he receives only 41 per cent of his salary at retirement. Similarly, at 35 years' service he in fact only receives 58 per cent of salary on the day of retirement.

The theory behind pensions, as I understand it, is that having given the best years of their lives to the service, their country and their government, they are entitled to a minimum of security at retirement. They do not have that now, and certainly it is glaringly apparent that their widows and dependants do not have that now.

We have heard opinions about the effects of inflation here tonight. It is my view that inflation is caused by the government, and members of the force have absolutely no way of defending against it. The inducement of a pension when a member of the force was recruited was an influencing factor in many cases of those joining the force. Most members leave the force with 24 years' service, not because they want to but because they must in order to take advantage of their youth in gaining other employment to meet the needs of their families at a critical time in their lives. They are fully aware that the pension they are to receive will not sustain them in any dignity or standard of living.

Most police forces in the United States permit members to retire on 20 years' service with half salary. There are other advantages as well. I want to draw for members some very startling comparisons. For instance, in the state of Alaska state troopers operate under this plan. The contributions are 5 per cent of salary; contributions earn 4.5 per cent interest; pension benefits are available at any time after five years' service; normal retirement is at 20 years' service at half salary; salary is averaged over the past three years, and that is the way it used to be in the force and the way they want to return to now; thirty years is maximum service, or 55 years of age; pension cost of living is indexed at 4 per cent if the fund is solvent; benefits are tax exempt; there is a 10 per cent increase in benefits if the receiver is a resident of the state of Alaska, an inducement to stay there; benefits are stacked to social security; no-cost medical insurance to the receiver and dependants; when the plan is fully funded the administrator can make investments in the private sector, with funds realizing current interest rates; and there are three separate operational survivor plans for dependants.

Contrast that with the treatment we accord in our pension legislation to members of one of the finest, if not the finest, police forces in the world. Are the United States pension funds being bankrupted? I suggest that is not the case.

Police work is an occupation requiring the stamina of youth, and that is particularly so of the RCMP. Many recognized authorities on police administration and psychology take the position that the stress factor in the police profession is the symptom of higher rates of suicide, marriage breakdown, alcoholism, and a shorter life expectancy.

Indeed, I just read today in that same "Canadian Police Chief" of January, 1979, that current statistics show 225 suicides per 100,000 police force population in Canada as opposed to 16.5 per 100,000 in the general population. No one can convince me that the major difference between the suicide rate in the average population and the police population is not directly attributable to that stress factor, a factor which is being studied more and more by psychiatrists and psychologists today.

Authority is readily available, I suggest, to support these statistics in United States law enforcement agencies. However, none is immediately available in respect of the RCMP, save those which might have emerged in the study commissioned by the force which, if not completed, should be completed shortly.

I suggest to hon. members that the argument here is that if the psychological "stress disutility" can be substantiated, and it would certainly appear to be substantiated, this creates the strongest possible argument for separating the force from the public service pension plans, thus entitling members of the force to more generous treatment in respect of their retirement benefits.

From information available it would appear that the RCMP is the only police force that uses the last six years averaged salary for pension computation. No other police force in the police universe uses that formula. Indeed, the RCMP itself did not use it in the past. Most use the three year formula, and some are based on the last year of earnings.

I submit that the force is a unique organization. As a unique organization the force should not be equated with the public service in so far as their pension schemes are concerned, but rather equated with the police universe. Under the Pension Contribution Act an officer's pension is based on his last day of service. In other words, the pension is calculated on whatever his annual salary might be on the last day that he serves. This is a unique pension plan for a unique organization. It seems most persuasive that on the merits in maintaining this type of pension program, based on the last day's salary, then the force would be truly unique and would attract the best possible candidates because of the salary range and the pension benefits.

No one can convince me that the calibre of candidates being attracted to the force today, while still high, is as high as it was 20 years ago. Let us compare a member of the force with the private sector. Through initiative and entrepreneurial ability, an individual in the private sector usually amasses considerable wealth over his business career. Most members in the force are unable to accumulate wealth because of transfer, career cycles and so on which take them to every part of Canada in the performance of their duties. If it is truly the desire of the Canadian population to maintain a unique police organization like the force, then recognition should be enshrined in the salary benefits and pension package so that after a long and trying career members can live in dignity and independence, and so that widows and dependants need not worry in this regard. Of course, they will worry anyway if the breadwinner of the family meets with a fate which all police members face every day.

As for superannuation deductions, members of the force would likely welcome contributing more over their careers if it meant a better pension, in the same way in which the bill provides for an increased contribution by air traffic controllers on operational or tower duty. Conversely, a member can burn out by the time he or she achieves 20 years' service, in which case it would be beneficial to both the member and the force that he be allowed to leave at a reduced scale, as is now in effect for NCOs, but without penalty. I certainly saw this burned out effect in spades when I went around to the penitentiaries of this country and observed prison guards, and the same argument can be made with great force for those who serve in Canada's penitentiary system.

Another invidious provision of pension legislation as it is now applicable to the force is the 35 year lock-in clause which is applicable to officers. This lock-in clause does not sit well with commissioned officers in the force when other ranks within it have the option of leaving the force after 20 years' service, on a graduated scale. Indeed, many NCOs simply will not take a commission because of that lock-in clause, particularly those who are close to their 20 years. A strong argument, therefore, might be made that this should be changed to include all ranks, with the proviso that a commissioned officer must give six months' notice prior to superannuation.

I would also mention here that the Marin royal commission recommended that the lock-in clause in the pension legislation for the force be removed. I would like to quote from the Marin report commencing at page 169, which reads:

> First, the criterion for pension benefits and other entitlements should be the same for officers and other ranks. Second, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police may find it beneficial to make representation to the Solicitor General and the Treasury Board to adopt a policy that some other police forces have instituted with respect to flexible pension schemes allowing full pension for all ranks after 25 years with the option to remain in the force for a maximum of 35 years.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act is at best a very complicated piece of legislation. It is most difficult to read with any degree of comprehension, and in several sections there are references made to, "a member, a regular member, a contributor, an officer," and I could go on. References are made to "on duty" and certain sections are co-ordinated with sections of the Income Tax Act for purposes of the Pension Act. One might interpret the act in its present form as saying that an officer who has completed 20 years' service, but less than 35, and dies from natural causes, leaves his wife half of what he would have been entitled to under the act, that is, a return of contributions, deferred annuity or an annual amount. An officer who dies with more than ten years' service but less than 20 years' service could only be entitled to a return of contributions. In other words, the widow would be absolutely destitute.

I hope that I have succeeded in pointing out some of the discrepancies which exist with respect to the treatment of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in so far as their pensions are concerned. I could go on and point out great discrepancies in their salary rates which are even more glaring than the serious shortcomings which exist in their pension legislation. But if we are to attract a high calibre of recruit and maintain a high calibre of member within the force, something must be done if we are to arrest the rate of attrition which, as I said, exceeded over 700 members leaving last year. Many of these members left because of the stress factors or because they became acquainted with the glaring discrepancies, some of which I pointed out today.

There must be some meaningful and constructive changes in the pension legislation of the RCMP. I would hope with respect to its relevancy to the treatment which is accorded to the air traffic controllers on operation and tower duty, that some of the amendments which I have attempted to describe, might well find their way into the bill when it goes to committee, so as to provide for these shortcomings.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to participate in this debate because it is a subject that concerns and puzzles me very much. Bill C-12 was given first reading on October 26, 1978. It followed up a statement made by the President of the Treasury Board on March 9, 1978 in which he announced that the government intended to change certain aspects of the public service superannuation plan, especially as regards the indexing of benefits on the fluctuations in the cost of living.

To me, Bill C-12 is one of the most complicated pieces of legislation I ever had to study. It is intimidating because of its technical character and its mathematical jargon. For a layman like me, and many others in the House, actuarial questions are not the easiest to understand. This bill, Mr. Speaker, calls for an intellectual process which may leave us with a feeling of perplexity and confusion.

So I do not mean to deal with the actuarial aspect of Bill C-12. I leave that to the expert members who spoke before me or will probably be speaking after me. I would rather deal with relatively more simple objectives. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the main objectives of the bill are, first, to implement the amendments relating to the indexing of the pensions of retired civil servants; second, to implement the agreement reached by the government in 1976 with the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association and, third, to amend the present arrangements for amortizing actuarial liabilities and to deal with certain other questions of a technical nature. So I will be dealing with the first objective, Mr. Speaker, namely the amendments relating to the indexing of pensions of retired civil servants. Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate at all to state my position. I am of those who believe that it is socially just and fair for an indexing formula to apply to pensions. I am glad the public sector should lead the way and I am confident the private sector, which has been doing it in certain cases, will follow suit in a few years.

Indexing means the pension is geared to the cost of living as it goes up. That means more money for the pensioner but not necessarily an increase in his purchasing power. That means some 100,000 civil servants now receiving a pension—and that includes all pensions, whether disability pensions, retired pensions, and armed forces pensions—that means those people with a purchasing power which is being maintained can buy the same goods, not more, they can keep a standard of living based on a pension they paid for with their work, with their lives.

Let us examine closely what Bill C-12 proposes to do with respect to the indexing of pensions. The most important under its principle proposes to amend the agreements providing for the indexing of civil servants' pensions to the increase in the consumer price index. Bill C-12 does away with the automatic provisions now in effect. It also abolishes the need to make automatic adjustments based on the consumer price index as has been done since 1971. So it comes from a commitment made in 1971 by the federal govrnment that pensions of public service employees will be automatically indexed to the cost of living. It proposes changes which I believe will be fair and equitable. Those changes might put an end to a controversy that has been going on now for over three years. That controversy, of course, is about the financial capacity of the pension fund to finance the outlays required to pay for both the pensions of retired civil servants and indexing—two things, pensions and indexing. Nurtured by a group called the National Citizens' Coalition the controversy continues, and you can be sure, Mr. Speaker, that it is going to be with us during the next election campaign.

On the one hand, the argument has been that there is enough money to pay the pensions. This is the position of the Public Service Alliance and certain other experts or groups, and up to a point I agree with it. On the other hand, the Citizens' Coalition Movement says the opposite. Those who say that there is enough money in the fund to pay indexation as concerns the capacity of existing funds to finance the pension benefits, also state that until now indexation of pensions has cost nothing to the taxpayers. They argue that the funds paid out as benefits in the last 50 years do not amount to the sum contributed by the employees. This is quite true.

For its part, the coalition states that this is not an accurate way to examine the financing of pension funds. According to the coalition, pensions must be fully financed by the fund, which means that a pension plan must always have enough money to pay all eligible pensions as well as the future pensions of all employees. The coalition argues that in this way, if the pension plan were abolished or if the employer ceased to exist, which is very unlikely, the pension plan would have enough funds to face its present and future commitments.

The situation was explained during this debate by certain hon. members, and I am thinking especially of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), an expert in actuarial matters, who made an interesting speech and gave, in my opinion, a very understandable explanation. During this debate, he explained the situation quite clearly and precisely. In any case, Mr. Speaker, this man knows what he is talking about as he is a well-known economist. I salute him. An economist is not an actuary; there is a difference. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member spoke about people whom he knows, and as I was saying, he explained that the basic pension benefits are totally financed on a full capitalization basis. This is a fact. It means that if present commitments are met by the contribution of employees, the amounts required to meet future commitments must come from the government, who is the employer in this case, as well as from interest benefits.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I believe it was explained quite well during this debate that the funds were invested at a weighted interest rate based on the borrowings of the federal government and that the funds were earning enough money to make all the necessary payments. Contributions and interest benefits cover the costs. No financing by the Canadian taxpayers is required at this time and future commitments will be met by the government, which is now proposing a new formula. This formula constitutes the main thrust of Bill C-12. The government is proposing a formula according to which, for a given period, the indexation rate of public service pensions will be announced in October for the next three years.

The minister told us a few weeks ago that if he had announced this rate in October 1978, he would have set a ceiling of $7,000 under which the pensions would have been fully indexed, even if this meant that the difference between the amount of the pension and this ceiling of $7,000, would have been indexed at a reduced or lower rate.

Mr. Speaker, I asked today exactly what is the average because we often hear about it. People say that retired public servants have large pensions, and it has already been suggested to me that this was not quite accurate. I therefore wanted to know the average pension paid to retired public servants and their survivors. The average disability pension amounts to $4,250 a year. Far from being a fortune, this is below the poverty line. Those who receive a pension based strictly on the retirement element, that is former public service employees, receive on the average $5,152, which is a bit higher. As I said earlier, 100,000 former public servants now receive a pension of some kind from the federal government. Yet 85 per cent of them receive a pension of $7,000 or less, or 85 per cent of all former public servants.

We have often heard about those who receive large pensions of $20,000 or more. Mr. Speaker, there are at best 100 people in Canada who receive a pension of $20,000 or more from the federal government. It would therefore be false to suggest that these pensions are exorbitant, that they will push the government into bankruptcy and that, because of this, we shall have to pay exorbitant taxes and premiums. I believe that all these figures confirm what many of us already know, which is that on the whole, public service pensions do not bring instantaneous wealth and are on the contrary quite modest and reasonable.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke earlier about two positions which are based on two completely different matters. There are those who maintain that the contributions paid to this date covered all payments already made under the federal government's pension programs. That is true. The Coalition, on the other hand, maintains that the employees' contributions do not cover future benefits. So there are people who say: we have the money needed to pay for it now, and others who say: you do not have the money that will be needed to pay for it in the years to come. And that is also true. In other words, there are those who are referring to the financing capability and others to the actuarial financing. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal with the actuarial aspect because I am not familiar with it, and I am confident that in committee we will be able to consider all the related terms and conditions.

Rather, I would like to come back, Mr. Speaker, on the proposed objectives of Bill C-12. It makes the indexing of pensions subject to purchasing power, in other words, the question will not be the cost of indexation but rather the rate of indexation. As I have said, this rate will be set every three years by the minister, who will announce it at a given time, this year, in October 1979.

I was recently drawing my colleagues attention to the fact that there are people in the media who are interpreting Bill C-12 as a measure to put an end to pension indexing. I do not know how they came to such a conclusion, but that is certainly not the purpose of Bill C-12, and I would like to repudiate these comments by stating that we do not intend, with this bill, to abolish pension indexing.

We are asked with Bill C-12 to establish a system that would be much more easily controlled, according to experts, and that will be of real advantage to pensioners because they will know exactly where they stand for at least three years, this is ensured by provisions covering the minimum applicable and the indexing rate.

In conclusion, I would like to refer to the basic reasons for indexing pensions. The debate on indexing revolves around risks. Of course indexing involves risks, and the only point that can be made is that a society cannot agree on how to spread those risks. On the other hand, once an understanding is reached on how to spread the risk, there sometimes are implications making implementation difficult.

I believe we are all agreed on the need to protect our pensioners against their being robbed by inflation. Inflation steals assets away from people with fixed revenues, including pensioners. No active and industrial society such as ours is exempt from a degree of inflation. Inflation equally harms various groups of pensioners and increases the gap in revenue between Canadians in the work force and retired Canadians. In the newspaper Le Droit, editorialist Pierre Bergeron describes inflation as follows:

—that refuge for small-income people against the predations of inflation . . .

This is a very clear and precise explanation. Any deserving society must protect the small, and if pensioners who retired some years ago are not afforded by us who are still in the labour force and by governments the kind of protection that will maintain their purchasing power, they will sink into poverty while everything around them will point to how unjust this society of ours can be.

I would like to give the case of a 75-year old pensioner who retired 10 years ago, as against that of the 65-year old Canadian who leaves a similar job today. If both are getting an unindexed pension, the former will get much less than the latter by an amount that will probably be commensurate with the inflation rate over the last 10 years. Both would receive the same old age security pension; the Canada Pension Plan for the individual aged 65 would be better since it would take into account the salary increase during that period. In other words, the non-indexed pension of a retired person who is 75 and performed comparable work will perhaps be 50 to 60 per cent of that received by a younger man of 65. Therefore the first principle is that indexing protects the pension by adjusting the income to the cost of living as it increases. It does not allow pensioners to purchase more, Mr. Speaker, but merely to purchase as much.

The governments have often been criticized because they ran ahead of the private sector when they fully indexed the pensions and, according to those same critics, the private sector does not have the same resources as the public sector. During a debate held in the House not long ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) indicated that 60 per cent of Canadian pensioners were financially dependent on the old age security program.

It means that the public sector as a whole has to assume through its taxes the financial burden of its workers. Of course the private sector makes a significant contribution to replenish public funds so those pensions can be paid. However, if the same private sector says that it is unable to pay pensions comparable to the indexed pensions in the public sector, it should not criticize the fair distribution of common assets. It is not the pension costs but the inflationary risks which concern the private sector.

It is possible to make all sorts of assumptions, and I admit the complexity of the problem. But if the employee puts so much emphasis on the indexation of his pension, he must be willing to assume the costs. As a matter of fact, the purpose of collective bargaining is precisely to deal with such issues. If the employer can demonstrate that his costs are too high because of indexation, and if the employee demands indexation, the salaries could reflect this desire, either through a reduction or duly negotiated concessions between the employer and his employees. As to the risks involved, no actuary or economist can predict the future, and it is clear that a private firm is faced with a dilemma when it has to decide its actuarial projections. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that solutions to this problem do exist. Private employers can and should do better. The related negotiations will be difficult and complicated.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

We do not have a magic formula to solve that problem. What we need is a will to find a mechanism that will protect both the employer and the employee against those risks of inflation while at the same time maintaining the basic principle of protecting those who cannot protect themselves against inflation. Bill C-12 provides for a review every three years of the rate of indexing based on the capacity of the fund to pay. That is an approach which seems right in a difficult economic period.

Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to see this bill in committee because we will have an opportunity to question the minister on the amendments he proposes to update this bill which was read for the first time in October, I believe, last year. The minister will bring in technical amendments to correct certain dates in the bill, and I will be interested, like all my colleagues, to hear the witnesses who will be appearing on this bill, particularly the unions representing the civil servants who provided us with a lot of documentation on this question. I examined attentively the arguments put forward and I think certain clauses of the bill will be amended if we can be convinced by the witnesses of the advantages that would represent.

I for one believe that Bill C-12 is an acceptable compromise in a difficult economic period. I am prepared to improve it with my colleagues in the House when it is considered in committee and to listen attentively to all witnesses. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the House for its attention.

[English]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on Bill C-12 tonight because of the implication it has for the Canadian forces long service pensioners. The bill makes some remarks on the forces' pensions. It is absolutely beyond me why the government would bring in a bill that deals with two major pension funds and try to make them fit into the same box with the same regulations.

The life that is led by civil servants in their normal positions in Canada is not exactly the same as that led by service people. Nothing could have made the point more clear than what was said by the former president of the treasury board, the super-minister, the nanny for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who need a guiding light of some sort.

When introducing this bill in the House, the minister stated he wished to have the 85 rule abolished in order to encourage serving people to continue until age 60 or 65 rather than leave their employment at age 55 to take advantage of the 85 rule. I imagine most members understand that means if you have 35 years of service, you can qualify for an indexed pension at age 55. Actually, you can do that at age 55 if you have 30 years' service. If the total of your service plus your age equals 85, you can start indexation at the present time. The former president of the treasury board seems to think that is uneconomic, inefficient, and wants it stopped.

I was somewhat surprised that the minister brought in Bill C-12 which works a real disservice to the armed forces. The former president of the treasury board wanted senior civil servants to carry on until age 60 or 65. That is only reasonable because they have acquired a great deal of expertise and knowledge which could be of benefit to this country. But the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) does not give the serviceman an opportunity to serve until age 60 or 65. He must leave at 55, and in many cases at a younger age. Junior officers must retire at age 47. Those in other ranks are required to leave as early as 40 or 45. At age 55, they were able to have indexation. That is no longer going to be the case. It is unfair. It discriminates against the service personnel vis-à-vis the civil servant. That kind of inequity should not be built into this bill. One has the option of serving beyond 55, and the other has not.

The part that seems to make it irrevocable is on page 18 of the bill, subclause (3), and I quote:

> There shall be credited to the Canadian Forces Supplementary Retirement Benefits Operating Account in each fiscal year an amount representing such portion of the interest on the balance to the credit of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account as the Minister estimates is required to ensure that there are sufficient funds available in that Account to meet all payments of supplementary retirement benefits from that Account for the year.

I did not realize anybody could write a sentence that long and hope to have the ordinary person understand what he is talking about. It means that they will haye an indexation on a three-year basis. To enable them in their mythology to have sufficient funds to do that, the minister will determine that a portion of the interest on the balance will be credited to the Canadian Forces Supplementary Retirement Account as the minister estimates is required to ensure that there are sufficient funds available. He will determine how much he wants to spend. Then he says the percentage he has to credit to the superannuation supplement portion will have to be a certain percentage. I hardly know how to describe that kind of mathematics. It starts with the answer and works back to the problem. That is what he is doing.

That kind of attitude indicates that this bill serves two purposes, both partisan in nature. It is no secret there will soon be an election. I swear that this bill is designed to make those taxpayers not on pension think that the government is capping pensions and taking a hard line with pensioners, while at the same time saying to pensioners that it is really not hurting their pensions very much. The government is trying to satisfy both sides.

On February 8 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) stated the figures planned to be used for the indexation for the next three years. I quote from page 3040 of Hansard for February 8 where he stated:

> There would be full indexation up to earnings of $7,000, and above that the figure proposed was 8 per cent in 1979, 7 per cent in 1980, and 6 per cent in 1981.
> MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON): Does that move back a year now?
> MR. BUCHANAN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks if that now moves back a year. It moves back a year in the sense that the triennial period will be 1980, 1981 and 1982.

That simply means it was moved back one year. It gives the government the opportunity to say it is not cutting pensions this year. It had intended to, but was not able. For reasons totally mysterious to me, the government did not think it could get this bill through the House on time. It brought in a lot of rather foolish little bills which it found impossible to get through the House before Christmas. Thus it was able to postpone this bill for this amount of time.

The government is now saying the figure for 1980 will be 8 per cent, that it will be 7 per cent in 1981, and 6 per cent in 1982. But who believes the government any more? I suppose these figures bear some relation to its estimates of what inflation will be, but we recall that the Minister of Finance predicted that it would be 5 per cent, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he brought in wage and price controls after promising not to do so, said that by 1979 the rate of inflation would be 4.5 per cent. Now they think in 1980 it will be down to 8 per cent. But does anybody believe that any more? I cannot really say they are trying to mislead anybody; they are just trying to cheer themselves up a little.

I should like to deal with the status of these two funds, the public service fund and the armed forces fund. To ascertain the exact situation one has to put questions down on the order paper—it is no use relying upon the government for information. We can be grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for putting down the questions he did on April 11, 1978—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Every year.

Mr. McKinnon: —and to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), who obviously looked over the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, thought they looked pretty good, and more or less duplicated them on October 10, 1978. In any case, the answers are worth reading into the record.

I am speaking on this bill because the services pension fund is administered by the Department of National Defence, not by the people who pay the civil service pensions. The armed forces have paid into a pension fund for longer than I can remember, in the expectation of a reasonable pension when they retire. Many of them made no effort to accumulate savings of their own; upon retirement they lived, for the most part, upon their pensions. They were paying into a fund on a matching basis.

What happened was that 20 or 25 years ago the government decided there was no sense setting up a fund to look after this plan because the government needed the money. It decided to borrow the money from the pension funds of the civil servants and the armed forces. I can tell you that nobody asked any serviceman I know of whether he wanted these funds to be borrowed by the government and put into savings bonds or anything else. In any case, the decision was made and the money was placed into what is called a mythical fund, though I suppose the government would prefer to refer to it as the armed forces pension account.

This is the question asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West:

What was the total amount at credit in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account on March 31 in the following years: 1965, 1970, 1975, 1976, 1977 and 1978?

This can be found at page 7044 of Hansard for October 10, 1978. The answer shows that in 1970 the amount was $3,306 million; in 1975 it was $5,772 million; in 1976, $6,456 million; in 1977, $7,006 million, and in 1978, $7,538 million. So the account had more than $7.5 billion in it as at March 31 last. I did a small calculation and found that 7 per cent of $7 billion amounts to around $490 million a year.

Turning to page 7044 of Hansard we find the question:

What was the total interest earnings for the 12-month period preceding each date?

Those are the dates to which I have just referred. The answer to that question was as follows with respect to the year 1978, namely, $289,498,000.

Because it is difficult to ascertain the pension pay-out for 1978, I would prefer to quote 1977 figures, although the amount is somewhat smaller. In 1977 the interest, on the basis of the government's calculation, derived from the $7 billion in the fund at that time amounted to $265 million. Now, what does the government have to pay out by way of pensions? According to the answer to a later question placed on the order paper, the amount is as follows: in pensions, $189 million, which did not include supplementary retirement benefit because of indexing. Again in answer to a question on the order paper we find that the supplementary retirement benefit account paid out $1,050,000, and $50 million under the statutory vote. The total comes to $241 million.

The truth of the matter is that when we take the interest alone from the armed forces pension fund, on the basis of government calculations there should be a surplus of $24 million a year after paying pensions and indexation, to say nothing of the contributions which are still coming in, contributions which presumably the government is matching. Of course, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, we do not see the government's money. On the other hand, the men make their contributions and the government takes them. Today, everyone is acting as though they had no right to their pensions, and this is what annoys them.

If the government had invested these funds, even in its own bonds, a totally self-sustaining pension fund would have been created. The interest available each year is more than enough to meet pension claims, including indexation. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this fund is really just a scrap of paper representing the amount which would have been there if the government had not borrowed it all. The fact is that the government did borrow it. They owe it to the servicemen from whom they borrowed it. It is outrageous. The government is trying to pretend it is generous, that it is trying to benefit the servicemen instead of itself. Of course taxpayers are unhappy. If someone with a total lack of competence was looking after my money, I would be pretty unhappy too.

In any event, it seems to me that this bill will not solve the problem. Canadian forces long service pensioners have given up on ever getting a fair, reasonable and business-like understanding with the government. The government is obviously just going to determine by itself how much it is willing to pay in pensions and in indexation each year. The government will work its calculations backward to determine how much of the pension fund it will assume. It actually belongs to retired civil servants or armed forces pensioners.

I think I will wind up on a low note tonight. A piece of distressing business took place in the last few weeks about which I think the House should be aware. An organization which calls itself the Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association has been in operation for about five years. About five years ago it applied for a charter and received one from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which is in charge of charters for small organizations like that.

The Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association has grown rather remarkably, and wants to have some answers about their pensions, how they are being considered and what the rules are going to be.

They knew what the rules were when they signed up. The government changed the rules, not they. The Department of National Defence and, most notably, the minister, seemed to object to their calling themselves the Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association. Something suddenly came up, and now letters are going out to the Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association telling the association that it must stop calling itself the Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association because, in the words of the Minister of National Defence as written in a letter, and I quote:

The Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association was issued Letters Patent under that name on April 29, 1975 by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. At the time of the application for Letters Patent the Department of National Defence was not consulted by Consumer and Corporate Affairs on the use in the name of the words "Canadian Forces", but had this Department been consulted it would not have given its approval.

The use of the words "Canadian Forces" in a corporation or association title is objectionable on public grounds because it connotes that the corporation or association is sponsored or controlled by or is affiliated with the Government of Canada—

What a lot of nonsense! What is the government going to do next? Will it go after the Army and Navy Store to get it to change its name? Will it go after the boy scouts or the girl guides? I have never heard of anything so ridiculous. Why would the minister do this to servicemen, those to whom he is supposed to be loyal? He wants them not to be allowed to refer to the fact that each and every one of them served long and honourably in the Canadian forces. I think it is absolutely outrageous that he should now threaten them that if this is not done they will lose their charter. He is telling them that they must change their name or they cannot have a charter to conduct the business of their association any longer.

I suppose they could do something simple which probably even this Liberal government could understand. I suppose they could change their name to the "Long Service Pensioners Association, Formerly the Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association", but I think the members of the forces would say that this is so chicken that a person hates to talk about it. However, this has come up, and I think it would be wise, proper and appropriate if the government were to back off. If these pensioners are still willing to allow their names to be associated with this government, the government ought to be thankful for it, instead of vice versa.

The Canadian Forces Long Service Pensioners Association has been operating from its headquarters in London. I went there to speak with members of the association a few months ago and to see what their problems were. We had a very interesting meeting, and I suggested that they might be better off if they gave up trying to get the government to account for the $7.5 billion which is in the fund and which should belong to the pensioners instead of the government. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to start a funded fund for their pensions. They would have to face the loss of what is in their pension fund, $7.5 billion, which I do not think the government will ever acknowledge.

I do not think the government will give those pensioners any more than it absolutely has to give. I do not want to make invidious comparisons and compare anyone to this government, but the members of the association were willing to go to the extent of forgetting all about this $7.5 billion if they could have a government guarantee that they could continue under the present system for a given period of time, say ten or 15 years, and have the extra interest which is not needed to pay into their fund to keep it even. Let us remember that the interest itself pays in $24 million a year more than is needed for the pensions and the indexation.

However, we must also remember the amount the serviceman pays in and the government pays in. If that could be done for ten or 15 years and if there could be a funded fund, which is the honourable way, the association would be quite happy to forget about the $7.5 billion already put into the fund on their account, which the government will not recognize. I think that might be the way out. The serviceman certainly does not want anyone to think that he is beholden to the taxpayer or to the government at this time for something to which he is not entitled. The impression which is being created by the government across this country is that servicemen are lamprey eels on the big fish, the government payroll. This is not so. They put in sufficient money to pay their pensions and their indexation, and they are entitled to a better and fairer deal than they have been getting. With that I will conclude, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who rose before me spoke mainly, and I understand that since he is the official critic on national defence for the Progressive Conservative party, of the personnel in the armed forces, present, past and future. I appreciate his interest in those classes of individuals who are also very important to us. But, if you examine the title of the bill, you will see that it applies to a much wider variety of people than the personnel in the armed forces. The title of the bill reads as follows:

the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act . . .

which applies to all those who fall under the bill.

. . . the Public Service Superannuation Act . . .

which includes perhaps 200,000 or 300,000 employees.

. . . the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act . . .

which the hon. member has just explained.

. . . the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act . . .

which includes a good many individuals.

. . . and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Hon. members here, of course, are directly concerned by this bill since it also affects the retiring allowances of hon. members who for one reason or another retire from politics or who will be defeated in the next election which will certainly take place in 1979. I think I can assure the population that an election will be held in 1979.

So when we examine the purpose of the bill we find that it is rather simple but it does have technical aspects where we need consultants and most of all actuaries to help us figure out what is good and valid in this bill. And it seems, according to the speeches I have heard, that opposition parties agree to proceed as soon as possible with the consideration of the bill in committee. Of course we will have to call on experts to enlighten us further and advise us in the consideration of a bill which has many technical aspects.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I raised with the minister responsible for CMHC, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), the question of the community services program. This program was announced last spring and was supposed to come into effect in 1978. But there have been delays, and this has had an effect on the municipalities because the community service program will provide about $400 million for important and needed community services such as sewer and water facilities and other municipal infrastructure programs. Apparently the delay has taken place because the minister has not been able to negotiate a suitable arrangement with the Ontario government for the provision of this service to the municipalities.

The program, besides providing sewer and water facilities and funding for the services, will provide assistance for neighbourhood improvement, for cultural and recreational facilities, for insulation programs, for community buildings, and for facilities to convert waste into energy. The funding will be in the form of grants rather than loans. These grants can be used for debt servicing.

In my constituency, in the Algoma district, for instance, municipalities such as Sault Ste. Marie are looking forward to building large sewage treatment facilities and they need to know what kind of funding will be available under this program. Communities like Elliot Lake with new towns of 20,000 people need to know what kind of funding will be available under this program. Another town in my constituency in the Manitowaning district, the town of Little Current, applied last year for a municipal infrastructure grant. It was not able to have it funded, but it now has the approval from the provincial government to go ahead with the program. They need to know what kind of financial assistance will be available for the community service program in 1979, because they want to go to tender.

The federal government sets down the criteria for the program, and then the actual approval needs to come from the provincial government. But the question I want to put to the minister, and which I would like to have answered on behalf of these municipalities, is how soon final agreement will be reached with the province of Ontario on the community service program so that money can be made available to the municipalities to get on with these important and needed community facilities and services. I think that the time for action is now, and there should be no further delay because it is not only the municipalities in my constituency but many others across the province of Ontario that are waiting to know how soon this program will be implemented in Ontario and funds made available to the municipalities to proceed with these important community services and capital work projects in this fiscal year.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for bringing this subject to the attention of the House and once again showing the interest which his constituents have in the many benefits that can come to his riding from the program announced by the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet).

When the minister replied to the question put by the hon. member he said that he was meeting with the minister and officials of the province of Ontario and that this meeting would be attended also by officials of CMHC. The results of that meeting, and of meetings earlier in the day between officials of the province of Ontario and CMHC, gave both ministers reason to believe that the negotiations which have been ongoing for several months would be brought to a successful conclusion with the signing of the required federal-provincial agreement very early in the new year.

There would seem to be every reason to expect that the benefits of this new program, which involve extensive grants of federal funds to municipalities, will be available to Ontario commencing early this year. A few weeks are required to allow the provincial minister to complete the necessary process of obtaining provincial authority to sign the agreement on behalf of the province of Ontario.

This is an appropriate time for me to remind the hon. member that this new program has been introduced to provide provinces and municipalities with a maximum degree of flexibility in the utilization of federal funds for a broad range of community projects and services. It will replace the assistance previously available through the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, the Municipal Incentives Grants Program, and the Municipal Infrastructure Program, all three of which had proved successful while in effect but were perceived in some quarters to be unnecessarily narrow and restrictive in application.

While there are criteria applicable to the acceptability of projects under this new community services program, they are sufficiently broad to offer the opportunity of participation to a larger number of municipalities to sponsor a broader variety of projects, at the same time including the types of projects eligible under the former programs. Within the terms of the criteria the provinces and municipalities have the responsibility for setting general priorities and selecting specific projects to be assisted out of funds budgeted each year. This represents no change from the manner in which the Neighbourhood Improvement and Municipal Infrastructure Programs were administered previously.

The negotiations with all provinces on this program are moving into the final stages, and the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs is expecting to have agreements signed with all provinces early this year.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—POLICY RESPECTING EX GRATIA PAYMENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of this part of the session I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) certain questions relating to the government's policy on ex gratia payments. I specifically mentioned four instances where it seemed to me, based on the definition of what is normally considered the basis for ex gratia payments, having reference to the government authorities manual, and other authorities, clarification was needed.

I hope that tonight, sir, the minister will personally, or through his spokesman or parliamentary secretary, take the opportunity to provide answers not only to the questions I asked on January 23, but also in respect of additional information I requested in a letter addressed to the minister last Wednesday. Unfortunately I have had no response to that either.

The definitions of ex gratia payments, either in the government authorities manual, or the statutes setting out the basis for such payments, appear to have one major criterion, and that is that it is one for which no liability is recognized and it is made as an act of benevolence in the public interest. Implicit in this, sir, I take it to be that there will be no ex gratia payments where there are statutes in existence under which a payment can be made in the regular fashion, that is to say, one would not settle by an ex gratia payment a matter involving land, because that could be paid under an expropriation act. The authorities manual itself says:

> Where there is no statute providing for payment of compensation for damages, authority of the Executive is required for settlement of claims against the Crown without resorting to litigation procedures. The Treasury Board has directed that a statute which simply authorizes a Crown agency to determine the manner in which money made available to the agency is to be spent is not to be interpreted as authorizing payment of claims.

Perhaps I might outline my concerns very briefly, Mr. Speaker, with reference to four of these payments, the ones about which I previously asked the minister. For example, let us start here in Ottawa with the item listed in this year's public accounts as compensation for guard services at L'Esplanade Laurier Building, Ottawa, charged to Vote 10, Olympia and York Developments. Why was this payment authorized and by whom were negotiations initiated? By definition, obviously there could have been no legal liability, or it would not have been an ex gratia payment. Which officers of this company came forward with the claim? What did the property management personnel for the department and Mrs. Tissot have to say about all of this? Incidentally, were payments of this sort made in other cases, say, for example, at Place du Portage when she was there?

Could I have an answer from the government representative with respect to the compensation for the expropriation of land at Mirabel which amounted to $2,391,145? Were all proper, legal and statutory steps followed under the Expropriation Act? How could one go beyond or outside the statutes so specifically tailored for this remedy and stay within the bounds of ex gratia payments? Was the fine academic mind of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) brought in to engineer this situation? Did he specifically authorize it? Did he have the authority to authorize it? What does the spokesman for the government say about this?

The interpretation or definition section of the Expropriation Act is very broad. Land includes "buildings and structures and other things in nature of fixtures, mines and minerals whether precious or base, above or below the surface." It goes on to say that interest in land in relation to land in Quebec includes "the interest of a lessee therein." The government apparently really had to stretch on this one. I would like to have more information about this item.

The amounts themselves are extraordinary. Sandwiched in between the two I have just mentioned is an incident which is more conventional. It appears that Kenneth MacEwan was paid $600 for the loss of tools. That is more like an ex gratia payment. But here is another. Payment was made to MacGregor Travel Company for legal, accounting, transcript and other costs incurred and arising out of an inquiry and report upon the financial administration of Air Canada which amounted to $39,374. I recall very well the circumstances and the part played by this company. They received a $100,000 payment from Air Canada, which was one of the major items that triggered the inquiry into Air Canada by Mr. Justice Estey.

It is very strange, prima facie, I would say, to have an ex gratia payment under these circumstances. I would think that the budget of the original commission of inquiry would have been a more appropriate vehicle, but if no legal obligation existed to pay this company and if no other way could be found, let us hear about why this company should get such a gift and, incidentally, whatever happened to the $100,000 they were paid by Air Canada? Did our national air carrier ever get that money back?

It is interesting to compare that sort of ex gratia payment's concept with the case of John Danch, an RCMP officer who contested a case in the federal court of appeal successfully about an unjust dismissal. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has the discretion to pay his legal costs, which are far less than $40,000. He has not received a penny, even though the discretion is there.

I see that I am running out of time, but I would like to mention the fourth example. It involved $500,000 which was paid out, again on an ex gratia basis, to Ste Marie Air Services. Again, I quote from the public accounts:

> To compensate for loss of earnings due to operating restrictions resulting from the opening of Mirabel airport.

There are no other comparable payments to other air services, and that is a lot of money for a little company incorporated in 1964 and turned over to the children of the incorporating individual and into which a professional land surveyor, Mr. Verdier, in 1976 bought a substantial interest. This half a million dollars to compensate for loss of earnings is almost five times the assessed value of the land and buildings of Ste Marie Air Services. This air strip is not even in the "Tersa" of Mirabel, and there is some question as to whether it should ever have been licensed in the first place because of the elevation of its runways. What is the story behind this payment? I have information that Mirabel was not the reason at all for the suspended operations of this little air service.

I would like to hear further details about these particular ex gratia payments which stand out in such a dramatic way, not only because of their amounts, but because of the definition and the circumstances.

• (2215)

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give the hon. member answers to the specific subjects he has brought up, but I will attempt to explain the government's policy in regard to these ex gratia payments.

I would like to point out that by "ex gratia payment" I mean a payment which is an act of benevolence in the public interest, is wholly gratuitous, and is approved as an act of grace in an area of government operations not already regulated by legislation. The Crown, in making such payments, does not therefore admit liability for them and as a matter of law is not liable for them, indeed the Crown makes such payments only where it is clear that there is no legal liability to do so.

The making of these payments is regarded as being an exercise of benevolence or a prerogative of the Crown. The authority of the governor in council, acting as the Queen's representative in Canada, is therefore necessary for each payment unless the governor in council has made other arrangements. One such other arrangement was made in 1974 in the form of the Ex Gratia Payments Order, 1974. Under that order in council deputy heads are authorized to make ex gratia payments not exceeding $1,000, mainly to employees, in respect of damage to or loss of real or personal property suffered by an employee in the course of his duties.

All such payments in excess of $1,000 and all other kinds of ex gratia payments are authorized individually by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Treasury Board following the consideration of a submission from the minister of the department concerned.

In most cases ex gratia payments are made for the purpose of compensating someone in part for a loss or harm already suffered but for which the Crown is not legally liable.

The Treasury Board, in reviewing recommendations to the governor in council for the making of ex gratia payments, looks at each case on its merits, taking into account such factors as the need for the equitable treatment by the government of groups or individuals, the public interest, fairness, the receipt by the Crown of services or claims against the Crown for which the Crown is not legally liable to pay, and the degree of hardship that would be imposed upon individuals and groups by failure to act ex gratia.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members that all ex gratia payments are listed annually in the public accounts of Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF WAGE SETTLEMENTS

Mr. David Orkilow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the third week of January the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) warned against too large wage increases which he said could trigger double digit inflation. On January 26 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) warned business leaders that it would be crazy to go back to the kind of wage settlements that prevailed before the wage control program in 1975. The chairman of the Board of Economic Development added his two cents worth. He told businessmen that non-government workers were getting settlements about 1.5 per cent above those of workers in the public sector.

What is the government worried about, Mr. Speaker? Is there in fact an explosion in wage settlements? Is there in fact a danger that wage settlements are of such a size that they could trigger double digit inflation? The facts show exactly the opposite. Wage and salary increases are averaging just 6.4 per cent, 2 per cent less than the increase in the cost of living in the last year, so that workers in 1979, if they follow the advice of the Prime Minister and other members of cabinet, are going to be asked by the government to accept a reduction in their real standard of living.

Let us compare the attitude of the government with regard to wages to its attitude with respect to an increase in profits of Canadian corporations. On February 7 the Globe and Mail reported that after tax operating profits of 110 corporations grew at a faster pace in 1978 than in any year since 1973. Profits of the 110 companies surveyed rose by 25.6 per cent in 1978, which is more than double the 12.2 per cent recorded in 1977.

It is interesting to look at these corporations by classification. They show that bank profits increased by 33.2 per cent, in the base metals industry they increased by 44.1 per cent, in the paper and forest industry profits they increased by 86.2 per cent, and merchandising profits increased by 68 per cent.

These facts were brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, and the substantial increases in profits were compared with the Prime Minister's strictures placed upon workers. What did the Prime Minister say about these profits? He said, "We are glad there are profits." That is the attitude of the government. Increased profits regardless of their size are fine, but wages must not go up more than 6.4 per cent.

What has happened? The cost of living increased by 8.4 per cent last year. Beef prices are going up by 18 cents per pound. Recently the Anti-Inflation Board reported that food prices went up by 19 per cent in 1978. The government was urged to take action because price increases are substantially higher than necessary. In the case of food, the increase is much higher than the increase obtained by the farmer. The middleman, the processors and the retailers, are skimming off exorbitant increased profits as a result of the increases they have been allowed to adopt.

When that situation was brought to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) not once, not twice, but many times, all the minister would say is that the government is looking into reports of profiteering by food companies. We have had experience with studies done by the government. We know that they take two or three years and lead to no action. No one on behalf of the government, not the Prime Minister, not the Minister of Finance, nor the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who are the ones calling for restraint on wage increases and are pointing to the direction they want the private sector to take by pointing out the tough line they are taking with public servants, will lift a finger to restrain the business community.

Need I remind hon. members that in a similar situation, United States presidents Kennedy and Johnson called in representatives of the steel and aluminum industries and made it clear to them that they would not accept the exorbitant price increases which they were proposing to implement at that time? Will the Prime Minister do that? No, of course not. He is too busy lecturing workers on the need for them to show restraint. It seems to us that if the government is concerned about inflation, which it talks about incessantly, and if it wants to keep prices from escalating too much, and if the government wants to dampen inflationary forces, then it ought to be calling on all sectors of the community to practise the same restraint.

It seems unfair for the Prime Minister and his cabinet ministers to be giving the lectures they have been giving to the workers of this country. These people have not been receiving exorbitant wage increases, partly because they have been trying to be good citizens, and partly because the economy has not permitted them to be as demanding as they can be, have been, and should be when the economy is booming.

I would hope that the government would apply the same kind of thinking to prices and profits as is applied to the legitimate requirements of the working people of this country. Until it does that, the government is not dealing with Canadians in a just and equitable manner.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). It is correct that wages increased at a lower rate than the consumer price index in 1978. Therefore real wages declined. Much of the increase in prices resulted from higher food prices and the lower value of the Canadian dollar. It should be recalled, however, that real wages were increasing in preceding years and, even with the decline of 1978, were some 6 per cent above their 1974 level.

With some moderation in food price increases in 1979, workers should realize a further gain in real terms. Increases under new wage settlements decelerated considerably over the period in which real wages were increasing and this deceleration continued into 1978. The historical record demonstrates that real gains are possible with moderation in cost and price increases.

It is not unreasonable that some workers might attempt to recoup some of the loss in real wages of the past year. However, it is desirable that this adjustment should be gradual, and that wages would not rise substantially and erode the gains we have made in our international competitive position. This applies not only to wages but to all costs, including profits.

Increases in average weekly earnings in the industrial composite decelerated from a high of 14 per cent in 1975 to over 12 per cent in 1976, and to 9½ per cent in 1977. Complete data for 1978 are not yet available, but January-November figures suggest an average 1978 increase of about 6 per cent.

The consumer price index increased almost 11 per cent in 1975, 7.5 per cent in 1976, 8 per cent in 1977, and 9 per cent in 1978. Real wages increased, therefore, by a little over 3 per cent in 1975, a little over 4 per cent in 1976, 1.5 per cent in 1977, and in 1978 declined by about 2¾ per cent.

Wage settlements in major collective agreements decelerated from 17 per cent in 1975 to 10 per cent in 1976 and 7.8 per cent in 1977. For the year 1978 as a whole, the average increase should be about 6¾ per cent. The first year increases in agreements were not substantially higher than increases for subsequent years in agreements. In the first quarter of 1978 they were 7.1 per cent, in the second quarter 6.6 per cent, and in the third quarter 7 per cent.

It should be emphasized that wage settlement data are for agreements signed in a given period and cover a limited proportion of all agreements in existence, and an even lower proportion of total wages for all employees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but his three minutes have expired.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

CALL FOR FREEDOM OF INFORMATION LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring forward a motion under the circumstances set out in Standing Order 43, the facts of which will appear.

Given the fact that three legislatures operating under the Westminster system have passed or are dealing with freedom of information laws, that the Council of Europe, representing some 20 European countries, is giving favourable consideration to similar proposals, and that the Canadian government stated nearly three years ago that it was giving priority to drafting legislation, and noting with concern the reluctance of the government to produce facts in response to requests during question period, or at all, I move:

That this House requests the government to forthwith table a bill to provide for open government and bring to an end the secret society which it has developed.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO REVIEW RIGHTS AND IMMUNITIES OF MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal that members of the legislature of Ontario—and it applies equally to members of the House of Commons—must disclose the source of information that comes to them as confidential.

Most, if not all, hon. members have had the experience of individuals being prepared to give information that would throw light on wrongdoing or some matter of public interest provided that they have the assurance that their names will not be revealed. If this court decision is upheld, it means that the wells of confidential information will be closed and information which would have been furnished will remain unrevealed. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That a special committee of the House of Commons, to consist of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named later, be appointed forthwith to review the rights and immunities of members of the House of Commons, and that the subject of confidentiality of information given to members of parliament shall receive the fullest consideration;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the first, second and third sessions of the thirtieth parliament be referred to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Government members are afraid of what might have been revealed.

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF CHILEAN REFUGEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It appears that a number of persons from Chile who have presently applied for convention refugee status in Canada will be deported to Chile, a country which the Department of Employment and Immigration has removed from the category of countries to which previously a person would not be forced to return.

• (1410)

Whereas the ad hoc committee of the United Nations Committee on Human Rights reports that Chile is still severely limited with respect to basic human rights and people continue to be arrested and tortured for political reasons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration be requested to reinstate Chile's status as a country of exception to ensure that no one will be deported from Canada in the face of the lack of human rights still prevailing in Chile.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PENSIONS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT NOT CONSIDER QUEBEC ANNUITIES AS INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Whereas Quebec annuities are pensions paid to senior citizens in the province of Quebec; whereas the contributions and the payments themselves are in no way related to the pension and the federal old age supplement; whereas when the plan was first set up, the annuities were not considered as income; whereas since this government has come to power those annuities have been decreed to be income, the federal government thus taking over 50 per cent of the Quebec annuity cheques reducing by as much their benefits from the federal pension supplement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the government discontinue that practice of pumping Quebeckers dry and come back to the initial act under which Quebec annuities were not considered as income with regard to the federal pension supplement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF MANNER OF PROVIDING ADDITIONAL GRAIN HOPPER CARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgency.

[Mr. Brewin.]

In view of the fact that the Canadian Grain Commission is the policing body of the grain industry in western Canada and has evidenced its dissatisfaction with the Canadian Wheat Board's handling of hopper cars by setting up a hopper car committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately refer this whole matter to the Standing Committee on Agriculture with authorization to that committee to summon officials of the Canadian Grain Commission and the Canadian Wheat Board to appear as witnesses.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

BROADCASTING

CRITICISM OF PROPOSAL THAT FEE BE IMPOSED FOR TV VIEWING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of a number of Standing Order 43s raised recently in the House, I rise under the provisions of that Standing Order.

In view of statements reported this past weekend and the resulting fears of the Canadian public about their free access to television facilities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail):

That this House congratulates the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) for referring to the hon. member for Egmont's (Mr. MacDonald) idea of charging 25 cents to every Canadian for every television program watched as "the height in asininity" and recommends that this description be equally applied to the Tory idea of doubling cable—

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STATUS OF NATIONAL FOOD POLICY—MEASURES IMPLEMENTED

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, if I could have the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I would like to direct a question to him. My question relates to the progress of the government's national food strategy or national food policy.

Is the minister satisfied with the progress to date with such a policy and such a strategy? If not, why not? If he is, would he give some indication as to what progress has been made and what recommendations have been implemented as a result of the food strategy talks that took place some 12 months ago?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, progress is being made. It is slow, but it is steady. Changes have been made as a result of the three conferences which took place in the food strategy area. Some changes have been announced recently, including new guidelines for the National Farm Products Marketing Council and some appointments have been made to some marketing boards. Decisions are being implemented as it is appropriate to do so.

• (1415)

Mr. Wise: I have a supplementary for the same minister. Surely the minister should know that the continuing high levels of inflation, high interest rates and the 83-cent dollar, all products of this government, are adversely affecting the food price issue and food price increases. The minister said some kind of action would be taken. He has denied the return of wage and price controls. Is he referring to food price controls, or just what action does the minister have in mind?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the government is considering further action with respect to food prices. Once it has made its decision, it will announce it in the House.

Mr. Wise: I put this question yesterday to the Minister of Agriculture and received no response whatsoever. I now ask the minister, can he give me one simple example?

Mr. Allmand: That would be rather foolish, Mr. Speaker. When the decision on policy is made, it will be announced in its entirety.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO HOLD DOWN FOOD PRICE INCREASES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In a speech yesterday in Winnipeg, the minister expressed his concern over the fact that food prices in the next few months will increase anywhere from 12 to 14 per cent. I would like the minister to express his concern in some tangible way. Perhaps he can tell us why he agreed to the removal of the subsidy on domestically consumed wheat in Canada which meant an immediate 15 per cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread.

What co-ordinating activity is he taking within his department, given the responsibility that is his under the statute to make sure that various government activities which could have an impact on food prices are co-ordinated within the context of some kind of strategy? Perhaps the minister would like to address himself to that.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As was stated on several occasions in this House, we agreed to remove the subsidy on bread because it was a subsidy which went to all levels of the population. We wanted to make sure that our scarce sources of public money went to those who needed it most. We increased the guaranteed income supplement to old age pensioners and we introduced the tax credit for children. That will put the money where it is most needed. That was one of our policies to deal with this situation.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps the minister will take the House into his confidence and tell us why he expects food prices to rise from 12 to 14 per cent in the next few months. If he has already, as he said in his speech yesterday, expressed his concern to cabinet about this and expects action to be taken, why cannot that action be taken now before food prices go up even further?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the predictions for this entire year are between 9 per cent and 10 per cent over the year. However, the forecasts that were given to us by different sources are that in the next five or six months food prices are likely to increase between 12 and 14 per cent. In other words, as the year goes on there will be a levelling off in the rate of increase. I and many ministers have shown our concern. The cabinet has been considering for the last couple of weeks several measures which will deal with this problem.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps the minister will tell the House who in the House is responsible for co-ordinating food policy or food strategy. Is it the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or some other minister we do not know about? We know about the DM-10 study which the minister likes to forget about. Will he tell us who has the ultimate responsibility for this question which is causing so much concern to the people in this country?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there are several interdepartmental committees and committees of officials dealing with food policy. The five principal departments involved have been agriculture, fisheries, consumer affairs, trade and commerce, and health and welfare. The Minister of Agriculture and I have been acting as co-chairmen in this area.

MEASURES TO PREVENT PROFITEERING IN LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the wholeasale price of rough spruce plywood rose from $185 per 1,000 board feet in January, 1978, to $245 in January, 1979, two by fours in the same period went from $195 to $265, and the wood products industry had an 87 per cent profit increase last year, will the minister report what action he is taking to stop this profiteering and thereby protect home builders and consumers generally?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question was asked last week. I responded that I would refer the matter to the director of investigations under the Combines Investigation Act, to see whether there was any infraction under that act, and that I would explore other possibilities as well. I cannot accept as being right or wrong the allegations made by the hon. member until I make sure that some of these matters are correct.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, this price increase was brought to the minister's attention last November. He said then that he would investigate it. We followed it up in January. All the minister can assure us is that he is investigating. Meanwhile, prices are going up. Over the last two years, the wholesale price of two by fours has risen by 70 per cent, and only last week a further 10 per cent increase was announced with regard to both two by fours and plywood sheets.

● (1420)

Since the minister told the Consumers' Association of Canada yesterday that he expected companies with increased profits to practice price moderation, and that if they failed to do so he would have to take action, will he now call in the heads of the lumber industry and demand price rollbacks for domestic lumber?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall the hon. member or anybody else bringing this to my attention before Christmas, but the matter was brought to my attention last week.

I never said at any time that I would do the investigating, because I do not have the powers under the Inquiries Act that the director of investigations possesses under that statute. He has the right to use certain powers of search and seizure which I do not have, and he will carry out his responsibilities and report to me and to the public.

Mr. Symes: For the information of the minister, my hon. friend from Winnipeg North raised this matter with the minister on November 27 and my leader followed it up in January. Though the minister may not have precise legislative authority to take action, he certainly has the power to call in the heads of the industry and try to exercise moral suasion if the government is too timid to bring in legislation.

I should like to put another aspect of this question to him. Again, surely, it relates to something he can investigate with a view to taking action. I understand that upon conversion to metric measurement, plywood is one-sixteenth of an inch less in thickness than under the old Imperial measurement; in other words, there is 10 per cent less wood in an ordinary plywood sheet. We were assured when we passed the metrication bill that there would be no rip-off, as far as consumers were concerned, as a result of the conversion process. This being the case, will the minister now investigate this particular application of metric conversion and take up the matter with the company heads as well?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have a team in the field already helping consumers adjust to the metric system.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Allmand: We have already provided a great deal of help across the country and we will be glad to follow up that particular matter. With respect to calling in the heads of businesses, we have done that before and we will do it again if it is necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

THREE WEEKS' BENEFITS PAYABLE TO PERSONS 65 YEARS OF AGE

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and concerns the three weeks of unemployment insurance benefits paid to anyone who reaches 65. Can the minister tell us whether, in view of the recent amendments to the unemployment insurance regulations, this payment will continue to be made, or if it will be cancelled?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the same thing applies under the new legislation.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the minister try and find out why some government employees are phoning to tell us, as was the case this morning, that the three weeks of benefits would be discontinued. Could he enquire to find out if somebody is mistaken?

POST OFFICE

DOOR-TO-DOOR MAIL DELIVERY IN URBAN AREAS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Postmaster General. On Friday, January 26 last I asked some questions with reference to Post Office inefficiency and gross misconduct which has taken place at the post office in the city of Calgary. The minister agreed to send an investigating team to Calgary.

Has the minister set up this team, in light of the fact that he has received a petition containing 241 signatures and complaining about post office service. The post office to which I refer is open only between eight in the morning and four in the afternoon. Weekly newspapers—for example, the Calgary North News—are sometimes delivered three weeks late. Would the minister tell the House what the team is doing? Has it made an investigation? There has been no improvement in the situation.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think that Calgary Area post office service is as good as it can be in the present situation. The regional manager came to Ottawa to discuss with us ways to improve service. I know that the part of the country to which the hon. member refers has been growing tremendously in the last few months, but I can guarantee the hon. member that everything is planned at this moment to give the Calgary area better service than it has had, and within the next few months the area will get that better service.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I plead with the minister to set up an independent investigation. I was informed at the weekend that some of the staff of the post office play hockey with fragile parcels. It is no wonder there is 60 per cent breakage. If that is the efficiency about which the minister is talking, I ask him to set up an independent investigating team to look into the whole postal mess not just in Calgary but throughout Canada.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should answer such a question, but I can tell the hon. member that everything possible is being done to see that the Post Office is run efficiently and conveniently. I think the question of the hon. member greatly exaggerates the situation.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR ADEQUATE APPEAL PROCEDURES FOR REFUGEES—CASE OF IGNACE MUNOZ

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I believe the minister received a telegram yesterday from an interchurch committee with respect to serious charges concerning a number of refugees from Chile, and in particular the case of Mr. Ignace Munoz and his family. Apparently there is a real danger, if they are deported this Friday as announced by the department last week, that Mr. Munoz will again face possible torture, imprisonment and, this time, death.

Since this deportation is the result of failure to provide adequate translation, interviews and appeal procedures to those applying for refugee status, I wonder if the minister will indicate what action he will take directly to ensure that justice is done and human life is not endangered. This comes directly under his responsibility.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in so far as Chilean refugees are concerned, Canada does not need to be ashamed of the efforts it has made. Second, I think the hon. member should recognize that this government took the initiative of saying we would take political prisoners. In fact, we went right into jails and said we would take 100 families. We reached that quota, we exceeded it, and then we doubled it to 200. Our record in this regard is good, and there is a tendency to bad-mouth it all the time. I think that discredits the service Canada has done in helping these unfortunate people.

Not being satisfied with the appeal procedure under the new Immigration Act, we set up an independent refugee status advisory committee. After an individual claims refugee status, he is interviewed. He can be interviewed in the presence of counsel, if that is what he wants. The refugee status advisory committee considers the interview and determines whether the individual is, in fact, a refugee. It also makes recommendations regarding humanitarian matters. If the committee finds that an individual is not a refugee, the matter is still considered by the department as a second appeal tribunal.

So I do not think it is a good idea to be bad-mouthing constantly what we have endeavoured to do in this particular case. We are attempting to be fair and careful with the lives of these people.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as the minister well knows, there have been numerous complaints about interview, translation and appeal procedures. The minister did not address himself to that.

In view of the serious charges made by a very responsible group representing the major Canadian churches, and the further representations today by a representative of the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees who indicates the danger which will confront Mr. Munoz and others if they are deported to Chile, will the minister review the specific case which has been brought to his attention?

In addition, will he promise to meet the church officials who raised serious questions about the present refugee procedures as well as the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees who is concerned about this specific case?

Mr. Cullen: As a lawyer who has practiced for some 12 years, I am satisfied that when an individual loses an appeal there is always something wrong with the procedures. That is a known approach which is used constantly. But the fact of the matter is that my deputy minister has met with the church leaders. I am quite prepared to meet with them to hear their representations. I am also prepared to have a look at the case which the hon. member has mentioned, because it is of concern.

It is not an easy decision to have to make in cases such as these, but in an attempt to be as fair and as objective as we can, and recognizing that these people have a concern, we are trying to make a decision that takes into consideration the concerns expressed not only by the individuals who are launching the appeals but by others who are involved in the appeal procedures.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA'S RECOGNITION OF NEW REGIME IN IRAN

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the announcement that the United Kingdom government intends to recognize the new government of Iran, and President Carter's statement that the United States stands ready to work with the new government of Ayatollah Khomeini, can the minister inform the House whether Canada intends to recognize the new regime, what criteria will be applied in this decision and what instructions have been sent to the Canadian diplomatic personnel in Iran?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I say, with respect, that I do not want to answer that question orally this afternoon in terms of the type of instructions and the like that have been sent. I will be glad, obviously, to inform the House in a formal way as to what is being done.

I have every expectation that we will be extending recognition to the government of Iran in the normal and routine way in which it is accorded to established regimes, but since the situation is evolving so quickly, I would prefer not to make any more direct statements at this time.

ENERGY

STEPS TO ENSURE ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF OIL TO EAST COAST REFINERIES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Having regard to the minister's earlier remarks concerning a secured oil supply for Canadian refineries, and in light of the announced cutbacks in deliveries of crude oil to some east coast refineries, will the minister indicate whether his contingency plan has now been put into operation and whether this will restore the level of oil supplies to the east coast refineries?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the contingency plan to which I referred a short time ago had to do with the situation which would be created if the international energy agency emergency oil sharing program were put into place. That contingency plan deals with the allocation of crude, the allocation of products and even, possibly, the necessity for a rationing program. That was the contingency plan to which I was referring.

As regards the reallocation problems which have been created for eastern refineries, in Quebec and Atlantic Canada, I believe that the arrangements we presently have in place, the submissions by the industry to the National Energy Board for exchanges using western crude displacing crude at Chicago, should tide us through at least for the present.

Mr. Crosby: In light of the actual cutbacks to certain east coast refineries, I should like to ask the minister whether he can give the House an indication of who exactly is responsible for the maintenance of adequate oil supplies for east coast refineries, and whether he has any indication that those supplies will be continued in the future.

Mr. Gillespie: As I have indicated in the House, I have every reason to believe that the source of Venezuelan crude will be made available to Canada, based on the undertakings which I received when I was in Venezuela. The Mexican crude will not be available to us until the end of the year, but it will help us to reduce our dependence on Middle Eastern crude over a period of time and, therefore, to increase our take from western hemisphere sources, therefore reducing our dependence on the Middle East, an area which is unstable so far as oil supplies are concerned.

I believe that the arrangements, which are still very much of an ad hoc, temporary nature, even though they are of an emergency nature in the sense that western crude is being displaced in Chicago to provide for the shortfall in Atlantic Canada and in Quebec, should, as I indicated a moment ago, tide us over for the time being.

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO TAKE TO AVOID ENERGY SHORTAGE, ESPECIALLY IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could the minister tell us whether he did receive the report requested by his department on the future of Canada in the energy field? If so, could he tell the House what measures his department is taking to face both the immediate and the long term situation which is critical when it comes to the independence of Canada and particularly of the eastern provinces in the energy field? Could he also tell us whether the government is still supporting the natural gas pipeline project between Montreal and Halifax because such a pipeline could be an alternative in such areas as energy supply in such cases.

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised the question of a natural gas pipeline to the maritimes. That particular proposal has been submitted to the National Energy Board, which will be dealing with it during the course of this year. That submission, along with the extension of the pipeline from Montreal to Quebec City and points in between, could have a significant impact on reducing Canadian dependence on foreign oil. Figures which I have seen indicate that the extension of the gas pipeline to the maritimes could displace as much as 100,000 barrels a day of otherwise imported crude oil.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR BUILDING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT IN HUNGARY, HON. KALMAN ABRAHAM

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before proceeding with the question period, may I ask hon. members to join me in signalling the presence in our gallery of a distinguished visitor, together with a delegation of his ministers here on official business. I refer to the presence in our gallery of the minister responsible for bulding and urban development in Hungary, the Hon. Kalman Abraham.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DECISION ON FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SYSCO TO MODERNIZE PLANT

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, November 28, 1978, during the minister's visit to Cape Breton, he was quoted in the Cape Breton Post as saying:

A decision will be made before the end of the year on whether Sydney Steel will get funds for modernization needed to carry out a ten-year sales contract crucial to its future.

We are now in the middle of February and no such decision has been announced. Can the minister tell us why the delay on this decision, and whether we can expect early action on this crucial matter for Cape Breton and Nova Scotia?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I remember quite well mentioning the possibility and the hope I had at the time of concluding these negotiations. But since November, following discussions we had with the New Brunswick premier, we had to set up a small task force which has reviewed the existing proposals and which has started a new round of negotiations not only on a certain contract which had been already negotiated, but on other projected contracts with other possible purchasers of the goods. We hope that within the next few days—and I repeat, within the next few days—they will make their findings available to me. I shall then be able to recommend to my cabinet colleagues the course of action the government should take concerning this proposal.

[English]

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for that information and ask him if this confirms the suspicion at this stage that if an agreement is not reached in the next few weeks between Sysco of Nova Scotia and Tisco of British Columbia, the whole Sysco plant could fall on its face?

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF MEXICAN CRUDE OIL THIS YEAR

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday, and again today, he indicated that the negotiations with the Mexican state oil company might mean that Mexican crude would be available in Canada by the end of this year. Because our earlier information from both Mexico and the industry here in Canada indicated that this would not be available until at least the second quarter of 1980, I wonder if the minister could inform the House how much we are negotiating for this year and how much Mexican crude is expected under these negotiations this year, that is, 1979.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the arrangement which I discussed and which was agreed to when I was in Mexico early in January was that Canada would guarantee to the Mexicans a market for 100,000 barrels a day, and the Mexicans would guarantee to us a supply of 100,000 barrels a day.

The Mexican government indicated that it would be able to start deliveries in the order of 15,000 to 20,000 barrels a day before the end of this year, but very much toward the end of this year. Also, it expected we should be able to get the full volume of 100,000 barrels a day by late 1980 or early 1981.

Mr. Lawrence: What is the expected shortfall that will have to be made up respecting the Iranian cutoff?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, at the moment it is impossible to give any precise answer to that question, if for only one reason, that it would be impossible to estimate how long the crisis in Iran will go on and how soon they may be able to start production. At the present time, part of the shortfall is made up by increases in production by other OPEC nations, particularly Saudi Arabia. As I indicated in the House as well, part of it also is being made up by a drawdown on inventories. I am confident, if there is a relatively early increase in production by Iran, that the measures already taken should see Canada through.

We may come out rather better than most other countries because we have an option most other countries do not have. That is to say, we have some surplus producing capacity, some surplus oil in the ground rather than in storage above ground, which we can call on at the present time during what I hope is just a temporary period.

Oral Questions

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION BY HOUSING INDUSTRY

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is also the minister in charge of metric conversion. No doubt the minister is aware of the arbitrary decision of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation requiring all applications for assistance under the National Housing Act to be in metric after May 1, 1979. Also, the minister must be aware that some building products are available in metric, but basically plywood and dimension lumber are manufactured only in Imperial measurements due to the fact that Americans are our chief purchasers.

Because metric converion has become metric confusion to the majority of Canadians, will the minister meet with the minister in charge of CMHC and discuss the possibility of delaying the implementation of metrification into housing until such time as the lumber industry has made that conversion?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, some time ago—in fact, in 1970, if my memory serves me correctly—all parties in the House unanimously agreed to set up a metric commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: All parties in the House agreed to setting up a metric commission.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: Where were you, Jack?

An hon. Member: You must have been away, Jack.

Mr. Horner: Then the metric commission took it upon itself to form sectors to study—

An hon. Member: Did you approve it?

Mr. Horner: At that time my leader did not even ask for my approval, nor did my leader at that time seek the advice of caucus.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Horner: I, like the hon. member, was not considered important by him at that time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Then the metric commission set up sector studies in each sector. In this case, it went to the construction industry and asked for their co-operation in determining when the construction industry could foreseeably make the move to convert to metric. It was with the full co-operation of the construction industry that the metric commission set up the deadlines for that particular sector of the economy.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

If the construction industry now wants to ask for a major delay, I would hope they would come at least to the metric commission or myself; neither has been done yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I have never known the hon. member to be backward in telling his leader what he thought about various points.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: The minister must be aware of the attitude of the American government toward metrification and the fact Australia and Great Britain are taking a second look at metrification. In view of the fact metrification is costing Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars, and Canadian consumers unknown millions of dollars, will the minister, as one who stood shoulder to shoulder with the troops on this side objecting to the metric bill, give an undertaking that he will meet with his counterparts in the United States in order to discuss metric conversion, so that we can move in concert with the United States?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, let me first put the House straight. There was no metric bill; there was a resolution.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Horner: It was a resolution which had the complete approval of all parties, as I said.

An hon. Member: Just to set up the commission.

An hon. Member: Except you, Jack.

Mr. Horner: That does not mean to say that it had the consent of all members of the House. I never said that at any time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I want to assure hon. members and the House generally that my leader consistently hears my views.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The gratifying position I find myself in—

An hon. Member: And he rejects you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The gratifying position I find myself in is that my leader now actively seeks my views on all subject matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And consistently rejects them.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Now we know what is wrong with the Liberal party.

Mr. Alexander: That is why you cannot get ahead in the polls.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TIMETABLE FOR MINTING OF METRIC COINAGE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. I raise this question with the minister because he is also the Receiver General for Canada and the minister to whom the Master of the Mint reports.

Will the minister advise if the government is proceeding with its plan to produce metric coinage? As I understand it, coins have been designed and samples approved in the 20-cent, 40-cent and 80-cent denominations. Would the minister advise if a timetable for the release of these coins has been determined?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to provide detailed information concerning these issues. It is clear, however, that in view of the rising costs of metals, we shall have to come to a decision concerning for instance the 1 and 5 cent coins, whose nominal values are less than the costs of production. I hope I shall be very shortly in a position to announce the necessary decisions.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is looking into that, could he advise what consultation has taken place with the vending machine industry and the manufacturers of cash registers? We now understand that it will cost $100 million to convert scales. What will be the cost of converting cash registers to metric coinage? What consultation has taken place with the telephone companies and the vending machine industry of the country? Could the minister find those matters out at the same time?

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member that the Canadian Automatic Merchandising Association already is on record as not opposing any of those plans. It goes without saying that no decision will be taken without having full consultation with the vending associations.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO ESTABLISH FAMILY COURTS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

For the past couple of years several Quebec groups, and in particular the Quebec Women's Federation, have been calling for the establishment of a family court. In view of the results of the latest federal-provincial conference at which there was unanimous consensus on the transfer of family rights, could the minister say whether he intends to introduce shortly a bill to amend the constitution so as to set up those family courts, and does the minister, as this will undoubtedly necessitate rather extensive delays, have an alternative which might be immediately applicable to Quebec which could rapidly establish a family court?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in co-operation with several provinces we have already managed to establish family tribunals by going ahead with the joint appointment of judges who are particularly knowledgeable in the area of family relationships. I do not have a similar agreement with Quebec yet but such an arrangement is available to the Quebec authorities if they want to use it, just as a few other provinces have already used that technique.

With respect to the constitutional amendment that would be required to ensure the transfer of marriage and divorce to provincial jurisdiction, the government indicated it agreed with such a constitutional amendment and no decision has been made yet as to the date when parliament will be called upon to consider that specific amendment.

TRANSPORT

USE OF ADDITIONAL GRAIN HOPPER CARS ON CPR LINES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In response to farmers' concerns over the recent media report that the CNR only would get the new hopper cars which the Wheat Board has ordered, when presumably the farmers collectively will pay for them, would the minister explain why farmers who are on CPR lines will apparently not be able to have the use of the hopper cars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there was a point in time when both the Wheat Board and I had the distinct impression that the Canadian Pacific Railway were telling us that they would have enough cars for the handling of grain next year. That, incidentally, was part of their reason for not entering into the boxcar repair program, even though we were offering to pay half the costs and even though I had drawn to their attention the requirement under the statute that they provide equipment for the carriage of goods. They later changed their view and entered into that car repair program. Also, they have now indicated that they do, in fact, require some new cars.

As a result, while the Canadian Wheat Board—I suppose fairly logically—had decided to allocate the cars to Canadian National, which clearly said they needed them, now that Canadian Pacific has indicated likewise I am sure further consideration is being given to the question of whether it would be fair to farmers in the areas served by CPR not to have the advantage of the cars as well.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, in that event, will the minister give his unqualified endorsement that he will make certain that the Wheat Board is fair in the allocation of these cars, as all farmers, presumably, will have to pay for them collectively?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, to this point I have indicated to the Wheat Board my view that it would be wise for them to have these cars divided between the two railroads. I have not considered whether I would take any further action if the Wheat Board continued in the judgment that it was best for them to have the cars allocated to Canadian National. I have also conveyed to them the strong feelings of farmers whom I have met through my travels in southern areas of the prairies, where Canadian Pacific lines predominate, about the fact that the cars ought to be shared.

INQUIRY WHETHER PUBLIC HEARINGS WILL BE HELD ON RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

Mr. Bert Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Will there be any provision made for public hearings concerning the abandonment and destruction of the Amiens subdivision from Spiritwood to Shellbrook in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, that area was fortunate enough to have one of the first recommendations of the Prairie Rail Action Committee confirmed by government action, and as a result the lines to Spiritwood and to Glaslyn have been transferred into the basic rail network. Other recommendations of the Prairie Rail Action Committee go before the Canadian Transport Commission. In this particular case it is a recommendation of the Hall commission which created the first question about that line.

Under the current law, the Canadian Transport Commission can arrive at its own decision as to when it ought to hold hearings. Therefore, it may follow one practice or another, depending upon the extent of submissions to it in regard to the line. I have been suggesting to communities which have concern about saving their line and want to be heard that they not only make their views known to the Canadian Transport Commission at an early date, but do so in the form of a brief setting out their views, so that the commission has an analysis of their reasons in deciding even the preliminary question of holding a hearing.

INDUSTRY

PROGRAMS TO ASSIST ELECTRONICS AND TELEVISION INDUSTRIES

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Statistics Canada statistics show that the "Made in Canada" colour television sets manufactured in December total only 11,900, as compared to 21,000 the year before—a decline of 81 per cent—and that on a year-to-year basis the sales of Canadian-made colour television sets were down 114 per cent and, as compared to 1975, they were down 219 per cent.

The Canadian TV manufacturing industry is disappearing and our electronics industry is in very bad shape. If Statistics Canada intends to do away with statistics on this industry this year, it will save money. Apart from Statistics Canada saving money as our industries disappear, has the government got any programs that will assist the electronics industry and the TV manufacturing industry during the present year, 1979? What action does the government intend to take?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for asking this question because it gives me pleasure to put on the record that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, under the enterprise development program, has specifically helped one of the major television manufacturers in Canada, namely, Electrohome, and helped to put that company back on its feet. In fact, we were out of production of colour television sets for some time, but now Electrohome has gone into production because of the advantages due to the present value of the Canadian dollar. We are now enlarging our production of colour television sets. The increased production may not have shown up in the statistics for December, 1978, but I am confident it will show up in the 1979 figures.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I overlooked a supplementary question by the hon. member for Meadow Lake.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

TRANSPORT

OBJECTION TO PROPOSED RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT AT AMIENS, SASK.

Mr. Bert Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that in the 1920s Canadian National set up a colonization board in Saskatoon to encourage development of this area by promising settlers a rail line, and that the decision to abandon the Amiens subdivision means that people who settled this area in good faith are now being betrayed because of the lack of co-operation between the railways and the government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that that is the kind of comment the hon. member will want to put in his submission to the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BENEFITS OF COMMON MARKET WITH CARIBBEAN

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or, if it is more appropriate, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Recently an announcement was made about a trade and economic co-operation agreement between the governments of the Caribbean common market and Canada. In that regard, could the relevant minister inform the House what benefits will be available for Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are many different benefits to come from it, but I do not think that I would be permitted to go into detail at this time. I will be glad to provide a copy of the agreement and of the statements made at the time it was signed.

FISHERIES—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON TERRITORIAL BOUNDARIES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs: it concerns the present state of boundary negotiations in terms of the west coast.

Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the House if the Canadian delegation is now actively considering a proposal to move the territorial boundary at the Dixon Entrance south, in exchange for some territory in the 200-mile zone? Is that presently under consideration by the Canadian delegation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, without attempting to be evasive, I think the hon. member knows that it is not customary to reveal the details of negotiating positions; but I think that I can tell him that there is nothing that has been in any sense firmed up with regard to the west coast. A number of proposals have been put forward by both sides, but beyond that I do not think that it would be appropriate for me to comment.

Mr. Leggatt: I wonder if the minister could give me some assurance that the Government of Canada does not intend to move that boundary south? If he could give the House that assurance, he might be able to satisfy many of the people who live in the north.

Could he also tell us whether these negotiations, which have been going on for a long time, have an internal time limit, set by the minister? Has there been some agreement in terms of an international forum to ultimately settle the dispute between this country and the United States both on fisheries and on boundaries?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question I can give the hon. member the assurance—and I repeat to him what I said earlier—that there is no offer from Canada. A number of proposals have been put forward in one way or the other, but as of this moment it is merely a matter of negotiation.

On the broader question, quite frankly, I do not know what the outcome is going to be on the west coast. We have had extreme difficulty as to any kind of basis on which an agreement might be formulated not only with our own Canadian fishing community but also with that community as it relates to the fishing community in Alaska and the United States. I think the hon. member knows that we have been involving all of the parties. I believe, incidentally, that our Canadian negotiators are in Alaska—if not today, they will be tomorrow—talking about halibut, for example.

It is exceedingly difficult to get an arrangement with regard to a species which affects one group of fishermen when the trade-off may be another species which is of interest to another group of fishermen. It is extremely complicated, I repeat. On the question of whether it is going to go to third party arbitration, no decision on that has been arrived at on the west coast, but I think the hon. member knows that within a short time, perhaps within 24 hours, we will be announcing a decision in that regard for the east coast.

NEGOTIATIONS ON CANADIAN TERRITORIAL WATERS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I was trying to catch your eye to put it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but perhaps it would be more appropriate to put it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns Canada's north coast and the same negotiations.

Reports are fairly positive that at the fisheries negotiations the United States is laying claim to a considerable area of Canada's territorial waters east of the Yukon-Alaska boundary on the basis that the sector theory does not apply. Can the minister tell us whether such a claim is being made by the United States to Canadian territorial waters and, if so, can he assure the House that the Government of Canada is taking a firm stance that in no way will any portion of Canada's territorial waters as recognized by the sector theory be bartered away?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure the hon. member that we have taken a particularly firm stand. We want to get the absolute maximum that we can for this country.

In so far as formal claims by the United States are concerned, for obvious reasons I would want to check and see what has been laid down as a formal claim as distinct from certain positions proposed in negotiations. I will try to get that information for the hon. member.

Perhaps a more general answer would suffice at the present time, in that Canada has recognized no claims by the United States for any boundary lines or any other proposal that they have put forward on the west coast. As I told the hon. member a few moments ago, the whole thing is very much a matter of negotiation, with no final decision made as to how it will be disposed of, whether by bilateral negotiation or third party arbitration.

MR. MACEACHEN—OPERATION OF STANDING ORDER 43—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: A point of order under Standing Order 43 has long been outstanding before the House. I am conscious of the fact that today is an allotted day for the opposition but I should like to dispose of this ruling at this time. I have given it very careful consideration and I do not think the House will find that it will take an undue length of time, bearing in mind our desire to start proceedings on the opposition motion.

This point of order came up in respect to difficulty with proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43 but obviously, through the very extensive discussion, it touched on long standing concerns on both sides of the House about the proceedings pursuant to this Standing Order which we have now organized as our first item of business every day and which proceedings have given us a rather troubled history.

The Standing Order began, innocently enough, simply as the written expression, perhaps even unnecessary, that with unanimous consent we could free ourselves from the shackles of our own rules. In due time it found its way into the hands of all members as a rather regularly used device during motions which in the previous arrangement of our business followed questions each day.

Early in this parliament we re-arranged our order of business in a way which I feel, and which I think other hon. members feel, greatly improved not only our question period but which consecrated our opening few minutes to applications pursuant to this Standing Order every day. I think it cannot be overlooked that this represented a clear confirmation of support in the House for the practice.

It also introduced an element of self-discipline, since the time not taken up with these motions would be available for additional questions and, as a result, I believe I became more lenient in my own interpretation of Standing Order—perhaps as discussion on all sides of the House indicated, a little too lenient. In any case, I certainly welcomed this point of order when it was raised late last year.

I want to say at the outset that the extensive discussion, containing a number of very reasoned contributions, has in itself done a great deal to reduce the difficulty, especially in the consensus which I felt was evident, that the practice, however imperfect, fills an important purpose and must be preserved, and that I must exercise my authority to check obvious abuses.

Drawing upon this consensus, I hope members have noticed that since the day of this discussion I have intervened on several occasions to reject applications from both sides of the House which contained inflammatory preambles which are of a purely partisan nature, which lack urgency, and which are frivolous; and even today I set aside one of those applications which came from the government side of the House. As I say, I have tried to do that on both sides of the House and to draw upon the consensus raised in the discussion that I ought to do so in order to preserve this practice. Equally, I have refused to put the application to the House where the motion endeavours to express congratulatory messages or relates to procedural problems.

I want to stress to the House that I have taken this approach as a direct response to contributions from all sides—from the government side, of course, but equally from the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Among the contributions I received I stress those members because in each case the member stressed that it was hoped I would find a way to reduce the misuse of the rule in order to safeguard it. I, therefore, say I was drawing upon a consensus. With the support of the House I will continue to do so in order to ensure that access to this procedure remains available every day to those who seek to bring to the attention of the House matters which are worthy of urgent consideration.

I also want to resolve the point of order related to the conflict with our schedule when consent is given, the motion is put and debate begins. I am convinced that the committee which recommended the excellent pre-arrangement of our routine proceedings did not anticipate this problem, and so we are without specific guidance.

I am faced with some very clear language in Standing Order 15(2), which protects the hours of question period each day, and Standing Order 45(2), which transfers to government orders any interrupted or adjourned debate. I have therefore followed the practice of transferring to government orders any debate under Standing Order 43 which is interrupted by the question period. It seems to me that to do otherwise I would have to ignore these Standing Orders and give motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 a priority over all other business, which is really in effect giving to it the priority heretofore enjoyed by motions referring to matters of privilege. Finally, it seems to me that if the effect of consent to put a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 is to give it that kind of priority, I think members realize I would only be increasing the difficulty of securing consent instead of easing it, which might be more desirable.

A future procedure committee will, I am sure, endeavour to clarify this problem for the House. In the interim, I will continue to treat these debates, once interrupted by question period, as having been transferred to government orders pursuant to Standing Order 45(2).

These two decisions about attempting to reduce those abuses which I cited earlier in my ruling, and this ruling about attempting to transfer the debate to government orders if interrupted by question period, may clarify situations which press upon us for the moment, but still do not touch on many of the elements given very extensive consideration in the discussion, including a number of suggested improvements. I think I should deal with those briefly.

I think all sides of the House recognize that this procedure is the best substitute we have for a grievance procedure, but that it fails fundamentally as a grievance procedure because it is not in any way designed to evoke a direct, reasoned response at the time the grievance is aired.

We dealt rather extensively as well with the difficulty that members who withhold their consent for the introduction of this motion ought in some way to be identified, perhaps by rising in their place. This was a very strong point raised over a long period of time by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and was also referred to on several occasions by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

One of the most basic concerns relates to the rather widespread misunderstanding of the very nature of the proceeding itself. That is, that what is being sought is actual passage or approval of the motion and therefore that the withholding of consent by the other side somehow constitutes opposition to the motion. Both of these notions are rather widely held and both of them are totally incorrect. For very good reasons members of this House are entitled to notice in advance before being asked to debate a matter of some importance.

The effect of Standing Order 43 is solely to introduce into the House a motion without prior notice. Approval or passage is an entirely separate question once the motion is put. On the other hand, the withholding of consent ought to be related in some way to the introduction without notice of a motion, and I am sure it often has nothing to do with the substance of the motion.

There is not much that I can do to bring about a more accurate understanding of these procedures from the Chair. However, I want to return to one proposal that seemed to receive support from all sides of the House, and that is the matter of a member refusing consent and doing so with identification. Obviously that carries with it a counter-balancing change in our practices. Presumably if a member is to be identified when withholding his consent to the introduction of a motion, then we would have to give to that member the opportunity to explain the reason that he is withholding his consent.

Let me try to point out the difficulties that we face by the example which is so recent, namely the motion now put a second time within about a week by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Many suggestions were put that that abuse of the rule might be eliminated by prior notice being given to the Chair so that I could choose between motions. Alternatively, I could take a tight line on abuses when listening to the preamble of the motion.

The motion put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert touches a matter which seems to me, in any Speaker's decision, would qualify as far as urgency is concerned because it follows upon a court decision. It is important because it affects the rights and privileges of members of the House of Commons with respect to the confidentiality of their sources of information. Even if advance notice had been given to the Chair, a method which has been suggested by some hon. members, and even if I take the tightest possible line on preambles, any Speaker would surely see that this is a motion that qualifies pursuant to the rules.

The difficulty arises when the withholding of consent is considered as opposition to that kind of a motion. Whether it is or not, leaving aside political differences for the moment and taking a serious approach to the dilemma for both sides of the House, I would say this is a motion that most would consider could quite properly be put under this procedure. On the other side of the coin the question is: Is it desirable that that kind of motion be debated without any advance notice? It is a very serious question. Would the House be satisfied with a debate that did not include in that subject a contribution, for example, by the minister of justice of the day? Surely not. Therefore, the withholding of consent in these circumstances is related to the fact that notice should be given, and a matter of this sort ought not to be sprung on the House without such notice. Later in the question period of that particular day, in response to a question put by the right hon. member, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) gave some reasoning. But that does not happen every day.

Then the question arises: Is this the direction in which we should move? Should members withholding consent be prepared to identify themselves by rising in their places? If they do this, should they be given the opportunity to make a brief statement about the reason for withholding consent? Immediately the House will realize that we have fundamentally changed the proceeding if we do that. Also we will have entirely altered the use of that brief period of time which now exists.

Another of the useful suggestions that has come forward and which also gets my approval in principle concerns the development of a grievance procedure. We are striving to use this proceeding in order to replace what I have said many times in the past is significantly missing from our practices, and that is the right of members on all sides of the House to have access to the proceedings of the House to air grievances that cannot be aired satisfactorily in the question period, at least not always.

It cannot be done satisfactorily under the provisions of Standing Order 43 because there is no response permitted and there is not sufficient time. The adjournment debate is the closest thing we have to it, but it is not satisfactory either. It has a tremendous backlog and in order to get to the adjournment debate one must first have access to the question period. Therefore it is hoped that the House could develop some proceeding at six o'clock, as specifically suggested, I think, by the hon. member for St. John's East. Perhaps we could use that period of time, but I do not know and I certainly would not want to think through the details without an examination by a committee.

It seems to me the following are two possibilities and worth-while suggestions. First, regarding withholding of consent under our present proceeding, that the one withholding consent might have a brief moment to give his reason. Second, that a grievance procedure be established which would replace the attempt now being used under Standing Order 43 to air a grievance in a more adequate and direct way. Both of these suggestions should be examined.

I say in conclusion that these suggestions have my support in principle. The House will know that at this stage of our parliament it would not be timely even to attempt these rather important and substantial changes. In any event, these changes ought not to come from the Chair. They have to be as a result of consensus in the House carefully distilled through committee proceedings which will examine all of the consequences and make recommendations to the House.

I indicate that these are two suggested improvements that ought to be given careful consideration, probably early in the next parliament. A report should be made to the House so the House can draw upon that consensus. I will continue, as I say, with the support of the House to enforce the rules as strictly as I can, bearing in mind the ad hoc nature of the proceeding, the preambles and the content of motions, in order to ensure that we will continue in the balance of this parliament to have this procedure available for those who wish each day to bring important and urgent matters to the attention of this House.

MR. CROSBIE—BROADCASTING—NON-RECOGNITION OF SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the question period. Your Honour recognized me so that I could ask a question, which was not unimportant, in connection with the television manufacturing industry of Canada. You did not permit me to ask a supplementary; you went back to my hon. friend from Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu) to permit him to ask a supplementary, which I certainly agreed with. But, Mr. Speaker, as you know, the original question is not always the most important one.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I asked a question about the television manufacturing industry. My supplementary was going to be: Why were the government purchasing TV monitors specifying foreign equipment when it calls for tenders? Why do they not assist the industry by giving some preference to purchasing, rather than discriminating against Canadian manufactured equipment? So obviously the important part of my question was the supplementary. Yet for some reason unknown to me, Your Honour did not permit the supplementary. Just because Your Honour wished to permit the hon. member for Meadow Lake to have a supplementary was no reason for Your Honour not to allow me to have a supplementary, unless the question I was asking was completely inconsequential in the first place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that he has no point of order. The matter is discretionary. I have to exercise this kind of discretion every day. Regrettably we were coming to the conclusion of the question period and I had some very difficult choices. About three members had supplementary questions and I could not recognize all three of them. Perhaps the next time it will be the hon. member at the expense of one of his colleagues.

MR. McGRATH—CMHC OFFICIALS—ALLEGATIONS OF WRONGDOING—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) rose on a point of order and asked that I withdraw some of the comments I made in answering one of his questions. I then agreed to check Hansard. I must say that indeed the hon. member for St. John's East did not accuse the civil servants of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but that he merely alluded to allegations of wrongdoing. I therefore take this opportunity to straighten out the record, and correct Hansard.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would say that is a demonstration of good parliamentary manners.

UNUSUAL AND TROPICAL DESEASES

Question No. 211—Mr. Jones:

1. Have there been any reports of outbreaks or diseases that are unusual for the Canadian environment or climate by doctors or hospitals within the last eight years? If so, what were they?

2. Have there been any reports of tropical disease breaking out in Canada since 1970? If so, please specify.

3. Have the number of tropical or unusual disease cases been on the rise in Canada since 1970? Please give statistical figures for outbreaks of tropical or unusual diseases since 1970.

4. Have these cases been reported to the Health authorities or to the public to warn them of these dangers? If so, list the authorities to whom these cases were reported. If not, why?

5. What steps have been taken by the Department of Health and Welfare to protect the people of Canada from the spread or attack of tropical or unusual diseases?

6. Is immunization against tropical or unusual disease available to all Canadians upon demand. If not, why?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: 1. There have been few reports of outbreaks or diseases in the last eight years that are unusual for the Canadian environment or climate. A visitor to Canada was diagnosed as a case of cholera in 1974, and a second diagnosis was made in 1977 in a Canadian who acquired the infection while overseas. No spread occurred in Canada. The recently described legionnaires' disease was confirmed in two patients in 1977, and in approximately 20 in 1978. Poliomyelitis which, through aggressive immunization programs, has become a rare disease in Canada, was diagnosed in nine patients during the past summer. All occurred in unimmunized individuals who had rejected vaccination on religious grounds. Over the past eight years the average incidence has been three cases.

2. No outbreak of tropical disease has been reported in Canada during the last eight years. Epidemics of these diseases are unlikely to occur nowadays because of the ecological environment and improved hygienic conditions. As shown in the response to question No. 3, malaria is being diagnosed in an increasing number of patients. However, all cases have occurred among travellers returning from the tropics and spread within Canada does not occur.

3. The following table shows the number of cases of tropical or unusual diseases reported in Canada since 1970. As already noted, the increasing volume of Canadian travellers to tropical countries where the disease is still endemic.

Reported Cases of Rare Diseases—Canada, 1970-1977

Amoebiasis	118	134	253	491	584	650	870	746
Brucellosis	31	8	16	8	27	30	38	39
Cholera	—	—	—	—	1	—	—	1
Leprosy	6	9	10	15	10	11	18	16
Malaria	5	7	7	25	24	52	91	96
Poliomyelitis	2	6	2	4	3	2	—	2
Psittacosis	9	3	6	2	2	1	—	6
Tetanus	11	6	3	3	8	1	7	8
Trichinosis	6	3	16	14	49	7	41	23
Tularemia	1	1	—	1	8	2	35	5

4. Tropical and unusual diseases are reported by the physician making the diagnosis—either to the local medical officer of health—or directly to the respective provincial epidemiologist. Action is then taken for location and examination of contacts, if this is necessary. Provincial health authorities in turn alert Department of National Health and Welfare officials if further interprovincial or international action is indicated for control of the disease in question.

5. With Department of National Health and Welfare support, a special committee was formed to develop a "Canadian Contingency Plan" dealing with the principles and management of exotic dangerous communicable diseases. This was published in March 1978, and since then approximately 3,500 copies have been distributed to federal, provincial and municipal health authorities. In addition, pamphlets are produced to alert travellers of disease risks in foreign countries. Travel agency associations are informed of special vaccination requirements and ongoing training is maintained in biosafety practices for quarantine officers at ports of entry.

6. Immunization is readily available, although the number of vaccines of proven safety and efficacy is greatly overshadowed by the number of diseases for which no adequate prevention exists. In general, family physicians can provide most immunizations, and many local health departments provide special clinics for traveller vaccinations. Yellow fever vaccine is supplied free of charge in National Health and Welfare designated clinics.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—LOSS OF CONFIDENCE IN CANADIAN DOLLAR AND GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House regrets the government's refusal to give parliament a meaningful opportunity to investigate the loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar and the government policies which have reduced our currency to its lowest level in 40 years.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as you and the House will know, this is the first day available to the official opposition to discuss a matter of our choosing in the House of Commons since parliament has resumed after Christmas in the fifth and, we trust, final year of the life of this discredited and limping government.

We have chosen to direct attention today to a question of substance and a question of procedure relating to the ability of the House of Commons of Canada and the ability of the people of Canada to have revealed to them the facts and the forecasts that are available to the government regarding the state of the Canadian dollar. We would like an opportunity to hear witnesses, including some of the most credible Canadians in the land who are concerned that the policies now being pursued by this government in relation to the Canadian dollar are policies that are pushing the dollar down, adding to inflation in this country and very seriously damaging our economic prospects.

We know that today the dollar was up infinitesimally; it is now at 83.79 cents U.S. We know also that in the past two years the value of the Canadian dollar has dropped almost 20 per cent, from $1.02 U.S. to less than 84 cents U.S.

Mrs. Holt: It's good for trade.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Clark: One of the Liberal members who is departing from this House and, when the election comes, from this parliament shouted from behind the curtains that it is good for trade.

An hon. Member: It was simply Simma.

Mr. Clark: One of the Liberal members said it was simply Simma. I understand their problem. She has now turned her attention to the whole government and is no longer simply criticizing the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé).

The result of the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar has affected the daily life of every Canadian. Food, clothes and imported components necessary for production in this country cost much more money. Some of the investment houses based here and operating outside this country estimate that the value of the Canadian dollar, which has already fallen almost 20 per cent in two years, could fall as low as 79 cents U.S.

The government claims that we have a floating dollar when it knows that this is not a floating dollar at all. They know that it is very close to being dishonest to claim that the policy now being followed is a policy of allowing the Canadian dollar to float.

The government has spent $5 billion of our exchange reserves. It has borrowed almost $6 billion and has increased interest charges seven times. The governor of the Bank of Canada says that he has done everything he can on the monetary side. When asked what he is going to do on the fiscal side, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) says he is not going to do anything at all.

[Translation]

I would now like to talk about what happened to the Canadian dollar and why, more important, the present situation has developed. The fact that our currency's value went down on monetary markets in the fall of 1977 was not surprising given the performance of our economy in relation to that of our main commercial partners. It was not realistic to have our Canadian dollar equal or even surpass the U.S. dollar. The economic reality required a downward readjustment and most experts were agreeing to have the level fixed at between 88 and 92 cents. But there has not been an adjustment of that kind. Our dollar has literally dropped down to 83 cents, a level never before reached since the 30s, and it dropped despite massive interventions by this government on money markets through the Bank of Canada. The economic reality does not warrant a dollar worth only 83 cents. The only explanation lies in this government's incredible incompetence in economic matters. Mr. Speaker, the 83 cent dollar is nothing else than an absolute no confidence vote in this government by the international community.

[English]

This government has earned that vote of no confidence by the international community by failing to meet three basic tests of economic leadership. First, its management of the dollar has raised questions about the honesty and in fact the intelligence of this government. Either it does not know what it is doing, or it is not going to tell the truth to the people of Canada and the international community about what it is doing.

● (1530)

The Minister of Finance says day after day that the dollar is floating, yet while he says the dollar is floating he empties out our exchange reserves of $5 billion. He borrows almost $6 billion abroad and pushes through seven increases in the bank rate, all of them for the precise purpose of ensuring that the dollar does not float. Watching this contradiction unfold, the money traders in Toronto, in New York or in Zurich can only conclude that the Government of Canada is either dishonest or incompetent, or both.

Mr. Alexander: I like that last.

Mr. Clark: Second, the government has completely failed to deal with our basic weaknesses in our dealings with the rest of the world. Our weak dollar is only a symptom of much more fundamental problems—a $12 billion deficit in manufacturing trade, a deficit of more than $1 billion on our tourist account, and an even larger imbalance in the flow of interest and dividend payments to other countries. These problems require action by the Government of Canada. They cannot be solved by the Bank of Canada. All the bank can do is finance our current account deficit by ever larger borrowing from abroad. This compounds the problem. In fact, we shall have to add $1 billion more to our merchandise trade surplus this year just to offset the widening gap in non-merchandise accounts.

The government has not brought forward a single major policy initiative to deal with these problems except for the false pretence that a devalued dollar is, in itself, an answer. Surely the experiences of countries like Britain and Italy make it clear that a weak currency is no answer to anything. Our problems are much deeper than the level of our dollar and they have to be faced.

The third major failure lies in the area of growth. The government has kept the economy well below its potential. If one were to score the government, its recent economic box score could be summed up this way: budgets, 5; task forces, 22; direction, 0.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It might well be the most telling commentary on the approach taken by this government to say that the only important development in the economy has been the drop in the Canadian dollar. Having amassed the largest spending deficits in our history, the government have absolutely no plan to bring the budget into better balance. They have what is called a restraint target. What does that mean? It means that government spending would double in seven years and even that, in the words of the Minister of Finance, would only be a pause before they get on with bigger and bigger spending.

Ours is a country of enormous potential, a potential unparalleled elsewhere in the world. Yet we are heading into our third straight year of inadequate growth, with unemployment over one million and inflation of 8 per cent or more. And the response of the government is to tell Canadians to lower their sights, to get used to unemployment and higher prices. That is a recipe for disaster and it is a response which can no long be accepted.

It is well known that there is deep disagreement between the parties in this House about national economic policy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) claims everything is just fine—there are no problems and there is no need for any major change. We in this party believe fundamental changes are needed. We have to reduce the size of government and reduce the burden the government places upon the private and productive sectors of this country.

We believe we have to put money back into the hands of individual Canadian citizens by tax cuts, tax incentives and other means which will get the country growing in line with its potential. That is the fundamental difference which exists in economic policy. It is well known. It is known to the House and it is known to the people. The lines are drawn. There will be an election. The election will be fought on that question and as a result of that election, as a result of that issue being decided, there will be a new government. And there will be an opportunity to bring some growth back into the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The disagreement which exists about the fundamentals of economic policy is well known. But what we are dealing with today is a different and, because of its urgency, a more serious problem. I say this because the disagreement on the question of the Canadian dollar is not a disagreement between political parties alone. Disagreement has now become public among the small group of people in this country who are privy to the policy which is actually being followed to defend the Canadian dollar. The chairman of the board of directors of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. McLaughlin, deliberately made his concern public on January 11 when he dealt directly with the pretence that the Canadian dollar is floating. I will quote briefly from his remarks.

Mr. Breau: He has been replaced—

Mr. Clark: One of the hon. members opposite who specializes in talking from his seat has talked about people being replaced. He should look forward to that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I shall quote only two passages from the words of Mr. McLaughlin:

> It is true that we officially have a floating rate for the Canadian dollar, but during the past year the float became a rather dirty one. Ottawa maintained that the Canadian dollar was being left to find its own level on the market. That is the essence of a clean float, with intervention only to prevent too great a movement either way, over a very short period. But what Ottawa said and what Ottawa did seemed to be two quite different things. In my view, this has been part of the reason for the fall in the Canadian dollar.

In other words, to make it clear, part of the reason that the Canadian dollar has fallen has been inconsistency between what the government said it was doing and what it has in fact been doing. It is the policy and the duplicity of the government which have driven the value of the Canadian dollar down.

Again, Mr. McLaughlin said:

> But surely the experience of governments around the world has shown that any currency defended at a level other than what the market says it should be must inevitably end up at the market level anyway. Government support is not only ineffective but frequently counter-productive.
> Certainly last year the defensive efforts of the govenment had, in my view, a reverse effect. This support probably pushed the Canadian dollar down.

That is the view of the chairman of the Royal Bank. That was his public testimony and, as we in the House of Commons know, he was saying publicly what countless other Canadians expert in this field have been saying privately. There is direct and widespread disagreement with the policy being followed by the government to support the Canadian dollar. There is a widespread view that this policy is, in Mr. McLaughlin's words, "probably pushing the Canadian dollar down."

We know that the dollar continues to drop. We know that every drop in its value adds to inflation in this country. We have a right to know why the government is pursuing a course which has so obviously failed. We have a right to know what forecasts, what expertise in possession of the government, can justify a policy which, on all the evidence, is failing miserably. But this information is not available to parliament and to the people of Canada. Questions put in this House are evaded or else they are not understood.

When the governor of the Bank of Canada appeared before the standing committee, his answer to Mr. McLaughlin's charge was simply: "Mr. McLaughlin is wrong." Nothing more. There was no explanation, no defence. When the minister appears before that committee he is deliberately protected from questioning by Liberal members who ask about everything else, and then he is further protected by a Liberal deputy chairman who tries to deny the official opposition their right to ask questions.

● (1540)

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Reference has been made to proceedings before a committee of this House at which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was not present, and it seems to me there should be an opportunity for the chairman of that committee or someone on his behalf to make a response. Incorrect information is being placed on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The contributions to the debate which ensue this afternoon can take the form of any intervention which may be desired. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has the floor.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If the deputy chairman wants to have an opportunity to participate in this debate, perhaps he should consult his superiors in his party to see if he can get on the list of speakers. Or perhaps the view of the Liberal party in relation to members of that committee is that none of them should be heard on any circumstance at all. Perhaps that view will prevail and this deputy chairman will be denied his right to make a point, just as members of my party were denied their right to put questions in the standing committee.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): You are not being fair, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: There is a parliamentary secretary opposite who is very nervous. I am not surprised about that. Anyone who has to serve as parliamentary secretary to this Minister of Finance, when we have an economic policy which has driven the dollar down and the rate of inflation up and which is driving the unemployment rate up, deserves to be nervous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What is clear to all the world and even to the very nervous parliamentary secretary is that the present government policy is not working at all.

Mr. Martin: Nonsense.

Mr. Clark: The hon. parliamentary secretary says "nonsense" because the dollar is up to 83.79 cents today. It has dropped 20 per cent in two years.

Mr. Martin: Nonsense.

Mr. Clark: The parliamentary secretary continues to speak from his seat. Is he arguing that the Government of Canada has deliberately driven the dollar down, or has it simply fallen down because of the inadvertence of this government? Is he arguing that it is the deliberate policy of this government to allow more than a million people to be out of work in this country? Is the parliamentary secretary arguing that it is the deliberate policy of this government to have the dollar drop in such a way as to increase inflation?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is no wonder he speaks from his seat.

Mr. Clark: There is a very real question as to whether the policy being followed is deliberate or accidental. Most of us think this government does not know what it is doing. Most of us think that is the reason the government refuses to let evidence be public, that that is the reason it put a gag on the standing committee and that is the reason it keeps forecasts secret and refuses to allow witnesses to come before committees so that they can be examined and we can have the benefit of their expert testimony. We think this government does not know what it is doing. We think that the international community, whose decisions affect the value of the Canadian dollar, has also come to the conclusion that this government has no idea what it is doing, and that is adding significantly to the uncertainty which exists both in the international community and here at home. That is another factor which is reducing the value of the Canadian dollar month after month and day after day.

This question of confidence is very important because if the government continues to pretend that there is no problem and everything is fine when the dollar drops month by month, and if the government continues to pretend that we have a floating dollar when that float has to be supported with billions of dollars, confidence in the Canadian economy will be reduced even more than it has been.

Part of the enemy is a failure of policy, and I intend to come back to that later in this debate. But part of the enemy also is uncertainty about what this government is going to do. The government should surely understand by now that secrecy creates uncertainty, that a pretence of a float creates uncertainty, that a failure to explain policy or a refusal to answer legitimate criticisms all create deep uncertainty, and that that kind of uncertainty will drag down the Canadian dollar deeper and deeper.

That is precisely why we have been seeking a full-scale parliamentary inquiry into this situation. An inquiry would allow us not only to hear from the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance, when Liberal members allow questions to be put, but it would also allow us to examine the testimony of Mr. McLaughlin and other experts and representatives of investment houses and banks.

We need an opportunity to make public some of the evidence which exists in relation to the effectiveness or the failure of the policy which is being followed. As a parliament and as a people we must also examine publicly some of the other policy options which are open to us. Perhaps we should be considering special export mechanisms like the DISC program introduced in the United States when its balance of payment deficit proportionately was only one third as large as ours. We certainly should be reviewing sectors where our own domestic economy is very heavily dependent on imports to see whether there are ways—whether through special "buy Canadian" programs, temporary import surcharges or other mechanisms—by which we can encourage more substitution of imports by Canadian-made products. We should also be examining ways to improve our tourist account, offer new incentives to attract foreigners to Canada, more effective packaging of Canadian travel for Canadians and perhaps examine some existing proposals to allow Canadians to spend their own money while winter vacationing in the sun.

Unfortunately, this government refuses to face up to the problem, and so it does not want parliament to examine policy options. Canadians are left to suffer the price of the weakest dollar in more than 40 years and the risk that it will drop deeper, dragged down by the uncertainty this government's attitude engenders.

I want to deal with some of the substance of the problem we face now. I think it is agreed by people who know the situation Canada faces that the Canadian dollar will remain vulnerable to downward pressure as long as there is a large current account balance of payments deficit. Canada has suffered current account deficits averaging $4 billion in each year from 1975 to 1978 inclusive. Since 1976 the trend has been upward. Forecasters expect a larger current account deficit in 1979 than in 1978. The problem is not getting cured, it is getting worse, and the reasons are clear. The deficit on trade in services has been growing by an average of $1.1 billion a year for the last four years. Even under the most optimistic of assumptions, the growth of that deficit will continue to be very significant in the future.

As I said earlier, just to keep the current account deficit from increasing the merchandise surplus must grow by $1 billion per year. Despite devaluation, the surplus did not achieve that growth in 1978. Most private sector forecasters do not see a $1 billion improvement in the surplus in 1979. Even though Canada is achieving record merchandise surpluses, these surpluses are simply not adequate to stop the current account deficit from rising, let alone reduce it.

The government has offered no forecast which indicates that the current account deficit can be reduced in the medium term. I understand that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will be replying later. Perhaps he will give us that and other forecasts. Thus the government can provide no evidence which suggests a more stable dollar in the future, and even if Canada were to achieve a series of quite remarkable improvements in merchandise trade over the next five years, we have no indication at all whether our trading partners will tolerate sustained large Canadian merchandise surpluses.

[Translation]

The devaluation of our Canadian dollar these last 27 months had a greater impact on the Canadian economic performance, for better or for worse, than any budget put forward over the last four years. Although a number of exporters praised the admittedly stimulating nature of devaluation, both importers and consumers suffered from a lower dollar. When we realize the scope of the devaluation, we are amazed at the lack of discussion of the consequences.

The Minister of Finance usually supplies forecasts of the impact of his proposals. The minister for instance did forecast that the sales tax reduction at the retail level would lower somewhat unemployment. He predicted the reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax would reduce inflation by 0.5 per cent. These programs had minor impact relative to devaluation, but there is no government member who is not ready to give details on the pros and cons of devaluation. What is the actual and forecasted share of devaluation in the inflation rate? In terms of stimulation, what is the Canadian dollar devaluation worth? Would a still lower dollar generate sufficient merchandise trade surplus to reduce the current deficit in the current accounts?

[English]

Those are some of the questions that have to be asked but which the government refuses to answer. When one looks at the strategy that has been followed by the government to defend the dollar, one finds there are three main elements:

first—my colleagues will be discussing this later—there have been higher domestic interest rates; second, there have been immense federal borrowings abroad; and third, there has been the utilization of large amounts of foreign exchange reserves.

These three do not represent by any means all the tools available to defend the dollar. There are others available, and the parliament and the people of Canada have a right to know whether the others are being considered, and if they are not, why not. And if they are being considered, is there an intention to introduce them and to modify them?

There are a number of other measures available. Let me enumerate some of them that should be considered by a government that is serious about maintaining the strength of the Canadian dollar. Is consideration being given to currency swaps with central banks of other governments? Is consideration being given to borrowing from the International Monetary Fund? Is consideration being given to the revaluation of Canada's gold reserves? Is the government considering reductions in the rate of monetary expansion which we have seen in this country? Is any consideration being given to raising the chartered bank secondary reserve ratio? Is consideration being given to seriously reducing the growth rate of federal spending? Is the government giving any consideration to placing temporary import quotas on non-essential goods? Is there any consideration being given to reducing the duty-free exemption for returning Canadian travellers?

Those are only some questions, and the list is by no means inclusive. Many of these mechanisms may be completely unacceptable to the government. All of them involve costs to the Canadian economy. But let us be clear about this: so does the current interest rate policy involve costs to the Canadian economy; so does the current falling of the Canadian dollar; and so does the current rate of inflation, fed so much by the devaluation of the dollar.

What this parliament has the right to know and what the government has an obligation to set forward is what are the relative costs to the other instruments that might be available, and why is there no serious public consideration of other means that might prove more effective than the means that have clearly failed to support the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Speaker, I referred to the matter of interest rates and although this government seldom does anything sensible, there is nothing less sensible than their determination to increase interest rates to record levels. That idea of theirs has led to the most expensive monetary policy in this country's history.

We are told the government has no choice, they must maintain interest rates above those in the United States. In suggesting this the government forget there were times in history when interest rates were in lower Canada than in the United States, without undue harm to this country. But more important still, this government admits Canada has no choice and must be a follower rather than a leader, whatever the consequences for Canadians and our own economy.

[English]

These alternatives that I have listed have to be considered. Will the Minister of Transport, when he rises in his place today, explain to the people of Canada and to parliament why these alternatives I have listed are not acceptable, whether they are being considered, and if so, whether there is any intention to follow any of them?

In his appearance last week before the standing committee, the governor of the Bank of Canada said that he would not recommend them. That is his judgment, and his judgment, of course, has credibility. But there has been no explanation as to why all other alternatives to a policy that has failed are unacceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is essential in my view that we obtain either here in this House or in our parliamentary committees a much more in-depth and precise explanation than we have been provided with up to now.

[English]

That, Mr. Speaker, is the problem of policy, but there is also the very serious problem of secrecy. Secrecy has become a way of life with this government. It is the most secretive government in the western world—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) but I think he will observe that his time has come to an end. I thought perhaps he was concluding, but then I realized he was opening another subject. I do not think he can carry on now without the consent of the House. It is the usual 30 minutes time limit. It expired a minute or two ago but I did not want to interrupt him at that time. Perhaps he could indicate now whether he proposes to conclude or whether he wishes to seek the consent of the House to continue.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would propose to conclude, if I might be given a minute to do so, and I will try to take no more than that.

I had intended to elaborate somewhat more the problems of secrecy posed for this process by the government, particularly in light of the fact that eight years ago we had a recommendation by a committee of the other place that would have led to a much more extensive public discussion of economic questions. I wager to say that had the advice of the other place been accepted, had there been a tradition of openness for the last eight years instead of the tradition of secrecy which we have seen here, we would not be facing a problem with the value of the Canadian dollar as acute as the one we now face.

While it is fundamentally important that the government change a policy that is leading us to deeper and deeper trouble with the Canadian dollar, it is also fundamental that this government abandon its practice of secrecy, that it stop putting obstacles in the path of inquiries by committees of the House of Commons and allow witnesses to come and be examined; that it allow all the truth to be told about the state of the Canadian dollar and the options that are available to the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada that could reverse the sinking trend that has marked the Canadian dollar for the last two years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should say, first of all, that I am rising to speak in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who accepted some time ago an engagement to speak at the prestigious Council of Foreign Relations in New York. I regret that he is absent and I regret particularly that the opposition has rushed to put this motion on the order paper in his absence when he could not confront the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in the appropriate way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: I know they were saying that of course they had to do it because it is such an important question to put before the House, but then I know they did not put a votable motion before the House but simply one for debate. I suppose that in view of the fact that, as the Leader of the Opposition said, they have one matter of substance and one matter of procedure in their motion—and they are wrong in both of them—they might have expected to lack the support of the House if a vote had come about.

There was some rumour that the Leader of the Opposition was not going to be here. When I saw that he was absent during the question period and beyond it, I thought that was true, but I gathered what was happening was that the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) were trying to decide whether to deliver a long deficit speech or a short deficit speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will have heard of the Book of the Month Club. Obviously there are no economic books in that club and he has not read many others, but the Book of the Month Club is well known. However, the "deficit for a month club" created by the hon. member for York-Simcoe is something new.

I notice that the Leader of the Opposition is here and I am delighted. I also notice he did not go into the question of deficits and left us wondering what his policy is in that regard, even though I should have thought that in his spirit of openness he would have revealed to the country at this important stage what his thinking really is so that we get a view of what this self-styled prime minister-in-waiting would do as the leader.

An hon. Member: Now you are getting the message.

Mr. Lang: I am not sure that that self-styled leader would have set many minds at ease by telling us what his policy is because, after the Leader of the Opposition spoke about the fact that he would go for an even higher deficit for two or three years, that that was his method of bringing deficits under control, we had the only example I know in history when a senior spokesman for the party indicated on that same subject matter that his leader was not speaking for the party in giving those opinions to the people of Canada. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) indicated that it would be only for perhaps a month or two, that they were not quite sure. Then I think the Leader of the Opposition said, "Maybe even five minutes".

• (1600)

I am delighted the Leader of the Opposition read a speech which contained some economic questions. It did not contain any suggestion of answers, which of course is not surprising. At least the Leader of the Opposition was here today. He was not before the committee. He made his grandstand in the House demanding that Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada come before the committee, but the Leader of the Opposition was not there to put his questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The hon. Leader of the Opposition could have asked these very questions, and if he was not satisfied with the answers of the governor, he could have cross-examined. The hon. Leader of the Opposition admitted that the governor of the Bank of Canada made a telling case in support of the policies in place relating to major monetary and fiscal questions, yet he did not appear before the committee to put questions.

Also the Leader of the Opposition indicated that in the spirit of openness he would have liked other witnesses to appear before the committee. I have been told by members of the committee and the steering committee that they knew of no case where the opposition asked for certain people to be called before the committee and their request was refused. It is the lack of putting requests for witnesses which is troubling the opposition and their leader, rather than any lack of openness on our part in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: The Canadian dollar—

An hon. Member: —has just fallen again.

Mr. Lang: Earle McLaughlin said that the Canadian dollar will in many ways reflect an international judgment about its value. Over any prolonged period of time obviously that is true. Over any short period of time obviously it reflects the moves and opinions of those who speculate in the market. One of the most serious indictments of the official opposition is the irresponsibility with which it has engaged in the debate on our currency and economy, without regard to the fact that those outside the country might make the mistake of treating the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York-Simcoe as being somewhat responsible and therefore rely upon their statements and figures.

When the Minister of Finance said that the deficit would be $11 billion, the Leader of the Opposition made the bald statement that it would be $15 billion to $18 billion. The Leader of the Opposition is being irresponsible when he makes such a bald, unfounded statement. The trouble is that people outside the country may not know how little attention they should pay to the Leader of the Opposition when he makes such statements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: When has the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) ever been correct on any forecast?

Mr. Lang: The governor of the Bank of Canada told the committee what everyone in the House and the country should know concerning the question of the value of the dollar or any currency. He said that people react to every bit of news around; they react to every bit of news about possible separation or anything one would like to see. He indicated that people would react if someone irresponsibly said that there will be foreign exchange controls.

On February 3, the hon. member for York-Simcoe was quoted in the Toronto Star as having heard in Ottawa that there was a government contingency plan on controls. That was completely false, completely irresponsible. Even if the hon. member had real knowledge about such a matter, as a responsible member of the opposition he should have avoided saying so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Without the facts to support it, he made a statement which had impact upon the Canadian dollar.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: At the present time many Canadians believe that the Canadian dollar is undervalued. At the time prior to the election of the separatist government in Quebec, many Canadians felt that it was overvalued. At that time we were going though a series of fairly high wage settlements, and we were deeply concerned about the impact upon our productivity and competitiveness. We reacted with a program of wage and price controls which turned the corner on that inflationary spiral. As we emerge from controls and are moving into lower figures of inflation, we know we must continue restraint in wages and prices to keep competitiveness under way.

One of the serious matters faced by the country which has an impact upon the value of the dollar and the confidence of investors is the existence in Canada of a separatist government espousing policies to change the entire economic framework of the country. The uncertainty surrounding that fact was not improved when the Leader of the Opposition indicated that he would negotiate a sovereignty association with the government of the province of Quebec; the Parti Québécois were dancing in the streets of Quebec. Perhaps later the hon. Leader of the Opposition was not sure whether that was what he said, but he did not deny saying it. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) knew that his leader had said it and repeated it until it was clear to every Conservative member that such a policy was unacceptable; then it was rejected. What I am highlighting is the irresponsibility and complete lack of control by the leader of the Conservative party over what he says, over his partners in specific areas of responsibility in that party, and the damage it can do.

The Leader of the Opposition did not speak about his deficit. Once again he talked against the federal deficit. He pretends to see a way of cutting 60,000 public servants which he thinks will save some money. However, he talks about a bigger deficit to stimulate the economy. Why did the Leader of the Opposition put himself in that position? It was because it was put to him that he had, in his various perambulations and speeches, promised income tax cuts of $2 billion immediately and a mortgage deductibility plan of $4 billion over three year. Incidentally, that plan can be dressed up as an attractive tax reduction, but it will benefit the rich more than the poor. It is pure fraud and deceit if it is not accompanied by some word concerning from where the money will come to make up the $4 billion in mortgage deductibility. Were will the money come from?

The hon. Leader of the Opposition likened his program to the American one. Canadians should take note of a warning concerning his proposed program: in the American program a capital gains tax on homes is in place. Perhaps that is where the hon. Leader of the Opposition has in mind getting the funds. The government would not support that policy in any circumstances.

Mr. Gillies: That is not a fact.

Mr. Lang: On January 8 the hon. Leader of the Opposition appeared on a CTV program. He was asked the following question:

> You talk about $4 billion over three years on a mortgage deductibility with $6 billion in other tax cuts. How are you going to get over this deficit?

The Leader of the Opposition answered as follows:

> The basic question is: how do we get over the deficit? You get over a deficit two or three years from now by having a slightly larger deficit now. There is no way around that.

That is what started the business of who said what.

Mr. MacEachen: Then we heard from Darcy McKeough.

Mr. Lang: As the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said, the well known Conservative, Darcy McKeough, the former treasurer of Ontario, said:

> I sincerely trust and hope that my national leader, Mr. Clark, and his advisers have been misquoted when they talk about the possibility or desirability of bigger deficits.

● (1610)

The hon. member for York-Simcoe did not wait. He told the press immediately that what the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) meant was that there would be a deficit for maybe two or three months, and we have not been told how it is going to work. In all this openness which they want there is this phantom deficit with no information as to how it will work.

The Leader of the Opposition asked a few questions about possible measures which he, presumably, might put in place. I do not know why he would ask if he did not mean to say that he would put them in place. He has some possible measures to remedy the situation. He says, "Maybe we should look at special export programs". Does the Leader of the Opposition not realize that the dollar at its current level is one of the greatest spurs to the export of Canadian goods? We are seeing that in terms of the improvement in practically every sector of our economy, and as a result we have a $3.5 billion surplus in trade for this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The Leader of the Opposition insists on referring to a deficit of $11 billion in what he calls manufactured products. He insists on referring only to the end product figure and ignoring, as my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has pointed out, such manufactured list goods as steel, cement, paper and lumber which move out in a form that does not put them in the end product category. But when those products are taken into account we are in a surplus position of $3.5 billion rather than a deficit position of $11 billion.

I have not, nor has the Minister of Finance, ever made light of the kinds of problems which face this country in a troubled world. But I think it is fair to say that the Leader of the Opposition does a real disservice when he sounds off about a deficit under the heading of manufacturing by using an end product figure to obtain a deficit, when the figure in terms of manufactured goods as a whole shows a surplus of $3.5 billion. That is important news of the kind which the governor of the Bank of Canada, if the Leader of the Opposition had been in committee to hear him, would say might have a good impact upon the whole economy and our dollar rather than a bad effect, as do the kinds of wild statements made by members opposite and by the hon. member for York-Simcoe in particular.

The Leader of the Opposition in this case follows the hon. member for York-Simcoe. I thought when I heard the hon. member for York-Simcoe say that that he would have a different view from the Leader of the Opposition, in keeping with their current practice, but I guess, as somebody phrased it, it is tweedledum and tweedledummer. I would have thought that when I heard the hon. member for York-Simcoe suggest that we go for a temporary import surcharge or some form of import duty, we would at least have heard a westerner, who should remember something about what tariffs do to our whole economy, rebuke his colleague for saying such a thing. But he would actually suggest temporary import charges at a time when our dollar value has made it easier for our goods to compete at home and abroad. He would do so in the face of some worrisome words in our friendly country to the south that they may think of a similar measure when they have as serious problems or more serious problems than ours in terms of balance of payments.

An hon. Member: They are thinking about it.

Mr. Lang: If they are thinking about it, then surely it is in our Canadian interest to resist that, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will do in the highest circles of the world in keeping with an agreement made by the leaders of the seven countries that they would do everything they could to keep away from restraint measures and attempts simply to back the unemployment or developmental problems of one area into another. We want an open world with freer and freer trade and no temporary measures which would restrict that trade either within our country or outside it.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York-Simcoe are also guilty of misleading language when they use the expression that money is spent in connection with the defence of the Canadian dollar or action in relation to the Canadian dollar. It is transformed from one form of dollar to another—from American dollars in our hands to Canadian dollars—traditionally when we are guarding against uneven movements in a downward direction, and back the other way—from Canadian dollars into American dollars—when we are guarding against uneven movements in an upward direction. That policy of trying to use the currency exchange reserves in order to even flows and avoid fast movements is clearly very important.

This country is by and large in excellent economic shape.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Let's go to the people on that one.

Mr. Alexander: When is the election, Otto?

Mr. Lang: We continue to have a serious challenge on the employment front where we are trying to spur the economy as much as possible to provide jobs, and we are providing jobs now at a year over year rate of 450,000, a rate which outdistances any other country in the world.

One might ask what does 450,000 jobs mean? Is it a large figure or is it a small figure? If one compares it to the actual growth in our population of 205,000 over that same 12-month period, it is quite significant. As a result Canadians are on average and individually—

Mr. Alexander: —getting sick of this government.

Mr. Lang: —better off in their standard of living day by day, week by week and year by year, even in the challenges we face in this economy of ours in a difficult world. That is why we see more Canadians travelling generally, but particularly travelling abroad, and that is why it contributes to our balance of payments problems as well. It has not been the policy of this government, and we would avoid such a policy, to restrict Canadians in how they invest or travel. We do encourage them to travel in Canada and to buy in Canada. The hon. Leader of the Opposition has said that perhaps we ought to do that. Perhaps he has not noticed that we have designed to do that, that we have a tourist program specifically designed to attract more and more Canadians to travel in this country.

Mr. Crosbie: Like Trudeau to Colorado.

Mr. Lang: We believe in doing these things on the basis of encouraging Canadians to take a certain course of action and not on the basis of falling back on restrictionist controls and power devices such as the Clark Tories suggest. That is not our policy. Our Liberal policy is to be as free and open in our society and our economic endeavours as it is possible to be.

Mr. Crosbie: Like freedom of information in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Get an injunction, Otto.

Mr. Lang: Hon. members opposite, Mr. Speaker, were glad to hear the Leader of the Opposition quote Mr. Earle McLaughlin, although I am sure they did not like what he said a few weeks or months ago when he also indicated how firm his belief was in the basic soundness of our economy. Perhaps they would like to hear the last group of quotes which have come into my hands. Mr. Powis, president of Noranda Mines, said:

One of the most striking things about the meeting—

He was referring to a meeting of businessmen.

—was the degree of optimism, more than most of the forecasts.

The Financial Post said:

Canadians rank remarkably high in affluence in a world more troubled than we. The time has come in other words to count blessings.

Mr. Laurent Thibault of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association said:

You talk to any company you want to, they're growing, markets are good, inventories are lean, profitability is improving, they can compete.

● (1620)

The president of the Hudson's Bay Company, Donald McGiverin, said:

The economy is pretty darn good really.

Canadian Business Magazine wrote:

The fact is we're still operating one of the most successful economies on earth.

The facts are there, Mr. Speaker. In the face of those facts the Leader of the Opposition is not sure today whether he wants a stronger dollar, a higher dollar or a lower dollar. His colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe has given us some advice about what level he thinks is right. The truth of the matter is that the dollar will reflect in part the judgment of the day of traders in currency and traders generally in this country.

I pointed out earlier that in that complex of figures in relation to trade and in relation to the balance of accounts it is also true that wild statements and rumours made by spokesmen in the opposition can have their impact as well. They cannot have lasting impact because they will be exposed, but they can have that impact which is the most serious—which causes a sudden surge up or down in the currency. A stable currency is obviously relatively to be desired at whatever level it may appropriately be.

Where ought our Canadian dollar to be? I said earlier it was generally agreed that prior to the November 15, 1976 election of the Parti Québécois it was overvalued. It is generally agreed now that on all terms, and related at least to that very fact of a separatist government, it is undervalued.

Mr. Alexander: I was told that separatism was dead.

Mr. Lang: The most important thing is for us to confirm what the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has just said about separatism being dead—

Mr. Alexander: That is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said.

Mr. Lang: —in the sense that it is in hand and under control.

Hon. members opposite and the Leader of the Opposition smile. They do not realize that the Parti Québécois was not elected because it said it was going to separate from this country and was determined to do so. It could only get elected because of the strong feeling of federalism in the province of Quebec. It was only elected after it gave up that plank and turned instead to a referendum on independence. That was changed to a referendum on sovereignty association because René Lévesque hoped that people in Quebec might be sucked in by those words; but the only person he seemed to suck in was the Leader of the Opposition who did not know how serious those words were.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please, order. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has the floor.

Mr. Lang: Why can one say with confidence that separatism will not succeed in this country?

Mr. Gillies: Because we are going to have a new government.

Mr. Lang: There are some who would say it in terms of a question of the force of power, but that is not the way we talk. The reason one can say that the strength of federalism exists and is strong in the province of Quebec and other provinces is because of the long, determined efforts by this government to lead a right thinking majority of Canadians along the path of understanding the needs of the minority, whether it be in regard to their culture, in regard to Atlantic regional development, or whatever. That is what will sustain our federalism and this great Canada of ours.

It is only this continued understanding, this continued searching out of the rights and needs of the minorities and the sensitive understanding of their needs, which will prevent the cause of any kind of separatism from growing. It is that kind of understanding which we have seen in the governments of this country, particularly after the challenge became visible and real from the province of Quebec, the kind that we saw in the leadership given by Prime Minister Pearson in searching out the causes and the answers to the problem. We have seen it in the sensitivity of the programs of this government under the leadership of the Prime Minister.

Liberals throughout this country promote the view that minority interests must be respected and put in place in terms of our laws and our structures. That is what in the end will win over any threat of separatism in this country. That is what in the end will restore confidence on this vulnerable question of separatism, without having in the short run a great deal to do about it in terms of convincing those abroad that the threat is in hand.

Mr. Alexander: You had ten years to do all of this.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, what the Leader of the Opposition ignores is the exact value of a dollar to those who export, because exports reflect higher costs which may have been built into our wage and price structures. Certainly the fishermen of this country should bless the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) for the 200-mile limit and for prosperity in their industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: They are benefiting by the price they get for their fish today compared to other costs they have to incur in Canada. The Saskatchewan farmer and those throughout the prairies and other regions of this country benefit when they export agricultural products and receive 45 to 50 cents more per bushel of wheat because of the change in the value of the dollar.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are real reflections of the need there was in Canada for an adjustment to the dollar, having regard to our wage and price levels which have gone too high. Those were the needs which were faced with wage and price controls and which are now being faced with ongoing programs to try to ensure that restraint by those who would take too much out of the economy is the order of the day.

Many spokesmen in the real world have said how well our economy is doing when compared to other countries. In the years to come when the separatist threat is put behind us that fact will stand us in good stead in the kinds of jobs we continue to promote and in the continued growth of the economy.

No motion lacking in substance and wrong on the procedural issue which may be put forward by the Leader of the Opposition can conceal the fact that a great deal has been going right with the economy of this country when considered against the background of a world which has been and is troubled. This government will continue to move toward policies which are free and liberal and which give people as much freedom as possible in the management of their own affairs, their decision to travel, that give as much freedom—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Minister of Transport but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, we have just had a walking and talking illustration of what is wrong with this country by the minister of almost everything—the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the minister of the wheat board, the minister of justice, the minister of manpower, employment and immigration. He is minister of everything but master of nothing. The minister has just lectured us and I will try to put what he said in reasonable terms. I followed with great care the brilliant, sophisticated reasoning just presented to us. Apparently the fact that hamburger costs $2 per pound, that interest rates stand at 11.25 per cent, that the dollar is down to 83 cents, and that gasoline costs over $1 per gallon has absolutely nothing to do with this government. This is to be blamed, on the one hand, on the opposition or, on the other, on René Lévesque.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: It was a real tour de force, a put up job by a former dean of law. In my view, the reason for the election of the PQ government was because the people of Quebec, like the people of Canada, got sick and tired of a Liberal government.

• (1630)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is the reason. A few years ago a man named Bourassa from the province of Quebec took the same attitude that this government is now taking with Canada as a whole, specifically that everything they do is right. Whatever problems emerged, Mr. Bourassa blamed the provincial separatists for them, he did not blame his own government. This is the same attitude that the federal Liberals are now taking by putting the blame on the opposition. I notice the minister, with his characteristic modesty and consideration of the opposition, has just left the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Broadbent: If there is anything that a Liberal cannot stand to hear, it is the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Whenever it hits them in the face they leave.

His was an incredible performance. I want to say to the minister that he has convinced his backbenchers if no one else in the country.

Mr. Paproski: They have gone also.

Mr. Broadbent: The subject matter of the motion I thought we were debating was associated directly with the problems of the Canadian dollar. I had hoped to hear, particularly from the minister who was filling in for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), some solid defence of the principal instruments that the government has seized upon to prop up the dollar. There are two of them and I will come to them in a moment. They are serious in the financial and real world that Canadians are living in now. But we heard nothing. We heard noting in defence of the government's policy. All we got was a little forerunner of the Liberal party's election campaign which suggests that all of the country's problems are to be blamed on everyone else instead of upon themselves.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) at one point in his comments today—and on this I agree with him; anything I do not agree will I will come to later in my remarks—said very correctly that the real problem of the Canadian dollar is not to be attributed to interest rates or some other minor aspect in an over-all monetary or financial policy, but to the performance of the Canadian economy as a whole. That is the problem.

The reason we have a strong Japanese yen, a strong West German mark and a strong Swiss franc is that we have strong Japanese, Swiss and German economies. In these countries and others there are governments which are seriously committed to national economic performance. Canada is in trouble today and has a weak Canadian dollar because we have a weak Canadian government, that has no sense of purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is the reality.

There are two principal instruments in dealing with this 83 cent dollar that have been applied, on the one hand, by the Minister of Finance and, on the other, by the Bank of Canada. I want to deal with them because every now and then it is appropriate for a politician in Canada to deal with a matter of substance and say where he and his party stand on the issue. The two instruments that the government has seized upon are interest rate tinkering and borrowing money abroad.

In a matter of months we have gone from an interest rate structure of 7.5 per cent to 11.25 per cent. One direct result of this policy has not been a good one. What impact has occurred as a result of jacking up the interest rate in this way? If I remember correctly, seven times in the last year we have had an interest rate increase. This was effected by the Bank of Canada with the full support, policy, and I am sure direction, of the Government of Canada. The negative effect has caused interest rates to increase and Canadian businessmen have been affected. This meant Canadian businesses could not expand and provide more jobs which are badly needed.

Second, mortgage rates have increased. This meant that Canadian families who wanted to buy homes have not been able to get a home at all or have had to pay much more for it. This has resulted in restricting consumer credit. Consumer credit costs were increased along with the bank rate. In each one of these instances, either interest rates for businessmen, consumer credit or mortgage rates, the effect has been negative, not positive, on the Canadian economy. The effect has been a generation, not a reduction, of the pressures of internal inflation.

I doubt whether the Minister of Finance—although I am stretching a point here—the minister who has just spoken would deny these negative effects, but they would say, however, there have also been positive effects. They would say the interest rate upward pressure, which we think is a fundamentally faulty policy and ought not to have been embarked upon, was needed. Why? To attract investment into Canada and to make up for the outflow of capital.

What has happened during the period we have had this upward pressure on interest rates? In 1978 it did not work. That is a simple reality. In the past year, not coming in but going out of this country, there was some $2 billion of investment capital by Canadian firms. What were these firms investing in? Most of the money was going to the United States. It was going to the country which for most of that period had lower interest rates. If interest rates were a prime consideration in terms of attracting capital, then obviously it would not have been going in that direction. And why does a country like Switzerland, which had much lower interest rates than Canada throughout this period, get all the foreign investment it wants?

I will come to the different question of whether we want it in a moment, but first I want to deal with the argument that it has been effective. It is the government's position and that of the Bank of Canada that we needed to have these higher interest rates—admitting it was harmful in terms of domestic inflation—because we had to get this investment capital. In Canada we are now experiencing a net outflow of capital; it is not coming in. Countries that wanted investment, like Switzerland and the United States, have had lower interest rates than we have, yet they have been attracting and getting investment capital for what I regard as the central economic reason that investors had more over-all confidence in the performance of their economies. That is the reality.

The other method of propping up the dollar used by the government and the Bank of Canada has been to borrow directly abroad and to issue new bonds. The reality of this in terms of its effects has been even more alarming as an illustration of faulty economic policy. The Bank of Canada borrowed a total of $3.5 billion abroad last year, $2 billion in loans and $1.5 billion in bond issues. We estimate that the direct cost to the Canadian taxpayer of borrowing this money abroad last year was $268 million. That money has gone; it has gone forever. In addition to that cost, as a result of the additional $1.4 billion which was borrowed in Canada by the Canadian banks the total outlay for Canadians for this faulty policy is some $378 million. That is more than $1 million a day which this government has spent in propping up the dollar. This is more than $1 million a day which my party would argue could have been much more sensibly spent in restructuring and rebuilding a manufacturing sector in Canada that could be generating more jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: There are two brief but cogent arguments against the central pillars of this financial policy, the interest rate approach on the one hand, and borrowing abroad on the other. I will not elaborate further upon them.

As I said at the opening of my remarks, my party and I believe that the serious problems of the Canadian dollar, and they are serious, are attributed to the over-all malfunctioning of the Canadian economy. To paraphrase what the Leader of the Opposition said, something more serious and fundamental is required than tinkering around with interest rates. However, I am not just going to comment on the government's disastrous performance in this regard. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that something more fundamental is required. When he said that, my ears perked up. I thought I might hear from the Conservatives the fundamental policy that is required. I regret to say that I did not hear anything fundamental.

Mr. Paproski: He did not get to it.

Mr. Broadbent: One of the Conservatives says he did not get to it. He made some suggestions. I will not comment on those; I thought they were illustrations of fundamental Conservative thought, if that is not a contradiction in terms. The suggestions that were made were exactly of the same kind of tinkering nature that we have had from the Liberals.

On the other hand, he suggested some restrictions should be put on tourists with regard to what they bring into the country. That is one idea. On the other hand, there was the suggestion of imposing for a brief period of time some tariffs, thereby holding out some prospect that jobs will not be lost by keeping out certain products. That is a clear violation of an international agreement. Those were the two principal suggestions from the Conservatives. It is entirely the same kind of tinkering as that proposed by the Liberal party. There is no difference at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Give us a chance. Wait until we are in a couple of years.

Mr. Broadbent: The Conservatives say give us a chance. I have experienced 20 years of disaster with the guys over there. I do not want to put up with another 20 years of those on my right.

Mr. Crosbie: What about ten?

Mr. Broadbent: Neither the government nor the official opposition is offering any serious solution to our problem. On behalf of my party I want to state briefly what I think is the problem and to make some very specific suggestions.

The real problem we face in Canada is not just an international problem as the Liberals like to tell us. The Germans, Japanese, Swiss, Belgians and Swedes do not have it. In a different context, the Americans do not have it. The real problem is that this country does not have a viable industrial manufacturing sector of world class standing. The reason is that just over 20 years ago a decision was made by a Liberal government, supported by a series of governments, including one term in office of the Tories consisting of two principal points.

After the war it was decided that we were a rich resource country. From Newfoundland on the east coast to British Columbia on the west coast, it was recognized that we indeed were blessed on a per capita basis with the richest supply of resources in the world. It was argued by the Liberals of the day and supported by subsequent Tory governments that because we had a small population spread across the continent, we should sell off our resources to other countries that were industrialized. That was the argument that was made. Not long ago the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said in a speech in Toronto that we should remain hewers of wood and drawers of water.

It was further argued that because of our small market, we could only have an industrial base that would serve the Canadian market and that it would have to be promoted behind high tariff barriers.

The chickens are coming home to roost at the end of the seventies. That is the real reason we are having problems with the Canadian dollar. We are finding that we are not the only country with resources. Countries such as Guatemala, Indonesia, Panama and Mexico also have resources which they are selling. As a result, we are seeing lay-offs in northern British Columbia, Thompson, Manitoba and Sudbury, Ontario, our once thought totally immune resource parts of this country. However, that is what is happening in Canada.

Our manufacturing sector was set up on a branch plant basis. Not only is it not doing research and development, but it is not going after export markets. It is not even competing behind tariff walls to serve the Canadian market. Therefore, we are having lay-offs in our manufacturing sector. On the one hand, we run into international competition with third world countries in selling off resources. On the other hand, we cannot compete at home with the manufacturing sector, which not exclusively but in the main is incompetent in world terms. That is the result of decisions made by a series of Liberal prime ministers and maintained by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was prime minister of Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: That is not true.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member says it is not true. I hope he joins in the debate.

I want to place on record the relationship between these general statements and the current difficulty we are having with the dollar. In 1950 we exported 15 per cent of our mineral production in raw form. By last year that percentage had climbed to 40 per cent. We are just stripping it off and exporting it. In 1950, 25 per cent of Canadian jobs were in the manufacturing sector as opposed to 20 per cent in 1978. We are becoming less of a manufacturing country than we were ten or 20 years ago and becoming more of an exporter of relatively unprocessed raw materials.

These data show that we are continuing to sell off our resources. In terms of our share of the world market, however, we are selling fewer because of competition from the third world.

Mr. Gillies: Look at the figures.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member for Don Valley will have an opportunity to join in the debate. I hope he will. I would like to hear him reiterate and justify his view that the people of Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario and the east should be hewers of wood and drawers of water.

That is the current statistical data on the resource sector. The data for the manufacturing sector is even more alarming. The growth of the fully manufactured goods deficit in the balance of payments account grew from around $3 billion in 1970 to over $12 billion in 1978, an increase of 400 per cent in eight years. Meanwhile the penetration of our domestic market by imported manufacturing goods increased in 17 out of 20 categories of secondary industry products in our country. The process started after the war of being an exporter of raw materials and importer of manufactured goods, or at least not a sophisticated manufacturer of secondary goods, has worsened, not improved. That is the real reason for the problems we are having today with the Canadian dollar.

My time today is relatively brief; I only have a few minutes remaining. In that time I would like not only to state the problem, as I have done, but to suggest an alternative approach, something that does not involve the tinkering we have heard about from both of the old line parties.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: A central approach has to be taken now in order to come to grips with the problem of the Canadian dollar. We must deal with the broader question of providing jobs for all Canadians who need and want to work, and with driving down the cost of living. This is all connected with restructuring the Canadian economy. It is all connected with the issue of ceasing to be what we have become, namely, industrial tenants in our own land.

● (1650)

We should begin with the assumption that the central duty of the Government of Canada is to see that Canadian resources are owned by Canadians, controlled by Canadians and turned into manufactured goods by Canadians for export all over the world. That should be the assumption. To achieve this end we have laid out, on other occasions, certain specific recommendations. But today, in the context of this important debate on the Canadian dollar, I will set out certain definite proposals for the consideration of the House.

First, we should stop propping up the dollar at the cost of many millions of dollars for the sake of a policy which is not working. Instead of spending more than a million dollars a day to maintain a dirty float, we should invest that money directly in restructuring the Canadian economy and bringing about a greater degree of Canadian ownership in commercial sectors.

Then instead of raising the bank rate, the prime rate should be lowered by a whole percentage point. This should be done immediately because, in our view, it is essential to stimulate economic growth and make up the 14 per cent of unused capacity in the economy.

Third, over half of the jobs under the control of the Canadian Development Corporation which was set up in 1971 exist in other lands. My party says that all future CDC investment should take place in Canada alone unless a specific investment project can be shown to have a long-range Canadian benefit.

Finally, immediate steps must be taken to redirect the current rate of Canadian investment abroad. Intelligent use of planning agreements, investment incentives and joint ventures in energy, mining, pulp and paper, transportation, fishing and manufacturing could keep large sums of this money in Canada. Before large Canadian firms are permitted to invest significant sums abroad, they must be required to show a net Canadian benefit.

This approach, Mr. Speaker, is not something drawn out of a hat. It is not the magical product of academic economists working in a closet. These four proposals I have listed have already been put into effect in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, France, West Germany and Japan. The point I am making is that these are practical measures which are not new, they are workable, and the general conclusion Canadians should draw from them is that the problem of the Canadian dollar is not to be put in one corner, so to speak, while inflation and unemployment are put in other corners. They are all related as every economist and every thinking person knows. The means of dealing with them are also known.

What is lacking, therefore, is not the knowledge but political leadership, and it is time we got the leadership which would move the country in the required direction, leadership which will rest on the assumption that Canadian resources belong to Canadians and that the time is long overdue for us to start using those resources to develop a first rate manufacturing base in this country.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—LOSS OF CONFIDENCE IN CANADIAN DOLLAR AND GOVERNMENT POLICIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark:

That this House regrets the government's refusal to give parliament a meaningful opportunity to investigate the loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar and the government policies which have reduced our currency to its lowest level in forty years.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the motion of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). Like the hon. member I think that the Canadian dollar has reached a critical point. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) can go on repeating that an 85-cent dollar will be profitable for our external trade, but in fact the weakness of the Canadian dollar results from the weakness of our economy.

In fact, foreign investors and financial circles have lost confidence in the economic policy of Canada, an ad hoc and unforeseeable economic policy. We have no continuous plan, no real orientation. We take band-aid measures when we have our backs to the wall. The proof that the Minister of Finance does not want a dollar worth 83 or 84 cents any more than we do is that the Bank of Canada has continuously intervened on the foreign exchange market to prevent the drop of our dollar. Indeed the Bank of Canada has used up its foreign currency reserves to support our dollar, and recently the government had to borrow again on foreign markets.

Furthermore, the Bank of Canada had to juggle with discount rates so that the interest rates of chartered banks rose to record levels and those banks will continue to make excessive profits, at our expense naturally, as they have been doing since 1968. Much to the amazement and surprise of the government the report published last week by the Economic Council of Canada proves it. In the beginning, the drop of the dollar to 90 cents was an unavoidable adjustment resulting from the loss of competitiveness of Canada as concerns price and cost, and the lack of economic leadership of our political authorities. I should rather, Mr. Speaker, talk about the absence of leadership. That would be more in line with the present situation.

When the Minister of Finance says that an 85-cent dollar stimulates imports, he forgets of course to talk about the adverse effects we are beginning to feel as a result of our depreciated dollar. That drop was too rapid not to have negative effects, quite simply because of the strong upward pressure on food prices and our massive imports—particularly during winter—of agricultural products which indeed we cannot slow down and without which we cannot do. So we are unable to slow down inflation.

Indeed, workers with a family spend the greater part of their budgets on food, meaning that most of their expenses go for food. So the depreciated Canadian dollar represents an additional increase in the domestic prices of goods purchased abroad. As a result of that workers today are beginning to cry out loud. Unemployment insurance benefits are being reduced by 66 per cent to 60 per cent, so our family allowances and inflation continues to gallop. So, as I was saying earlier, inflation is far from being checked and even the minister must have realized his predictions. In this post-control period, we see there are ever-increasing potential confrontations between management and unions which of course are going to ask for big salary increases. Indeed, the government is beginning to be concerned about that tendency, as the right hon. Prime Minister (M. Trudeau) pointed out recently.

In spite of last minute interventions the dollar has not yet stabilized and its drop is constantly being reported in the media where every day we are told about a loss of a few points or a very insignificant temporary recovery. But in the last several months the defence of the dollar has been very costly. We borrowed astronomical amounts to replenish our run-down reserves.

So what is the logic, Mr. Speaker, behind all that inconsistency in government measures? Opposition critics have asked for clarifications on the government policy on a daily basis. Naturally, we did not get a clear answer. And yet we represent the people and they have a right to know how their money is being used because they ultimately suffer from the continuing depreciation of our dollar.

In his address to the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Royal Bank, which according to its latest annual report made profits of up to 40 per cent, the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the bank, Mr. McLaughlin, accused the government of being irresponsible and of having caused the dollar to fall. Here is what he declared last month on January 11, and I quote:

It is true that we officially have a floating rate for the Canadian dollar, but during the past year the float became a rather dirty one. Ottawa maintained that the Canadian dollar was being left to find its own level on the market. That is the essence of a clean float, with intervention only to prevent too great a movement either way, over a very short period. But what Ottawa said and what

Ottawa did seemed to be two quite different things. In my view, this has been part of the reason for the fall in the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker, that accusation against the government comes from the head of the Royal Bank. We in our party, as members of the opposition, were right to show our concern about these last minute interventions which never did succeed in supporting the dollar anyway. The motion we are dealing with today stems directly from that fact. Of course, other factors have contributed to the fall of the Canadian dollar. I said earlier that our lack of competitiveness and the fact that our costs were no longer competitive had weakened our economy and therefore our currency. Obviously, having to rebuild our reserves and to borrow outside the country to do so has placed us in a very unfavourable position.

I would like here to quote again from the comments of Mr. McLaughlin, still on the subject of government interventions on the exchange markets. He said the following:

However, the experience of other countries has shown that whatever supportive action was taken, the currencies always ended up by falling back to the level where the market placed them.

And Mr. McLaughlin concludes his assessment of the present situation in these terms:

Government interventions are not only ineffective, but often harmful.

In support of this assessment, I would like to recall the effects of the numerous and unsuccessful interventions of the Bank of Canada on the exchange markets. On October 17, 1978 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) introduced a bill in this House to ask that the borrowing power of the government be increased by $7 billion for this financial year and set at $10 billion for the year 1979-80. There was a reason for this sudden thirst for money: an increase in the borrowing power had become necessary because of the borrowings made outside the country.

The future does not look very encouraging for our dollar. Where and when will this decline finally stop? We would all have a hard time predicting this. For all Canadians who import more than 25 per cent of the goods they consume, the immediate effects of the situation are not pleasant. The government seems to hope that this decline will bring immediate advantages in the export sector, that our economy will bounce back and that this will result directly in lower unemployment. However, the demand for our products, which are mostly raw materials from the mining and forest industries, will not increase overnight. Besides those two sectors are closely linked to the fluctuations of the market and must face a very strong competition. Furthermore, the international economic outlook is quite discouraging. Experts are even forecasting a recession in the United States in 1979. If a strong demand for our products fails to materialize, we will have to lower our interest rates in order to stimulate new investments. Mr. Speaker, this government is presently preparing its next electoral campaign. Naturally it talks a lot about separatism and national unity in order to make Canadians forget its failure at solving an economic crisis which is worsening month by month. It is quite obvious that it is once again preparing itself to mystify the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker, why speak about unity in such a large country as ours, divided as it is into very different regions? In the first place, we are divided when it comes to politics and religion yet the government ignores completely the only element likely to bring harmony within this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from north to south. That element, Mr. Speaker, is our economy. Our Canadian dollar is indeed the same coast to coast. It is just about all we have in common from one province to the next.

This government fails to assume control over the monetary system to allow each region and each individual to feel certain that in his country, whatever his origin or his language, he will enjoy fairness and understanding and will be able, according to his abilities, to benefit from the enormous riches of Canada without hurting anybody. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that is one of the few solutions we have before us to restore confidence within our people who will be best able to judge for themselves and realize their privilege of living in a beautiful and great country such as ours, where harmony and peace will be based on our dollar as a common denominator. There is an urgent need to determine where we find ourselves now and where we are headed with the haphazard policies of this government.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon. I have never seen, since I have come to parliament, a greater indication of why we must have an election right away. If the quality of the speech we heard from this government today is an indication of their thinking on the economic problems of this nation, then certainly the country is in serious trouble and needs a change of government as soon as possible.

How incredible it is, when the Canadian dollar is at an over 35-year low, or at a 110 year low if you take the annual average, for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) not to be here, for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not to be here, for the new super minister of the board of economic development not to be here! What is parliament for? Why are we here? Are we not interested? Is this not a significant enough problem to be debated by the leaders of the government? Can we not have a serious debate on economic policy in the parliament of Canada? Does the government have no one to put up to speak on these issues except the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang)? Everything that this minister has touched has gone wrong. This is the Minister of Transport who could not run an airport policy, the minister who could not run a wheat policy, the minister who practically created a constitutional crisis in his handling of the airport controllers situation, a minister who rises here and makes some sort of second rate, high school quality political speech, at a time when the official opposition has used the first possible day available to it to put forward a motion in this parliament dealing with the major issue facing the Canadian people. Yet there is apparently no one in the government who is capable or competent to get up and speak on this issue and to defend the government's program.

I say this so often but parliamentarians wonder over and over again why the people of Canada are holding parliament in such low repute. The answer is clear: parliament is irrelevant. How irrelevant it can be is shown by the fact that when we have a day set aside to discuss the most important and the most serious economic situation, potentially the most dangerous economic situation that the country has faced in generations, there is nobody here from the government to debate it.

An hon. Member: Where are all the Tories?

Mr. Gillies: Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to make parliament work, if we are going to make parliament relevant, we must have important debates.

An hon. Member: There are only eight of you Tories here.

Mr. Gillies: We cannot do our job as parliamentarians if we cannot debate these important issues. On top of that, we could not get from this government a reference to the standing committee so that we could really examine these issues in that extension of parliament. What we are doing now in that committee is smuggling in, under a reference of the Bank Act, a discussion on this matter, debating and wrangling about who should be there. Should we not have a debate with the best experts, the best people we can find on these issues? Is that not what it is all about? Are we not trying to solve the problems for the sake of the Canadian people? Yet here we are unable to get a debate of any relevance going in the House of Commons because the government once again—presumably they are afraid to talk about their policies—has no one to put up to talk on the issues that are in front of us at present.

I noted with interest some of the comments made by the Minister of Transport. Most of them were irrelevant, and those that were not irrelevant were incorrect. He discussed the fact that the Canadian economy may be in difficulty because of some of the things that are being said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and members of the opposition party in spite of the fact that we have the most incredible Minister of Finance this country has ever had, a Minister of Finance who rises in the House of Commons and says the government is not supporting the dollar at the same time as he goes out and borrows over $5 billion to support the dollar; who says the dollar is moving up with slight market fluctuations at the same time as he is using more money in defence of the dollar than has ever been used in Canadian history. The Minister of Transport has the unmitigated gall—I hate to use that word, but lacks common sense—to question the credibility of the Leader of the Opposition, when there has never been—and I challenge anybody on the government side to dispute this statement—a minister of finance with as little credibility as the current Minister of Finance. Everywhere you go, Mr. Speaker, if you ever leave the Hill and talk to people engaged in investment activities, you find that the minister has little credibility.

One of the reasons the Canadian dollar is in trouble is that the government has no credibility. How can this government talk about credibility, a government that campaigns against wage and price controls and then, when it gets elected, puts them in? We will not have any reasonable, hopeful economic policy in this country until we change the government. What is wrong with our economic management and has caused the feeling by people around the world about our economy is that the government have made so many disastrous errors; they speak from both sides of the mouth, and no one knows what their policy is, if there is any policy. They show inability and unwillingness to give to the committee the power to permit members of parliament to fulfil their function by discussing the economic issues with the best experts and getting the best advice they can get. It is disgraceful in the extreme and shows how bankrupt the government are, how frightened they are of exposing what is going on in this country.

Compare our situation with the way in which economic policy is debated in any country in the western world. The other night the President of the United States made a report to Congress on the state of the American economy. Why did he do that? He did it because by the full employment act of 1946 he is required to do so by law and to make a forecast on how the American economy will operate so that people can evaluate it. The Congress holds hearings with witnesses, members of Congress can get an evaluation of what policy should be put in place, and Americans are informed of what the issues are.

It seems that would never do for Canada; it would never do for the Liberals. They do not want people to know. They do not want to solve the problems. That is the only conclusion one can reach from the way in which they operate. Today on the first allotted day to the opposition which is devoted to the most important problem in Canada, to have no minister in the economic area in the House of Commons to defend government policy is utterly disgraceful and shows the lack of ability there is in the government. They cannot find anybody. One person is out of town so they cannot find anybody else to speak on economic problems for the government on this particular day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson).

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is an aspersion cast against the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). As was explained quite clearly, he is in New York, in answer to a long standing invitation, to address the Council of Foreign Relations. The minister who spoke in his place is Acting Minister of Finance, and he handled the subject quite capably on behalf of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Gillies: I would have thought the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is not a recognized point of order.

Mr. Gillies: I would have thought the Minister of Finance would have felt that his place today was in the parliament of Canada. That is where he should be. Where is the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras)? Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner)? Where is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand)? The government has no one capable of speaking; it had to put up the Minister of Transport, who proved there was no one capable of speaking on this issue. The government was unable to put up anyone who was capable of defending its policy. The government is desperate, but it is even more desperate when the Minister of Finance is in town. The point remains: The government does not want to discuss economic policy because it cannot. The government does not have anyone capable of discussing economic policy.

● (1720)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Where are the ministers of the government? Indeed, the Minister of Finance thought he had to leave the country rather than face up to speaking in the House of Commons on the first available day. It is very simple to see how the government feels about parliament. This is where the debate should take place, but where is the Minister of Finance? Where are the ministers of the government?

An hon. Member: Where is your leader?

Mr. Gillies: The ministers of the government should be here to discuss this issue. If they cared about parliament, they would be here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member repeatedly asks his question. Perhaps he does not mean it rhetorically, but as the hon. member was told, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is in New York addressing an important audience. The minister made that commitment a good deal of time ago. Notice of this debate only came down late yesterday afternoon. The hon. member accused the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) of speaking politically, yet he has given us nothing but political claptrap for the last five minutes. When will we hear the hon. member's speech?

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I do not recall the portfolio of the hon. minister who just spoke, but even with a real cutting edge he failed to make his point. The point which must be made repeatedly is that either we care about parliament or we do not. If we care about parliament, we will have important debates in parliament. If we do not care about parliament, we will put our first priority on speeches made outside of the country instead of being here and speaking about important problems. Obviously parliament is not able to work when the government has no one capable of defending its policies or capable of putting forward a policy concerning a very important issue.

It was refreshing to listen to the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who attempted to put forth propositions concerning the issues faced in the country today. I thought his comments were relevant, but he was quite wrong in many of his assertions. At least the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party attempted to address the problem and participate in a debate on economic policy. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party commented upon some of my remarks concerning hewers of wood and drawers of water. I hope the hon. member will read my speech on that matter. If he does so, he will see my argument was that we should use the foundation of our resources as a basis for the industrial strategy of the nation.

It is a shame that we should be a country rich in mining, I think the fourth richest in the world, and yet import 66 per cent of our mining equipment. It is a shame that we should be a country with huge markets in pulp and paper, and yet import well over half of our papermaking machinery. It is a shame that we should be a country rich in fishing, and yet have no refrigerated ships to go out on the sea. The essence of my remarks was that we should use our resources as the base for the development of an industrial strategy. That is exactly the direction in which the country must move.

Canadians will be very confused after hearing some of the statements made in the House. The Minister of Finance rose the other day and indicated that 440,000 jobs have been created. Then someone else rose and said: "Yes, but 8 per cent of the total labour force is unemployed." Then someone else said: "But the inflation rate is only 8 per cent". Then another hon. member said: "But the inflation rate in the United States is 9 per cent, so we are better". Then an opposition member said: "Yes, but in terms of Switzerland the inflation rate is only about 2 per cent, so we are worse." We go on and on with this type of nonsense.

There is only one sensible way of looking at economic performance. It is not in terms of international comparisons; it is in terms of potential. The reality is that the rate of real growth in the economy is less than 3 per cent. During the period of 1946 to 1966, the rate of real growth averaged almost 6 per cent. When there is growth of that dimension, unemployment is reduced, and inflation problems are handled. Is there a set of monetary and fiscal economic policies which can be put in place which will fulfil the potential of the country? That is what Canadians are concerned about.

The evidence is clear that such policies are not in place now. Anyone who argues that the real optimum rate of growth for the Canadian economy is less than 3 per cent belies our history. On the average for many years our growth rate was approximately 6 per cent. For many years during the post-war period, we were able to maintain unemployment rates of 6 per cent and less, and an inflation rate of approximately 2 per cent. What has gone wrong? Of course, it is the government which has gone wrong, as have its policies which have been put in place.

Apparently there is the view that our present economic situation was created by chance. It was because of mistakes, the mistaken policies which were put in place. The situation would not be such if there had been better economic policies. Canadians are suffering seriously because of the policies of the government. Today the Minister of Transport said that it was all a mistake. I forget who the government blamed today; perhaps it was Mr. Lévesque. In 1968 when the present federal government came into power, it is interesting to note that there was just a whisper of separatism in Quebec. Now ten years later the separatist government is in power. The Liberal government is in power in Ottawa today and it must take some responsibility for the situation we are facing. It must take responsibility for the economic situation, rather than just blaming Mr. Lévesque and the opposition.

A few years ago the then minister of finance, Mr. Turner, who is now in the business of writing newsletters, blamed all the problems in the Canadian economy on international situations. The federal deficit cannot be blamed on anyone else; it happened domestically.

An hon. Member: Tell us about that.

Mr. Gillies: I will tell hon. members about the deficit. In Canada the federal deficit created by the government is presumably running at $12 billion. The government will not tell us for sure because it really does not know. It is similar to the situation with Crown corporations; the government does not know how many Crown corporations it has. The current deficit in the country is four times higher than that in the United States. The Liberals do not seem to understand that the deficit had to be financed and was financed by increasing the rate of money supply through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Railton: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: The inflation in the country was created by the government.

Mr. Railton: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Perhaps the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) does not care about poor people, old people or those affected by inflation. Perhaps he thinks inflation is a joke.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: It is interesting to see the hon. member's attitude. The government created inflation by its policies. It did not care what effect inflation had on Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) was talking about my not caring, he should be reminded that he is talking about someone who cares a great deal about Canada and its poor people, someone who has devoted a great deal of his time to looking after such people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1730)

Mr. Gillies: I would be glad to hear the hon. member for Welland join in this debate because I do not think I have ever heard him speak in the House before. I would love to hear him speak in this debate—

An hon. Member: Cheap shot.

Mr. Alexander: What do you mean, cheap shot? This is no kindergarten session here.

Mr. Gillies: —and hear him say how he supports a government that creates inflation of this sort which does so much to hurt the old and poor people, and whether he thinks it is a good idea to have an 8 per cent inflation rate in Canada. This government has created inflation by creating the deficit. It is one of the most irresponsible activities of a government in the western world, to allow a deficit to take place which is four times greater than the deficit of the United States.

An hon. Member: Tell us about your deficit.

Mr. Gillies: What has happened as a result of that? It has been financed by an increase in the money supply, and the net result is the balance of payments deficit which we have at the present time and in association with it a decline in the value of the dollar.

Mr. Alexander: The Toronto boys are worried.

Mr. Gillies: Hon. members attended the committee as a result of the current situation. But what is the question which is really relevant? The relevant question before parliament is: what is the proper level of the dollar for the Canadian economy and what are the sort of economic monetary and fiscal policies which should be put into effect that will result in the dollar reaching a level where inflation can be managed and unemployment is kept at a reasonable level? Nobody on the government side has been able to tell us, even though they are making the policy. Many experts think that the proper level for the dollar is somewhere between 88 cents and 92 cents, and I suspect that that is reasonably close. The proper course of action would be to get experts before the committee and find out.

I do not happen to believe that it is significant to be a member of parliament and not care about these things and not be concerned about what sort of economic policies this country ought to have. That is what the real issue is, the inflation, the high prices and the unemployment which hurts the people. We cannot find out what the government thinks the real policies are.

An hon. Member: They don't know.

Mr. Gillies: They don't know. I can inform the hon. member for Welland that if we were to go to committee and ask such a question, they would not give us an answer. The reason is because they probably do not know or do not have any views on the matter. One view that is very clear is that of the governor of the Bank of Canada when he went before the Senate and said that if the dollar drops any more the inflationary forces that it will unleash will be harmful to this nation.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Gillies: The governor of the Bank of Canada. We all know that every time the dollar drops we get more inflation. It is important to determine what we can do to alleviate the situation. I do not think that the government expected the dollar to go under 90 cents, but it did. Nor do they expect it to break 80 cents, but it may or it may not. The current account deficit is very high, and as a result the dollar may go that low.

The government in its position of defending the dollar has taken two approaches. The first position is to borrow abroad, as it has done to the tune of $5 billion unlike any government in Canadian history. The cost, incidentally, to the Canadian people due to the differences in exchange rates alone is well over $170 million. In other words, the amount Canadians will have to repay because of the exchange rate differentials which have taken place since the borrowing is estimated today at about $170 million. The tragic thing is that even by following that policy it does not seem to have stopped the slide in the value of the dollar, but this seems to be the only policy the government has been able to come up with.

The foreign exchange equalization account had approximately $6 billion in reserves two years ago, and the government has almost depleted it. It has replaced it by borrowing abroad with expensive money and we are now faced with the necessity of having to repay those funds and the accrued interest. The government which is best known for following this sort of policy is the British government during the period 1960 to 1965. Essentially, it bankrupted the country. The declining value of the pound created more inflation and the inflation caused costs to rise which nullified trade advantages, and they were soon back in the same cycle. Canada is desperately approaching that same situation, and for a rich country like this to be getting into such a situation is fairly desperate indeed.

The second thing which the government has done is to raise interest rates. Presumably it does not care about high interest rates, high consumer borrowing costs, high mortgage costs, or high costs for starting business. Every economist in this country and, indeed, the governor of the Bank of Canada, have said that a high interest rate policy, given the high domestic economic situation in the nation today, is wrong. The last thing Canada needs right now is a high interest rate policy, yet since the beginning of 1978 the bank rate has gone up 50 per cent, from 7.5 per cent in the beginning of 1978 to the current level of 11.25 per cent. Every time interest rates go up mortgage rates and rates in general go up. It is inflationary.

Why has the government taken the direction that it has on interest rates? Incidentally, it is interesting to compare the bank interest rates of other countries around the world with Canada's interest rates. Here are some interest rates: West Germany, 3 per cent; Switzerland, 1 per cent; Japan, 3.5 per cent, and U.S.A., 10 per cent. The reality is that the countries with strong economies have the low interest rate structures and a strong balance of payments. We are going in the other direction, because the government argues that we have to keep capital flowing into the country or the dollar will fall even further. If one looks at the figures, which some people never presume to do, the rise in interest rates has really not caused a change in the rate of the flow of funds. We have the peculiar situation that even though we have moved the interest rate up seven times, it really has not done anything for the net flow of capital.

Let us look at the argument of not raising interest rates. If interest rates had not been raised, it is argued the net flows would be much greater. But is that true? Another argument which needs to be examined is that in today's world slight differentials in interest rates are not as important to reinforce the international movement of capital as the assessment on the part of investors with regard to the strength of the economy itself. This is a bottom line question on economic policy. If we have moved to a high interest rate policy at a time of high inflation and high unemployment, it is a terrible price for Canadians to pay if it was not necessary to make such a move.

Describing the situation in terms used by lawyers, "there is enough evidence to suggest that it should be investigated". There is enough evidence that interest rate differentials are not that important to the movement of capital right now and that we did not necessarily have to follow this policy. The Canadian people have a right to know whether this is the right policy or not. It is not good enough for the Minister of Finance to assert that he had to do it to keep the differential between the rates of the United States and Canada at their levels. Recently there was a period in Canadian history where our rates were higher than those in the United States. There was also a period when they were lower. The period when Canadian rates were lower than the rates in the United States did not seem to have a deleterious effect on the strength of the current account balance.

Mr. Danson: When was that?

Mr. Gillies: Roughly 1971 to 1974. What is the right policy? What we are trying to get across today is that on issues which are as important and as fundamentally significant to every single Canadian as this one is, we must have the best advice, input, debate, analysis—

Mr. Alexander: And honesty.

Mr. Gillies: —and openness and honesty possible, because it is too important to proceed otherwise. If we do not need in Canada a high interest rate policy because of our foreign exchange situation, how desperate that we should be taken down that road.

• (1740)

It is very seldom that issues are so clearcut in the making of an economic policy—where decisions can be made so clearly one way or the other. But this is one of those occasions. We are at a crossroads in the sense that the government is dedicated to the proposition that in order to hold the dollar at its present level it has to go to high interest rates. Some people who are highly thought of have suggested that we could hold the dollar where it is without the high interest rate costs. That proposition should be examined.

Much is made of the point that the falling dollar has helped our exports and, of course, it has. But the fundamental question of how much more our exports are helped by an 83-cent dollar than by a 90-cent dollar has not been answered, and that is another very important question. Would exports be helped even more by a 70-cent dollar? The choice is between inflation from devaluation and the trade gains made from it. Clearly, if going from 90 cents to 83 cents hardly expands exports at all, it is not worth while because it brings too much inflation. There has to be an optimum rate at which the dollar will float given an appropriate monetary and fiscal policy. We have to find that out, and that is why we must have a reference to a committee and a proper debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the motion that is before the House today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) should perhaps have the subtitle, "Another Request for a Fishing Expedition." I think we are all aware that there have been enough Tory fishing expeditions on this subject in recent months and they have all been scuttled.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the governor of the Bank of Canada have both appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs whenever asked by that committee and by the steering committee to appear. The official opposition has been trying to make a story out of this by insinuating that there has been resistance or objection to having the governor of the Bank of Canada appear before that committee. There has never been any such resistance. As soon as the steering committee made the request last week, arrangements were made within 24 hours for the governor of the Bank of Canada to appear. When the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) indicates that there has not been proper testimony before that committee, then I think the things that the governor of the Bank of Canada said that day should be restated.

I might say that all five financial critics of the opposition were present that day. It was a prestigious occasion. It was the first time that all five critics had turned up at one meeting together.

Mr. Alexander: We have five; you have none.

Mr. Martin: In diversity, I suppose there is sometimes strength. They are the "variety club."

I think some of the things that the governor of the Bank of Canada said that day were very important. I should like to quote one or two comments from his opening statement when he said:

> The substantial depreciation of the Canadian dollar that has now occurred, together with an improved performance to date in controlling our domestic costs, has re-established Canada's competitive position at least for the time being.

I think that was an important statement and, if anything, it supports the kind of government policies that have been in place.

An hon. Member: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Martin: I do not have time to read it all. The hon. member was there. He is one of the financial critics. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has joined the variety club.

On that day the governor of the Bank of Canada also said:

> —more exports, more import replacement, a lower current account deficit, less dependence on foreign capital, more output, more jobs, even higher government revenues and lower government deficits than we would otherwise have. I cannot think of a more attractive way to move our economy forward.

That is not a statement of this government per se but is a statement by the governor of the Bank of Canada made before the committee within the last week.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for St. John's West would like me to read the entire statement of the governor, but I think that would just further deflate any points members of the opposition might want to bring forward in this debate. I will simply quote one or two other points. He said:

> Conversely, anyone who feels that the objective of monetary policy should have been to halt or reverse the decline in the exchange rate before it had gone nearly so far as it has is advocating that we should have pushed up interest rates a good deal further and faster.

I am not sure if the hon. member for Don Valley or other members of the club over there are in favour of further, higher interest rates than we now have, but the governor of the Bank of Canada has made it abundantly clear that were we to halt artificially the decline of the dollar if that is the direction it happens to be going in at a particular time, it would mean much higher interest rates than currently prevail.

The governor went on to say:

> It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the effect on expectations of a 'hands off' policy would not be more serious, since such a policy would create the impression that the authorities do not care about the exchange rate and this in turn would arouse widespread fear and concern.

A couple of lines later, he said:

> I might add that a similar view is shared by the authorities of other nations as a result of their experiences in recent years.

That shows what the governor of the Bank of Canada has been proposing and government policies have been very supportive of this course of action, and the experience of other industrialized nations has led them to follow the same route when faced with similar problems.

I should like to deal with a point made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) who continues to put before the people of Canada what he put before the finance committee—the insinuation that every time borrowings are made to bolster the exchange reserves, it means a net cost to the Canada taxpayer. This is not necessarily the case. In many cases when borrowing to buy another currency the money can be invested, and perhaps in some cases an even higher return can be earned than the cost of borrowing the money. The governor of the Bank of Canada referred to that when he said:

The total amount of government borrowing and the total interest cost to the government is not necessarily increased. And for the country as a whole the net external debt burden is not necessarily increased.

In his concluding remarks before the committee the governor of the Bank of Canada said:

—we should not exaggerate the difficulties or be frightened of the future. There is much to reassure us. The Canadian economy is now very competitive with the rest of the world. It will take time for us to reap the full benefits although I think they are already in evidence to some degree.

I might interject that the 477,000 new jobs are perhaps some indication of what he was trying to get at. He did not use that figure; it is mine. He went on to say:

One promising sign is the remarkably strong growth in employment that we have been experiencing recently. The main point is that we still have a reasonably good chance of emerging from our present difficulties in a strongly competitive position, with lower rates of inflation, and in time with lower interest rates.

The government is being criticized by the hon. member for Don Valley, the Leader of the Opposition and others who are trying to make an issue of this exchange rate. Let us be realistic. The issue they are trying to make is to see through constant bickering and putting the item in front of the public that possibly it can go a little lower because they feel that politically that might be of some use to them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I think that is exactly what is happening, otherwise they would be listening to the view that positive information—

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, a point of order, I want the hon. member to withdraw that statement right now. It is dishonest, it is inappropriate, it is absolutely incorrect, and is not worthy of being spoken in this House of Commons. To suggest for a moment that when members of parliament are trying to debate important economic issues they are trying to embarrass the government instead of getting things going in a proper way, is outrageous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) will agree with me that he has just got a point of debate. These remarks are definitely not unparliamentary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: It is not a point of debate, it is a point of order—a point of privilege. It is not a point of debate. The speaker opposite said that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and myself were trying to make an issue out of the Canadian dollar to send it down. We are trying—we have said over and over the problems that are created by this dollar going down—we are trying to get it up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: I want you to ask that man to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has a point of disagreement and nothing else. There is definitely no point of order in what he is saying. He may have a different opinion. The remarks of the hon. member are not a reflection on the hon. member. It is a question of interpretation of facts, policies and remarks.

● (1750)

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have rendered my decision. There is no question of privilege on the assumption made by the hon. member.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, he said that I was trying to force the Canadian dollar down. That is privilege. That is not debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That is the hon. member's point of view. I am not here to judge what is one member's point of view in comparison to another member's point of view. I am sure the hon. member's remarks might not have satisfied the parliamentary secretary when he made his speech—

Mr. Gillies: The parliamentary secretary is a liar.

An hon. Member: Withdraw that statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. What the hon. member for Don Valley just said is unparliamentary and I think he should withdraw that statement.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, that man said the reason we are debating this dollar problem is because we are trying to force it down.

Mr. Crosbie: He is a liar.

Mr. Gillies: That is not true, Mr. Speaker. That is absolutely not true. He lied when he said that.

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I ask the co-operation of the hon. member. I cannot allow the hon. member's last remark in any way, especially as he said it as directly as he did. He has a point of disagreement. He can say that the statement is untrue but I cannot allow this last remark unquestioned by the Chair. By the rules of the House the hon. member must withdraw it.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, he is so ridiculous I will withdraw it.

I must say that I find that sort of remark in the capital markets we are living in today, and the problems we are experiencing, totally unworthy of anyone who seeks to sit in this Parliament of Canada—

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, obviously I was not directing any specific aspersions on individuals—

An hon. Member: Of course you did; you said so.

Mr. Martin: The point I was trying to make was that the whole thrust of the opposition party, led by those who are presumably the financial critics, and the Leader of the Opposition, is to get excessive debate on this subject of the exchange rate. That is the point I am trying to make. In the process I might say—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the parliamentary secretary. He was wrong in what he said in the first instance regarding what the hon. member for Don Valley had brought to your attention. However, it amazes me now to hear the parliamentary secretary suggest that in light of this crisis with which we are faced at this time we are to stand or sit mute. If that is what the parliamentary secretary is projecting, indicating or implying, then he better check his thoughts and let me know what I am supposed to do. Under no circumstances whatsoever—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Alexander: —are we going to sit here on this side and watch these people destroy the country in terms of its fiscal and monetary policies. Are we supposed to sit here and be mute?

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I want the parliamentary secretary to tell me if that is what he is saying and I am to sit and listen to all this nonsense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West knows that he has only a point of disagreement. He can seek the floor in due time and make these remarks and still be within the confines of the rules of the House. This is definitely not a point of order. If I am to permit hon. members to answer each other as we go along, no one will be able to make a speech or put his ideas in front of the House and the Canadian people, and we will not be able to have an orderly debate. The parliamentary secretary should be permitted to complete his speech.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, will the parliamentary secretary allow a question?

Some hon. Members: Come on!

Mr. Alexander: It was all right for the parliamentary secretary to jump up every five minutes on points of order. Will the parliamentary secretary allow me one question?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, in view of all these interruptions and I do not know how you will rule on this, but I would prefer the hon. gentleman to wait until the end of my remarks.

Mr. Alexander: Typical.

Mr. Martin: At that time I would certainly be pleased—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin: I might say in the process that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has been around this House longer than I have. I am not sure whether it is one of my functions to instruct him as to what his function is in this House. Perhaps privately we could get together and I could give him some suggestions—

Mr. Alexander: I want you to tell me now.

Mr. Martin: Obviously there have been many and valid opportunities for members of the opposition to question witnesses in the finance committee on this issue. We are having another debate here today. What I am seeking, and what I am sure members on this side of the House are seeking, is for people in the official opposition who are deigning or wishing or hoping some day—a fond hope they might have of some day holding power—is for them to take a more serious responsibility on some of these issues, for instance, the proposal of increased deficits. The governor of the Bank of Canada made it very clear that if we were to follow the proposals suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and others over there to increase the deficit by about 50 per cent, which is what the total of all the various proposals would amount to—

An hon. Member: You are misleading the people of Canada.

Mr. Martin: I think the hon. member for Don Valley would have to admit that this would have a disastrous effect on the exchange rate—

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) on a point of order.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I was at this committee hearing and the governor of the Bank of Canada refused to give any opinion of what a higher deficit might do to anything. He said it would all depend on the circumstances, the rest of the economy, and he gave no answer to us. The hon. gentleman comes in here and tells the House that he made an answer, that it would be thus and so. He refused to answer that question. This is a deliberate attempt to mislead members of the House—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that we were in sort of a committee of the whole procedure—

Mr. Gillies: You started it.

Mr. Martin: I did not realize I was the one who interrupted—

Mr. Alexander: You made the mistake.

Mr. Martin: I touched a nerve, Mr. Speaker, and there was all kinds of response—

Mr. Crosbie: By not letting us speak.

Mr. Martin: I want to come back to the point raised by the hon. member for St. John's West. The governor did say in his opening remarks, and I have quoted this on the record, but I will do it again:

> —more exports, more import replacement, a lower current account deficit, less dependence on foreign capital, more output, more jobs, even higher government revenues and lower government deficits than we would otherwise have.

This was a clear indication that what has happened has helped keep government deficits down—

Mr. Alexander: Let us call it six o'clock.

Mr. Martin: Obviously we are touching a nervous point in the opposition—

An hon. Member: We are always nervous when you speak.

Mr. Martin: —in connection with this whole exchange rate area. The facts speak for themselves. In the course of my remarks I will put more facts on the table.

The economy of Canada is behaving extremely well in most sectors. We do have certain problems. We do have regional unemployment problems. We recognize those. Not everything is perfect. There is no country in the world where everything is perfect. Nevertheless the statistics have been put on the record, and will be put again, that internationally as compared with seven other industrialized nations which the Leader of the Opposition named during the throne speech debate last fall, we placed either first or second in most important economic sectors—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Martin: Those are facts. A lot of this has resulted from a lower exchange rate. I am not saying whether 83 cents or 85 cents or any particular rate is perfect. I do not know what is perfect—

An hon. Member: Right.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Martin: But the point is that the lower exchange rate has helped achieve some of these favourable results—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to inform the hon. member that it being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, before continuing my remarks I wish to raise a very brief question of privilege. On two separate occasions during the course of my comments prior to the supper hour I was distinctly referred to as a liar, by two members of the opposition. One was good enough to withdraw that unparliamentary comment, the other was not. I wonder if the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) could be given the opportunity to do so before I continue my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Chair will take it under advisement and the hon. member can raise this again tomorrow after we have had an opportunity to look at the blues.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I examined the blues over the supper hour. That is how I know the comment is in there.

I had indicated in my comments some of the supporting evidence that abounds across the country as to how well the economy of Canada is doing. I pointed out certain exceptions and problem areas to which the government is addressing itself. It is not at all unusual for a country to have specific problem areas.

I want to review for the record some of the very positive aspects of the past ten years in which this government has been in power. In the latest ten-year period for which figures are available, 1968 through 1977, Canada had an average annual real growth in gross national product of 4.6 per cent. Contrary to what the hon. member for Don Valley said, it is important to examine our progress in an international context. We do not live in a vacuum. During that same period, real growth on an annual basis in the United States was 2.9 per cent. Only Japan had a rate of growth higher than ours.

Perhaps a more significant figure is the increase in real personal disposable income during that period. For Canadians, real disposable income per capita increased by 51.9 per cent. The comparable figure for Americans was 24 per cent, less than half.

The growth in employment in Canada has also been strong. Since 1970 the number of jobs in the country has increased by 23 per cent, or more than two million. At the same time the U.S. had an increase in employment of 15 per cent, Japan 5 per cent, and in Germany the number employed fell by 6 per cent.

Since the OPEC shock of 1973 only one industrialized nation in the world has had a gain in employment every year. That was Canada.

What about the current state of the economy? Last year real growth in Canada was about 3½ per cent. Admittedly, it did not measure up to expectations. But that was largely due to the increase in food prices and the rise in the prices of things we import caused by the lower exchange value of the dollar, both of which were difficult to forecast. But at the same time our competitive position in the world improved as a result of a much better cost performance and the important trade benefits flowing from devaluation. These contributed to a recovery of profits, the replenishment of corporate liquidity, and a general firming of the stock market.

It might be appropriate at this point to interject one of two comments by people who presumably would not necessarily be labelled as Liberals but who are independent surveyors of the Canadian economic scene. The first is John McCallum. He indicated that the 85-cent dollar is a bright spot in the otherwise dismal prospects for the recovery of the Canadian economy. That is an important point to mention:

> If devaluation is thought to be permanent it may be profitable for a company to switch from foreign to Canadian suppliers; it might be profitable to expand sales in the United States; it might be profitable to expand capacity in order to increase export sales or to compete with imports on the home market.

I could go on to quote other comments. I will mention one or two. Jack McArthur, another well-known financial columnist, posed the question: "Does Canada teeter between boom and bust?". He indicated that wage gains were shrinking and employers' expenses per item were falling. Manufacturers were planning to invest more money in their production capacity, a very positive sign, quite contrary to the kind of information the hon. member for Don Valley was putting before us. He indicated that the decreased value of the dollar was the most drastic thing that had ever happened to the country. The lower dollar makes Canadian products more competitive. Again, I am quoting Jack McArthur.

Vincent Egan, another business writer, said surplus predictions are positive and that exports are good because of the dollar's decline. Foreign exchange reserves have been rising, he says.

Wood Gundy anticipates a slower rate of inflation in Canada and a very significant decline in interest rates. This is very positive stuff.

The Chairman of the Toronto Stock Exchange, Mr. Michael Curry, said the substantial drop in the Canadian dollar would help restore the international competitiveness of Canadian goods. I would match the chairman of the Toronto Stock Exchange against the hon. member for Don Valley at any time. Both are from the Toronto area. The former is positive and the latter is negative. Says Mr. Curry, Canadians will switch to lower-priced Canadian goods; however, we must keep wage settlements down and concentrate upon our economic strengths.

The Toronto Star, a paper which is not always favourable to the Liberal government, said in an editorial recently that an 85-cent dollar should help jobs. Again in the Toronto Star we read the heading "Silver Lining Seen in Sliding Dollar". In another article recently headed "Drop in Dollar is Bad, Right? No, It Means More Jobs" the paper discusses examples of companies which have been given a big boost as a result of the lower dollar. Among them we find Airbone-Arconas which produces contemporary furniture, Westeel-Rosco which manufactures sheet metal construction products, Dominion Textile which today employs 675 more workers than it did a year ago, and Noranda Mines—every drop of one cent in the dollar leads to $5 million in profits after tax.

The list continues. Savage Shoes have hired about a hundred new workers, fish sales are up, the packing industry has benefited, pulp and paper earnings have risen as have those of electrical manufacturing companies. The steel industry and cement producers are benefiting. Mr. Speaker, I could spend an hour quoting these excerpts.

Some hon. Members: Go on!

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Don Valley and I both come from Toronto area ridings. For whatever reason, he is not standing for re-election. The point I want to make is that his stories of gloom and doom will gain a good deal of press attention. I just hope that some of our positive information will gain equal attention. According to Eric Nilsson, economics chief for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the sick dollar may be the best medicine. That is a rather prestigious organization. He is quoted as saying our competitive position has been fully restored. Even tonight, before representatives of the Canadian Chambers of Commerce, there was reference to government spending.

The opposition proposes to increase the deficit by 50 per cent—just for a few months, so they say. I quote from one of the Chamber's releases:

> The government's commitment to extreme restraint must be continued and intensified. We are encouraged by the emerging national consensus to restrain public spending.

This is something of prime importance to the Minister of Finance, a man the hon. member for Don Valley had the nerve to say had been the worst Minister of Finance to come before parliament—I don't know whether he said since confederation. The policies which the minister and government have adopted are policies which all sectors of the economy today are endorsing as being the right and positive course to take at this time.

I should like to quote again from a study document issued by the C. D. Howe Institute. Discussing the dollar, the report stated:

> In summary, an exchange-rate realignment may bring about fundamental changes in a country's competitive position that can lead, over the longer term, to important changes in its industrial structure. The depreciation of the Canadian dollar over the past two years opens the door for major new investments in a broad spectrum of exporting and import-competing industries. What is more, the response of workers and firms so far has been to accept the initial price and cost disadvantages arising from a depreciation. This significantly improves the probability that the depreciation of the Canadian dollar will be the foundation for new industrial activity rather than the source of a new wave of inflation.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this is far from the doom and gloom kind of news that this debate was intended to purvey to the Canadian public.

We are already witnessing renewed strength in business investment. Contract awards, industrial and commercial building permits and new orders for machinery and equipment all point upwards. During the last year inventories have gone down while shipments have started rising rapidly. The result is a demand for increased production to rebuild stocks.

Despite a general slack in the economy, some industries are already running into supply constraints. Steel, pulp and paper, lumber, shoes and textiles are running at or close to full production.

Our manufacturing sector has become a source of real strength in the economy during the last 12 months. Capacity utilization, which was at 83.6 per cent in 1977, expanded to 87.4 per cent by the fourth quarter of 1978. Output is up 9 per cent over a year ago and manufacturing employment is up by nearly 7 per cent, or 125,000 jobs. How can we relate that kind of information with the information put on the record by the Leader of the Opposition and his five financial critics who are members of the financial variety club opposite? I just do not understand it, and I think there comes a point at which the Canadian people do not understand it either.

An hon. Member: Try us.

Mr. Martin: Earlier this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition quoted from a speech by Mr. McLaughlin, but he just quoted one of the negative parts of it. Mr. McLaughlin and the governor of the Bank of Canada disagree on the benefits of the lower exchange rate. That is fair enough. They are both knowledgeable and able people. On balance, however, the governor of the Bank of Canada probably has a heavier and broader responsibility than Mr. McLaughlin. After all, he is protecting the interests of Canadians at all income levels whether they be bank shareholders or ordinary workers on assembly lines. His responsibility is much more complex than that of Mr. McLaughlin.

In his speech to the 110th annual meeting of shareholders on January 11 Mr. McLaughlin stated:

From a world perspective, the standard of living and the quality of life for virtually all Canadians remain very, very high. Our land is at peace. We walk the streets safely. Our institutions are increasingly responsive to local concerns. Governments are remarkably free from corruption. We have freedom of speech and a level of political liberty unrivalled anywhere. We may judge the level of governmental expenditure to be excessive, but we have reason to be proud of our care and concern for the disadvantaged in society.

I might interject that government expenditure is not nearly as excessive now as it would be if the official opposition took over.

[Mr. Martin.]

He went on to say:

We have fine educational institutions. We have a business community which has high standards of honesty and social responsibility, as well as vigour and efficiency. We are rich in natural resources, have a skilled work-force, and are one of the world's major trading nations. Our growth continues to outperform most other countries around the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin: I cannot find any strong background to support the doom and gloom information being put forward by the so-called experts opposite, the finance variety club of five. I just do not know where they find information to show that the lower exchange rate is doing us so much harm. One hon. member wants higher deficits, and another wants lower deficits.

I suppose in diversity hon. members opposite find some strange strength. They are all over the map. They do not know where they are going. They have no policies to put forward, so they take a day of this parliament to debate the exchange rate. One of them suggested—I think it was the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—that the rate should go to 90 cents. Last year he was not in favour of a rate of 90 cents. I do not have quotations here, but he was asking questions in the House and indicating that it was a disaster that the Canadian dollar should go to 90 cents. Now he thinks it should be 90 cents. What does he want?

How does the hon. member for York-Simcoe propose to bring the dollar up to 90 cents? Does he propose artificial mechanisms to move it immediately to 90 cents? Does he propose a fixed rate of exchange? Let us hear from hon. members opposite. What are their proposals regarding the Canadian dollar? All they are doing now is criticizing, and their criticism falls on deaf ears more and more across the country because Canadians, by and large, know that they are benefiting at this time from a strong Canadian economy. They know they are benefiting from the strong leadership of the Minister of Finance and of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, let me start by clearing up one matter. I think the hon. parliamentary assistant said that I called him a liar earlier today. If I called him a liar, what I meant was that he was a Liberal trying to stay in power. That is what I really meant. I know there is very little difference, but I will withdraw the statement he was a liar. He is a Liberal desperate to stay in power, and he will twist and squirm as they all do and as they are doing today to do that.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Who are you, Crosbie?

Mr. Crosbie: This is a motion that is being treated with the utmost contempt by the government. It is a motion that deals with a serious subject, asking the government to give parliament an opportunity to investigate the loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar and the government policies that have reduced our currency to its lowest level in 40 years.

There is no way that the gentlemen opposite can tell the Canadian public that they have not been in power since 1963 because they have, and they bear the responsibility, and they are the people who have to bring forward the solutions until another group takes power, and when we take power we will bring forward solutions.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): You will probably switch by that time.

Mr. Crosbie: This afternoon we heard the Liberal line, and the Liberal line was from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) would have been ashamed to say it. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) would have been ashamed to say it. The Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) would not even have attempted it, but the Minister of Transport in his brazen way came into this House, and I quote his exact words, "this country is in excellent economic shape". Tell that to the one million unemployed. Tell that to the millions suffering from the high food prices and the inflation of last year, the 9 per cent of last year that wasn't supposed to be there. Tell that to the people who are suffering the 15 per cent increase in food prices in the last 12 months. Tell that to the people who are not investing. Tell it to the people who are taking their money out of Canada and investing in the United States and everywhere but Canada. Tell those people that this country is in excellent economic shape. This is exactly the same tack they took in 1972.

In 1972 they went to the people of Canada and they said, "The land is strong." Well, the land might be strong, but it is not Maurice Strong. He has fled the land. That is one Strong that has fled this country, and the people of Canada are not going to believe, the Liberals are not going to be able to persuade them that this country is in excellent economic shape. That is what I call the emperor's new clothes policy of the Liberal party. Remember the old fairy tale of the emperor? The tailor told him that he was putting on a magnificent suit of clothes for him, and the emperor walked down the streets naked because he believed the tailor who told him he had on a fantastic suit of clothes. The people of Canada are walking naked while this crowd tries to persuade them that the country is in excellent economic shape and they have on wonderful economic clothes. Well, they are not going to believe it. They are not so simple-minded as to believe it.

There is another saying, that in the valley of the blind the one-eyed man is king, and the one-eyed man in this conglomeration is Mr. Bouey. He has one eye. He has the monetary eye, and the parliamentary assistant was hiding behind Mr. Bouey today, Mr. Gerald Bouey, governor of the Bank of Canada. He is the one-eyed man, and in this government he is king because the rest of them are blind. They cannot see. They do not know what to do about the economy.

At least Mr. Bouey had the guts to come before the finance committee and stand up for his monetary policy, his monetary policy which he is responsible for, and the government is only part of the story. Whenever we wanted to question him about the government's fiscal policy, about what had led to this concatenation of disastrous economic events, he had to say, "I can't tell you, gentlemen. I can only advise the government. I can't advise you and the people of Canada." The only one that these gentlemen have had the guts enough to push forward is Mr. Bouey. Why doesn't Prime Minister Trudeau come before the committee and give his testimony as to what he has done in the last 15 years?

Mr. Foster: How come Joe wasn't there?

Mr. Crosbie: There is no confidence in the Canadian dollar, no confidence in Canada. Why? How can we have confidence in this Minister of Finance? You ask him a question in the House, you ask the Minister of Finance why the Canadian dollar has fallen to 83 cents, and his answer will be, "Oh, but your leader lost his baggage on his trip around the world." That is what the Minister of Finance of Canada answers serious questions asked him in this House. He comes back with cheap political claptrap. The Minister of Finance is a fine human being, a warm politician. I like him as a politician, but as a Minister of Finance he is a disaster. No one could have confidence in him. He does not answer seriously in this House. Asked serious questions, he comes back with political rigmarole.

Investors read Hansard, they watch TV, they read the newspapers, and when they see the incredible lack of answers we get from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance, the Canadian dollar sinks lower and lower. At least his predecessors treated the job seriously. "Thumper" Macdonald thumped the hell out of the Canadian economy, and John Turner fled to Toronto after his disastrous stint. They did treat themselves seriously. They did not come in here and just give political answers when they were asked questions, but this Minister of Finance acts as a parish pump politician when he is asked questions.

I want to give another quotation, "A disordered currency is one of the greatest political evils"—Daniel Webster. They might take that to heart across the House, and that goes back to the early 1840s. That is true here in Canada. This disordered currency has been caused by the gentlemen opposite. Another quotation which they might remember is a little poem, "Money talks, I'll not deny; I heard it once, it said goodbye". That is the poem that every Liberal minister of finance has practised since he has been in office. On the way coming in and on the way going out, it said goodbye—the huge deficits that these gentlemen have run up.

● (2030)

Now let us just look at why we are in the shape in which we are. I want to quote governor Bouey from his statement of February 6. He is the only one of all the government apparatus who had the courage to come to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Even there our hands are tied with the ten-minute rule. You cannot question officials for more than ten minutes. When we have the Minister of Finance, he acts like a poltroon. When you ask him a question for one minute, he answers for nine minutes with this claptrap about "le baggage". He cannot talk about the Canadian economy; he is too ashamed.

Mr. Bouey said in his statement:

A substantial decline in the value of the Canadian dollar relative to the United States dollar had become inevitable because of the higher rate of price and cost inflation in Canada than in the United States earlier in the 1970s.

What government was in power when that happened? It was the gentlemen opposite who were in power in the early 1970s. It was they who presided over the disastrous inflation we had from 1970 to 1975. Our troubles now with the low Canadian dollar were caused by their lack of courage, their lack of policy, their lack of gumption and their lack of guts, just as we are observing now. When those gentlemen have a chance, they will not tell the Canadian people what their policies are driving this country toward. There is an election coming up so they do not want to talk about the policies. They do not have a minute to get up in the House and tell us which of these alternatives the financial experts say they should adopt, because they hope to get to the election before the ass goes out of the Canadian dollar altogether and they have to act again.

Which of these alternatives will they take? Will they export additional energy to the United States? Will they put on temporary tariff surcharges and quotas on imports considered non-essential? Some analysts think this should be done. Will they reduce the duty free exemptions for tourists? Will they eliminate the 15 per cent holding tax on corporate securities issued for a term of under five years? Will they do any of those things, or do they hope to get to the election like a bunch of cowards before they have to face the Canadian people with the consequences of their sick treatment of the Canadian economy for the last ten years?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They know that the only way we can come out of this crisis in Canada is by asking the Canadian people to tighten their belts, to sacrifice, and they are afraid to do that before the election. The Chrétien notch is under way now, the increase in food prices. Everyone in Canada is struck now by the Chrétien belt tightening, the 15 per cent increase in food prices because of the devaluation of the dollar. Will these gentlemen declare a moratorium on any further purchases of foreign-controlled Canadian companies by such government owned Crown corporations as the Canada Development Corporation and Petro-Can? What effect on the dollar did Petro-Can's huge purchase of Pacific Petroleum have on our exchange rate? Why was that permitted? These are the questions they should be answering for the Canadian people. Because they are not and because the financial community as well as the investment community know they are not, we have this tremendous pressure on the Canadian dollar, because there is no confidence in the group opposite. The only thing that will change that is a change in government. When we get in, that will be changed.

We do not have enough time here tonight to expand on anything, but if we want to look at a neutral comment let us take a look at what is put out by McLeod Young Weir Limited, the economics department, which sums it all up in the document which they put out on November 17, in which they point out what our trouble is at pages 8 to 15. They say there is a longer-term structural problem—the very large deficit on end products which includes manufactured goods. The government opposite scoffs when we mention the $12 billion deficit in the manufactured end products; it pretends there is no problem at all. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tried to pretend we are much better off than we were 12 or 15 years ago.

McLeod Young Weir go on to say:

The conclusion then is that our trade balance is constantly engaging in a tug of war between the ongoing surplus for raw materials and the deficit for end products.

They say we have to have a huge surplus of raw and semi-fabricated materials to cover the larger and rising deficit on end products. But the gentlemen opposite will not even recognize the problem, or will not admit that there is a problem.

The document goes on to read:

This, in turn, continues to suggest that Canada has not yet been able to break its foreign trade dependence on its raw material base—a situation which does not bode well for Canada over the longer term.

You, gentlemen opposite, have been in office for the last 15 or 16 years. What have you done about the these long-term problems? You have done nothing. We have always had their short-term political excuses. There has always been the constant desire on their part to stay in power, to do the easy thing, but try to keep themselves in power. This has been illustrated by the parliamentary secretary in the ridiculous speech he made here today.

The document goes on to read:

Where Canada has developed its most visible problems is on the non-merchandise trade balance . . . over-all, Canada's service account deficit increased substantially . . . to $5.7 billion in 1976 and $7.4 billion last year. The erosion is evident in all areas of the service sector but is most pronounced in the interest and dividends section and the travel section.

We have a $4.5 billion deficit on our current account. That is why the Canadian dollar is down to 83 cents, that is why the pressure is on, because there is no confidence in this government which may drive it down further. It is also caused by the fact that we have a huge deficit on the tourist account and a huge deficit on the interest and divident account. The situation is summed up in the following way in this document:

—Canada has run a current account deficit of $3.8—$4.8 billion since 1975 compared to a current account which was in basic balance between 1971 and 1973. In 1977, these deficits were essentially the product of four specific problems.

This is still true, even more so. It goes on to read:

An $11 billion dollar deficit on end products in the trade account, a $3.5 billion interest service deficit, $2.2 billion "other service" deficit, a $1.6 billion foreign travel deficit.

All of these have worsened in 1978, not improved. Then they go on to deal with the outflow of investment from Canada, which is also extremely dangerous.

That is the problem we have, a problem which the government is not facing. What did we hear from the Minister of Finance when he was asked a question about the fact that he is doing all the borrowing abroad? He said, "We are doing this because the provinces are not borrowing abroad as much as they were." In other words, he encouraged the provinces and municipalities to borrow outside Canada. When I was minister of finance in Newfoundland, they were advising the exact opposite—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I remember when the gentlemen up here were telling the Newfoundland government, "Do not borrow abroad, it is too dangerous. My God, you have a $200 million deficit, do not borrow any further." Here they are with a $12 billion deficit, they are the worst managers of the Canadian economy ever, giving us this advice. Now they are advising the Canadian provinces. "Borrow abroad all you can. Save our bacon for God's sake. Do not borrow in Canada, go outside, never mind the exchange rate."

Here is one of their own documents by Mr. Fullerton, a Liberal supporter, entitled "Quebec's Access to Financial Markets". At page 9 he shows that of the provincial debt, $70.4 billion, 43 per cent is already owed outside Canada, or $30 billion, and he points out that Quebec, which owes a total provincial debt of $17 billion, because of the part that the province borrowed outside Canada will require $19 billion to repay that debt.

Because of the exchange rate which has gone against the Canadian dollar, Quebec and the other provinces borrowed U.S. dollars years ago, they borrowed in Switzerland and they borrowed in West Germany, and because of the mismanagement of this government, it has cost them four times as much to pay off their debt now as it did when they borrowed the money. That is the danger. The government does not care about that.

In his study Mr. Fullerton points out the following:

> Thus a recorded debt for Quebec of $17 billion, based on Canadian dollars received, would at current exchange rates require $19 billion Canadian to repay it. The exchange rate swing also affects interest costs, raising the nominal interest bill on Quebec's direct and guaranteed debt by some $200 million to its current level of about $1.5 billion . . . but the recent experience does demonstrate the risks inherent in foreign borrowing.

These gentlemen are trumpeting that they are borrowing abroad because the provinces and municipalities are not doing so. In other words, they are saying to the provinces, "Gentlemen, go borrow abroad." Now they have a policy according to which they want Canadians to borrow abroad to save their goods. We owe $106 billion abroad, a net $53 billion. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that up to 1977 the country's net international debt rose $18.2 billion, an amount that previously it took us 15 years to reach? Now they want us to go further with it.

When they are not borrowing abroad, they want individuals and companies and provinces and municipalities to take all the risks of the exchange rate, a tremendous risk which we have demonstrated, where the Canadian dollar now is depreciated 40 per cent in terms of the German mark and 40 per cent or 50 per cent in terms of the Swiss franc or whatever the Swiss currency is. If one borrowed there five years ago or ten years ago, it would cost two or three times as much to pay back the money. They are telling us today to go ahead and borrow abroad to cover up their own mistakes and errors.

We have only a short time to speak here. The board of economic refugees are not even here to speak tonight. Where are they? Where is the president of the board of economic refugees? Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? They are ashamed to come here. Where is the Minister of Finance? He is scouring down to Washington. Where is the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State for Small Business? He has fled the place. Where are their economic ministers?

An hon. Member: Where is your leader?

Mr. Crosbie: Where is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand)? "Allmand" is not even all there, and he is certainly not all here. What about their forecasts, their inaccurate forecasts? Who can believe the outcasts, as I call them, of the Minister of Finance? They are not forecasts, they are outcasts. He says that it is going to be a 5 per cent growth rate. Then it turns out to be 4 per cent, and then it turns out in truth to be 3 per cent. He says that we are going to have a $5 billion current account surplus on merchandise trade and then he says "$4 billion." Then it turns out to be $3.5 billion. He says that the inflation rate is going to be 6 per cent. Then he changed it to 7 per cent, and then it turned out to be 9 per cent. He said that this year it is going to be 6 per cent. Then he said it is going to be 7 per cent, and now it is going to be 7.5 per cent. That is the Minister of Finance of this country. It is a wonder the Canadian dollar has any value at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If they had any shame, they would go to the Governor General now and clear out. Governor Bouey can only treat the symptoms. To treat the cause of the disease, the people of Canada have to do that. They are the only ones who can do it. They can cut out this canker. They can amputate this incompetence, this mismanagement, this arrogance, this bunch who have brought Canada to its lowest economic state ever. The people of Canada can do that. If they have any guts at all, let us go to the people now, right now. While they are looking at the entrails of the land, the Gallup polls, the "Goldberg" polls, the "Goldenberg" polls or whatever polls they are looking at, they should get their courage up an go to the people so that we can start dealing with the problems which face this country. I say they should get the white feather. They should not come in here with a red rose. They should come in here with a white feather. That is what they deserve. They are afraid of the Canadian public. They are afraid of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The only thing which has gone up while this government has been in is bankruptcies. Bankruptcies have gone up 41 per cent in the last year, 5,500 bankruptcies. The prices of food have gone up tremendously. That is the only thing going up. Everything else is going down. The value of the dollar and everything else is on the way down. Now, the Canadian dollar—how will they explain to the Canadian people the $3 billion spent on importing food every year? That was the amount in 1977. The food index rose 15.5 per cent last year. Canadians on the average spent 21.5 cents out of every consumer dollar on food.

The Canadian dollar has lost eight cents worth of buying power abroad in the last year. As the dollar went down, the cost of imported food went up by that much. Where is the government's policy on this, the 15 per cent which we buy from outside, fresh and processed fruit, 650 million? Are they going to conjure up something which Canadian people can eat in the way of fresh and processed fruit to replace that? Coffee: are we going to grow coffee in Canada to save the $420 million we imported last year? Fresh and processed vegetables, $400 million; meat, $295 million; sugar, $230 million. They have put that added burden on every member of the Canadian consuming public because of their gigantic incompetence and because of the fact that clinging to political power means more to them than the good of this country. That is what they have done. They have not got the guts now to acknowledge it or go to the Canadian people. They just sit over there and smile and simper and they scug along to the end of their five-year term clinging on to power, in their desperate Liberal desire to cling on to power.

Go and test it now. Let us go and test it now to see if Canadian journalists are right or wrong, or what the Canadian people want. They want to be rid of that bunch, believe me. They are waiting for a chance to get at them, and we are waiting for a chance to get at them. They come in here and they treat our motions with contempt as if they are of no importance. We heard the Minister of Transport today and the parliamentary assistant treat with contempt our attempt to have parliament discuss the loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar and government policies which have reduced our currency to its lowest ebb ever. They treat it contemptuously. They do not even have the Prime Minister here. What are their financial and economic ministers? Nothing but second rates. The Minister of Transport is trying to shut up the mouths of the press by throwing the press out in Saskatchewan, the Regina Leader Post.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I very much welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate. As I listened to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), I wondered whether we should take him seriously or whether we should take his leader seriously. The hon. member for St. John's West claimed to be the finance minister of a previous government in Newfoundland. He claimed to have a knowledge of figures and how they should be used. But, as I looked at the figures and listened to him, I must say I did not gain any confidence. For example, he claimed the government has run up the largest public debt in this country's history. If the hon. member had looked at the figures he would have recognized that it was the former Conservative federal government which has a net public debt—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: I am referring to 1962. At that time during the Diefenbaker years the debt of Canada was 33.4 per cent of the gross national product.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Gillespie: Today the net public debt is 18.9 per cent of GNP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Anyone listening to the voluble member for St. John's West would have been reminded of a disoriented man. Perhaps it is not altogether surprising. After all, the hon. member had tried to be a Liberal leader in Newfoundland and failed; the door was closed in his face. Then he tried to be the leader of the Conservative government in Newfoundland, and again the door was slammed in his face. Just recently the leader of that government decided to step down, and where did the hon. member find himself? He finds himself in opposition at Ottawa. The hon. member realizes that is where he will stay, in opposition in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: As I listened to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I wondered whether he expected us to take him seriously. After all, he chose the subject, the time, and the wording of the motion. Also he chose to hold the debate when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was not in the country, knowing perfectly well that the minister could not participate in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Canadians are entitled to ask if the Leader of the Opposition is serious about this question. Why would the Leader of the Opposition have not chosen to have the debate when the Minister of Finance was in the country?

Mr. Gillies: Why is he not here?

Mr. Gillespie: It is quite clear the Leader of the Opposition is not interested in any responsible approach to this important question. The Leader of the Opposition chose to avoid the substance of the debate, just as he chose to avoid the opportunity of attending the hearings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs when the governor of the Bank of Canada appeared last week. If the Leader of the Opposition had chosen to attend that committee meeting, he might have learned something. He might have learned that there are a number of factors which affect the value of the Canadian dollar. For example, he might have been reminded that the trade balance in Canada and the competitiveness of Canadian industry are important to the value of the Canadian dollar. He might have learned that the health of the United States economy is important to the value of the Canadian dollar.

The Leader of the Opposition might have been reminded that it is the judgment of those outside Canada, of the international investors, the money market managers and those who are trading in foreign currencies—the judgment of those with respect to the political stability of Canada and the question of separation or partition—that determines the value of our currency. It is the judgment of those people with respect to what other people in Canada are saying about Canada, particularly some of those who would hope to be the leaders of Canada and some of those on the other side who I believe, quite properly, can claim to be leaders in this country. Those international judgments—

● (2050)

Mr. Gillies: They have judged the government.

Mr. Gillespie: —have an enormous effect upon the Canadian dollar and they have been judging some of the statements made by the leaders opposite. In my remarks—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has the floor, and I suggest we listen to him.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for St. John's West, for example, has referred to Petro-Canada. I would enjoy an opportunity to debate Petro-Canada with him and with the Leader of the Opposition. I cannot help but feel that many leaders outside Canada, for example, our allies and trading partners, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Italy and Japan must wonder about this country when the Leader of the Opposition would destroy the national oil company at a time when they are trying to build national oil companies in their countries to protect the energy security of their people.

These people and also the people in banking businesses abroad are asking why would the Leader of the Opposition put himself in such a completely untenable, unthinking, irresponsible position. There is no time to debate the issues of Petro-Canada this evening, but I am sure there will be plenty of opportunity in the weeks and months to come.

Mr. Gillies: During the election.

Mr. Gillespie: I would like to deal briefly with the four points which I mentioned a moment ago in regard to the question of the trade balance. We have heard a lot of rhetoric and bombast from the other side on this issue. The trade balance, of course, is immensely important, and there is no question that we have had a growing deficit with respect to our balance of payments. There is also no doubt as to why that has occurred. Anybody who has been watching the events over the past five or six years would realize that the competitiveness of the Canadian economy and of the manufacturing industry in particular has been seriously eroded because unit labour costs have gone up and were higher on average than those in the key manufacturing sectors of the United States. Furthermore, those wage rates had been rising more rapidly than they had been in the United States.

International market forces have redressed that imbalance by judging the value of the Canadian dollar at a figure less than what it had been six years ago. The market has made the inevitable adjustment to the situation where a sector of the economy becomes non-competitive with its trading partners.

The second factor which I referred to, the health of the United States economy, is not something about which the official opposition talks. To listen to them one would think that the Canadian dollar could exist quite apart from the financial health and growth of the United States economy and that it could develop in Canada quite apart and unrelated to what is happening south of the border. Those who deal with international currency exchanges know that the Canadian economy is a dependent economy in the sense that 70 per cent of its market is with the United States and in the sense that the health of the United States financial markets are important to Canada.

These people also know, but I have not heard it from the opposition, that the United States dollar has been under great pressure for the last two and a half years. For example, if we take 1976 as the base period, the United States dollar has fallen against the yen by 35 per cent; against the Swiss franc by 34 per cent, and against the deutschemark by 29 per cent. I cite these numbers because if there is a weakness, and in theory there has been a serious weakness in the United States dollar, and if the Canadian economy is a dependent economy vis-à-vis the United States, it is not surprising that those who are making judgments about the Canadian dollar would regard the Canadian dollar as a weaker currency than that of the United States.

The official spokesmen on the other side never allude to these points. Nor do they remind Canadians that the Canadian dollar was worth one dollar and 2.86 cents American in October, 1976. They do not remind us that on November 15, 1976, the PQ party, the separatist party of Quebec, was elected to form the government of Quebec. They do not remind us that within two weeks of that event the Canadian dollar dropped to 95.88 cents, the single largest, most precipitous drop of the Canadian dollar in the last two and a half years, the period at which we are looking. I did not hear any opposition speakers in this debate today draw to the attention of the Canadian people the significance and influence of that election on the value of the Canadian dollar. That event more than any other reflected the dramatic change of view that others had of this country.

How could anyone claim that the policies of the PQ party had no effect on our economy? How could anyone argue that the health of our economy is unrelated to unity? How could anyone offer to negotiate the division of Canada without changing the perception which others have of Canada? Yet that is precisely the position that the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) have adopted in recent weeks, a readiness to negotiate the division of this country.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are straying from the truth, Gillespie.

Mr. Gillespie: Our dollar will climb back, Mr. Speaker, when confidence returns.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You wouldn't recognize the truth if you fell over it.

Mr. Gillespie: The dollar will not climb back through gimmickry. The Tories say that they would prefer to see the dollar at 90 cents.

Mr. Gillies: We would prefer to see it where it floats.

Mr. Gillespie: Of course it will rise up in due course.

Mr. Gillies: When we get a new government.

Mr. Gillespie: The Tories, however, propose to get it there in a rather quicker fashion, by fiddling with the Bank of Canada's accounts and listing our gold assets at a higher figure. I believe that that was a proposal of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Confidence cannot be built on gimmickry, it can only be destroyed by an opposition which proposes that it would resort to such gimmickry.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who writes your speeches, Alastair?

Mr. Gillespie: The government has looked at the proposals of the opposition, and they are, clearly, not serious. The Tories had a chance to put their proposals to the governor of the Bank of Canada and, as the news reports noted, the Tories ran out of questions after the first 15 minutes.

Mr. Gillies: Source? Source?

Mr. Gillespie: The Tories claim to be ready to govern, but have they told the Canadian people through this debate that unit labour costs have helped to make Canadian products non-competitive? Have they told the people that Canadian wage costs have been higher and have been rising in Canada higher than in the United States prior to controls? Have they told the Canadian people that the Canadian dollar has helped to re-establish a cost competitive industry? Have they told the Canadian people that as a result of the Canadian dollar we had a record trade surplus last year of $3.5 billion? There is every indication that we will have a larger trade surplus this year—a trade surplus related to the manufacturing sector, the products sector of our economy.

• (2100)

Have the Tories told the Canadian people that the lower dollar represents an opportunity for Canadian business? Have they told the Canadian people it represents an opportunity for the manufacturing industry, an opportunity which they and we should fully exploit for the benefit of Canada? I do not hear voices on the other side saying to Canadian businessmen, "You have an opportunity as a result of this lower dollar; get out and sell." They want to play politics with that.

In this debate I have not heard that the Tories have told the Canadian people that, as a result of the more competitive Canadian dollar, Canada created over 400,000 new jobs last year. At no time that I can recall, certainly not in the last ten years, has there been that degree of growth in a period when the Canadian labour force has increased by one third, the fastest increase of any labour force in the industrialized world.

The Tories have not come clean with the Canadian people. That is why I have welcomed this debate and the opportunity to put some of these facts on the record. They have not helped Canada at this time. I believe they have distorted the situation in Canada. I think they have emphasized the negative; they have not emphasized the performance and strength of Canada. Theirs has been an erratic voice. At one time their leader was predicting a deficit of $18 billion when he should have known better. Some of his supporters knew better. I believe he tried to correct himself, but it is not clear that he ever did. He must have known that kind of error would be noticed. I regret that he did not take the opportunity to put the record straight. Other people saw and heard that kind of error.

A short while ago the hon. member for Don Valley was arguing that the deficit in Canada was too high and should be lowered. In recent weeks his leader has been arguing the reverse—that the deficit should be greater. Others outside Canada hear these confusing statements, so is it any wonder that those who are making a judgment in respect to the Canadian dollar are confused? These are the people who would claim to be ready to govern. They have shown themselves completely inept in the economic area, and they have shown themselves to be thoroughly irresponsible. They have made knowingly untrue statements.

Not long ago one of the official spokesmen for the Tory party, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), claimed publicly that there were Liberals who were speculating against the dollar. He knew perfectly well that those comments would be heard. I suspect that is the reason he made them. Why else would he have made them? When he was challenged he could produce no evidence, because we knew and he knew that they were untrue. It is that kind of statement made inside Canada by people who claim to be ready to govern that others outside Canada are judging. They are aware that the opposition is creating confusion and is being irresponsible.

The opposition can, of course, choose to ignore the threat of separation, as many of them have. They can choose to make irresponsible statements, and that to a large extent is why the Minister of Finance—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret I have to inform the hon. minister that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, before the House tonight is a very simple motion to let the Parliament of Canada have an opportunity to take a deep look at the various arguments expressed not only in this country but in other countries about the proper way to handle the economic crisis that faces us at the present time. It is not necessary for me to argue over what the parameters of that crisis are. Every person in Canada knows the extent of the rise in prices in the last four or five years, the extent of the insistent unemployment, and certainly the deficit in our budget. Serious-minded people in every country of the world are debating this fact, but here we are being denied the chance to take a deep look at it.

I thought it would be worth while to put on the record what is happening in other countries. For example, the United States has exactly the same type of policies as we have for coping with the same sort of difficulties. They, too, have a deficit; they, too, have a negative balance in international trade; they, too, have high prices. But what are they doing about these things? Are they keeping them quiet, not mentioning them? Let me read what appeared in the magazine Saturday Review on January 6 this year. I shall read it slowly because I think it is our duty to listen to this.

There is a new theory circulating around Washington these days that is riding roughshod over the existing debates of the economics profession and the political configurations of contemporary America. It has ambushed the predictions of political pundits. It has baffled the congressional leadership. It is promoting the political fortunes of its proponents while evoking turbulent reactions from economists of widely differing persuasions. Cabinet officials have been denouncing its prescriptions. And the President has been faced with major legislative challenges to a number of his initiatives—challenges based on this new concept.

What is this new concept that has the whole United States intellectual community in a furor today and has upset Congress to the extent of defeating three major portions of President Carter's budget last month? Do our media show any awareness that there is a great debate going on in the United States over the same subject we are concerned about in Canada? A deathly hush, a silence hangs over this nation. All that is being discussed in the United States is a simple, elementary truth, that for 30 years the economists who have been guiding governments in the United States, Canada and other countries, have been consistently wrong. That is what they are discussing.

Surely the quantitative evidence of the last 20 years in every western nation shows that something is desperately wrong with the theory being used by the advisers of this and other governments on economic matters. I am referring not only to the monetary side, but to the fiscal side which concerns us the most. I say that this subject has been put before the government, this alternative theory has been put before this parliament, as recently as three years ago—the very things they are talking about with great excitement in Washington with the whole Republican party joining in this new theory and a large number of Democrats joining with them, sufficient to defeat the administration in the House on three votes. We did not wait till 1979 to start talking about this theory.

I have the Hansard of three years ago reporting the first budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) when this party, in opposition, tried to give him some alternative theories to those he was getting from his own advisers. I cannot and do not intend to read the whole speech that I made on June 8, 1976, but I should like to put parts of it on the record. I started off by saying:

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge put forward not a new philosophy, but one that was laid clear as an alternative by the Economic Council of Canada six or seven years ago, namely, that when you have a large number of unemployed and 15 per cent or 20 per cent of the plant capacity unused, if you put that group of people to work and put that plant capacity to use, then there is no inflation.

That theory was enunciated by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). It was a serious effort on his part to get this debate started. I might say that I have been trying to do so for 15 years, but I stood up and pointed it out and in my own way congratulated him on taking a serious interest in this subject. I then went on to call it by the name that was used in describing his theory by the Economic Council of Canada, the potential budgeting theory. Four or five reviews by the Economic Council of Canada, an institution set up by this parliament to give alternative advice to the Minister of Finance and, the Bank of Canada, mentioned potential budgeting as something that is used when there are unemployment and unsued plant capacity available to produce new wealth to get the country out of its difficulties.

As the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said this afternoon, you measure a country's performance not against Timbuktu or Japan, you measure it against your potential to produce. If you are producing only 70 per cent or 80 per cent of potential, every dollar that you do not produce must be marked down as a loss forever; that is the human problem of the unemployed, unused plant capacity, the debts and worries of our people.

We would like to know more about this matter we are discussing. For a country in Canada's position, no one knows at what level our dollar should be when it is floating. We have to feel for that point. We would like to get some advice. When this government announced it was going to float the dollar, every party in this House supported that stand. Do not forget it. But what caused the uproar between us was when the advisers to the government got the minister to stand up and say the dollar was still floating when it was not floating. Instead the government was pouring in reserves trying to keep the dollar from going down; it was borrowing money trying to keep the dollar from going down. But the worst sin of all was to raise the bank rate seven times in less than a year, to raise interest rates, as if that would keep our dollar from going down. Quantitative evidence shows, as the hon. member for Don Valley mentioned this afternoon, that raising interest rates as part of the theory to hold the dollar up has had no effect. That same sort of evidence has been produced in country after country. I am thinking specifically of the United Kingdom. That country has tried raising rates and raising rates, but to no avail.

We as parliamentarians have a responsibility to the people of this country that goes beyond the winning of elections by our party against another party. You would think from the debate in the House this afternoon—from the heckling that we received when our leader was speaking, making a simple request—that this was a ball game. It is not a ball game. This is a matter of serious impact to all the people of country, and I might say to all nations of the west. No one knows the truth for sure. That is why we called for a detailed look.

We congratulate the governor of the Bank of Canada for having the courage to come forward and defend his policies. We know he is worried. We know that he knows about this theory they are debating in the United States. The Economic Council knew about this theory being debated in the United States, as if it were God's word anew. But never is it mentioned by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Never is it mentioned by the Economic Council of Canada, because the big thumb of big brother is on them. Everyone in this House should know who big brother is.

A few years ago in 1972 the battle between the Prime Minister's office and others was lost, but it has been restored in a new way. Big brother now works through a secret gestapo type of organization based on commissars. Each department of government has a commissar that goes past the minister, by the deputy minister, and reports directly back to the Privy Council office to big brother. That is why the civil servants in this city are demoralized and fearful. That is why they are determined in this capital city, where they have always voted Liberal as a matter of faith in their bosses, they are not going to vote Liberal for a long time in view of this type of commissar who is watching over every move made.

Mr. Paproski: Romeo knows about it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): We have a right and duty in this House to be able to draw some advice from people who each have a little to offer. We suspect that the theory that has been operating behind the advisers for government for the last 30 years has been wrong. I know it is wrong because I can add and subtract. It was a Canadian by the name of Mundell who produced this alternative theory. To my knowledge only two members of parliament during the last six years have ever mentioned his name in this House, the hon. member for Don Valley and myself. I recommend to Canadians, speaking for the people of Canada, not for political parties, that they read the efforts that we made in all humility, admitting that we did not know the final answers, in speeches made by myself on July 8 and by the hon. member for Don Valley on July 9. He dealt with the international posture and I tried to deal with the domestic posture. The speech shows four alternative courses which the new Minister of Finance should have considered. I knew in my heart that the chance of having him consider this was very small.

I knew from bitter experience of my own, in government and in opposition, that we were facing a monolithic pyramid which did not allow any difference of opinion. It refused and rejected the advice of the Economic Council of Canada, it looked askance at the Conference Board, it looked down its nose at the C. D. Howe Institute, and it looked down at this new institute of Walter Gordon's two weeks ago. They believe that God created wisdom and he put it into the hands of the 250 professionals who work in the Department of Finance, and God help any economic council or anything else. That is the situation.

We as members of parliament are responsible to the people of our constituencies and to the country as a whole. Are we going to stand by and see ourselves dominated and ruled by a group who have been proven wrong for 30 years?

Mr. Railton: Prove it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): At least in the government that I belonged to we took it up face to face with those who approached us, and we are the only government over the last 30 years that challenged this concept of monopoly of wisdom. We went the full route and fired the governor of the Bank of Canada because he would not consider our views as being worthy.

I speak to you chaps who sit on the government benches. You should have seen what happened on this side then. You should have seen how the scenario worked out; of going to an advertising agency, of getting the cameras all set up, of having a committee of the Senate, getting certain arguments made, and then to bring out the victim who was fired by this great majority of 200 conservative members. A loyal public servant wanted to restrict this economy, stop all goods coming into Canada and raise taxes 25 per cent. They destroyed us as a political party by the techniques of public relations. However, this time the people sitting on the hot griddle are right over there. They have to face the whirlwind. They have to face the fact that they have indoctrinated the people of the big cities to believe that only the Liberals can rule, that God only speaks to the Liberal party.

More and more people are learning it is not the Liberal party that runs this country. It is a group of mandarins who seized control during the war years, and they have extended that control into a complete monopoly. The only way the Liberals can try to control is through the Prime Minister's staff in the Privy Council office, using the technique of a commissar, a gestapo. It is not working, Mr. Speaker, because you can't win unless you know something. What you need is an alternative.

I have a lot of other quotes here, but I think I have made my first point clear. There is an important issue here. I cannot stand here, nor can any other member, and say that I am right, because I do not know. All I know is what we have had from government advisers over the past 30 years has been wrong every time. Look at what happened to Walter Harris, Donald Fleming, and Mitchell Sharp. Look what happened to poor Benson.

Mr. Railton: Look what happened to Joe Clark.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Look at what happened to Donald Macdonald and John Turner. Look at what is now happening to a very fine person, the present Minister of Finance, who comes here and says the most horrible things. The hon. member for Don Valley said that he lost credibility by saying these things. It is worse than that. The fact is that by saying one thing and doing another for ten years, the people of Canada no longer trust the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That lack of trust is in others too because they hang with the Prime Minister. He is going to leave them twisting in the wind.

Oh, those poor members from Toronto! I can see their problem. There is nothing you can do when a city turns pathological and makes up its mind that it cannot trust the Prime Minister. It will chuck out every Liberal candidate, good or bad. That is not a matter of satisfaction because, as human beings, you hate to see anybody get knocked off when it is not his fault. However, do not come into this House screaming and yelling at us because we simply ask to look at the problem to see whether we can come up with enough information to make a better decision.

We know this is a lame duck government. It is carrying on because it does not have the strength or the will to bury itself. It is a walking dead. They are too fat to fight and too frightened to run. They are paralysed with panic. If I keep this up much longer, people will think I am the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

I want to make one point clear. Early last fall the leader of the Conservative party stated in Vancouver that he thought if Canadians had to compete with Americans as individuals, our tax level should be the same. A few weeks later during the by-elections, he said that if we formed the government he would like to make the interest rate on mortgages and taxes by municipalities deductible under the Income Tax Act as it is in the United States. You should have heard the yelling in Toronto. Newspapers, pundits, civil servants and, yes, Liberal candidates all dutifully yelling this is terrible, it is the end of the world. When the votes came in, 50 per cent were Conservative. The people had gotten the message. The significance of that has not sunk in over there.

What our leader was expressing was a policy of reducing taxes to get growth. It was a policy of reducing the taxes to balance the budget. If you reduce taxes when you have unemployed and unused plant capacity, more people go out to work, more taxes are paid, and the budget is balanced. My closing words are a quote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member. I have allowed him an extra minute. His time has expired. Does the House give consent to allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) is seeking the floor. I have to recognize him.

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I misunderstood the purpose of the debate today. I have been waiting patiently since three o'clock in anticipation of somebody in the opposition putting forward some ideas. I attended the committee meeting when governor Bouey was questioned. In fact I questioned him myself. A number of opposition members who are here this evening also had the opportunity of questioning governor Bouey.

The policy of the government and of the governor of the Bank of Canada requires no defence here today. The policy is well known. It has been explained repeatedly. I had assumed that we would hear today even a germ of an idea as an alternative policy that could form the basis of a debate. I have heard nothing.

I listened to Mr. Gillies—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): —a professional economist, attack the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) personally. I heard him attack the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). He declared the Minister of Finance is the worst in the history of Canada—

Mr. Gillies: An understatement.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): —that the economy is in a situation of crisis—

Mr. Gillies: True.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): —and that off the Hill there is no one who believes the Minister of Finance has any credibility.

Mr. Gillies: True.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I am often off the Hill. It is apparent to me that the people I talk to do not feel that way at all.

Mr. Gillies: Neither one of them?

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I think that the Tories must talk to each other and the Liberals must talk to the people.

Mr. Gillies: The only Liberals we can find are on the Hill.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): The only ideas I heard read into the record by members of the opposition have come from McLeod Young Weir, and Mr. McLaughlin. Mr. Gillies did not refer to anyone specifically.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I remind the hon. member that he should not refer to another member by name, but by his constituency.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is one of the problems of being a new member. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) referred to those who say that the dollar should be between 88 and 90 cents. I do not think he suggested it was his idea. We have heard from McLeod Young Weir, Mr. McLaughlin, Saturday Review and others, but we have yet to hear from the opposition.

● (2130)

I am disappointed in the comments made by the hon. member for Don Valley because I had anticipated we would hear something constructive from him, an examination of different policies. Our position is on record but nothing of any substance was put forward by opposition speakers, nothing specific that we could grasp. Only one single idea was forthcoming from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and I will deal with that in due course.

The reasons for the fall in the value of the dollar back in 1976 are no secret. We all expected the dollar would fall at that time. It had been widely predicted that as soon as interest rates shifted and the differential between Canada and the United States disappeared, it was bound to happen. The situation was compounded by the victory of the Parti Québécois, to which reference has been made on a number of occasions during this debate. In addition, it is well known that labour costs in this country rose dramatically in 1975, settlements in the first half of that year being in the neighbourhood of 18 per cent. Subsequently settlements were reached at lower levels. The competitive position of Canada was the subject of wide debate, and it was broadly felt and recommended that the dollar should find a lower level.

I, for one, see no evil in the devalued dollar. I am surprised that it seems to be an article of faith among the opposition that it should be at a higher level. Naturally, we do not want to see the dollar fall any further.

Mr. Gillies: Why not?

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): There are other factors involved. Mention has been made of the recent policy review of the C. D. Howe Institute which pointed out that a further decline in the value of the dollar could set off another round of price and wage inflation in the country. This is not something Canadians want to see. On the other hand, as one finds when addressing oneself to the business community, there are considerable benefits attached to the present level. Some quotations to this effect were read into the record by the Minister of Transport, I believe. It is perfectly clear that a large and representative cross-section of the Canadian business community is pleased that the Canadian dollar is hovering somewhere in the 83-85 cent range. The evidence is clear for all to see. Our trade balance of $3.6 billion in 1978 bears testimony to the benefits which the lower dollar has brought.

The opposition suggests the value of the currency should rise, that we are in some kind of crisis. Perhaps it will rise. The C. D. Howe report suggests it will do so. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) indicated this evening that the dollar would undoubtedly rise in due course. But we do not want it to rise too quickly, placing us in the same position as Japan and Germany which are fighting at the moment to deflate their currencies and expanding their monetary aggregates and money supplies in order to bring this about. This is not the answer for Canada. It seems to me it is extremely irresponsible to talk in terms of a national crisis. The hon. member for Don Valley said it was probably the most serious crisis in the economic history of this country. I say that when an economist, as he is, discusses this issue and offers no solutions then he is fully aware that there is no crisis of the proportions he describes.

There are, nevertheless, difficult policy decisions to be made. The choices are not easy. This is a very serious matter and I agree with the last speaker for the opposition that the subject is not one to be taken lightly. I certainly do not take it lightly, because I am concerned about the dollar plunging below its present level. I am equally concerned about its rising too rapidly to higher levels, which would again leave us unable to compete on world markets. The dollar, as it is, is laying the foundation for a strong industrial sector throughout the eighties and, I suggest that to follow any other policy at the moment than the one suggested by the governor of the Bank of Canada would be utter folly. In any event, the opposition has placed no other policy before us for examination, although that is what I had hoped to hear today.

The opposition has had ample opportunity to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): There was nothing to prevent any member of the opposition holding discussions with anyone they chose. They are quite entitled to talk to the Canadian Bankers' Association, to economists, to analysts with the C. D. Howe Institute or the Economic Council. They can talk to anybody they please, and they are quite capable of putting questions to responsible ministers based on the information they obtain. But they have not done so. Basically, they are trying to create an inflammatory political situation out of a serious economic matter which the government has openly put forward for examination.

We hear charges that there is secrecy. There is no secrecy here, Mr. Speaker. There is nothing secret about the situation of the Canadian dollar. Nothing is undisclosed. The only secret, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps the best kept secret, is what the opposition's policy is with regard to the dollar, and, for that matter, with regard to other economic measures which they hope to implement, such as the stimulative deficit, about which we have heard so much, and such as laying off something in the order of 60,000 public service employees without anyone getting hurt by such a move. There are many aspects of the policies of the opposition which really are shrouded in mystery and secrecy. But that is not the case in so far as the government is concerned in relation to the dollar.

Long term solutions are obviously necessary. We have to work together in a non-partisan way to arrive at long-term solutions which will ultimately resolve the problem of the dollar and the other attendant difficulties flowing therefrom. Low productivity presents a serious problem in this country. Reference has been made to the situation in the United States, where productivity is also a serious problem. In fact The Economist recently published material which indicated that of the seven largest OECD countries the increase in productivity in the United States was the lowest. Britain was second, and we are the third lowest. That is not a good record. And that is where we have to make a start. We need to establish long-term economic objectives, and I am sure we will do so.

Mr. Gillies: You have had 15 years.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I take the view, obviously not shared by members of the NDP, that we require more foreign equity in this country. We have too much debt. One reason why our foreign account balance is in such a deficit position is the tremendous interest burden we must bear. But many object to foreign equity and, as a consequence, there has been a patriation of foreign equity, something which has not helped our dollar situation either. We ought to adopt a series of sound fiscal measures to attract capital into the industrial sector.

Mr. Gillies: Again, you have had 15 years.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): The government has introduced such programs. This is the kind of thing we should be discussing during the debate today. We also need to control the money supply carefully. I believe the Bank of Canada has done an admirable job in this respect holding the money supply within the limits of the narrowly defined M1. Perhaps the time has come to consider larger aggregates of money supply. These are matters on which it is legitimate to submit a number of varying ideas for consideration by this chamber.

● (2140)

I have not heard any ideas from the opposition except one, and I would like to deal with it very briefly. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition told us that the program of the Progressive Conservative party to stimulate the economy is to cut taxes. To my knowledge we have heard only one concrete proposal emanating from the official opposition with regard to that tax cut, and it takes the form of mortgage interest deductibility and real estate tax deductibility within certain limits. I, for one, would not say that that is a ridiculous suggestion because at one time I proposed it myself. However, careful examination of that proposal, which I would have thought would have been made by the Conservative party, indicates that it would be a tragedy to inflict it upon the Canadian people.

In terms of the productivity this country requires, and in terms of attracting capital for us to develop the competitive industrial sector which will ultimately result in our dollar's achieving a level which would be satisfactory to all of us at some future date, I submit that that policy is sheer folly.

In the course of the last week a number of us journeyed to Washington to discuss with Americans their experience in this area. I would say that any informed observer—certainly every representative of the U.S. government and every economist of note—was virtually horrified at the prospect of our introducing such a measure in this country. They would do anything to get rid of such a measure in the United States because of the inequities it creates, the social problems inherent in it, and the variety of negative impacts it has upon the American economic scene. Those negative impacts would probably be greater here in Canada. The Americans have lived with this, not really by choice but through inheritance, since 1913, and here we are with the prospect of having it foisted upon the Canadian public by the Conservatives, should they ever attain office.

I do not propose here to review in any great detail the problems with that measure because I do not consider it to be germane to this debate except in one specific area. Specifically, the deduction of mortgage interest and real estate taxes clearly favours high income groups. This proposal would create disposable income, discretionary income for a privileged group which is less likely to invest it in the commodity sector and which might very well be tempted to invest it outside the country. In fact this proposal might encourage the acquisition of more expensive real estate, to the detriment of the industrial sector.

Reference was made to the problems with which our American friends are wrestling. This is one of them. In the United States the amount of capital devoted to the business sector as a percentage of gross national product is something like a third or less than that of Japan. I urge all to look carefully at any plan of this kind, which is the only one which has been put forward by the official opposition. It would not only have a disastrous effect on the country but also on the dollar because it would not accomplish its intended purpose, even if put forward in good faith.

I occasionally refer to a few authors, as do other hon. members. We talk about where the Canadian dollar should be. The hon. member for Don Valley has said that some people tell him it should be between 88 cents and 92 cents. We know the level of our dollar today. Many observers are inclined to use a somewhat more objective yardstick than a gut feeling, pride, or what they can buy eggs for across the border. I have before me, for example, the February edition of "The International Bank Credit Analyst". In it there is a table entitled "Unit Labor Costs", which one can find in a number of other publications as well. One can see that labour costs per unit in output in Canada, adjusted for the exchange rate, are very marginally less than those in the United States today, making us almost dead-on competitive. So, I suggest that it is no accident that the Canadian dollar is fluctuating between 83 cents and 85 cents. That is not a crisis. The only people in Canada who see this as a crisis and dwell upon it daily are members of the opposition.

I think an objective study would suggest that when the dollar begins to be sold at 83 cents or less, it would be undersold. On the basis of that I would be very surprised to see the dollar drop to the level of 79 cents, which I believe was mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon.

I do not think there is any reason to panic. This is a time to roll up our sleeves and get to work. It is a time to sit down and debate with members of the opposition who are quite capable of debating these issues, who are knowledgeable in these areas, like the hon. member for Don Valley—to sit down and engage in intelligent debate, not the kind of amusing comic relief we heard from the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Admittedly, the hon. member did provide some relief to what I believe was, unfortunately, a rather dismal performance by the opposition in this debate today.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I would like to join in this debate. I am disappointed that the government feels that this motion should not have been brought forward and that discussion about what level the Canadian dollar should be at should be reserved for the financial pages and for the tourist when he buys his American or British money at the bank.

Our dollar is at its lowest level in 46 years. Forty-six years ago we were at the height of the great depression. Even then the dollar remained so low only for a few months. During the time of the depression the Canadian economy was agricultural and agrarian in nature, but then our economy was much smaller than those of other industrialized countries of the west. I think it is significant that our dollar is devalued to 83 cents and that many knowledgeable people argue that it could drop to 79 cents. I think this is something for us to worry about or, at least, discuss. Whatever we may think, what the traders of the world think of the stability of our economy and how good it is, is important.

We have had deficits in the billions in federal budgets for the last few years. Ministers of finance have consistently underestimated their budgetary deficits and inflation rates. The Anti-Inflation Board said that inflation would be down to 4 per cent, but it is more than double that amount. I think it is nonsense to make such predictions in the first place. There does not seem to be a light at the end of the tunnel. If there were, we would be much happier.

The government has made much of the fact that our trade surplus is $3.5 billion. If we examine this, we find that that is really only the percentage increase as a result of the fall in the value of our dollar. Unless the government gets the economy in order, this surplus will soon be lost. It is no secret that we can buy Japanese and German appliances and other products at a cost of only a little more than previously. That is certainly not because the value of our dollar has decreased. Businessmen supplying our markets from outside are not necessarily at much of a disadvantage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is essentially wrong? Essentially, too many dollars are being printed, and they are being printed too fast so that domestic inflation is rampant. We have been keeping our interest rate high, as the government of the Bank of Canada has mentioned. He had hoped to control inflation, but it now becomes debatable whether or not the inflation can be curtailed by a high interest rate while at the same time the supply of money is being expanded too rapidly.

There is no doubt that the impetus of the present inflation was fueled by the minority government between the years 1972 and 1974 when the Liberal administration sought to stay in office by buying off, at all costs, the demands of the NDP. These expenditures were not met by borrowing in the money markets but by printing money which in those years financed some 75 per cent of the deficits of the government.

Reliable American estimates show that we have to plan for a 7 per cent inflation so far as the United States is concerned. It is suggested that almost certainly the deficit in the United States will be much bigger, in excess of $30 billion, and will end up closer to $40 billion. But the American position seems good compared with ours. The rule of thumb relating to an economy ten times our size involving $40 billion, would indicate $4 billion, but our deficit is some two and a half times the projected American deficit. Our balance of payments problem is even worse than theirs. They have some $29 billion, ours is closer to $4 billion or $5 billion, which in their terms would be $40 billion or $50 billion.

The message for all of us is clear. Governments must control their spending. It is no use borrowing huge sums of money to be paid back at a future date when we have this gigantic deficit.

Can we consider the indexing problem and the built-in outlay in government expenditures? Governments must control expenditures even when that is socially undesirable. Even when expenditures are politically very desirable, their total effect on the economy must be assessed. In periods of rapid inflation, total indexing should be brought into question. In Canada, governments at all levels are involved in vast transfer payments, not only right across our society but across all the regions of the country.

The indexing of personal income tax raises serious problems. The possibility that an indexed income tax would make a government more aware of its responsibilities and more prudent in its budget managing makes it desirable, if governments would heed warnings. It is obvious that the tax structure is out of balance. Perhaps it should be realized that decades ago we lived in a very stable economy when taxes were raised through consumption taxing.

In the last two decades the exchequer collected money largely through the income tax system. This was based on the theory that those who earn more should pay more. This was considered a fair tax. Now some 60 per cent of total federal and provincial revenues are raised through the income tax vehicle. But this has its disadvantages. A heavy tax discourages productivity, and all our indices indicate that the productivity in our country is not rising as rapidly as previously. Furthermore, the income tax is inflationary in itself, and having enriched the government tax coffers it has given false signs of a healthy economy. High marginal income taxes encourage the underground economy. It operates outside the tax system and gives benefits to individuals without requiring them to pay their share of the tax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the falling dollar is of great concern to all of us. Although we have a surplus of over $3 billion in our merchandise trade, it is still not enough to cover our foreign exchange deficits. The falling dollar makes the payments of dividends and interests to foreign borrowers expensive. The government has intervened to the extent of some $5 billion this year, and I understand the minister is now going to Japan to incur a further large loan. Furthermore, foreign borrowers cannot be paid off by debasing the currency. A $1,000 Canadian government bond of 1971 was worth $500 at the end of 1978.

There are one or two things I would suggest, in the short time I have, on the balance of payments problem. We should be looking at the short-term natural gas exports to the United States. To those who suggest we should not export energy, I would answer that energy is a commodity like any other. We are exporting a large amount of energy in the form of food and grain. Furthermore, in western Canada we have a large amount of grain on our farms. If we can get it to the ports, it can be sold, thus helping our economy.

The government might consider facilitating the inflow of money to Canada. One suggestion would be the abrogation of the 15 per cent withholding tax of short-term money, say up to five years. This action would not incur retaliation by our trading partners as might occur if foreign exchange controls were instituted. The government and the minister should be much more vehement that foreign exchange control not be put in place. Last week in Brussels we were told by bankers that the very thought of foreign exchange controls would mean that Europeans would withdraw their money.

In order to give my NDP colleague a few minutes in which to speak, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my brief remarks. I appreciate very much having had the chance to put my ideas on record.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in the very short time remaining to us I want, first of all, to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) for his courtesy in allowing me the three minutes in which to wind down the debate.

The purpose of my intervention is simply to draw attention to a couple of very important discrepancies in the case presented by the government throughout today. Of all the debates that I have had the pleasure of attending in my short time in the House, this has been one of the most painful and partisan experiences through which I have suffered. The government is saying on the one hand that the opposition and events outside its control are responsible for the fact that the dollar is in such a terrible state, and that we should all be good citizens and support the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the Liberal party because to speak out against the economy is to speak out against the country, and to speak out against the Liberal party is also to speak out against the country. It is all that confusion and arrogance that will be the downfall of the Liberal party in this country. Their confusion consists in thinking that the Liberal party and the state of health of the Liberal party are the same thing as the state of health of the people of Canada.

The fact of the matter is that this government has produced a policy which it cannot justify and explain to Canadians. It is a policy which it has evolved by chance and by happenstance. Now it is attempting to tell Canadians, "We did it all on purpose." They are telling us that they have a floating dollar when they have given it a pair of $5 billion water wings in order to allow it to float. That is the phoniest float I have seen.

An hon. Member: Orderly markets.

Mr. Rae: Orderly markets? That is rubbish, and you know it is rubbish. They know they have engaged in a high interest rate policy because, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) said, they have no choice because our economy is dependent on the U.S. and tied to the U.S. economy. This government has done nothing about that condition of our economy for 15 years.

The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), who travelled with me to the United States, I am glad to say, gave a very accurate account of our findings there with regard to the Tory mortgage interest deduction proposal, but had the gall to come to the House and put forward certain suggestions as if this government were facing the future with a bright face when in fact it is a tired government which has produced no new ideas. The Liberal party has had 15 years in which to address itself to the structural problems which were so ably described by my leader earlier today.

An hon. Member: We will have a further 15 years.

Mr. Rae: They will have no more 15 years.

• (2200)

The fact of the matter is that the House has not been allowed to examine the record. We do not know the effect of the interest rates. We have been given no calculations to tell us what is the costing of the various options. The governor of the Bank of Canada came before the committee and gave us only one option. Also he paraded the horrors of doing anything else or of considering any other policy. It is time for reform, not only of the financial policies of the government but of the accounting procedures of the House. They do not allow us as members of parliament to have the facts to enable us to judge the policies which the government puts before us. I cannot go back to the people in my riding and in conscience tell them that I know exactly why the government is doing what it is doing, other than the fact the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) tells us that it is the best thing for Canadians. I am not satisfied with that, and I do not think the people of Broadview are.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10 p.m. it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) rises on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps some member opposite could tell us what the business of the House will be tomorrow. Are we carrying on with Bill C-35 or Bill C-12?

Mr. Andres: Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the consideration of Bill C-12 tomorrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-6, an act to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—CRITICISM OF ENFORCEMENT OF AIR SAFETY REGULATIONS—CALL FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the issue I wish to deal with tonight arises out of questions which I directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) last Thursday having to do with the administration and enforcement of air navigation orders and standards. It is a very important issue. It is not new. It has been around for quite some time. It has become progressively more urgent, given the disturbing reports which have emanated from time to time over the last year or so.

In order to recap briefly, back in November, 1977, the MOT conducted an in-house investigation into air navigation in northwestern Ontario. Perhaps the results are best described in the edition of the Globe and Mail of Monday, November 28, 1977. The article was entitled "Policing of Aviation Rules Inadequate, Violations Common, 2 Investigators Say". Briefly the article reads:

> Aviation safety across Canada, and particularly in northwestern Ontario, is being jeopardized by the Ministry of Transport's failure to adequately enforce air regulations and take action against companies and individuals routinely engaging in illegal and dangerous practices, says a confidential report by two investigators for the federal ministry.
> Calling for a complete overhaul of procedures, the investigators said top officials in Ottawa block the attempts of regional safety officers to put a halt to the operations of aviation firms that continually break the law and endanger the lives of employees and passengers.

The article goes on to cite various examples of political interference, and continues as follows:

> Some of their other findings: —Overloading, falsification of log book entries, illegal and unsafe maintenance practices, flying below legal limits in bad weather, flying with insufficient flight instruments "and other illegal and dangerous practices too numerous to list here"—

Certainly that is a damning indictment. What action did the minister take? He indicated that Canada has one of the best records of air safety in the world. He authorized the hiring of 12 aviation inspectors, and he said that he would review the situation.

If we look at the situation, there is a shortage of 60 civil aviation air inspectors at the present time. Thus, if there were any hirings, it would be applied against the aggregate shortage of 60. We have the infamous Bolduc telex, which arose out of an inspector attempting to suspend the operation, wherein he was wired asking him to consider fully the political representations, the possible embarrassment to the Minister of Transport and any other political implications.

Then there was the question of the emergency locator transmitters which the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) outlined very adequately in the House just last week. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have another report which has surfaced again from within the Ministry of Transport and which again levels a very stinging indictment against the administration and the enforcement of air regulations. To quote briefly from this document:

● (2205)

> Enforcement action is generally unco-ordinated and often haphazard.
> There is no clear determination of the role inspectors are expected to play in the enforcement activity even in the case of inspectors specifically assigned to the enforcement function.
>
> Many inspectors shy away from recommending administrative enforcement action—
>
> Agents appointed by the Department of Justice are in the majority of cases inexperienced in aeronautics law and are afforded little support when preparing prosecutions.
> The enforcement sector suffers from a severe lack of inspector resources. In some regions only a small percentage of complaints are actioned and in many cases such action is limited to conveying the information to the RCMP.

In the face of all this the Minister of Transport has the gall to say that he can reassure Canadians that the safety standards in Canada are among the highest standards of the world.

That may very well be, but these high standards are not being complied with.

We need a clear definition of the role, function and authority of our civil aviation inspectors. Clearly, we need a policy to recruit more personnel and, clearly, we must move immediately to upgrade the salary scales of these individuals to make their salaries comparable with their counterparts in the industry. The inspectors have been without a contract since 1975. The last time they had a salary adjustment was in July, 1976. I submit that the Minister of Transport has failed to act responsibly and with despatch and that he has failed to provide Canadians with the degree of air safety which they deserve. He has been derelict in his duty, and if he does not have the courtesy to resign he should be removed from office, as far as I am concerned.

Is there any wonder why Canada's level of safety standards has slipped from seventh place to thirteenth place out of 18 nations throughout the world? That fact is not very comforting, and we must ask ourselves how many more lives must we lose before this government acts. People in this country are still shocked and horrified over the Cranbrook disaster, yet we see in the December 21 issue of the Calgary Herald this article entitled "MOT Cites Weak Rules in PWA Crash". It goes on to say in part:

> Upgraded air traffic and air-worthiness regulations may prevent a recurrence of the Pacific Western Airlines crash at Cranbrook, B.C. last Feb. 11 that claimed 43 lives—
> The official crash report by Ministry of Transport accident investigators cites several instances of weak regulations, primarily in regard to poor communications, that contributed to the crash—

That, sir, is not very comforting either. In fact it is very disturbing and very discomforting, and if this minister, as my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West indicated in the House last Thursday, is not guilty of wilful and wanton misconduct, then he is pathetically incompetent and should be removed.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe this issue was raised by the hon. member during the question period on February 8, and I believe they tried as well to raise something relating to this issue last Monday in the form of a motion under Standing Order 43.

What the hon. member forgets to remember is that in fact the minister responded to what was viewed as a potential difficulty in terms of trying to police what was happening in the airways by calling for and setting up the task force about which the hon. member has suggested he had some information provided to him even in advance of the results of that task force being made available to the minister. There was some suggestion at the time that, in fact, it was the report of that task force itself which was condemning what was happening in Canada. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) indicated to the House that day, the task force had not yet drafted any report, and nothing had come to his attention that was the sort of information the hon. member was trying to put forward.

The hon. member speaks of the decline of safety in Canada and of dropping from seventh place to thirteenth place in the world. I do not know where he gets his statistics, but my information is that Canada is within the top five in the world as regards safety. That is something of which to be rather proud.

If one were to accept the hon. member's suggestion that this government and particularly this minister have done nothing, that would be to negate the fact that the minister has set up the task force, recognizing that there is some difficulty with policing. We also have to recognize that in the air as with other modes of transportation, but particularly in the air, one has to rely upon the responsibility and professionalism of the people operating in that environment.

As one who has flown in the IFR environment on a number of occasions as pilot in command, I can say from that experience, and from experience with people who operate in the industry, that the level of professionalism and competence of the pilots in Canada is something we have no reason to worry about. There may be individual instances where transgressions take place and there may be some difficulty with policing these things, but surely the hon. member would not suggest we should have a policeman in every cockpit or a monitor on all the radio waves. There are difficulties inherent with the kind of policing he seems to be suggesting in order that the minister would be able to fulfil his function that actually go beyond reasonable suggestions that could be made by any member of this House.

The hon. member spoke of the ELT question. The ELTs were required by the department after consultation with the industry, and at the request of and with the approbation of the industry. I suggest they were removed only at a time when it was evident that they were a source of potential danger as opposed to being a help. This kind of action belies the position the hon. member is taking when he suggests that the Minister of Transport has been delinquent in his duties. I see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

STATUS OF WOMEN—EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on January 23 I raised with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the matter of the speech of the president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, delivered in Ottawa on January 10, at the regular quarterly meeting of the council. At that time the Prime Minister indicated to me that with respect to the very strong criticism brought forward by the president he had had a report, and he added:

> —I can state unequivocally that either the president was not directing her remarks at the government or else she was unequivocally wrong.

There followed a day or two of fairly intensive debate with the Prime Minister about the validity of the remarks and the accuracy of the remarks. For the record I want to quote extensively from the remarks of the president because I think it is important that all hon. members realize how strong the criticism was of an advisory body appointed by this government. Mrs. Rousseau began her remarks with this paragraph:

After considerable study, consultation and discussion, I have come to a tragic conclusion: not only are Canadian women excluded from the employment strategy proposed by the Canadian government, but they are subtly evicted from the labour force. This conclusion is all the more bitter in that it questions women's right to work. After ten years of in depth studies, conclusive research and multiple recommendations, such are the facts.

At page 3 of her text she went on to say:

But when we dissect official statements made in time of economic ill-health, we are appalled to see that women are consistently held responsible for the high rate of unemployment, though they fall victims to it more than other groups. Consequently, they are used as scapegoats and as a screen for a chronic inability to redress the economy.

She then raised two questions not yet answered by the Prime Minister or by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), as follows:

Before it was decided to exclude women from the employment strategy, why is it that the CACSW's advice was not asked? Is an advisory council a political ornament? Are there any women on the regional working groups advising Canada Employment and Immigration Commission's sector task forces?

On the next page she asked:

Why are they always ignored in policy planning?

● (2215)

She was referring here to the role of women. In the latter part of her remarks she said:

If government does not know its own objectives, or does not make then known, we know what our objectives are: women's right to training, to work and to employment mobility on an equal footing with men.

Then there is this further question:

Is our role as Advisory Council on the Status of Women recognized, or will the government take our advice only when faced with emergency situations?

I want to remind all hon. members that the criticism that was posed by the president of the Advisory Council did not come lightly. It follows numerous official comments and statements made in recent years. I just want to list three or four that I have before me this evening. Hon. members will recall that on April 10, 1978, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in his budget statement said:

An important reason for the growth of our labour force has been the growing number of Canadian women who are working. Since 1970, the number of adult women in the labour force has increased from 1.9 million to 2.7 million, a rise of more than 40 per cent.

Then on September 8, 1978, detailing the announcements by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), the so called Chrétien-Andras statement of that date said:

The strong gains in employment have been matched by continued rapid increases in the labour force as a result of the continued increase in the proportion of women and young people seeking work. Thus the unemployment rate averaged 8.5 per cent over the first half of the year, although it dropped to 8.4 per cent in July.

Then the Prime Minister's comments this year, first on the program "Question Period" televised by CTV on September 8, 1978, in which he said:

There was about 36 per cent of the women working three years ago and now there is 42 per cent of them. But this phenomenon will stabilize at one time . . .

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

The same thing with the youth problem . . . You know, we're creating and I think we're quite successful in creating jobs but I have to admit that we cannot create them as fast as the people come into the labour force.

Finally at the end of the year on September 28, 1978, in a conversation with Bruce Phillips broadcast by CTV, the Prime Minister said:

—the labour force is increasing because of immigration, immigration to Canada, because of what is called participation rate which really means that the percentage of young people and women who want to work now is immensely higher than it was ten or 15 or 20 years ago.

People want to enter the labour force, and they see that that is their answer, O.K., you will have eight per cent unemployed.

Then the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) on January 29, 1979, in speaking to an international symposium on female offenders, said:

In addition, increased opportunities for women in the labour force brought increased opportunities to engage in a wider range of criminal pursuits.

If there was any doubt about the feeling of either the advisory council or its six parallel bodies, that should have been put to rest on January 29 when a letter was sent to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on behalf of the six provincial bodies and the federal body which says:

Dear Mr. Cullen:

At a special meeting of the leaders of the Advisory Councils on the Status of Women of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario and Saskatchewan held in Toronto, January 26, 1979, there was unanimous endorsation of Yvette Rousseau's position that "not only are Canadian women excluded from the employment strategies proposed by the federal government, but they are subtly evicted from the labour force."

That, along with the extensive letter which indicated in detailed terms the anxieties and questions which these advisory bodies had, should let the government know in no uncertain terms the atmosphere which they have created with their subtle and sometimes not so subtle attack on the right of women to a place in the labour force.

To put the other side of the case, a recent report from the C.D. Howe Research Institute, as quoted by Don McGillivray in a recent article, suggested this:

What will it mean for the Canadian economy if women keep joining the paid work force at the rapid rate of the past couple of years?

The pessimistic answer is that it will mean more unemployment. The optimistic answer is that it will mean more economic growth.

What we need from this government is a more positive response to the right of each and every woman to her desire to a full share and an equal opportunity in the market place.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken and the chairman of the Advisory Committee on the Status of Women share positive and real concern about the place of women in the labour force. But perhaps what they have both done is to misunderstand some government statements. What has been said by ministers, as the hon. member has quoted, is that the participation of women in the labour force has increased very dramatically. This is a fact. It is not a matter of blame, it is a fact. It is a fact which I welcome. I certainly agree with him and with the very positive approach by the C. D. Howe people that enhanced participation also enhances opportunities for the country. But, in the short term, the very rapid increase in the labour force, which includes young people and women, presents us with the need to create a lot more jobs very quickly.

● (2220)

In the last year something like 340,000 additional jobs were created in Canada, yet we still find ourselves with more unemployment than we want. This is a statement of numbers. It is by no means intended to suggest that either women or young people do not have a right to jobs or that we must not enhance our efforts to create them.

On April 18 last I placed some figures on the record, also in response to a question by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). They were with regard to the steps being taken in the public service. Tonight I would like to mention some of the steps being taken in the Department of Employment and Immigration at the present time.

The CEIC is working in the area of affirmative action geared toward employers, unions, and women returning to the labour force as well as national women's organizations. Women are being encouraged by departmental officers to look toward training in non-traditional jobs. The over-all strategy and action plans of CEIC reflect an attitude toward encouraging employers to change attitudes that could be disadvantageous in the hiring and promoting of women and to train and accept them in non-traditional areas.

I know that the chairman of the Advisory Committee on the Status of Women whom the hon. member for Egmont quoted is perfectly sincere and indeed to be commended for her fear that women in this time of economic straits may lose what they have gained in the labour force. This is certainly not the policy of the Government of Canada. On the contrary. Far from being excluded from the employment strategy, at the present time there are particular efforts being made in the employment strategy to encourage the participation of women and to continue further this very welcome trend that has developed in recent years.

One might also mention that in 1976 the changes in measuring the labour force survey for the first time began to reflect accurately the participation of women in the labour force. This is an important measurement.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—DECISION ON FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SYSCO TO MODERNIZE PLANT

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I quoted from the Cape Breton Post of Tuesday, November 28, 1978, in which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) was quoted as saying that a decision would be made before the end of 1978 on whether Sydney Steel would get funds for modernization needed to carry out a ten-year sales contract with the Tree Island Steel Company Limited of Richmond, British Columbia.

In answering me today, the minister gave an explanation of some of the reasons for the delay in making the decision, but in effect said, if I understood his French, that he would be taking a proposition before the cabinet in a short time. In my supplementary I tried to impress, through the minister, on the cabinet who will be receiving what is in reality the effects of combined negotiations between DREE officials in Moncton and Halifax, and Sysco management people from Sydney, which have been going on quite intensively for some time, the urgency of a favourable decision for Sysco.

I also want to make it abundantly clear that if the cabinet does not decide to go along with the modernization plan for Sysco, then there is only, in my opinion, one or two alternatives. Eight years ago there may have been three or four, but now it is a question either of modernization, of reducing Sysco to the production of rails only, or close it down. The reduction of the plant to a rail mill operation only would mean that steel blooms would have to be imported from somewhere else and turned into the rail products. This would mean that about 400 employees would remain, out of a present work force of some 3,056.

As well, it is completely unrealistic to depend on spot markets for blooms in order to keep a rail mill going. We must also remember that when Sysco is operating at near its capacity of some one million tons, some 500,000 to 600,000 tons of Cape Breton coal will be used in the plant.

The steel workers and their families in the industrial area have suffered through many crises during the years which culminated in the announcement on October 13, 1967, by the private owners of the plant that it would be closing down. That day is etched in the memories and emotions of all Cape Bretoners and, indeed, of most Nova Scotians, and has always been referred to as "Black Friday".

The provincial government of the day took over the plant. As I have said on many occasions, I think the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which was set up in 1967, should have taken over the steel plant as well as the coal industry. But the federal government failed to do so and therefore it has, in my opinion, a special moral obligation to make sure that the finances for modernization are available and that any needed advisory help is provided to the management team which will have to direct the modernization operations as they evolve.

I do not want to go into the history of the last 12 years of the Sydney Steel plant, or to be vitriolic about some of the decisions which were made. Some of us who were close to Canadian and world steel trends felt that the decision to postpone the installation of modern steel making facilities, such as oxygen furnaces, and experimenting with what is called the submerged injection process, was the most backward and the most harmful of all the decisions which were made during that period. There was, as well, in the early period of the take-over, what the auditor general of Nova Scotia referred to as the declaration of "illusory profits" by the management of Sysco. The psychological effect on the employees of this latter action was extremely bad; they felt that profits had risen to some $29 million in about a year and a half. I mentioned that these profits were illusory, but their declaration was a prime reason for an unnecessary and uncalled-for strike which occurred in 1972 and lasted some seven weeks.

Given the changing international steel outlook, emphasis was then placed on building a new steel plant on the Greenfield site at Gabarus, Cape Breton Island, sponsored by an international consortium of international steel producers. Time and radically changing circumstances on the international steel scene have shown that the dream of Mr. Ralph Hindson, managing director of the now defunct Cansteel Corporation, the provincial agency responsible for setting up the new plant, was passé.

Attention then returned once again to the modernization of Sysco. In the days when the plant was viable it sold its bread and butter product, namely, steel rails, in large tonnages. The private owners had for a number of years a sort of captive market for its semi-finished steel products in the finishing mills they owned in the province of Quebec. Gradually these mills in Quebec were sold by the private owners to a Quebec provincially-owned company called Sidbec. Eventually, with a growth of basic steel production by Sidbec, these markets were largely lost to Sysco.

What the management of Sysco is trying to do through its ten-year contract is to supply up to 2.4 million tons of billets to Tree Island Steel Company of Richmond, B.C. This contract would be worth about $300 million. Through this and other contracts it could lay a long-term basis for something equivalent to the captive markets for the products of Sysco. This requires basic modernization of the plant at a cost of approximately $150 million, and the restructuring of the debt load caused by the losses incurred during the bad years of 1970.

I am happy to say that the minister in charge of DREE, who told me today that in a very short while he intends to bring a proposition with regard to this matter before the cabinet, seems to be playing a helpful role in the co-operative federalism which alone can save this country. A favourable decision by the cabinet on this issue could lift the morale of both workers and management and encourage them to pursue the goal of an efficient steel plant on the east coast, giving permanent employment to thousands of workers. This, along with the commitments already made to our increasingly vital coal industry and to our reviving fishing industry, is a realistic basis for a new hope for a complete turn around and some meaningful diversification of the Cape Breton economy within the next decade.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reply to the hon. member regarding the Sydney Steel Corporation. I should like to elaborate on the statement made by the minister this afternoon. In the summer of 1978 the government of Nova Scotia made a comprehensive and costly proposal to the federal government for the rehabilitation of the Sydney Steel Corporation.

This proposal was resubmitted to the federal government by the government of Nova Scotia under the Hon. John Buchanan and was discussed between the premier and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) on November 28, 1978. At that time the premier and the minister agreed that December 31, 1978, was not a critical decision date for confirmation of a ten-year billet contract between the Sydney Steel Corporation of Nova Scotia and the Tree Island Steel Company of British Columbia. Furthermore, the proposal made to the federal government envisaged a capital rehabilitation program considerably beyond that necessary to meet the requirements of the Tree Island Steel Company.

• (2230)

A working group consisting of officials of DREE and of the Sydney Steel Corporation has been reviewing all aspects of the Nova Scotia proposal, including production capability, markets and profitability. Results of marketing studies, carried out under the current $20 million subsidiary agreement in support of Sysco, have contributed to this evaluation. A number of production alternatives are being costed so as to determine the most viable production options for the Sydney Steel Corporation, given world market conditions for the products that Sysco can produce. At the same time, refinements to the Nova Scotia proposal have been made up to and including January of 1979, and these refinements are also being evaluated.

Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member, however, that even though the Tisco billet contract may turn out to be attractive, from the point of view of Sysco, this contract in itself would not ensure future viability or profitability for the Sydney Steel Corporation. It will be necessary for Sysco to produce other products for sale in Canada and abroad, on as viable a basis as possible.

I am well aware of the importance to Cape Breton of the Sydney Steel Corporation operation, and I am hopeful that the minister will be in a position in the very near future to propose a federal position to the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

LAND REGISTRATION AND INFORMATION SERVICE IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise in conformity with the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the inability of the federal government to explain its unilateral termination of support for the land registration and information service, and its failure to complete its obligations to the three maritime provinces for an up to date land registry system, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Prime Minister immediately indicate the increased cost to these three provinces to complete the changeover to this new system or the reversal to the former one, secondly, the lost revenue which would have been forthcoming in the development of a new export technology for the region and, finally, the number of jobs lost in the exodus of many highly trained personnel.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TERMINATION OF SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS TO ARGENTINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House, in light of the failure of the Argentine to subscribe to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, the fact that the Canadian government seems to be entirely dependent on the information from the government of the Argentine, without any system of monitoring infractions, and the AECL now proposes to provide additional reactors or components of them which can be used for the production of plutonium or nuclear weapon material, urges the Canadian government to refrain from authorizing AECL to proceed with any further sales of reactors or components thereof until the Argentine has accepted the non-proliferation treaty or provided an adequate means of monitoring the use of reactors and components provided by Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SECURITY CLEARANCE PROCEDURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 involves the security procedures policy of the federal government.

In view of requirements and procedures involving security as set out in a government security administration manual, section 11-3, which is several years old, and in view of the obvious need to rethink security matters because of the conditions over which several solicitors general have presided during the past few years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

● (1410)

That the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister indicate on motions, soon, to what extent change of marital status or residence within the past ten years in foreign countries, or having close relatives living within the borders of foreign nations, still impedes an individual obtaining security clearance, so that at least Canadians will know some of the rules which can affect them so drastically.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

CALL FOR AUDITOR GENERAL'S DETAILED INSPECTION OF FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND CONTROLS OF CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

In light of the growing reports in all areas of the country about alleged violations of the National Building Code and charges that CMHC is being forced to operate on a system of patronage, and in view of the serious lack of control in the financial and management procedures of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House immediately call on the Auditor General of Canada to undertake a detailed inspection of the financial management and controls of CMHC for the last fiscal year and, further, that this House direct the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to make an immediate reference to the standing committee to investigate and examine the reports of the series of articles in the Hamilton Spectator entitled "CMHC, the greatest national drain".

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF LINGUISTIC TRAINING PROGRAM IN PUBLIC SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the consequences of the Official Languages Act and since for years this government has based its reputation in Quebec and in French Canada on its intention to implement bilingualism; in addition, since there was no possible justification for the substantial cuts to the budget of the language branch and that such a decision was necessarily interpreted as an admission of the government failure in that endeavour, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the President of the Treasury Board explain the major reasons which prompted him to reduce the staff of the language programmes branch by 33 per cent while the reductions for the entire civil service were set at 2 per cent, and that this House direct the minister to suspend that decision until a proper inquiry shows that it is sound.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTION MUNICIPALITIES PARTICIPATE IN PROCESS OF CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the major socioeconomic change in Canada since 1867 has been industrialization and urbanization, that the majority of people of Canada are metropolitan dwellers and that the Science Council has estimated that 90 per cent of the Canadian population will live in an urban environment by the year 2000, that municipalities are required to provide an ever-increasing number of essential services to our population, and that municipal governments are closer to the people and provide more essential services to their respective populations than any other level of government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley):

That this House call upon provincial governments to invite the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities to participate in the ongoing process of constitutional reform with a view to entrenching powers in the constitution so as to provide municipalities with the powers and revenues necessary to permit them to effectively discharge their responsibilities and to provide the services expected of them by the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE ADEQUATE OIL SUPPLIES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In the wake of reliable reports that there are to be substantial cutbacks in imports of crude oil and that Imperial Oil will be reducing supplies to the east coast refineries by 25 per cent, and having regard to assurances given in the House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the situation is under control, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether cutbacks in imports of foreign crude have occurred or are likely to occur? In any event, what action has been taken by the government to ensure that there are adequate oil supplies?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I regret I must advise the hon. member that I am not Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, nor am I his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Crosby: May I, then, ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he and his hon. friends are sufficiently organized over there to answer the question either through the acting minister or some other minister? I directed a question to the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, but if he is unable to answer perhaps he could suggest another member of the ministry who might be able to answer.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I shall raise a question of privilege on this at three o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources clearly indicated in the last few days what our various plans of action are to remedy our import difficulties, and more specifically the plan for oil swaps with the United States. That plan is being applied.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: I will direct my supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary. I appreciate that plans have been outlined, but I am asking whether there have been cutbacks and, if so, what is the extent of those cutbacks? Are there likely to be cutbacks in delivery of foreign crude oil to east coast refineries in the near future?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give the hon. member exact figures. Still, I can tell him that the negotiations are going on, the situation is being monitored and the plan is being applied.

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): I should like an assurance, preferably from the Deputy Prime Minister, if not from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that this announced reduction of between 25 per cent and 30 per cent in crude oil being imported by Imperial Oil into Nova Scotia and Quebec is, in fact, being made up from other sources.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give that assurance to the hon. member. I shall obtain the information requested and the minister can give it to him tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Nobody over there is able to give any assurance. I should like to ask who is responsible in the government for making certain that Nova Scotians and other Canadians will receive a fair allocation when oil imports are cut back by a multinational corporation like Exxon. Is anybody over there accepting responsibility for this?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, as I just said and as the minister already indicated the department is closely monitoring the situation and we are sure that there will not be any shortage of crude oil for the Canadian people.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, in New York, the Minister of Finance indicated that the Government of Canada might be prepared to increase its commitment for sales of natural gas to the United States following the significant gas discovery at Elmworth, Alberta.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House if the Minister of Finance was stating government policy in New York? In short, is the government prepared to increase exports of natural gas to the United States on anything other than an emergency basis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that would depend on the report to be made by the National Energy Board. As the hon. member knows, it is the policy of the government to export only that which is surplus to present and foreseeable Canadian needs. Once we have a report on that from the National Energy Board, we will be able to make a policy decision. However, we have in the past and will in the future have a policy to export what is surplus to our needs, particularly if it is needed by our American friends.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, quite apart from what the National Energy Board might conclude after the hearings it has to have on this subject, and after its meditation, I would like to obtain a specific commitment from the government.

Is the Prime Minister aware that the amount of resources leaving Canada in raw form increased from 15 per cent in 1951 to 49 per cent in 1977, representing a net loss, if we had been processing those resources here, of thousands of jobs; and, if so, will he agree that quite independent of what the NEB recommends, the Government of Canada should not agree to increase our exports of natural gas to the United States but should, instead, at long last establish a policy which will maintain that natural resource here and develop a secondary petrochemical industry based solidly on it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member goes back some years to show a statistical trend. I remind him that the premiers of Saskatchewan and Alberta were in the city toward the beginning of this decade, begging the federal government to help them export to the United States, which we did. So, naturally, those figures have to be viewed in the historic context of the premiers of those western provinces wanting to export.

We now have a different view of the energy picture following the OPEC crisis, but our basic policy remains the same: we do not export energy unless it is surplus and in excess of Canada's present and future needs. This policy is established by a quasi-judicial body, the National Energy Board, whose report we await.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that, by definition, surplus is arbitrary in nature. It used to refer to a 25-year period. It may or may not have included reference to the establishment of a petrochemical industry in this country. According to my definition of surplus, we do not have natural gas to export if we take the view that we should be keeping it at home for the development of secondary industry.

Would the Prime Minister agree that we should use any so-called surplus either for the establishment of a petrochemical industry here in Canada or for the rapid replacement of oil on the east coast with gas, so that we can have an assured supply of energy for Canadians living in that part of our country—but not export it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, by referring to the transmission of gas to eastern Canada, I am happy to see that the New Democratic Party is espousing a policy which is promoted by my party, the building of an Atlantic and Quebec pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says he does not accept the idea that there is a surplus, and he says that therefore we should not export. That is our policy, too. If there is no surplus, we will not export. But whether there is a surplus or not will be determined by the National Energy Board. If the hon. member's hypothesis that there is no surplus is correct, then there will be no exports. But if there is a surplus, we will consider what we will do with it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES PREVENTING CANADIANS WITH CRIMINAL RECORD STAYING IN UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A few days ago, I asked him this question, and he told me he would take it as notice and he would answer later. My question was as follows: on January 1, 1979, an agreement was concluded between Canada and the United States whereby any Canadian who has a police record, no matter how trivial or how old, is forbidden to enter the United States unless he obtains a special authorization certificate. Can the minister substantiate this agreement with the United States and is it a one way agreement or does the same apply to an American citizen who wants to come to Canada?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have by now a written response to that question. I regret the fact he has not got it. I suggest it is too complex a matter to describe orally, but if it is not in his hands by later this afternoon, I will look into it personally.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer, but to clarify the situation further can he tell us whether he intends, if it exists, to re-evaluate that situation which has been going on for long enough with regard to Canadian citizens who want to go to the United States?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is basing his question on an incident which I think occurred in the last few months, it is being looked into and evaluated now and I will be glad to include that in my response to him.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

EXAMINATION OF ESTIMATES BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board, but he is not here. He is never on time. I see the Deputy Prime Minister is not here and he cannot answer any questions. So if I may, Your Honour, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. It comes as a result of the very serious condemnation—

An hon. Member: Where is your leader?

Mr. Alexander: —uttered by the Auditor General when he indicated that as a result of the spending information he now gets, it is really a big gamble for him to certify at the end of the year that the government really spent what it said it would.

I put it to the Prime Minister in this way: this is a crisis situation; it is a matter of chaos. I would like to know what immediate steps the government is planning to take in order to rectify this serious situation which is embarrassing not only to the Canadian people but, more important, to the watchdog of the public purse.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was very ungracious of the hon. member to mention the absence of the Deputy Prime Minister—he was in his seat a moment ago and had to leave the chamber on House business and will be back in a few minutes—particularly when so many members from the Conservative front bench are absent, including the hon. member's own leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I notice that even their financial critics are away today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: All the good ones are here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Here he is.

An hon. Member: Hurrah, here is the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Alexander: There it goes again, Mr. Speaker: there is another minister who cannot answer a question, and it is the Prime Minister in this case. I tell him that the Leader of the Opposition has gone to Vancouver to one of the biggest fund-raising dinners ever held in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Let me ask the Deputy Prime Minister a question on a very serious situation, a question which I just posed to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member put the question.

Mr. Alexander: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I just do not understand what is going on there. I would like to put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister regarding the serious allegations and severe condemnation which the Auditor General put before the Canadian people yesterday when he indicated that as a result of the spending information he now gets, it is really a big gamble for him to certify at the end of the year that the government really spent what it said it would.

All I am asking the Deputy Prime Minister to do is tell us what steps the government is thinking about taking in order to bring some order out of the chaos and minimize the embarrassment which the watchdog of the public purse is now experiencing.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Now the Deputy Prime Minister will not answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to the second part of the question, the very subject mentioned by the hon. member is now being discussed in front of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

In so far as the first part of the question is concerned, I can tell the hon. member that I agree with him: I am sure that if the Leader of the Opposition's trip is like any of his recent ones, it will be a "fun" dinner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who wrote that for you?

RESPONSIBILITY OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL IN FORM OF GOVERNMENT ESTIMATES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question might also be put to the President of the Treasury Board, whom I saw in the restaurant at lunch, but in view of his absence I will address it to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the Auditor General reiterated the absolutely vital importance he attaches to having the Comptroller General responsible for the form of the estimates—the kind of information that is presented to parliament and to the public. This is absolutely essential if he is to restore some semblance of financial management control to the government's profligate spending program.

• (1430)

My question to the Prime Minister is this. On behalf of his minister, will the Prime Minister instruct the President of the Treasury Board that the Comptroller General indeed is to have responsibility for all facets of financial management control in accordance with the type of commitments made by the previous president of the treasury board, the current President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, who stayed for only part of the meeting yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lefebvre: —the Auditor General also said in committee that he is quite happy with the arrangement which has been made, with the trio set up within the Treasury Board secretariat, including the Comptroller General and himself, to bring forth recommendations to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which, incidentally, is being chaired by a member of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lefebvre: The Standing Committee on Public Accounts has set up a schedule of meetings on this very important subject. As the hon. member knows, we hope to bring in an interim report in the next two or three weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUNCTION OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL IN OVERSEEING GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, since the Prime Minister seems to know very little about the government's spending program.

As the parliamentary secretary is aware, the Auditor General has made it abundantly clear that he feels he will have failed if he is not able to convince the government of the absolutely vital importance of the Comptroller General being responsible for supplying the data and the kind of information necessary for parliament and the public properly to assess the government's spending plans. When will the parliamentary secretary, if he is able, commit himself to a positive response to the request of the Auditor General? If not, will he at least explain to the House why?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, again in answer to the hon. member, it is quite apparent the former president of the treasury board, who is sitting in the chamber, made a commitment to that same program. Incidentally, I should like to explain to the hon. member, who does not seem to understand, that this has been the result of a five-year study by the Auditor General of Canada—

Mr. Andre: It is about time something was done.

Mr. Lefebvre: —in conjunction with his very competent staff. Does the hon. member expect the Standing Committee on Public Accounts to make a report within four or five days on this subject after being told that it was a study which took place over a period of five years?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER POLICY OF FRANCE VIS-À-VIS CANADA WILL BE MAINTAINED DURING REFERENDUM PERIOD

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Following the visit to Canada of the Prime Minister of France, Mr. Raymond Barre, I would like to know from the right hon. Prime Minister whether in the explanation the French Prime Minister gave of the French policy about Canada and Quebec, namely a policy of non-interference and non-indifference, as well as during the private conversations he had with his French counterpart, he discussed whether that policy clearly set out by Mr. Raymond Barre will also be maintained during the referendum period?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first, no one knows when the referendum will be, so I cannot deal with that aspect of the question. But as far as the visit itself is concerned, I can say it met our expectations in every way, it was a complete success from the point of view of the Government of Canada and, I believe, the government of France. We talked a lot, of course, about economic matters, and particularly in the area of exchanges of high technology, I believe France and Canada both realized we have a lot to learn from one another. But what pleased me most during that trip was to see the French government through its Prime Minister recognize the French fact all across this country, in a preponderant way in the province of Quebec of course, but also among Francophone minorities in other provinces. Talks were held with the government of France and three provinces to get discussions going in three English provinces toward the establishment of French secondary schools for the minorities in those provinces.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CRITICISM OF PROPOSAL TO REDUCE NUMBER OF RECRUITS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice: it concerns the announcement which has been made that there will be a large reduction in the percentage of recruits for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I ask the minister what has been decided in that connection. What is the justification for this course, at a time when holdups and violent crime are so much on the increase and when the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can be so beneficial to the country as a whole?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member is perfectly aware that the Minister of Justice is not responsible for the administration of the RCMP. Consequently, his question should be put to the minister responsible for the RCMP, namely the Solicitor General.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, normally that would be a good answer; but as far as the government is concerned it does not seem to matter who is responsible, nobody has any information available for the House.

Now I will ask whoever is responsible for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, what is the reason for this course being taken at a time when violent crime is on the increase? The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, through the years from the day it was the Northwest Mounted Police to the present, have done so much to preserve Canada from crime waves.

An hon. Member: Who is the responsible minister?

An hon. Member: Oh, it is the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is a big surprise.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to reply to the right hon. member. I know he is very far away from me at most times and therefore has not been able to recognize the alacrity with which I have provided information to the House on previous occasions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I point out to the right hon. member that he is not accurate in his basic premise to the effect there has been an increase in the rate of violent crime in Canada. Quite to the contrary; both in 1977 and 1978 there was a decrease.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: There has been a decrease per 100,000 of population. There has been a slight increase in the total number but because of the increase in population, per 100,000 of population there has been a decrease. I am very pleased about that, because there is no question it is the result of some very progressive policies adopted by the government and by my predecessors.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: In terms of the right hon. member's question, I fully agree with him that the RCMP has been a very salutary force of law enforcement within the country and will continue to be so. There has been a reduction in the percentage of increase as a result of government limitations in terms of its own man-year increase and expenditures. I can assure the hon. gentleman that in most contract provinces there has been a readjustment, so there will not be a demand for an increase in the number of man-years within the RCMP.

● (1440)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if verbosity is the measure for providing information, the minister is a master in this House. I asked him what was the reduction in the number of trainees for this year. What percentage reduction is taking place? At a time like this, when crime is increasing—I am speaking of violent crime, not ordinary crime—why should we reduce the number of trainees to the extent that has been decided upon by this government, and what is the percentage of that reduction?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, again let me say that I will send the hon. gentleman the figures published recently by Statistics Canada. I am pleased that he has drawn the attention of the country to the fact that there has been a decrease in the rate of violent crime, in terms of percentage. It is true there will be a substantial decrease in terms of total hirings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How much?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, we will be hiring during the year, I believe the exact figure is 247 new recruits for the RCMP. That is a substantial decrease, I believe, in that last year the total number was in the vicinity of 500.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is false.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

PROTECTION AGAINST USE AND TRANSPORTATION OF POISONOUS CHEMICALS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State (Environment). It has been reported that 300 tons of arsenic trioxide are being shipped by truck from St. Pierre, Manitoba, to Cobalt, Ontario, where it is reported it is to be used in a water process to produce crystallized arsenic and silver.

The citizens of the Cobalt area are naturally very upset by the fact that the Manitoba government is paying part of the shipping charges to dump this arsenic in their community and that the process may contaminate the water levels and their drinking water as well as the lakes and rivers in that area.

What steps can the department take to ensure that the transportation and processing of the arsenic trioxide, a deadly poison, will not endanger the lives and the environment of the community, as well as being a potential disaster during interprovincial transportation?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the disposal of this arsenic trioxide is really the responsibility of the government of Manitoba. Certain of our officials have been working with them in an advisory capacity only, so I do not know all the details as to how things are being carried out by the Manitoba government.

I would be very happy to look into the situation, but I have been assured by my officials that the methods used by the Manitoba government to dispose of this arsenic trioxide will be safe.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, they are favourable to Manitoba because it is being dumped in Ontario. We have always had some arsenic there, but we do not need any more. I should like to ask the minister whether a permit has been obtained to move this large tonnage of arsenic by highway, and what safeguards have been demanded by his department in issuing a permit for this interprovincial shipment?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will look into that. I should remind the hon. member that the Department of Transport has a measure which was introduced not too long ago, which hopefully will be passed by the next parliament, dealing with hazardous products. We have been concerned for some time—

An hon. Member: Bring it on today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We will pass it now.

Mr. Marchand: You would not pass it today, don't give me that kind of bull. We would be happy to bring it on today. I am sure my colleague would be happy to bring it in, if you want to pass it now.

An hon. Member: Through all stages.

Mr. Marchand: Yes, all stages, right now. The bill is ready to go.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand: We could pass it now.

An hon. Member: Bring it in now.

Mr. Marchand: I think it is a very good bill that will deal very specifically with the transportation of hazardous products.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

METHOD OF DEALING WITH LOSSES INCURRED AT MIRABEL AND PICKERING AIRPORTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Considering that the government has plans to write off some $655 million arising primarily from losses incurred at Mirabel and Pickering and, further, that it will incorporate some additional 19 airports into the airport revolving fund—which will have the tendency of hiding the operations of white elephants—and, further, that it is the intention to transform present airport taxes into higher user fees which will, in the process, have a tendency—if it is not the fact—to circumvent parliamentary control, will the minister reconsider this action, particularly in view of the Auditor General's recent comments? Will the minister reconsider this matter and revoke this plan, since it will certainly undermine and further erode parliamentary authority over the public purse?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that this is not a case of writing these funds off. I gather there is a change in interest rate being effected, but this does not involve, as the hon. member alleges or suggests, a writing-off of the funds.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I see the minister conferring with his colleague, the Minister of Transport. It is obvious he has not looked into this.

In view of the fact that the plan to convert the airport tax to a user fee has the potential of creating a significant fund of money, resulting in a $100 million annual slush fund which would be completely beyond the ability of parliament to control and which could be used by the government in further misadventures like Pickering and Mirabel, does the minister not consider this to be totally contrary to the traditions of parliament and the pleas of the Auditor General?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of whether to collect certain amounts of money by way of airport tax, as well as having things like landing fees and other charges, is something which we propose to discuss further with the airlines. Indeed, some of the key people in Canadian airlines have indicated a probable preference for that course of action.

Hon. members should appreciate that this is, in fact, a price for particular services being provided. If a different arrangement, such as having airports as private or Crown corporations, were in place, this sort of charge would ordinarily be negotiated, in terms of the benefits being provided, as an appropriate cost; so there is nothing very exceptional about that procedure.

GOVERNMENT EXPENSES RELATED TO MIRABEL AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR COMPLETE REPORT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the President of Privy Council. In view of the fact that one of my main functions in the House of Commons consists in scrutinizing government expenses and that the Auditor General said yesterday in committee of the House that his office, and I quote:

> . . . could not do its work adequately because reports on government expenses were inaccurate and incomplete.

As the hon. member could see a while ago I cannot even scrutinize, for example, the construction expenses related to Mirabel airport, I would like to know from the minister what immediate steps he intends to take to settle that problem which is very serious for us opposition members?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned by the problem raised by the hon. member and, as my colleague has indicated a few minutes ago to the hon. member for Calgary, it is a matter which the Auditor General as well as the Comptroller General and the President of the Treasury Board have discussed deeply, and I hope to be able to indicate next week what steps we are going to take as a government in relation with budget estimates.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

The Auditor General complained about the fact—and this is hard to believe—that half of the funds administered by the federal government do not appear in the budgetary estimates. I would like to know if the government will soon publish estimates that can be understood by members of the opposition and by average citizens so that the elected representatives of the people can examine government expenditures. I am not talking about the studies. I am asking the minister what specific and immediate action we can expect on the part of the government to correct this situation.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, there is no truth in all this. Indeed, all the details are in the blue book and all the information is available to hon. members. The only thing is that the approval of the House is not required for transfer payments because approval is provided in the appropriate statutes. The figures are available to all members of the House, but what is at issue is the question of approval because the government has already received approval for these transfer payments under the legislation passed by parliament.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORTED CUTBACK IN FUNDS FOR LANGUAGE TRAINING

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. I advised him this morning of reports circulating in Montreal to the effect that the federal government is cutting back on aid to education funds, particularly second language funds, in the province of Quebec. I referred to the article which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette.

I would ask the Secretary of State to confirm to the House, first, that the report is wrong and, second, that contrary to the statements made by the Parti Québécois minister of education, the federal government is not cutting back but is, in fact, continuing to make funds available but on the basis of accountability. In other words, the fact is that we are demanding—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It sounds as though the hon. member is trying to answer the question at the same time as asking it.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for protecting my right to answer. It is true that in the proposals we have made to the provinces, we are prepared to permit more funds for the duration of the next five-year agreement than were utilized in the past five years. In fact, we have made a commitment as a floor to the expenditure of over $850 million in comparison with $1 billion back in 1970.

The dispute, or the point of contention, between the provinces and the federal government is not basically over amounts of money but over the question of whether there will be true accountability, not to the federal government, but to the citizens of the provinces and the citizens of Canada, to ensure that those funds transferred to the provinces are directed to the expansion of second language and minority education in this country or to extra costs which may flow from providing services in education in both languages in the provinces.

Any attempt to use the proposals of the federal government as some excuse for withdrawing existing educational services would be just that, an excuse, and I might say it would be a form of intellectual terrorism.

TRADE

OWNERSHIP OF SHIPPING ENGAGED IN EXPORT TRADE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which arises from his trade negotiations and recent talks with the Chinese and Mexicans, particularly in the area of bulk cargoes such as grains and oils.

In these conversations, did the minister raise the matter of the usefulness, particularly to Canada, of cross-trading or using Canadian carriers in these bulk trades and, if so, with what result?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in my talks with the Chinese, the question of in whose ships the goods would move was not raised. Of course, in the past China has gone out on the market and hired ships to move Canadian grain. I suppose it was expected they would do that in the future.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I apologize if this is a representation, so I will put it in the form of a question to the minister. In future negotiations, would he keep in mind the benefit to Canadian carriers who have demonstrated expertise with bulk carriers in hauling some of our own resources in and out of this country?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am a strong proponent of creating as much Canadian content in our exports as possible and that would mean in any case, where it is possible, to move it by Canadian ships if there are Canadian ships.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NAME OF INDEPENDENT AUDITORS EMPLOYED TO AUDIT PENSION FUND ACCOUNT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport? On May 4, 1978, the minister accepted a motion that I made to appoint a firm of independent auditors to audit the CNR pension fund. Could the minister now name the firm doing the independent audit and tell the House when they will be presenting their first report to parliament?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check on the progress being made.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question. Due to the low pensions being paid by the CNR, and the small increases, will the minister make, or has he made, representations to the president of the CNR to make some kind of cost of living adjustment to CNR pensions for the coming year?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to depart from the long-standing policy of treating this as a matter which is discussed by other parties and not by us in the House.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ACTION BY GOVERNMENT ON RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING SECTOR BARGAINING

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Labour? In view of the fact that the loss of man-days resulting from strikes and walk-outs more than doubled in the first ten months of 1978 compared to 1977—in fact, there was an increase from 2.7 million man-days lost, to 6.4 million man-days lost in the first ten months last year—and because a great number of these strikes are a direct result of the fragmentation of union power, could the minister explain when he intends to act or why he has not acted on the many recommendations dealing with sector bargaining, the most recent being the Bairstow report?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to express my gratitude, and I think that of my predecessor, for the good work done by the Bairstow commission. I have invited the parties involved in the two industries mentioned in the Bairstow report, the air transportation industry and the grain handling industry, to meet with me soon to discuss an appropriate approach to the recommendations of that commission. I am waiting for their response to my invitation so that we can discuss those recommendations.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Surely the minister knows that there were many reports dealing with the subject prior to the Bairstow report. There was the Finkelman report, which was a confidential document, with the same suggestion; so this has been in the works for years and years but strikes continue to increase at an unprecedented rate. I wonder when this government will finally stop studying reports on top of reports and take some steps—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

TRANSPORT

SUBSIDY FOR FARM TRUCKING OF GRAIN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. The report of the Prairie Rail Action Committee made two fairly specific recommendations, one being a government subsidy for farm trucking of grain which would amount to approximately one cent per bushel per mile on anything over 20 miles, and the other for federal government assistance to municipalities where upgrading of rural roads is required.

What has the federal government done about these two recommendations which were put forward one or two months ago?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been analysing the implications of these recommendations. I have, personally, been discussing them with farmers and farmers' representatives in order to gauge their reaction, particularly in the context of several of the recommendations of the Prairie Rail Action Committee that these be substitutes for retaining certain lines. The analysis is being completed. I will soon be discussing with my colleagues the appropriate approach to be taken.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The federal government's assistance to municipalities where upgrading of rural roads is concerned is possibly a positive recommendation. Does the minister agree with the other recommendation, that government subsidies for farm trucking of grain taken, as an arbitrary figure, anything over 20 miles, is really fair to the farming community? What specific changes is he considering in that particular recommendation?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think there are recognized difficulties with the proposal, in light of the fact that certain farmers have for several years, or for a long time hauled their grain distances greater than that. I think the context of the Prairie Rail Action Committee recommendation is that these farmers now being affected are having something new suddenly created for them and imposed upon them.

● (1500)

The Prairie Rail Action Committee was guided generally by the principle of not allowing hauling distances to increase beyond 20 miles and their decision on which lines to abandon. It is in that context that this program would have to be reviewed. I would appreciate the hon. member's further opinion after reflecting on that answer.

FISHERIES

QUOTAS FOR CAPELIN—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the minister is aware of the importance of capelin stocks to the cod fishery on the east coast and, as such, he will be aware of the serious overfishing of capelin that has taken place over the last couple of years. Can he explain to the House why he did not follow his own scientists' advice to lower last year's capelin quotas?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member got the impression about this year's quotas. I know that the whole issue of the capelin fisheries is the subject of an international meeting of scientists which if my memory is accurate, is taking place in Tokyo right now.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, I know the minister is aware of the situation that along sections of the southeast coast of Newfoundland there was no capelin run last year and the inshore fisheries sufferred as a result. I know he is aware that the overfishing has been done mainly by foreign seiners along the Grand Bank and Hamilton Bank.

Will the minister assure the House and the Newfoundland fishermen who were seriously hurt last year that foreign seining of capelin will be curtailed on the Grand Bank and Hamilton Bank, and that proper management measures will come out of the meeting in Tokyo and the government will take serious measures to support the cod fishery in this way?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the problem is as simple as the hon. member has indicated. I am sure he did not want to mislead the House. The fact is that capelin stocks have been fished much, much less than they have been over the past decade. The problem of the past year is one which the scientists have not yet fully explained. However, I tell the hon. member and the House that if required for conservation reasons, we will do what we did this year, that is, interrupt the fishery before the quota has been taken, and bring it to an end.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKINNON—VARIANCE IN ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is one of privilege. It affects all hon. members, but most particularly members of the opposition in that they ask more questions in the House than members opposite.

This question of privilege relates to an answer given to me by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) with supporting evidence given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and another answer which I received to a written question. The variance between the answers is such that it is quite apparent one or another of the answers is false.

To get to the evidence, Mr. Speaker, I received an answer to written question No. 649 from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) or his representative. The question reads:

Did Chancellor Schmidt personally or some of the other bidders ask for a few more months beyond the August 1 deadline to improve their bids on the new fighter aircraft contract, and, if so, which companies submitted additional proposals after August 1?

The answer to that question reads:

I am informed by the Department of External Affairs and National Defence as follows: No.

So the written reply was, "No, Chancellor Schmidt did not ask for an extension nor did any of the other companies." When I saw that answer I set about the necessary research to find written documentation of the opposite approach. May I now present two conflicting pieces of evidence, one from a press conference and one from Hansard.

First I quote from a transcript of the Prime Minister's press conference dated November 14, 1978 held in Ottawa. Mr. Jack Best asked a question of the Prime Minister concerning the new fighter aircraft and wanted to know, in view of the postponement of the contract process, how firm and total the government's commitment was to purchase. The Prime Minister answered as follows:

Completely firm and total. If there has been a slippage, it has been at the demand of those who are making bids. When I saw Chancellor Schmidt this summer, he had heard about our inclination to reduce the, I think, seven options to a smaller number and he personally, but this is true of some of the other bidders, asked for a few more months so that they could improve their bids. And, the Department of Defence in agreement with the government just felt that if the bids could be improved even in terms of off-sets to Canada, in terms of the number of planes which could be purchased for a given amount of money or in terms of their efficiency in the performance of certain tasks we would willingly give them a few more months.

As can be seen this is a direct contradiction of the written answer I have received. One must be false. Incidentally, the Prime Minister and Chancellor Schmidt conferred on July 16 and 17, 1978.

In the event a transcript is not enough evidence, I wish to draw Your Honour's attention to page 867 of Hansard dated November 7, 1978, where the Minister of National Defence, in answer to a question put by me concerning the new fighter aircraft, said:

As hon. members know, the vendors asked for additional time to submit, we have given them that additional time to submit—

Further along in his statement the minister said:

—if I may state the status now; there has been a deferment to give the vendors an opportunity to resubmit.

So the Prime Minister said yes, the companies, and Chancellor Schmidt personally, had asked for additional time. The Minister of Defence stated yes in the House of Commons.

Now in the House of Commons I have been informed that the answer is no. It is not easy, Mr. Speaker, to determine in this case who is responsible for the falsehood, but certainly there has been a falsehood, and it is my understanding that that means my privilege in this House, and indeed the privileges of all members, have been abused.

The precedent in a case such as this is fairly clear. The nineteenth edition of May's Parliamentary Practice states at page 141:

It is a breach of privilege to present or cause to be presented to either House or to committees of either House, forged, falsified or fabricated documents with intent to deceive such House or committees or to subscribe the names of other persons or fictious names to documents intended to be presented to either House or to be privy to or cognizant of, such forgery or fraud.

I might say that the Chair used this citation in reaching a decision in the case raised before Christmas by my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), which confirmed that provision of false information to a member of parliament can be an infringement on his ability to carry out his duties. The reply to my question, signed by the parliamentary secretary, was obviously and demonstrably false, unless the statement by the Prime Minister at his press conference and the statement by the Minister of Defence at page 867 of Hansard were themselves fabrication.

It is difficult to believe that neither the Department of External Affairs nor the Department of National Defence was not aware of requests from bidders about which both the Prime Minister and Minister of Defence appeared to be completely knowledgeable. I wonder, therefore, what kind of process these written questions go through. Perhaps this answer I received reflects an attempt to mislead me by directly contradicting other information given publicly. Perhaps it reflects the incompetence of those providing the answers, or the impossibility of providing factual replies consistent with those given in the House. In this respect I would ask you to note the brevity of the reply.

We all realize that the government does not have to provide an answer to written questions, but if it does reply surely there is an obligation to make an honest effort to avoid deceptive or completely untrue responses.

In the ruling of December 6, the Chair asked:

Does that lead us to the conclusion that, by virtue of an act or omission, the House, or a member, has directly or indirectly been impeded in the performance of its functions or his duty, or that there has been a tendency to produce such a result? If I so find, then I really have no choice but to find, prima facie, that a contempt has been committed.

I believe in this case, sir, my attempts to follow up and ask questions about the fighter acquisition program have been impeded by the untruthful reply to one of my questions.

If you find I have a prima facie case of privilege, I would move:

That the reply to written question 648, containing an assertion demonstrably at variance with the facts as stated by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I could not quite follow the logic of the hon. member's remarks, but that is not unique.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): For you.

Mr. Danson: I tried to follow the sequence of what he was endeavouring to say. Obviously there is no intention to mislead on a fairly straightforward question. I had hoped that since the Christmas recess he would have been asking questions about defence matters, but apparently he has been concentrating on this important point of privilege. Therefore, I would like to take notice of this question and go through the record because it is difficult to follow the written questions on the order paper and the answers given in the House by myself and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Certainly there is no intention to be misleading. We have been as straightforward as one possibly can be on this entire program. I only want to clear up the matter to the satisfaction of the Chair, and possibly some day to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: It is certainly not unexpected that the minister would want some time to examine the matter, to examine the transcripts and deliver his contribution on this question, which is obviously a very important one, at a later date. The matter will stand in abeyance to give the minister an opportunity to do that.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. PETERS—SECOND READING OF BILL C-17

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the question period the minister of the environment indicated that he was willing to proceed with second reading of Bill C-17 to provide a guarantee of safety to the residents of northern Ontario against the shipment of arsenic into that area. I have discussed this with my House leader who has agreed that we will give second reading to the bill without debate in order that it can go to committee and this protection will be available for the people of Cobalt. The members of the Conservative party are very interested in this matter and I am sure they will give second reading to the bill so that the people of Cobalt can be protected against this very deadly and toxic material.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I welcome the suggestion from the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). I would ordinarily have given a speech on second reading of this bill. However, I can make my remarks at the committee. As well, this bill represents a very high degree of co-operation with the provinces. It is one they would welcome. We have had discussions with them on the regulations. This is an extremely good example of federal-provincial co-operation on a very important matter. If the Conservatives and the other parties join in agreement to pass this bill forthwith, we can deal with it effectively in committee and do a great deal of good for the country.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to reply with regard to the bill, but as a member of this House I find it somewhat difficult to see this kind of procedure take place on the basis of information that was given by the minister which simply is not in total keeping with what has transpired.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have a point of order raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). He is making a suggestion regarding the passage of a bill. There is no vehicle by which we can debate the matter and disagree. If the House is of a disposition to take the bill through all stages when we get to orders of the day, I will be glad to follow the direction of the House and call it. If there is no agreement to do it at that time under the conditions then set forward, and if the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) wants to disagree with any statements made during the course of the debate, he is not in any way constrained from doing so. All I can do is determine whether there is agreement to take it. When we come to orders of the day, I will be glad to examine in order to see if there is consent to deal with it in that way.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I feel bound to indicate that this is a matter that we will certainly take under consideration in a most positive way.

While I am on my feet, and since we are dealing with House business, there is a matter with regard to the National Transportation Act which has been on the order paper for some time. I wonder if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) could now indicate whether he is prepared to arrange to refer the subject matter of that statute to a committee where it could be discussed. It is a matter we have been requesting for a considerable period of time. It could be quite helpful.

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR VICTORIA

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, in introducing his question of privilege the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) stated that the question he was raising affected more the members of the opposition than members on this side of the House because the members of the opposition asked more questions. He left a clear impression that members of the opposition carry out their tasks more diligently than members on this side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): He did not explain that the very nature of the question period makes it possible for many more members of the opposition to be recognized than members of the government backbenches. That should be on the record.

MR. EPP—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND THE ENVIRONMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order in the sense that information can be given to the House in the course of the question period which reduces or removes the freedom of individual members because the information given is simply not correct. That happened again today when the minister of the environment indicated that there was a provincial responsibility to move the arsenic from St. Pierre, Manitoba.

I would like to point out to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that originally those 300 tons came from northern Ontario, his area of the province. The fact is the arsenic that is there was deregulated by this government. Promises were made by members of this government to remove that arsenic. Those promises have not been lived up to. This minister has not lived up to his obligations. He now says it is a provincial responsibility.

What is the vehicle that an individual member can use to get at one member of the cabinet who makes some statements which are totally denied by another member of the cabinet? Here we sit as members of the opposition. We cannot bring this government to task. They take the privilege and the opportunity to say whatever suits them at any given time and in any circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order. The hon. member will recognize at once that he has a disagreement with or some kind of a criticism of what has been said. It does not constitute a point of order. If he dislikes the quality of answers given or remarks made during the question period, he knows there must be some procedural basis other than simply the occasion to disagree and criticize. There must be some procedural basis of an attempt, as he would have to allege, to mislead the House.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) raised a question of privilege which at least in its general terms raises a question of sorts which he has identified and put that to the House to see whether or not, once a contribution has been made from the other side, a question of privilege exists. Certainly it does not exist either in privilege or in order to complain about the quality of answers given in any question period. That is well known. I cannot receive other commentary on that.

MRS. HOLT—STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR VICTORIA

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I feel there was a misleading representation made in this House that maligns my reputation in the west. It was made by a western member. My reputation in the House has been damaged. It indicates that I am not acting, questioning, and challenging my own ministers on issues—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to identify the representation to which she is referring.

Mrs. Holt: The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) said in this House that the opposition asks more questions than we do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The fact is that very much by deliberate design and by constant practice opposition members do ask more questions. The House knows at once that that statement, whether or not members may wish to take it up and explain it, is not an inaccurate statement. It is not in any way out of order. There is no procedural basis upon which I can now entertain disagreement or an attempt to take issue with that statement as though it were a procedural point.

MR. MACKAY—GUIDANCE SOUGHT FROM CHAIR

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am seeking your guidance as a result of a remark that you made in the course of this deliberation on the point of order or non-point of order. It is simply this. If I understood the Chair correctly, you indicated that there really is no basic amount of information required in an answer from the other side. It is on this that I seek your guidance. If you will bear with me for a moment, I raise this not in a quarrelsome way but as a matter of seeking information.

Mrs. Holt: Don't bear with him, Mr. Speaker, if you can't bear with us.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I will resist the temptation to say that some people are easier to bear than others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I do not want to take very much of the time of the House. My point is simply this. Your Honour was dealing with the quality or content of written questions. In the late show the other evening, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) was asking a question about the bill to be sent to the Soviet Union for the cost of the clean-up. In return, he received an answer that had nothing to do with that. I had an expression—

Some hon. Members: Order.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have made my disposition and I suggest the hon. member ought to investigate the facts and the background of the matter he is now raising before he takes it any further.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO EXEMPT CERTAIN PRACTICES FROM PROVISIONS OF COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved first reading of Bill S-6 (from the Senate) to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The other day the House unanimously passed a motion to concur in the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to expand the committee's terms of reference so as to enable the reconstitution of the subcommittee on penitentiaries in order that the maximum security institutions of this country might be revisited. Now that the government has had an opportunity of studying that motion and that report, can the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) give the House any indication when a motion will be brought before the House to give effect to that reference?

Mr. MacEachen: I shall need to have a word with the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) as to what the next step ought to be, and I will take the hon. member's representations into account.

Mr. Foster: Would the House leader consider referring, "The Management of Canada's Nuclear Waste" to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works? There have been some discussions around the House in this connection, and a number of members on the other side would like to see this reference made. I wonder whether there would be unanimity about having it referred. If that is the case I should like to see the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) introduce the appropriate motion because a lot of work has been done by the standing committee and, if the reference were made, the work could go forward.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have not had an opportunity of discussing this matter with the government House leader. Perhaps he and I might be given an opportunity to consider it together. I am aware of the representations which have been made. Some discussions have been carried on with members of my caucus, and I would expect that if the government House leader is interested in taking the matter up with me I would be very pleased to talk to him about it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should be happy to join in this conversation. I might say I would do so as one who favours the idea of sending this matter to the committee as quickly as possible.

Mr. MacEachen: Having been so warmly invited to meet with my colleagues I shall be happy to arrange a meeting, probably tomorrow, with a view to dealing with this item and a number of other items which have been raised today in this House, as well as items which are on my own mind in connection with the business of the House.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr.

IMMIGRATION PROGRAM IN VIETNAM

Question No. 523—Mr. Epp:

1. Has Canada established a Consular mission in Vietnam and (a) if so, are immigration officials attached to the office (b) if not, in what manner and in which locations are interviews for immigration purposes conducted?

2. How many applications for Vietnam were (a) received (b) approved in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976 (iii) 1977?

3. What was the number of applications approved under terms of family reunification and how many were accepted as refugees?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. (a) No.

(b) Arrangements for interviews are made through the Hong Kong office; some are processed in Singapore or Seoul and a large number have been processed in the U.S.A. Negotiations are currently being conducted with the authorities in Hanoi with a view to establishing an immigration program in Vietnam. These negotiations have been ongoing over the past two years and it is expected that an agreement could soon be reached whereby immigration examinations may be conducted in Ho Chi Minh Ville (Saigon) and in Hanoi.

(a)	(i)	5,627	(b)	(i)	2,993
	(ii)	425		(ii)	2,184
	(iii)	250		(iii)	530
				Total	5,707	admitted under the special movement as refugees

Although we received 5,627 applications in 1975, not all of them were approved that same year. This is why the totals in 2(b)(iii) are higher than those in 2(a)(ii) and (iii).

BILL C-12

Question No. 556—Mr. McCrossan:

1. Did the government undertake an actuarial valuation of the combined Public Service Superannuation Account and Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account on the basis of the amendments proposed in Bill C-12, An Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, using either the actuarial assumptions used by Tomenson-Alexander or other appropriate actuarial assumptions and, if so, what is the estimated amount of indexing that will be available for the (a) Public Service (b) Canadian Armed Forces (c) RCMP in the three year period 1979-81 and in subsequent three year periods up to the year 2030?

2. If the Tomenson-Alexander actuarial assumptions were not used, what actuarial assumptions were used?

3. Over the same period, what is the expected annual increase in the cost to the government with respect to the Public Service Superannuation Account resulting from the proposal in Bill C-12 to transfer excess interest on the retired employees share of the Public Service Superannuation Account to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account?

4. Will the interest credited to the retired employees share of the Public Service Superannuation Account continue to be based solely on government securities or will it be based on a fairer interest market reflecting investment opportunities available in the market?

5. Has the government considered investing part of the assets of the Public Service Superannuation Account and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account in non-government securities because of concern over phantom funding of government insurance plans and, if so, what portion of the funds is the government considering investing?

6. For each year 1972-77, what was the average age of retirement under the Public Service Superannuation Act and how does this average vary by annual salary level at retirement using the salary categories (a) $0 to $10,000 (b) $10,001 to $20,000 (c) $20,001 to $30,000 (d) $30,001 to $40,000 (e) $40,001 and over?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): 1. No. The basic change to the indexing portion of the program being proposed by Bill C-12 is to remove the currently automatic guarantee of full indexing of pensions to the consumer price index with a system whereby indexing would be limited to the amount of funds available for that purpose; namely the pensioners' share of excess interest earned by the public service superannuation account along with the contributions made by and on behalf of pensioners to the supplementary retirement benefits account. In this way, instead of the funds required depending on the level of benefits, the level of benefits would depend on the funds available for indexing.

In effect the supplementary retirement benefits plan is being converted from a defined benefit to a money purchase type of program. The actuarial implications of the bill for the Public Service, Canadian Forces and RCMP superannuation accounts would be reflected in the regular actuarial valuations the department of insurance is required to make of these accounts.

2. See No. 1.

3. The over-all effect of Bill C-12 would be to reduce the combined government budgetary requirements for the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. Current estimates indicate that the long-term effects of Bill C-12 would likely increase annual budgetary requirements for the Public Service Superannuation Act by 2.5—3.5 per cent of payroll and decrease budgetary requirements for the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act by a greater amount. More precise estimates of the effect on budgetary requirements would be determined by the department of insurance in their regular valuations of the public service superannuation account.

4 and 5. Operations of the public service superannuation account with regard to the interest earnings and investment media are governed by statute and any proposals to alter the current arrangements would require legislative action and would be announced in the normal manner.

6. The average age of retirement of contributors under the Public Service Superannuation Act from 1972 to 1977 was as follows:

	Final Salary
	$0-10,000,	$10,001-20,000,	$20,001-30,000,	$30,001-40,000,	over $40,000,	Overall Average
1972	63.18	62.3	62.44	62.43	66.21	62.93
1973	63.06	62.07	61.79	62.09	64.59	62.66
1974	63.05	61.79	61.10	61.74	60.34	62.33
1975	63.30	62.02	61.13	60.66	60.93	62.24
1976	63.33	62.03	60.93	61.14	62.36	62.05

ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—N.B.

Question No. 722—Mr. Howie:

1. Were applications received for financial assistance under the Enterprise Development Programme of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce from the Province of New Brunswick and, if so, how many (a) for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978 (b) from April 1 to December 1, 1978?

2. How many of the applications were approved and what was the total dollar value?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Applications for assistance under the EDP are received through the programs branch of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the IT&C regional offices across Canada as well as the individual branches of the department. Due to the wide dispersement of applications it is not possible to determine the number of applications received in a particular province.

2. During fiscal 1977/78, two applications were approved from the province of New Brunswick for a total dollar value of $55,132. From April 1978, to December 1, 1978, four applications were approved from the province of New Brunswick for a total dollar value of $71,000.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—COMMUNITY COURSES IN FREDERICTON

Question No. 726—Mr. Howie:

Were any community courses funded in Fredericton, New Brunswick by the Department of Employment and Immigration since January 1, 1978 and, if so, what were they and what was the extent of the funding?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): There were 46 full-time institutional occupational training courses purchased under the Canada Manpower Training Program between January 1, 1978 and October 31, 1978 in Fredericton, New Brunswick. Attached is a list of the courses and their corresponding purchase cost. (Total purchase costs for courses with the same name vary according to the number of trainees enrolled.) The cost of income maintenance paid to trainees is not included.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1978

MEASURE TO CHANGE RETIREMENT BENEFIT PROVISIONS

The House resumed from Monday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Buchanan that Bill C-12, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-12 not only because of its significance and importance to all of us, especially to those who have dedicated their lives to the public service, not only because I come from the metropolitan area of Dartmouth-Halifax where, next to Ottawa, we have perhaps the highest per capita share of public servants in the country, but for a particular reason. Within my constituency lies one of the largest military establishments in our country. It embraces many thousands of active members of the Canadian armed forces, as well as thousands who are living out their lives on pensions.

I enter the debate with mixed feelings. If the bill does represent a sincere and serious effort on the part of the government—and here I quote the words of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan)—"to firm up the financial underpinnings of the program to ensure we are not stirring up future trouble for taxpayers and public service pensioners" then perhaps it can be welcomed. Certainly it would be needed. There is very real concern abroad in the land with respect to the whole subject of indexation. Concern has been expressed both by the taxpayers and by the public servants.

An hon. Member: You've made it.

Mr. Forrestall: I've made it. Somebody has taken my picture. It is disturbing to see a flash bulb go off. Perhaps it is because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) is just leaving the chamber that we are celebrating by taking pictures. Anyway, the taxpayer feels that he or she will be left to pay for what has been described by some over-zealous partisans on this question as overly generous public service pensions. For his part, the public servant feels that protection against the ravages of inflation may now, or at some time in the future, be removed. As I see it, Bill C-12 was intended to dispel both these fears. Even more to the point, I believe the bill will destroy the basis upon which some of these fears have grown—the distortions which have been placed in front of us all. It strikes me that intrinsically this is what faces us.

What concerns me in any event is that the bill may merely represent another government exercise in "ad hockery" and camouflage. I am concerned because I suspect the government does not know what it is going to do about indexation and is merely trying to buy time with the legislation which is before us. It may be that information available to the government and its actuaries and senior financial advisers is such that they cannot come to a firm decision at this time. What they have done on the eve of an election is to introduce a measure and let it proceed to a certain stage in the process of its becoming law, knowing well in their hearts and minds that nothing will be done about it until after the next general election.

I have been concerned for some ten or 12 years about the relationship of the government as an employer to its employees in the public service of Canada. On questions of pay and pensions perhaps it is time that the cabinet recognized that there is no longer a need for a direct relationship between the policy-making structure, the cabinet, and the employee. Perhaps it is time we began to examine the usefulness of an extended concept of the Treasury Board which allows it such authority and stature as to make it the employer, and not this parliament.

If we look to those areas of this country where there is a concentration of public servants, for whatever reason—perhaps it is the longevity of the present government; 15 or 16 years is perhaps too long for one group of individuals to lead effectively—we find that the majority of public servants are represented by members of this side of the chamber. I do not put that forward or postulate it as too serious a matter, but it seems to me that, given present circumstances and the lateness of our parliamentary mandate, perhaps none of us, including members of the government, has any right to be meddling with the affairs of those who serve the public in this country. We should not be dealing in an ad hoc manner with amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act or any of the seven or eight acts which affect directly or indirectly the careers of the public servants of this country, certainly not in the dying months, weeks or even days of an already tired parliament. I think the public servants of this country deserve something a little better than that.

I said that I am concerned that we might be dealing with this matter on an ad hoc basis. We do not have the answers to the questions of concern to my parliamentary colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). There are literally dozens of questions with respect to this matter which need to be examined in depth. That is why my colleague said that we are prepared to let this matter go to committee where we can conduct the type of scrutiny and review which is required, and I hope that can be done today.

I have some fear about legislation which enables the government to appear to the taxpayer as if it is getting tough with the public service, and to the public service as if it is getting away with a good break. That seems to me to be the wrong way to approach the matter. Much more thought and study have to be given to the relationship between this institution and the employees of the Government of Canada. To have parliament regulating the relationship between employer and employee in the 1970s and 1980s is wrong. We cannot do it efficiently. As I have suggested, I think we should look much more seriously at the extended concept of a treasury board, not only in fact but also in appearance, assuming the responsibilities of employer. We should look seriously at removing from this chamber control over the constant ups and downs which face every member of the public service when issues of this sensitivity come before us.

I do not want to deal at any great length with the specific content of this bill as it relates to the 200,000 or 300,000 public employees in the country, but I would like to make a few comments about a segment of the public service which I think needs some special recognition. I refer to members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

I remind hon. members of the unique position of members of the Canadian armed forces in our society. It is unique in the sense that they do not enjoy the privilege of freedom with respect to their tenure. In fact most of them are forced to retire. The vast majority of them are forced into retirement at age 55. Many are forced to retire at ages even younger than that. I am talking about a particular group of public employees in the military category, the pensions of these individuals as they are affected by unique circumstances, and the relationship they have with us.

Canadian forces annuities are paid by the Department of National Defence from either the old defence services pension continuation account or the Canadian forces superannuation account, not out of the usual public service funds. The average retirement age for Canadian forces personnel is significantly lower than for public servants generally. I bring to the attention of the House again the involuntary or statutory nature of retirement from the forces of armed forces personnel.

I am aware that some form of Treasury Board-DND committee was established a few years back to make representations on matters regarding personnel compensation, including pension concerns. One cannot be certain of what real input this committee has. I hope this will be dealt with when this bill comes before the appropriate committee.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) was in the chamber earlier today. Undoubtedly he is now out about his departmental responsibilities. I hope he will participate in this debate. The minister suggested snidely that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) has been preoccupied with the question of privilege he raised this afternoon since the beginning of the year instead of asking questions about the military and the posturing of this government. I thought that to be beneath the minister and the usual attitude for parliament he displays. I thought the minister to be somewhat contemptuous. I wish he were here now so that I could say that to him. Very few have been as diligent in support of the Canadian military as has been the hon. member for Victoria.

While the minister makes comments and observations of the kind to which I referred, he does not bother to get on his feet to make a contribution on behalf of the 75,000 or 80,000 men and women in this country he represents and for whom he has a responsibility and obligation. I suggest to him, just as I would suggest to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), that if he wants to enjoy the title of deputy prime minister he should get up in the House and speak to members if for no other reason than to recognize that a member has the right to be heard and that his constituents have the right to air their grievances. His attitude is typical of the government's attitude in the dying months of this government. This afternoon, the question of the security of those retiring from the public service of Canada, and the security of oil supplies for a major oil refinery process in Atlantic Canada drew from him not even an utterance. I know he must consider the question seriously, but, being Deputy Prime Minister he should keep himself advised and he should rise in the House and participate in the debate so that we will know what is going on.

I say the same thing to the Minister of National Defence. Where is he in this debate? Perhaps in what is left of the afternoon he will join us, and I hope he does. I hope the minister will not only address himself to the concerns of those serving in the forces, but also, either here or before the committee, personally or through his parliamentary secretary, will address himself to the concerns of those who have already retired. The minister will be aware that many of these people have been what you could only call long forgotten and neglected individuals.

There are 60,000 annuitants receiving Canadian forces pensions today. My own province of Nova Scotia has more Canadian forces pensioners per capita than any other province and, indeed, only Ontario and British Columbia have more actual service pensioners than Nova Scotia. However, I am sure that all hon. members, regardless of the constituencies they represent, are familiar with some of the difficulties which these individuals face. It is interesting to note that the average pension paid to ex-servicemen is approximately $3,400 a year. Even with full indexing, I do not think anyone should fear that these people are suddenly going to be living in the lap of luxury.

I enjoy listening to my colleagues. I listened with interest to my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he voiced his concerns on this bill, and I agree with him. We should not only be talking about protection of income for public servants, the military and the RCMP; we should be talking about the extension of this principle to every Canadian, the right of these people to enjoy, as he so well stated it, not only protection against inflation but to enjoy with the rest of our society the increases in our standard of living.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: I differ with him because I think only the private sector should provide the means to do it. I do not think that the assumption by government of the means of production would in fact satisfy that. But at least at the end we are on the same track. How can a pensioner receiving $3,400 a year cope on that? That is absolute poverty, not relative poverty. If you even gave him only 10 per cent, you are only giving him $340 a year—plus $30 a month—plus $1 a day. Will that put him in the lap of luxury? God knows, the old 85 rule was a cancer on our concern for our retired forces personnel. Now they have made it even worse.

At present less than 45 per cent of Canadian forces pensions are indexed in some form. However, this percentage will almost certainly decline with the removal of the 85 rule and the gradual raising of the indexing age from 55 to 60. To a certain extent I can understand and appreciate the rationale for this change. There is no doubt that present regulations encouraged early retirement and provided opportunities for abuse, to the extent that some former well-paid public servants are able to receive indexed pensions while drawing top salaries in the private sector at a relatively young age. But it is one thing to take away the option of early retirement with indexing for those who have the choice, and it is altogether different for those in the Canadian forces who are forced to retire at an early age. For these servicemen there is no option of serving beyond the age of 55, except in the rarest of circumstances.

It will mean that some servicemen will have to go as long as 20 years on a static pension, with inflation rising as high as 10 per cent per annum during some of those years. Now we have in front of us a step being taken, ostensibly for the purpose of inducing one group of public servants to remain employed beyond the age of 55. It will have a deleterious and serious effect on the serviceman who has been waiting patiently for the increase in his pension that would normally come at age 55. Now this is denied him. It seems to me that not only has the serviceman been under a specific disadvantage but he will be under an even greater disadvantage under the provisions of this bill. Very much the same special case can be put forward for members of the RCMP.

There are those who will argue that the early retirement age of Canadian forces personnel, voluntary or not, provides them with an opportunity to add significantly to their pension income by taking on a second career. However, this is more easily said than done. The Canadian forces long serving pensioners association claims that up to 75 per cent of ex-servicemen cannot find gainful or meaningful employment once they have retired. I strongly suspect this figure is even higher today, with the general economic slowdown and the high rate of unemployment. Even in the best of circumstances there are profound difficulties for an individual attempting to start a second career at the age of 45 or 50.

I am convinced that the serviceman, like the vast majority of other public servants, in no way wants to be viewed as a drain on the taxpayers of this country. He is more than willing to pay his fair share to a financially sound pension scheme. Indeed, this is what most forces personnel assumed they were doing when they elected to pay an additional contribution toward indexing under the 85 formula. We remember the afternoon when that was sneaked through when we were ostensibly recalled to debate a railway matter, and were told that while we are here we might as well do something else. This was some years ago.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

As members of parliament we have a very strong responsibility, in dealing with this bill, to ensure that we lay a truly solid foundation which will guarantee some measure of protection for all public servants against the continually rising cost of living, but I suggest to hon. members that we have a particular responsibility to those who serve us within the parameter of a very strict and rigid discipline. We order the lives of members of the Canadian armed forces in virtually every way. We do the same with our national police force. We tell them under what circumstances they can enter, and precisely under what circumstances they will leave. We thrust, into an other than a sound economic environment, men who have unique training capabilities and capacities. We pay them an average of $3,400 or $3,500 a year in terms of pension. That is all they get on the average. It is very easy to find the exceptions, the $25,000 a year pensions in all sectors of the Canadian public service, but the average is only $3,400. As I say, we thrust them into the labour market in an unique era in our economic development when job opportunities are rare and jobs are difficult to come by, and we expect them to find gainful and meaningful employment. What do we do in the private sector with an expert on torpedoes? We have a very particular responsibility to our Canadian armed forces personnel on their retirement.

● (1550)

I am in complete disagreement with the provisions of this bill which extend indexing yet another five years to age 60. I regret the minister has seen fit to mix all of these pension matters in one omnibus bill. They should have been dealt with separately. They have unique characteristics, and we tend to downplay the importance of one or another because they are lumped together.

We welcome the opportunities which lie ahead in committee to pursue, with every bit of our energy and talent, the many, many questions before us. We welcome the opportunity to hear the concerns of all professional organizations which come before the committee. Also we welcome the opportunity to take a look at the several reports which are in existence and on which we must arrive at some conclusion.

I have very little reason to believe that the bill will ever become law prior to a general election. In that context I return to the camouflage and the ad hockery of this measure. I do not think the government wants to do anything at this point in time. The government believes it has captured the best of two worlds. In fact it has got the public thinking that the government has given the public service a good swift kick, and public servants think they are protected. In reality neither of those two situations exist. The government is uncertain of itself in this particular area. The matter has not been studied sufficiently. Perhaps we have no right at this time in the life of this parliament even to consider tinkering or playing around with the superannuation accounts.

When this matter is before the committee I hope the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and the Minister of National Defence will encourage or send their parliamentary secretaries so that the ministers' views respecting members of the national police force and Canadian armed forces can be made known to the members of the committee, and through them to the House, as well as to the members of the police force and the armed forces. I add that particular note to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West. In its consideration of these two particular aspects of the public service, I urge the government not to overlook their uniqueness and the characteristics of their relationships with us. Also I urge the government to recognize the added responsibilities and difficulties which particularly members of the Canadian armed forces have when they attempt to obtain gainful and meaningful employment outside the services.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-12 because it affects many people in the upper Ottawa valley. I represent a large number of Crown employees at Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd. in Chalk River, a large number of military personnel in one of the largest bases in Canada at Petawawa, and a large number of public servants in various departments located throughout the area.

We must remember that we have one of the best personally disciplined armed forces in the world. We have a lot of talent in the scientific field and in our public service generally. In the entire region of eastern Ontario which I represent, I appreciate and the region appreciates, what these people and these employment factors really mean to our over-all community. Without these people, our community would have to fall back on the timber trade, the limited number of factories that we have, and the commercial community, which latter of course would be much smaller.

During the last few years there have been many upsetting events throughout the world, not only of a military nature but certainly to a very large degree of an economic nature as well. Among these have been the uncertain conditions in the Middle East and the supply of energy to the western world. These uncertainties seem to be increasing as time goes on and, as a result, they have a very direct effect on the economies of western countries and inflationary trends. World conditions, along with the difficulties we have faced at home, have had far-reaching effects on many facets of our economic and social life. Bill C-12 is one example of how pressures have been brought to bear in one area of our domestic life as Canadians. There seems to be one assumption which we hear a great deal about today, that inflation is here to stay and everything will continue to rise for years to come.

Unsettled conditions in the past few years, and the unpredictable events which have happened in the world, have caused many problems for us and other nations. At the same time we must not rule out the possibility that certain events may lie ahead in the world picture today which can very well have a different effect on the economies of the western nations and, as a result, have a reverse effect on inflationary trends. For example, what will happen when the so-called third world countries become more self-supporting? What will happen when certain potential giants in the world today which are not highly industrialized become so in the immediate years ahead and goods and services become more available to all?

I was glad to hear the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) and others in the House mention the past diatribes of the National Citizens' Coalition which seems to look upon the Canadian scene as its own personal domain, and which is trying to mold public opinion to suit its own purposes. The one thing which can be said about the National Citizens' Coalition is that one can realize readily its membership has not suffered very much by the inflationary trends of the past few years. Otherwise, they would not be able to produce the full-page newspaper ads and the other means they use to snowball the public. Perhaps they should be looking at their own various company pension plans and indexing in order to find out just how they are treating their own employees in this day and age. The fact that Bill C-12 places the various public pension plans discussed in the bill on a self-financing basis, automatically should withdraw it from such vindictive and unjustifiable comments.

As long as I have been around Parliament Hill I have never ceased to wonder why bills in the House cannot be written up in legal jargon on one side of the page and in layman's language on the other. I have a perfect example of what I mean before me at the present time. I have had many inquiries with regard to this bill from public servants, employees of Crown corporations and from members of the Canadian armed forces.

● (1600)

The question that keeps cropping up from the Canadian armed forces is, just where do they stand with the annual rate of inflation having regard to their pension at sixty years of age, if in fact they are required to retire, say, at the age of 44, 47 or 51 etc? The answer to that question is buried in the legal jargon found on page 7 of the bill starting at paragraph (b) of proposed section 4(1), sub-clauses (i) (ii) (iii) (iv) and (v). The latter sub-clause to be found at the top of page 8.

If a corporal retires at age 44, he will receive at age 60 the cumulative rate of inflation for the total 16 years, and his pension will go up accordingly at age 60. As for the immediate indexing of his pension, this does not come into question, because when he retires now he does not receive the indexing at the age of 44, and will not under this present legislation, so nothing has changed for his immediate future. But the fact that the indexing is cumulative for him during those 16 years means that his pension will, in fact, be worth something to him at age 60, in the event the inflationary rate continues.

For brigadier generals, who are classified as general service, they will retire at age 55 so this bill will affect those who are retiring immediately or in the next few years. A general who is classified as, say a specialist, such as a chaplain, dentist, legal, medical, music, nursing, or personnel development, have a compulsory release age of 60, and generals who have reached that position by virtue of being commissioned from the ranks have a compulsory release at age 55. A full colonel in the general service retires at the age of 55. A colonel under the specialist title must retire at 58, and a colonel who was commissioned from the ranks must retire at 55. A lieutenant-colonel who falls within the specialist field must retire at 55, and a major who falls in the specialist field must retire at the age of 55. These are the people who would be involved immediately if they are about to retire. Those who retire within the next five years will be doing so on a prorated basis.

Under Queen's Regulations and Orders Table A, article 1531, it is stated that a sergeant retires at age 50, and could have up to 30 years' service. In a case such as this, his indexing will accumulate for the next 10 years and he will get the lump sum increase at age 60 added to his pension.

Because of the earlier age that most military personnel are required to retire, as opposed to those people in the public service and those who work for Crown corporations, it would be unfair to a service man if he had to wait until age 55 before his pension even started to become indexed. By that time he would be far behind those who retired at age 55 today. This is why indexing starts for him on the very day he retires. We get into the old argument with some saying we should be keeping these people in the armed forces longer because they are trained and still active, while others say we must keep a younger armed forces and these people must retire at certain ages. Even within the military community itself this is a debatable point.

Proposed section 4.1 of this measure on page 10 provides for a three-year review of pension funds by the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance, who will then report to the minister whether the pension fund is viable to meet the rate of inflation of the day. If the report is positive, the cabinet of the day has no choice but to allow full indexing in accordance with the viability of the fund. If in the opinion of the report the fund is not viable, then the governor in council sets the rate for the next three years. As has been said many times before, this bill prevents anyone from retiring very late in the year and getting the full indexing for the entire year. If a retiring person has the "85" formula and retires at the end of June he will receive the indexing for one half of that year, and similarly for other fractions of any one year.

In order to offset some of the innuendoes raised by the National Citizens' Coalition, it cannot be said often enough that approximately 85 per cent of today's retired public service personnel and armed forces personnel retired on a pension of less than $7,000 per year.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What was that figure?

Mr. Hopkins: I said that 85 per cent retire on pensions of less than $7,000 per year. I put that figure on the record last fall when the former president of the treasury board made his introductory remarks. Therefore it is important that these people receive more supplementation than those in the much higher categories. You will recall that last fall full indexing would have been allowed on earnings up to that $7,000 mark, and above that the figure in the proposal was 8 per cent in 1979, 7 per cent for 1980, and 6 per cent in 1981. However, because this particular bill did not pass last year, this item will come up for review once again and later this year we will find out whether the amount is going to be around $7,500, or somewhere around $8,000 for full indexing. These figures are very familiar to me as I have many neighbours who have retired from the armed forces or the public service and find themselves in this particular pension income bracket.

Even though this debate today is related to pensions in the public sector, I feel, Mr. Speaker, that there is a real need to take a good look at some of the private pension funds as well. Ministers of labour at the provincial levels and the federal Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) should discuss the problems faced by those who do not have a portable pension plan, in this day and age. In today's world, we find people in their 30's and early 40's by necessity moving around to find other jobs. In many cases a person might have 18 years with one company but, because he is laid off his job, or his position has become redundant, and he has to find another source of employment, he or she may lose that 18 years in the pension plan, and simply be given the amount he or she placed in the fund. Many of these pension plans fall under provincial jurisdiction, but our federal Minister of Labour, who is a very humanitarian type, could do a lot of good for private citizens across this country if he were to initiate such meetings with the provincial ministers of labour in order to provide portability of pension plans for every Canadian citizen across Canada who spent a reasonable amount of time working for one particular company and then found it necessary to move or, indeed, saw a chance for promotion in another area.

Again I wish to return to discuss a very serious problem that today faces many of our military personnel who retire at an early age. In many cases the trades that personnel in the armed forces practised for many years are not recognized once they arrive out on "civvy street". In many cases provincial departments of labour refuse to license mechanics, plumbers, carpenters and so on without further apprenticeship training. As a result they find themselves on the labour market with no qualifications of a legal nature but they do have the experience and knowledge of their field. I have had many people in my office discussing this very subject.

At the present time there is a military-civilian training accreditation committee working on this problem, but it still has a long way to go; even though it has made a very good start. In view of the considerable lapse of time between the time a member of the armed forces is pensioned off and the time he will reach 60 years of age for indexing, and under present conditions the age of 65 for the old age security, it becomes very necessary to provide him with a legal recognition of his skills so he can supplement his income during those crucial years.

In the United States forces, they quite often use the last year of a military person's career, if it is their wish to do so, to train them for a job when they get out of the service. I can only strongly recommend to the Minister of National Defence that this type of program be seriously looked at by the Department of National Defence in Canada, and also that he might solicit the support of our good friend, the Minister of Labour, to deal with the provinces on civilian accreditation for the skills that members of the armed forces already have.

I wish to thank hon. members for their attention during my remarks. There are many other items I would like to discuss but I shall save them for committee stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-12, legislation aimed essentially at reducing the level of benefits afforded to federal civil servants. Its main objective is to reduce the widening gap between public service and private sector pension funds. Pressured by representatives from the private sector, the government decided to reverse course on something that was apparently recognized for all civil servants, the indexing of their pensions.

As many of my colleagues in this House, I feel that pay differentials between the private and the public sectors are becoming a source of injustice. How many private sector workers toiled all their lives to get a meagre pension after 40 years? The government showed leadership when it put forward the indexing of retired public servants' pensions, and it believed the private sector would follow suit. We are now backing out, we are taking away full indexing from public servants and substituting this new system. A part only of pensions will now get automatic indexing. The minimum could be $7,500 or $8,000 a year, when some 80 per cent of pensioners are getting less than $7,000 a year.

Citizens once again will fall victim to this shortsighted government. By the same token bilingual public servants who had been promised the bilingualism supplement until 1983 were told last summer that would not be the case. Starting from April 1, they will stop getting it. And unemployment insurance claimants are now getting a maximum of $144 a week instead of $160, since January 1, 1979.

Mr. Speaker, the unemployed suffer a loss of revenue of some $16 a week, although a great number of them have obligations and often many dependents, with consumer prices on a constant increase. The Health Resources Fund schedule to end in 1980 was retroactively cancelled as of 1978, without consulting with the provinces.

The new provisions contained in this bill will cost between $38 million and $48 million less a year. This saving is very much in the spirit of the hatchet policy, as I call it, under which they cut expenses as much as possible without knowing exactly why and without too much concern for future consequences and especially for the people who are left in need. And all this is done to respond in one way or another to the industrial and financial lobbies.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that all Canadians would support the government wholeheartedly if they were asked to cut down on their expenditures to have a healthier economy. Unfortunately, these drastic cutbacks will not improve the problems of unemployment and soaring price increases. Last summer, when he announced his decision to cut back expenditures, the right hon. Prime Minister said that this was the policy of the three r's which were restraint, renewal and reallocation. He was the only one to sing this tune. Indeed, he is still the only one. Everyone understood immediately what he meant by restraint, or budgetary restrictions. Indeed, we did not have long to wait for the axe to fall. Our unemployed know this better than anyone else because they were the first victims. But what concerns me most is that we still do not know when, how, why and where the other two r's, renewal and reallocation, will come in. We are still waiting. Nothing much has happened since then.

Bill C-60 made everyone unhappy and the Pepin-Robarts report will probably be left on the shelf since it does seem to please the Quebec premier a lot more than the Prime Minister of Canada. As for the reallocation concept, which was supposed to involve a reorientation of government funds towards employment programs, it seems to have been applied on a very small scale for a country which has more than 8 per cent of its manpower on unemployment, or nearly one million unemployed, and mostly among people. Where is the employment strategy that we have been demanding for many years? The unemployed are yelling at the top of their voice, but can the government hear them? The government is doing nothing, and that right before an election. What then will it do after the election?

The big problem resulting from the budgetary cuts, at least immediately it seems to me, is the decrease in the purchasing power of the citizens, whether they be retired or unemployed. Indeed, those steps will result unfortunately in reducing the standard of living of many citizens who will progressively become less and less able to buy consumer goods, the effects of which will be felt throughout the economic system, and that at a time when the Canadian dollar keeps sliding down.

● (1620)

Mr. Speaker, I am not criticizing the government for realizing that the gap between pension plans in the private sector and the public sector was leading, over the long term, to a completely unbalanced and inequitable situation. I am only insisting on the fact that the needs and hopes of civil servants were built up, and now the means of meeting them are being withdrawn. The public sector must not tag along behind the private sector. Instead, the gap between the two must simply be reduced to fairer proportions.

There is precious little awareness of the fact that budget cuts will have unfortunate socio-economic repercussions. I have repeatedly spoken—God knows how often—about adopting the guaranteed annual income. Even the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) recognizes that such a program is desirable, though impossible at the present time. I say that a guaranteed annual income is not too heavy a load to bear when one considers the amounts already spent on unemployment insurance benefits and welfare. That would be a much fairer solution, a solution that would apply to the whole population and would not encourage disproportionate gaps, such as those we now know, between the public and the private sectors.

I wonder how much electioneering there is in this bill as we approach a federal election. Indeed in introducing this bill the government is trying to look good before bankers and financiers and part of the people. Those measures are only a first step toward the pure and simple abolition of escalation clauses in all federal plans. And, given those measures, private businesses will be very happy not to have to improve the escalation provisions in the pension plans of their own employees. Among other points of dispute between the government and civil servants, the principle of early retirement was mainly criticized. The civil servant who must retire involuntary because of a cutback in staff or his age cannot find another job and is helpless to fight inflation. There again, as always, private sector employees in the same position will face new restraints from the employers.

This bill starts from an entirely understandable purpose but uses means not likely to maintain harmonious relations in the public service. If the government backtracks too much on this, as it is doing with Bill C-12, the abolition of bilingual bonuses and the lay-offs of language teachers, we will soon have an explosive climate in the federal public service. That would be unfortunate because our public servants are competent and well organized.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation I am the last speaker from this side of the House and this matter will be going to the committee shortly.

I want to reiterate on behalf of the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative party, that it is our intention to get this bill to committee as quickly as we can so that the examination that was spoken of so eloquently by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), in opening the debate for the official opposition, can continue. That kind of examination is absolutely essential in terms of this legislation.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), in the course of his speech the other evening, asked what the position of this party was with respect to the idea of pension indexing in the public service of Canada. He made some very flattering remarks about me, which I appreciate, and given the appropriate opportunity I will reciprocate. I do not like to quote myself, but in 1973 during the course of a debate I spoke on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party with respect to the position that was put before the House by the then president of the treasury board. This was referred to by the then hon. member for York-Scarborough. The bill passed through all stages of the House within a few days. In fact I think second reading commenced on September 7 and it was back in the House on September 12, which was a very short period of time for a significant piece of legislation.

As you know, the amendment that was before us at that time respected full indexation on public service pensions, that is the range of the public service we speak of in the Public Service Superannuation Act. I said at that time:

> Members of the government certainly are draftsmen of the bill, but if you examine the history of public service legislation you find that this government and its predecessors were really dragged, kicking and screaming, to the point where they finally gave in to what, over the years, were the reasonable demands of public service staff associations, the officers of public service associations, retired public servants and others who have written to people like myself and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).
> As I say, the government has finally given in and seen the reason for positions that have been taken by my party and, for that matter, the NDP with respect to this matter.

What happened on that occasion? Let us cast our minds back to that time. The president of the treasury board came into the House of Commons and indicated to us in a short, succinct statement that it was the intention of the Government of Canada to move in the direction of full indexation of pensions. He did not indicate to us in any way that there was any problem with respect to funding. He did not indicate in any way that we would be facing a bill in 1979 which changes the principles that were accepted by the House of Commons in 1973.

I believe the House of Commons and I at that time relied on a few things. First, I relied on the proposition that the president of the treasury board of that day knew what he was talking about. That may have been my first mistake. Second, I relied on the fact that behind that statement of the president of the treasury board there had been sufficient studies undertaken by the Government of Canada and they were prepared to come to the House with respect to that matter. That position was put by me on September 7, 1973, and later on September 12, 1973.

On third reading of the bill at page 6472 of Hansard I said this:

> —it is my intention to be the only spokesman for my party at this final stage, and to expedite the passage of the measure.

That was the position put in 1973. With respect to the plight of people who are retired and who are no longer in the work force, people who cannot bargain for themselves, people who are subject to the ravages of inflation and other things, that has to remain the position. That must remain the principle that would guide any reasonable person looking upon individuals who may well be otherwise unprotected with respect to inflation. That is something I want to point out to the House. Why? Why is the principle of indexation relating pensions to the cost of living a reasonable one? It can be put in many ways.

I do not think it is appropriate in a reasonable society to adopt a position that people who cannot fend for themselves ought to be left treading water in a stream which flows backward. That is akin to going downhill. I know the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) is anxious to tell the House that he knows which way water flows, and I commend him for that.

To come back to the subject, this is an important provision. That is the long and short of it, why we discuss indexing at all.

I looked at the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In the course of his speech on this bill in the House on February 12, 1979, he said this:

● (1630)

I begin by saying I would be happy if the bill were not before us at all;—

What he is saying is that he would like the principle of indexing established in 1973 to continue. He is also saying that he would like it if the economic circumstances of the country were such that the government would not feel moved to dispense with the principle. He would like to say that he did not want to stand in this House and say that the public service is fortunate that it did not suffer worse.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): When I am finished. Let me continue:

—I would be quite happy if we continued with the present plan which calls for full indexing of the various pensions covered by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. However, there has been a vicious campaign and many people have been taken in by arguments that certain individuals are being favoured as opposed to others.

If there is a fear in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about the figures that might be produced in the future, that is something he can articulate. There is a nagging fear in his mind about what the future may hold.

In his speech the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) branded as false the position of the National Citizens' Coalition. I share his views with regard to the campaign that has been launched. Notwithstanding that, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is harbouring some doubt as to whether the government may have succumbed to the siren song of the National Citizens' Coalition.

Mr. Lefebvre: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre) says no. If the government says no then it is saying that the National Citizens' Coalition is wrong, and it is important that at the committee the government demonstrate where it is wrong. If the National Citizens' Coalition is in fact wrong and if that can be demonstrated, that there is no need for a change in the law, the law should not be changed.

Mr. Harquail: What is your position?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) asks what is my position with respect to the National Citizens' Coalition. I will tell him my position. It has been a callous campaign, a campaign of half-truths. Hon. members will recall that it has been a campaign similar to that conducted on another occasion which brought disapprobation upon this House of Commons and its members. They have done exactly the same with the public service.

I would be the last one in the House to say that every public servant is not lazy, is not polite, and is not working his full share. There are public servants who tell me that there are others in the public service who are that way. For every one in the public service like that, it brings disapproval by the public. However, in general the public service of this country is reasonably good.

What public servants want is the opportunity to express themselves, to feel the challenge that others feel in various aspects of the community. There is nothing wrong with that. However, when I receive clippings from the National Citizens' Coalition I have to regard that as a result of some dishonest advocacy, something I flatly condemn.

There are some real changes to be made with regard to the public service. There ought to be a challenge for public servants. They should work to capacity. There should be changes in the bargaining procedures and a whole host of things that affect public servants. The cause of a public service and its respect for itself are not advanced in any way by the kind of attack that has been made by the National Citizens' Coalition. It is a matter of prejudicial guesswork at best, and I am being lenient when I call it that.

The hon. member for Restigouche wants to know my position. I will tell him. A public servant has told me directly what he thinks about the national coalition. This is what he said:

Dear Sirs:

I'm mad as hell about this type of misrepresentation with respect to the public service indexed pension—civil servants indexed pensions.

He went on to add, and I commend this to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien):

—and government use of my pension contributions at ridiculously low interest rates.

The Minister of Finance might want to take that message to heart when considering this matter. Other speakers in the debate have pointed out the questions that should be asked in committee and the inquiries that should be made. The hon. member for Hamilton West did a service by laying out those questions.

This House should never again fall into the trap of accepting what this government says about anything. The government has in effect said that this is the best it can do. We must examine that. There is a difference of opinion in this House. In fact there is a difference of opinion on the government side as to whether this is the best it can do.

I suggest that hon. members reread the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa West. If the figures that he gave are true, then he drove a horse and cart through the speech made by the President of the Treasury Board. On the other hand, if the position of the President of the Treasury Board is correct and we have to change the law so that we fully index for 85 per cent of members of the public service who retire, then his predecessor, the Hon. C. M. Drury, when speaking in this House in 1973 misled this House, the public service, and the people of Canada. That is why we need to have this kind of examination. We can no longer accept at face value what the government says.

We have to examine ourselves with regard to how we feel on these principles. We must ask ourselves whether this bill is fair and proper in light of circumstances revealed at that committee, and given the difference of opinion with regard to changing the law and therefore the benefits. Eighty-five per cent is not a bad batting average for any government. I concede that. That is one of the reasons we will send this bill to committee.

Yesterday I received a call from someone who will be just outside the 85 per cent, just above the $8,500 figure with regard to his pension. The other evening the President of the Treasury Board was optimistic enough to say that indexing may go up to $8,000 or $8,500 on the fully indexed portion. This man is just above that. I cannot bury a constituent in statistics any more than I can bury an old age security recipient in statistics and advocate a means test for OAS. Nobody on the other side will do that, and I hope nobody expects us to do it. That is why we must examine what the hon. member for Ottawa West says to see whether there is an embarrassment of riches in that plan, whether the bill is really necessary, and whether the level of benefits should fall. That is the examination which is to take place. That is the position taken by the hon. member for Hamilton West. We are entitled to these answers. The public service is entitled to these answers.

It is important that we do not follow with respect to this bill a process of perfunctory consideration and quick passage through committee. It is important that public service organizations, and those outside the public service as well, should have an opportunity to give evidence before the committee. It is important that what happens in the committee is not a repetition of what happens in committees from time to time when full examination is not allowed. We cannot get to the truth completely in the House of Commons even though members do their best; everyone knows that the major work of parliament is not done here but in committee where matters can be pursued in detail.

I have another cautionary word to add. It may be satisfactory that we can accept that things look pretty good for the next biennial period, and, who knows, that they may well look good for the triennial period after that. I hope this is the case. But we are not really looking to the next triennial period, we are talking about a succession of other triennial periods down the path. I don't think we can grasp this bill to our bosoms and accept it as the last word. We have to understand that we are not looking just to the next election or beyond the next three years or the triennial period after that. We are looking well into the future. What we are doing here affects the situation and the future of very large numbers of people.

We are prepared to accept this bill today provided there is to be the careful examination of which I have spoken. I am not prepared to fall gratefully into the arms of the government with respect to this measure. As far as the government is concerned, I am from Missouri; I have got to be shown. I have joined the host of Canadians—or they have joined me—who feel the government has mishandled the economic situation. I join with the 62 per cent of Canadians who feel the government has mishandled the economy. That is the result of the latest Gallup poll. That's good news for the Liberal party. That figure is more than double the 27 per cent who approved of the way in which the government has acted. That is the latest report; it appears in the Citizen if anybody wants to read it. It is dated February 14, 1979.

An hon. Member: Valentine's Day!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is a myth about the economic performance of this government. There used to be some economic management. I am sure the late and venerable Louis St. Laurent must roll over in his grave when he considers the economic performance of the present government compared with his.

An hon. Member: May he rest in peace!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, may he rest in peace. Do not associate him with the Liberal party of today because if you do you will tarnish the memory of a fine public man.

The poll is a very interesting one. It shows that a hefty 71 per cent of the people in western Canada are unhappy about the government's economic management. So are 70 per cent in Atlantic Canada and 65 per cent in Ontario. Given the percentage of error attached to Gallup polls, a rate of 4 per cent, this amounts to a condemnation of the ability of the government to convince the Canadian people that it can handle anything. It is most important the government should realize that with respect to this kind of legislation which affects the future plans of public servants as well as the plans and lives of public servants who have retired, not to mention their families, the widows and the children of public servants—and I define the public service broadly here as including both the RCMP and the military—that we must examine very carefully the statements which have been made in this House and the statistical data behind those statements.

Given the government's track record with regard to public service pensions, let alone other things, I do not think we ought to accept at face value that what the government says is really the case. Not that they lie. I am not suggesting they lie, but they have been known to be grossly mistaken.

Mr. Alexander: And less than honest.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was not about to make that suggestion, but since my hon. friend has made that interjection I will say that it might be appropriate. The House of Commons, on behalf of the public we serve and on behalf of the public service, which is part of our responsibility, should examine this plan so that we are not required to go through this kind of exercise again.

I want to say something, now, with respect to the future of this country. A number of people have made known their views with regard to that future in terms of pension payments and the way in which governments at various levels are able to consider at least providing "hedges" in pension plans for their retired workers. There has been a great outburst in the community because it is felt that similar provisions are not possible on the private side. That is a matter of debate. It is a question we all have to ask ourselves as public men and women, people who are here for a time to represent others, to represent the community. We have to be prepared to assess the truth of these assertions—to consider whether it is, in fact, impossible. If we do not examine them there are others in the community who will do so.

Is it the case that in a country as rich as ours, with a population as ingenious as ours, with corporations whose leaders are as ingenious as they are, that it can be said without doubt that we are not capable of devising ways in which those who are not relying on public sector pensions and who are relying to a large degree on private sector pensions can find some ways to build into their pensions provision against the ravages of inflation? I might point out that this would not be necessary if governments could control inflation. This is a situation which places a tremendous onus on governments everywhere. That is the bottom line in the pension business. If inflation is contained to a small amount the argument about indexation loses its force.

If people outside the work force face the inflation which can be called ravaging inflation—those are the words which have been used to describe inflation as it affects those people today—and if they are relying to a great extent on pension plans which are not related in some way to the cost of living, then the fact is that those people are falling further and further behind. I believe it was the hon. member for Ottawa West—someone did—who put some figures on the record in this debate with respect to the fact that our population is aging. The aging constituency of all of us in this House is growing. The sheer political power of that constituency is growing. As it grows, its voice within the country will grow along with it. That constituency will put upon us a responsibility which we may not be prepared to look at now, but a responsibility will be put on us and others like us to protect those who are less fortunate in that broad economic sense because they are not in the work force. That is something with which we will all have to deal.

I think it is important that this debate be conducted in that atmosphere. Let us face the fact that those in that constituency face a major problem. Let us not think that the critics of indexation are able to silence the debate in the country merely by saying that as far as they are concerned it does not exist and that they will not look at it. That debate is going to go on in this country. It is being carried on now. It has been carried on, and if hon. members have not read it, I commend to them the brief which was filed before the Royal Commission on the Status of Pensions in Ontario by Eckler, Brown, Segal and Company Limited, in which this question was addressed and in which the question of costs was addressed. We will eventually have to address this matter.

I also commend to hon. members an article published in 1979 in papers on "Canadian Public Policy" by Professor James E. Pesando of the Institute for Policy Analysis of the University of Toronto, because he addresses the question of the ability of the private sector to maintain itself in times of inflation. He argues that indexing is a feasible although challenging objective. He had something to say about the Tomenson-Alexander report, which I think should be taken with an appropriate grain of salt and subject to examination by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Professor Pesando said this, and I am quoting from page 84 of the article:

> To sum up, the procedures employed by Tomenson-Alexander have the effect of artificially (and, ultimately, arbitrarily) reducing the liabilities in respect to the real benefits and increasing those in respect to the indexing provisions by an equivalent amount. This result is of crucial importance if the cost of the indexing provisions as identified by Tomenson-Alexander is used as an argument against the indexing of private pensions.

I hope the two representations to which I have referred will be considered by the committee because we have to consider this bill while recognizing the realities of Canadian society. I cannot believe that the pension industry in Canada, which is reasonably and appropriately led by men of wisdom and business acumen, despite their reluctance to address the problem—and there is some reluctance—is in fact not looking at the problem. I suspect that over the next ten or 15 years as the clamour develops, whether we like it, whether they like it, or whether anyone likes it, we will be driven to consider how this can be accomplished and, in its accomplishment, what the role of the government will be in this undertaking.

In the context of this debate I do not think we can forget that there is editorial opinion. It may be wrong. I do not know. Within the last year or two an opinion was expressed in an editorial which appeared in a newspaper in the United Kingdom. That editorial commented on a speech made by the head of the United Kingdom Actuarial Society. In that speech it was stated that we must regard pensions less as an actuarial problem and more as an economic problem, and that we ought to look more at the ability of a country to bear the pension burden, and examine it from that point of view.

If we do not get inflation under control in this country, I suggest that we will not be able to withstand the pressure applied by those who find themselves exposed more greatly than they are today and who will come to legislatures for remedies. That is a long-term issue from which this parliament and succeeding parliaments cannot turn away. What will these people ask for? They are going to say that the gross national product is growing at a certain rate. They are going to look at the portion of that gross national product which is taken up by old age security and other pension payments, and they are going to say that that portion is quite small.

They are going to say that as the gross national product grows their benefits should certainly also grow, because they will not be in a position to protect themselves. They are going to say to us that something must be done to ensure that they are not exposed. I just wonder what our argument will be. What will we say to them? Will we say that working Canadians will have the benefit of increased salaries to meet inflation but that these other people will not have those benefits? I just put the unfairness of that proposition to the House as we look down the road at a problem which will gradually drive us down into the bottom of the funnel. We are going to have to face this problem. Part of the solution, of course, is to wrestle inflation to the ground. The wrestling match with this government is over, and the government has been carried out of the ring, out cold.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Kayoed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is one battle this government is perhaps incapable of fighting, and the people will make that judgment, but the issue to which I have been referring will still be there for us to face. If governments are not yet thinking about it, they should begin to think about it because I am satisfied that in the bowels of the insurance industry and in the bowels of the pension industry people are thinking about it.

I had the privilege today of sitting down for lunch with prominent Canadian businessmen, the same group some hon. members opposite met with for dinner last evening. Next year it will be our turn to go to dinner, and it will be their turn to go for lunch. A question was put to the president of a prominent Canadian company.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We were not invited.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That demonstrates their good taste.

The president of that Canadian company was asked what his company does for its executives on the company pension plan with respect to the cost of living.

An hon. Member: They give them shares.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is one of the things the company does. That is common with large corporations. Some people are given shares, share options, hedges and benefits of that kind. However, in the case of people who retired some time ago, this officer admitted that if they were ad hoc adjustments and if there were no adjustments in their pensions for the cost of living some of these people would be living in genteel poverty. I ask the House to consider this. That was a discussion with an executive about executives. I ask the House to consider how that is multiplied again and again by those who are not executives, who do not have the opportunity of indexation by stock option. When you consider that, sir, I think you realize how important this debate is. It is certainly important to the public servants of this country.

• (1700)

As my constituent put it to me last night, "I want to know why in 1973 I was promised one thing and in 1979 I am given something else". They are entitled to that answer, sir. Eventually this House and our successors in this House will be faced at the gates of this place with those people outside who are not in the public service an who will ask the very same question with respect to themselves. I hope that there is something going on within the government of this country that will help—

Mr. Railton: We are looking after it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am not so sure they are looking after it. They have not looked after anything else, but I do hope they are looking after that and that there is something going on within the government, because in retrospect, if you consider it carefully, it can be legitimately argued that if there is not some way that everyone can share in the growth of the national economic pie, assuming that it grows, then those who do share in the growth of that national pie are really robbing those who do not. That is the simple case that has to be made as we look at this legislation. I do not think this House can afford to look at it in any other way, and if we have any sense of balance that is exactly the way we will look at it, and our deliberations in the committee will be aimed at getting at the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seeking the floor to ask a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I, sir?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time allotted to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has expired. The hon. member may ask a question with consent of the House. Does the House allow the hon. member to put his question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the generosity of the House in allowing this extra time, I will not ask the question I was going to ask about 1973 being the year of a minority government. Rather, I will put a question to the hon. member arising out of the telephone call he said he had from a constituent who is just over the $8,000 figure.

I wonder if the hon. member would join me, and I am sure that members on the government side would join me too, but I think it is more useful if it comes from the opposition side of the House, in asking the press to make it clear that even if Bill C-12 goes through, there still is escalation for that portion of pensions above $7,500 or $8,000. It has been clear, but I am getting the same phone calls and the same letters. I had a letter this morning from a pensioner who was afraid that once he reaches the $7,000 level there will be no more escalation.

Will my friend join me in making it clear that the bill, as we understand it, provides for full escalation up to the threshold of $7,500 or $8,000, and that the portion of pensions above that, which pensioners have now or which they will get after escalation, will be indexed by a figure slightly less than the full cost of living index?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that that statement was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I certainly join in that statement and I am certain that other members in the House will join us, because we do not want that kind of confusion to continue.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in joining the two hon. members in affirming that fact.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Are we on a point of order, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was recognized to ask a question. We are not in committee of the whole; if the hon. member wants to put a question accepted by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), he should put it.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-37, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill, together with the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act, implements my budget measures. The major objectives of those measures are, first, to maintain and accelerate growth in demand through fiscal stimulus; second, at the same time to put downward pressure on prices and costs in order to protect our renewed competitive position; third, to provide further stimulus to capital spending and research and development so as to improve industrial productivity and efficiency and to ensure continued growth; fourth, to assist particular sectors in overcoming structural problems; fifth, to provide more support for regional development; and sixth, to take action to maintain the integrity of Canada's tax system. My budget has been described as a responsible budget. The tax measures before us implement the budget objectives in a responsible way.

The bill reduces taxes for working individuals. It does this by doubling the limit for the employment expense deduction, increasing it from $250 to $500 a year. Being related to employment income, this measure provides additional incentive and reward for working Canadians. It will reduce federal and provincial tax by some $365 million in the 1979-80 fiscal year.

But this is not the only element acting to spur growth in disposable incomes of Canadians in 1979. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that tax indexing will result in a $1.6 billion reduction in federal and provincial income taxes. I also announced a reduction in the contribution rate for unemployment insurance. I have reduced the federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, thus boosting purchasing power by about $1 billion. For a married family earning the average industrial wage, these measures taken altogether should raise real after-tax disposable income by over two and a half per cent. Canadians will pay a lower share of their total income in taxes in 1979 than they did in 1978. The stimulus provided by these measures will support consumption demand over the coming months. As well, strong stimulatory forces are at work as a result of a more competitive dollar. More demand means more capacity utilization and more incentive to investment.

I would like to refer to two other tax changes affecting individuals. They are not as large as those I have just mentioned but, in their own way, are just as important. Hon. members will recall the concern expressed at the time of the last budget over the taxation of RRSPs in cases where both parents die leaving minor or disabled children. I have found that this is a valid concern. This bill provides that, in these cases, specified amounts may pass to dependent children or grandchildren without being taxed in the hands of the deceased. The amounts will qualify for forward averaging for tax purposes in the hands of the children. The allowable amounts are larger for younger children than for older ones, with a maximum of $125,000. In the case of disabled children, the limit is a flat $125,000 regardless of age. The tax benefits from this can amount to tens of thousands of dollars. This bill also includes provisions to permit those who are disabled or whose spouse is disabled to mature their RRSP funds before they reach age 60. Such persons will now be able to purchase an annuity or an RRIF at any time.

A strong industrial structure is vital to Canada's future. A more efficient industrial structure means lower costs and increased competitiveness. The government has put in place a large number of tax measures to spur industrial development, to help particular sectors, and to promote activities which are of importance to industry. Hon. members are familiar with the two-year write-off and low federal tax rate on manufacturing. The budget papers indicate that, as a result of these measures, corporate income tax on Canadian manufacturing as a per cent of profits is some 10 per cent lower than is the case in the United States. The federal tax incentives for mining result in a preferential federal tax environment. Past budgets have provided tax incentives which make investments in research and development much more attractive. These are but a few examples of the many ways the tax system plays a role in economic development and support.

Prior to formulating my budget I talked with representatives of many sectors. The recommendations of the sectoral task forces were thoroughly reviewed within my department. I benefited greatly from these efforts. Many of the sectoral task forces made recommendations concerning the investment tax credit. I have responded to those recommendations. This bill provides an indefinite extension of the federal tax credit past June, 1980. Now business will be able to plan and develop even their largest projects in an orderly fashion. Moreover, the measure will give them benefits amounting to $500 million for investments made after June, 1980.

This bill also enriches the tax credit. The basic rate of credit will be increased from 5 per cent to 7 per cent. Also other rates are increased. The benefits from the increased rates of credit apply from November 16, 1978.

These changes to the investment credit promote investment in some very important sectors. The benefits go to manufacturing and processing businesses, the petroleum and mineral industries, logging, farming, fishing and grain storage. As a result of the extension and enrichment of the investment tax credit, I look to measurable improvements in Canada's productive capacity, better growth, productivity and cost performance over the medium term.

Provisions of this bill extend the 7 per cent credit to apply to long-haul transportation equipment. Items such as aircraft, inter-city buses, long-haul trucks and trailers, vessels and railway rolling stock, track grading and other equipment will qualify. The tax benefits involved amount to about $30 million annually. Canada's transportation system is one of the sinews of the country. It will be stronger and more efficient as a result. Efficiency will mean lower costs. Also this measure will promote better services to passengers, with more modern equipment.

Regional development is a cornerstone of Canada's structural economic policies. Regional development grants are a prime example of our commitment. Fiscal equalization has long been a part of federal-provincial financial arrangements. The equalization program will provide some $2.6 billion to qualifying provinces in this fiscal year.

We have used the tax system to foster a better distribution of economic activity across Canada's regions. This bill adds to the regional tax incentives already in place. It doubles the investment tax credit in the Maritimes and Gaspé from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. This is equivalent in its effects to a cost reduction of 20 per cent of the price of eligible machinery, equipment and structures used in these areas. In other designated areas the credit rises from 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent. These areas cover most of Quebec outside the Gaspé, northern Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, parts of northern British Columbia and northern Alberta, as well as the Yukon and Northwest Territories. While it would be wrong to expect immediate results, I believe this type of distinction by region can lead to significant improvements in economic potential over time.

Also I should like to emphasize that these regionalized credit rates strongly support our sectoral policies. Mining and pulp and paper, two of the sectors toward which my budget was directed, both will benefit generally from the higher credit rates of 10 per cent and 20 per cent. As a result of the enrichment of the investment tax credit and its indefinite extension, the private sector will earn over $1 billion in benefits in respect of their investment in the first full year in which the changes are in effect. Some $500 million will be claimable immediately in the year while the remainder, mostly representing credit earned by non-taxable firms, will be carried forward to reduce tax in subsequent years.

Let me turn to research and development. Over the recent past the government has taken a range of substantial tax actions to promote R and D. Adequate incentives for R and D have been stressed by the sectoral task forces and others. Canada must ensure a first class R and D effort. More R and D in Canadian industry is essential for good economic performance over the medium term. This government is committed to doing its part to achieve this goal through a variety of measures including tax incentives, direct grants and subsidies. The bill adds to the support already in place. The basic investment tax credit for R and D now will be doubled. It will be higher than for other investments. Since 1977 the after-tax cost of R and D has fallen by half. This is a result of measures taken by me and my predecessors.

While it is too early to evaluate the full effects of these measures, preliminary indications are that firms are showing interest. They are looking to stepping up their R and D effort. Some firms which have not made a commitment to R and D are starting to do so.

I want to direct Your Honour's attention for a moment to R and D of small firms. It is a matter which has been raised in the House before. Unfortunately small firms do not themselves engage in an adequate amount of R and D. For the health of the future Canadian economy they must be encouraged to do so. This bill addresses that problem directly. It contains an R and D credit of 25 per cent for small firms. It is the richest of any tax credit applying to investment. I know of no analogous measure in another industrialized country. What matters for ensuring improved R and D performance is that R and D be made more attractive relative to other investments the firm might undertake. It is noteworthy, therefore, that for small manufacturing firms the relative cost advantage in favour of R and D over other investments is greater than is the case for large firms.

• (1720)

As a result of these measures the after-tax cost of R and D can be as low as 15 cents in several provinces. This is without taking into account any grants that may also be available. The R and D tax measures will provide a tax reduction of $100 million over and above the value of the immediate fast write-off for R and D that has been in place for some time. Several of the measures also reduce provincial taxes. Successful R and D has a high rate of return, higher than many other investments. Research and development is, however, risky. I believe that these tax incentives ensure that the risk does not lead to underinvestment. They produce a tax environment that is very favourable to attaining Canada's R and D goals.

This bill contains other tax cuts to aid important sectors of the economy. I turn first to resource taxation, and mining in particular. Federal and provincial ministers have finished a review of mining taxation. Let me say in passing that this review, in my opinion, represents a prime example of the kind of co-operation the Canadian federation can and should accommodate. The review report makes instructive reading, and I commend it to hon. members.

As I said in my budget, the report shows that the federal tax system is basically sound. In 1975, the latest year for which actual data are available, the federal tax was only some 14.4 per cent of industry profits. In the same year the federal tax rate on manufacturing was 23.6 per cent, which itself was a preferential rate compared with other industries. Under the federal system, no tax is generally payable on new mine investments until capital is recovered.

The federal share of total government revenue from mining is only some 33 per cent. This compares with our share of over-all corporate income tax from all sectors of some 70 per cent. And the federal share of revenues from mining has been declining. I do not believe, therefore, that an unbiased observer would claim that the onus was on the federal government to reduce its taxes dramatically even if further tax reductions are in order.

Nonetheless, I did decide, in framing my budget, that some additional incentives for new mine development were warranted, and I wanted to provide leadership to the provinces in this matter. Accordingly, this bill contains three major changes affecting mining. First, development expenditures will now be written off at 100 per cent immediately. Second, townsite and other social capital expenditures at new mine sites will earn the depletion deduction of one third of their cost. Third, mining will be a major beneficiary of the investment tax credit and of the indefinite extension of the pollution abatement incentive. The total value of all of these measures to mining is some $60 million per year.

I am pleased that I was able to take the lead in acting upon the principles put forward in the resource taxation report. While I, of course, cannot be sure, I expect and hope that provinces will take up this lead. I want to reiterate that the federal government will pursue the spirit of co-operation established during the review. This government will seek to avoid tax system changes that create undue uncertainty, and it will not take tax action to offset the benefits from any tax reductions that provinces introduce.

There are other measures in the budget directed to particular sectors. In oil and gas this bill provides for continuation of drilling fund incentives. They have been very successful. The amount of funds going into exploration and development in oil and gas annually, through these funds, has grown from nothing to up to $500 million currently. As a result of the extension of the measure a continued high level of exploration activity will be encouraged.

The pulp and paper industry will receive significant tax benefits over the coming years from the extension of the two-year write-off for pollution abatement equipment. This will be accomplished by changes to the income tax regulations. Reducing pollution is an important goal. This measure acts to lessen costs to industry of installing pollution abatement equipment. The pulp and paper industry will also benefit from the enhanced investment tax credit. The credit applies to pollution abatement investments as well as other investments in this sector.

Housing is benefited by extension of the preferential tax treatment of multiple unit residential buildings. It also benefits from the reinstatement of deductibility of interest on property taxes on land awaiting development. Conditions in the housing market are different than in 1974 when this deductibility was denied, and it is time to reinstate it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the bill under study includes important amendments which will affect businesses. The amendments I already referred to would reduce corporate taxes. Others, would have the effect of amending our tax legislation according to the development of our economy. They would allow us to make sure that federal taxes will remain fair and equitable for all Canadian taxpayers. One of the main responsibilities of a finance minister is to make sure that the taxation system will remain equitable. Bill C-37 would allow us to achieve that goal. In that context, I would like to have a look at the provisions of the bill which are related to income bonds and term preferred shares. Traditionally any income originating from such shares was considered as dividend. That was the practice, without taking into account that those shares were actually proofs of debts. It made some sense in the case of some businesses which used those shares, more precisely income bonds, when they were facing serious financial difficulties.

As a matter of fact, this is why income bonds were created in 1930. But now, this form of financing is used mainly by multinational or national companies which are in a sound financial position. For some borrowers, the fact that the financing costs are in the form of non-deductible dividends does not matter very much. Some have more tax incentives than necessary to ensure that they have no tax to pay, whatever happens. Their non taxable situation does not mean that they are in a difficult financial position.

This type of financing attracts industrial lenders because their investment income in the form of dividends is not taxable. In fact this financing system means that tax incentives which are not claimed by industrial firms can be used to reduce the tax which would otherwise be payable by banks and other financial institutions. Of course there would be no problem if the amounts were small. If the funds were going into productive investments, there would be no great difficulty, but such is not the case. Chartered bank assets in the form of income bonds or debentures and term preferred shares in the 12 months ended October 1978 went from $3 billion to $7.2 billion.

I have indicated that Canadian government and provincial revenues are eroded to the tune of some $500 million a year. Because of this, the tax rate on bank earnings plummeted from 40 per cent to some 30 per cent. Tax revenue from bank earnings remained roughly constant from 1977 to 1978, although their profits increased some 20 per cent. Further, a significant part of those funds did not go into new productive investments. Takeovers were thus made easier. Those funds were used to re-finance existing standard loans in order to derive maximum benefits from fiscal savings. In the period ending October 1978, the volume of that type of securities in bank portfolios increased tremendously. Also, most of their total assets used in any form of industrial financing were settled.

I could not let the situation go on. This legislation therefore provides that the revenue from shares issued after budget night will be taxed the same way as interest revenue. Revenue from that source will be taxable when received by banks and other lenders. The new issues of term preferred shares with a term higher than 10 years are more in the nature of shares than loans. For this reason they will not be affected. Borrowers facing financial difficulties will still be entitled to existing fiscal status.

I would now turn to the second major initiative of a structural nature involving the corporate tax structure. It concerns the reduced tax rate available to small businesses. As I indicated in my budget, Mr. Speaker, small businesses are afforded very generous tax provisions. This is mainly due to the lower tax rate available to those companies and the dividend. A businessman who is incorporated and earns $50,000 pays in fact $4,000 to $5,000 less in federal and provincial tax than as a wage earner or as a professional who is not incorporated, at this salary level.

The fiscal benefits of incorporation are greater at the top of the income scale. It is to the advantage of the businessman whose small business is incorporated because he can save by not distributing his business income. The income tax rate is only 20 or 25 per cent. Any additional tax payable on personal income is deferred until the businessman distributes the undistributed income. In the meantime the taxation rate for personal income tax may be less. Individuals can save on an income which is sometimes subject to much higher rates of taxation, and the opportunities for tax returns are much more limited.

The lesser taxation rate for corporations represents a reduction of $900 million a year in corporate income tax. There is an annual tax saving of $5,000 per corporation. In addition to these measures, shareholders of small companies are subject to a special tax system as regards capital gains. The study I have published and which compares the Canadian and American tax systems clearly illustrates that our tax system is much more advantageous to the small businessman.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that we are justified, through our tax system, in favouring small business as such. It needs this edge to cope in the business world and with economic risks, to get the necessary capital for growth and job creation, as well as to be able to compete with larger Canadian and foreign firms.

On the other hand, I do not believe that these tax privileges must extend to activities where the characteristics of small businesses cannot be taken into account. By allowing this we would simply increase the fiscal burden of everyone else and cause a general lack of respect for the fairness of the taxation system. In this regard, certain situations in the past have caused serious problems.

Members of professional classes in certain provinces can form a corporation or a company, but they cannot do so in others. This does not provide for fairness. For instance, in the past a doctor or a lawyer living in a province where the members of this profession can form a corporation or a company paid much less federal income tax than another member of the same profession in another province. On principle, I do not believe that the provincial legislation governing incorporation should cause such major differences in the amount of federal income tax payable.

In the provinces where the members of a profession cannot incorporate, they set up management companies whose only aim was to siphon off professional income or fees as administrative, management or financial services. This income could then entitle them to the reduced taxation rate. Such management companies often belonged to the wife of a man in a professional class. Thus, the benefits of the reduced taxation rate provided for small businesses were added to those of income sharing.

The financial situation of professional classes is not the same as that of the small business. Their income is much more stable. Access to these professions is justifiably carefully controlled. The deduction offered to small businesses was implemented when incorporation by professional classes did not constitute a problem. This deduction was never aimed at providing these people with a privileged taxation status.

Other workers, such as managers, have begun to incorporate to take advantage of the reduced taxation rate. Court rulings have also entitled investment and rental income to this reduced rate. As I said in my budget speech, it would be unfair to allow such practices to go on because in so doing, Mr. Speaker, we are in fact imposing a heavier tax burden on those who are not incorporated.

The provisions of the bill and the draft regulations that accompany it are aimed at four types of businesses: first, doctors, dentists, lawyers and accountants; second, businesses set up to offer managerial, financial, administrative or similar services to an associate company; third, businesses set up to manage the investment portfolio of an individual; fourth, the employee who incorporates himself. The details that apply will be found in the draft regulations I have had published. I am still receiving useful observations with regard to the specifics of those regulations. I promise to examine any question submitted to me by hon. members in the course of this debate. I shall put the finishing touches to the regulations in light of all the comments I shall have received.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention four specific points to hon. members: first, those provisions do not alter in any way the right to incorporate when there are valid reasons to do so and when provincial laws allow it. I expect that some members of the professions, management businesses and others will continue to incorporate. Second, the provisions stipulate the same rate of income tax for all groups concerned, as is the case in a good many other businesses: no more, no less. Finally, those who are already incorporated can, in many cases, see to it that their income tax is no higher than if they were not incorporated and received their income directly.

Third, my measures provide small incorporated businesses with a privileged fiscal system when compared to what exists in the United States where incorporation provides much fewer tax advantages. They have nothing comparable to our dividend tax credit. It is therefore impossible in the United States to pay less tax by having the income pass through a business instead of getting it directly. There are tax fines levied on income from professional service businesses and personal assets businesses. Therefore, the U.S. tax system tends to discourage the practice of deferring income tax by not distributing funds. Fourth, those measures concern more than a few of the 300,000 small incorporated businesses eligible for the reduced tax rate.

Businesses in the manufacturing, processing, construction, agriculture, fisheries, resource mining and development, wholesale and retail trade sectors continue to benefit from the provisions for small businesses. It will be the same for nearly all businesses in the service industries, including hotels, motels, businesses providing personal, particular or teaching services, driving schools and general insurance agencies.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, this bill requests a borrowing authority of some $10 billion for fiscal year 1979-80. Hon. members will recall that in November, 1978 additional authority for $7 billion was granted. Most borrowing authorities obtained before November, 1978 have been used, except for a part that remains available for the next fiscal or subsequent years. Any unused amount of the $7 billion borrowing authority granted last November will be cancelled on March 31, 1979.

We anticipate for 1979-80 cash requirements of some $10,750 million, excluding exchange rates. The borrowing authority requested at this time should be enough to meet our cash requirements and a margin for contingencies like foreign borrowings. The government is expected to begin fiscal 1979-80 with rather high cash balances part of which could be used to meet cash requirements.

All unused borrowing authorities provided for in this new legislation for 1979-80 in respect of which the governor in council has not taken any action will be cancelled on March 31, 1980, under section 37 of the Financial Administration Act. Mr. Speaker, those are the remarks I wanted to make in introducing this bill which flows from my budget.

I was not in the House yesterday when I was blamed for being absent. I want to apologize to the House—

• (1740)

[English]

If I was not here it was because I had a long standing engagement to make a speech in New York before an important forum. Suddenly yesterday the opposition decided that it was a good time to have a motion. This motion could have been debated during other opposition days earlier on. In any event I was working in New York yesterday, and today I was speaking in Quebec. I have not had time to read the speeches and comments that were made in my absence. I have been informed of a few points and perhaps I can talk about them now.

Questions were asked yesterday. By the way, I would be glad, Mr. Speaker, if you would stop me at this point. If you can guarantee that during the debate on this budget bill, no one will speak about the dollar, I will shut up right away.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not want to prevent the minister from making the comments which he may deem necessary. However I think the only weakness in his preliminary comments is a reference to yesterday's proceedings, a debate which has already been concluded. If he wants to deal with general budgetary matters which he could link up with the bill under consideration, I have no objection. I am prepared to listen to the minister and judge as time goes on the acceptability of his statements.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, it was my intention to rise and not to go back to yesterday's debate but to discuss the present bill, in particular clause 70 dealing with the $10 billion and the money borrowed to support the Canadian dollar. This subject is opened for discussion, so let us hear from the minister. I would be interested in knowing his answers on this question. I will reply. His statements could be applicable to yesterday's motion, but I think it is a sensitive issue. The problem exists. It was not as obvious in the past.

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to say a few words. However, I will not refer to yesterday's debate too much.

I am glad the hon. member is a gentleman and he recognized that I had good reason to be absent yesterday. I hope that he will read the speech made by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). He did not speak well of me because I was not here. In my opinion I was doing a lot of good for Canada yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I want to raise a few points because some of the comments from yesterday make me laugh. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), when he was talking yesterday about the dollar, asked a series of questions. It was obvious that he did not propose any solutions. When he put forward solutions during the last few months he fumbled them all, from sovereignty association to the referendum and so on, even the phantom deficit. It is all related to the budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to listen to the minister's statements on the value of the dollar because that is an important issue. But if he wants to get involved in politicking, and repeat the same old rehash you hear at every street corner and which is reported by the press, which is more interested in cigarette butts and chickenshit, fine, but not in the House. I am interested in the $10 billion. I want to hear his statements on that and nothing else. He can save that for the St. Maurice region or anywhere else, if he wants.

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, a week ago the opposition was telling Canadians that we have no more reserves. We have $5 billion in our reserves. Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition got up in this House and asked why the minister was not revaluing the gold reserves.

The market knows that we have $1 billion worth of gold carried on the books at its old value of $40 an ounce. If I said that that gold will now be valued at its market value of $220 an ounce, then I would show $4 billion more in reserves. The opposition would then be the first to get up and state that the Minister of Finance is trying to fool the public by revaluing the gold reserves.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

A few days ago the Leader of the Opposition was talking about the fact that we have no reserves, and now he is saying that I am underestimating the reserves because I have $1 billion which has been carried on the books at $40 an ounce, and he says that we should probably revalue it to $220 an ounce. It seems to me the opposition should make its mind up about this matter, because the public will certainly have some questions to ask.

Relating to the level of the deficit, people on the other side are always talking about the deficit of this government and saying that the debt level is so fantastically high. I would like to tell hon. members that in 1962 under the last Conservative government—and I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was here at that time—the public debt in Canada was 33.4 per cent of the gross national product, and today it is only 18.9 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: It is quite obvious that we have a drop in our debt in relation to the GNP.

I would like to place some more facts before the House because I expect to hear some funny theories coming from the other side.

An hon. Member: Too bad their members are not here.

Mr. Chrétien: Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition and members of the opposition, during the course of asking bright questions but not offering any solutions, asked why I was not going to the IMF. It is very simple. One goes to the IMF when one is broke. Canada's credit is good. We can go to Germany, Japan and the United States any day for credit. Yesterday I was in New York and I could have borrowed $1 billion just like that. So I am not going to the IMF, and for a very good reason. When one is forced to go to the IMF it is because there is no more credit available. As well, if one goes to the IMF, the IMF will then run the country for you more or less, because they set down the guidelines. If we can go on the open market and borrow money, it is because Canada's credit is pretty good. If the Leader of the Opposition did not know that, I will tell him today.

● (1750)

The professor from Don Valley asked why we do not force the Bank of Canada to reduce its secondary reserves. We could do that. However, what would be the effect? The effect would be to push the interest rates higher. It would reduce the money supply in Canada. That is the same member who got up and complained about the high level of interest rates in Canada.

I would like the public to reflect on the policies they propose. I could give the whole list, one after the other. They are laughable. There will be other occasions for that. Tomorrow I will be before the committee.

I do not want to take much more of the time of the House. As all members know, I would have loved to have been here yesterday to reply to the Leader of the Opposition and to have talked about the phantom deficits that come and then disappear. However, I had a long-standing obligation to be in New York to speak about the future, the potential, the wealth, and the freedom of Canada. That is why I was there.

One of the problems in Canada is that too many people are negative. You do not have to travel far to realize how well off we are in Canada. One need only look at the present crisis in Iran. How many countries can face the oil and gas problem the way Canada can? We have a lot of potential. In the budget bill introduced today we give more incentives to the oil and gas industry to invest in order to find more oil and gas in Canada. We have put forward many propositions of that nature.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is not for that reason.

Mr. Chrétien: We have been the government lately. Some say too long. We have helped to escalate development of the tar sands. We have given great incentives so that exploration for oil and gas will be carried out in the north and in the Beaufort Sea.

When I see the troubled world in which we live today, I see that we are a very fortunate people. Of course this country is not perfect. After all, we are all human beings. But Canadians do not realize how fortunate we are.

Some say we do not have good economic policies in Canada. I was privileged to be in Argentina on a business trip during the recess. I was amazed at what I was told by the minister of finance of that country. He told me that right after the war Canada and Argentina were equal in terms of population, GNP, resources, and potential. We have followed two different courses. They became extremely nationalist, protectionist, and intervened a lot. We did not. We became the traders of the world. Per capita, we are the biggest trading nation in the world, almost $100 billion of trade both ways, export and import, and a gross national product of $250 billion. They followed the course of closing their borders, intervening in efficient industries, and becoming protectionist.

Look at the results after 30 years. Our GNP in American dollars is about $220 billion. Theirs is about one fifth of that. We buy and sell about $85 billion U.S. every year. Argentina buys and sells on the international market about $10 billion or $11 billion. Our figure is eight times as much because we have followed the course of an open society in trading with the world with no exchange controls, importing and exporting capital and dealing with all nations of the world. When I hear all the gloom and doom speeches, I think there is nothing better than what we have here.

Income Tax

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very interesting winding up speech on the opening of an income tax bill. In the last ten minutes the minister reopened many a debate. He has fashioned the hair shirt and he will have to wear it. The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) has been travelling as well. However, we have been sitting in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. My colleagues are now at the committee discussing precisely the points about the state of the Canadian dollar with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

I had hoped the minister would not get into "politicaillage" irrelevant, cheap political jibes. However, they did not bother me. I have heard far more—

Mr. Stollery: Where were you yesterday?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I sat in committee for seven hours, far more than the hon. member ever does.

Mr. Stollery: I was here in the House of Commons listening to all the cheap jibes from the other side.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was one of the few times you were here. I suggest to the minister that as a result of these interventions there will be replies. The minister talks about gloom and doom. He should have been here to hear the four horsemen then on this side, when the dollar was at 95 cents, and we had the audacity to peg it at 92½ cents because we were then under a controlled exchange set-up with the world monetary fund.

The situation is now a lot different. Today the dollar is at 83 cents, the lowest it has ever been in my lifetime, and I am sure in the lifetime of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton), and even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am not being disparaging when I say that, but I am sure it is longer than the lifetime of any person in this House. When the dollar went from 95 cents to 92½ cents, you should have heard the doom and gloom. Gracious me, this is nothing! Nothing is being said in comparison to what was said at that time. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) wanted to open the debate on this, that is fine. I will continue for the rest of my time in discussing the bill.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) could tell us if it is the intention of the government to carry on this debate tomorrow.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CRIMINAL CODE

NEED FOR FURTHER DEFINITIONS RESPECTING SEXUAL OFFENCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the decision in the case of The Queen v. Pink Triangle Press, whereby Provincial Judge Harris dismissed a charge of obscenity because, in his words, "Parliament has failed to define immorality clearly enough so that its courts can judge what is moral and immoral as far as it affects children". I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That as the Attorney General of Canada is severing Bill C-21, the big amendment to the Code, and bringing in a separate bill by consent of the opposition in reference to the definition of "soliciting" and "public place" as to prostitution, that he therefore also produce in the same bill a new definition of "obscenity" as far as it affects children and, in particular, make it illegal for any publisher, either by photograph or by writing, to depict a child engaged in or participating in an act of masturbation, sexual intercourse, gross indecency, etc., in light of the fact that the city of Toronto has already experienced the horrible murder of a young boy by the name of Emanuel Jaques, and child obscenity in that city is still flourishing.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR CESSATION OF EXPANDED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that employees at the Canadian Grains Commission in Winnipeg were informed yesterday that they would not receive their pay cheques today if they did not produce a social insurance number, this directive including employees with 20 to 30 years' service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the government remove the directive that pay cheques will not be issued to employees if they do not produce a social insurance number, and further, that the government cease expansion of the use of the social insurance number beyond the social assistance programs to which the government assured the Canadian public the usage of the social insurance number would be restricted.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST THAT GRANTS BE MADE TO AMATEUR, NOT PROFESSIONAL, SPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of the same Standing Order.

Not only has the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport offered some $18 million to four cities for arena construction, but she is presently offering some $29 million to the city of Vancouver for another professional complex. In the light of the result of the Soviet-NHL All-Star games, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That these proposals be withdrawn and that in their place the minister provide substantial funding for hockey coaching schools and genuine amateur hockey, the study of Soviet and European hockey systems, and the integration of a good hockey program into the public and post-secondary educational system. Further, that the minister get back to her proper responsibility, which is amateur sport and fitness and not the subsidization of professional sport.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON AVAILABILITY OF OIL SUPPLIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek unanimous consent for the following motion.

Given the uncertainty of government action with respect to both immediate and future oil supplies for eastern refineries, and having regard to the discourtesy shown to this House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in calling a press conference at 1.30 p.m. today, thus precluding an opportunity for hon. members to move under the provisions of Standing Order 26, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby):

That the minister rise in his place on motions at 3 p.m. today and make a full report to the House and to Canadians clarifying the situation with respect to the availability of oil supplies.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion at this time can be made only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

A COD'S A COD FOR A' THAT!—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the voiceless codfish, long forgotten by humane societies and by the world, but now at last recognized as the noble cod, is the subject of ecological and environmental as well as humane concern by a new organization founded in St. John's, Newfoundland, by Miller H. Ayre and known as Cod-Peace, of which Ayre is the cod-ordinator, and in view of the fact that the purpose of Cod-Peace is to protect the cod, particularly against the voracious, rapacious and unprovoked attacks of the savage seal, I would move, seconded by the codfatherly member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That Cod-Peace be supported and encouraged by all cod lovers of Canada and that the chief cod of Canada, the Minister of Fisheries, make arrangements for the support and protection of Cod-Peace and for arrangements to be made for a national yum flipper feast during the festival of the Easter seal in late March, since the time is at hand for all cod lovers of the world to rise since they have nothing to lose but their cod-peaces.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITY FOR ENSURING ADEQUATE SUPPLIES OF ENERGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the statement of complete support by the Leader of the Opposition for the demand of Premier Lougheed for provincial control over all aspects of resources, and given that Exxon has announced the diversion of 25 per cent of Imperial Oil's supply of petroleum intended for Canada to the United States, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton):

That the government reaffirms its national responsibility by ensuring that no section of this country be deprived of the benefits of the petroleum resources of the nation; also that the government, through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, instruct Petro-Can to begin negotiations with its counterpart in Venezuela, as it is doing in Mexico, with a view to replacing the diverted oil.

AIR TRANSPORT

OBJECTION TO STOL PORT ON TORONTO ISLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the recent application by Canavia to expand the Toronto Island airport for use as a STOL port, and in view of the fact that such a STOL port would operate at a significant loss for the foreseeable future, would have a serious impact on the environment and would be used exclusively by business executives, not by the ordinary travelling public, and in view of the fact that the overwhelming majority of the population of the city of Toronto have expressed disapproval of such a STOL port through their elected representatives, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the Department of Transport intervene in hearings before the Canadian Transport Commission indicating its disapproval of the establishment of such a STOL port on Toronto Island.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

MEASURES TO ENSURE ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF OIL TO CANADIAN REFINERIES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On at least five separate occasions in this House over the last ten days the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has attempted to calm and soothe the fears of some of us that the Iranian disruption of crude oil supplies was serious and would bring about a worldwide shortage and that due to the lack of any meaningful policies on the part of this government, Canada is particulary vulnerable.

Because of our exposure in the House yesterday with regard to the deplorable situation of Imperial Oil, the minister has now done a complete flip-flop and agreed that the situation is serious. Because the minister is now putting the heat on Exxon of the United States and Imperial Oil of Canada because of the disruption of their offshore supplies, I wonder if he can tell us what he is going to do about a similar cutoff of offshore crude supplies to the Canadian refineries of BP, Fina, Golden Eagle and Texaco all of which are suffering because of the same type of percentage cutoff which Imperial Oil at its Montreal and Dartmouth refineries is suffering.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member inadvertently misquoted my position: that is not a new tactic on his part. Hon. members will realize that I have repeatedly stated in this House that the situation is serious. Hansard will show that I have said it is a serious situation, but I have also said that it is a manageable situation. I believe it is manageable and I have indicated to the House why.

We have some excess oil producing capacity in the west which can be traded for offshore oil which would, therefore, take care of the eastern refineries. I have reported this to the House on numerous occasions in the last couple of weeks. What the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham does not realize is that Venezuela is a different kind of source of supply for Canada than is the Middle East. We have had a very long history of supply from Venezuela. Venezuela has been our major supplier; roughly 40 per cent of our imports come from Venezuela. I was in Venezuela about a month ago and at that time I sought the assurance of the Venezuela government and Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela, that they would continue to supply Canada. They gave me that assurance.

In the case of Exxon and Imperial Oil we are dealing with a very special situation because Imperial Oil gets all its oil from Venezuela. That is the difference between Imperial Oil and the other companies the hon. member mentioned. I think I would have been remiss if I had not insisted on the undertaking that Imperial Oil establish a direct contracting relationship with Venezuela so that Exxon cannot siphon off supplies which should be coming directly to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, due to the ineptitude of this minister and this government we will have serious difficulty next autumn, at the very latest, with respect to our oil supplies. In the reversal of the minister which took place within the last hour he admitted that next fall, at the very latest, we will have serious supply difficulties. He has indicated some remedy with regard to Imperial Oil of Canada, but what is he doing about a similar situation which is affecting at least four other Canadian refineries and companies with respect to offshore oil?

Every Canadian refinery in eastern Canada will suffer under the allocation agreement, because our own pipelines may not have enough capacity to bring even Canadian western crude into eastern Canada. What is the minister doing about these other four companies? What is he doing about the other six Canadian refineries in eastern Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what has distracted the hon. member or what has preoccupied him. I do not know why he has not been following the debates in this House. I have made it very clear over the last several weeks that the exchange arrangements, which have been authorized by the National Energy Board, of the companies the hon. member has mentioned will replace the shortfall these companies otherwise would have. Using western crude on a temporary basis, it is possible to make up for the shortfall of crude which would have been affecting those refineries. That is quite clear, it is on the record, but the hon. member seems only now to have realized what has been going on.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not only tried to pour oil on troubled waters with respect to the public of this country, but he has even lulled into lethargy some of his cabinet colleagues who should have known what the situation was yesterday. One need only go through the quotations of the minister in this House over the last ten days. I ask the minister again, very sincerely, why he has not informed the Canadian public of the seriouness of this situation. Why has he not told us the truth regarding an extremely serious situation which we are going to face because of his ineptitude?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will recognize that that question has an element of argumentation.

CONTROL AND MONITORING OF OIL PRICES AND SUPPLIES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his colleagues would take eastern Canada seriously, maybe they would make some inroads and get some political support there. I have two questions for the minister. What authority does the minister believe—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: Never mind. You have trifled with us long enough, sir. What authority does the minister believe he has, or understand he has within his competence as minister, to control allocation, to monitor that allocation, to control prices and to monitor the prices of the very high-priced oil we will get as a result of the swaps, only one of which has the approval of the National Energy Board to date?

What monitoring and what control mechanisms does he have, or does he believe he has, that he can put into place to make sure that we do not freeze in the dark in eastern Canada next winter?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): I do not think the hon. member understands the situation. He seems to be arguing that we should not try in any way to make up the shortages that will occur in eastern refineries as a result of actions taken by others outside Canada. That is quite clearly what he seemed to be saying.

I have been stating in the House for two weeks that we can use western Canadian oil to make up that shortage. That is why we have taken the policy position, which the National Energy Board is administering, on submissions by refineries in eastern Canada which will provide them, in effect, with the same volumes of western Canadian crude. I do not think the hon. member really understands the situation. He seems to be saying that we should turn it all over to the multinational corporations, we should let the multinational corporations decide what is best for Canada, and we should stand back and accept the shortages which would inevitably occur with that kind of policy.

An hon. Member: The Pagliacci of the country.

Mr. Forrestall: Thank God some time in the spring the people of this country will get rid of clowns like that.

The question I am putting to the minister is simply this. What assurances at this point can the minister give the House, the refineries and the people of eastern Canada that starting April 1 there will be an adequate supply for the refineries? We do not believe him when he tells us all is well. Let him tell us precisely what assurances he can give us that there will be an adequate supply of oil for eastern Canadian refineries, starting April 1.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have told the House repeatedly that we received assurances from the head of Petroleos, the national oil company of Venezuela. I received assurances from the Venezuelan government at the highest levels that Venezuela wanted to continue the export of 200,000 barrels of oil a day to Canada. That is 40 per cent of our imports. They are our major supplier.

● (1425)

It is because Exxon decided, for its own purposes, to intervene and to divert something in the order of 25,000 barrels a day of that oil from Canada that I took the position with Imperial Oil. Imperial Oil accepted the first time around. They have made certain other arrangements which may tide them through. Also, I have made it quite clear to them that the kind of exchanges we are talking about will not be available to them and that the shortages they then may face will have to be made up by the competitors.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

SUGGESTION PETRO-CANADA PURCHASE VENEZUELAN OIL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, despite the bland and misleading assurances of the minister in the past week, which were repeated today—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —Canadians can now, with this oil crisis, see very clearly what it means to have our major natural resources owned and controlled by multinational corporations. That is the message.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Just an hour ago, in his press conference outside the House, the minister acknowledged that the request made by Imperial Oil to its parent company to ensure we received a fair allocation had been ignored. The minister acknowledged that, but he repeated his insistence that the branch plant go back and tell its boss what to do. The minister expects us to accept that. Who does he think he is kidding?

Considering that the east coast in particular needs the assurance of supply, and considering that the parent company—in this case, Exxon—has not met the request of the Canadian subsidiary, why is the minister not taking steps to ensure that Petro-Canada be the exclusive purchaser of that Venezuelan oil about which he talked so glibly today?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela, indicated that it would like to do business with Petro-Canada. Indeed, they have entered into joint arrangements with respect to research and development on heavy oil. Also, they have had some discussions with respect to oil shipments. It is possible—I do not want to say more than that at the present time—that Petro-Canada may be able to obtain a shipment directly from Venezuela. The hon. member must recognize that at the present time Venezuelan production is committed fully.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if Venezuelan production is committed fully, I should like to know how the minister expects to make up the shortfall with Venezuelan oil.

Miss MacDonald: That is right.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering Imperial Oil is reducing its allocation to its Canadian subsidiary by 25 per cent, Gulf by 20 per cent, BP by 45 per cent, Petrofina by 35 per cent, and the government is so proud, or has been in the past, of these multinationals having control of our oil resources, will the minister now give assurances that it is government policy to do in Canada what has been done in many other nations, that is, to make a publicly-owned and controlled oil company, Petro-Canada, the principal firm in that industry in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, measures have been taken already by Petro-Canada to provide for the security of Canada and Canadians through the arrangements which I have indicated already vis-à-vis Venezuela. There have been discussions respecting crude oil purchases. I have indicated there may not be any crude oil available at the present time. Also, I have indicated to the House that Petro-Canada has been pursuing actively a contract with Pemex, the Mexican national oil company, for exactly the same purposes, obtaining a secure source of oil for Canadians of 100,000 barrels a day. That 100,000 barrels a day is equivalent to the production Canada has been drawing historically from Iran.

Mr. Paproski: That is three years down the line.

Mr. Gillespie: I am not suggesting that would be available to Canada right away, but I have suggested the negotiations with Pemex have been moving forward very well and we can expect to receive some oil from Mexico this year.

● (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on the question of assurance of supply the minister has just given the case away. He has continued to express his pious hope, with no hardrock guarantees, that Canadians on the east coast will be able to get the oil they will need in the future. He has just given the case away.

I should like to ask him a question with regard to price. Since we are not getting an assurance of supply, will he now assure Canadians that his good friends, the multinationals who are shortchanging us in respect of supply, will not in the next few weeks and months double or in any way significantly change the price they are charging Canadians for this oil to which they are entitled?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, some of the producing nations have already changed the price. OPEC announced an increase of 5 per cent at the beginning of this year, and there is another one to come very shortly at the end of the first quarter. Some of them have already indicated that the extra volumes they are presently lifting to make up for the Iranian shortage will go at higher prices. There may well be higher prices worldwide, but those higher prices are not manufactured or created by trading companies or multinationals; they are higher prices created by producing countries, and there is nothing Canada can do about that.

As to the possibility of profiteering by multionational corporations or trading companies, I have already indicated to the watchdog committee of the Economic Council, CSIP, that we will be asking it to investigate any situation which comes to our notice, or any reasonable allegation of profiteering.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURES TAKEN TO CURB SALMONELLOSIS EPIDEMIC IN LÉVIS-BELLECHASSE, QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

According to a news item published in the newspaper La Presse today, it would seem that the incidence of salmonellosis in the Lévis-Bellechasse area is such as to constitute a threat of epidemic, and 150 to 300 dairy herds representing 15,000 dairy cows could be affected. Can the minister tell the House whether he has been advised of the matter and, if so, what steps have been taken by his department to prevent such an epidemic?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are very much aware of this. Over a period of time our inspectors have run incubation tests on feed, etc., in our laboratories in Calgary. They have confirmed the fact, in the laboratories in the province of Quebec where they have also run some of these tests, that this salmonella problem has come from the feed supplied to these people in Quebec by one of the large feed companies. Both laboratories came to the same conclusion.

There is no danger to anyone drinking the milk, as long as it is pasteurized. Anyone who consumes milk in its raw state would be taking the risk of getting salmonellosis. It is a very serious thing, and it affects approximately 10,000 to 15,000 head of cattle in that part of the province of Quebec. This is something that should not have happened, but it is something that has happened. We are very concerned that this should ever happen in the feed industry to the extent it has here, and particularly to such a developed company which is known worldwide for its efficiency.

I do not know what more we can do at this time, Mr. Speaker. We are putting new feed supplies into that area, and they are trying to decontaminate—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —the committee, and perhaps the hon. member. Mr. Speaker, I think that the member who is yelling may have something, but I do not know what it is at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INQUIRY WHETHER FEED QUALITY LABORATORY WILL BE ESTABLISHED IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. According to the same news item, the general director of the inspection service of the Quebec agriculture department believes that the federal government is to blame for not having enough inspectors to ensure adequate supervision, and having to send samples to the laboratory in Calgary which naturally reduces the efficiency of what supervision there is.

Can the minister tell the House whether he plans to set up a laboratory in eastern Canada located near those producers or near the feed mills to reduce the time span between shipping out the samples for analysis, and obtaining the results?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should probably know that we decontaminate the material that is used in this feed program, and that it comes from the province of Manitoba. It is not just coming from the province of Quebec: it is associated with a wide, wide area in Canada; that is the area from which the problem arises and we cannot inspect every little batch of feed that is being used—there is no way we can do that. The feed companies have that responsibility.

The suppliers should have a sense of responsibility in relation to good hygiene practices in order to make sure these inputs to the feed program, or feed rations, are handled in a much better fashion. We have one of the best records in the world for controlling animal health and feed inspection. If we had more money, we could have inspectors running up and down the road, as is the case in some socialist countries, getting in everybody's hair; but we depend on society itself for a certain amount of efficiency.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House whether the multinational Purina will compensate the breeders for their losses? If not, will the federal government make an inquiry in order to protect our dairy industry, our dairy producers, and avoid aggravating the beef supply situation in our country?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will find, if he checks the court records, that they show this is not the same virus that causes salmonella. Having regard to the overuse of different kinds of hormones in feed, I think the record will show that the courts and the companies have been very good in compensating producers for losses.

TRADE

SITUATION RESPECTING NEGOTIATIONS ON INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—POSITION TAKEN BY CANADIAN DELEGATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which has to do with a meeting that has been going on for several months, with 70 nations, at Geneva in an endeavour to obtain an International Wheat Agreement to take the place of the agreement that has been in effect since 1971.

It has been stated today that the whole negotiation has collapsed. That being so, the result is, or could be, of momentous proportions with regard to Canada's economy and the welfare of farmers generally. I would ask the minister, what is the present position? Is it a fact that the agreement is terminated? If so, is anything being done to restore, on a temporary basis, the 1971 agreement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the agreement discussions in Geneva have come to an end. The countries were not able to reach agreement on price levels or on a price range that would have been adequate to cover the farmers' cost of production. There is a spirit of continuing the food aid convention and also of assuring that discussions can begin again.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian delegation did an extremely good job in trying to ensure that farmers were protected in regard to a fair return, and they were supported at all times by the producers' advisory group. It had been our position throughout that the producers' advisory group had to be satisfied with the kind of agreement we might achieve, or we would not want to enter one. I can say, of course, that in the absence of that agreement we will continue our work with exporters and others to achieve a fair return for our farmers on the world market.

● (1440)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that a minister of industry, trade and commerce has had a Charlie McCarthy in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tell the House what stand was taken by the Canadian delegation? Why did the delegation oppose signing the agreement which on the face of it seemed to be fair and reasonable?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to convince the right hon. gentleman that McCarthy does know the facts, the government acted upon the advice of the advisory committee. The advisory committee was made up of Mr. Turner of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Mr. Roy Atkinson of the National Farmers Union, Mr. Lorne Parker of the Manitoba Farm Business Bureau—

Mr. Paproski: Otto's friends.

Mr. Horner: —Mr. Dobson Lea of Unifarm in the province of Alberta, Mr. Al MacPherson, president of the Alberta Wheat Pool, Mr. Jim Deveson and Mr. Ivan McMillan of the Palliser Wheat Growers in the province of Saskatchewan. All those people advised the negotiating committee not to sign the agreement; that to sign the agreement as it was proposed would be detrimental to Canadian wheat producers. The government acted on that advice and their own wisdom and decided that this would not be a good agreement; that somewhere down the road a better agreement could be signed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, now that the responsibility has been taken off the back of the government and its representatives, what is being done now to bring about a temporary agreement? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I know, is greatly interested in this matter, as he should be. Could he tell the House what is being done now to assure the wheat producer that he will not find himself in an almost impossible position?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the 1971 wheat agreement will be extended past June 30. We believe that the world market for wheat is expanding and that the price is on the rise, not on the decrease. It would have been detrimental to sign an agreement when prices are too low. I am deeply concerned about the wheat farmers, as the right hon. gentleman knows. My sons will sell a considerable amount of wheat this year—

An hon. Member: Conflict of interest, Jack.

Mr. Horner: —and, of course, they and all the farmers are interested in obtaining the best price possible.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL INTRODUCE LEGISLATION TO LESSEN POWER OF FINANCE COMPANIES OR ABOLISH THEM

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that in the Hochelaga and Maisonneuve ridings along Ontario and Sainte-Catherine streets there is an extremely high number of finance companies, and in view of the fact there are cases like the one I have here where someone who borrowed $5,000 and repaid more than $800 but failed to make one or two payments discovered that he still owes $5,070 could the minister tell the House if he intends eventually to bring forward some legislation with a view to either lessening the power of finance companies or wiping them out completely and leaving that business to the banks?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government did introduce legislation in 1976 to deal with borrowing, deposits and interest rates. That bill would have obliged disclosure of all costs and charges and would have dealt with the problem raised by the hon. member. But, as he knows, that bill died on the order paper at the end of last session.

However, in the meantime the Minister of Finance has published draft cost of borrowing disclosure regulations for banks which will cover borrowing, interest rates and costs and charges with respect to bank loans. I still intend to introduce amendments to the Interest Act to deal with other types of interest.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my initial question is addressed to the Prime Minister. It centres on the report issued today by the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity which, as we know, is a body that was established last summer at the request of the Prime Minister. This body has disclosed that 33 per cent of our inflation over the past two years is due to the falling dollar, a subject which we have debated so often in this House. That is, 6.5 per cent of our inflation is due to the simple fact that the dollar has fallen so fast and so far.

On June 29 I asked the Prime Minister if he was aware that a local commentator had said that the cost of the falling dollar on inflation was 4 per cent. The Prime Minister on that date said he had not done the calculation. Would he tell the House, now, does he agree with the body that was set up at his own request, that in fact 33 per cent of our inflation is due to his falling dollar?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member said twice in his question that the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity was set up at my request. It was set up at the request of the provinces at a federal-provincial conference meeting. The federal government had other plans for the post-AIB monitoring period and the provinces asked us to proceed in this way through the Economic Council of Canada. That is just to set the record straight.

As far as the effect of the falling dollar on inflation is concerned, I have said, as has the Minister of Finance, that anybody who knows the situation recognizes, of course, that one of the effects of a falling dollar is to increase the cost of living in Canada, because Canada is a country which imports many things. It also has the effect of favouring our exports and, therefore, gives jobs to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This is so evident that I do not know why the hon. member keeps asking the question. It is conceded. If the dollar is low, it means our imports cost more and that we have to pay more for imported oil, foodstuffs and everything else.

As to its exact effect in statistical terms, calculations have been made, some of which have been given by the Minister of Finance. I do not know the exact effect in terms of the cost of living index, but I do know that it means the inflation rate is higher.

The hon. member opposite argues that we should have a 90-cent dollar. How much would the cost of living go up if we had a 90-cent dollar instead of an 84-cent dollar? It is a calculation which the hon. member can make. But it is obvious, whether it be a 90-cent dollar, an 84-cent dollar, an 85-cent dollar or an 80-cent dollar, that the cost of living is higher because of the increased cost of things imported into Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister that Sylvia Ostry, when she announced the formation of CSIP, stated that it was done at the request of the Prime Minister of Canada. The Prime Minister states that it is now conceded that there is a cost to the falling dollar, notwithstanding the fact that in December, 1978, his Minister of Finance told me, in reply to another question, that I should welcome the falling dollar.

My final question is again to the Prime Minister. As CSIP has now said that if workers and others demand income increases to match the high rate of inflation which depreciation has caused, still higher prices and more depreciation will result, what does the Prime Minister intend to do when he speaks to the workers of this country to justify the inflation which he has inflicted upon them as a result of his faulty fiscal monetary measures which have led to the fall of the dollar?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite obvious why the Leader of the Opposition has dropped the hon. member as his chief financial critic in his undertaking not to name him as his minister in a future government.

ENERGY

SOURCES OF FUTURE OIL SUPPLIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he could be more specific with regard to the replacement of 100,000 barrels to 125,000 barrels of oil which will be necessary due to the disruption of Iranian exports of oil to Canada.

With reference to the 100,000 barrels per day from Mexico, I understood the minister to say that this oil will not be available until the end of 1980, perhaps 1981 and I understood him to say today in reference to Venezuelan oil that there is none available at the moment. Finally, with respect to swaps of western oil for offshore oil, the minister said today that this will give us about 40,000 barrels per day in this quarter.

Would the minister tell the House where we will get the 100,000 barrels or 125,000 barrels of oil per day guarantee which is necessary to meet the needs of Canada, particularly Quebec and the maritime provinces, in the next eight or ten months when it will be very crucial? The minister has given us no clear indication of where that oil is to come from.

• (1450)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that I expect most of the shortage to be made up by production in western Canada which will be moved through the exchanges to which I have already alluded.

The hon. member referred to 40,000 barrels a day. When we go into the second quarter, unless the situation is normalized in Iran and production starts up again, obviously we will be faced with large amounts. I believe that excess producing capacity in western Canada can look after that shortage up to as much as 100,000 barrels a day, if that is necessary.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is going to count on exchange oil from the midwest, can he tell us, first of all, what are the available oil supplies which Canada has now? In Washington, Mr. Schlesinger has said the United States has 70 days' supply, but I think generally around the world there is an 80-day oil supply reserve.

What are Canada's supplies at the present time, and to what extent are we using up or drawing down these reserves of oil? If, as the minister suggests, we step up the production of western oil, how long will we be able to continue at that rate? Will it be long enough to meet Canadian requirements until Mexican oil is available in 1980 or the beginning of 1981?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to say at the present time whether it will be enough to make up the difference until 1980 or 1981. One cannot be sure of intervening events or whether production will be resumed in Iran. I believe that the shortages I have been referring to in eastern Canada as a result of these reallocations can be made up by western crude through the exchange route at least until the end of this year, and probably beyond that.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS TO PROTECT CHILDREN FROM SEXUAL ABUSE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. During the week the opposition agreed that Bill C-21, amending the Code, be divided so that a separate bill dealing with the new definition of "soliciting" in reference to prostitution and redefining "public place" to help the situation in Vancouver and Toronto, can be introduced. If that is a separate bill, it will have only one section and it will be a small bill.

In light of yesterday's decision by provincial court judge Sydney Harris in acquitting Pink Triangle Press, publishers of The Body Politic newspaper which published an article dealing with men loving boys, and vice-versa, and such further immoral and degrading conduct, and in light of the recent horrible death in Toronto of Emanuel Jaques who was used prior to his death as a human machine by men, will the Minister of Justice consider bringing in amendments to the Criminal Code to protect young children against this kind of propaganda which may lead to the most degrading abuse of children, particularly as the minister has dealt with it in the same bill dealing with prostitution?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank representatives of the opposition parties who have given their consent to divide Bill C-21 so that we can proceed speedily with the clause dealing with prostitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I will proceed as soon as possible to get the appropriate consent in this House.

As for the other problem which was raised by the hon. member, I know it is a serious problem which is of great concern to members of this House. I will certainly look into the issues he has raised. Obviously, I do not know whether the case decided by the provincial court judge will be appealed. This is a matter which the attorney general of Ontario will want to examine, I am sure.

Second, I believe hon. members have received various representations on the clause that is already in Bill C-21 which aims at strengthening the provisions dealing with obscenity. The government has decided to act on this matter pursuant to recommendations from a committee of this House. I would hope we could proceed not only with the clause on prostitution but with the rest of the bill if it is found that it is preferable to keep the obscenity clause in the first bill. I will take the hon. member's suggestion under very serious consideration and will advise him as to what can be done.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POWER OF CSIP TO INSPECT BOOKS AND RECORDS OF CORPORATIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I understand the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said earlier during this question period that he was going to ask CSIP to investigate any allegations of oil industry profiteering, but CSIP has said that it has access only to ordinary publicly available information, which is often incomplete and subject to revision.

Large companies were reported yesterday to be unwilling to co-operate with that agency in providing information to it voluntarily. Will the government now give this agency full powers under the Inquiries Act so that it can get full and timely information directly from companies, including the authority to inspect or compel production of their books and records where circumstances require it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question is not unlinked to the one I received from the hon. member for York-Simcoe. I reminded him that the government's intention in the post-control period was to set up a monitoring body which would have such powers.

It was at the federal-provincial conference of February last year that the provinces, practically unanimously, dissuaded the federal government from this approach and recommended that the Economic Council of Canada set up the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity. We did that. This is all the action that has been taken to date. Any further contingency action such as that suggested by the hon. member for Windsor West is being studied by the government, but there has been no decision in that regard.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FAULTY METERS ON HOME HEATING OIL TRUCKS—STEPS TO PROTECT CONSUMERS BEING OVERCHARGED

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I would draw the minister's attention to an article in the Globe and Mail for Tuesday, February 13, in which one of the minister's officials is quoted as reporting errors in meters on home heating oil fuel delivery trucks. The official is quoted as saying that over an eight-month period some 44.7 per cent of the meters checked were found to be in error. Thirteen per cent of those meters were rejected entirely.

In view of the fact that home heating oil is a $1.5 billion business in Canada, and in view of the fact that the percentage of error figures indicate that it is possible throughout this winter, which has given us some of the coldest temperatures on record, that the government could have been allowing a major consumer fraud to take place, would the minister reassure the House that massive overcharging or shortage of deliveries has not taken place? I understand that legislation is pending, but can he tell us when it will be brought in and what its provisions might be?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the inspectors in our department are the ones who brought to light these possible frauds. We have the legislation in place now. We administer legislation which deals with that sort of thing and the inspectors are acting under that legislation. They will continue with their investigation and lay charges and pursue these matters in the courts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CLAIM OF FRANCE TO FISHERIES AND TERRITORIAL RIGHTS IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of External Affairs announced outside the House that an Atlantic coast fisheries agreement had been reached with the United States concerning the east coast, while the boundary problem in the Gulf of Maine-Georges Bank area would be referred to a binding third party settlement procedure.

In light of the fact that the Prime Minister met recently with the Premier of France, and since there has been no recent announcement by the government concerning the ongoing fisheries boundary dispute which exists between Canada and France over France's claim to fisheries and territorial rights around the islands St. Pierre and Miquelon, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether this matter was discussed with Premier Barre and, if so, what was the result of this discussion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was not discussed by me. I do not think it was discussed by other people. I had an update on it, and I understand that negotiations are still in progress. Our position, which is naturally of advantage to Canadians, is still being disputed by France—but we are pursuing it.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST THAT PICKETER BE GRANTED AUDIENCE WITH PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question for the Prime Minister, who by this time is aware of the presence of Mrs. Lucille Dubé. She has been waiting outside the parliament buildings for the past few months in an attempt to bring a grievance to the Prime Minister which she feels merits attention.

● (1500)

Can the right hon. member give an undertaking that he will take a moment to speak to this lady whose persistence has aroused a certain amount of interest and sympathy on all sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Dubé's case is well known to the government. I inquired about her presence and I had a few people speak to her on my behalf. She has a case which has been before the Quebec courts for quite some time. I asked advice of the Department of Justice. It seems to be a clear case where she has a complaint. It should be made in the normal way, through lawyers in front of the courts.

As far as her allegations about the conduct of judges is concerned, this was looked into at the request of the chief justice of the province of Quebec. Apparently the report is that there was no miscarriage of justice or misconduct of any judge in this particular case. Therefore, I am afraid that we are in the presence of a litigant who has lost in front of the courts and who is not prepared to take that loss. If she wants to study further recourse, the legal processes are there and she can hire lawyers to do so.

HEALTH

LEAKAGE FROM CONFIDENTIAL MEDICAL FILES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the uncovering of the leakage from confidential files on patients in the medical department at Medical Insurance and Medical Records, the finding of medical records blowing off trucks and being strewn along the roads, or information relayed along telephone wires by shady individuals purporting to represent medical personnel, can the minister state what progress on control has been made?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the problem described by the hon. member generally applies to provincially administered health programs. However, we all share a concern over the leaks of medical information that have occurred in past months. What I can report is that a code of practice for safeguarding health information was adopted in September, a few months ago, by the Canadian Health Records Association. That code has been distributed to insurance companies, all levels of government and every party that has an involvement in health records.

As far as the province of Ontario is concerned, there is the royal commission studying the confidentiality of health records, the report of which we will all read. Justice Horace Krever is chairing it. As far as may own department is concerned and the medical records we have due to delivery of direct health services, I am not aware of any loopholes in our system. If there is any case that the hon. member knows of, I would like to hear from him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have two notices pertaining to questions of privilege. One is from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) with respect to a point raised yesterday by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). I have a notice, as well, from the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKINNON—VARIANCE IN ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), who unfortunately is not in his seat today, I am sure with good reason—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: I did suggest for a good reason. I do not think it does credit to members opposite even to imply there is anything other than good thought behind that. Members of parliament frequently have good reason for being absent, and I am sure the hon. member does today. However, I did promise the House leader of the official opposition that I would have an answer today. Otherwise I would wait until the hon. member was back either from a committee meeting, some very important work in a department or his constituency, all of which members of parliament should do. As is my commitment to the House leader of the opposition, I am making my response to this question of privilege or alleged question of privilege which was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Victoria.

I have had an opportunity to review the various references which he cited. It appears that the hon. member for Victoria has either misunderstood or misinterpreted the actual facts. For the benefit of the hon. member when he reads this in Hansard, and for the benefit of other hon. members since it was suggested that the privileges of all members of the House were involved, I would like to review the sequence of events which he reviewed in such great detail yesterday.

First, the competitors for the new fighter aircraft were required to submit their initial bids by February 1, 1978. That was done. However, while the evaluation process was under way, representations were received to provide additional time so that they could refine their original bids. The indication was that they would improve their original offers. Indeed, hon. members will recall that there were some unsolicited proposals at that time on this very important contract.

I felt it was unfair to allow some to submit proposals and not give everyone the same opportunity. As a result of that and a cabinet decision of June 29, 1978, it was agreed to grant a period up to August 1, 1978 during which time competitors would have the opportunity to resubmit their proposals. This was deemed an acceptable time-frame for all competitors. All proposals were received by August 1 and no extension of time was requested or granted after that period.

The new proposals were evaluated by the government team and on November 23, 1978, cabinet reached a decision on the short list and I subsequently made a statement on motions before this House announcing that decision. The hon. member raised the question of Chancellor Schmidt raising this with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Indeed, it was done.

I think it is the sequence of events, the dates, which has confused the hon. member. The meeting between the Prime Minister and Chancellor Schmidt was in early July when it was requested that the period be extended. There had already been an agreement to extend that period. There was no request or agreement to extend it beyond August 1.

Everything has been on schedule since then. Therefore, I do not see how the hon. member could feel that he had been misled. Indeed, if there is reason for a question of privilege, I need only refer to the hon. member's question of privilege where he used the terms "falsehood" and "untruthful replies", which while they are not the same as the four letter words that are unparliamentary, have equally the same intent. However, I do not intend to raise a question of privilege on something like that.

I believe that when the hon. member returns and sees the sequence of events, he will realize that everything has been in order and that there was a misunderstanding of the dates involved and the sequence of events. However, it grieves me that words such as this can be used for a misunderstanding and the time of the House taken up by a question of privilege requiring a lengthy reply.

I wish further to point out that at the time of answering the hon. member's question I said, and I quote from Hansard of November 7, 1978, at page 867:

I expect to have this matter before cabinet this month, hopefully with a decision on the short list before the end of the month or early in December.

We more than met that deadline. I completed my response by saying there has been some slippage because of the length of time it takes to evaluate these new proposals. I think that was a misunderstanding. I said:

—I am looking forward to the final contracts being negotiated and the final choice being made in the new year, but not before late spring of the new year.

We are in the new year, but not yet into late spring. I stand by that. It will not be before late spring.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) with regard to the question of privilege of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). I am sure the hon. member for Victoria will want to examine the matter and the remarks that have been made by the minister. In the absence of the hon. member, it might be appropriate to have this question kept open so that the statement of the minister can be examined by that hon. member. I wonder if I might reserve the rights of the hon. member for Victoria and other members of the House with regard to this whole matter.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to do so, of course; I do not think I should make a final determination of this matter in the absence of the hon. member. This is a simple courtesy we have always accorded and I have no difficulty in extending it in this case.

I would, however, stress the problem we get into when complaints of this kind are raised; that is, when there is some dispute with respect to replies which have been given. This is a political forum and a legitimate area, but it has been a long standing practice that answers given and statements made in the House of Commons are accepted by members. We therefore get on to dangerous ground when attempting to indicate that an answer has been inaccurate, misleading or false, things of that sort. And when the words "false" or "dishonest" and similar words are used, we enter into another procedural problem because these are unparliamentary terms. While I will reserve the complaint of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) until he is back in the House, I think I should point out that we must be very careful when entering into matters of this sort that we do so with great caution from a procedural point of view. I say this because although at the outset the issue may simply be one of disagreement, if terms of this kind are used it could expand into other fields of privilege; for example, the use of unparliamentary language. That is a cautionary note I wish to enter now.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has given me notice of his intention to raise a particular matter.

MR. CROSBIE—TELEVISION INDUSTRY—ALLEGED FALSEHOOD IN REPLY OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter which I believe to be a breach of the privileges of members of this House. In answer to an oral question I put to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on Tuesday, February 13, the hon. gentleman gave an answer which, as far as I can see, was false. For a member of the government to give a member of the House false information is certainly an interference with his privileges as a member in his attempt to do his duty. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have listened to the words Your Honour has just spoken. This is the first opportunity I have had to raise the matter having regard to the necessary research involved. Although I knew on Tuesday afternoon that something was wrong about the minister's answer, it was not until this morning that I was able to contact the industry concerned and find out for sure that the information was not accurate.

I asked the minister a question about colour television sets manufactured in Canada in December. I pointed out that there was a decline of 81 per cent in December, 1978 as compared with December a year earlier. I also said that on a year to year basis sales of Canadian made colour television sets were down by 114 per cent. I asked the minister, in view of the fact that the Canadian TV manufacturing industry was disappearing, whether the government had any program to assist the industry during the present year. I asked him what action does the government intend to take. In his answer the minister mentioned the pleasure it gave him to place on the record that his department, under the enterprise development program, had specifically helped one of the major television manufacturers in Canada, namely Electrohome, and helped to put that company back on its feet.

In fact, Electrohome is not manufacturing television sets, Mr. Speaker, but I will come back to that. The minister continued:

> —we were out of production of colour television sets for some time, but now Electrohome has gone into production because of the advantages due to the present value of the Canadian dollar. We are now enlarging our production of colour television sets.

He added that the increased production should show up in the statistics for 1979.

We contacted Electrohome in this connection. The fact is that there is only one company in Canada which manufactures colour television sets. There were 11 in 1973 but there is now only one significant producer, RCA. Electrohome does not produce, does not manufacture, any television sets in Canada.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In December, 1978 Electrohome received a $15 million loan from the Royal Bank under the enterprise development board arrangements and it was not for the purpose of putting them into the position to produce television sets or manufacture them. There was no such connection. This assistance was given because Electrohome was seeking to reorganize due to the collapse of the consumer electronics market, TV manufacturing and the like, which was precipitated by the government's tariff policy and what is alleged to be foreign dumping. Electrohome had to get out of the business of manufacturing TV sets in Canada because of what they allege to be the failure of government policy. They then got a loan from the government to go into other activities. That is what the loan was for, not to manufacture television sets. The fact is that they are not now manufacturing television sets. Because of the devaluation of the dollar in July they plan to begin assembling 28-inch colour TV sets in Canada. They will not manufacture them and they are not manufacturing them now.

The minister laughs. The minister is careless with the truth. He is grossly negligent about the answers he gives in the House and now he chooses to laugh. The minister is asinine. We cannot trust a word he says in the House, Mr. Speaker. He says he has helped one of the major television manufacturers in Canada, namely Electrohome. He says we were out of production of colour television sets but now Electrohome has gone into production. He says we are not producing television sets. He says we are now enlarging our production. Every one of those statements is false. Yet the minister thinks it is amusing that he should get up in the House and give us information which is inaccurate, which is false. I submit—

Mr. Speaker: Order. With respect, the hon. member has now made an allegation of falsehood against a minister and has used an unparliamentary term. If he wishes to make an allegation that the minister has deliberately misled the House, he will have to stand by that allegation and make it specific so that a charge can be identified and take its proper course. If not, the allegation that the minister has said something false to the House is unparliamentary and the hon. member cannot be permitted to use that term.

Mr. Crosbie: On that point, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, Beauchesne at pages 110-112 says that since 1958 it has been parliamentary to use the expressions "false" and "falsehood". These have now been found to be parliamentary. If Your Honour says they are not parliamentary expressions I can only say that in my view the minister has given the House false information. Whether he is grossly negligent in what he says or whether he did it deliberately is not for me to say. The minister will have to explain whether he is just careless with the truth or whether he was deliberately misleading the House. I do not know. After I have heard his explanation I presume I will have to accept it, but I say a blatant falsehood was expressed in this House on Tuesday.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Crosbie: I certainly state that. The minister was careless with the truth. It is my submission that it constitutes a violation of the privilege of members of the House to be given this kind of false information when a question is answered.

If Your Honour should find there is a prima facie case, I would be prepared to move that the reply by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the question asked by the hon. member for St. John's West, recorded in Hansard on February 13 at page 3162 and containing assertions demonstrably at variance with the facts, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation and report. I do not think we should be subject to these misleading and slipshod answers, even if they are not worse than that. The minister will have to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would draw again to the hon. member's attention the passage in Beauchesne to which he has referred. At page 105 of the excellent fifth edition, of which the Clerk of the House is co-editor, it says at the middle of the page:

● (1520)

Since 1958, it has been ruled unparliamentary to use the following expressions:

Then follows the term to which the hon. member referred. Therefore, I take it as withdrawn by him the use of the word "false", and I again caution the House that these are the kinds of dangers we get into. However, the minister is anxious to reply.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, let us examine what is happening in the House. If members of parliament expect detailed answers to specific problems, the long standing practice has been to put them in writing on the order paper. Ministers have then taken the questions to their departments and obtained detailed answers. Many hon. members do that, but ministers should not be expected to have details at their fingertips all the time. That is quite impossible.

My answer to the hon. member is that we are helping many companies. We helped one specifically. One could have questions as to the words "manufacture" and "assemble". What is the difference? Manufacturers make component parts. An assembly plant takes component parts, whether they are made at that plant or somewhere else, and puts them into an automobile, television set or whatever. Granted, by narrow definition there is a difference between those words, but thousands of assembly plants are also manufacturing plants, and that is the interpretation I used with regard to Electrohome.

Today the hon. member admitted that the enterprise development program did help the one named company substantially. I do not think that the company will deny that. The hon. member did say today that the company is going into the business of assembling colour television sets. I said that that company is now going into the business of manufacturing colour television sets. I do not think there are many manufacturing companies which do not reach out and obtain parts from other sources and assemble them in their own plants. The only misleading must be with regard to the difference between "assembling" and "manufacturing", and I say again that thousands of manufacturers are in a sense assemblers as well.

If the hon. member wants me to define every manufacturing plant as just an assembly plant, I do not think that is really the essence of the question. The question is whether my department helped a manufacturing plant or an assembly plant in going into the television business. Is that company going to go into the business of manufacturing or assembling colour television sets? Yes, it is, and the hon. member admits it is; so I do not know what his argument is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the last sentence of the minister's procedurally concludes the matter. This is in fact an argument, as almost all these cases come to eventually, an argument or disagreement. Occasionally they do result in a discovery that somehow misleading information is given to the House, and invariably when that is done the person who is responsible indicates that it was not done deliberately and gives an explanation. That is almost the invariable result.

However, I do again caution the House that taking issue in this way with answers or making argument or refutation and getting into accusations of falsehood, deliberate misleading or dishonesty in some way raises a much more serious procedural problem than it attempts to solve. I think we have to be very careful about that.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. For my sake and for the sake of the House I want to have something cleared up. In his ranting, raving and clown-like manner, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) used the expression "deliberate falsehood". I think quite correctly Your Honour stated that the use of the word "false" is unparliamentary and quoted the most recent edition of Beauchesne. Am I correct in believing that the hon. member did use those words, that you, sir, asked him to withdraw them, but that he has not withdrawn them as yet?

Mr. Speaker: For the sake of the record—and I trust the hon. member for St. John's West will agree with this—let me point out that he indicated he had used those words after consultation with one of the editions of Beauchesne where he had seen a reference, as I am sure all hon. members have, that, typical of any word, depending on the context in which it is used, it is found to be parliamentary. So there are some precedents which lead one to the interpretation that the word has been used in a parliamentary context in the past.

On the other hand, I corrected him and said that the use of the phrase "deliberate falsehood" or "false statement" in the context in which he used it came under another set of precedents in the same volume and that it was therefore unparliamentary.

I understood the hon. member's position to be that if he was mistaken in his view of the precedents, he would withdraw that expression. I took that to mean that the use of that language has been withdrawn by the hon. member.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not mind saying that if I said that the minister uttered a deliberate falsehood, I would withdraw that. The minister is completely careless as to whether he tells the truth or not, but I do not say it is a deliberate falsehood.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), with respect to the business we will be dealing with for the balance of today and tomorrow and perhaps next week. It might be helpful to the House if the Deputy Prime Minister could indicate to us what he intends to call and what are the major priorities of the government in terms of legislation between now and, let us say, the Easter adjournment. Would the minister be prepared to do that?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the House will continue today with debate on the budget bill. Tomorrow I would like to call a number of items. Following consultations which I have had with representatives of the various parties today, I understand that it will be possible to deal tomorrow with a number of important items not requiring extended discussion, beginning with the second reading of Bill C-28 dealing with the Northwest Territories Act and Bill C-35 dealing with government organization and relating to the proposed department of fisheries and oceans.

We want also to deal with Bill C-17 relating to dangerous goods and, finally, with a reference to a committee with respect to nuclear waste. On Monday, I would like to continue with discussion on the budget bill and on Tuesday and Wednesday the bill in the name of minister of urban affairs, Bill C-29. Thursday will be an allotted day, if that is agreeable to hon. members opposite.

I would be prepared to attempt next week to project beyond this particular batch of bills. With reference to the budget bill I should mention that I also have in mind the other bill emanating from the budget dealing with the Excise Tax Act. When consideration of this batch is completed or when there is a prospect that we can complete dealing with this batch in the House, I will be able to indicate what we will try to do between then and the Easter recess.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understand that a representation has been made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre), that estimates would be tabled in the House on Monday.

While I am on my feet, let me indicate to the Deputy Prime Minister that consultations have taken place with respect to the reference regarding nuclear waste, and we are prepared to allow that to go without debate, so I assume we will be making the appropriate reference tomorrow.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I may refer first to the last item mentioned by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), we too are prepared to deal with the motion regarding the reference to a committee of matters relating to nuclear waste and we are prepared to do so without debate. As a matter of fact, we see no reason why that might not be dealt with today.

We have noted the other matters and are in general agreement as to the calling of the items. Of course, their disposition could be another matter.

There is one particular question I should like to put to the minister. It will not surprise him because I have put it to him a good many times. On Monday when I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) about the possibility of something being done with respect to one or two outstanding items affecting veterans, the Minister of Veterans Affairs said, as it is recorded at page 3110 of Hansard:

> —they are all under consideration and if anything can be done within the time he has mentioned, we will be more than glad to do it.

The time I had mentioned was the time between now and the end of this parliament. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) to find a way to bring an end to this business of my going to him and then to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and then back to him. Can the Deputy Prime Minister not get an agreement to provide time to the Minister of Veterans Affairs in this session so that at least one of these measures can be brought forward?

● (1530)

I just hope the government House leader will answer my question about veterans affairs.

An hon. Member: Truthfully.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to prolong the session in the manner indicated by the hon. member. I agree fully with the comments that were made by my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does that mean we will get some legislation?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the government House leader made no reference to the bill dealing with international economic boycotts. I want to ask him, following an answer he recently gave in the House to a question of mine, whether in fact any progress is being made in putting that bill forward and whether any kind of agreements have been sought or worked out for the second reading of that bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked earlier by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton on the tabling of the estimates, let me say that I understand the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) proposes to table the estimates on Monday. He mentioned that to me and asked whether I thought it would be possible, and I have no objection. So my friend can take it for granted that the estimates will be tabled on Monday, unless I advise him to the contrary today or tomorrow.

With respect to the question dealing with the legislation on the Arab boycott, I have not had an opportunity today to deal with it with the representatives of the other parties, but I will undertake to raise the matter at an early date with representatives of the various parties and if there is an indication that we can pass the legislation within a reasonable time, say, a sitting day, I will be glad to bring forward the legislation at an early date. Under those circumstances I would consider bringing it forward. I have had discussions with respect to the items I have announced today, and I cannot make any commitments about the Arab boycott legislation until I confer with my colleagues of the other parties, which I will do under the conditions I have mentioned.

Mr. Andre: I would like to ask the government House leader a question with regard to the estimates. Could he confirm that the usual practice, the practice of the recent past, whereby the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) makes a statement on motions followed by responses from opposition members, will be the situation that will pertain on Monday?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not know what the President of the Treasury Board has in mind, but I will make sure that the hon. member's representations are drawn to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Deputy Prime Minister but there is one point I should like to raise with respect to Bill C-35. There have been some discussions in the House that possibly part of that bill might be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. If that is agreeable to the government, we would agree to have Bill C-35 referred to that standing committee which could deal with the bulk of the subject matter quite appropriately.

While I am on my feet, may I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to make a reference of the commodity tax. It has been hanging around for some time and I have asked the question many times before. I think there is some concern that the matter be dealt with in the House.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the reference with respect to the commodity tax, I know the matter has been raised in the past.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A commitment.

Mr. MacEachen: I recollect that the action with respect to that has been delayed because the committee has been so well occupied—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacEachen: —but I will look into the matter and see whether the committee can deal with it.

I am quite prepared to seek consent of the House, at second reading of the bill relating to government organization, to have it sent to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. It is quite agreeable to me and to the government but it would require the agreement of the House at that time, and I hope we can do that tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could we not give that agreement now?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I would be prepared to ask for agreement that when we give second reading to the bill on government organization tomorrow, it be sent to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). It concerns questions asked today by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) with regard to Bill C-21 and the response by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) about splitting the bill, and the definition of obscenity, specifically in terms of clause 20 which makes amendments to section 166 of the Criminal Code. It flows out of a private member's bill in my name which has been discussed. At that time several spokesmen said there would be agreement by the government to that bill but that it would be incorporated in the omnibus Bill C-21. In view of the commitment given by the Minister of Justice today, can the President of the Privy Council give us any word on that?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will have to make some inquiries and get further information on that. I understood the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) today to have agreed to the possibility of splitting that bill and putting one particular provision into a separate bill so that it might be dealt with more rapidly. I gather the hon. member is now asking whether an additional item could be put in that bill rather than in the over-all bill. I will raise the matter with the Minister of Justice.

BILL C-35—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. First may I ask whether you have sought the unanimous consent of the House to have Bill C-35 referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, as suggested by the Deputy Prime Minister?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I did not understand that. I understood the Deputy Prime Minister to have indicated that he would ask for that consent when the bill is given second reading tomorrow. Does the House wish to pass that order now? Is consent being sought now?

Order Paper Questions

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House wish to give consent to a motion now being put amending the reference of the bill on government reorganization so that Bill C-35 be sent, following second reading, to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 340, 697, 744, 833, 896 and 955.

POTASH UTILIZATION SEMINAR—CHINA

Question No. 340—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. With reference to the official exchanges between Canada and China in 1977 mentioned in the annual review of the Department of External Affairs, on what date did the Canadian Potash-Utilization Seminar take place and (a) who were the participants and audience (b) what was the content of the program?

2. Did the Department of External Affairs offer similar seminars in other countries with the goal of improving the market for potash?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. The Canadian seminar on potash utilization, which was conducted as part of the ongoing trade mission program sponsored by ITC, also included discussions on dry-land farming techniques. These took place from May 4-20, 1977 during visits to Peking, Nanking, Shanghai and Kwangchow.

(a) The Canadian participants were led by an official of ITC, and included two representatives of the Potash Institute of Canada, a representative from the potash industry and one agricultural expert from each of the University of Saskatchewan and the Saskatchewan department of agriculture. The audience consisted of technical officials, principally from the Chinese ministry of agriculture and forestry, the academy of science and various agricultural scientific institutes.

(b) The program covered two main areas of discussion.

(i) potash utilization—including factors influencing potash requirements, responses to potash in various soils and crops, application rates and methods and experiences in other countries.

(ii) dry-land farming—including techniques of soil management and water conservation, tilling and seeding practices and cropping and weed control systems.

2. There were no similar seminars on potash offered in other countries.

FISHING VESSEL INSURANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 697—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the government currently negotiating an arrangement with Fisherman's Mutual for the transfer to the private sector of fishing vessel insurance and (a) if so, what are the terms of the arrangement (b) if not, how does the government intend to proceed with the transfer to private underwriters?

2. How many of those currently employed in the Fishing Vessel Insurance Programme will be laid-off or dismissed as a result of the transfer to private underwriters?

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. The government is currently examining the possibility of establishing a fishermen's mutual or mutuals to replace the Fishing Vessel Insurance Program (the F.V.I.P.). This examination involved consultation with fishermen and their organizations to solicit their support for the mutual or mutuals which could provide them with greater benefits than the F.V.I.P. In the event that the establishment of a mutual or mutuals is not feasible the government is prepared to retain the F.V.I.P. and does not intend to transfer it to private underwriters unless the fishermen or their organizations indicate this as their preference.

2. The F.V.I.P. will continue in existence and provide services to fishermen until such time that a mutual or mutuals could be operational. This should take at least a year. As a result, there will be no lay-offs or dismissal of personnel from the F.V.I.P. during this period.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-37, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had a speech of about 50 minutes in length from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) introducing this bill at second reading. I have now had the opportunity to re-read it. Unfortunately it confirmed my original assessment of the speech. It was more of self-congratulation to the government than one of explanation. The purpose of the complex tax bill and many of its technical amendments should have been explained. There are some improvements in certain areas, and there are features which I should like to discuss in some detail.

● (1540)

I wish the Minister of Finance were in his seat. I intervened when the Chair was about to cut the minister short as he was discussing the dollar situation. I felt there was plenty of scope for that under clause 70 of Bill C-37. Rather than dealing with the particular problem, the minister went off on a scurrilous diatribe with a ragtag of political jibes. The minister attempted to justify his position by taking a shot here and there. It did nothing to advance the study of the bill. I would have thought the minister would welcome the opportunity to deal with clause 70 since it is one of the principal portions of the bill. It has nothing to do with income tax but is a procedure whereby the borrowing authority is tagged on to a bill. It is a procedure which is quite acceptable.

Last year the government tripped itself up over its own ineptitude in attempting to increase a borrowing authority in an appropriation bill under a one dollar item or some similar procedure. Of course, the Chair rejected it. Last November the government had to introduce a borrowing authority bill in which it sought authority to increase its borrowing capacity by $7 billion. Approximately four months later the government is back saying, "We have to borrow another $10 billion."

This will cause considerable discussion in the House. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) attempted to elicit a good deal of information from the Minister of Finance, and this morning we ran into a stone wall on this particular point. While we received some information to the effect that presently there is outstanding some $2 billion worth of borrowing authority under legislation which expires on March 31, 1979, there will be a further $3.8 billion worth of authority which will be valid under previous legislation. With the $7 billion sought in this bill for the fiscal year 1979-1980, there will be authority for approximately $13.8 billion. Why is this money needed?

If one looks at clause 70 of the bill, it indicates that the moneys will be required for public works and general purposes. Let us look at what may come in under public works and general purposes. Most if it will be there in case the government wants to go to the rescue of the dollar. In the past year some $5 billion has been borrowed in the foreign market. Under clause 70 the borrowings may be in foreign currencies and at various interest rates. As well they may be repayable in foreign currencies, but the loans are strictly for the purposes of the exchange fund, to maintain the Canadian dollar as a so-called floating dollar. Of course, this is a complete misnomer; it is a misrepresentation. It is not even a dirty float; it is a supported dollar. When one gets into the market to the extent of $5 billion, there is no question that it is an active support and that the government is utilizing, in a rather vain effort to maintain the level of the Canadian dollar, whatever tools are available in a monetary sense.

The government does not have courage.

I want the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) to take note of that. On the eve of an election, the Minister of Finance and this administration does not have the moral courage to tell Canadians that it will have to engage in other measures of a fiscal nature. The available choices are being discussed with the governor of the Bank of Canada, yet none of them are palatable. Goodness gracious, they will be a heck of a lot more palatable than for Canadians to see the Canadian dollar go down below 83 cents, and perhaps it will go down to 79 cents. This is not doom and gloom.

I heard all the Liberal speeches in 1962 when the dollar was going down from 95 cents to 92.5 cents. Let me assure the House that they got the wind up in the Canadian public at that time on a staged and spurious situation. This time the situation is of their own creation because of their inability to maintain confidence in the Canadian dollar. The fact the dollar is down to 83.5 cents is merely a measure of the lack of confidence in the international market and on the part of Canadians themselves.

Mr. Breau: Nonsense!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) would not know where to invest a $10 bill in the foreign money market. Why is it that Canadians since 1973 have been spending on a capital basis up to $700 million more in foreign markets than foreign moneys are being invested in Canada for capital purposes? Why is it that Canadian corporations are investing in the United States, buying buildings, building skyscrapers and shopping plazas?

Mr. Breau: Because they are businessmen.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Precisely. They are businessmen and they know they will receive a better rate of return in the United States. The tax on corporate profits in the United States is lower; their return is much quicker; the businessmen do not have to wait around for endless periods, as they do in Canada, attempting to get regulations passed by this board, this bureaucrat, this provincial or municipal office. It is a crazy situation which we have.

All hon. members opposite refuse to recognize the bottom line of the deficit in the current account of close to $5 billion. Perhaps there will be a commodity surplus this year, and perhaps there was one last year; but when there are service charges, dividends, travel accounts and a negative flow of capital, then there is a current account deficit. There is no pushing beyond that line. The Canadian government has to cover this deficit by borrowing abroad. It has actually reached the point now that it has to borrow to pay the interest on its loans abroad. This is the position of a bankrupt, and this is what we are being asked to accept in clause 70. This is fully within the subject matter of this bill.

● (1550)

The minister did not say yesterday or this morning before the committee what he intends to do. He must come clean and be honest with the Canadian people. Mind you, to ask the minister in his present frame of mind to be honest with the Canadian people is perhaps asking too much and reaching too far. After all, we are on the eve of an election and these are the unsavoury details members on the government side would like to sweep under the rug. These are the unsavoury things that have accumulated over the past years as a result of this government's financial maladministration. This is the sort of thing that members on that side are trying to convince the Canadian people does not exist. They want to wave flags in our faces. As someone has said, try going to your banker with a flag in your hand to see how far you get. That is precisely what the Canadian public is being invited to do by this present administration.

Bonus issues are being blown entirely out of proportion. Let us look at this form from the point of view of taxation levels in this country, from the point of view of the value of the Canadian dollar, the degree of inflation and the level of unemployment. Let us see what progress there has been over the past four and a half years in this regard. Everything has gone up; unemployment has gone up from 5.1 per cent to 8.1 per cent, inflation has gone up, and now the rate of inflation is increasing. The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) should know that as the value of the Canadian dollar goes down the rate of inflation will increase. This is a fact because about 70 per cent of our imports come from the United States. We all know that it will be difficult to turn our economy around, but this fact is being played down. All these things have occurred since 1963, and those on the government side cannot duck that fact.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance talked about Canada being a great world trader. That may be; we are proud of the exports this country has managed and we are proud of the progress we have made in the way of exports. What is the situation when we take away petroleum products from that increase in exports? That is where the greatest increase has been in price and quantity.

An hon. Member: What about pulp and paper?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Are you suggesting an increase this year over the last couple of years? The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) knows that three years ago the lumber business in British Columbia was not worth a nickel.

An hon. Member: But now it is.

Mr. Anderson: It is certainly much better now, is it not?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is temporarily better now, but that is not progress. As a matter of fact, petroleum products are declining in quantity. Our exports of these products have declined in quantity as a result of deliberate government policy.

I often wonder about the position taken by members of the NDP, particularly the leader of that party. He wants the Canadian government to restrict the export of petroleum and natural gas. Let us talk about what the governor of the Bank of Canada said the other day that $500 million could be found immediately if we increased our exports of natural gas to the United States. The governor said he was impatiently awaiting the government's favourable decision in this regard. I am paraphrasing his words, but that certainly was his attitude. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) says we should not export any natural gas; rather we should send it to Quebec City and the maritimes. That just shows how bankrupt he is in his idea about how long it takes to build a pipeline.

Who is going to pay for the cost of converting the heating units in the homes in Atlantic Canada from oil to gas? Who is going to pay for this conversion cost all the way along the river from Quebec City? Is it to be paid by the Canadian government, the Quebec government or the governments of the Atlantic provinces? Even with the best of intentions it would be five or six years before a gas distribution system could be developed in the maritime provinces and down river to Quebec City and beyond. In the interval the small gas producers in Alberta would be shut down. They would be shut down as a result of a lack of cash flow. The gas in Alberta at this time is not necessarily being produced by the big producers who can afford to wait. There are many small independent companies producing gas. They have been making this point all along. If hon. members on the government side would attend meetings addressed by representatives of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada and the Canadian Petroleum Producers' Association, they would realize this fact.

In the past two years the Government of Canada, along with the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, have stimulated exploration for petroleum and natural gas. This has resulted in increased flows of gas. We have provisions in this bill for the same purpose. In spite of this, members of the NDP and some government members say we should not export gas at this time. They say we should not increase flows at this time, that we should shut these wells down, and perhaps in five years we will be able to get some gas into the Atlantic provinces, providing the people there want it and are able to pay for it. That just does not make sense.

The provisions the minister has included in Bill C-37 to encourage the production of petroleum and natural gas in Alberta, Saskatchewan and elsewhere will produce more gas. I am prepared to congratulate the minister in that regard as that is one of the better features of his bill. This feature was hard to come by. It was like pulling teeth to convince this administration that this had to be done. It was only because of a tough stand taken by certain provincial governments in this regard that this occurred. Whoever it is that feels he is to be congratulated for this, let him strain his shoulders patting his own back. This was a good decision and I unreservedly support it.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) would be the first to recognize that there is going to be an awful lot more gas available unless this industry is shut down. Many small independents are at the point of having to shut down now. No money is recovered from gas that is down a well. It may have cost $150,000 to $250,000 to drill the well, but where is the cash flow until that gas is sold? That points out the idiocy of this situation. On one side we have people saying we should shut production down and not export. No wonder they have no members in that area. They could not give away ice-cream cones to a five year old. It makes one wonder sometimes. I know that the minister is in the House and when he closes the debate—

● (1600)

Mr. Chrétien: Right now!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —there will have to be an explanation of this $10 billion. There will be available to the minister in fiscal 1979-80 $13.8 billion. There is the $2 billion which will expire on March 31, then there is $3.8 billion which will carry on into the next fiscal year, and he is now asking for another $10 billion.

From the budget speech we learned that there would be a cash requirement of $10.7 billion for this coming year, and that leaves a cushion of approximately $3 billion. What we want to know is what the minister's estimate is of how much of that will be required for foreign exchange borrowing. This is not an issue which the minister can sweep under the rug. We are down to the point where, as I said yesterday, in my adult lifetime I have never known the Canadian dollar to be as low as it is now.

It is no longer a case of saying, "Oh well, we'll be able to sell more and more at that lower price". That just does not wash because we buy too much, and as a result the cost of imports affects the cost of living and leads to higher inflationary rates, so the wheel turns once more. All we get is a recurring cycle but at a faster pace. It is a suicide course. There is no doubt that at some point the government will have to bite the bullet and take some other measures, and there are many open for consideration. The government must take the public into its confidence and explain to it what it intends to do and for what purpose. The public has not heard a thing about this tool.

Having said that, I would like to turn to other features of this bill. The one thing which bothers me about this particular bill, and I might as well touch on it at the beginning, is the redefining of small business. To me, it smacks of a dog in the manger.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) understood the effect of this, and if he came from a part of the country where this provision applied, he would realize just what I am talking about.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He has trouble getting to work in the morning.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I refer to small business, and the definition is there. If the province of Quebec had only followed the province of Alberta in this rather salutary example, the notaries would be allowed to incorporate. I am not going to go through the process of what this means, but what is significant is that a corporation pays income tax at a lower level, based upon the limitations of small business. The owner of the small business then draws his salary, upon which he pays income tax at his personal rate, and what is left may be invested.

The point which some of my constituents have made is that it gives them the choice of investing this money in, for example, an RRSP, the purchase of Canadian equities, and so on. But it is an investment made by the individual concerned. There are many people on the other side who would say, "Tax everybody to the hilt, the government will take the money and spend it as it sees fit". That is what it is saying in this bill.

I would like to know what the difference is between an architect and an engineer with regard to why they should be able or not able to incorporate. Why should a qualified insurance agent be allowed to incorporate but a notary or an individual who limits his legal practice to that of a solicitor is not allowed to incorporate? Is a dentist a naughty businessman? Is a doctor a naughty businessman? They are both professionals. There are many other professionals in business who are entitled to incorporate and therefore take the benefit of the rates. They ultimately pay tax because the accumulation of money as a result of the lower tax rate must ultimately be disbursed. In the interval, however, they have been able to invest their money.

Mr. Kaplan: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for York Centre is one of those who feels that the almighty state is more intelligent and better capable of investing the funds. The idea is stupid. The hon. member is not stupid, but the idea is stupid.

Mr. Kaplan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Certainly; I will debate this with you all day.

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member has mentioned that professionals such as doctors, lawyers, architects, dentists and so on are small businessmen too. The government also feels that these businessmen should have the benefit of this special tax incentive. Has the hon. member ever heard, in all the years he has been a member of parliament, of a doctor, lawyer, architect, or dentist risking bankruptcy in their business to build it up? Does that not indicate that the entrepreneur who takes such risks—not the doctors, lawyers, architects or dentists—needs such benefits?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The architect has always been able to do it and will continue to do so.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I know what the abuse is because it is done in the province of Alberta, and other professionals want to get the same thing. The point is that it is a question of principle as to whether the individual or the state can better invest the funds.

It also portrays something which is prevalent in government circles, and I have noticed it for a number of years, and that is that as soon as money is earned, it must be taxed, and the state has the inalienable right to a big share. Of course, it is wrong because the individual does not exist for the benefit of the state; the state exists for the benefit of the individual. That is the difference between the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party and, of course, the New Democratic Party is even worse. I should be able to take my own money and invest it as I see fit.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member could put two dimes together, I am sure he too would change his mind and say that the individual is the better judge of where his money should be invested, whether it be in Canadian industry or whatever. It is not so that the government can put money through Petro-Canada and buy Pacific Petroleums. That is fine. That is the kind of individual who would not last five seconds in Alberta or Saskatchewan, but that is where money is being made.

● (1610)

I am sorry the government has seen fit to take this step. Unless the government can show why it has to say to a lot of self-employed businessmen that they are going to have the benefits of the small business tax rate, many of them will never get to the top of the earnings. Remember, $750,000 is a lot of money to earn over the years. Surely if an architect is able to do that, why not an engineer?

Then we come to the insurance agent, the master plumber, the highly skilled carpenter, the tool setter; why can they not incorporate? They are all skilled men and so are the others, and that is where there should be parity. But somehow or other in the philosophy of the Canadian taxation system he who gets out and scratches is the one who will be hit hard by taxation. He is the one who will be bled. He is the one who leaves the country to go elsewhere. I have been told this by businessmen from one end of the country to the other. He who is successful is driven out because as far as the state is concerned he is the chicken to be plucked. He is the one with the guts, the ability and the persistence to get out and do something, and he is the one to be taken.

This act is a classic example of this philosophy. I suppose I could take a shot at those who would inspire this within the public service. They do not have the same opportunity as businessmen. These people are on salary. Therefore, no one can be any better than they can. So there is great inspiration by those people, at least I suspect there is. For example, there are accountants, doctors, dentists and lawyers in government service who are not at all averse to seeing this provision in the act which will deny to those in private practice and business the opportunity of being able to switch around and defer tax. After all, he who is in the public service has the privilege of an indexed pension. But the businessman has not. Surely he should have the opportunity to put aside something of what he has earned in a place where it can grow. If there is inflation this investment will grow with inflation; I will not deny that. Why should he be reduced to a position where he cannot avail himself of that which is given to so many others? I would like to question those who are on salary and those who would propose this particular action as to what was behind their motivation. I guarantee that many of them would admit it is because of the premise: "I cannot do it, therefore he cannot do it".

Let us go through the ways and means motion. I want to give a brief overview of the act. My colleagues, of course, will spend a good deal of time on the detail of this. Then we will be in committee of the whole where perhaps we will get more answers.

In the budget papers for November 16, 1978, in the section headed "Notice of Ways and Means Motion", No. 7 reads:

Interest and Taxes on Land

(7) That the Act be amended to permit a deduction for interest and property taxes incurred after November 16, 1978 with respect to land held primarily for the purpose of resale or development by a taxpayer in the ordinary course of his business.

Of course, this is right. It is an expense of doing business. Why should the individual be denied? After all, it was denied to him in order to try to stimulate movement of land so that it would not be held in the hands of developers. What happened was predictable. Every cent of tax and interest which the developer had to pay was merely added on to the sale price. The chap who is buying, that dear old sucker, the member of the public, the consumer, was the one who had to pay. Taxes and interest were added on to the price of the land and he was the one who had to pay. This all too often happens. It is said: "We are trying to protect the consumer; we are going to add on some costs; we are going to do this and we are going to do that." Then we hear the cry: "More controls". This is just like capital gains on the sale of land. The consumer or the ultimate purchaser is the one who pays that much more and everyone thinks he has been very smart. Instead he has been rather stupid.

There have been changes with respect to restricted farm losses and that is good. There have been changes to the research allowance. Here I must say the government has finally opened its ears and listened. It has accepted the fact that there must be inducements for expenses in research, not for the big international firms but for small firms. Unless they get this inducement, research will not be done.

The benefit of research is not only for the firm concerned or for the value of the product; research means the employment of hundreds and thousands of highly skilled people, young men and women—and also many not so young—who have been educated in Canada, and elsewhere often at our expense, to become highly trained in the scientific fields. There is not one nickel's worth of value in any program of scientific training unless it will be used. It must be used in research, either pure or applied. In this particular instance we are seeing attention or encouragement given to applied research. I think the Minister of Finance has to be congratulated for this hesitant step he is taking. It may be that as a result of experience over the next year or two or three allowances will have to be increased. This is something that is borne out only by experience. In any event, it is a step in the right direction.

Clause 17, which comes under the heading of unemployment insurance benefit repayments, is a rather curious provision. I do not reject the provision at all. I do not know why it is made a general rule, but it reads:

● (1620)

That for the 1979 and subsequent taxation years,

(a) the benefit repayment of an unemployment insurance claimant be deductible in computing the taxable income of the claimant for the taxation year to which the benefit repayment relates, and

(b) such benefit repayment not be deductible in computing the claimant's income for the taxation year in which it is paid—

In other words, if in 1977 an individual became entitled to an unemployment insurance repayment but for some reason or other it was held up and paid only in 1978, it shall not be taxable in 1978 but in 1977. I think that is correct. I would like to have seen the minister go one step further. This is of benefit to those in the public service. The negotiation of contracts in the public service is a lengthy procedure. Ultimately there may be an agreement or an award with a great deal of retroactivity. However, moneys paid on a retroactive basis are not attributable to the tax year for which they are being allowed; they fall into income at the time of payment. Many public servants are therefore doubly penalized. As a result of that retroactive amount falling into the last taxation year as a lump sum, the marginal rate will have gone up. Therefore, a good part of the retroactive benefit is lost.

We can adjust taxation back and forth. There is absolutely no reason why a retroactive salary award cannot be apportioned over the period for which it is awarded. It may go back two taxation years. It is not unknown in the public service to go into three taxation periods, and should be adjusted on that basis. I suppose it is a matter of administrative expediency that the moneys shall be collected when paid, not when they were earned.

When an award is made either by negotiation, an arbitration tribunal or someone else, surely it should be spread over the period concerned. If this is recognized with regard to unemployment insurance benefits and the allocation of premiums, it should be recognized with regard to wages and salaries and any increments arising therefrom. I again quote:

Canadian Exploration Expense

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

(19) That the provisions of the Act permitting the deduction of Canadian exploration expenses incurred before July, 1979 by individuals and non-principal-business corporations be extended to expenses incurred before 1982.

Why not all the way? Why are we so hesitant about getting rid of the principal occupation rule? During the fifties and sixties it operated to the disadvantage of those in western Canada when we were at a competitive disadvantage with Americans who came into the independent oil fields and took away the whole business, just like one would take candy from a child. Canadians were halted by an old-fashioned, out of date concept with regard to oil and gas. It is finally recognized that 100 per cent of expenses in so far as Canadian exploration is concerned in petroleum and natural gas fields can be deducted by individuals and non-principal-business corporations.

Why does this only take effect in 1982? Why is the government grudging for three years? Is it because they cannot get rid of that vestige? Is it something to be begrudged? Again it is the concept of people who do not understand the value of getting out and doing something. Then there is this provision:

(21) That

(a) the definitions of Canadian development expense and Canadian exploration expense be clarified to ensure that, for taxation years ending after May 6, 1974, they include the expense of completing an oil or gas well in Canada, and

(b) The definition of Canadian development expense be extended to include expenses relating to the recompletion of an oil or gas well in Canada incurred after November 16, 1978.

That is of advantage. It is good.

Storage Rights

(24) That, after November 16, 1978, a right, licence or privilege to store petroleum, natural gas or other related hydrocarbons be included in the definition of Canadian resource property.

Resolution No. 25, exploration and development expenses, is certainly good. I do not like what is said about the limitations on small business. I wonder what pressures the provincial governments were able to put on the federal government to get into this field.

There are a number of other resolutions, numbering into the seventies. I will not read them all. I think I said enough to cover what should be said at this stage of the reading of this bill. My colleagues will go into other fields. Many of the points included in the ways and means motion are pure housekeeping, plugging holes and clarifying situations which regard to the Income Tax Act.

Possibly some of the most uninteresting drudgery in parliament is amending the Income Tax Act, unless there is something that will really hit us hard. There are some small amendments that are of great benefit to the Canadian public. The individual worker has his allowance increased from $250 to $500. Perhaps there is some difficulty there determining what is that working expense. In any event, it was coming to the worker. After all, there has been more than 100 per cent inflation since the provision was put into the act some years ago. Therefore, it is only a catching up to what is known as a worker expense.

There are some inequities with regard to worker expenses, moving expenses and proposals to tax some of the benefits given to workers. For example, railways, airlines and others issue travel passes as part and parcel of salary and retirement benefits. These may be taxed as a benefit. If the government is going to get into that, I just wonder whether it will get into the price of meals in factory cafeterias that are sold at the break-even point. Is that not a benefit to the individual?

Are we going to tax the individual all the way through for all the benefits he receives? Some are already suggesting, as someone was last week, that travel arrangements and the issuing of passes to members of parliament and members of legislatures should be a taxable benefit. Of course, that is nonsense because it means I would be taxed twice as much as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with regard to that part of my income; he has to travel to Winnipeg and I travel to Edmonton, double the distance. As far as Air Canada is concerned, this is an allowance paid by the Government of Canada for me to get to my home, which is twice as far away as that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. However, I would be taxed maybe two or three notches above him. I know he would not mind that as an individual, but I do not think that I should be taxed less than members from British Columbia or more than those members from the city of Ottawa who do not get any passes for air travel at all. It should not work out that way.

● (1630)

I am wondering about another area from a social point of view. It arose during consideration of Bill C-8, I think it was, with regard to family allowances and the question of taxation. There was a grouping of family income to arrive at $18,000—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Bill C-10.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I thank the hon. member for giving me the correct number. That is a concept of joint family income. It seems to me high time that someone here, either a committee of this House or a joint committee of this House and the other place, should look into the advantages and disadvantages of a joint family income tax return. I have in mind returns by the husband and wife or in the names of a male and female who live as husband and wife. It is time to recognize such a partnership even though it does not have, shall we say, the official status of a marriage. Under the Income Tax Act there are any number of instances where there is a penalty attached to being married which does not apply to concubinage.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I know the hon. member may feel he gets all the benefits. But if he is a doctor or a lawyer, for instance, he cannot pay his wife for her work as a secretary. He could, though, if the personal corporation were continued. That is one of the advantages of the personal corporation. A bricklayer, a plumber, a truck driver, a plasterer or a carpenter working on his own cannot employ his wife to look after the office or as receptionist for his small firm. He cannot employ his wife if he is in partnership with someone else either. The firm has to be incorporated before the expenditure can be charged to the business and paid to her. The same applies to a wife working in a small restaurant operated by a husband. This is why one often finds the wife of a restaurant operator working for another restaurant operator, simply because it is more expensive under the Income Tax Act to function as legally married than it is in concubinage.

This leads to one conclusion. We ought to reconsider this aspect of the law, and it seems to me it could be put into the chapter of the pros and cons of filing general income tax returns between husband and wife. This is done in California. I know there is a great fear of income splitting, but that could be monitored just like everything else. It would remove these anomalies which exist under the Family Allowances Act or with regard to payments under the negative income tax. It would also eliminate anomalies as far as elderly persons are concerned. Here is a classic example: a special supplement is now payable to senior citizens where there is an income deficiency. If two people do not happen to be married, they can both collect a benefit; but if they happen to be married, only one of them can get it. I think this is a totally unjustified penalty imposed on those who are legally married.

In due course this bill will be given second reading. Its progress will depend on the answers we get from the Minister of Finance. I can assure him on a personal basis that I regretted that last ten minutes of his speech yesterday because it will make the passage of this bill much more difficult; his comments certainly opened up the scope of this debate far beyond the income tax issue. I do not think it was worthy of the minister and I hope he will not try dealing with a bill in that way again; it will be the last time he will put one through in any event.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) provided another example of the government's fundamental economic policy—do as little as possible while talking loudly about how good life is in Canada. This last budget, like those that preceded it, guarantees that our economy's weakness will continue without hope of a new direction. The same poverty of ideas and wealth of blustering was well exhibited by the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau's) last August 1 pronouncement. He pledged to do all in Canada's power to achieve growth in the order of 5 per cent for 1978, yet his method offered only a warmed-over version of Tory spending restraint, restraint which has to cost the economy many thousands of jobs.

We have not achieved the Prime Minister's August growth target, nor have we achieved the finance minister's forecast of growth in 1978. The November 1978 budget was accompanied by a new set of optimistic forecasts from the minister, but other forecasters, both in Canada and elsewhere, have taken the wise step of ignoring the minister and making their own, much less optimistic and more realistic predictions about the Canadian economy in 1979.

The weakness of this government and the lack of confidence created by the government's economic record are apparent for all to see in the dollar's performance. The minister tried to deal with that aspect yesterday and I want to spend a few minutes discussing the reasons for the present weakness of the dollar. We have to ask ourselves why the dollar is weak. It is weak because the economy is weak. We have unemployment, inflation, unused industrial capacity and unsolved constitutional problems. Other countries do not know who is going to be in charge of this country. They do not know what our tariff structure is going to be. They do not know who is going to be in charge of our resources, and they show that they do not know where we are going by marking our dollar down. Because people in Canada and in other countries believe that our economy is weak, they are speculating in Canadian dollars by selling them. This is probably reducing the value of the Canadian dollar by between six cents and seven cents.

The government has no policy with respect to unemployment or prices. The government has no plans for the future which it can announce, so people are afraid, and rumours about gimmicks such as exchange controls or temporary surtaxes on imported goods—which would be illegal under the GATT agreement—abound. Spokesmen for the Conservative party propose those kinds of gimmicks. If we want a stronger dollar, we have to convince the world that we will have full employment in the near future and that we will have an industrial strategy which will encourage a modernized and technologically efficient manufacturing industry.

The budget speech some months ago and yesterday's speech by the Minister of Finance did not even set out goals of that nature. The minister should by now realize that the economy does not change just because he says it will. However, in his speech yesterday the Minister of Finance did outline objectives which he hopes to achieve with his budget and with his bill. Upon close examination those objectives turn out to be as hollow as many of his earlier statements.

One objective which the minister proposed was, and I quote, "to maintain and accelerate growth and demand through fiscal stimulus". Consumer demand is not likely to increase substantially as long as the Prime Minister and other cabinet members successfully keep increases in wage rates lower than increases in the consumer price index, yet that is a deliberate well thought-out but wrongful policy objective of the government.

In the third quarter of 1978 real consumer spending grew only by less than 1 per cent, despite stimulative retail sales tax cuts, which the government has neither renewed nor increased. Current forecasts such as that of the Financial Post are for a consumer spending increase of about 3 per cent, no better than the last two years and much worse than the 5 per cent to 8 per cent gains of 1971 to 1976.

Another stated objective of the budget is to put downward pressure on prices and costs, yet the Minister of Finance has already abandoned his goal here. In November he predicted an inflation rate of 6.5 per cent, but this month before the Canadian Club of Toronto he changed his forecast to 7.5 per cent, undercutting the thrust of the budget and confirming the forecast of the Conference Board that inflation will remain in the 8 per cent range, if it does not go even higher. The budget is supposed to stimulate capital spending, but as I shall show later, it is more likely just to stimulate corporate profits.

Research and development is also supposed to be stimulated, but even the Canadian Manufacturers' Association estimates that only $50 million more industrial research and development will be produced, when increases of more than $250 million a year would be required to meet the government's own target in this field.

Another objective of the budget is stated to be assistance in overcoming the structural problems of sectors of the economy, yet the effectiveness of such measures is surely undercut by the minister's rejection of an industrial strategy for the country. Every industry and every plant gains from this tax measure, regardless of need and of who will benefit.

Similarly, the attempt to use across the board tax breaks to support regional development cannot hope to succeed as long as there is no specific industrial strategy with realistic goals and measures to tackle the structural weakness of the economy in poor regions. Every study of the Atlantic region proves conclusively that despite the hundreds of millions of dollars poured in through regional economic expansion development grants, relative earnings of people in the Atlantic provinces as compared with Ontario have not changed at all.

The minister now admits publicly that most economic forecasts of the growth rate in 1979 are, and I quote, "considerably less than 4 per cent", yet this budget adds up to zero impact on the economy at a time when the country needs economic leadership rather than another year of paralysis at the top.

The minister's November prediction of growth was between 4 per cent and 4.5 per cent. This should be compared with forecasts in the order of 2.2 per cent by Pitfield, MacKay, Ross and Wood Gundy, and 3 per cent according to the Financial Post and the Chase Manhattan Bank. The most optimistic private sector forecasts are in the order of 3.4 per cent, the optimists being Dominion Securities and the Conference Board.

Mr. Chrétien: And OECD.

Mr. Orlikow: It is little wonder, therefore, that yesterday the minister did not repeat any forecasts of economic growth in 1979. Even he must be coming to realize that the budget is having no impact on the economy. The only real tax cut in the budget, the increased deduction for employment expenses, will give the average taxpayer less than a dollar a week more to spend. This will not help meet the rising cost of living, nor will it generate the growth in consumer spending needed if we are to start creating jobs for the unemployed.

Over-all, the level of stimulus contained in the budget does not even undo the damage resulting from the August 1 cutbacks. The government admits this in the budget when it forecasts the number of new jobs in the coming year will be 200,000 less than the number claimed for 1978. I suggest that the minister study the long article in this week's Financial Times before he boasts about the supposed number of jobs created last year. There is no question that the economy needs a major stimulus. This budget and this bill fail to provide that stimulus. The reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax would have been a positive step if the government had taken steps to ensure that the reduction was passed on quickly to consumers rather than issuing polite, begging requests for business to pass on the tax cut and endlessly promising to look into the situation.

We in this party have repeatedly urged the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to call in the major companies which have raised their prices so markedly, despite record profits, and to warn them that they ought not to do it or else there will be legislation to stop those practices. President Kennedy did that with success, President Johnson did that with success, but this government refuses to take even those gentle steps. Still, the major personal tax reduction and the major program of public investment which are also needed to turn the economy around are totally lacking in this government's thinking.

The lack of stimulus from the budget is seen in the continuing stream of forecasts about a slower rate of growth in 1979 than we had last year. It can be seen in the recent call by the Financial Times for a new budget only three months after the November effort which is embodied in this bill. That editorial in the Financial Times stated, and I quote:

> The world is not unfolding as Finance Minister Jean Chrétien expected three months ago and the finance department should be preparing a revised budget to deal with the changing situation.

After noting the signs of a new economic downturn and the irresponsible attitude of the Tory and Liberal discussion of economic issues, the editorial continues, and I quote:

> The deficit is a phoney issue. The real issue . . . is what they can do to get the country out of the present stagflation swamp and the seemingly endless succession of years in which growth is a meagre two or three or four percent . . . Chrétien's new and higher estimate of inflation this year, with its predictable effects in reducing consumer demand and raising the personal savings rate, makes an adjustment in economic policy urgent. A budget with cuts in personal income taxes should be brought down, and it should be produced before the election.

● (1650)

I want to remind hon. members that that quotation is from an editorial in the Financial Times, certainly not one of the most radical journals of opinion in this country.

One group which continues to feel the brunt of the Liberal-Tory economic philosophy the most is the unemployed. This is the second winter in a row when more than a million Canadians will be out of work, according to the official statistics which omit the hundreds of thousands of hidden unemployed. Government officials may try to talk about the present seasonally adjusted unemployment rate of 8.1 per cent as being positive, but they should try talking to the people who are out of work and cannot find another job. Last month the unemployment rate, seasonally adjusted, was 17.7 per cent for young people aged 15 to 19 years. They are going through harsh experiences at the hands of the low growth fiscal policies of this government, and the experience will stay with them for the rest of their working lives. I would point out to members that they are among the best educated, highly trained young people we have ever had in this country, and they want to work. They do not want to be unemployed.

Another problem with which the November budget did not deal was inflation, yet across the country millions of working and unemployed Canadians are forced to watch their income being eaten away by price increases. The solution of the Minister of Finance is to ask people to put up with the high cost of food. He has suddenly realized that there is not much he can do about the cost of food and certainly very little he can do, if anything, about the cost of imported food. That is precisely what we told members of the House and members of the government when they brought forward their co-called wage and price anti-inflation program in 1975. The minister offers the people of Canada the hope of a stronger economy in the future as compensation for a shrinking food dollar. Well, the value of the minister's previous predictions of a rosy future shows that it is no compensation at all.

The dire situation of people living on low and fixed incomes was well illustrated recently in the Winnipeg Tribune. It was reported that one retired couple had to tell the gas company: "We just can't pay the high heating bill. We have to cut down on the food or cut down on heat." What a commentary that is on the way the system is working at present! In the past five years, the price of gas has increased two and a half times in Winnipeg, and it was up 16.5 per cent last year alone. Electricity just went up 15 per cent and phone rates are going to increase by 20 per cent in April. Yet rates are lower in Manitoba than in most of the other provinces.

Those basic needs of life are increasing at the same time as inflation of food prices is entering a second year of astronomical heights. The AIB reported that food prices went up an average of 19 per cent in 1978, and already there are predictions that in 1979 the price of a pound of hamburger will exceed $2. The days when the ordinary person can occasionally buy a steak are long gone. Those food prices increased no matter how often the minister last year tried to talk food prices down, and of course to blame the increases on the supposed crying on this side of the House.

His April, 1978 budget included a forecast of 7 per cent inflation. My colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), and I told him then that inflation would be between 8 per cent and 9 per cent, yet he chose to continue making unrealistic predictions which both undermined confidence in the government's economic management and offered an excuse for the government's failure to deal seriously with inflation. His unrealistic predictions about inflation next year will have exactly the same effect.

Indeed, the government has been so preoccupied with adopting the Tory restraint philosophy measures that it contributed to the inflation of food costs by removing subsidies from bread and milk. The director of the Montreal Diet Dispensary, Agnes Higgins—incidentally, an organization which has performed yeoman's service on behalf of the ordinary citizens of Montreal—has said that the price increase of staples, particularly bread and milk, are seriously affecting low income families. She said:

There are no substitutes for these foods. Once they go up, they never come down, and they cover most of the nutrition needed by children.

Let us look at the problem of providing housing for people. Housing is a major factor in the living costs of most Canadians. The cost of purchasing a home has gone up steadily and relentlessly in recent years. On Tuesday of this week my colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), pointed out to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) that the price of rough cut spruce plywood had risen from $185 per 1,000 board feet in January of 1978 to $245 in January of 1979. In the same period, two by fours rose from $195 to $265, and that in a year when the profits of the wood products industry rose by 87 per cent.

When the minister was pressed to take some action to stop this unconscionable rip-off of the Canadian people, what was his reply? Well, he questioned the figures, which came from such reliable and disinterested publications as the Globe and Mail and the Financial Post, and he promised to refer the matter to the director of investigations under the Combines Investigation Act. This is not a criticism of the director of investigations. The government has delayed so long in bringing forward and passing serious anti-combines legislation that not only will it take him two or three years to make a finding, but when he does it, unless we have adequate legislation, he will not be able to do anything about it. So we know that the cost of housing will continue to escalate because the government simply refuses to take any real action.

The budget and this bill may ignore the plight of the low income earners, but the government's corporate friends were, as usual, taken care of. The need for that kind of friendly attention is demonstrated by the 22.8 per cent increase in corporate profits in the third quarter of 1978, which contributed to profit gains of 25.6 per cent for the full year, according to the Globe and Mail survey. That was permitted and encouraged by the same government which is trying to force working people to accept wage increases of just 6 per cent when the cost of living is going up by 8.5 per cent. Companies and the government say that this just compensates for poor profits in earlier years, yet profits fell only once in the past five years, a 5.2 per cent decrease in 1975, and that was more than compensated for in other years. Profits increased 20 per cent in 1974 and 46.4 per cent in 1973. Only one of the major banks saw its profit decrease in even one of the last five years, and large oil companies have been equally profitable. A report published by the Economic Council of Canada has documented that between 1968 and 1973 the chartered banks earned excess profits of more than $200 million, and we know that since then their profits have increased at an even faster rate.

The government's decision to keep cutting corporate taxes flies in the face of all objective evidence about the effect of such cuts. Let us just look at the record. Corporate tax concessions contained in the recent budget, which came on top of a series of corporate reductions over the past two years, have had the effect of reducing the tax load for Canadian corporations to one of the lowest in the developed world. The background paper accompanying the budget argued that manufacturing in this country already enjoyed effective rates of 10 per cent to 12 per cent lower than those in the United States. Effective rates in the resource sector are even lower.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the file or files in the possession of the Department of the Solicitor General and/or in the possession of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police relating to the investigation concerning Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that I am not a vindictive person; all I seek is truth and justice. Briefly I should like to outline the history of the proceedings which led to my motion for the production of papers, related to irregularities within prairie farm assistance administration during the 1974 federal election campaign.

For hon. members who are not familiar with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, it was established by a former minister of agriculture, the Hon. James Gardiner, to compensate farmers for crop failures due to drought, hail or otherwise. Payments were calculated according to crop yield within a specified block up to a maximum of $800 per farm. While that was the original intention of the act, the federal government has since used it to administer lower inventory for tomorrow, known as LIFT, and the grassland incentive program; the former to encourage farmers to decrease wheat production, and the latter to pay them for each acre converted from grain to grassland when the grain market was in the doldrums.

Whether or not prairie farm assistance was acceptable, the general feeling was that in some cases the administration was a political arm of the Liberal party. Prairie farm assistance employees who refused to become involved politically with the Liberal Party deserve commendation for their courage and honesty. Many who got jobs were defeated Liberal candidates or other Liberal supporters who used their positions, influence and taxpayers' money to promote the Liberal cause in western Canada. Also I was informed that in some cases applicants for positions were screened by defeated Liberal candidates, and if not approved they were not accepted. Unfortunately, some of those who passed scrutiny allowed themselves to become political tools, especially during election campaigns.

Shortly after the 1974 federal election, I was contacted by a prairie farm assistance field supervisor who had evidence of what he considered to be wrongdoing within that administration. My informant had instructed employees under his supervision to discontinue farm inspections during the election campaign to avoid involvement in politicking. This meant they would not be paid. An expense account submitted by a field man in my informant's territory crossed his secretary's desk. It claimed travel expenses for the period just prior to the election when he was not supposed to be on the road. The secretary noticed the sheet had been forwarded from the prairie farm assistance Regina office but had not been signed by the district supervisor. Thus she reported the error to the prairie farm assistance office in Regina. Within minutes she received a call from Regina instructing her to return the expense claim to that office immediately. In other words, the district supervisor was to be bypassed.

Even to the most naïve person, such procedure would suggest something was out of order. Apparently the claimant in question was being paid for political work during the campaign out of prairie farm assistance funds made up of farmer contributions and federal tax dollars.

Had the government admitted in 1974 that in fact there was something irregular and assured the House that remedial action would be taken after an appropriate internal investigation, I would not have found it necessary to call in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and this prolonged uphill fight for justice would not have developed. By covering up and denying misuse of funds, despite evidence to the contrary, Canadians are left with the justifiable impression that the government does not take seriously fraudulent acts involving tax dollars. The government prefers to waste House time in cheap insinuations unrelated to public funds, while covering up payment of tax dollars for political gain. Is there no one in that group of nobodies who would attempt to be somebody by facing up to responsibility?

The prairie farm assistance irregularity was brought up in the House first by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and myself in December 1974, without satisfactory action on the part of the federal cabinet or the then minister of agriculture. At my request later that month, two constables from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police commercial crime branch visited my office to examine prairie farm assistance documents in my possession. Subsequently the RCMP decided there was sufficient evidence of irregularities within prairie farm assistance travel expense accounts to warrant an investigation. As a result, on May 27, 1975 an information was laid against the chief of field operations for prairie farm assistance in Regina, which read in part that he:

> —did by deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means defraud the public in general and the Government of Canada of the sum of $399.78 by making or causing to be made false and fictitious travelling expense accounts and work reports contrary to section 338(1) of the Criminal Code of Canada.

I might say that the amount is small and that the person so charged must deal with his own conscience; but principle is at stake here and my purpose in this motion is to find out who instigated the false work reports and expense claims. I do not think the accused did so on his own initiative.

At the preliminary hearing on July 17, 1975, the acting judge of the magistrates' court in Regina made an order, at the request of defense counsel, banning publication of evidence taken at the hearing. During the inquiry witnesses for the Crown were belittled, verbally abused, intimidated and subjected to tactics more in line with a dictatorship than a democracy. Following the hearing the accused was committed to stand trial. Would it not have been more humane and sensible to have handled this case responsibly within the departments concerned than to force the accused employee and witnesses into court?

I should like to put on record portions of the transcript of that hearing. This document contains questions and answers between the Crown counsel and the witness. It reads:

Q. Do you personally belong to a political party?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. What party is that?

A. That's the Liberal party.

Q. And did you back it in 1973?

A. No answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Young) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hate to interrupt the hon. member, but since he is reading from a transcript of the hearing, I wonder if he would be good enough to tell us the page and question numbers to which he is referring because they are listed in the transcript.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I commenced my remarks by reading question No. 37, which appears on page No. 46. It continues:

Q. Did you in 1974?

A. If there happened to be an election that year I did—

● (1710)

Then going on to question 42 it reads:

You have been, over the years, a member of the Liberal party?

A. Yes, I have.

Q. When did you next hear from—

The reference was to the accused and the answer was:

It was probably in May in '74.

Q. And under what circumstances?

A. He asked me if I wanted to work for, help out in the campaign.

Q. And there was a federal election held on July 9, 1974?

A. I believe there was, yes.

Then he asked how the accused contacted him and his answer was:

I believe he contacted me by phone.

Q. And what was said at that particular time?

A. Oh, I think he asked me if we had a candidate nominated and if I would help in the campaign. I don't think—I think that is just about all that it amounted to.

Q. And how did you respond to that question?

A. I think the way I responded was that I told him I would think about it and let him know.

Q. And did you in fact let him know?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. When—how did you do that?

A. Sometime after that.

Q. A matter of a few days?

A. Maybe a few days, maybe a week or something like that.

Then question 56 reads:

And what did you say, what was said on that occasion?

A. I believe I told him that I would help with the elections.

Q. And what, if anything, was said about compensation?

The answer to the question numbered 59 is:

He told me I would be compensated.

At sittings of the District Court Judges' Criminal Court at Regina on December 2, 1975, the Attorney General's agent instructed the clerk of the court to enter a stay of proceedings.

In view of the documentary evidence of misuse of PFA funds, I asked the then minister of agriculture whether or not the employee charged with fraud had acted on his own initiative or on the instructions of another. He replied that he accepted the ruling of the court, and my legitimate question was overlooked. Court or no court, a minister should be willing to accept responsibility for an employee's performance, particularly if it is a fraudulent act within his jurisdiction.

Having been stymied by irresponsible ministers at every turn, I was forced to submit a motion for the production of correspondence, expense accounts, wage claim reports, field-men's work reports, etc., between PFA employees in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and PFA in Regina for the period May 8, 1974 to July 8, 1974.

On July 7, 1976 the parliamentary secretary to the agriculture minister informed the House that PFA records were transferred to the Public Archives when the Regina office had been closed and could be viewed there, but that internal correspondence had been destroyed. Is it not strange to have such correspondence done away with when there remains about $9 million in the PFA fund?

Having evidence in my possession of impropriety within the PFA administration, I do not need to review the records transferred to the Public Archives. I continue to wonder, as do many Canadians, why internal correspondence, no doubt in part related to fraudulent expense accounts, was destroyed. Can there be any doubt that those communications were conveniently removed to cover up illegal doings on the part of some person or persons other than the employee who was charged? The government leaves itself open to that suggestion.

When the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain asked the minister who decided to destroy the Regina office papers, as it appears in Hansard for July 8, 1976, the minister replied that the person in charge of the office, that is, the employee accused of fraud, decided that all insignificant documents should be destroyed. This House and the general public will never know their contents.

As a last resort in my quest for clarification I presented a motion to have laid before this House a copy of the contents of the file or files in the possession of the Department of the Solicitor General or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police relating to the investigation concerning Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration. I have not mentioned every approach I have made to cabinet ministers in this House to get this matter satisfactorily cleared up, but the motion being discussed now dates back to July, 1976. I believe the RCMP would be prepared to give up the documents if it could obtain the approval of the Solicitor General's department.

Thank you very much for allowing me the privilege of bringing this matter before the House at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the presentation this afternoon by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). Perhaps I should point out to the House that this is not the first time this motion has come before this parliament. It was first put on as a motion for the production of papers by the hon. member on July 13, 1976, but it did not come up for debate in the first session of this parliament.

It was again put down as a motion for the production of papers on November 17, 1976. The then parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general, my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee), replied to the hon. member that it was not possible to produce the papers he wished to see because they related to police investigative matters conducted by the RCM Police in the province of Saskatchewan under the direction and control of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. The hon. member was told at that time that it was the attorney general of Saskatchewan who had refused to allow the production of the papers in this House. That was explained to him quite fully at that time by those who participated on this side of the House.

Notwithstanding that, the hon. member, still not satisfied although having had a fairly thorough debate during the second session of this parliament, put the matter down for the third time as a motion for the production of papers on March 16, 1978. It did not come to a debate in the third session, but it has now been put down as a motion for the production of papers as of December 6, 1978.

I cannot really give the hon. member much more of an answer than he has already received or that has been explained to him on a number of occasions. The matter was debated fully and explained during the debate which took place at the second session.

The solicitor general of the day wrote to the attorney general of Saskatchewan. Perhaps I should be technically correct and say that it was the deputy solicitor general who wrote, and permission to table the documents was refused. That information was requested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) during the debate which took place at the second session. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, wrote him a letter back in July, 1977, confirming that in fact the deputy solicitor general had written to the attorney general of Saskatchewan and in turn had been told that the attorney general did not consent to the release of the papers.

In addition to that, in general terms it has not been the policy of this House at any time I am aware of that police files and investigative matters are ever released on a motion for the production of papers, simply because they could contain all sorts of assertions, allegations and things that may not as yet have been proven in court. Such a release could compromise the police in the effectiveness of their investigations, and it could make it very difficult for them to work. It might also compromise people who have come forward voluntarily to give the police information. That in a nutshell is the simple reason why these papers are not produced in this House.

I could make a number of points in explaining that to the hon. member. I could go back and quote, as my colleague did, from sources as far back as Lord Palmerston showing why in the British parliament and, through that system, this parliament, such papers are not produced. It is RCMP policy and long-standing police policy that police files are not disclosed to the House of Commons or made public in any way. The necessity for confidentiality of police reports was recognized many years ago in Great Britain, and that is supported by the fairly well-known statement of Lord Palmerston back as far as 1865, to which I have referred.

The production of confidential police reports in the House of Commons might seriously jeopardize the good administration of justice and could seriously impair the success of future investigations of this nature. In this particular case an investigation was carried out by the RCM Police as a result of allegations of the misuse of funds under the prairie farm assistance administration in Saskatchewan in late 1974. The case was investigated and prosecuted under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of the province of Saskatchewan. The details of what took place are a matter of record and they are available to any member of this House. Obviously, the hon. member for Red Deer has those details in the transcript of the proceedings which can be obtained from the office of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. I am referring to the transcript of the proceedings at the preliminary hearing.

The alleged offence—and I stress "alleged" offence—although the matter comes under a federal statute, was considered to be of a criminal nature and the charges were laid under the Criminal Code by the attorney general of Saskatchewan. The prosecution was also conducted under the authority of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. As I have said, the concurrence of provincial authorities for the release of police investigative reports to the House of Commons has not been forthcoming.

The hon. member for Red Deer, in trying to make the case that there was some political hanky-panky, quoted from the transcript. He suggested that there was a possible cover-up. The hon. member was very selective in the questions and answers which he read from the transcript. The case which he attempts to make out through the transcript does not carry all the way through the transcript. Just to refresh his memory and to present the whole picture to members of the House who have not had an opportunity to read the transcript, I would refer the hon. member for Red Deer to question 28 at page 45. The Crown is examining the witness upon whom the case turned. The transcript reads:

Q. Did you talk about politics?

A. Well, I believe it came up.

Q. And in what way?

A. I really don't recall how it came about, how we started it.

Q. In any event, what was the gist of that discussion?

A. Pardon?

Q. What was the gist of, the essence of that discussion?

A. You mean what became of that discussion?

Q. What did you talk about?

A. You know, I really can't recall what we talked about. We talked about the program.

THE COURT: The Grassland Incentive Program.

One could go to other pages in the transcript. The hon. member quoted from page 46. Let me take him to page 48 which he conveniently overlooked. Question 64 by Crown counsel reads:

Q. Okay. And did you in fact work in the election campaign for the Liberal candidate in the area?

A. No, I didn't.

Q. Nothing at all?

A. Oh, I put up the odd poster in the evening.

Let me go to some other pages because I think that the questions and answers bear out a case which is quite different from the one which the hon. member for Red Deer was attempting to make.

Mr. Towers: You are incriminating your own man.

Mr. Young: We are now into cross-examination, Mr. Speaker. I am reading from page 68, question 245:

Q. In fact, you basically kept politics separate from your job, didn't you,—

A. That was our orders when we first started working for PFA.

Q. And Mr. Buchan never really changed those orders, did he?

A. Not that I know of.

Q. At least he didn't come to you and say we are now going to have a new method, we're going to mix politics with work, did he?

A. No.

Q. Never even suggested it to you at any time, did he?

A. No.

That presents a slightly different case which is coming out under cross-examination before the judge.

Mr. Towers: By a defence lawyer.

Mr. Young: Of course, a defence lawyer on cross-examination.

Mr. Towers: Who put words in his mouth.

Mr. Young: I would invite anybody, Mr. Speaker, to read the transcript, and they will see exactly how the case for the prosecution fell apart. Its own witness fell apart and as a result the testimony upon which the Crown based its case did not hold up in a court of law; and that is what a court proceeding is all about.

On reading through the transcript I would like to bring out some other interesting points. Here is question 269:

Q. Let me put it this way, Mr. Kormendy. You wouldn't be considered a truly active Liberal, would you?

A. Not really. I wasn't really that much interested in it.

This is the man to whom the hon. member for Red Deer referred in trying to make out a case that he was misusing PFA funds. Question 270 reads:

Q. And, in fact, in the past you had really not done very much campaigning for the Liberal party, had you?

A. Not since '64. No more than put up posters or nominate scrutineers and stuff like that. That's all.

Question No. 274 is also interesting:

Q. Mr. Kormendy, really, it's fair to say that there was no real great advantage to having you working for the Liberal party, was there? Looking at your past performance.

A. Not on the campaign, because I make a poor campaigner.

Mr. Nystrom: Typical Liberal.

Mr. Young: The hon. member for Red Deer tries to make the suggestion that the accused in this case had suggested to the gentleman whose evidence broke down at the preliminary hearing that the gentleman would be compensated for doing campaign work and that the compensation would come from PFA funds. That allegation did not hold up at all at the preliminary hearing. The evidence of the individual upon whom the Crown based its case broke down and the attorney general of Saskatchewan was left with no alternative but to dismiss the case.

Mr. Towers: He was still paid.

Mr. Young: The hon. member for Red Deer says that the gentleman was paid. His testimony in the transcript was that he was paid for work which he had been requested to do and which was in the general nature of his duties. There is a very interesting question and answer on page 83. It begins with question No. 356, which reads:

Q. Is it not also correct, Mr. Kormendy, that Mr. Buchan never told you to file false expense accounts?

A. Well, no, he didn't tell me to file false expense accounts.

Q. He never told you to file false wage statements, did he?

A. No.

That witness went on to say that he did not file false expense accounts. Let us look at question No. 375 which reads:

Q. So really, Mr. Kormendy, you believed that you were entitled to be compensated for the work you did in your home. Is that correct?

A. I figured I wasn't compensated enough?

Q. And you felt you should be?

A. That is right.

• (1730)

It turns out that the gentleman seems to have been compensated for work he felt he was told to do, not for any active politicking or campaigning.

If the hon. member for Red Deer takes issue with the fact that the case did not proceed to trial, I think he should take that up with the attorney general for Saskatchewan because the decision on whether to proceed to trial is one made by the provincial Crown who decides whether there is enough evidence. This was done notwithstanding that the magistrate at the hearing felt there might be. It is the provincial Crown's responsibility who is the agent of the attorney general of Saskatchewan and who in reviewing the case to see what he had to go on decided there was not enough evidence to proceed to trial. The evidence upon which his whole case might have stood was not there, after hearing cross-examination.

The hon. member for Red Deer said something to the effect of a court hearing that took place that would have been in the nature of something existing in a dictatorship. I find nothing of that in reading through the transcript, and I have been through all but the last few pages of it.

The transcript shows that a hearing took place, that a Crown counsel examined several witnesses, and the defence counsel cross-examined. It is an adversary system. The Crown counsel had the right and did, in a couple of cases, to re-examine witnesses. The court can only make a decision based on what witnesses say. When witnesses contradict themselves, or their testimony does not hold up, that is what a trial system is all about. Those are rights that we have fought for, not only in this country but in others. We enjoy freedom, democracy, the right to a trial, and the right to be judged by our peers.

The examination of the witness upon whom the Crown in the preliminary hearing based its case, and the evidence which the hon. member for Red Deer seems to have adopted, broke down. It did not stand up. If the hon. member for Red Deer wanted to be fair to the people whose lives and reputations were at stake in that court case, and he wanted to be fair to all his constituents who might read the Hansard report of this debate, he might not be so selective in the questions that he pulls from the transcript. He might give those people a chance to read the whole transcript so they can then make up their minds.

Let me review the matter. An RCMP investigation was held into allegations made with respect to the possible misuse of PFAA funds. The case for the Crown consisted mainly of the evidence of one witness, a Mr. Kormendy, who worked as a field inspector for the PFAA out of Westlock, Alberta. As I have explained by reading some questions and answers from the transcript, his evidence during that preliminary hearing broke down, and in fact he extricated the accused from any criminal involvement. Notwithstanding that, the magistrate hearing the preliminary proceedings did order a commital but on review of the transcript of the preliminary hearing, agents of the attorney general for the province of Saskatchewan determined that a stay of proceedings should be entered because there was clearly insufficient evidence remaining on which to convict the accused. All the interested parties were so advised.

To conclude, I turn to the original answer which was given to the hon. member for Red Deer. "I am sorry we are not at liberty—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think I can complete the sentence which the parliamentary secretary was going to deliver. It is the government's position that they cannot present these papers because the government of Saskatchewan refused to give them up on the grounds that this is a matter before the courts and it is not customary to give up evidence which the RCMP has collected when a citizen is on trial.

If I may, I would like to straighten out a few things. During the election campaign of 1974 certain farmers reported to me what was being said to them by men who they claimed and were, to their knowledge, to be employees of PFAA, which is a government agency. These people are not civil servants but are appointed by the minister, responsible to the minister, and can be fired by the minister. I did not take any action on these statements even though they were of highly improper and unethical political activity. To my knowledge they have never been mentioned in this House. This is one feature of this whole mess which has not been made clear. There are two parts to this problem. One is criminal fraud and one is political fraud.

When I sent word around to some of our people to take note in the event they had witnessed similar types of activities in their areas, several members of parliament reported to me that such was the case. One of them was the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), and I can name one or two of the others. When immediately after the election certain things happened that were reported to us, we recognized that they were far beyond us as ordinary members of parliament fighting a political battle, because these things were now in the area of criminal fraud.

I want to make it very clear to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) that he did not present a true statement of facts here today in relation to this case. He did not mention that every one of those employees of the PFAA had written instructions, signed by the director of PFAA, that under no circumstances were they to do anything of a business-like nature for the PFAA during the election period. They were not to do anything. When an officer is shown those instructions by his own director, that under no circumstances was any member of the PFAA to be allowed to do anything connected with PFAA work during an election period, and then to find someone doing so-called work, as the evidence quoted by the parliamentary secretary indicates and then has the nerve to submit expenses for doing something he was ordered not to do, that in itself is very close to criminal fraud. But when it is found out furthermore, and which the parliamentary secretary never reported, that supervisors immediately above the PFAA inspectors refused to sign those expense sheets because there was no authority for a person to be doing work, these people called the accused and said, "Do not worry, send it in to me and I will sign it." When he signed it, knowing of the existence of the director's written instructions, that is where the criminal fraud took place. He authorized the expenditure of money from the farmers' accounts to these men ostensibly doing business concerning PFA work, and when that is unauthorized, it is criminal fraud.

When the case came up for preliminary hearing the police were quite convinced the evidence they had from several witnesses—and it is very difficult to get witnesses to give evidence against themselves—was strong enough that they had a case and so took it to a preliminary hearing.

If any person reads this transcript of the preliminary hearing and reads the questions by counsel for the Crown and questions put by defence counsel, it is a wonder that the law association of that province did not disbar the bunch of them. We heard the questions by the parliamentary secretary. They were all leading questions. We have evidence of legal representations on both sides, the Crown and defence, not only being incompetent but dangerously close to something even worse, improper action.

● (1740)

I know what the customs are in parliament. You do not present to parliament documents that are in police custody. As the attorney general of Saskatchewan said in his letter, and I quote his words:

—I feel that it would be a breach of a confidence for me to disclose the evidence contained in statements taken by the RCM Police investigators, as these are private communications between the citizen and the police authorities, until such time as the citizen actually testifies in court.

That is the length of the protection. Why has this citizen not made his statement in court? That is what we are asking. When we turned our information over to the attorney general's department and they went in and seized the documents and took photographs of all the ones in the criminal fraud, that was only part of what we were after. The criminal fraud was a small part of the whole fraud. The big fraud was what were they doing politically. That has never been mentioned in this House, nor should it be mentioned until we get it to the proper place, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The first steps of the hon. member for Red Deer are obvious. As a good citizen and as a member of parliament, he turned over his information to the attorney general. He turned it over to the criminal fraud squad of the RCMP and we kept our mouths shut, all of us. When the preliminary hearing was held and all these unusually odd questions were asked by lawyers on both sides, the presiding magistrate did not state the whole case should be thrown out by the evidence of Kormendy. That is what the parliamentary secretary said today.

Mr. Young: I didn't say that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The judge ruled there was a prima facie case and committed them to trial. There is not just one person in this who allegedly did certain things that were wrong. There are several. However, this is the first one to be tried. We are now in a situation where the police are angry because their case was not properly presented by the Crown. Who appoints the Crown prosecutor? It is the attorney general of Saskatchewan. The police are angry at the incompetence of the type of questions asked by defence counsel, and the answers. In spite of all this, the judge committed this man to trial. That answers the parliamentary secretary completely.

The judge who sat there and heard all this, if you want the ordinary layman's language of what was happening in that court, heard all these lies. He said, "There is still criminal fraud here, and I commit the man to trial."

Go back and read the papers, particularly the Regina Leader-Post. This was happening to a so-called leading citizen, one of the leading hatchet men of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, the last dregs of the old Gardiner machine, now the new machine. There was not one mention in the Leader-Post.

When I saw mention of this in Canadian Press, the Globe and Mail, and other papers across Canada, I contacted the Leader-Post and asked why it was not covering this local story. There had been a preliminary hearing for criminal fraud and they said, "Isn't that too bad; we must get somebody on to this."

An hon. Member: Freedom of the press.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Freedom of the press? It is a part of this whole mess we see across the aisle. When you are corrupt and using the people's money, the farmer's money in this case, to try and win an election, that is beyond criminal fraud. It is a much bigger crime.

Mr. Boulanger: Speak to us about 1958.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I will speak to you about anything, but you speak on your feet in your own time. I know the corruption that goes on in the hon. member's riding. The hon. member for Red Deer is frustrated because he cannot even get back from the province of Saskatchewan the documents that he put into the hands of the police. It is not only the criminal fraud. It is also the question of the political fraud. Let me add a little bit of fact to that.

Why was the director of the PFAA paid $25,000 a year to be director and not allowed into his office for a whole year prior to the election, and this man who is alleged to have committed this criminal fraud ran the organization as a subordinate? He would not let his superior into the office. When this thing hit the fire and the fat began to burn in the fall of 1974, just before Christmas, why were all the girls in the office dismissed? Parliament had voted them their salaries until the end of March. The same great fear was loose out there.

These girls had been appointed to their jobs by Mr. Gardiner, then minister of agriculture, and kept on by succeeding administrations. They did their job for nearly 30 years, close to the time of their pensions, and were suddenly dismissed arbitrarily before Christmas. I would like the evidence for that. It can only be obtained by seeing the papers requested by the hon. member for Red Deer.

I asked questions in the House of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I had warned his staff years before to watch out, that when the big boy from Saskatchewan moves in you will be holding the bag. I said that he may be the minister in charge of this organization, the PFAA, but he is not running it. It is their organization that is running it. The Minister of Agriculture paid no attention to my warnings. Now he is caught trying to explain in the House why somebody without any authority from his office went in and burned all the records. He said that some of the records were put into the archives, those that were valuable in the criminal fraud case. However, it was not the criminal fraud that was the big issue. It was the political fraud.

As I said earlier, no one has ever mentioned what the political fraud is. We know. The guys who were doing it know. I am sure the government members would like to know. They would like to know what these guys were doing to earn this money for two weeks' work. This will only be cleared up when it is properly before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. We recognize that we will have to wait until the government changes and we can get that committee called.

Meanwhile, let us go back to the real culprit. I was concerned about this and I wrote a letter to the attorney general of Saskatchewan. It is addressed to the Hon. Roy J. Romanow, Q.C., MLA.

An hon. Member: A good man.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Yes, he is a good man working with Otto Lang. I will just read the last paragraph of my letter:

The public is aware of the investigation and the proceedings to date. The information we as members of the opposition had in their possession was turned over to the RCMP. A reading of the transcript of the preliminary hearing and the fact that Buchan was committed for trial by the judge raises questions in our minds as to why the Crown should ask for a stay of proceedings.

When the judge has heard the evidence, you wonder why the trial is not held. Rarely in our jurisprudence does an attorney general ever ask for a stay of proceedings when a judge has ruled there is a prima facie case. You let a judge and jury decide. It only happens as far as I know as a layman when one of the main witnesses dies, or new evidence comes up which changes the whole picture. But here we find the attorney general of Saskatchewan deciding not to go on with this trial in spite of the fact that a judge has ruled there is a case. So I asked him why.

● (1750)

Here is his answer. First of all, he deals with the request for papers. He says they have to be kept private until the citizen has testified. I agree with him. Now we come down to the part where he talks about the reason:

It is the duty of the prosecutor, notwithstanding a committal for trial, to review the evidence after the preliminary hearing to determine whether or not there is in fact a proper case to place before the trial court.

That is what the parliamentary secretary was describing:

The prosecution's allegations in this case were based entirely upon certain statements made by a Mr. John Kormendy, an accomplice—

There, Mr. Speaker, is a phrase which creates a new principle in law—you can't send a man up for trial when the evidence comes from an accomplice; that would be unfair.

Again he says this, in the next paragraph:

Further, a court in trying such a case must direct itself to the legal principle that it is unsafe to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice.

This means that if two men rob a bank and the police catch them and one of them turns state's evidence, then according to the attorney general of Saskatchewan the other man cannot be tried if that is the only evidence, because he stands to be convicted on the evidence of an accomplice. How many lawyers have ever heard of that principle? Not many. It is brand new. The attorney general of Saskatchewan is very smart, as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has pointed out. He is so smart he has coined a new principle—you cannot convict a person if the evidence comes from an accomplice. Well, we are not going to catch and convict many bank robbers if that is to be the rule.

The point I am making is this: what really matters in this whole picture is the fact that a citizen who is alleged to have commited a criminal act, and who was committed to trial by a judge, has not had his trial and has been prevented from going to trial by the attorney general of Saskatchewan. In explanation, the attorney general has offered a new principle of law, namely, that a person cannot be convicted through the evidence of an accomplice, the accomplice being the only witness. The police are angry because there are other accomplices who want to give evidence but they cannot give evidence until trials are held. So I suggest that though in all fairness we cannot, under past precedent, give the papers dealing with the criminal trial to the hon. member for Red Deer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, we have before us this evening a motion by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) that an order of the House do issue for a copy of the file or files relating to the investigation concerning the Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration. Even with all the good will I bear the hon. member for Red Deer—and it is considerable since we work together on the justice committee—I have to say frankly that I consider this motion an abuse of the time of the House and an abuse of the legal process in Canada.

This matter concerns the administration of justice in the province of Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who has just spoken has, indeed, put the emphasis in the right place. He saw he had to contact the attorney general of Saskatchewan with respect to this matter, and he has his reply. If there is any further issue to be taken up, it should not be taken up in this House. It should be in the Saskatchewan legislature or on the hustings in Saskatchewan.

He read excerpts from a letter of reply he has had from the attorney general of that province. I found it a little difficult to tell when the hon. member was reading from the reply and when he was interpolating his own comment, but as far as I could tell what the words of the attorney general of Saskatchewan were, he was not putting the primary emphasis for not proceeding with this case on the fact that this was evidence of an accomplice.

The fact is that the evidence which was given by the witness, Mr. John Kormendy, at the trial was so full of holes that he ended up by exonerating the accused, on one view of the evidence. It was the weakness of the evidence primarily, and only secondarily the fact that he was himself an alleged accomplice, which presumably led the attorney general of Saskatchewan to come to the conclusion he did. I am not here to defend the actions of that attorney general. I think he can well do that for himself, and he should be given the opportunity to do so if this is raised in the proper forum in Saskatchewan rather than here which, I repeat, I believe to be a wholly improper forum for discussing this matter.

I can see that, as a political matter, if there were a government of the same party in Saskatchewan, there might be a suspicion that the motivation of the attorney general was political. But that is not the case here. We are dealing with an attorney general of a New Democratic government of Saskatchewan. For a number of reasons he came to his decisions, and I think there can be no reasons other than legal ones.

Far from having coined a new principle in law, the attorney general is just following the normal practice. Where the evidence is not sufficient, a case is not proceeded with. The judge at the preliminary hearing did not, after all, convict the accused; he merely found a prima facie case which means that he thought there was enough evidence that the case could go on to be decided in full court. Responsibility, nevertheless, rests with the prosecutor to decide whether to proceed. That is a second responsibility and it is different from that of the judge. The decision has been validly made, in my view, and if it has not, it should not be challenged here, it should be challenged in the proper forum.

Mr. Paproski: Question!

Mr. MacGuigan: As to the question of the release of the papers as distinct from what the opposition is trying to do, which is to exploit this situation politically, we discover other legal implications. Historically, the question of the release of information to members in order to enable them to secure factual information about operations of government to carry out their parliamentary duties has been balanced against the equally important need to protect the security of the state and the rights to privacy of its citizens. The right to privacy is very important in this case, Mr. Speaker, because here we are dealing with a police investigation, with papers which were connected to that investigation, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-37, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. At five o'clock the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) had the floor.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was dealing with the effect corporate tax measures adopted in earlier years had had on our budgets.

Estimates made in 1977 indicated that since 1972 corporate tax burdens had been reduced by about $1 billion to $1.5 billion per year. The last budget reduced corporate tax burdens by about another $200 million a year.

These tax reductions have had the effect of increasing corporate profits and reducing government revenues, with the real result that the government has felt compelled to cut back on a wide range of social services. I do not have the time to enumerate those today, but members of parliament know very well what they are. There is no evidence that these tax reductions have had more than a marginal impact on capital investment or job creation. The C. D. Howe Research Institute, after examining the list of such concessions in Canada in 1976 concluded, and I quote:

> Although Canada has made extensive use of business tax concessions over the years, the question of the usefulness of such measures in achieving the desired goals remains unresolved.

More direct evidence of this fact came to light in 1975 when the Department of Finance surveyed a large number of corporations to see if there had been any impact from the introduction of the accelerated two year write-off for manufacturing and processing equipment in 1972. Of those surveyed, only 32 per cent said that these concessions, estimated to be worth $2.5 billion between 1972 and 1975, had any impact on investment decisions. Only 26 per cent said they would be increasing jobs as a result of these concessions, and only 15 per cent said that they would have any impact on prices.

The most recent study, published in the November-December issue of the Canadian Tax Journal concluded, and I quote:

> The effectiveness of investment incentive tax policies in bringing about changes in the over-all level of investment or the timing of investment expenditures is not at all apparent.

One thing that has been apparent is the almost weekly reports of immense profit increases. Bell Canada profits in 1978 came to more than $370 million, an increase of 25 per cent over the previous year. The 1978 profits of Abitibi Paper company more than doubled their 1977 performance. This astounding increase was nearly matched by Algoma Steel, with an increase of almost 90 per cent. Consumers Glass Company did better, with an increase of about 120 per cent in its last year. Profit increases in the 20 per cent to 25 per cent range are too numerous to list here, considering that they are only average, although most workers saw their wages increase at a much slower rate of about 6.4 per cent last year.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said recently that he welcomes the huge profits being reported by most corporations operating in this country. He talks about how those profits can be used to create jobs, but before continuing to praise the profit picture the Prime Minister should consider some examples of how corporate profits have in fact been used in recent years. Those most favoured friends, the giant pulp and paper companies, have been either playing "Monopoly" with each other or investing in new operations outside the country. MacMillan Bloedel, Domtar, CP Investments, Abitibi, and Prince and Argus Corporation have all been involved in take-over bids for other companies instead of investing their profits in new plants and processes as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) have talked about.

Despite the high level of profits and world demand, Canadian pulp and paper corporations have refused to replace outdated plants or expand operations in Canada, while at the same time they expand abroad. For example, MacMillan Bloedel has committed itself, along with its partners, to pour some $131 million into a French pulp company over the next three years. It is also involved in a multimillion dollar project to develop Brazilian pulp properties, plus plywood and lumber mills in Malaysia. Domtar spent some $34.5 million to acquire a number of U.S. gypsum and wallboard mills last spring. And it is to these corporations that we are giving over $200 million to help them modernize.

The Prime Minister's assertions about the need for high profits to ensure Canadian investment is revealed as a sham by examination of the record of the government's Export Development Corporation, which is encouraging development elsewhere through guarantees of loans for new plants in other countries, plants which very often compete with Canadian plants and Canadian workers for business and jobs.

Inco benefited from Export Development Corporation loans to help it export jobs to Guatemala and Indonesia. The government's reliance upon across the board tax cuts let this corporation defer $368 million in federal taxes on 1976 and 1977 profits of $1.7 billion, although it eliminated 4,000 full time jobs in Sudbury, Ontario, and Thompson, Manitoba, in just one day in 1977. Indeed, Inco has been able to gather tax cuts and exemptions from the Tory government in Ontario and promises of the same from the Tory government in Manitoba, despite the sorry spectacle of Canadian operations being downgraded in favour of overseas investment.

What is true of the privately-owned corporations is now becoming the policy for publicly-owned corporations like the CDC. That corporation was created by an act passed in Parliament on June 9, 1971. Its purposes were:

(a) . . . assist in the creation or development of business, resources, properties and industries of Canada;

(b) . . . to expand, widen and develop opportunities for Canadians to participate in the economic development of Canada through the application of their skills and capital;

(c) . . . to invest in the shares or securities of any corporation owning property or carrying on business related to the economic interests of Canada; and

(d) . . . to invest in ventures or enterprises including the acquisition of property likely to benefit Canada.

How does this corporation act? CDC, which is owned between 66 per cent and 70 per cent by the federal government, has substantial investment in petrochemicals, mining, venture capital, oil, gas, and health care. CDC companies employ over 20,000 people world-wide. One of these companies, Polysar Limited employs 3,700 workers in the Sarnia, Ontario, operations, but 6,000 people world-wide. The majority of the company's manufacturing subsidies are in Europe or the United States. In 1977 Polysar acquired a 25 per cent interest in a French plastics forming business. Polysar also operates major synthetic rubber plants in both France and Belgium.

Instead of investing money and its know-how in building plants in Canada, which could not only supply the Canadian market but which could sell on the international market, Polysar is investing increasingly its efforts and its money in corporations producing in foreign lands.

Similarly, in health care 1977 saw CDC's Connlab group acquire a quality biological facility in Swiftwater, Pennsylvania. Connlab Holdings Limited also controls 75 per cent of A/S Dumex based in Copenhagen, which in turn employs 700 Danes. Dumex is particularly involved in marketing drugs in developing countries. Recently, Dumex expanded its facilities in Denmark, and the company markets in 40 countries. Dumex completed a new plant in 1977, and a second plant is scheduled for completion in 1978, both of them in Canada.

CDC Oil and Gas acquired a working interest in a major Louisiana property during 1977. Based in Calgary, with a total staff of 130, the Louisiana purchase cost $45 million U.S. and resulted in a 45 per cent interest in 27,000 acres of partially developed land located on the Gulf of Mexico, south west of Lake Charles, Louisiana. U.S. employment in the 14 wells, two drilling rigs and one completion unit, which are scheduled to continue for at least five years, will almost certainly exceed the Canadian based staff. With investment in Canadian oil research and exploration below par, CDC job creation in the United States is inconsistent with Bill C-219's mandate of developing the resources of Canada. The company has also bought a 25 per cent interest in a group evaluating prospects in the western approaches area of offshore Great Britain.

Is it any wonder that we do not get the kind of development which we need in Canada when publicly-owned corporations seem to be more concerned about developments outside Canada than they are in Canada?

That is the situation, and we continue it despite all the evidence that these kinds of policies have created personal suffering and have led to the economic decline resulting from this policy of spending restraints and of tax favours for the well-to-do.

Concern for the kind of economic policies which this government has been following has been expressed by many people, including people who are employed by the government to study the problems which we face. The vice president of the Science Council, Dr. Shepherd, in a recent speech expressed that concern when he said:

It is utterly crucial to any country aspiring to industrial health that it map out and implement a strategy designed to achieve international leadership in this new wave of technology . . . In apparent defiance of its plethora of human and material resources, Canada has not adequately positioned itself within the new global environment and in relation to the new industrial revolution.

The kind of tinkering in which this government has involved itself will not meet the needs of the Canadian people. We believe that a central approach is essential to provide jobs for all Canadians who need and want to work, to drive down the cost of living, and to cease being, as my leader has said, industrial tenants in our own land. This party has set out definite proposals to deal with the current economic situation and set in motion a restructuring of the Canadian economy.

First, instead of spending millions of dollars each day in a futile effort to prop up the dollar, that money should be invested in gaining a greater degree of Canadian ownership in key sectors of the economy. The prime bank rate should be lowered a whole percentage point, instead of being raised seven times as it was in the last year, in order to stimulate economic growth and reduce inflationary pressures. All future CDC investment should take place in Canada unless a specific investment project can be shown to have long-range Canadian benefit.

Immediate steps must be taken to redirect the current massive Canadian investment abroad. Planning agreements, joint ventures, and specifically applied incentives could keep large sums of money in the country and keep it working for present and future economic health. Large firms must be required to show a net Canadian benefit before they are allowed to invest abroad.

People in my province of Manitoba and in all parts of Canada are feeling the disastrous results of years of the Liberal-Tory economic remedy, which is to cut government spending and cut taxes for the least needy. Their approach has brought the economy to a virtual standstill and now is keeping it there with budgets such as the one of November, 1978. The world's judgment of Liberal-Tory economics is being made daily in the exchange market, and we see the results in the 83-cent dollar. Canada deserves better. It is long overdue for us to start using the country's resources for the benefit of all Canadians by developing a first rate manufacturing base which meets the challenge of the new industrial revolution and provides jobs for Canadians who want to work.

● (2020)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in the debate on this budget bill, partly because of the events of the last two, three or four days. One event which bothered me considerably in the last four or five days was a poll which was produced by Gallup. It indicated that Canadians did not think the economic affairs of the country were handled as well as they could have been by the government. Therefore I should like to look at the general economy of the country and also at what is happening in the energy field because these matters are related very much to the situation we are in now.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

It is interesting that many Canadians feel this way, and yet many economists feel very differently. When one looks at many of the more important economists in the country and other parts of the world, one will find that they see Canada as a country doing relatively well compared to other countries, and also as doing the correct thing at this particular point. This particular budget is based upon many of these correct things.

If we attempt to understand the position we are in at the present time, it is important to go back over the last ten or 15 years and trace some of the principal points where major changes have occurred. The years 1968-1969 to approximately 1973 was a period of almost unlimited growth for the industrial world. Growth rates of 7, 8 and 9 per cent were being registered all over the world. The feeling was that this would go on forever. Along with many other governments, this government engaged in activities which years before would not be considered acceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. members take their conversations behind the curtains. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) has the floor.

Mr. Paproski: Right on.

Mr. McRae: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government engaged in activities which would not have been possible before this. In other words, we instituted many social security programs and schemes of this nature because we felt unlimited growth was with us. I will deal with that matter when I talk about expenditures and revenue a little later.

An event occurred in 1973 which changed the whole picture of the economies of the industrial world. Of course that was the sudden change in oil pricing brought about by the coming together of oil-producing countries under the heading of OPEC. Within a few months there was a 400 per cent increase in the cost of oil. This single factor perhaps has had more to do with the subsequent years than any other factor in this 15 or 20-year period or since the beginning of World War II.

In the period from 1974 to 1977, immediately after the OPEC increase of 400 per cent in the cost of oil, massive amounts of dollars were drained off to the OPEC countries. Last year alone there were $50 billion from the United States, $2 billion or $3 billion from Canada, and so on. In the years 1974 to 1977 the world went into a recession which was the worst in 40 years, the worst since the big depression. A recession in any country can be considered a period when there is less than a zero growth rate or a negative growth rate. Most of the major countries of the Big Seven experienced periods of recession of at least one year. Canada was the only country among the Big Seven which did not have a single year of actual recession. In other words, it did not experience one year when the growth rate was negative in the period from 1974 to 1977.

As a matter of fact, Canada's growth rate in this crucial recession period averaged 4.1 per cent. During the same period the U.S. growth was only 2.7 per cent, and it experienced one year of a negative growth rate. Also at that time the 24 OECD countries averaged growth rates of 2.9 per cent. With the exception of Japan, our growth rate was the best. These are factors which we must consider, and they are factors which create some problems. We did not experience the same depth of recession as other countries. Because we did not experience the same recession as the United States, we had some inflationary problems which they did not have to the same degree.

If we look to this year we can see various economic groups are predicting very moderate growth rates among all major countries, the seven summit countries. Just recently a Newsweek analyst predicted that Canada would outperform growthwise all of the other Big Seven countries except Japan. Perhaps at some other point it would be worth while to look at the Japanese situation. We could see whether Canadians are really willing and ready to adopt the kinds of measures, policies, and social styles which are being developed by the Japanese.

There is a good deal to be said about the fine performance of our country over this period of time. There was a high growth period from 1965-1966-1967 to approximately 1973. Then there was the major crash or problem caused by the 400 per cent increase in the cost of oil on the part of OPEC countries, followed by a global recession in which Canada probably fared the best of any country. Of course during this period of time there were a couple of very serious problems. One of them was the problem of inflation. It was exacerbated considerably by the fact that we had less recession than most other countries. We had considerably higher growth rates than the United States.

As I mentioned, our growth rate averaged 4.1 per cent over this period as opposed to 2.7 per cent in the United States. This created some very definite and strong inflationary pushes. In spite of a great deal of opposition at an earlier period, this was one of the reasons why the country had to institute some kind of serious anti-inflationary program by 1975. Incidentally, the program was relatively successful. It was not so successful in that the inflation rate was not brought down a great deal—it was brought down two or three percentage points—but it was successful in the sense that the inflation rate might have been a great deal higher. With labour settlements of 22 per cent in the first half of 1975 one could expect a very much greater inflationary period in 1975 and 1976, regardless of what we did in terms of controls. I think it is relatively important to understand that.

The other factor which made it very difficult for us was unemployment, but in spite of that factor we have still experienced an increased growth rate. Perhaps that is because of the initiative this created. Here again I think we are unique as a country. In all of the non-communist world we are unique in that we have had a far larger growth in the labour force than any other country. If one looks at the summit seven, the United States, Japan, France, West Germany, Britain, Italy and Canada, one will see that for every one hundred people in the labour force in 1965, the average in the labour force in 1975 was 109, with the exception of Canada. There was an increase of roughly nine persons per 100 in the labour force over that ten-year period. Canada, on the other hand, had an increase of 46 people per hundred, or a 500 per cent greater increase than the average for those other countries.

Let us take a couple of those countries individually. The United States was the one closest to us with an increase of 28 people per 100 in the labour force in 1965. Countries such as West Germany had a negative increase, or a slight decrease in the labour force.

Such an increase in the labour force as we experienced, I contend, put tremendous pressure on the government to do many things that were inflationary, such as expenditures in respect of job creation and so on, creating in turn very heavy deficits.

In spite of this situation, in regard to employment we have achieved much growth in terms of the number of jobs. This last year we have had by far the largest growth in employment by population of any of the countries to which I refer, and we had an increase last year of over 400,000 new jobs in this country. That is a very remarkable increase.

In spite of that growth in the labour force we are finally getting to the point now, with the increase in the number of jobs, where the situation is beginning to turn in a slightly different direction. It now actually looks like we will have more job growth than we will have growth in the labour market. This is something I think that is just beginning to turn around. For a country that has had that kind of growth rate, larger than that of most other countries with the exception of Japan, we have done quite well. However, this has caused inflationary pressures because we have had more growth than other countries. Those countries were experiencing a recession, but this country, with that kind of growth in the number of new jobs, some 500 per cent higher than in any other country, has done relatively well. This is not a perfect performance, but it is relatively better than in other countries.

In ordinary times, times that we might call normal periods, perhaps the early 1960s or the late 1950s, one could adjust one's economy fairly rapidly. One could throw a couple of billion dollars into the demand side, raise interest rates, create more money, or reduce the money supply, and have some effect. I contend that with the problems facing the world today, with massive increases in energy costs, it is virtually impossible for a government to take simplistic Keynesian actions. Those were very popular, very good and well proven methods, although not always enacted at the right time. They were well proven methods for solving problems, but they have not been possible in this situation because they simply would not work. When the opposition, whether it be NDP or Tory, suggests it could go out and spend two or three more billion dollars and create a two or three-month higher deficit, or something of that order, with the expectation that we would see a massive growth in the economy, it is talking rubbish, given the nature of economic conditions in the world today.

I should like to talk a little bit about government expenditures because this is an area in respect of which I think the public feels perhaps we have been inadequate in the way we have responded to some of the problems facing us. I think it is important to realize that in the period leading up to 1973, or early 1974, we embarked upon a whole series of social security measures, health and welfare measures and so on, which would make it easier for the public, for the poor people and for many Canadians on old age security, to solve their problems. In this way we were giving them a better deal in pensions after retirement, and so on. These were the kinds of things in which governments were engaged. These were legitimate activities, as they are now. These were legitimate measures commensurate with the growth in the economy.

If one takes a look at two curves, that is, the expenditure curve and the revenue curve, one will see that all the way through from 1965 to 1974 the curves ran along parallel. At one time there might have been a slight deficit, and then there might have been a slight surplus but basically speaking the curves were parallel. Then in 1974, and again this has to do with the OPEC situation and the general sort of decline or recession that occurred, the expenditure curve continued on up but the revenue curve went out. That is an extremely important situation, and that is where the deficit problems started.

Incidentally, it might be interesting to note that at that time Mr. Turner in his budget, at the very strong urging of a Conservative opposition, started indexing everything and also started indexing exemptions. This was a large factor in the distortion created between the slope of those curves. In other words, we were indexing old age pensions, family allowances and a whole series of things, and in the opposite direction we were also indexing the exemptions. As a result there was a loss of revenue, and greater expenditure. At this critical time with the OPEC situation, which slowed the growth rate, and a kind of double indexing in both directions, a deficit situation was created. The policies up to that particular point had been good policies, well-formed and well within the means of the country, given the growth rate that was expected. I do not think anyone predicted the kind of changes that occurred in 1973 and early 1974.

When we look at government expenditures I think it is important that we consider how the government spends its money. The largest item is known as transfers. Some 51.7 per cent of all government dollars goes out in the form of transfers, with 22 per cent to persons, 21 per cent to other governments, provincial and municipal, and 8 per cent in terms of subsidies to railways and so on, as well as various consumer subsidies. These add up to 51 per cent, over half the budget of the Government of Canada.

The next item is public debt, which relates to wars and past expenditures. It amounts to 14 per cent of government expenditures. Then we have government operations, accounting for 34 per cent. This includes 3.4 per cent for Crown corporations in the form of subsidies, etc., 8.9 per cent for national defence, and 22 per cent for the rest of the government's operations. Taking the public debt, the servicing of debt, transfers to provinces in the form of pensions, etc., along with government subsidies, we have about 65 per cent of all government expenditures going in that direction. This leaves 35 per cent that the government actually controls, and some of this is not controlled, in the sense that it includes Crown corporations.

When a government has a deficit in the order of $12 billion it has to cut back. It is very difficult unless it cuts back in this major area which takes up to 65 per cent of the expenditures. For example, in cutting back the number of beds in hospitals in cities such as Thunder Bay, the provincial government is reacting to the very large $12 billion deficit of the federal government.

I do not wish to get into this particular aspect of the issue at this point, because it is a debate in itself, but I would mention the fact that I think governments should look at their health services and various other services which they provide, including penitentiaries, and consider whether or not there are simpler and cheaper ways of providing these services. For instance, halfway houses in the area of mental health, as I understand it, cost $30 to $50 per day per patient, whereas the cost per patient in a mental hospital is $150 per day. Chronic bed hospitals, which we need more of in our community, cost about one third of what active bed hospitals cost. These are some of the things we must look at. In other words, what we need is a shift according to the needs of the people rather than many of the institutional costs which we incur.

One factor which is being grossly overlooked by the government and by Canadians in terms of how Canada is doing as an economy—and I was pleased to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) refer to the figures in his speech yesterday—is the national debt and the fact that it has not grown in this country in terms of the gross national product. I would like to explain what I mean, because I think that it is important that Canadians understand this whole business of debt. If, for example, I owe $10,000, then in order to determine my worth and whether I can pay the debt off the person or institution loaning me the money must look at three factors. Of course there is the size of the debt, then there is the size of my assets and, thirdly, my income. It is meaningless to talk about debt unless one talks about it in these terms.

When talking about the debt of the nation, and I think that Canadians are concerned about how much debt this nation is incurring, we must talk about it in terms of these three factors—the size of the debt, the size of one's assets, and one's income. Therefore in measuring a national debt we measure in terms of net debt, as we do personal debts, that is, assets versus liabilities in terms of one's income or gross national product.

If we look at the net national debt as a fraction of the gross national product over the period of the last 20 years, we find that it fluctuates considerably. In 1952 it was in the area of 50 per cent to 51 per cent of the gross national product. In 1962, the last full year that the Conservative party was in power in this country, the gross national debt amounted to 33 per cent of the gross national product. In 1978 the gross national debt amounted to only 18.9 per cent of the gross national product. In other words, our debt position has improved considerably since 1952. It has even improved considerably since 1962, from 33 per cent in that year to 18.9 per cent in 1978.

The fears Canadians feel for the state of the nation economically would be allayed considerably if they were made more aware of this debt ratio. Looking at the figures I have mentioned, Canadians should feel that as a nation we are doing relatively well.

Another factor which gives Canadians a great deal of concern and tends to create pessimism is the grossly undervalued Canadian dollar. This feeling tends to grow in the country as the dollar declines or stays in the area of 83 cents to 84 cents. If one is looking for a date on which events turn around—and I have referred to the period in 1973 when OPEC oil was increased by approximately 400 per cent—with regard to our devalued Canadian dollar, one must consider November 15, 1976, as the pivotal date when there was a change of government in the province of Quebec. I was in the United States just a few weeks before this event and, as I recall, we were being paid $1.02 or $1.03 for the Canadian dollar. After that date the Canadian dollar declined very rapidly. It did not fall to 85 cents, but to around 90 cents. One of the major single factors which influenced the price of the Canadian dollar on the world market, was the uncertainty as to what would happen to this country should the Lévesque government prevail and should Quebec separate from the rest of Canada.

There are other factors. Some of the concerns, I believe, have been allayed considerably because of our increased productivity and our reduced unit labour costs which have been coming down at a faster rate than most of the other countries in the world. There are many factors which would actually bring the Canadian dollar back closer to 90 cents, but the single unity factor is of prime importance.

On the other hand, one of the big advantages of the lower dollar is that Canada is now able to export to other countries more competitively than it was able to, two, three or four years ago. Canada's trade has increased markedly in the last couple of years primarily due to the fact that we have an 84-cent or 85-cent dollar. Another factor which is not given the consideration I believe it should be given has to do with the Canadian entrepreneur who must sell in competition with imports. This situation has the effect, of course, of creating a 15 per cent tariff on import goods, but I do not think that we have succeeded as well as we might in competing with imports. Certainly the 85-cent dollar means that imports are that much more expensive, and Canadian entrepreneurs should be able to take advantage of that situation.

The reason why we have probably not been as successful in this area is because there is uncertainty as to how long the situation will last. Another factor may be that too many Canadian entrepreneurs are taking a larger than necessary profit instead of pushing for a larger piece of the business. This is something which should be looked into and analysed.

We know quite a bit more about the export side of things than we do about the competition of Canadian entrepreneurs versus importers. This is one of the factors that has had a salutary effect on the region from which I come. I am speaking of Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario. Thunder Bay has one of the lowest unemployment rates in Canada, although I am never quite sure what the rate is in Thunder Bay. We can never get a good sampling from Statistics Canada because the numbers showing are so small and so we cannot get a good picture of the situation. Northwestern Ontario has a similar situation, except for a few areas like Atikokan. These are mining communities which have different problems.

Because Thunder Bay is a major port from which grain is shipped, the area is more concerned with the export trade. Because of the forest products industry where roughly 90 per cent of the produce from areas surrounding Thunder Bay is exported to the United States, the area is in good shape at the present time. The depressed dollar has been advantageous to the area and is one of the major factors for its relative affluence.

I was in Europe last week with a group of people. We visited with people at NATO and with representatives from the European economic community. Many of us got the impression that Canada relative to most European countries was very well off. We found out that our dollar could buy a great deal more at home than it could abroad. It leads me to believe that if our dollar buys more at home than abroad there is something wrong with the price of the dollar. Either we are not moving our goods as fast as we can, or there is something artificial which is creating some difficulties with the dollar which is not really understood. Basically, Canadians on this trip felt that we were very well off relative to other countries and that basically we are moving in the right direction as far as our economy is concerned. The government and the Minister of Finance should be given credit for this general direction in which we are going.

I would like now to turn to the economy and speak about some of the problems I foresee in the energy area. As I mentioned several times during the course of my speech, the 400 per cent increase in the price of oil since 1973 has had a tremendous effect on the Canadian economy and upon the economies of all countries in the non-communist world. It seems to me that in many ways, while we had this serious dislocation in our economy where $50 billion last year was drained off in the United States for oil and where hundreds of billions of dollars have moved from one part of the world into another part and which have not been funnelled back into the demand side, it has had a bad effect on one hand and a good effect on the other.

The OPEC nations have been telling us that we and they are running out of oil. I am looking at a publication called "Energy Futures for Canadians" which was tabled in the last week or so, which enunciates the concerns we should all feel about global and national energy problems.

I have spoken in this House on many occasions about energy demand and supply. There is no question in my mind that between the years 1985 and 1990 Canada and the rest of the world will have serious problems with respect to oil supplies. The world will run out or have reduced this important resource within the next 20 or 25 years so that we will have to change our lifestyles considerably. Canada has some synthetic oils such as syncrude, and the heavy oils, but basically the world's oil supply, as we know it, will be reduced within the next 25 or 30 years, so we will have to depend to a much greater extent on other forms of energy.

Canada should be looking much more carefully at how we will get along without oil. We have been reminded once again by Iran, one of the OPEC countries, that this problem exists. I do not know how many reminders we must get to realize that we are going to be in trouble. With Iran supplying 10 per cent of the western nations' oil supply which is now cut off, and with yesterday's announcement by Exxon that they would divert 25 per cent of the oil from Venezuela to the United States and other markets which Imperial Oil was getting, we are reminded again of a long-term problem which is rapidly becoming short-term.

I was most upset when we had these revelations about cutbacks that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) last night spoke about in Calgary, strongly supporting the very provincial, local views of the premier of the province of Alberta when he talked about the province of Alberta controlling almost totally the oil and energy resources of that wealthy province. The day is going to come when Alberta oil will no longer be there. We may have syncrude and so on. And the day is rapidly approaching when oil will be no longer supplied from Iran, and there will be a shortage of oil coming from Venezuela.

This is not the time for this country to become a group of balkanized provinces, with the resources of this country limited to the people in one province. I think this next election has got to be fought on the basis of whether we will be one country or nine or ten or eleven countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: The crux of the whole matter, whether we like it or not, will be in the energy area. We have to pool all our resources as a nation. We cannot allow Alberta to control the whole thing. I worry a great deal when the Leader of the Opposition says that each province should control its own resources totally.

We have a long-term problem in this area, Mr. Speaker. All Canadians have to share the nation's wealth and its problems. This country is a cold country in the winter. Its citizens must be supplied with some form of heat for their well-being, so we must ensure that all Canadians are fairly looked after.

In conclusion I would like to say that at a time when there is no simple answer, at a time when most governments of the world face high inflation and high unemployment, problems which cannot be solved by Keynesian methods, by increasing money supply or by increasing demand, at a time when there are massive increases in energy costs, which are prime factors in any industrial state, Canadians should look around them to see that this country has not done that badly. In spite of recession, we have had a growth rate during the last three years perhaps second only to Japan. And to compare the growth rates of Canada and the United States, these were 4.1 versus 2.7. We have done relatively well. During this period we had a 500 per cent greater increase in the labour force than any of these countries. Considering this massive problem alone, Canadians should not be disappointed in our performance. There are no simple answers like there used to be. This government has made some mistakes, as have all governments, but on balance we have done rather well.

I would like to go into the election that will be held some time in the next few months, with Canadians knowing that their economy is in relatively good hands. Their concern today should be where we are going in the future and whether we can solve some of the problems, such as the energy problem, as a total nation, or break up into ten or more countries.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in joining in the debate on the bill before us tonight, Bill C-37, I will speak in relatively non-partisan terms because, the issues that I wish to raise are of such a serious nature that it is time that this House came to its senses. There are three matters in particular that I would like to deal with in connection with Bill C-37. Before doing so, I first want to emphasize that what my colleague from Edmonton West Mr. Lambert) said earlier today and yesterday, I reiterate.

We believe there are portions of Bill C-37 that are good, that should be commended and endorsed by the Canadian public. I refer, for example, to certain incentives that have been given to the petroleum industry in the earnest hope that that industry will once again become more and more a Canadian-owned industry. We endorse that. We endorse various other caretaking changes that have been made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to streamline the act and, above all, make it more equitable as far as income tax burdens are concerned.

I am not going to speak for long tonight. My first point deals with the provisions in this bill touching on the taxation of small business corporations. Frankly, we find it rather remarkable that the minister has asked us, first in his budget, then in his ways and mean motions, and now in this bill, to accept a concept where the smallest of small businesses will have to bear a higher tax load than those that are not so small. That surely is not equitable. Some of my colleagues will dwell more fully on that.

We are the first to agree that there are loopholes in the existing act. There may have been tax avoidance schemes worked out whereby those that rightfully should be paying higher taxes have been able to avoid those taxes. We on this side of the House say, identify those loopholes and plug them, but whatever you do, do not, through faulty draftsmanship or for other reasons, catch a lot of innocent small business people who deserve a break as far as income tax is concerned but are going to be denied that break should this bill ever see the life that the Minister of Finance suggests parliament should give it. More about that later.

The second point is that we emphasize that all members of this House should think in a serious way of the implications of what the Minister of Finance is proposing. This is perhaps the first time, certainly in Canadian history, that a minister of finance has proposed that future taxation of this country be handled by regulation. Read the provisions of this bill and you will find that the definition as to who fits in and who does not fit in as a small business is to be defined by regulation. That should be the prerogative of this parliament, not of some civil servant who decides who should be taxed and who should not. More about that later.

Probably the most alarming part of this bill is the last clause. I refer, of course, to clause 70, where the Minister of Finance is asking for power to borrow $10 billion for what he calls public works and general purposes.

I would like to dwell a little on what this government has led us into. The speaker just before me, presumably bucking for a higher role in that caucus, tried to extol the virtues of his government. He took a trip. I take it he stayed at the best hotels in Europe and came away feeling that things are not so bad after all as far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. Boulanger: It is the best in Canada.

Mr. Stevens: I hear for the first time this year from one of the Liberals over there, speaking from his seat, who now tells us it is the best. Perhaps that member will listen to a few facts published by no less than the President of the United States in his economic report to Congress. One of the strange facts about this House is that you often find public information available in Washington concerning the performance of this government and its economy that is literally not available here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Let me point out something to my hon. friend who said he took a trip to Europe and found that things are looking pretty good. Here is what the economic report of the President, transmitted to Congress in January, 1979, has to say about Canada in relation to those European countries.

In table 33 of the report, the annual growth in gross national product per employed worker in major industrial countries is reviewed for the years 1964 to 1978. I am pleased that you are seated, Mr. Speaker, because you are going to be stunned when you hear these figures.

In Japan the real growth between 1964 and 1973 per employed worker was 8.9 per cent. Guess what it was in Canada; 2.4 per cent. In Germany in the same period it was 4.7 per cent, in France 4.5 per cent, in the United Kingdom that this government almost likes to laugh at, 3.2 per cent, and in Italy, 5.4 per cent. Every one of those European countries produced better real growth per worker than Canada.

What about the most recent years, 1974 to 1978? In Japan the real growth was 3.2 per cent. In Canada it was .6 of 1 per cent. Is it any wonder they are a little timorous about going to the electorate because the average voter in Canada senses that his real growth, his real lot, has not gone up the way he anticipated it would. Between 1974 and 1978 the real growth in Germany was 3.3 per cent, France 3 per cent, and the United Kingdom .8 per cent, still slightly above us. Italy was above us as well with 1.1 per cent.

I put that simply as background because when we come to consider this question of borrowing we have to remember that the government's domestic borrowing and its foreign borrowing are an indication of the trouble into which it has led us.

• (2110)

What did the Minister of Finance have to say about these serious subjects when only yesterday he spoke on the bill before us? He took us down to Argentina. He had found in Argentina a country which, he said, was in a situation even worse than we were. He had found a land on the other side of the world, presumably he was standing upside down, where figures showed, he said, that they had done even worse than we had. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have learned to take what the Minister of Finance says with a good deal of caution especially when he speaks without notes, so I took a quick look at the statistics myself and I found, according to the United Nations Statistical Year Book, that in Argentina they have only 2.3 per cent unemployment compared with 6.9 per cent in Canada in the same year. I notice that the Minister of Finance did not deal with levels of unemployment in the two countries. What I am saying is this: he conveniently ignores the obvious figures which show the lack of progress in Canada, preferring to turn to the situation in Argentina or some other country for some small solace.

We are dealing with serious matters tonight, and rather than expressing my own view exclusively I should like to refer to the opinion expressed by a noted economist, Mr. Ralph Sultan, vice-president of the Royal Bank of Canada in Montreal. Writing in this month's Euromoney he had this to say:

> Unfortunately, the services side of Canada's current account also put in a record performance in 1978—on the deficit side. The services deficit in 1978 (including interest and dividends paid to foreigners, royalty payments, travel and tourism, shopping and freight charges) went over the $8 billion mark. That left an over-all shortfall in Canada's current account of close to $5 billion.
> Since 1970, the size of the merchandize surplus has fluctuated. The services deficit has just got bigger and bigger. And for good reason: Canada has been borrowing and borrowing. When provincial government utilities' financing programs slowed down some 18 months ago, the federal government merely stepped in to fill the gap with its own foreign currency borrowings. Canada's desirable and effective free float policy seems to have been forgotten.

These views are not expressed by a spokesman for my party. They are the views of the senior vice-president of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. Sultan, passing comment on his own country. He believes there is no need for Canada to be caught in a vicious circle as is now the case. In his words:

> Canada is caught in a vicious and unnecessary circle. Capital is borrowed abroad to balance the country's international payments. The interest paid on the borrowed capital swells the services deficit. Canada's current account ends up deeper in the hole. And so on . . .

Thus, for 1979, the Royal Bank estimates Canada's trade surplus at $3.4 billion. But the services deficit will be a whopping $9.4 billion, and Canada's required capital inflows will be well over $5 billion again.

I read that into the record because I think it is very pertinent when we realize that only last night the Minister of Finance told us of yet another foreign borrowing. Hon. members will recall that he announced what he described as further details of the plans of the Government of Canada to raise funds in the Japanese capital market. He stated:

This financing is expected to total Japanese yen 100 billion of which yen 30 billion would be realized through a public offering of five-year bonds and yen 70 billion to be realized through two syndicated loans, one of ten years and the other of 20 years to maturity. The yen proceeds received by Canada would be converted into U.S. dollars and added to Canada's official international reserves.

Let us get this into perspective. It is not long ago that the government borrowed approximately $787 million from the Germans. It was in May of last year. The reason I say it was approximately $787 million is that we actually borrowed DM 1.5 million. At that time the minister said, "Think of the low interest rate we got—it was only 5 per cent." It ranged between 4 per cent and 6 per cent, about 5 per cent on an average. The minister came back saying, "Aren't we lucky?" Do you know what it would cost us, Mr. Speaker, to repay that loan if we were called upon to do so? It would cost the Canadian public $962 million. In addition to the 5 per cent interest we would have to find another $175 million to pay off that loan. Translated into percentage terms it means that if we had to repay that money, the interest charged to Canada would be 35.7 per cent. That is the type of situation into which the government is leading us. They are plunging us increasingly into foreign currency debts without any reserve or hedge which might reflect the eventual level of our currency in relation to the currency we are borrowing.

Put it this way: if we had borrowed from Japan ten years ago the $500 million U.S. the minister announced last night, it would have meant that in 1969 we would have borrowed 166 billion yen. How much do you think it will cost us to repay that loan today, Mr. Speaker? We would need 944 billion yen. To repay that loan, without counting any interest, would represent an increase of 99 per cent over what it originally cost us. That is 99 per cent in ten years.

That is the foreign side, Mr. Speaker. As we know, the Minister of Finance last night also announced the government had begun negotiations with the syndicate of Swiss banks to raise funds in the Swiss capital market through a fixed term bank loan. We do not know the amount. We do not know the rate. The hard fact is that this government is getting desperate and doing desperate things.

Let us not forget that when we are asked to approve a $10 billion borrowing authority, as we are in clause 70 in the bill now before us, it is $10 billion in addition to the $3.8 billion the Minister of Finance told us he still has available in unused borrowing authority as of now. So what he is really requesting us to do is to okay almost $14 billion of borrowing authority.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Today in committee the minister reiterated that he anticipates the cash requirement this year will be $10.25 billion. He mentioned certain other things which I find very interesting. He said he would like to encourage corporations, municipalities and provinces to join in the foreign borrowing. He told us it would help out. In other words, the more he can involve them in whatever currency risks which follow, the more comfort he will have.

● (2120)

Notwithstanding the fact that the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity revealed today that as a result of the minister's policy of a falling dollar we have had one third more inflation in the past two years than we otherwise would have had, the minister startled the committee by telling us that he thought a 6.5 per cent inflation rate in this country is a good record and that, if he could achieve it, he would be quite happy. This is the Minister of Finance speaking not only of the borrowing needs of the nation but also of what he regards as a good level of inflation.

Let me also mention that when the minister went to New York earlier this week he told those listening to him, and I quote; "I also recognize that a current account deficit per se is not a bad thing." How does the minister think world investors must have reacted to that statement, knowing that Canada is the only major industrial nation which has had a current account deficit for five years in succession? In addition, of course, in relation to our gross national product, our current account deficit is higher than that of any other industrialized nation in the world, and the minister has the audacity to go to New York and say that this is not a bad thing.

Having said that, let us put into perspective what we are talking about when we talk in terms of further borrowing authority of $10 billion. We are dealing with the question of debt. Boy, have they ever brainwashed the hon. member for Fort William (McRae)! It is clear that he never went into the library to read the facts. Somebody either told him or he heard somewhere that in relation to our gross national product somehow or other our debt is not high. However, if we check the facts, we find that in fiscal year 1958 debt charges in Canada were slightly under half a billion dollars and that the total budget that year was $4.8 billion. That works out to 9 per cent of the total budget in 1958 going toward debt charges. By 1968 the debt charge had risen to $1.273 billion, and the budget was then $10.284 billion. The rate then was 10 per cent, which was only slightly above the 1958 rate. Debt charges at that time amounted to 10 per cent of the budget. In the fiscal year which is just concluding 14 per cent of federal government spending goes to servicing the debt this government has already put on the books. To be specific, $6.5 billion is the anticipated amount of debt charges this year alone. Translated into average terms, that means this irresponsible government has inflicted upon the average worker in Canada a $14 per week load simply to service the debt which it has run up.

We do not have 1980 figures. All we know is that on budget night we were told that the expenditures anticipated by this government in 1980 would be $51 billion. We do not know on what the government will spend that money. We understand that the estimates will come in on Monday. Wouldn't it be fairer for parliament if the Minister of Finance allowed parliament to deal with the estimates and to see exactly what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) intends to spend this money on? Would it not be fairer for the Minister of Finance at that point to tell us that he would like to borrow $10 billion? That is not what is being done. What the government is doing tonight is asking us for authority to borrow $10 billion. The government is asking us for a blank cheque and telling us that we will find out what it will spend it on later, if ever. Let there be no doubt that that is not good enough for this party.

On budget night we were told that the government not only anticipates spending $51 billion in fiscal 1980 but that it also anticipates a budgetary deficit of $12.9 billion as a result of that spending. Let us get something into perspective here. Ever since this Minister of Finance took office he has whimpered and whined about his attempts to show restraint and to reduce the deficit. That is straight misrepresentation.

Mr. Chrétien: What about all the promises being made in Vancouver tonight?

Mr. Stevens: Before the minister took office the total federal deficit was $6 billion. Then it went up to $10 billion. In April of last year we were told that the total deficit was $10.9 billion. That was the budgetary figure the minister gave us. In November we were told he had made a mistake. Oops, the minister found another $1.2 billion deficit, and by that time we found that the total deficit was $12.1 billion. Based on the first nine months' statement it looks as if the deficit of a budgetary nature will be well over $13 billion. I notice that the Minister of Finance cannot take the heat. He is now starting to leave the House. The minister anticipates a budgetary deficit of $12.9 billion next year, and he has the audacity to say that he believes in smaller deficits and restraint.

Mr. Boulanger: Even Joe Clark has had enough of you.

Mr. Stevens: Again let us put this into perspective. My friend, the hon. member for Fort William, told us about his trip to Europe. Presumably he got to Germany. I wonder if he asked the Germans what they do about deficits. If he had, he would have found out that, by constitution, the kind of deficit this government is inflicting on the Canadian people is illegal in Germany. The government in Germany cannot borrow for non-capital purposes, but this government proposes to borrow $10 billion for non-capital purposes. Is it just coincidence that we now happen to have 9 per cent inflation and the Germans have less than 3 per cent? No way. The mounting deficits inflicted by this government on the Canadian people are the cause of our inflation.

The reason I rose to speak tonight is that when we project ahead as to where this government is taking us, we see a very terrifying picture. Wood Gundy, the largest investment house in Canada, in its December, 1978, forecast for the years 1978 to 1983 pointed out that based on what is already in position, without the government's changing what it has said, we will have steadily rising deficits between now and 1981. By 1981 the total deficit requirement of this government will be $13 billion. Only then does the deficit begin to drop to $10 billion and eventually to $9 billion in 1983. In short, Wood Gundy figures show that if this government is allowed to carry out its plans, it will require $55 billion of further borrowing simply to service its operations between now and 1983. That compares with $26,523 million which the government ran up in the previous five years, which was the heaviest borrowing we have ever had in Canada in any five-year period.

● (2130)

That is why I am alarmed, because when you translate that, as does Wood Gundy, into what is the cost of servicing that debt, you find that the $6.5 billion costs currently being incurred go up to $10 billion by 1983. That means that if the government is allowed to carry out its plans of high deficits and high spending, the Canadian public will be expected to pay in 1983, $10 billion to service the debt alone. That $10 billion is greater than the entire budget of this country at the federal level when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary opposite who speaks sometimes—I understand he was the last in the lot and ended up being Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance by default—likes to comment about various deficits. I note he does not even sit in his own seat when he makes his comments.

Mr. Boulanger: Where do you stand in relation to Joe Clark, your leader?

Mr. Stevens: My little friend here—

Mr. Boulanger: Little?

Mr. Stevens: —this is the second time I have heard from him this year, and in honour of the occasion I should respond to him a second time. He asked me where I stand in relation to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I stand behind him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Because he will be the next prime minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Not only do I stand behind the Leader of the Opposition, but the bulk of the Canadian public are going to stand behind him, and they should be consulted before this bill is passed. That is why I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-37, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I did not pay attention. Who seconded the hon. member's motion?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I did, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, first I want to take a moment to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who, unlike the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), has contributed something over the last couple of years in these difficult economic times. He has contributed something to the economic advance of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: I notice that hon. members opposite are pretty loud tonight. Perhaps they could grant me the same courtesy that I granted them, but I do not suppose the word "courtesy" is part of their vocabulary. However, I would like to have a moment to say my piece, if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) does not mind too much.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not mind at all.

Mr. Stollery: Thank you. I noticed that when the hon. member for York-Simcoe rose to make his short 40 minute speech, he said he would act in a non-partisan manner. All of us on this side were a little taken aback at that, but we thought we would listen as he gave us his non-partisan economic speech. But as it progressed one could see that we were being treated to the usual mixture of selected facts and phantasies of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Let me say, particularly for those people who might not have picked it up, that you must not mix something like debt charges and debts and not explain that these are two different things. But we are used to that sort of mixture to which the hon. member for York-Simcoe treated us.

He mentioned that in 1958, rather an interesting date, just after the Conservatives took over from a Liberal administration, the debt charges they inherited from the Liberal administration were very low. The hon. member very conveniently did not mention that in 1962, after four years of a Conservative administration, the Canadian debt was at its highest since World War II; it was 35.4 per cent of our gross national product. After and including the problems in the 1960s, the world-wide problems brought about by the Vietnam war, the energy increases and the various difficulties of absorbing a justifiable demand by the third world for a better standard of living, after all those things, the Liberal government of the day faced the country with a debt, as a percentage of the GNP, of about 17 per cent, less than in 1962 after four years of administration by the party opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: The debt at that time was about 50 per cent less. One must ask the question: is this done to scare the Canadian people? Is this done to frighten Canadians, to make them lose confidence in themselves? Is this the kind of approach taken by a person who only yesterday was touted as the future minister of finance? Is that the kind of reaction he would like to see from the Canadian people to make them lose confidence in their own country?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, that is their game.

Mr. Stollery: I think that is a rather interesting attitude from a man who, as I said, until yesterday was touted as future minister of finance.

I notice that when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) mentioned that he had been in Brussels, he made the rather innocent comment that in his brief experience visiting Europe he found that Canadians live better than most people in Europe. I will return to this a little later. The hon. member for York-Simcoe heaped scorn on anyone who would suggest that Canadians live well, in fact that Canadians live better than anyone else in the world. When the hon. member for York-Simcoe hears someone say that Canada is the greatest in the world and has the highest standard of living, he cannot take it. He must scorn, that is the hon. member's approach.

● (2140)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Perhaps he scorns because apparently he will not be the minister of finance if his party were to win the next election, which I think will not happen. The hon. member for York-Simcoe said that he would make a non-partisan comment on the economy, and I should like to point out to Canadians that they should not be frightened by the hon. member's scare tactic. They should not lose confidence in their country, and they should listen carefully when bankers talk about the economy. They should keep in mind that bankers are not always correct, that they are not always the best friends of small businessmen, and that they have particular views of economics.

Bankers do not talk about the standard of living of the average man or the statistics which have been referred to by members on this side of the House for so long. Anyone could take a stroll down the main street of any Canadian town and hear the views of small businessmen. We know perfectly well that from 1968 to 1976 personal incomes, wages, salaries, fringe benefits, pensions and investment incomes increased by 72.6 per cent. That increase affects not only the banking community but every Canadian living in any town or city across the country.

Hon. members opposite have been using the situations in other countries to compare with Canada. They have divided the gross national product by the work forces of countries which have experienced a decline in their work forces. I do not understand why the Conservative party insists on ignoring the fact, for example, that in Japan 2.6 million fewer people are working at the present time than in 1970. Of course the Japanese way of life is perfectly all right for the Japanese. Since the climate of our country is cold, many Canadians go to Florida during the wintertime. Perhaps we are being somewhat irresponsible by spending too much money outside the country, but I am sure Canadians on holiday would not want to follow one of those little red flags, the zaibatsu, which is carried by the Japanese when they are on holiday. Of course most of their holidays are company ones arranged on a co-operative basis, which is perfectly all right for the Japanese.

When hon. members opposite use Japan as a model, perhaps all features of Japanese life should be used equally. For example, what about the fact that in Japan people live in rather small spaces? The Japanese government has not traditionally provided services for its citizens. I am not one of those people who think that a government should not provide services for its people. I think governments should provide for their citizens. Canada should be proud of the fact that many services have been provided for its citizens.

When we are discussing the economics of the 1970s or any other time frame, we should remember what our fathers told us. I was born in the middle of the depression, so I remember only as it ended. Actually the depression did not end until 1947. The type of business one could do was based on one's best three years prior to World War II. This was very difficult in the type of business my family was in. In those days we all had fathers or friends of the family to answer questions. Everything was going well in the 1950s and 1960s, and I am sure hon. members asked questions concerning the cause of the depression. My father used to say, "Look, one thing is for sure. They never knew they had it. They never even started to guess why they had it until it was ten years over. They didn't know, and they won't know when a similar thing happens again."

Mr. Orlikow: They are happening right now.

Mr. Stollery: A depression is not happening right now. A depression means that there is declining growth, which is not happening at the present time. As was indicated earlier, we are experiencing the most difficult decade since the 1930s, for a variety of reasons with which we, as members of parliament, are familiar.

In this type of ongoing discussion, which has taken place for years in the House of Commons, one can follow one of two routes; one can indulge in the hyperbole concerning government spending, or one can take the economic route. I repeat that the percentage of the gross national product which is debt is not as high as it was in 1962. One can indulge in hyperbole and frighten people half to death, or one can gather many books written by economists. Today I went to the library and ordered a copy of the book entitled "General Theory of Employment Interest in Money" which was written by Keynes.

Mr. Orlikow: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) can read it as well.

Mr. Stollery: One can read Galbraith or any number of books dealing with economics. I suspect most hon. members have read many of these books. When one reads the various books, one comes to the conclusion that one is not very much the wiser. If one has read 20 books written by 20 different economists, one will discover that they have 20 different approaches. After reading those books, perhaps one is somewhat more informed, but also more confused than before. The important thing is that the government must provide as much as possible for its citizens. If there is a declining growth rate, it should be absorbed as fairly and justly as possible by the citizens, particulary those who cannot protect themselves.

● (2150)

The Conservative party has said clearly through its mortgage tax credit proposal that instead of providing for the poor people, instead of making life easier for those people who are experiencing more difficult times because of the declining growth rate, it is going to make life easier for the rich. That is what the mortgage tax credit proposal means. That party is going to make life easier for the rich. It is going to give them $5 billion. We did not hear tonight about the famous stimulative deficit, but that was to be an $18 billion operation. There was to be $5 billion for the rich. I think it is important that people in Canada understand that different approach, and particularly the Conservative approach which was clearly enunciated during the byelection build-up. It was indicated there was to be an extra $5 billion for the rich. I think that is sinking in now.

An hon. Member: It sunk in during the byelections.

Mr. Stollery: I do not think the people in my constituency, with an average annual income of less than $12,000 and no possibility of getting any of that rich man's $5 billion, will take too kindly to that approach. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) says one should not compare one's self with people in other parts of the country. We should not use any kind of measuring stick, but just sort of wander around and pluck things out of the air. Everybody knows that things are more difficult now than they were ten years ago. The Conservative party's answer to that is exactly the same as it was in 1930: protect the rich and make sure the poor people suffer. That is the record. There is to be $5 billion in mortgage tax credits for those people with expensive mortgages, but nothing for the people with small mortgages or for those who rent.

An hon. Member: It's too bad you weren't running in the last byelection.

Mr. Stollery: I do not know if the people of Canada have quite cottoned on to that, but they will, particularly when we go through some of the announcements apparently being made today to reinforce this Conservative position of favouring the rich and the well-to-do, favouring those who have and against those who have not. I think the people of Canada will see through that. The next election may be very interesting.

An hon. Member: It sure will be.

Mr. Stollery: But not in the way hon. members opposite think.

Let me bring one more point to the attention of the House before ten o'clock. I should like to relate what has happened to the value of the dollar, and suggest why it has happened. This is another chestnut being dragged out by the Conservative party. I have looked at the statistics regarding the value of the dollar over the last two and a half years. I got all the statistics for each month, and I did so because of some of the wild things we heard yesterday. No one over there wants to talk about the Parti Québécois, the separatists, or what effect the election of that party has had on the value of our dollar. If you mention the problem we have in this country as a result of one of the provinces with a government that wants to separate, you are practically shouted down for being cynical. We are not supposed to talk about this. My goodness, are we not supposed to realize what happened to the value of the Canadian dollar following the election of that party in Quebec in 1976?

Let me give the House some statistics in relation to the value of the dollar in the past couple of years. In September, October and November of 1976 the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the U.S. dollar was par or $1.01. No one wants to talk about that fact. Following the Quebec election, the value of our dollar in relation to the U.S. dollar in December, January and February was 98 cents, 98 cents, and 97 cents. In March it dropped to 95 cents. In April, May, and June it was 95 cents, 95 cents, and 94 cents. Nobody wants to talk about that, and nobody wants to admit that perhaps there was a relationship between what happened in November, 1976, and the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar. I suggest that nobody but a fool could fail to understand that relationship.

I do not know anyone in the currency business, but I suppose currency is similar to cheese in that you are not going to keep cheese that has gone bad. Surely you are not going to keep milk that has gone sour. I suggest these people are not going to hold on to Canadian dollars when it looks as though the country is not going to be around much longer. People are not going to do that unless they are crazy. I cannot imagine the gnomes of Zurich and New York, whoever they are, if they really exist, holding on to Canadian money in a crisis situation such as this. I cannot imagine people like that being so stupid.

This opposition has no position in this regard. It is an opposition without position. It has lost its credibility, and that is the reason hon. members do not want to talk about this relationship. They suggest that what happened in November, 1976, had nothing to do with the drop in the value of our dollar. Are they really suggesting that the gnomes of Zurich and New York are going to hold on to hundreds of millions of Canadian dollars knowing there is a possibility that the country may not exist as it is now for much longer? That is just too stupid for imagination, and it is beyond imagination that such a group of individuals could seriously think they could form the government of this country. That is the approach they have taken. They do not want to talk about it. In June, 1977, the value of the dollar dropped to 94 cents.

An hon. Member: Please call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Stollery: In July the value dropped to 94 cents, and in August it dropped to 93 cents. In September it was 93 cents, and in October it dropped to 90 cents. I do not think anyone could take very seriously a group that does not want to talk about this. Let me call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and continue on Monday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO IMPROVE PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, February 12, as reported at page 3109 of Hansard, I put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in these words:

> In view of the fact that there are three or four outstanding items, such as the 48 per cent rule as it affects widows, revising the War Veterans Allowance Act, keeping the disability pension rate in line with the composite wage in the public service and so on, with which it would be desirable to deal before this parliament ends, would the minister do his best to bring before cabinet one or more of these issues so that parliament can deal with them in the name of our veterans before this session ends?

In the few minutes one has in the late show, I can expand only briefly on those four or five items, but I would like to impress upon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Parent), who is here tonight to respond on behalf of his minister, that the heart of this question is simply this: are we going to get some veterans legislation before this session ends?

Over the last few days I have been pushed from one minister to another. When I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he would be bringing forth any legislation, his reply was that it depends upon whether there is time. When I asked the government House leader or his deputy to make time for some legislation in the field of veterans affairs, I was told that it is up to the Minister of Veterans Affairs to submit the legislation. Today when I renewed my endeavours with a question to the government House leader, he said that he would be happy to prolong the session to get some of these things done, but since one does not know when the session will end, one does not know what "prolong" means. However, if by that he meant that there is hope that we will get some legislation respecting veterans affairs in this session, I am very grateful.

I said that I would take a moment or two to expand upon these four or five topics. I need not take the time to develop them fully because my friend and I know the case from A to Z. First, there is the 48 per cent rule. This is becoming of concern to more and more veterans, especially as they get older. It bothers them to realize that in many cases if they die first their widows will not get a pension because their disability pensions are below 48 per cent. That rule simply must be changed.

Then there is the question of an over-all review of the War Veterans Allowance Act. This review has been promised to us repeatedly for the best part of a year. In fact on December 22, 1978, just before Christmas, the minister said in regard to that matter that "it is coming along quite well, and I hope to have something to present sometime in February." We are already in the middle of February, and I hope that that commitment will be carried out.

I also mentioned on Monday the desirability of keeping the 100 per cent disability pension rate in line with the composite salary index in the public service. It was adjusted last year to bring it in line because it had fallen behind, and it is slipping again. It seems to me that we ought to put this on a legislative basis so that we are not required to bring it up to date every three or four years.

A minor item which I had in mind when I asked my question the other day, and which is causing some irritation, is the fact that when the mail is disturbed or delayed at the end of the month certain pension cheques do not arrive on time. This is particularly annoying to veterans because their disability cheques are dated at the end of the month and, therefore, they do not receive them until the end of the month. Certain other cheques, such as old age security cheques, are sent out two or three days ahead of time, but disability cheques are not sent out in advance. I am told that the reason is because disability benefits stop the day a veteran dies. When an old age pensioner dies in the middle of the month the pensions lasts for the rest of the month. If that simple change could be made it would not cost very much and then these cheques could be sent out a little early.

Another main issue of concern to veterans these days, and to the organizations that represent them, is that of domiciliary care which is something that needs to be improved because our veterans are aging.

I have listed five subjects, and the parliamentary secretary cannot deal with them all in three minutes. He does not need to because I have set out the items. What he ought to be able to do, and what will boost his stock tremendously if he will do it tonight, is to assure us that before this session ends, before this parliament is dissolved and before an election is called, there will be legislation introduced on one or more of these items. I say to him that if it is, members of all parties in this House will co-operate and get that legislation through in no time at all.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) again for bringing the problems to the fore with regard to the veterans and the pensions. I am sure the hon. member is well aware that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is acutely aware of the problems as they exist now. I am sure the hon. member realizes the minister has tried over the years, and has been very successful in making the lot of veterans through their pensions, and through the pensions of their widows, much better than it was at any time before.

As the minister said to the hon. member in his reply on Monday, the items are under consideration. The review of the War Veterans Allowance Act is nearing completion. The minister expects to receive a report on the outcome of that study shortly. As to whether the legislation will be brought forward depends again, as the hon. member was told today, on the amount of time that we have before the end of the session. There are some other variables.

The team designed to study the legislation has confirmed that the legislation, in parts, and the administration it requires, do not fully provide for the needs of those it seeks to serve. It has been outdated by contemporary social policy. Detailed proposals are currently being developed which will meet the present and future needs of war veterans allowance recipients and their dependants.

I need not remind the hon. member that the subject of providing pro rata pensions for widows whose husbands were in receipt of disability pensions of 47 per cent or less has been discussed very often in this House over the years. Indeed this has been brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the committees that we have sat on together over the last four years. It should be remembered, and I point this out only for the record, that the widow was pensioned whose husband's death occurred during war time or whose death was attributable to his service, and regardless of the degree of disability assessment. The question arises is whether, if death was not in any way attributable to military service, a widow's pension should be paid because of the service connection.

With respect to disability pensions, they were indexed, as the member fairly brought out earlier, on January 1 to reflect changes in the consumer price index. The basic rate for an unmarried 100 per cent pensioner is now $679 a month. In the case of a married 100 per cent pensioner the figure is $849 a month. If he and his wife have two dependent children his pension is increased to over $1,000 a month.

I wish an answer could be given specifically to the question which the hon. member brings up. I can tell him that this whole subject is under review and there is great sympathy on this side of the House with the over-all concept of what we are trying to do with the widows' pensions.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are ready to agree.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—INQUIRY WHETHER BUDGETARY CUTS WILL AFFECT FUNDS FOR TEACHING OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this brief intervention relates to the federal-provincial agreements providing for the teaching of the official languages in our Canadian educational system. I raised this question in the House on the 25th of October last because I wanted to know the possible impact of the government's budgetary cuts and especially the impact of these cuts on federal-provincial programs on bilingualism in the educational system.

In answer to my question, the minister confirmed that the government had decided upon freezing these payments amounting to $140 million and he promised that he would try convincing the provinces to establish an accountability procedure whereby the public would be made aware of the breakdown of the federal funds provided to the provinces to help them incur the extra expenses required for the teaching of the second language and the teaching of official languages to minority groups.

Incidentally, that was proposed by the B and B commission in 1969 and the Liberal government of the day had been willing to sign agreements with the provinces in order to help them take up that national challenge, namely to allow linguistic minorities whose mother tongue was one of the official languages access to education in their own mother tongue and to allow Canadians of the linguistic majority to learn the second official language in all parts of the country if they so desired.

Mr. Speaker, as present agreements end before March 31, 1979 and as it is urgent that those agreements be signed in order for us to have the assurance that the provinces will continue to ensure the education of the minority groups and the teaching of the second language to those who so wish, I feel it is timely tonight to bring up one of the problems that seem to be of concern not only to the federal government but also the provinces.

I am thinking here of the question of the accounting, the matter of giving publicly a breakdown of expenditures made by the provinces, so that not only the people of the provinces concerned might know what is going on in their own province, but also all Canadians might be fully aware of the amounts spent on those objectives, namely encouraging and compensating the provinces for the additional expenditures incurred for the teaching of the second language and the education of the minorities. As we know, schooling in Canada is compulsory for all children. So, when talking about schooling expenditures it must be understood that there is no question of the federal government interfering in a provincial jurisdiction; instead, it is a matter for it to try to make up for whatever the provinces may not be expanding with regard to that additional burden. Schools, desks, school buses, teachers, books, those exist for all students in all provinces, and I do not feel that, because I speak French in Ontario, I am a greater burden to the province than is the other guy who speaks English. So, in all fairness, both would be entitled to the same education, and that is what we are striving for. The agreements seem to be bogged down, Mr. Speaker, on the question of giving a public breakdown of the accounting. The provinces say: It is our jurisdiction, education is our responsibility, therefore the federal government has no right to interfere. We in the federal government do not want to interfere in education which is so essential, so well known in the Canadian context and where the provinces have full authority.

Some provinces or perhaps all of them refuse however to account for those expenditures. The problem is as follows: we, who live in a minority situation, do not have the assurance that those provinces spend the federal funds for the objectives which we think are pursued by the federal government. I think hon. members are aware that for several years we have been asking for access to the books, for public accountability. They refuse saying it is a provincial area of jurisdiction, and we just have to foot the bill, and then they will see how to spend the money.

The problem is that federal funds are transferred to an account called the general accounts of the province, then they are redistributed according to a formula which does not take the federal formula into account because payments are made according to a well established formula, while they are redistributed according to another formula which is sometimes not so well known.

● (2215)

Therefore I consider them as essential because we are just coming out of a period where we received the Pepin-Robarts report, which recommends that Canadians leave to the provinces the obligation to educate minorities in their own area of jurisdiction. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who can make an act of faith in that philosophy or that proposal which would give the provinces complete freedom to act without having well established standards or criteria from the federal government to ensure something which, I think, is essential to the life of my country. In other words, wherever one lives in Canada, one would have access to education in his or her own mother tongue. You really treat minorities like simpletons when you try to make them believe everything has now change and that in less than ten years the provinces have earned the right to be trusted after ignoring the problem for years and years.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to conclude by saying that these agreements could be multilateral, or national with national criteria, or maybe we should consider bilateral agreements if, as press reports and the minister of education claim, they do not trust the current formulas, let us find new ones, and if we cannot do it generally for all provinces, maybe we should consider entering into bilateral agreements with the provinces that are willing to do so.

Mr. Speaker, this is an urgent matter and we must have the assurance tonight that these programs will continue to be implemented and that the breakdown of accounts will be done openly and publicly so all Canadians can see for themselves and be assured that funds are well spent.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank you, and I thank my colleague from Ottawa-Vanier for his question. I want to assure him sincerely and immediately that we will continue this second language education program in this province. It is not only a question of continuing, Mr. Speaker, but far from rocking the boat with this program, the federal government believes that bilingualism in education in Canada is a matter of great importance.

Even in the next five years, Mr. Speaker, the federal government will spend a minimum of $852 million to teach the second minority language in Canadian schools. And the federal government has already devoted more than $1 billion to provide second language courses in the provinces since we first negotiated and accepted in 1970 to do so in every province.

[English]

The present agreement signed with the provinces in March, 1974, made general reference to the importance of full accounting—

● (2220)

[Translation]

—as my colleague mentioned, the accounting—

[English]

—by provincial governments for the federal funds received. Progress in this regard has varied from province to province. It has been different throughout Canada, but a very considerable amount of information on provincial utilization of these funds has been made available by some provinces. In others progress has been less satisfactory from the federal point of view. Most notably, the province of Quebec has not accounted for the federal formula payment beyond providing information on the numbers of students and the provincial costs of education per pupil, the variables which are utilized in the calculation of the federal payments.

The federal government, therefore, is seeking to obtain a more specific "accounting" under future agreements through new arrangements which will ensure that its funds are being effectively used to develop and implement new initiatives or to help defray the demonstrated additional maintenance costs in each province relating to the provision of education in the minority official language and second official language instruction.

Indeed, the minister stated only yesterday in the House that the dispute or the point of contention between the provinces and the federal government is not basically over amounts of money. The real question will be whether there will be true accountability, not to the federal government——not to the federal government but to Canadians to make sure that funds granted to the provinces will be used to teach the second language or the minority language in this country.

[Translation]

ENERGY—STEPS TO ENSURE ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF OIL TO EAST COAST REFINERIES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, on February 13 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) a rather simple and straightforward question, and I naively expected an equally straightforward answer. The pith and substance of my question was the situation with respect to oil supplies to east coast refineries in the light of rumours that these supplies would be cut back.

This question did not come out of the blue. Earlier I had introduced a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding whether cutbacks were likely. The minister had made several statements in the House in response to questions from hon. members on his side, and he had indicated on those occasions, and then again in response to my questions, that he had had negotiations with Mexican authorities with regard to Mexican oil. He also spoke of arrangements with Venezuela. However, he did not deal with the question of cutbacks in supplies of foreign crude oil, which crude oil is necessary for the operations of east coast refineries.

One might have thought as a result of the minister's responses that there indeed was at that point in time no effective cutback of supplies and no need for real concern on the part of residents on the east coast of Canada. However, almost 24 hours later we learned through the media and other sources that there were indeed cutbacks of oil supplies and that this was a very serious problem for east coast refineries. So, I stand here this evening to explain to the House the urgent and pressing nature of the energy problem on the east coast, and particularly in the province of Nova Scotia.

Nova Scotia has the highest energy costs in Canada as a result of the world situation respecting the price of oil. Our government in Nova Scotia failed to take action in the early 1970s when it became evident that the price of oil worldwide would escalate. This in turn goes back to a decision taken years before that Canadian oil would not be available beyond the Ottawa Valley line and, that those on the east coast would have to rely on the availability of foreign crude oil for their domestic needs, and to operate the refineries which were constructed at about that time on the east coast.

The government knew, or must have known, in 1970 that there would be a problem—but nothing was done—just as today the minister must know that there is going to continue to be an energy problem on the east coast arising from the reduction in the world supply of oil and the difficulties in the Middle East. I wanted to know what the minister has done about it. What he has told the House before and since is that certain arrangements had been made, and he mentioned an oil swap. He said that Canadian oil will be delivered to the central United States in return for their share of foreign crude oil available from the Middle East and other sources. But that oil swap has nothing to do with the minister. He did not take those steps.

● (2225)

Those arrangements were made among the international oil companies without any help or intervention from the minister, I suspect. The fact of the matter is that beyond those long range negotiations and the ordinary course of government activities, he has taken no steps to assure available and adequate supplies of oil for east coast refineries.

I wonder if the minister realizes and recognizes the serious effect of his inaction on the east coast. He has told us that he will get oil from Mexico. We read in the newspapers that the President of the U.S. is in the same place bidding for the same oil stocks. I have to ask: does this mean that we will engage in a Dutch auction with the United States for these dwindling oil stocks? If oil is available, what price are we going to pay for it? Will it be the worldwide price presently established by the OPEC nations, or will it be a premium price? I suspect that we will be paying a great deal more for our oil than we now are, and this in light of the fact, as I said, that in Nova Scotia we are paying one of the highest prices for energy in Canada.

My problem, and I am sure that of all Nova Scotians, is this: Several years ago we were told we would be paying $1 a gallon for gasoline, and many people would not believe it. Today, as a result of the inaction of the minister, we can look forward to paying $2 for a gallon of gasoline unless some immediate action is taken. What immediate action can be taken? The answer is obvious. We must look for alternative sources of energy. We have tremendous coal reserves in Nova Scotia which, if the minister would act now forcefully and quickly, could be developed so that they would be available, because the supply of Middle East oil is dwindling and will be dried up and gone. This is not a stable source, so we should not have to rely on it.

Like most Nova Scotians I am directly affected by this matter which is of prime and grave importance to us. I asked a question the other day in the House concerning the same matter. I wanted to know what action had been taken. I put the question to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who is a great Nova Scotian, and who should know our problem. He preferred to fiddle with problems of parliamentary procedure while the oil refineries on the east coast burned for lack of oil.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to say to the hon. member that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) is very concerned, as is the government, not only since today but since the 1970's about the particular problem caused in eastern Canada by the oil crisis and he is also, if not more, sympathetic to the people of Nova Scotia than the people in all eastern Canada.

Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall certain facts about international crude oil supplies. We know that from October to December last there were sporadic interruptions in crude oil imports from Iran. We also know that since December 26 those imports of Iranian crude have come to a complete standstill. You must remember that Iranian crude oil in the world totalled 5 million barrels a day, or about 10 per cent of supplies in non-communist countries.

To make up for that shortage the other countries agreed to increase their production and crude exports. The present effects, on one hand, of the stoppage of Iranian exports and, on the other of higher exports by other oil-producing countries are basically this: the total amount of available crude in the world dropped by two to three million barrels a day, which is about a 4 to 6 per cent cutback in supply, not yet the critical point set by the international organization of oil-importing countries.

As concerns the situation in eastern Canada, I believe it is wrong to say that the minister and the government have done nothing. Mr. Speaker, if we go back to the events that I mentioned earlier, the crisis of the 70s, we can see all the phases we have gone through, all the steps that the government has taken to correct the situation. In my opinion the most outstanding aspect is that Canada's domestic price is different from the international price. This is because of the existence of a mechanism which allows adjustment of the prices. And we know this adjustment works.

Normally, we used to import 500,000 barrels of oil a day from Iran. We generally import 500,000 barrels a day. Of these 500,000 barrels, 100,000 or 20 per cent came from Iran. Following the reductions, our importers had some success in convincing other international crude suppliers to increase their supplies to offset this deficit.

It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that there are unavoidable delays in exact accounting of the dates of delivery by internationals to Canadian importers. It is also quite obvious—and I believe that this is quite fundamental—that some delays are unavoidable if we are to provide accurate figures on the imports expected by refiners, which information must be communicated to the government.

However, we have seen that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) did not spare any effort, to arrange for negotiations and to organize the exchange program which the hon. member mentioned, and that we can already feel the effectiveness of these measures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR RAIL LINE INTO NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN WITH RAILHEAD AT PRINCE ALBERT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the vast mineral discoveries made in northern Saskatchewan, which will require railway transit construction if the fabulous potential for Canada is to be attained, the Canadian National Railways should proceed without further delay to give consideration, in the national interest, to commencing construction of a railroad into these areas, to Lac La Ronge and 100 miles north with the railhead, of course, being in the city of Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH

LOCATION OF CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity having to do with the implementation of the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Given the fact that the best medical and scientific expertise in occupational health and safety is available in the city of Hamilton, particularly at McMaster University, and given the fact that Hamilton, the industrial heartland of the country, is now, I understand, fourth on the short list, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government, in the national interest, gives serious consideration to the establishment of the centre in the city of Hamilton because of the obvious industrial environment and available expertise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that this is a direct representation on behalf of his own constituency. As such, I am sure he will agree that that is not the purpose of the provisions of Standing Order 43.

CALL FOR PETRO-CANADA TO BE SOLE AGENCY FOR IMPORTING OIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the president of Imperial Oil directly snubbed the twofold request by the Government of Canada that no diversion of Venezuelan oil destined for Canada should take place, and that Imperial Oil establish direct contact with the Venezuelan government rather than operating through its parent, Exxon corporation, in the United States.

This naive move by the Government of Canada and the arrogant rejection of Canadian sovereignty by Imperial Oil are unacceptable. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House asserts that the diversion of Venezuelan oil by the Exxon corporation is not acceptable to the Parliament of Canada and that the government establish immediately Petro-Canada as the sole agency for importing offshore oil into our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC WORKS

MEASURE TO CONTROL EXCESSIVE SPENDING BY DEPARTMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Repeatedly over the past 2½ years I have asked the government for a clear indication of whether, and when, the Department of Public Works will be put on a revenue dependent basis so as to cut down on excessive spending by departments. Since the government has continually given vague support, but no substance, to the idea despite the recommendations of the other place and the opposition and a history of studies going back to the Glassco commission, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Public Works make a statement on motions indicating whether the government intends to adopt the "user pays" principle of financing public works, so that the House may have a clear sense of where the government is moving on this issue before it has to deal with yet another set of estimates.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS TO COMBAT INFLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of the back-breaking rate of inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the government forthwith bring in legislation to provide an amending formula to the basic rate of pension for disabled veterans so that the basic rate would be adjusted to increases in the pay of the five selected categories of public service workers, thereby affording them a minimum insurance against inflation.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMPENSATION FOR CANADIANS WHOSE PROPERTIES IN RUSSIA ANNEXED BY U.S.S.R.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Yuri Shymko (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that almost $10 million are raked off every year by the Soviet government from estates of Canadians with relatives in the U.S.S.R., most of it from the disposition of capital from Canadian properties and mortgages, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker):

That this government negotiate with the government of the U.S.S.R. full compensation for any properties formerly owned by Canadians and annexed by the allied Soviet government during and after World War II, and also that any past and future estates left by Soviet citizens be transferred to their surviving relatives in Canada, with appropriate legislation preventing Soviet expropriation by means of forgery, duress and excessive overcharging of 45 per cent of Canadian estates left to surviving relatives on their territory.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member will realize, in rereading his motion, that I really cannot put the question unless there is some attempt in the preamble to establish urgency. It is not sufficient that it be an important matter, which this is; it must have some urgency. Since there does not seem to be an element of that urgency, I think I ought not to use this Standing Order to entertain this kind of motion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROTEST AGAINST PROPOSED INCREASE IN SUBSCRIPTION PRICE OF "HANSARD"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

That this House notes with regret the decision of the Department of Supply and Services to raise the Hansard subscription price from the present rate of $3 per session to $65, and therefore expresses its view that the House of Commons itself should take over the sending out of Hansard and should keep the subscription price within a reasonable range so that Canadians will be encouraged to receive and read the actual record of what goes on in parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STANDING ORDERS

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR GRIEVANCE PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the consent of the House to move a motion to provide for a provisional change in the Standing Orders. I would not expect that consent to be given today; however, I hope the motion will form the basis of discussions between my House leader and the government House leader because of the assistance and co-operation I have received from my House leader.

With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I will move the following motion:

That the Standing Orders be amended by adding, for the remainder of the present session, the following:

40A(1) At six o'clock, on any Monday, Tuesday or Thursday, Mr. Speaker may deem that a motion, "that grievances be noted", has been made and seconded, whereupon such motions shall be debatable for one hour.

(2) No member shall be recognized by Mr. Speaker to raise a grievance unless notice of the grievance to be raised has been given to Mr. Speaker by 4 p.m.

(3) The member raising the grievance may speak for not more than five minutes. A minister of the Crown, or a parliamentary secretary speaking on behalf of a minister, or a member directly involved in the grievance raised, if he wishes to do so, may speak for not more than five minutes.

(4) When it is provided in any Standing Order—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McGrath: I have two more paragraphs, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are in some difficulty by virtue of the very terms of my ruling of a couple of days ago, to which I know the hon. member is directing himself. In my ruling I did indicate that this Standing Order should not be used for procedural matters. In another part of the ruling I indicated that I would welcome any initiative by members of the House to establish a grievance procedure which might improve on the present one.

For the moment, I think I have to stick with the ruling that we should not use this Standing Order to accomplish that purpose; but I certainly hope that further discussions will take place along the lines of the motion now put together by the hon. member, to see whether or not the House might want to take further action in respect of it. I do not think I can be inconsistent in respect of my ruling in allowing him to put his motion in these terms pursuant to this Standing Order.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you can tell me how I can move it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is your problem.

PARTIES TO CONTRACT FOR PURCHASE OF VENEZUELAN OIL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to remind him of the assurance he gave to the hon. member for Assiniboia earlier this month in which he said, among other things, that Venezuela has been our major supplier, supplying some 40 per cent of our imports. He said he had received personal assurances from Venezuela that those supplies would continue to Canada. Yesterday, the minister also referred to these assurances.

I should like to ask him whether, when he made that statement in the House earlier this month, he knew that the company contracting for these supplies from Venezuela was Exxon, rather than a Canadian company such as Imperial Oil.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Yes, Mr. Speaker, when I was down in Venezuela I raised this matter with the head of Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela, and we discussed the contracting relationships which govern the sale of Venezuelan crude to Canada. They pointed out to me that the contractual relationship was with Exxon International, but that they would prefer to deal directly with a Canadian company.

When I got back to Canada I reported to Mr. Armstrong my discussions with Petroleos de Venezuela and the fact that I had received assurances of 200,000 barrels a day. Knowing that Imperial Oil of Canada sources virtually 100 per cent Venezuela, I made it clear to him that I wanted him to establish a direct contracting relationship with Petroleos de Venezuela. I put that request to him, for reasons of public policy, in a letter that was sent to him in January.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not know what answer the minister received, but I can guess. Perhaps I had better ask him whether he received a response from Mr. Armstrong and, if he did not receive a response, what he did about it.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated in answers in the House that I have had a number of discussions with Mr. Armstrong. So far they have not been satisfactory to the government. Mr. Armstrong has not yet been able to give me evidence that Imperial Oil has secured permission from its parent corporation to deal directly with Petroleos de Venezuela and to enter into contracting relationships with that corporation.

• (1120)

Mr. Armstrong told me that he raised this matter with his parent company, with Exxon. He indicated that he is hopeful he will be in a position to reply to me within a short period of time, but he has given no specific date. I have made it very clear to Mr. Armstrong that Canada regards this as a very important matter. I have indicated to him that the exchanges involved which his company is seeking are matters we will have to review against this policy background. Quite clearly, it is a lever; it provides the government with clout in this particular situation and I intend that we should use that clout.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the uncertainty the minister encountered, in view of the vital concern of the people of Nova Scotia and the maritimes regarding these supplies, and their natural anxiety, and in view of the still doubtful outlook particularly after the first quarter, why did the minister feel he was discharging his duties to the House and to the people in that part of Canada by simply standing up and giving very bland assurances calculated to give the impression that the supplies of oil from Venezuela would continue to flow into eastern Canada in the normal manner? In view of what the minister has told us today, how can he justify having taken this casual, complacent position before the House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House a moment ago, I had reason to believe that Venezuela wanted to deal directly with Canada. I had no reason to believe that Exxon International would divert supplies from Venezuela, supplies which were destined for Canada.

Mr. Lawrence: You knew.

Mr. Gillespie: As recently as a few days ago I had no reason to believe that that would be done, that they would put western hemisphere crude oil on a worldwide allocation basis. After all, other international companies have not adopted that practice. As I understand it from information I have received, other international companies have allocated only on the basis of Middle Eastern crude oil, but they have not cut back on their western hemisphere crude oil. For example, there has been no allocation or reduction on the part of Shell. Shell Canada is dealing directly with Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela.

There has been no cutback between Gulf Canada and the supplies from Venezuela to Canada for Gulf's account, nor has there been any with respect to Texaco: I have been assured of that by the president of Texaco Canada. The situation in which we are dealing with Imperial is a different and unique one. Exxon and Imperial have dealt with this question of reallocation in a different manner than other international companies.

The second thing which is different about the situation is that Imperial sources come exclusively from Venezuela and none of the other companies' do. It is intolerable and unacceptable that our multinational corporations would intervene and decide that 25,000 barrels a day of crude oil, or roughly one-quarter of the crude oil supplies for this company, should be diverted to other markets. More particularly, I would have thought the hon. member for Halifax would have been equally concerned about this since his area is more vulnerable than any other part of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: What a lot of huffery and puffery.

POSSIBILITY OF SUPPLYING EASTERN CANADA WITH WESTERN CANADIAN OIL

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The matter becomes more confusing as the minister ploughs along. Perhaps he could explain to the House what possible benefits will accrue to either the producing provinces which have surplus producibility, or to the Atlantic provinces which obviously need crude oil supplies, by the government's threat to block any further oil swaps by Imperial Oil Limited?

● (1125)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think we are in the fortunate position, as I have indicated in the House before, of having surplus producibility in western Canada. The government of Alberta has indicated it is prepared to approve additional liftings of a temporary nature to make up for shortages which are being felt by eastern Canadian refineries. That will be done through the displacement mechanism on a temporary basis. I would expect that these additional liftings in western Canada will be of benefit to and will look after eastern Canadians.

If the hon. member is asking about the threat in respect of Imperial Oil and the concern that might cause to customers in eastern Canada, my answer to him is that if Imperial Oil is not prepared to establish a direct relationship, then it will have to accept the consequences. This is its responsibility to its particular customers, with which it should be concerned. If, as it has said, it has this flexibility to deal worldwide, it should be able to look after them. If it cannot, we are prepared to authorize additional liftings from western Canada to its competitors, and I am sure its competitors will be very pleased to look after that market.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is a very stupid bargaining stance on the part of the federal government. Is the minister saying he is sure there will be sufficient supplies for the Atlantic provinces, either from Venezuela or from western Canada, to meet second quarter requirements and to build up their stocks for next winter?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe the answer, quite clearly, is yes. The Venezuelans have said they are prepared to continue these supplies to Canada. The problem is with Exxon, and I am surprised that the hon. member and his party do not yet understand that. They do not yet understand that and seem to be saying to themselves, "We will let Exxon solve our problems for us."

An hon. Member: You said the problems were solved.

Mr. Gillespie: We are not prepared to let Exxon solve our problems; we are going to solve our own problems.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, a month or so ago the minister said the problems were solved: he gave us all the assurances, and now he is backtracking, changing his position.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PETRO-CANADA AS EXCLUSIVE IMPORTER OF OIL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to turn the minister's words right around. It is the Government of Canada that is saying Exxon is going to solve our problems; that is the whole negotiating stance of the government.

In view of the fact that the minister does not have to wait for that letter from Mr. Armstrong, since he got his answer from the press conference yesterday in which Mr. Armstrong flatly turned down the two requests—one that the corporation deal directly with Venezuela, and the other that they fully restore our quotas—in addition to which Mr. Armstrong said at his press conference that they are going to continue to deal with Exxon and not directly with the government of Venezuela, considering that Imperial Oil took that position yesterday and that Shell, Gulf or Texaco might take it next month or the month after that, will the government not recognize that this is the normal economic performance of the multionationals and, therefore, immediately establish the Canadian corporation, namely, PetroCan, as the exclusive importer of oil into this country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that a number of multinational corporations, especially the Canadian operators, are dealing directly with the national oil company of Venezuela and that they have established a commercial relationship. I hope and expect that Imperial will do the same thing.

PetroCan has also initiated discussions with Petroleos de Venezuela; it has already had a number of discussions in respect of the sourcing of crude for Canadians, more particularly for eastern Canadians who are affected by the shortage at the present time. I cannot as yet announce what the outcome of these discussions will be, but clearly Petro-Canada is in the field right now seeking a contracting relationship with Petroleos de Venezuela in the same way it is negotiating with Pemex, the national oil company of Mexico.

● (1130)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister, once again, in the first part of his answer—to which I listened with care—reasserted his faith that Exxon would do what the Government of Canada wants it to do. I do not know what the foundation of that faith is. The minister is like a man on the Titanic saying, just before the ship goes down, "Pass me another glass of sherry; everything is going to be fine."

Mr. MacEachen: What's wrong with beer?

Mr. Broadbent: There is no reason for us to believe that. Given the expressed desire of the government of Venezuela to deal directly on a government-to-government basis, which I confirmed as recently as this morning, and the need for Canadians in Atlantic Canada and Quebec to have an assured supply of oil in the future, I repeat, why does the government not make Petro-Canada the exclusive importer of oil into this country?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe that Petro-Canada has made enormous progress in the past three years and more particularly the past year.

Mr. Broadbent: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: I wonder, as the hon. member does, about the official opposition and why they would want to dismantle Petro-Canada. I, like him, wonder why the Leader of the Opposition repeatedly says he would dismantle Petro-Canada and destroy this major policy instrument which is aimed at providing security of supply for Canadians.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows better than most that we would not have Petro-Canada unless the NDP had forced this government to create it in 1973. He knows better than most the reality of the discussions which took place at that time.

Since Canadians in Atlantic Canada and the province of Quebec do not want to be held up to ransom in the future by multinational companies if they continue to behave in the way these companies behave—I am not criticizing them on this basis, because they are out there to make profits, but if they are set up on a multinational basis they have no allegiance to this country—why does this government not give Petro-Canada the same kind of mandate as companies of its equivalence in Venezuela, Mexico and around the world have, namely, to protect the energy interests of its people?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada has done. It has given Petro-Canada that mandate and that is why Petro-Canada is the negotiating instrument for the Government of Canada with Mexico. It is the sole negotiating instrument for 100,000 barrels per day which I hope will replace the equivalent amount that we had been receiving from Iran.

It is also true that Petro-Canada is within the top ten and that it is the second largest natural gas producer in the country.

Mr. Broadbent: Sit down.

Mr. Gillespie: It is probably about number six in oil production. So in terms of security of supply it is very important. I believe there is another important reason, and that is that the creation of Petro-Canada will help to keep the multinationals honest.

Oral Questions

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF OIL SHIPMENT DIVERSIONS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, it is really hard to see how Petro-Canada or any other state oil company could assist in this mess which the government has nurtured in ten years of neglect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: My supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lawrence: Thank you, sir. I am sure that the minister can understand the feeling on the part of some of us that there is a very obvious contradiction between the private knowledge which the minister had about these diversions and the public face which he has put on in this House about his own actions relating to the supply of Venezuelan crude oil. The minister knows, or should have known, that Imperial Oil—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Lawrence: Yes, I do, sir. Did the minister not appreciate that Imperial Oil was informed by Exxon in January, to the minister's knowledge and to the knowledge of the NEB, that there would be diversions, and that in actual fact a number of those diversions had to be approved by his own agency, his own department and the NEB? At that same time the minister was coming into this House and making public utterances that he had saved the situation by assuring us of Venezuelan supply. How many swaps in January and early February were approved by the NEB, not only for Imperial Oil but for all the eastern refineries?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Right on.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is trying to suggest—

Mr. Lawrence: That you knew; that is what I am suggesting.

Mr. Gillespie: —that this had been developing for some period of time and that I was aware of the facts. The hon. member has obviously made a completely wrong inference.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We know that you don't know the facts.

Mr. Gillespie: The first time that I learned there would be a diversion of 25 per cent was last Thursday when a delegation from Imperial Oil came to my office. That was the first time the cutback of 25 per cent came to my attention.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, then how could the minister tell us that he and the NEB approved a replacement cargo as early as February 8, which was unloaded at the Dartmouth docks for the Imperial Oil refinery, when that approval would have to have been made many days before so that the arrangements could be made? How could that possibly happen without the knowledge of the minister; and did not the minister then ask himself why that type of diversionary tactic, that type of replacement cargo, was needed?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about two different things. There is the situation of a predictable shortage developing in eastern Canada as a result of the Iranian problem, when all production in that country ceased on December 26—because 20 per cent of the supply comes from Iran. That possibility, probability, problem was known to us and we were taking the necessary action to ensure that exchanges could move in to help out in that situation. What the hon. member is asking, if I understand him correctly, is, when did I know that there would be a 25 per cent reduction—

Mr. Lawrence: When there was going to be a reduction.

Mr. Gillespie: —or diversion on the part of Exxon. I am telling him that the first time I knew about it was when I talked to the Imperial Oil delegation last Thursday and they put some figures in front of me.

Mr. Lawrence: You should have known.

EFFECT OF OIL SHORTAGE ON PRICE OF HOME HEATING FUEL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I think the bottom line of this issue is whether or not people in eastern Canada will find it a little chilly next winter.

I would like to ask the minister what instruments he has in place and at his disposal to ensure that the almost totally unacceptable gap in the cost of electrical energy generated by oil does not get beyond the incomes of individuals in terms of coping with the cost. What assurances can the minister give the House that the high cost of the swapped oil, traded oil or replacement oil will not drive the cost of home heating fuel out of sight and out of the reach of the average person in eastern Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the western Canada crude will be moving across Canada according to the one-price policy which has been established. As the hon. member knows, Canadians have the advantage of a lower price in international terms as a result of this government's action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I believe the hon. member had some other questions about swapping and I would be very pleased to hear them again.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the unit cost per 1,000 kilowatt hours for energy in Charlottetown is 60.13, whereas in the rest of the country it is probably around 28 or 30. What assurances does the minister have that this swapped oil, this traded oil or replacement oil—both Iranian and Venezuelan—will not result in the cost of home heating fuels and gasoline going beyond the capability of an already hard-pressed area economically? How will families be able to pay for fuel oil next winter? Will the costs be going up and, if so, by how much and when?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I answered a question about prices. I indicated that Canada had no control over international prices and that prices are established by the producing nations. We cannot affect that. What we can make sure of is that there is no rip-off by those who are importing. That is the role of the Petroleum Compensation Board. There is no way that additional or high spot prices which may have been paid to replace Venezuelan crude at regular prices will be swept in for oil import compensation purposes, establishing a higher rate. We also indicated that CSIP, which is the agency of the Economic Council, will be asked to assist in the monitoring of this possible problem.

● (1140)

I might also indicate to the House, because of the obvious interest in this question, that we will be giving notice today of a bill, an energy supplies emergency act, which will be designed to provide the power to the government so that it can act with authority in the event of any necessity to allocate crude oil supplies or to allocate product. At the moment this seems remote, but if necessary it could implement a rationing program as well. Notice will be given today.

URBAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STUDY ON POSSIBILITY OF BUILDING BUS LANE ON MERCIER BRIDGE

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

His colleague the Minister of Justice notified the Quebec government on January 26 that $62 million would be available for public transit in Quebec.

Would he confirm that those funds could be earmarked for a feasibility study on the construction of a bus lane on the Mercier bridge. The purpose of that lane would be to provide quick access to public transit vehicles between Châteauguay, the metro station of Angrignon Park to Ville Lasalle and other points on Montreal island.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member has been toying with that plan for a long time. It is obviously a very interesting project which should be considered by government authorities. However I remind the hon. member that the agreement of the provincial government is needed in the first place to carry out such a study and such a project.

ENERGY

INVOKING OF EXISTING LEGISLATION TO SOLVE OIL SHORTAGE PROBLEMS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

In view of the fact that when this country was in a similar oil crisis in 1973, the present government which was in office at that time brought down the Petroleum Administration Act, committed itself to storing oil in eastern Canada and to set up the machinery whereby it could appoint an allocations committee to control imports and take that out of the hands of the multinational corporations, why has the minister not been using the powers he already has, rather than talking about some nebulous bill which he is going to bring in?

I want to ask him specifically why he has not set up an allocation committee, of which Petro-Canada would be a member, to take control of imports of oil and for dealing with Venezuela. The minister knows perfectly well that Imperial Oil cannot deal with Venezuela if Exxon tells it that it must not do so. When is the minister going to stop being simply a fall-guy for the oil industry and start acting in the interests of the people of Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the Petroleum Administration Act. That is the act that gives the government of Canada the power to set prices. The hon. member also remembers, as I do, that the official opposition opposed passage of the Petroleum Administration Act. They did not want the Government of Canada to have that power. If they had been successful, Canada today would be paying world prices, not a price significantly below world prices to the advantage of consumers and industry throughout this country.

The hon. member also refers to the allocation powers we had under the emergency supply allocations act. He may also remember that in order to get passage of that important act we had to agree to a sunset clause which was the proposal of the opposition. It goes to show that a sunset clause is not always a very useful provision in an act, because that particular act which gave the power of allocation self-destructed over two years ago.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The-Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not need the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to tell me about the defects of the Tory party; I am aware of them. I am dealing with the defects of this government which has been in office for 16 years and which made commitments in 1973 and 1974 to give the people of Canada security of supply and has not been able to deliver; that is what I am dealing with.

I want to ask the minister two short questions. What have they done about their commitment to store oil in this country, particularly in the maritime provinces and Quebec, against the possibility of offshore oil being cut off?

I want to ask also why, when the minister was in Venezuela negotiating with the state oil trading company which has stated repeatedly it wants to deal on a government-to-government basis, he did not at that time arrange for an agreement between Petro-Canada and the state-owned oil company of Venezuela without having any intervention by the multinational corporations.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the question of oil storage is an important one. It involves more than Canada; it involves the mutual defence interests of Canada and the United States. The United States has shown an interest, through their strategic petroleum reserves program, in three sites in Canada, two in the Strait of Canso area and one in Newfoundland at Wabana. I believe that three submissions have gone forward on these very significant oil storage proposals.

I can assure the hon. member that as far as storage of oil in Canada is concerned, our storage facilities and our oil in storage right now meets our undertakings to the International Energy Agency.

As to the question of the contractual relationship between Petroleos de Venezuela and Petro-Canada, negotiations started at that time between the two companies. There were discussions with respect to supply and there have been more recent ones. A close working relationship has been established between the two corporations. As I indicated yesterday in an answer, they concern very important areas in the development of heavy oils in western Canada and the heavy oils of Venezuela. Without Petro-Canada it would be impossible, as far as I can see, for Canada to interface with the Venezuelan national oil company. Again the point has to be made that the Tories, who would dismantle and destroy Petro-Canada, have nothing to put in its place.

DISTRIBUTION SYSTEMS TO TRANSPORT OIL TO MARITIMES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister knows that Petro-Canada has not put one barrel of oil in place in Canada. This government has been in power for 16 years, and it knew that OPEC created a crisis.

I want to ask the minister how it is possible, in a country that has enough oil to meet the needs of all its citizens, that the government did not put in place long ago, particularly after OPEC, distribution systems that would get our oil to the maritimes, which we ought to be able to do.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition keeps playing the same song. Obviously, they are trying to knock Petro-Canada, trying to put Petro-Canada down for their own party reasons.

I think they have misjudged the situation. They do not understand the security of oil supply question for Canada. Security of supply, the development of heavy oils, exploration in the High Arctic, the hon. member must know that over half of all the exploration in the High Arctic and the offshore last year was undertaken by Petro-Canada. They must know that had it not been for Petro-Canada, we would not have seen the great surge of activity in the heavy oils development of western Canada. These heavy oils will be important in the future for security of supply for Canada. That is also one of the reasons we can move, on a temporary basis, small quantities from western Canada to look after the eastern refineries' situation.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, we have not had an energy policy in this country since the days of the Diefenbaker government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (1150)

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the minister the question that every Canadian is asking today. In a country that is producing enough oil internally, domestically, to meet the needs of all Canadians, how is it possible that we do not have a distribution system in this country? After the crisis of OPEC, how is it possible that we are fooling around talking about Venezuela, Petro-Can and Exxon, when we produce all the oil we need in this country and we do not have a system to get it to the Canadian people?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think equal attention has to be given to both questions and answers.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I understand that since the hon. member gave up being the official critic on energy matters, he has not been able to inform himself of the energy situation in Canada. Perhaps he is not to be blamed for his question.

The hon. member made the astounding suggestion that we are producing enough oil to look after all of Canada and the only problem is distribution. I wish that were the case, but it is not. Canada is a net importer of oil. The hon. member does not seem to realize that. He does not seem to understand the security of supply questions facing this country.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO MISLEADING ADVERTISING RESPECTING LOTTERIES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Affairs. The Consumers' Association of Canada has been very critical, particularly of Loto Canada with regard to deceptive advertising they allege is taking place in Loto Canada respecting certain matters in connection with the allocation of funds, particularly television advertising, to the effect that the funds are going for amateur sport. The fact is that only $3.7 million of the $225 million goes into amateur sport. Has the minister's department been looking into that matter and what is the result of their investigation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my department did look into the ads of different lotteries last year and communicated with them. It brought to their attention some of the rules and regulations with regard to misleading and fraudulent advertising.

Loto Canada, by the way, did change its ads. I cannot recall right now what happened with some of the provincial lotteries. I am not aware of the recent allegations of the Consumers' Association of Canada, but I will be glad to look at them and refer them to our people who are investigating misleading and fraudulent advertising.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When the minister is looking into these matters, will be also look into the question of whether, in terms of the return to a person buying a ticket from Loto Canada, that person is not being ripped off? The allegation of the Consumers' Association of Canada is that it is a very bad return on a person's money. Even in Las Vegas, at least 95 per cent of the money invested comes back to persons who buy tickets there.

Will the minister look into the whole question of whether there is a reasonable return, and the fact that people who think they will be winners is not the case for most people who invest in this kind of lottery?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for York West asked me some questions on a similar matter. I agreed to look at the lottery question from the consumer point of view. A unit has already been set up in my department to do that. I will refer to them the question put by the hon. member.

ACTION TAKEN BY COMBINES INVESTIGATION BRANCH IN CASES OF DECEPTIVE ADVERTISING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister has power under the Combines Investigation Act to investigate and, indeed, lay charges in cases of proven deceptive advertising.

In light of the most recent charges by the Consumers' Association of Canada of deceptive and exploitive advertising, has this matter been referred to the combines investigation branch? Also, can he tell us why he or the combines investigation branch did not lay charges last year when it was discovered that Loto Canada was involved in deceptive advertising of its lottery?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that last year we not only looked at Loto Canada but at all lotteries in Canada, provincial, regional, and so on. If I recall correctly, at that time there was no ruling or decision on the part of the people in the misleading advertising section; it was a grey area. We brought it to the attention of the various lotteries that they must conform with the law and not be misleading in any way. My recollection is that Loto Canada did, in fact, change its advertising to make it conform with the law. I do not know about the provincial lotteries; I will have to check into that. I received these new allegations only recently. I will have to talk to those in the misleading advertising section to see whether this is valid or not.

Mr. McGrath: Is there an investigation under way to measure the impact that lotteries in Canada are having on social, publicly-funded agencies such as United Appeal? It has been said that this represents a tax on the poor and that it is having an impact or effect on social agencies in this country which depend on public funding.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the initiative last week by the hon. member for York West, a unit was set up in my department to examine that. The hon. member has already sent us some material and I have been in touch with the voluntary organizations group. They are willing to co-operate with us in our studies. We are looking at lotteries from a consumer point of view and will report in due course.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORTED CUTBACK IN FUNDS FOR LANGUAGES TRAINING

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State who said in the House, on February 14 last, with regard to the negotiation for the renewal of the five-year national program of subsidies to the teaching of the official languages that he was asking the provinces to be truly accountable to the citizens of their respective provinces.

I should like to ask the minister whether he did, in fact, make concessions because I thought, first of all, that he intended to ask the provinces to be accountable to the federal authorities and the Parliament of Canada who are called upon to vote funds of over a billion dollars for the next five-year period. Has the minister changed his position in this regard?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I have changed my stand. There are two aspects to the negotiations with the provinces: first, we are insisting on accountability to the citizens of Canada, of every province, as the hon. member indicated so that we can assure the hon. member and the public that the funds spent by the Government of Canada and the provinces are in fact used for increasing the teaching of the minority language, the second language, or to make up for the additional expenditures, if any, incurred for an education system in both official languages.

In addition, and this is my second point, we told the provinces that we want to emphasize non formula rather than formula programs to better ensure that accountability, to prove that the funds are really used for the specific goals of the program.

We still insist, therefore, on accountability and not only to the federal government either. What I want is for the public to know what is being done with regard to the problem, and to know that those sums of money are being spent efficiently.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REGULAR JET SERVICE INTO WESTERN MANITOBA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Now that the right hon. member has experienced, personally, at the Jeux Canada Games the dynamism, Canadianism and friendliness of the people of Brandon and western Manitoba, will he speak to his Minister of Transport and ask him to make the necessary arrangements to have urgently needed, regular jet service into the area, as he promised during the last election campaign in 1974?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do know that Brandon has an air service. I do not believe it is a jet service. I can understand the desire of people to have a more rapid service. I recall that for a period of a few years we discussed with the government of Manitoba a project called, I believe, Skyways which would have permitted cities in Manitoba and Saskatchewan to be linked. That fell through, as I recall it, because the government of Manitoba withdrew from the project.

● (1200)

This being said, I know the Minister of Transport is still interested in ensuring better service and in co-operating with provincial governments to this end. For my part, I would say to the hon. member who represents the area that he is quite right in referring to their friendliness and to their great community spirit, and I am surprised they would want to leave Brandon so rapidly. I think they should be happy to stay there and not increase their links with the outside world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Roberts.]

PUBLIC WORKS

PROPOSED USE OF LAND AT LONDON, ONTARIO

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It concerns about 35 acres of land purchased south of London at the cost of some $600,000 to build a new prison there. That is an example of a very costly blunder which the people of Canada should know about.

Is the prison issue in London completely dead, and does the department intend to turn that land back to the Department of Public Works to salvage whatever they can out of it?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that about the time I made the announcement related to the changes in the building program, London was included among the institutions which were not going to be built, to realize the cost reductions envisaged as a result of the Prime Minister's announcement of August 1. The land has now been turned over to the Department of Public Works and is part of the inventory of that department.

Mr. McKinley: My next question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Can the hon. gentleman advise us what will be done with this land, and that the prison issue is indeed dead? The Solicitor General mentioned that it was because of cutbacks, but that was a convenient excuse because they realized after the municipal elections that it was a very unpopular move. What is going to be done with that property?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I will report to the hon. member next week.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. LAWRENCE—ENERGY—ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—NOTICE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the question period today, I believe I have a question of privilege relating to statements by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) which I firmly believe have misled the House as to the extent of his knowledge of when some of these events were known to him. I should like to take the opportunity now of giving you notice that I intend to raise that aspect of his remarks as a question of privilege at some future time, if I have your permission.

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—ENERGY—INQUIRY WHETHER LEGISLATION FORTHCOMING

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with respect to an answer given me by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources during the question period. It has to do with his failure to answer a question which is of importance to Canadians, and that is how, after 16 years in office, a country with our supplies should be faced with the position where it cannot supply energy to one part of it. It seems astonishing to most Canadians.

The minister in the course of his answer indicated he intended to give notice of a bill. I think the House should know whether that bill is drafted. If it is drafted, let us see it now. It is not unusual that a minister, if he regards a bill as important, should consult with relation to the terms and conditions of the bill. I think the minister should tell the House, in view of the urgency of the question, whether or not the bill is drafted, and if it is drafted I think he should stand and agree that it would be quite appropriate in these circumstances for all parties to see the bill so that it could be studied before it is dealt with.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I propose to put this bill on notice today. The bill is drafted. It will deal with the situation the country may eventually face and it will be available to members before the House is asked to deal with it.

MR. STEVENS—CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker, Your Honour will recall that on February 1, in response to a question and a request put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for a special reference to the finance committee with respect to the falling dollar, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) assured us that the Bank Act reference was sufficient to hear not only the governor of the Bank of Canada on that question but any other witnesses. The deputy House leader went further and stated that if any further power was needed for a reference it would be forthcoming. Unfortunately the committee today voted against a hearing of any independent witnesses with respect to the currency matter. Therefore, I should like to ask the House leader whether we may now have the reference to the finance committee so that this serious matter of the falling dollar and the currency question may be rapidly dealt with by the finance committee without further delay.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): From what the hon. member has already stated, it is clear that the committee already has the power to deal with the question of the Canadian currency and the exchange rate. If the committee did not have that authority it would not have been able to hear the governor of the Bank of Canada and question him for several hours. So obviously the committee has already acted and heard evidence on the question of the exchange rate.

There is no deficiency in the powers of the committee; it is a decision, apparently, by the committee itself that it will not deal further with and call witnesses on this subject. I suggest to the hon. member that the remedy is not through a reference to the committee. The committee is master of its own proceedings and it can decide who it wishes to call as witnesses.

Point of Order—Mr. Nystrom

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I inadvertently misled the House leader. In short, he missed my point. In today's committee the Liberals, voting en masse, voted through a motion which stated:

> That subject to hearing evidence at its regular meeting on February 16 the committee proceed with "in camera" sessions for the purpose of preparing and submitting a report to the House of Commons on the subject matter of the Bank Act at the earliest possible date; furthermore that there be no interruption to this work other than priority attention that may have to be given to any other references which may be submitted to the committee from the House.

Specifically, what they overruled was a steering committee recommendation last night that further meetings be held for the purpose of hearing independent witnesses concerning the currency question, and that those meetings be held in the coming week. The Liberal members voted that down and said in effect, that until we get a further reference from the House of Commons no such meetings will be held. May we have the reference which has been requested?

Mr. MacEachen: First, I shall not raise a point of order on the hon. member's coming before the House dealing with the proceedings of a committee before the committee has reported. I may do that later because I believe we have frequently fallen into the trap of dealing in this House with matters before a committee. As I understand it, we deal with committee proceedings when a commmittee has reported. I am not raising a formal point of order today but I am serving notice to the hon. member that he had better get his act together and begin to observe the established rules of the House.

The committee itself has demonstrated that it has power to deal with the very subject matter with respect to which the hon. member asks for a reference. In the circumstances, a reference is unnecessary and redundant; it is up to the committee to decide on its own proceedings. It has done so, and it is not now for the House to tell the committee what to do when it has the authority to proceed as it wishes.

● (1210)

Mr. Speaker: Order, Please. I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) was in order in the first point he raised as to whether a reference might be made. That has to do with the business of the House, and we always endeavour to permit questions by way of points of order as to House business which, of course, is a matter of order.

However, he also dealt with the business before a committee, with proceedings and votes in the committee, and I think in that respect the point that there is a limit as to how far we can go under the guise of discussing House business to interfere with the schedule and the work of any standing committee is well taken. I do not think we can pursue the matter any further on those grounds.

MR. NYSTROM—INQUIRY WHEN BILL C-24 TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a similar point of order to raise with the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). I notice that yesterday he did not refer to Bill C-24, which deals with the Two-Price Wheat Act. When will we proceed with that, especially since the government, through order in council, has already stopped paying the money which was previously provided to millers as a bread subsidy? The government stopped paying the subsidy before Christmas through an order in council. When will it bring a bill forward to make legal what it has already done?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member wants the bill to be brought forward and is now indicating his support for it when it is brought forward.

Mr. Nystrom: No.

Mr. MacEachen: If that is the indication, then I will be more sympathetic than I was yesterday about bringing the bill forward at an early date.

MR. BALDWIN—ALLEGED INACCURATE STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) made a very inaccurate statement. I attempted to get the floor to ask another question in order to deal with it. The minister said that the actions of the official opposition prevented the effective operation of energy allocation legislation. The fact is—and I was speaking for my party at the time—that a compromise was worked out between myself and the then minister. The drafting was the drafting of the government, and a clause was put into the bill to protect this country from the actions of a bumbling, stupid and inefficient government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That may have begun as something close to a point of order, but it certainly did not end as one.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. McCAIN—REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DEBATE FISHERIES AGREEMENT

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On February 14 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) issued a statement outside the House with respect to the tentative agreement reached between the Government of Canada and the government of the United States regarding fishing privileges on both the east and west coasts. Would the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) consider giving this House an opportunity to discuss that agreement so that it might assess historic rights and opportunities with respect to fishing versus future opportunities for fishing? This question was signally overlooked in the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could this matter be referred to a committee or discussed in the House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss this matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). I believe the minister has been ready from day to day to deal with questions about the fisheries agreement, and I am sure that he would consider carefully what the hon. member has said about an opportunity to provide additional information. I will discuss it with the minister.

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—REQUESTED REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to an earlier point of order. Perhaps I will raise a new one because I think that you, sir, as the first commoner should understand the extent of the undertaking which was given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this House with respect to the ability of the committee and members of parliament to deal with the question which was raised again by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and the understanding which I think the House had, not just with the Prime Minister but also with the deputy government House leader, who answered questions in the House of Commons with respect to the disposition of the government. When the Prime Minister and the deputy government House leader indicate that certain things will be done, I assume that is a representation that certain things will be done and that they ensure that they will be done. Otherwise, the committee system falls down.

Mr. Speaker, the reason for my raising this with you is that if the committee system does break down because undertakings are not carried out, we have no other recourse but to appeal to the Chair. We can, of course, wait until the committee reports, if the committee ever reports, but we think that Your Honour as first commoner should be interested in this matter.

I want to indicate the extent to which this government went. I put a question on February 1, 1979 with respect to consultation. It was put to the deputy government House leader, who is the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik). I asked whether there might be an undertaking to consult the chairman of the standing committee or the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) to see whether a reference might be made with regard to the matter I was dealing with. That referred to the exchange in which the Prime Minister was involved earlier in the day in which he said surely there would be no difficulty.

This is what the deputy government House leader said:

I feel confident that the steering committee and the full committee are capable of dealing with this question adequately, but if there is a disposition by the steering committee and the full committee that they do not have the capacity to deal with the questions which they want to bring forward, I am sure that the matter could be dealt with further. However, I have no doubt that they have full and complete power to deal with all the questions hon. members want to put to any witnesses which are relevant to banking in Canada.

The issue certainly was relevant to banking in Canada. The issue was the operation of the central bank. There was a clear representation and understanding that this matter would be dealt with by the steering committee, which it was, and that it would be dealt with so that there would be no obstruction to that examination in the full committee. That was the impression the Prime Minister wanted to leave in the House. In fact, he left the impression with the House that the government would not stand in the way of the full operation of that committee so that members who wanted to question the government and call other witnesses would be unfettered. That has not been lived up to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The difficulty with this point of order is the same as the difficulty with the point raised by his colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). We begin with a question regarding whether some undertaking was given in the House about sending something to a committee. That may be a question of order for this House, but if that has in any way been reversed or frustrated by an action of the committee, that is a matter within the competence of the committee which I cannot touch, at least not by any procedural means of which I am aware, unless the action of the committee was in itself some transgression of regular practices. Even then, putting it on solid procedural grounds here is very difficult; but the point is that if the hon. member maintains that some undertaking in the House was frustrated by an action of the committee, I do not see how the Chair in any way can intervene in the action of the committee so taken.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I naturally have to abide by your ruling. I was not at the committee but people who were there have told me that the effect of it all was that only government members were able to put questions. I think there is a duty on the chairman of the committee, who is sitting in the House now, to stand up and tell the House whether he will make a specific request for a reference now, because it is obvious that the government is trying to play both sides of the street at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have now gone quite far from a point of order in terms of the proceedings of the House. We are dealing, in the first place, with the business and the agenda of the committee and the right of the committee to be the master of its own proceedings. In any case, we have now gone beyond the bounds of any point of order in asking for a further dialogue between any member and the chairman of the committee outside the orbit of the question period. I think procedurally the matter has to conclude.

Mr. Paproski: Another Liberal cover-up.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 951.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

OFFICE IN WINNIPEG

Question No. 951—Mr. Hare:

Did the government establish an office in Winnipeg for the purpose of Manitoba representation in the Cabinet and, if so, at what cost?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

S.O. 26—Mr. Broadbent

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

ENERGY

SHORTFALLS IN SUPPLIES OF CRUDE OIL TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Speaker: I have received two notices pursuant to Standing Order 26, one from the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), and the other one from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). The notice of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East was received in my office first, and therefore I will call on him first; I will then call on the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the notice which was brought to your office earlier this day, and notwithstanding the undertaking by the government House leader with respect to the tabling of legislation today, may I suggest to you, sir, that the evidence is now overwhelming that unless urgent action is taken before the end of this quarter, the country will find itself in the situation whereby eastern provinces will face inevitable shortfalls in crude oil supplies to provincial refineries.

It is therefore essential that the House have the opportunity to discuss the contingent plans in their broadest aspects to meet this immediate crisis. Should you find, sir, that the usual criteria have been met, I would be prepared to proceed under the provisions of Standing Order 26 to move the adjournment of the ordinary business before the House so that the matter of the energy crisis in the supply of oil to eastern Canada can be dealt with.

CUTBACKS IN CANADIAN OIL SUPPLIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing an important and specific matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the substantial cutbacks in oil supply to Canadians as a result of the crisis in Iran and the action taken by multinational oil companies, particularly the refusal by the president of Imperial Oil late yesterday afternoon to comply with the two requests specifically made by the Government of Canada, namely, that Canada's full quota of oil from that company should be restored, and that this company should deal directly with Venezuela instead of with the parent Exxon Corporation. Such action maintains the shortages of needed oil and contravenes the sovereignty of Canada as expressed through the will of the Government of Canada.

Having moved that motion, I would only add what has been said about the government's intention to introduce the bill, which, in my judgment pertains not at all to the questions that I have raised about the disregard of the multinational corporations of the express wishes of the Government of Canada.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Both members, as I have indicated, gave me notice this morning of their intention to make this application pursuant to Standing Order 26, and I have to say to them that with my understanding of the purpose of Standing Order 26, as I have said on previous occasions, it always gives the Chair great difficulty to try to resolve these matters and in particular to define whether or not the particular problem which is addressed is of a sufficiently critical or emergent nature to warrant its consideration under this particular Standing Order.

In respect of this particular subject, I would at least be driven to the point of saying that since this matter involves something which is of national scope, it would certainly qualify under those circumstances; and indeed since all parties, under intensive questioning in the last day or two, particularly today, have indicated the very serious nature of the problem, both in the questions today and in the answers given by the minister as to the extent of the problem and the extent of the risk or threat that is involved if the failure to co-operate with the Canadian government's demands goes on, it would seem, on the face of it, to fit the use of the Standing Order.

In the end I have to come to a conclusion, as I have in the past, on two points. The first is that when this House debates Standing Order 26 motions it always debates something of immediate relevance, and I think it is important for the House to do that. Presumably that is the reason for the rule to be on the books, and I do not think we should interpret it so strictly that we can never take advantage of it, otherwise we should take it off the books.

The second point is that in a situation of this sort, when I am left in doubt, I do not see any reasons why I should not resolve that doubt in favour of those who are applying, and I say this freely, particularly so when more than one member makes the application at the same time and when they come from different political parties. This is again an indication of the seriousness with which this matter should be considered.

In these circumstances I am also impressed by answers of the minister which indicate that the government, too, wants it known that it takes this matter very seriously. That was the tenor of the answers given by the minister today. Therefore, it might be helpful to have it known that the House also does take the matter seriously, and therefore it would seem to me to be a useful application of Standing Order 26. That might give some indication of my intention on coming into the House today.

However, the Chair does face a problem in trying to decide whether the situation is an emergency or crisis, because that seems to be somewhat in dispute. I am in great difficulty because of the rapidly developing events. I think likely I would have taken advantage of the provisions of the Standing Order which would have allowed me to set aside some time on the next sitting day, which would have been Monday. I might also have tried to appeal to the House in that some of the strictures of the rule leave me in difficulty. I am not entitled to ask for a debate on whether I should invoke Standing Order 26, nor am I entitled to defer my decision, I have to give today. That is the language of the Standing Order and I think it is appropriate language if the situation is critical. So I think the House understands what I was going to do on coming to the House today.

However, subparagraph (5) of Standing Order 26 provides, as I think hon. members know, that in making my decision under the Standing Order I must have regard to whether or not there would be an opportunity to debate the problem in some other way. If nothing else, the announcement by the minister that he intends to give the House notice of a bill having to do with this subject raises the possibility. I do not know and I have no way of knowing, but the House leader has given an indication, as has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), that notice of the bill will be given and that it relates to the subject.

Therefore, I am doing the only thing I can do under the circumstances, and that is to set the applications aside today. But I want to say that I do so—and I think the House should co-operate with me in this although I have no procedural way to ensure it—reserving the right of the two hon. members who have involved themselves in this important question to replace the motions, if they wish, at another sitting of the House, after the House has been able to acquaint itself, first, with the terms of the bill, the subject matter it addresses, the scope it provides for debate, and second, with when that debate will take place. These are the two questions we will want answered.

If the bill gives an opportunity to debate the subject in a fulsome way, I will set the applications aside, and therefore I think I should just leave it to the two members. I set them aside today because I have to—I cannot reserve them or defer them. I do that under those circumstances, and I leave it to the House to deal with once it has been better acquainted with the content of the bill and with the timing that that debate may have.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would say that that ruling is appropriate for the moment, and whether or not I believe that to be the case would not make any difference because that is the ruling. I just wanted you to know that I think it is appropriate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What would be perhaps helpful, since the government House leader has indicated to me that the bill is now drafted and since it is important that the bill be proceeded with today, if he does not have it with him now or if there is any difficulty in handling it, I would like him to know, through you, sir, that we would be prepared to consent a little later, before or after the luncheon adjournment, to revert to introduction of bills so that the bill can be introduced and the kind of discussion you indicated would be appropriate could begin. I suppose that the best way to begin that discussion is to have the parties see the bill, either now, since it is ready, or as it is introduced later in the day.

I want you to know, sir, that we are prepared to agree to go back to introduction of bills later in the day, if that should be necessary, and waive notice, if that is necessary, if the government are prepared to go ahead as they said they were today.

● (1230)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it clear that we would agree to the waiving of any rules which might be necessary for introduction of this bill today. Perhaps we should reserve until we have seen the bill, but if it is a useful one we would be prepared to start the debate on second reading as well.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the matter of Your Honour giving further consideration to this issue, I wonder if I could be so bold as to suggest, keeping in mind the mere fact the government has put legislation on the order paper, or will put it on by Monday, that this is no guarantee as to when the government will proceed with it. Any agreement reached ought to include proceeding with that legislation or allowing the emergency debate.

The entire question is not just the bill which the government will be bringing down giving them new powers, but the extent to which the government has failed to use the powers it already has. That is one of the reasons we want this debate as quickly as possible.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I notice the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is still sitting there with his contented smile in the middle of this crisis. I am sure he will become excited one of these days. If he will not, perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) will give us some indication at this point, from the government's perspective, that it would be agreeable to bring forward the bill this afternoon, having had an indication from the opposition parties that we take the matter very seriously and would like prompt action. Would the Deputy Prime Minister agree to waiving the rules and bringing forward the bill so that we may have a look at it? In the same context on behalf of the government, would the Deputy Prime Minister state not only that the bill will be introduced soon, but that the debate on it will take place on Monday at the latest?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, earlier I indicated to the House that it was my intention to give notice of this bill today, and that in the normal course it would be given first reading on Monday. Hon. members have asked to see the bill today and whether we could begin its discussion. I do not think it would be reasonable to expect the House to begin the discussion of the bill today. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) suggested earlier that his party wanted to study it before dealing with it. I will investigate whether it will be possible to give it first reading today and have the bill made available.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Good.

Mr. MacEachen: Perhaps the terms of the bill are familiar to hon. members, but there is one difficulty. Yesterday, I chaired a meeting which approved this bill and certain changes were made in cabinet committee. I am not sure whether the bill has been reprinted with the changes. If I find it has been, or it can be reprinted before the end of the day, I will consider asking for leave to give it first reading.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1978

DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

The House resumed from Thursday, January 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for Mr. Trudeau) that Bill C-35, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, one of the main features of this bill deals with the new department of fisheries and the environment. I want to take this opportunity to speak on fisheries matters.

We have just seen a fine display by our fin-feathered friends across the House. Now I want to go into fishery policy in Canada and what are some of the problems. First I should like to point out what everybody already knows. The statistics I have already prove that we have a great growth rate today in the fishing industry. For the 11 months of 1978 to the end of November, the total fish catch was up 18 per cent in volume and 45 per cent in value, a tremendous increase. The landed value was up from $237 million in 1977 to $344 million in 1978. So there has been an increase in volume and a tremendous increase in value.

However, we have to be cautious. The fishing industry has always been a cyclical one. It has always had its ups and its downs; it has always had its three or four good years and then has its three or four poor years. While things are looking good now, we have got to keep that in mind as we approach the future of the fisheries.

There is no doubt that in the rural areas of Newfoundland today there is comparative prosperity, and certainly compared to ten years ago a tremendous prosperity. The rural areas of Newfoundland are dependent completely on the fishery, just as the rural areas of the rest of Canada are dependent upon agriculture. That brings me to my first point. At the recent constitutional conference, the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland put forward a position on the fisheries at the meetings leading up to it. At the meetings earlier in the year, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) agreed that there would be 14 subjects to be discussed by federal ministers preparing for the constitutional conference of last week. He agreed that one of those 14 areas should be fisheries.

Under the British North America Act today, the fisheries is completely under the constitutional jurisdiction of the Government of Canada, inland and coastal fisheries. That is quite clear; everything that happens in the water is under the control of the federal government. The Prime Minister agreed that this should be one of the 14 areas which could be discussed to see if changes were required and whether agreement could be met.

The striking thing at the federal-provincial conference was that the only one of these 14 subjects that the Government of Canada did not put a position forward on, and the only one where they did not have a position paper, was the fisheries. The government had no position paper on the fisheries, and they made no suggestion as to what changes there should be constitutionally with respect to the fisheries, because the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), in that petulant display of the power he wields apparently over the government, threatened other government ministers that he would resign if the Government of Canada made the slightest change in its complete control over the fishery.

The second noticeable thing was that of all the 14 topics to be discussed at the constitutional conference, only one was the subject of a propaganda campaign by government ministers going across Canada speaking against it, and that was the fisheries. The minister of fisheries of Canada went about Canada during the period when these ministers were meeting in private sessions. The federal-provincial ministers were meeting with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde). They had three or four or five meetings in between constitutional conferences. The only federal minister who campaigned against any change, or was permitted to campaign against any change, was the minister of fisheries of Canada who spoke in Halifax and everywhere he could decrying any attempt to change complete and absolute federal control over the fishery.

The provinces of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia put forward a proposal that there be concurrent jurisdiction with federal paramountcy for some items of the fishery and provincial paramountcy for others. They suggested the federal government would have paramountcy over international negotiations, surveillance, international enforcement, basic research, conservation, global quotas of fish to be caught, quality standards for export, licensing of foreign vessels; and that the provinces would have paramountcy over determining quotas—inter-Canadian quotas after the federal government determined global quotas, the division of the quotas among provinces—harvesting plans, allocation of aquaculture and fish farming areas, and the licensing of local boats and fishing vessels, with the residual power in the fisheries to be with the provinces.

The minister of fisheries of Canada turned thumbs down on even discussing these proposals for concurrent jurisdiction in the fisheries. He would not discuss them. In his arrogance and his petulance, he threatened to resign if the Minister of Justice or the Government of Canada even agreed to discuss the points put forward by Nova Scotia and Newfoundland and agreed to by all of the other eight provinces. This was a position put on the final day by the ten provinces of Canada. But no, the fisheries dictator of Canada, the minister of fisheries of Canada, the chief cod of Canada, said "No, we are not going to discuss it."

Now here is an industry. The fishing industry is just as important to Newfoundland as the agricultural industry is to Saskatchewan. There is concurrent jurisdiction in agriculture. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is not prepared to concede that there be any mention or discussion of concurrent jurisdiction over fisheries with the provinces.

● (1240)

That attitude has to change. That attitude will change and certainly our party is prepared to discuss these issues with the provinces, keeping in mind that the federal government has to be paramount in at least the areas that were suggested by Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, if not other areas, but that the provinces, like Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, where fisheries is of such fantastic importance to their whole gross provincial products and the livelihood of the people—the whole roary area of Newfoundland with a third of the people living in my district completely dependent on the fishery—these provinces in which these people live should have some say as to what is to happen in the industry.

Here is one clipping to show the position the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment took before the constitutional conference started. He spoke in Halifax as reported on January 27, and said the Atlantic fishermen would be the eventual losers if Ottawa allows the coastal provinces to share in jurisdiction over the fishery. I say "bushwa", Mr. Speaker. That is not proven at all and he has done a disservice to Canada.

One of the arguments the minister uses is that there would be such confusion that the provinces would be competing with one another with disastrous results. Imagine the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment suggesting that there would be any disastrous results about the fishery if the provinces were permitted to have some control, when the federal government has controlled fisheries since 1867 and the fisheries just about died. From the early 1960s until 1975 the fishery nearly expired while the superior minister and his government had full control over it. Canada has had control ever since 1867, yet he turns around to suggest that if the provinces are given some concurrent jurisdiction there is such avarice and such anarchy in the provincial capitals, and there is such incompetence, the fishery would be ruined unless the mighty federal government and this minister have complete control. We are not to have any decisive say in our own lifestyle as to whether our province's economy flourishes or does not, if the present Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is not removed. But he will be removed.

Just look at this: this superior minister who talks so much about federal control being so important sent a release out on February 14 in which he said that fishery improvement loans were up 65 per cent. He said that the federal government under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act had guaranteed 900 loans totalling $16,338,000 during the period April 1, 1978 to September 1, 1978. Last year it was only $9,900,000 but this year it is $16,338,000. This is where the federal government guarantees loans granted by the chartered banks. These loans are not even made by the federal government, yet the minister boasts about these guaranteed loans, made by the banks and not by the federal government, which are up to $16 million this year across the whole of Canada.

Let us look at what is the record of the Newfoundland government in assisting the fisheries and the fishermen. The fisheries loan board of Newfoundland makes loans directly, not through the banks, to the fishermen for boat building, gear purchasing purposes and the like at very, very low rates of interest—I think it is 3 per cent, with very, very low down payments; you only have to put 5 per cent down to get loans from that board to build yourself a longliner, if you are a fit man to build a longliner and sail and operate it. This fisheries loan board of Newfoundland in Newfoundland alone made $23 million in loans to fishermen this year—that is, during the past financial year—as compared to this government guaranteeing across Canada $16 million. The Government of Canada, this mighty government that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment thinks is so all important to the fisheries, is not doing anything in the line of financial assistance to fishermen. It is not even in the same category as the government of Newfoundland which loaned $23 million in 1,335 loans to bona fide fishermen. Those loans were made in the 1978-79 fiscal year by the Newfoundland fisheries loan board.

That will show the House that the Newfoundland government is taking its responsibilities for developing the fisheries seriously, even though it has no constitutional jurisdiction, and even though it is restricted to doing certain allied and subsidiary things and has no authority over quotas, licensing or what happens in the sea at all.

This government is going to have to decide whether the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is bigger than the government. The Prime Minister says that one of the 14 topics they will consider for change is fisheries. He is sabotaged by his Minister of Fisheries and the Environment who campaigns across Canada against it, and finally says: Pierre, if you go one iota in this direction I am going to resign, and the great Prime Minister of Canada has to surrender to his little fisheries minister from New Brunswick! That is some spectacle. The Prime Minister of Canada claims he is very, very strong for free enterprise, that the market system is the best system, and yet he has reversed himself in recent years. This is the gentleman whose promises are completely contradicted by his own minister of fisheries, whose policies are not to rely on the private sector at all but to criticize and embarrass the private sector at every stance.

On September 25 of last year they had to write the Prime Minister to point out what the Prime Minister had said and to point out the attitude of the minister of fisheries, his opposition to them, his criticism of them, his refusal to deal with them and his refusal to enter licences for fish freezer vessels, freezer trawlers and the rest of it. The Prime Minister has only given a formal reply to their letter.

One thing this parliament and the House of Commons fisheries and forestry committee will have to deal with—the chairman is here today—is the arbitrary nature of the exercise of power by the minister of fisheries. The minister of fisheries is a man who can make or break you if you are in the fishing business. He can give you gifts of hundreds of thousands of dollars. That is the power that this gentleman has today because he controls licensing, and there are no standards set as to when he is going to give you a licence and when he is not. He can approve of your going into an arrangement with the Bulgarians, if he wishes, with the Russians, the East Germans, the Poles or the Japanese, or he does not have to agree. He can allow this fish company to enter into an arrangement, or he does not have to allow it.

This year I was given, in answer to questions I asked at the committee in November, a list of the co-operative fisheries arrangements, as they call them, for 1978, where the minister of fisheries allowed Canadian unions or Canadian companies to go into arrangements with foreign partners in taking our fish resources in Canada. There is a long list of them. I want to point out that this is entirely arbitrary. If the minister does not like you he does not have to let you enter into that arrangement; he just takes you off his list. Or if he likes you, or if you are a political ally, or if you are allied to the Liberal party, he can allow you to go into a deal.

Just look at squid. The minister did extraordinary things on the quota for offshore squid—not the squid that comes into shore. He gave a gift to various fishing companies in Canada. He said to them: "Look, there are so many thousand tons of offshore squid, we cannot catch it here in Canada. We have not got the vessels for it, the facilities, because it has to be frozen immediately after it is caught. Gentlemen, I am going to give you a licence and you can enter into deals with the Japanese or whoever is equipped to catch squid, and you can sell your right to this licence I am giving you. In effect, you can sell it to the Japanese or whoever wants to buy the squid and you can make yourself $100,000 or $50,000, whatever the amount might be, depending on how much squid I allot to you".

This is the power that we are allowing this individual minister of fisheries. He allowed H.B. Nickerson & Sons Ltd. to take a quota of 4,000 metric tons and they made arrangements with the U.S.S.R. and Japan for these people to catch the squid. The U.S.S.R. and Japan paid them a fee, so much per ton. They did not have to lift a finger. Nickerson did not have to catch it. They did not have to lift a finger, except to make a few commercial arrangements.

It was not just Nickerson. Some 2,000 tons went to Karl Karlsen & Co. Ltd.; 1,600 metric tons went to United Maritime Fishermen Cooperative; 400 tons each went to Ocean Harvesters Ltd., Earle Bros Ltd., Quinlan Bros. Ltd., P. Janes & Sons, of Newfoundland, and to A. Northcott Ltd., Arctic Fishery Products, Port aux Basques Seafoods—400 tons each—and Bay Bulls Sea Products, Beothic Fish Processors, Bonavista Cold Storage and Burgeo Seafoods Ltd. In other words, it was a gift. The minister of fisheries came along and said to those companies: "Gentlemen, here is a 400-ton gift of squid which you are not going to catch, but you can allow the Japanese to catch it and you can get a fee from the Japanese for that purpose. I am giving you a gift of money." And we are allowing this! There is no board set up to oversee it and there are no rules or regulations to deal with it.

Then he said to National Sea Products: "Gentlemen, here are 6,000 metric tons", and they entered into arrangements with the U.S.S.R., East Germany and Japan. Then he said to Fishery Products Limited in Newfoundland: "Gentlemen, here are 4,000 metric tons. You do not have to put a net in the water, you do not have to send a boat out, you can't because you do not have the equipment, but I am giving you 4,000 metric tons to help your balance sheet this year". I have heard that some of these companies made several hundreds of thousands of dollars just from that alone. The fishermen themselves were allowed the deals through their union. I believe that in some of these deals they were required to process 25 per cent of the squid onshore, and the rest was taken into these freezer vessels and they went off and it was never dealt with in Canada at all.

What about our 7,000 plant workers? Are they to be forgotten in all these deals that the minister of fisheries is in? He is the biggest dealer in Canada. He is big enough to be the biggest in Las Vegas. He is the biggest deal maker the fisheries has ever seen in Canada, and it is all done arbitrarily. There is no principle laid down. It depends on whether you can scratch the minister's back nicely enough. This is a shocking situation and I intend to propose to the fisheries committee that we get right into this.

Now, 3,500 metric tons went to B.C.M. Investment Limited. Who are they? Is this one of Canada's great national companies? All I am able to find out is that there are three individuals who own the company, all Canadians. It is a one-shot deal. They do not own a processing plant. One of the three principals is associated with a small fishing company. Why should B.C.M. Investment Limited be given a gift of 3,500 metric tons of squid, which they sold to Hoko Fishing Company Limited in Japan? This demands explanation.

Another company is Atlantic Sea Products Limited which received 2,500 metric tons. They sold that 2,500 metric tons to Kyokuyo Company Limited in Japan. Who is Atlantic Sea Products Limited? I am told that they have a small fish processing plant down in Hubbards. I do not know what other connection they have with the fishery.

So apart from the large established fishing companies and the smaller ones which were given gifts, there is B.C.M. Investment. They got 3,500 metric tons of squid, 2,000 metric tons of silver hake, which they sold to Hoko Fishing Company Limited, and they got 300 metric tons of Argentine which they sold to Hoko Fishing Company Limited.

What is going on in the administration of fisheries in this country? That is what I want to know, and anyone else who hears this will want to know it too. This minister should not be allowed to give gifts worth tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars like this to companies in Canada, or unions or individuals, arbitrarily with no standards set down by this House, no legislation set down by this House or no appeal. You cannot appeal if he refuses you a licence. There is no appeal procedure. There is no appeal court. There is this complete arbitrary use of discretionary power and authority by the minister of fisheries, who is tyrannizing the fishing industry with the immense power that he has. So, Mr. Speaker, I am hoping that the fisheries committee will agree to pursue this.

There are more and more peculiar things going on all the time. The minister of fisheries says that you cannot expand your fishing fleet. "No, I am not going to give you a licence to replace your trawlers; I am not going to allow you to expand your fleet; but I will allow you to enter into all kinds of deals with foreign concerns." When we object to that, he says, "But our Canadian companies can't catch argentine, they can't catch silver hake, they can't catch squid, they are not equipped to do it". Well, how can they get equipped to do it if the minister will not allow them to go into the business of building freezer trawlers? You have to have freezer trawlers to catch these species of fish. He has the industry caught in a vicious circle. He says: "Gentlemen, you can't have a licence for freezer trawler, no, no, no, no." When we object to his giving out all these deals to foreign groups—the East Germans, the Poles, the Russians and all the rest of them—he says: "Well, I have to do this because we can't take our quota of silver hake, argentine and the like." We say that he has to start moving now.

The minister is a propagandist. When he spoke here on January 24 he exaggerated what it is we are asking for, what sensible people in the industry are asking for. He said as reported at page 2534 of Hansard:

> Sometimes these protests are accompanied by calls to cash in on this wonderful new bonanza by vastly expanding the fishing fleet.

There is not a soul in Canada asking to vastly expand the fishing fleet, the slaveen; he has just made that up. What we are asking for is the right to replace the fleet that is here now and perhaps expand it a bit; and the right to get some freezer trawlers to catch argentine, squid, mackerel and silver hake, which we cannot do now because we do not have freezer trawlers. The minister went on to say:

> In both cases these protests are from people who have not taken the trouble to study the situation or have chosen to ignore the facts for whatever reason.

Nonsense! These protests are by the industry itself and by others who have done a little study in this industry. On the same page he says:

> The idea of a massive fleet expansion for traditional species . . . is a pipe dream.

Sure, it is a pipe dream because nobody ever suggests it except the minister who wants to have something to knock down.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has he been doing lately? What has this ingenious minister been up to lately, this veritable Santa Claus. He should come in here with a red suit and a white beard. At the moment he has cod on his mind, the northern cod—2J3K—off northern Newfoundland and Labrador. I was delighted to have the chance yesterday to give recognition to our great new movement in Newfoundland, CodPeace. This movement is the equivalent to cod as Greenpeace is for the rest of the world. It is a movement that wants to protect the cod from the savage seal. This group was initiated by Mr. Miller Ayre of St. John's who deserves a medal. He should get the Canada Medal or whatever it is, like the people who are walking around with these medals crumbling off their chests and bowing them over. It is time that a few of those medals were scattered out where they should go. I propose Miller Ayre right now, immediately, for the whatever it is, the Order of Canada, in recognition of his great movement that will sweep the world—CodPeace. We have nothing to lose but our cod pieces.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "In cod we trust".

Mr. Crosbie: In cod we trust. There is a total allowable catch of northern cod of 170,000 tons. One hundred thousand tons are for the inshore fishery. This is the cod off northern Newfoundland and Labrador. There are 30,000 tons for Canadian trawlers, 25,000 tons for foreign trawlers and 15,000 tons remaining. The minister of fisheries is a dictator, and he has arbitrarily decided that he is going to permit that 15,000 tons remaining in the quota to be caught by foreign vessels so long as they sell the catch to fish plants in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

That may be sensible because we do not have special ice-reinforced trawlers that can catch this cod. We are in the humiliating position that we cannot catch our own quota of the offshore, northern cod because we do not have the kind of vessels that will do it, and the minister will not permit the industry to get them. But he is going to permit now the East Germans and the Poles to catch this 15,000 tons as long as they sell the cod, frozen onshore, to our own fish plants for them to process. That is in the circumstance that we cannot catch it ourselves, a circumstance which the minister has put us in. It is the minister who has got us in the position that we cannot catch it ourselves, the Canadian industry. That makes sense, but only because he has forced us into that position.

Fishery Products Limited tried fishing last year and were very successful in catching fish under the ice, up in the ice, but their trawlers are not specially ice-reinforced. They had such heavy damage that the insurance companies forbade them to try that fishery again this year. The East Germans and Poles can catch and land that fish for much less than we can. The minister has not given the trade much time. He did not give them much advance notice. There is a lot of equipment necessary to make this successful so that you can take the frozen products and process them.

My point is this. The minister or the government—and if they don't do it, they will—must announce how they will license in the future in order to permit our present fleets to be replaced over the next five to ten years, the stern trawlers and side trawlers. Our own Fishery Products in Newfoundland has 40 trawlers. They need advance notice because these trawlers today cost something like $6 million or $7 million. They cannot arrange a whole lot of money in just a couple of months. They must know whether they are going to get one licence next year, two the next or two the next, or however, so they can start replacing the fleet.

The minister has a new policy, which he says he has, and I agree with the concept; he wants vessels owned by individual fishermen or by companies they form rather than by processing companies. I am quoting from his speech which he made in Halifax on January 26. I agree with that concept. It would be better to have our fishing fleet owned separately from the processing companies. But how is an individual fisherman to accomplish this? How is he to get $7 million or $10 million for a fishing trawler? That was not explained.

● (1300)

The processing companies now have to get vessels or they will not have fish for their plants. They have to get the catch themselves. That is an historical development. They have to know if the minister is serious about this. If he is serious, they are not going to build any more ships. It is the minister's duty to explain how he is going to accomplish this, and see that the individual fisherman or that trawler companies only and not processing companies get the money and develop the fleets that will be needed to get fish for the plants so that the plant workers will have work over the next ten or twenty years. He cannot leave them in the dark, making this policy statement and then not following up. The industry is going to have a basket case in the next few months if he does not start making some decisions. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) is from Cape Breton, a fishing area; is he going to sit and let this power hungry minister of fisheries give out these licenses, these presents and gifts? Is he going to allow him to complete his policy? Are we now to allow our own Canadian industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I just have a few minutes to conclude. For the future success and development of our fishery, we need to have growth in the inshore fishery and in the offshore fishery. It is unfortunate that for political reasons the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and the members of the government have continually stressed the inshore fishery and have seemed to ignore the offshore fishery.

● (1410)

There are 7,000 fish plant workers in eastern Canada who are not going to be able to get a decent year's work; they are going to be on part time work unless we have a successful and profitable offshore fishery as well as the inshore fishery. So it needs to be balanced. This is the kind of development we need but unfortunately the minister seems to exhibit some prejudice against a strong and healthy Canadian offshore fishery at the present time. If this is the case it is the fish plant workers who will suffer in the long run as well as the fishermen themselves.

It is peculiar the minister should say he is biased in favour of the inshore fishery when his actions in certain areas show otherwise. But now that the fishing industry has become a prosperous one it is time the government started spending some real money on the fishery. We have noticed in my constituency for the last couple of years that the increased emphasis we hear about does not seem to apply when a man is building a long liner. The government is supposed to have a strong bias in favour of the inshore fishery but when a fisherman in Newfoundland wants to build a long liner, a vessel under 75 feet in length—and these have become quite expensive lately, the price running anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000—he can go to the provincial government and get a provincial government subsidy. He can get a loan from the provincial government at an interest rate of 3 per cent. But when fishermen come here for a federal subsidy, they find that the mighty Government of Canada has only $4 million for these purposes to cover the whole of Canada. They discover that the regulations have been changed and that today, before they can get any bounty or assistance for building a long liner, a man has to be replacing a vessel which is at least eight years old.

This is the great federal government which says it is so biased in favour of the inshore fishermen. If that is the case, why aren't they doing anything further to replace these boats? Why aren't they helping new fishermen to enter the industry, men who haven't owned a boat before but who have been fishing for years and are interested in acquiring a boat? It is time for the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) to put his money where his big mouth is, where his big inflammatory mouth is. It is also time for his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who bellows like a bullfrog about his great support of the inshore fishery, to see that some real money is put into funds to help fishermen acquire new long liners and new boats for the inshore fishery as well as the offshore. I do not want to mention the Deputy Prime Minister, of course, because he is in the same category; I don't want to hurt his feelings. He is here today and he has called this bill.

We have to remember the plant workers. If the bias of the Minister of Fisheries against the offshore fishery continues, I have three plants in my district, dependent on offshore fishing, the National Sea Plant in St. John's employing some 500 or 600 workers, the Fisheries Products plant in Trepassey, the medium-sized plant in Fermeuse. These plants employ maybe 1,000 workers between them whose jobs on a year-round basis would be endangered if the offshore fleet continues to be neglected by the minister of fisheries.

There are dozens of other plants, inshore plants, which also buy some offshore fish at Bay Bulls, Witless Bay, Arnold's Cove, Admiral's Beach, Branch, St. Bride's, Southern Harbour, Riverhead. There is a new one going up at St. Mary's, there is Fairhaven—I could name another dozen. We have to remember that when the minister of fisheries "knocks" the industry, when he knocks the offshore fishery, when he shows his bias in favour of the East Germans, the Poles, the Russians, the Japanese and everyone else who fishes offshore except our own national companies which have been taking chances for the last 50 years, before the hon. gentleman was even thought of, he is endangering the employment of all 7,000 or 8,000 fish plant workers in Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces.

In addition, the minister should spend more money on the inshore fishing villages. There are some 50 or 60 fishermen fishing from Portugal Cove South. That is their whole livelihood. For two years now I have been pointing out to the minister that the wharf and community stage are going into the sea, that the breakwater is crumbling. They are exposed to the sea and if he does not act and start repairs by early April there will be no inshore fishery from Portugal Cove South this year.

Here is an industry whose value is burgeoning. The government is getting greatly increased income from the fishing companies and it is time to use it to increase the funds available for Portugal Cove South, for the work needed at Renews, for the slipway which was promised at St. Shotts, for completion of the work at Come-By-Chance, for the replacement of the wharf at Long Harbour. Peter's River, St. Vincent's, is one of the great inshore fishing commmunities of North America. Peter's River, exposed entirely to the sea, dependent entirely upon human construction to preserve a place to land fish, is a tremendous inshore fishery; there are inshore fishermen who earned in excess of $50,000 in the six-weeks' trap fishery this year. This is a place which needs a community stage and where the wharf has to be expanded and facilities for landing have to be improved so that the fishermen of St. Vincent's and Peter's River, many of whom are now returning to the fishery, can have the necessary room to fish and land their catch.

Gaskiers and Pt. La Haye are part of the fishing community of St. Mary's Bay where some of the best inshore fishermen in the province have to land their fish in primitive circumstances. Last year and in 1977 they salted their fish. This year they are landing it fresh. These men deserve help and encouragement. They are building, under the Canada Works program, a magnificent fishing gear storage shed and they are doing the same thing in Peter's River. It shows the value of some of the Canada Works projects. I can assure the minister here today that no projects in Canada are better constructed nor is any of that money better used than at Peter's River, Gaskiers and St. Mary's Bay. If he would like to come with me, or take me down in his jet some time, to Newfoundland—he is only going to have a jet for a couple of months now, until he is bounced out and becomes an ordinary citizen—I would like to show him those two projects. That is where Canada Works funds can really come in handy.

Bay Bulls, Mr. Speaker, is one of the best fishing places in the island and it needs a wharf. It also needs a slipway. These have to be started this year. The minister has promised action for Bay Bulls but has dragged back on his promise for a fishing patrol vessel base. There has been no progress over the last 12 months and we want to know when that work is to start and why it has not got under way as the hon. gentleman promised when the by-election was on. I was elected despite the minister's promises that if the Liberals were elected they would go ahead with this patrol vessel base in Bay Bulls. I was elected and shall be re-elected there very shortly.

I call on the minister now to get this great fishing patrol base in Bay Bulls under way. He should not drag back just because the Liberal candidate does not have a chance, not a hope. He is going to become a powerless third; he might be right off the ballot paper altogether if somebody doesn't take mercy on him and decide to give him the odd vote. The minister should forget politics and just get on with his promises in Bay Bulls to put in the new Crosbie fishery patrol base for the fishing patrol vessels of eastern Canada. If the minister does that I will be very pleased, particularly if he names it after me. That will make me even more pleased.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, speaking in the chamber on January 25, is reported on page 2561 of Hansard to have said:

I believe that our markets are not sufficiently diversified and are in a more precarious state than is generally realized.

Well, the Deputy Prime Minister is the man in charge of the GATT negotiations. What has the hon. gentleman done to ensure that the worries and fears of the Secretary of State for External Affairs are laid to rest? Apparently nothing. The minister says our markets are not diversified and are in a more precarious state than is generally realized. The government is supposed to be negotiating with the European Common Market to get duty-free or low-duty entry for our fish into the Common Market so we would no longer be almost totally dependent on the United States.

● (1420)

What have the Deputy Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) done to realize this main negotiating point? As far as we can find out, they are being treated with contempt by the European Common Market. Is the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment going to come clean and tell us exactly what is happening in the GATT negotiations? Will it help the Canadian fishermen? Are we going to be able to diversify our markets? It is not enough for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say he is concerned. He has been in power and in the government since 1968. When is he going to take some action so that we can diversify our markets and not be completely dependent on the United States?

We have a strong fishermen's union in Newfoundland, and that is a good thing and I support it; but I am not going to be completely subservient to the fishermen's union in Newfoundland nor to any other union, and when the fishermen's union of Newfoundland is led by an NDP supporter and when they attempt to get the rest of the members of that union to support the NDP, I have to say I demur.

I have to say that I do not agree, that I think it is a bad mistake for Mr. Cashin and the leaders of the Newfoundland fishermen's union to attempt to get that union to support the NDP. Number one, the membership is not going to support the NDP. They are free-born Newfoundlanders who are not going to be told by anyone whom to support. They are not going to listen to union bosses any more than they listen to company bosses or government bosses. They are free, independent figures, and they are not just going to follow slavishly the goals of the NDP.

So I say yes, we need a strong union, fishermen's union, in Newfoundland. I believe in countervailing power. I think we also need a strong, prosperous fishing industry in the trade of Newfoundland, and I think we need two governments who take a real interest and co-operate in getting the fishing industry going.

I said during the summer that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is a puppet of Mr. Richard Cashin, and lo and behold, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment of Canada wrote a letter to the St. John's Daily News which said, "I am not a puppet". That was the purport of his letter. Imagine the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment having to write a letter to the daily press to say that he is not a puppet. He so appears to be a puppet that when he was called a puppet he had to out-puppet himself and write the St. John's Daily News to say he was not a puppet. He has the appearance of being a puppet, and he does not have the appearance of being fair in weighing the conflicting claims and demands of the trade and the union.

So, Mr. Speaker, I have always been a strong supporter of a good organization for the Newfoundland fishermen. We now have one, but there are certain conflicts of interest in that union which have got to be noted. The interests of the fish plant workers the union represents are not uniform with the interests of the inshore fishermen on all occasions or the offshore fishermen. Many of the deals, for example, that the union entered into last year with the Bulgarians and the Russians did not require any of the fish caught to be landed and processed in Newfoundland, and that is to the detriment of the fish plant workers. And in many other deals of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment which I recited to the House earlier today that he authorized to be entered into for the catching of squid and the like, the squid did not have to processed in Newfoundland or in Nova Scotia or in Canada, so that Canadian workers lost that kind of work.

This is all pretty shortsighted, and there are many questions to be answered as to what happened last year and whether it was desirable for the arrangements to be entered into that were entered into in the interests of everybody in the industry. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment says that he is operating in the interests of the inshore fishermen. Well, why, if that is the case, did he take the shrimp resource that belongs to Newfoundland and Labrador, the great new shrimp resources found off Labrador, and give three licences to his own province of New Brunswick, two catching licences for that shrimp to the province of Quebec, two to Nova Scotia and only two to Newfoundland, this huge shrimp resource off Labrador that rightly belongs to the fishermen of northern Newfoundland and Labrador? And he has retained three of these shrimp licences for fishermen in Labrador who at the present time have no catching capacity. Why did he ignore the interests of the fishermen of Labrador and of northern Newfoundland in distributing these shrimp licences which he now controls in an arbitrary fashion? It takes a huge investment to equip yourself with shrimp-catching vessels for those areas because the shrimp are in deep water.

The result of his action was that Fishery Products Limited could not expand their shrimp processing operation at St. Anthony because two licences were not sufficient for landing shrimp at St. Anthony, and the fishermen of Labrador are now dealing with the minister and trying to take advantage of this resource for themselves. According to my information, at the beginning of February they were getting nowhere with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

The Labrador resources advisory council has made proposals for licences to go to the six communities from Rigolet north to be used in the interests of the people of Labrador. There is a proposal for a co-op to use the licences. There is a proposal for equipment to be put in the plant at Cartwright that might employ 140 or 150 people, but up to February 1—and I have not had a chance to check today because this debate came on quickly and unknown to me—they have had no response from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. If the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is so concerned about the inshore fishermen, why did he take the shrimp resources and divide them up by giving three licences to his own province, two to Quebec, two to Nova Scotia and only two to Newfoundland and three to Labrador?

I might quote from the Union Forum of July, 1978. They call it the single most disappointing decision made in his tenure as Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. They say that this was a political decision and that he is taking away from the people of Labrador and northern Newfoundland the possibility to improve greatly their economic base. I quote from the editorial:

> If we are going to start getting into allocating access to lucrative resources on a political basis, then the next thing you know fishermen in Labrador and northern Newfoundland will begin to demand access to the lucrative scallop fishery on Georges Bank.

The union puts its finger right on the problem with this minister. It is politics, and too many of his decisions are based on raw politics. I see that my time is up, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a speech, but I have a question to ask of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. Watson: A question on the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member can make a speech. We are on second reading, not in Committee of the Whole. The hon. member can make a speech, but there is no way by which he can put a question to a minister who does not have the floor. He can put a question to a member who has the floor.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I will, in effect, use this time as a speech, but all I want is to ask one single question. It relates to clause 14 of part III which deals with the Department of the Environment. Clause 14 would repeal sections 5 to 7 of the Government Organization Act, and my question relates to section 5 (a) (i) which reads as follows:

(i) the preservation and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality—

Subsection (a) refers to the act's having jurisdiction—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not wish to prevent the hon. member from making a speech, but I must refer him to citation 381 of Beauchesne which says that second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure. On a motion for second reading it is out of order to discuss the clauses of the bill.

I think the hon. member is ahead of his time. The question he wishes to ask will have to be put when the bill reaches the committee stage. As I said, he can make a speech on the principle of the bill. He can perhaps refer to a clause. But asking a question about a specific clause should be left for the committee stage.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, the reason I started the way I did was that I understood that there was a general disposition this afternoon that speeches were to end with the speech of the hon. member who just spoke. I did not want to place the House in a position where there would be a succession of other speeches. If I am not going to be followed by other speeches, I will be very brief. I want to make just one point. If, however, my intervention will result in a number of other speeches, I will sit down right now. Do I have the assurance of the House that there will not be other speeches? If that is the case—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member is asking for something no one can guarantee because no one knows what the hon. member is going to say. Having been in the chair for eight years, I know that speeches generally bring on more speeches.

Mr. Watson: I seek, in effect, an assurance by this intervention that this jurisdiction, which apparently is going to be given to the Department of the Environment, will include the right of the department to ensure the preservation and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment on Indian reserves. This is of particular concern to a great number of people in the Montreal area and in particular in my constituency area of Châteauguay, who have been adversely affected by certain developments affecting the quality of the environment on the Indian reserve of Caughnawaga. This has had overlapping effects for the people of Châteauguay.

I simply make this intervention in order to seek an assurance from the minister at some point later on that this will, in effect, allow the federal government to take steps, quite apart from its rights and jurisdictions for Indian affairs, through for example, a section of the Department of the Environment dealing with forestry, to deal with such matters on the Caughnawaga Indian reserve and with other matters relating to the environment on that reserve. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO MODIFY NUMBER OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-28, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief and in this way I hope to set an example which everyone else will feel compelled to follow.

Bill C-28 is a very short bill which contains only two clauses. It is a bill to which, I can say from the government side, we are prepared to put through all three stages today to expedite it. I have made that offer through private channels and I make it today publicly and await to see if it engenders a response from all opposition parties.

As I said, the bill contains two clauses. The first clause would provide the commissioner in council of the Northwest Territories with the power to alter the size of the council by territorial ordinance from 15 to as many as 25 members. This is a power that the Yukon territorial council has had since 1974. My impression is that this amendment would be supported by all members of the existing council. In fact, this particular provision has been the object of a fairly vigorous lobby in Ottawa by members of the council. They have made their concern known to me, and, I think, to hon. members opposite, that in their view this amendment is in the interests of the Northwest Territories and they ask the House of Commons to move on it. That is why I am prepared to move on all three stages of the bill today, if that meets with the support of the House.

The second clause of the bill would validate an ordinance passed by the commissioner in council at its October session in anticipation that parliament would enact the bill before us today. The council amendment ordinance empowers the commissioner to describe 22 electoral districts upon passage of this bill, an increase of seven over the presently constituted council of 15 members.

The rationale for the bill is straightforward. Apart from the fact that it has the support of the council and many people in the Northwest Territories, I was able to meet with the new mayor of Inuvik in my office and she told me they strongly support it. I understand Chief Johnny Charlie from Fort McPherson made his views known on radio today and said that he supports it.

I know there are some who have misgivings about it, and I suspect the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) may want to develop that; but I think on balance it would be fair to say that the council as presently constituted with 15 members is too small to be properly representative of the cultural and geographic differences of the Northwest Territories. I think it is also fair to say that, given the period of time when we are moving in a very substantive way toward a responsible government in the Northwest Territories, there is a great deal of political communication that must be undertaken, and that can probably be undertaken more effectively by a council of 22 members than one of 15, given the land mass with which the members have to deal, the dispersed nature of the population and the cultural differences.

I think I should also point out to the House that I have discussed the bill before us with the special representative of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. Mr. Drury. He studied it and he indicated he thinks it constitutes a forward step and he strongly supports it. Obviously it is a move to reinforce the direction in which I think we are all going toward greater autonomy and responsible government, but it does not—this is a point I should like to stress because it is this point that the opposition, namely, those who wish to be cautious on this bill, are stressing—inhibit constitutional options that would be before us and before the Northwest Territories in the future. I think it is important to recognize that.

The final point I would make is the point about urgency. The statutory life of the council will expire on March 31 of this year and an election must be held soon thereafter. It will be conducted by the chief electoral officer of Canada who, of course, would appreciate as much lead time as possible to prepare for this event. I hope, given the general support that exists for the bill, the argument of urgency, and the fact that the bill in no way precludes constitutional options which we will be exploring, that hon. members will see fit to put this bill through all three stages today.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. The debate on this bill is long overdue. The bill puts into law what members of the territorial council in the Northwest Territories have been asking for for a long period of time.

We on this side of the House have requested this amendment for some time, but it was not until late last fall that the minister saw fit to bring in the legislation. At that time we indicated to him that we were prepared to give the bill speedy passage, three stages in one day. We are still prepared to do that. We would be very happy to see the bill have three readings today. Unfortunately I understand hon. members of the New Democratic Party are not prepared to give such an undertaking.

● (1440)

As the minister has said, the matter is urgent. Why is it urgent? The answer is very simple. The territorial council have requested this change. Because of the vastness of the territory they represent, the council feels it is not realistic that there should be only 15 members on the council. They feel they cannot represent adequately the people who are scattered throughout the territories.

Approximately a week ago I was in the territories and had occasion to talk with members of the territorial council. I spoke with one councillor who told me that, in order for him to visit one isolated community, he had to charter an aircraft. For him to charter an aircraft, spend the day in the community and fly back cost approximately $500. He also indicated that he had a number of such communities in his constituency. One can see it is almost impossible for 15 members to represent properly the people in the area. This is the feeling of the members of the territorial council.

In anticipation of an increase in its numbers, the council passed an ordinance on October 27, 1978 which provided for the setting up of 22 different ridings or constituencies and for the provision of 22 members to represent those constituencies. Clause 2 of the present bill provides for retroactive approval of that ordinance. As the hon. minister pointed out, the life of the council in the Northwest Territories expires on March 31, 1979. This is why members of the territorial council came to Ottawa prior to Christmas. The minister said that they were lobbying, but I do not feel, when members of a provincial government or a territorial government come to Ottawa to talk with either the minister or opposition members, that they are lobbying. I feel they are doing their job; they are attempting to represent their provinces or their territory.

Mr. Faulkner: That is what I meant.

Mr. Neil: It is unfortunate that the New Democratic Party has not seen fit to undertake to give three readings to this legislation today. In talking to members of the legislative council last week, they indicated that it is very possible, if this legislation does not receive quick consideration, they will have to proceed with their election under the old provisions of the act. In other words, there would be an election of only 15 members rather than 22, and another four years will go by before there could be proper representation on the council.

I am disappointed in one respect regarding this bill. For some time the territorial council has asked the minister to change the legislation. Rather than the council being called a council, it would be called an assembly; and rather than being called members of the territorial council, the members would be called members of the legislative assembly. Unfortunately the minister has not seen fit to include that provision in the bill.

This bill is an important one because it gives better representation to all areas of the territories. There are those people in the north who say that the territorial council does not represent all the people of the north. But if one examines the make-up of the present council consisting of 15 individuals, one will find that nine of those 15 councillors are native people.

Last week when the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and myself were in the territories, we met with the territorial council for approximately two hours. At that time one of the territorial councillors posed the following question: "Some of the people say to me that I do not represent the native people. What do you people think?" We asked him about his constituency and his constituents. It was practically made up of native people. We responded to him by saying that under a democracy, once a person is elected by secret ballot, he represents all the people in his constituency whether or not they voted for him.

If one examines the attitude of the government over the years, it would appear that the government and the minister do not believe that the duly elected territorial council, the representatives of the people, in fact represents the people of the territories. One may ask why I say this. It is very simple. The government and the minister have refused to allow the territorial council or representatives of the territorial council to participate actively in the land claims negotiations.

This goes for the Yukon as well. I understand representatives from the Yukon were in Ottawa a week or two ago. They were members of the newly elected government in the Yukon. They asked the minister to give them the right of representation in the negotiations which will be and are taking place with the natives in the Yukon concerning land claims. When the COPE agreement was negotiated, at least the agreement in principle, it is interesting to note that it provided for the setting aside of roughly 10,000 square miles of the Yukon Territory on the north slope of the Yukon and that there was no prior consultation with the territorial council in the Yukon respecting that land. Representatives of the territorial council in the Yukon read the COPE agreement and found that the Government of Canada had set aside some 10,000 square miles on its own.

I suppose this land is owned by the people of Canada, but basically it is owned by the people of the Yukon. It was set aside without the properly elected people or the legislators in the Yukon having an opportunity to have a say in it.

● (1450)

I suppose that at some time in the future the government will say in respect of the COPE agreement that the territorial government had some input because the commissioner of the Northwest Territories signed this agreement. The commissioner acts under the direct authority of the minister. He does not act under the authority of the government of the Northwest Territories, and he signed the agreement under the instructions of the minister and not under the authorization of the territorial government.

I want to make it perfectly clear that any reference I have made to the COPE agreement has nothing to do with the contents, which will come up sooner or later in parliament for consideration. I will reserve my comments on the agreement until that time. I use that as an example of the manner in which the Government of Canada, not only this minister but ministers of Indian affairs and northern development in the past, deal with or treat that area.

Mr. Faulkner: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it is important that the issue be clarified. I am not sure the hon. member is up to date on events, but there is now a memorandum of understanding between the Government of Canada and the government of the Yukon—

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Faulkner: I understand the hon. member is interested in hearing what the update to the position is, and I think it is important that it is clarified.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister does not have the floor so he cannot make a statement. He could do so, perhaps, when he concludes the second reading stage of the bill.

An hon. Member: You were a great Deputy Speaker. Didn't you learn anything?

Mr. Faulkner: I thought members over there had an interest in the truth.

Mr. Neil: We on this side of the House are always interested in the truth, and if there is information that has come to light recently to which we are not privy I would certainly be very happy to listen to what the minister has to say when that is possible.

The government over the years has consistently treated the Yukon and Northwest Territories as colonies. The minister in his remarks a few moments ago made some reference to the granting of responsible government. I suggest that this government has no intention of ever granting provincial status, for example, to either of the territories, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country within the last year made that statement. He said the territories would not have provincial status during his lifetime.

It is interesting to note what the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) said when he spoke during the referendum debate on January 31. I quote from page 2774 of Hansard as follows:

> Let us look at the Yukon. The Conservative party now is committed to giving provincehood to the Yukon. What does that mean? It means provincehood to the Northwest Territories shortly after, and eventually it means turning over the natural resources of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to extremely small populations. That policy was enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition and the Conservative party. If that is the position of the Conservative party, the Liberal position is somewhat different. The government considers the natural resources of the north are the common heritage of all Canadians.

Those are the remarks of the hon. member for Laprairie. This legislation today enlarges the legislature. I feel that, regardless of the attitude of this government to the territorial council, this change means greater representation to the people in the Northwest Territories, and, whether the government likes it or not, it means a step toward self-government and provincial status for the N.W.T. Self-government cannot evolve without a settlement of native claims, and the territorial governments, whether in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, must be a part of these negotiations.

I have a copy of a speech made by the distinguished member of the territorial council, the Hon. Arnold McCallum, in the legislature of the Northwest Territories on February 1. He was replying to the commissioner's opening address. I should like to read a short part of what he said as I think it is important. He said:

I rise to talk about the most important contemporary issue facing this Legislature. And, in talking of it, I rise to make what I think is the most important speech I have ever made in this House.

I do this because I sense that we are approaching an intersection, a point at which all of us in the Northwest Territories—native and non-native—may push ahead to a better social order, or doom ourselves to the back-burner, and throw away our main chance to embrace in the N.W.T. what the rest of Canada takes for granted—self government.

I believe that the route we choose depends on whether we as members of this Legislature behave as politicians seeking personal or partisan gain—or whether instead we become statesmen.

I believe that if a free Northwest Territories is to emerge, that if a free Northwest Territories is to evolve, we must then become statesmen, wise in the science of government and unselfish and conciliatory in our conduct and in our work.

It is for this reason that I want to speak to you today, and speak to all citizens of the Northwest Territories about a species of wildlife.

It comes to light later that the species of wildlife to which he refers is government bureaucrats. He goes on to state:

The federal intent in land claims is to divide and conquer, and to divide and conquer us all.

In now agree with the Indian Brotherhood of the N.W.T. I now agree with the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada. I don't agree that the federal government is the culprit. As I've said, I believe the federal bureaucracy is. But I do agree with these groups as to what is happening: Divide the peoples of the Northwest Territories and, by so doing, conquer and control the peoples of the Northwest Territories.

This speech received little if any coverage in the southern press. It is an important speech and I believe it expresses the opinions of many northerners. It is a speech of some 30 pages. I do not know if the minister has read it, but I recommend it to him. Certainly it should be made compulsory reading for all senior civil servants in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It recites a scenario in the north of divide and conquer; a divisive policy at a time when we should be doing everything possible to unite our country. I do not blame the minister. He is only one of four whom we have had in the past six and a half years that I have been here. He has a heavy and responsible portfolio. The short period of time which the various ministers have spent in the portfolio makes it impossible for them to grasp completely what is happening. They must depend on senior civil servants for advice.

• (1500)

The future of our country depends on the attitude and policies of the government, not only toward the native people, but toward all the people of the north, and in particular the elected representatives of those people. Fortunately there will be a federal election soon. I say that that election will bring about a change in government, and under a Conservative government there will be the development in the north envisaged by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, which will be based on the spirit of co-operation between all northerners regardless of background.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: In closing, I would like to say that there is an urgency to this bill. It is important that it be passed so the next election in the Northwest Territories can be held on the basis of 22 seats. I urge the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) to make a speech at some length about what he would like. I hope that we will grant third reading to this bill today so that it may become law.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to make some remarks on Bill C-28, the bill which is before the House at this time, and I am pleased to follow the two previous speakers who remarked on this bill, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil).

I am concerned about the number given to this bill. It seems to me that that is the number which the government uses to bring in bad legislation. I am sure that hon. members will recall that the last time we had to contend with a bill C-28 it was the bill which, in effect, restricted collective bargaining for civil servants.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw say that he would like to see this bill pass third reading today. I consider the bill to be nothing but a piece of window dressing on the part of the government. It does absolutely nothing for the autonomy of the north. I believe that the hon. member for Moose Jaw said that we would have to wait another four years before they—and I assume when he said they that he was referring to the people in the Northwest Territories—will get proper representation. I am quite sure that the many good members sitting on the N.W.T. Council would take offence at that remark, and I hope that that is not what the hon. member meant by the statement.

I would be more than happy to support a bill which would bring autonomy to the north. I have represented that beautiful part of the country in this House for a little over six years, and during that time I have been waiting and hoping that the government would bring in legislation giving us the autonomy we are seeking. This bill, however, does not do that, and that is why I do not think it should be treated so lightly. The bill in its present state should not even be on the floor. If it had the substance which would bring some autonomy and a responsible government to the Northwest Territories, then I would be the first one on my feet to muster support for it, but not the way it is. All it does, as it stands, is put a few more seats on the territorial council.

If the government wishes to change the name from Northwest Territories Council to the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories, that is no problem. The only cost involved is to rewrite a few lines to change the act. Not too long ago I introduced a private members' bill in an attempt to do that very thing, but the government did not seem to get too excited, nor did they voice their support.

I made some statements about this proposed legislation when I became aware of it a few months back. I put out a press release stating my views. Basically the theme of that press release, which I put out in June, 1978, was that "bigger is not necessarily better." I am sure that there are a large number of people in the Northwest Territories who agree with me, although I know that the minister has been able to quote accurately some people who are in favour of this increase in the size of the Territorial council, and that would be fair enough if they were given more responsibility to handle some of the very important matters and questions which have to be answered.

Many hon. members will remember the recent news reports from the communities of Rae/Edzo in the Northwest Territories. It was a prime example of the drastic housing situation there that was brought to light through an outbreak of tuberculosis, a disease which is commonly associated with the poverty stricken people of the world. I have harped on this situation since I have been a member of this House, but what I have been saying on behalf of my people on matters of this nature have fallen on deaf ears.

Now the Liberal government and the party to my right here are willing to take a little piece of legislation, give it all these fancy-sounding, kind words, and say that it is good for the north, that the people up there are asking for it, and "we will give it an hour and a half or two hours on a Friday afternoon to put it through all three stages, and rubber stamp it." They feel that that will keep the people of the Northwest Territories quiet for a while and make it seem as though they are getting some autonomy.

No matter what the results are of the next election, whether we have a Conservative government or a Liberal government, the situation will remain the same.

Mr. Paproski: No, no, Wally; it is not going to be the same.

Mr. Firth: You are willing to rubber-stamp it right now, and if you want the floor you can have it in just a few minutes.

Mr. Faulkner: Order.

Mr. Firth: This is nothing but some silly window dressing to keep the people of the Northwest Territories quiet. I was saying earlier that no matter which government gets in, the power will remain with the people in Ottawa. This bill does not give any autonomy to the people of the Northwest Territories, where there are some very major decisions to be made. There is some question about land claims and whether the Northwest Territories should be divided into two or three territories, as one area might be ready for provincial status before another. Some very good proposals have been put forward by native associations, and we should try to find answers to their questions regarding autonomy for the Northwest Territories.

• (1510)

Members of the Northwest Territories Council complain that they have to cover very large areas and that they experience difficulty in doing so. They believe that 15 members are not adequate. I know that very well myself, Mr. Speaker, and I made that point when I came here a few years ago. On behalf of the people of the Northwest Territories, I lobbied for an increase for federal representation and, as a result of my work, and with the support of many other people who are finally beginning to understand some of the problems of the area, there will be two federal members for the Northwest Territories after the next election.

Fully understanding the problems of trying to represent such a large area, I made a serious suggestion which I hope the government will take just as seriously. Indeed, I believe the Northwest Territories Council could implement my idea themselves. I suggested that members of the council should be elected on a full-time basis. As I understand it, they have the right to set their own salaries or stipends and operating expenses, so they could designate the positions as full-time as they are needed. The council only sits about four times a year, perhaps sometimes five, and for two or three weeks at a time. If the positions were made full-time perhaps that would even attract candidates of a higher calibre. I think this suggestion has fallen on deaf ears, however. Some people who cannot at present afford, for financial reasons, to run for council might be able to do so if the position were a full-time one. I reiterate that I do not believe that bigger is necessarily better in this case.

At present the colonial system operates in the Northwest Territories, as an appointed civil servant can, in effect, overrule elected members of council. As I understand it, the commissioner can withhold consent, which is much the same as the governor general or a lieutenant governor refusing royal assent to a bill. In my view, this is too much power for an appointed civil servant. I suggest that the bill should contain a clause to the effect that the commissioner be elected and I am sure this would bring more support for the bill.

What it amounts to in this day and age is a colonial situation in a country that has known democracy for a great many years. I believe that the Northwest Territories pays its own way, Mr. Speaker. This view may stir up a hornet's nest, of course, and I expect it will meet with disagreement from the other parties.

I should like to give some examples of areas where revenue comes in. For instance, there are two gold mines in Yellowknife, the Con mine and the Giant Yellowknife, and, of course, gold is a high-priced commodity at the moment. There is the Pine Point mine, a lead zinc operation. There is the Nanasivik operation in the Arctic which is a tungsten mine. There are the gas and oil wells at Norman Wells which have been operating for 40 years. There is a silver mine at Echo Bay and a gas pipeline coming out of Pointed Mountain. There is the fur industry, the commercial fishing industry, the business tax, some logging and personal income tax. There is great potential for gas and oil in the Liard area. There is great potential for agriculture. Many people are of the opinion that the north country is all ice and snow and therefore the chances of a good agricultural industry have not received the attention I believe they deserve.

I do not believe that we should have to prove we pay our own way before we can be given the responsibility of a fully elected government which is responsible to the people. I do not think democracy should have a dollar price tag on it. If provisions for this were made in the bill before us I would be more than happy to support it.

I should like now to comment on the position of members of the Conservative party, Mr. Speaker, who are on record as giving full support to Bill C-28. They are anxious to give it one or two hours in the House of Commons, rubber-stamp it, and hope that will keep the people of the Northwest Territories quiet for a while. That is different from the position put forward by the Progressive Conservative candidate for the Northwest Territories in the forthcoming election. Not long ago he made some comments about the situation which were reported in the Yellowknifer, the local newspaper, in November, 1977. Here is what the Progressive Conservative candidate for the western Arctic had to say:

> Let's not kid ourselves, we do not have responsible government in the Northwest Territories. Here the commissioner is the government and he makes that plain for all to see. The system of having an advisory executive committee comprising both elected and appointed members is really just a sham and a farce.
> People talk about responsible government as if it were responsible to have varying degrees of responsibility but this is pure nonsense.
>
> The chief executive officer of the Northwest Territories is either responsible to the federal minister in Ottawa, or he is responsible to the people of the N.W.T. There's no in between . . . It has to be Ottawa or the people.
> Regardless of whether or not we have full provincial status, this 19th century colonial approach must be given up. The commissioner has to be chosen by and responsible to the people he supposedly serves. Nothing else will do.

That was the position of the Progressive Conservative candidate in the Northwest Territories. Therefore I was somewhat dismayed to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw say that we should give all three readings to this bill, and get it over and done with in a short period of time. I believe the bill should go to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The committee should hear witnesses from the north. It could invite members of different organizations to come to Ottawa to present their case or, better still, the committee could travel to certain communities in the north and hear the views of the people of the Northwest Territories.

I know there are some who support this bill to increase the number. I have met with some of them. I have given a lot of thought to this. However, I certainly cannot support going through all readings of this bill in a short time. The topic of responsible government and autonomy for the north deserves much more time and very serious discussion by a lot more people than two or three speakers in this House trying to get the bill through in short order.

Another point I wish to touch on briefly is the special representative of the government, Mr. Drury, who travelled in the north and talked to a few people. If you look at some of the news articles, in fact you need only read the headlines, you will realize the people in the north are not happy with merely having an individual come and talk to them about this matter. The people of the north would like to see this topic discussed more seriously rather than this bit of window dressing for the Northwest Territories in a little two-clause bill.

That is about all I would like to say at this time. I want it clearly understood that I am not in favour of merely rubber stamping this bill and letting it go through the House in speedy order. It should be referred to the appropriate committee for very serious consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words this afternoon on Bill C-28. This is a short and seemingly innocuous bill since it hardly covers one sheet of paper. Nevertheless, it is certainly very important. While listening a few moments ago to the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), we could sense his concern, Mr. Speaker, over the lack of seriousness of this bill in view of the needs of the people in the territories. I think his concerns are warranted because he can certainly be considered a man well aware of the problems existing in his riding, the territories, problems which are larger than for the rest of Canada and which concern diverse regions with resources that can hardly be imagined from afar.

As several other government bills, Mr. Speaker, this one has had a long period of gestation. In 1974, the hon. Jean Chrétien, who was then minister of Indian affairs and northern development argued in favour of such a move. This is what he said at the time, and I quote:

> We must consider the need to increase the number of council members to better reflect the population changes.

That was the opinion of Jean Chrétien when he was minister. In 1977 the Council of the Northwest Territories submitted to the federal government a brief entitled "Priorities of the North" in which it also called for an amendment to the act. One could read, and I quote:

> The legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories should have the power to determine the number of its members, which should not be less than 15 or more than 25 as is the case for the Yukon. Those amendments should be in effect before the next election.

And we know that 1979 should be an election year in the territories. So this bill arouses the interest of both the federal government and the territories concerned. Why that double interest? Before I answer that question, I believe it would be appropriate to get the whole picture by describing briefly the status of the territories and the council. For all practical purposes the Northwest Territories are under the trusteeship of the federal government. A commissioner appointed by Ottawa looks after it. He gets his instructions from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Mr. Stuart Hodgson is currently the commissioner.

The territories have, as we saw, a council made up of 15 members now. For the first time in 1975 that council became a truly elective council with a majority of native representation. In addition, there is an executive council where three of the 15 councillors and three officials of the federal government sit.

Under the legislation governing the territories, its government has jurisdiction over so-called local powers: education, social development, penitentiaries, administration of justice. For its part, the federal government takes on several provincial responsibilities: construction and maintenance of roads, lands and forests, health and so on. The situation created by the federal trusteeship, the distribution of powers as well as the ethnic diversity give the territories three possible options as to its constitutional future: (1) the status quo, (2) the nation, (3) the province. The status quo. The federal government would indeed like to keep the territories under its thumb. The discovery of substantial reserves of natural gas means an additional source of income for the central government. If the territories were given the status of a province, their income would then go to the provincial government and not to Ottawa as is now the case for Alberta, for example. Indeed, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) clearly stated that it was out of the question that the territories should become provinces. The fact is that other factors plead in favour of the status quo, namely the lack of sound economic basis and the sparse population.

The Indian nation. During the 1975 election which ended up with the creation of a council made up of a majority of natives, two Indians were elected. These representatives, namely Mr. James Wahshee, President of the Indian Association of the Northwest Territories and one of his friends resigned shortly after and were replaced by two Metis. In fact, they handed in their resignation to stress their desire to form an independent Indian nation within Canada. To them, the council does not serve their cause and the Canadian Tapirisat Inuit Association has similar purposes. Their position and that of the National Indian Brotherhood were submitted this summer or two summers ago to the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Canadian Constitution. The Territorial Council was completely opposed to this plan. It said the following:

> The concept of separate analyses which divide people according only to their ethnic background and automatically denies the political rights of the minorities goes against not only Canadian political traditions, but also the "Canadian" constitution.

This concept does not agree either with the ideas of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Thirdly, there is provincial status. The idea of giving the status of a province to the territories seems to be very popular in the council. This transformation has been considered for several years. In 1975, when the council became an elective body, many people considered this the first step towards a responsible government. Mr. Arnold McCallum, president of the Territorial Council, is a supporter of provincial status. He submitted a brief to the joint committee last summer in which he listed a few of his reasons for requesting the status of a province.

First of all, in 1966, the Carrothers commission on the evolution of government in the Northwest Territories stated in one of its recommendations that all Canadian citizens were entitled to take part in the institutions of a responsible government under the terms of the Canadian constitution. It also stated that the Canadian citizens living in northern Canada should be able to play the same role in their government as the residents of the provinces. If such was the situation in 1966, it still is in 1978. Secondly, can there be a democracy when the commissioner of the territories can proceed without consulting the elected representatives and a federal minister can act without consulting in any way the Northwest Territories? Thirdly, we are the only Canadian legislative body which cannot set the number of its ridings. This is not to the credit of our democratic system. In fact, it has been said that many important changes will affect the territories in the more or less immediate future. Decisions therefore have to be made and they have to be made by a responsible government.

In the meantime, the federal government decided to study the situation. The Hon. C. M. Drury was directed to enquire on the constitutional aspects of land claims. At the time of his appointment, the right hon. Prime Minister said this and I quote:

> The government was not favourable to the creation of new political divisions in the north . . . essentially based on racial differences and direct relations with the federal government.

We may wonder, Mr. Speaker, what will be the purpose of this enquiry if conclusions are drawn in advance. In light of this brief summary, we can identify the objectives of this bill. First of all, the federal government answers the many requests of the territorial council by granting it a larger representation but without more powers. Somehow, it puts it in the same situation or even in a worse situation than that presently faced by provinces because of the tendency of the federal government to centralize all powers in Ottawa. So, Mr. Speaker, a larger representation of the territorial council might be of some benefit to it, as it might assume its responsibilities a little better or a little easier. Yet if they are not granted additional powers it will become very difficult because I think that when somebody tries to do something, when he attempts to discharge his responsibilities he should have the power to do so.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that at this time it is not enough to grant them more representatives on the territorial council; they should enjoy additional powers so that these representatives may better discharge their responsibilities. Secondly, by agreeing to one of the demands of the council the federal government is somehow trying to appease that body in its claims for provincial status at least for the time being. They are trying to make it wait by applying liniment on the wound in the hope that they will be patient a few more years. Thirdly, by granting additional representation, the government hopes that it will show itself more sympathetic to the people, namely that there will be more natives on that council be they Inuit or Indian people. It is also an attempt to put an end to or shelve Indian claims for independent nationhood. The government hopes that they will forget their objective and come around to its views.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is quite certain that by presenting this bill the government is seeking self-serving objectives. What remains to be seen is whether these objectives will answer the expectations of the members of the council and the residents of the Northwest Territories. I agree with my colleague from the Northwest Territories and I think that we should not be too quick in passing this bill. It should perhaps be passed at second reading stage today, then referred to a committee so that representatives and organized groups from the Northwest Territories may be heard before the committee and spell out what they want and what they expect from the central government.

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, because of the understanding which exists—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I must inform hon. members that recognizing the minister at this time will close the debate.

Mr. Faulkner: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Because of that understanding I will take another occasion upon which to respond to some of the points which have been raised in the debate. However, there are one or two points which I believe it is important I should deal with now. One is the assertion of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) that we are not involving the YPG on the Northwest Territories government in the land claims discussions. I should like to say that as a result of concern expressed about the nature of consultation in the past I have agreed to develop memoranda of understanding with the governments of the Yukon and of the Territories which would lay out the nature of the participation of those governments in the land claim's discussions. This showed clear up an issue which has been of some concern to the north.

The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) suggests that this bill is window dressing, and he argues that autonomy and responsible government require much more time. He must recognize that it is precisely because the questions of autonomy and responsible government are now under review in the Northwest Territories that more time is required. More study, and the completion of the work of the special representative are required. It is precisely because of those things that this bill has such modest and limited intentions. I think the hon. member would be the first to admit that if we went into the areas the hon. member referred to at this point without consultations being completed, without the work of the special representative being completed, and without adequate consultation with the native groups and the territorial council, they would all have objected to this bill. The reason this bill is supported in the north is that its objectives are limited to the one area where there appears to be general support. There appears to be general support for the proposal that the size of the council be increased in number from 15 to 22.

The other question raised by the hon. member are not being avoided by this bill. It is just that no one agrees that we are ready to address those questions at this time. However, I do not think there is any doubt in anyone's mind that next year, following the completion of the work of the special representative, we will then be in a position to conduct a major review of the Northwest Territories Act, at which point we will deal with the substantive questions the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the minister a question. When the memorandum of understanding is completed, will he circulate it to members on this side of the House?

Mr. Faulkner: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT

MEASURE TO PROMOTE SAFETY AND TO PROTECT ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Bud Cullen (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-17, to promote public safety and the protection of the environment in the transportation of dangerous goods, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), I should say that he is in Newfoundland, a very important part of this country, as I am sure my hon. colleagues opposite would concede, signing agreements which I think will be for the benefit of that province.

Canada's growing trade relations with other countries on other continents, combined with rapid technological change in the transportation industry and the increasing use of dangerous substances in common manufacturing processes, have generated an urgent need to regulate the transportation of dangerous goods.

The wide variety of legislative instruments which are currently being used to regulate the transportation of dangerous goods has been proclaimed by various levels of government at various times and in connection with individual modes of transport or specific goods. Obviously it cannot be claimed that, even taken as a whole, they will provide a satisfactory method of ensuring that these goods will enter, pass through, and leave the transportation system safely or economically. On the contrary, manufacturers, shippers and carriers of dangerous goods are at present faced with a confusing maze of regulations, depending on the means of transport being used and the places to or from which goods are being carried. Canada is not alone in having to face the need to resolve this problem, but we can take some pride in saying that with the valuable support of the provinces and of the industries concerned we are among the world leaders in formulating multimodal legislation in this area.

Bill C-17, to promote public safety and the protection of the environment in the transportation of dangerous goods, will impose fairly severe penalties on those involved in the transportation of dangerous goods who seek to avoid their responsibilities. That in this country such persons are remarkably few in number is strikingly demonstrated by the absence of serious accidents involving the transportation of dangerous goods in Canada. It is no longer possible, however, to rely solely on domestic standards to maintain this safety record. In any event, there is one area of activity where no uniform safety requirements are in force in this country, namely, highway transport.

Dealing with the international aspects first, it is obvious that, just as standards for container safety cannot be left to individual nations to determine, standards governing the packaging, marking and methods of handling dangerous goods must be international in nature.

Since 1957 a committee of experts on the transport of dangerous goods has been reporting to the economic and social council of the United Nations and making recommendations dealing with the matters to which I have just referred. Canada has been an active member on that committee, and there is now a substantial area of international agreement on the standards to be applied, sufficent to warrant major legislation by the Government of Canada. Such legislation would establish norms and provide for detailed regulations setting out the duties and responsibilities of all those involved, from the moment when goods are prepared for shipment until they arrive at their final destination.

As I have said, highway transport raises special problems within Canada as well as between Canada and the United States. The problems which arise within Canada result from the fact that for the most part highway traffic and highway safety legislation is within provincial jurisdiction, as are incidental laws relating to such matters as labour safety, environmental protection, and emergency response planning. As a result, different standards may be required by each province. This problem is compounded by the fact that the United States has its own standards, which may be partly acceptable or totally acceptable in some provinces but not in others, and may or may not conflict with Canadian federal laws and regulations.

There has been a great deal of co-operation between our two countries, chiefly by means of reciprocal agreements to accept the standards of the other country for packaging and labelling. There are, however, some areas where less easily soluble problems have begun to arise, for example, the Canadian and Quebec requirements that all shipping documents and package markings be in French and English—a characteristic which does not commend itself to the United States—and the Canadian desire to adopt World Health Organization toxicity standards, which would lead to more substances being regulated in Canada than in the United States.

Uniform legislation within Canada would obviously facilitate the negotiation of mutually acceptable arrangements with the United States in these and other areas. To the extent that Canada as a country can implement United Nations standards, the need for uniform rules for all modes of transport for industries involved in the manufacturing and shipping of dangerous goods can also be met.

This is an ideal shared by industry and government alike, and is demonstrated by the clearly expressed desire of all concerned for consistent and comprehensive regulation in this field, a desire which contrasts markedly with the current trend to criticize government intervention in the private sector.

At first glance, some affected parties might have reacted adversely to the idea that their paper work apparently was going to be increased and their overhead costs escalated by the introduction of yet another piece of transport legislation. In fact, they have for the most part realized that the effect of the proposed transportation of dangerous goods act and regulations will be the very opposite. Where now three or more documents may be required if goods are being transferred from one mode of transport to another, across provincial boundaries, and on board ships or planes destined for overseas, the new legislation will reduce the number of shipping documents required to the minimum. Similarly, marking and labelling of packages and containers will be simplified, as will packaging requirements themselves, so that goods will not have to be unpacked and repacked or unlabelled and relabelled every time they are transferred from one place to another or from one means of transport to another.

In sum, the bill contains provisions which will enable safety standards, procedures and marks to be applied uniformly to all classes of dangerous goods, regardless of the mode or modes of transport by which they may be travelling. It takes into account the duties and responsibilities of all of those involved in the preparation, handling and transportation of such products, and imposes on them whatever liabilities are appropriate to their role in the transportation process. Indeed, for the first time, it will make those who buy and sell dangerous goods as responsible as the carriers traditionally have been for the safe transport of those products.

Conformity with the regulations and standards which will follow from the passage of this legislation will be enforced by specially trained inspectors, some employed directly by Transport Canada and some by other government departments at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. These inspectors will have fairly extensive powers of inspection and detention of potentially hazardous goods or packages and will be able to impose fines in certain circumstances. They will also be in a position to take all possible measures to contain the effects of accidents or incidents involving dangerous goods in transport.

The bill thus represents one of three prongs of a comprehensive safety program for the transportation of dangerous goods, the first being a legislative instrument designed to deal with the serious consequences of transporting dangerous goods in an unsafe manner. The second prong of the safety program will be the development of multi-modal regulations under the authority of the bill to ensure that dangerous goods are properly identified as being dangerous and that they enter, pass through, and leave the transportation system in a safe and economic way. The third prong will be the development of an emergency response program in co-operation with other federal agencies and with the provinces.

It goes without saying that legislation cannot prevent accidents. But it can reduce them by deterring people from taking unnecessary risks, and it can mitigate ensuing damages by enabling emergency response personnel to react in the most appropriate manner when such accidents occur.

I referred earlier, Mr. Speaker, to a common desire for regulation in this area. That this desire is shared by the Government of Canada with the governments of the provinces and the industries involved has been demonstrated over the past four or five years by an unprecedented degree of consultation and co-operation between all three in attempting to formulate mutually acceptable legislation and regulations. That it is shared with the United States and other major trading partners has been demonstrated by the concentrated and fruitful discussions that have taken place within the framework of specialized agencies of the United Nations, such as the International Maritime Consultative Organization, the International Civil Aviation Organization, the Economic and Social Council, the Economic Commission for Europe, and between specialists in Transport Canada and the United States department of transport.

Now a third party may be said to have intervened: the general public. As a result of the publicity given to the increasing number of transportation accidents and incidents involving dangerous goods, there is a growing public awareness of the dangers to human life and to the environment presented by new and ever more powerful and potentially destructive chemicals travelling across the country. This awareness is giving rise to frequent questions directed to Transport Canada to find out how the transportation of such goods is regulated in this country.

I hope that I have persuaded hon. members of the vital need for uniform legislation governing the transportation of dangerous goods in Canada, both from the point of view of safety and with respect to the maintenance of good and prosperous trade relations with other countries. The Government of Canada has played a very active part in inter-provincial and international attempts to establish uniform safety standards, and it is in our best interest to proceed with the enabling legislation contained in Bill C-17.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that our party supports the principle and therefore the major objective of this piece of legislation. I believe it is fair to say as well that we acknowledge the need for such a piece of legislation, given the fact that there has been an increasing number of fatal and near fatal incidents involving dangerous goods, which unquestionably highlights the need for a co-ordinated law which is put before us in the form of this bill now, and to ensure that the public interest will be assured and that the movement of dangerous goods will not harm the Canadian public.

I would like to say also that we on this side of the House are disturbed and disappointed by the piecemeal approach of the government relative to transportation since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has taken over the helm. We believe that we should have before us the comprehensive new policy thrust which had been introduced in the form of Bill C-33 back in 1976. A similar bill was reintroduced in the form of Bill C-20. We have had a series of white papers and policy statements advanced by the Minister of Transport as a result of the government's new policy thrust, but none of those documents has ever been referred to a committee for consideration. Perhaps they were discussed only at a committee meeting or two.

I want to say to you, sir, that the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications is probably one of the most underutilized and underemployed committees of the House, in spite of the fact that transportation is key to the attainment of balanced economic growth in this country, key to the establishment of a sound industrial base, and key to the provision of some semblance of national unity. Yet the subject matter has not progressed from the order paper, has not been considered by the committee, and we have not had the opportunity to obtain the views and opinions of the numerous people engaged and interested in transportation in this country, the shippers, the carriers, and everyone who has a vital interest in transportation.

We think it would have been much more appropriate to deal with the total package, to have a comprehensive program and then to put the respective pieces of legislation together, such as the ports act. There has been a suggestion that we should proceed with the ports act. Also, in our view, we should proceed with the amendments to the National Transportation Act before we proceed with this bill because it contains the outline, the basic policy guidelines and the framework of a comprehensive national transportation system in this country. We think that the National Transportation Act requires a substantial amount of debate because there are regional differences on the matter, there are various freight rate anomalies, and safety in the movement of goods is but one element. So we think it would have been more appropriate to deal with it in the orderly fashion I suggest rather than in the way in which we are proceeding.

I know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has no control over this, that he has simply submitted this bill on behalf of his colleague, and I certainly do not fault him, but I think that that message should ring very clearly in the minds of government members because we have not proceeded in an effective fashion in dealing with the transportation problems in our country. We have a serious grain transportation problem and serious problems relative to air safety, so it seems to me that a clear and co-ordinated transportation policy should be put in place. We have a committee of the House, and we can utilize the institution of parliament in a much more effective way than we have done to deal with these important issues.

I said at the outset of my remarks that we approve of the principle of the bill before us and indeed of its objectives, but I must say that we insist that these objectives be met without imposing excessive costs or hardships, and with the minimum of restraint put upon the operations of the carriers and the shippers. It must be recognized by all concerned—because we consider this to be a very important piece of legislation—that this bill is really an extension of the Criminal Code, not merely a transportation law. Although the minister indicated that this was enabling legislation, I suspect, although I am not a lawyer, that it tends to minimize its enabling aspects. This bill has many implications, and the impact of its regulations will have a critical effect. So it is absolutely necessary for the regulations which will be prescribed to be reasonable, well-founded, and understood, and that the implications with respect to their enforcement be clearly considered.

The minister spoke about the importance of the bill's international aspects. While this is true, we must not lose sight of the fact that for the time being, and perhaps for some time in the future, our major trading partner is and will be the United States.

• (1600)

Before adopting any set of regulations we should consult to the fullest with the industry and the provinces. The key to the effectiveness of this piece of legislation certainly is inherent in the regulations. The provinces must make major contributions in determining what the regulations will be because of the enabling aspect of it and the clear constitutional responsibility of the provinces.

That brings me to the dangerous goods code, and perhaps I might call it four o'clock before dealing with that subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to private members' hour, I wonder if there was not an agreement yesterday that we would pass without debate today the motion to refer a document entitled "The Management of Canada's Nuclear Wastes" to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. If that is the case, and if there is a disposition to carry out that undertaking, perhaps it can be done now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, respecting the point of order, there was such an agreement. We would be prepared to do that now.

While I am on my feet I should like to mention that there was some discussion earlier in the day concerning the possibility of the government making available later this day the bill respecting the allocation of petroleum and energy, if that is the appropriate way to describe it, and if I recall the minister's words correctly. The government was to attempt to make available that bill to the House, to introduce it and distribute it so that it can be studied.

While the parliamentary secretary is dealing with the matter of the reference to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred, he might tell us whether the government will introduce that bill now. As we mentioned earlier, we are prepared to revert to introduction of bills in order to do that. We were left with the impression that that might be done this afternoon. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary can inform the House.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, concerning the motion to refer the document entitled "The Management of Canada's Nuclear Wastes" to the appropriate committee, an agreement was arrived at yesterday. Thus, that is not a problem.

Concerning the request of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, I understand he expected the bill to be introduced today with the consent of the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Pinard: It is obvious the bill is not completely ready now. Perhaps it will be completed before five o'clock. If it is, I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council will come into the House and seek unanimous consent to introduce it. I cannot make any commitment on that because I do not know if the bill will be ready before five o'clock.

Also while I am on my feet, there is unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of Bill C-214 and that the preceding item numbers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the understanding is that we will proceed with item No. 7 in the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and take the appropriate steps to move that to the next stage before proceeding with the consideration of Bill C-214. I think that is the understanding.

CANADA SUNSET ACT

MEASURE TO SUBJECT ALL GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS AND OPERATIONS TO REGULAR REVIEW

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved that Bill C-214, to establish a Sunset Law for Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a year ago this month I had an opportunity, during debate on a motion regarding the role and scope of government activity in society and the economy, to speak on the subject of sunset laws. At that time I read into the record a suggested draft bill on the sunset concept. The bill we are discussing today is primarily the same as that earlier draft. As a private member's bill, of course it is limited by the constraints which restrict all private members' bills. Nevertheless, I feel it provides a solid base to discuss a pragmatic and promising approach to the problem of increasingly overgrown and unresponsive government.

The proliferation of federal agencies, commissions, boards, offices and even ministries, which have sprouted forth in such numbers in recent years, must be brought under some kind of control and scrutiny. The problem with these agencies and programs, which perhaps were established originally for a specific and worth-while purpose, is that they seem to defy the laws of nature. They never die natural deaths; they seem to acquire a life of their own. Even if they were set up originally with a narrowly defined purpose, they tend to generate new functions and responsibilities almost by an unconscious reflex action. Over time, what was once a responsive and flexible agency can become a tangled labyrinth, snarled in its own complexity and buried beneath the weight of "proper" procedures.

I feel the sunset law approach is essential, but it is not the only instrument available to us. It is essential if we are to control some of the bureaucratic sprawl. Such legislation would provide for the periodic termination of government agencies and programs unless they are able to justify their continued existence. The sunset concept involves setting fixed dates for the automatic termination of government agencies and programs in order to force their full-scale review. If this review shows they have served the purpose for which they were created, then a positive legislative act, resolution or some other positive act would be required to extend the life of a particular agency or program. However, if one was deemed to be no longer relevant, useful or necessary, then it would be either modified or allowed to terminate.

I do not think it is necessary to go into the mechanics or major elements of the bill because I spelled these out in some detail last February. In addition, I believe the bill itself is clear and relatively straightforward, and for this I owe a vote of thanks to the parliamentary counsel's office for its help and advice. However, there are two points I think should be made and perhaps dealt with at least briefly at this time.

First, the schedules attached to the bill are designed as a suggested format or timetable, if you will, for carrying out the mandatory review of existing programs and agencies. It may be decided that the committee, which I have suggested should carry out such a review, would be in a better position to establish such a timetable. If so, I am sure that would be more than acceptable to the concept and principles we have before us for consideration now.

The second point of clarification pertains to the need for competent support staff assigned to the committee to assist it in undertaking the broad based evaluation of programs and agencies which is necessary. Because of the restrictions on private members' legislation I could not write this very important and absolutely necessary feature into my bill. As you know, we are not allowed to suggest the spending or the raising of money. However, if this House is to adopt the sunset concept, then the designated committee or procedure, whatever, must be properly equipped to do the job.

In this context I recognize there are many people who suggest the job of reviewing each and every program and agency of government might in itself create an enormous bureaucratic burden. We will not know that unless we try. Program evaluation as such has not been seen in my experience to bring an end to existing programs within this government, programs that are no longer fulfilling or meeting the reason for their establishment in the first place.

As the size of government increases, so increases the amount and the level of mandatory funding. Administrative costs escalate, and there is a decrease in the amount of money available for new purposes and new needs. This is particularly true in a growing and expanding country such as Canada with the many geographically related problems we face. The type of legislation which I propose is a means to balance funds allocated for agencies or programs established years ago with new needs and new priorities facing Canada in the 1970s and 1980s.

As money grows more and more scarce, essential programs and services must be run more economically and efficiently. The sunset process could provide a way to ensure the greatest control of and accountability for all public funds.

However, sunset legislation should not be viewed as merely the means of cutting or reducing government spending. Though certainly one of the goals of this approach and of this form of legislation, that is not the sole objective. Equally as important is the need to make government again truly answerable to the people of this country. Canadians are understandably beginning to feel that they are becoming the servants and not the beneficiairies of our form of government. Perhaps this feeling is strongest at this time of year when we are forced to undergo that unique Canadian form of water torture known as filing you income tax return. It is not just tax forms, it is the broad gamut of government, which has become so complex, that it has forced us to create additional offices simply to explain to Canadians where they can obtain assistance and understanding of the functions and roles of agencies and programs being undertaken by the government.

As my esteemed and very distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), has said, perhaps it is too late for us to regain control of the machinery of government and its complexity. I differ with him to this degree; I do not think it is too late for us to try. He may be right, but I hope not.

The government has complicated the life of the small businessman to such an extent it has had to create a special office for the "reduction of paper burden". My secretary has on her phone a piece of paper which says "If you do not understand it, call me and we will tell you." This is an office to explain paper burden. Good God, what are we coming to? This office even supplies little red stickers with its telephone number that can be stuck on the phone for quick reference. Can you imagine this paper burden number stuck there on the telephone beside other emergency numbers for the police, the fire department, the ambulance and so on?

An hon. Member: They have the biggest Xerox machine imaginable.

Mr. Forrestall: The biggest Xerox machine in the world could not keep up with this. We are in some degree of trouble when we reach this stage. Just to illustrate for a moment or two, let me refer to the fact that one of the reasons for the establishment of PetroCan was to create an agency of government that could deal with the governments of other countries for the express purpose of obtaining crude oil and its delivery. As you know, this country is not secure in its oil supply for reasons that are totally inexplicable. We are told on the one hand by one industry that we have generations of self-sufficiency but we do not have a distribution system. Millions of people living east of this Ottawa Valley where we are sitting today are at the whim of foreign nationals in respect of security of home heating fuels and gasoline. This year we will pay close to $4 billion to foreign-controlled cartels to move our trade goods into this country and our exports out, all of which is totally out of our control.

PetroCan has not secured one gallon of oil for the people of eastern Canada since its establishment. Good God, that was what it was established for. I am suggesting, not in any forceful way, that PetroCan should be thrown out the window. I think it should be dismantled or, if it is not, it should work for the purpose for which it was brought into being, and that is to secure oil deliveries to eastern Canadian refineries. I just mention this as a typical example. Had PetroCan been under the scrutiny of a competent standing committee of this House, whose purpose and function it was to review its role, the work it is doing, and to ascertain whether it was meeting the principles and concepts for which it had been established, perhaps today refineries in eastern Canada might have the ability to say to the people of Atlantic Canada, "You will get your fuel oil, your home heating fuels and your gasoline for next winter." As it stands now, we do not know that. I do not know the reason for this either.

I do not want to be accused of talking out my own bill, but I do want very briefly to mention one other potentially very positive aspect of sunset legislation, and that is the ability of the legislation to involve ordinary people directly in the review process. Perhaps this could provide some real meaning to that almost forgotten slogan "participatory democracy". In any event it would seem natural that the designated committee would want to hear from those individuals and organizations directly affected by a particular program or agency. By appearing before a committee these groups could offer an insight into the effectiveness of certain government activities which we seldom receive.

The secrecy surrounding government activities in recent years is appalling on its own, and I do not think that I need to take up the time of the House with a dissertation on some of the sad examples of the consequences of secrecy. I say that we should put these programs and agencies up for review in a public forum responsible to this chamber, and made up of members from all sides of the House. The government should expose itself to the people of the country, particularly those who are directly affected; then they would have some assistance in the formulation of future program policies.

In summing up, I hope that hon. members will feel that the subject matter of this bill deserves further study. I firmly believe that the sunset approach offers a practical means of ensuring that public funds are economically and efficiently spent. It is my objective as a Progressive Conservative member of parliament, and it has been for the 14 years I have been a member of this House, to look for new ways in an attempt to balance our budget. It does not necessarily have to be sunset law, but I ask hon. members to take a look at the proposed bill and what is implied in it, to look at their daily work and the mail which comes across their desks, at the time and energy spent in responding to that mail, and to think for a moment of the time, energy and dollars consumed in the ministers' offices to secure answers for constituents, and then make a judgment about some approach to the proliferation of agencies, programs and departments and, indeed, even ministries which we are faced with today, so that we do not take quite ten years before we get around to doing something useful about it.

I want economy and efficiency, and one of the ways to get it within the agencies and programs of this government is through the responsibility and accountability of them to the public. It is also a means of involving Canadians directly in those areas of government which affect them most, and this, in my view, is very important.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I have one final comment. Some eight or ten years ago I proposed, not a new concept to the western world, to this chamber, and I have done so in every parliamentary session since 1969-1970—the concept of an independent accident investigation commission. The other day the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) finally allowed, perhaps because of the heat he was under with respect to standards of safety in transport in this country, the introduction of a bill which emulates the one that I had put before this chamber so many times in recent years. I do not mind waiting seven years, eight years or nine years—now it will probably be ten years—for a good concept to find its way into legislation, but I hope, for the sake of the Canadian economy, and to cope with a growing, sometimes almost unmanageable labyrinth of agencies and programs, that it will not take this long for members of this chamber to recognize that there is some validity in this concept.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this bill I have decided to take a pragmatic approach. I do not think that it will work. It will not work as it is now presented, for a variety of reasons. For instance, the workload it would impose on parliamentarians would be overwhelming, and diverse opinions from diverse public groups would cloud the issues which would be fundamental to any review process. Sheer work volume would make reviews superficial and ineffective, and forward looking futuristic type programs vital in a changing society would get short shrift in favour of what was appealing on a short-term basis.

There are, in my opinion, many other reasons equally compelling that militate against the proposal advanced in this legislation.

Mr. Forrestall: It is a good idea.

Mr. Béchard: Beyond the negative aspects, there is the other very practical question as to whether it is necessary. I suggest to hon. members that it is not. The government has mechanisms—they have been mentioned by others—and it has the authority, by virtue of its majority, to review any program or any project that it deems has outlived its usefulness. So where does this leave the proposed legislation? It leaves it in the position of being unworkable and undesirable.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to add substance to these rather bald statements to show why this legislation is impractical for this nation at this time, even though the intent is laudable. Sunset legislation provides a predetermined termination date. In other words, before any project is ever launched, someone has planned its demise unless, of course, it can be demonstrated somewhere down the line that it should be kept alive. In isolation, that seems to me to be a fairly inflexible and somewhat illogical approach. In fairness, though, this proposal is not so much to eliminate programs but to evaluate them, and the termination date is simply a mechanism to force that into happening.

There are other problems with this legislation. This enforced evaluation system on a predetermined schedule is first cousin to zero-base budgeting. Zero-base budgeting is the buzz word which came along with President Carter in the United States and which, if hon. members have been following its progression, has not been getting the attention it did only one or two years ago. I think this is because some people in the United States have recognized that this approach can only work under certain circumstances.

Zero-base budgeting means exactly what it says, that each year the manager goes back to zero and builds his program from there. It is a tool to analyse and evaluate project effectiveness, just as this sunset legislation is designed to force analysis and evaluation of projects in Canada. The projects then are ranked and fitted in with the money which is available.

In a Harvard Business Review article entitled "Where does zero-base budgeting work?", James D. Suver and Ray L. Brown quoted the following definition as the most concise:

> Perhaps the essence of zero-base budgeting is simply that an agency provides a defence of its budget request that makes no reference to the level of previous appropriations.

They go on to say that all definitions of ZBB "express one common thought." The manager must be able to justify each activity's projected level of expenditures in total, and no level is taken for granted. They went on to say:

> In this light, zero-base budgeting becomes just another management tool, which can be used to review, analyse and evaluate budget requests.

What is really being discussed in this bill is the development of a management tool, but like zero-base budgeting, the overriding problem is the unwieldy and monumental task of reviewing thousands of what are described as decision packages each year.

● (1630)

Can you imagine the horrendous bottleneck that would be created for the parliamentary process in this country? Every program would have to be treated the same. Members could not simply pick and choose those that tickle their fancy because that, in my opinion, would be a dereliction of duty. Many uninteresting projects are vital to the well-being of our nation and need the same level of attention as the glamour issues. Members therefore would have a tremendous addition to their daily work load which, given the sheer volume, would undermine the fundamental objectives of the program.

But in addition to that criticism of overwhelming volume, there is the very real problem of passing judgment on a whole host of issues that are advanced by extremely talented specialists. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that I would want to have a considerable amount of expertise if I were placed in the position of having to weigh the merits of a program geared to oil resource development or coal resource development, knowing only one of the two could be funded. This is only one example in an almost endless list of possibilities.

Add to that problem of acquiring basic knowledge the companion issue raised by my colleagues: the influence of pressure groups. Suppose that the coal industry had an exceedingly effective organization promoting its interest and that the oil producers, being fragmented by a whole lot of internal bickering, had an ineffective voice. What would happen? Would the judgment of those conducting the reviews be impaired by the selective evidence they would be receiving? Maybe not, but I believe all members would agree that it is possible.

Put that in the context of social services. Would the services for the aged and the poor suffer because they are ill-equipped to mount the kind of pressure that a more wealthy segment of society could mount? Remember, Mr. Speaker, the process requires ranking of priorities to fit within a predetermined financial framework.

From an effectiveness standpoint, then, Mr. Speaker, there is room for concern. Let us look at the efficiency feature. Sunset legislation requires that a re-evaluation take place at a specific time. It does not matter that it is obvious to all concerned that the program is worth-while and should be continued—it must be evaluated. That opens the door to a host of problems, including grandstanding and electioneering on the thin pretext of examining proposed expenditures. It really is not a very efficient way of dealing with the intent of this legislation.

Because of the similarity between sunset legislation and the zero-based budgeting concept practised in the United States, I would like to borrow from their experience. While some find zero-based budgeting a good tool, there is also evidence that many programs receive routine endorsement because there is not time for appropriate evaluation. Some programs never are serious contenders for termination. In Canada, these could include national defence, family allowances and national revenue. No new evaluation system would reverse the perception of the timeliness of these programs, even if inefficiencies were revealed.

I would like to quote some of the comments from those who should know in the United States. Sunset laws, and the zero-based budgeting that it implies, are not magic wands that will solve problems overnight. No one claims that they are. James D. Suver and Ray L. Brown, whom I quoted a moment ago, had this to say:

> But are users of the technique happy with it? Phyrr said that Texas Instruments was happy with it . . . The city of Wilmington, Delaware found it useful and intends to continue using it . . .
> The experience of the Department of Agriculture with its ground-up budget in 1962 was also mixed. Interviews with every high-level person who was intimately involved with the effort revealed that few decisions were made and savings were insignificant. However, other benefits were reported by almost one half of those interviewed . . . The experience of the state of Georgia seems similar. A survey of department heads and their budget analysts concluded that there were three primary advantages associated with that state's use of zero-base budgeting:
> 1. The establishment of a financial planning phase prior to budget preparation.
>
> 2. An improvement in the quality of management information.
>
> 3. An increase in the budget involvement of personnel at the activity level.
>
> The survey cited three disadvantages as well.
> 1. An increase in time and effort, required for budget preparation—"This is a very serious problem."
> 2. A contention that the new system had not significantly affected the allocation of funds . . .

3. An ineffectiveness of the decision-package ranking approach to meet changes in the level of funding.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is the implementation problem. This kind of legislation cannot be introduced overnight and the introduction process presents serious problems.

Senator Muskie, who proposed a sunset law in the United States, is quoted as saying that "pilot testing would inevitably require selecting out certain programs or agencies for the initial trial runs." This, Muskie believes, "would jeopardize the principle of neutrality, thereby conceivably making the process politically unworkable."

As hon. members know, this whole subject of sunset and similar legislation is being examined by the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability. The government will examine closely the findings of that commission and consider carefully any recommendations that may be forthcoming.

I can assure hon. members, however, that this government is too concerned about expenditures and program effectiveness to sit on its collective hands, waiting for a commission report. Many initiatives have already been taken to meet the kind of objectives I believe the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) had in mind when he proposed this legislation. The roles of the Auditor General and the Comptroller General have been defined to ensure a measure of cost-effectiveness adjudication.

Performance measurement would quickly identify programs where the original goals were no longer being met. In the 1977 annual report on this continuing program it was stated that for project-type activities, the following certain basic steps are important:

the establishment of objectives for the project and for each component;

the selection of projects to be undertaken in light of priorities, objectives and available resources;

the development of plans and cost estimates for each project;

the establishment of suitable means for regularly monitoring performance in key areas such as actual-to-estimated costs, actual-to-estimated schedule of completions and actual-to-planned results for each project;

the review or evaluation of results after each project is completed.

That 1977 report goes on as follows:

It is essential that performance measurement be considered an inherent and indispensable part of the program management process, since it provides the feedback that all managers need to control program operations and to render a proper accounting for the public funds entrusted to them.

The regular monitoring of the ongoing performance of programs is an essential element in the government management process, but it is not the whole story. It is necessary to subject programs to periodic, objective evaluations with a view to:

changing and improving the ways in which programs are operated;

clarifying program objectives;

reducing or eliminating programs, or aspects of programs, which have become redundant or of a low priority; identifying programs, or aspects of programs, which may have increased in relative priority.

● (1640)

Treasury Board has recently approved a policy requiring departments and agencies to conduct such evaluation of programs, with the results to be communicated directly to deputy heads of departments and heads of agencies and other appropriate levels of management.

In addition, the Treasury Board secretariat is actively encouraging departments to undertake A-Base reviews. These are internal reviews of the basic programs. The advantage of this system is that it is flexible and selective, overcoming the very serious problem of universality. This program does not, at the present time, provide for any parliamentary involvement but it does indicate the high priority given by the government to evaluation of its programs.

There are plans under way, as was indicated in the recent Speech from the Throne, for parliamentary involvement in program reviews. The government committed itself to providing members with an opportunity to become directly involved in the review process. Naturally, any review—and this includes sunset legislation—of federal programs would be restricted to those over which the federal government has total and exclusive control.

When you are examining federal government expenditures it must be recognized that only $14.3 billion spending estimates of $48.3 billion for 1978-79 are for the direct operations of the federal government. The biggest part of total spending—well over $20 billion—is in transfer payments to individuals and the provinces. Sunset legislation as now proposed could not touch these programs that cross jurisdictional boundaries. That would immediately diffuse any effectiveness that it may have had to offer.

So, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the government does have control mechanisms in place. It is awaiting additional information and recommendations from a royal commission. Sunset legislation hasn't been an unqualified success in other jurisdictions. For all these reasons, and more, I cannot support this legislation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek the consent of the House to go back to that portion of the daily routine of business dealing with introduction of bills, and to seek the consent of the House to waive the required notice so that I can have introduced a bill to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been patiently waiting for the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) to bring in this bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So have we, Mr. Speaker. We are happy to consent to the introduction and first reading of this bill. When that has been done, perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) will indicate whether it is his intention to call it for the second reading debate on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is unanimous consent given?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister could indicate when the bill is to be debated at second reading.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted we will deal with the bill on Monday. It may be that on Monday the parties will not be ready. However, I have asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to be available to deal with the bill on Monday. That is my expectation. We might have a word on Monday morning to see if things are on schedule so that we can deal with it, but that is the plan at the present time.

Mr. Paproski: The Deputy Prime Minister is suggesting that he will be having a House leader's meeting on Monday morning to see if this is agreeable on all sides, whether we can have the debate starting at three o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be in touch. In the event that any party in the House finds it difficult to deal with the bill, I will reconsider whether we should proceed with it on Monday.

CANADA SUNSET ACT

MEASURE TO SUBJECT ALL GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS AND OPERATIONS TO REGULAR REVIEW

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Forrestall that Bill C-214, to establish a sunset law for Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-214 with some trepidation. Perhaps there is no issue in the forefront of the minds of Canadians concerned about the growth and size of government and the responsibilities that governments have taken on, more au courant today, than the issue of sunset laws, some simple way to bring under control the operation of governments at all levels in Canada.

I believe the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) is sincerely one of those wishing to express, through the use of private members' hour and this bill, that he wants a development to come which will effect a better review of government.

I very much appreciate the comments of my friend the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard), a few moments ago. I might not be as generous as he in saying that all of the current structures are completely efficient and that we cannot improve upon them. However, even in the tone of his speech and knowing this member as a wise man, he will agree that we always want to improve. I agreed with him that we cannot find this bill, its wording and rather all-encompassing nature, to be the answer. On the surface this legislation appears to embody a good idea, one that has merit in practice, and certainly one that has appeal to the general public. As I said, that is why I have some trepidation. However, after you scratch through the shiny surface, the effects of this legislation are not nearly as desirable. In fact it is shot through with potential problems and, in the few minutes available to me, I would like to draw hon. members' attention to a few of the shortcomings.

In the review process leading to the dissolution or continuation of a government organization, the proposed legislation sets out some key bases that must be touched in considering the future of an organization. These include internal and external assessments on the continuing value of the organization. One of the principal problems that is readily apparent is that any organization subject to the proposed sunset legislation would be vulnerable to the influence of pressure groups. The existence of these various groups that promote or oppose certain government activities is, of course, a good and necessary part of a democratic society.

In fact increasingly in Canada we are finding more and more organized lobbies, groups representing various industries and various sectors of society organizing themselves to lobby the government. That is a good exercise, although I have some personal concern that we might, as the Americans have already done before, formalize the relationship of these lobby groups with governments and members of parliament. The danger I see here, however, is that well-orchestrated and finely tuned campaigns by wealthy or well-funded pressure groups could unduly influence the decision-making process.

An organization which serves a segment of the population well may not have the kind of polished support that many pressure groups can mount. What safeguards are built into this proposal to protect the right of those ill-equipped to protect their own? I do not see any in the legislation, Mr. Speaker.

We could have a situation where a pressure group, campaigning for its own, narrow self-interest, could force the continuation—or the cancellation, depending on the circumstances—of a program that does not have broad support within the community. The results could be detrimental to a large number of Canadians.

As well, Mr. Speaker, the review process is tailor-made for reliving battles won or lost in earlier legislative skirmishes. This possibility becomes particularly likely in periods of minority government where individuals or parties could resurrect issues long resolved. Think of some of the legislation that has been passed in this House in recent years, legislation that was long fought and took up many weeks of the time of the House. I am sure some members on the opposite side are proud because they forced reforms and amendments in order finally to have their support or not have them further delay it. When you imagine that under this proposed legislation everything would have to come up for review at a regular time, how completely damaging it would be to the process and how frustrating to the public and to us in trying to carry out our job.

● (1650)

In this respect, what concerns me most is that it is much easier to terminate a program than to start one. It's much easier to delay a project than to speed it on its way. You can readily see, Mr. Speaker, how the procedures proposed in this legislation could lead to endless political haggling and a very unproductive government organization.

One might ask why would it be unproductive? During the entire period that its future is in jeopardy, an organization's effectiveness would be impaired. Projects or activities couldn't be undertaken because there would be no assurance that they could be completed. Good staff, faced with the prospect of unemployment should the organization be dissolved, would tend to seek alternative employment, creating both a staffing and a morale problem. Constant uncertainty would influence every decision and every undertaking.

The whole review process would also create major and serious problems for hon. members themselves, because to avoid criticism of bias or discrimination all programs would have to be treated in an equal manner.

Each decision to continue or to terminate a program is extremely important; this means, then, that every program would require an exhaustive and painstaking review by hon. members. The immediate effect would be a tremendous addition to the parliamentary workload. Members who already are pressed to meet their diverse responsibilities as elected representatives would suddenly find themselves with a whole new onerous workload. And the responsibility to participate actively in each review could not easily be sloughed off. Each decision would be simply too important.

The proposal would force us to bring back a number of issues which were extremely controversial and, when they resurfaced, all of us would have to consider seriously participating in the discussions surrounding those reviews in order to protect ourselves in the light of the stands we took earlier with regard to the legislation originally.

There is no question that parliament's workload would rise dramatically and could easily reach the point at which the legislative process would be impeded by the review of organizations whose mandate had expired. The cumulative effect of this process is obvious: the greater the workload, the more superficial the review. Meanwhile the pressure upon us to act responsibly while making such reviews would increase, as would the impact of lobby forces, some of them, perhaps, with a selfish interest with regard to a piece of legislation not broadly understood or of broad appeal, giving them the ability to cause great damage to the intentions of parliament when it earlier passed the legislation.

That, Mr. Speaker, is no reflection on any member of the House but, rather, it is a hard and real fact of life. This factor alone seriously undermines the intended effectiveness of this legislation and is sufficient grounds for me to oppose the bill now before us.

There is another feature of this legislation that is worrisome. It is one that became extremely obvious to me during the expenditure reduction exercise undertaken by this government last summer. You will recall, of course, Mr. Speaker, that many projects and programs were designated for reduction or elimination as a result of the government's need to cut spending.

What was the reaction of Canadians? As I recall, virtually everyone heartily endorsed the principle of reduced government spending. We should have lower taxes. There should be fewer public servants. Of course there should be lower spending. Of course the bureaucracy had become too large. Of course we must be more efficient, there should be fewer public servants. That was the reaction. Then the details became available, and what a hue and cry went up across this land! Everybody was riding his hobby horse. Those who are dedicated and important supporters of the arts campaigned to cut some other program rather than the ones which directly affected them. Those in one affected industry were prepared to sacrifice another in their place, and so on.

The point of this, Mr. Speaker, is that it is virtually impossible to obtain a consensus among Canadians on what the federal government should be doing for them. It is because it is impossible to obtain such a consensus that the House of Commons has such an important function to perform. That is the reality, that is why we are here. After the government has put forward its proposals we, as backbenchers on this side must decide whether we can support it, whether we ought to press for changes in caucus if we believe there ought to be adjustment, or if our constituents press for change and, in turn, the opposition, with their particular interests or in accordance with their party philosophy, can press for change.

A program or policy that lacks visible appeal is doomed at the outset under this bill before its long-term ramifications can even be considered. I am afraid that too often we, as Canadians, are a basically selfish people and that we only look at measures which have the capacity to affect us directly. What chance of survival would some of our environmental programs have had, for example, had they been subject to sunset legislation? Under the economic crunch of the last year or two many good programs brought in a decade ago might have fallen by the wayside.

I am sympathetic to the concept of this legislation. It is not new and it is not without redeeming qualities. I believe, however, that it requires more research to determine the benefits and the liabilities, to judge the effects on worth-while programs now in place, and to evaluate whether this is the best approach to dealing with the problem of programs that have outlived their usefulness.

In point of fact, some of the mechanisms to deal with these very questions are already in place. The government, through the expanded role of the Auditor General and through the work of the Comptroller General, has procedures that can be used to measure the effectiveness of various programs. And this government has a reasonably good history of phasing out programs that have outlived their effectiveness or replacing them with new ones that more directly meet the needs of Canadians.

Some recent examples come readily to mind. The Anti-Inflation Board is being wrapped up, with the continuing part of its program going to another agency where fewer people with a different mandate can do the job. The Neighborhood Improvement Program and the Bank Act are examples where termination was an integral part of the over-all plans. Further, there was a reiteration in the Speech from the Throne of the government's intention to ensure that a close watch on its myriad projects was being kept and to transfer certain programs to the private sector where appropriate. The government also made a commitment to provide parliament with the opportunity to review evaluations of major programs which ensures that hon. members have an on-going opportunity to be part of a review process.

But this is on a selective basis. There isn't the pressure to which I alluded earlier where every program would have to be reviewed. Parliament can build its review into the continuing work of hon. members, filling the dual need for selectivity and for making the review process a viable opportunity.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I see an admitted need for an orderly, systematic review of government programs. There are some programs which have outlived or will outlive their effectiveness. However, the government has procedures to ferret out those programs whose effectiveness is open to question, and it has procedures for eliminating those no longer necessary.

I believe members of parliament themselves have, as a major function, the task of directing attention to government programs which they believe need to be removed or improved. The bill identifies a genuine problem. Many of us share the concerns of the hon. member who has brought this measure forward, but I am afraid that a general application of the sunset principle would be too all-embracing. If I might play a little with the word "sunset", I am afraid this kind of a sunset law may indeed lead to a nightmare.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at the outset that in putting forward this bill the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) is certainly responding to a deeply held belief among the public, which is that governments should do more and be less. There is concern about the inflationary effects of over-regulation and that the heavy hand of government might limit enterprise and innovation, but while I am sympathetic to the hon. member's wish for greater efficiency and more care about the expenditure of tax dollars, I share the concerns which have been expressed by my colleagues, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), about the particular method proposed.

There is a lack of flexibility because sunset legislation requires that every program and every department be reviewed on specific dates and times, even if everyone agrees that they are operating effectively, and the more programs which have to be reviewed, the less likely it is that there will be in-depth examinations.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT REVERSE DECISION TO SELL OR CLOSE CERTAIN GRAIN ELEVATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter or urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the decision of the government to sell five inland grain elevators in the prairie provinces and a port elevator at Prince Rupert, British Columbia, and in light of the fact that such decision has been made at a time when record utilization and profits are being experienced by the terminals in Saskatchewan and pitifully small offers have been received on the tenders for these elevators, and in the case of the government elevator in Saskatoon no bid at all was received, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House directs the government to reverse its wrong-headed decision to sell or close the five inland grain elevators and the port elevator at Prince Rupert, British Columbia, as the sale for closing of the said elevators at this time can only have a negative effect on grain handling and transportation in western Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If by chance he is not, my friend, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), will do so. Did the Deputy Prime Minister say yes, or no?

Mr. MacEachen: I said no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House (a) notes that this is National Heritage Day, (b) regrets that legislation to make this day a holiday has not yet been passed, and (c) expresses the hope that whatever government is in power later this year will support such legislation so that all Canadians can enjoy a February holiday and be reminded of the richness of our national heritage.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT RESPECTING RURAL ROUTE MAIL CARRIER CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on an urgent matter of public importance.

On March 17, 1978, the Postmaster General admitted in the House that rural route mail carriers, in the face of continuing inflation, are suffering because of the $10,000 ceiling imposed on rural contracts, and promised that steps would be taken to amend the Post Office Act with a view to ending this discriminatory practice. Because of the government's failure to act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Postmaster General introduce at the earliest possible opportunity an amendment to the Post Office Act designed to remedy this long-standing injustice, as promised by him and his predecessors over the past few years.

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs is in Toronto today demonstrating how worried the government is in facing the people without a policy of mortgage deductibility. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

The cutbacks in supplies of foreign crude oil to east coast refineries means the possibility of an energy crisis in Nova Scotia and eastern Canada. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

Canadians, along with all civilized peoples of the world, were stunned by the completely unprovoked and barbaric attack on a civilian Rhodesian aircraft one week ago today which resulted in the death of all 59 children, women and men aboard. This was the second such savage attack in a few months, the first resulting in the massacre of 48 innocents. I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this assembly join with Great Britain and the United States to unequivocally condemn this heinous crime as admitted to by Joshua Nkomo's Patriotic Front Alliance, and that we assure the citizens of Rhodesia that Canada supports and encourages their sincere efforts toward the establishment of a civilized and democratic nation where all may live without fear of recrimination or terrorism.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT FORECASTS OF RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my initial question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister, who undoubtedly has noted the 8.9 per cent inflation level revealed today in Statistics Canada figures.

When the Prime Minister announced his control program and anti-inflation program in October, 1975, he indicated that the inflation level would be 4 per cent by October last year. Would the Prime Minister now tell the House what, in effect, went wrong, bearing in mind that in each of the years 1976, 1977 and 1978 the Americans had consistently lower inflation than we in this country and each of the other main OECD countries, such as Great Britain, Italy and France, had consistently declining inflation levels while our inflation rate consistently went up? What went wrong?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am genuinely surprised that the hon. member should ask that question. He spent the major part of last week telling the government and the people that when the Canadian dollar fell, it had a very drastic effect upon the rate of inflation in Canada. He has given the answer to his own question. I think the hon. member should read over the questions which he posed last week and he will see. He indicated the degree to which inflation had gone up because of the lower dollar level, and that is true.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister who last Thursday and once again today conceded, in reply to my question, the impact of the falling dollar on inflation: he indicated that one of the effects of the falling dollar is an increase in the cost of living in Canada.

Is the government now going to correct its faulty fiscal stance which is causing the fall of the dollar and the consumer consequences we are now seeing because of rising inflation? In short, it is not enough to stand in the House and say, "Don't blame us for inflation; it is the falling dollar". What will he do about the falling dollar?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand there is only a difference of degree but not of principle between the hon. member and us. He wants a 90-cent dollar and it is an 84-cent dollar. But the effect would be the same: a 90-cent dollar would have a negative effect on the cost of living in Canada.

The hon. member wants to know what we can do. We know what they would do: they would have an increased deficit, and that is not our answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PLANS FOR POST-AIB MONITORING PERIOD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, based on the expenditure figures which will become public later this afternoon we can see the astounding deficit the government is leading us into.

Again I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Last Thursday, he indicated that the federal government had other plans for the post-AIB monitoring period, that is, other plans than the setting up of the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity. Would he reveal to the House what these other plans are, and is the government now considering instituting them in view of the fact that inflation is obviously getting out of control again?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the answer was given in answer to a question by the hon. member for Windsor West who was asking if we were prepared to give some stronger investigative powers to the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, and I said we were considering this.

STRATEGY TO CURB RISING FOOD PRICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the consumer price index today identified sharp increases in food prices, confirming the prediction of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs last week wherein he predicted food prices would go up 14 per cent over the next few months, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government has a food strategy to deal with rising food prices as suggested by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in Winnipeg last week and, if so, when are we going to hear about it and how far will food prices rise before the government acts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member shares with us the belief that the producers of food in Canada should be encouraged to reach the stage of stability but that they should not be controlled either during the period of controls or between periods of controls. The producer is left free and we have never attempted to control his produce at the farm gate. He sells on a free market.

In so far as what happens to the food after that is concerned, the hon. member knows that we held a study into the processors and distributors and it was not found that there were excess profits there.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting to the Prime Minister that we should reimpose controls, because we saw how ineffective they were. What I am asking the Prime Minister is, does the government intend to produce a co-ordinated food strategy, given the fact that we have at least five government departments actively involved in this area, each one acting separately and each one influencing the food component under the CPI? This needs co-ordination and obviously someone has to step in between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Agriculture. Will the Prime Minister say whether or not there is going to be this kind of co-ordination within the government so we will know where we are going in terms of food policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been following this subject, he would recall that there was a meeting here in Ottawa not only with the ministers involved but also with the various producers and distributors. They discussed this matter. I would remind the hon. member that about 30 per cent of the food we consume is imported and those prices are affected, as I was telling the hon. member for York-Simcoe, by the falling dollar. That is one of the main causes of food prices having gone up.

As the hon. member knows, one of the main reasons the food index has gone up this month over last month is the importation of fresh fruits and vegetables. Naturally, if in the winter you want to import such things from southern climes, you must pay a premium because of the fall of the Canadian dollar.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STEPS TO ENSURE REDUCTIONS IN SALES TAX PASSED ON TO CONSUMERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could direct one final supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who seems to be more realistic than the Prime Minister in terms of his predictions.

In another area affecting the CPI, a non-food area, we have noticed an increase in the price of automobiles notwithstanding the fact that the government has already decreased by three points the federal sales tax on automobiles. What has the minister done to monitor this situation to ensure that this reduction in federal sales tax on automobiles and on other hard goods is, in fact, being passed on to the consumer, as there would appear to be evidence here, with automobile prices going up, that the reduction is not being passed on?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I want to correct the hon. member in respect of his question to the Prime Minister. I never said food prices would go up by 14 per cent in a few months; I said the increase would be from 12 per cent to 14 per cent, year over year, in the next few months and 9 per cent to 10 per cent for the total year at the end of the year. That is a very gross misrepresentation, which is not unusual for the hon. member.

It is interesting to note that the non-food part of the consumer price index in fact declined over the past month. Furniture and clothing prices declined in that particular index. The main reason for the increase in the CPI is, as the Prime Minister stated, with respect to food, electricity and gasoline. With respect to those items on which we removed the sales tax, there has been a general decline—

● (1425)

Mr. Stevens: Car prices are up.

Mr. Allmand: —in the prices of those commodities. So far, the sales tax cut has been a success.

SPREAD BETWEEN PRICES PAID TO FARMERS AND THOSE PAID BY CONSUMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Prime Minister has talked about food prices for farmers—we agree with his remarks in that regard—about the high price of imported foods.

I would like to ask the minister about the spread between the price the farmer gets for his produce and what the consumer pays for food produced in Canada. For example, in Winnipeg in the week of February 9, the year over year price increase which farmers received for chicken and turkey was seven cents a pound, but the consumer paid an extra 49 cents a pound for chicken and 36 cents a pound for turkey.

The minister has said many times that he would investigate this matter. I would like to ask, once and for all, what does he intend to do about it? Why are the farmers and consumers being ripped-off?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance last summer did request that the AIB do a study on price spreads or price-profit spreads in the food industry. The study was carried out by them and report was made in the fall. The report indicated that there was no exceptional profiteering and that there was really no change in the profit margins in the food industry.

However, within recent months new evidence may have come to light. Anybody who has such evidence is encouraged to send it along to the director of investigations to see if there is any price-fixing or rigging of the marketplace whatever. I have referred the complaints of the hon. member to the director of investigations. But if it is something which does not come under the Combines Investigation Act, all we can do at the moment, since we are not in controls, is to try to analyse the reasons for these price increases and to bring moral pressure to bear if they are unusual.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the farmer receives an extra seven cents a pound and the consumer pays an extra 49 cents a pound. Who is doing the monitoring in the minister's department? These figures are readily available to anyone.

The price of bread, as the minister must know, has gone up by about 10 cents or 12 cents a loaf, while the component cost, namely, the subsidy which the minister in charge of the Wheat Board took away from us, amounted to 3.5 cents a loaf. The minister said that he would look into this matter as well. Is the minister satisfied that the bakeries and bread companies are justified in raising the price by ten cents or more a loaf, and if he is satisfied with that increase, would he table the evidence?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the principal price monitoring group in the government is not within my department but under CSIP, which has replaced the AIB at the recommendation of the provinces. We refer different price increases to that group for analysis.

With respect to the price of bread, our prediction was that bread prices would increase by about six cents to seven cents a loaf as a result of the removal of the bread subsidy, and that was done in January. It is too early yet to know what companies are charging beyond that, and for what reasons.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if that minister has control of anything. The input costs went up by approximately 3.5 cents. The Mallon report which was produced two or three years ago said that consumers in our country were paying up to 7 per cent more than they should because of the tremendous corporate concentration in the retail market.

Would the minister tell the House whether he is considering a policy statement or bringing a bill into the House which will break up the tremendous concentration which the retail stores enjoy in this country, particularly in western Canada?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, this government has brought in three bills to deal with concentration, and we did not receive much support from either the hon. member's party or the official opposition.

Mr. Crosbie: Or the Prime Minister: he chopped it.

Mr. Allmand: I brought in Bill C-13 last fall to deal with concentrations, mergers and competition policy. I cannot remember one occasion on which the hon. member's party co-operated with us in proceeding with that bill.

ENERGY

ALLEGED REDUCTIONS IN QUEBEC DELIVERIES OF HOME HEATING OIL BY GOLDEN EAGLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could the minister tell the House whether there is any truth behind the reports heard during the weekend in the Quebec City area about the rationing of home heating oil? Has the minister been officially advised about that possibility? This morning it was stated during a discussion on radio that Golden Eagle was reducing by 70 per cent its deliveries to independent distributors. Is the minister aware of that situation?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have been made aware of the situation by representations from my own party and from the independent fuel marketers.

The situation has been a tight one, is a tight one and will probably continue to be a tight, difficult one for some little while. The problem has been aggravated not just by a cold winter but by serious difficulties with some of the eastern refiners. For example, the hon. member will have noted that the Gulf refinery in Montreal had a fire last week that reduced production by close to 40,000 barrels per day. There have also been difficulties with the Imperial Oil refinery and the Shell refinery in Montreal.

Special efforts have been made by the refineries, I have been assured by them, to bring heating oil into the market. For example, some of the crude that was recently offloaded at Point Tupper will be reloaded on to a tanker and moved up to Golden Eagle, close to Quebec City, and will be processed there and then moved into the Montreal market.

A number of measures of this kind are being used by the eastern refiners right now to try to improve the situation. We are doing our best to ensure that the independent marketers are being looked after by the refiners and that the refiners, for example, are not trying to secure new customers at this time but are continuing to look after the resellers so that they can look after their traditional customers.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Given his answer, the minister is surely aware of the serious situation. Just the same I should like to ask him a supplementary question. Considering that families without central heating are more seriously affected as a result of conditions experienced by independent dealers because families that use a small furnace commonly called a space heater do not have large tanks to hold supplies for several weeks but usually a 45-gallon tank which does not last long, will the minister consider taking other steps to make sure that retailers can have sufficient heating oil to meet the needs of families whose heating systems are such as I have just described.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we will continue to maintain our pressure on the refiners to ensure that the resellers have the oil so that they can look after the kind of situations, the difficult situations, the hardship situations, that the hon. member has referred to.

INDUSTRY

DETRIMENTAL EFFECT OF US COUNTERVAILING DUTY ON ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

As the minister knows, some 70 per cent of our exports go to the United States and we have a huge deficit of manufactured end products. The United States treasury department has just imposed a 9 per cent duty on Honeywell Limited for exporting an optical sensing system to the United States, on the grounds that this is a countervailing tariff and that Honeywell had been subsidized because they had received a PAIT research and development grant from the minister's department which is now included in the enterprise development program.

I want to ask the minister if the government has assisted Honeywell in their case so far. Are they going to see that the case is appealed? Is the government protesting to the United States government against this spurious countervailing duty on that ground, and if this situation is maintained by the United States government does it put the whole enterprise development assistance program for Canadian industry in danger?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): First of all, Mr. Speaker, it does not put the whole enterprise development program in danger. Second, we are assisting Honeywell and we are bringing as much protest against the United States government for their action in this case as possible.

Third, we have a surplus in manufactured goods of $3.5 billion; that is, over-all with the United States and the rest of the world.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, we have a deficit in our balance of payments and current account of over $12 billion in manufactured end products. The minister cannot get around that.

May I put a supplementary question. The grant that the Honeywell corporation received was for research and development purposes. That has now been held to be a subsidy as contributing to assist them in introducing a commercially successful product on the market.

Will the minister tell the House whether he is going to attempt to restructure those kinds of grants to get around this problem? Second, is the minister, or the government, in the talks at GATT, making any effort to see that if they are successful, the United States government will no longer have the power to use this countervailing duty situation without at least proof of injury? Is there likely to be a successful end to that negotiation at Geneva? That, I believe, is one of the main points in dispute.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are negotiating at Geneva what breaks down to about four different kinds of applications of non-tariff barriers and this is one of them. I believe we can look forward to a successful conclusion of that aspect of the Geneva negotiations—that there will be an agreement signed by the participants to some kind of control over the application of non-tariff barriers.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question. The minister seemed to indicate that he did not need to restructure the PAIT type of grant of the enterprise development assistance program. Could he indicate to the House why it does not need to be restructured, in view of this finding by the United States treasury department? Surely some action has to be taken if this decision by the United States treasury department sticks.

Mr. Horner: I do not believe we have to restructure the PAIT form of grant, because it is the wish of this government to encourage research and development in Canada as much as possible. Research and development is really a very small portion of the manufacturing cost of the product.

If we could get Canadian companies—I think it is our ambition to get something even as small as 2 per cent or 2.5 per cent—to spend this amount on research and development, then we could see our manufacturing industry enlarged a great deal. We do not believe it is the small expenditure on research and development that the Canadian government contributes that is so injurious to our good neighbours to the south.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT CROWN CORPORATIONS MAKE PAYMENTS EQUAL TO COMMERCIAL OCCUPATION RATE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. The minister has announced today that the Municipal Grants Act would be amended to increase significantly the grants in lieu of taxes. Among other things, the minister has indicated that no grant would be paid in lieu of business taxes, except in the case of Crown corporations. Could the minister advise us of the steps he will take to convince these Crown corporations to pay grants equal to commercial occupation rates?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we shall deal with this piece of legislation when it is introduced in the House in a few days. We shall then have a full debate on it. I suggest it is important that all federal institutions should pay real estate taxes. As to sales tax and business surtax, the problem is indeed very different and complicated, and we shall have the opportunity to deal with it when the bill comes before the House.

AIR TRANSPORT

INVESTIGATIONS INTO ACCIDENTS INVOLVING HELICOPTERS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Considering that there has, as yet, been no final report from the helicopter accident north of Revelstoke in which four glacier skiers were killed a year ago, and following last week's avalanche south of Golden, British Columbia, in which seven people died, can the minister indicate whether a new inquiry has been instituted into the most recent accident?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether that step has been taken at this point. Obviously, we will be concerned to determine the facts and I will be looking at the manner of the investigation as soon as possible.

Mr. Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider, or has he considered, initiating a broader investigation involving the other federal departments that are interested, the provincial level of governments, the ski and guiding associations and the companies operating the heli-skiing industry as well as other interested groups and individuals, and that such an inquiry be a public inquiry?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will determine whether the more formal sort of consultation which the hon. member suggests would be an improvement on an informal one.

STATISTICS CANADA

VOLUNTARY RESPONSES TO STATSCAN SURVEYS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. During the House of Commons debate on February 22, 1977, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

> This government is not opposed in principle to the concept of making the response to certain official statistical surveys voluntary.

He said, further, that the possibility of introducing voluntary responses to some Statistics Canada surveys was under examination by officials of the department. Does the Liberal government still hold this view? If so, when will such legislation be forthcoming?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government still holds that view; and it will be forthcoming soon, in this session. In fact, I hope to have that included in a piece of legislation that will be put before the House later.

CHARGES LAID UNDER SECTION 29 OF THE STATISTICS ACT

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, recently in a test case the Crown unsuccessfully prosecuted one of my constituents for violating section 29 of the Statistics Act. It is now further persecuting my constituent by appealing that very just decision of the courts.

Will the minister advise, or recommend to the Crown attorneys prosecuting Canadians accused of section 29 violations to enter a stay of proceedings or drop the charges until the strict compliance issue is resolved?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the hon. member expects us to use the question period as a time for representations of that sort.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's response would he consider, if he has not already done so, implementing the provisions of private member's bill C-452 that I have before the House? This would amend the Statistics Act by removing the penalty provisions in section 29 which can be imposed against Canadians who refuse to answer questions on Statistics Canada surveys. I claim no pride of ownership; I will be glad to share that idea with the minister.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that Statistics Canada has a very important purpose to serve in our country. Its statistics are widely used by many facets of Canadian industry. They are taken and collected under the strictest and most confidential methods possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Just like the income tax.

Mr. Horner: The other point I want to make is this: Statistics Canada is an independent body. It does not answer to the wishes, particularly of a political person, at any time. It wants to make an accurate study of the economic facts in Canada. If hon. members would like, I will send them a copy of this booklet put out by Statistics Canada, called "Doorstep Diplomacy"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: —in which the guidelines are clearly outlined. There are eight guidelines, and I would like to read one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Wenman.]

An hon. Member: Scare us.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Miss MacDonald: I appreciate the minister's lengthy explanation, but it was not in response to the question I posed. I would like to ask if he will, indeed, do something about the penalty provisions in section 29 of the Statistics Act, which only House of Commons parliamentary procedures can change, so that people who do not feel they should answer these surveys do not have fines or the penalty of imprisonment imposed on them. That is the question.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, one thing that I have noticed after a lengthy parliamentary career—

An hon. Member: It will soon be over, Jack.

Mr. Horner: —is that Statistics Canada is being taken and accepted by people of Canada as if it were the Bible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: If Statistics Canada print a figure, everybody believes it must be accurate. Everybody accepts the fact that it is accurate beyond a shadow of a doubt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member's suggestion might seriously erode the ability of Statistics Canada to maintain the level of accuracy for which it has become so highly respected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

POWERS OF MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like to congratulate him on his signing of the Maritime Energy Corporation agreement with the maritime provinces.

Mr. Crosbie: Author?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We did not know you could read.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The opposition judges others by themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Will this new corporation be empowered to ensure future petroleum supplies for the maritimes? Will it be able to enter into arrangements with Petro-Canada to prevent the kind of high-handed, unconscionable acts of diversion attempted by Exxon and its Canadian puppet, Imperial Oil?

Mr. MacKay: Read the bill.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Maritime Energy Corporation will be an extremely important corporation to the maritimes and to Canada. Quite clearly, it is placing collective and joint action ahead of the earlier "go it alone" policy. I believe because the corporation will be working with the three maritime provinces and the federal government together, it will be possible to establish a secured energy source for the maritimes and increasingly build upon the indigenous energy sources of the maritimes. Therefore the maritimes will become less vulnerable and less dependent on foreign oil.

As hon. members know, foreign oil is used for some of the electrical generation in the maritimes. I believe that the Maritime Energy Corporation will, over a period of time, make the maritimes less dependent on imported oil.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to that nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF OIL SHIPMENT DIVERSIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last Friday, the minister told the House that he knew nothing of the diversion from Canada by Exxon of some 25,000 barrels of Venezuelan oil. Saturday's paper contains a reply from Imperial Oil Company as follows:

A company spokesman said a senior energy department official knew of the plan on January 24, as did the National Energy Board.

This is in direct contradiction of the minister's statement that he knew nothing about the matter until February 8. In view of the very serious nature of this apparent contradiction, has the minister investigated which senior departmental official received this information? If he knows who it was, has that official been removed, since it is the very height of incompetence that important information like that should have been kept from the minister for two solid weeks?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member may be overstating the situation by attaching more importance than it deserves to the allegation as reported in the press. I believe that there was some preliminary discussion in the sense that it was possible that a situation could develop with respect to diversionary tactics. I think that information may well have been conveyed to my department at one time.

The hon. member is right when he says that on January 24 there was a letter that went—I believe from Imperial Oil—to the National Energy Board dealing with a diversionary plan, or some words to that effect. But the hon. member also knows, of course, that the National Energy Board is an independent board. The National Energy Board makes its own decisions and takes its own counsel in these matters. There is no reason for the National Energy Board, for example, to seek my advice on this or ask me to sign or agree to any measures of this kind; nor did they.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the National Energy Board is not only a regulatory body, but under the terms of its act it is the minister's adviser on energy matters and therefore it is taken for granted that there is a constant and continuing liaison between the minister's office and the National Energy Board in order that the minister may be aware of what is happening, and in view of the fact that a curtailment of 25,000 barrels a day constituted a serious threat to the well-being of many Canadians, will the minister explain why it was that the information which was passed, not only to a senior official but also to the National Energy Board, was not conveyed to him? Either there has been a gross dereliction of duty or the minister has been incompetent in conducting the affairs of his department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Both.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to information which was conveyed to the National Energy Board. It is not at all clear, as I had an opportunity just recently—within the past few hours—to read that particular information. They were not talking about 25,000 barrels a day. That does not come across at all. If one looks at that particular submission, it comes across somewhere in the order of about 10,000 barrels a day. It was not until January 8, that I have mentioned—the Thursday—that a delegation from Imperial Oil came to see me and presented to me, in my office, this plan about the 25,000 or 30,000 barrels a day. To the best of my knowledge, that was the first I ever heard of it. I told them it was quite unacceptable. The date was Thursday, February 8.

INQUIRY WHETHER DREE REPRESENTED IN MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the Maritime Energy Corporation. Is DREE to be represented in the newly-formed Maritime Energy Corporation, and will the federal financial commitment be sufficient to lower or stabilize electric energy costs in the maritimes?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): I believe the corporation will do just that. I believe it will help stabilize electric energy costs and that it will provide more secure energy at lower cost than any alternative. As to the composition of the board of directors and whether DREE will be represented by a member of the board, that is a matter which is presently under discussion.

Mr. Howie: Can the minister tell the House when he plans to let the provinces know the cost-sharing formula with respect to Lepreau, Fundy and similar projects which the corporation might undertake?

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, indeed. At three o'clock I shall be tabling the memorandum of understanding reached between myself and the three maritime premiers. That memorandum sets forth the cost-sharing arrangements with respect to Lepreau.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO S.O. 43 MOTION PROPOSED EARLIER TODAY

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that several members of the government refused unanimous consent to my proposed motion under Standing Order 43—

Mr. Corbett: Is this to be taken by the free nations of the world as meaning that the government condones such murder and crime?

MANPOWER

SHORT-TERM WORK PERMITS FOR FOREIGN NATIONALS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It arises from the fact that much of Canada's production equipment is foreign-built and that Canadian business often has to rely on quick advice or on-site repair by foreign nationals when it has to be repaired.

[Mr. Howie.]

Has the minister instructed his officials to issue short-term permits to these foreign nationals in such circumstances, so that the economy can be kept rolling?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): We deal with these cases on an individual basis. Sometimes we are criticized because we allow the entry of foreign nationals to operate a piece of equipment and subsequently they stay to work on the equipment and do jobs that Canadians could do.

However, when we are satisfied that the request concerns a piece of equipment covered, for example, by a patent which has to be kept secret, or in cases where there is no time to find a Canadian to work on the operation, then we issue a temporary permit and do everything we can to accommodate the business.

Mr. Epp: That is the precise problem, Mr. Speaker. By the time the department, through its officials, has investigated whether a short-term work permit should be granted, so much production time has been wasted that Canadian employees are in danger of being laid off.

Requests have been made by various companies that a different system be introduced under which, if requests are made to local Manpower officials, quick investigation can take place and foreign nationals can be brought in should they be needed. It makes no sense whatever to wait for the bureaucratic machinery to unwind while production equipment is idle.

Mr. Cullen: If the hon. member has specific cases in mind, we shall be happy to look at them. Nevertheless, we do have an obligation to see that Canadians are employed if there are Canadians available who can do the work required. We must be vigilant to see that such requests are not used as a dodge to secure the employment of non-Canadians, but we do our best to accommodate companies when the circumstances warrant it.

AIR TRANSPORT

INVESTIGATION INTO VIOLATIONS OF AIR SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On his own admission, Bill C-40 which he has introduced and relates to the transport accident investigation commission is not likely to be given too high a priority before the election, and even if it were given priority we would probably be looking at a lead time of about two years before an accident investigation branch could be set up.

This being the case, what does the government intend to do in the interim period, which could amount to as long as three or four years, possibly, to alleviate the concern of the Canadian flying public about violations of air safety which have occurred and which have been in the news recently?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Let me make it clear that if the House could see its way to give early passage to this bill, I would be delighted. In that sense, I think it is an important bill. It is in the context of the general delaying tactics that I see in the House on the part of the opposition that I am bound to conclude that it would not pass very quickly.

I am surprised, however, that the hon. member does not know that we have set up an accident review board to investigate air accidents, so we have taken the steps open to us in the absence of legislation.

Mr. Murta: The accident review board has obviously not been working very well. The minister knows quite well that the proposition he mentioned a few minutes ago is totally false. He never approached anybody on this side with regard to speeding this legislation along.

What does he intend to do in the interim, given the fact that it could take up to two years before this legislation, even if it was passed, could be made effective?

Mr. Lang: I do not agree it would take so long. I think we could get the legislation in place fairly quickly, say before the end of 1979, and move to set up the commission rapidly.

The hon. member says I did not approach anyone on that side with regard to the bill. Perhaps not, with regard to this particular bill, but I did get word from the spokesman on transportation for the Conservative party they would not let anything through unless we let them travel first throughout the country.

STATISTICS CANADA

SURVEY OF FAMILY EXPENDITURES—NECESSITY THEREFOR

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as the minister responsible for Statistics Canada.

Bearing in mind the concern expressed by many members of the House over many months about the Statistics Canada survey of family expenditures which may amount to a major imposition on one in every 25 Canadian families, has the hon. gentleman taken any action to ascertain whether this survey is necessary, fair and reasonable?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Let me first of all correct some false impressions. The survey is not exclusively directed to those receiving family allowances. It is directed to one in every 550 people in the labour force, not one in 25. It is intended to cover some 13,000 or 14,000 households. About 14 surveys of this type have been carried out by Statistics Canada throughout the years. It is absolutely necessary, in order to keep in balance the consumer price index upon which so many people in industry, and elsewhere, depend.

• (1500)

I have advised Statistics Canada people not to press hard on anyone who does not want to answer, but merely to let such people be dropped from the list. I have been assured that that is the procedure Statistics Canada has employed. Statistics Canada is getting about an 80 per cent response, with which Statistics Canada is very satisfied.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING OF OUTREACH PROGRAM

Mr. Yuri Shymko (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. My question is with regard to public petitions to reconsider the recent decision by the regional review committee to stop further funding for the Outreach program in Parkdale, which now has the third highest rate of unemployment of the 23 ridings in Toronto. Could the minister state—

INDUSTRY

LOSS OF JOBS IN CANADA DUE TO DECISIONS OF FOREIGN PARENT CORPORATIONS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the recent decision by National Steel Corporation of the United States to close the Moose Mountain iron ore mine in Capreol, Ontario, will result in the loss of some 250 jobs, and in view of reports indicating that the Canadian steel industry is so busy it cannot even meet the orders it is getting, can the minister explain to the House what steps his department has taken to make sure that the decision which has been made in the boardrooms of a foreign company does not affect these 250 jobs?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Moose Mountain mine at Capreol is, indeed, owned by the National Steel Corporation of the United States. That mine was producing about 650,000 tons of pelleted iron ore per year. In 1977, the National Steel Corporation of the United States increased production at its iron ore mine in the United States from something a little over two million tons of pelleted iron ore to something over five million tons.

That was a tremendous increase in production in the United States. That created a situation in which the 650,000 tons from Canada were not needed. My officials have met with the management of the mine and will be meeting shortly with Ontario government officials to try to find out whether iron ore pellets could be sent to some other steel mill in Canada.

STATISTICS ACT

RESPONSES TO STATSCAN SURVEYS—REQUEST PENALTY CLAUSES BE REMOVED FROM LEGISLATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who has now indicated that in one case he will allow Canadians who do not want to answer requests from Statistics Canada to be, in his words, dropped from the list. Is that policy going to be applied generally and, if so, why does the minister not agree to remove the penalty clauses from the law?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that question earlier. Dealing with family expenditures, and noting the sensitivity which was expressed in the House, I spoke to the chief statistician and suggested that he might find it easier not to press charges in those cases where people were refusing to answer sensitive questions. He assured me that he was getting a very good response, practically 80 per cent or better, and in those situations where there is an 80 per cent response accuracy can be maintained.

However, if the penalty clause was dropped completely, I feel sure that the rate of response would drop down substantially below 80 per cent and then statistical inaccuracies would begin to appear.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, is it, then, the position of the minister and the Government of Canada that officials of the Government of Canada are supposed to enforce the law only when enforcement of the law suits the minister?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the law is to be enforced. It is necessary that Statistics Canada statistics be accurate, and I have said that we will be putting before parliament a proposed change in the law so that statistics can be collected voluntarily when we want such statistics collected. In some instances the result of collecting statistics on a voluntary basis might be beneficial, but if we dealt with all statistics on that basis there would be substantial erosion with regard to accuracy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKINNON—VARIANCE IN ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform the Chair that I have not yet had sufficient time to prepare my reply to the remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) concerning a question of privilege I raised last week. I expect to be prepared by tomorrow at 3 p.m. or any succeeding day, provided, of course, that the minister is in the House.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think my schedule calls for me to be in Toronto tomorrow, but I expect to be here on Wednesday, if that will save this business of "After you, Alphonse", waiting for the other to come back from wherever he has been.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The next time the two hon. members are in the House together, that question will proceed.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1979-80

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1980, was presented by the Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the main estimates I am tabling today tell a story of determination, achievement and restraint.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Buchanan: They transform the announced economic intentions of last summer into irrefutable reality today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Buchanan: For these reasons I feel privileged to have the honour to table before hon. members the spending plans of this government for the fiscal year 1979-80. These estimates mark the fourth consecutive year in which the government has announced in advance its spending targets for the ensuing year. In each and every year we have kept our spending within those announced target growth figures. When the public accounts are presented to parliament, there is no question that they will show once again we have controlled spending within the expenditure ceilings set and declared well in advance of the fiscal year.

• (1510)

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

[Translation]

Mr. Buchanan: Let us examine the facts. For 1976-77 we forecast an increase of 16 per cent over the previous fiscal year. The real increase was only 10.4 per cent or 5.5 per cent less than expected. The same thing happened in 1977-78, when the expected rate of growth was estimated at about 10 per cent and real growth was only 7.1 per cent. Last February my predecessor announced a ceiling of 9.8 per cent for 1978-79. That limit was reduced to 9.5 per cent in August and we expect to respect that target.

Today I am tabling the main estimates for 1979-80. We anticipate a total increase in government expenditures of 8.9 per cent. Total expenditures, estimated at $52.6 billion, include budgetary and non-budgetary expenditures, as well as the expenditures provided for in the supplementary budgets to be presented throughout the year. Considering past performance, I can assure hon. members that the ceiling put on the grand total will be respected.

I want to stress that for the third year in a row the increase in total government expenditures has been under 10 per cent. That level of growth respects the government policy, namely that the increase in expenditures be smaller than the nominal growth of the gross national product which, according to forecasts, will be 11 per cent for 1979-80.

[English]

Achieving this goal has not been easy and I believe it is a measure of the calibre of my cabinet colleagues who have set aside their own departmental priorities in the harsh reality of spending restraint, for the common good of all Canadians.

It is because of the spirit of co-operation and restraint that I am able to table these estimates which call for total spending of $52.6 billion, compared with the 1978-79 total of $48.3 billion. They meet two very important fiscal goals. First, they carry through the spending reductions announced last August. An example of the effects of these reductions is that a total of 38 departments and agencies receive less money this year than last. The second goal was to keep growth in spending to less than the growth in the GNP. That too has been accomplished.

To prevent comparisons of apples and oranges, permit me to explain once again why spending growth is compared with nominal growth of the GNP. The government, like all purchasers of goods and services, must pay today's inflated prices. Therefore, the increases in spending must be compared with the GNP figures which reflect the influence of inflation. There has been some confusion in the past because some have made comparisons between the growth in spending and the real growth in the GNP, which is an inaccurate and improper kind of comparison.

As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, we met our fiscal goals. Another major outcome of the August expenditure reduction exercise should be noted. Our forecast at the time was that the cutbacks could lead to a reduction of 5,000 public service positions. These main estimates show a reduction of 6,685 person years, including the 1,400 person years transferred to the province for the operation of veterans' hospitals. The result is a real reduction of some 5,200 public service positions. I am happy to say this reduction will be possible with a minimum disruption of individuals in the federal public service work force.

In 1975-76, when we announced the restraint policy, growth in the public service was reduced to 4.1 per cent. The following year it was lowered dramatically to 1.3 per cent. In the 1977-78 and 1978-79 fiscal years, the growth was six-tenths of one per cent each year, about 2,000 positions. Now, after this period of stringent control, we have gone further and have actually reduced, in absolute terms, the number of authorized person years by a sizeable 2 per cent, reducing the authorized strength of the public service to the approximate level that existed four years ago.

The total authorized person years for 1979-80 is 318,435, which is just a shade higher than the 317,184 authorized in 1975-76. Compared with the current fiscal year, it reflects a decrease of 2.1 per cent. This has been a difficult achievement, particularly in light of the forecast growth of 1.9 per cent in the Canadian labour force. It should be noted that this is the fourth consecutive year when the growth in the federal public service has been less than the growth rate of the Canadian labour force. As a result, these fewer public servants are serving a larger number of Canadians. The number of public servants has not kept pace with the growth of the nation.

One object of this restraint is to reduce the role of government in the economy and leave more room for the private sector. It is clearly evident from last year's job-creation figures that the private sector responded positively and well when it created in excess of 400,000 new jobs for Canadians—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Buchanan: —a message that my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has had some difficulty in getting through to hon. members opposite.

In fact, when we look at the $4,291 million increase in total budgetary main estimates for 1979-80 compared to the previous year, the effects of this government's economies become increasingly evident.

An hon. Member: The largest dollar increase in five years.

Mr. Buchanan: Of that increase, 57.5 per cent, more than half of the total, is accounted for by transfer payments to individuals, to other levels of government and in subsidies and other transfer payments. More than half the additional money being spent simply passes through the federal government's treasury to improve and equalize opportunities for Canadians across our nation. The other major contributor to the increase is public debt, which accounts for 43.1 per cent of the increase as a result of debt costs of $8,350 million, compared with the previous year's total of $6,500 million. Even a major portion of the money the federal government pays out in debt charges can be considered as a form of transfer payment, since it is money being paid directly to Canadians.

I readily acknowledge that the size of Canada's net debt is a worrisome matter for me, as it is for my colleagues. However, it is less worrisome when viewed in the context of Canadian history since the Second World War. Our net debt in 1979 is forecast at 22.2 per cent of the gross national product. That is up 3.3 percentage points from the previous year, but only 3.2 percentage points higher than in 1972. Ten years previously, in 1962, it was 33 per cent of the GNP, in 1952 it was 52 per cent, and in 1947, at the end of the Second World War, it was 110 per cent of the GNP. I present these figures only to place the national debt in perspective. The size of this nation's debt is not at this stage an albatross to economic development and growth.

So far I have talked about transfer payments, debt and total spending. Now I should like to draw hon. members' attention to one of the most significant features of these main estimates, and that is the fact that the net operating and capital expenditures of the federal government itself are holding absolutely constant in 1979-80. Not one more dollar is being spent for federal operating and capital requirements than was spent in the previous year.

● (1520)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Buchanan: In its own operations the federal government is absorbing all price and demand increases without using one more dollar than in the current fiscal year. In real terms the purchasing power of departments has decreased significantly because of the influence of inflation. Within this type of restrictive framework we have been able to introduce some new initiatives. We have not ignored the nation's pressing need for skilled workmen. We have allocated additional resources for training programs and labour market development. I am most encouraged by the creation of the Board of Economic Development Ministers headed by my predecessor, and by the impressive work already under way to aid the economic climate of the nation.

We have developed policies backed up by dollars to encourage the businessman to take advantage of opportunities. We are helping to develop the basic economic environment through research and development incentives and further incentives geared to investing in the private sector through tax and other incentives. All this was within a fiscal framework set eight months in advance of the fiscal year for the first time in history at a figure well below the anticipated growth rate of the GNP.

The $52.6 billion forecast for total spending is the total. I am confident, as in each of the last three years, that we will come in under that target figure. Our public service has decreased in size 2.1 per cent, while population, labour force and demand for service have increased. Our national debt as a percentage of the GNP is considerably lower than it was ten years ago. The amount of money being spent on government operations and capital investments expressed in absolute dollars will be exactly the same as it was in this fiscal year; not one more dollar. Is this a question of a government overtaken by events, lacking control of its fiscal policies? Can anyone say in clear conscience that federal government spending is out of control?

An hon. Member: Put me on the list.

Mr. Buchanan: The record clearly refutes any such illusion. Year after year we have set total spending targets which include supplementary estimates and every other expenditure to be made or anticipated, and we have not exceeded them. Not once have those targets been in jeopardy. The evidence is in the blue book and the companion publication which Treasury Board ensures reaches every member of parliament. All government expenditures are covered; 60 per cent are covered by statute and the balance is subject to appropriation by parliament. Nothing is hidden; nothing is missing.

Every dollar which passes through the federal government's treasury is accounted for in the main estimates. As I said before, the information I am placing before hon. members covers the total proposed government expenditure program, including provision for supplementary estimates, loans, grants, subsidies, budgetary and non-budgetary outlays. It is all there, whether items such as grants and contributions require approval by appropriation acts or reflect approval by other statutes.

However, we acknowledge additional detail would be helpful to hon. members. The other day I made reference to this in response to a question by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). We would like to improve upon the plans and presentation of the main estimates. I want to make it clear there are no omissions in the information provided in the main estimates. However, we can improve upon the form and content of the estimates to make them easier for members to read, comprehend, evaluate and use. I do not want to anticipate the contribution to be made by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts currently examining this subject; but I want to emphasize I am receptive and sympathetic to suggestions which will be forthcoming.

Also it is possible to provide supplementary information in a manner which may be more detailed without adding to the complexity. Further, we may be able to improve on the content in a way which will assist managers in carrying out the expenditure plans of the government, and in so doing provide an improved basis for comparing actual expenditures with plans for purposes of evaluation and accountability.

This spring I expect to present to hon. members my proposals on the principles and presentation concept for a new form of estimates. I trust there will be wide discussion and consultation on them with hon. members, government departments and others. If general acceptance is evident, my proposal would be to select several departments to present pilot projects of a new estimates format in parallel with their regular presentations for 1980-1981. These pilot projects would provide the occasion for further study and discussion in parliament and its committees. Then we could move forward to introduce progressively a totally reformed estimates package which would incorporate the requirements identified by hon. members. But let us make no mistake: old form of the estimates or new, the message is the same. The government has demonstrated that its present expenditure plans meet all of its commitments. The record has shown that we not only plan to meet them but that we implement and control our expenditures accordingly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, last year in reply to the then president of the treasury board and his statement, I made the observation that the minister was employing a lot of flimflam, in the manner in which he presented his data, to try and create the impression the government was doing a lot better than it was. Compared to the present President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan), his immediate predecessor was an example of openness and honesty.

This is the first time an opposition critic of the Treasury Board has not been given a copy of the minister's remarks in advance. We have not been given any copy. There was a press briefing at ten o'clock, a lock-up for the press. We asked permission to attend and we were denied such permission.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is that a responsible government?

Mr. Andre: Last year the then president of the treasury board invited myself and hon. members of the New Democratic and Social Credit parties to his office at 12 noon on the day he presented the estimates. He gave us a copy of the blue book, the book entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", plus a copy of his remarks and the press kit. We were asked to embargo them until three o'clock, which request we honoured. We were provided with approximately 2½ hours to study the material in order to be able to respond in some depth, so that the public and members of the press would receive a true, balanced perspective to make their own judgment on what should be reported after being given the two points of view.

This year at 1.15 p.m. we were invited in for sandwiches. A senior official of the Treasury Board presented a half hour of cooked data and charts, selected data along with the sandwiches. At approximately 1.50 p.m. we were informed we were not allowed to take anything out of the room. We were not allowed to take copies of the blue book, the book entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" or the information on the chart.

Mr. Nowlan: Shame.

Mr. Andre: The President of the Treasury Board has the gall to stand and say that he accepts the recommendation of the Auditor General for a form of the estimates. He does not even know what the Auditor General is talking about.

Mr. Buchanan: I did not say that. The hon. member can read what I said.

Mr. Andre: The entire purpose of the Auditor General's recommendation was to make the spending process more open, to disclose to the public and the House the government's true spending plans; not to cook things so that a lopsided view of the government's intentions are presented in a manner which precludes any criticism on the day they are presented. Flimflam is too light a word to use in this instance.

Mr. Buchanan: The hon. member would be inarticulate without it.

Mr. Andre: For a moment I should like to deal with the global figure of $52.6 billion. How was that figure produced?

Mr. Martin: Add up the totals of the departments.

Mr. Andre: There are the main estimates, budgetary and non-budgetary, reserves for supplementaries and some estimates of lapses. This year the government is estimating the lapses will be $1,217 million. Last year they amounted to $1 billion, so the figure is more than $200 million larger this year than last year. This year they are estimating $1,350 million as reserves for supplementaries. Last year the figure was $1,550 million, so there is another convenient $200 million change in the figures.

● (1530)

Using the same estimate last year that the government is using this year for lapses and supplementary reserves, the figure projected for the coming year is not $52,600 million but rather $53 billion. The projected increase in percentage terms this year, using the same basis the government used last year, is 9.7 per cent, a larger increase than last year. The claim by the minister that in fact we are doing better this year than last year is a bunch of nonsense. It is arrived at by cooking the books. It is arrived at by doing the very thing the Auditor General said should not be done if the government is to bring honesty and openness into the spending process. Obviously that is something this minister does not believe is important. Why do things honestly and openly if it is politically safer to be devious and hide things? That is the approach he has taken.

I did not receive a copy of the minister's comments, although it is the custom in this place for ministers to give the opposition critics such copies in advance. This is the first minister I am aware of to violate that tradition or practice. In his remarks the minister talks about what a good job the government is doing in terms of reducing the national debt as a percentage of gross national product. If we look at the figures as he indicated them we will see that in 1946, at the end of the war, the national debt as a percentage of gross national product was 100 per cent. Every year since then, year after year, there has been a decline in the national debt as a percentage of gross national product, until the year 1975. Since then, year after year it has been increasing. The significant thing is that since this government embarked on its so-called restraint program in 1975 the debt of this country as a percentage of gross national product has been increasing year by year. It is that trend that should be worrying the government, and it is that trend that should be worrying the minister. Comparisons between 1946 and this year are meaningless. What is meaningful is the trend of the debt to go up and up and up in the last few years.

This increase in debt is producing in the coming fiscal year a debt load of $8.38 billion. The interest expense for the next year will be higher than the entire budget of the Government of Canada when it came into power. We are to pay more for interest this year than was spent by the government in that year; more interest is being paid than the total amount spent eight years ago. That is the fact that should be concerning the people.

I sincerely hope this manipulation that has been carried out by this minister, together with the hidden and secretive way in which he has approached the disclosure of these estimates, will not fool the public, and that the public will realize that the government is planning to increase its expenditures this year at a higher rate than last year, that is, by 9.7 per cent as opposed to 9.5 per cent last year. I hope the public will realize that the global increase of $4.3 billion is the largest dollar increase since 1975. I hope that by now the public has recognized the ability the government has for cooking the books on the non-budgetary side, by transferring certain loans over to Crown corporations and, voilà, they disappear from the estimates. The government claims it is cutting expenditures when all it has done is transfer them to other entities so they do not show up in the blue cook. That method has been used again this year in the projection of federal supplementaries and lapses to the tune of $400 million. These expenditures have been hidden from the public.

Let me repeat what I said in my opening remarks. This minister has not had the common courtesy of allowing members of parliament the same privileges given members of the press when they are locked up for a period of time to examine the books prior to their being made public. This minister did not provide us with an advance copy. Having withheld that courtesy from members who are spokesmen for opposition parties, it is difficult for members to comment in detail. The minister's predecessor has followed the practice of making copies of his remarks available in advance. That is a practice followed in this House by most ministers.

This is a marvellous book, and I am sure the secretariat of the Treasury Board spent a great deal of time putting together these nice little pictures of selected data designed to make this government look good. Honesty has not been a first requirement in the assembly of this data. Obviously the first requirement has been to pick out the numbers that make the government look good. This government has put these figures together in such a way that it hopes people will think it is doing a good job. That is what the secretariat and the minister have done, and that is why the Auditor General is insisting that the Comptroller General assume responsibility in respect of the form of the estimates. Obviously the motivation of the present group is not to inform but in fact to deceive the Canadian public about the profligate spending policies of this government.

Without a copy of this material in advance it is difficult, as I have said, to go into detail at this time. However, in the days and weeks ahead the House can be sure we will fulfil our responsibilities by carrying out a double check on this government in an effort to bring some semblance of order and honesty to its approach to the spending of taxpayers' money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I cannot get as excited as spokesmen for the official opposition about the failure of the minister to make copies of the documents available in advance. I do not think opposition members could get much more by having copies of the documents available at ten o'clock in the morning than by obtaining them at 1.30 or one o'clock. I suggest that what we need is not the presentation of documents one, two or three hours before the minister's statement, but weeks or months before. What we need is open government such as the Auditor General has suggested. There is no need for the kind of secrecy we have witnessed. Let me suggest to the minister that even in this country there comes a time when a government party may find itself in opposition and may regret that when in government it did not provide the opposition with more information.

According to the minister, the government is involved in a restraint program. I suggest it is limiting its expenditures in important fields such as post-secondary education, health and social services, not because needs in these fields have lessened, but simply because it seems to the government that this is the popular thing to do. The government has put a ceiling on the increases it will pay toward the cost of medicare and hospitalization, both of which programs were really pushed by the federal government and which are now to be paid increasingly by the provinces. This government has put a limit on Canada Assistance Plan expenditures for social services, again a program initiated by this federal government, the increase in the cost of which, when not to be paid by the government, will have to be paid by the provinces. It has put a limit on the amount which it will pay for the increasing cost of post-secondary education. It has cut back on employment programs, such as Outreach, which were doing a tremendous job of finding work for people who have found it difficult to find work, who did not fit into the work force in the normal way and for whom the manpower department was a complete failure. It has cut back on the amounts paid for the manpower training allowances. It has cut back on funds for housing although there are still hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who are poorly housed.

However, are the needs for these programs any less? Is that the reason the government is cutting back expenditures in these fields? No, the needs are not less and the costs are not lower. In fact, they are higher. The result of these cutbacks will inevitably be that the provinces, which have much less ability to find the money to pay for these programs, will be required to find money, and the individual citizen will be required to bear the increased burden of these programs or do without.

There are indications that this is already happening. In the Department of National Health and Welfare which group has felt the axe of these restraint programs? One would think that at least the government would be more selective and that, more properly, it would have started at the top. What the government has proposed to do is to put the blocks to the poorest people in this country, the people whose standard of living can be compared with that of people living in some of the underdeveloped countries in Africa and Asia, the native people. These are the people the government proposes to give the chop to.

The universities and community colleges are having to cut back on their programs and to increase their fees. The increase in registration fees at one of the universities in my province last year was 20 per cent, and there will probably be another increase this year. Many hospitals in cities across Canada are having to close because the provinces do not have the money. As the federal government cuts back they are required to exercise restraint within their hospitals, and all of this with hundreds of thousands of people on hospital waiting lists.

Medical research is feeling the strain of these cutbacks. Through bookkeeping devices the government tries to hide this fact, but medical researchers cannot be fooled and they know that there is restraint in this area. As a result many medical researchers are moving to the United States.

What is the reason for this government restraint? The government says: "If we do not have restraint we will have more inflation, and inflation is terrible for the poor people; therefore, we have to protect them." One way in which the government is attempting to protect the poor people is by eliminating its subsidies on bread and milk.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: On the other hand, they have allowed gas and fuel oil prices to rise. The result is that inflation is up, according to the figures which were published today, by 8.9 per cent. This is almost the level inflation was at in 1975 when the government brought in the anti-inflation program. According to today's figures, food prices increased last month by 1.9 per cent, and this was in the main due to the increase in the cost of bread. That is what government restraint means.

In his remarks the minister suggested that the reduction in public servants by approximately 6,000 positions would be accomplished without too much hardship. The minister must isolate himself rather effectively in his office because I do not think there is one member of parliament in any party who has not met people who have worked for the government for years and years and are now being laid off. I recently heard of a 50 year old doctor who had worked for national health and welfare for over 20 years and had received his lay-off notice. To say that these lay-offs are being conducted without any real hardship is either nonsense or ignorance.

The minister says that the restraint program is working, the government is playing a smaller role in the economy, which is working, and the private sector is picking up the slack. The minister can juggle the figures all he wants, but I would like to refer him to a full page article that appeared in the Financial Times last week which raised some very serious questions about the claim that 400,000 some odd jobs were produced last year. No matter how many new jobs were produced last year, the fact of the matter is that we have more unemployed in this country right now than we have had since the great depression of the 1930s. There were 977,000 people unemployed last month according to the official figures. Anybody who really cares knows that there are probably another 250,000 people who have given up looking for work because there is no point in doing so if one is unemployed in Glace Bay, Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland or the Interlake area of Manitoba, because there are no jobs there. This is what the government's economic policies and restraint program have brought us.

At the same time as the government preaches restraint and pats itself on the back for how well it is doing, it continues to hand out the goodies to the favoured few.

An hon. Member: Fat cats.

Mr. Orlikow: The pulp and paper industry, which is one of the most efficient and profitable industries in Canada and always has been, has been using its money to invest in other countries, such as buying plants in the United States or building new plants in Brazil. These foreign plants will eventually compete for sales with Canadian companies. What did the government do for this industry just a couple of weeks ago?

An hon. Member: Played Santa Claus.

Mr. Orlikow: It gave this industry over $200 million without provisions for monitoring the money to ensure that it will be invested in Canada.

The automobile industry is the most profitable industry this world has ever seen, but what does the government do to get them to build a plant in Windsor? It bribes them by giving them a grant of some $80 million. This government would like to bribe GM to build a plant in Quebec. Why should we have to bribe the automobile companies? They have made hundreds of millions of dollars in this country, and they are still making hundreds of millions of dollars every year in this country. Why do we not require them to build their plants in Canada to sell automobiles in Canada? There is no reason except that this government has no industrial strategy policy.

This government goes from disaster to disaster trying to plug the leaks. This so-called Liberal government is in the process of stealing the program and platform, plank by plank, of the Conservative party. They are taking this country back to the economic policies of Herbert Hoover and R. B. Bennett. The results of that policy will have the same effect as similar policies had in the 1930s, and the present recession may well turn into a full-fledged depression.

The minister is proud of the number of jobs the government has created. I would like to conclude by reminding the minister that, according to official figures issued by Statistics Canada, some 977,000 people were unemployed last month. This figure amounts to 8.1 per cent of the labour force. We know that there were probably another 250,000 people who were looking for work but who were not counted. If the government continues its present policies of restraint coupled with its failure to come up with an industrial strategy which will put our people to work, a year from now we will not have 8.1 per cent unemployment but probably 9 per cent to 9.5 per cent of the labour force will be unemployed. Instead of 977,000 people unemployed there will probably be 1,250,000 people unemployed. That is what the government's restraint program means, and we think that the government is dead wrong.

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my comments will be very brief and for the same reasons put forward by the hon. members for the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic Party. Not having received this documentation and not knowing exactly what it contains, we would rather hold our comments until later and we will study these estimates very closely.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): To follow the comments of the hon. member who has just spoken, I will simply say that I find myself in the same situation. I did not receive the documents but that does not prevent me from speaking, for I have something I want to tell the House.

[English]

The form of the estimates about which the minister said a few words has been a matter of discussion at some length by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts of which I have the honour of being the vice-chairman. The minister in his statement today has indicated—

Mr. Alexander: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought the usual procedure was that the minister delivered a statement, the official opposition replied, then the New Democratic Party had an opportunity to reply and finally the Social Credit party. I did not think there was any room at this time for a backbencher on the government side to deliver a speech. I figure that this is the time when we have the opportunity to ask questions. It usually happens when the minister has completed his speech and, therefore—

Mr. Francis: Does the hon. member want to deprive me of my rights in this House of Commons?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Alexander: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to deprive the hon. member of anything whatsoever. I am trying to tell him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a certain sequence of events which takes place. I should like to have the opportunity of asking the minister the first question. I noticed that the minister—

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, on that point of order, I think the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) had the floor. May I refer you to Standing Order 15(3) which reads as follows:

—a minister of the Crown may make a short factual announcement or statement of government policy. A spokesman for each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly thereon and members may be permitted to address questions thereon to the minister.

An hon. Member: That is right, questions.

Mr. Pinard: I have not finished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) was going to ask a question. That is why I recognized him.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have had the honour of serving as vice-chairman of the public accounts committee—

Mr. Andre: Question.

Mr. Francis: Hon. members on the other side are very quick if we on this side try to cut them down. Do they not give me the same rights as they demand for themselves? Are they not prepared to say the rules are the same for all hon. members?

Mr. Andre: Ask a question.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the minister but I do have a preamble. In view of the problems in connection with the format of the estimates—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Francis: I shall take my time, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure I have the right to do. The problems have been considered at some length, not only by the Auditor General in his various reports but also by members of the public accounts committee. In view of the models which had been developed, not only for government departments but for Crown corporations, in order to render the estimates in a form which is more comprehensible to hon. members, I venture to suggest there is not a single hon. member in this place who will read every word in these documents. Very few of them have an opportunity of using the information in a way that is helpful.

My question to the minister is this: Just when does he feel it will be possible to make a more detailed statement concerning the format of the estimates following the suggestions of the Auditor General and the committee in order that they could be put in a more useful format for hon. members of this House?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated during the course of my remarks, I hope I will be able to do that later this spring. I look forward to receiving comments from the public accounts committee which is doing a detailed study of this matter right now. I would, of course, wait to receive that study before making comments or suggestions.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I still want to register my concern. There is a practice, with all due respect, that the first questions come from this side, but I will not argue with Your Honour.

I want to ask the minister to elaborate on the statement he made about pilot projects being implemented by certain departments in order to bring about what I think he implied—a better form of estimates. I want to know what stage this new innovative step has reached. What departments is he talking about? What is the time-frame? In other words, just stating there are some pilot projects does not mean a thing to a minister or to any member of the House. I just want to ask that question and a couple more.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated during the course of my remarks and as I suggested to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), I should very much like to receive suggestions from the public accounts committee. I hope to bring these proposals forward later this spring. If general acceptance is evident, the proposal would be to select several departments at that time to present pilot projects for the new estimates format in parallel with their regular presentation for 1980-81.

Mr. Alexander: In other words, what the minister is saying is that, notwithstanding the concern that the Auditor General has registered with this parliament and the people of Canada, he has done nothing other than come to the House and say he is thinking about introducing a pilot project which will affect some departments, and which may bring about a more readable or understandable form of estimates.

This matter is extremely serious. As a matter of fact, I think it borders on the chaotic. The Auditor General says it is a gamble now—not next spring or next year—for him to certify the government is spending what it says it will spend. In other words, the Auditor General cannot do his job; it is a gamble. Surely, under the responsibilities of the minister, this matter must have been discussed with the Auditor General, so I should like to hear the minister's reply to him. This is the sort of thing that would be cleared up immediately in the private sector. I want to know whether we still have to wait until the minister understands that this is a very serious matter.

Mr. Broadbent: What are the odds of the gamble?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that we have been addressing ourselves to this matter. To suggest that the Treasury Board secretariat and the Comptroller General have not looked at the matter is absolute nonsense; as the hon. member well knows, they have appeared before the public accounts committee. The Auditor General, the Comptroller General and the Treasury Board secretariat are looking very carefully at the form of the estimates. The Auditor General has suggested to us that he is happy with the way the arrangements are moving ahead. There is also, in parallel, the study being done by the public accounts committee.

We are certain, with all this input, that we are going to come up with improved estimates that will be of more use to members and to the public. Every bit as important, they will provide an effective means for managers within the public service to discharge their financial management responsibilities more effectively. It is totally wrong to suggest that this matter has just arisen lately and that sufficient attention is not being paid to it.

Mr. Alexander: All I know is that the Auditor General says right now that it is a gamble to certify the books. All I am saying is that this is a very serious matter. The fact that the Auditor General has indicated the government's spending documentation was so unclear and incomplete that he cannot do his job is further impetus for saying that this is a matter of a critical nature.

• (1600)

My last question is this: Will the minister kindly advise why after that delightful lunch he found that it was not possible to give the opposition parties an opportunity to read his statement? If he had done so we would have been able to look into it and have a better understanding and be better prepared to reply. Is there any excuse the minister can possibly give for that reprehensible conduct, conduct which I think is unnecessary? It is certainly not in keeping with with the precedent that was set by his predecessor; he did allow us the opportunity to look at the statement so we could have some in depth study. Is there any reason why the minister did not want us to see his statement before he gave it at three o'clock?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, absolutely none. As I indicated to hon. members over lunch, I was not aware they had made representations in an endeavour to be involved in the press session earlier. I indicated at that time I would be quite prepared to organize a similar briefing for hon. members next year.

An hon. Member: You will not be here then.

Mr. Buchanan: The point I would like to make to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) is this. He has not learned yet that one cannot suck and blow at the same time. He spent considerable time developing the suggestion that they were cooked books, that the material was a pack of lies and it was a series of mistruths. He then went on to say that he wanted this information sooner. It seems to me that he should make up his mind. Either the material is sound, which I believe it to be, or it is not; that it is worth-while, which I believe it to be, or it is not. Hon. members are quite right in suggesting that by having access to this information earlier they could come to this question period prepared. I suggested to them when we were discussing the matter that I would be quite happy to make the arrangements. I am rather puzzled that hon. members made the points they did on this subject. Unquestionably this arrangement can be made, and I will be happy to look after it for them.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my initial question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) deals with this new accounting principle which the government have adopted of revenue expenditure. I direct the minister to page 29 of his explanatory booklet in which it is stated that in the main estimates national health and welfare go up a total of $1,367 million. My question to the minister is this: Am I correct in stating that that in fact would be something over $1.8 billion in expenditures if they had not chosen to make the family allowance change that is reflected toward the end of that page, where it is stated that there has been a reduction of $491 million in family allowance payment? In short, have they not put into the revenue expenditure column $491 million, which has the net effect of reducing that estimate by $491 million notwithstanding the fact that more than that amount will be going out in loss of revenue?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, no. Unless I misunderstood the hon. member, that does not involve the concept of revenue expenditure. That represents a deduction in family allowance of $491 million. That is a result of two things; it is partially demographic and partially the reduction from $26 or $27—whatever it is—to $20 per child, if I understand the hon. member correctly.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the minister has conveniently tried to misunderstand me.

An hon. Member: It is not hard.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I will be a little more direct. The minister will recall that a $200 payment was approved in this House to be in the form of an income tax credit. That payment, which amounts to something in the neighbourhood of $700 to $800 million, must be covered some place. If it is not covered in expenditure estimates as brought forth by the minister, it will obviously be covered in the loss of revenue. Will the minister say whether it is not true that the expenditure reduction in family allowance that he shows of $491 million will be more than offset by a revenue loss when $200 per child payments are made some time in April, conveniently just before the election?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has made it quite clear, with the exception of those who normally would not have income tax payable, it would be in the form of a revenue reduction to the Crown. It is normally not shown as an expenditure. It will show up in the figures of my colleague the Minister of Finance as reduced revenue to the federal Crown.

Mr. Stanfield: We never see them.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. This figure of $52.6 billion which he produced today is coincidentally the same as the one that was talked about last September, which was only achieved by some Draconian cuts to the extent of $2 billion. If those cuts are real as opposed to fictional, the minister must have in his possession detailed estimates, at least in global form, that would have been applicable if those $2 billion cuts were not made. Is the minister in a position to give those figures to hon. members and to the public at this time, namely what the estimates were before those so-called cuts were undertaken?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, unless my memory is incorrect, that information was provided last September to the House of Commons by my predecessor, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras), and by the Minister of Finance when they gave the detailed breakdown of where the $2 billion cut was occurring in planned expenditures, the $500 million that was for the upcoming fiscal year, 1979-1980, as well as the $500 million cut that applied to the current fiscal year in taking it from $48.8 billion to $48.3 billion. All that information was provided at that time and is available.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, in order to try to get some relationship between the years so that we can make comparisons on a year to year basis that are realistic, it is necessary to ensure that one is talking about the same thing in different years. These estimates did not include CMHC figures because CMHC is going directly to the marketplace for its money rather than going to the Department of Finance, as was the previous practice. That is roughly $400 million in expenditures that are not in these books but were in previous books. The Export Development Corporation also has about $400 million of spending which had been in previous estimates but which, by a bookkeeping manoeuvre, were removed from this blue book. The Federal Business Development Bank has similar funds which have been removed from the spending estimates by this bookkeeping procedure.

My question is this: What would be the total spending of the federal government for the next fiscal year if the same basis was used this year as was used, say, four years ago? That is to say, if the same entities were included in this blue book that were included in the blue book four years ago, would the minister not agree that spending would be in the vicinity of $54 billion or $55 billion?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I would have to examine that. But whenever changes have been made I recall quite clearly that my predecessor indicated what the changes were and where they were made, the same as I did this time in identifying the 1,400 man year reductions in the transfer from the federal to the provincial governments. That has been done whenever any changes of this nature have occurred. I am sure that material can be put together in its totality. But those changes have always been identified when they have been made. To say what they would have been had conditions remained unchanged over the last four years is not a realistic thing to do. Conditions have changed. These entities are now dealing directly in the marketplace, which I believe is a healthy move and a good way for them to function. To suggest, to use the hon. member's words, that there is some flimflam or hanky-panky here is nonsense. Whenever it has been done it has been clearly identified.

• (1610)

Mr. Andre: Would the minister not agree that it is meaningless to have his officials appear before the press pointing with satisfaction to increases of 8.9 per cent and 9.7 per cent and saying that since 1975 there had been only modest increases, less than increases in the gross national product? Would the minister not agree that these are meaningless numbers when in fact the programs included in the total spending have been changing year by year? The government has not disguised the fact, it has admitted there have been changes, but does the minister not agree that in these circumstances the comparisons are meaningless?

Mr. Buchanan: I am puzzled. Maybe it just shows the Conservative nature of the hon. member's thinking. His idea is to lock things into a static, unchanging position and never change. What about the new programs which have been introduced? Are they to be eliminated so as to compare apples with apples? The situation evolves. Things change. New programs have been introduced and certain programs have been dropped. It is unrealistic to suggest things can be frozen at one point in time and shown always in the same way forever in the interest, the hon. member says, of an undistorted picture. The situation changes and will continue to do so.

Mr. Rae: It always changes in your favour, though.

An hon. Member: Well, well, where have you been?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a question in which the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) is very interested. How does the government determine its priorities when cuts are made? I notice from the blue book that some $90 million is being cut from food production and marketing, over $1 million dollars from crop insurance and about $250,000 from animal research. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has expressed concern about increased inflation arising from imports of food. It seems to me that if the government had a real strategy it would be promoting the production of domestic food in a move toward self-sufficiency. Such a policy would call for increased funding for programs I have mentioned. In working out its cuts, does the government seek to support through budgetary priorities the economic policies of the Minister of Finance or the general thrust of the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? Or is it a matter of trying to pin the tail on the donkey?

Mr. Buchanan: Not at all. The hon. member is well aware that over the last few years we have, I understand, increased in an unprecedented fashion the amount of our food exports. It is absolutely wrong to suggest that this does not enjoy a priority on the government's part. If the hon. member wishes to ask questions on various detailed aspects of this program he should obviously address himself not to me as President of the Treasury Board but to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

Mr. Orlikow: I should like to ask the minister to give us more information with regard to the reduction of 5,700 in the number of public servants of which he spoke. What percentage of these will be in the national capital area and therefore engaged in administration, and what percentage will be out in the various communities engaged in the actual delivery of programs?

A second question. I am speaking from memory but I believe the hon. gentleman told us there would be a reduction in the number of post office personnel of either 1,600 or 1,800 people in the coming year. We have spent well over one billion dollars on equipment to computerize and automate the post office operation, yet the mail is moving slower than ever. It took five days for a letter mailed to me from Toronto last week to reach Ottawa.

An hon. Member: You're lucky!

Mr. Orlikow: A friend of mine—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was about to put a question, I believe, before he began to make a speech.

Mr. Orlikow: I am trying to give an illustration. The mail is moving slower than ever. At the same time there are tens of thousands of people in the new urban areas who have been waiting up to four years for door to door delivery of mail and cannot get it because the government is putting a freeze on increases in service. How does the minister propose to reduce the number of post office staff unless he is prepared to destroy completely an already unsatisfactory delivery service?

Mr. Buchanan: Questions concerning the operation of the post office should be directed to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne). As to lay-offs, the latest information we have from the Public Service Commission—these are estimates—is that by April 1 the figure should be roughly 450, of which 60 per cent will be in the national capital. These figures are obviously based on best estimates we can get from the commission and over the succeeding couple of months there could be an additional 250 to 350, for a total, nationwide, in the order of between 700 and 800 individuals.

In his comments the hon. member suggested we were insensitive to the requirements of post-secondary education, of medicare and the needs of the family. I do not know whether he was listening when I made my remarks. I stated that approximately 58 per cent of the $4.3 billion increase this year is going directly to transfer programs to individuals and to the provinces to pay for things such as old age security, the child tax credit, medicare and post-secondary education. These are precisely the areas which are receiving the highest priority.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, when I said the government was reducing its contributions to the various shared-cost programs, I had this in mind: from the inception of the programs until April last year the government was paying approximately 50 per cent of the cost. As of last year the government put a cap on the increase it would pay in any year, the cap being the amount of the increase in the gross national product. If the cost of administering and paying for those programs is more than the increase in the gross national product, the provincial government, or the individual citizen, is obviously going to have to pay the difference in the short haul.

My question, then, is this. The minister just now spoke of several hundred people having been laid off. The figures I have been receiving from the Public Service Commission show that some 2,500 people have been laid off or have been given notice that their services will be terminated as of either March 1 or March 31. The minister's own figures for next year show a reduction of 5,700. There is quite a discrepancy, Mr. Speaker, between the 450 the minister spoke about a couple of minutes ago and the 2,500 who have either been laid off or have received notice, and the 5,700 which is the figure in the blue book. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to explain that discrepancy.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the figures which I gave the hon. member were ones which I received this morning. The anticipation is that the actual lay-offs nationwide will by April 1 be 450.

● (1620)

The answer is that by far the greatest number of these people are successful in getting relocated elsewhere in the public service in jobs which become vacant as a result of various forms of attrition, whether it be retirement, resignation, death or disability. Jobs are opening up continually as a result of the turnover within the public service. As I say, the figures I quoted to the hon. member were figures I received today.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to come back with a supplementary question. Did the minister announce a further reduction of 5,000 plus person years, or are we talking about jobs or positions? Second, over what period of time are these person years to be reduced?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, these are not actual employees but public service positions which are being reduced. The bulk of these reductions, according to my understanding, will be accomplished by the end of March or within the next couple of months, so that the vast majority of the people involved with this should receive lay-off notices as we move into the next fiscal year.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up the point the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) was trying to clear up because it seems to me that the government sometimes has a choice between increasing expenditures and providing a tax credit, and in terms of the over-all financial position of the government—in other words, in terms of the effect of these transactions upon the size of the surplus or the size of the deficit—it comes to the same thing.

However, if one employs a revenue expenditure approach, to the extent one does that it really makes rather meaningless talk about controlling expenditures. For example, if the revenue expenditure in terms of the tax credit with respect to family allowances had not been put out in that form but had been directly expended, it itself would have amounted to a 1 per cent increase in expenditures. What I am really asking the minister—and I would like him to comment—is whether it really means anything to say you are limiting the increase in expenditures by whatever—8.9 per cent—when you are fooling around or, to use a more polite word, making adjustments between the expenditure side and the revenue side.

It seems to me that I would not be very far out to say with some degree of firmness that the minister's assertion that escalating the increase in expenditures 8.9 per cent does not really mean anything because he is taking some things from the expenditure side and cutting down his revenues. So when one is looking at the over-all position of the government, it really does not mean anything. It really does not mean anything for the minister to insist that he is restricting expenditure increases by this amount. One has to take into account the kinds of expenditures he is making through reductions in revenues also, which is the valid point, it seems to me, which the hon. member for York-Simcoe was trying to make.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member got into what is an extremely interesting area, the whole concept of revenue expenditure which, as the hon. member is well aware, is one which has not really been utilized in Canada. It is used in the United States where each year, other than the basic exemptions in the tax system, it is my understanding that all other forms of what are termed tax expenditures, i.e., forgone revenue by the government, are shown and listed each year. The amount that is lost by registered pension plans, registered retirement savings plans, registered home ownership plans, R and D incentives all of these are shown as revenue expenditures.

To date that concept has not commended itself to us here in Canada. We have not used it. As I am sure the hon. member is aware, my responsibility is related purely to the actual expenditures which are made by the government. If we get into the question of tax policy, we are moving into the preserve of my colleague the Minister of Finance; but from my point of view of responsibility for expenditure ceilings and keeping within those expenditure ceilings, I believe we have accomplished that goal. If the hon. member is saying he does not like some of the changes which have been made in the tax structure, that is a totally different matter which should be taken up with my colleague the Minister of Finance.

I gather from the nodding of the head of the Leader of the New Democratic Party that he would like to see some system of revenue expenditures. That is another subject, the discussion of which would involve a considerable amount of time, and I think it would be an extremely interesting one.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, without going into the ramifications of this concept, will the minister not agree that if he has been able to effect a reduction in expenditures by some tax expenditure, then when one is comparing the extent to which he is controlling his expenditures, this should be taken into account, and would it be not very difficult to produce estimates which would go up by only 7 per cent? One could probably do this by making some further tax expenditures. That was the hon. member's point, and that is the point I am making. I am just suggesting in all sincerity that the minister's assertion that he has restricted the increase in expenditures does not mean anything except in terms of his own definition of what an expenditure increase is.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, there is some validity to the hon. member's point, but where do we draw the line? Do we look at all the various tax incentives and tax concessions which are granted to Canadians, whether they be capital gains taxes or anything else, and begin to classify those as expenditures? I am not speaking pro or con on the subject. I am saying it is a new concept. To date what have been classified in this country as expenditures are those ones where the government actually gathers in revenue from the taxpayers of Canada and subsequently redistributes it, whether it be to the provinces, directly to individuals or for the purchase of its own goods and services. To date that has clearly been the concept which we have used in this nation. If the hon. member is advocating that we should move to integrate into that the concept of revenue expenditures, or tax expenditures to use his term, then that is a basic policy question we could spend considerable time debating.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Bearing in mind the number of members who have been trying to get the floor and bearing in mind that I have to draw a line and limit questions at some point, a balance will have been fairly achieved and a reasonable number of members will have participated if I conclude the questions by recognizing four other members, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie).

● (1630)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): As always, Mr. Speaker, you are showing fairness and I thank you for that. First of all I would point out to the minister, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) that once again we have been taken by surprise. As far as I am concerned, I have been apprised of those papers only about ten minutes ago. It might not be the minister's responsibility, but I would like to remind him that in future, whenever possible, we would like to be able to examine a little in advance the statement the minister proposes to make in the House, in order to understand the issue before making our judgement and ask a few questions. In any event, I would not like to bore the minister with that—

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Well, you agree. Everybody agrees I think, but I would nonetheless ask a question which to me appears to be of great importance. In table No. 1 of document No. 5 on the public debt program, we find a rather spectacular increase in the 1968 net debt of Canada, which then was amounting to $39.622 billion, and which will reach an amount of $64.672 billion according to the estimates for 1980. Can the minister tell the House if he intends to consider very seriously that public debt increase, which surely has an impact on the economy of the country and the possibility to attract investors here?

Second, does he intend to make proposals to change somewhat or even a great deal the funding methods for the public sector to avoid those phenomenal increases in the public debt, automatically resulting as they do in very big servicing costs for that debt?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, first of all I accept the suggestion of the hon. member that hon. members would like to examine the documents in advance, and if I am still President of the Treasury Board next year I would be very happy to make the necessary arrangements as well as for the media. Furthermore, I believe the hon. member was invited this morning—unfortunately, the hon. member was not contacted directly; perhaps he did not receive the message inviting him to lunch, I do not know. Anyway, about the amount of the public debt, and as the hon. member pointed out, it is a heavy burden for the people of Canada and we are very aware of that problem. The percentage of the gross national product has been higher in the past than what the public debt represents. However, I grant him that it is a serious problem; indeed my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), indicated that for the current fiscal year the deficit will be, I believe, roughly $12.1 billion but next year that deficit will be reduced to $10.7 billion. So, substantial progress is being made in that direction in an intelligent way, I believe. It is true that it is a very significant amount, and I hope to be able also to reduce even more the size of our deficit for the subsequent year.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse on a supplementary.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, to give others an opportunity to ask questions, I will be brief.

I note very briefly that there is a reduction of $158 million for the Department of Public Works. I understand the Department of Public Works is now responsible for urban affairs and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I do not want to embarrass the minister with my questions, but I would like to know if that reduction of $158 million is applicable only to the housing area or if it affects housing as well as public works in general?

Mr. Buchanan: If I remember well, Mr. Speaker, that applies particularly to public works; the other department comes under a separate vote.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I want to start off by making a comment about what the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) said when he suggested the government was following the recommendations of the official opposition in bringing in these estimates. I want to say that this shocking statement will do a great deal to impair my political and social status in Peace River!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Having said that, I think I have to preface this question with a few preliminary words. It so happens I was chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts some 15 years ago when the then secretary of the Treasury Board said that we had a scheme before us by which we could make it simple for members of the House of Commons and members of the public to understand the form of the estimates. There were so many votes at that time, and the intention was to reduce the number of estimates and make them simple and more comprehensible. After some reluctance, there was an agreement on the part of the committee. I remember at that time the Auditor General, Max Henderson, told us we were on dangerous ground because, as he said, once it happens, the dam will be opened and all hell will break loose. That is what happened and at present, to most members of the public, these estimates are incomprehensible.

Having in mind the extent to which parliamentary committees develop into legislative abattoirs when they come to consider estimates of the government, will the minister discuss with his colleagues, at least in the limited time he has to enjoy the privileges of power, and undertake that, for the purpose of having a more intelligent basis of discussion so that we can better discharge our responsibilities on behalf of the shareholders of this country, the taxpayers, the estimates of at least four or five departments will be brought into the House, where they would form the subject of discussion in the House, as used to be the case? Thus during the course of an average parliament of four or five years there will be an opportunity for the House, through the question and answer period and the very successful operation which those hon. members who were here at the time will recall, to examine the estimates, which is the only way in which we can get back to a sensible and meaningful method of discharging our duties to the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making representations. As I indicated in the course of my earlier remarks, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is now studying this. The triumvirate of the Auditor General, the Comptroller General and the secretary of the Treasury Board are examining it as well. That will deal basically with the form. The question of procedure and how it will be handled would relate, it seems to me, more to the activities of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization; but I profess no expertise in this department. Certainly so far as the form is concerned, we are looking very carefully at how it should be changed. From then on the way the estimates will be handled will not be a question for me as President of the Treasury Board to determine but rather for the House of Commons to determine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. gentleman is a good friend of mine. I like him in many respects and I would like to ask him the following simple question. Does he not consider personally, both from his experience as minister and from his recent brief experience as President of the Treasury Board, that that would be a more acceptable way, forgetting the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization which obviously will not be called into existence before the end of this parliament? Does the hon. gentleman not consider that to be a more intelligent and sensible way to handle the estimates of this country involving some $52 billion?

Mr. Buchanan: It may well be, but I am sure the hon. member would also admit that we are likely not to have the form of the estimates changed before the event which the hon. member seems to be very conscious of will take place, in other words, in the next few weeks. So I really think his recommendations are at sixes and sevens with each other.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a previous question the minister indicated that questions about specific items in the estimates should be directed to the minister involved. I can understand that he cannot have knowledge of all these questions. However, there are some changes in the estimates which deal with a variety of ministers. Surely the minister has a responsibility to co-ordinate government policy with regard to the estimates.

My question therefore is based upon cuts in the rape crisis centres, in family planning services and in the Outreach and Aware programs, all of which are under various ministers but deal with cuts in the estimates with regard to women. Has the minister a responsibility to implement government policy in co-ordinating the various requests from the various ministers, and is it the government's policy to cut back specifically services to women as reflected in these estimates?

Mr. Buchanan: The answer to the latter part of the question is no, it is not part of the government's policy. If my memory is correct, I believe the hon. member directed a series of questions on this subject, as have other hon. members, to my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde). The minister has endeavoured to respond. Whether hon. members are satisfied or not, the minister has endeavoured to respond and explain clearly that this is not government policy and that in fact there are other programs which to a degree fill the gap being created.

● (1640)

Mr. Leggatt: In assessing a particular cut, is it the minister's policy to assess the impact of the cut on another department? For example, in term of the Outreach and Aware programs, a cutback in specific services to women to be placed in employment means the Canada Assistance Plan Act saves a great deal of money. If a woman on welfare is given specific assistance and placed into employment, there is some savings to the treasury on the other side. In other words, the cut means an expense to another department. Does the minister take that into consideration when he considers the impact of these requests from ministers? Does he consider the cost to the treasury as a result of cuts?

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Whenever cuts are made, there is an effort to see what the impact will be, whether it will increase, as the hon. member suggested, the costs under the Canada Assistance Plan Act or something of that nature. Generally the policy is to attempt to make some intelligent estimate as to what in fact the impact will be outside.

Mr. Leggatt: You blew it this year.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier, we will conclude the questioning with the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie).

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the minister made much of the fact the public debt is only 22.7 per cent of the GNP. Has the minister considered that these figures are not in constant dollars? In fact, a holder of a Canada Savings Bond taken out in 1971 is losing, if it is paid this year, approximately 50 cents on the dollar. In the sale of Canada Savings Bonds, the government will be repaying in dollars with considerably less buying power at the maturity of the bond because of inflation.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct in pointing out that the debt is not in constant dollars, but neither is the gross national product of which it is expressed as a percentage. It is not being made in terms of constant or real dollars in either case. In both cases current dollars are being used.

Mr. Ritchie: Does the minister not agree that, in the maturing of Canada Savings Bonds and similar type debts, the government pays back very much less in buying power than what it borrowed from the individual in the first place?

Mr. Buchanan: That may well be correct, but the hon. member conveniently overlooks the fact that bond holders receive a substantially higher return. In other words, four or five years ago the return was substantially less. Now the individual receives 9.5 per cent on Canada Savings Bonds, which rate is designed to help offset the impact of inflation.

PUBLIC WORKS

PROPOSED USE OF LAND AT LONDON, ONTARIO—CORRECTION OF INFORMATION PROVIDED BY MINISTER

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct some information which I provided to the House on Friday. In reply to a question by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley), I indicated that land purchased for the construction of a penitentiary in London had been turned over to the Department of Public Works. That information was inaccurate. The land is still under the control of my own department. I have already advised the hon. member of the erroneous information.

CANADA HERALDIC COUNCIL ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE GRANTING AND USE OF ENSIGNS ARMORIAL

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-461, to establish a Canadian heraldic council.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill essentially is to patriate the granting of armorial bearings. At present, if anyone in Canada wants a coat of arms, he or she must apply to the United Kingdom authorities. This bill would establish a Canadian heraldic council so that armorial bearings pertaining to Canadian entities can be granted in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AIRBORNE WARNING AND CONTROL SYSTEM—EUROPE

Question No. 639—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the government agree to participate in an Airborne Warning and Control System in Europe and (a) if so, on what date was the decision taken (b) if not, will a decision be taken and, if so (i) on what date (ii) will Parliament be asked to approve participation?

2. Did Canada participate in the development phase of AWACS for Europe and, if so, in what amount?

3. Has a programme cost for AWACS been agreed upon among NATO Nations and, if so (a) what is it (b) what is Canada's share as a (i) percentage of the total cost (ii) dollar figure?

4. Does DND's capital budget contain provision for Canada's contribution to European AWACS?

5. Will Canadian Armed Forces personnel be involved in the European AWACS programme, such as, flight crews, maintenance crews, training crews, etc?

6. Does the government attach a higher priority to AWACS for use in Europe or in North America?

7. Does the government propose to make any contribution towards either the capital or operating costs of the AWACS which the USA will fly in North America and, if so (a) in what amount (b) will Canada make personnel and/or bases available?

8. Will American AWACS operate on (a) a regular (b) exceptional basis in Canadian airspace?

9. Has the USA been urging Canada to participate in European AWACS as a matter of higher priority than North American AWACS?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. (a) Dec. 6, 1978. (b) Not applicable.

2. Canada has contributed to the initial research and development phase for a total of $250,000 over the period 1974 to 1978.

3. Yes.

(a) Acquisition cost—$1,826 M. (1977 U.S.); Annual cost for operation and support—104 M. (1977 U.S.) from 1985 onward.

(b)(i) 9.8 per cent of the acquisition cost; 9.3 per cent of the operation and support cost;

(ii) $180 M. (1977 U.S.)—acquisition cost; $9.5 M. (1977 U.S.)—operation and support costs after 1985.

4. No. However, DND is now examining appropriate arrangements to include funding of program costs in the defence services program.

5. Yes. Canadian military personnel will be involved in the manning of the NATO AEW force headquarters and the airborne component.

6. The question of priority does not arise because the AWACS system in Europe and in North America is considered a military requirement in support of the total deterrent and defence posture of the alliance.

7. (a) and (b) Canada will not contribute to the capital costs. However, discussions are taking place with the U.S. to explore the possibility of some joint arrangements for training and co-manning of some U.S. AWACS aircraft within the NORAD context.

8. (a) and (b) It is envisaged that U.S. AWACS aircraft would operate in Canada on a regular basis during NORAD training and exercises and in times of crisis or hostilities.

9. No. As a NATO-wide system, all members of the alliance have been encouraged to participate in European AWACS.

ORDER OF MILITARY MERIT

Question No. 703—Mr. Jones:

1. When was the Order of Military Merit created and why?

2. How are candidates chosen for this Order?

3. Is language qualification taken into account at all?

4. Does the Governor General give routine approval to these names or does he actually make the final decision?

5. Is it true that the list was rejected at first by the Governor General in the spring of 1977 and if so for what reason?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The Order of Military Merit was established July 1, 1972 for the purpose of according recognition to Canadians and other persons for military merit.

2. Candidates are chosen by an advisory committee which was established in accordance with the constitution of the order and such names are submitted to the chief of the defence staff (CDS). The CDS in turn recommends to the minister those nominations which in his opinion have the greatest merit. The minister recommends a final list of nominees to the Governor General.

3. No.

4. The Governor General, as Chancellor of the Order, makes appointments to the Order.

5. No.

AIRCRAFT—STARFIGHTER

Question No. 705—Mr. Jones:

1. What is the role of the Starfighter in the Canadian Forces? What is the actual intended use of the Starfighter?

2. How old are the Canadian Starfighters? What is the total cost of their upkeep per year?

3. How many Starfighters have crashed in Europe in the last 12 years? How many Canadians were killed or injured in these accidents, if any?

4. How much time is required in maintenance on the Starfighter daily?

5. Does the government intend to replace these, and if so, when and at what cost?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The role of the Starfighter in the Canadian Forces is to conduct offensive and defensive air support operations. It is currently deployed in this role and will continue to be so used.

2. The average age is 14 years. The total operation and upkeep cost per year is $79,359,876.

3. Thirty-six Canadian Starfighters have crashed in Europe during the past 12 years. Seventeen Canadians were killed and three were injured in the accidents.

4. 29.3 man-hours per aircraft per day.

5. The CF-104 will be replaced by the new fighter aircraft in the $2.34 billion identified for the purchase of the total fighter aircraft fleet.

MOBILE COMMAND

Question No. 707—Mr. Jones:

For the years 1950-1970, which regiment of Mobile Command was the most efficient? Which regiment had the highest re-enlistment rate? Are these or/is this regiment still in existence, and if not why was it or/were they disbanded?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): The relative efficiency of regiments in mobile command for the years 1950-1970 cannot be established because of the different equipments and roles assigned to the regiments. Even where equipment and roles were similar, efficiency would not be rated in relative terms, but in respect of the ability to be operationally effective in meeting the roles assigned. Records on re-engagements and re-enlistments were not maintained by unit for the period 1950-1970.

SYSTEM OF SURVEILLANCE

Question No. 715—Mr. Jones:

1. In the opinion of the Department of National Defence how many persons are required to provide Canada with a proper system of surveillance, including provision of course for time off, etc.?

2. How many persons does the department employ in order to carry out surveillance operations in Canada?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. Surveillance is not the exclusive role of any command or element of the Canadian Forces. It is, however, a primary role of both maritime command and air command, the military personnel of which number approximately 9,200 and 22,700 respectively.

ARMED FORCES—PAY INCREASE

Question No. 740—Mr. Howie:

On what date is the next scheduled pay increase for members of the Armed Forces?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): October 1, 1979 for all ranks and classifications except generals, colonels, dental and legal officers. The scheduled date for pay revision of these groups is April 1 annually to correspond with the date of compared groups in the public service.

AIRCRAFT—CF-5

Question No. 785—Mr. McKinnon:

How many times on (a) surveillance (b) a trans-Atlantic crossing have CF-5 aircraft had to resort to the use of one engine?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): CF-5 aircraft have had to resort to the use of one engine on five separate occasions during surveillance-training and trans-Atlantic flights. (a) Surveillance—two; and (b) Trans-Atlantic—three. There have been a few occasions when one engine has malfunctioned then cleared rapidly, enabling the flight to continue to destination.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved that Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Bill C-42, the energy supplies emergency bill, is a very important one designed to protect Canadians in the event of an energy emergency. In my remarks concerning Bill C-42, I propose to deal with four aspects of the situation: the general background for the need of the bill; the oil situation in Canada; our obligations under the international energy agency emergency oil sharing program; and the particular features of the bill itself.

As to the features of the background, once again we are faced with uncertainties associated with the petroleum supply disruption affecting the non-communist world. The revolution in Iran has created a major supply difficulty. Iran, the second largest OPEC oil producer, has not exported any crude oil since December 26, 1978. Roughly 20 per cent of OPEC production or six million barrels a day of Iranian production has not been available since that date. Some of that shortfall has been made up on a temporary basis by other OPEC producers. In terms of non-communist consumption, the net shortfall is approximately 5 per cent.

Our hope is that political stability in Iran will be restored quickly and that Iranian Oil will once again flow freely to world markets. We cannot be sure when that will occur. There are disturbing signs that it may be many months. Nor do we know for certain what policies other OPEC suppliers will adopt, or what other events may intervene.

If parliament were to be in continuous session there might be an argument to postpone this legislation. But given the fact that a dissolution will occur this year, the government believes it would be wise to secure the necessary authority now to deal with an energy emergency which could arise while parliament had been dissolved. Its introduction should be seen as a precautionary measure to protect Canadian energy security.

Canada is a net importer of oil. Since the 1973-74 crisis we have been able to reduce the dependence of eastern Canada on imported supplies. In 1973-74 Quebec and Atlantic Canada imported close to 800,000 barrels a day. The government took measures to have an oil pipeline built from Sarnia to Montreal. That pipeline has reduced our dependence on imported oil by roughly 300,000 barrels a day. At the present time we are importing about 500,000 barrels a day. About one-fifth of that 500,000 barrels a day had been coming from Iran before the shutdown. Another 200,000 barrels a day came from other Middle East and non-western hemisphere sources. Another 200,000 barrels a day was sourced in Venezuela. Members will be aware of my steps to ensure that, despite the action of the Exxon Corporation and Imperial Oil, this oil will be as secure to Canada as the Venezuelan and Canadian governments want it to be. Altogether our imports of 500,000 barrels a day are equivalent to about 30 per cent of our total oil requirements.

The companies affected have been able to offset their shortfalls temporarily through alternative overseas sources as well as increased production from our own domestic sources. Increased domestic supplies are reaching eastern Canadian refineries through exchange arrangements with companies in the U.S.A. I have asked the National Energy Board to authorize such exchanges to meet demonstrated shortfalls in our imports with a view to assuring oil supply for Canadian consumers and to maintaining our inventories.

We have been in touch with the provincial governments on these matters and everything is being done to ensure maximum utilization of western Canadian crude in eastern provinces which are vulnerable to this import disruption. I am particularly appreciative of the co-operation which the Alberta government and its agencies have extended.

These measures may not be enough. We may have to take further action by imposing demand restraints, and perhaps allocating crude oil and petroleum products. What we seek is to have the necessary legislative authority to take these steps if needed.

I am, therefore, proposing Bill C-42, an act to provide the means to allocate available energy within Canada during periods of supply disruptions caused by shortages or market disturbances outside our control. These measures will be necessary to fulfil our commitment under the agreement of an international energy program, or in any national energy emergency unrelated to the triggering of the international emergency oil sharing system.

As all hon. members know, in the aftermath of the 1973-74 Arab oil embargo and production cutbacks Canada, the U.S.A. and 14 other member countries of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development got together to see what could be done to deal collectively with possible future crises. In November, 1974 these countries entered into an agreement on an international energy program. Three other countries subsequently joined, and the membership will soon be increased to 20 since Australia has applied to join.

A central feature of the agreement is an emergency oil sharing system which provides for the equitable distribution of available oil in an emergency. The fair sharing is based on the historical consumption and net imports of each member country. The sharing system is triggered when a formal finding is made that the group of countries has suffered a loss in its oil supply equal to 7 per cent or more of its average consumption. Members will recall that in my opening statement I mentioned that the present shortfall occasioned by the non-made-up portion of Iranian oil production amounts to 5 per cent of oil consumption already. Clearly we are within reach of that 7 per cent figure.

The agreement commits the different member countries to have in place adequate legislative authority to permit the imposition of mandatory control over the use and consumption of oil during an emergency, and to have by 1980 reserves of petroleum equal to 90 days of its net petroleum imports. Canada today more than meets this emergency oil reserve commitment to the international energy agency. This is because we import about 200,000 barrels of oil a day on a net basis. Imports of about 500,000 barrels a day are partly offset by exports of oil and natural gas liquids of nearly 300,000 barrels a day, yet our whole national oil inventory of perhaps 130 million barrels is counted toward our international energy agency commitment.

However, that 130 million barrels is equivalent to only 75 days' supply when measured against our total consumption rate rather than our net imports. We must not, therefore, plan to rely on oil stocks for an indefinite period to meet overseas supply shortfalls. For one thing, they cannot be drawn down to anything like zero days' supply without serious shortages occurring. For another, they are distributed right across our very large country, whereas supply shortfalls are likely to hit us regionally.

We must not be complacent as a result of what may in statistical terms appear to be a strong stock position. Adequate legislative authority is needed to enable us to deal with petroleum emergencies by means of allocation and, if necessary, rationing programs.

Most of you will remember that we had an energy supplies emergency act, Bill C-236, assented to on January 11, 1974, which after a two and a half year life lapsed on June 30, 1976. That bill was created in response to the Arab oil embargo and production cutbacks of late 1973 and early 1974. The present bill is essentially the same as the previous act, with some minor changes to which I shall be drawing hon. members' attention.

First let me outline the principal features of the bill. The bill would create legislation to deal with emergency shortfalls of petroleum and certain alternate fuels such as coal and natural gas. Such shortfalls could occur as a result of disruptions in supply due to shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security, welfare and economic stability of Canada. The actual causes of such a shortage or disturbance could be natural disasters, technical problems, strikes, embargoes, or any other kind of emergency, including, of course, events far beyond our borders and quite outside the control of the Government of Canada.

The allocation powers provided in the act would be invoked by the governor in council when in his opinion, for reason of shortage or market disturbance, the national security, wealth or economic stability of Canada is affected to the point where in the national interest it is necessary to conserve our supplies of petroleum products.

The legislation authorizes the governor in council to appoint an energy supplies allocation board composed of up to seven members including a chairman. Under the previous act there were five members including a chairman. I would envisage the appointment to the board would reflect the interests of producing and consuming provinces, the consuming public and the petroleum industry.

We are fast approaching the time, Mr. Speaker, when we will be required to adjourn this debate for private members' hour. I am about to enter an important part of my speech which deals with the duties of the board, and because I do not feel that there is enough time to fully explain, I wonder if hon. members would agree to call it five o'clock.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ADVISABILITY OF PROVIDING MUNICIPALITIES WITH DIRECT ACCESS TO REVENUE SHARING

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of revising Canada's tax system in order to provide municipalities with direct access to revenue sharing so that they can meet increasing responsibilities to the expanding Canadian urban population.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Canadian cities are facing a crisis in financial management which threatens to get worse unless they gain access to an expanded source of revenue. As the number of urban citizens grows and the responsibilities toward these citizens increase, cities have become increasingly dependent on financing from outside, such as grants and borrowing. If the present trend continues, cities will no longer be able to function as self-governed units and decisions affecting urban dwellers will be made by an authority far removed from their local concerns.

Stated simply, cities are overwhelmed with the modern problem of urbanization in Canada which has increased the demand for physical and social services at the community level without an adequate tax base. This crisis has been building up for many decades and has it roots as far back as confederation. When our fathers drafted the constitution for the future dominion of Canada, they could not foresee the shift in population from the rural areas to the cities. In 1871 the urban population was a scant 722,000; in 1977 it was an overwhelming 16 million, 76 per cent of the Canadian population. Before the end of this century, 90 per cent of Canadians will be urbanized. Because such a radical shift was not foreseen, the municipalities were not considered in the division of fiscal powers.

As originally drafted, the BNA Act gave the federal government authority over all forms of taxation, while the provinces were restricted to direct taxation within the province. The provinces were also given authority over municipal institutions. With the enormous expansion of the revenue needs of the provinces, the federal government was forced to share more of its tax revenue and more taxation powers were transferred to the provinces. Municipalities gained the right to raise taxes on property.

Today municipalities find themselves in the same situation which provinces faced earlier; their revenue base is no longer adequate enought to finance the services which they provide. Grants from the federal and provincial governments and borrowing have made the shortfall, but just as the provinces could not function on the basis of additional grants from the federal government, municipalities cannot function primarily on additional grants from federal and provincial governments.

In the final report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution in 1972, it was recognized that municipal government "requires a new focus of attention and more effective means of presenting its point of view to the two senior levels of government." The Federation of Canadian Municipalities specifically urged at its annual conference last year that municipalities be assigned certain powers to be scheduled in the constitution, and the resources to give weight to those powers. It said:

> Suggestions for enhancing the status of municipalities under any new constitutional arrangement should be based on the principle that municipalities, in the first instance ought to be assigned those powers which experience has indicated are best exercised at the local level—We call for an urgent re-examination of the roles and responsibilities of our three levels of government, as well as the sources of revenue that go along with them, so that we may reshape our Confederation into one which fits the facts and realities of our present day. We believe, that this nation's strength can be enhanced, not lessened, by a re-assessment and re-assignment of the proper roles of each level of government, including local governments.

It is strange that no mention was made of the role of the municipalities in the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. The federal-provincial conferences on the constitution have focused on equitable revenue-sharing between their two levels of government, ignoring the municipal problem. It appears that our modern-day version of the Fathers of Confederation, the first ministers, are repeating the error of a century ago.

The city of Edmonton illustrates the kind of change which has occurred in the urban areas in the past century. Edmonton has become the fourth largest city in Canada. Over the past five years the city has grown 15 per cent. This means that the city has a responsibility to provide services to half a million people—services like the police and fire department, libraries, parks and recreation, transportation, water and sanitation. These services are the most vital ones to city-dwellers, since they are what makes a safe and healthy community. Of all levels of government, the municipal government is the one closest to its citizens in their daily lives.

Besides servicing an expanded population, Edmonton has also had to finance the increased technological complexity of those services. The police force has moved into the computer age, a new era in public transit was started with the light rapid transit system and water quality control requires a more efficient sewage treatment process.

At the beginning of this year, Edmonton was faced with a serious dilemma as it drew up its budget for 1979. The city was not able to take account of the revenue from grants because the level of the grants will not be known until April. In order to maintain the existing level of service and keep up with the growth in population, the property tax rate would have to be increased by about 20 per cent. City council, however, had decided that property taxes would not increase beyond 6 per cent. This means a $10 million shortfall for Edmonton in 1979.

The quality of life in the community—housing, transportation, security—would be affected by any attempt to make up this shortfall. In order to save $1 million, the fire department would have to operate with 77 less men than planned. To save $150,000, 10 outdoor rinks would have to be closed by the parks and recreation department. A cutback of $100,000 in the social services department would mean the loss of an additional $400,000 in provincial grants.

The city cannot afford such cuts. The police department is already battling a rising rate of crime, up 62 per cent in the past ten years. In 1978, there were 16 murders in Edmonton, 37 attempted murders and 73 rapes. The number of rapes alone is so serious that Edmonton women have organized in protest.

In the area of transportation, Edmonton has had to raise bus fares by 10 cents in order to get an additional $3.86 million. Even with this increase the public service will operate with a deficit of $25.5 million this year. Telephone rates have been increased by 5 per cent to gain an additional $3 million, one-tenth of which will be taxed by the province anyway. Edmonton has had to nickel and dime itself in order to gain small increases in revenue which do not begin to meet its needs.

The money shortage has a special effect on one sector of the population—the aged. The proportion of persons over 65 years old is increasing. In Edmonton, the aged will make up 8 per cent of the population in 1986, compared to 6 per cent in 1976. The city will have to bear substantially heavier burdens for social services, health care and housing, since the aged require more of these services than any other age group. In Alberta, people over 65 need twice as much medical treatment.

Not only do the aged have special needs which are met in part by the city, but they are also on a more limited income and therefore less able to pay for what they need. Seventy-six per cent of senior citizens in Canada have an income of less than $5,000. In order to live, these people need subsidized housing, but in Edmonton this housing is limited because of the influx of migrants seeking jobs who take up the cheaper accommodation until they can afford to move. In other words, people looking for jobs across Canada, because of the high rate of unemployment in other parts of the country, flock to Alberta, specifically northern Alberta and Edmonton, and create an added factor in the housing situation. Rents have also increased with the increased demand for housing. Paradoxically, therefore, the economic boom in the west has adversely affected the aged in some respects because they are not full participants in the increased wealth. This "catch 22" situation in Edmonton reveals the modern problem of a city in the midst of a booming economy.

In order to plan for the growing proportion of senior citizens and the services they will need just to maintain their sense of dignity and independence, the Edmonton social planning section has engaged in some long-range programming. In the words of the report:

> Attempts to fill unmet needs, inflation and the expected increase in demand will bring costs to a level substantially greater than would be the case if the present level and types of services were maintained.

Instead of cutbacks, the city of Edmonton needs to ensure that it has the added resources to meet these additional needs.

It cannot do this if it has to rely on a tax base restricted to property taxes. Property taxes are not growth taxes. Local levies grow at a rate of 4 per cent to 5 per cent each year while spending responsibilities grow at a rate of 10 per cent to 12 per cent per year. At the same time, cities have had to cope with a doubling of the inflation rate in the past ten years and a decline in the Canadian dollar to its lowest level in 45 years. The declining Canadian dollar is costing Edmonton an extra $6 to $7 million this year which means that the residential taxpayer is paying $30 a year more than he should be—and getting not a bit of extra service for this amount. Meanwhile, the federal government goes merrily on its own way with an expanding source of revenue; personal income tax revenue has quintupled in the decade of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

In order to make up the difference between tax revenues and expenditures on services, municipalities have traditionally relied on federal and provincial grants. The Alberta government announced in January a trebling of provincial support to the urban transportation requirements of its cities. This welcome measure will alleviate some of the stress on Edmonton's budget and allow the city to continue improvements to its public transportation system.

We can now look to the early extension of the light rail transit system to the south side, including the university area and eventually Mill Woods. This excellent provincial support is in contrast to the federal government's slippery evasion of support by narrowly defining interurban transportation to exclude the intraurban Edmonton system. That is a problem we have gone over many times in this House so I shall not dwell on it now.

The federal government's contribution through grants to Edmonton's revenue last year was $6.4 million. All of these grants were conditional, restricting Edmonton in the use to which the funds could be put and financing projects which were often not high on Edmonton's list of priorities but which were politically convenient for the federal government.

With my colleagues from Edmonton I was in a meeting last week with Mayor Purves and the city aldermen and personally examined their protest that the government does not consult with municipalities before starting up short-term employment or social services projects, and yet the municipal governments bear the public complaints when these programs are terminated. This kind of ad hockery does not help the city to plan rationally to meet present and future demands.

The reliance of cities on federal and provincial transfer payments for a substantial part of their revenue—32 per cent in 1974-75—is affecting their ability to govern themselves. The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in its study of Canada's system of public finance states:

> Increasing conditional grants from the provinces and Ottawa can only mean derailment for our concept of civic self-government.

Local self-government is important because of its proximity to its citizens. This closeness leads to a greater degree of democratic accountability, but only if municipal governments do not become overly dependent on outside governments.

[Mr. Roche.]

Not only would a more decentralized system of government be attuned to the needs of its citizens, but it would also cost less. Administrative costs per capita for municipal governments are less than one-third the size of federal government administrative costs per capita. It would be hard to argue that local governments would waste tax money, when the federal government has presided over an increase in the federal public service of 44 per cent, despite the Prime Minister's promise to cut the public service by 10 per cent.

When federal and provincial grants do not meet the needs of the municipalities, they resort to borrowing. This borrowing is applied primarily to the construction of vitally important capital facilities such as roads, sewer and water systems and recreational facilities.

The recently announced $1 billion municipal debt reduction program in Alberta will provide Edmonton with $239 million to retire 90 per cent of its debt. The province of Alberta's serious concern over the debt situation in its municipalities is to be commended. The level of the program—$1 billion—and this concern expressed by Alberta are indications of the seriousness of the debt situation which municipalities face across the country. These special grants underscore the real need in municipalities for a systematic allocation of funds.

Of course, the need of municipalities in the other provinces that do not have Alberta's wealth remains as acute as ever. They cannot wait for cash surpluses. They need the revenue now to cancel their debts and they need the revenue in the future to prevent the accumulation of debts. Municipalities cannot continue to operate at a deficit with the hope that the money will eventually come from somewhere if they wait long enough. They need to have control over when that money arrives.

In the longer term, cities will have to obtain a more fixed and predictable form of revenue than property taxes, grants and borrowing. Direct access by the municipalities to revenue would not involve an increase in the level of taxation. Instead it would require a shift from one level of government to another. The Canadian public finance system is capable of raising enough tax revenue to pay for all public services provided by the three levels of government, even in the face of expanded demand. Although there is enough revenue to meet all expenditures, cities have had persistent deficits in their financing, while federal and provincial governments have shown a surplus over 20 years, even taking into consideration the deficits the federal government has run in the past couple of years.

The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities at the 1973 tri-level conference stated:

> We are firmly convinced that the tax revenues of government in Canada today are more than adequate to support the costs of managing growth. In fact, the existing tax revenues should be adequate to offset the costs of many additional responsibilities, if the methods by which fiscal resources are allocated among the three governments can be rationalized. Primarily, they require substantial re-deployment downwards to the local level of government.

● (1720)

That statement remains valid in 1979.

If this problem were easy to solve, I suppose it would have been solved long ago. Political realism enters the picture. Local governments could be given the power to tax in areas other than property taxes. But tax power given to the municipalities would have to be taken away from the federal or provincial government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. However, with the unanimous consent of the House the hon. member may continue. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for their courtesy in allowing me to continue.

The problem is how to decide how much tax power transferred from which level of government, and under what conditions, should now be brought into place. Once the local government gained the power to tax, a decision would have to be made on whether city administrations are capable of handling the collection and dispersal of the taxation revenue. Differences in rates of taxation among cities might lead to shifts in population trends as taxpayers sought to live where they paid lower taxes.

Consideration ought to be given to a more effective means of giving the municipalities a secure source of revenue through revenue sharing. In other words, the municipalities would not be given taxation powers, as with tax sharing, but would be given a fixed percentage of the revenues gathered by federal and provincial governments. Revenue sharing would presumably eliminate the need for grants, and cities could calculate with assurance their expected total revenue.

The route to a proper mechanism could be found by a tri-level task force, which could work out an effective way of implementing either revenue or tax sharing. The representatives of the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities should be present at any federal-provincial meeting, including those on the constitution, not just as guests but as participants. This is the theory behind the tri-level process begun in the early 1970s but now suspended because a few provinces refused to give up their total jurisdiction over municipalities and because Ottawa is afraid to lead the way in a new national urban policy.

I want to see tri-level meetings made regular and systematic as a form of government in Canada, because it is only in such meetings that the voice of local governments can be heard. Let us end forever the idea that local government does not belong at these high level conferences. There is no doubt in my mind that the cities can make a positive contribution to our present day constitutional debate. As has been said through the mayors and municipalities associations:

> We are fully prepared to assist in setting new directions for Canada that will serve the interests of all Canadians—directions that will hopefully lead us to a stronger, more united Canada for the decades ahead.

It is long past time to streamline government in Canada and allow the municipalities to stand on their own feet. The federal government should take the initiative in finding tax room for local government. And the municipalities who so urgently need revenue should be directly involved in negotiations and should, of course, be held politically responsible for any new revenue sources granted.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us were rather amazed to listen to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) list a litany of sin and evil which the province of Alberta is guilty of, specifically in reference to the city of Edmonton. It has not provided funds or assisted the city with its police force. Edmonton is a city with a high rate of rape and other crime, and where health care is poor because the provincial government has not provided the funds.

Mr. Alexander: You have deliberately missed the point.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While I would not suggest to the House that the hon. member is deliberately misinterpreting my remarks, he is certainly inadvertently misinterpreting specifically what I said with respect to the province of Alberta having given $1 billion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has the floor.

Mr. Anderson: In the event the House misinterprets the hon. member's remarks, I am saying that we are all aware that municipalities are creatures of the provincial government. Do we accept that first point? If we accept that first point then the second point follows as night follows day. If there is a shortage of funds for essential services in the city of Edmonton, then I suggest the hon. member not mislead this House and say that it is the fault of the federal government. I would suggest that the hon. member has brought out a litany of sins against the province of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: That is a province that cannot cry poor or say that it does not have the money to assist its municipalities. I have some prepared remarks but I must reiterate that I was amazed to hear the hon. member say that it is the fault of the federal government that we are not getting these sources of funds for the city of Edmonton. That city is surrounded by wealth unknown in other provinces. If it is not able to carry on essential services, whose fault is it? Is it the fault of the federal government, which has no jurisdiction whatosever in municipal affairs? The hon. member is less than honest if he assumes or misleads this House by saying it is the federal government which has financial responsibility for the city of Edmonton.

He knows and we know that it is the government of the province of Alberta that has total responsibility in the taxation field. If the province of Alberta wishes to give taxation responsibility to the city of Edmonton, it does not have to ask the federal government. Elected representatives do not have to ask their colleagues in Ottawa; all they have to do is to pass legislation in the Edmonton legislature that will give taxation authority to the city of Edmonton and to communities in the province of Alberta which are apparently suffering under a debt load that is unbearable in that province. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona does not say it but he has given one of the most damaging indictments of a provincial government not assisting its municipalities.

Mr. Alexander: Let us have your prepared speech; time is running out.

Mr. Anderson: It is strange indeed that at the present time the province of Alberta is running a provincial election and the first half of the hon. member's speech is an attack on the existing provincial government. Hon. members in this House I am sure would agree that it was a litany of omission, of greed by a provincial government that is not willing to share its resources with its municipalities. But in absolute terms, as usually happens in this august House, after reading off a litany of sins which are under the direct control of Alberta, the hon. member concludes that it is the fault of the federal government. We are the ones that are doing this.

Mr. Alexander: Most things are.

Mr. Anderson: Let it be said in clear and absolute terms that the municipalities are the creatures of the provincial government. We in the federal government could not pass one iota of legislation which would give the municipalities a share of any legislation, provincial or federal, because we do not have that authority.

An hon. Member: You go through the back door. Just like the airports.

Mr. Anderson: Let me say it again. Some hon. members opposite are not aware of how our system operates. The municipalities are creatures of each province.

● (1730)

Mr. Alexander: We all know that.

Mr. Anderson: If the hon. member wishes to get legislation changed in order that municipalities, including the city of Edmonton, can provide better service to the people in their communities, he will have to direct the speech he made to the provincial governments. That is absolutely clear. I am pleased he should have stood up in the House today, during a provincial election, and said that the government in his province is not treating the municipalities fairly in the distribution of tax revenues. That is a damning indictment of the policy of the provincial government in respect to its treatment of the municipalities and it is much more effective when coming from a Conservative member of the House, at a time when there is a Conservative government in power in Alberta. A member of the NDP or of the Liberal party might be accused of being partisan, but the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) cannot, surely, be accused of being partisan.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I thought we came here to have a serious discussion on a serious subject. The hon. member is playing cheap politics by distorting my remarks. He ought to be ashamed of himself for using such cheap shot tactics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: Obviously we must have struck home.

Mr. Alexander: No, you did not.

Mr. Anderson: If the hon. member was so serious, if his ideals are so lofty, if his motives are so much better than mine, why did he not put the blame where it lies, in this area of responsibility for the sharing of taxation funds, that is to say, upon the provinces, rather than use the federal government as a whipping boy though he knows the area is one over which it has no jurisdiction? If the hon. member's motives are so pure, why did he not make this clear?

It is the provincial government which is responsible for the situation involving the city of Edmonton which the hon. member so categorically put on record. I may be accused of being partisan but I listened carefully to what the hon. member said. He told us an extreme problem had arisen in Edmonton brought about by the financial policy of that province. The government of that province is Conservative. I listened carefully to what he said because he can certainly not be called partisan being, as he is, aligned with it.

The root of the difficulty basically is that the municipalities are limited to taxing real property. This area of taxation amounts to about 85 per cent of their revenue, the other 15 per cent coming from licensing, business licences and so on. The hon. member recognizes that this tax base is extremely limited. It is not only extremely limited, but this way of raising revenue is extremely unpopular; people in these communities get a real property tax bill once a year for a lump sum and any increases are very disturbing to them. The hon. member might have considered how the federal government could possibly become involved in a tri-partite discussion of this matter when it has no jurisdiction whatever in the field. It is strictly the provinces which have the right to change pertinent legislation if they wish to do so.

If there are to be changes, those changes will have to come from the provinces. May I put it on record that the provinces at the present time derive revenue from the proceeds of personal income tax, corporate income tax, sales tax, succession duty, and returns from government enterprises as well as returns from levies imposed upon natural resources whether by way of royalties or otherwise. In fact they have access to virtually all revenues accruing to the Government of Canada except customs duties. It would be very hard for the hon. member to convince us that the federal government, which is already running into budget deficits, should take the lead in steps to equalize the distribution of money to the municipalities, especially since he comes from the province of Alberta. Day after day we are told the federal government should be more responsible financially yet the hon. member is suggesting it is our responsibility to bring about the equalization of payments to municipalities and that somehow the provinces are completely out of the picture and can wash their hands of it.

Mr. Alexander: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Anderson: I do not think this is the forum in which this matter should be resolved. After watching the proceedings at federal-provincial conferences I suspect the federal government would be looked upon with a jaundiced eye if we were to attempt to tell the provinces how they should equalize their payments to the municipalities. I suspect they would give the hon. member the same advice as I do, that this is in the hands of the provinces, not in the hands of the federal government.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) I had hoped that in this short hour we would have benefited from a serious discussion of a very important issue instead of such partisan cheap shots as we have just heard. Instead of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) being the first speaker over there it would have been better had Your Honour recognized the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), who is in his place today, because of something he said a few days ago. I notice that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, having made his cheap political attack, has left the chamber. That is par for the course over there.

Mr. Alexander: For him, anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The motion before us, which I support, does not talk about the sharing of funds. It talks about a revision of our taxation system. If hon. members will examine the motion put forward today and the motion which the hon. member for Westmount sought to move under Standing Order 43 on Valentine's Day, February 14, they will find a marked similarity between them.

● (1740)

The hon. member for Westmount made it clear, even though we all know it, that municipalities are creatures of the provinces, and in his motion he wanted the House to call on the provincial governments to invite the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities to participate in a certain process, but what was the process? It was "the ongoing process of constitutional reform with a view to entrenching powers in the constitution so as to provide municipalities with the powers and revenues necessary to permit them to effectively discharge"—why did the hon. member split that infinitive?—"their responsibilities and to provide the services expected of them by the Canadian public." I think the two members, one a Conservative and one a Liberal, have made a useful contribution to this subject by their motions. The one which was made the other day under Standing Order 43 was not allowed. Somebody said no.

Mr. Alexander: A Liberal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I suppose the motion which is before us today will be talked out, but the issue is not the simple matter which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni talks about, namely, a rich province sharing some funds it has in the bank. The issue is our tax system and the distribution of powers among the three levels of government.

Much was said by the last speaker about the provinces giving things to their municipalities. Provinces cannot give what they do not have. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni may say that the federal government have given away all sorts of taxing rights to the provinces, but the provinces certainly do not see it that way. As I say, I think what we should have had in this hour was a serious discussion along the lines of two very good motions, the one before us now and the one the hon. member for Westmount tried to move on Wednesday, February 14.

I support this motion, and I hope that even yet it might be referred to a committee, or that the subject matter might be referred to a committee. It happens once in a blue moon and—who knows—maybe the moon will be blue tonight.

There is just one other thing I would like to say before I sit down and leave time for others, and that is that one of the reasons we in this party feel very strongly about a revision of the taxation system as it affects municipalities is that we believe in taxation according to ability to pay. Property taxation is not according to ability to pay, and when we force our cities and municipalities to provide so many of the services they have to provide on the basis of that unfair system of taxation, it is just not right, it is just not modern, and it is not humane. It is in the federal field, in the provincial field, and in the field of what we can do under the constitution that we can provide for taxation to be put on the basis of ability to pay. I think we should move in that direction, and I say as I sit down that I welcome the motion which is before us today, as I welcomed the motion my friend across the way tried to move on February 14.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to contribute very briefly to the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) which concerns a very current issue. I would like to congratulate the hon. member for having raised this subject.

During my political career, I have often been closely involved in municipal affairs. The subject of this motion therefore recalls to my mind my years in municipal affairs, and I have to say that I agree in principle with the motion.

Mr. Speaker, it has become obvious that revenue is insufficient in view of the increasing responsibilities of municipalities. We have been aware of this for a long time. This question has also been discussed for a long time, but no valid solution has ever been proposed. Every municipality in my province must provide essential public services, such as water systems, sewers, fire protection services, recreational activities, road construction and all kinds of other related services to promote building and residential development.

Rural municipalities face very difficult problems because an increasing number of urban dwellers have been settling down in rural areas, to avoid in many cases, I imagine, the extremely high tax burden brought about by the financing of these sewers and water systems. Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that municipal affairs come under provincial jurisdiction. I have known this for a long time and I hope that this will never change. However, it is time the municipalities had a greater share of the fiscal pie.

Mr. Speaker, statistics show that municipalities sunk so deep into debt that the servicing charges account for some 60 per cent of their budgets. They cannot count on the remaining 40 per cent to expand and improve the services provided their citizens. This is a situation that must be looked into. We all know the enormous costs municipalities have to pay for the design and construction of water and sewer systems, so much so that even with provincial subsidies they must face decades or even a half-century of debt repayment at excessive interest rates. This is why they are at the mercy of higher governments for further financing or additional subsidies. It must be remembered that under the current financing system, where a water and sewer system costs nearly $1 million, ratepayers will have to pay $5 million. So the current burden of municipalities is debt service.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the situation in Quebec rather than other provinces, because municipalities are under provincial jurisdiction and the laws may vary. I read last week in a Montreal area newspaper that the municipality of Sainte-Lucie, in the Laurentians, was so deep into debt it is incapable of getting out, and ratepayers refuse to pay their property taxes. There is something basically wrong and we must have a very serious look at this to find a solution. I see that my colleague from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) wants to contribute, so I will conclude on a suggestion. Earlier the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated the mover had no proposal to solve the problem. This may be, but I would like to put forward a suggestion made by the Canadian Association of Municipalities before parliament, before the cabinet, in a self-explanatory brief. In that brief cabinet was urged to amend the Bank of Canada Act so the latter could make long-term loans to provinces so that the latter in turn may extend long-term credit to municipalities, with an interest rate covering service charges only. I am here to represent these municipal governments, and I support their proposals. I would therefore call upon cabinet to consider this serious matter once more, before all our municipalities go bankrupt.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to have too much to say—

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you have recognized three speakers from the opposition side—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

• (1750)

Mr. Alexander: I just want to be on the record as stating that what I heard from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) would indicate to me that, notwithstanding the fact that three quarters of the population of this great country of ours in the 1980s will be living in cities which are bigger than many of the provinces, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni thinks that the cities are not important, nor should they be an important participant in the constitutional debate. He indicated to the people of Canada that the cities are unwanted, not needed, are irrelevant. I will not say that he meant that deliberately, because we are not allowed to say that, but perhaps I will say that he was less than honest with regard to the thrust of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). He made that statement with malice aforethought, and if that is unparliamentary I will have to think about withdrawing it.

What the hon. member was attempting to say is that the needs of the cities are increasing but that their revenues are decreasing, and that it is about time we accepted that as a fact, knowing that in reality our cities are growing into megalopolises of the size of New York. Therefore we must be concerned about their future in terms of the environmental malaise which stems from this growth.

When I talk about environmental malaise I refer to the drunkeness, the broken homes, the family squabbles, the deprivation that children are facing, the frustration of living in big cities, and so on. This is what the hon. member was talking about. He was saying that these problems which come about as a result of the growth of cities need solutions, and one of the solutions he is thinking about is that we should sincerely think about a tripartite approach. In other words, it is time now to say that cities should count. This is the opposite of what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni stated. What he wanted to do was to take advantage of the situation by throwing a few cheap shots.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And then running.

Mr. Alexander: And then running, because he knows there is now an election in Alberta. But I am talking about the problems of the cities in general. I become very concerned because now and again we have an election and I remember this government was talking about urban transportation during the 1974 election campaign and it spoke about pouring millions of dollars into the city of Toronto because, as it said, it understood there was a need.

What did they do after they were elected? They forgot all about the promises. I remember their promises in Hamilton where they said, "You need an expanded airport and here are X millions of dollars with which we will do it." That was in 1971. It is now 1979 and we still do not have that expanded airport. What I am saying is that at times these people recognize there is a need in terms of the urban environment and they spare no expense and no promise in terms of trying to suck the public in, and then they leave them high and dry after they have accomplished their purpose and become elected.

What disturbs me also is the fact that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said that the federal government has no clout or legislative authority because it is the provinces which have jurisdiction over the cities—the cities are creatures of the provinces. We all know that, but we all know as well that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) would think nothing of introducing an incentive plan in order that people can purchase homes, which results in subdivisions being built, which puts a certain amount of stress on the municipal purse. He did not mention that, but that is one way to get in through the back door.

I can also tell you the same thing with respect to airports. They can build a Mirabel or a Pickering which will upset the environment in any municipality, and at times they will do that without any consultation until they are caught, at which time they will admit that they did move a little too early and that they should have consulted. So, Mr. Speaker, do not let the hon. member for Comox-Alberni con you, as I would say back in the city of Hamilton.

A few years ago—I think the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) was with me on the joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Constitution, although I am not sure—I realized what an important part of our Canadian way of life were our growing cities. I was impressed with the problems I encountered. This goes back a few years. At that time we made recommendations in terms of the constitution and what it should contain regarding cities. I found out, just as did the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, that the Task Force on National Unity had nothing to say about the growth of our cities. I am surprised about that. I received our tax bill this week. I went home feeling so happy on Friday when my wife said that the first two instalments are in. But then I became unhappy. The point is, sir, that even with Bill C-60, the bill on the constitution, we have not yet heard a word about the problems which the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona brought forward.

We must now direct our attention to the problems of the cities, and the only way we can do this is to convince the provinces. I know they are very jealous about their rights. They say, "You cannot go over us, under us, or through us, without consultation," but what is missing, I think, is the leadership which must come from the federal government.

I notice the good doctor, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), wants to speak this evening. I do not know whether or not I will give him an opportunity to speak. What the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is asking for is leadership by this government in bringing the parties together to see how we can solve this serious situation. We do not want to get into a partisan debate in the manner of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni who thought that, as parliamentary secretary, this would be a marvellous chance for him to attack a member from Alberta, which he did. I was ashamed, because I have respect for that member. At times he does his job, but this time we on this side were a little disgusted to see that a parliamentary secretary would jump up in such an eager way, having forgotten that one of his leading lights, the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), spoke only recently on October 16, I think, putting the problems of the cities before the House of Commons and his own party—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, February 14.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, February 14, Valentine's Day, the day of love, understanding and compassion. The hon. member for Westmount brought in that motion, and do you know who said no, Mr. Speaker? The Liberals, as usual, said no. I suppose that is becoming a little partisan, but the fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona as well had the same idea in mind and his motion has come to the front. What do you find? You find a Liberal member who represents a thriving province who should know the problems, of, say, the city of Vancouver and of other big cities. These are problems beyond our immediate comprehension.

All we are trying to do at this time is to emphasize, re-emphasize, delineate and underscore the need that we as members of parliament must be ever aware of, the needs of our growing cities. You cannot call them, as did the hon. member, and I will paraphrase him, unwanted second cousins. That is what he attempted to do. You cannot imply, as did the hon. member, that they are not needed in the constitutional debate, that they should not be there. That is the height of irresponsibility.

I share the views and the initiative taken not only by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, for whom I have a great deal of respect. Also I have a great deal of respect for the hon. member for Westmount and for my good friend, the House leader of the NDP, who also seems to have the ability to put his finger on the problems. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) indicated that he had more to say but that he wanted to hear the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton West who comes from a big city, faced with problems.

The government is thinking about introducing a centre for occupational health and safety. It is another big mess. The government is talking about establishing the office in Ottawa which, in my view, is the last place it should be. We have the expertise—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the representatives of the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party for the responsible support they gave this motion.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, before the supper hour I dealt with the introductory part of my remarks, but perhaps just briefly to recap I should say that I dealt with the instability of the Iranian situation. I dealt with the fact that Iran, as the second largest OPEC producer, produced in the order of six million barrels a day, and that production has not been available to OPEC consumers since late December. Even though other OPEC producers have tried to make up part of that, they have not been able to make it all up; indeed, perhaps only about half of it.

● (2010)

The result of that in terms of world consumption is that there has been a drop in equivalent oil production of 5 per cent. That 5 per cent is not very far off the trigger mechanism of the International Energy Agency which prescribes the 7 per cent figure. In the event that the consumption by IEA members is forced back to a 7 per cent lower level compared to a year ago, then the trigger mechanism would be activated, which would involve an allocation system throughout the IEA nations.

I also said that Canada is a net importer and that we are dependent on imports of oil. We have been able to reduce our dependence in a number of ways, partly through the extension of the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal which has reduced our dependence by 300,000 barrels a day, from 800,000 barrels a day down to 500,000 barrels a day. That 500,000 barrels a day figure, however, is still a significant dependency by eastern Canada and part of Quebec.

I commented on the fact that Petro-Canada has been very active in seeking additional sources of supply through arrangements with the Mexican national company and, as members know, Petro-Canada has been active in a number of other ways to ensure that Canada's dependence on foreign oil can be reduced. I refer to the activities of Petro-Canada during the past year, its acquisition of Pacific Petroleums Ltd., and the emphasis it has given to the heavy oils. There has also been a very substantial initiative by Husky in the development of heavy oil since it was taken over by the Alberta Gas Trunk Line. This ownership, this repatriation to Canada, would never have taken place had it not been for Petro-Canada.

I referred to the reason that we should act now, given the fact that the world oil situation is in an unpredictable situation and that one cannot be sure whether the Iranians will be able to repair production. Nor can one be sure of how other OPEC nations may react to the current crisis or what other events may intervene.

As the adjournment occurred, Mr. Speaker, I was introducing some of the powers of the new board. I was pointing out under the legislation before us that the allocation of powers which we are seeking would be invoked by the governor in council when, in his opinion, by reason of shortages or market disturbances, the national security, welfare, or the economic stability of Canada is affected to the point where in the national interest it is necessary to conserve our supplies of petroleum products.

I would like to deal briefly now with some of the duties of the board. In the event of an emergency being declared by the governor in council, it will be the board's job to implement a mandatory allocation program to assure sufficient supplies of oil products and their equitable distribution. This is provided in part I of the bill. This activity would include, among other things, designating the regions of Canada in which the program is to be implemented—if the whole country is not to be involved—specifying the petroleum products that are to be controlled, providing for systematic allocation of the controlled products on a priority basis, and setting up an appeal system to hear possible complaints.

Under the planning which has already been done, three degrees of priority are recognized. The first priority is category critical which deals, for example, with health services, security, and food products. The second priority is essential, which has to do with the manufacturing industry and employment. The final category is non-essential as, for example, leisure activities.

With respect to prices, this House will, of course, recognize that price control is a necessary concomitant of any allocation scheme. The board will therefore also be empowered to make regulations prescribing the price at which, or a range of prices within which, any controlled product may be sold. This authority, like all other regulations made by the board, will require the approval of the governor in council.

Part II of the bill relates to the rationing of controlled products. This part will be activated when the governor in council instructs the board to extend the mandatory allocation program if it appears that the supplies of a controlled product are, or are likely to be, so short as to cause the mandatory allocation plan to fail. A rationing program for motor gasoline has already been developed under the previous act and can be implemented within a lead time ranging from three months to six months.

One change we have made in the bill from the former Energy Supplies Emergency Act relates to this rationing program. This envisages the use of chartered banks, which have agreed to assist in the administration of the program by handling coupons and coupon accounts. The banks are enabled to take part in the scheme, despite any provisions in the Bank Act that may have prevented them from doing so. The post offices will be used for the primary distribution of coupons to the public.

Mr. Paproski: We will never get them.

Mr. Gillespie: The emphasis in any allocation program will be on practicality and simplicity in implementation. The Emergency Supplies Allocation Board will therefore have to seek the advice of oil companies. This may involve the companies in collective discussion of such advice to the board and in co-operative action. With this in view, special provision is made in the bill in case the companies are required—and I must emphasize the term "required"—to enter into agreements, arrangements or courses of action which might involve contravention of the Combines Investigation Act. The board may in those circumstances, by order, and only after consultation with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, exempt an applicant and such other persons as it deems necessary from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, but only to the extent required to enable the applicant to comply with the allocation program.

The legislation empowers the board, in order to make better use of the available supplies of a controlled product, to make special regulations providing for a temporary relaxation of certain laws that currently restrict the emission of sulphur pollutants into the atmosphere. However, this would be done upon the issue of a short-term permit and only after consultation with the responsible ministers of the federal and provincial governments, for example, the departments of environment and health and welfare.

There are also provisions in the bill to enable the National Energy Board and the Canadian Transport Commission to co-operate with ESAB which will be co-ordinating programs in order to ensure that the petroleum products may be moved as directed by the board in order to relieve anticipated shortages.

Finally, this law will require the compulsory termination of a mandatory allocation program after 12 months, unless such a program is extended by the order of the governor in council with the approval of parliament. However, no such order may extend the mandatory allocation program for longer than 12 months at a time. The bill requires that a motion to adopt an extension order be tabled in each House of Parliament within seven days after it has been made. If the House of Commons negatives the motion the allocation program shall thereupon terminate. We believe this is a better solution than the one that was worked out and included in the previous bill involving a sunset clause in which the whole legislation self-destructed in mid-1976.

I should like to say a word or two about federal-provincial industrial consultation which is a very important area. Allocation and rationing plans have been developed since 1974 by the original Energy Supplies Allocation Board and, since its demise, by officials of my department. These plans would form the basis of programs to be implemented by a recreated ESAB. They have been evolved as a result of extensive consultation with provincial governments, the petroleum industry and representatives of petroleum-consuming interests. I would expect this process of consultation to be continued by a new board. As I already indicated, membership of the board itself would reflect provincial, private consumer, and industrial interests. I am aware that allocation programs can only work effectively with broad public support. The board will, through consultation, seek such support and provincial co-operation.

Canada's energy needs are large in order to support our high standard of living, to deal with a cold climate, and to provide the transportation links across our broad land.

Canada's energy potential is great, and this government has worked long and hard to realize that potential. Let me give a few examples of this. The oil sands development is being encouraged by the payment of international prices for this product; by appropriate fiscal terms; and by direct participation in the Syncrude project where the federal government has a significant equity holding. Other important initiatives of the government include oil and gas exploration fostered by our pricing policies and by tax reliefs which specially assist pioneer efforts in frontier areas such as the Beaufort Sea.

The Canada-United States gas pipeline treaty opens the way for pipeline access to already discovered reserves in the McKenzie Delta. Petro-Canada, the bête noire of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the major policy instrument in Canadian participation and government participation in industry, has become in three short years a major force in our petroleum industry, providing a stimilus to exploration, and participating in schemes for the expansion of eastern Canadian gas markets. I am referring to the gas pipeline which would move natural gas all the way to the maritimes, the bold plan to bring Arctic Islands gas to eastern Canada, liquefied natural gas from the high Arctic, using the Canadian system, and working to develop the heavy oils of western Canada.

The attitude of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to Petro-Canada was recycled last Friday, I believe, in Vancouver, when he said once again that he would dismantle Petro-Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gillespie: Hon. members opposite applaud the notion that Petro-Canada should be dismantled.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Because you are making such a mess of it.

Mr. Gillespie: Some hon. members on the other side come from Atlantic Canada. Hon. members must know that if it were not for Petro-Canada there would have been no oil and gas exploration on the offshore Nova Scotia shelf in the last year.

Hon. members should know that as a result of Petro-Canada's initiatives it will be participating in the exploration and development of the coast off Labrador. Hon. members should know that Petro-Canada is stepping in because the French consortium, the EastCan group, is not prepared to go ahead. Petro-Canada is, because it is in the national interest, and because it believes there is a very good opportunity of discovering significant findings of oil and gas.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is Petro-Canada going to take over all the oil in Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: The Leader of the Opposition said weakly in Vancouver, when he was asked about Petro-Canada, that he would use the Canadian Commercial Corporation to buy oil and natural gas. That has to be as limp and lame an approach to our national energy problem as anything he has put forward. One could ask if he might use the Canadian Commercial Corporation as well when, let us say, the Chairman of mainland China said, "I want to deal with a Canadian national oil company. I want to deal with Petro-Canada. I want Petro-Canada to come to China and help us explore, and I would like you to bring some Canadian companies as well." Has the opposition explained how that would be done? I presume they would probably turn it over to Exxon because that has been their posture up to now.

The Leader of the Opposition might also be asked how he would replace Petro-Canada in a deal with the Norwegian state oil company which wants to deal with the national oil company of Canada. It is considering it, along with a number of very interesting proposals, including drilling in offshore waters such as the Arctic waters north of 60. I suppose the opposition, in a situation like that, would turn that over to one of the internationals as well.

When the government of Venezuela says it wants to deal with the national oil companies of other countries, and says it wants to deal with the national oil company of Canada, it must wonder about the leader of an opposition that hopes to be the government, who says he would destroy the national oil company. In effect, he is saying to Venezuela, "We do not want to deal with you."

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister has convinced me of the virtues of Petro-Canada. I noticed the members behind him are cheering a lot, and I wonder if he would inform the House under what circumstances Petro-Canada was created.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question can only be asked with the consent of the minister. The hon. member took the floor without permission of the Chair. I think it is for the minister to decide whether he wants to answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to answer any questions at the end of my remarks. Let it be quite clear that the Government of Canada, the Liberal government, in 1974 introduced the legislation which created Petro-Canada. It received support from the New Democratic Party but absolutely no support from the Tory opposition. Ever since then the Conservative party has been out to stick a knife in the back—to stab Petro-Canada. They would dismantle and destroy one of the most important policy instruments for energy in this country.

Mr. McKenzie: Call the election.

Mr. Gillespie: Hon. members opposite you should quieten some of their friends.

Mr. McKenzie: Call the election.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, with your assistance, I should like to carry on with my remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the use of the word by the hon. member that I just heard is parliamentary. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) should be very careful, and at the same time should allow the minister to make his speech.

• (2030)

An hon. Member: Tell us a little about Bill C-42.

Mr. Gillespie: I recognize the sensitivity of some members opposite. I understand why they are embarrassed and why they are having difficulty with the decision of their leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: It is fairly obvious from those making a noise on the other side, and from those who are not, that there is a problem on the other side.

There are a number of important measures which this government has taken to reduce our dependence on foreign oil. I would like to refer to the measures that we have taken to stimulate electric power development with the government in Newfoundland. We have created a very important corporation named the Lower Churchill Development Corporation. This is a corporation which can bring in a massive supply of power from the Lower Churchill development. It is power which is now going to waste. But, as a result of the joint effort of the two governments and the creation of the Lower Churchill Development Corporation, there is a chance that that power will be developed for the use of Labrador and Newfoundland, perhaps also for the use of the province of Quebec and the maritimes. This will be a very important project in the order of some billions of dollars which will provide several thousand megawatts of power.

Today I tabled in the House a memorandum of understanding which was reached through negotiations with three provincial premiers. This is also a very forward looking concept. This establishment of a maritime energy corporation will draw together the three maritime provinces in electrical energy planning with respect to transmission and generation for the first time. This system will operate with a centralized computer so that a least cost power system will be available for the maritimes. This corporation will be big enough to finance new projects in the maritimes, projects which will be too big for any one province to finance, construct, or manage by itself.

We have not neglected the important demand side of the energy equation. The government has taken a host of measures directed at increased conservation and a greater use of renewable energy to reduce requirements of conventional fuels. Hon. members opposite may wish to forget it, but members on this side remember only too well the announcement last July 4 of measures involving $380 million over five years aimed at developing renewable energy, using our forest energy and using solar technology. Those are all important measures from the point of view of reducing our dependence on foreign oil. All these measures have helped reduce our current and prospective dependence on imported energy, specifically foreign oil. But some oil import dependence will remain for the foreseeable future.

As the House knows, I am working hard to ensure that a major part of our oil imports is derived from secure sources and secure commercial arrangements, another area in which Petro-Canada has already started to play an active role. A degree of insecurity is, nevertheless, inevitably associated with our remaining dependence upon imported oil. This is primarily the problem this legislation addresses.

I referred earlier to the political developments in Iran and the cessation of oil exports from that country. This incident has brought home once again the fact that an interruption in the supply of offshore oil can occur with very little warning. If the current disruption continues for several more months, the total shortage of supply could cause the activation of the emergency oil sharing plan by the International Energy Agency. By participating in this agreement we are committed to being ready at all times with a program of contingent oil demand restraint measures enabling us to reduce our rate of consumption. Some international agency member countries have already publicly announced measures to deal with the oil supply disruptions to their countries. As far as we are concerned, we have the necessary plans in place. What is urgently required now is legislative authority to move quickly, if we have to, to implement our allocation and rationing plans.

If it became necessary to declare an emergency, crude oil allocation could be implemented in seven days. The petroleum product allocation program would take 60 days to implement, and the motor gasoline rationing program would require a lead time of up to six months.

What is needed now is legislation in place to enable the government to implement these programs without delay should we face a serious shortage of supply. It is on this basis that I commend to the House Bill C-42, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard from the minister how all is serene, calm, and light on the horizon. He has informed us that as a result of his own particular genius and never ending overtime efforts, all is well. The minister, I must say, reminds me of that old depression days cartoon where one bum says to the other bum, "If you're so smart, why ain't we rich?" If the minister is so smart and so much has been done by this government, why are we in this energy mess and why do we have this bill before us?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: It is as simple as that. The minister has gone through a long recital of facts, as he calls them. They may have been mainly argumentative. I would like to give my version of the chronology of what has been going on. It may be as distorted as the minister's, but I will try to wipe out the type of political argument for which the minister is getting such a reputation. I would like to make what I hope will be a fair, impartial, and completely non-political presentation of the facts.

As a result of the first OPEC crisis in 1973 this government introduced a bill which was almost identical to the one before us tonight. The 1974 bill, however, lacked, in our view, some needed guarantees that parliament be consulted. That bill in its original form was quite open-ended in that it gave the government authority to move unilaterally into certain fields which we and others considered to be clearly provincial jurisdictions. The Progressive Conservative demand in those days for a sunset provision in the bill or a self-destruct mechanism for its operation was eventually and reluctantly agreed to by the government, but not our request that parliament have the opportunity to express itself either before, during or after the decision was taken by the government to implement the procedures in that old bill. Our reason for asking that the sunset provision be inserted was to make sure that the bill would eventually die and that the government would then be forced, on the death of that bill, to re-examine the whole situation completely.

As a result of the 1974 crisis as well, Canada, along with what subsequently turned out to be 18 other nations, under the sponsorship of the OECD entered into an agreement which, in effect, required Canada to assist the other signatory nations of the western world, as they would assist us, to make up any short form of crude oil supply that might occur. Essentially, that 1974 agreement called for the triggering of a procedure to reallocate world petroleum supplies outside of Iron Curtain countries when a shortage of at least 7 per cent of world supplies was encountered over all. A complicated formula of reallocation was designed to see that the shortfall to any nation was shared by all the others.

● (2040)

It is important to recognize that the situation which triggered the implementation of that treaty was one involving the sharing of the effect of the shortfall in the total consumption of petroleum products by the signatory countries. This is important. It required a shortfall of not just imported crude oil or petroleum products but a shortage in the total consumption of all petroleum products in the signatory countries. To focus on the Canadian situation, the Canadian allocation of foreign crude was based on Canada's total consumption of oil resources, domestic and foreign, not just a shortage of imports.

The government knew of these arrangements. It had signed the treaty and it understood the procedures. In fact it was a member of the executive committee. The 1974 supply crisis passed into a price crisis. Happily, there had been no need to invoke the provisions of the bill or of the treaty. The act itself died on January 30, 1976, as a result of the sunset provision we insisted the government should put in place.

Did the government consider the over-all picture? That act had died. There was the treaty of 1974. The minister told us tonight that those measures in the bill before us, and I am using his actual words, now, would be necessary for us to fulfil our commitment under the international energy program. That is the treaty I am talking about. In other words, there was the 1974 treaty to which all countries outside the communist world believed Canada had committed herself in a meaningful way. The bill which was to implement the terms of that treaty died in 1976, intentionally as far as the opposition was concerned, because we wanted to force the government into reconsidering the whole picture. What happened? The same as what had been happening in many of these economic and resource fields under the present minister. Nothing happened. He either considered the whole picture and decided that no emergency allocation bill was necessary, or he did not consider it at all.

In either event I believe the government is to be very severely criticized. Did the government replace the bill? No. Was anything done to expand the pipeline capacity of this country so that crude oil could be moved into these regional areas where, obviously, there is likely to be a disparity one day? No. Did the government take any other steps to improve the regional supply position? The answer is obviously no. Did the government do anything at all to resolve the essential ingredient in this issue?

[Mr. Lawrence.]

We needed an improved delivery system for petroleum products so that Canadian resources and supply facilities could fulfil the demands upon them and reduce the effects of control by a foreign-owned industry. What we got was a half-hearted response, mainly from the minister's predecessor. The pipeline was extended to Montreal. But the bottleneck on the western side of Sarnia existed then and still exists today, so that the Montreal refineries continue to require offshore crude oil. This is the difficulty which the minister has not attempted to tackle.

No one is to blame for the bottleneck except the minister. He takes full credit for the setting up of Petro-Can though I think we shall hear argument about that later, and in any case I would point out that Petro-Can is an expensive agency; it is staffed by empire builders rather than resource finders. Between 1976, when the legislation expired, and early 1979 when a new crisis emerged to threaten Canada and the western world, instead of a decent, meaningful policy we were offered lethargy, complacency, and inaction.

To get back to the chronology. In December, 1978, the situation in Iran seriously deteriorated. On December 26, 1978, 20 per cent of Canada's offshore oil supply was stopped. British Petroleum, a state-owned trading corporation, PetroFina, partly owned by a foreign state, Gulf Canada and other companies in eastern Canada were obviously in trouble, along with other companies, because, to varying percentages, they relied on Iranian or OPEC oil. A large percentage of the crude oil used by those refineries came from Iran. But, in the minister's mind, not Imperial. Why? Because Imperial received through Exxon about 100 per cent of the crude oil used in its eastern refineries from Venezuela. Golden Eagle also buys from Venezuela, and Shell, too, uses Venezuelan oil.

Early in January, Exxon informed Imperial Oil that it was invoking the force majeure clause in its supply contracts, and diversions would have to be made on the pattern of the international energy agency's formula. This is the formula which, as I indicated earlier, was important because of the scope and proportion involved, namely, that the cutbacks to Imperial from Exxon would be on the basis of Imperial's total oil consumption and not just on the basis of its imports.

● (2050)

Industry people and government people tell me that there was no question at all, on reading the communications received from Exxon by Imperial, and transmitted in turn by Imperial to this government and to this minister, that this meant that we were in for some fairly serious times as a result of the cutback to Imperial, one of the major forces in the Canadian energy picture. We were in for some very serious times because these cutbacks from Exxon on Venezuelan crude were going to be serious. There was no question whatsoever. Golden Eagle, which is also supplied by Exxon, was also informed of cutbacks. This was in early January.

Immediately—obviously—Imperial moved to find an alternative supply in order to begin to replace the cutbacks imposed by its foreign parent, Exxon. On January 8 of this year, specifically to forewarn this minister, this government, and this government's regulatory body, Imperial Oil Limited informed the National Energy Board and this minister's senior allocation officials of what was going on, why it was going on, and what Imperial intended to do to make up for those diversions. The minister now says that he himself was not informed of these diversions. Under the rules of this House we have to take the minister's word, and I do, but it seems awfully strange to me that the minister can now claim to us that on the basis of many telexes, wires, telegrams and communications flowing back and forth from the National Energy Board to the industry, from the industry to the National Energy Board, and from the minister's department to the industry about these cutbacks—the minister is shaking his head.

I have one right here. I can read to him parts of the telex, for instance, from Mr. Priddle of his department early in January informing the industry of the dangers of the Iranian situation and that the department wanted to be brought up to date on what alternative sources of supply were available. I could read the telex from the National Energy Board dated January 14 urging industry people to come forward quickly with a long series of swap arrangements which were obviously going to have to be made to make up for these cutbacks.

I could read these communications. They are available.

Mr. Gillespie: Go ahead.

Mr. Lawrence: Here is one from Mr. Priddle of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources:

> January 4th telex from Paris indicates Iranian production fell in November to 3.1 million barrels per day and in December to 2.5 million barrels per day.
> This production shortfall has been compensated for by other producing countries and delaying of stockbuilds by industry.

Further on he talks about other dangers with regard to Persian Gulf producers. Then later he says:

> —complete loss of Iranian production in the first quarter would result in a shortage close to 7 per cent of first quarter demand.
> If and when such a point is reached, participating countries may need to reduce demand or use emergency stocks.

Mr. Gillespie: If you read from a document, you have to table it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Just ministers, Alastair.

Mr. Lawrence: I have another fairly long one. I will not take up more of the time of the House, but it is signed by Mr. R. Priddle, of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is a warning to the industry of what was going on and what would have to happen as a result of the Iranian cutback. This is a serious situation. As I say, Exxon had already informed Imperial of this cutback.

I think it is inconceivable that the minister was not kept up to date by his officials, and I say in all frankness and bluntness that I believe the minister was informed by his departmental officials and by the agencies he frequently directed with regard to policy matters at that very time about the necessity of quickly approving swap arrangements. However, he says in this House that he was not informed, and if he says in this House that he was not informed, we have to accept that, and I do, but I say that it seems very strange to me.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member cannot have it both ways. He cannot, on the one hand, say he accepts my word, and then go on in a very devious way to suggest that he does not. He ought to be honest with the House, with me, and with himself. He ought to make it quite clear that he accepts the position which I put forward. He should avoid trying to confuse the situation, which he has done. I am asking him—

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Blais: The minister is speaking about a question of privilege. Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not think a point of order has priority over a question of privilege. I am trying to listen to the minister. There are too many people who think they should be in my place.

I must say that I do not agree with the point made by the minister. I want to say to the minister that the rules of the House forbid a member from accusing another member of lying, of being a liar, or bringing falsehoods to the House. On the other hand, a member is not forced to agree with another member. There are words, however, which cannot be used in the House.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When Your Honour rises, the microphone lights in front of hon. members should, in deference, go off, but not until Your Honour is up out of the chair. Only then should those microphone lights go off. However, I noticed today that the microphone light in front of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) went off before Your Honour rose. His light went off, yet the minister's light went on. I find that very hard to understand, and I wish that those who operate the switches would please take notice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am prepared to look into the matter. The point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is surely valid. I do not generally watch to see whether lights are on. I cannot do that easily, but I am sure the message has been heard by those responsible for the operation of the console. I am sure they do their best in any event.

Mr. Lawrence: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the fair and impartial manner in which you have always conducted the proceedings of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: On January 8 of this year, especially for the purpose of forewarning the government, this minister and the minister's regulatory body, Imperial Oil Limited informed the National Energy Board and the minister's senior allocation official of just what it was that it was doing, and why replacement stocks were needed to take the place of the crude oil which was being diverted. As I say, the minister may now say that he was not informed of those representations to the government. In any event, something happened on approximately that date to wake the minister from the lethargic state in which he had been. He realizes suddenly that alternative sources of crude oil are needed in this country. Why? Because he hot-tails it down to Mexico.

● (2100)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: He is informed by the Mexican authorities that crude oil will not be available in any appreciable quantities, enough in any event to get over the shortage which, it turns out later, he was informed we were not going to reach until at least 1981. That certainly is no help in the short term. So then what does the minister do? The minister goes to Venezuela and the Venezuelans guarantee to the minister that they will continue to ship what they have been shipping, and to the group to which they have been shipping, namely, Exxon Incorporated of New York.

In February the minister comes into the House and tells us that when the Venezuelans first told him they were shipping to Imperial Oil in Canada only through Exxon, it was the first time he realized that the Venezuelan crude supply to Imperial was being handled through a middleman. That is what he said in the House. He shakes his head now, but on page 3301 of Hansard of February 16, the minister said that the Venezuelans:

—pointed out to me that the contractual relationship was with Exxon International—

If they did not have to point it out to the minister, if he knew ahead of time, why did he use that type of language in the House? The assumption that we can draw very fairly from the minister's words are that that was the first time the minister knew. I agree that, to me also, it is inconceivable that that was the first time the minister knew. He should have known long before, but in any event, there we are.

I believe that on that occasion all of a sudden a light lit up in the minister's brain. Suddenly, that rang some sort of bell because, at that point, the minister had a faint memory of the notice he had already received from Imperial Oil of the cut back and the diversion in the Exxon supply. So the minister then turns to the Venezuelans, "How can Canada guarantee our Venezuelan supply when there is a middleman?" "Easy," shrug the Venezuelans, "cut out the middle man." The minister then comes back and propounds this as some modern, novel, unique policy of his for the first time.

Who has been the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources all of this time? The minister comes back from Venezuela and, in a blinding vision, realizes that what has been going on for years is now no good for this country or for this country's oil supplies. Where has he been? Either he knew about this and did nothing, or he did not know about it, in which case he is clearly incompetent.

If the minister wants another date indicating that there was some knowledge of this, let me point out that on January 19 the National Energy Board sent out a telex to the whole industry imploring them to get their applications in for the swap arrangements that had to be made. On January 24 Imperial Oil formally applied to the National Energy Board for a swap for the part of oil that has been diverted away from them. The application was for a cargo of crude to be sold to Imperial Oil and shipped to the Dartmouth docks from an independent company called the Clarke Refining Company of Chicago. Let me point it out to you—this did not come from an industry source, it is in the public domain since, as the minister knows, I received it from the National Energy Board after I requested it from them.

It is the actual formal application, accompanied by a sworn declaration dated January 24, 1979, addressed to the National Energy Board from Imperial Oil Limited formally requesting approval for an agreement with Clarke Oil and Refining Corporation to exchange Canadian crude for equivalent tanker borne foreign crude entering Canada via Portland, Maine, for Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. In actual fact, it was unloaded in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, on February 8. Part of the documentation involved in the application to get the diverted crude supply was this document. It is fairly long and it goes through the complete statement of what was needed, what the price was going to be, what the arrangements for it were going to be, and why it was needed.

Paragraph 2(c) reads:

Our supplier, Exxon International Company, has advised us that the Iranian disruption and resulting crude shortages have caused them to establish an IEA type shortage sharing system among other affiliates.

The minister knew they were an affiliate by this application.

It goes on to read:

We—

That is Imperial Oil.

—are responding to this system.

I do not know how much clearer it can be for the minister, for his department, or for his regulatory body, that diversions have taken place and that the whole diversion allotting program was based on the International Energy Agency's program, which obviously meant the situation was serious. But again the minister comes to this House at a later date and tells us he did not know about it. That was on January 24.

On February 1, in answer to a question directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) in the House, the latter, obviously totally ignorant of the 1974 treaty to which Canada was a signatory, in grand, stentorian tones says that Canada, out of the goodness of her heart, will not allow the Americans to freeze in the dark. That received a lot of ink and a lot of play in the media across the country as an indication of the voluntary good wishes of the people and the government of this country toward our American cousins. Come hell or high water we were not going to allow the Americans to suffer one bit. Are we not grand fellows, because the minister obviously did not even know we were committed to a program. What was the U.S. shortfall was the Canadian shortfall, and what was the U.S. problem was the Canadian problem.

We are committed to assisting the Americans whether we like it or not, and I am not trying to indicate for one moment that we would not like to, but this is another measure of the incompetence or the facade of half truths or misrepresentations that have been built up by the government in this whole sorry mess.

On February 5 the minister told the House—this is well after January 24, when the formal application was made, well after January 8, when the informal representations were made to them—the following:

I have received personal assurances from Venezuela that those supplies will continue to Canada.

On February 8 there is further documentation given to the minister, and this time it is personally handed to him by the people of this country. They have an interview with the minister and they tell him the extent of the cutback from Exxon to Imperial Oil. Just by way of coincidence, on the same day, February 8, there is the offloading at the Dartmouth jetty of the first of the crude oil diversion which has been approved some time ago by the National Energy Board to Imperial Oil. Also on that same date the minister told the House the following:

● (2110)

—that there might well be shortages affecting eastern refineries. The corporation which owns these refineries has been making plans—

Certainly they have been making plans. They have been making plans to the knowledge of the minister and his regulatory body, the National Energy Board, and to the specific knowledge of some of the senior officials in the minister's own department. Later the minister said that this particular occasion of February 8 was the first time he learned there had been serious cutbacks and diversion of Venezuelan crude by Exxon.

On February 13, in response to a question posed by one of my colleagues in the opposition, the minister said the following:

—I have every reason to believe that the source of Venezuelan crude will be made available to Canada, based on the undertakings which I received when I was in Venezuela.

Because of these continued misrepresentations made to the House and the public at large, on February 14 we finally decided to take the opportunity to expose to the Canadian public some of the details we had learned. It is no secret from whence we learned the details. Obviously they were learned from another government in the country. We learned of the serious cutbacks which had been taking place as far as Imperial's crude supply was concerned. We exposed it on February 14. On February 15 an Imperial Oil spokesman said they had convinced Exxon that, instead of a cutback of 22 per cent, in effect the cutback itself would be cut back to 10 per cent. Outside of the House the minister said that even the 10 per cent cutback was unacceptable to the Government of Canada.

On February 14 the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) outside the House said that the Exxon cutback was intolerable and unacceptable to the Government of Canada, even though a few minutes before the parliamentary secretary to the minister said in the House that he had been unable to confirm our allegations that Exxon was cutting back shipments by 25 per cent.

This is a long and sorry history of either ignorance by the minister of facts which he should have known, or of incompetence by the minister or someone somewhere, if not the minister, or of people who are close advisers to the minister who had been trying to pull the wool over the eyes of Canadians. Time after time we received calm, soothing assurances from the minister and his spokesmen that all was well. Why would the minister continue to do this when it was obvious that sooner or later the true facts of the situation would come to light and the truth would be out? The reason is simple. I believe honestly the minister felt that by shoving this under the carpet, hiding it and keeping it from the light of day, somehow or other the government and the minister would blunder on and blunder through until after an election, when perhaps someone else would have to clean up their mess. It is as simple as that.

As far as the public is concerned, the real crunch in both the price situation and the crude oil situation will occur late next fall or early next winter. That is when the crunch will hit the people of the country, and it will be due to the ineffective actions of the minister and perhaps some of the misleading things which have been said.

What conclusions can we draw from this rather sorry history? Of course the first has to be government policy. Collectively the government has been asleep at the power switch from 1974 to 1979. Virtually nothing has been done to take care of a very foreseeable situation in the country. Granted, the roots of the problem do not emanate in this country as far as the foreign cut-off is concerned, but this has happened before. Almost exactly the same thing happened in 1973 and 1974. At that time we were rushed into emergency legislation. We were cautioned that we had to get the bill through in a hurry because it was needed dreadfully so that the government of the day could take care of any emergency situation which might come along. Luckily we put a time limit on the bill so that it would expire, and it expired.

Instead of reconsidering the entire matter and coming along in a sane and sensible way, at a sane and sensible time to come forward with legislation such as this, the government waited until it was pushed into the very corner, facing a crude oil crisis. It is a shame. The people of the country deserve better than they have been receiving from this particular minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: The issue before the people of the country today is not whether there should be an emergency oil allocation scheme. The issue before the people of the country is the very sorry record of the government respecting this entire mess. That is the issue before the people. Has the government done anything about cleaning up the inefficient and, in some ways, wasteful distribution system in the country? We still have the bottleneck which was there in 1973 and 1974 which spokesmen on both sides of the House deprecated. The bottleneck in the pipeline is still there. It is there tonight. Because it is there, not enough Canadian crude is going into the Montreal area. Absolutely nothing has been done to clear up the very obvious deficiency for Canadian crude, or crude from no matter where it comes, in the Atlantic region.

Why have these matters not been looked at before, rather than waiting for the crisis to be upon us? As is usually the case, the government comes in with too little too late. No facilities or encouragement have been provided by the government for people in the private sector to promote or build storage and reserve facilities for crude and refined products. If the minister is sucked into the position by some of his socialist colleagues in the cabinet and in the House to the point where, God forbid, PetroCan should enter the picture, of course they will discover that PetroCan or any agency associated with the government simply does not have the required and necessary storage or reserve facilities for large amounts of crude which should have been in place long before this.

The minister knows there are geological formations, especially on or near the east coast. One major formation is located in the riding of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. Another is located on an island off Newfoundland. There are many geological formations which would be suited very admirably for reserve and storage facilities on the east coast. But in the years between 1974 and 1979, the government did absolutely nothing about it.

We lack government policy and we lack government programs to rectify some of these obvious and serious deficiencies. We even have a refinery at Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland, that is in mothballs. For heaven's sake, a few months ago when there was a glut of some of this crude oil on the market, what did this government do in an attempt to free and get working some of those cobwebbed refining facilities that are in existence? Even the refineries in eastern Canada that were working were operating at much under capacity. These are matters which I think in more sane and more reasonable times this House would be able to discuss in an unemotional way. We cannot do that tonight because we are under the gun, under pressure to get something done; again under pressure to enact emergency legislation to deal with an emergency situation which we should not even be facing, but one that does exist.

The bill before us tonight is an admission in itself that we were right and the government was wrong. Look at the calm and soothing words that have come from the minister. He says no action is necessary; there is no concern; shove it all under the mat. We only start to learn the truth, and the government only starts to come forward with legislation, after a part of the real situation is exposed by the official opposition. Then we have a complete reversal. Instead of the minister saying all is well, we have a complete reversal which includes a very neat political dodge.

With great huffing and puffing, Lord Alastair on his white horse comes charging after all the multinationals. With great huffing and puffing he is charging not only against the multinationals but against the Canadian subsidiaries of the multinationals. The minister asks in shocked and hushed tones, why didn't Imperial deal directly with Venezuela? That is what the minister asks. I think people in this country have every right to ask why the minister did not know earlier and make his directives earlier. Who has been in power, for heaven's sake, over the last few years? If the minister did not know there was a middleman in the Venezuelan crude deal, what does the minister know and what does he do? I suggest the answer is absolutely nothing. He should have known that even had Imperial dealt directly with Venezuela that would be no guarantee that today somehow or other we still would not be in the same situation.

We are tied to the international shortfall with all the signatory countries to that 1974 treaty. Once they hit the 7 per cent triggering mechanism it does not really matter whether Imperial Oil or any of our other Canadian subsidiaries of multinationals were dealing directly.

The minister's cabinet colleagues, and his NDP colleagues in this House, argue that the government deserves some credit because Petro-Canada was set up under this government, even though at great cost to the Canadian taxpayer. They argue that if Petro-Canada had been used as the buying agent none of this would have happened. That is the theory.

Petro-Canada has been in existence for some time. If the minister or his cabinet colleagues now feel that Petro-Can is not acting correctly, or should have been the agent, or the intermediary, or the wholesale broker in some of these international deals, why did the minister not direct it in that way before this? Why does the government come along at this stage and do this? I will tell you why that is. It is simply because, underneath it all, the minister realizes that the intervention of a state oil trading company in the middle of complex, complicated negotiations and dealings between people in the private sector and people in the producing field would not add anything toward the solution of the international energy crisis of today. I suggest that would not do anything at all to help us get out of this hole this government has dug for us. I do not believe that the intervention of PetroCan in the Mexican transaction, or in the Venezuelan transaction, would have been any help at all.

I would ask the minister, if he is now not satisfied, why did he wait this long before making these representations? If Petro-Can should be the buyer from Mexico why is the minister telling Canadian companies to deal directly with Venezuela? Why is there this contradiction? If this is good on the one hand, why is it not good on the other hand? If it is all right for Canadian companies to deal directly with Venezuela why is it not all right for Canadian companies to deal directly with Mexico? As the minister knows—I better amend that by saying, as I hope this minister knows, there were Canadian companies dealing and negotiating with Mexico in respect of Mexican crude oil long before the minister and Mr. Hopper popped up in Mexico on this deal.

An hon. Member: You mean popped down.

Mr. Lawrence: Yes, you are right, popped down. I am glad to be corrected. As I hope the minister knows, some of these negotiations were well on the way to a final deal in respect of both delivery and price when the minister and his PetroCan officials turned up, or turned down, and this completely threw these negotiations and timetables out. If the minister is now advising Canadian companies to deal directly with Venezuela, why is he suggesting or, as a matter of fact, almost insisting that the state oil enterprise be inserted in the middle of the Mexican deal?

Surely to goodness now that PetroCan is diversified, has reached out and enlarged itself so that it now encompasses a very diversified corporation in the Canadian energy picture, and there is no question about that, if the minister inserts that state oil trading corporation in the middle of these complex negotiations, PetroCan itself will allocate unto itself, or there is that danger, major portions of the oil that might become available in time. If PetroCan is given the authority to act as a broker or wholesaler in respect of these negotiations, and the minister knows that brokers and wholesalers charge fees and commissions, I have no doubt that PetroCan would follow that course of action. If PetroCan did follow this useless intervention, to my mind consumers' costs would go up.

An hon. Member: What do you think Exxon is doing?

Mr. Lawrence: I have just heard an intervention from another minister, asking what I think Exxon is doing. Exxon is a perfect example of what I mean. The minister may believe that Exxon should not be in the middle of these negotiations. I might agree with him that there is no question about that, but I say to the minister that perhaps if some of us on this side of the House were clothed with his authority and were receiving the pay cheques that he has for doing some of this work he has not been doing, we would know these facts and maybe the situation would have been changed long before this.

By no stretch of the imagination do I want that minister, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), misinterpreting our position to the effect that we are saying the Exxon intervention is a good one, because we do not believe that. We still believe that if Exxon should not be in the middle of these deals there is no reason Petro-Canada should be in the middle of these deals either.

• (2130)

Mr. Broadbent: Who should?

Mr. Lawrence: It is as simple as that. Certainly the companies themselves are able to contract and negotiate on their own. They were doing it in the case of Mexico before the minister came along.

The minister now says that in respect of Venezuela they should do it. The record is one of not only a lack of competence in policies and programs, but there is also a lack of credibility in the minister himself. I believe that the dates, information and references which were available in the minister's department should certainly indicate to the House and to the public at large that if this minister did not know the facts, if he did not know the dates, if he did not know the details of those diversions, then he darned well should have, and there is no question in my mind about that.

The record of this government with respect to matters such as this is not very good, especially when it comes to its record of attempting to go out of its way to raise fear, apprehension, and perhaps even confrontation with those partners in confederation, the provinces, in an area of provincial authority and jurisdiction.

Before the bill was introduced in 1974, which was rushed through this House, there had been no prior consultation with the provinces. A bill, with as far-reaching consequences as had the bill of 1974, was brought into this House without any prior consultation whatever with the provinces. That bill died in the middle of 1976. The predecessor to this particular minister was very well aware that there were large areas of doubt and strong opinions in provincial jurisdictions, some of which at that time were run by the same party as the minister and his predecessor. Very strong opinions were held by the provincial authorities that the bill of 1974 was not the way to tackle the problem of international allocation.

What has happened here today and on Friday is that the minister is introducing a duplicate bill.

Mr. Gillespie: Are you going to vote against it?

Mr. Lawrence: Once again there was no consultation whatever, prior to the introduction of this bill in the House last Friday, with any of the provincial authorities with respect to its terms or its jurisdiction of authority. I think that is despicable and, certainly, the minister well knows now that I think some of the provisions in this bill and that some of the things which have been said by his colleagues have caused a very real concern in provincial and industrial circles. Probably the comments of most concern have been the rather lighthearted but terrible implications with respect to the matters of hydro electric power, coal mining, and sources of energy alternative to petroleum products.

To put it mildly, the ham-handed operation of this particular minister coming in as he has with this particular bill has certainly made the provinces apprehensive, and quite justifiably so, about the large degree of power which this government is now attempting to saw off, in the minds of some of these provinces, from an area which is strictly of provincial jurisdiction. Certainly there may well be room for people to believe that under the guise of an almost self-inflicted domestic crisis in respect of oil supplies in this country, this minister is again following the old federal, Liberal party dictum of attempting to grab more power under the guise of attempting to solve a problem of which they themselves were the authors.

In spite of the doubts regarding this minister, and in spite of the doubts regarding the veracity and motivation of this government, we have no desire to hold up this bill. We certainly do agree, sir, and it may well be that we will be the ones who will have to utilize some of the provisions of this bill to get the country out of the mess it is in, that a federal government needs certain legislative powers to direct and supervise the allocation of foreign energy supplies on which, thanks to the negligence of this particular government, we still remain dependent.

I think it is a travesty that this country is still dependent on foreign oil supplies, but because this government has put us in this mess I am afraid that we are going to have to go along and appreciate that a federal government will require this type of emergency legislation. We will not oppose this bill on second reading, but only on the condition that there is a very clear understanding that we expect a comprehensive and searching examination of this bill in committee, with full opportunity for us to make amendments and for expert witnesses to be called so that we and the people at large, the people in the industry and the people in provincial jurisdictions, can be assured that such a measure is needed and that such a measure will be for the benefit of all Canadians.

Our policy in so far as the official opposition is concerned is that once we are in government, if and as when it happens, our efforts will be directed to the objective that Canada will be the master of its own destiny in resource matters and, specifically, in oil and gas, that Canada's needs will be met with Canada's resources. We will have no need for an emergency petroleum allocation bill of the type which is before parliament at the moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of care to the official spokesman on energy matters for the Conservative party. He seemed to go on some time before he got to the statement outlining his policy and, in fact, I think it was in the last sentence. I tried to write it down and I hope that I have not missed a semicolon or a comma, "that if the Conservatives formed the government that in terms of energy Canada would be the master of its own destiny." That was what he said in his conclusion.

I will come to the government in a moment because the minister, who has sat rather smugly through this crisis which he has created, is certainly not going to be ignored in my comments. We have an energy crisis which is genuine, and no one either outside this country, in this country or anywhere else, given the situation in Iran, has any illusion about this crisis, with the possible exception of our sherry-drinking minister who smiles his way through all crises.

The official spokesman for the Conservative party in dealing with the question of Imperial Oil not making sure that we got our allocation of oil on a continuing basis from Venezuela, said that he objected to a Crown corporation intervening in the process. That is the Conservative party's statement, and I listened with care, that Petro-Canada must not intervene and that the government must not take any other steps. If we are to be masters of our own fate, as the hon. member has suggested, and given the fact that every other oil company in this country is foreign-owned, how are we to achieve that result? The Conservative party did not tell us that.

The whole argument of the hon. member, in terms of his criticism of government policy, led to the inescapable conclusion, that if the multinationals got us into this difficulty, the multinationals must get us out. What an absurd conclusion! But that is the official position of the Conservative party on this issue. I do not think there should be any illusion about that.

• (2140)

In spite of the fact that Venezuela and 90 per cent of countries in western Europe, have Crown corporations or state enterprises to deal with the allocation of petroleum resources because they take their obligations seriously, in this country the Conservative party says, "Leave it to the multinationals." That is not only absurd, but at this time in history it is totally irresponsible.

I want to turn now to the minister. Since September, 1975, the total period since the last energy crisis, the minister has had responsibility for energy policy. Forgetting about the broad range of energy policy and restricting my remarks to oil and gas, I would argue that there are three key components to that policy. There is the existence of Petro-Canada, there is the two-price system for oil, and there is the pipeline. Now that the pipeline has been constructed from Sarnia to Montreal to service the Quebec market and ensure that that part of our oil from western Canada goes to Quebec, it makes eastern Canada less dependent on imported oil.

Those are the three points of the policy that I would argue are devoid of content. Every one of those three was forced upon the Liberal government during the minority government of 1972-74.

When the minister waves the flag about Petro-Canada, I recall some private conversations in that period when the Liberal government of the day was by no means enthusiastic about Petro-Canada, the two-price system, or the pipeline. In order to survive a crucial vote at Christmas, 1973, and to protect their hide, however, they accepted all three items which were almost literally forced down their throats in order to survive. But that is history, Mr. Speaker. I would argue that those are the three principal elements of an otherwise vacuous energy policy. The last crisis was in 1973 at the time of the very substantial increase in price of petroleum products which was forced upon the world by the OPEC countries.

We now have another crisis, the one which gave rise to this bill even though the bill deals with it only in the most peripheral way. It came from the terrible—and they are terrible for the human beings involved—results of conflict in Iran in recent months. It is a terrible human tragedy no matter how one views the desirability or undesirability of the political outcome. At this point no one can have anything but sympathy for the people of that nation and what they are going through.

One of the consequences of that has been the severe curtailment of production of oil affecting virtually all countries outside the communist bloc.

How does that very serious event in history have a marked effect on Canada? That came about when the multinational in the field, Imperial Oil, and its parent, Exxon, decided for their own purposes, regardless of international concern, to divert from Canada oil which was not coming from Iran, of course, because our imported oil via Imperial comes almost entirely from Venezuela, and to divert a certain percentage of the intended allocation from Canada to other parts of the world.

What has been the minister's reaction to this? In this House last week, and again today in his speech, he tried to suggest that the Government of Canada has no responsibility in this matter, none at all, that the villain of the piece is Exxon Corporation.

I want to point out that, to say the least, the relationship between the Government of Canada and Imperial Oil, the subsidiary in Canada of Exxon, has been a mixed one. One day the minister is on his feet criticizing that corporation, but he neglects to mention a few relevant facts about Imperial Oil that I should like to put on the record.

This government and the Liberal party have probably given more special treatment—and this may explain part of the wrath of the minister, feigned or otherwise, that is directed toward Imperial—more financial assistance and more handouts to Imperial than to any other corporation.

We have calculated that at the end of 1978 Imperial Oil owed the people of Canada $600 million in deferred taxes. In the past decade—and now I speak of Imperial and not Exxon—from 1968 to 1978, the life of this government, Imperial Oil accumulated $2.2 billion after tax profits earned in Canada. Out of that they paid $1 billion in dividends, of which 70 per cent went to Exxon because Exxon, of course, is a 70 per cent shareholder of Imperial Oil.

The Exxon Corporation, therefore, the parent firm that was diverting our intended oil supplies from Venezuela, received some $713 million net profit from the people of Canada in the past decade. It has not done badly.

First of all, they diverted 25,000 barrels of oil per day. That was the original decision. I am not so concerned about the timing of it. It is an important matter that the minister's officials either at the National Energy Board or in his department did not keep him informed, but I am prepared to accept his word that he did not know. I cannot accept that it absolves him of responsibility, however. If he has set up his department in such a way that decisions can be made involving a shortfall of thousands of barrels of oil and he does not know about them, then no one is responsible but himself. If he left instructions that he be kept informed on a daily basis of such transactions and these instructions were not carried out, then he should fire the official concerned or, what is more likely, if he did not set up the procedures in the first place, then he has to accept responsibility.

In any case, it was Exxon's original intent to divert 25,000 barrels of oil per day from Canada. The minister got upset and said, on the one hand, that we want full restoration of our quota and then, on the other hand, he said that to get this full restoration he wanted Imperial Oil to deal directly with Venezuela. As the minister knows, the corporation did not comply. It snubbed him completely. It said it would only restore part of the quota, and we are still 9,000 barrels a day short.

● (2150)

Second, Imperial Oil is insisting it will continue to deal not directly with Venezuela as Canada requested, but through Exxon, its parent corporation. Then the minister gets excited and becomes the champion of Canadian interests. The great multinational has taken a course of action which displeases him, so the minister wraps himself in the Canadian flag and says that he is going to make it toe the line.

I want to deal with the central question. It goes to the heart of the problem that we are now facing in 1979 and which should have been envisaged in 1973. Indeed, it should have been seen by the government earlier than that. However, I pose the question: Is the Exxon Corporation behaving in some way that is an aberration? Is it departing from the norm for a multinational corporation in such circumstances? In my opinion it is not.

For the minister's benefit I would like to read part of an article from the Toronto Star:

> One effect of a very high degree of foreign direct investment in Canada is that strategic decisions affecting a very large proportion of Canadian business activity are taken by senior business executives resident outside of Canada—

This is not something said by an NDP premier of Canada nor an NDP federal politician. It comes from the government published "Foreign Direct Investment in Canada Review" which was done in 1972, better known as the Gray report. In 1972 that study pointed out in a very thorough and comprehensive way how multinational firms perform. It clearly documented the kinds of difficulties encountered particularly for a country like Canada, when multinationals are permitted to get control of resources. That is the crucial point on which I want to dwell. What we have is not aberrant behaviour by this particular multinational, Imperial Oil, but standard, normal behaviour.

This same situation was experienced the past year with Inco, another multinational in the resource field, which found it was better to expand in Guatemala and Indonesia while laying off workers in Thompson, Manitoba, and Sudbury, Ontario, because it would be able to maximize its profits by so acting. I could go through a whole list, not only as they affect Canada but as they affect other countries, concerning the performance of multinational corporations if they are left unregulated.

We are now experiencing in the energy field a direct consequence of allowing a multinational corporation to dictate our energy policy. The problem is not at all as the minister would have us believe, that the Exxon Corporation is some kind of villain, it is not a villain. The Exxon Corporation is a multinational enterprise that is out to maximize its profits. It is phony and hypocritical of the minister to get up and pretend that it will have one standard of behaviour in Canada but another standard of behaviour elsewhere. That is not how the economic system works. I find it morally offensive when one makes moral judgments about corporate directors in these companies for acting in a way their shareholders appoint them to act. The fault is not with the Exxon Corporation. The fault is with the Government of Canada which did not have arrangements set up in the first place that would have made the crisis we are now dealing with impossible. That is the subject we should be debating tonight.

What is the correct solution? If the government, back in the minority days, had created not only Petro-Canada, as we insisted, but if it had gone further and made Petro-Canada, as we argued at that time, the exclusive purchasing agent for all offshore oil, we would not have the crisis of the last couple of weeks, about which the minister has been speaking. That is the reality. We should have done what almost every other industrial country has done, and that is to set up within our borders what we call a Crown corporation. Other countries call them state enterprises, or if it is nationally-owned in the private sector, a domestically-owned corporation. This Crown corporation should be severely regulated to ensure that it purchases all the offshore oil to meet energy needs. Other countries have done this and that is what Canada should have done.

An hon. Member: Other countries are more effective that we are.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not hear the hon. member's interjection, but I listened to his speech with a great deal of care. I must say that for anyone to argue that the solution to our problem is to get the multinationals to come in when they are the ones who have created the situation, he will have to go a long way to persuade me of the intelligibility of any other recommendations that he makes.

Petro-Canada should have been created in 1973 as the only purchasing agent for offshore oil. That would have headed off the Venezuelan situation we now have. But what can we recommend under the present circumstances? What is the government's attitude toward Petro-Canada? This crisis is upon us because the minister wants to make a villain out of Exxon. He has his election on his mind which is coming perhaps in the next few months—

Mr. Gillies: He has already lost.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has that in mind. But what is the real attitude? Right now it is thought to be expedient to praise Petro-Canada and to fight Exxon. What is the government doing with Petro-Canada?

Mr. Gillies: Nothing.

Mr. Broadbent: Instead of making it the central petroleum corporation in this land, as we argue, which would not only have control over all imported oil and then channel it out, but also deal with refining and deal directly with outlets—for example, in Montreal today retailers are having trouble getting supplies from multinationals—if we had Petro-Canada importing oil it would ensure independents in Montreal and elsewhere of a ready supply of oil which would help to meet the needs of small businessmen. Instead of encouraging Petro-Canada this way, as the minister knows the Government of Canada is involved in taking away certain preferred rights that Petro-Canada now has for exploration on thousands of acres of land owned by the Government of Canada. Even now it is backing away from creating the kind of corporation that Petro-Canada should be. It is concentrating instead on singling out Exxon as some kind of convenient whipping boy as justification for its own failure.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying what we think should be done. We will be proposing these items at committee stage. This bill should be amended to include Petro-Canada as a member of the allocation board. Second we want the bill amended to make Petro-Canada the sole importer of offshore oil.

We recommend the following step because there is no other way of achieving it. We should pass the bill on third reading as amended—as I hope it will be amended—and then the government, by order in council, should cause the operative sections to go into effect immediately, not to impose rationing, because iet us hope we shall not need rationing but to do one simple thing which should be done immediately, that is, to make Petro-Canada the sole importer of oil into Canada. That should be done this week; it should not be put off until another oil crisis or until another pre-election period. We should pass this bill and give Petro-Canada that authority.

• (2200)

Almost every other country in the world has set up a nationally-controlled major oil company. The crisis we are going through will not have been totally unproductive if it forces this incompetent and irresponsible government to do what other countries have done a long time ago, that is, to make Petro-Canada the major oil company in this country serving all Canada's oil interests from the time the oil leaves the ground until it reaches the consumer.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, before we call it ten o'clock might I ask the deputy House leader to tell us the government's intentions with regard to business tomorrow?

Mr. Cafik: It will be our intention to continue consideration of Bill C-42, the energy supplies emergency bill.

An hon. Member: And then?

Mr. Cafik: If it is anticipated by the opposition that we might conclude this stage of the bill tomorrow, we would move on the National Housing Act amendments.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

METRIC CONVERSION—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION BY HOUSING INDUSTRY

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on February 13 I put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) regarding the metric system. I did so for two reasons, first, my concern, and that of the general public, concerning the metrication program, and second because beginning on May 1 it will become mandatory for all applications under the National Housing Act to be in the metric system so as to conform with a directive put out by the CMHC, notwithstanding the fact that the lumber industry has not converted to metric nor is it likely to do so in the near future.

The reason is very simple. About 80 per cent of our lumber trade is done with the United States, and they have not converted. We shall therefore be faced with a situation after May 1 in which builders will be using plans and specifications in metres and centimetres while the lumber will be in inches and feet. This is metric confusion, not metric conversion. We have Celsius instead of Fahrenheit, kilopascals instead of inches of mercury, kilometres instead of miles per hour, and wind chill factors measured in numbers rather than temperature. Individuals do not know whether to put on a sweater, an overcoat, a jacket, or a hat and gloves. Radio stations give the temperature in degrees Celsius. At times they give readings in both Celsius and Fahrenheit. I understand, however, that radio stations will be fined in future if they give readings in other than Celsius. It is great to be living in a democracy!

I did not plan to upset the minister when I asked my question on the thirteenth, but he became quite excited. He said at that time that all parties in this House had agreed by resolution to go metric but, as I understand it, it was a general motion, and speakers from all parts of the House agreed in principle. I was not a member at that time, but I am surprised that no vote was taken. Yet, based on that resolution the bureaucrats, in their quiet way and without formal authorization from this House, commenced a program of metrication which has caused confusion and which has been costly for the taxpayer. The costs to industry can never be calculated, but if one considers all the changes industry had to make, the cost must be in the billions of dollars.

We can determine some of the costs because some of them were recorded in the answer to a question I put in this House. I asked what the cost of metrication had been since 1971, that is, the cost of the administration of the system, not the cost industry has passed on to the consumer. The cost to date has been $24 million. In reply to a written question the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce advised me that the setting up of the sector committees and the travel those committees did cost $1,306,625, over $1.3 million to have these sector committees travel the length and breadth of Canada. The Metric Monitor, that newspaper which extols the virtues of the metric system, a propaganda organ, cost $242,-688 for printing and publishing. Distribution of that document cost some $423,736.26.

In response to my question the minister said that there had been no metric bill. I would like to direct his attention back to Bill C-23 in the fall of 1977 when the then minister of industry, trade and commerce introduced a bill entitled "An act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement." Among other things it changes acres to hectares and bushels to tonnes. No one was more vocal than the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), unless it was the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), or myself. The minister stood shoulder to shoulder with the rest of us and fought that bill. Could he have changed overnight? Apparently he did.

Britain went metric and is having many problems and second thoughts. The same is true for Australia. On the other hand, the United States brought in legislation making metrication not obligatory but voluntary. I would like to quote briefly from an editorial in the Hamilton Spectator of Thursday, March 28, 1978, which says:

> The contrast between the United States' handling of the metric question and Canada's is the contrast between a democracy and a dictatorship . . . Canada even denied public opinion a forum; metric rules were simply imposed by a bureaucracy not answerable to the people.
> Americans got a choice; Canadians got their orders.

In closing I would like to say that my plea is simply this: let us put a halt to metrication until such time as we can sit down with our counterparts in the United States to discuss ramifications. The hon. minister has said, and I quote from Hansard:

> The gratifying position I find myself in is that my leader now actively seeks my views on all subject matters.

I hope that the hon. minister will talk to his leader and halt metrication until such time as we can discuss it with the Americans and move hand in hand and step by step. Otherwise metrication will cost Canadian taxpayers and consumers millions and billions of dollars.

● (2210)

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, effective May 1, 1979, all applications for assistance under the National Housing Act must be in metric units. This is an administrative requirement under the National Housing Act.

Sector committee—construction, 5.01, a voluntary committee composed of voluntary representatives of the construction industry, including the Housing and Urban Development Association and the Canadian Construction Association, approved a plan that set target dates for conversion to help the industry convert as rapidly and economically as possible.

There are sources of plywood in metric dimensions, and the capability of the lumber industry to produce the required plywood panels in metric dimensions has been established.

As for progress in the United States, the American National Metric Council has been co-ordinating, planning and scheduling since 1973. Now that there is a U.S. metric board in operation, further impetus has been given to metric conversion plans already under way via the American National Metric Council voluntary sector committees.

An example of progress in the U.S. metric conversion program is in the automobile manufacturing sector, this being the single largest manufactured export Canada has, representing 27 per cent of all exports to the U.S.A. The way automobile manufacturers are swiftly coverting to the metric system in the U.S. is the very kind of voluntary program that the U.S. metric board is required by Congress to encourage.

From the very beginning the Canadian metric conversion program has been and is being co-ordinated with counterpart American sector committees. In the last few days alone, six U.S. committee members, including a director of the ANMC and staff from the U.S. metric board, met with their opposite numbers in industrial sectors in Ottawa.

The white paper on metric conversion in Canada, issued in January, 1970, which called for the establishment of MCC was agreed to by the House leaders of all parties. An order in council, the metric commission order of June, 1971, established the Metric Commission with a mandate to involve voluntary participation from all sectors of the Canadian economy.

In 1975-76 a resolution debate on the program of guideline dates for metric conversion was held, including committee hearings at which industry, labour and consumer groups presented their views. The report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs unanimously recommended that the House consider the advisability of adopting the guideline dates, and recommended further legislation to facilitate metric conversion.

The first such legislation, the Statute Law (Metric Conversion) Amendment Act, chapter 55, was debated in the House and Senate and assented to on August 5, 1977, by the Governor General. The second Statute Law (Metric Conversion) Amendment, Bill S-10, has received Senate approval and first reading in the House of Commons on December 15, 1978.

This legislative action supports the 102 sector committees comprising over 2,000 volunteers who are currently developing the plans and schedules for implementation of the metric system in their sectors of the economy.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—TELEVISION COVERAGE IN SOUTHEAST MANITOBA

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, on January 26 I asked a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) regarding the installation of CBC English television in southeastern Manitoba. This is the third time that I have used the adjournment debate to bring this matter before the government. I was wondering how best to get this message to the government in view of the fact that it has not lived up to its promises on this question. What I intend to do is to outline to the government once again the promises it has made in the hope that this will be one promise it will fulfil, rather than making all the promises and, once it comes to implementation, having the words prove to be empty.

In 1975 a petition was passed and signed by 346 members in the southeastern area of Manitoba requesting the then CBC president Laurent Picard for CBC English television programing. The CBC at that time, in response to the petition which I forwarded to them, said the following, and I quote from a letter of May 21 signed by Dennis Townsend, director of parliamentary services:

● (2215)

Under the Accelerated Coverage Plan, a UHF 50 kw transmitter with a 300-foot tower is scheduled for Sprague, Manitoba, with the expectation that an application for it will be made to the CRTC in 1978. The transmitter will provide CBC English TV service.

I protested back in 1975 that 1978 was too far in the future. Having made the protest, I figured I would receive some favourable response. On August 14, 1975, the liaison officer for the CBC wrote as follows:

It should also be noted that we are nearing the half way point in the five-year plan. Since it takes about two years to prepare our documents, have our application heard by the CRTC and put the service into operation, it is now very difficult for us to change any of our target dates.

That letter was written in 1975 and it was referring to the target date of 1978. Hope springs eternal in the human breast, and I kept on working. The year 1978 came, and I felt it was time to approach the government once again to see whether it would do anything. I wrote to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation once again, and I received the following reply from Mr. Dennis Townsend:

Using this and the other criteria which Anne Richens of this office explained in her August 1975 letter to you, Sprague is included in ACP Priority Group 100, and it is our expectation that we will apply to the CRTC this summer for permission to establish the Sprague transmitter.

Mr. Townsend's letter was dated February 8, 1978. I was very hopeful that we would get somewhere because the CBC was saying the same thing in 1978 as it had said in 1975. Then I thought I received the real word in a letter written by the hon. Secretary of State dated March 2, 1978, in which he said the following:

I note that you directed a copy of your letter to Mr. Townsend, and you will now have received his reply of February 8, informing you that the CBC does indeed expect to apply to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, this summer, for permission to instal a television transmitter at Sprague, Manitoba.

I come from an area where there are very few Liberals and consequently I have a tendency to believe them. Perhaps I am naive. It is a mistake I made. Perhaps I should not have believed them, because on November 3, 1978, I received a letter from the president of the CBC after most of 1978 had passed, and after criticizing the CBC. They had not made an application and they had not fulfilled the promise. They simply had not done it. The letter I received from Mr. A. W. Johnson, the president of the CBC, read in part as follows:

I am indeed sorry to confirm your fear that because of the new restraints on our budget Sprague is among a number of ACP projects which must be delayed until the necessary funds become available. At this early stage of deciding how budget cuts must be allocated within the corporation it is difficult to give you a firm date for the rescheduling of the Sprague project, but at the moment since this is a transmitter project of some magnitude, it looks as though it will now be included in both our 1980-1981 and 1981-1982 capital budgets, with probable implementation during the 1981-1982 fiscal year.

That letter referred to 1979 restraints back in 1978. Even that letter does not wash. That restraint program was not in effect. The Secretary of State, the CBC spokesman for parliamentary services, the president, and the parliamentary secretaries who have answered me twice, have not given the facts. They have promised, but they have never fulfilled. Now it is 1979, and the people of that area do not have coverage. Then to top it off, the unity task force indicated that every Canadian is entitled by right to television and radio access by the CBC. This is a small area of Canada which had television coverage before it was taken away by Bill C-58 of the government. The government said that it was going to give the area some other coverage. It has taken away the television coverage that area had, and has not given them the television coverage paid for by taxpayers.

On January 26 the minister indicated that he would give me a reply. On behalf of the petitioners, the people of Sprague and the area, I am waiting not only for a positive reply but for some positive action.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the CBC's accelerated coverage plan is designed to ensure that CBC radio and television service will be extended to all communities where 500 or more people are unserved or inadequately served in the appropriate language.

• (2220)

The ACP is implemented under a strict formula system of priorities which takes into account such factors as population, capital and operating expenses, provincial equalization, and geographic and cultural isolation. Implementation is in this way as fair and equitable as it can be made. All communities identified for inclusion in the ACP are listed according to their priority under this formula, and "community" in this case also means minorities within a larger language group, such as the French-speaking population of Thunder Bay and the English-speaking population of Chicoutimi.

Provision of funds for the implementation of the ACP is made within the CBC's regular capital and operating budgets. As for the plan itself, it was originally to be completed in the period 1974 to 1979. A number of factors, however, have brought about a stretching out of that period by approximately three years.

Those factors include: a sharp rise in costs—they are now approximately double the 1975 estimate—the difficulty of finding enough qualified technical personnel for the installation of the more than 600 transmitters involved in the plan; delays in the production by the electronics industry of the necessary equipment, and budget constraints in 1978-79 and 1979-80.

Under the accelerated coverage plan it is intended to establish English television service at Sprague, Manitoba, which is included in Group 100 of the ACP priority list.

Because of the workload and budget cuts, implementation of some ACP projects has fallen behind the original timetable set out for the more than 600 transmitters involved in the plan, and it is now hoped that the Sprague transmitter project, which is one of some magnitude, will be included in the CBC's 1980-81 and 1981-82 capital budgets, with probable implementation during the 1981-82 fiscal year.

The CBC regrets that due to these circumstances which are beyond its control it is not possible to provide the Group 100 service at the time the corporation had originally hoped and expected to do so. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) may be assured, however, that Sprague is in the same relative position on the priority list as it has always been, and that no projects which came after it on the list have been moved ahead of it.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—GUIDELINES FOR INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, basic to an effective research and development effort in secondary manufacturing is a national industrial policy. Canada's industrial research and development effort is strangely out of step in the industrialized world in which Canadian products must compete. The business sector in Canada provides only about one third of research and development expenditures compared to figures of 40 per cent to 50 per cent for most industrialized countries. In addition, the business sector in Canada performs about 40 per cent of research and development compared to 50 per cent to 65 per cent for business sectors in most advanced countries.

In 1978 the government made some serious attempts to stimulate research and development, both through increased federal funding and through tax incentives. A major goal announced by the minister in June was an increase in gross expenditure for research and development to 1.5 per cent of gross domestic product by 1983. Critics pointed out that to attain this goal research and development expenditures in industry would have to grow by an average of 19 per cent each year, and government and university expenditures by 12 per cent of 13 per cent annually.

In August, 1978, however, the government launched an austerity drive and announced plans to reduce federal spending. Science and technology, including various research and development programs, were affected in many areas. Then on November 16, 1978, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in his budget speech announced new tax incentives for industries performing research and development.

The picture that emerges over the past year is rather confusing. On the one hand the government announces increased funding and tax incentives to stimulate Canadian research and development. On the other, it abruptly terminates important government research programs.

I have some recommendations I would like to make in an effort to increase our research and development impact in Canada. The existing industrial research and development tax incentive provided by the federal government should be reformulated with a view to incorporating the following features: a conversion to a 25 per cent tax credit instead of a 50 per cent additional allowance; the introduction of a base level research and development expenditure of $1 million which would qualify for the full incentive without regard for increments; qualification of all capital expenditures for the full incentive; and all research and development must be done in Canada to qualify for the incentive.

In other words, small and medium sized firms which spend less than $1 million per year on research and development would be able to qualify for the full 25 per cent tax credit in respect of all their expenditures on research and development. This would include 99 per cent of Canadian-owned firms. The large firms that spend over $1 million per year on research and development would qualify for the tax credit in respect of any increased expenditure in research and development over the base level. In areas of slow growth the rate may be increased.

The Small Businesses Loans Act should be amended to facilitate low interest loans for research and development facilities and operating costs. We should provide financial assistance through DREE for buildings and specialized equipment to be used for scientific research and development in DREE designated areas of regional disparity.

● (2225)

The present federal government tax incentive program is inadequate in the following respects: the incentive is based on incremental R and D expenditures only. The consolidation of capital with current expenditures penalizes firms making substantial capital outlay for R and D purposes. The incentive discriminates severely against the smaller firms whose net cost of R and D could be 70 per cent higher than for a larger firm. The incentive is not available to firms not having a taxable income, for example, in the start up phase of new technology-based firms.

I feel also that some non-tax incentives of an industrial nature should be considered. Any review of industrial support policies should involve full participation of industry. New incentive programs should minimize elaborate administration. For example, where applicable, self-administered tax credits are preferable to grants that require lengthy and complex applications and detailed monitoring. The contracting out of government R and D projects which has been a step in the right direction should be intensified. Both the amount and the scope of contracts should be increased. Federal procurement policies should aim to stimulate promising Canadian companies. The procurement policies of provincial and local governments, as well as of publicly supported institutions, should be similarly co-ordinated. The federal government should take the lead by making this a condition of various incentive and cost-sharing programs. We have been waiting for an announcement in this regard since last June.

International trade and technological agreements should make special provisions to strengthen Canada's industrial capability. Opportunities for co-operative activities should be sought out and supported. Fragmentation and polarization of the activities of various groups, whether in industry, government or the universities, must be overcome.

I am convinced of the importance of research and development as an essential base for economic advancement, and I feel we should encourage the advancement and transfer of scientific knowledge and technology in a co-operative effort between universities, governments and industries.

Our objective should be to increase support for basic and applied research and development in Canada over a five to seven year period to 2.5 per cent of the gross national product, which is the fraction of the gross national product now spent in the United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany. We should establish a forum which will enable parliamentarians and interested Canadians to become involved and contribute in a direct way and on a regular basis to an appreciation of the wide scope and complexity of science affairs.

The bottom line is that it is not enough to have the best tax incentive system in the western world. Our ministers, deputy ministers, assistant deputy ministers, and the department heads have got to get on their bicycles and travel to the board rooms of the parent companies of Canadian subsidiaries and sell our program. We have got to give the private sector the confidence that our government understands that research is a long-term proposition, and convince them that the incentives will remain constant for at least ten years. In the past 15 years we have witnessed a number of major, unrelated programs involving tax incentives put forward and then cancelled by the government. It is small wonder that the private sector takes no confidence from this performance and is not prepared to commit its funds to a program of long-term scientific research and innovation.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) covers a great deal of ground in his comments, and it will be impossibe for me to address all of them in the three minutes in which I have to respond. Certainly he has mentioned some very good ideas, some with which I agree and some with which I do not agree.

• (2230)

I think the basic tenet of having more research and development in Canadian industry is one with which both sides of the House can agree. We have found from industry that the decisions have to be made by them, both in their timing and their framework, so that the most effective use can be made of their resources. This means that the tax method is a more effective incentive than the grant method, where government bureaucrats may become involved in a time-consuming and costly delay in decision-making.

In the last three budgets, attempts have been made to improve the performance by industry in the research and development that is needed in this country.

The hon. member said that he would like to see an increase in the target level from 1.5 per cent of the gross national product in 1983, to 2.5 per cent. In realistic economic terms, Mr. Speaker, we will do very well indeed if we reach the 1.5 per cent target, in so far as the amount of money that must be spent represents a 20 per cent increase in research and development each year for the next several years. The amount of money required to reach a target of 2.5 per cent over the short term would be enormous.

Whereas I agree with the general purpose of the hon. member's comments, I can in no way agree with several of the details he has outlined.
