A multiple-choice question offering different alternatives should be put to the people, something the ballot paper must be very clear about. These alternatives ought to allow each elector to vote for or against one of the choices. In all likelihood this would certainly complicate the language of the question. If it were chosen at the time of a referendum, it could undoubtedly extend the debate in the House beyond the 40-hour limit. The referendum question must be approved by the House at the end of a debate not exceeding 40 hours.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I feel that such an important question dealing with the constitution and whether a province should remain within the Canadian confederation requires a very serious debate, and I wonder if a 40-hour debate is adequate to allow all political parties to clearly and fully express their points of view and submit their arguments.

On a number of occasions the opposition parties were accused of filibustering when they tried to extend the duration of certain debates. Well, Mr. Speaker, these efforts may very often have served to provide the public with an opportunity to react and convey to their elected representatives their opinions on the subject under review. When the debate is too short, the public is deprived of this opportunity.

According to Bill C-9, referenda may be held in a province, in a number of provinces, or in Canada as a whole. The government itself will decide the limits of each referendum. I feel that this is dangerous, and we are aware of the risks which people have run in the past with a subject like this.

● (1500)

One should only remember what happened on the occasion of the plebiscite in 1942. We all recall that during that period the province of Quebec in particular was squarely against conscription for military service overseas. People in Quebec were all the more opposed because the government of the day had promised time and time again that as long as it was in power it would not let Canadian sons shed their blood outside the country.

Remember that during the war of 1914-1918 the Conservatives had endorsed conscription and had been booed by the Liberals at that time. In 1939, however, it was the other way around while the Liberals were ruling the province. In 1935, Mackenzie King and his ministers, especially his ministers, all strong men of Quebec, won the election after campaigning against the involvement of Canada in a foreign war. We know how quickly the Liberal government was to declare war on Germany later in 1939. It even did so before Britain. One will remember how the then Liberal government wanted to participate in the war but it had its hands tied up. So Mackenzie King considered holding a referendum in 1942 to release himself from his promises. But the plebiscite was held nationwide, in the nine provinces of Canada. Naturally, eight provinces voted for releasing Mackenzie King from his promises while the province of Quebec voted to hold him to them. So obviously the plebiscite was won by Canada as a whole.

In a referendum on the constitution or on whether Quebec should separate from the rest of the country, if all Canadians are asked to decide such a matter, it is obvious the nine provinces other than Quebec will undoubtedly vote to have Quebec stay. So it seems to me it is useless to spend money to hold a referendum. We already know the answer. The experience of 1942 should make us careful. This particular aspect of the bill will have to be fully debated since it could be used covertly to manipulate public opinion in such a way as to obtain a vote approving the government using the referendum. The legislation should clearly state in what instances every Canadian province and region would be called upon to participate in the discussion and the vote.

The right to vote and the registration procedure would be the same as in a federal election. Several clauses of the referendum bill are closely patterned after the Canada Elections Act while in some respects they are more specific. Mr. Speaker, that part of Bill C-9 is perhaps the most judicious. The expenses for a referendum and the contributions by an individual, a group or a political party must not exceed $5,000. Only registered political parties and referendum committees can make contributions and referendum expenses in excess of $5,000 during the campaign. That part of the bill is unfair to small political parties and minor referendum groups. We should take this into consideration.

Through this exemption, this government accepts to depart temporarily from the principles announced at the outset which are freedom of speech and right of association. It appears clearly that the groups which will have access to unlimited funds for their campaign will be able to publicize their views more efficiently than those with a more limited budget. It is the same situation in a general election. Throughout the political history of Canada we have seen that the political party with the biggest financial support was always the winner. So the situation would be the same in a referendum.

Bill C-9 also deals with broadcasters who shall put broadcasting time at the disposal of registered participants as they do during an election. Half of broadcasting time would be allocated to federal parties on a national scale while the other half would go to provincial parties in every province. This part of the bill might be prejudicial to the democratic process of informing the voters in two ways: first by restricting the broadcasting of a specific opinion, for instance that of the Parti Québécois, to the province of Quebec and, second, in the case of a debate in which provinces would express partial opinions, the federal government would publicize its views throughout Canada while provincial views would get only partial regional coverage. In both cases, the federal government would be highly advantaged in the debate. In that game, Mr. Speaker, the federal government would take the lion's share.

Mr. Speaker, in drafting Bill C-9 it is obvious that the federal government has made sure it will be dealt all the winning cards to obtain the answer it wishes to get. Mr. Speaker, when a question is that important I think that the people of the province of Quebec should be free to give the answer they want to give, to answer freely after due consideration of the consequences of their decision for the future of the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada. It is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that Quebeckers should decide because if a decision is imposed on them we will never reach our objective of national harmony.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on December 11 last, on the first day devoted to the study of Bill C-9, the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), in a brilliant speech, referred to the opposition of the Progressive Conservatives to this legislation, saying it was absurd and an abdication of their responsibilities towards Canadians.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, we have heard two other speakers: first, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who, doubtless inspired by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald), served up more or less the same arguments, haphazardly and pell-mell in a mish-mash that does not even deserve to be dwelt on any longer since I shall soon be discussing the arguments of the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands, official spokesman of the party.

It is however the third speaker on the side of the official opposition I would briefly refer to, because I wonder in particular what meaning some people are giving to the concept of parliament discussing our great national issues. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), in an effort no doubt to emulate Jeremiah, heartedly exposed us Liberal sinners. I assume he also includes members from the New Democratic Party because they in their wisdom support the government proposal now before us. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich came to the House with his Pandora's box from which he exhibited in succession Saint John's apocalypse, the misfortunes of the Jews in Israel, the most unbelievable horror stories and half quotes. In his highly emotional conclusion somewhat devoid of substance, I thought I noticed a trace of temper, to put it midly, that in my view was not up to the normally elevated spirit of our proceedings here.

Let them address to possible shortcomings in the bill, I'm all for that. Any legislation is always perfectible. This one is no exception, as we have no hesitation in recognizing. Indeed our institutions call for multiple readings. There is the consideration in principle, then second reading at which stage we are now. But there are also other steps in which a bill can be taken apart and expurged of ambiguities or possible problems, which is perfectly normal and healthy. We have the committee stage for that purpose. It has been suggested for instance that a 40-hour debate is not enough. Well, this can be discussed. Maybe it could be 50 hours, maybe something else. This is no reflection on the principle beneath the bill.

It has been suggested that the ambit of the bill is too wide. Well, this can be discussed in committee to see how it could be narrowed, if we were to take that view. I have no difficulty in envisaging this, and I am perfectly willing that this be discussed. But it is quite another thing to look for intentions, to suggest as did the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich—not only that this will not solve the Canadian problem, on which he is absolutely right and I do not believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) in any way suggested this legislation would solve the Canadian problem, but that the enactment of the bill would bring about the falling apart of Canada. I believe this unjustified projection is going too far.

The hon. member in my view has a long record of service to this country. There is no doubt about that. He served in the Canadian Forces, and he also served in the external service. But then again I did not quite understand the references to sagging morale in our external service. This remains to be proven. As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos) stated earlier, our external service is among the best in the world and recognized as such. So much for that. Despite his record, the hon. member feels endangered as an individual by this legislation. I wonder why? This piece of legislation clearly flows from the Canadian government's constitutional authority. Some said the opposite but without providing the least shred of evidence, without undertaking any demonstration of the fact, on the contrary.

Since the Canadian government has the right to introduce such legislation, it can do so one way or an other. The minister and the government decided to draft what is commonly referred to—this expression is unknown in the House or perhaps it has not even been used here in the past—as a general law. That was because the other solution open to us, namely a bill which would deal directly with the issue of the referendum announced by the government of Quebec, was perhaps more difficult to choose at this time. Indeed the form in which this referendum will take place is already known in its broad outlines, because Quebec has also passed such a general law, but its content is still a matter for speculation. I therefore see nothing wrong in the fact that the government wants to provide itself with an instrument with which in due time it will be able to present to the Canadian people or even a part of it, namely a province, a question which will be the subject of a 40-hour debate in the House of Commons, as well as a 40-hour debate in the other place. For those who may not be fully knowledgeable about parliamentary procedure, 40 hours is a lot of time. This represents several days of debate without the possibility for the government to use closure. Some have said that rather than set the duration of their debate to 40 hours, why not then use the means provided in the present standing orders and thus follow the democratic process as we already know it. It is precisely because if we let the democratic process function as it presently does, these guarantees requested by certain members are not as broad as those contained in this bill because hypothetically one can imagine that in the midst of a debating day at three or four in the afternoon, the government could decide to impose a fixed schedule.

It could well for instance say that we still have two more days to debate the issue and then it will be referred to the Senate for the matter to be expedited. On the contrary, 40 hours in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, without the possibility for the government to curtail these proceedings, to limit the right of private members to intervene, this seems to me quite reasonable. Well, we will have an opportunity to talk about it again. Finally, after the opposition have presented its arguments, provided they are more constructive, we may then decide that this delay must be extended. That is quite possible. It will be up to the parliamentary committee to make a decision about it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not provide that the question will have force of law once it has been answered by the population in a referendum. Not at all. We are dealing here with a consultative referendum. How does a consultative referendum differ, a mechanism already used in other jurisdictions with the same parliamentary system and the same traditions as ours, whether it be Britain and most of all Australia? I might be told that Britain has used the referendum process in very specific terms through a legislation which was dealing specifically with joining the common market. All right, I agree. But Australia, Mr. Speaker, does have general legislation on referenda which allows her to hold popular votes on constitutional matters. Well, how curious! And it works. It even works rather well and the provinces, the constituent elements of the Australian federation, have never been heard complaining about how those popular votes were working. On the contrary, it is the federal government itself which is complaining, despite the fact that their legislation is more extensive than ours, that the constraints imposed by public opinion and consultation are such that the federal government has its hands tied with those proposed changes to the Australian constitution. What is the idea of trying to make us believe that Bill C-9 will radically change the parliamentary process and corrupt our institutions?

Let us be serious, Mr. Speaker. Once again, if certain provisions of the legislation can cause confusion, we could discuss them in committee. But what is there about the principle of this bill which prevents the Progressive Conservative opposition from supporting it? There is something rather strange in this regard. We talk about consultation. I recall very well that last March, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sent a six-page letter containing his general proposals for popular consultations to the Progressive Conservative, New Democrat and Social Credit leaders. Did the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) show his disapproval at that time? Indeed not. The Leader of the Opposition is obviously too busy demolishing and criticizing everything indiscriminately to give a specific answer on these political issues. Indeed, since then, he has started to make certain suggestions, with the result that we have seen, especially since his return from a great voyage around the world in 80 blunders, as it was called in the headlines of some newspapers.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, when the bill was first introduced during the last session, did we hear opposition spokesmen make any great statements about the government's plot to destroy our Canadian institutions? No, Mr. Speaker, not at all! And once again, when the bill was introduced last October, was there any disagreement on the other side of the House? I listened to the speeches and I did not hear any. It is only after the bill was first introduced in the House that the opposition discovered their sacred mission to prevent the Prime Minister of Canada from overthrowing the government. What nonsense! Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich was shocked when the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) said: "We have been given a tool in the hope that we shall not use it". He made a terrible scene. However, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I hope we will not have to use this bill in answer to a referendum in Quebec, and I repeat once more, Mr. Speaker, that those who will not face the facts understand nothing about the situation.

Why should we give it that tool? Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House two years ago, I am one of those who believe that referenda are dangerous if used inconsiderately. I continue to believe that in the first place our parliamentary system was not structured to provide for systematic public consultation, and on the other hand people are not familiar with this kind of consultation, as for example in the Swiss federation. So it is a system which should be used purposely and with great care. I am the first one to recognize it.

Any legally elected government has some constitutive elements of the Canadian federation. A government of an important province in the Canadian federation has dedicated itself to the separation of Quebec and that is in its program, but with that in mind it has promised to hold a referendum to consult Quebec residents. That legislation is now in the books of the National Assembly. The premier of that province has said repeteadly that he will hold one. Perhaps it should already have taken place since they promised in 1976 that it would be held within two years, but as I do not want to be partisan I will say that it will probably take place within a short period. And that is where, Mr. Speaker, as Quebeckers and as Canadians, we will have to face a very serious problem. If only the political philosophy of the Parti Québécois—a philosophy which like any other political philosophy keeps changing with time—were perfectly clear, Quebeckers would not hesitate to answer a clear question.

Then you could say that there is no need for us as Government of Canada to ensure that consultation of the people is carried out properly, for if the question is clear, so would the answer be in the case of a "yes" or a "no". I do not want to enter into the debate of whether after winning the referendum, assuming that it did one day, the government of Quebec can or cannot carry out separation. Some, after examining the books and for purely legal considerations, say "no", they do not have the right while other eminent constitutional experts say "yes", they have the right.

In any case, let us be realistic about the facts, Mr. Speaker. If there was a clearly expressed opinion by the people of Quebec saying "We no longer want to be part of the Confederation of Canada," there would not be much we could do about it. There is absolutely no question about it, and I am among those who believe that the people of Quebec have progressed enough, have enough self-confidence, are aware enough of their responsibilities and duties to make a wise choice, and I will fully respect that choice, Mr. Speaker.

But having said that, the government is a government. I have no intention here, and God forbid that I should, of putting the government of Quebec on trial. But a government is a government, and like any government, the government of Quebec wants to win, and that is perfectly normal. The Progressive Conservatives are a political party and they want to win. The New Democrats and other parties want to win. We are a political party, we want to win. The Parti Québécois is a political party and a government which wants to win, and that is normal, that is in the logic of things.

Supposing that the Parti Québécois wants to win and holds a referendum, as the Gallup polls show—a poll is a poll; you cannot make more out of it than what it is—but we are making assumptions and let us hope that the majority of Quebeckers will not be in favour of the so-called separatist option, if there is such an option at this time, because they are not sure—either sovereignty or sovereignty association. There is then an obvious dichotomy between the interests of a government which has to win, they want to win, and a population which is not ready to support an option. This dichotomy leads to the conclusion, namely, that the question, if they must win, if they want to win, must be as nebulous as possible. They cannot ask the question: Are you for Quebec sovereignty? Only one question, like that, because they might very well lose. They cannot ask the question: Are you for the independence of Quebec, with eventually an association? No, they would also lose. These questions are clear, the answer would also be clear.

However, these same polls show that there is in Quebec as in other areas of the country a well-asserted desire to renew the Canadian federation, to give back some authority to the constituent elements, to reform the institutional structures.

Mr. Speaker, this is an easy way out. It will eventually allow them to ask a question if they wish and here again, I do not want to be unfair to the present Quebec government, to phrase their question in such a way that they would get a majority of "yeas". But would those answers be really a victory? Of course, they would see it that way but their opponents would not, they would object that the question was so vague as to make the answer quite worthless, and claim they have no terms of reference to proceed with the separation but only a hypothetical mandate to renegotiate, God knows what. And the Quebec government would say to that: "We have won our referendum!" And they would come here to Ottawa and say: "I want this and that, give it to me I have received a mandate from my people."

What are we doing here as Canadian goverment and as members of parliament? Do we take for granted that the support given to the secessionists is a "carte-blanche" allowing them to go as far as they please?

An hon. Member: You can still negotiate!

Mr. Lachance: Oh yes, you can always negotiate and the leader of the Progressive Conservative is good at that. This is no problem for him. He has no authority to do so but he still does.

Our attitude is quite different Mr. Speaker. We fell that the Quebec people ought to decide their own future freely. Once they have decided, we will take our responsibilities. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) contends that sovereignty association is just one and same thing. Sovereignty is not bad; it is the association which is important. It is not independance they want, but sovereignty-association, a revamping of the Canadian federal system. Mere presumptions, Mr. Speaker! Nobody knows the actual content of this sovereignty-association. The separatists have never defined it. This may be a new kind of federalism, or a confederalism like some Parti Québécois experts have said? But two Péquiste members are now talking about a system whereby, although they suggest there would no longer be any Federal or Confederal Chamber, there would be an association freely agreed to, similar to the European Community arrangement or to the Northern Countries Council set-up, which would allow us to continue just like before, whithout any further problems or difficulties. But those are mere the oricians! And again, this is not part of the proposed program of the Parti Québécois. Even if that were the case, it would mean a radical move from what is now facing us. Is that really what we want, Mr. Speaker? Is that really what Quebeckers want? It will be up to them to decide. But let them decide. Let us not anticipate on that decision even before the question is put. It is unbelievable.

At all events, it is nevertheless natural and sound, and a minimum of caution requires that the Government of Canada provide itself with the appropriate tool to clarify if necessary a situation which could become so blurred that nobody would make it out. But what is wrong with that? What is unusual in that situation? We are told that the scope of the bill is too broad, that it deals with all constitutional matters. but if this bill referred directly to the question of Quebec and the Parti Québécois, the members of the opposition would say: You single out a particular problem within a province without knowing what is going to happen in that province; you make projections about future events. So, if we did otherwise, they would tell us to do the opposite. And since we do the opposite of what they suggest they accuse us of doing the opposite. Just try and make something out of that!

The NDP has understood what we want to do with this bill. We do not want to destroy our democratic institutions. It was never intended. Anyway, I can assure the House that if any government, this one or any other, took it upon itself to misuse this bill and tried to exert undue influence on the Canadian people in defiance of the House of Commons, there would be such a public outcry that such a government could not function and would be rejected.

Have the Progressive Conservatives so little confidence in the Canadian democracy that they see a threat to our institutions in this legislation which provides the government with a tool to find out what the people think? I have more confidence than that in the people of Canada. I have too much confidence in our parliamentary institutions to suggest that such a piece of legislation will undermine their very foundations. It is unthinkable that one could make such a mountain out of a molehill, and I really mean it. The New Democrats, who do not always share our views and very often criticize and flatten us with all kinds of arguments, but it is all quite fair, have understood the real problem at issue here. But the Progressive Conservatives are so concerned with base electoral considerations that they are blind. Well, Mr. Speaker, we shall proceed with this bill and we will make sure that the question that will be put, either in Quebec or in another context, will be in the best interest of the Canadian people as a whole as well as of Quebeckers.

● (1530)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Merci, M. l'Orateur.

[English]

I wish to say a few words on the bill before us today, Bill C-9 dealing with referenda. I want to begin by saying that the speech made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the leader of this party, was "right on" when he gave the position of his party with regard to the bill before the House today. He made it very clear in the debate that we supported the bill before us. He made it clear that we are supporting it because the bill concerns the referendum on the constitutional matter only, and he made it also very clear that we believe the federal parliament needs the power to conduct a referendum in the province of Quebec if indeed the question posed by the Parti Québécois is not clear. It seems to me that we would be very remiss indeed if we did not give this institution the power to conduct such a referendum if the referendum question in the province of Quebec is not clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: It seems to me that the Conservative party members are very mixed up and rather inconsistent.

I go back to the speech made in the House by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). She spoke about the Parti Québécois and said:

It is already quite clear that the Péquistes are loading the dice as well as stacking the decks.

If they are loading the dice and stacking the decks, then I do not see why we should want to deny the House the right to have proper legislation allowing it to conduct a referendum if we think the referendum question in Quebec is not very clear. If the referendum question is clear, that is another matter, but what happens if the Parti Québécois, when the referendum in Quebec is held in October or November, asks for the power to negotiate sovereignty association and wins? What do we do then as the federal parliament? I ask that question very seriously. I think we should have the power and the right to put a very clear question to the people of Quebec: Are they in favour of becoming independent? The Conservative party may say "nonsense" to that, but I ask them: Who speaks for Canada? I think we all do. We are all a part of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I do not say this with any particular slant against the Parti Québécois; I recognize they are well meaning, intelligent, capable people. That is one of the reasons why I think they might do very well in the referendum that will probably be conducted next fall. They are brillant politicians, brillant communicators. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands says they are stacking the decks and loading the dice. They are doing all these things, yet she would have parliament deny us Canadians in general the right to ask Quebec a clearcut question. I do not think that is right. I think we, as Canadians, should have the right to do just that. We are all Canadians.

The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) in his speech said this was a real problem where he comes from and that they are concerned about independence. Then a member from Alberta said we are all Canadians, we are concerned about that too. If we are concerned, then why not make sure that this institution has the power to conduct a referendum to clarify things? I think that is fair and straightforward. That type of legislation has been in effect in many countries in the world. In Great Britain, for example, there have been referenda conducted on constitutional matters.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nystrom: There was a referendum on Great Britain joining the Common Market. They are now talking about referenda in Wales and Scotland to determine their future.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No, those are special bills.

Mr. Nystrom: This is a special bill also, one dealing with the constitutional package. The Leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Clark) gets very mixed up. We know the reputation of the leader of that party, but still I do not think they should always be mixed up because they want to follow their leader. I noted that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) was crying and saying what would happen if the government were to introduce this legislation and hold a referendum during an election campaign.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No, a referendum on elections.

Mr. Nystrom: It is right in the bill. At page 8 of the bill we find clause 6 which reads:

(2)(a) no writs of referendum shall be issued during a general election;

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I did not say that. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order or a point of clarification. I did not suggest in my comments—and the record will show that—that a referendum might be conducted during an election. I said the question might be put on general elections in Canada as a principle.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: If the hon. member does not know what the purpose of this legislation is, then I am really surprised.

We are faced with possibly the greatest crisis in this country, the fact that an important part of the country will be faced with the question about splitting away and becoming independent. The bill before us now will give the federal parliament the power to conduct a referendum in Quebec or in any other province, or indeed if there is a new constitutional package, to conduct it right across this country. That is all this bill is talking about. Some members of the Conservative party think that is funny. I would like to know where they stand.

A few months ago the leader of that party was quoted as saying that if Mr. Lévesque gets 60 per cent or over of the vote on sovereignty association, he would sit down and negotiate it with him. I understand he said it in French, but he still said it. I have seen journalists who have talked to people who were at that particular meeting. I believe it took place in Rivière-du-Loup. That is what the Leader of the Conservative party said. He did not know what Mr. Lévesque meant by sovereignty association, but by God he was ready to sit down and negotiate it. He is saying what Lévesque is saying: "Negotiate two sovereign countries."

• (1540)

Mr. Paproski: That is not what he said.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, it is. I am glad the hon. member said that, because I was about to indicate that the Leader of the Opposition then changed his mind. I was not surprised that he changed his mind because he does so often. Now the Leader of the Opposition is saying that he really did not mean that, they will have discussions and talk. What is the difference between negotiating and talking, negotiating and having discussions?

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) appeared on CTV's "Question Period". He made it very clear that we should sit down and negotiate sovereignty association, and that it would be very silly not to sit down for such a purpose. It was not until the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), whom I admire very greatly, was able to get the hon. member for Rosedale in the corner and give him a spanking that he promptly went before the press and said, "Well, I really did not mean that."

Coincidentally I turned on the television and saw the hon. member for Rosedale. He said that he used four words interchangeably: negotiation, discussion, talking, and another word. In my mind they are similar words, yet the hon. member said, "Now I am not going to talk about negotiation. I will talk about talking and discussions". Apparently that is the position of the Conservative party. During the Christmas recess people were approaching me and asking how a federal party could say such a thing, and whether Conservative members were about to sit down and talk about something of which they knew nothing. I indicated that I would not be surprised, given the present Leader of the Opposition. I said, "You can see him now on his world tour." That is the position of the Conservative party, and it does not surprise me.

The bill before the House is a very clear one. It will last for five years. One would think the sky had fallen in if one listened to the remarks of members of the Conservative party. Perhaps they do not know what the bill is all about, perhaps they have not read it. The bill deals only with constitutional questions; they will not ask about the price of rice in China. The bill contains a sunset clause. It will go on for a period of five years and then it dies. Perhaps Conservative members do not realize this.

It is only advisory in nature and a consultative mechanism. As the hon. ember for Westmount said, it is really nothing more than a public opinion poll. Do Canadians not have the right to say what they feel through a referendum on a matter as basic as the constitution of Canada? Do Canadians in the province of Quebec not have the right to say yes or no to a very clearcut question as to whether they want to be independent or remain a part of Canada? Perhaps the people of Saskatchewan should have the right to say yes or no to a certain constitutional package. Perhaps one area of the country should not receive special treatment, as has been suggested by some Conservative members. The bill requests a direct yes or no answer to a very clearcut question. It does not have to apply necessarily to the entire country. It can apply to one province or region of the country. If we are dealing with whether Quebec wants to remain a part of Canada, indeed that is what will happen.

Some members have expressed concern about the fact that 40 hours of debate is not long enough. Surely that is a quibbling question. We must remember that 40 hours represents between eight or ten days of consideration in the House of Commons. I realize it takes Conservative members a long time to say anything, but ten days should be long enough. Once the bill leaves the House of Commons, it goes before the Senate for consideration. Where the 40-hour maximum applies as well. Thus, we are looking at approximately 20 days of consideration. There are only five days in a parliamentary week, so we are talking about four weeks. We will have more than adequate time to consider the wording of the particular question which will be put to Canadians.

An amendment could change this particular clause. Perhaps members of the Conservative party would like to have 45 hours or 50 hours for consideration of the bill, but it seems to me that the 40-hours limitation is not a good enough reason to oppose it. When the referendum is conducted, it will be conducted in the ordinary manner in which an election is conducted in terms of franchise, voting, enumeration procedure, ans so on. The contributions made for the referendum campaigns on either the yes or no side will be limited to approximately $5,000 per contributor. There will be government subsidies for groups on both sides, similar to those provided under the Canada Elections Act. Also some free time will be provided by the broadcasters of the country. Those parts of the bill are very important.

In a question as important as the one which will be facing the country, we as a parliament should have a device to go and ask a very clearcut question if we think the situation must be clarified. The entire question of the unity and the future of Canada is a very, very important one. A debate such as this provides us with an opportunity to express our views as to why the country should be united.

Recently the Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity completed a major study. It made a number of observations and recommendations concerning the country and various items in the constitution which require change. We do not accept all its recommendations, but some of the matters to which it referred are very important and should be accepted by the House.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my congratulations to the Pépin-Robarts commission. As I said in English, it has prepared a sound report and I agree with many of its recommendations. But, Mr. Speaker, Canada is a wonderful country which was founded both by the French and the British 200 or 300 years ago. Long before the British and the French ever landed here, there were many Indians living in this country, who actually are the very first Canadians.

We have the privilege, Mr. Speaker, of having many ethnic groups in Canada. For instance, in the west there are many Ukrainians, Poles, Germans, Chinese and some Swedes like myself. Moreover, Canada is a very vast country; as a matter of fact, the distance between Vancouver and Halifax is greater than between Halifax and Paris, France, or Halifax and London, England. Canada is also a land of plenty with only 23 million people living in five regions which are very dissimilar: British Columbia, the prairies, Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

But unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there exists a deep misunderstanding between the five Canadian regions, between eastern and western Canada, between our consumers and our producers, between Quebec and the other provinces, but the deepest misunderstanding is to be found between Quebec and the other provinces. There is a significant cultural difference between them but, Mr. Speaker, the problems that prevail in Quebec and in English Canada are generally the same. We all have the same unemployment problems and the same Prime Minister. Therefore we have many very similar problems. It is for reasons such as those I do not wish this country to break up.

[English]

It seems to me sometimes we tend to exaggerate the differences a lot more than we should. Of course there are differences, but there are many similarities as well. Many of the differences in language and culture can be turned into tremendous assets with positive results for all of Canada.

● (1550)

I believe we have the flexibility we need in the constitution as it is now, perhaps with some amendments, and we have talked in this party of the different amendments that should be made to the constitution to make it very clear that the resources come within provincial jurisdiction, giving more power in communications to the provinces, and powers in respect of immigration given to the province of Quebec and perhaps others, and so on. I think that with those types of changes all parts of Canada have enough flexibility.

The province of Quebec, for example, does have the right, as it should, to make sure that French is the official working language of that province. Do they have that right? Our leader has said on several occasions that he supports the general principles of Bill 101. I do not think there is any party in the House which would deny that. Sure, there are some "i's" to be dotted and "t's" to be crossed that some might disagree with, but in general Quebec has that right just as other provinces exercise the right to have English as their basic language of work except, of course, New Brunswick, which is probably the only true bilingual or French-English province in confederation. These things do exist and I think we have flexibility.

I think the big thing that is lacking in this country is not a decentralization of power, which the Leader of the Opposition wants us to have, but a more even distribution of development. For so many years so much of the development has been concentrated in southern Ontario. I suppose if there is a spoiled brat of confederation it is the southern part of the province of Ontario. The freight rate structure has been geared in the main to aid that region.

An hon. Member: That's boloney.

Mr. Nystrom: Someone says that is boloney. He must be from southern Ontario. The tariff structure has been devised to help in the main the industrial heartland of this country, which is southern Ontario.

An hon. Member: How about Oshawa?

Mr. Nystrom: We are talking about southern Ontario and that is, of course, part of southern Ontario. I know the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) might think Oshawa is in the north, but it is really down in the south. Anyway, I know the Leader of the Opposition needs some geography lessons but I always thought the entire caucus had more brains than he and I am very much surprised to find that we have somebody here who does not know where Oshawa is.

Then we have government policies which I think probably have centralized this country to a great extent in places such as southern Ontario. Let me give you a couple of examples of what I mean by that. We have concessions to big companies through taxation, supported by the Conservatives. Most of those concessions go to the large companies, and most of the large companies are situated in the province of Ontario. Most of the public servants are in the province of Ontario, and until recently most of the buildings housing those public servants were in Ontario also.

There are even some government inconsistencies. DREE was established to get rid of some of the inequities and disparities in this country, to help Newfoundland, part of Quebec, the northern part of the prairies and the like. Of course we support the objectives of an organization such as that. Then we have other government plans such as the Export Development Corporation that channels government money into the promotion of our exports. As it happens, of course, most of our manufacturing takes place in areas like southern Ontario, so we have government money coming right back into those areas.

An hon. Member: Take it easy on southern Ontario.

Mr. Nystrom: I am not criticizing southern Ontario. It has been smart enough to have shrewd politicians, shrewd businessmen and shrewd people for all these years, and has obtained that development. What I am saying is that the time has come when we must have more balanced development across this country.

Of course, I think that is happening in western Canada. Through our resources it is exerting its muscle like it has never exerted it before, and will continue to do so. I think the balance of power in this country is starting to shift. There should be more development in western Canada as it relates and pertains to our resources. I think in Edmonton, Yorkton, and all over, that development must continue and must be accelerated. We must have more development in the Atlantic provinces.

There are a lot of things that could be done in the Atlantic provinces which are not being done. We have relied on the old program of offering a company a large carrot, but once it has gobbled the carrot the incentive to stay and expand is gone. We must develop things that are indigenous to the areas, the fishing industry, and the lumber industry. Other commodities that are produced there should be processed and manufactured in the Atlantic provinces.

In Quebec all we have to do is look at the unemployment rates to know that large areas of that province have not received their full or fair share of national development money and national development policies.

My friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), and others, talk about northern Ontario as being the real colony of the south, the colony of Toronto. That seems to be the forgotten region of the entire country in many ways because it is part of Ontario. There is no reason why there should not be more development there with more equal distribution and dispersion of the growth in the province of Ontario. These are the things I think have to be done.

We cannot solve the problems in respect of unity entirely by changing the constitution. I do not think we are going to make the country stronger by a tremendous decentralization of power. The premier of my own province has said that is not the solution. We do not want to set up ten quasi-sovereign states. I suggest that would really balkanize the country completely. I do not see how you create more unity by giving a tremendous amount of power to each of the ten parts. As Mr. Lévesque said yesterday on television in New York, talking about the old French proverb, if you whet the appetite you become more and more hungry. I think that is what will happen if you have a real devolution of power toward each of the provinces. I do not think that is necessary.

If we want to create equity in this country and help the outlying regions and the people who have not been helped in the past, we need a strong enough central government to distribute income and opportunity right across the country. You cannot do that by creating a system in this country where you have ten provinces given tremendously more power than they have now. I think that is the way the Leader of the Opposition wants to go. At least that is what he talks about, certainly when he is in the west, and that is what he talks about on many occasions in this House without, of course, clearly spelling out precisely what he means.

I see that I have only two or three minutes left. Let me say there are many people who have suggested that if Quebec wants to go it does not matter anyway because the rest of the country will stay as it is. I think they are dead wrong. As the report of the unity task force has said, we should not use economic arguments to keep Quebec in. Quebec has six million people and lots of resources, and perhaps they could do well on their own. Many people seem to think if Quebec goes it will just fall apart and suffer tremendous economic ills while the rest of the country would merrily carry on. I want to suggest that if Quebec goes that could be the end of the entire country. It could be the end of what is left of the entire country as well.

I am sure it would be tremendously advantageous to the Atlantic provinces to have closer ties with the United States. That would make tremendous sense. I see some members nodding their heads. I can tell you, coming from the west, that there would be a tremendous move among the people of the four western provinces, certainly in the three most western provinces, to become independent. Why should we continue to attach ourselves to the province of Ontario from which we import all kinds of manufactured goods but, in turn, to which we export very little? Why should we continue massively subsidizing the province of Ontario? I suggest that within five or ten years we would see the whole country totally balkanized, with perhaps three or four different units, a couple independent and a couple perhaps amalgamated with the United States. May I call it four o'clock?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

OLD AGE SECURITY

SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENT IN PENSION PROVISIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $350 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising living standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

He said: I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, once again to have an opportunity to present a motion that calls for substantial improvements in our old age security program. When I ask for improvements, it is by implication to be said that over the years we have done fairly well in building up a program for our older people which is certainly a lot better than was the case a few decades ago. I not only admit that we have done fairly well, I am proud to assert it, for I have been involved in a good deal of the story.

It is a story which gives me great pleasure to tell and I tell it fairly often, but I must not repeat it on this occasion because I would use my 20 minutes and still not finish the story. Even so, I might give one or two highlights to indicate my long interest and attachment to this question. As I have said before, it was actually on the very day that I was born, June 18, 1908, that the House of Commons of Canada first debated a measure having to do with pensions for ordinary Canadians. That was the bill which established the Government Annuities Act. I am told that I was born at about four or five o'clock in the morning, but it was not until that afternoon that the House of Commons debated the legislation. So, pensions in Canada and I got started on the same day.

I was also very much aware of the bargaining and the debating that went on in 1926 when the first old age pension bill was passed in this House of Commons and then defeated in that other place, which seems to be on the way out. Everybody is now recommending its abolition. The result of things that year, the bill in the early part of the year and an election and another bill later in the year, was that the first old age pension as such came into effect in Canada in the early part of 1927. That was a pension of $20 per month payable at age 70 under a very, very severe means test. When I first came to this House as a member in 1942, that was still the state of the old age pension, so I have been involved in all the changes that have taken place since, and I am happy to say that many of those changes have been exceedingly worth-while.

We have made things infinitely better for older people today than they were in the days of my parents or my grandparents, days that I remember quite well. Even though we have made these improvements—and I am not taking time to tell the story of the prodding and the pushing that it has taken to get them—the fact of the matter is that there are still further improvements to be made. I am not deterred at all by the argument that this is a time of restraint. I do not feel that that is any reason for leaving until some later year or decade the question of doing something to improve the position of our senior citizens.

Our senior citizens face needs today, even under our improved legislation, and it is my view that this parliament ought to be giving attention to those needs. I realize that this particular parliament, the thirtieth in Canada's history, is in its dying days and that the chances of getting something before there is a dissolution are not great, but I hope that by keeping the flag flying we will get something done on this important question before 1979 is over.

My motion, Mr. Speaker, covers most of the things that need to be done in terms of pension. Perhaps I should address myself to those items in the order in which they are mentioned in the resolution. In the first place it proposes that pensions under the Old Age Security Act and under the Canada Pension Plan should be available at age 60. I emphasize the fact that in neither case do I contend that these pensions should be universal at age 60 the way they are at age 65 but, rather, that they should be available to all those who are out of or are prepared to leave the labour market. In my view that is the only test that should be applied. I do not see the validity of a means test at that age, and even worse than the means test is the marital test that applies to the spouse's allowance which is available to some Canadians now between the ages of 60 and 65.

I know about the campaign to permit people to work beyond age 65. I am a living example of one who believes in that line of thought. What bothers me is that the campaign to provide for people to be allowed to work longer years can easily lead to the suggestion that the date for the payment of the pension might be made later than it is. In my view it should be made earlier, as I have said, at age 60. Certainly there are many people who are in the kinds of jobs where they can work many years beyond age 60, 65, or even beyond age 70, but the kind of people I represent in the railway shops, packing plants, textile establishments, steel mills and so on in the city of Winnipeg, are in hard, backbreaking jobs, such that whenever I meet these people, especially at election time, they say to me that staying at work until they are age 65 is very difficult. The thing they plead for most is to get that pension age down, at least on the basis of its being available. So I press this matter.

I remember the long struggle to get the age down from 70 to 65 and the years when we were told that it could not be done, but we finally got it, even if it took a year at a time to get it down. I suggest that it could now be put down to age 60 and that that is an objective to which this parliament should commit itself.

There is the fact that with so much unemployment in the brackets of younger people it makes sense to let some of the older people who want to retire do so, to open up jobs for those younger people. I am not asserting that this by itself would solve the unemployment problem, but it does seem to be silly to ask the younger people to live on unemployment insurance or welfare when they want to work, and to require older people to stay in the shops and factories to age 65, when they would much rather have the chance to retire and enjoy the remaining years of their lives. Again, I stress the importance of that aspect of the motion, namely, that pensions should be available at age 60.

I have said it before and I say it again: I am not arguing for pensions to be universal at age 60 the way they are at age 65, but in my view anyone who is out of the labour market or who is prepared to leave the work force and wants the pension, should be able to get it. That would include housewives at home. So far as women between the ages of 60 and 65 are concerned, especially those who are not spouses—those who are single, widowed or divorced—surely this is the more humane, the more decent way to meet their needs than by that terribly discriminatory spouse's allowance we have at the present time. I press that aspect of the legislation with extreme vigour, Mr. Speaker.

Most of the rest of my motion calls for an increase in the amount of the pension. I have put in a particular figure of $350 per month. That has to be seen in relation to the fact that at the present time the old age security payment, in other words, the basic pension, is $167.21 per month and there is available on top of that a guaranteed income supplement of $137.28 per month, which comes to a possible maximum of $304.49 per month. For persons at that point I am not asking for as much of an increase as I should like to ask. I am simply suggesting a minimum figure. I hope no one in this debate will argue I have the wrong figure in there, unless he wants to argue that it is too low.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, you can get almost any figure you want for the poverty level. The committee of the other place that dealt with aging some years ago has, from time to time, through its chairman, Senator David Croll, updated that figure. The Canadian Council on Social Development produces figures on the poverty level too, so it varies. Municipal bodies of social workers produce them also. I would point out that they range all the way from about $5,000 per year to $8,000 per year for a single person, and from $7,000 per year to $12,000 per year for a married couple. I suggest that to anyone who considers the cost of living today, those estimates of the poverty line are not at all high.

It is a fact, of course, that there are some other things available to older people, thanks to the legislation we have been able to win in this parliament and our legislatures, such as health and medical care, senior citizens apartments, and so on. When one looks at poverty levels based on the figures I have given, and when it is realized that the total amount payable under old age security and guaranteed income supplement combined is only $3,648.00 per year for a single person and only $6,756 for a married couple, one realizes that we are still asking most of our older people to live at or below the poverty line. I suggest that is something this parliament ought not to be doing; we ought to be a humane body of men and women and we ought to meet the needs of our older people.

It is argued, of course, that the pension is being indexed according to the rise in the cost of living. Almost every time we raise the issue we get that answer from the government. I want simply to make the statement again that we often make, that the indexing is always several months behind because of the way it is computed. It is also based on a general index and not in relation to the things that senior citizens have to buy. Neither does it conform to the principle I suggest in my motion, namely, that senior citizens should have the right to keep up not only with the cost of living at the point that they retire but should be able to keep up with the rising standard of living which is made possible by the economy they helped to build.

I say it is not good enough to tell us there is this kind of indexing. It does not even keep our older people up with the cost of living, let alone their right to be part of the Canadian family in every sense.

There are those who talk today about lots of older people being wealthy. An organization that I shall not name, because I am shocked at what it said, has suggested this week that perhaps we should abolish universality—we should no longer continue to pay old age pensions and family allowances to everyone. The implication is that there are older people who are wealthy and do not need their old age security. Mr. Speaker, there are statistics which show that 60 per cent of our senior citizens, 65 years of age or over, qualify for part or all of the guaranteed income supplement. You do not qualify for that unless you have little or no other income, Mr. Speaker. That accounts for 1,200,000 of our two million senior citizens.

By virtue of the fact that they qualify for the guaranteed income supplement they are already living far below the poverty line.

Above that 60 per cent, that 1,200,000, there are another 800,000 senior citizens. The implication is that they are all right. Mr. Speaker, they are not. I would say that half or more than half of those people are still living at the poverty line or just above it, which is not decent, dignified living.

There may be 10 per cent of our senior citizens at the top, but not more than that, who are receiving enough other income that they do not really need the pension. I suggest the way to deal with them is to raise the income tax on all persons in the upper brackets. Let us not ever go back to the indignity and confusion and bureaucracy of the welfare approach that was involved in means testing pensions as I knew it when I first came to this House of Commons.

I know it is argued that we have more sophisticated ways of doing these things today. It is not as cruel and severe as it was years ago. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I say to you out of some experience of knowing what the life of older people was like 50 years ago, and knowing what it is like today, that one of the best things the Parliament of Canada ever did was to put old age pensions on a universal basis; to make them a matter of right and to make them a matter of dignity.

There are older people today, even the ones who may be having a tough time economically, who are better off in terms of dignity and self-respect than was the case for most of our older people 40 or 50 years ago. Let there be no talk of any return to a means test for old age pensions. If there is any worry about the few at the top who make too much and do not need it, it can be taxed back.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is making some very good speeches about the changes that need to be made in our income tax system in order to get more for those who need it and take more from those who are at the top and do not need it. I go along with that completely. Let us not have the indignity and confusion, the unfairness that existed with the means test as we had it years ago. Once we start talking about the level at which the pension would not be paid, we are in trouble.

I see that I have used my 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker, and that I must sit down. I thank the House for the attention given me as I have made this speech—I do not know if it is the one thousand and fiftieth or the eleven hundredth time I have made it over the years. I am proud of what we have done in the Parliament of Canada to improve things for older people. Let us not stop now just because some people call for restraint. Let us recognize that the older people of this country are part of the Canadian family and that they deserve the best we can do for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am very pleased to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As usual, he has made an impassioned plea, this time on behalf of senior citizens. It is the same kind of plea he has been making since he has been in the House of Commons.

● (1620)

I am glad to have the opportunity to discuss this motion today, since it comes at a time when the Government of Canada has just taken some actions to improve the benefits provided to senior Canadians under the Old Age Security Act. I think, before we directly examine the terms of this motion, it might be appropriate to look at the new changes to see what we are doing, why we are doing it this way, and how much it is going to cost.

In January of 1979 the guaranteed income supplement for old age security pensioners is going to increase by $20 for each household receiving the benefit. More specifically, unattached pensioners, and couples where only one is a pensioner, will receive $20 a month. Where both husband and wife are pensioners, or one is a pensioner and the other is receiving a spouse's allowance, each will have an extra $10 a month.

The other change is a refinement to the spouse's allowance program which will permit the extension of this benefit for six months after the death of the recipient's pensioner spouse.

These changes indicate that the government, indeed that all members of this House share the concerns for older Canadians which are expressed in this motion by the hon. member, although practicality, especially in view of the current economic situation, required a much more modest approach. I think it is particularly significant, in debating the present motion, that we remember this $20 increase will be made not on the basic old age security pension, but on the guaranteed income supplement which is made available to pensioners with relatively low incomes. By doing so, we are ensuring that the money that is available for this increase will go to those who need it most. We could have used the same money to make an across-the-board increase in the basic benefit, but the increase would have to have been smaller, and it would have done nothing to resolve the special problem of the pensioner living alone. Using the guaranteed income supplement, we have given as large an increase to this group of pensioners as we have to pensioner couples who have the advantage of being able to share expenses.

One other thing about these new amendments which is important in discussing this motion is cost. The guaranteed income supplement increase will cost about $290 million, and that is a pretty large sum. To find that much money required some hard decisions about reducing expenditures in other valuable programs, so as to avoid higher taxes or increased borrowing.

But that $290 million is absolutely nothing compared to the cost of the hon. member's proposals, which are so large that even it whole departments of government were eradicated we could not find the money. We would have to raise taxes or public borrowing to finance these proposals. I hope to get back to this point later, if time permits.

We have before us a motion which really incorporates a series of proposals which have been made from time to time by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I wish to thank him for putting forth all these ideas at once because it gives us the opportunity to discuss the implications of them as a group. As I understand it, the hon. member has asked for five separate items, at least one of which is not entirely within the power of the Parliament of Canada to grant.

First, he wants eligibility for old age security at 60. This would be subject to some test of non-participation in the labour force, and I am not entirely sure how this test would work or whether it would apply only to those between 60 and 65. I am not sure whether the hon. member would want us to cut off from benefits the many persons over 65 who are still in the labour force on at least a part-time basis. Statistics Canada's figures indicate that 182,000 persons over 65 were labour force participants in March of 1978. On the other hand I see no reason to discriminate between the 60 to 65-year-old old age security pensioner and the over 65s on this ground. I do not know whether the hon. member would go as far as some countries, like Belgium and Finland for instance, in enforcing this retirement provision. Those countries apparently deny pensioners the right to work once they start receiving their pension. I do not know if we would ever want to go that far in Canada. There is no doubt that it is less easy for Canadians over 65 to find work than it is for those under that age, but thus far the door has not been shut altogether. Individual employers may set retirement ages but the nation as a whole does not compel Canadians to stop work completely.

Secondly, the hon. member asks that the same thing be done to the Canada Pension Plan, again subject to non-participation in the labour force. This is a task that might be even more difficult to achieve than a reduction in the eligible age for old age security.

It is not just that the Canada Pension Plan is a federal plan subject to provincial consent, so that we would need provincial accord. There is also the difficulty of paying for the benefits. One member suggested in the last session that we could somehow produce the money for all these proposal by slashing other programs, but neglected the fact that the Canada Pension Plan is a contributory program. The cost of the early benefits under the Canada Pension Plan would have to be borne by the contributions of Canadian workers and employers. The current controversy over the funding of the Canada Pension Plan has largely resulted from a lot of misplaced criticisms about the contribution rate. It has always been clear that this must rise from 3.6 per cent to around 8 per cent over the next 50 years if benefits are to continue to be paid, and this does not seem to be an exorbitant price to pay for the type of solid coverage that the Canada Pension Plan provides. However, when you add in the cost of retirement benefits at age 60, then the costs of this plan start rising at an alarming rate. It is true that the major portion of the cost will have to be borne by future generations of contributors, but surely their interests must be of concern to us as well.

Next, the hon. member wants to see the basic old age security benefit raised to $350. I do not want to dwell too much on this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, because I think that all of us want to see senior citizens receive as much as possible and the cost is the only factor with which we have concern. There are some arguments that could be made as to the effects on retirement savings that a jump in old age security benefits might cause, but I am sure that every member of this House would vote for an increase in old age security benefits if only it did not cost anything. But it will cost. The current basic old age security benefit is $164.74 a month, and the budget for this benefit, not counting the supplement or spouse's allowance, is over $4 billion a year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is a month behind.

Mr. Robinson: Raising this benefit to $350, even without all the extras the honourable member asks in terms of eligible age and removal of income tests and such, would raise the annual budget over the $9 billion mark a year. In other words, it will more than double the price tag of this program, not just for one year but forever. Having raised the benefit, we could not turn around and decrease it again, except perhaps in some circumstances too dire to be imagined now.

Next, the hon. member wants to abolish the income test on the guaranteed income supplement, and by implication incorporate this benefit with the basic old age security payment for all pensioners. Again, cost is an overwhelming factor which has been mentioned, but this whole proposal must be seen in light of the hon. member's basic objection to the income test, which I hope I will have an opportunity to speak on further, because it seems to me to be a very important concept.

Lastly, the hon. member wishes to set up an automatic indexation of these revised benefits by some measure of the Canadian standard of living rather than by the consumer price index as is currently the case. This idea differs markedly from the current system of indexation, which is intended only to maintain the real amount of benefits. If we were to increase benefits automatically by a larger percentage, one that increased the real value of benefits, we would be increasing the real cost of the program over a period of time. This proposal has been made from time to time, and because of the potential cost implications it is one that we would have to weigh carefully indeed.

It is apparent from what I have said earlier on this motion that there are a number of disturbing aspects to this long list of proposals. Certainly the overriding thing has to be the sheer monumental cost of the hon. member's suggestion, and we have had a pretty thorough discussion in the past of what this would mean to the Canadian taxpayer.

But there is more than simply cost involved here. Some of the things implied in this motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre amount to a fundamental alteration in the approach that would be taken toward income for the elderly and for other Canadians as well.

For example, the hon. member has proposed that we remove the income test which is currently applied to the guaranteed income supplement. What he is proposing really amounts to raising the old age security benefit and abolishing the guaranteed income supplement altogether. In other words, he is suggesting that we abolish the feature of the program that is designed to direct the benefits to those with the lowest income. He appears to be saying that there is something wrong with a program being designed so that funds will be directed to those most in need.

The guaranteed income supplement was introduced about 12 years ago, and I do not wish to take hon. members through all the changes that have been made since then. But I do want to emphasize three points about the original program. The first is that if the same funds as were available for the supplement had been added onto the old age security program without an income test, the benefits provided would have been much smaller. In today's terms, if the $1.25 billion now being expended on the supplement were divided evenly among all OAS pensioners, this would provide each with an extra $50 per month. Each would have about $215 per month. But a pensioner who has only old age security and the guaranteed income supplement to live on would have about $65 less than the $280.29 available now, with the income-tested benefit. In any real situation the cost effectiveness is always going to be important. Universality is also important, however, and a program like OAS which combines a universal benefit with an income-tested supplement may be the best compromise. That is what we have today.

The second point is that the program was and still is not means-tested, if we define a means test as an examination of both income and assets. Instead, the supplement was concerned only with the income of the individual as defined by the Income Tax Act. This avoided the stigma that is commonly associated with programs which examine the assets of the individual. It meant that a pensioner with a low income, but in possession of a few assets such as a house or car, would not be forced to become destitute before being eligible for this benefit.

I know the hon. member is aware of this difference and prefers to call the income test a means test, but we should remember that the major drawback to a means test, as most people understand the term, is the examination of assets. Under the guaranteed income supplement this problem simply does not exist.

The third point about this program's design is that it was originally a temporary measure, designed to supplement the income of pensioners only where they did not have a chance to contribute for ten years to build up a full pension under the Canada Pension Plan, which came into effect in 1966. However, the supplement was so successful and its value was so obvious that rather than being phased out starting in 1976, the program was made permanent. There is a lesson here, Mr. Speaker, and it is that programs like the supplement do have a legitimate role to play. Many people are saying that, rather than being abolished, the guaranteed income supplement should serve as an example to be remembered in designing programs for other deserving and needy groups in our society.

There has been mention, for example, of a guaranteed income for other groups, perhaps through the vehicle of a tax credit system. I would remind hon. members that any proposed tax credit would almost have to be income-tested in very much the same way that the guaranteed income supplement is income-tested. The rate of tax-back on a tax credit might be lower or higher than the $1 for every $2 applicable under the supplement, but the principle would be the same, that is, the greater the individual's income from other sources, the smaller the proportion of the tax credit that would be retained by the individual as disposable income. We all know about the new child tax credit in this regard.

Despite whatever governments may do, it should always remain the right and the responsibility of the individual to plan and build toward his or her own retirement needs as he or she perceives them. The idea that the government knows better than the individual and can do better than the individual in the field of retirement planning is not one that we could easily endorse or justify.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who just resumed his seat, I cannot fail to applaud and commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the pertinacity with which he comes at this problem and the evident concern he has shown throughout the years for the elderly. He takes a very human approach to this problem. He is ever making these urgings.

In times when the Canadian economy is flourishing it is able to meet at least some of the demands that are put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by others. He urges, for example, that a pension be available at age 60. It is not quite clear whether these people would take the pension at age 60 if they wanted to go on. I rather suspect that is not so. At 65 it would be there for them as well, even if they remained in the work force. That is one approach, I suppose.

The hon. member complained about the means test, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson) has said. In the extension of the guaranteed income supplement and the qualifications to obtain it, there is a process of a means test which I suppose is actually an incomes test. That is fair enough. I do not see anything undignified about that.

If we were able, we in this House would all want to ensure that the elderly of this country live in full comfort for the rest of their years. We would also like to feel that in their working years these people would be able to provide for that on their own, setting aside and not just frittering everything away. That is one of the unforeseen side effects of this cradle to the grave operation in which we have been involved.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree that a tendency has developed on the part of, unfortunately, a great many people to believe they do not have to save, the state will look after them, they will be all right, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will look after them when the time comes. They believe that when their time comes the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will urge that their pension be increased. That is not the ethic that belongs to the Canada that his mother, father, grandmother and grandfather knew. It is not the ethic that brought me into the world.

My forebears had to look after themselves out of their own resources and to look after others in the immediate family, such as cousins who had the misfortune to lose one or the other of their parents. That happened in my family. The ethic of that generation is being lost not wholly but partly as a result of the feeling that the government will look after them so they can spend everything they have. They believe there is no need to save. That is unfortunate.

The hon. member's motion is very complex. I will not necessarily deal with all elements in a connected fashion. One element of the motion is that the pension he is suggesting should be indexed by other than the cost of living index. The present cost of living index does not really apply to the elderly. I have urged that there be a special cost of living index for the elderly, one which is more related to their buying patterns and habits. That is something we ought to implement.

There was a change in the cost of living index, the base, the formula, the basket, or whatever you call it, on which the cost of living index was devised. It took place just about two or three months ago, but it did not meet this particular need.

I have learned that in Britain there are two indices applicable to the elderly. One is apparently applicable to couples over the age of 65 and it relates to the pattern of their expenditures. They may or may not own their own home, they may be living in homes for the elderly; they don't buy clothes to the same extent as younger people and not many of them buy ski equipment, yet that element, sports and recreation, is included in the present cost of living index. It is nonsense. There is another index, and I was surprised to learn of it. It is an index which is applicable to single people in Britain who are on pension. Pensions for them are indexed according to a single person's index. I think it is high time we had our statisticians looking into this matter.

When I heard that the index was being worked on I had very high hopes that there would be an index which could very well be applicable to the elderly. It has not been done and I regret this very much. In passing, and since I am talking about the British pension system, I do feel that I would like to emphasize once again here, unrelated as it may perhaps be to the motion before us but still relevant, the plea of those of us who are deeply concerned about the lot of the British pensioners in Canada who are not getting any indexation of any kind in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The reciprocal agreement has not yet come through. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would carry our message of concern to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in this regard.

An hon. Member: We are working on that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You have been working on it for years.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I know each country blames the other, but surely there is a way of getting down to it. There aren't that many pensioners in that position. I learned that the agreement between the Italians and the Canadians was concluded the other day and I know this will be a great joy to those who lost their sons during the war. I do wish we could get it cleared up so that those British parents who came over to live near their families—their sons or their daughters who had emigrated here—should get the benefit of the increases in the British pension. However, that is a matter which will arise on another occasion.

We tend to overlook the fact that not everybody needs the pension. Many members object to a means test. The suggestion is that if certain people do not need a pension, if they have sufficient assets to make themselves comfortable in their later years, you can tax them like the devil and take those assets away from them. But what you are doing is simply redistributing income. If someone wishes to refuse the pension, if he doesn't need or want it, why should he not be able to assign it either to someone who does need it or make it quite clear that the money is going into the general pot?

As I said before, I hope there is not a single person in this chamber who does not want to ensure that those who are in need in their later years should not be in want. All of us want to make sure that their needs are catered to, to the extent that is possible. Many of us here, either because of our family circumstances prior to coming into the House, or because of the enterprise we were engaged in before we came here, or maybe because of family circumstances since coming into this House, might feel prepared to forgo the pension which might be available to us from the CPP or the OIS. Why should we not be able to make clear that we wish this pension to be available to someone else who is in need?

I am reminded of one comment made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which tickled my fancy. He said: "Pensions ought to be available to wives who are not in, or who are prepared to withdraw from, the labour market." There ought to be more wives around here prepared to comment on that remark. Wives are in the labour market whether they like it or not, as far as I can see, from the time they become wives. Husbands who are in the labour market should be able to contribute that portion of a pension for their wives so they can draw a pension in their own right. Why not?

An hon. Member: Cutting into universality.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): All right, I know about universality. But is there a man in this House who would not be willing to pay twice his contribution in CPP payments in order that his wife, at the time of her reaching retirement age, would be able to receive payments from the CPP? I hope not. But I am not going to go around the House asking the question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the husband whose income falls in the low income brackets and who cannot afford to pay a premium for his wife?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am talking about those who are able and willing. Let's distribute the income. That's what we are doing anyway. I am prepared to share what I have with those who have less, and I think a lot of people feel the same way.

There are a few other provisions which have not been included in this and which I would like to see. For instance, I would like to see tax measures which would waive certain taxes on those who have reached the age of 60 or 65. I think of capital gains taxes, for example. I will not say 60 or 65, even, at the moment, but I have in mind those who are up in years and have retired from the work force. They have saved up a little packet. They may have put it in Canada Savings Bonds, though I hope they put it in something a little more promising that that. They should be allowed to cash those savings without having to pay tax on half of the gains they made. There might even be consideration given to relieving them of other tax or allowing them a special tax rate in their circumstances. These are ways which could be used to ease the lot of those who are in the later portion of their lives.

I have mentioned the business of indexing pensions in Britain. I heard someone say across the way here that there is no law compelling people to stop working. I think there is such a law applying to public servants requiring them to stop work at 65. A friend of mine who was in the militia came to me saying he had reached the age of 60, and a young girl in the orderly office called him in and said: "You are 60, you are finished, hand in your uniform and get out." Why should he? He still has the desire to go on working, contributing to the training of the young folk who want to be in the militia. Why should he have to leave? This is sheer nonsense.

So unfortunately there are some laws which I think should be examined a little more closely. There are people who want to go on working, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does. I wonder why he is not taking his pension. I will tell you why he is not taking his pension—

An hon. Member: He is waiting to form the government.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You think he is waiting to form the government? It is going to be a long time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He will be in the Senate by then.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't be so sure.

Mr. Paproski: Not even that organic union is going to take place.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They might even offer a Senate place or some other merited position.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought you were my friend.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Let me come back now to GIS for a minute.

There is another measure which I think we should consider because I think this motion opens up a great vista of improvements for the elderly who deserve our attention. I wonder if there is not some possibility of removing an increase in the limits of earnings permitted to those with pensions without suffering a reduction in their pension. Surely this is a means of alleviating their lot in a time of high inflation. Of course this is what is worrying the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and it worries me too. I see people going around a shopping centre picking up a little piece of meat and seeing it is beyond their means. Even ground meat is becoming too costly. When they look at the price of homogenized milk or two per cent milk or skim milk, they find it is beyond their means. The same is true for bread. These are very serious problems.

I wonder if there is some means whereby we can refer the subject matter of this motion to a committee where we could break it down into its various components and see if there are not some other ways still open to us, in these times of restraint on the one hand and inflation on the other, to improve the lot of the elderly, those who are no longer in the work force, those who are prepared to leave the work force, and the handicapped. Would it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to move a motion that the subject matter of this motion be referred to the appropriate committee for further study and examination and that it return to this House with the committee's recommendations? I think we are all earnestly and keenly aware of the problem and we would like to do something to help. If the motion is in order, I would be very happy to move that the subject matter of this motion be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak in the closing minutes on this private member's motion No. 6 put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I thank him again for giving us the opportunity to debate this very important subject. Surely if there is any justice, that member will be recorded honourably in Canadian history at least in this area for being one of the great champions of our older Canadians—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But—

Mr. Philbrook: There is always a "but". In giving due credit to the hon. member let me clear up a number of misconceptions which often arise with regard to such suggestions as those contained in the motion, not that there were any misconceptions on the part of the hon. member when he formulated these proposals, but I think they are in the minds of many members of the public. Since time is so short, I will not attempt to go into them in full detail, as I would have, but, to point out the first one. This system is based very solidly on three tiers or areas: the old age security program, the Canada Pension Plan, and private pension plans.

Another misconception is that these benefits should go beyond basic needs and by themselves provide whatever level of security and comfort in retirement might be desired.

Another misconception is the belief that any and all improvements in the system must come in the public sector. That refers to the third tier, particularly in a country which believes in a free society, the responsibility of its citizens and the ability to provide for oneself, with all the flexibility that that suggests. Perhaps it is time we realized that not only is it possible to expect improvements in private pensions but there may be more room in this area, much more room, to make improvements than there is for increasing public benefits which result in an increased burden on the taxpayer directly, or increased costs indirectly. The registered retirement savings plans, for example, have been brought in in recent years and, although greatly used, are not used to full advantage. Yet everyone seems to have given up on these sources of additional pension.

In closing I would like to say that, as hon. members are aware, the amending formula in our Canada Pension Plan requires that changes in the CPP of the type recommended in this motion be approved by the Parliament of Canada and by two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the total population. In addition, there are other difficulties. I wonder how easy a task it would be to convince the provincial—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. on Monday, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF CANADIAN LIBRARIES RECEIVING FREE PUBLICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in connection with an order issued by the Department of Supply and Services which, beginning in April, will reduce by one half the number of Canadian libraries which currently receive Canadian publications free of charge. In practicable application, this means that the number of libraries in Saskatchewan receiving such publications will be reduced from 25 to 8; in Manitoba, from 23 to 8; and in Alberta, from 24 to 12.

The consequence of such reduction ill mean that the public will not have access to information to which it is entitled. Libraries facing serious financial difficulties already will be denied the supply of such information. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government give reconsideration to such order, for unless this is done the libraries will cease to serve the public effectively.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST STATISTICS CANADA CARRY OUT SPECIAL SURVEY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that Statistics Canada, last March, did a special survey aimed at finding out how many outside the labour force wanted to work and came up with the number of 263,000 people, which would add about two percentage points to the unofficial unemployment, jobless rate, and in view of the fact that changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act would, even by March, start to affect the number of people outside the labour force who want to work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That Statistics Canada be asked by the Minister of Finance to carry out a special survey for the month of February or March corresponding to the special study of last March.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONSUMER DISCOUNT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion relating to an issue of major importance.

In a statement to a group of businessmen last Friday the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) suggested the possible return to wage and price control in this country. In view of the absolute failure of such measures in the past and their negative effect on Canadian workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the government relinquish all plans, if any, to reintroduce this type of negative economic tool and that it put all its efforts in setting our economy on the way to prosperity through positive action, by instituting for example a consumer discount.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ACTIVITIES OF MICHAEL PITFIELD IN PAST YEAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning national security and Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Prime Minister make an immediate statement outlining activities of Michael Pitfield during the past year regarding national security, including participation as chairman of a top secret PMO/PCO investigative group on this subject, and whether the government plans to adopt recommendations prepared by this group, including a six-year phase-out of RCMP security service, disbanding of a plan to appoint an ombudsman for Canada, application of extreme modifications of the freedom of information act and, finally, he give a full explanation why Michael Pitfield, who has negligible national security experience, was authorized to deal with such matters when his only chief qualification is a close confidante of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

GOVERNOR GENERAL

POLICY ON OPENING OF GOVERNOR GENERAL OFFICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As the new Governor General has opened a regional office in Winnipeg at room 200, 303 Main Street, the federal government building, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That this House request the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions to explain new policy on Governor General regional offices, how many will be opened, for what purpose, and at what cost.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED MANDATORY INCLUSION OF LINGUISTIC RIGHTS IN DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That this House regret the lack of understanding and the apathy of the task force on Canadian Unity in spite of the cries of despair uttered by minorities and the recommendation that self-fulfilment and survival of linguistic minorities be entrusted mainly to the provinces; moreover, that this House regret that the task force did not recommend the compulsory inclusion of linguistic rights in a charter of individual and collective rights and suggest that all governments take necessary action to reach that aim so that the reconciliation not look like a divorce between the two founding nations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INCOME TAX

DISTRIBUTION AND SUBMISSION OF T4A SLIPS FOR OLD AGE SECURITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the taxation branch of Revenue Canada has stated in the Income Tax Guide for 1978 tax returns that T4A(OAS) slips will be received by pensioners with their January cheques, whereas the Department of National Health and Welfare say the slips will not be issued until late February, and in view of the fact that this blunder was brought to the attention of the appropriate officials three weeks ago, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House call upon the government to take immediate action to clarify its position with respect to the distribution and submission of T4A(OAS) slips in order to put an end to the confusion which presently exists in the minds of our old age pensioners.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF PRAC RECOMMENDATIONS ON RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, during this past year I did a telephone survey of some 15 railway lines that were under review by the Prairie Rail Action Committee and found that approximately 12 of those lines were receiving abnormal and very low service.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House instruct the transport committee to do a systematic analysis to ascertain whether or not there has been any significant decrease in the level of service during the past 15 months to those rail lines recommended for abandonment by the Prairie Rail Action Committee; and, further, if a substantive lowering of service can be established, that the Canadian Transport Commission be made aware of the committee's findings prior to their report to the Ministry of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I direct my question to his superior, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

In view of today's dollar now being at 83.75 cents, making it the softest of the soft currencies among all industrial nations, would the minister indicate if he is aware that it has now been revealed that the United States current account deficit is only one-third, relative to their size, of our current account deficit in this country? If he is aware of that hard fact, does he agree that our sad current account position is contributing heavily to the decline of our dollar?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, I have no additional comments to offer other than the very wise ones the Minister of Finance has made in this area. He has stated categorically in this House on several occasions the policy of the government in regard to foreign exchange.

I am, of course, generally aware of the juxtaposition of the United States current account balance, and so forth. I am not sure that is the whole, or the substance of the story. There are many other factors to be brought to bear, such as our relationship, our fiscal position vis-à-vis the provinces, the United States government's position vis-à-vis their states. All those kinds of things should be brought into context to make an objective analysis of this situation.

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Having had those few words from the minister, perhaps I can go even to his superior, the emperor, the Prime Minister himself.

Bearing in mind that the Canadian dollar is now, in 1979, at the lowest level it has been in relation to the United States dollar for literally over 120 years, and bearing in mind that Mr. McNess, a well-respected economist, referring to Canada stated as follows—

I estimate that current and past devaluation is adding something in the order of an additional 4 per cent to the inflation rate—

—would the Prime Minister confirm if it is his understanding that the 83-cent dollar has cost us 4 per cent in inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could not confirm or deny the 4 per cent, as I have not made the calculation. It is obvious, however, that a lower value to the Canadian dollar means that Canadians have to pay more for imported goods. That is the way the dollar works.

It means, therefore, that the cost of living in respect of imported items in Canada is higher than if the dollar were at par. This is the incentive to Canadians to buy things made in Canada which will create jobs for Canadians. That is how the lower value of the dollar is working, to create jobs in Canada.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister. Another effect of the falling dollar and the government's desperate attempts to prevent it falling further is rising interest rates.

As we learn from the United States that it is likely their rates will continue going up, and it is estimated by some economists in New York that they may be up by a point and a half in terms of United States short-term rates by next June, would the Prime Minister indicate if he intends to continue to instruct the Bank of Canada to keep raising interest rates in Canada in order to keep ahead of United States rates, notwithstanding the devastating effect high interest rates are having in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: I have never given any such instructions, Mr. Speaker, so I would not be called upon to give them again. As to what happens after something hypothetical or speculative occurs in the United States, the very nature of the question is out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Questions

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

Given that Canada will never have a stable dollar until the current account balance in our balance of payments improves, could the minister confirm, first, that the current account deficit for this year is significantly higher than last year and, second, that the trend is worsening rather than improving; and could he tell this House how this performance will continue to affect the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, the trade surplus, of course, is showing some indications—

Mr. Stevens: Current account.

Mr. Andras: Hon. members over there have great difficulty getting their act together: this is obvious in many of the statements they have made. In fact, there is apparently very fierce competition among them for any role, but the universe will unfold as it should.

There is a new element on the scene: if they begin to accept some of the wise comments of a former colleague of theirs, Mr. McKeough—

Mr. Stevens: How about your Mr. Turner?

● (1420)

Mr. Andras: Perhaps it will be possible to clarify exactly where they stand on these kinds of issues.

On a serious note, we Canadians, governments and parties of all types must, obviously, do our very best to improve the competitive position of our industry vis-à-vis foreign trade in order to increase our trade surplus. Trends are encouraging now, but they are not sufficient to overcome the other problems that we all know we have.

With regard to internal deficits, as the hon. member pointed out and as I responded to him, one has to take this in total combination with governments at all levels in this country in terms of what are their cumulative surpluses or deficits in order to compare them with the American situation. While we have certainly taken steps to restrain our expenditures, we have revenue problems which are creating current account deficits in this country.

I have not had any indication of what hon. members opposite would do. In fact, the only news I have had recently is that they would do something—God knows what—to increase that deficit.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the current account deficit on the balance of payments. In terms of our domestic deficits we—as I am sure all members opposite do—expect newsletters to put us in touch with comments of former colleagues.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Cotret: But seriously, Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week, at the Prime Minister's regular press conference, he was asked about three-month to six-month projections on the dollar, unemployment and the rate of inflation. The Prime Minister replied, "They look good to me."

I would like to ask the minister if it is his view that with an 83-cent dollar, a rate of unemployment over 8 per cent and a rate of inflation over 8 per cent, that looks good to him.

An hon. Member: You can't fool a fool.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not deal in those very specific mediums—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: —and I do not think the Prime Minister was; but I will say that I have had the benefit, as other people have, of talking to a great many businessmen and others in this country, including labour leaders. The curious thing is that their confidence in the indicators in our economy are far more encouraging: theirs is much more upbeat and concrete, backed up by investment decisions, than you get from the theoretical economists from whom we are hearing and from the outside world. Certainly, the partisan comments are developing a psychological depression in this country, rather than any optimism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I would like the minister to explain this to the House. If everyone he hears from in the private sector, all the confidence he hears, is correct, what explains the dramatic fall in confidence vis-à-vis the Canadian dollar? What is the government not telling Canadians that, obviously, international investors and Canadians know, to make them lose faith in the Canadian dollar and thereby bring the dollar to its lowest rate in years and years?

Mr. Paproski: Pierre Trudeau.

An hon. Member: It is simple.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Ask your Secretary of State.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of psychology in this area and I think the very kinds of questions and comments that members opposite are making in these times—for very questionable motivation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: —is one of the reasons why there is some problem.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF WAGE SETTLEMENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As a result of meetings with business leaders which he held over the weekend, I would like to ask whether the Prime Minister or the business leaders were able to isolate any instances of exorbitant or inflationary wage increases.

As every member of parliament knows, the industrial composite index of wage and salary increases went up only 6.4 per cent, which was less than the increase in the cost of living. If the Prime Minister has any information in this respect, would he tell the House who these groups are?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there were several instances referred to of settlements which were considerably above the average figure mentioned by the hon. member—a figure of 6 per cent to 7 per cent.

● (1425)

Concern was expressed that these increasing rates of settlement might lead to double-digit inflation if Canadians were trying to compensate themselves for increased costs of goods imported from abroad, whether it be increased costs of energy because of the rise dictated by the OPEC nations, or whether it be increased costs of goods imported with the Canadian dollar worth less than it had been in the previous year. These instances were referred to. There was no general consensus that we would go into double-digit inflation; on the contrary, the hope was expressed that some of these settlements would, by their nature, be catch-up and would not indicate a trend. The hope was that the trend would continue to show the restraint that was shown in the past year by union and management.

Mr. Orlikow: I am sorry the Prime Minister was not able to give any specific illustrations about wage increases somewhat higher that 6 per cent.

Statistics Canada reported last week that after tax, industry corporation profits were up by more than 30 per cent over the year earlier, and bank profits were up by 25 per cent. Did the Prime Minister discuss with the business leaders the desirability of price and profit restraint on their part in the coming year?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was quite a bit of discussion on that. Certainly, from the government's point of view we indicated that it would be preferable, in the allocation of resources, if management kept in mind the importance of satisfying the consumer with lower prices, rather than the shareholder with higher dividends. This was discussed at some length. In that discussion we also referred to settlements with labour which might be inflationary if they were not justified by any particular catch-up.

FINANCE

PROFITS OF MINING INDUSTRY—INCREASE IN PRICE OF ZINC

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is for the Minister of Finance. On Friday, the minister said that the pulp and paper industry had made windfall profits which they were investing in modernization of their plants. The minister commended them for that.

Has the minister identified any other industry that has had similar windfall profits? Will the minister look into the mining industry, which has just raised the price of zinc by two cents a pound, an increase that will escalate as it moves through the economy, and any other industry which has had windfall profits? Will he discuss with those corporations the need for restraint on their part in raising prices?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I do not know, Mr. Speaker; I will have to check the increase in the price of zinc, because I do not have that in front of me.

Of course, in the last while the price of mining products has been quite low in the international market. The fact that it is increasing at this time is not necessarily bad for the Canadian economy. Most of those products are exported. This will permit some mining operations that are not operating at full capacity at this time to resume full operation and get more people working. A firming of the prices of mining products is not necessarily bad for the Canadian economy.

INQUIRY WHETHER STEPS WILL BE TAKEN TO CHANGE FLOATING DOLLAR POLICY

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

For quite a while now the Minister of Finance has been saying that the Canadian dollar is a floating dollar. In view of the fact that well informed people in economic circles, especially those involved with banking institutions, have indicated that, contrary to the Minister of Finances's allegations, the Canadian dollar is not floating but has been supported by the actions of the government, could the minister or the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers advise the House whether the new department will change this so-called floating dollar policy and how it will direct the economy to solve this problem?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, monetary and fiscal policies are the responsibility of the Minister of Finance, and I have stated very often that the Canadian dollar is a floating dollar. The purpose of the interventions made by the Bank of Canada was to maintain a normal market, and this is something the central bank of any country must do when its currency is going either up or down. I suggest that the hon. member read very attentively the interview which the governor of the Bank of Canada has given to The Globe and Mail newspapermen and which was published last Saturday.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary question.

As we know full well that the governor of the Bank of Canada is on the payroll of the chartered banks, I think it might be preferable for the minister to take note of what the president of the Royal Bank said about the floating dollar. I ask the minister what he intends to do to remedy the situation: the president of the bank having said that "of course we had to build up our reserves because those of the government were used to support the dollar". He also added: The mere fact of borrowing immediately placed us at a disadvantage. What does the Minister of Finance intend to do to remedy the situation?

Mr. Chrétien: To my mind, the hon. member is contradicting himself somewhat in that he said, just a minute ago, that the governor of the Bank of Canada is on the payroll of the presidents of the chartered banks, after which he said that the president of the Royal Bank does not agree with the governor of the Bank of Canada. The hon. member might be well advised to read his text again. The policy of the government and the Bank of Canada is well known with regard to our reserves and the fluctuations of our dollar on the market: I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): On another supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The point being precisely that the investments the government makes to support the Canadian dollar distort its fluctuations, would the minister be willing to change that tactic which has finally been proved to be unwise since the dollar continues to go down? Would the minister be finally willing to base the value of the dollar on that of Canadian production instead of on the interests of American financiers?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, at this time the value of the money of every country in the world, or rather all industrial countries, is determined by the market. All of them have been floating since 1970; in that, Canada follows the same policy as the United States, Germany, Japan and all industrialized countries; in other words, the value of our dollar depends on the reactions of the market.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER OF NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Speaker: Before continuing the question period, I invite all hon. members to join with me in signalling the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished visitor, head of an official delegation, in the person of the Right Hon. Brian E. Talboys, Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM OF OVERCLASSIFICATION OF POSITIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board: it deals with classification.

Might I remind him that a complete audit, a report as of December 1 back in 1976, indicated there was good evidence that the administration of the classification system was deteriorating? Since the government has stated its intention to introduce Bill C-12 which has to do with indexation, a related matter, when are we to be told what the answers are to this serious problem of overclassification which, I say, is costing the Canadian people some $75 million a year: I dispute the minister's estimate that it is costing $45 million? Why the foot-dragging after all these years?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Again, Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the figure of $75 million. I took the same position when replying to one of the hon. member's colleagues. I said at the time that even taking into account a degree of indexation, we felt the maximum figure would be $50 million. Even so, that is a lot of money and the position is still very far from satisfactory as far as we are concerned.

I have already outlined the action we are taking. The departments which have been identified as major offenders, and the occupational groupings in which the most serious difficulties are apparent, are being given close study and monitoring procedures are being put in place in an effort to correct the situation. Certain positions which are now vacant and which have been identified as being overclassified are, obviously, being downgraded. If individuals concerned can be relocated in other positions, the vacant positions are being downgraded. We are looking at various measures which can be taken to correct the situation to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. Alexander: I hope the minister realizes there is some urgency with respect to the debate on Bill C-12. We want complete answers; we want this whole issue to be discussed so that we may know what to do with Bill C-12 which involves the indexation of pensions.

I will now put another urgent question to the minister. In October, 1977, a further report was placed on the desk of his predecessor, indicating that in the personnel administration group, the group which does the classifying, there is a greater tendency for overclassification. The report went even further; it called for corrective action to be initiated immediately. This was back in October, 1977.

Can the minister assure us that the corrective action which was called for, and which is so important if we are to reduce this enormous cost to the taxpayer, has in fact been taken and, if so, what is the nature of this action?

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the personnel policy branch has put in place a new monitoring mechanism to make a particular study of this situation. It has been termed the Classification Early Warning Capability—that is a phrase which one might expect someone in the department of my hon. friend, the Minister of National Defence, to use—and it is designed to identify these cases and red-flag them earlier in the process.

Mr. Alexander: Can the minister assure us that we will have all the answers with regard to overclassification or misclassification when we begin debating Bill C-12, which I understand has a high priority this week? Obviously, we shall need complete answers if we are to reach a rational conclusion with respect to this important bill having to do with the indexation of public service pensions.

Mr. Buchanan: I can assure the hon. member I shall do my utmost to supply the answer to any questions he may wish to ask, but I should tell him it is my understanding that when officials from the personnel policy branch were appearing before the committee on miscellaneous estimates, all these matters were probed at some length. Nevertheless, as I say, I will be happy to supply additional information if it is requested.

Mr. Alexander: Probing is not a solution.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INCOME TAX—DISTRIBUTION AND SUBMISSION OF T4A SLIPS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: it relates to the issuing of T4A (OAS) income tax slips to old age pensioners, and their subsequent submission to Revenue Canada.

The revenue department proposed that these slips should be issued with the January cheques. Why, in these circumstances, did the hon. lady's department decide to issue them, instead, with the February cheques, late in the month, on February 26? Knowing they would be late, why did she not take the opportunity of issuing with the February cheque an errata slip so that pensioners would not be so confused about the situation?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The T4A (OAS) statement will go with the February cheques because we were persuaded of the urgency of having the other TFA-1 statement received by families in January together with the new form for mothers.

I ask senior citizens to recognize the reason for this decision. The machine could not process the information slips for both groups at the same time. Each of these groups is large in size and the senior citizens will receive the required forms in time, as the law says, before the end of February. Unfortunately, both groups could not be dealt with in the month of January.

Mr. Halliday: Old age pensioners normally submit applications for guaranteed income supplements at the same time as they return their income tax forms. Has the minister taken into account the confusion which will exist in her department when all these applications for GIS come in late, not to mention the confusion in the minds of all the old age pensioners who are awaiting their cheques?

Miss Bégin: I would not wish to suggest that it is the hon. gentleman who is confused, but I do not think it is the mothers who are confused. As I say, the machine cannot handle all this information in the same month. I had to make a choice. I thought it was more important—and I think all senior citizens in the country understand this—to help 1.5 million mothers who have never had to file an income tax form, which they must do in order to claim this new cheque. It is not distributed automatically, as is the family allowance. We wanted all the papers they needed to come with their January cheques.

The hon. member should have said, in his proposed motion under Standing Order 43, that on the other hand senior citizens have January, February and March in which to fill in their income tax and GIS application forms. They will have the same length of time to which they are accustomed. I am talking about an administrative decision to give priority to mothers who are non-filers and who are getting cheques for the first time. I am thinking particularly of those mothers who need the money the most.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPANSION OF RELATIONS WITH CHINA

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the United States is now pursuing more actively its relationship with China, a very welcome move coming about seven or eight years after our move, can the minister assure the House that Canada will pursue and expand its relations with China so that we can maintain the advantage gained by recognizing that country very early in the 1970s, which is something the Leader of the Opposition apparently does not understand?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the Leader of the Opposition—and judging by the reaction opposite, the official opposition—is aware of how vigorous and effective our efforts have been in the last seven years in terms of our relations with China. I am not sure, either, whether, in talking as I believe the Leader of the Opposition did about what has happened in the last eight weeks, he was unaware that trade relations between the United States and China have been normal for many, many years. He seems to be continuing his insistence on proving that where ignorance is bliss, it is folly to be wise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL—FACILITIES TO ASSIST HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that we are getting close to the time when the World Congress on Rehabilitation, of 1980, will be held in Winnipeg with perhaps many thousands of the delegates being handicapped persons, many of them in wheelchairs, can the minister bring us up to date on what facilities his department will be providing at the Winnipeg international airport so that these delegates can be accommodated?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the hon. member again refer to this congress, and I know he appreciates the effort on the part of this government to see that it will, in fact, be held in Winnipeg.

At the time we had our last exchange about these facilities, I asked for a report on the planning being done and I was satisfied that the matter was in hand. I have not since received a detailed analysis of the exact facilities being put in place. This depends to some extent on the type of aircraft to be served, and this kind of information is being gathered; but contingency plans are being developed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question, may I ask the minister if consideration is still being given, since it will take some time to implement permanent installations, to the installation of temporary elevators from the second floor down to the first floor in the baggage carousel area so that these people can be accommodated next year?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that that was one of the matters being looked into. I indicated that to him. I have not received a more up to date report on the type of facilities which will, in fact, be selected, but I will try to obtain that information for the hon. member so that I can inform him more fully.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSIGNMENT OF SPECIAL ADVISER IN DEPARTMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my questions are to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have two questions concerning Canadian representation.

Last week, the Prime Minister announced the appointment of Basil Robinson as a special adviser in the Department of External Affairs to undertake an assignment, and I quote, "advising on Canadian representation in the United States". What is the meaning of this phrase, considering that Canada has recently closed some consulates abroad, and does it suggest that Canada at last is strengthening the Canada-U.S. relationship which is so vital to our economic well-being?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would have had a perfectly legitimate and proper question if he had not thrown in the two words "at last", as if up to now we have not been doing anything to strengthen our relationship with the United States. The hon. member has just come from a conference at which I think virtually everyone said that Canada-U.S. relations are good.

As for Mr. Robinson's appointment, I think the hon. member is aware that over the last two or three years we have had an independent group headed by a gentleman whose bona fides are, I think, impeccable in this regard, Mr. Jake Moore, looking at how we have been represented in the United States and how we can improve our representation. Mr. Robinson will be following up on that assignment and looking at the recommendations we have received from Mr. Moore and also from our present ambassador in Mexico, Mr. Langley, who had a special assignment.

UN FORCE IN NAMIBIA—CANADIAN INPUT IN FINAL DETERMINATION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the conference at the weekend, everyone there said that both the management of and public information regarding our foreign policy needs to be improved greatly.

I want to come to a second area of Canadian representation which concerns decisions about a UN force in Namibia, now that Canada is no longer a member of the Security Council. Will Canada have a voice in the final determination to send a UN force to Namibia to supervise elections, and can the minister assure the House that before any Canadian commitment to such a force is made, the issue will be brought to the House in the form of a motion, rather than to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence in the form of an announcement?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the supplementary relationship between that question and our relationship with the United States, but I am glad to answer in any event.

As far as the continuation of our relations with the Contact Group is concerned and despite some of the disparaging comments which have been made about our foreign policy, the fact is that all members of the United Nations, and particularly the members of the Contact Group—including the United States, Great Britain, France and Germany—have insisted that we remain a member of the Contact Group even though we are no longer on the Security Council. I am very proud of that fact and was delighted to accede to that. We will be continuing our negotiations on the Namibia question.

Up to this moment there have been no formal or informal requests to Canada with regard to the establishment or provision of a group for the Namibian exercise, perhaps partly because we are still not sure that such a group will be put in place. I said in the House on Friday that the signs were promising that UN-supervised elections would be possible.

On the matter of how the endorsement of this House should be obtained, I have looked at the precedents and there are a number of ways in which this has been done. Certainly, we in the government and on this side have no wish to do anything in this regard which does not have the endorsement of the House, and I will look at the most appropriate way of bringing that about if and when we are asked and agree to go.

NATIONAL SECURITY

EXPANSION OF SECURITY UNIT WITHIN DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from a statement issued by the External Affairs press office last Friday following my raising in the House the activities of Eldon Black, Undersecretary of State for External Affairs in charge of security, the statement being to the effect that the department is expanding considerably its security unit.

Will the minister give details of such expansion, including in what way it involves Eldon Black and how far the government will go with respect to recommendations that RCMP personnel posted abroad be replaced by External Affairs personnel?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, and without attempting at all to second-guess your authority, I think that question is altogether too detailed for me to answer orally. Furthermore, since it involves a matter of security, I think it would be unwise for me to do so. I in no way intend to retain information to which the hon. member is entitled. If he will be so good as to agree, which might be hard for him—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Jamieson: —I will try to give him a written answer. In the short run, however, I say to him that in so far as the role of Mr. Black and the hon. member's reference to expansion are concerned, this matter has to do, to a large extent, with such things as terrorism which, as hon. members know, is occurring overseas. In that connection, we are required to have a more comprehensive organization than we have had previously.

SPECIAL ACTIVITIES OF MICHAEL PITFIELD—FUTURE ROLE OF RCMP IN SECURITY MATTERS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that out of the loquaciousness we heard there was one little gem of information.

I would like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. My question concerns Michael Pitfield, Secretary of the Cabinet. Will the Prime Minister give details of the special activities of Mr. Pitfield in the field of national security; specifically, whether the government will adopt the recommendations of the Pitfield group not to appoint an ombudsman, to modify freedom of information legislation and to abolish the security service of the RCMP?

Finally, can the Prime Minister tell us why any of these recommendations, or any other recommendations concerning the RCMP, would be under consideration or even be discussed before the report of the McDonald commission is made?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like every other question I hear from the hon. member, this one is based on pure fabrication.

Mr. Alexander: That is what you said before.

Mr. Trudeau: That is what I say again.

Mr. Alexander: And then you wanted his documents.

COMMUNICATIONS

EARTH STATION SATELLITE POLICY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. In view of some conflicting reports, will the minister be announcing an earth station satellite policy?

In view of the fact the Clyne committee is studying this, among many other matters affecting telecommunications, will the earth station satellite policy, pay television, the problem of interconnection and other matters be delayed until we have the report of the Clyne committee?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the policy on earth stations is not tied in with the timing of the committee on telecommunications. In the very near future I think I will be in a position to announce the revised policy on ownership of earth stations.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In view of the fact that within a short time the minister may be making an announcement, is the timetable for the Clyne committee to report by the end of February, this coming month, still on schedule? Is the minister telling the House that she may very well be making a statement on earth station satellite policy before she is in receipt of the Clyne committee report?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, it could be, but I am not saying that it will be. Referring to the second part of the question, as far as I know the Clyne committee has been working non-stop for the entire month of January and its work is going very well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN IRAN

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to whom I have given very brief notice: it relates to the whereabouts and safety of Canadian citizens who were recently, or are now, in Iran and facing some very serious difficulties.

As I understand it, it has been the policy of the minister's department not to publish the names of those known to be in that country or suspected of being in that country. There may be reasons unknown to me that that is productive to the safety of those citizens. But does the minister not feel that the publication of such information might be of assistance to the department, in that people outside the department might have information which would be very helpful, and in that it would relieve the stress upon the families of those who remain in uncertainty concerning the whereabouts of their relatives?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am genuinely grateful to the hon. member for having given me notice and for the sympathetic manner in which the question has been asked.

Since the hon. member talked with me about it on Friday, I asked the department whether we can reveal some of the names involved in what has come to be called the Iranian exercise. As the hon. member has stated, if there is deemed to be some benefit in that, we have no hesitation in doing so. As we have discussed briefly, the problem is whether we might be jeopardizing those parties. It is a matter of judgment. Since the hon. member has a particular case in mind, I would be glad to consult with him privately and perhaps get his judgment on that particular decision.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

COMMUNICATIONS

POLICY RESPECTING PAY TELEVISION AND EARTH STATION SATELLITES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications: it concerns the policy respecting pay television and earth receiving stations for satellite technology.

Since politics is light years behind the evolution of technology in this area, can the minister be more precise as to the time-frame she has in mind within which such a policy would be announced, since the study has been under way for two years and since numerous northern communities are going ahead with the installation of the technology without the government's policy?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I do not take kindly to the remark that politics always are behind technology. Hon. members of the opposition have highly criticized the committee on telecommunications which I set up to ensure precisely that politics will be on top of the technological revolution.

As for the earth station policy which the hon. member ties to the introduction of pay television, he is right to see a natural link between the liberalization of the earth station policy and the possibility of cable operators using earth stations if and when pay television is introduced. I cannot be more precise, but I will let the hon. member know ahead of time when I will announce the new policy so that he can look at it.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

NECESSITY OF INCLUDING LINGUISTIC RIGHTS IN ANY CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Considering that the Pepin-Robarts commission recommends doing away with constitutional guarantees which would protect language minorities in the provinces, even suggesting that section 133 of the present constitution be repealed, can the Prime Minister assure the House that his government still believes that there are two immutable requirements in any formula towards a reform of the constitution, namely the federative formula and the necessity of introducing a charter of rights and liberties including language rights.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I used those very words in the statement I made in the House last Thursday. But as far as the specific question of the hon. member is concerned, I would insist on the fact that this bill of rights should and must include a bill of rights protecting official language minorities all over the country.

ENERGY

COMMUNITY MEETINGS BY COMMITTEE ON NUCLEAR ISSUES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it concerns the committee for nuclear issues in the community.

In light of the resignation of David Brooks from the committee, and his accusation that the committee is not doing anything, and in light of the recent refusal of the committee to hold public meetings in Kingston, Peterborough and Sault Ste. Marie, would the minister indicate if he has been in touch with the committee to find out why it has held only one community meeting in its nine months of existence? Why is the committee refusing to hear the views of communities which have expressed interest in presenting views? How has the $200,000 federal grant been expended?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I reviewed the progress of this particular committee with some of the officers of the Science Council of Canada who are associated with it. They told me that they would be mounting a very significant public meeting in Vancouver in the very near future, a public meeting which will present all sides of the issue.

I believe some of the difficulties the committee has had in recent times in scheduling meetings in other parts of Canada are related to the fact that it has not been possible to put together a balanced presentation of views for the particular community which has sought a meeting.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's answer quite interesting in view of the fact the city council of Kingston offered to bring members to Ottawa, at no expense to the committee, to present their views and they were turned down.

With reference to the proposed conference in Vancouver, and in view of recent statements indicating that the Vancouver conference is being arranged so as to present a pro-nuclear slate of participants, will the minister say what steps he is taking, or will take, to ensure that the proposed conference will present as unbiased a view as possible and that it will live up to its mandate to bring in all community views at the conference?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady will appreciate the committee does not report to me. I have no responsibility for the committee whatesoever. I will be very pleased to convey to the committee through this answer or, if that is not satisfactory, in other ways the concern of the hon. lady respecting the Kingston conference which did not take place. Undoubtedly, there may be further discussions on that one.

As to the question of the Vancouver conference, I think the hon. member has made a representation for a balanced presentation, as I have acknowledged in earlier answers. I can assure the hon. member that every effort, based on my conversation, will be made for a balanced presentation.

NATIONAL SECURITY

LISTING OF SUBVERSIVES IN PUBLICATIONS CIRCULATED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I should like to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister: it concerns the weekly internal security service summary known as "The Whizzer", certain statements made by Mr. Bourne, and certain answers given in the House by the Solicitor General on Thursday.

In view of the answers of the Solicitor General on Thursday, can the Prime Minister tell us who decides what organizations and individuals are on that list: is it Mr. Bourne, is it the Solicitor General, is it someone else, or is it some other committee; and does this list include all organizations with the name "Peace"?

● (1500)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the police security branch co-ordinates the preparation of the weekly internal security service report known as "The Whizzer" on behalf of the security advisory committee. This group also prepares a more in-depth analysis of internal security matters, known as a "special assessment."

The purpose of these reports is to inform the Canadian security community of the changing threat to internal security. The fact that the PSB prepares "The Whizzer" is public knowledge and is listed as one of its functions in the ministry's annual report.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the Prime Minister's ventriloquist for that answer and address this question to him.

Is this list circulated generally to ministers of the Crown, and what controls are exercised over the list to guarantee that individuals who have been named unfairly have some kind of redress?

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I will draw the balance of the hon. member's question to the minister's attention and perhaps he can relay further information on his return on Wednesday.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. MACDONALD (EGMONT)—REFERENCE OF HARE REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with House business and in reference to questions raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). On December 13 I raised a question with the government House leader regarding the Hare report and other recent documents having to do with disposal of nuclear waste, and a reference to the appropriate standing committee. Further, in answer to a further question by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) the minister indicated he had discussed the matter with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and suggested there would be an appropriate motion on the order paper referring this matter and more recent information to the committee so it could continue its important work. I wonder whether the minister could tell us exactly when that motion will be on the order paper in order that this matter may be referred to the appropriate standing committee?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): I understand it is on the order paper right now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is my understanding it is not yet on the order paper; I have just checked. I wonder if the minister could tell us when it will appear. Does he mean it will be on the order paper today?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if it is not now on the order paper and if notice has not now already been given in respect of this matter, I will see that it is dealt with shortly.

MR. ALEXANDER—REFERENCE OF BILL C-35 TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to direct the attention of the minister responsible for fisheries to a matter regarding Bill C-35. It has been suggested to him, not only by myself but also by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), that the subject matter be sent to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry rather than the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I can assure the minister that it will be given speedy passage after we have heard from two more speakers. I wonder whether the minister has had an opportunity of considering this, and has he decided that the bill would be sent to that committee rather than the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, a referral which in my view seems to be rather ridiculous in light of the substance of the bill.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the government House leader, whom I have not seen today and with whom I have not had the opportunity of discussing this question since it was raised last week, let me state, as I indicated, that we would be quite willing to accept the suggestion. Since the hon. member has indicated they have only two more speakers, and in view of the fact that I understand all parties are agreeable to quick passage, the suggestion by the hon. member is one to which I am sympathetic, and if there is unanimous consent when the government House leader requests it I think this arrangement could be made.

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—BILL C-12—TABLING OF STATISTICAL INFORMATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On Friday I spoke to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) in respect of the possibility that he might some time early in the week and prior to the beginning of the debate on Bill C-12 table the goverment's expectations regarding figures for the first triennial operation of the bill, assuming that it passes the House of Commons. I notice that we have now passed the period for tabling of documents. Does the minister intend to ask to do this later, does he intend to do it tomorrow, or does he intend to do it at all before the debate commences?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I misunderstood the hon. member. My understanding on Friday was that he intended to ask me a question on this subject today, and I have the appropriate information. I could put that information on the record verbally, if you wish, and table the documents which do not really contain the precise figures. However, I am in your Honour's hands.

Basically our intent was to give full indexation for all pensionable incomes under $7,000, which I think amounts to something around 75 per cent or 80 per cent. Regarding amounts above $7,000, during the year 1979 we intend to index those at 8 per cent, in 1980 at 7 per cent and in 1981 at 6 per cent. I should point out, as hon. members will see when they look at the report from the chief actuary, that this was based on an inflation assumption of 8.8 per cent when in fact it turned out to be 8.4 per cent, so we are better off than we thought we would be. With a little good luck this provision hopefully will be even more generous for the years 1980, 1981 and 1982.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. minister have the leave he now seeks from the House to table the report he has just explained?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

MR. ALEXANDER—BILL C-12—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps I could put this to the minister in light of the fact that he seems to be so co-operative this afternoon. There are a number of questions on the order paper, the answers to which would be of great importance in debating Bill C-12. I am wondering whether the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) will see to it that the answers to those questions on the order paper in terms of financing and indexing in Bill C-12 are in our hands at the time the debate commences, which I anticipate will be this week? Will he see to it that all those questions are answered, as we need all the information we can get before we can make a decision on this very complex bill?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look into that, but I think hon. members may well find much of the information they wish contained in the document I have just tabled.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in relation to this matter, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) whether documentation on interest rates and earnings will also be made available, as this is vital to any assessment of revenue in comparison with expenditures for the period.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That's a first rate idea.

Mr. Alexander: In short, we want everything before you get your bill.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I think that information could be provided. I should point out that this was also a contributing factor: the chief actuary projected an interest rate of 9.4 per cent. As the hon. member intimated, we have done better than anticipated; we actually earned 9.6 per cent, so that in fact we are better off.

An hon. Member: Or worse.

Mr. Buchanan: That is correct. But from the point of view of the fund, it is better off and, in fact, that could well help the situation as far as available revenues are concerned.

CIDA CAR PURCHASES

Question No. 165—Mr. Roche:

Is CIDA purchasing cars worth (a) $64,225 (b) $28,576 from Automobile Renault Canada Ltée, St. Bruno de Montarville, Québec and, if so (i) how many (ii) for what purpose?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, CIDA is purchasing cars from Automobile Renault Canada Ltée, St. Bruno de Montarville, Québec:

(a) but not in the amount of $64,225 but rather in the amount of $16,056.27 which is equivalent to 64,225.05 francs (French).

(b) Yes, in the amount of $28,576.

(i)(a) Quantity three.

(b) Quantity five.

(ii)(a) Three vehicles will be used by six Canadian experts related to the provision of technical assistance.

(b) Five vehicles will be used by five Canadian experts who make up a multidisciplinary team.

All of the above Canadian experts are required to visit regularly various regions of Zaire in order to provide assistance in the development of the project along the lines agreed to by Zaire and Canada and to regularly monitor the progress of the project in the field.

Question No. 166—Mr. Roche:

Is CIDA purchasing cars worth $70,491 from Peugot Canada Ltd., Pointe Claire, Québec and, if so, (a) how many (b) for what purpose?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes.

(a) Nine model 304's and two model 504's. Total value $70,491.00.

(b) The nine vehicles will be used by a team of 20 Canadian experts in the detailed study of the railway system in Tanzania. The railway has 1,600 miles of roadbed reaching to all parts of the country which must be examined and improved.

Within this group there will be five maintenance specialists located at Morogoro which is 120 miles west of Dar es Salaam, the capital. These persons will be required to make frequent trips to Dar es Salaam for related training at the national vocational training centre.

The preference for Peugot vehicles was based on the widespread use of this particular model in East Africa and the high degree of maintenance and service which is available in that region.

NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 392—Mr. Herbert:

For the years 1950, 1955, 1965, 1975 and, each of the past three years, what was the national debt as a percentage of the gross national product?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance):

Fiscal Years Ending March 31	Public Debt of Canada[1][3]		Net Debt of Canada[2][3]
	($ Millions)	per cent of GNP	($ Millions)	per cent of GNP[4]
1950	16,730	99.6	11,645	69.3
1955	17,560	67.8	11,326	43.7
1965	26,288	52.3	15,530	30.9
1975	52,643	35.7	19,275	13.1
1976	59,802	36.1	23,296	14.1
1978	80,048	38.1	39,622	18.9

[1] The public debt of Canada consists of all liabilities which appear on the government's statement of assets and liabilities.

(2) The net debt of Canada is represented by the excess of recorded liabilities over net recorded assets.

(3) Amounts for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1950 to March 31, 1975 inclusive have been adjusted to reflect the presentation of assets and liabilities introduced in the Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977.

(4) Calculations are based on the preceding calendar year Gross National Product figures, i.e. debt at the end of the 1977-78 fiscal year is expressed as a percentage of GNP for calendar year 1977, etc.

MULTICULTURALISM

Question No. 528—Mr. Mitges:

For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, what were the non-salary operating expenditures of the Multiculturalism Directorate under (a) transportation and communications (b) advertising (c) publications (d) professional and special services (e) rentals (f) materials and office supplies (g) equipment and capital acquisitions?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): The non-salary operating expenditures of the Multiculturalism Directorate for the fiscal year 1977-1978 were:

(a) Transportation and communications	$227,928.82
(b) Advertising	471,629.90
(c) Publications	96,584.19
(d) Professional and special services	711,145.40
(e) Rentals	13,117.34
(f) Materials and office supplies	60,322.94
(g) Equipment and capital acquisitions	5,654.48
Total	$1,586,383.07

GRAIN DUST

Question No. 664—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Has grain dust been suspected as a possible cause of grain elevator explosions and does it have a nutritional value comparable to the whole grain from which it is generated and, if so, is the government considering the possibility of compacting grain dust for handling as a potential ingredient in livestock feed?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Grain dust is suspected as a possible cause of grain elevator explosions. It becomes ignitable when a combination of critical conditions are met. The known critical factors under which dust will explode with damaging force are high temperature at source of ignition, concentration of dust in suspension, size of dust particles and moisture content of the dust particles. When ignition occurs within a confined space, it may cause an explosion.

Grain dust is considered to have good nutritional value for livestock, although not necessarily as highly nutritious as the whole grain from which it is generated. Such dust captured by dust collection systems in terminal elevators, together with other refuse screenings from the cleaning systems, is lightweight material which is bulky and difficult to transport. In order to overcome this problem, it can be concentrated by pelleting into livestock feed. Almost all grain process elevators in Canada have pellet mills as an integral part of their terminal operations, concentrating this by-product and exporting it as grain screenings pellets.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 676—Mr. Hare:

What was the total expenditure allocated to research and development for the past three years by (a) universities (b) the government (c) industry (d) each province?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology):

Expenditures on Research and Development in Canada
(millions of dollars)

Funded by:	1975	1976	1977
Universities	240.1	264.4	272.4
Federal government	694.3	734.5	818.2
Industry	571.3	589.0	693.4
Provinces	91.9	113.0	133.5

The totals given for expenditures on research and development by the provinces were estimated by Statistics Canada from a survey of a sample of provinces. No breakdown of this total into the expenditure by each province is possible. The figures refer only to research and development in the natural sciences and engineering, as used in calculating the Gross Expenditures on Research and Development statistics used in international comparisons. Expenditures on social sciences and humanities research and development, for which full private sector date are not available, are not included.

WATER RESOURCES RESEARCH

Question No. 693—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Did Canadian universities receive grants from the Department of Fisheries and the Environment for water resources research in (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79 and, if so (i) which ones (ii) in what amount in each case?

2. Did the government announce in September 1978, that the $800,000 in grants to universities for water resources research would be terminated and was the amount already allocated for 1978-79 or 1979-80 and, if so, in what amount to each university?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): 1. See list below.

2. As part of the cutback in spending announced by the government in September, 1978, annual funding for the water resources research suppport program was reduced from $1 million to $250,000 effective April 1, 1979. This did not affect the $1 million already allocated to the universities for 1978-79. Research proposals for funding in 1979-80 under the program, which are now being received from Canadian universities, are expected to total nearly $2 million. These will be assessed by a review committee and the funds allocated to the successful proposals in April, 1979.

RESERVES, MILITIA AND ARMOURIES

Question No. 709—Mr. Jones:

1. How much was saved in reducing the Militia in 1969?

2. How much was saved by closing down armouries in 1969?

3. How much will be spent to increase the reserves according to the January 1978 statement?

4. How much will be spent to restore old, closed down armouries, and build new ones?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. $3.2 million in 1969 dollars.

2. The estimated annual savings was $650,000 in 1970/71 dollars.

Order Paper Questions

3. Additional requirements for personnel, equipment and training are now being identified. Increased costs have not yet been determined.

4. It is not intended to restore old closed down armouries. The cost of armouries to be constructed is estimated to be between $1.5 to $2.5 million in 1978/79 dollars.

MOBILE COMMAND PERSONNEL

Question No. 710—Mr. Jones:

1. What is the ratio of English to French personnel in the Mobile Command?

2. How many persons are in the Mobile Command in the West? What is the number of English persons in this group? What is the number of French persons in this group?

3. How many persons are in the Mobile Command in the East? What is the number of English persons in this group? What is the number of French persons in this group?

4. How many persons are in the Mobile Command in the central region? What is the number of English persons in this group? What is the number of French persons in this group?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. English 67.7 per cent; French 32.3 per cent.

2, 3 and 4.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—PROVENCHER

Question No. 823—Mr. Epp:

From June 1, 1974 to date, what lawyers in the Constituency of Provencher were given work by the Farm Credit Corporation and, by year, what amount was paid to each?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): From June 1, 1974 to May 21, 1975:

Morton H. Nemy; 200-2727 Portage Prairie, St. James, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

K. R. Hanssen; Duncan, Duncan & Hanssen, Morden, Manitoba.

William C. Middleton; Weselak & Middleton, Beausejour, Manitoba.

From May 21, 1975 to present time:

Morton H. Nemy; 200-2727 Portage Prairie, St. James, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

William C. Middleton; Weselak & Middleton, Beausejour, Manitoba.

Dyck, Smith & Neufeld; Box 1627, Steinbach, Manitoba.

Fees and disbursements are paid out of the proceeds of the mortgage by and upon the direction of borrowers; the corporation has no records of such particulars.

PROJECTS IN CONSTITUENCY OF RICHMOND

Question No. 856—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Treasury Board finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Board planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): 1. The Treasury Board is a central agency whose responsibilities center around expenditure and personnel management, administrative policy and official languages. As a central agency, it does not finance projects throughout the country.

2. There are no plans to undertake the financing of projects in the future.

Mr. Young: I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I stand on behalf of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty). I see that none of his questions have been answered. I hope the minister or the persons in charge will either advise us to take the questions off the order paper or tell us why they cannot answer them.

MR. McKENZIE—REFERENCE OF MATERIAL TO RCMP

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on December 7, 1977 I placed a question on the order paper asking whether members of parliament are entitled to use the DOT telex "Comcen" facilities for the purpose of sending political messages out. I also asked how many times since October, 1974 the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) has used such facilities.

It does not take a year and a half to answer a question like this. A memo dated November 7, 1977 stated that the sending of these political messages over this telex network was a misuse of government facilities. Since the government will not provide me with an answer, I have no alternative but to send all this material to the RCMP for their reference, to investigate the improper use of this government facility and to determine whether any offence has been committed against the provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada.

I have one more comment. With regard to Bill C-12, I have a question on the order paper requesting information as to where $9 billion in the public superannuation account was invested and what kind of dividends it has been paying. This information is necessary to discuss Bill C-12, and I would like the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) or his parliamentary secretary to obtain this information for us as soon as possible.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, in the absence of my colleague and on his behalf, I attempted to point out that we do try to get these answers as quickly as possible. The whip for the Conservative party has mentioned his colleague's questions which have been on the order paper for a while. As I recall, some of those questions are very extensive and require answers from approximately 45 different government departments or agencies, months of research to prepare, collate and bring forward the answers, and it costs a great deal in time and money. I wish that all members in this House, in commenting on the time taken to bring answers forward, would also take an interest in the cost and time for public servants involved to prepare the answers.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wanted to introduce two bills today. I do not know if that was understood by the opposition, but perhaps I did not get up at the right time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is what happened; you did not get up at the right time.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I was watching the opposition and it confused me.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that it is expected that we will call the ways and means motions standing in the name of the hon. minister at this time under orders of the day in the regular way. The minister did not miss anything.

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed from January 26, 1979 consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, a number of those who have participated in the debate on this bill have said that this piece of legislation is one of the most important ever to be discussed in this parliament. I agree with those sentiments wholeheartedly. It has even been acknowledged by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). To show the urgency and gravity of this legislation, a view shared by all sides of the House, I would like to quote from the hon. member's speech. Before I read from it, however, I should say that this will probably be the only time in this debate that I will agree with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. She said:

This is one of the most important, one of the most major, bills ever to come before the Canadian parliament, because by its very nature it has tremendous bearing on our established political process. This bill gives to the governor in council, the cabinet, the executive, power to initiate referenda on constitutional matters. Nothing could be more substantive or more serious. It is serious not just because of its constitutional aspects, with which I shall deal in a few minutes, but it is doubly serious because a referendum of any kind at the national level is a serious matter in itself.

I completely agree with those statements. Then, however, the hon. member and her colleagues went on to attack Bill C-9 in a most ferocious way.

I was not here on Friday, but I had the benefit of watching the CBC program "This Week in Parliament" last night, and when I saw some of the histrionics which went on in this Chamber on Friday—especially by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro)—I was astonished. I believe he said that he was appalled; but I was appalled that he would drag the debate on this bill down to the level which he did. I will let the hon. member's words and actions speak for themselves. They are on videotape, and anyone can see them if they wish.

The Conservative party attacked this bill as undermining responsible government, speaking of course in the context of British parliamentary democracy. This in itself is a valid concern and I have no quarrel with it. In the first part of my remarks this afternoon I will deal with this concern, but from a perspective which is completely opposite to the one taken by the Conservative party.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) also spoke on this bill on November 12. He gave the classic, responsible government defence, and so he should since he is a former professor of philosophy. Although the hon. member did not quote him by name, which would be anathema to him, he really gave the defence, if you will, of the Edmund Burke thesis of the fiduciary role of an elected representative. That is a person elected to use his or her judgment over a particular period, a representative not subject to the whim of instant recall or of his or her constitutents, but a representative who must account for his or her actions at election time.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby eloquently summed up the arguments. I would like those hon. members of the Conservative party who are present to hear the rest of his remarks. At page 2043 of Hansard for December 12, 1978, he said:

> Democracy should be concerned with electing men and women to study issues seriously, to recognize the complexity of most problems and to work out a fair solution.

He went on to say that the problems facing us now and the problems posed to this country by the introduction of a referendum in the province of Quebec mean that we should go beyond the traditional role of parliamentary democracy, the traditional attitude that Edmund Burke had and what he felt about the role of the member of parliament. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby went on to plead that the special case of the proposed referendum in Quebec gives parliament no choice but to provide itself with a means to consult all of the people.

I wish to develop this argument further than the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby did in order to counter the proposition put forward by the Tories. Perhaps it is quite academic and it might be too philosophical, but I think we are dealing with a matter of fundamental importance and that we should look at the philosophical aspects of the debate very closely.

As one who was born and raised in Great Britain and in my early years schooled in the magnificent fairness of the British parliamentary system, I have only the utmost respect for the monarchy, for British parliamentary institutions and our system of common law. The Conservative party should realize, however, that not only do societies evolve as time goes by but the laws that govern society also evolve.

That is what is happening in Canada today. Canada is no longer a British dominion. I hate to bring this matter to the attention of hon. members opposite, but it is no longer a British dominion. We have inherited the monarchy and we have inherited common law and parliament, and I am glad we have, Mr. Speaker. But our society itself has changed radically since the war, so radically that the proportion of those who had ancestry in the British Isles has fallen to about 40 per cent of our population. One or two per cent of the population are native people, about 27 per cent have French ancestry and the balance of around 30 per cent comes from varying backgrounds. There are many of these people in this House, and many on the other side.

These people have not always been touched by responsible government in the British context. Those of non-British stock do not necessarily appreciate or accept the rather nebulous British constitutional system of guarantees for basic liberties—a system composed of laws passed by parliament, customs and judicial decisions. A great body of opinion in Canada today does not accept the supremacy of parliament to protect rights. In fact, even the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) agrees with that, because in 1959-60 he introduced the Canadian Bill of Rights to protect individual liberties. He knew how important it was. The trouble is that the Canadian Bill of Rights does not stand up. It is not good enough. We need these rights basically entrenched. I wonder what the right hon. member for Prince Albert would say on this particular matter.

The British constitution is an oddity in a world of codified constitutions. For example, those who came to Canada from continental Europe, like our neighbours in the United States, innately feel that constitutional guarantees are best safeguarded by codification rather than by legislative action. It must be acknowledged that the British constitution approach which believes in the supremacy of parliament is stoutly defended in English speaking Canada—and often emotionally. At the recent constitutional conference, for example, it was Premier Lyon of Manitoba who vigorously defended the supremacy of legislative action as the ultimate safeguard for basic rights. This is a particular point of view that Premier Lyon and others are entitled to.

This proposition was also defended last summer in the deliberations of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. Some members of the Senate on our side and on the other side defended that approach. Indeed, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield)—who I am glad to see in the House today during my speech—made the same point in committee. There is nothing wrong with it, Mr. Speaker. My question is whether this particular point is applicable in Canada in the present context.

The classic "responsible government" approach is becoming tougher to defend in twentieth century society, not only in Canada but also in Great Britain. Those who are quick to bark on the other side should look at what is happening on the other side of the pond in relation to what is happening to responsible government, aside from all their labour troubles. They should pay attention to what is happening in a constitutional sense in Great Britain, the mother of parliamentary democracy.

Let us look at this country for a moment, Mr. Speaker. Over the past century we have seen responsible government safeguard rights—to use Mr. Lyon's terminology—by the 1890 act of the Manitoba legislature which rendered inoperative the institutional bilingualism provisions in section 23 of the Manitoba act. In 1912 there was the promulgation of the infamous regulation 17 in the province of Ontario which made English the sole language of that province. This parliament cannot be absolved from not protecting the rights of individuals. The internment of Japanese Canadians in World War II resulted from the application of section 3 of the War Measures Act, passed in 1940.

I am saying that perhaps legislatures are not the best guarantors of individual liberties. I am challenging this traditional argument that is supported not only by Premier Lyon but by his Conservative minions or his colleagues in this House.

There are some elements of Bill 101 that are an infringement on the rights of the minority. I am sure hon. members opposite have supported the challenges made in the Supreme Court of Canada of those sections of Bill 101. So much, Mr. Speaker, for legislative protection of minority rights.

We now consider Quebec's referendum which will ask for some consensus on sovereignty association or independence where presumably the unconstitutional provisions of Bill 101 would be enshrined in law. Who is to stop that particular referendum? No one, Mr. Speaker, because it is well within the ambit of provincial legislatures, provincial governments and the provinces to hold a referendum on any issue. It does not apparently strike one as logical, however, nor does it strike one as being fair or responsible, that the parliament of Canada should also have the tool of the referendum to counter any referendum that takes place in a province where the question has not been put fairly or there is some question as to the accuracy of the result of that particular referendum. I say it is logical, it is fair and it is responsible.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who has been heckling me throughout my speech should read some of the speeches of his leader. He is at odds with his leader. He should do his homework if he does not agree with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. That party supports Bill C-9.

Mr. Peters: Some may.

Mr. Collenette: Talk about division! The hon. member for Timiskaming does not support his party on Bill C-9 and I want that on the record, Mr. Speaker.

It becomes apparent that responsible government is not as sacred as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands would have us believe. Does it not follow that history has taught us that where rights and freedoms are concerned it is better for society as a whole to decide on what rights and freedoms should be guaranteed? Who can accept the whim of legislatures—the whim of the national assembly of the province of Quebec on Bill 101, the whim of the legislatures of Ontario and Manitoba in the cases I have cited? I might even add, Mr. Speaker, the whim of this parliament in the 1940s. I am not sure if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was here when the War Measures Act was passed in 1942, I think it was—

Mr. Woolliams: What about 1970?

Mr. Collenette: —when under the auspices of this parliament citizens of this country, Japanese Canadians, were interned. So much for the legislative guarantee of basic human rights.

An hon. Member: Under the Liberals.

Mr. Collenette: Where did the Tories vote? Everybody was very complicit in that matter. I am not just talking about parties here; I am talking about the legislatures themselves. If hon. members want to check the record they will find that only one or two members in the House of Commons did not support the War Measures Act in the early 1940s. Let them do their homework before they start criticizing us.

• (1530)

Mr. Peters: Start studying.

Mr. Collenette: Even the United Kingdom is not bound by British parliamentary traditions. Where was this tradition of legislative safeguards when Westminster invoked internment in Northern Ireland? This was only done in recent years. I believe the British government showed some level headedness in having the matter referred to the World Court in The Hague. Even in the mother of parliaments there has been a question of whether or not basic rights are being guaranteed by parliament itself.

In March a referendum will be held in Great Britain on the question of devolution of powers to Wales and Scotland. So much for our great British parliamentary tradition. Even in Great Britain they are recognizing British parliamentary democracy must change, must evolve, and must adapt to changing circumstances.

The Conservative party attacks Bill C-9 using arguments either outdated or that have failed both in Canada and in the United Kingdom. How else is one to decide whether to entrench rights or not to entrench rights, to devolve power or concentrate power? How else are we to decide that? Partisan politics often obscure the real issues in constitutional debate. We have seen it in this House with reference to Bill C-9 and we saw it at the special joint committee last fall when the official opposition were not serious about trying to find new ways to devise a constitution for this country. My answer is provided right here in Bill C-9. The people collectively should be the ones that are consulted on basic constitutional changes.

The Tories say "no" for consulting the people by means of a referendum; or if you want to use another phrase, by direct democracy. In fact, I would like to quote the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands again. She attacks Bill C-9 as constitutional revolution by stealth. This is absolute rubbish. I have heard some things said in this House that are really quite odd but I find that approach the oddest of them all.

These remarks lead me to the second major point that I wish to make this afternoon, and that is to talk about Bill C-9 in the context of a general consitutional debate. It has been acknowledged by a number of speakers in this debate that Bill C-9 has been brought in here in response to the referendum bill brought in by the province of Quebec. In fact, the constitutional debate itself is a response to the debate that is raging within the province of Quebec. That is true. But as the Task Force on National Unity said last week, there is another dimension to the constitutional debate. It is expressed in other dimensions, for example, feelings of alienation by Atlantic Canada and western Canada from the power-making and power-sharing decisions in the country today. In a way I am almost glad—I should not say this—that the PQ won the election in 1976—

An hon. Member: Horror!

Mr. Collenette: —if for no other reason—

An hon. Member: —but for the lousy Liberal government they replaced.

Mr. Collenette: —than this one electoral act has all Canadians, not just French speaking Canadians but every Canadian, thinking about the future of their country. It has acted as a catalyst.

We have taken the basic Tory approach for so long, the kind of attitude that says "Look, the problem will go away, we will muddle through". We cannot take that approach any longer, Mr. Speaker. We have to face not just provincial governments but all legislators, and all Canadians have to face basic constitutional problems. The election of the PQ has if nothing else focused our attention on this question. In fact, the PQ victory in 1976 is the catalyst that is bringing Canada closer, to use Professor Frank Scott's words, "to the rendezvous that this generation has with the BNA Act". Professor Scott uttered these remarks about 15 years ago. It seems that he had real clarity of vision because in 1979 we are faced with a rendezvous with the British North America Act.

While most of the discussion in this debate on Bill C-9 has dealt with a federal referendum as a check on the honesty of the Quebec referendum, I would like to talk about the application of a federal referendum in terms of general constitutional reform, not just in terms of Quebec independence. Here it would be well to look at some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and in this respect I will quote part of her December 12 speech in this House. She said:

> A myriad of concerns come to the fore, concerns which all of us as parliamentarians, representatives of the people, feel deeply about. Who is going to determine whether or not an issue is constitutional? Can the federal government call a referendum on constitutional issues that might or would have a bearing on provincial or concurrent jurisdictions without the approval of the provinces? What about a referendum on controversial constitutional matters that have not yet been assigned to either provincial or federal jurisdictions, such as offshore resources?

As far as I am concerned, this bill provides for this parliament to determine when or where a referendum should take place, not only on matters of federal jurisdiction but on matters of provincial jurisdiction and concurrent jurisdictions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: —and even in unassigned jurisdictions. That is the way I interpret Bill C-9, and I think the opposition should face up to it.

Some hon. Members: We have.

[Mr. Collenette.]

Mr. Collenette: But these Tories disagree with us.

Miss MacDonald: That is right.

Mr. Collenette: On the one hand they oppose the people's right to speak as provided for in Bill C-9. And even if a referendum is held and the people do speak, the Tories do not want the people's will to be enacted by this parliament. That is their position. It is there in black and white in Hansard. So much for the Conservative view of democracy.

An hon. Member: That is the end of parliament.

Mr. Collenette: Their view of democracy is power-broker, backroom deal democracy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: They are very sensitive about this, and I can understand it—where provincial potentates would decide on constitutional matters. "To hell with the people;" that is what the Tory attitude is, and it has been said. It is right here in Hansard of December 12. Let us take a look at the speech made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. This debate has really smoked the Tories out and put their ideas on the record. Hansard shows that the Conservative party has nothing but contempt for the will of the people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Now that these views on direct democracy are in Hansard they will not be able to reverse these stands so easily.

I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is here because the view of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands cannot really be reversed. The Leader of the Opposition is very adept at reversing his views two or three months after the fact. He would negotiate sovereignty-association last November, but he will not do that today. My hon. friend the member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) says the same thing. They do a little soft shoe shuffling here. How can the member for Kingston and the Islands and the others in her party whose views are in Hansard in black and white reverse their stand? How can they do that? It is right here and it shows that the Conservative party has contempt for the will of the Canadian public to decide what kind of a country they want.

An hon. Member: Like wage and price controls.

● (1540)

Mr. Collenette: We know what their view is of Canada; it is a decentralized, weak and balkanized country, I would say, to be fair, that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has been consistent in her views as to who speaks for Canada. Her speech on Bill C-9 parallels the arguments she made before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. I think I have those remarks here. I would like to read them into the record as well. I quote the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, issue No. 1 of the special joint committee minutes for August 15, 1978:

> The attitude of the provinces makes one pause and think and is also an eloquent expression of the kind of attitudes which are now prevalent. You say that you are going to consult with people, but I think it would be more important to consult the provincial representatives of the people of Canada. It is all fine and well to speak directly to the people, but if you go over the heads of the 10 provincial governments, you are going to have trouble.

Trouble from whom? You will have trouble from the Canadian people who are sick and tired of the games the Conservative party play on constitutional reform and in debate on this bill. Their view of democracy is to get together and make deals with the provincial premiers. They do not want to consult the people.

At least the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is consistent. Her view is: "The hell with the people, we will just look at the views of the provincial governments". The Conservative party has come up with a view very much akin to the Bundesrat in Germany. That is a form of upper house bringing the provincial governments into the centre. This view was also expressed by the Task Force on National Unity and the Ontario task force. That is one way of looking at it. I do not think it is the way Canadians want to deal with constitutional reform.

Let us go to another quote from the deliberations of that committee. This is Professor Edward McWhinney, head of political science at Simon Fraser university, a very eminent individual who has travelled all over the world. What does Professor McWhinney say on this matter? He is talking about the Bundesrat hang-up. I do not think he said hang-up; that is my word. Referring to the Bundesrat, he said:

> —it is basically a conclave of princely rulers meeting for executive purposes, and the analogy with our Senate or the attempt to make an analogy with the Senate I think is misplaced. The better analogy would be to the federal-provincial conferences—

I share that view of Professor McWhinney. The Bundesrat may have been applicable in the nineteenth century or postwar Germany because of the very nature of the German state and the way the German principalities and states came together to form modern Germany, but that is not the answer for Canada today. I completely oppose any view of a Bundesrat approach being sneaked into the parliament of Canada.

I want to deal further with this basic argument on the Bundesrat and who speaks for Canada. In fact, I think the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands used those words. We know the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has used them. They have become a sort of password—Who is speaking for Canada? I say the people should speak for Canada. The hon. member and her colleagues say the provincial governments should speak for Canada?

I have been elected to represent a particular constituency in metropolitan Toronto. There are provincial members in that constituency. One of them recently made a statement criticizing the federal government. That is fine; in the context of our British parliamentary tradition it is fair ball for provincial ministers continually to hammer away at Ottawa. However, it seems that federal ministers and members should not attack the provinces. That is not considered fair. As far as I am concerned, I have as much right to speak in this chamber and throughout the land on matters affecting municipal or provincial jurisdictions as have my provincial and municipal counterparts to speak about federal matters.

This view obviously is not shared by members opposite. What they really want is a confederationist approach in the classical mould. They want to bring the provincial governments into the Senate chamber, the upper house. They want them to have veto power over legislation passed by this House.

In Bill C-60 introduced in the last session was a very novel and ingenious way of bringing the regions into the centre. Bill C-60 proposed a form of proportional representation in the Senate where the parties in the legislatures—not just the government party but all of the parties in each legislature, whether it be the PQ in Quebec, the Liberals in Ontario or whatever—would have the opportunity to represent their legislatures. Half would be appointed by the provincial parties and half by the federal government. That would bring in an element of proportional representation.

There was a delaying power in the proposed Bill C-60. However, the Conservatives did not want that. They regard the true voice of the people as being in Queen's Park or the Grande Allee. That is not true. We are the true repository of what Canadians think.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: I do not know what hon. members opposite are laughing at, Mr. Speaker. We are all entitled to speak for Canada. On a question as fundamental as this where there is no consensus, the Task Force report said we should return to the spirit of 1864 where everybody submerged their petty differences and brought forward a new dream for this country. With the way the provinces carry on, aided and abetted by the attitude of members opposite, there is no consensus for a new dream.

What is one to do? If we want a new dream or a new vision for Canada, if we want to resurrect the spirit of 1864, even in the absence of any consensus on the part of the provinces and the federal government, we should consult with the people. However, the Tories do not want that. They disagree with it.

I see my time is running out. I am sure members opposite will be glad because I have said a few things they did not want to hear. The truth really hurts them. I will conclude by again quoting Professor McWhinney when talking about constitutional reform in general terms. This was said on the same day, September 26, I quote:

> The key is popular consensus. If you draft a constitution without popular consensus it may be what Mr. Justice Owen Roberts of the United States Supreme Court called "a railway excursion ticket, good for one journey on one train at one particular time to one particular place." . . . So I stress this issue of a prior societal consensus as a fundamental condition of successful constitutional making.

That is what Bill C-9 is all about. We want to get society's consensus on the direction in which we should move. Members opposite argue that our party does not really know what this country wants. But I argue that they don't and that the provinces don't. I say this because, to be fair, each government wants to protect its own sphere of operations; each government has to see things through the perspective of its own jurisdiction, its own obligations under the constitution.

I do think it is incumbent upon the members of this House to pass the bill before us in order to establish a mechanism by which the people of Canada can be asked for their views. It is not sufficient just to ask the people of Quebec, to determine whether the Quebec referendum is accurate; we should ask all of the people of Canada what direction they wish to see the country take. Do they wish to take the decentralist road as put forward by the Leader of the Opposition? Notwithstanding René Lévesque and the PQ the country would just drift apart eventually. We will not need a separatist government in Quebec if we follow the policies of the opposition, Mr. Speaker; the country would just drift apart anyway, each part going off and doing its own little thing.

The one thing that struck the members of the Task Force, the report said, was the multiplicity of views, the multiplicity of different societies, the parochialism that is evident in Canada today. If we follow the policies of the Leader of the Opposition—I am glad he is present to hear me this afternoon—we will not need René Lévesque: Canada will be finished.

What my party stands for, Mr. Speaker, is, first, to consult the people and ask them what kind of country they want. We should ask them if they want a strong central government which has the ability to redistribute revenues. I am not just referring to social programs here, although the Tories say a lot about social programs. Do we want to equalize the wealth of the country a bit? Do we want to see national standards, whether such standards apply to labour or to education? You know, Mr. Speaker, we have created a whole generation of people like me—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Collenette: We have come through the school system and we really do not have any particular trade. We are academics. The Leader of the Opposition is one himself. I do not know why he smiles. He is a product of the educational system of this country which has gone along in a hodge-podge fashion and has not really geared those going through it, people like me and like him, to the labour needs of the country. This is all due to an education system which has also failed to develop a basic understanding between our major national groups and has failed to introduce second language teaching. So we need a strong central government to ensure that rights are guaranteed from coast to coast, that the English language minority in Quebec is protected in the same way as the French speaking minority in Ontario is protected, that the education systems in this country do not discriminate against certain parts of the country. We want a strong central government, one which is able to regulate the economy, administer the economy and develop the vast economic potential of this country for the benefit of all Canadians.

What we do not want is what the Tories want; what they have said in debate on Bill C-9 parallels their comments of the last couple of years. They want a decentralized Canada, a government of petty potentates, a loose economy of semi-independent states. Who speaks for Canada? As the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby said on December 12, it sure as hell isn't the Conservative party. Who speaks for Canada? As far as I am concerned we should ask the people of Canada who speaks for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: Bill C-9 provides them with that mechanism.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to make a few remarks in response to the speaker who has just resumed his seat. I noted his preoccupation with consultation with the people of Canada. I find that rather peculiar for a spokesman of a political party which has been running as fast and as far as it can to the end of its five-year mandate to avoid any consultation with the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I think, sir, that he did, though probably inadvertantly, express the view of his party regarding the future of this country and the role of leadership in this country when he said, in effect, "If you want a new dream for Canada, ask somebody else." That is certainly the position of the Liberal party at this time. We believe there is a very important role for consultation with Canadians, such as regular elections, such as keeping your word on questions like wage and price controls. We believe that very strongly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It was also interesting to note the continuing preoccupation on the Liberal side with the position of the Progressive Conservative party on constitutional issues. I can understand this, because as soon as they understand our position—and this usually takes them some time—they adopt it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: They did so with respect to the recommendations of the Kingston declaration which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) condemned in this House on one day and then eight days later went out and embraced in a representation to a federal-provincial conference. They have done it, now, on the question of regionalism, which his party so thoroughly attacked for so long a time. Now that it has been recognized as an essential part of the Canadian reality by the Pepin-Robarts commission, the Prime Minister and his party are saying: Well, that's what we thought all the time.

The difficulty of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette)—and I sympathize with him in the few remaining weeks he has left in that capacity—is that he does not understand our position. I hope he might have accorded it the same attention as some of his superiors in his party have given to our constitutional positions in the past, because once they understand them they adopt them.

We are going to give the people of Canada the opportunity to move beyond that minor inconvenience of an intermediary hon. members opposite do not understand so that they can have in office, just as soon as we have the election the hon. member called for, a government of Canada that is prepared to start with the constitutional position that the present government occasionally ends up with, the constitutional position that can guarantee some unity in the country.

I want to deal for a moment with the suggestion that this is merely a consultative mechanism before us as proposed in the government's Bill C-9. I do not wish to dwell on this at any great length; I simply want to quote the words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde). There is a danger in pretending that we can ignore the advice that is given on referenda. If we adopt holus-bolus what is proposed in the bill, the practice of referenda on practically every subject—that is what the government is proposing here—we will create a situation wherein the ability of parliament to do what parliament was established to do, to do what Edmund Burke described as the role of parliament—to cast our judgment and then be held accountable for it at elections—will be severely circumscribed.

I quote no better an authority—and I rarely quote him as an authority—than the Minister of Justice himself. He said in answer to a question by my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on December 12:

If the government does not proceed to do anything about it surely the people of Canada would ask themselves why they had to go through with that exercise in the first place.

Exactly. Of course that question would be asked, particularly if we had more and more recourse to referenda. There would be increasing pressure on the part of the people who were consulted and saw their views ignored not to have their views ignored. There would be a continuing attrition of the fundamental and traditional role—not simply in other countries but in this country—of the House of Commons.

The other matter the Minister of Justice referred to was also said in answer to a question. It was not a prepared remark but it may well be one of great significance. He said:

There is nothing in the constitution at the present time which could make the result of a referendum binding on the government, parliament or any particular legislature.

I am not sure what he meant by the phrase "at the present time" but I think it is a phrase we all have to consider when we ask ourselves exactly what the intentions of the government are with regard to this legislation it is introducing.

The circumstances under which this bill has been put forward in parliament and the unmistakable implications of the language of the legislation are such that hon. members of this House will have to consider our responsibilities with even more than our usual seriousness. As has been said by almost every speaker here, this is an unusually important piece of legislation. It is important because, while the bill is very innocent in what it pretends to do, it is very dangerous in what it proposes to do.

As hon. members will recall, the matter arose as a relatively modest proposal relating to the fairness of the proposed referendum in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), who is in his place today, spoke on Friday. I regret that I was not here; I was meeting with the man who hopes to replace him. The hon. member indicated that it was his view that this power would never be used. That is an interesting view, and I rather regret that the hon. member for Westmount did not have an opportunity, to elaborate on why he thought it would not be used, either in the specific application of which he was speaking or, more dangerously, in the much larger application of which this bill is possible. This bill would allow federal referenda on literally every question under the sun. That is what the legislation provides.

When the modest proposal arose, it arose in the context of the proposal in the fall of 1977 by the government of Quebec when it released its white paper on referenda which was in anticipation of the provincial referendum legislation which came forward later, in December of 1977. Certain of the ground rules which were set out in the Quebec white paper were felt to place severe and undue restrictions on traditional freedom of association and expression in a political compaign. As a result, there was very serious fear in the province of Quebec, a very serious negative reaction and a very serious view across the country that it was not going to be possible to have some of our traditional liberties safeguarded in the conduct of this referendum campaign.

At about that same time—and I am sure there was some relationship between the two events—the Prime Minister began to make suggestions about the need to provide the federal government with what he called at that time the same tools as the Parti Québécois government had. In his annual New Year's interview on CTV, the Prime Minister explained the role he anticipated referendum legislation at the federal level would play. I think it is useful to place on the record the words the Prime Minister used at that time. This was at Christmas, 1977:

You could use it in Quebec to contradict or double check an erroneous or undemocratic Quebec referendum. You could use it in the other nine provinces after Quebec would have hypothetically voted to a question: "Are you in favour of independence and association", and if the answer is yes, then you ask the rest of Canada . . . I don't want to put the referendum as the centerpiece of our action. It is purely a counteroffensive tool.

That was what the Prime Minister said in 1977, and that is the reason for our concern. That description is dramatically different from what is in fact proposed in the bill before us. The Prime Minister went on at that time to say that a referendum—and I quote:

—is not something which is in the nature of a parliamentary system.

I recommend that to his acolyte from York East. I want to return to that theme later on, but for the moment it is important to remember that the first proposal was to provide the Government of Canada with what the Prime Minister called a counteroffensive tool in the event that the province of Quebec rigged the question or rigged the rules of the referendum it was having. This proposed counteroffensive tool was said to be needed in the event that the national government needed a referendum or an instrument to answer an initiative which was taken by referendum in the province of Quebec. It was to be counteroffensive, and it was limited at that time to one circumstance and to one circumstance only.

Among the advantages of that modest, limited proposal at that time was that it fell within the Canadian tradition of the limited use of referenda. When we have referenda before, they have always dealt with specific questions which were always clearly within the jurisdiction of the sponsoring government, and the authority sought of parliament was always limited and specific as to a particular question. Even though that tradition has not contributed at all to national unity or the national harmony of the country, that is none the less the tradition which exists; and if the government wants to proceed within the Canadian tradition, it need only come to parliament with a bill providing for a specific referendum on a particular question. There would certainly be widespread support in this House for a specific Canadian referendum ensuring the fairness of the question put regarding the future of the province of Quebec. If that is what the government wanted, that is what it should have asked for. Instead, it is asking for something very different and which is very dangerous to the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Bill C-9 seeks a power which goes well beyond the specific question in Quebec. It goes well beyond the Canadian tradition concerning referenda. The minister admitted as much when he put the bill forward. He said that this device would be used, and I quote, "should the process of constitutional revision ever become blocked".

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: An hon. member says "hear, hear". The hon. member was citing British history but unfortunately did not reflect much knowledge of our own, because the fact is that the whole history of our country has been one in which from time to time, from the point of view of one government or another, constitutional revision has been blocked. The hon. member might not like the federal system, he might not like the inconvenience of having to deal with the diversity of this country, but that is the country as it is, and that is the country with which we have to deal in this House.

When the Minister of Justice talked about the use by the federal government of this legislation as a means of imposing the federal will on constitutional discussion, he indicated that this central government, having been reminded that the questions and conditions regarding referenda can be rigged, is asking the parliament of Canada to give this government the power to call a referendum on constitutional questions wherever there is disagreement among governments.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: An hon. member opposite says "hear, hear". Speaking in the name of his party the hon. member has just entered the debate.

An hon. Member: He is a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Clark: An hon. member who holds an office in the government says, "hear, hear" to the idea that there should be an ability to override the interests of diversity in this country and to impose the view of one man who might be able to command a parliamentary majority in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Lawrence: He has just identified himself.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I cannot let that rest. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is using traditional deceptive Tory trickery to distort my words. That is not what I said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I do not think the Chair will ever know if there is a point of order because there is so much noise.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, it is not often that one has two opportunities to make a point. My point is that the Leader of the Opposition deliberately distorted the words I used in my speech. I did not say what he says I said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member says he cannot let the matter rest. As is so often the case, he should have. The electors of York East will certainly give him an opportunity to have plenty of rest, whenever he has the courage to encounter the kind of consultation he has been talking about and whenever he has the courage to meet the electorate.

The point about this new proposal, which would allow referenda on the constitution or—and I will come to this later—almost any other subject, is that it is a complete departure from Canadian practice; not simply practice concerning referenda, but practice concerning the basis for agreement on constitutional change. The practice in this country generally has been to amend the constitution only with the consent of the provinces. That is an inconvenience for those who govern in the certitude that they are the sole possessors of the truth and whose instinct is always directed to arbitrary and unilateral actions. But it is also a protection for minorities, wherever they are, a protection for individual citizens of Canada and, not least important, a protection for the integrity of this confederation and its ability to continue to function.

Canadians should not infer from the so-called stalemate of recent years that constitutional change in this country is impossible. Important contitutional changes have been brought about by consultation and consent in the past. This bill would enable the federal government to blackmail the provinces in constitutional discussions. If the discussions were not going in the way the federal government wanted, how easy and convenient it would be to put some of the questions to all of the country, or to put all of the questions to part of the country, as this bill would empower the government to do, and get the result wanted by the central government. The result might be satisfactory to the people who put the question, but it would be deeply illusory and, more serious than that, a result which would be deeply divisive and cause Canadian to turn against Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I suppose one could go on and say, "If the federal government did that, the provinces could have their own referenda". I think one of the ministers is nodding his head. I am never sure whether that indicates agreement or weariness. But if the federal government embarks upon a practice of consistent referenda, so can the provinces. Where would that lead us, a country like ours? We would have one level of government having a referendum on question A with answer X, and we would have another level of government having a referendum on the same question with a different answer. Where would that lead us?

Mr. Grafftey: To chaos.

Mr. Clark: As the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) says, it would lead us to chaos. We have enough of that with the government. We need a national government which will reflect and not try to undermine the necessity to deal with the natural diversity of the country.

I should like to deal with the language of the legislation, which I am afraid some government members have overlooked. It draws a much broader sweep than their remarks seem to indicate. The referendum power is to deal with the constitution of Canada which, according to clause 2 of the legislation, the definition clause——includes, without limiting the meaning of that expression,

(a) the customs, conventions and enactments that comprise the Constitution of Canada, and

(b) the political and judicial institutions and processes of Canada—

One must think for a minute what that means. Or better yet, I challenge anyone in the House to try to think of some Canadian question which is not embraced by that wide definition. The definition allows the government to have a referendum on anything it wants.

What does it mean in practice? Let us look at the language. What is a custom in Canada? What is a convention within the Canadian system? I will not give an exhaustive list because it would take the rest of my life, but I should like to refer to some examples. Cabinet government is a custom or a convention in the country. Are we to have referenda on cabinet government? Ministerial responsibility is or has been a custom or convention in the country. Is there to be a national referendum on ministerial responsibility? I hesitate to raise the subject of the monarchy because members opposite are so sensitive on the question, but the monarchy is a convention in the Canadian constitution. Is there to be a referendum on the monarchy? Federal-provincial conferences are a convention in the Canadian constitution. Are we to have a yes or no referendum on federal-provincial conferences? In fact, the parliamentary system is a custom which is not written into law. Does the government intend to have a national yes or no referendum on the parliamentary system? The power to do so is in the bill. That is what the government is requesting: the power to have referenda on the monarchy, on cabinet government, on ministerial responsibility and on a number of other things.

The fundamental rule of law in this country is a custom. Is it to be put to referendum? The bill asks for the power to put that question to referendum. What are enactments? The referendum power has to do with enactments. Let me cite a few examples. One of them is the Canadian Bill of Rights; another is the Indian Act. The Supreme Court of Canada draws its existence from an enactment, as does the right to vote. Is the right to vote to be the subject of a referendum? Because the bill permits the government to ask for a referendum on that question.

What about political and judicial institutions and processes? What does that include? Among other things it includes a free press, the party system and the distribution of powers among different levels of government. Are those to be the subject of referenda? That is the power which the government is requesting in Bill C-9. For example, they are asking for the power to put the question of freedom of the press to referendum.

I do not accuse the government of proposing referenda on these subjects specifically. I suspect its reason for widening the power it seeks is much more precise. The government wants a weapon it can use against any province in the event of disagreement about a particular constitutional reform. Perhaps it will be patriation, perhaps it will be natural resources. Hon. members of the New Democratic Party, given the interest of their last remaining premier on the question of provincial jurisdiction over natural resources, might want to take a look at whether they are so enthusiastic about this bill which would empower the government and all governments to have national referenda on whether Saskatchewan should surrender its jurisdiction over natural resources.

Perhaps it will be on some other question that the government would seek to pressure a province with a yes or a no answer on a complex question. As I will argue later, even that is dangerous and counterproductive. The power being requested in this bill goes well beyond that. As members of parliament, it is incumbent upon us to have an obligation to do more than consult. Also we have an obligation to protect particularly the rights of minorities and others who might be injured by bills of this kind. It is very important for us to consider those provisions and implications when we deal with legislation.

As I have said, parliament is being asked to give the federal government the right to hold referenda on almost anything. We are being asked to deliberately open wide the range of questions on which referenda can be put. Perhaps the government will say that will never happen. If it will not happen, why is the government requesting the power? Why run the risk that this weapon, once permitted, will be used to accomplish purposes which may lie beyond the government's declared desire or even its desired intention? Why seek more power than is needed? The government has done that often, but why is it seeking more power than is needed now? Indeed, this is a question for all parliamentarians who care about this institution: Why should the House of Commons grant a request for more power than this or any government requires?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I have indicated some of the subjects to which referenda could apply, but I think we can assume some of the matters I have raised will not be dismissed by referenda. Probably federal-provincial conferences or the Supreme Court will not be dismissed by referenda. Let me suggest very seriously to members of the House who might be tempted to support this bill, hon. members who are concerned about minority rights and the rights of people who need the protection of an institution like parliament, that there are at least three groups which particularly could be threatened if the government begins to use the wide powers it is requesting for some reason not revealed in this debate. Those three groups are the minorities of Canada, the press of Canada, and any government, federal or provincial, which may feel bound to defend a principle which is momentarily unpopular with whatever electorate a referendum might happen to consult.

With our special responsibilities under the Indian Act, let me ask members of the House of Commons if the Indians and Inuit of Canada would like to have their rights put to a referendum? What about the Hutterites, Mennonites, or any other religious minority in the country? Would they like to have their rights put to referenda? Seriously, I ask the following question: Would it be healthy for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be told by referendum what it should or should not report, what interests it should encourage, or what ideas it should conceal? Would that be healthy? The bill is requesting the power to have referenda on the rights of native people, religious minorities, and the rights and role of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Are these things improbable? Well, perhaps, but the temptation to use such power, as we have seen, has often resulted. At some time some government may find it irresistible to abuse the kind of power that is clearly within what this government is asking parliament to give it.

● (1620)

Of course, the government can say it would not be binding. Of course it would not if it was just to get the popular opinion on, say, aboriginal title, on the rights of religious minorities, or just to get a popular opinion on the rights of members. You know as well as I, Mr. Speaker, what a government that was not conscious of Canadian tradition could do with that kind of power. You know what could be done with it. It could be devastating, it could undermine, erode and abandon much of what this country and this parliament has stood for through the years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have a very dangerous instrument in our hands. We should not allow the legitimate preoccupation of members of this House with assuring a fair choice in respect of federalism in Quebec to blind us from the other possibilities we are inviting by this very bad, very dangerous and potentially authoritarian bill.

I think many members are troubled by the excesses that are possible in this bill. I understand the hon member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) will be following me in the debate. I think he has been accusing me of not having read the bill. I trust he will address himself in his remarks particularly to the questions of definition and to the scope of power that is open to this government by the definition I have just read.

Mr. Breau: I will.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member says he will and I look forward to hearing him. Let me repeat the point. We should not allow our legitimate preoccupation with assuring a free choice in Quebec to blind us to the other real dangers that exist in this legislation.

Many people here are troubled by the excesses that are possible in this bill, and I certainly would ask hon. members of this House of Commons, regardless of party—and I mean the members of conscience in this House—to ask themselves whether they want to put minority rights or other rights to the kind of risk this bill proposes. I ask them seriously to consider that before voting later today.

I realize that after 11 years the government is frustrated by its failure to make progress in its efforts toward constitutional reform. Indeed, as I listen to some members opposite I sometimes feel they are frustrated by the very nature of federalism in this country. There is no question in my mind, and I say this with some regret, that they are using the situation in Quebec to justify a referendum weapon that can be used to attempt to rally yes or no support for some of the government's pet constitutional bills. They are also, and probably not for the first time, trying to use the situation in Quebec to their own electoral advantage. We will deal with that whenever the election finally comes.

I do not question—I want to make this very clear—the motives of the Government of Canada in respect of matters relating to national unity. As the Prime Minister said the other day, and I was pleased to hear him say it and hope some of his backbenchers heard him also, all parties speak for Canada in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I do not at all question the government's motives, but I think the government has been wrong in its analysis of this nation, and wrong in its approach to unity in this nation. One of the reasons we are so divided now is that the central government has been wrong and stubborn on key questions. As more than one observer has pointed out, the Pepin-Robarts task force report amounts to a repudiation of many elements of the government's approach and many elements of the government's stewardship. Uniting this nation requires much more than having a means to try to force the premiers into line. On key questions like the integrity and unity of this nation there can be no negotiation, none at all. On other questions, including distribution of powers and patriation, there can be real progress only with real agreement, and that kind of real agreement requires an atmosphere of co-operation.

We have made some progress in constitutional talks lately. I must say we have made particular progress since the government discovered and adopted the recommendations of the Kingston conference. It would be tragic if that atmosphere of progress, minor and recent, were destroyed by Ottawa using the weapon it is seeking today to blackmail the provinces into accepting unacceptable constitutional changes. That, sir, would recreate the confrontation that has done so much damage to this country.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we should put aside the case of Quebec for a moment because as concerns the issue of constitutional referenda, Quebec is in a special situation since it will have its own referendum to determine its constitutional future. Naturally, the Canadian government needs special powers to hold its own referendum in Quebec on this same issue. Everyone agrees about this. There have already been cases in Canada where the federal government was empowered to hold a referendum on a specific issue when necessary. And we can face the particular problem involving the situation in Quebec by using the same methods that have been implemented in our Canadian traditions.

However, this bill makes important changes in the way of using referenda in Canada. This bill grants much more power to the federal government and allows it to ask questions related to constitutional matters under provincial jurisdiction. When he introduced this bill, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) said that this tool could be used if the process of constitutional review breaks down. In other words, Ottawa could use a referendum in the case of what the minister has called a constitutional review breakdown. This bill will allow Ottawa to ask the opinion of the public throughout Canada to attempt to force any province to accept constitutional changes with which it disagrees. We can now think of instances where this power could be used to the detriment of one province or another. The federal government could use this tool to attack Saskatchewan in relation with the rights of this province as concerns natural resources. It could also attack the jurisdiction of Quebec in educational matters, for instance. It could attack the jurisdiction of coastal provinces as concerns offshore resources.

This means that this new power in the hands of Ottawa will certainly cause new tensions in the area of federal-provincial relations. It is totally in the spirit of confrontation that prevails within the federal government every time it must deal with the provinces. A national government convinced that progress is possible through co-operation rather than confrontation would not ask for such a tool which proves useful only when there is disagreement. The mere fact that it requires such a tool shows that Ottawa is expecting even more confrontation with the provinces. Such a presumption is quite dangerous because if one starts discussions while expecting disagreement, there is bound to be disagreement.

If we really want to make progress, we must take an entirely different approach to federal-provincial relations. We must recognize that the only way to renew the Canadian federalism is to reach a consensus among all governments. Blackmail is not an answer. The only solution is to agree. For some years, the premiers of provinces other than Quebec have seemed increasingly willing to consider reforms that would ensure the development of the Quebec culture within a renewed federalism. English Canada is favourable to change, and it is most important for the cause of federalism in Quebec that the national government be in a position to work in consultation with the provinces that want reforms instead of fighting with all the provinces.

The essence of my intervention in this debate is quite simple, and I repeat it now. If the government feel that a referendum on a specific question is necessary, then let them come and put it to this House of Commons. Let them do it in the Canadian way and ask a specific question, not seek this immense power which would allow the national government to run referenda on virtually any question. If it would like that kind of support, then let them come to this House of Commons and ask for it. But we say "no" to this bill that demands so much excessive power.

If the government came forward and asked us for what they say they want, then they would get a different hearing; but they are asking for something much more. They are asking for a power that is dangerous in the hands of this or any government. That is a power which we in this parliament, being conscious of our traditions, of the need to protect minorities and others who might be abused by the power, of the fact that the only way in which we will get agreement and progress in this nation is for different governments to agree and come together, knowing that you do not get agreement by blackmail, will resist, as this bill is written now. It is an attempt to grab more power than is needed for purposes which are not stated by this government.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order has to do with the intervention a moment ago by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette). The record will show, and I am sure members heard him, that he accused the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) of a deliberate distortion. In the very admirable work, the fifth edition, of Beauchesne, at page 106 are two examples which cleary indicate that the use of the terms "deliberate distortion" and "deliberately distorted" are unparliamentary.

I have taken the time to obtain copies of excerpts from Hansard. The first infraction occurred on December 5, 1968, at page 3517, and a corresponding citation is given in Beauchesne. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) called upon the Speaker to declare that the words "deliberate distortion" were unparliamentary and requested withdrawal by the member who made the comment. The Speaker of the day said:

> Order, please. As the hon. member knows much better than I, there are a number of precedents and a number of authors who list long series of words considered to be unparliamentary. Basically I would think the suggestion by a member that there has been a deliberate intention to mislead the House is normally not acceptable according to the practices of this House. Although the hon. member may have wanted to say there had been a distortion, I am quite sure he did not want to impute to any hon. member an intention to deliberately distort something. I should like that hon. member to confirm my understanding of this situation.

The speaker required withdrawal. The second precedent occurred on May 26, 1972 at page 2589 of Hansard and is also cited on the relevant page of Beauchesne. At the foot of the page with respect to the remarks made by the then member for Skeena, the Speaker intervened, called for order and said:

> The hon. member knows that another member should not be accused of deliberately distorting what has been said. He can say that it has been distorted, but he has no right to say the distortion was deliberate.

On that occasion as well the offensive words uttered by the member at the time had to be withdrawn.

I suggest, since the hon. member for York East is now in his seat, that the gentlemanly thing for him to do in the face of those precedents is to rise and, if not apologize for the use of that unparliamentary term, at least have the good grace to withdraw it.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) raised this matter as a point of order. It is true in the first intervention I made on a point of order that I did use the word "deliberate". It is said that I repeated the words; but I do not think that I used them in the second intervention.

An hon. Member: Yes, you did.

Mr. Collenette: If I did, then we will have to see the blues. As I said in my speech, I have the utmost respect for the traditions of British parliamentary democracy, and I would not want to accuse any member of deliberately distorting any facts. I would be most pleased to withdraw the word "deliberate". It was done in the heat of debate this afternoon. We have had a rather heated and very useful exchange. I apologize if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was in any way offended. Members of the House will realize that the Leader of the Opposition does not do anything deliberately.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on second reading and referral to committee of Bill C-9 that would empower the Parliament of Canada to hold referenda on constitutional matters.

[English]

Before I go into my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to deal briefly with the tone and content of the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I wonder if the leader of the Opposition has read the bill, because in his attempt to attack and blur the government's position on the constitutional question and the national unity question, he repeatedly said in his speech that the government wants the power to hold the referendum, to do this and to do that. Section 4 and 5 of Bill C-9, at pages 6 and 7, clearly state that any proclamation or order in council to hold a referendum must be approved by this House. The bill provides for 40 hours of debate on the motion.

This House of Commons must approve this motion before a referendum can be held, so how misleading—but not deliberately of course. When a man of the stature of the leader of a national party rises in this House and bases the whole premise of his speech and his attack on the government on the fact that this government would like far-reaching powers to hold referendums, I do not know what to think. He feels that it is terrible to ask this House to pass this bill because it is going too far in asking for powers to hold referendums. If the hon. member had read the bill on that 14-hour flight from Tokyo to Bangkok to India, he would have seen that the government could not hold a referendum without asking parliament to approve the motion and to provide for 40 hours of debate.

Again, it is a reflection of the Conservative party's stand on this issue to only attack the government. The important thing to this party on any aspect regarding the constitution of Canada or national unity is not to take a position and say, "We believe in this", but to attack the government or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). If there is one thing that has been consistent with the Conservative party's position in the eleven years that I have been in this House, particularly since the election of the Parti Québécois, it is that which was stated very clearly by their former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield)—whom I respect—when he spoke in the debate on national unity last year. He said, in effect, that to trust this government or to trust the Prime Minister with doing anything on national unity is like asking an arsonist to put out the fire.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: A great speech!

Mr. Breau: I am glad that hon. members opposite applaud because they help make my point. That is their position again.

Anybody who thinks that by trying to redress what some people perceive as historical injustices in this country, anyone who believes you are going to do this without having tension, does not understand the nature of these injustices and these perceptions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is true.

Mr. Alexander: How long have you been in power?

[English]

Mr. Breau: We have been in power for quite a while.

Mr. Alexander: That is the problem.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) says that is the problem. I happen to think that is another reason for the problems and tension in Canada.

If there are tensions in Canada it is precisely because the government in power and its members have decided to work at the national level to try and correct what some people consider as historical injustices in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition and the former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party as well as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) think that the situation can be corrected in Canada and Canada can become united without going through tensions, they are naive. But I dare believe they are not only naive and they know that this prime minister, this government, have tried precisely to correct things in Canada. They tried to do that with the bilingualism policy. There are some who say they agree in principle with bilingualism, they support that principle, but then question everything from A to Z to satisfy those in Canada who are unduly preoccupied with the French fact in Canada.

As a result, there are further tensions. So, Mr. Speaker, to claim, as the Progressive Conservative party does—

An hon. Member: Jack Horner!

Mr. Breau: The Progressive Conservative party attacks the government on every statement, on every proposal made with regard to national unity. They say: They were the ones in power, they should have settled that. Well, Mr. Speaker, you cannot correct the situation in Canada. You cannot answer those who are convinced that there have been historical injustices in this country. You cannot answer those who might be influenced by others who want to isolate Francophones in Canada without going through a period of tensions. What I say to members opposite is that they can oppose the government on philosophies, on approaches to the constitutional issue. But they should at least be wise enough to understand instead of constantly lashing at government ministers for the only reason there have been tensions in Canada under this government. Tensions are unavoidable if we are to correct the situation.

Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservatives find it difficult to take a position on constitutional matters and the issue of national unity. Of course, they find it easier to simply lash at the government with constant references, as we heard this afternoon from the opposition leader, to suspicions that the government raises the issue for political gains only.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite possible that to discuss national unity and constitutional matters is to the advantage of the Liberal party. That may be. But we are not doing it simply because it benefits the Liberal party. It is not simply because we have a history and understanding of national unity in this country that each and every proposal or suggestion we make should be automatically rejected by the Progressive Conservative party. In so doing, they show how weak, how incapable they are of taking clear positions on these matters.

Today, we heard the Progressive Conservative leader criticize the government's constitutional approach. He suggested that holding a referendum on our constitutional future might harm minorities. I myself come from a minority group—however, I dislike that term "minority" because it has other connotations—I am a member of the French-speaking community outside Quebec. A study and analysis of what went on on that issue, especially this last year or these past eighteen months, have shown me that the approach taken by the Canadian government and the holding of a national referendum would not harm minorities. Quite the contrary! Did the Leader of the Opposition not hear some premiers during the last constitutional conference object to the entrenchment of language rights in the constitution? Does he not think that at one point—and it becomes important to deal with various perceptions of justice—it would be important for the government to hold a referendum on that question as to whether linguistic rights should be entrenched in the constitution?

Mr. Speaker, either the Leader of the Opposition has not read the bill under study or he does not understand what the minorities in Canada are looking for. I can certainly tell him that one thing the French-speaking minority is looking for is a reform of the political system, a reform of our political institutions through reasonable means.

Mr. Speaker, we must also correct the imbalance which lies in the present constitution whereby under section 133 the English Canadians in Quebec have written rights in that province that French Canadians do not have in other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, our purpose is not to assess what a provincial government does or does not do for the French-speaking community in the province, be it today, next week or in six months' time. But we have to solve once and for all what people perceive as an injustice in the constitutional and political history of our country. I know what it is, Mr. Speaker. But for those of us who must go back to their ridings and try and convince those French-speaking Canadians who wish to isolate themselves, be it in Quebec or elsewhere—because French-speaking Canadians wishing to isolate themselves in their culture and language are not all in the province of Quebec—this is a very important issue.

There are people like that everywhere; there are some in my province, and it is not easy for us to go to them and try to convince them that Canada has been able to cope with the political situation in the country when we cannot even say that we shall be able to include in the constitution the language rights of the French-speaking Canadians, the same rights the English-speaking Canadians have in Quebec under section 133.

Today, the Leader of the Opposition failed to tell us clearly whether that was his party's policy. He did not say a word about that. No, Mr. Speaker, he does not even care to see his party come up with a clear position on matters relating to the constitution and national unity. I wonder why. Is it possible that the Leader of the Progressive Conservative party does not know that in Canada there are people who are overconcerned about the French fact? Some people are overconcerned about that. But there are other people whose concern for ensuring the advancement of French-speaking Canadians, for providing equal opportunities for French-speaking Canadians in Canada can be questioned.

Mr. Speaker, is it possible that such people are merely trying to pass judgment on this government only on that issue?

[English]

I am not suggesting any of the Conservative members are doing that, but is it possible that they do not realize there are people in this country who are overly preoccupied with the French fact? If so, let them come to my province and listen to the way politics are discussed there. That does not concern me very much because to some extent I find it natural. For a period of ten or thirteen or fourteen or fifteen years in this country there has been an attempt to redress things, an attempt by governments, with the advent of bilingualism in the civil service and with some advancement of bilingualism in Canada, to do something about that. I do not find that so irritating and depressing that some people may want to oppose that. In fact, in my province there has been quite a reaction to the advancement of Acadians, and of Acadian institutions. I do not lose my cool just because of that.

● (1650)

I say to hon. members that all they do is attack the government for presenting exactly what it is they want to do to the Canadian people. The Conservative party voted for the Official Languages Act, and they voted again in 1973 when we had a motion to amend it, and I appreciate that.

An hon. Member: Only Jack Horner did.

Mr. Breau: When we talk about national unity, the constitution and about the urgency of having constitutional reform in this country, I would like the Conservative party to state clearly where they stand.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the bill we are dealing with is one of the most important to come before the House in quite a long time. As a matter of fact, Bill C-9 is a major part of the response which the government of Canada is giving to the crisis which exists in Canada since November 15, 1976. The second part of this response is the constitutional debate which has taken a new turn following the introduction in June 1978 of a government bill dealing with constitutional amendments. The purpose of that bill was to start discussions and provoke a debate both within our parliamentary institutions and elsewhere in Canada.

This bill has truly given rise to a good debate, and I think it has compelled our politicians and encouraged all Canadians to become aware of this issue. On the day which followed the election of the Parti Québécois in the province of Quebec, I urged the government to hold a referendum or an election, and to provide Quebeckers with a democratic means to indicate their intentions as to the future of our country. If I suggested that at the time, it was for a very simple reason. The political context of such a referendum is extremely important, I would even say crucial. I felt that obviously the PQ would stage the referendum campaign in a style that would create controversy. Well, that is exactly what has happened. That is exactly what is happening.

Mr. Speaker, I think that all Canadians, all those who wish to keep our country together should rejoice and approve a bill which asks parliament to incorporate in our statutes a legal means to hold a federal referendum on constitutional issues when the need arises, be it before, during or after the Quebec referendum. The important thing is that the situation has changed. The opposition leader speaks of British traditions, of the necessity to settle this question among politicians, among federal and provincial parliamentarians. He speaks, Mr. Speaker, naively, irresponsibly, as if the people in power in Quebec are good people, people who will put the question clearly and honestly when the referendum is held. How naive can one be! Whoever understands that René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois are using Quebec nationalism as a vehicle for politics, as a political tool, cannot speak that way, Mr. Speaker. Whoever understands that must be aware that René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois are now telling the rest of Canada: Meet our terms or we go. That is blackmail, Mr. Speaker.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) claims this government is resorting to blackmail. All of Canada is being threatened with blackmail by people who would split the country. When the Leader of the Opposition speaks of our diversity, of its strength, of the importance of respecting our diversity, I agree with him. I too appreciate the diversity of Canada, but not to the extent of destroying Canada. The leader does not know his history, Mr. Speaker. Let him go back 3,000 years before Christ, to the days of the Sumerians and Akkadians—Akkadians with a double "k", in the country of Akkad—what destroyed those civilizations after hundreds of years, almost 1,000 years? What caused their destruction, Mr. Speaker? The lack of autonomy of their city-states. Those city-states, through which the aspirations of the people could be represented locally; those civilizations simply wanted to respect the diversity of their civilization; after 700 years, the Sumerian civilization collapsed simply because there was no central power.

Naturally, I respect the diversity of Canada, but I shall not do so when there is someone in power in one of the provinces, one of the most important in Canada, which represents about one fourth of the population in Canada, who says: I am going to use the diversity of Canada to destroy it. Mr. Speaker, that is what is going on in Quebec, and when we say we want to have a federal referendum, it is because we want to make sure that both the question and the answer, the question put by the referendum and the answer given to it by Quebeckers, are very clear, and that everyone understands them.

I must once again ask this question: Why is the Leader of the Opposition, deceiving the people on such an important matter by saying that we want the power to hold a referendum on anything he says "anything under the sun"—when the bill clearly states that it is for constitutional matters, that before holding a referendum, the government will have to go before parliament with only 40 hours of debate in the House of Commons. I wonder why the Leader of the Opposition resorts to such distortions especially in a debate as important as this one on the future of Canada. Is it because he meets people who oppose this government, only because it so happens that this government has quite simply decided 10 or 15 years ago to try and correct some historical injustices, Mr. Speaker. I wonder why the Progressive Conservative party and its leader do not come out with a clear position on this and why, when he criticizes the bill, he skirts the truth. I wonder!

As I was saying earlier, a constitutional reform is a significant element of the federal government's answer to the Quebec situation. It is indeed because even though we can say no to the government of Quebec, we cannot say no to Quebeckers. We must provide Quebeckers with an alternative, we must tell them that our political institutions in Canada can be altered so that Canada's French-speaking citizens, in Quebec and elsewhere, can really become full-fledged citizens. That is what must be done, Mr. Speaker. And I must admit that I find it difficult to control my temper because I seldom get emotional on political matters. I can play the political game, however, when we are talking about the future of the country, it is a little different. And it is hard for me not to blow up when I hear people inside and outside the House say that the government gives too much importance to the constitutional reform and national unity issues.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is true.

Mr. Breau: I am happy to see the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) confirm what I think, that there were—

Mr. Boulanger: You are also free to protest in your province.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—The Canadian Economy—"The Road Ahead" circulated by former minister of finance; the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Radio and television services in English and French; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn)—Labour Conditions—Monitoring of and compensation for workers exposed to asbestos hazards.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions and public bills.

Is it agreed that item No. 7 and item No. 9 stand with unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of drawing up a national navigation policy, the prime objective of which would be to lay a favourable groundwork for the setting up of a true Canadian merchant marine.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for seconding this motion, as well as members on the government side who will no doubt support it.

It gives me great pleasure to submit to the House at this time this sensitive issue of a Canadian merchant marine. Over the last few years there have been significant developments in Canada in the area of transportation. As early as 1975, a national transportation policy proposal was put forth by the then minister and member for Langelier, Mr. Marchand. That was followed by the creation of VIA Rail, the passage of the Maritime Code and the coasting trade legislation. Many of us saw the Maritime Code and the coasting trade legislation as the first steps towards the establishment of a Canadian merchant marine.

However, we are now in 1979 and this has not yet materialized. Nothing concrete has been done to revive the merchant marine that we had even before the first and second world wars. Through lack of concern, our successive governments have let the situation deteriorate to such an extent that things could not be worse. We have all the human, technological and material resources at our disposal to establish a merchant marine, yet no action is being taken.

Need I remind the House that at the beginning of this century Canada's merchant fleet ranked fourth in the world? But year after year it slipped back compared to those of other industrialized countries. Of course, at that time the government did not see fit to intervene directly. By 1944, reports were submitted which showed, among other things, that the private sector was not much interested in the operation of a merchant marine and that grants were essential. Yet no positive action was taken and we started to sell our ships at the end of the last world war. In 1958 we still had a Crown corporation, the Canadian National Steamship Company, which still operated a dozen of ships, all of which were abandoned that same year. Now, 20 years later, we are still at the same point, and that is unbelievable.

I would like at this time, Mr. Speaker, to quote some figures in order to throw some light on the situation of the international maritime traffic in our waters. The most recent figures are for the month of April 1978. During that one-month period, we had 1,720 arrivals of ships carrying close to five million short tons of freight, and the same number of departures of ships carrying 8.8 million short tons of freight. The potential is there, nobody can deny it. Yet, according to an OECD study published in 1976, our country ranked last among OECD countries, on the same level as Switzerland and Germany, two countries which have no littoral. That is quite an honour, Mr. Speaker.

For instance, according to Statistics Canada, in 1976, 200 freighters were loaded in Canadian ports with goods to be shipped to the United Kingdom, and out of those 200 freighters, only two were Canadian registered. It is likely that it was the same ship. The most common registration countries are Denmark, Norway, Liberia, Panama, Greece, Germany, the United Kingdom and Russia. According to the latest studies, that last country has made tremendous progress recently and is already almost monopolizing maritime traffic throughout the world. Indeed, since the last war the U.S.S.R. has increased its merchant marine threefold or fivefold, to the extent that it is now in position to assume definite control over the huge potential of transport tenders by merchant marine. Conditions are about the same for the transport of goods from the United Kingdom to Canada. I could also mention that in the case of Belgium and Luxemburg, of 100 ships travelling from those countries to Canada, only one alone was flying the Canadian colours and finally in the case of France, only one of 150 ships carried the Canadian flag.

In reply to question No. 79 put on the order paper by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), the Minister of Transport answered that only three ships of Canadian registry are doing some trade abroad, not taking into consideration of course the boats on the Great Lakes. In 1960, there were 18; in 1950, 88; in 1945, 173. Of our three ships, only one is anchored in Quebec City and it is the Edgar Jourdain which belongs to Mr. Jules Jourdain of Rimouski who feels rightly that the Canadian maritime policy is prejudicial to him. This man deserves our admiration because he persists in spite of everything in hoisting the Canadian flag on his ships which is one of the very few which are plying the seas around the world. Ships hoisting convenience flags in our waters are twice as numerous as they were two years ago, in spite of their low security standards. Indeed many of those boats and oilers have been shipwrecked and the crews of those ships of course are made up of foreigners and that does little for employment in Canada.

Just imagine that, CIDA, an agency of the Canadian government, manages to find and send experts to Algeria to build a merchant marine in that country. I imagine it should not be too hard for the Algerians to outstrip us in this area. Flags of convenience have become a real plague. Some conventions and policies proposed or already applied in some countries have rid them of this plague. The UN has set up a maritime code providing that 80 per cent of the shipping between two countries should be done by vessels flying the flag of one or the other country, which leaves 20 per cent of the shipping to vessels flying other flags. But this convention has not been ratified by all trading nations. However, it indicates that there is a seemingly irreversible trend toward the protection of national interests in international shipping.

While many countries are combining money and efforts to build their merchant marine, our own government is moving at a snail's pace or not at all. We are really missing the boat, it is time to say. Even in the United States where 65 per cent of shipping operations are carried out by vessels flying a flag of convenience, they have given thought to the establishment of an American merchant marine with a minimum quota for export-import shipping so that American sailors would have job opportunities rather than those from Hong Kong, Malaysia or other countries. With our potential, we only have to pluck up our courage and invest in setting up a merchant marine of our own.

In 1976, a project raised many hopes. It was the proposed construction of the M. V. Arctic. This ship was designed by a Montreal firm. Its construction was undertaken in the shipbuilding yard of Port Weller, Ontario, at a cost of $40 million. Three shipbuilding companies formed a consortium and, with federal government support, paved the way for the creation of a national merchant marine, and even if we had to call on technological expertise from abroad, even so this ship was nevertheless designed entirely in Canada and she was built in our own shipyards.

Mr. Speaker, that is really the first joint effort by the Canadian shipbuilding industry and the federal government. In an article published in La Presse on Friday, October 22, 1976, one could read this:

> If the pilot project succeeds, the government intends to constitute a first nucleus of a national merchant marine with ten such vessels.

A few months earlier, on June 14, 1976, the vice-chairman of Canada Steamship Lines, Mr. Arthur Nightingale, stated at a seminar on transportation:

> It is now economically possible to create a Canadian merchant marine regardless of any considerations of security and national sovereignty.

In spite of all his moderation and his carefulness, Mr. Darling had this to state in his report in 1974, and I quote:

> It is obvious that the answer will not be the immediate creation and operation of a fleet under Canadian flag. But conditions are changing and it may be not only possible but also necessary that ships flying the Canadian flag operate within the international shipping community.

Mr. Darling had other comments to make which are still more to the point today. He noted that the companies that stood better in the international shipping community were those which were supported by their government, and I quote:

> That means progressive penetration of nationalized or state-supported shipping companies will some day change considerably the competitive aspects in that industry.

On the question of costs, manpower, capital, expertise and shipyards we are just as advanced, Mr. Speaker, as our major trading partners. They are making increased efforts to develop their national fleets while we still only have an embryo which is far from being born, unfortunately. Following the release by the Minister of Transport of the report on our shipping policy in January, 1979, I wonder whether it is not more appropriate to talk of an abortion rather than a birth. Indeed, that report does not contain anything new and only maintains a status quo that has lasted long enough. The government refuses to recognize the need for new tax incentives.

The minister's release is a big disappointment. This is a time for action to use one of the prime minister's favorite slogans. This is a time for action, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the formulation and the implementation of a real policy for the construction of a merchant marine in this country. The time has come and we have every reason to believe that in the future under bilateral agreements our partners will want to transport a percentage of our goods shipped abroad. If such is the case we will be in a very bad way. Without a fleet we will not be able to get reciprocity under such agreements. In 1974, we spent $2.7 billion to ship goods abroad. The greater part of that amount went to foreign shipping companies and their governments naturally which levy taxes. If one considers that shipping costs cannot be stable under the present economic conditions this will place our economy and our balance of payments in a shaky position.

In June, 1976, Canada Steamship Lines announced it was acquiring three merchant ships, and despite the good will of the company, it was regretfully announced that these ships would have to sail under a foreign flag. The vice-president of that company, whom I quoted earlier, explained the decision this way:

> We waited in vain for 16 months for the federal government to take steps in line with the recommendations of the Darling report, and then we decided to go ahead.

Mr. Speaker, how can we explain then that Canadian ship owners cannot find here benefits comparable to those we are offering to foreign countries through the Export Development Corporation? In his report, Darling was referring to this and I quote:

> Canadian companies flying foreign flags would not be prepared to change flag unless they were given the opportunity to make as much profit.

And further:

> It is estimated that Canadian companies should be entitled to the credit of the Export Development Corporation at the same conditions as the ones offered to foreign companies buying Canadian vessels.

What Canadian companies want, Mr. Speaker, is just to get the same treatment as the one given to foreign competitors. At that point, a very specific recommendation from the Darling Report comes in, namely unification of responsibilities and the establishment of an authority with powers proportional to the various goals established to meet the needs of a merchant marine policy which should have as its first objective the establishment of a merchant marine in the country as it has been specified in my motion which is now under discussion. Our government keeps on thinking that the merchant marine is a sector as any other. It is a rare case, Mr. Speaker, in the club of industrialized nations. We have no specialized administration for all questions concerning international navigation. This lack of policy and this indecision are not to our credit. I have the impression that the government watches our merchant marine as one would watch somebody on his death bed. The problem of the merchant marine cannot be considered within the general scope of a transport policy. It is a specific problem which needs specific solutions.

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) for having presented this motion which has been coming back before the House for over 15 years. Year after year I come back asking the government to take a clear and well-defined position with regard to the Canadian merchant marine. Mr. Speaker, as one can see on the order paper, I too have a motion which I will eventually have to withdraw because it no longer responds to current needs. I am asking the government to implement the recommendations contained in the Darling report.

While strongly supporting the hon. member for Rimouski, I think that the government has followed the recommendations and the strong representations which I made and repeated on many occasions with the support of several members of this House, from both sides of the House and from all political parties.

I have been saying, as reported in Le Peuple of Wednesday, February 12, 1975, some four years ago:

A solution must be found to this issue . . .

I was giving an explanation in this article because it had reported one of the many speeches I made in the House concerning a Canadian merchant marine and it had recommended that the government should take a position.

I would first like to mention all the positive aspects of "A Shipping Policy for Canada" published by the Department of Transport under the authority of the Minister of Transport, Mr. Otto Lang. I come directly to the conclusions, Mr. Speaker, in order to say something positive to this House because it has been criticized in various speeches and as I have myself criticized the government for I wanted it to be constructive.

I think the hon. member for Rimouski should have seen some good things in this report, even though he thinks that it brings nothing new and that the government does not seem to be prepared to do anything. I think that all the debates we have had in the House lead to a recognition which is very important for the future of a Canadian merchant marine.

I would like to read from page 51 of the English version of this report which was published on January 24, 1979. The report says:

With respect to Arctic shipping, the government intends that, as a condition of approval to export unprocessed or partially processed resources, Canadian registered vessels must be used if they are available at reasonable cost. The government is also prepared to consider, on their merits and on an ad hoc basis, substantiated requests for assistance related to the use of ships both registered and built in Canada for use in the Arctic.

And this is a big step the government has just made. I will come back to this later on in the course of my review. It must be acknowledged, however, that the government wants to proceed with this issue. Indeed, it is stated on page 3 of the release issued by the government at the time the report was published:

The government finally concludes it would be appropriate to require for exportation . . .

And I find also on the subject of . . . the Arctic

But still, with respect to the ships we need for the Canadian merchant marine, it is stated under options 3 and 4, that if there are changes in methods, if some countries want to go ahead at our expense either by forming groups against assistance or costs or by applying costs that could become prohibitive for the transportation of our export goods, the government would be ready to revise those policies at any time and put an end to that, and consideration must first be given to the national interests on policy matters concerning an ocean-going merchant fleet. This is all very good, and I will come back to this later. There is also a matter of savings.

Last week, I was allowed to ask a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). I asked him:

In view of the uncertainty which prevails regarding the future of Canada's shipbuilding industry and, in view of the many representations I have received from union spokesmen and shipyard officials, I would like to know if the government has made a decision concerning the 20 per cent subsidy to help shipbuilding in Canada and make us more competitive on the international market? If so . . .

And I concluded: I would like to know for how long? Because a number of concerned people, and I see here the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), who probably will take part in this debate, a number of people know that no later then tomorrow the 20 per cent subsidy on shipbuilding will be terminated, according to recent statements made by the government. But the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated the following in answer to my question, as reported on page 2546 of the Hansard of June 25, 1979:

Mr. Speaker, we have done a considerable amount of work on the drafting of a new shipbuilding policy. The Board of Economic Development Ministers and the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers want to make a comprehensive statement on the whole subject, possibly next Thursday.

That is to say—

Mr. Boulanger: That was January 25 and not June 25.

Mr. Guay: Pardon me. I thank the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) for that correction. Then it was January 25, 1979, only last week.

I anticipated a positive answer without knowing what the minister responsible for the economy, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) will announce this week, on Thursday. I am sure the government will answer in a positive way in view of the pressure exerted by the Quebec caucus as this issue is causing some uneasiness as concerns the future of shipbuilding in our country, and all shipyards have been in touch with me, Mr. Speaker. It is also important in the province of Quebec. We have been most insistent, and I hope that in all that debate shipping shall not be the only topic to be discussed as surely I must admit that we made a big step by granting exclusiveness in the Arctic and, with the support of all honourable members, I urgently ask the minister to extend, not on a mere quarterly basis, the shipbuilding policy or the 20 per cent subsidy, but once and for all, for an indefinite period.

● (1730)

We need this subsidy for the future of the Canadian shipyards. Let us look, Mr. Speaker, at recent newspaper headlines, and I would like to quote something that appeared quite recently, on January 23, in the newspaper La Presse:

Crisis—

—this appeared on January 23, 1979 in La Presse under the title:

HEAVY INDUSTRY:

Crisis in shipbuilding;

This article discussed in particular the future of the shipyards, and especially of the Davie Shipbuilding in Lauzon, which is involved in shipbuilding for 70 per cent of its operations. The article said that if the government did not restore or permanently maintain the subsidy so that, as I said earlier, Canada can remain competitive internationally in the area of shipbuilding and conversion—I must recognize that while some people say that the government has not acted in this area, this subsidy was maintained by the hon. Jean-Luc Pepin and was extended by the hon. Jean Chrétien when he was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and was even amended because this 20 per cent subsidy previously applied only to shipbuilding and was extended to the conversion or modernization of Canadian ships and ships used for exports.

Mr. Speaker, I have here another newspaper. On a recent trip, I bought the November 25, 1978 issue of L'Express Information. On page 47 of the economic section, there was an article entitled:

The collapse of shipbuilding

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the future of our shipyards is a cause for concern if the government does not take some action. I cannot wait till Thursday and I shall be the first to applaud at anything that the government can do for an industry which is extremely important not only from an historical point of view, as the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) pointed out earlier, but also from an economic point of view and as regards the equipment needed on these ships. Indeed, we must not consider only the shipbuilding industry but also everything that it means for the secondary industry, all the supplies, all the subcontracts that the shipyards can let out when they are awarded important contracts, and most important, 80 per cent—I was even going to say 90 per cent, but I do not want to start an argument on figures—but our shipyards have been relying on government policies for their survival not only with respect to orders but also to incentives for shipbuilding, and it is truly essential for the future of this industry which is so important and deteriorating.

When I received a press release from the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association, I was quite pleased with the conclusions of this letter which was addressed to me and which expressed the association's concern. One could read in L'Express Information that before 1982, something which should certainly be a cause for great concern throughout the world, shipyards will be forced to close down. And such will be the case of our own shipyards too. We are not any wiser than the people in Europe where shipyards date back nearly a thousand years. Our own yards are hardly a few hundred years old. We also will be faced with this tragedy unless the government acts and acts promptly. I was therefore very happy to see that the government had given some thought to the matter. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce told me last Thursday that the cabinet had looked into the problem as a result of the numerous representations I have been making for too long.

That is why I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) and other members are now concerned with the merchant marine. I am pleased to get their support, perhaps because we begin to have glimmers of hope, except for a few Conservative members and a few also on this side. We were a handful of members who believed that Canada could provide itself partially with a merchant marine, and I do hope that in the long run we shall have our own ocean merchant marine we can be proud of.

The Canadian Shipbuilding Association said the following in that letter they sent me: The long-term prospects in that area are excellent. The government will ensure that its fishing boats are replaced in the next five or ten years. We also expect to invest close to $1.5 billion in the building of six frigates to renew our merchant marine fleet for the marine department. We do know that this is a long-term policy, that there cannot be any immediate effects on shipbuilding. The government also intends to spend over $2 million on equipment, assistance and supplies of every description to develop Arctic resources. And I am convinced that a major part of those $2 million will be used, as the report signed by the Minister of Transport suggests, to transport our abundant natural resources in the Arctic.

So, Mr. Speaker, I too remain still concerned, at least until next Thursday, and if one wants to make an effort and still remain positive in all this matter, you will admit we made a big step. If the government can say that in an indefinite and unlimited way the subsidy will be maintained, as long as that subsidy of 20 per cent to assist the shipbuilding industry is amended, until we have really found the way in the short run to help the shipbuilding industry in Canada because we saw in the case of Marine Industries Limited what the government of Quebec has to do for that industry. And in that respect, Mr. Speaker, in a future debate I would like indeed to talk about the promises of a government in power. I do not want to enter the debate on the merchant fleet on that issue but I believe that those who will be my opponents and those who will have to fight the referendum in the riding of Lévis and in the 16 ridings in and around Quebec City will have to answer very important questions with respect to the assistance to the shipbuilding industry, particularly when we know what they did; they awarded two contracts against a very firm recommendation to Marine Industries Limited when all recommendations said that contract should go to Davie Shipbuilding, for advantages not only as far as manpower is concerned but also for economic advantages.

Mr. Speaker, reporters, members in the Quebec City area are very saddened by what happened. But I am not provincially elected, I am federally elected, and I believe that more than ever the people of Davie Shipbuilding at home, the people in the shipyards across Canada are beginning to recognize what we did and the debate we carried on with the support, that I carried on, I would say, with the support of a few members in this House today, is bearing fruit, and I am glad because we are going to reap them not only to the advantage of the hon. member for Lévis. After 16 years, I believe I planted, as the popular saying goes, other seeds that bore fruit. That one took more time to grow but I think it is there and it is there to stay.

So, the government is doing something, contrary to what the hon. member for Rimouski has said, claiming that the status quo is being maintained, that things are at a standstill, that the government does not budge. I know the hon. member has been away from the House for a while due to illness. I am very happy to see that he is well again and I welcome him to the House. But to my mind, the first thing he should do is read in its entirety the report we published last week, because it points out critical aspects of the situation and, indeed, it makes positive suggestions. On that topic, I have always tried to be positive, Mr. Speaker, because when one is negative in a debate, one obtains nothing; nothing worth-while comes out of it.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the efforts I have made in this House have borne fruit. But they must be followed up. That report must not become just one amongst all the others. As some will notice, those who are listening to this debate, I avoided repeating my speech and shall not repeat it, because for me only one thing counts in this debate on our merchant marine: not the Darling report, not the mountains of other reports we have had, not all the studies and surveys we have made, but this report that can be criticized. Indeed, I should like to deal with it when I have more time, because this debate does not end today; we must come back to it, or at least to my motion, at which time I can continue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Like the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), I am delighted that the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) has put a resolution of this sort on the order paper. I support it wholeheartedly. We have heard the hon. member for Lévis on more than one occasion, as he has heard the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, the hon. member for Rimouski and the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), as well as many others on both sides of the House, speak in support of the proposition that Canada should have a merchant marine.

Perhaps I may be permitted to be a little critical, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member suggested that when we are critical we do not get what we want, that we should really go along with this government, accepting its little favours and be happy. Of course that is the paternal attitude of this government, that we should just take what it gives us.

[Mr. Guay.]

I noted in the report published and distributed last week the minister said that for the movement of processed and partially processed goods for export from the Arctic every measure will be taken to ensure that they are carried on Canadian flag vessels. That is good and fine, and it is progress, but what progress! It is very slow. We have been addressing ourselves to this problem for years, it seems to me—at least six years to my knowledge, and the hon. member for Lévis has said that for 15 years he has been working on the government and has only got this far. That is fine, but there is a puzzling paragraph in this particular report TP-1676 published last week in respect of a shipping policy for Canada, which I should like to quote.

At page 51 there are two quotations in respect of policy that I should like to put on the record. They both puzzle me. I do not know whether in the time allotted we will obtain any clarification. The first part states:

> After full consideration of all of the factors involved, the government has concluded that, in the present circumstances achievement of these objectives does not warrant the provision of new tax or financial measures to support the development of a Canadian deep-sea merchant marine.

The objectives there refer to a Canadian flag fleet.

This is an admission that all the work done by the hon. member for Lévis, except in respect of the Arctic, has gone unheeded by the government.

The second column on this same page 51 contains an extraordinary statement which I just do not understand at all. Perhaps someone will shed some light on it. It states:

> The government intends to proceed with legislation to give it broad powers to obtain information and to act where Canadian shipping interests are threatened by the actions of a foreign government or carrier.

I suppose that is fair enough, but it goes on to > Legislation would include the power to permit the designation of "Canadian shipping lines", including companies located in Canada but not operating vessels under Canadian registry, to enable the government to respond to the requirements of a number of developing countries.

What sort of gobbledygook is this? We are going to have designated Canadian shipping lines. Under what flag are they to be operating, Panamanian or Peruvian? This government has to be out of its mind to come out with nonsense like that. Why does this government not provide some means for accomplishing the objective?

There are a number of means the government could adopt, three of which come to mind easily, to assist in the construction of Canadian vessels in Canadian yards for the creation of a Canadian merchant marine. The first means, of course, is through outright subsidy. I do not know what the Thursday declaration will be, but I hope, like the hon. member for Lévis, the government will not cut back on this subsidy.

There is the second means, namely, tax incentives to those who are prepared to raise the capital for construction. That is the basis of the question I posed on January 25 in a supplement to a question raised by the hon. member for Lévis.

The third method is one that is open to every other country in the world but not to Canadians, and that is the use of Canadian funds from the Export Development Corporation. Why is that the situation? We have built 51 ships within the last four of five years for Greece, France, the United Kingdom, the Bahamas, Cuba, and Bermuda, and we have built them under the provisions of the Export Development Corporation. We have spent over $500 million in this regard, but we have not built one through that method, the Export Development Corporation, for a Canadian carrier. I wonder why is that. This is a misuse of Canadian funds. Why should Canadian corporations not have at their disposal the same facilities available to these other countries such as Cuba? Why should they not be able to get low interest credit and insurance coverage to guarantee loans? That is one of the methods used by the Export Development Corporation, the guaranteeing of loans.

When I was at home at Christmastime an enterprising man from the area who is interested in shipping came to me and said, "If I had a guarantee I could raise the money to obtain a small Canadian flag vessel, then perhaps another vessel, and then another." Unfortunately at this particular stage he is talking about buying vessels that are now afloat. That will not help our shipbuilding industry, I grant you, but once an individual gets started there is no end to it. It will grow, and before long we will be building our own ships. This was a very enterprising man and I listened to him carefully. He asked why the government would not guarantee a bank loan so he could buy a ship. He actually had Canadian cargoes for these ships.

Speaking of Canadian cargoes, I found some of the figures given in this particular study confusing. Am I to believe that imports into Canada, as described in the table at page 15 of this report, are brought into Canada on Canadian flag vessels to the extent of 47 per cent? I just cannot believe that. There are not that many Canadian flag vessels available.

On page 15 of the English version of this report under exports it is claimed that 21 per cent is carried on Canadian flag vessels. I have gone past Roberts Bank more times than I care to count and have seen Canadian coal piled ship high beyond the funnels for shipment to Japan, but I have not seen a single Canadian flag vessel carrying that coal. That coal is carried by Japanese vessels, which in turn bring back the steel processed by the use of that coal, some of that steel with four wheels and a steering wheel attached. This is our coal, and much of that is our steel from the British Columbia islands. It is all carried in foreign bottoms. We would certainly be able to carry the goods in Canadian bottoms if the matter of guaranteeing a bank loan for the construction of Canadian vessels were looked at carefully. I find that particular table very deceiving.

The table on page 44, also in the English version, mentions the route description and the export/import commodity. It brings us right back to the coal I mentioned which was being carried from Roberts Bank to Japan. Coal is carried to Japan and the ships come back empty. We import a great deal from Japan. Why do we not carry the coal in Canadian bottoms and bring back the cars and the televisions, if that is what we are importing from Japan? That table on page 44 is a disgrace, and should not be included in a study of this sort.

The hon. member may be content with what this government has done to ensure as much as possible and at reasonable cost, the carriage of Arctic resources. His minister has sold him a bag of garbage. It is not a guarantee that all our imports and exports into the Arctic will be carried on Canadian vessels. That report is a great deception and letdown after the Darling report, which has been urging the creation of a merchant marine. There are other reports, such as the Audette report, and the situation goes back longer than either of us can probably remember.

I understand that we have guarantees from some of the labour unions for "X" number of years that there be a no-strike clause in the contract, because that is one of the things which destroyed our merchant marine after the war.

I know there are other members who will want to speak on this subject. Once again I would like to thank the hon. member for Rimouski for bringing this matter forward. This government does not have the time to create a policy on this matter, but there is one being developed. I can assure hon. members of that, but they will have to wait for the results of the election to see it.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the previous speakers to thank the member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) who was the mover of the motion today. I think it is an excellent opportunity to do so, since Canadian policy on maritime transport was made public last week. I also take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to welcome him back after his illness and assure him we are ready to cross swords in a friendly way as usual.

As for his comments, Mr. Speaker, as my colleague for Lévis (Mr. Guay) has pointed out, I think he should have paid more attention to the report recommendations with respect to a Canadian policy on maritime transport, because it is far from advocating the status quo and I believe, for example, that restricting the shipping of resources from or to Northern Canada to Canadian ships is a major step in the right direction.

The hon. member for Lévis, as usual when the subject especially concerns him, made an impassioned speech, and I would like to say on behalf of all my colleagues, that he has shown great perseverance in his long and useful career as a member of parliament in bringing up a subject which concerns of course the interests of his constituency, but which also is of great importance for the economic future and direction of the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) talked garbage in his speech. I shall mention only the venom which we are used to seeing him pour forth periodically in this House. We had rather a good example of this last Friday in his speech about the bill on referendum, and this only added to the outpouring of venom contained in his few comments today.

Before speaking specifically about the direction of our policy concerning the merchant fleet, I would like to rectify a figure mentioned by my colleague from Rimouski, who said that there were only three oceanic ships sailing under the Canadian flag. I would like to tell him the good news and announce that there has been a fourth ship sailing under the Canadian flag since early January, and I would like to quote in regard to an article in the newspaper Le Devoir of January 5 and written by Mr. Guy Deshaies, which says the following:

An important even though modest step in the development of a Canadian merchant fleet will be made this weekend when the ship Maurice Desgagnés, sailing under the Canadian flag, leaves the port of Chicoutimi loaded with wood pulp and explosives for the Netherlands and Germany.

The ship will come back from its first international trip with a full load of German import products.

Mr. Speaker, this is a new company called Desgagnés Maritime Limitée and I am very happy to mention this fact because this company is established in my constituency and has been active in shipbuilding since the beginning of this century. Moreover, the chairman of the Desgagnés group, Mr. Yvan Desgagnés, has always been an active supporter of the merchant fleet. We must depend on the entrepreneurship of Canadian entrepreneurs, on the quality of our labour as mentioned by the hon. member for Rimouski, as we realize that even a private company in a less privileged area of Canada succeeded in carrying the Canadian ensign on international seas and, I am very proud of it as it is a company from my riding.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have the time to undertake an exhaustive analysis of the report published last week as I have only three minutes left, but I wish to say very briefly that in view of the adverse situation of the shipping industry, considering that there are too many vessels used for international transportation and that many companies do not succeed in obtaining contracts anymore and that, in the last three years, international shipping companies have seen their profits decrease, in view of the adverse situation of the shipping industry and the fact that it would be difficult to prove that a Canadian merchant fleet would be the ideal answer to our problems, to our balance of payments or our present commercial problems, the new financial or fiscal measures to encourage oceanic transportation by ships flying the Canadian flag are not justified economically. Investments in oceanic transportation do not represent an optimum use of our national resources. This is an important factor as the government tries to encourage economic development through a minimum of interference.

Mr. Guay: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Lévis rises on a point of order.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. Guay: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport and I think it might interest all hon. members, even the member for Esquimalt-Saanich who left this House. I am not sure if it will be during the present session but I hope that the report will be referred for study during the present session to the committee of transport and communication.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Lapointe: To answer this question very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I would say that this report announces legislation which will allow the government to obtain more information on international companies doing business in Canadian ports. As soon as that legislation is introduced and adopted after second reading in the House, the report and the legislation will be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will have to skip many pages of my excellent speech in which I could have presented very sound arguments to the hon. member for Rimouski. I will say that the government's conclusion, in the present international situation, does not justify the investment of Canadian funds in the development of a Canadian merchant marine. On the other hand, the government is prepared to protect a sector which after a few years should become the most important of the country, from an economic point of view, namely, northern Canada and as much as possible reserve that sector to Canadian ships.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hour reserved for consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock, when the House adjourned for supper, I was saying that in the Conservative policy—if it is really a policy—relating to the bill, to what the government is saying on the constitutional issue, on the national unity issue, the objective is not to put forward a viable alternative, to tell Canadians exactly what they want to do, but simply to attack what the government proposes, pretending as the Leader of the Opposition himself stated this afternoon, that the Liberal party is only trying to get some electoral capital. Yet, Mr. Speaker, they are playing politics with national unity, not the Liberal party, and I for one will not try to find an excuse because my leader has a viable position concerning the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, here I will be critical of my own colleagues and many Liberals across the country who should stop apologizing because our leader, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is an efficient critic—as he has always been—of political nationalism in Quebec. Time has come to stop apologizing for that. I do not feel ashamed because the leader of the Liberal party can say across Canada: here is the policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative party should realize that by limiting themselves to criticizing our position on this issue without even putting forward a viable alternative, they show their weakness, their inability to arrive at positions. Mr. Speaker, there are ramifications to constant frustration of constitutional reform and constant downgrading of its importance. Before the five o'clock recess, I was suggesting I find it very hard to control my temper when I hear people state in or outside the House that the issue of national unity, the issue of the constitution is not that important and there are other matters more important to discuss.

Mr. Speaker, I also dealt with perceptions of injustice in Canadian history. There are not only, however, perceptions of past injustice, there are real injustices perpetrated now today on language matters, on racial matters in Canada. If anybody is amazed or questions this, let them come to my province where I could point to examples. I would quite simply suggest that perhaps the Progressive Conservatives are naive—because I am not in any way intimating they are being devious—they probably are naive if they think they can maintain a united and strong Canada while frustrating endlessly the constitutional reform process.

With regard to the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition over the past few months about sovereignty-association, there is an article in La Presse of October 28, 1978, in which he is reported by Mr. Louis Falardeau as having said something he has never denied, in spite of everything he is trying to say now:

> I shall have a mandate to negotiate with the provinces, and if a province has a specific mandate, I shall have to negotiate and deal with it.

Then many people have taken to task the new and unfortunate member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), a former mayor of the city of Toronto, who has not yet adjusted to federal politics. I do not blame him for his blunder, because he was doing exactly like his leader. I suggest that his leader did not mean any harm when he said that, because he did not realize what he was saying. I merely say that he is irresponsible and naive and proves his inadequacy as a national leader. That is what I am saying of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I have always been against any action leading to political isolation. I have always objected to those who wanted to isolate people because of their language or their culture. However, I can understand as a Francophone how easy it was for political parties such as the separatist party in Quebec to inject nationalism in politics. It is quite easy to understand when one looks for five minutes at Canadian history. If anyone can deny that there never have been and there still do not exist in this country attitudes that are not as favourable to the French fact as they could have been, it is because he is not being honest. Surely one can hide this fact and pretend it does not exist. But it does exist, Mr. Speaker. That is why I think national parties such as the Progressive Conservative party should make its position clearly known on this particular issue.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to constitutional reform, it is getting late for Quebeckers as well as for Francophones outside Quebec, because they feel that some things ought to be changed in our country. And I explained earlier that the Progressive Conservative party always says when this matter is discussed: Look who has been in power for 10, 12 or 15 years, you have. And they seem to blame us for it. I told them that it was impossible to mean—

● (2010)

[English]

Mr. Baker: Who else?

Mr. Breau: Some Conservative members are helping me make my point. What they do not realize is that one cannot redress the political institutions of this country nor can one redress the political order of this country without creating tension. If hon. members think they can do that, they are fooling themselves. One cannot do that unless tensions are created.

[Translation]

The fact that tensions have been created in this country for the last ten or 12 years does not worry me at all. There were tensions in my own provinces also, and that does not worry me too much either. There were some reactions against the promotion of Acadians. Looking at New Brunswick politics, it is obvious that there were some reactions like those. We should not worry about that. Such things are normal. If we are seeking, a healthy society, we should not hesitate to tell each other truth. What happened in Canada for the last ten years is that we have begun to tell each other the truth. When truth is told, it is normal that some people try to use the truth to break the country. It is true that we have seen tensions, and it is true that we will know some more. Why? Because Canadians have started to face the truth and recognize it. These are the steps that we have to go through if we want to be able to take real decisions on those matters.

Unfortunately, the Progressive Conservative party is making an electoral issue out of that bill, out of the constitutional question. They are the ones who make an electoral issue of that question. The recent remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and of the hon. member for Rosedale, although they both tried to clarify them, have shown that they are unable to understand the situation in Quebec and in Canada, that they are unable to really lead this country as a responsible party.

[English]

Earlier in my speech I mentioned that I had suggested a couple of days after the November 15, 1976, election that the federal government had a duty to make sure that the people of Quebec could respond to their federal government as well as to their provincial government. Why? Because now that the PQ have the means of communication in Quebec and the means of development, the government can create a context into which it could convince Quebeckers that the federal system is against their interests. That is exactly what I thought at the time and that is exactly what has happened. If hon. members want an example of what I meant at the time—and it is still an issue today—they could take a look at the issue of transmission of electricity from Newfoundland to Canadian markets and U.S. markets. We know that there was a deal made for Churchill Falls, and while I do not necessarily agree totally with the position of Quebec, I can agree that on that one, a deal is a deal and a contract is a contract. It is difficult to deny that.

But what about the development of the Lower Churchill—Gull Island?

That power will have to be transmitted through Quebec on Quebec land. Do hon. members not realize that it is possible in that kind of a context to make that an issue in Quebec and convince Quebeckers that it is against their direct interests to be part of a federal system? They can, and if hon. members do not know that, they do not know what is happening in Quebec. That is exactly the kind of issue around which the PQ could create a referendum campaign. In this instance, Quebeckers, if they want to be good Canadians will probably give Newfoundland a break and give Newfoundland what it is due so it can sell its resources in Canada and in the United States. That is an issue around which the Quebec government can very skillfully convince Quebeckers that a federal system is against their direct interest. It may not be against their indirect interests as citizens of Canada but it can be against their interests strictly as Quebeckers. That is why the federal government has a duty and a responsibility to make sure that on the question of the future of Quebec the federal government must ask that question of Quebeckers as much as their provincial government will.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude on that point. Some people say that it is up to the Quebec people to decide their own fate. I heard a member make that comment this afternoon, I do not argue against that, naturally, because it will be mostly up to Quebeckers to decide.

But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that I am a Francophone, and like other Canadians also, I have a right to speak to Quebeckers before they make up their minds because a part of Quebec belongs to me, my own history is rooted in Quebec and I have always felt that the fact that Quebec was the stronghold of the Francophone community in North America, in Canada, has inspired me personally and politically.

Mr. Speaker, French speakers outside Quebec have something to say on this matter; I am not suggesting that we tell Quebeckers that they are not able to make their own decision, but rather that I have the right to speak to them before they give their final word. In that sense, the bill that we are debating today is important because of the authority it would give the federal government, and parliament—in spite of what the Leader of the Opposition was saying this afternoon, to mislead the people—to decide when and how a referendum would be held, first on the future of Quebec, if necessary, but also on constitutional reform. I categorically oppose the Leader of the Opposition's attitude and position when he says that if two or three provinces want to boycott the progress of constitutional reform in Canada parliament should accept that. Parliament has something to say in this regard, and this is an important bill, Mr. Speaker, which concerns not only a referendum on the future of Quebec but also possible referenda on consitutional reform. We must not let those who want to destroy Canada impede the reform of Canadian political institutions, because those people want to use the diversity of Canada, which should be our strength, to destroy the country. That is what they want to do.

Mr. Speaker, we have the responsibility as a federal government, as a federal parliament, because in this parliament there are people from all over the country who spend days, weekends, weeks or election campaigns to go and persuade Canadians in all parts of the country to elect them to sit in this parliament, and I do not accept at all the idea that only the provincial governments can speak on behalf of the Canadian people.

Each hon. member is elected here to speak on behalf of Canadians, and if at a certain time partisan provincial politicians are only thinking about the future of their own province and if, on the other hand, we see, as it is the case in Quebec today, a government which wants to isolate Quebeckers around their language and their culture, which is bad for the future of Canada, it is our responsibility to have a mechanism enabling us to go and ask the people of Quebec what they want, to ensure that the context in which that question is asked will favour those who want to fight for the unity of Canada, not only in a context which will favour those who want to dismantle the country. That is the danger. And the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) talks about respecting Canada's diversity. He says the government's attitude on the constitutional reform, on the subject matter of this bill, is dangerous because it does not respect Canada's diversity. I asked him this afternoon: Diversity at what price? Diversity until when? Diversity to what extent?

There is a danger of too strong a decentralization and of too strong a concern over this diversity, when one relies only on provincial governments to express this diversity, it is dangerous, it is naive, it is irresponsible. Each and every member of parliament represents the diversity of Canadians, wherever he may sit in the House. Where are these people elected? Where do they exercize their political ability? In any part of the country. We express here the diversity of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, for Quebec's future as well as for constitutional reform, we need a tool which will enable us to go to Canadians and ask them: What do you want? Do you want what your provincial government proposes? If, as I was saying a moment ago, a provincial government wants to hinder the constitutional reform, for their own reasons, should we, as the federal parliament, accept this? I say no, Mr. Speaker, and I would like those who pretend to be speaking in favour of a strong and united country to say the same.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate on Bill C-9, an act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada. The most important words in that title are "relating to the Constitution of Canada." The title of the bill must be read in conjunction with what is being put forward, as stated so eloquently by our national leader this afternoon.

I have just finished listening to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). I noticed that in most of his speech he was very critical. His aim in presenting his argument on unity and on this bill was to hurl reproaches and recriminations at the Conservative party rather than getting down to what is in the bill and under study this evening. It will not be my purpose in speaking tonight to hurl reproaches and recriminations at the Liberals, only to allude to one.

Since 1963 under Pearson that party was the government. Since 1968 under Trudeau they have been in the government. Prior to that time the question of unity was not in the form of confrontation and disunity that we have today. Regardless of what they say, they must bear some responsibility for the status of this issue in Canada at the present time.

At the outset I would like to read the most important part of the bill, and this was dealt with by our leader this afternoon when dealing with the title of the bill, the Constitution of Canada and how far it goes. I quote from clause 2:

> "Constitution of Canada" includes, without limiting the meaning of that expression,
> (a) the customs, conventions and enactments that comprise the Constitution of Canada,—

Our leader mentioned the various customs and precedents of parliament. The traditions and customs that crystallize the democratic process we have in this country should be one of the terms and matters placed before the people of Canada.

The word "enactments" in the bill means any bill that has been enacted by this parliament, whether it be the Bill of Rights or any other bill.

The point that bears emphasis, and I draw the attention of the chamber to this, is the political and judicial institutions and processes of Canada. The political institutions are the institutions of this parliament. The judicial institutions are all the other parts of our democratic system. That means this bill is really a general referendum bill. That is the complaint our party is placing on record in this debate. We are not against a referendum in any shape or form if the matter placed before the Canadian people is a special act or a special matter rather than on general matters. Therein lies the difference in the position between our leader and our party and the arguments from the other side.

One of the first things we must do is look at the word constitution as defined in the bill. What are we really talking about? I would like to put a couple of definitions on record before getting to the meat of what I intend to say about this bill. What does the word constitution mean? I would like to read from a book by J. D. Whyte and W. R. Lederman, "Canadian Constitutional Law". I quote:

> The word constitution . . . means the document in which are set out the rules governing the composition, powers and methods of operation of the main institutions of government, and the general principles applicable to their relations to the citizens.

That is a very good, succinct, and brief definition of what the word constitution means. There are other definitions. There is the definition of Salmond in "Jurisprudence", and I quote:

> Constitutional law is, as its name implies, the body of those legal rules which determine the constitution of the state.

That means the physical make-up of this country, which is exactly what our constitution is all about.

There is another definition by Dicey, which I will put on record at the same time:

> Constitutional law . . . appears to include all rules which directly or indirectly affect the distribution or the exercise of the sovereign power in the state.

I wish to deal with three aspects. First, I will deal with the make-up of our country. I will then give some historical background. I heard some this afternoon from the hon. member for Gloucester and from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Collenette). What really is the make-up of this country? As I have said on many occasions in this chamber, we are not made up of provinces totally, although there are ten provinces in our present system. We are made up of regions.

We are all part of all that we are. Each is needed by the other, and nothing is good alone. The prairie provinces have certain ideas about this country. The Pacific province of British Columbia has certain ideas. Ontario has certain fundamental ideas about it. I have listened to many speeches in this House, not only in this debate but in others. Quebec certainly has some definite ideas about the make-up of Canada, and so it should. The Atlantic provinces naturally have certain ideas.

I listened to the reproaches and recriminations hurled across the aisle this afternoon. I will not engage in that. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) made a very learned, reasonable and, I might say, low key speech on this issue. We live in a healthy climate. Canadians from region to region present their arguments and positions. We are all part of the environment.

I listened today to the hon. member for York East. He talked about being born in the United Kingdom. Well, many of us have roots there. But there is a difference he does not seem to appreciate and I should like to put it on record. It is plain, it is easy. Most of us understand it, but sometimes one has to argue from a known premise when one is developing an idea. It is that we are operating under a federal system. How did that system come about? We did not unite as a country, that is, the provinces of Canada, Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, just because we all loved one another—though no doubt, we respected one another's rights. We came about as a nation because of the growth of North America. At that time there was springing up to the south a very strong nation, one of the strongest in the western world, the United States—and thank goodness it is strong. So we were able to compromise.

As I read history, John A. Macdonald felt at the beginning that we should establish a legislative union. What is a legislative union? A legislative union is one where all powers are centralized in one government and then delegated to the various provinces and municipalities. A federal union is a central government with delegated authority under the distribution of powers, other powers being delegated to the provinces so that each area will have its say. Therein lies the difference between legislative and federal union. And when Macdonald and Cartier, an English-speaking Canadian on one hand and a French-speaking Canadian on the other, recognized that the four areas I have mentioned should come together as a nation, they came together under a compromise arrangement because each was able to make concessions; we were able to bring this country together by uniting the four provinces I have mentioned, and later the other regions came in, one after another.

If we were able to accomplish this without a referendum, do we need the kind of referendum which the government is proposing? I am not against a referendum, but do we need the kind of general referendum which would allow us as a parliament to make a decision? I want to ask this further question: do we, as a parliament, really make the decision? I say it is the cabinet which draws up the questions. Ministers draft the questions and bring them before parliament, knowing full well at this time that they command a majority and that they may have some help from the New Democratic Party which, as I understand it, is split this afternoon. So it is the government which will set the questions, and that is what I call a general referendum and that is what I am complaining about in connection with the bill before us.

We want the people to have their say. We believe in conferences, we believe in consultation. The government has held many conferences with the provinces in connection with confederation. Those who took part were not able to agree, but they agreed on some things, and arrangements are presently in hand for the holding of a further conference in February. Now we are to have a general referendum. Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada certainly want to have their say, if they are asked specific questions and if those questions could be brought before parliament by way of a special act in which they would be set up. Some people in this country believe there should be a referendum on the issue of capital punishment—yes or no. I see an hon. member over there shake his head. Maybe he would not want that kind of referendum to be held.

I say that if there is to be a special referendum asking, say, a question concerning the distribution of powers as between the federal and provincial governments, let the question be placed specifically before parliament by way of a special act. This was done at the time of prohibition, and the same was done on the conscription issue. Canadians would then know where they stood. But to give the government the power to hold a general referendum whereby they themselves draft the questions is unacceptable. I am reminded of the question, "Have you stopped beating your wife?" If you say yes, you are wrong. If you say no, you are wrong. And then members opposite say, "Of course, parliament is going to decide."

Well, Mr. Speaker, parliament is going to decide, because we are allowed 40 hours of debate in parliament, and they were not even content with putting the guillotine rule of 40 hours into force. They even told the Senate they had to shape up in 40 hours, too. And then you know what it means, Mr. Speaker. They say parliament decides. Ladies and gentlemen, it is all decided nicely in the back rooms, to use an expression which one hon. member used this afternoon—somebody accused the Conservatives of back room tactics; well, if they did use some back room tactics they had some great teachers over there. So what is going to happen? The government is going to draft the questions. It is going to make a political ploy, and that is not what we are prepared to accept in this bill at this stage. That is why we intend to vote against it.

To get back to the question of a federal union, the issue can again be put in simple terms. All those matters that are common to Canadians in the ten provinces from coast to coast are matters for the central government, and all those that are local are matters for the provincial governments. Of course there is always some overlapping. It would take me a couple of hours in which to read even a summary of the cases on the Constitution of Canada which have been decided in the last 30 years. They have gone to the Supreme Court of Canada, and some of the earlier ones have been referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. When I see before me wording such as I have read to the House with reference to the Constitution of Canada—and meaning the constitution as defined by this bill, not by the definition I have read in Dicey or Jennings—I, as a Canadian, become very concerned and I think every Canadian who listens to the speech I am making now will be most concerned, wherever he or she may live.

As I have mentioned, only two referenda have been held. There was one on prohibition in 1928, and Quebec voted against the idea. I might say that had I taken part I would have voted against it too. I say this because prohibition did more to undermine the morals of this country than anything else has done.

An hon. Member: Drink Canada dry!

Mr. Woolliams: One of my friends tried that and he died at the age of 45. He was the mayor of Calgary.

The next was held under the Dominion Plebiscite Act of 1942. Approximately 2,945,000 Canadians said yes to conscription and 1,643,000 said no. Again, Quebec took a position different from that taken by the rest of Canada—I am making nothing of that except to emphasize, and in this I agree with our chief spokesman on the subject before us, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, that this was divisive. Prohibition was divisive, and I would point out that these were particular subjects, not general subjects such as are involved in the present case. What we are trying to do now, as I understand it, is to develop a theory and a policy which will bring the country together, not divide it. Although the conscription issue was raised 30 or more years ago, it is still one which leaves deep scars in the memory of people in the province of Quebec.

Why is this divisive? It would pit region against region. What do I mean by that? Geoffrey Stevens was quite complimentary to our party in this regard. I am reading from the Globe and Mail:

> The Government says its intention is to restrict referendums to constitutional propositions, but the words "political and judicial institutions and processes" lead Conservative Critic Flora MacDonald to argue that the bill would allow referendums, for example, on abolishing preliminary hearings or liquidating the Parliamentary Press Gallery—

As our national leader said.

> Nor is there anything to prevent the federal Government from ordering referendums on constitutional matters which are wholly within provincial responsibility—to take extreme examples, the transfer of Alberta oil or Ontario schools to federal jurisdiction.

My New Democratic friends behind me are heckling me, but I do not mind. I know that they are split. They should have a talk with Mr. Blakeney, the premier of Saskatchewan, because I agree with Mr. Blakeney. He believes the resources of Saskatchewan belong to Saskatchewan, and we in Alberta believe that the resources of Alberta belong to Alberta. I am sure my friends from Quebec and Ontario and other parts of Canada believe that the resources of Quebec belong to Quebec and the resources of Ontario belong to Ontario. So I say that this legislation would pit region against region.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Are you speaking for the provincial governments?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to listen to the hon. member, but I hope he will just quiet down and give me a chance to make my speech. After I sit down I will listen quietly to him. There is one thing I have noticed about the hon. member, and that is his ability to make a lot of noise without making a lot of sense.

This bill would also pit race against race. That is exactly what happened with regard to the conscription issue. The bill would pit religion against religion and culture against culture.

Mr. Boulanger: Come on.

Mr. Woolliams: I see that the Liberal whip is worried about his members. This bill would pit political cunning against common sense and judgment.

Mr. Lang: Don't you trust the people?

Mr. Woolliams: I trust the people, but the people do not trust this Liberal government.

This bill would pit family against family and friend against friend.

Mr. Lang: And people against people.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister is right. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) comes from my province and was dean of the law school I attended. I do not know whether I was lucky or not; I graduated before his time. He knows as well as I do that when we deal with sensitive issues relating to people, religion, regions, race or culture, there is a virus of dislike, hatred and bigotry which always hovers in the dark. Perhaps it is not great, but it is there in every nation, and it is here in our nation. Let us not hide the fact that all that is needed is a spark to ignite a flame, and this general referendum legislation may be the spark which will ignite the flame of bigotry and hatred. As a Canadian I do not want to see that.

Mr. Boulanger: Try to be nice for a change.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know what to say to the Liberal whip.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is not the whip.

Mr. Woolliams: If he is not the whip, he is the acting whip.

It seems that hon. members opposite do not like to hear the truth. This kind of referendum legislation in such a general and broad sense would undermine the whole principle of responsible government. I repeat that we in my party are not against a specific referendum on a specific subject, but we are dealing with constitutional law. My friend says we should be nice. I remind him that there are thousands of cases reported in the book I have in my hand. In the book there are decisions on phrases and words with regard to provincial and federal jurisdiction. The constitution is interpreted in this book.

We are dealing with a very serious matter. Let us suppose we put out a ballot as big as this book by Lederman and Whyte. The Minister of Transport should know Mr. Lederman. Mr. Lederman was a Rhodes Scholar from our university. He became the dean of the law school at Queen's University. If we put such a ballot before the people, they would be up day and night.

I feel that this legislation is a political ploy. Hon. members opposite keep asking us about our policy. I have told them where we stand on this subject. Hon. members opposite say we do not have all the answers. I will be honest and fair, which we must be on this subject. I have not met one Canadian in the academic field, or even in that great Liberal party, who has all the answers to the question of national unity. However, we over here have some answers, and we are prepared to give them to the House. We are prepared to stand on principle with regard to national unity policies. The fires of disunity are being rekindled all around us by none other than the Trudeau government and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself. The Prime Minister is a great actor; I cannot take that from him but, like a fireman, he is attempting to put out bonfires for political expediency in an effort to be re-elected at this time when he is in trouble. He is in trouble because, as hon. members opposite know, economically speaking this country has never been in the shape it is now, even during the depression.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Woolliams: An hon. member says "rubbish". Let him stand in his place and tell us when the dollar was—

Mr. Lang: And tell us when Canadians were better off.

Mr. Woolliams: C. D. Howe said that.

Mr. Lang: It was John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Now the Minister of Transport tells us that Canadians are well off. The minister should tell that to our one million unemployed. Political expediency is what this government is all about.

Any number of questions could be put in a referendum. A referendum could decide whether the great bread basket of the prairies should be turned over to Canada. A referendum could decide what should take place in the maritimes. Let us face reality; the power in Canada is located in central Canada because that is where the majority of our population is located. I believe Ontario members will now make up 98 seats in this House. Western Canada will return the same number as Quebec, but Ontario will return 98. There could be a question as to whether the Atlantic provinces should unite into one province. Perhaps the people of Ontario would say that is a good idea. Perhaps the people of the prairies might agree.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The province of Prince Edward Island is a great province. It was one of the first to join confederation after the initial four provinces, but Prince Edward Island has less population than three of the constituencies separate and apart in the city of Calgary or in Toronto. In a general referendum this question could be put to the people. Such a move might be a tax saver. By nature man takes care of himself at the right time, and people would vote accordingly. This bill would descriminate against small population regions. People in those regions would be the ones to suffer as a result of any general referendum legislation of this kind.

I would like to deal for a few moments with a few clauses of the bill. I have referred to political and judicial institutions an processes of Canada being in the form of the Constitution of Canada. Does that mean we will have a referendum to change all the courts? The administration of justice is under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and criminal law falls under the jurisdiction of the federal government. Will there be a general referendum to say that all courts must be federal courts? The government talks about centralization, so that question could be put. I do not know what Canadians would do about it. I would think they would vote against it, but that question could be put easily.

That resolution or motion coming in for debate for 40 hours, with the guillotine falling, was drawn up by the Liberal federal cabinet. It will be a Liberal question put to the electorate to help the government elect itself, if the referendum were held at the same time as the next federal election. That is what this political ploy is all about.

Referring to Bill C-9, clause 3(1) reads as follows:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that any question relating to the Constitution of Canada or relating to or arising out of a proposed or possible change in the Constitution of Canada is of sufficient importance to warrant obtaining the opinion of electors on that question, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, direct that the opinion of electors be obtained—

Who has that power? Not my party, not the New Democratic Party, not the Social Credit party, but the party in power right now which has gone by its mandate because it is too frightened to call an election. That is the party which will draft those questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Then, how does the procedure work? I know hon. members opposite do not like what I am saying, particularly those who have not read the bill. It is unnerving to find out how horrible something is which they have not yet read. The bill continues:

> (5) No proclamation may be issued under subsection (1)
> (a) during any period that the House of Commons stands dissolved—

Thank goodness for some small mercy. It continues:

> (b) later than 45 days after the text of the order in council authorizing the issuance of the proclamation has been approved by a resolution of both Houses of parliament.

Mr. Reid: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I hear the new minister saying, "Oh, oh." He was not here for the original debate. He knows, as well as I, the process of government. He is not a child. He knows the Liberal party has the majority. The Liberals draft the motion, bring it to parliament, in 40 hours it becomes law, and in 40 hours it becomes law through the Senate. That is what we are debating tonight, and that is what we are against. We are against the breadth and width of the bill and the political ploy of the Liberal party in reference to this legislation.

The bill continues:

4. An order in council authorizing the issuance of a proclamation under subsection 3(1) shall not be made until a motion setting forth the text of the order in council—

Then clause 5(1) reads as follows:

—praying that the text of the order in council set forth in the motion be approved, shall be debated for not more than 40 hours—

When there is a time limit on debate, no matter what the issue, it would not matter what we on this side of the House said or what Canadians might say to the government. In 40 hours the guillotine falls. The question is put, and the Liberals stand together, men and women together, and they say that Canadians have been able to speak through a referendum which they put to Canadians in the question they wanted, in the language they wanted, and with the inference they wanted to draw therefrom. It is the same operation in the Senate, and on it goes. That is the reason we are against this bill in its present form.

An hon. Member: What is your suggestion?

Mr. Woolliams: I have told the House what our suggestion is. Sometimes it is similar to dealing with a mule. In order to get something through its head, you must get its attention. As I said, we believe a specific question, whether it is a matter dealing with the constitution or something other than the constitution, should be put to Canadians. It should be a specific question, not a general composition on the constitution about which even the great experts do not agree.

I should like to refer again to the remarks of Geoffrey Stevens in this regard. He said the following:

—Why should referenda be restricted to provinces which have rejected a federal constitutional amendment? Why, in the interest of consistency, should not people whose provincial governments have accepted a federal proposal have the same opportunity to overrule their elected representatives? Or is the object simply to give Ottawa a second chance?

He continued:

Similarly, the government, with all the fervor of a new convert, is preaching what a good thing it is to consult the people.

That will be something new. He continued:

Okay. But if consultation is such a good thing, why not make the verdict binding?

Let me pause there. After all the expense of a referendum and playing with the people like dollies, asking them for their opinions, then what happens? It is similar to Mackenzie King with conscription. He said, "Conscription when necessary but not necessarily conscription". Do hon. members remember that? That is exactly what he said, after spending several millions of taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. MacFarlane: He was right, and that is important.

Mr. Woolliams: I suppose the argument of the Minister of Transport would be this: referendum when politically expedient, but not necessarily accept the message of the people if it is found to be politically inexpedient. I imagine that would be the minister's position.

Mr. Stevens continued:

Why not allow the people, by petition, to force a referendum?

The government rejects spending limits on political parties, on the ground that they would produce infringements of freedom of expression and association. Why, then, are spending limits imposed on candidates and parties in federal elections?

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) has expressed some interesting thoughts. I should like to take a look at some of the comments he made when he presented the bill. As reported in Hansard, he said the following:

This bill is being introduced by the government at a critical time in Canada's history.

I could not agree with the minister more.

He continued:

I am sure all hon. members recognize its potential importance. The bill provides the framework which would permit parliament to approve that referenda be held on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, where that includes all the conventions and enactments of the constitution as well as the political and judicial processes of Canada.

That covers the entire field. Then he said:

I want to deal with three themes in my remarks today: first, the need for the bill,—

Do we need the bill in this form prior to the constitutional conference which is coming up? Do we need this bill at a very sensitive and tender time in the life of our nation? Do we need it at a time when the task force has spoken out? Those are the questions I should like answered.

—second, its implications for parliamentary democracy and for federal-provincial relations—

How many times have we risen in our places because the federal government became involved in an area of provincial jurisdiction? How many times has the federal government thrust a program on the provinces, leaving them with the money burden of paying for it?

An hon. Member: After they got the votes.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

The minister continued as follows:

—and third, the principles underlying it as the framework for a democratic procedure.

We would agree to that if it were a special act of parliament dealing with a specific subject, and not in great general terms.

Later on the minister said the following:

Given these enormous changes, we must have the greatest respect for the Fathers of Confederation who drafted our constitution.

● (2100)

As I said, and I remind this government, we did not have a referendum when we came into this Confederation.

The quotation from page 2034 of Hansard continues as follows:

It has served us well and provided the framework for extraordinary accomplishments. But it is necessary that Canadians look carefully at this constitutional legislation to ask whether, after a century, the time has not come to renew our most basic law.

I suggest he has overlooked something. In 1867 the BNA Act came forward, but what happened after that? The growth of our country did not stop there. We then had the Manitoba Act which formed part of Manitoba, and later it became a larger area. Then we had Prince Edward Island coming into Confederation, and then we had the Saskatchewan and Alberta Act of 1905 when they came in. Prior to that time British Columbia came in. Then last, but not least, we had Newfoundland coming in. Newfoundland was mentioned in the original act, but it was the last to come into Confederation. All this has happened in the last 100 years.

There is one thing I have not heard from members of the Liberal party, and I do not think I have heard it in any of the complaints or questions about unity and Confederation. Has anyone ever really pinpointed what is really so bad about the constitution, except for small references to the distribution of powers and financial arrangements? I would tell the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, and I see him smiling, that all of us know that the words used back in 1867 are much like a growing tree; they change with social and economic conditions.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I thought the hon. minister said something. I did not hear what the former dean said.

Mr. Lang: I said, I bet Sankey wished he had said that.

Mr. Woolliams: That is exactly what the judicial committee said in reference to one of the cases that came from Aberhart's government in Alberta. I do not know whether the minister read it. Maybe it was not in one of his lectures to his class, which somebody wrote for him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: You obviously were in law school before my day.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, and that is one thing I always say: Blessed are the lucky.

Mr. Lang: For they shall be Liberal in their hearts.

Mr. Woolliams: Then the minister went on to state:

But the federal government would be able to ask parliament to approve a referendum question if it was confident that a public vote on the question would clarify the desires of the population in regard to constitutional reform.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The government knows that is impossible, and the Minister of Justice has said it is impossible. Even if it were possible, this government would not follow what the people asked for in a referendum of this general nature. That is what I suggest in answer to that argument of the Minister of Justice.

Then the hon. member goes on to say:

Some Canadians, and I respect their views—

I do not know whether he respects the views of just some Canadians or just some Liberal Canadian views. In any event he stated:

Some Canadians, and I respect their views, are worried that a law which would enable parliament to approve referendum questions on constitutional matters may have serious implications for either our federal system or our parliamentary democracy. Are they right to be worried?

We have the right to be worried. We have a function here in the official opposition, and that is to point out the facts to the Canadian people about the kind of law upon which we are being asked to vote. I am confident this bill will go to the committee and we will have to make our changes there, if that is possible at the committee level. We all know how the committee system works. If a Liberal member does not get on with the Prime Minister, he is taken off the committee and we do not see him for a week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired. If he wishes to continue he will require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by stating that I regret that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) did not have the opportunity to continue. Perhaps it is time that someone intervened with a couple of points in response to what he has been saying. I should like to begin by trying to put to this House what I believe are some of the facts as they relate to this referendum bill. I do so having sat through the speech of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) this afternoon, a speech which left me convinced that either the man does not understand what is going on in the province of Quebec or, if he does, he is not prepared to face it on a flat open basis, with statements or assertions with which he and we can stand during an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaker: Easy now. I can stick it even much further. In the meantime, I am trying to do it gently enough so that you will understand something about the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Blaker: I will be glad to explain if you will give me a minute. The hon. member for Calgary North referred to one of the members on this side as being somewhat like a mule because he could not get the point. Without using such rough language I want to try to make a point to the hon. member for Calgary North, with whom I might say I have often sat and had the pleasure and the honour of conversation on this subject matter. I am not going to repeat our private conversations, but I am going to say publicly what I then said to him privately.

The hon. member says the problem with this referendum legislation is that it does not provide for specific questions. I do not want to go all the way back to the Viscount Hall days and the Privy Council decisions in the 1800s to instruct the hon. member on a little history, because he only needs to go back to 1976 when Mr. René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois were voted into power. They were voted into power for a very simple reason. One very bright gentleman by the name of Claude Morin realized that if you distinguished the question of separation, putting that aside and promising the people in the province of Quebec that the order of the day was only good government and there would be a referendum put separately, with no separation simply by virtue of the election of the Parti Québécois, the people would accept them. As a result we got a Parti Québécois government. We have a party many of whose members declare that the position now taken, called sovereignty association, is not strong enough and that in fact, as Pierre Bourgault said recently, the current leaders of the Parti Québécois will have to go and be replaced by somebody who is prepared to offer full sovereignty on the basis of a declaration with no referendum.

The hon. member for Calgary North must be aware of the game being played by the Parti Québécois regarding the subject of the word "separatism". What does it mean? What does "independence" mean? What does "sovereignty association" mean? The hon. member says the answer to this referendum legislation is the posing of a specific question. He says the problem is that we are not asking a specific question. It is very easy to understand why that is so. We cannot get the Parti Québécois to ask a specific question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: The proposition put forward by the Conservative party in this debate is that we are far better to trust the governments of all of the provinces including the Parti Québécois in the province of Quebec. What can I say to those of you who do not live or reside in that province? We have heard the words "separatism", "independence", and "sovereignty association". We have seen them manoeuvred and manipulated week after week after week. Of course we are not sure that the Parti Québécois is going to ask the question honestly. Since we do not know what they are going to ask or how they are going to ask it, we want a simple piece of legislation that gives us the manœuvring room within which to ask the right question. That is not hard to understand.

• (2110)

The hon. member for Calgary North, as did his leader this afternoon, said that this kind of general legislation is a direct threat to Canadians at large and that it is a direct threat to the provinces. The hon. member for Calgary North has said that this might mean the loss of the national resources in each of the provinces. The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon said that minorities will be endangered or could be endangered by this legislation. Where has the Leader of the Opposition been? The minorities in Canada are endangered right now.

Mr. Alexander: Who has been in power for the past ten years, and what are you doing about it?

Mr. Blaker: I will answer the hon. member's question about being in power for the last ten years, in one minute.

Mr. Alexander: Answer it then.

Mr. Blaker: The hon. member will be sorry when I do.

There are approximately one million Anglophones in the province of Quebec who are wondering just whether or not they will be remaining Canadians. While the member for Calgary North and his leader argue the power of provinces, we on this side make it very clear, "My civil rights and your civil rights as a Canadian ought to be applicable from one coast to another and never subjected to the whim and varying changes of party governments in one province or another."

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Blaker: No, he cannot ask a question. Have a seat.

Mr. Alexander: When you talk about minorities, let's hear about all of them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Alexander: Don't talk about the provinces. Talk about all of the minorities in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wish to remind the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) has the floor.

Mr. Alexander: I am terribly sorry, sir; he made me nervous.

Mr. Blaker: I imagine I do make the hon. gentleman nervous, and I will make him more nervous in a moment. Perhaps the hon. member does not understand because their members do not fit in any of the categories called minority.

Mr. Alexander: You might as well sit down now.

Mr. Blaker: The proposition put by the Leader of the Opposition is that French-speaking people in the province of Ontario ought to rely on the government of Ontario for the enforcement of their civil rights and that English language

Canadians in the province of Quebec ought to rely on the government of Quebec for enforcement of their civil rights. The proof of the matter is that the provinces will not guarantee those civil rights and, therefore, we would like a referendum that is wide enough to ensure that the meaning of being a Canadian and that one's civil rights will be guaranteed from one end of the land to the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition said that his party had a clear understanding of where they are going. I find that very interesting. He accused the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) of not understanding, and he practically said the latter could not follow the Conservative position. I want to plead guilty, because I do not follow it either, and I think that there are many other people on the floor of this House who cannot follow it. I know that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), the former mayor of Toronto, cannot seem to follow their position. I know for sure that the Conservative candidate in my riding does not follow it, because no sooner did he hear the statements made about negotiating or not negotiating with the Parti Québécois and about Claude Ryan "being a theologian, therefore it is better to deal with René Lévesque," than he rushed into print to say, "some Conservatives don't share those opinions." I do not blame him, because if I were in his position I would be worried too.

The Leader of the Opposition said that it is regrettable that the newly elected member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) did not explain just why it is that he believes a referendum will never become necessary. I cannot speak for the hon. member for Westmount, but I would like to state what, surely, is obvious. If our federal referendum is broadly enough based and well enough worded in terms of the opportunities to put in the words we need, then all the more reason for the Parti Québécois to word its referendum so that the federal referendum will not have to be used. That is another reason why we need a wide-power referendum, because if we restrict ourselves, as the hon. member for Calgary North has suggested, to a single question now, the premier of the province of Quebec would fall over laughing and devise a question in order to get around our own question.

We do not want a referendum. Nobody who appreciates British parliamentary practice likes or wants a referendum, but we don't know what the best other response is to the fact that the country is beginning to divide amongst itself. We are not sure how the Quebec referendum will be handled, so we need a weapon in our arsenal to face this kind of separation challenge.

I will be very interested to hear the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). We may differ in our perceptions of how the bill ought to be worded, but surely, as two people faced with the same problem, we will not differ as to its seriousness.

An. hon. Member: He would have a different solution, I suspect.

Mr. Blaker: If I could hear one solution from the members opposite upon which they all agree, I would happily go to election the following day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: The Leader of the Opposition and the members opposite say that the danger of this kind of broadly worded legislation is that somehow or other the federal government will deke or mislead the people. If these members are truly afraid that legislation worded so widely could confuse or mislead the people, then why do they seem to have so much confidence that the same widely worded legislation in the province of Quebec will not deliberately confuse the people? We wind up with the Conservative party sometimes flipping to negotiating with the province of Quebec on separation, sovereignty or whatever, and sometimes flipping back.

I would like to tell the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who, I believe, had a question about where we are all going, that unless the Conservative party, which now has two seats in the province of Quebec, settles on a response to the threat of national unity, it will have no seats in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Grafftey: How many seats do you have in Alberta? Not one.

An hon. Member: We have one.

Mr. Blaker: I would like to refer again to the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the question of this referendum being used, in his words, "to blackmail the provinces." The provinces are legal jurisdictions and creations of the British North America Act. Surely it is not too difficult to understand that as legal and political jurisdictions they come after people. If we put a referendum to the people of Canada, are the member for Calgary North and the Leader of the Opposition afraid that somehow the results of that referendum will be so misleading and so confusing that they will do damage to these legal structures, the political institutions called provinces?

The hon. member for Calgary North has said that it may cost the people of Alberta their natural resources. He must have absolutely no faith in the people who put him in parliament if he thinks that they are so stupid that they will give up their natural resources in a referendum.

I would like to invite members of the Conservative party to take a position. I heard the leader of that party say this afternoon that the Pepin-Robarts report has a lot to be said for it and that this government has for years and years produced a situation which has caused the breakup of national unity. If this government, the Liberal Party of Canada, is the cause of so much difficulty in the province of Quebec and is the cause of national disunity, then how come there are going to be 72 Liberal seats out of 74 seats in the province of Quebec in the next election? Every single Conservative knows that. How come the very same people, the French Canadians and the minority English Canadians in the province of Quebec, are massively voting for the Liberal party according to every poll that has been taken? We must have really pulled the wool over their eyes.

I said that I wanted to finish on the subject matter of the Conservative party position on the Pepin-Robarts commission. I want to go to the next election, and I want something very clear from the Conservative party. I want to be able to quote each and every member who is prepared to stand up and say that they agree with Pepin-Robarts and that the civil rights of Canadians ought to be governed by the provinces. I want to hear the Conservatives say that.

What I am saying, and as far as I know what every member of this government is saying, is that we think the purpose of a nation state is to serve the citizens. The best thing any nation state can do for any citizen is to make sure it is the servant of the citizen and not the master. The only way that can be ensured is by having civil rights enshrined in a constitution. We want civil rights in a nationwide constitution. I would be delighted to hear a Conservative member of parliament stand up and say he wants civil rights to come within the jurisdiction of the provinces. That is why we want a referendum, Mr. Speaker. If the ladies and gentlemen opposite say that referendum is too widespread, that is fine. May they look back, when the referendum is held, and say thank God that referendum was wide enough so that at least the federal government was able to run a referendum that was honest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, first I have to say that as a good Canadian I was very sad while listening to the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker). I do not exaggerate and this goes beyond any political consideration.

[English]

The hon. member who just spoke said that he would happily fight an election on the question of national unity. Let me warn this House that if another election is fought on the question of national unity in a partisan way, it is my sober judgment that it will be a very hollow victory, because I am not sure we will have a country after that kind of election that is worth governing. The hon. member opposite would happily have—

[Translation]

—yes, that is quite sad. We will be pleased to—

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to preserve the rights of all members in a serious debate like this. The hon. member opposite will have his chance to speak, although he rarely speaks in this House.

[Translation]

You will try to call an election on the historic issue of national unity, but let me remind you that the next election will be fought on the financial management of our country.

[English]

I am not fooling myself. Just take the pulse of the people and the next election is going to be waged on the fact—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: The only reason I am running is to get rid of the worst government the Canadian people have had since confederation. The other reason is we have such a great leader on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I have seen hon. members opposite trying to orchestrate an election on the question of national unity. Make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker, the next election is going to be waged on the issue of the economic mismanagement of this country by hon. members opposite.

The hon. member who just spoke alluded to the fact that he wanted the referendum authority from the federal authority as an arsenal, so to speak, in the federal kit. Was this a Freudian slip? Is he looking into the future, as I am, vis-à-vis the possibility of a federal government saying it has its referendum in its arsenal to fight Mr. Levesque's referendum? If we continue in that style I am going to choose my words very carefully.

Mr. Pelletier: Just negotiate.

Mr. Grafftey: I am not ready to talk about negotiating, but if we get into a situation——where we have a federal referendum against a provincial referendum, can you imagine what the results would be of such a confrontation in our province?

[English]

I am going to deal with that later. I will debate this as I go on tonight, but I categorically say that by admitting that any referendum, be it federal or provincial, has the validity to bring this union to an end is to admit the negotiability of the union called Canada. That is the bottom line of this debate. I say it was a Freudian slip when the hon. member said he wanted the referendum authority for the federal authority.

Mr. Blaker: I meant—

Mr. Grafftey: I do not care what the hon. member meant, speaking from behind the curtain. It is what he said that is important. If we get into a situation as between the federal and provincial referenda on this question, at least in my province, I will tell the House later what I think the results are going to be.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, 112 years ago, the Fathers of our Canadian Confederation met to unite those two Canadas and lay the foundation of confederation. One thing is sure: they were members of various political parties, and came from different areas of the country.

[English]

It goes without saying that the Fathers of Confederation 112 years ago, coming as they did from different political parties and different regions of the country, were obviously proud and were loyal to the various regions from which they came. In a spirit of bipartisan statesmanship and broad vision, however, they gave birth to this country that we today call Canada. I am sure that the one message the Fathers of Confederation would give to us in this House today would be that we should reincarnate that spirit, that bipartisan statesmanship and broad vision—we should bury the hatchet to a certain extent and get on with building a new Canada. We must bury the hatchet and speak together about one Canada.

We are not going to agree on all points, of course. I am as guilty of it as the next person, but quite often I do not like the atmosphere there is in this House. I think each and every one of us in this House is a good Canadian. No one is better than the other. No one indispensable man is going to save this union. No one party is indispensable. If, in a spirit of partisanship, we continue yelling across the floor to each other on this issue, and possibly having a referendum on it, only one person is going to be laughing on his way to the referendum, and that is René Lévesque.

Maybe we have the fathers and mothers of the new confederation sitting in this House today, Mr. Speaker. I think we do. I have friends on both sides of this House who are capable of exhibiting the kind of statesmanship and determination that is going to set this country on new roads. The Fathers of Confederation would be the first to tell us——to work together here in the House of Commons. In the broader sense of the word, a constitution is, let us say, a political document, in the best sense of the word. But it seems to me, in view of the challenge we now face as Canadian politicians, that we must work together, in the real sense of the word, towards a renewed federalism.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me say that it will be very difficult for me to discuss openly what will follow here in the House of Commons, but I start my speech with a deep sense of responsibility as the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi whose population is about 75 per cent Francophone and 25 per cent Anglophone, a riding where the two linguistic groups of our country live together, as in Sherbrooke, in a true spirit of national unity.

Mr. Béchard: In Bonaventure too.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: In Bonaventure also. Along the coast of the Gaspé Peninsula, in Bonaventure and several other places. That is proof.

● (2130)

[English]

The eastern townships, Bonaventure and other parts of the province, are not necessarily typical as opposed to those areas that are unilingual, be they unilingual French-speaking or English-speaking, but through our historical evolution, be it social, political, economic or constitutional, the people in my part of the world, as the hon. member opposite just said, like in many parts of Quebec, have learned to live together in a true, constructive, and positive spirit of national unity.

National unity in debates like this is quite difficult for me to talk about. It is something that for years people in my part of the country have felt deeply about and deeply believed in. It has dominated our political activities.

[Translation]

And I am proud, as is the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) to represent here, in this House of Commons, such a spirit of national unity. But that spirit demands, Mr. Speaker, the word is slightly more English, I know, that spirit demands leadership.

[English]

What we find in the eastern townships and in my riding is that when Canadians of the two different language groups get to know each other—it is not always easy because of the make-up of our country—it is living proof of what can be done in a true and constructive spirit of Canadians working together in national unity.

Let us have a good open debate about this. I am no better a Canadian than any member opposite, but if I differ in some details—and after all they are only details—my desire to preserve this union we call Canada is no less than theirs. We are not getting the kind of leadership we need if all we can do here today is draft a referendum, or draft legislation for a referendum, or from a federal viewpoint address ourselves to the proposition of a provincial referendum being held and asking Canadians a question which they do not want to be asked. Hon. members may feel I am presumptuous in saying that. I say this for the second time: Why ask the people of Canada a question, the answer to which we already know? Why ask the people a question they do not want us to ask them?

Mr. Speaker, when I took my oath of office here in Ottawa, as an elected member of the House of Commons I promised to preserve national unity directly and indirectly. Together with hon. members from both sides of the House, I promised also to defend and define—or more appropriately under the present circumstances—redefine the federal entity.

[English]

When I was sworn in as a member of Parliament in Ottawa at the beginning of this parliament, I understood directly and indirectly that implicit in being sworn into this House was my promise to the Canadian people at large, and to my constituents in particular, that I was to defend and define—and as the circumstances are here right now, redefine—the federal cause. The people of my constituency never asked me to ask them the most stupid possible question: "Do you Heward, or do the people up in Ottawa want this union to continue?" Continue, my friends, with this legislation and I solemnly warn you in the most bipartisan spirit that you are heading right into a breach of trouble the like of which this country has never seen.

[Translation]

When Churchill, President de Gaulle or Roosevelt were faced with real crises, did they rely on referenda? No! In the best and true meaning of the word, they demonstrated leadership, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Governments are called on to lead. Governments are not asked to cop out of their responsibilities by holding a referendum, the results of which will be horrendous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I say to hon. members opposite that we are ready to work with them. There is one clear message which the Canadian people from coast and from north to south are giving us, and that is that the time has come to renew and update a constitution suited to modern times.

Instead of passing this kind of legislation and instead of heading into the kind of trouble which I do not want to contemplate, especially in my particular part of the world—and I will choose my language later—I plead with hon. members opposite to forget this insanity, reach out across the floor of this House and include us in the debate on constitutional renewal. God only knows that much sooner than later and no matter who is in power after the next election, the whole idea of a plebiscite or a referendum could easily become an academic hypothesis. We are called on to lead.

What is the government asking for in this legislation? Is it asking for vague powers to hold a referendum? When I am asked to address myself to a debate, I want to know the ground rules. I want to know with some modicum of precision what I am asked to do. Is this bill about the desire of the government to change unilaterally our constitutional framework? I do not know. I suspect it is not. Most hon. members are honest and realistic enough to say what this bill is about. It is a specific reaction to what is going on in my province. I ask again what every member from this side of the House has asked since this debate was initiated, if that is the case, why not—

Why did the government not ask us to co-operate to adopt a referendum bill with better defined intentions?

[English]

Sir, at the risk of being redundant and repetitive, something I am told I do far too often, but I guess we are all guilty of doing that—

I urge the right hon. Prime Minister to forget this bill as soon as possible.

[English]

I ask the Prime Minister to forget this legislation. I hope this message will be transmitted to him. My leader has already, directly and indirectly, referred to the chaos that competing federal and provincial referenda would have vis-à-vis the future of this country.

● (2140)

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) referred to past plebiscites. She talked about what the 1928 plebiscite did and what the 1942 plebiscite did vis-à-vis pitting neighbour against neighbour and what it did in terms of setting back the body politic in this country in terms of constructive progress.

This is one of the saddest days in my life as a parliamentarian. It really is. I say this with no partisan gratification; this is a sad day for me. I make no apology for my emotion. I never thought I would see the day when, instead of exercising our prerogative of leadership by defining and defending the federal cause, we would be here discussing a referendum which will ask the Canadian people whether or not they want this nation to continue. What unbelievable foolishness. Let my warning be heard. If we continue on in this foolishness, and you are not going to trick me into using the words I am thinking right now, again I say why?

[Translation]

There is your answer, and it would be difficult to have a scientifically conducted poll in the province and the rest of Canada concerning the intentions of the public about a Quebec being inside or outside our great Canadian family or under the well-known sovereignty association formula.

[English]

We are discussing something in this House that we should not be discussing. We are discussing whether this nation is negotiable by way of referendum, instead of reaching across the floor of this House and joining forces in a bipartisan way to redefine and renew our federal structures. I know that to date—

[Translation]

Have hon. members opposite perhaps already found that out on many occasions? By voting against the bill currently before the House, we do not want to deny the federal government the authority to deal with the referendum Mr. Lévesque wants to hold in the province of Quebec.

[English]

Are we in this House by voting against the bill denying, as the hon. member who spoke before me said, from the federal arsenal a weapon—strong language, eh—that Lévesque already has in his provincial arsenal? Maybe so, but I think not. I cannot influence what is going on in the province of Quebec in terms of whether they are setting up a referendum or what kind of referendum it is going to be.

[Translation]

But in a sense I may be able to influence directly and indirectly those who come to Ottawa. I know one thing, if this atmosphere persists in the House over various policies, as I noted a moment ago, there is only one man who stands to gain and that is René Lévesque, the present premier of Quebec.

[English]

There is one question that is asked of me by members opposite, admittedly by the public, and very often by the press. Where does your party stand on these questions of national unity, constitutional development, and federal-provincial relations? Maybe in some small detail we differ with members opposite. When I think about, as we say in French—

[Translation]

—the main tenets of our policy—

[English]

—we are all together as good Canadians. In committee we can discuss our detailed differences on these issues. However, if we are looking for semantic slips or whatever in order to wage an election on this issue, forget Canada my friends. The Fathers of Confederation never did it. Why should we? The crisis, emergency and challenge facing us are no less than the challenge that faced them. I am often accused of being an alarmist. However, even in my part of the world we have slowly come to the realization that time is not on our side.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was first elected in 1965, I had great admiration for him. I still have a great deal of admiration for him. He is a personal friend. I met him many times in the cafeteria upstairs in this building, knowing that he had the ear of the then prime minister. I told him that I had been in this House for seven years and that I was appalled at the duplication, buck passing and waste as between the federal authorities and the provinces.

Apart from the specific things going on in my province at the time, a succession of Quebec governments were saying this is the last chance for Canada, with varying degrees of nationalistic slogans. I pleaded with the then parliamentary secretary to the prime minister to lend his considerable weight to the urgent demands of the time for immediate constitutional reform. Frankly, he disagreed with me. He said, "Heward, we have a constitution now which provides enough flexibility for what I want to do, and by confrontation with the provinces I would create an atmosphere and mix that would end up in no progress."

We have had 14 years of that kind of confrontation. I am not saying this in a partisan sense, but frankly, Mr. Speaker, every member of this House must realize it has not worked. Nobody can objectively say that it is working very well. The chickens are home to roost and the time has surely come for us to consider that constitutional renewal that we considered 14 years ago. Again I ask, what is the government asking us to pass?

An hon. Member: The bill.

Mr. Grafftey: Does the government want specific power for a specific referendum, or does it want power to alter the constitution unilaterally? There is no substance to this bill. With many members in the past, I have voted against the constitutional implications of orders in council, a bill not having the regulations presented so that we would know the substance of it, or omnibus legislation with many subjects under one heading. The present bill is the final insult. Why not take us into your confidence? What do you want I ask?

[Translation]

What do you want? The legislation under study in the House is so vague that I cannot see its substance.

[English]

It is very difficult to ask responsible members of parliament on either side of the House to pass legislation that is so vague that the substance will only begin to make sense when civil servants, under the instructions of the government of the day, write in regulations. Frankly, this is a very hard bill to debate. It is so vague that we do not know what the government wants.

• (2150)

I have already mentioned the Prohibition Plebiscites Act of 1898.

[English]

Then, as the hon. lady from Kingston and the Islands said in her magnificent speech, came the 1942 conscription issue and, by amendment, the Dominion Plebiscite Act of 1942 actually went as far as to write in the question though leaving the time of the calling of the plebiscite to the government of the day. The question and the intent of the act were clear. What it did in substance to our country is another thing.

[Translation]

After the plebiscite, the prime minister at that time said: conscription if necessary but not necessarily conscription. Today with such a legislation we may be facing another issue, Mr. Speaker: separation if necessary, but not necessarily separation.

[English]

This, Mr. Speaker, is the most disruptive, ambiguous and damaging piece of legislation in this whole area that the government could possibly have brought up. In my appeal for a bipartisan approach to constitutional renewal—I do not think it is too late—let me say this: hon. members opposite should not dignify the validity of referenda, be they federal or provincial, by passing one here in Ottawa. I have no idea what the provincial referendum is going to be in the province of Quebec. I have no idea.

An hon. Member: And you are ready to take the risk?

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: I have spoken with several Parti Québécois MNA's and they cannot define the terms sovereignty-association. I agree that sovereignty is the same thing as independence. You have heard, no doubt, our leader's last statement.

[English]

I issue a solemn warning to members opposite who want to recreate this issue for short time votes. The Fathers of Confederation said that if this country ever broke up regionally along political lines it would take statesmanship of the highest order to bring it together again. I heard an hon. member opposite say that after the next election there would be no members from my party returned from Quebec. Well, I hope that in the next election he comes to my riding and fights against me. The facts are these, Mr. Speaker. It is true we have only two members from the province of Quebec, but how many does the government have from Alberta, how many have they got from the west? One. And I won't tell you how they got that one, Mr. Speaker.

By emphasizing dualism and forgetting regionalism in the last ten years, the government has gone far toward creating the difficulties we presently face. We are all in it together. But the fact is that there are only two of us from Quebec——and not many of you in the western provinces. That is another major reason why we should work together for a renewed federalism.

[English]

Is that true or false?

Some hon. Members: True.

Mr. Grafftey: Is it true or false that because there are only two of us from Quebec, and hardly any of you Liberals from the west, we should stop the nonsense I am listening to in this House and work together for renewed federalism?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: When I say a renewed federalism, I mean this, and I want to be very clear—I am not choosing my words, here they are: the people of Brome-Missisquoi in the province of Quebec have given me no mandate whatever to recognize the validity of any referendum, federal or provincial, to take any part of this country out of the nation called Canada. Is that clear?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) speaking in this debate said the referendum would amount to a sort of sophisticated Gallup poll. The Canadian Press has reported the Prime Minister as saying on many occasions that the result of a federal referendum in Quebec held under the terms of this federal legislation would be binding on the federal government. What nonsense! What is much worse than saying that by talking to a government that has a mandate for sovereignty association we are ready to negotiate.

[Translation]

No referendum, whether provincial or federal, can permit us to put an end to the Canadian union, and I speak on behalf of the whole population of Brome-Missisquoi, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Well, the hon. member says René Lévesque doesn't run there, but I have Péquiste member from one part of my riding and this may possibly answer that question.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) on a point of order.

Mr. Pelletier: I have a question for the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey).

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: I am sorry, but my time is limited. Without drawing a long bow I will attempt to show how ridiculous is what we are attempting to do. In this electronic age it is very arguable that we do not need a House of Commons. I am not going to get into a philosophical debate, as to whether part of the country has a right to secede or the efficacy or lack of efficacy of referenda in a so-called British parliamentary system. But it is a fact of life that in an electronic age, leaving aside Mr. Orwell's 1984, it is highly conceivable that within two hours we could ascertain public opinion on any issue facing the country as a result of people voting from their living rooms. If members want to get into that type of direct democracy, even political parties today could pay for more sophisticated polls than the Gallup polls. You know, Mr. Speaker, and I know it. Electronic polls could be held on any issue.

The most serious plea I have ever made in my public life is to ask members opposite to forget this insanity. It is absolute insanity. I have talked to Canadians of both linguistic groups across my province, and I can only say that by dignifying the validity of referenda along the lines of the bill before us the government will be giving Mr. Lévesque a weapon that he never expected to have. He has said he will continue to hold them provincially until he wins. So let us get together and defend and define the federal cause. We shall be doing that not by asking the people questions they do not wish to be asked but by working together for that degree of constitutional renewal Canadians are seeking.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of addressing this House on the most serious issue on which I have ever expressed myself in this chamber. I trust we can get this debate sooner, rather than later, on a bipartisan road for the good of our country and for the good of the people we are meant to be governing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2200)

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have this opportunity to contribute to this debate, but in view of the time and since the clock will not stop to allow me to say in three minutes what would take much longer, I believe I shall have to limit myself to a few preliminary comments. One of these preliminary comments is in reply to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). Mr. Speaker, I have rarely seen anyone lose himself as completely in side issues as he did when he accused us of wanting to stage an election on a so-called problem of national unity. I suppose he imagines there are no national unity problems in Canada even though Quebec has a government which was elected by proposing an option which would separate Quebec from the rest of Canada. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi solemnly stated in the House of Commons that there is no national unity crisis in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but it is time for the adjournment debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—"THE ROAD AHEAD" CIRCULATED BY FORMER MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the adjournment debate in which I take part tonight arises from an exchange in this House between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and I on December 21 last. At that time I referred the Minister of Finance to the latest of the letters which had been sent out by his predecessor twice removed, Mr. Turner, with respect to the haphazard, inadequate, and inept handling of the economy on the part of this government, and I was very much surprised to find that rather than dealing with the substance of Mr. Turner's comments concerning the Canadian economy and the inadequacies of the government, the Minister of Finance chose to use quips to try, somehow or other, to conceal the true impact of what Mr. Turner had been alleging.

Hon. members will recall that the Minister of Finance said that the letter to which I was referring, as he said was the case with other Turner letters, amounted only to a gossip column which one could get from any newstand in Toronto for 15 cents. I pointed out to the Minister of Finance at that time that the price was not 15 cents but that it was actually $15,000 to each of the corporate elite to whom Mr. Turner had been sending this information, and that in truth Mr. Turner had been making substantial revenues from circulating his comments concerning the government to this group of corporate brass of executives at $15,000 each. It was estimated that there may have been 12 to perhaps as many as 20 recipients.

I put a further question to the Minister of Finance, and again he made an offhand comment concerning the letters. The reason I asked that this be put down for adjournment debate is that I feel it is not so much a matter of embarrassment to the government to have a former minister of finance, who in many quarters is still respected, making comments concerning the present economic stance of this government—that perhaps is secondary—but to me the important thing is that these comments are being made not only by Mr. Turner and not only by economists from coast to coast but also in questions and speeches in this House continually, yet the government is evading the answers.

The government is not levelling with the Canadian public. Why, for example, is our dollar now in the 83 cent range, the lowest level it has been at on an average annual basis for over 120 years? Why, over the last few years, has our economic performance been worse than that of any of the major industrial nations of the world? The November 16 budget of the Minister of Finance forecast a $25 billion deficit for this year and the coming year. That happens to be a deficit on non-capital expenditures amounting to 25 per cent of the total expenditures of the government over the next two years.

Without any hesitation, on November 17 and continually thereafter, we in this party have said that that is an intolerable deficit, and that the government must answer to the Canadian public as to why it has been totally inadequate in curbing that deficit. That is the position of my party.

If the Minister of Finance does not have the courage to come into the House tonight and answer the question as to why the government has put us into this type of deficit position, at least his parliamentary secretary can somehow or other bring the word. Surely it is not enough, day in and day out, to question the Minister of Finance concerning not only the falling dollar and the $25 billion non-capital deficit which he forecast for the nation this year and next, but also concerning rising inflation, rising unemployment and the current account deficit.

Finally, there is apparently a mood for a pro-business budget—The crux is the size of the federal deficit. The government does not wish it to exceed the present public projection—

As far as the public is concerned, the crux is the intolerable deficit which the government has asked Canadians to bear. I will be interested in hearing the remarks of the parliamentary secretary tonight. How can he justify the 25 per cent of the total expenditure deficit? As I have said, it is revealed in the November 16 budget.

In a nutshell, it is time for the government to be candid with the Canadian public. If it has mismanaged the public purse, it is time to admit it, ask for forgiveness, and have an election to clear the air. As Mr. Turner has said, it is intolerable to have the present inadequate handling of our economy without an election, although an election has been anticipated for 18 months. Let us clear the air. Perhaps a vote would do it.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes available to me this evening I should like to illustrate some ways in which the Canadian public has been very well served during the tenure of the last five Liberal ministers of finance, Messrs. Sharp, Benson, Turner, Macdonald, and the present day Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

During the period 1968 to 1977, personal disposable income per capita increased as much as 118 per cent. Real per capita disposable income rose 52 per cent, which was more than double the increase in the United States. During 1968 to 1978 the number of Canadians living below the poverty line was cut by half. From 1973 to 1976 the OECD reported that Canada had the third highest rate of growth in the western world. Further, the OECD reports that Canada's per capita income of $8,400 is third among major industrialized countries, and the United States was fourth. Each year during the 1970s Canada created more new jobs than any other major industrialized country. The increase averaged 3 per cent in Canada, 2 per cent in the United States, and less than 1 per cent in Japan and Europe. In 1978, ten million Canadians were working, whereas in 1968 7.5 million Canadians were working. From July, 1977, to July, 1978, 422,000 new jobs were created in the country.

Finally, I should like to refer to the opinions of a distinguished member of the Conservative party, the former treasurer of the province of Ontario, in terms of the economic policy of the opposition, wherein he said the following:

Former Ontario Treasurer Darcy McKeough emerged from six months of private life on the weekend to chastise federal Conservative leader Joseph Clark for suggesting the need for a larger deficit.—

The reference to the federal opposition leader was brief, but significant because it was made at a dinner in his honour before an audience that included Premier William Davis, several provincial cabinet ministers and many prominent Chatham-Kent Tories.

● (2210)

Let me further quote:

In an interview Mr. McKeough said he is alarmed with the federal Conservative party's stand on the deficit. It is nonsense to think that the tap can be turned on and just as quickly turned off—

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that the record of this government stands on its own merit.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—RADIO AND TELEVISION SERVICES IN ENGLISH AND FRENCH

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) what he had done and what more he planned to do to hasten the full implementation of the CBC's so called accelerated coverage plan. The question I asked was prompted by a recommendation of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. As a matter of fact it was the first of the specific recommendations in the document entitled, "A Future Together". What the specific recommendation said was that the principles of equality, status, rights and privileges of the English and French languages for all purposes declared by the Parliament of Canada within its sphere of jurisdiction should be entrenched in the constitution.

Among the purposes referred to was No. 5, namely, the right of every person to have access to radio and television services in both the French and English languages. Allow me to show how the accelerated coverage plan, the ACP, is designed to meet the need and fulfil what this Liberal government already regards as the right of Canadians.

The ACP is a plan for accelerated extension of television and radio services in Canada. The terms of reference for the ACP are as follows: to provide CBC national service in the appropriate official language, English or French, to all unserved areas containing 500 or more people which can be covered by a single radio or television transmitter, and those points presently inadequately served and, secondly, to complete the implementation of the plan within a five year period from the date of approval.

Mr. Speaker, the memo which I have outlining the terms is dated December 3, 1974. Thus, by the end of this year the detailed plan for each region should be fully implemented. On this memo from the CBC there is written in alongside this term of reference a note which says "will be considerably more". That is to say, the time schedule of the CBC is not about to be met; the plan is not on target with respect to time. One could ask, what else is new? Governments and their agencies are rarely on time unless we have a crisis of some kind on our hands.

There is more to my complaint than that. This plan, which was to take five years to complete, was at the very beginning started with the CBC holding meetings with representatives of each region to ensure there was local and regional input. This was to be used in the development of the plan. From this work a detailed plan for each region took effect. Included among the topics discussed at these regional meetings was that of the priority of the projects within the five year time span. French-speaking Canadians living in northwestern Ontario, where they constitute in many communities a majority of the population, or at least a significant percentage, were told their need for French language radio and television was of the highest priority and they would begin to enjoy this service at the very latest by the end of year three of the plan. That means they should have had the service by Christmas of 1977. There is some vague hope that it may come by Christmas of this year, but the degree of commitment by CBC to the accelerated coverage plan is very vague and uncertain.

I have the great privilege of representing in my constituency a great many Franco-Ontarians, and I hope in the future to represent many more as the boundaries of my constituency are pushed into north-eastern Ontario. Franco-Ontarians are a patient, tolerant, and good natured group of people who have contributed much to the economy of northern Ontario, particularly in the forest products industry, as entrepreneurs and as professional people. It has been a struggle for them, however, to maintain the use of their language in Ontario where there is but one official language, namely, English.

The province of Ontario has been rather slow in many cases to provide educational facilities and other services in the French language. Of course, the situation is improving, but Ontario at this time extends no statutory rights to the French-speaking people of the province in terms of the right to use their language and to have services in that language.

Very recently a private members' bill to that effect was given second reading in the Ontario legislature. The premier made it clear, however, that there would be no way in which the bill would be brought forward for third reading and passed into law. The bill was not designed to make Ontario a bilingual province, but to give Franco-Ontarians service in their own language where there was a significant number and where there was a demand for the use of the French language.

Franco-Ontarians have learned to expect little from Queen's Park, but they do have high expectations of the federal government. There are federal agencies and departments which are bilingual in the main, but there is a strip of northern Ontario running from Sault Ste. Marie up to Nakina on the main line of the CNR where a significant number of French-speaking Canadians live, and they are still waiting for the CBC French language radio and television network they were promised. Some of these communities have a French-speaking population to the extent of 60 per cent or more. They believe that a promise was made and that there was a commitment, but the service they were told they would get is not yet there.

They are beginning to get a sense of impatience, and that is quite understandable. Recently an unlicensed service has done something to fill the void, but CBC must be instructed to meet their obligations. Additional funds were voted by parliament for the accelerated coverage plan. We know that it is an extensive plan and that there are many difficulties. However, my colleagues and myself have been frustrated in our efforts to speed up the implementation of the ACP. Therefore I would ask the Secretary of State to use his office to make it clear to the CBC that this plan is of the highest priority, and in the name of national unity the CBC should step on the footfeed and get the accelerated coverage plan completed.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would commence by reiterating to the hon. member the words the minister used in a response to that question just a few days ago, that he shared the concerns of the hon. member and that, indeed, the hon. member has been tenacious in trying to ensure that in fact the schedule which was attached by the CBC to the ACP program would be adhered to if at all possible. In addition to that, the minister has made the increase he indicated he would make and, although they have been preliminary by way of response to date, the CBC has provided some information which I would gladly provide to the member this evening.

The CBC takes the position and relates that in fact the accelerated cover plan is designed to ensure that CBC radio and television service will be extended to all communities where 500 or more people are unserved or inadequately served in the appropriate language. The ACP is implemented under a strict formula system of priorities which takes into account such factors as population, capital and operating expenses, provincial equalization, and geographic and cultural isolation. Implementation is, in this way, as fair and equitable as it can be made. All communities identified for inclusion in the ACP are listed according to their priority under this formula, and "community" in this case also means minorities within a larger language group, such as the French-speaking population of Thunder Bay and the English-speaking population of Chicoutimi.

Provision of funds for the implementation of the ACP is made within the CBC's regular capital and operating budgets. As for the plan itself, it was originally to be completed in the period 1974 to 1979. A number of factors, however, have brought about a stretching out of that period by approximately three years. These factors include a sharp rise in costs, which are now approximately double the 1975 estimate, and the difficulty of finding enough qualified technical personnel for the installation of the more than 600 transmitters involved in the plan. Other factors were delays in the production by the electronic industry of the necessary equipment and budget constraints in 1978-79 and 1979-80.

I realize that this is not as complete an answer as the hon. member would require, Mr. Speaker, but it does give some kind of revised estimate in terms of the implementation time. It is something that both the minister and the hon. member would want to pursue when this matter comes before committee during steady of the estimates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the fall of the Canadian dollar has had more impact on the Canadian economy than any budget that has been introduced in the life of this government, but the plight of the dollar has been kept away from debate in parliament, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the government make an immediate reference to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs to allow for a full discussion of the reasons for and the impact of the falling dollar, and that the committee be empowered to call witnesses, including the minister, the governor of the Bank of Canada, representatives of the chartered banks and representatives of the financial institutions which have acted for the government in their foreign exchange transactions.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STEPS TO ENSURE FOREIGN-OWNED COMPANIES BECOME GOOD CORPORATE CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), in Toronto during the weekend, with regard to guidelines to control the operation of foreign-owned companies in Canada, is quoted by the Canadian Press as saying:

Very little effort has been made to inform foreign-owned corporations of the rules, and certainly nobody has ever tried to check whether there's been any compliance. The frustrating thing about all of this is that I had a tough fight in cabinet to get my guidelines approved, and it's all come to nothing.

Also, a senior official in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is quoted by the Canadian Press as saying:

Everyone you ask here about the Gillespie guidelines gives a Trudeau-like shrug and a broad grin, and it seems nobody's given it a second thought since 1975.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a motion, would he please put it.

Mr. Hees: I have just arrived at it, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Shymko):

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to ensure that foreign-owned companies are advised without delay what their responsibilities are as good Canadian corporate citizens, and that steps are taken by his department to ensure these responsibilities are carried out in a satisfactory manner, so that Canadians may derive the greatest possible benefit from the foreign capital invested in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUESTED IMMEDIATE REMOVAL OF DISCRIMINATORY EMPLOYMENT POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Considering that women are still discriminated against in so many aspects of work in Canada, including that within the federal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of National Defence be complimented on his improvement in the work situation for women in the Canadian armed forces by recognizing, among other things, that women, as well as men, will now have the right to fly with the armed forces and, further, urges the government to remove immediately other sexually discriminatory policies.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CONGRATULATIONS ON COVERAGE OF PEPIN-ROBARTS REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the CBC must faithfully report all newsworthy items, always adopt an unbiased attitude when broadcasting conflicting approaches to important events, and make a point of maintaining a non-partisan balance between the various opinions expressed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the Speaker of the House send a letter to the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to congratulate him for the coverage which was given to the Pepin-Robarts report on the eleven o'clock news last Thursday night and Friday night, and again during a special program where the activities of the week were summarized; to congratulate him, I said, for having wilfully failed to broadcast the views of the Social Credit Party of Canada.

The corporation thereby maintains its high standard of fairness at the expense of the party which represents the official Quebec opposition in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

GRAIN

INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE FOR WHEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Due to the fact that world wheat price and markets are relatively stable at present, with grain selling at well above initial prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government give authorization to increasing the initial price for wheat by at least 50 per cents per bushel.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Because of the tremendous increase in the cost of energy in Nova Scotia and other eastern provinces resulting from the escalation in the world price of the oil required for generation of electric power, some industrial plants are unable to continue in operation in competition with those in provinces with lower energy costs. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House direct the government to consider the establishment of a new national energy policy which would provide assistance so that the cost of energy to industrial and other users in one province will not exceed the national average cost of energy.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion for debate?

INCREASES IN FOOD PRICES—MEASURES TO PROMOTE GREATER FOOD SELF-SUFFICIENCY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Anti-Inflation Board reported that food prices went up by some 19 per cent in the past year.

In order to promote more stability in production and prices both for the farmer and the consumer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to prepare concrete proposals for the coming food strategy conference which will promote greater food self-sufficiency in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST INHUMANE TRAPS BE BANNED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, in recognition of the unnecessary and cruel suffering endured by millions of "wanted" fur-bearing animals in this country, as well as countless others of God's creatures who are annually trapped and endure excruciatingly painful deaths by means of the leg-hold trap, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby):

That this House does forthwith instruct the minister of the environment to utilize the full power of his department to ban this inhumane instrument of torture from the forests of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate, in accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, who will know that the value of the Canadian dollar is down again today.

Since there has been no parliamentary opportunity for detailed discussion on either the reasons for or the impact of the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar, I wonder if the Prime Minister would care, today, to make a reference that will allow the appropriate standing committee of this House to examine the reasons for and the impact of the falling dollar? That reference would include an opportunity for the committee to examine all the relevant witnesses and documents.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course, it is not correct to say that there has been no opportunity to discuss this. In the first months of the session there were several occasions, such as the speech from the throne debate and the budget debate. There is now before us on the order paper an occasion to discuss this subject in the budget bills of the Minister of Finance. Before mid-March, there will be some seven opposition days when they can put this subject up for debate.

I would welcome such a debate, Mr. Speaker. I am looking forward to seeing how the Leader of the Opposition will explain the increased budget deficits that he proposes will lead to a stronger dollar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I would like to know how he deals with the advice that he has just received from Mr. McKeough, the former treasurer of Ontario. These are very vital questions for the future of the country and I hope we will have such a debate.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will begin to worry about advice received from former ministers of finance when that advice comes in the form of a newsletter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: What the house will know is that the Prime Minister of Canada has once again denied an opportunity for the kind of detailed investigation of the policy relating to the dollar which would allow us to call witnesses, such as the governor of the Bank of Canada, such as Mr. McLaughlin and a number of others who are expressing great concern about the dollar policy of this country. The fact is that this government has lost about $5 billion in reserves and has no domestic reserves left, leaving Canada in a situation where our entire foreign exchange operations are being financed by foreign borrowing.

My question to the Prime Minister is: since this unnecessary secrecy has led to great uncertainty and has probably led to a dollar that is much lower than it need be, will the Prime Minister of Canada give us an undertaking, today, to open up that secrecy, even a little bit, and require that the government publish on a weekly basis trading figures relating to the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this question is absolutely misleading; I hope members of the House realize that.

An hon. Member: Poor boy.

Mr. Trudeau: Not only on all the occasions that I have indicated has there been an opportunity for debate on this subject, but if the Leader of the Opposition or one of the other of his finance critics and advisers want to ask questions of the Minister of Finance, of the deputy minister or the governor of the Bank, there is a standing committee on finance of this House and the Leader of the Opposition can attend it, make his views known and ask questions.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister pretends he does not understand the rules of this parliament and pretends that his government has not denied a reference to the standing committee that would allow this kind of discussion.

Given the dollar crisis that is the most severe in the history of this country, what we are asking for is an opportunity for the truth to be told so that Canadians will have all the information on what has led to the dollar policy and the dollar situation now and will know the reasons why people like the Deputy Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada are saying that the fall in the value in the dollar is contributing to a least one-third of the inflation that Canada faces.

I want to deal with that matter specifically now. Since that statement has been made by both the governor of the Bank of Canada and by the present Deputy Minister of Finance, will the Prime Minister give an undertaking, now, that he will table in this House of Commons the reports and studies on which the estimates of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Deputy Minister of Finance were based which led them to conclude that the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar has contributed to at least one-third of the inflation we now face and which could lead to serious new inflation? Will he table those studies, or will he keep that information secret too?

An hon. Member: And cover it up.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is so unsecret that I answered a question yesterday, or the day before, put by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and I conceded that the falling value of the dollar had indeed increased the CPI. So there is no secret about that. In so far as questioning the governor of the Bank is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition is obviously showing that he does not know what is going on. The governor of the Bank of Canada is in front of a parliamentary committee; he is testifying in front of the standing committee on finance of this House.

An hon. Member: No, he is not.

Mr. Trudeau: If the Leader of the Opposition wants to go there and ask some questions, he just has to do it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not understand the difference between the Senate, before whose committee the governor of the Bank is testifying, and this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: What this House wants is the opportunity that the Senate now enjoys, to question the governor of the Bank of Canada, to question the minister and to question other officials—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —who have information on this matter. I ask the Prime Minister once again, will he not make a reference to a standing committee of the House of Commons of Canada to allow us to examine these witnesses and to look at all the reports which must have been compiled in the Department of Finance and in the Bank of Canada, so that the people of Canada will have some idea as to exactly what the implications will be of this calamitous and continuing fall in the value of the Canadian dollar? Will he give us the rights the Senate now enjoys?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Senate is enjoying these rights after the House of Commons has enjoyed these rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The governor of the Bank has been in front of a committee of this House. There are officials now in front of another committee of this House, studying the Bank Act.

The Leader of the Opposition is just beginning to catch on to a problem. He realizes that he did not ask the questions when the governor was here in front of a committee of this House and now he is complaining that the governor is talking to the Senate. We can have the governor come back before the committee when the Leader of the Opposition makes up his mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: They are not doing anything.

● (1420)

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR IN RELATION TO OTHER CURRENCIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, who must know that when the questions that he was referring to were attempted to be asked, they were ruled out of order at the committee.

The Prime Minister seems to want to fill us in on what is happening in the world. Can he indicate why the Canadian dollar, in relation to the American dollar, has fallen 15 per cent in the past two years, while the Japanese yen has gone up 77 per cent in relation to the Canadian dollar, the British pound is up 36 per cent and the deutschemark up 51 per cent? Why has the international market passed such a devastating verdict on Canada to make ours the softest currency of any of the industrialized countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this may call for a long answer, but I will begin to give it. If you allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will try and explain some of the basics of economics to the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: When a country chooses to protect its currency by having very restrictive monetary policies which slow down the growth of the economy, it can indeed have a high-value currency. The problem is that this tends to create unemployment.

Mr. Gillies: Like Japan and Germany.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says, "Like Japan and Germany".

Mr. Gillies: The point is there is no unemployment in those countries.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says there is no unemployment there. When you can ship your unemployment out of the country, as is the case, for example, in Switzerland or Germany—it was the case when they were protecting their currencies—it is reasonably easy to have a restrictive growth and ship your unemployment abroad. Then you have a strong currency.

In the case of Japan, they do not ship their people abroad; they force the employers to keep them employed, and the workers in the plant take reduced salaries in order that everyone keeps working. There are various techniques that have been used, about which members opposite do not seem to be informed. However, you have to make a choice. If you want to continue creating jobs, as this country has, and it has created 428,000 jobs year over year—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —this means not following the restrictive monetary policies that some of these countries have followed. It has been our choice to make sure that Canada continues to produce jobs at a rate which is faster than any of the industrialized societies.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps if the Prime Minister would continue his lecture, he could tell the House what exactly is the full impact of the falling dollar in relation to world currencies. Yesterday he indicated that import prices go up. Would he also tell us the impact on Canadian-produced articles such as lumber, metals and certain food products which are priced on a North American basis and which have risen on an American dollar expressed basis to a very high price as far as Canadian consumers are concerned? Would the right hon. gentleman tell us about the impact on the Canadian consumer of his choice to let the dollar fall?

● (1425)

Mr. Trudeau: I have just answered that. Of course, when the dollar falls, the price of imported products—

Mr. Stevens: Canadian products.

Mr. Trudeau: —the price of imported goods and substitutes for them tends to differ; they cost more to the consumer. In terms of exports, it means that Canadian goods are more competitive on international markets; that we are selling more on international markets and consequently creating more jobs in Canada. This is one of the beneficial effects of the lower dollar.

Of course, unless we are going into a two-price export products structure, which I do not believe the opposition is advocating, it does mean Canadians will be paying more for goods which are higher priced on international markets.

Oral Questions

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

MONITORING OF PERFORMANCE OF FOREIGN-CONTROLLED COMPANIES IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Prime Minister. I note with interest his new-found concern with job creation. In that context, I should like to say, as a preamble to my questions, that in 1975 the then minister of industry, trade and commerce tabled a set of guidelines designed to ensure that benefits to Canada from the performance of foreign-controlled firms would be improved. Among these were increased research and development at home, increased exports and further processing of natural resources: in short, more jobs.

Considering that senior officials in that department confirmed yesterday that absolutely no monitoring of foreign-controlled firms had been done since 1975 to ensure that these objectives were fulfilled, why has the government so completely failed in the stated course of action it established almost four years ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question is somewhat contradictory. The Leader of the New Democratic Party speaks about my "new-found concern" for creating jobs. I can tell him that throughout the seventies this government and the Canadian economy have had the best record of any industrialized nation in terms of creating jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is a matter of statistical record. I see the Leader of the New Democratic Party shrugs about that. He does not like performance; he just like words about the future. Regarding the future, these guidelines were established by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce precisely in order to contribute to a larger pool of job creation. The figures show he has been partly successful.

The hon. member says there has been no monitoring. Of course there has been monitoring; there has been monitoring of all the firms reviewed by the Foreign Investment Review Agency. The very statement from which he has read indicates that FIRA has beefed-up its capacity for monitoring the application of such guidelines. As far as other areas are concerned, I take the point that there has not been sufficient monitoring. If some firms say they have not been following the guidelines, and others say they have we shall take note of it and make sure that more and more of them do follow the guidelines promulgated at the time by the then minister of industry.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister says the government has created more jobs than other countries. The reality is that it had to do so because of the higher level of unemployment than other countries—a million short in terms of jobs.

An hon. Member: Very convoluted.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister has indicated that FIRA rates the performance of newly-established foreign investment. That, as we all know, is inadequate.

The question had nothing to do with that. The question pertains to the existing foreign-owned firms to which the then minister applied his guidelines in 1975 but which are not being enforced now.

● (1430)

Will the Prime Minister confirm that there has been no enforcement or monitoring, and will he therefore admit that his own government's inaction has produced many fewer jobs than it could have?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I find that the Leader of the New Democratic Party is not very convincing when he says "Sure we have created more jobs than any other society, but we have done so because we have had to". Of course we want to create as many jobs as possible but that is what we have done. To say that we had to do it is not any form of praise or blame, because there are many other countries with very high rates of unemployment which should be creating jobs but which are not.

Mr. Broadbent: Like Germany or Japan? Which ones have high unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: I just spoke about two particular countries which reduced their unemployment figures by sending their unemployed back to Portugal, Spain or Yugoslavia. We do not do that in Canada. Workers come here and they get jobs, but we do not exile them just because they become unemployed. This is not our way of doing things, and I do not suppose it is something the Leader of the New Democratic Party would propose.

We have these guidelines. They apply in the case of newly-established firms which came under FIRA. They apply to the others. If they have not been applied with enough force and stength, I will ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to report on this and to make sure that the guidelines are adhered to. I merely say that the promulgation of those guidelines must have produced some results, since it coincided with the period when Canada created jobs at a faster rate than that of any other industrialized society.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, The Netherlands and Japan all have less than half the unemployment rate of Canada, and they have not exported one worker. The Prime Minister cannot get away with that foolish argument.

I see that the Prime Minister is getting some information from the minister who ought to have been acting on this. One of the major areas of concern about foreign-controlled firms has been the failure to pursue export markets. Would the Prime Minister confirm that the $12.3 billion deficit in trade in finished products in 1978, which meant the loss of thousands of jobs, is the direct result of the government's failure to implement its own policy which was announced almost four years ago by the minister?

Mr. Horner: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen a recent report on how these guidelines are being applied. The hon. member reads from a newspaper article which apparently is based on some conversation with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The very fact that the former minister of industry, trade and commerce issued those guidelines, and the very fact that he is suggesting that they could be implemented with greater strength, is a positive indication and I certainly support him. If there is some falling back on the implementation of these guidelines, I am sure the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will take note and implement the guidelines with greater force. However, they are there, and basically what the Leader of the New Democratic Party is doing is congratulating the government for having had the foresight to bring in these guidelines which will continue to be applied.

AIR TRANSPORT

ACQUISITION OF NORDAIR SHARES BY AIR CANADA—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

According to an article published in this morning's Le Devoir, Air Canada president Claude I. Taylor has stated that Air Canada rather than the Minister of Transport will make the final decision regarding Nordair and the fate of regional transportation. If that is so, can the minister tell us if he has in fact sent the Nordair file to Mr. Taylor or if he intends to do so shortly, and who will decide the fate of Nordair and of regional transportation in eastern Canada.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has an accurate report of what Mr. Taylor said. Indeed, Mr. Taylor is seeking proposals in relation to the shares of Nordair which Air Canada has acquired at my suggestion.

It is my interest to follow up on the various offers which appear to be ready to come forward, as quickly as possible and to do so without necessarily awaiting the actual transfer of those shares to the government, which had been mentioned earlier. So those offers will come in and will be assessed, I am sure, by Air Canada and the government together.

RATE OF ECONOMIC GROWTH—EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister seriously suggesting that those countries which have strong rates of economic growth are really working against the well-being of the world economy by exporting their unemployment?

If this is so, why did the government agree, at the meetings in London and Bonn, to try to achieve a 5 per cent real rate of economic growth in Canada, which has a "prosperous" economy? How can the Prime Minister possibly suggest that the countries which have strong balance of payments positions are somehow working against the well-being of the world by exporting their unemployment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I never made any such suggestion. I never argued that those who, to quote the hon. member's question, had a strong rate of economic growth were working against the benefit of the world economy. On the contrary, we are all trying to achieve a faster economic growth. I point out to the hon. member that according to the OECD, Canada had, on average, a rate of growth over the past ten years which was among the two or three best of all the industrialized societies. I do not see why the hon. member should ask the question he asked.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, without pursuing that particular argument—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the Prime Minister is so preposterous that it is hardly worth considering.

In the last two or three years, Canada made commitments at London and at Bonn to try to achieve a rate of 5 per cent growth. We are going the other way. Why are we following a high interest rate policy, which will slow our rate of economic growth?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, many times the Minister of Finance, myself and other ministers have said what is obvious, I think, to most observers of industrialized societies, including all those who met at Bonn, before that London and before that Puerto Rico. There are two difficulties at hand in our free market societies: one is high unemployment and the other is high inflation. We realize that if we fight just one, we can be successful, but then we lose on the other.

Mr. Broadbent: You are losing on both.

Mr. Trudeau: All I am saying is that Canada, on the over-all balance, has performed better than most.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The record is there. The House was reminded of it again by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance in his speech last night, if hon. members want to look at Hansard. The record is there. I am just saying that one country, like Germany—Switzerland is an even better example—can concentrate on fighting inflation and that can be done by having a tight monetary policy. There can be success, provided unemployment does not follow from that tight monetary policy.

Switzerland does not have to be bothered about unemployment because hundreds of thousands of unemployed have been asked to leave the country. That is all I am saying. In Canada we do not do that and we do not want to do that. That is why we cannot think just of protecting the dollar and fighting inflation at the cost of creating high unemployement. We have to have a balanced approach to these problems. Obviously, the opposition will not be able to solve them because its answer is to increase the deficit.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, it just seems to me to be preposterous that the Prime Minister should be reading the economic situation in this way. The reality in Canada is that we have high unemployment and high inflation, and we are not fighting either one satisfactorily. We have a high interest rate policy which is causing a low rate of economic growth. The policy of supporting the dollar is hurting us in terms of inflation. What evidence does the government have that it had to move to high interest rates in order to keep the dollar at the present level?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says we are not fighting either. Does the hon. member want us to increase the deficit? If he does, it will have the effect—and it is advocated by the New Democratic Party—of stimulating the economy in the short run at any rate. I believe that is what the hon. Leader of the Opposition is proposing.

● (1440)

Mr. Gillespie: Not today.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, he was yesterday, anyhow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, decreasing the deficit creates more jobs, but also it adds to the inflationary pressure. That is why the government does not want to do that. We do not want to add to the inflationary pressure. We are sorry there is a great deal of unemployment in Canada, but we realize—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: At least you are sorry.

Mr. Trudeau: But we realize that our economic management has created more jobs, at a faster rate, in Canada than in any other industrialized society. That is a fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

REMARK BY MINISTER CONCERNING FIRING EMPLOYEES TO SOLVE PROBLEMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General regarding the chaotic and unacceptable state of affairs in the Post Office for which the Postmaster General is blaming the workers and not management.

It has been reported that the Postmaster General recently stated that he could make the Post Office run efficiently if only he could fire 500 workers. What is the background for that statement? Does the Postmaster General have a list of the names of these 500 persons and the unions to which they belong? Or was this just public posturing in order to cover up the ineptness of Post Office management?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should understand better the context in which I replied to a question asked by a newspaperman: "How many people do you feel you could get rid of, if you want the Post Office to work smoothly?" I stated that if I had my way to do something about it, maybe 500: I could have said 100, or I could have said 1,000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: I think hon. members of the opposition should have copies of some of the letters I have received from citizens across Canada.

Mr. Jarvis: We sent them to you.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They were delivered by hand.

Mr. Lamontagne: They would see the reaction of people. They would see that nine out of ten letters I received approved of that statement in the context in which it was made. Another thing I want to tell hon. members: my job is not to blame management; it is not to blame the workers; it is to see that both do the job they should do for the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lamontagne: That is the way I must take my responsibility. If management does something bad, it will be blamed. The same applies to the workers. I can tell hon. members that the reports I have received from different media—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A supplementary, the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the Postmaster General is all excited about; he is the one who brought out this statement. The letters I have received indicate that people are receiving their mail late and that they are ashamed and disgusted with the service they are receiving for which they are paying an exorbitant price. There are further unchallenged reports which indicate evidence of pilfering, drinking, smoking pot and goofing off at the Gateway sorting plant in Mississauga.

These are very serious allegations of disorderly conduct bordering on lawlessness and obvious lack of control on the part of postal management. What steps are being taken in order to bring these matters under control? Or is the Postmaster General content to just sit and condone this type of action?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to register the fact that I take exception to the statement that we are sitting around doing nothing. Some members on the other side of the House are blaming us for harassment and persecuting the workers because we have put them on notice of dismissal and have fired some. Again I say that we have to be firm about these people doing what the hon. member has just mentioned, but also we have to be fair and abide by the rule of law in our democracy. As I said to the newspaper, it is a long process.

I should like to refer to a lady in the Toronto Sun who wrote to me and said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hull.

Mr. Alexander: One final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Hull.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY WHETHER COMPENSATION WILL BE PAID FOR LOSS OF BILINGUAL BONUS

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have a very pressing question to ask the President of the Treasury Board.

As thousands of public servants have been notified that as of April 1, 1979 they will no longer receive the bilingualism bonus, and as a great number of them earn small salaries and will be seriously affected in their family budget, and as there are all sorts of rumours going around concerning them, can the minister reassure these loyal servants of the state and tell them if he intends to offer them some form of financial compensation so as not to unjustly penalize those whom I would call the poorest of the poor in the public service?

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct in pointing out that the bilingual bonus plan will be terminated, as my predecessor indicated, on March 31, 1979. However, Treasury Board has put in place a basis whereby the salary and the bonus as of that date will be compared with the individual's salary a year later. If there has been any shortfall—in other words, if the income is less than it was on March 31, 1979—they will be compensated for any shortfall.

TRADE

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS AT GATT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to get away from these philosophical subtleties of the Prime Minister which contain no information and simply are false.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to get right down in the barnyard and get the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently there is unanimity among the Liberals that that is where he should be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not care about that. Simply, I want to ask him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question is a very simple one. What is the reason why Canada, of the 95 nations engaged in the talks concerning GATT, is the only nation which refuses to agree with the others? What is the reason for that? What change of ideas will take place in connection with the representations made by Canada's representatives at GATT in this regard, so that we will not lose the opportunity of selling wheat?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: —I should like to inform the right hon. member that I feel right at home in the barnyard, and I feel right at home in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: My father, being one of the great traders of Saskatchewan, taught me well the art of sitting down, trading and negotiating trade for Canada. With that premise, I feel confident that Canada's position regarding multilateral trade negotiations is a very good and strong one.

In the negotiation of anything, there may be times when we are the odd man out. We are not now. We are holding out for the best possible arrangements for Canada. I feel confident the negotiations are in good hands.

• (1450)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, what are the representations Canada is making that are contrary to those of all other member nations of GATT? What are those points that would indicate Canada's political power and strength is being shown there, as described in some of the literature put out by the department?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to describe where we are at odds with the 95 other countries. If the right hon. gentleman was referring to the International Wheat Agreement, for instance, we want the highest possible floor price which will trigger the movement of grain into surplus reserves. Necessarily, we want a fair but fairly high maximum price which will trigger the movement of these reserves into the market.

We are continuing these negotiations. The size of the reserves is also up for negotiation. Certainly, we are doing our best in that particular instance to maximize exports of western grain to the widest number of consumers possible in the world around us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the minister agree with the views expressed by the president of the importers' association that Canada is dragging its feet and is causing a situation to develop in which our wheat markets are going to be lost, and lost completely, because of the stupidity of this government?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree. I see the demand for wheat growing in the world, and I see a very good position for Canada to command its traditional share of that growing demand for wheat in the world.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Oral Questions

FINANCE

COST OF LIVING INCREASES DUE TO HIGH PRICES—EXCESSIVE PROFITS OF CERTAIN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I would address it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Statistics Canada yesterday released figures showing an average weekly wage increase of a little over 6 per cent, compared to a 9 per cent increase in the consumer price index last year. Since this represents an annual wage loss of $365 for the average worker in Canada, I want to follow up on a question posed yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and ask the Prime Minister if he is aware that corporations which were represented at his Friday meeting have experienced astronomical and scandalous profit increases over the last year. For example, Noranda Mines had a 117 per cent increase. I have these figures, which I will make available to the Prime Minister.

If the Prime Minister is aware of these profit increases, will he inform the House why he did not ask the corporations concerned to reduce their prices so that Canadians do not have to face high cost of living increases over the next few years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may have missed the answer I gave to a similar question posed yesterday by a member of his party, I indicated to the contrary, that this kind of point was discussed at a meeting I had with business leaders. I indicated in this House that the government had suggested that when profits are forthcoming, the companies should consider benefiting the consumer or reinvesting those profits to create more jobs. This is a suggestion which will be carried forth by this government.

In so far as the earlier statistics given by the hon. member are concerned, of course they are right if he just takes last year. If he takes the period of three years during which controls endured, he will see that the workers' wages over that period were above the increase in the cost of living. Indeed, if he looks at the past ten years, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance reminded us yesterday, he will see that real disposable incomes in Canada went up 52 per cent which, incidentally, is about twice as high as they went up in the United States over the same period.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

HIGH PROFITS IN FOOD INDUSTRY—ADVERSE EFFECT ON CONSUMER PRICES

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister does not tell us what commitments he received from those corporations to reduce their profits over the next year. This is even more crucial in view of the fact he is asking for the same commitment from wage earners, that is, to lower their wage demands over the next year or so.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I should like to address my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that the Anti-Inflation Board announced yesterday—this was reported in The Citizen—that food prices increased 19 per cent over the past year and, further, in view of the fact that the food industry has registered an increase in profit and one of the companies represented at that Friday meeting, Burns Foods Ltd., had a profit increase last year of 198 per cent, will the minister tell this House what action he intends to take to control high profits in the food industry which, of necessity, must have an adverse effect on food prices?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned about this rapid increase in food prices and we are considering some new initiatives in that regard, but they cannot be announced in the House at this time.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF ASSESSMENT REVIEW PANEL ON LOCATION OF NUCLEAR REFINERY IN ONTARIO

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for the Environment. The minister will remember that an announcement was made in his name that the environmental assessment review panel studying the location of a new Eldorado Nuclear refinery in the province of Ontario was to have reported to the minister by now.

My question to the minister is: has that report been made to him and, if so, when will it be released? If it has not been made to him, why has it not, and when does he expect to receive it?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I expect to receive the report in a couple of weeks. There has been some delay in the preparation of the final version of the report. As soon as I receive it, I will be making it public.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT PLANS FOR FOOD STRATEGY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the finding of the AIB that the increase in food prices of 3.8 per cent over the month represents an annual increase of 19 per cent, will the minister tell the House what has become of the plans for a food strategy on the part of the government?

Given the fact that it is almost a year since the conference was convened for this purpose and we have heard nothing about it since, does the government have a food strategy and, if not, what does it propose to do about this?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not one year since the hon. member heard of it last, unless he has not being paying attention to what has been going on. As a matter of fact, we have had three conferences with different levels of society—the provincial governments, the private business sector, consumer groups and many other voluntary organizations.

We have been developing a food strategy with the other five federal departments and with the many provincial departments concerned. Because there are so many levels of governments involved in respect of food, including provincial departments of consumer affairs, industry, trade and commerce, agriculture and fisheries, this is taking some time. It will take some time before the results of a global food strategy can be seen in the economy.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGED INVASION OF PRIVACY IN SURVEY OF FAMILY EXPENDITURES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: I believe Statistics Canada falls within the minister's jurisdiction.

Statistics Canada is presently conducting a survey of family expenditures in 1978. This study is the most massive invasion of personal privacy ever conducted by any government of the western world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: The minister laughs. It asks very many personal and private questions about incomes, about debts, about banks balances, clothing purchases and such personal items as toilet paper consumption, sanitary products, perfumes and hair tints.

Is the minister aware of this survey, and will the legal sanctions that exist under the act be applied against individuals who refuse to answer these question? I ask this because many people are very upset about the very personal nature of many of the questions being asked.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will look into that question. I believe this is a voluntary survey, but I will look into that aspect.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, it is not a voluntary matter at all. Every twenty-eighth person on the list of those who receive family allowances is being interviewed by Statistics Canada, and the interview takes something like 3½ hours to complete.

• (1500)

Will the minister look into this matter, and if what I have said is true will he order Statistics Canada to stop the survey and refer the matter to another committee of this House so that we may look at it in its full context?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, if I stopped the survey, it would not be necessary to refer it to a committee of the House. I said that I would look into the whole question, and I will.

BRICKLIN CANADA LIMITED

Question No. 185—Mr. Howie:

Was the Department of Regional Economic Expansion required to pay any portion of the $2.7 million loan guarantee to the Bank of Montreal made in respect of Bricklin Canada Limited and, if so, what amount was paid or may be required to be paid?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Yes, $2,699,-000 has been paid and at the present time a further claim in respect of accrued interest and receivership costs for $133,000 has been received. The department's liability for this amount has not yet been legally determined.

LAND REGISTRATION—MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 195—Mr. Howie:

1. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, what amount was paid by Canada to the Maritime Provinces for the development of the Land Registry Information Services?

2. How many persons were employed on the project on March 31, 1978?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. For the fiscal year 1977-78, DREE paid $5,916,956.72 to the Council of Maritime Premiers for the Land Registration and Information Service.

2. 245.

Order Paper Questions

EXPENDITURE CUTS

Question No. 614—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. In determining where cuts in expenditure would occur in the various departments and agencies, what criteria were adopted to decide which operations were not of sufficiently high priority to justify their continued existence?

2. Does an inter-departmental committee of any kind exist to supervise the proposed expenditure cuts to ensure that only low priority items are eliminated from the budget, or reduced in size and, if so, who is on the committee and what are its terms of reference?

3. Did the committee prepare any studies or reports and, if so, will they be Tabled in the House?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): 1. The review of efficiency and effectiveness of federal government spending programs is a continuing process involving not only the departments and agencies concerned, but also the central agencies such as the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Office of the Comptroller General, as well as various interested groups of Canadians who have a specific interest in the programs. It is on the basis of their collective understanding of the performance of all government programs, combined with the priorities of government and the outlook for spending within the restraint policy that ministers make their collective decisions about which expenditures must be reduced.

2. No inter-departmental committee was established to review the expenditure reductions.

3. Since no committee was established, there will be no report.

REDUCED EXPENDITURES—DEVELOPMENTAL RESEARCH

Question No. 615—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. In deciding to reduce expenditures in areas of developmental research, did the government consider the impact of such reductions on future economic growth, resource development and export opportunities?

2. Was a study prepared examining such factors and, if so, will the government table it?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): 1. Expenditure reductions were undertaken only in those areas of developmental research that were considered to be of lowest priority in order to minimize detrimental ramifications. However, these limited cuts in research and development were more than offset by new thrusts in this area announced by the federal government earlier in the summer. The additional research and development expenditures are to be directed to higher priority projects.

2. Since there was no task force or special study group established, there will be no report tabled.

DREE—SUBSIDIES TO DUFRESNE FOREST PRODUCTS COMPANY

Question No. 628—Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve):

Did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion subsidize the Dufresne Forest Products Company of Val d'Or and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what were the reasons and projects warranting the subsidies (c) what specific conditions were attached to the subsidies?

[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Yes. (a) An incentive offer under the Regional Development Incentives Act, in the amount of $579,200, was accepted by the company. (b) Setting up a sawmill for which the eligible investments total $1,696,000. (c) The specific conditions for granting this subsidy are in accordance with the Regional Development Incentives Act and Regulations.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Question No. 678—Mr. Epp:

1. Is the RCMP planning to amalgamate the Highway and Town of Steinbach detachments and, if so, on what date?

2. What is the expected number of officers planned for the detachment once amalgamation has been completed?

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

RCMP—BUILDING AT STEINBACH

Question No. 679—Mr. Epp:

Is the government planning expansion of the RCMP Highway Detachment Building located at Steinbach, Highway No. 12 and, if so (a) what is the capital spending (b) on what date will construction (i) begin (ii) be completed?

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): No.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—FREDERICTON

Question No. 686—Mr. Howie:

How many community courses were funded in Fredericton, New Brunswick by the Department of Employment and Immigration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, there were 57 full-time institutional occupational training courses purchased under the Canada Manpower Training Program in Fredericton, New Brunswick.

SOVIET TUPOLEV BOMBER

Question No. 730—Mr. McKinnon:

Does the Department of National Defence classify the Soviet Tupolev bomber, NATO designation "Backfire", as a heavy bomber?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): DND no longer uses the term "heavy bomber". The term currently in use is "long range bomber" and the Soviet "Backfire" could be classified as such.

CFB GAGETOWN—FEDERAL LABOUR INTENSIVE PROGRAM

Question No. 738—Mr. Howie:

Was money allocated to the Department of National Defence under the current round of the Federal Labour Intensive Programme and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what amount will be spent at CFB Gagetown and on what projects will persons be employed?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): There is no Federal Labour Intensive Program currently in effect in DND. The last program terminated September 30, 1978.

CFB GAGETOWN—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 739—Mr. Howie:

On November 1, 1978, how many (a) civilian permanent (b) civilian temporary (c) military personnel were employed at CFB Gagetown?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): (a) 594. (b) 221. (c) 3,061.

SMALL INDUSTRIES FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—N.B.

Question No. 745—Mr. Howie:

What amount was paid by DREE in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, under the Small Industries Financial Assistance Programme?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: In the fiscal year 1977-78, DREE paid $1,041,400 under the Small Industries Financial Assistance Program in New Brunswick.

Question No. 746—Mr. Howie:

In the Province of New Brunswick, do any counties qualify for assistance under the Small Industries Financial Assistance Programme and, if so, which ones?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Yes, the counties of Restigouche, Gloucester, Northumberland, Kent, Madawaska, Victoria, Sunbury, Queens and Charlotte qualify.

PERSONS REGISTERED AT FREDERICTON EMPLOYMENT OFFICE

On November 30, 1978, how many persons were registered for work at the Fredericton, New Brunswick manpower office?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): There was a total of 8,098 persons registered for work at the Fredericton, New Brunswick employment office on November 30, 1978.

Order Paper Questions

PERSONS RECEIVING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—FREDERICTON

Question No. 791—Mr. Howie:

As of November 30, 1978, how many persons were receiving unemployment insurance from the Fredericton, New Brunswick office?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 5,003.

COMMUNICATIONS—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 845—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of Communications finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Mr. Crawford Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—N.B.

Question No. 902—Mr. Howie:

How many loans were granted by the Farm Credit Corporation in the fiscal year 1977-78 and how many were granted in New Brunswick?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Farm Credit Corporation advises:

	Number of loans approved Fiscal year 1977-78
Under the Farm Credit Act
Canada	7,066
New Brunswick	92
Under the Farm Syndicates Credit Act
Canada	105
New Brunswick	2

CIDA—AID TO WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Question No. 521—Mr. Epp:

Did the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) give any aid to the World Council of Churches in (a) 1968 (b) 1969 (c) 1970 (d) 1971 (e) 1972 (f) 1973 (g) 1974 (h) 1975 (i) 1976 (j) 1977 (k) 1978 and, if so, by year (i) in what amount (ii) what projects were approved (iii) what was the purpose of each project and what amount was approved in each case?

Return tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. BEATTY—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS NOS. 65 AND 66

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary the fact that my order paper questions Nos. 65 and 66 have now stood on the order paper since January 26, 1978, which is now over one year ago. I would like to indicate that I am sure all members of the House would appreciate it if the hon. parliamentary secretary would do his job and answer these questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that we take all questions seriously. At this time of the year the average rate of answers to questions on the order paper is advantageously comparable to the rate during the same period last year and Canadians are aware, Mr. Speaker, that we usually answer more than 90 per cent of the questions on the order paper during the year, which is excellent.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong to believe he is being persecuted. It is not the first time he has taken the floor but in the past he was very well treated by parliament, and I would ask him simply to stop setting himself up as the Don Quixote of the Progressive Conservative Party, and particularly to use the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) as Rosinante.

MR. ELZINGA—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 223

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a point of order dealing with question No. 223, which I have had on the order paper for some three sessions of parliament. The government has had three years to work on this question, which simply deals, as I have shared with the parliamentary secretary before, with special and annual passes that are granted to the presidents of Crown corporations or government commissions and how often they have used these special passes.

I was hoping that the parliamentary secretary would have had an opportunity over the Christmas break to examine the question and come forward with an answer. Might I get a commitment from him now as to when I will get an answer?

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed from Monday, January 29, 1979, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, last night, I started my speech very late and pointed out that I could make only preliminary remarks. But even those preliminary remarks I did not have time to complete. I was more specifically commenting on the speech made earlier by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). He said yesterday that there was no national unity problem and that our difficulties were rather of an economic nature.

Yesterday, I said what I thought of the perception the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has of matters of national unity, but I should also like to mention that he insists that the most important issue today is one of economics. I do not disagree with that, Mr. Speaker. Economic matters must command the attention of the government. However, I want to remind the hon. member that we deal with those matters in due course and that this government can easily act simultaneously on several fronts.

That national unity is a major problem at this time cannot be denied. We have in Quebec, as I pointed out yesterday, a government intent upon dividing Canada, that is, upon separating one of the Canadian provinces from confederation. If that does not constitute an important problem for Canada, I wonder what does. Personally, I feel that even though it is true that national unity must not be the only matter with which we must deal, it certainly is of considerable if not capital significance in economic matters. Consequently, that national issue must be discussed and we must do everything possible to solve the problems facing us at this time.

I believe the government has made an effort in that direction by introducing in the House this legislation on referendums. At this point of the debate, I feel it is important to clear up the situation. We see the opposition rising against this legislation on the referendum on the pretext that it could be abused. I note the opposition refuses to acknowledge that we have set out in the bill some limitations to the use of the referendum once enacted. One of those limitations lies in the fact that its life is limited to five years, a period during which we hope to have been successful in settling our national unity problem and perhaps even carried out a constitutional reform we could put before the people and on which we could hold a referendum. On the other hand, the opposition refuses to acknowledge that we have limited the referendum to constitutional matters only. They refuse to acknowledge that, yet fail to spell out what they think is something other than constitutional matters. And they state we could abuse that political instrument to the point where we would be legislating by referendum.

In this regard, I have a comment I would like to make about the speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. He is opposed, and rightly so, to our legislating by referendum, yet he recommended last night that we legislate by public poll. Here is what he said in substance: There is no need for any referendum. Governments enjoy the power to conduct public polls even more important than those conducted by the Gallup Institute, in order to know exactly where people stand on a question like national unity.

I must say I found some boldness in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi when he called upon this House, with tears in his eyes, to show better respect for democracy. Which is more democratic, Mr. Speaker, legislating by polls or, from time to time and in extremely limited circumstances, putting to the people a referendum on a central issue of concern to them? What the opposition would like in fact and what they imply when suggesting they are against the referendum is that they are against the idea of asking the people's views on constitutional reform. I for one feel that if we were to obtain the provinces' agreement on the current constitutional negotiations, the outline of the resulting constitutional remodelling should be submitted to the people through a referendum, and this is why we are putting the legislation forward.

What must be realized is that the bill had its inception in circumstances that were quite special, namely the election that occurred in the province of Quebec on November 15, 1976. Those political circumstances called for unusual political responses. The referendum bill is one of those unusual responses that also meets a specific need I shall be explaining in a moment, and that is also designed to address the larger question of constitutional reform.

Listening to the opposition I see they lack the flexibility, the kind of imagination that would allow them to easily turn around in tighter political situations. They lack the understanding, the basic sense of strategy that would allow them to join us in accepting this proposal to give the authority to hold referenda, either in the country as a whole or in the province of Quebec only, for a limited period and on constitutional matters only. Under the circumstances the reason becomes apparent why in the race for power they can never make it at the finish line: they are incapable of what I would call elementary analysis of a political situation. If they were now to make a cold-headed review of the facts, they would look at this proposal with a minimum of objectivity. But the truth is Progressive Conservatives have had no understanding whatsoever of what goes on in the province of Quebec, as we have long since realized, but they do not quite grasp what is going on in the rest of the country either. We had examples in the suggestions made recently by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), who was only echoing statements made much earlier by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

I suspect that this type of statement was suggested to the hon. member for Rosedale by Mr. Payette, the candidate whom the Progressive Conservatives have just recruited and, I warn the opposition, whose political options are not very clear. Following the statements of Mr. Ryan who quite properly took offence at what the hon. member for Rosedale said, I would say to the hon. member, an ex-mayor, that he should have taken the time, when he was mayor of Toronto, to make a few visits in the province of Quebec, especially in the city of Montreal; then he could have understood what is happening there, he could have improved his political education so that he would have been a bit more mature when he came to the House and he might have known better than to make such statements.

This was a rare occasion for him to fraternize with the people of Montreal, with Quebeckers, and to get informed on what is really happening in the province of Quebec, but he did not do so and now he sits here in the federal parliament without knowing the real problems of Canada and without having grasped the national dimension of these problems. What is the actual situation in Quebec which justifies this legislation on the referendum? I am going to sum it up briefly because I do not want to dwell too much on it and above all because many of these things have already been said. When it was elected, the Parti Québécois promised the Quebec people it would hold a referendum on the independence issue. Soon after, realizing that this measure was not quite popular, it began to say that it would hold the referendum within a year. It then stated that it could no longer put a definite date on it. Finally it declared that it might even wait until after the coming federal election.

One can easily say that the Parti Québécois is just procrastinating and those who analyse the situation will see quite clearly that if the Parti Québécois hesitates so much it is because it knows quite well that it will not win the referendum. So what is it doing in the meanwhile? Well, for the Parti Québécois it is crucial to gain time, because it has devised a strategy whereby in gaining time it could project a moderate image of itself before the people and make them believe that it is now quite in favour of outright independence, and it could make all kinds of gestures which would tend to mystify the population. Furthermore, it is quite consciously creating some ambiguity around one of several questions which could perhaps turn out to be contridactory and which could be asked when the referendum takes place. The last invention devised by the Parti Québécois in order to confuse the people has been to declare itself as following the path and the tradition of all the heads of parties in the province of Quebec and of all the former premiers of Quebec up to this day. It claims merely to be acting in conformity with the traditional attitude of the province of Quebec.

Yet, though it claims to be consistent with the previous stands of the province of Quebec, to the best of my knowledge the preceding governements have never advocated the separation of Quebec from the rest of the country. Yet such is the goal of the Parti Québécois. This is what it has been saying within the province of Quebec but at the same time Mr. René Lévesque goes to Washington to explain that his goal is independence for Quebec and to try to convince the public there that such a move constitutes no threat for the United States or the rest of Canada. He therefore adopts a federalist approach when he addresses his fellow Quebeckers or at certain federal-provincial conferences and on the other hand he takes a separatist approach when speaking abroad. It is exactly the opposite that is true. The Quebec government breaks totally with the Quebec tradition while claiming it is simply following up Quebec's demands. They change their goal completely, saying: We separate. Such is our aim. The province of Quebec will never fulfil itself as long as it is not its own master and has full control over its territory, a territory which covers what is now the province of Quebec. Therefore, they change their goal while saying that nothing has changed, and they add to the general confusion on purpose. Indeed, if the Parti Québécois fosters such confusion among the people, it is because it is up to something. They would have the people believe that they have given up their original option, or at least that it is not as urgent now, and they pretend to negotiate, at times they negotiate and are willing to talk, at other times they withdraw.

A minister makes a statement and a day or two later it is denied or corrected by René Lévesque himself. From time to time, it is René Lévesque himself who sends up a trial balloon and one of his ministers, namely, Mr. Morin, tries to catch it back when he realizes that it was not well received by the public. The previous Quebec governments used to demand more autonomy, more specific powers on certain matters, greater financial means to meet their requirements and more scope to set their own priorities.

Such were the demands made by Mr. Lévesque's predecessors, but Mr. Lévesque does not follow the same line and has definitely broken away with Quebec traditions. On the contrary, he distorts the rules of the game and the image of Quebec at the negotiating table and at the constitutional conference table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) on a point of order.

Mr. Matte: Would the minister allow me a question on the statement she has just made?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I will do so with pleasure at the end of my remarks if I have time left.

Mr. Lefebvre: It is not a point of order, it is just nonsense!

Mrs. Sauvé: I think that Mr. Lévesque participates in constitutional discussions just for the sake of appearances, which is rather clever, until the situation he manages to create gives him an opportunity to walk out. Then, he will go back to Quebec and say: You see, I tried to negotiate in good faith but it just did not work. I made every effort to reach an agreement with the federal government but it proved impossible.

He is deliberately cheating. And he also impedes progress. This is the most serious problem the federal government is now facing in its constitutional negotiations. He deliberately stands in the way of the negotiating process while denouncing its slow progression. Of course, you can never expect a quick outcome so Mr. René Lévesque can say: You see it takes too long, it is not possible to come to an understanding, one province wants something and another wants something else. So it is hopeless, the whole procedure is wrong. Then he pretends to take part in discussions so as to be in a position when he can eventually rationalize his unwavering determination to release the province of Quebec from its federal ties.

I believe that Mr. René Lévesque is too shrewd and so are some of his advisers to burn his bridges in case the referendum he is reluctant to hold on the future of Quebec would not be a success. In this way he could have it both ways. He wants to leave the door open. He was very careful for instance not to take a definite stand with his colleagues from the other provinces. He did not tell them: You know, I have definitely given up the idea of separating Quebec from the rest of the country. To my knowledge he has never said that in federal-provincial conferences. So it is obvious he is playing a game, not a very honest game which is far removed from the political openness which he is bragging about. Throughout his political life he has been saying that politicians must be transparent. Well, he is far from being transparent right now. He is trying to drag us all into his dilemma and confusion. Time has come now—and it is ever more urgent as time goes by—for all politicians to grasp the problem involved, to define the issue at stake, to determine the aims of this country and to come up with a clear question, and for Mr. René Lévesque—who advocates another alternative—to state what are the advantages and the disadvantages so that the population would be well informed. He should demonstrate how his alternative might be viable and indeed he should show the road to follow. And that is not all. He should tell us exactly how that option can become reality because even though theoretically feasible in practice it will raise a great many problems. He must inform the population about the problems they can expect to face. People must understand the risks involved in that endeavour, the delays inherent in such a process, the unstableness that could follow in Canadian political and social life, particularly in the province of Quebec because finally Quebeckers will have to foot the bill, to restore their social, political and cultural life in a totally modified political context. I accuse Mr. Lévesque of refusing to inform the people. He will agree to consult them only when he is pretty sure that they are so confused by the hotchpotch of words and options that have been proposed that he has a chance of getting a positive answer. What does Mr. Lévesque do, talking at length as he does about the true sovereignty of the people? Mr. Speaker, the people are sovereign only when they make their own choices, and especially when they can do so fully informed. Let him give back to the people of Quebec this basic sovereignty which consists in being adequately informed to answer a question which will decide their political future.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we need this referendum legislation so that we can replace the provincial government if it does not hold its referendum as promised. This is a promise that it made to the people in Quebec, but with all the delays, we may wonder whether it will eventually keep its promise. And if the economic and social situations in Quebec continue to deteriorate, will someone not have to act to clarify the situation? And if the Quebec government fails to do so, the federal government needs this political tool which will enable it to consult the people in Quebec about their own future.

It must be kept in mind that we wish Quebec to hold its own referendum. We believe that it is its responsibility; since the Quebec government has brought up the matter of a new option, it must consult the population and we hope that it will hold this referendum. If it does not, however, and if the situation continues to deteriorate, we want to have the means to intervene. Moreover, if the province of Quebec holds its referendum, the question could be so ambiguous that the answer would make no real sense and nobody would know if the people have voted yes or no. This is what happened in the provincial election when the people were told: Vote for us and we shall give you good government and talk about independance later. The people voted on this ambivalent proposal and found themselves with a government which was not satisfied to give them good government—if it is any good—but which also wanted to promote its option of independence for Quebec.

So, if this question is ambiguous, somebody else must be in a position to ask a more precise one to give Quebec citizens the possibility to state clearly what they want and to make a clear choice as to their future. But this is not what is happening and those who are aware of the Parti Québécois backroom manoeuvres know only too well that since it was elected it has been carrying out surveys on a question and even on several questions. It is testing what the question should be. It attempts to devise what question will bring in the highest percentage of "yes" answers, whatever its degree of clarity. This does not bother them too much. They are trying out questions. And the people are confused and worried. In some cases, and I have seen examples of it recently, a certain anxiety starts to show up. Not so long ago, I paid a visit to a group of senior citizens of my riding.

I met someone who asked me: But what is going to happen if the referendum is deferred? And suppose it is not held? Here is how she put it to me: If I am against independence, how do I answer? Is this proof enough that people are confused? She knows what she wants, she is against independence, but she said: I will not know what to answer. Well, this shows me just how confused people have become.

I have just said in French, Mr. Speaker, that I met a representative of the senior citizens at a meeting in my constituency. That person exemplified the kind of confusion in which the population finds itself with the kind of publicity and manoeuvres the Parti Québécois is up to in the province of Quebec. This person came to me and asked me: "If I am against independence, how can I answer the question?" That was enough to give me the message that the population has become extensively confused about what is going on. That person knew what she wanted to say. She wanted to say that she was against independence. With all the questions floating around that might be asked on the referendum, she was afraid she would not be able to answer in conformity with what she believes. That is the kind of confusion that has been systematically created by the Parti Québécois. It is our duty to do something to help the population see clearly how things should be handled in this kind of situation.

The Parti Québécois is obviously playing games, camouflaging its real intentions by using words like sovereignty association, which they do not even attempt to define in the course of their speeches. That senior citizen who is somewhat removed from the political scene is understandably in a state of confusion. It is our duty to enlighten such people. However, for someone like the hon. member for Rosedale to be taken in by the kind of ploys used by the Parti Québécois is not understandable.

The hon. member does not see through the exercise of the conditioning of the people. That forces me to the conclusion that some of the leading members of the opposition are politically naive when as members of this House I would expect that they would be politically grown up. It is inexcusable that politicians would get taken in by this kind of manoeuvring and manipulation. It indicates something very serious—the total ignorance of that party about what is going on in the province of Quebec.

Last night we heard a remarkable speech by the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), an Anglophone who perceives the situation very well. He explained it to the opposition in a way that I thought was admirable. I recommend that members opposite read his speech. From an Anglophone point of view, it was an exact description of the situation in the province of Quebec, the dangers we face and the reasons why we need this referendum.

Instead of listening to that speech and taking from it what would be profitable, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi called the bill a political insanity. He pleaded, practically with tears in his eyes, that we should abandon it. He called for co-operation on both sides of this House to address ourselves together to the important issue of the day, national unity. I say to him, join us in a constructive measure which is designed to substitute for the Parti Québécois, if they do not fulfil their promise of holding a referendum, a measure designed to fight any attempt to put to the people of Quebec a question that might be so ambiguous as to be meaningless.

Someone must have contingency plans if this kind of thing occurs in the province of Quebec. The federal government must have some kind of political instrument whereby it can do something with regard to clarifying the situation. I will not let the situation in the province of Quebec deteriorate to the point of no return. Before that I will go to a referendum. It is very important. I am convinced that the people of the province of Quebec do not want their province to separate from the rest of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Sauvé: The situation in Quebec—and this is having an effect on the rest of the country—could become unbearable. Therefore, there would be immense advantage to holding a referendum on the question of national unity. That is the meaning of this legislation.

I cannot understand why the opposition does not accept this measure. I can see that they might find some fault with it, but we are prepared to discuss that. However, they refuse even to consider that this is a measure which is needed at this time. I am surprised this point escapes someone like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, who comes from the province of Quebec. Rather than relapsing into political expediency, with the opposition seeking to contradict us at all times, I thought he would have used his offices as a Quebecker to influence his party. After all, he is a senior member and must have some influence in that party. However, he let himself be superseded by one of the recently attracted political stars. I am sure the opinions voiced by the opposition originate there rather with someone like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi who has been living in the province of Quebec for a long time. I say to the hon. member, never abandon your position in a political party. Never abandon it to anyone else. Holding your position in politics is of the essence.

I appeal to members on the other side to join in giving the government this instrument which could be used to dissipate the confusion which is being systematically nurtured. The Parti Québécois know that if they are clear, they will be defeated. Our task as federalists has become increasingly difficult in Quebec with the accumulation of these ploys, contradictory statements and misuse of words which are constantly being hurled at the people. We must keep clarifying the issues, pointing out the manner in which everything is being done at the present time.

I plead with hon. members, do not add to this confusion. Try to see through this constant manipulation of the people which, in my view, is a most sinister abuse of democracy. If you follow the scene closely and apply some political judgment to your analysis, you will find that this referendum bill is indispensable. It is an indispensable response to the circumstances and crises which this country faces.

[Translation]

Because we want to know, Mr. Speaker, that while the process of amending the constitution is going on in Canada, the process of disruption has already begun in Quebec. However, being unable to anticipate the consequences of the venture, the government of René Lévesque stalls, dodges the issue and fosters confusion, postpones its deadlines, launches a vigorous propaganda campaign to seduce Quebeckers and make them believe they can be both Quebeckers and Canadians in a separate Quebec. In that context, it is urgent that the government of Canada take it upon itself to set the people straight and to shed light on a political manoeuvre which clearly appears today to be a death-trap and a risky gamble on the future of Quebeckers.

Because of those manoeuvres, we had to react and to provide ourselves with an instrument at least equal to that of the Parti Québécois. So a referendum is necessary. We will hold a referendum if necessary, but not necessarily a referendum.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate. However, after having sat through it yesterday and today I feel compelled to do so. The word "distort" has been dropped often in this debate by way of an accusation by one or other hon. members on the opposite side. Sitting here listening to the speeches during the parliamentary days since we have been back, the greatest distortions have been coming from the other side.

The hon. lady who just resumed her seat and other members opposite have said that we do not really understand the situation in Quebec. Is it because we do not live there? If that is the case, I can equally say that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) does not understand the Yukon because he does not live there. Nor does he live in the province of Quebec. However, I do not say that. One does not have to live in a province to understand what is going on there, any more than one has to live in another country to understand what is going on in another country. It helps, certainly, but I do not suggest to the hon. lady or to any other member opposite that they do not understand the Yukon because they have not lived there. I have been fortunate enough to live in every province and both territories of Canada, but I do not say I understand the country because of that good fortune.

This distortion has been brought out by each successive speaker on the government side, and at the same time they say they are not using the national unity question as an issue in the forthcoming election campaign. All their speeches have been focused on the question of national unity and very little time has been devoted to the dangers inherent in this bill itself. I might say that the main factor—I am glad to see the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), I believe it is, in his seat because he served in the last war—that caused me to seek the Conservative party was what happened in this country in 1942; I shall have one or two things to say about that in a moment.

Speaking of distortions, the hon. lady says we are against public referenda in Canada. Yesterday I saw she was in her seat when our leader spoke on the subject and made it clear that we were not against a referendum on the question of unity or any question concerning Quebec. We are not against it at all. But we did make it quite clear—the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) did this yesterday in a very eloquent fashion—that the question should be a specific one and that parliament should decide on that question.

The hon. lady says it is logical to ask Premier Lévesque to make his question clear in the referendum, that it is logical we should insist on that clarity so that the people of Quebec will not be confused when they come to vote for or against. I agree. But if it is logical to demand this of Premier Lévesque, is it equally logical for us in the opposition to demand that the government make its question equally clear before we are asked to pass judgment upon it? So when the hon. lady and others over there say we are against referenda, that is false; it cannot be dignified by any other description. And when hon. members over there say that because of the dangers we see in this bill, and our position in opposing it, we do not trust the people of Canada—I hear this from the NDP, too—that is equally false. It is simply not so. If it is sensible to hold a referendum on the question of unity then, surely, we should know the question; and that has been the practice on previous occasions in this country when a referendum was held. We say: Bring in a simple bill and write the question into the bill. We want a clear question formulated.

Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau)—I believe that was his riding; it was either him or the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette)—spoke on national unity. I sometimes think that members over there, when they are speaking on questions as vital as this one affecting the nation have tunnel-vision which prevents them from seeing the 40 per cent of Canada above the 60th parallel. He said he got angry because we on this side were not concerned about the question of unity. Well, if he experienced anger with respect to the debate which is going on today over unity, imagine my frustration and the frustration of those who live in the Yukon. Here are people fighting to get out of the country and there we are in the Yukon fighting to get in. Does the government of the day hear our pleas? Is there any question of holding a referendum to seek the opinions of those in the Yukon wishing to join confederation? I should say not. Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) takes exactly the opposite view.

For this reason I was disappointed in the report of the Task Force on National Unity because there was not one single reference in that report to those Canadians in the Yukon, to those Canadians whom I represent—and I come from the most westerly city in Canada. There is a brief reference to the travels of the task force; they say they travelled from St. John's, Newfoundland to Yellowknife. That is as far as the reference goes. We were not totally absent, though, because the coat of arms of the Yukon was displayed on the front cover of the report. That was some small consolation; we were remembered, somehow, but I do not think it was in the minds of those responsible for compiling that report.

The minister who has just spoken says she cannot understand why we do not accept this legislation. She, and speaker after speaker from the other side, have accused us of opposing everything, making a broad, generalized accusation that we are somehow a party of chronic opposition and chronic filibustering. She has forgotten the pipeline legislation of last year and how, if it were not for this party, that legislation might not even yet have seen the light of day in this House.

They distort not only the position taken by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr.Crombie) and the Leader of the Opposition—that rug has been pulled out from under them, now—but they have tried to make an issue of this reference to negotiating sovereignty association, separatism, or whatever. I might remind them of the remarks made by their own leader as recently as December 20, 1977. They were indignant that we or anyone would even consider negotiating a question of separatism with the people of Quebec, yet in an interview with Bruce Philipps on December 20, 1978, The Prime Minister was asked this question:

> But there is no real, legal way to separate, is there, Prime Minister? It is not provided for in any law that I know about.

To which the Prime Minister replied:

> No, it is not. That is why there cannot be any unilateral declaration of independence. But in the same way there was no law in Britain permitting any of its colonies to separate. When the reality of a colony no longer wanting to be a part of the British empire arrived, well, the Brits just passed a law. What I am saying basically is that if ever Quebeckers by an overwhelming majority decide they no longer want to be a part of this country then they are going to sit down and negotiate with the rest of the country how they can be kept in.

That was said by the Prime Minister. Yet they are accusing us of somehow bargaining the country away by saying exactly the same thing. Of course, we will talk with the people if the referendum which is to be held, presumably in Quebec, is passed by a majority. It is either that or allow the country to do down the tube, and that is certainly not want I intend to do.

I want to touch on something which is quite important in this debate. The Leader of the Opposition laid out the dangers inherent in this legislation with abundant clarity. I, like others on this side who have expressed opinions, am very disturbed by this legislation. It means the end of responsible government in this country. In a moment or two I am going to quote verbatim the words uttered in the 1942 debate by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). At that time he coined a phrase: "Not government by legislation, but government by plebiscite". That is the direction we will take if this referendum bill is passed.

What the hon. member for Gloucester neglected to point out yesterday and what the hon. member for York East neglected to point out, when they accused the Leader of the Opposition of not having read the bill and when they trotted out the safeguards they thought were contained in the bill so that no abuses could occur, was the fact that if this bill is passed, it will permit the cabinet to frame questions, and it will permit the government with its majority—and this legislation is more likely to be abused by the present majority than by any other political party I can think of—to lay on the whips and ask questions regardless of the opinion of anyone else in this House. That same danger was inherent in the 1942 legislation.

It is no comfort whatsoever to say that whenever a question is framed, if ever, on whatever issue or problem, it will be brought before the House of Commons and allowed 40 hours of debate, which is closure in advance. It is no comfort whatsoever to me, and I am sure to others on this side, to be told that this is a safeguard. That is simply phony terminology. Thirty-five hours is the advance closure in the Quebec legislation, as I understand it. No other country in the world which has legislation authorizing referenda imposes any limit on debate. That point was omitted from the arguments yesterday, and this is an extremely dangerous provision in the bill.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) would permit a question.

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly.

Mr. Breau: Does the hon. member believe that the 40-hour limit proposed in this bill is the most serious part of the bill, and would he agree to support this kind of legislation if there was no time limit on debate?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. I did not notice whether he was in the House at the beginning of my remarks when I spoke about the sweeping powers granted by this bill being dangerous. The danger is not just the question of the 40-hour limit. We are not opposed to referenda, but we want to see a specific bill, such as those which were brought in in 1942 and 1898. We want to see a specific question. Then we would have our say, and the bill could pass with the government's majority. That is what we want to see. This bill is bad and it is dangerous. It is explosive.

However, the government did not stop at imposing a 40-hour limit on debate in this place. It imposed advanced closure in the other place. That is provided for in clause 5(3), which limits debate in the other place to 40 hours. That is going pretty far down the road toward totalitarianism, and it should be taken out. With its majority, the government is going to pass this bill anyway, and it is an extremely dangerous piece of legislation. It will be rammed down our throats in any event, but it is one of the most dangerous pieces of legislation to hit this place since 1942.

I pointed out to the hon. member for Gloucester that the 1942 legislation brought in by the then prime minister was couched in the same terms. The right hon. member for Prince Albert will remember that. That legislation asked for a blank cheque.

Another point of which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) reminds me is that we are being asked to believe that there is such great urgency about this legislation that we must succumb to advance closure which would limit debate to 40 hours. Yet when we were involved in a global struggle to maintain the freedoms for which that war was fought, in the middle of all the urgency of a worldwide conflict there was unlimited debate. That was not even attempted to be taken away by Prime Minister Mackenzie King of that day.

Mr. Beatty: This government has made Mackenzie King look good.

Mr. Nielsen: And that is some feat. Because of the fight which was led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert and others in the opposition of that day, Mackenzie King saw the lack of sense in what he was doing. I will read some excerpts from that debate. They are to be found in Hansard for February 25, 1942. The right hon. member for Prince Albert said the following:

> I have in my hand a copy of the bill. Why does it not incorporate the question to be asked of the people? This bill as placed before parliament will have but one result. It will change the constitutional history of this dominion, in that it will permit the Prime Minister at any time from this day on to submit a plebiscite on any matter whatsoever to the people of Canada, with the authority of this parliament.

That is precisely what we are being asked to do today.

> It is so worded, Mr. Speaker, that it is operative beyond the war. It is so worded that the Prime Minister can continue to submit plebiscites at any time and without restriction. Let me ask this question. Why was not the method followed this time similar to that adopted in submitting the plebiscite of 1898? In my opinion this bill represents a milestone along the way that will destroy responsible government. The Prime Minister has said in effect that a great harm was done to the principle of responsible government in 1940 when he promised that there would never be conscription for overseas service, and now in effect wishes to undo the harm so that responsible government may be restored again.

That was from page 835. At page 836, drawing a distinction between the 1898 legislation and the 1942 legislation, the right hon. member said, and I quote:

> To illustrate the difference I should point out that under the measure as it now appears before parliament, the Prime Minister and his government do not have to submit any questions to the people, whereas under the plebiscite of 1898 the question to be asked was in the statute. The other major difference is that the government may submit as many questions as they choose when they choose. They may place a plebiscite on any question before the people at any time in the future. There is no control whatsoever . . .
> When the statute was passed in 1898 there was nothing evasive in the attitude of the government. The question was put in the statute. The regulations as to voting were contained in the statute.

After the shellacking Prime Minister Mackenzie King had received from the right hon. member for Prince Albert with regard to the irresponsible nature of the bill which was brought before parliament, and after the right hon. member pointed out to Mackenzie King the harm it would do to responsible government, the prime minister of the day said the following as it is recorded at page 837:

> I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend—

He always said that, but he always did.

● (1600)

—but may I say that I did make it quite clear to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he referred to the same matter that I could see no reason whatever why the question itself should not be inserted in the bill. I hope it will be by the committee.

MR. HANSON (YORK-SUNBURY): Why not make this a special bill?

MR. MACKENZIE KING: That is all it was intended to be.

MR. HANSON (YORK-SUNBURY): Apparently the Prime Minister did not get his ideas across to the draftsman of the bill.

If this bill becomes law, if it is passed in its present form, we are going to have in Canada government by plebiscite, not by responsible government.

MR. DIEFENBAKER: But this is the bill upon which we are asked to vote. If we pass this bill we allow the government to submit a plebiscite at its will, at any time and on any matter whatsoever, and against that I protest.

I imagine the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) remembers that debate and the reaction that we overseas had to that debate.

The hon. member for Gloucester says he gets angry. I get angry when I think back to those days, when I think of what the present Prime Minister was doing at the time this debate was going on in parliament; riding around Montreal on his motorcycle with a German helmet and condemning Canada—

Mr. Collenette: A cheap shot.

Mr. Nielsen: It is the truth, it is the truth.

An hon. Member: A cheap man.

Mr. Railton: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not ashamed of my conduct during those days, but that right hon. gentleman should be; he should be.

Mr. Railton: I am not ashamed of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Nielsen: It is time these things were said. It is time members opposite were reminded of it, because that is what we are dealing with in this bill.

Mr. Railton: That indicates what kind of man you are.

Mr. Nielsen: He was riding around Montreal complete with German helmet, extorting Canadians in Quebec not to support the Canadian government war effort—the Canadian war effort—because "it would be supporting a British imperialistic war".

An hon. Member: Terrible.

Mr. Nielsen: But I and many others in this House—

Mr. Collenette: Whom are you quoting?

Mr. Nielsen: The present Prime Minister.

Mr. Collenette: Table the quote.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, I have it in my files. If the hon. member—

Mr. Railton: Table the document.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member wants—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Rae: Did the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) use the word "extol" or "extort"?

Mr. Nielsen: Extort.

Mr. Rae: Extort. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member opposite who has been interjecting—I forget his riding—also should remember that is where the two years of age was lost, in that period of time. Yes, I get angry. I get angry to think for the second time now we have this kind of legislation before us.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I do not trust this government any farther than I can throw it with respect to the implementation of this kind of wide power.

An hon. Member: That goes for you too.

Mr. Nielsen: I would like to throw it somewhere, I can tell hon. members.

Mr. Breau: What power?

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member for Gloucester was not listening yesterday—

Mr. Breau: I was.

Mr. Nielsen: One of the reasons for my unrest about this bill is that it would allow the government—

Mr. Breau: Parliament.

Mr. Nielsen: This government. This government has the majority. Parliament cannot do a damn thing about resisting this bill, and the hon. member knows it. All we can do is speak and try in speaking to arouse in the hearts of responsible members opposite—

Mr. Railton: You are still in the barnyard, right on a pile of manure.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) is still interrupting.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member for Welland wants to take part in the debate, I wish he would do so on his own time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Welland rises on a point of order.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I think I have the right to say, when the honour of my leader is being impugned, that the hon. member opposite who is speaking is adopting a nasty, mean attitude, and that he is standing on top of some very dirty material in the barnyard.

Mr. Beatty: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Railton: We do not come to parliament to listen to this kind of thing.

Mr. Paproski: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Spurious points of order. We got it from the hon. member for York East yesterday who smuggled in comments through spurious points of order. Let me tell the hon. member that it was not I who was going around urging Canadians not to go overseas. I went. It was not I who was riding around Montreal in those days. I was over there, if the hon. member wants to talk about honour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) rises on a point of order.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I find that kind of comment unusual. Having been one of those who served and came from Montreal, I do not remember anything like that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: I just do not happen to, and I happen to have been reading French and English at that time there. So I think maybe we should be careful about making remarks about individuals.

Mr. Beatty: Do you deny it?

Mr. Nielsen: All the hon. member has to do is to read his leader's own writings. The press—

Mr. Collenette: Table it.

Mr. Nielsen: I could fill the table with them. Time magazine of 1965, for one. Go ahead and look; they will be in the archives, the evidence.

Mr. Collenette: Do you have it here today?

Mr. Nielsen: No, I do not.

Mr. Collenette: If you do not have it here today, you should not quote from it.

Mr. Nielsen: It is burned on my mind from the number of times I have read them.

Mr. Collenette: Place it on the table.

An hon. Member: You cannot stand the truth.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of National Defence knows that what I am saying is true. He knows that what I am saying is true.

An hon. Member: Stand up and deny it, Barney.

Mr. Nielsen: In any event—

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member knows he has gone too far; he is hesitating.

Mr. Nielsen: I have told only the truth. The truth hurts.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has the floor.

Mr. Nielsen: In view of the interjections it must hurt, and the truth usually does; the truth usually hurts.

Mr. Collenette: We heard you yesterday.

Mr. Nielsen: That is fact and it is true. I could go on in that vein—

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Nielsen: —but I want to stick to this bill. I am speaking in terms of what went on with exactly the same legislation in 1942. The prime minister of that day saw the dangers, and the bill went to committee. It came back from committee and all the generalities had been stripped from it. It came back from committee as a specific bill, with a specific question in it. That is what we on this side are prepared to support. There is no rush to put this bill through. When Mr. Lévesque gets good and ready to put his question, then is the time to bring a bill before parliament with the question the government wants to put. That is when we should be asked to vote on it.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Nielsen: But to ask for these sweeping powers at this time is sheer nonsense. The hon. member for Gloucester asked me about these sweeping powers, and I was about to tell him about one of my very vital concerns respecting the broadness of this bill. It is that the government can decide, because it is a constitutional issue, to put a referendum to the people of Canada, or indeed to any individual province in Canada, respecting whether our native people have any such thing as aboriginal rights. They are a minority—

Mr. Breau: You have to put that to parliament for approval.

Mr. Nielsen: This bill is not putting things to parliament. It is a bill for putting questions to the people of Canada or to any other province, the population of any other province.

Mr. Paproski: Draw the hon. member a picture.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members opposite have said that we do not understand the bill, but judging from the comments of the hon. member for Gloucester, it is painfully obvious that he not only has not read the bill, but has not even listened to the debate.

Mr. Breau: I have read the bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Under the provisions of this bill, the government could put that very question by referendum to the people of Canada or to any particular province.

Mr. Breau: If approved by parliament.

Mr. Nielsen: It will be approved by the government, not by parliament. The government has a majority and what it decides to do it is going to do. It does that in this place and in every single committee because of its majority. Do not try to snow us, or, as the hon. lady describes it, confuse the issue, by saying parliament is doing this. We are not doing it; we are opposing it. Hon. members opposite are doing it. It is wrong, dangerous and should be booted out if there is a possibility of such a question being put to the people of Canada in respect of native rights by way of referendum. That is dangerous, and for that reason alone it should be booted out, because there is that possibility. To do the proper thing we should follow the course we followed on two occasions in Canada, in 1898 and in 1942, when specific questions were set forth in specific bills.

● (1610)

Once again, to emphasize by repetition, let me say that, apart from the province of Quebec with its legislation, this is the only jurisdiction in the world that is putting advance closure on the debate on a question, whatever question the government decides to dream up, not only here but in the other place as well. That to my mind, sir, is right next door to a totalitarian state.

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I take part in this debate which is of great importance and which will mark an altogether significant step in our collective and political life. Let us not kid ourselves, the sole reason why this bill is before us is the victory of the Parti Québécois on November 15, 1976. While this bill concerns every Canadian, it is of special concern to Quebeckers for they will have to take a decision on the constitutional future of Quebec.

Quebec is like a giant who has just woken up, a province which now entertains doubts about its history, its culture, its social organization and its political institutions, wondering as well why it should belong in Canada such as it was established in 1867 by the Fathers of Confederation. Yes, Mr. Speaker, Quebec has woken up and possibly this awakening will bring a second breath, a new vigour to the idea of a real Canadian confederation. If members of the Canadian federation want to keep Quebec in, they will have to accept it as a fascinating and full-fledged society.

The Task Force on Canadian Unity has just published its report, where it talks, of this awakening, in the chapter intituled The Anatomy of Conflict. It says, and I quote:

> For the longest part of Quebec's history one theme dominated the cultural life of the collectivity. That theme was survivance, or sheer survival. This overriding concern for the maintenance of the way of life of a people coloured the relationship between Quebeckers and their compatriots.

But, Mr. Speaker, only an insensitive observer of the life of the province could fail to note a substantial shift in approach in which that community's concern for survival is now expressed by the thoroughly contemporary and dynamic pursuit of its own development.

Mr. Speaker, those remarks were made by a task force which was created by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself and which described itself as being federalist. Such a quotation is a good illustration of the confusion which prevails in Canada today and of the long way we have to go if we are to restore national harmony. The Task Force on Canadian Unity proposes a new federation, and even though Quebeckers feel that those recommendations do not go far enough, yet these reflect a state of mind which is more conciliatory and not based on childish fights. One cannot talk, Mr. Speaker, of that state of mind which is suggested by the task force without wondering about the federal government's state of mind when it comes up with this bill concerning the holding of a referendum on matters relating to the Constitution of Canada.

When I talk about the federal government's state of mind, I refer to its real intentions in relation to the possible holding of that referendum. In any case, if this bill is passed, hon. members of this House may not have to wait long before they get into a debate on a referendum question. This bill does not concern Quebec alone, but the federal government might indeed use it in any litigious matters between the central government and the provinces.

In spite of the constitutional conferences, the present frame of mind is much more directed toward confrontation than toward dialogue. All this is understandable since one side wants sovereignty association and the other seeks centralized federalism. Canada needs a constitutional readjustment and this is the spirit which should prevail. Since 1945, provincial responsibilities have kept increasing. Just think about the importance of natural resources, education, public health. And yet the flexibility of the British North America Act is often limited in terms of subsidies to the provinces.

Always in the same spirit, the election of the PQ is a reaction to an old constitutional arrangement which goes back as far as 1867 and which does not reflect today's reality. I sincerely think, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have to renegotiate seriously the Canadian confederation before holding a national referendum. Otherwise we would be putting the cart before the horse. Can we demonstrate our seriousness to the Canadian people when there were no serious negotiations? I shall accept a national referendum when we have had serious negotiations and when the Canadian people as a whole, and particularly the people of Quebec, have before them really concrete proposals.

Assuredly, Mr. Speaker, the Parti Québécois government is going to hold a referendum within one year; it will seek approval to negotiate the conditions of sovereignty association; this is not a good deal for the federal government and it would be most unfortunate if Quebec should separate from Canada. It does not mean however that the central government should not reform the constitution to make it more favourable to the well-being of Quebec and other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to warn the government that its lack of responsibility as far as national unity is concerned could turn out to be very expensive for Canadians. Indeed, by acting in an obstinate fashion, the federal government would help considerably the all-out supporters of separatism in Quebec. In the present context, Bill C-9 would betray the interests of Canadians and provide a dangerous opportunity for propaganda. We have heard about national unity for several years, especially since November 15, 1976. I consider that this word, Mr. Speaker, is mere propaganda because it assumes uniformity and thus does not correspond to the Canadian reality.

Canadian unity does not exist and has never existed, because there have been too many different groups. However, there are groups in Canada that are willing to share their common interests. The central government's role is to channel the common forces in the best interests of all communities. I should like to remind hon. members that national unity implies cultural homogeneity and sometimes a unitarian government. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, such is not the case in our country.

Before asking Quebeckers whether or not they are in favour of sovereignty association or whether they prefer our present federalism, it would be in the interest of the central government to make serious proposals instead of minor reforms such as those proposed in the former Bill C-60. Canada has to be rebuilt in order that our ten provinces and our two territories may fight for a common cause. I believe Canada must form a marriage of convenience, and if this country is to grow, it is essential. All parties concerned should be able to fulfil themselves. There cannot be a really viable Canada and a legitimate partnership unless the two contracting parties have freely agreed to it and unless each party recognizes that it is clearly in its interest to share its existence with others.

Until such time as circumstances change, any partnership such as Canada must recognize the right of all parties to the contract to very flexible formulas for amending its constitution. After 110 years, each and every one of the provinces has the right to examine its situation in relation to confederation and to renegotiate sections of the constitutional act. To date, the Quebec government alone has expressed its intention of holding a referendum on the constitution.

[Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve).]

I therefore ask the federal government and hon. members to respect the spirit of the Canadian confederation and wait for the results of the Quebec referendum. I feel that Canadians must express their views on the constitutional future of the country after a provincial referendum. Provincial governments and many Canadian citizens are displeased with the present federal system. The current distribution of responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments no longer reflects reality. The federal government machine has become too cumbersome and we have to submit to regulations that border on inefficiency.

I have here in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a letter from a citizen who lives in Radisson, on James Bay, and who is having problems with the unemployment insurance system. I would like to repeat to hon. members some of his quite enlightening comments about the present system. Here is what he says:

> Why should I be against federalism? Perhaps because I am now convinced that I am supporting a costly, ineffective, system which is so overburdened with legislation, regulations, paper work and bureaucrats that it cannot deliver the opportunities promised when I adhered to the system.
> Why should I be unable to obtain benefits for which I have been paying premiums for years?
> Is it unreasonable to believe that the part I play in a project as remote as James Bay will make me lose the benefits to which I am entitled?

As it can be seen, this citizen is not pleased with the government and he is not alone. In closing he writes, and I quote:

> To relieve you from the painful task of reading my indignant comments, I will tell you, sir, that I want to be a positive asset in a Canadian and Quebec community, but if a referendum is to be held in the near future I will not consider it as a political but rather as a practical matter, to wit, have I paid to support a system which has not given me what I could rightly expect?

Mr. Speaker, that is the fundamental question we must answer when we consider this legislation. That is the question the Pepin-Robarts commission attempted to answer. That is also the question the various governments and especially the federal government must answer. That is the question the provincial governments must discuss and it is the issue to which will relate the reforms they will submit to their people.

Mr. Speaker, I insist on the fact that the federal government is a creature of the provinces and that all constitutional reform proposals must come from them. The latest constitutional conferences have indicated a general dissatisfaction which is not peculiar to Quebec. All you can hear about in the province of Quebec is dissatisfaction. The people of that province have elected a government whose option is sovereignty. I think the situation is serious enough and that there is no need for us to make it worse by holding a second referendum without any previous negotiation. I deplore that atmosphere of confrontation which opposes the federal government and the government of Quebec. We have had a war of statistics and we shall soon have a war of referenda.

Mr. Speaker, earlier I referred to the state of mind of this government. I am afraid that its attitude and that of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are not very conciliatory. On the one hand he wants to adopt this bill with a certain measure of haste; on the other hand, at his press conference last Friday, he refused to acknowledge the Canadian duality which Quebec exemplifies. Something which the Pepin-Robarts commission has already acknowledged. The right hon. Prime Minister has often stated that he would refuse to negotiate the possibility of sovereignty association in case Quebeckers replied affirmatively to the Parti Québécois referendum. I suggest that the attitude of the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues is quite arbitrary. It is not certain that Quebeckers will reply affirmatively to this referendum. As elected members of the Canadian public, we are not asking the government to negotiate the independence of the province of Quebec, but instead a constitutional arrangement which would recognize the particular character of each Canadian province.

Many recognize that the present government is suffering from a superiority complex, and also from what I would call a chronic case of inflexibility. It is indeed showing its inflexibility by engaging in this all-out fight, when the interests of all concerned would dictate co-operation and understanding between partners. In any event, Mr. Speaker, the present political climate and the general purport of Bill C-9 lead me to believe that this referendum will be a propaganda tool rather than a means of discussion and information. The government restricts the scope of its referenda solely to constitutional issues. Besides setting limits of referendum expenses, the bill defines eligibility to the referendum vote and air time allocated to opposing groups as well as to federal and provincial parties. To go back on those main themes, I must say that I deplore the fact that the bill is concerned only with constitutional issues, whereas several other points could be considered, such as abortion, capital punishment, social policies, and so on.

On December 12 last, the former minister of state for federal-provincial relations and the leader of the New Democratic Party praised the democratic merits of referenda. We even heard the leader of the New Democratic Party give his support to this bill. I would suggest to him that he think it over carefully before voting for this bill. I would like to remind hon. members of this House that the result of the referendum would not in any way compel the government to respect the opinion expressed by the public; so one may wonder what the government's reaction would be to a positive response of the people concerning sovereignty association for Quebec. Once again, the Prime Minister said last Friday that he would not negotiate. This means that the government might follow the policy established before the referendum in spite of the opinion expressed. If the referendum is negative, there will be no problems for the federal government, but we must question the legal value of a strictly consultative referendum.

Furthermore, we do not know the wording or the scope of the referendum question. I fear a serious confrontation might be brought about by two referenda, one by Quebec and the other by the federal government, for each of them will try to rally the people to its cause. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to make a few comments on the air time and the expenses allowed. We can see that the air time will be in part allotted to the federal parties and in part to the provincial parties of each province. This means that the federalist parties will get almost all the air time.

I would also like to voice serious reservations about allowable expenses. Bill C-9 is much less restrictive than the Quebec law. Referendum expenses and contributions made by a person, a group or a political party must not exceed $5,000. But only registered political parties and referendum committees will be allowed to make contributions and expenses exceeding $5,000. I believe that this part of the bill discriminates against small political parties and referendum groups. I cannot see how the government can claim it is exercising democracy with such rules. It becomes very obvious that groups and parties with unlimited funds at their disposal will enjoy a clear advantage over the others and this constitutes a propaganda risk.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my speech by putting hon. members and Canadians on guard against the risk of manipulation of public opinion. I am not imputing wrong intentions to the government, but I do want to warn them that this legislation could be a major asset in the constitutional dispute. Before holding a referendum, it would be preferable that the governments negotiate and put before the people a real common constitutional project aimed at the development of all Canadians and the economic, social, political and human progress of this country. Canada is a great country of which we must be proud. There should be no room here for discord, so let us show the entire world that we are a nation that is basing its relations on mutual respect and harmony.

Mr. Wm. Andres (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased for various reasons to be able to enter the debate this afternoon on Bill C-9, the referendum bill. From the outset I had made up my mind that I wanted to take part in the discussion because I believe in this country, Mr. Speaker. I believe in the rights, freedoms and privileges of each group and of each region. I believe that as Canadians we have an obligation to each other, a responsibility to each other, to keep this country united. This country was born as a result of people coming here for various reasons in their search for freedom and opportunity. I believe it is the responsibility of the government to see that those freedoms and privileges are protected.

Canada is made up of diverse groups of people of various cultures and traditions and, indeed, with two official languages, yet it is rooted in many other languages. These rights and privileges have been recognized by this government, but now there appears to be a threat. Indeed, there not only appears to be but there is a threat. One government in this country has as its aim to separate from confederation, not necessarily by the will of the people within that province. It has taken upon itself to make that move supposedly in the interest of that region.

The federal government has a responsibility to see that those people get a fair hearing, that the views of those people are respected, that their views are not distorted but are taken into consideration. It is for these reasons that I support this bill.

While the leaders in that particular province have taken upon themselves to move the province out of confederation—and it may even be by various and devious means—they have suggested that when all else fails, as when the support of the people failed prior to the election of 1976, they would not separate from the rest of Canada without a referendum. Subsequent to that many statements were made because it was felt that they did not have the support of the people. When we question the motives and methods that may be imposed upon the people of Quebec we must also take a stand to protect the rights of the people in that province as well as the rights of all regions of Canada.

Many words were uttered in this House in the few days before the Christmas recess on this subject. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred to what he called the distortion of this bill by various speakers. I cannot accept that kind of remark, Mr. Speaker, because I am convinced that all parliamentarians are here to represent the views of the people in their constituencies as well as the views of Canadians from all corners of the country. I do not believe for one moment that there are members of this House who would willingly distort the intent of that bill, the words contained therein, or the purpose of the bill.

The hon. member also suggested that the bill was bad, dangerous and explosive. I take the opposite view, Mr. Speaker. The bill is not dangerous, nor is it explosive. The bill is in the hands of the government, in the hands of this House, in the hands of parliamentarians; if it is dangerous and explosive then maybe the hon. member for the Yukon ought to look at himself and his own motives in reflecting on the bill.

Parliamentarians need to take a rational approach. At times in this House we take a very partisan approach, and I have been party to that course myself sometimes in an insignificant way. I do not believe that at this time, however, there is room for partisan politics because the future of this country is at stake. I am convinced that we are all concerned about it. We need to have a unified approach. Goodness knows we have enough discord in various parts of Canada. I even see the discord and fracture on the other side of the House when I hear some members talk about sovereignty association and negotiations for sovereignty association. Then later I hear remarks from speakers on the other side who would not negotiate.

We need to get our act together, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members on the opposite side need to take a look at where they are going. Maybe they ought to consult with their leader and with their constituents a little more. In the end it will be the Canadian people who will speak. It is at this time and with this bill that the federal government is prepared to consult the people of Canada. It is because of the importance of this issue, the opinions that have been expressed and the hazards that we face that I can support this kind of a view and this kind of an attitude.

I am not even sure what some hon. members on the opposite side of the House are speaking about when they talk in terms of negotiation of national sovereignty. Where is their mandate? They do not have a mandate to speak about national sovereignty or to negotiate with the PQ.

For the first time in history Canada is facing a challenge, the very outcome of which threatens to sever the bridge of her nationhood. It is that important. It is a serious question. Circumstances facing Canadians are peculiar and unprecedented in our history. We are sailing into uncharted waters never before explored. We have a provincial government that is dedicated to separation regardless of what it says. Never before has a government sought a mandate to extricate itself from the bonds of Canadian unity.

An hon. Member: What do you think happened in 1868?

Mr. Andres: We need to consult with the Canadian people, if the matter gets to that point, so that we can protect the people. It is with this reality in mind that I support this legislation presently before this House to give the Government of Canada the authority to consult Canadians on matters pertaining to its constitution. What is more important in the Canadian constitution than the plebiscite of 1898 or the plebiscite of 1942? Those plebiscites were not regarding national unity. This particular referendum overshadows all legislation that has been brought before this House. It is of the utmost importance that members on all sides of the House take a serious look at this piece of legislation and the implications contained therein. It is important that members take a serious look at their obligations and duties to this country. It is important too that they take a serious look at the wishes of the constituents they represent in each particular region of Canada.

Miss MacDonald: Just like capital punishment. That will be the next thing you will say.

Mr. Andres: Members on the other side seem to bring up the issue of capital punishment from time to time for various reasons. I am convinced that there is only one reason for doing that, and that is to drag a red herring across the floor in order to take away attention from the importance of this particular piece of legislation.

An hon. Member: I will remember that.

Mr. Andres: There is no comparison between the issue of capital punishment and the issue of national unity. The issue of capital punishment was put before this House in a free vote. Every member had his or her opportunity. It may be that members on the opposite side may have had some restriction. I am not aware of that from the rumblings I hear, but on this side of the House it was a completely free vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andres: If there are members on the opposite side who feel this is not the case, I would challenge them to get up and say so. I would like them to tell me where and how, and to give me the proof.

Mr. Beatty: The cabinet. Ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It was cabinet solidarity.

Mr. Andres: It seems strange to them that one can support a piece of legislation while others may not support it. That they cannot understand. I am afraid there are members on the other side who have been in the opposition so long that they do not understand how freely this government operates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Free with everybody's money.

Mr. Andres: Bill C-9 which is presently before the House affects all Canadians. It gives all Canadians a direct voice in the fundamental law of the land, a law which will shape the future of our country. This is a most important piece of legislation.

There are those who feel that referenda are opposed to the principles of parliamentary democracy. There may be some validity to this kind of argument. Some people will argue that referenda give parliamentarians the opportunity to shirk their duty. There may be an element of truth in that. I would suggest to those who advance such a proposition that if the shoe fits, then they may wear it. I suspect that in many cases on the other side of the House the shoe does fit.

This particular referendum which will shape the future of our country and its laws is of the utmost importance. It differentiates in many ways from referenda held earlier.

Miss MacDonald: Which one?

Mr. Andres: I cannot see any comparison at all. This referendum, as I indicated earlier, is for the protection of people who live in a region of this country. Bill C-9 is a cautious piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andres: In fact, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) felt it was too restrictive and not broad enough. Time and again we have heard that this bill is too encompassing, too broad and too vague. The opposition say that if it only asked one question, they would support it immediately. I do not understand that level of thinking. I see a question in this bill: the protection of the Canadian people is at stake. If members opposite do not understand that, it is because they are not familiar with the bill.

● (1650)

This bill is very definitely aimed at the referendum that is supposed to be held in Quebec. The bill has an expiry date. It is under the complete control of this parliament. Where are the broad powers? Where is the question that hon. members opposite look for? Only parliament can initiate a referendum the result of which would be subject to the approval of parliament. If members opposite do not have faith and trust—

Miss MacDonald: In this government?

Mr. Andres: I said in parliament. The bill will be under the complete control of this parliament. It is ironic that as we will be facing the electorate of this country—

Mr. Gillies: Soon, I hope.

Miss MacDonald: That is the referendum they ran away from.

Mr. Andres: Members opposite feel confident. However, I can understand why their confidence has been somewhat clouded in the last few weeks by the jolly running around of their glorious leader and the various views expressed by some of the new shining stars on the horizon.

Mr. Chrétien: Tiny stars.

Mr. Andres: I can understand why they have even lost faith in themselves. Consequently, they do not understand the true meaning of this bill and the protection that is included therein. The referendum is advisory. We are seeking advice from the Canadian people on a question as important as their own future. It complements the parliamentary system by providing an additional check. In no way does it withdraw the powers of parliament or the responsibility of parliamentarians.

Mr. Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): It sounds superfluous.

Mr. Andres: In no way can this referendum be compared to the plebiscites of 1898 or 1942. In no way can it be compared to any question facing this nation because it talks about the future of this country.

It has been stated that referenda tend to be divisive. They are not; they are consultative. It is when people are not consulted that the division creeps in.

The issue involved in this bill concerns the roots of our nationhood. We are not afraid to go to the people to ask if they want to remain united. I am afraid the members of the opposition know the answers but are not responsible enough to face up to them. Sincere, honest citizens want this country to remain united and strong. It is only through this consultative process that we draw the people in and give them an opportunity to voice their opinions on national unity for the good of all Canadians. Canadians feel attached to this country. It is time they now be given a chance to voice their opinions. What will the referendum prove? It will be an affirmation from Canadians, a statement that above all else they wish to continue as Canadians from coast to coast, from north to south, in a country with ten provinces and two territories united under the banner of Canadianism.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my party is quite prepared to see this bill come to a vote this evening if the other parties are prepared to allow termination of the debate. If the other parties are prepared to terminate the debate tonight, I will be the last speaker for this party. I would indicate to the government and members of the other parties that, if it is decided that the debate will not end this evening, our members may well want to participate further in the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might permit me to say that, as far as today is concerned, we have only one more speaker, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae).

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, following the hon. member's remarks, I would like to say that on our side we are ready to vote as soon as the House is ready to do so.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that there is a growing consensus that the debate be brought to a termination. I repeat, our party is prepared to have the vote taken this evening. If the other parties would like a vote this evening, we are prepared to terminate our participation at second reading as soon as I complete my remarks. However, if the debate continues beyond this evening, there are members on this side who may well choose to participate.

As there are only two minutes remaining before five o'clock, I wonder whether I might call it five o'clock and carry on at eight o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—External Affairs—Assignment of special adviser in departments; the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan)—Business of the House—Second reading of bill concerning Arab boycott; the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—National Defence—Commitment to increase defence budget.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

RIGHTS OF WAY TO REVERT TO CROWN

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary) moved that Bill C-208, to amend the Railway Act (ownership of land where line abandoned), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reasons for presenting this bill have not changed since I first introduced it in the House some four years ago. We have discussed the bill and my motion that the government introduce such a bill on at least three occasions. Even though Liberal members, at the urging of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), talked out the bill and my motion, I find that they have not put forward any valid reason for rejecting the bill. While talking out my bill, government members wasted valuable hours by discussing other phases of transportation.

On February 28, 1978, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) spoke for almost 20 minutes on the Hall commission report with respect to prairie grain transportation before telling us that the Minister of Transport had signed an agreement with CNR and CPR in the fall of 1977 which would parallel the intent of my bill. At that time I had not seen the agreement. Since then I have tried to obtain a copy from the minister's office.

Finally I obtained a copy from the office of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowksi) after he was promised one by the minister at a committee meeting. I do not know at this time whether this agreement was signed or not, for I was not able to obtain a signed copy. Whether it has been signed or whether it has been used, no one seems to know. It is very easy for the minister to show a copy of an agreement that he and his department have dreamed up but is it valid? Has it been used? What use has been made of it?

For the record, I would like to read a copy of the agreement. It is between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the Canadian National Railway and Canadian Pacific Limited. It reads:

Whereas CN and CP have been requested by Her Majesty to make a gift, in the public interest, of certain branch line rights of way and they have acquiesced in this request as hereinafter recorded,

Now Therefore the agreement witnesseth that the parties hereto mutually agree as follows:

Upon receipt of an order from the Canadian Transport Commission authorizing abandonement of rail lines within the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta on or subsequent to August 5th, 1977, CN or CP, as the case may be, will forthwith transfer to Her Majesty by way of gift all its title and interest, mines and minerals excepted, to its right-of-way and lands appurtenant thereto. In respect of such line, excepting only the portion of any such rights of way and lands lying within an urban area, subject to the right of CN or CP, as the case may be, within eight months after the date of the order from the Canadian Transport Commission or the date of the abandonment specified in such order or the date of this agreement, whichever is the later, to enter onto such transferred lands to remove rails, ties and other railway materials therefrom. CN or CP, as the case may be, shall be responsible for the payment of taxes and maintenance of such transferred lands until it has removed the aforesaid rails, ties and other railway materials therefrom. General descriptions of the lands which it is contemplated are to be transferred pursuant to this paragraph have been prepared by CN and CP and are attached hereto as schedules A and B respectively and proper land descriptions of these lands will be incorporated by CN and CP in the transfer documents.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the parties hereto have executed this agreement by their proper officers in their behalf duly authorized in that behalf on the day and year first above written.

I believe this makes it clear that contrary to the statement by the member from Assiniboia the agreement will not serve the intent of my bill. I would, therefore, specifically urge the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), who tried to explain that the purpose of the bill was served by this agreement, as well as all hon. members, to read my bill and the agreement. I am sure that after reading my bill and the agreement they will see the intent of my bill is not reflected in the prairie rail agreement.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the CNR-CPR, is for specific rail lines abandoned in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This is a real issue. This agreement is not for all of Canada, it is just for the prairies, and not necessarily for all lines that may be abandoned in the prairies. This type of agreement should be included in a bill and included among federal statutes, not decided through ad hoc agreements, secret meetings and agreements within agreements.

Agreements of this type apply only to specified parts of the country, leaving other parts of the country to fend for themselves. For example, British Columbia is excluded from the agreement. There are problems in B.C. of equal if not more consequence, when it comes to rail abandonment. Agreements such as the one to which I referred forget an important concept—the retention of rail corridors.

The requirements of British Columbia, because of their dwindling rail system, are of at least equal importance as those of the prairies. This can also be said for eastern Canada and the Atlantic provinces. My bill would have the effect of ensuring that important rail corridors will remain open and of giving federal and provincial governments responsibility for these corridors which they will have to assume in the future.

The responsibility to provide transportation corridors in the future, when our present non-renewable fossil fuels run out, will fall on the government, not on the railway companies. It is true the companies may have had to pay for some land in the past, but this was more than compensated for by the many "sweetheart" deals they received from the government in the form of land grants and subsidies.

I take exception to the idea that the railways should retain the rights to the mines and minerals. They were granted land for the purpose of building a transportation system. It adds to the credibility of the claim that CPR is no longer simply a transportation system but is, rather, a huge conglomerate with various other interests. Imagine the confusion which would result if a mineral find should occur on a narrow corridor while these big conglomerates are holding the rights. Surely the Minister of Transport, the Department of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission can see far enough into the future to avoid this type of situation. It may only be a rare event, but think of the confusion it would cause.

A most important aspect of the agreement, Mr. Speaker, is the exclusion of portions of land and rights of way that lie within an urban area. This is one of my main arguments for having such a bill on the statute books. If valuable national assets are permitted to be broken up and sold off for short term advantage, future generations will be deprived of vital transportation corridors.

In the long run, shortage of renewable fuels will enhance rail transportation using these corridors. As fossil fuels are depleted these rail corridors will become increasingly important. The expense of reacquiring abandoned rights of way or opening new ones in built-up urban areas will add significantly and unnecessarily to transportation costs. It is in these very areas, urban areas, that it is most important that the corridors revert to the Crown.

No wonder, Mr. Speaker, the railways were so fast to sign the agreement, if the agreement has, in fact, been signed I have seen no evidence that it has. It is no wonder they made this agreement with the Minister of Transport. They knew full well that they were trading off less expensive land in rural areas in return for very expensive land in urban areas and cities.

Let us consider, for instance, Penticton, British Columbia, where a portion of the CPR's line has already been the subject of a hearing for abandonment. Marathon Realty is not too interested in the rambling line through the mountains, but even before the rail line abandonment is final it has already begun to sell off and take options on valuable property in the city of Penticton, some of it on the waterfront.

It is something again to know that a cattle rancher in a rural area has experienced a hassle in getting a crossing over a CPR line which has not been used for years, yet when he travels to Penticton he can see that rail crossings have already been paved over, knowing that approval for abandonment has not yet been granted. This is a typical way in which the railway tries to use its "authority".

My bill says that title of ownership should be vested in the Crown in the right of Canada. This, of course, means that the federal government would obtain ownership.

I know that there is some concern among the provinces that they should be the ones to receive title. I am not arguing against that, as I believe they have a good case. After all, in most cases Crown land is owned by the provinces. During the hearings of the constitution committee last year it was determined that both federal and provincial governments could own Crown land. This point could be sorted out at the committee level, should the government in all seriousness see fit to pass this bill at second reading. It might be best to have these rail lines revert to the Crown in the name of provincial governments. After all, the provinces should be the ones to deal with municipalities, not the federal Minister of Transport, who says he wants to. An appropriate amendment to this effect could be made in committee before the bill is brought back for third reading.

What kind of heritage are we going to leave our children and grandchildren? They are the ones who will have to pick up the pieces and pay the costs if we in this day and age do not protect their rights.

The CPR and the CNR are big corporations. The CPR has branched out in many ways. When one looks at its record over the last few years, one wonders whether it cares about transportation. It would appear that the government-controlled CNR is more concerned about trying to emulate the CPR than about transportation in Canada. The railway companies are oriented to the bottom line of profits. They do not care who gets hurt.

It is the responsibility of the CTC to look after people's interests. Therefore, at committee hearings and at hearings with regard to the Carmi railway abandonment my appeals to the commission were to ensure that the interests of our children and grandchildren are protected in the future. I believe the CTC has the obligation to come to parliament with recommendations to change rules or laws which do not offer this safeguard to their heritage.

Parliament has an obligation to protect the heritage of future generations. It is for this reason that I have introduced this bill. Special agreements will not solve the problem. I know my bill can. When railways are granted permission to abandon lines anywhere in Canada, the rail rights of way should revert to the Crown.

The government should take its responsibilities seriously. The Minister of Transport must be aware of this and should not send in his troops to talk out the bill. He must not become a pawn of the railways. In the interests of our children and grandchildren he should support my bill or, failing that, introduce a government bill to the same effect.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

It is time for the government to be as tough on railways who rush to abandon rail lines as it so generously supported them years ago when rail lines were first constructed in this country.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-208 is one which my friend, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), has proposed before in this House, and it has been debated on other occasions. Having said that, I do not mean to imply that it should not be debated again, because such debate serves to give the hon. member and all members of the House an opportunity to look again at developments, happenings, activities and at the rationalization of the branch line network in western Canada. This debate affords us an opportunity to review some of those things.

I was pleased to note that this afternoon the hon. member put forward some additional arguments—I think they were very sound—to support the suggestion that the bill should be considered, even though certain other events which the hon. member discussed and which I will be discussing have taken place since the time he first proposed the bill and since the time this bill was put forward in the House.

It is interesting to look over the past record of this bill and other questions relating to railroad rights of way. This bill once again illustrates the schizophrenia of the position of my hon. friends opposite. The hon. member who proposed this bill suggests that rights of way from abandoned railway lines should be turned back to the federal Crown. I believe it was on December 19, 1977 that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), who was in the House a few moments ago, seconded by my good neighbour to the west, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), moved, and I quote:

> That the Minister of Transport notify western provincial governments that he is prepared to immediately negotiate with them and with the railroads to ensure that ownership of abandoned rail line rights of way be under provincial jurisdiction.

So two completely opposite proposals have come from our hon. friends opposite within the space of about a year. However, we are getting accustomed to that. We have seen this approach in other areas as well, I suppose the most recent one being the one which has been referred to in debates and exchanges in this House over the last few days, and that is the turnaround of the official opposition with regard to economic policy. After berating this government over the last several years for the amount of government spending and the level of the deficit, over the holidays the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) showed us that he is not really worried about the deficit. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition would enlarge the deficit and spend his way back to prosperity, after spending a number of years telling us to contain government spending and so forth. I mention this to indicate that this kind of schizophrenia in Tory policy has become the custom around here rather than the exception.

I recognize that the bill proposed today by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary represents a very sincere effort and that in fact to a large degree it is presently part of this government's initiatives with respect to dealing with branch line rights of way. The government and particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) have moved much further than the hon. member suggests in his bill. The bill suggests that rights of way should revert to the federal Crown. The hon. member gave a number of very valid reasons why that should be the case. This government and transport people have said that we should go further than that. Rights of way should go to the federal Crown, but in the case of prairie branch lines the rights of way left as a result of abandonment should go directly to the rural municipalities involved and, in most cases, from them to adjacent land owners.

I think we are making very good progress on the whole question of what to do with the rights of way of these branch lines and of making sure that we are getting the land back into the hands of municipalities and from there to its rightful owners.

During the recent Christmas recess, I met with a number of different groups and individuals in my constituency. Among those groups were rural municipal councils. Some of them were municipalities which had branch lines within their boundaries which were scheduled for rebuilding, retention and reconstruction. Also, some of them were municipalities which had branch lines in the process of being abandoned. The following questions came up at different council meetings: what is happening in this regard, what is the government doing, what can they do, and so on.

The steps respecting the abandonment of branch lines in the prairie network are as follows. First, there is a Canadian Transport Commission order authorizing the abandonment of a particular line. Second, under the agreement between transport, the CNR and the CPR, which was spelled out by the hon. member who introduced the bill, the land is deeded from either of the involved railroads to the federal Crown. Third, as I understand it, the titles could well contain leases or other related caveats as they are transferred. Fourth, the land then is dealt with by a railroad bed steering committee, with the object of getting the land back into the hands of the party who deserves it. Fifth, in most cases the level of government best able to decide and to deal with it certainly will be the rural municipality. It goes without saying that in most cases the individual or person who will have the opportunity to acquire the land will be the landowner or the ratepayer who owns land on either side of the right-of-way. Quite often railroad rights of way cut through crop land, pasture land or whatever.

Much has been made of the Hall commission. Other spokesmen have indicated that ownership of rights of way should go back to rural municipalities, so that they in turn can sell them to the rightful parties in order to compensate them in some manner for the loss of tax revenue, which revenue resulted from rail lines going through municipalities. I suspect there will be more red tape for the municipalities than there will be financial revenue from much of the land. This is because it is not worth a great deal to the municipalities in that sense, nor to the landowners whose land was split or divided by rights of way. I do not see a great deal of revenue accruing to the municipalities, even though it will be of some assistance and some value.

Initially the provincial governments of the prairie provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba were very, very upset about the notion contained in the bill put forward by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. They were upset about the idea that this land should revert to the federal Crown and not to the provincial Crown for whatever reason. I have yet to find any validity or common sense in the arguments put forward by the provinces. I suppose it is a classic case of how far provincial power advocates will go in attempting to make the case that they will fight with the municipalities and the adjacent landowners over the right to have the land in their hands, leaving the federal Crown out of it entirely.

It has been a realization for me as to how ridiculous two levels of government can become when attempting to establish their rights in this regard. It is all right for the federal government to put up hundreds of millions of dollars to rebuild railroads, for subsidies and everything else; but when it comes time to accept back the land from the railroads, suddenly that particular aspect of railroad activity becomes a provincial responsibility and is no longer the right of the federal government.

Some of that antagonism seems to be waning. The province of Saskatchewan is represented on the committee to deal with farmers, rural and urban municipalities. The committee will look at the entire process of determining who should be the rightful owners of some of the land being turned back.

A great deal of progress has been made since the hon. member put forward his bill. I recognize his bill goes further than the present practice and policy of the government, although the practice and agreement established by the government and the two railroads to deal with the rights of way, which are now in the process of being abandoned across the prairies, certainly will form a precedent for rights of way in the hon. member's part of the country and other parts of Canada. As I said on a previous occasion in this debate, the bill does not go nearly as far as the government has gone in dealing with this question. The bill is somewhat redundant because we have progressed beyond the point referred to, the objective of the hon. member's bill.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments regarding the bill before the House today, I commend the hon. member for suggesting that the land in question should revert back to the Crown. His idea is a fine socialistic one. The land will go back to the Crown and be distributed to the people. I did not realize the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) was such a socialist.

Mr. Whittaker: The hon. member has said that before, and he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Nystrom: Also I did not realize how sensitive the hon. member was.

I have a copy of the report entitled: "Grain and Rail in Western Canada", written by Mr. Hall, commonly known as the Hall report. At page 103 he made comments regarding what should happen to the railbeds once rail lines are abandoned. He indicated that the land should go to the provincial Crown, and that the provinces and municipalities should make a decision on what happens to the land. Referring to page 103, in part it reads as follows:

We propose to forestall controversy by providing that, upon abandonment, the roadbed—that part of the property abandoned represented by land—vest in the provincial Crown for disposition as may be mutually agreed to between the relevant province and municipal authorities.

Mr. Hall goes on to make a few more detailed comments as to why that decision should be made between the involved province and municipalities.

I should like to make a few comments on why railway lines should not be abandoned. Of course, I realize that some lines must be abandoned, but when one refers to the abandonment of lines, one should also talk about why some lines should not be abandoned. I see the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary agreeing with me. At the present time, this issue is a very big and controversial one on the prairies.

● (1730)

About two weeks ago the minister released a report from the Prairie Rail Action Committee which studied some 2,400 miles of rail line on the prairies. It recommended that about 60 per cent of those rail lines be abandoned.

I want to go back over a little bit of the history of rail line abandonment. I know the minister has said that upwards of 70 per cent of rail lines on the prairies are preserved in that they are in the basic network and will be upgraded. That is excellent, but I think a number of rail lines that have been abandoned in the past, and a number of rail lines the government now proposes to abandon, should not be abandoned.

The PRAC report refers to 2,400 miles of line of which 60 per cent should be abandoned. It is our position and the position of the wheat pools, and they are tremendously credible as they are the ones who built the elevators and deliver 70 per cent of the grain in the province of Saskatchewan, and nearly as much in Manitoba and Alberta, that most of these lines should not be abandoned but should be preserved and upgraded, to the benefit of the people who live in the area.

Let me point out to the House what it means to some of these communities to lose their rail line. First of all, the lines that PRAC studied are the lines that in respect of which Hall could not really make a decision. Hall looked at about 6,000 miles of rail line and said about 2,000 miles were utilized to the extent that they should be put immediately into the basic rail network. He said that an additional 2,000 miles of line were not being used enough, that there were too many inefficiencies and it would cost too much to upgrade them. He suggested that they were not worth-while and should be abandoned. Those rail lines have now been abandoned by the government. The bill before the House has no direct relevance to those lines as they have already been abandoned.

Mr. Hall had a third category in respect of which he said further study was needed. He recommended the setting up of a prairie rail authority to study these lines and make recommendations to the government as to what should be done. Instead of that, the minister set up the Prairie Rail Action Committee which has advised him to get rid of 60 per cent of those lines in respect of which Mr. Hall could make no decision.

What we have said, and what has been said by the wheat pools and the province of Saskatchewan, and many other agriculturalists, is that 90 per cent of those lines should be preserved. We have suggested that they are used to haul a sufficient amount of grain to warrant their upgrading. We have said they serve a sufficient number of farmers and, in many cases, the towns rely on them, and that their removal would cause inconvenience for a lot of people. We have suggested that the farmers who haul grain to the elevators on these lines would be greatly inconvenienced if the lines were removed.

Let me point out four things it would mean to the people if the rail lines were abandoned. First of all, it would mean an extra haul to the farmers. Instead of having to haul for seven or eight miles it would mean a haul of 20, 30 or even more miles. Secondly, it would probably mean an increase in provincial and municipal taxes to upgrade the roads the farmers would be using to truck their grain instead of moving it by rail. It would also mean the speeding up of the demise of the small farm because it is only the operators of large farms who are economically able to truck the grain this extra distance.

The abandonment of a line would also mean the end of those towns on the line because the farmers are not going to go to those towns when they haul their grain to other towns. Since they haul the grain to other towns they will do their shopping there. If the farmers shop in those towns it is those towns which will prosper and grow. These other small towns will gradually diminish and die. We have had many studies which indicate that when a rail line is abandoned about half the businesses in the area eventually go. Many of the people who would normally retire and move to those towns will eventually move to other towns on an operating rail line because they want to retire in a place that is booming and growing.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member began his speech by accusing me of being a socialist. Let me say that I am not. The difference between that hon. member and myself, and he is a socialist, is that I spoke to the bill and he is speaking to everything else but the bill. I wonder if he should not now speak to the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member responds to that point of order, let me say that I have been concerned about some of his remarks and his approach to the subject matter. While he is approaching the subject matter from another direction, I wonder if it is not now the time for him at least to make an effort to speak to the bill. There is an object in the bill which refers specifically to rail line abandonments. I know the hon. member has the right to disagree with that policy of abandonment and is trying to further his point of view, but I am sure that hon. members would now be happy to hear him present his remarks in specific relation to the subject matter.

Mr. Nystrom: I take what you have said very seriously, Mr. Speaker. I was about to conclude by tying all this into the bill presented by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. I apologize for leaving the impression that he is a socialist. I know he is not. I just wanted to say I was happy to see that he does have some socialist ideas once in a while, such as those contained in the bill before us today. It is very gratifying to see a Conservative member with good ideas like this.

As I was saying, we think the government should adopt the Hall recommendations, and specifically that the land held by railroads in respect of which a rail line is to be abandoned should go to the provincial Crown, and that provincial and municipal governments should negotiate as to what happens finally to that land. We would be very remiss if one or two of us, during a debate of this kind, did not point out that instead of talking solely about what happens to the land after a rail line abandonment we should be considering the reasons for not abandoning the rail line in the first place. We should be giving reasons why 90 per cent of lines proposed for abandonment should be preserved. They should be preserved for the benefit of the farmers, the small businessmen and the towns along the lines, as well as for the people in those small towns; in short, for the the benefit of everyone who lives in the rural community. Our cities are getting too big and a lot of people would like to live in rural communities in a rural society. When we abandon the rail lines these rural communities no longer exist.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) is in the House. I hope he will participate in the debate and tell the House of Commons why the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) wants to abandon so many railway lines in western Canada—

Mr. Lapointe: It is not true. The Minister of Transport—

Mr. Nystrom: —and he also says that the Minister of Transport, in co-operation with the Department of Transport, will use the transportation policy as a tool to maintain national unity—

[English]

This is so in order that we create more equality in this country and make sure that things like freight rates do not operate as obstacles in places like the maritimes, the rural parts of Quebec, northern Ontario, the west, and places of that sort. When the hon. member makes his comments I think it would be relevant if he expanded on the bill a bit and talked about a national transportation policy as well.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity on other occasions to join with the hon. gentleman across the way who proposes this bill this afternoon in discussing the question of rail line abandonment and the disposition of railway rights of way following any abandonment procedure that might take place. I remember a day in the House of Commons just about a year ago when this subject was debated by my hon. friend from British Columbia and a number of others of us who are very interested in this matter. I am pleased that the hon. member has taken the initiative once again to bring this issue to the floor of the House, because it is a matter of importance.

Those of us who have spoken since he introduced the bill just happen to be western Canadians, all three of us from the prairie region. Hon. members will understand the interest and concern we have for this subject because of the important job that must be done and is now being done in western Canada to rebuild the grain handling and transportation system across the prairies and to export positions. It is a vital industry for our region and for Canada. There is not a more positive element in our national balance of trade figures than the figures relating to grain exports. Therefore the questions of how we can best take advantage of our grain exporting opportunities, develop markets, produce the grain to satisfy those markets, and then efficiently transport that grain to the markets, are important questions for all Canadians.

Once again I commend the hon. member for raising this issue in the House of Commons as he has done on other occasions, and I hope our discussion this afternoon will serve generally to bring matters up to date as to where we stand at the present time in this regard.

The bill proposes an amendment to the Railway Act which, on the surface, appears to be relatively straightforward. The proposal can even be considered to have some considerable merit, although the sincerity of the opposition in giving support to this bill must be questioned when one recalls that on December 19, 1977, a colleague of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) moved, under Standing Order 43, in the House:

> That the Minister of Transport notify western provincial governments that he is prepared to immediately negotiate with them and with the railroads to ensure that ownership of abandoned rail line rights of way be under provincial jurisdiction.

If I read the hon. member's bill accurately, I think he is proposing that if there is to be ownership by the Crown, it should be the Crown federal, not the Crown provincial. In the case of the Standing Order 43 motion which was raised on that other occasion—

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of clarification, I can tell the hon. member that I clarified that matter in my speech. I am sorry that the hon. member was not present during my speech, but I will be pleased to send him a copy now before he continues in this vein.

I mentioned that the jurisdiction, federal or provincial, of Crown land ownership had been discussed in the constitution committee, and it had been determined that it could be owned by either entity. In this particular instance, the bill could be amended and the matter of jurisdiction discussed in committee. I have no hang-up on who owns the land, whether it be federal or provincial.

Mr. Goodale: I am glad to have that clarification, Mr. Speaker, but I am not sure that it totally disposes of the issue before us. The distinction between ownership by the provincial Crown or federal Crown in some instances is likely to be an important distinction, and if it is something that can be reasoned or rationalized away that easily, perhaps that would be an end to the issue, but I doubt that in the negotiations such a conflict could be resolved that easily.

To listen to some of the spokesmen for the provincial governments in western Canada after the publication of the Hall report, I had the impression that they held this issue very dearly and saw through their eyes that there would be for them some considerable problem if the ownership of these roadbeds were to revert to the Crown federal.

The federal government has taken what I think is an eminently reasonable position, that where a roadbed is eventually abandoned the ownership reverts automatically to the Crown federal but only for the purpose of facilitating the transfer of ownership to the party which should, in the final analysis, hold it permanently. In the case of the roadbeds in the prairie region, the federal government has no vested interest in being the permanent owner of those parcels of land. Rightfully, the ownership should be in the hands of the local municipality or the adjacent farm owner. I think this may be an important point of distinction on this issue raised by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

The hon. member's motion, bearing in mind the region from which he comes, is more broadly based and does not simply focus upon the prairie region and the question of grain transportation. I recognize that his intention is to work a broader amendment into the law than that relating simply to grain lines on the prairies. Be that as it may, I think the most crucial and pressing issue in the country today relates to those rail lines in the prairie region, and that is why I think that the comments in this debate since the bill was introduced have focused specifically on the grain transportation question. The federal government recognizes that there is merit in federal Crown ownership of these rights of way, but only for the purpose, as I said before, of ensuring a smooth transfer of these lands to the logical owner who will derive the most benefit from them.

There are, of course, other considerations which must be taken into account with regard to this amendment. The Hall commission report recognized that municipalities affected by rail line abandonment would suffer through a loss in taxation. As a result, the government has made the decision that the disposition of abandoned rights of way on the prairies will be executed in such a fashion as to allow for compensation for that tax loss to accrue to the municipalities, in recognition of the fact that their revenues would be reduced by the loss of the taxes on the roadbeds.

To expedite the transfer of title to the ultimate owners, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) early last fall signed an agreement under which Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway will transfer to the federal government all roadbed property identified for abandonment in the prairie provinces. As the minister stated before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications last year, this agreement was reached specifically to ensure that the land is transferred to the logical recipient as quickly as possible. There is no intent of retaining the land for the federal Crown, as I have said.

In order to facilitate the process of ownership transfer, and recognizing the need for municipal compensation, the Minister of Transport has established for each of the prairie provinces a rail roadbed steering committee which will determine the disposition of abandoned rights of way in each province. Meetings have already taken place with prairie farm and municipal groups.

I can think of three specific meetings which were concerned with this question and there have undoubtedly been other discussions about it. The rural municipal organizations and the Western Agricultural Conference, which represents most farm groups in western Canada, have given active support to this initiative by the federal government. The municipal associations have now been formally invited to participate in this consultative process, and the prairie governments have also been invited to lend their support to the plan even though, as I said a few moments ago, some of them were reluctant in the first place to get involved in the federal process because they drew a strong distinction between the merits of ownership on the part of the Crown federal and ownership on the part of the Crown provincial. If the interjection from my hon. friend from British Columbia is some indication that the provincial governments have got over their concern about this issue to a certain extent, then I welcome his remarks.

The procedure worked out by federal officials in consultation with western representatives calls for the establishment in each province of a rail roadbed steering committee. This committee will consist of two representatives selected by the rural municipal organization, one from the urban municipal group, one representing the general interests of farmers, one representing the Government of Canada, and one from the provincial government should they agree to participate. I am glad to note that the province of Saskatchewan has agreed to provide a representative, thus giving provincial support to the process. Hopefully the same sort of co-operation will be forthcoming from other prairie governments.

In each case the steering committee will consider all the interests that might be involved in the abandoned rights of way. Although the ultimate owners will primarily be the municipalities and the adjacent farmland owners, exceptions will be allowed. Each proposal will be considered on its own merits.

Again, we might identify a potential problem that could exist in the generalized approach put before us this afternoon by the hon. member who proposed the bill. It might not be possible to adopt a general principle that would apply in each and every case of an abandonment or potential abandonment, in all regions of the country. Even in the case of the prairie region there are different interests expressing a desire ultimately to own the roadbeds that might be involved, and even in a rather homogeneous situation we see different viewpoints and interests being expressed. If there is that much diversity involved in what is a rather self-contained situation on the prairies, it is understandable that if the same principle were to be applied across the country, the numbers of disputes and competing interests would be rather remarkable indeed, and it might not be possible to adopt any legislation of general principle that would be workable. There will always be exceptions, competing interests, and a matter of judgment to be applied in each case as to where the ultimate ownership should fall.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is also involved in the case of those rail lines that happen to pass through Indian lands. The department will have the right of first refusal for any land which passes through Indian reserves in those circumstances.

The steering committees in each province will consider legitimate uses proposed by the provinces, such as transportation and utility corridors, subject, of course, to the payment of appropriate compensation to the affected municipalities. With those two exceptions, the interests of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the interests of the provincial governments, the general principle in the prairie region seems to be that the abandoned rights of way would be offered to the local municipality as a first priority and thereafter to the adjacent landholders who would pay for the land with the payment accruing not to the federal government but to the municipality as a form of compensation for their tax loss.

Earlier I mentioned that meetings of the roadbed steering committees have already been held. In keeping with the government's policy of ensuring that railway lines not required on the prairies revert quickly to those who can make most use of them, in most cases that means primary producers, the memberships of steering committees is oriented to small urban and rural municipality representation. I have already gone over the proposed representation for each of these committees. The membership covers a wide range of interests, and the individual representatives are involved actively in every day prairie life. It is hoped that these committees will be in a position to proceed quickly with the transfer of these lands. The procedure I have outlined is extremely flexible and adaptable to the specific conditions present when any particular rail line is proposed to be abandoned. This will ensure that these properties are disposed of in the most equitable fashion, bearing in mind all of the potential competing interests that might come to the fore.

While there is merit in the germ of the idea proposed by the hon. member from British Columbia this afternoon, I think that at least in relation to the prairie regions, events have rather overtaken the proposal. We have a procedure in place which is dealing with the situation effectively and which seems to have the general support of farm organizations and municipal organizations, and at least the province of Saskatchewan and, we hope, other provincial governments in western Canada.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Whittaker: I should like to ask the hon. member what his proposal is for abandoned lines in urban areas.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, the agreement is somewhat more complicated in the case of urban municipalities because of the competition of interests involved. I do not think I have time in the three minutes left before six o'clock to go into all the details of that. They are a matter of public record, however, and have been discussed on many occasions by the Minister of Transport, just as the provisions relating to rural municipalities have been discussed in many other forums.

To deal not only with the answer to this question but also with the one key defect that one could see in the bill proposed by the hon. member, the important point is that it is not easy to develop a single general rule that could be adopted as an amendment to the statute and that would apply in every case. I think there must be flexibility to deal with different circumstances. In the case of the rural situation one might think that the cases would be simple and that there would not be disputes. In fact there are competing interests that have to be reconciled.

To suggest it is possible to draft one amendment which would solve all the problems is rather unrealistic. I do not think it is possible to apply a general principle across the board. In saying that, I do not want to minimize what I think is some fundamental merit in the proposal made by the hon. member in terms of how we might begin the process, because in fact, we have begun in the prairies in just the way he has proposed. The significant point is that the process has gone far beyond that mere beginning.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have very little time to make my comments about this bill, I would like to take the few minutes at my disposal to point out the facts to my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who suggested that the minister recommended the abandonment of railways. I would like to remind him that this was contained in the report submitted by the Prairie Rail Action Committee and that all recommendations concerning the abandonment of certain railway lines have been referred to the Canadian Transport Commission.

Since he has been a member of this House longer than I, he should be aware of the mechanism which exists in Canada. He should recognize that it is now up to the Canadian Transport Commission to make a decision concerning the recommendations of the committee. He said that the abandonment of about 1,044 miles of railway had been recommended, but he forgot to mention that following the work of the Hall commission and the recommendations of the Prairie Rail Action Committee, more than 80 per cent of all railroads in the prairie provinces are now protected until the year 2,000, and he also forgot to mention that the Canadian government is now spending and will spend in the years to come more than $800 million to improve the railways so that they can accommodate larger hopper cars and boxcars to ensure the most efficient grain transportation network possible in Canada. I believe it is now six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour reserved for consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty), who was speaking at five o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my friends on the other side for their kind applause. I hope they will not greet the end of my remarks with the same enthusiasm as the beginning, but I hope hon. members will find my comments both informative and constructive.

Parliament is continuing its debate today on Bill C-9, a bill which the government says will give it a valuable tool for carrying on the fight in favour of national unity in Canada. This bill sets the ground rules whereby the federal government can hold a referendum on any question relating to Canada's constitution. The powers which the government is asking for are very broad. In the words of the bill itself, it would give the government the power to hold a referendum on:

> —any question relating to the Constitution of Canada or relating to or arising out of a proposed or possible change in the Constitution of Canada is of sufficient importance to warrant obtaining the opinion of electors on that question—

The referendum could be held in every part of Canada; it could be held in only one province or held in a combination of provinces. Deciding the scope of the referendum, the question to be asked in the referendum and the terms, would be left to the Government of Canada. Once the bill is passed, and it is certain to pass because the NDP have assured the government it will add its support to the government majority all the way down the line in passing this contentious piece of legislation, the government will have the power for five years to hold a vote on any constitutional question whatsoever that it chooses, once it has gone through the procedure of rushing a pro forma motion through this House of Commons. Just to obtain pro forma approval of the House of Commons, which would be gagged after 40 hours' debate on the motion, the bill provides that this government, which has demonstrated its callous disregard for parliament, will simply have to tolerate 40 hours of debate in the House of Commons before the debate comes to an end and it can ruthlessly use its majority to put aside any dissent.

That would be an enormous amount of power to give even to a good government which had proven that it knew how to use power wisely, but in the hands of this government which has ruthlessly undermined the role of parliament and implemented policies which have resulted in deep tears in our national fabric, this amount of power would be intolerable.

The Progressive Conservative party will vote against this bill. We know that in the end the support of the socialists will ensure that the bill will be passed. Fire is an element which can be an extremely useful device. In the hands of careful and responsible people, it can produce tremendous human benefits, great advantages for us all. However, in the hands of the irresponsible it can cause serious property damage. In much the same way public referenda can provide an important and valuable device in our political system. They can ensure a means by which our citizens can make important decisions about the laws under which they live.

My province of Ontario has long had a system of local option which allows residents of local communities to decide whether liquor will be served in public institutions in their community. That is an example of how referenda can be used effectively and for the public good in at least one of the jurisdictions in the country. They have been used well there for years.

Many people have asked that the federal government allow referenda on a broad range of topics in which there is considerable interest. The members of this party are not saying that there are no circumstances under which referenda can be justified, that there are no circumstances under which referenda would be useful for the Government of Canada. Indeed, several of our own members have proposed specific topics ranging from taxes on one hand to capital punishment on the other where they, as individuals, feel that a public vote would be desirable.

Just yesterday our leader indicated in debate on this bill that if the government had brought in a specific bill with a specific motion in it which could be approved by parliament, dealing with the question of national unity, and if it was clear that a referendum on that topic would be helpful in maintaining the unity of Canada, that sort of bill would have had our support. However, what we in this party are saying is that in a parliamentary system every attempt by a government to hold a referendum that would end up costing the taxpayers millions of dollars directly and indirectly before it was completed should be justified on its own merits.

No government has the right to ask parliament to approve broad legislation requiring only a rubber-stamp approval by the government majority in order to be used. In the hands of an incompetent or irresponsible government, this potentially valuable tool of a referendum could become very destructive indeed.

I ask the government members here tonight this question. If they feel that the voters might be asked a question whose importance is so self-evident that no more than 40 hours of debate would be required, why are they then not prepared to drop this bill and instead bring before parliament a specific bill authorizing a specific resolution or a specific question to be asked? Why did they come to parliament now to get virtual carte blanche for the next five years for whatever course of action they might choose to adopt?

Supporters of the government might argue that a crisis in confederation will develop over the course of the coming months that will make swift action urgent. If that is the case, as the government claimed it was the case when it suspended civil liberties in Canada seven years ago, what political party in this parliament would stand in the way of rapid approval when the time came?

Instead of indicating a respect for our parliamentary system of government, this administration asks us to give it the power now, and to entrust parliament's rights to the government's good will. That is not good enough. Let us take another look at the wording of the bill. It would allow the government to ask for a vote on "any question relating to the Government of Canada or relating to or arising out of a proposed or possible change in the Constitution of Canada" which the government would like to see voted upon.

We should look also at the definition in clause 2 where the scope is so broad as to include, and I quote:

> —without limiting the meaning of that expression,
> (a) the customs, conventions and enactments that comprise the Constitution of Canada, and
> (b) the political and judicial institutions and processes of Canada;

The wording of this bill is so broad in its scope that it would give this government virtually unlimited power to ask for a vote of the people on almost any issue it chose, because virtually no issue in Canada could be excluded from that if the government chose to define it in a way which was very broad. There is absolutely nothing in the wording of the bill which would restrict the government from asking about matters that fall exclusively under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Indeed, as recently as yesterday, a government member went on record as saying that is what he saw in this bill. I quote from page 2652 of Hansard when the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) made this statement:

> As far as I am concerned, this bill provides for this parliament to determine when or where a referendum should take place, not only on matters of federal jurisdiction but on matters of provincial jurisdiction and concurrent jurisdictions and even in unassigned jurisdictions. That is the way I interpret Bill C-9, and I think the opposition should face up to it.

We do face up to it, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate that some members of the government have not been as candid as to the government's intentions when speaking about this bill. They talked about how narrowly it would be confined. The last member who spoke on behalf of the government talked about this referendum we have before us as if he knew what question would be asked. Parliament has not been told what the question is that will be put to the people. We have been given no guarantee that it would be used sparingly, this broad power which the government is seeking. In fact we have been warned of just the opposite by a Liberal member that the government could use this bill to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction.

This bill would empower the government to inflame further the bad feelings that exist between Ottawa and the provinces by invading areas where it has no right to be. Some members opposite were present in Toronto when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke to a Liberal fund-raising dinner one week before Christmas. I read the transcript of the Prime Minister's comments at that dinner. I think it is worth considering part of them in the context of this bill. After a long recital of why he felt his government is indispensable, the Prime Minister turned to the question of resources. These were his words:

> You know, we're hearing the provinces say: Well, these resources are mine and the federal government shall have nothing to do with these resources. We don't say that. We say: The resources of any part of Canada belong to Canadians. And sure it means a little bit of hassle, a little bit of confrontation, but not a big one.

What is there in this bill that would prevent the Prime Minister if he wanted "a little hassle" with the oil-producing provinces and decided to hold a referendum on the question of whether the federal government or the provinces would control the reserves? It would be this government that decided to hold the vote in the first place. It would be this government that would decide what wording of the question would be most likely to obtain the preferred result. And it would be this government that would use its majority to authorize the vote only after 40 hours of debate in the House of Commons.

The leader of the NDP says that this bill is an essential tool for the unity of Canada. But what would he say to Allan Blakeney in Saskatchewan if the Prime Minister chose to pit the consuming provinces of Canada against the producing provinces? It would be too late then to say that parliament should not have given the government such a broad grant of power.

● (2020)

Just last week the Task Force on National Unity brought down its report. It was clear from the hearings held by the commissioners that one of the major causes of disunity in this country has been the willingness of the federal government to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction. In the words of Premier Robarts at the time, the government forced medicare on the provincial government, to "change the constitution without amending it." This has been the practice of the Liberal government through successive changes in the cabinet.

The bill before us places no restrictions upon the ability of the government to ask any question related to the constitution, whether it deals with an area of federal jurisdiction or not. At the very least, the leader of the NDP could have asked that the government confine the bill to matters either exclusively, or at least partly, falling under federal jurisdiction, before offering his party's wholehearted consent. The unity of Canada requires that much at least as a pre-condition of support for a bill of this kind.

The constitutionality of this bill deserves more than just lip service. And by "constitutionality" I mean more than just the strict legality of the bill itself, because it is probably arguable that any jurisdiction in Canada has the right to poll its constituents on virtually any subject, whether it relates to an area falling under its jurisdiction or not. But surely good constitutional practice requires that the question whether the government is acting in an area in which it has the right to legislate should be considered when a bill of this kind is being brought forward. Otherwise, the whole concept of the distribution of powers in Canada between the federal and provincial governments is made meaningless.

The government attempts to justify the introduction of this bill on the basis that the announced intention of the Lévesque government to hold a referendum in Quebec on the question of sovereignty association, whatever that means, makes it necessary for the federal government to have the power to do the same thing. The question that Quebeckers will be asked will be loaded in favour of a positive vote for separation, according to the bill's defenders. And the federal government should have the ability to ask its own question of Quebeckers, or, as the Prime Minister speculated, of the people in the other nine provinces as well.

What surprises and disturbs me, if the future of Canada is to be decided by a succession of referendum battles, first held in the provinces, then held by the federal government, and again, perhaps, in the provinces, is that at no time in the debate on this measure have government speakers addressed themselves to the question whether "sovereignty association" can even be a topic for discussion between the two levels of government.

[Mr. Beatty.]

As my leader has said, if the government had brought in a specific bill to deal with the question of national unity, or specifically dealing with something related to the constitution, we would have been prepared to entertain it. We remain prepared to entertain a bill of that kind. But we are not prepared to grant carte blanche to the government for the taking of a tool which can be used to divide Canadians and to pit region against region. Mr. Speaker, if the federal government can ask a question on the subject of sovereignty association which has any legitimacy, then surely the government has also to accept that the break-up of Canada is a proper topic for debate. And if the federal referendum on Quebec's role in confederation is to have any legitimacy, the federal government must also accept that a provincial referendum on the same subject might have legitimacy too.

By even suggesting that Canada's future should be settled by a battle of referenda, the government gives up its right to say the separatists are unjustified in claiming that a provincial referendum can be the proper expression of the public will. Surely if the government intends to use this device in that way, it owes it to the Canadian people to address itself to that issue first, namely, whether or not the course of action it is proposing will in fact give assistance to the separatists by legitimizing the referendum route they are taking.

All that is left, Mr. Speaker, if we accept the legitimacy of a vote to break up Canada, is whether the question asked was fairly put and whether the results achieved are in our best interests. No one made this argument better than the leader of the New Democratic Party when he spoke in the bill's defence in December. Here are his words, as recorded on page 2044 of Hansard:

> No one can pretend that a referendum will be a permanent solution or the only solution. But if you do not believe in violence, if you do not believe in oppression, then surely the people have to be given the right to determine if the possibility of the survival of the country is at stake. That is why I, for one, agree in principle with the means of the Parti Québécois, which is a democratic means of establishing a referendum although I oppose that party with all the energy, intellectual, moral and physical, within the law that I can muster on their objective.

Listen again, Mr. Speaker, to the operative part of that paragraph. It is this:

> . . . then surely the people have to be given the right to decide if the possibility of the survival of the country is at stake. That is why I, for one, agree in principle with the means of the Parti Québécois, which is a democratic means of establishing a referendum . . .

Those were the words used by the leader of the NDP as he spoke in defence of his party's position on this bill. The leader of the NDP quarrels with the goals of the PQ which are to break up Canada, but he applauds the means they have chosen to do so. Nowhere does he question whether any government has the legitimacy to discuss the break-up of Canada itself, although the referendum would do that. And nowhere does he spell out what he would do.

Mr. Nystrom: Tell us about Crombie!

Mr. Beatty: I seem to have touched a nerve of my socialist friends tonight. And I do not blame them, because our position is crystal clear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Let them howl. Go ahead, howl. I will be reminding my Liberal friends shortly of something their leader said, too. Our position is clear. Our leader has said specifically that the survival of Canada is not a matter for negotiation. We will not negotiate. We will not discuss sovereignty association. We know now from the squeals of indignation from the NDP what their policy is. I want to ask the NDP and hon. members opposite what sort of a majority in a referendum, either federal or provincial, would be needed for this bill's proponents to wash their hands of Canada? Would the figure be 66⅔ per cent? Or would it be 60 per cent? Or would it be 51 per cent? The issue is reduced simply to one of numbers if you accept that the break-up of Canada is open for negotiation. This is the thesis which underlines the measure before us, and it is the thesis which underlies the speech given by the leader of the NDP.

An hon. Member: Wrong, wrong!

Mr. Beatty: Read Hansard. You will find it on page 2044 of Hansard. What other construction can be put on his words? As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, my leader made the unqualified statement, which he repeated this week, that our party will not negotiate sovereignty association with the government of Quebec. Surely the people of Canada are entitled to the same assurance from the leader of the NDP and from the leader of the government opposite.

We heard a great noise coming from the government benches earlier. You could see they were uneasy. They had good cause, because they are probably as aware as we on this side of the House of the transcript of the talk between the Prime Minister and Mr. Bruce Phillips of CTV which was taped on Tuesday, December 20, 1977, and shown on CTV National Network on Sunday, January 1, 1978. Let me read the exchange. Perhaps Liberal members opposite will follow me and address themselves to the implications of what the Prime Minister was saying:

BRUCE PHILLIPS: But there isn't any real legal way to separate, is there, Prime Minister? It's not provided for in any law that I know about.

PIERRE TRUDEAU: No, it is not. That is why there cannot be any unilateral declaration of independence. But in the same way there was no law in Britain permitting any of its colonies to separate. When the reality of a colony no longer wanting to be part of the British Empire arrived, well, the Brits just passed a law. Now, you know, what I am saying basically is that if ever Quebeckers by an overwhelming majority decide they no longer want to be part of this country, then they're going to sit down and negotiate with the rest of the country how they can be kept in. What I say at this point is I will not make them change their mind by force of law. I do say that somebody will have to sit down and negotiate with them and it won't be me.

What was he saying? "Somebody will have to sit down with them and negotiate and it won't be me." It won't be the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) either, because if Quebec separates he is going with Quebec. He would choose it over Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the leaders of both the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party have a responsibility to the Canadian people to come clean with this House and to indicate on what terms they are prepared to talk about the break-up of Canada. That's the common thread which runs through those two quotations I read to the House.

Mr. Speaker, the crisis in our confederation today is grave but it is not unique. I tried to correct an hon. member opposite when he said earlier that this was the first time a provincial administration had attempted to destroy Canada. That's not so. Joseph Howe stood for office and won a strong mandate on a platform of pulling his province out of Canada. Some people argued then that Macdonald should support a policy of asking Nova Scotia to give the new country a fair trial for a year or two and then to make up its mind about what it wanted to do, but Macdonald's response was unequivocal, unlike the response of this government and that of the New Democratic Party. It was this:

That, it seems to me, would be giving up on the whole question. The ground upon which the Unionists must stand is that repeal is not even a matter of discussion. I hope that the Colonial Office will be firm in this matter. If the Duke of Buckingham says at once to Howe and his confreres that they have nothing to hope or expect from the British government, I think the matter will end there; but if he should be weak enough to say "You should give this system a fair trial for a year or two," the consequence will be that the professional agitators will keep up the agitation for a year or two and then will return to the Colonial Office and plead their own factious course and its success as an evidence of the persistent refusal of the people to be incorporated in the union.

Macdonald's response was blunt. Repeal, he said, was not a matter of discussion. I and hon. members on this side of the House do not deny that the nature of the threat posed to confederation by Joseph Howe was different from the nature of the threat posed today by René Lévesque, but Howe's challenge to our national survival was every bit as real as Lévesque's is today. The future of Canada as a nation was considerably less secure in 1868 and in the years immediately following confederation than it is today.

The courses of action which are open to this parliament today remain essentially the same as they were in Macdonald's day. We can either state without equivocation that Canada is indivisible, or we can decide to haggle over the terms. There is no third option.

Where we in this House should be turning our attention is to attacking the reason why growing numbers of Canadians throughout this country are giving up on Canada. We should be looking for ways of proving to them that we understand their concerns and problems, and that the federal government, instead of increasing the tensions between different parts of the country, will work to eliminate them.

In 11 years this government has taken a centennial spirit for this country's future and replaced it with bitterness between French and English, between producer and consumer, between government and the private sector, between the provinces and Ottawa, and between east and west. As testimony at the hearings of the Task Force on National Unity demonstrated, virtually every measure, without exception, taken by the government in the name of national unity has further embittered Canadians over the course of the last 11 years. That is the legacy of 11 years of the Trudeau government.

What is worse is that the government has cynically used national divisions, which deepened as a result of its policy, for partisan ends. On virtually every platform—and we have seen it here in the course of debates in the House—from which a Liberal speaker talks, whether it be the Prime Minister or the lowliest Liberal backbencher, the issue of national unity is used in a pitch for votes, as we saw today.

Perhaps the most cynical version of this ploy is the claim that if Canadians decide that they are fed up with 11 years of arrogance and incompetence on the part of this government and vote to throw this government out, they will be spelling the end of Canada because Quebeckers will feel that the rest of Canada has somehow turned its back on them. We have all heard that claim by the Liberal party throughout Canada.

If it is true that in this bill, or in the unlamented constitutional proposals which died an early death last fall when even the government's supporters in the Senate turned on it, the government has armed itself with the weapons it needs to defeat the separatist challenge, then we must ask ourselves why all the other solutions to the problem that the government has presented over the past 11 years have failed.

To listen to the government talk about how it has discovered the key to national unity in Canada is to forget who was in power a little over two years ago when René Lévesque swept to office in Quebec. What has happened since that time to make the government's claims more credible, when less than a year before the election of the Parti Québécois the Prime Minister announced to Canadians that "separatism is dead in Quebec"? The legacy of this government's term in office is that our country is more divided today than it has ever been before in my lifetime, and yet the government continues to exploit our national divisions for partisan gain.

Let us turn for a minute to the question of whether a federal referendum throughout Canada following a PQ success in Quebec would truly promote national unity. First, it is unclear whether the government would feel bound by the results of a referendum it held any more than the Laurier government felt bound by the results of Canada's first referendum.

The explanatory package which accompanies this bill states that the government could choose to consider itself bound, but in leading off in this debate in December the Minister of Justice stated at least twice that the government could simply disregard the results of a vote if it disagreed with them. It is worth reminding hon. members of the remarks of the minister when he was questioned by one of my colleagues to the left.

MR. BREWIN: Would the minister tell the House whether in this bill—and I have read Bill C-9 through very carefully—there is any provision which provides, after the referendum has been completed, for any option to be taken? Or is it that the opinion secured by the referendum is purely advisory, and it would still be left to parliament and legislatures to exercise the same jurisdictions they now have?

MR. LALONDE: Mr. Speaker, the interpretation in the latter part of the hon. member's question is the proper one. The referenda under this bill will be purely consultative, and there is no action required by parliament or by any legislature following any particular result of any referendum.

The minister said later:

I reiterate that it is clearly a consultative process. There is nothing in the Constitution of Canada at the present time that could make the result of a referendum binding on the government, parliament or any particular legislature.

What the minister said was that this government is prepared to go ahead, hold a vote, spend millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, allow passions on both sides of an issue to be inflamed across Canada, see the results come in, and then—disregard them if the government chooses to do so. No other construction could be put on the minister's words. The government could say, "We appreciate hearing from you, but we did not like the answer you gave, so we are going to ignore it." That is what the government calls direct democracy. The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) said essentially the same things in his remarks last Friday.

Let us imagine for a minute what would be the state of national unity in Canada if the government said it had found a constitutional issue which was so pressing that it should be put to the people in a nationwide vote and then, after millions of tax dollars had been spent and Canadians had expressed themselves on the issue, the government announced that the people had voted the wrong way and that the government would not support them. The vote would have been nothing more than a costly public opinion poll which wasted the time of the electorate.

Let us consider another possible scenario. The most recent Gallup poll on the question shows that support for Quebec's separation today is stronger in English Canada than it is in Quebec. Let us assume that the government decided to hold a national referendum designed to allow the rest of Canada to show Quebeckers that they were truly wanted. What would be the result if, in the middle of the campaign, an emotional issue such as the question of bilingual air traffic control were to crop up? What would happen if René Lévesque, intent on provoking a backlash in the rest of Canada which would permit him to claim that the country wanted to be rid of Quebec, were to introduce legislation in the Quebec National Assembly to strip away the rights of the English-speaking minority? Can the government say, in confidence, that English-speaking Canadians would be immune to that bait?

Finally, let me deal briefly with one of the assumptions in this bill which is supported both by the government and by the New Democratic Party, namely, that it is improper for the public to vote in referenda on non-constitutional issues but that questions related to the constitution lend themselves equally well to popular votes. Pointing out that a number of my party's members have called for a referendum on capital punishment but are opposed to this bill, the leader of the New Democratic Party said, "You can't have it both ways." What he did not explain is how he can have it both ways.

I say to the bill's supporters that unlike a referendum on such issues as capital punishment, abortion or taxation, which tend to cut evenly across demographic and geographic lines, the referenda which will be authorized by this bill would tend to divide Canadians along the lines of our deepest historic divisions. They will polarize Canadians on the basis of language and region.

I do not know how, in the name of national unity, the bill's supporters can say that they would refuse to allow Canadians to be heard on the questions which the polls show they would most like to have a vote about, but would encourage referenda to be held on the questions most likely to ignite bitterness between the language groups or between regions. It just does not make sense. This is the constant theme we have seen running through the arguments made by the government, that its goal is to let the people decide, to have democracy in Canada and to give the people a chance to be heard, but Gallup conducted a poll asking what issues Canadians would be most interested in having referenda on if they felt that referenda were justified. The results of this poll were released on Saturday, December 9, 1978. It found the following:

When Canadians, 18 years and over, were asked, in October, whether they would favour or oppose a referendum on capital punishment, 82 per cent replied affirmatively. In March of this year, when this question was first put to the Canadian electorate, exactly the same proportion favoured a referendum.

That is an issue which the government says—perhaps with justification—should not be put to a vote. I do not know; that is an issue for debate on another day.

● (2040)

The report continues as follows:

Questioned further on what other issues might best be settled by referenda, the majority could think of none—68 per cent. The most frequently mentioned issue was that of Quebec separation—12 per cent—

I hope the minister is listening to this. The issue of Quebec separation was followed by his bill. The report continues:

—followed by constitutional changes—3 per cent—

That is the public demand to which this minister is responding. What sort of mockery is it when the government creates a charade of pretending to be in favour of public input and participation, but it says that that participation can be only on issues about which it wants to hear from the public, and not on the ones about which the public wants to talk to the government? What sort of hypocrisy is it when the government comes before parliament with this type of bill and says that it will authorize votes in areas where there is not strong public demand, and denies Canadians the right to be heard on other issues about which they are concerned? What sort of hypocrisy is it when the government then says that, even if there is a vote, it may well choose to ignore Canadians afterwards? How will the government explain that after the vote has taken place?

There has been a constant thread running through the debate concerning the role of referenda in a parliamentary democracy. The hon. member for York East stated his views on it in the House yesterday. He felt that many of the British institutions embedded in our constitution were not sufficiently modern or up to date to serve present needs. He indicated that they had to be brought up to date, and that perhaps the various traditional ways in which we have operated in Canada just are not operating properly any more. The hon. member said that the entire British concept of a parliamentary sovereignty is a matter about which we should ask questions. It is worth taking a look at the hon. member's particular comments. As reported at page 2650 of Hansard, the hon. member said the following:

The classic "responsible government" approach is becoming tougher to defend in twentieth century society, not only in Canada but also in Great Britain. Those who are quick to bark on the other side should look at what is happening on the other side of the pond in relation to what is happening to responsible government, aside from all their labour troubles. They should pay attention to what is happening in a constitutional sense in Great Britain, the mother of parliamentary democracy.

The hon. member continued his speech by indicating that he strongly supported the bill, and that he felt it would be an advance for our system of democracy in Canada. As reported at page 2651, the hon. member said the following:

The Tories say "no" for consulting the people by means of a referendum; or if you want to use another phrase, by direct democracy.

This was the theme of his speech. I think it would be useful to go back to the last time when parliament was torn apart by a debate on the role of referenda in Canada. It would be useful to look at what the authorities had to say at that time about their role in relation to the parliamentary system. I found one government member who said the following:

The popular view in my constituency and the Toronto area in general is to put the question of capital punishment to a national referendum. This would certainly mean rule by the people in the literal sense; but the passions of the people run high. For me, the spectre of the disorder on the streets of Paris in 1792-94 develops in the scenario of a nation governed by referenda.

Countries that revert to putting questions to referenda often find that more problems are created than are solved. The Canadian referendum of 1944 on the conscription issue intensified racial and regional opinion and created tremendous difficulties, difficulties which were only spared the government by the conclusion of the war. The same analogy may be drawn with the 1975 United Kingdom referendum on the European Common Market, and the recent Italian referenda on divorce and abortion. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it could be argued that the results of the recent Italian referenda have helped to destroy the unity of the Christian Democratic party and precipitated the present political instability in Italy.

Like the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) I will take my chances with the theory of representation as clearly enunciated by Mr. Edmund Burke, and followed by many politicians in this House and the British House over the past 200 years.

Who was it who said that less than two years ago? It was the same hon. member for York East who spoke yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: It was the same hon. member who said yesterday that direct democracy, popular sovereignty, and the system of government which has worked in Britain for so many years, no longer were effective and should be revised. I should like hon. members opposite to direct themselves to that question. What would be their policy? How do they feel? What role do they feel a referendum must play? How do they justify their flip-flopping on this particular issue which is of concern to Canadians?

After the 1974 election my party engaged in a series of debates concerning the nature of the policies and principles the Conservative party would follow. At that time I argued that we should encourage a sharper definition of the philosophical principles in which we believe. But my former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), stressed the responsibility of any national party in Canada to act as a conciliator among the disparate groups in our nation. He argued that our most important function is to bind Canadians together whenever the centrifugal forces in our society threaten to tear the country apart. The events of the past few years have proven how truly right he was. Clearly the time has come when every national party should commit itself to solving our disagreements, not by pitting group against group, Canadian against Canadian, but through good will and Canadian compromise.

This bill would take away a vast slice of power from the Parliament of Canada and give it to cabinet. It can serve only to deepen our national division. It will not have my support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start by saying that no party in the House, and no member of parliament, has a monopoly on the question of national unity. Also, I want to say that no party, and no member of the House, has a monopoly on love for the country and faith in the future of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: It is important to remember that Canada is bigger than each one of us. It is bigger than the Liberal party, though the Liberal party frequently forgets that, and it is bigger than this parliament. I, for one, have no doubt that regardless of the outcome of the next election, Canada will remain united.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: It would be a disaster for the country if the Liberal party were allowed to say that one's opposition or one's being in favour of this bill meant that one was any more or less a Canadian. Quite frankly, I am tired of listening to members on both sides of the House saying, "I am a better Canadian than you are because I have been somewhere you have not been, or I have fought somewhere you have not fought." We should be well beyond that kind of argument and feeling in this House. It was Adlai Stevenson who said that partriotism of that kind is the last refuge of scoundrels.

The unfortunate tragedy and political difficulty facing the country today is threefold. First, neither the New Democratic Party nor the Conservative party have an effective electoral presence in the province of Quebec. It is an obvious fact, but frequently we are too embarrassed to state it. I state it frankly, but not with any great pride. Our country and the province of Quebec would be politically much healthier and saner if there were a federal opposition presence in that province. Another sad fact is that the Liberal party has no federal presence in western Canada and a declining federal presence in the province of Ontario. That is a tragedy for the country as well. The third great tragedy is that in November, 1976, the only means by which the people of Quebec could express their fatigue and dislike of the corruption of the Liberal government in that province was to vote for the Parti Québécois.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I speak for myself, and I am sure for many members of this party, when I say I approach the question of referendums with no great enthusiasm. If this were a normal time in the course of our history, and we were not faced with a constitutional crisis, I would have neither truck nor trade with referendums, and I am sure nobody in our party would either. I will say quite clearly why. I think the drawbacks of referendums in general have been described well, if a little unfairly, by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty). They were described yesterday in the speech by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). They were described in the speech by my friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and they were described in the speech by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

An hon. Member: And what about your leader?

Mr. Rae: I am coming to that. They were also described in the speech by the leader of my party. I think it is worth bearing that in mind. The disadvantages are quite simply these. In my view the greatest protection and the greatest presence the people can have in a democracy are the election of members through a strong party system, members of conscience who are prepared to take their position on matters of conscience to the people as individuals, and decide on matters of party politics as members of a political party, to be elected or defeated on those decisions. Neither election nor defeat is a disaster, and it is not the worst thing in the world to be defeated. There are worse things than being defeated at an election, and I hope members opposite will remember that whenever the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) decides to pull the plug; it is worse to lose one's self respect.

It is a function of a member of parliament to reflect, to consider, to weigh, to debate in caucus and to rely on party judgment, his own judgment and on the opinions of his constituents, and then make up his mind accordingly. As I say, in a normal constitutional time that would be the course I would adopt, and I am sure it would be the course that would be adopted by members of this party. However, there is one fly in the ointment. From speeches by Conservative party members yesterday, today, Friday and before that in December, it does not appear that they have recognized that fly in the ointment.

The fact is that in November of 1976, for the reasons I have described and not because the people of Quebec in 1976 were voting for separatism, a party which is committed to the breaking up of the Canadian federation was elected to form a government. We can talk until doomsday about whether the Liberal party opposite was responsible in some way for that election result. I have said already that I certainly think the state of the provincial Liberal party was to blame, and it must take some of the responsibilities.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Rae: The fact remains that there has been an election in Quebec that has had a dramatic effect on the constitutional situation in this country. The impact, the desires and the aims of the Premier of Quebec have never been sufficiently understood, appreciated, and realized by the Conservative party. If members of that party had realized them, I do not think they would have been able to take the position they have taken in respect of the bill which is before us at the present time. Nor would they have been able to say the things that many of their leading members have said about Mr. Lévesque and his real aims and desires, and the desires and aims of his party.

Let me say to the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) that I saw the CTV interview program, as I am sure many people did. I am not challenging for a moment the hon. member's love for Canada or his faith in Canada. That would be absurd. I have known him too long and too well for that. However, I think he has made a fundamental mistake in his assessment of the aims of Mr. Lévesque, and a fundamental mistake in looking at the national unity question in this country. That is a question of judgment. To say simply that Mr. Lévesque wants a settlement with honour is a mistake, as it would be a mistake to say that it would be more difficult to negotiate with Mr. Ryan, the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec who is, whatever else, a federalist, than with Mr. Lévesque. To talk about the two as if you were talking about the same game betrays an ignorance about the state of the country that is profound.

I think we are entitled to ask the same question about the Leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has stated very often that he is prepared to be flexible, to negotiate, and to talk. He has said most of our constitutional problems have been created by the arrogant attitude of the federal government, and we must have discussion and words; we have to reason together and we must adopt the model of the Kingston conference, where they had five Tory premiers together in Kingston, for the protection of the confederation and for the purpose of discussions with Mr. Lévesque. That is his serious assumption of the threat that is presented by Mr. Lévesque.

I am not suggesting that national unity and leadership are the only issues facing us, but I am saying that the people of Canada will be asking themselves if this is the leader they want to have negotiate with that very tough set of cookies in the province of Quebec, particularly if that is the assumption he makes of Mr. Lévesque's intentions.

I did not create that issue, Mr. Speaker. The Government of Canada did not create that issue. The Liberal party did not create that issue, although I understand it is going to make it an issue. I am afraid the Leader of the Opposition has made it an issue by his attitude.

The second thing which changes my mind about referendums is not solely related to the province of Quebec, and not solely related to Mr. Lévesque and the election of the Parti Québécois. The second thing is the fact that we are now embarked at last, thank goodness—out of a sense of crisis but also, I hope, from a sense of common purpose and achievement—on a path of constitutional reform. We are looking at a very different set of institutions and relationships between the federal and provincial governments, and between the House of Commons and whatever second chamber we decide to create. All of these changes will take place within the tradition of common law and loyalty to the monarchy, which are not in question. It would be absurd to suggest they are in question. Nevertheless, there are some very real institutional changes that will be going on, and I think this is a very healthy thing.

We have a Senate which I have called in the past "the indoor relief department of the Liberal party." It performs no real constructive or useful function in the federal system. It does not do the job which a second chamber could really perform in a federal system, and it is ridiculous that we have been so long in reforming that institution. We have a House of Commons which, as I suggested in my earlier remarks, has a party system that at the moment does not reflect the reality of representation in Canada. It is not true to say that there are no New Democrats or Conservatives in Quebec, because there are. It is not true that there are no Liberals in Alberta, because there are. There is no reason why—and I say this as a member of a parliamentary party which has been consistently under-represented in this House since it was founded over 40 years ago, not in terms of talent but certainly in terms of numbers—we are not entitled to look at the possibility of a reformed electoral system as well as a reformed second chamber. Even in such an instance there is still the question of division of powers. It is a difficult and exciting question and has been raised once again with the Pepin-Robarts commission report on national unity.

I must say in answer to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo that I do not believe that all of the wisdom in Canada rests with the provincial governments. I do not believe that when Premier Lougheed and Premier Davis get together and come up with an idea, that that is all there is to be said about the future of Canada. I believe that Canada is a bigger, better, and greater place then all of its parts put together, and that is the function of the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo mentioned medical care. If we waited for the provincial governments in this country to provide medical care, we would still be paying through the nose for hospital care and for seeing a doctor. If it had been left to the provincial leaders such as the Duplessis's or George Drews of this country, we would not have had unemployment insurance for years and years.

I do not believe that all the wisdom in the world lies with the federal government. I think there has been much arrogance, and in some instances a systematic abuse of power, on the Liberal side of the House. I think that there is a great deal of ignorance about the views of the average working person in English Canada on the Liberal side of the House. But I do not think we should allow 15 years of arrogance on one side to turn into 15 years of paranoia on the other, and I honestly think that in some of the criticisms made of the bill by the Conservative party there is an element of paranoia which does not face up to what is in the bill or to the crisis facing the country.

I have said that there are two things which changed my mind about a constitutional referendum—the election of the Parti Québécois and the fact that we are engaged in an exciting and dynamic period of constitutional reform. This means that we must, within the tradition of the common law and the monarchy, look at new institutions, and look at them in a way which will engage the attention, support, and consensus of all Canadian people from Newfoundland to British Columbia and to the Yukon. This cannot be done simply through a series of conferences between the premiers and federal government officers.

I tried to get into the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa in October, just after I was elected. I could not even get in, and I am a member of parliament. The man on the street in Broadview, walking down the Danforth does not know a thing about the Canadian constitution, but one thing he does know is that before he is from Broadview, Toronto, or Ontario, he is from Canada. We are in the process, and we may not even know or realize it—and some of us are so far behind the times we do not recognize it—of creating a new nationalism and a new nationality.

I had the occasion last week to attend, with the hon. member for Rosedale, a meeting of the multicultural leaders in Toronto. I was a delegate as he was. I believe it was organized by the Conservative party because I was the only NDPer there, along with a Liberal. The outstanding thing about that conference was that these people, wherever they came from—and we all came from somewhere—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Do you think that Stanley was born spontaneously? Apart from Stanley, we all come from somewhere.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Rae: The commitment which we all had at that conference and the admission was that we did not want to be known as Greek, Italian, Barbadian, Anglo, Irish or anything else, but as Canadians. These leaders were looking to the federal government for a new constitution that would protect their multiculturalism and social rights, and some of them even wanted us to protect their linguistic rights. The point is that they did not want to go to Bill Davis, Peter Lougheed or the provincial governments for the protection of their new sense of nationality, citizenship or pride in Canada; they were looking to the federal government for it. For any party to ignore that sense of nationalism and not see that nationalism as a tremendous source of strength which needs to be mobilized toward a new consensus, is to be blind to the future of the country, and is simply looking at old patterns and old divisions.

I would like to look now at some of the criticisms which have been made against this bill. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has said that the government was spreading disunity, that instead of fighting fire with fire it was fighting fire with gasoline, that it was a blatant attempt to subvert and undermine the responsibilities of the Canadian system of responsible government. She said that it was a complete departure from parliamentary practice, and that the scope of the legislation was so broad, so large, and so wide that it presented a threat to the civil liberties of every Canadian. She also said that it amounted to a complete departure from the freedoms which we have valued in the common law for centuries.

In looking at this bill realistically, I do not see those dangers there. There are problems in the bill and I have severe reservations about certain aspects of it, but the principle of saying to the federal government that there is no right in a federal parliament to hold a referendum on the constitutional future of Canada, at a time when we are faced with a constitutional referendum in the province of Quebec and when people are crying out for constitutional change because they want to be proud members of a new country, is simply nonsense and, furthermore, political suicide in the province of Quebec. I do not come from the province of Quebec, but the one thing which has impressed me is that every single member from Quebec, with the exception of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), has spoken in favour of this bill. They have said, "Please give us this bill; do not leave us in the hands of a provincial government which is determined to load the dice and stack the decks," to use the words of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I think it is worth remembering that there are interests in the province of Quebec which may need to be protected by the means we are giving the federal government and the federal parliament at this time. I put it as tentatively as that. I am not an enthusiast on the subject of referenda, and I have indicated my reasons. If these were normal times I would not be in favour of a referendum. The question raised is whether, when we know there is a government in Quebec which is soliciting political support with every means at hand, we want to say to the federal government, "You have no means; you cannot do it; we are not going to let you do it."

The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo asked why we do not come here with a specific question. Mr. Speaker, if I were playing poker with René Lévesque I would not want to put my money behind the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo—I can tell you that! He would walk in and say, "Here are my cards; what have you got?" That is not the way the game is played; this is a tough game, and we do not know what the question put by René Lévesque will be.

Already reporters are asking what we are going to do if René Lévesque wins the referendum, and if we are going to negotiate with him. I reply that I am not going to answer that question. I am not going to deal with the question. Do those reporters ask René Lévesque what he is going to do if he loses the referendum—if he is going to negotiate with the federal government? Of course they do not. They know he is a serious politician. I would ask that the federal government be as serious in the defence of federalism as he is in the pursuit of independence.

The Leader of the Opposition paraded all the horrors—that we could have a referendum on any subject—that it would change the Constitution of Canada—that it would change the law of Canada—would threaten the Indian minorities, the Inuit and the blacks—all the minorities and every group. That is what I call parading the horrors. It is an example of exaggerated fantasy as a result of a kind of paranoiac thinking which comes from being in opposition so long.

The fact of the matter is that there is one minority in Canada now which is seriously under threat. I am sorry to say that happens to be the English language and the immigrant minorities in the province of Quebec. That is the reality. It is not the fantasy. It is not the fantasy of looking at all the things the Liberals could do if they went collectively bonkers and if the opposition went home for five weeks and the Canadian people took leave of their senses. The reality we are looking at is what is going on in Quebec today. That is the crisis; that is the difficulty; that is the situation we have to meet. I say that we are entitled to ask that the official opposition be as serious, as tough-minded, as clever, and have as great a sense of the whole of the country as we ask of the government when we criticize them for being so inadequate.

Where did Roncarelli come when his liquor licence was cut off by Maurice Duplessis? He came to the Supreme Court of Canada, and won his case because he had federal rights and was able to come to the federal government to have them protected. Where did the people who suffered under the padlock law in Quebec come when they could not go to the provincial government—when these tremendous provinces had the Duplessis's, the George Drews, these great protectors of civil liberties—where did they come? To the Supreme Court of Canada.

The fact is that when minorities are under threat we should look at the reality of the situation and at what is really happening. Let us deal with the crisis that is facing Canada now, not some fictitious crisis the opposition is creating because of its generalized fear that the government is going to make national unity an election issue. That is what we are facing at the present time. I think the concerns of the opposition can really be met by looking at what this legislation does, and I will express my criticisms of the legislation as I consider this point.

First of all, the referendum question provided under this bill has to deal with the constitution. It cannot deal with every subject under the sun, as the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday. It has to deal with the constitution and that is what this debate is about—the Constitution of Canada—constitutional reform. That is what Pepin-Robarts is all about; that is what René Lévesque is all about; that is the subject of today's discussion. The question has to be limited to that.

This matter is going to be debated in this House. I think the 40-hour limit is ridiculous, although it is more extensive than it looks at first blush. It is about three weeks of debate. I think the limit should be taken away to satisfy our concerns on this side of the House that the matter is going to be thoroughly debated.

The question would be put to the people; it would be discussed and debated. There is protection in terms of all political parties and registered groups having access to the CRTC rules and so on. It is much more liberal and free than the position that has been put forward by the Parti Québécois in the province of Quebec.

The answer to the question or set of questions would be consultative. People keep asking, "What if he asks a question about Indian rights?" The answer is simple. What happens? Nothing. There is the Supreme Court, the BNA Act, the constitution, the common law—those things will not suddenly be dissolved by the holding of a referendum. This bill does not provide for that and it is absurd to suggest that it does. It shows a fundamental misunderstanding of the realities of political life. It would not lead to a unilateral change and it cannot, because of the nature of our political system.

If the government were foolish enough to hold a referendum in the province of Saskatchewan on the question of natural resources, the results would be disastrous for it. They would lose their referendum. We would clobber them, Mr. Speaker. I have a little more faith in the common sense and intelligence of the Canadian people than some members to my right seem to have. I do not think the Liberals are able to brainwash completely and dominate the people of Canada or Quebec so that the people would not give a reasonably intelligent answer to a reasonably intelligent question on the matter of the constitution.

I should like to end my remarks with a quotation from "Essays on the Constitution" by Frank R. Scott. At page 372 he wrote:

> A combination of forces—military, political, and economic—made it possible to find a common ground for the original constitution one hundred years ago. We seem to be at the stage that Canadians had reached just before the BNA Act was adopted.

He commented that we must not think we can be exempt in Canada from the creative force of nationalism in our own country. Then he went on to say:

> Nehru once said that there is a good form of nationalism, and a bad form of nationalism; the good form is that inherent desire in man to live in a society that enables him to express himself to the fullest; the bad form is the rigid application of racist doctrines that can lead to disaster. Both the good and the bad forms of nationalism are usually to be found simultaneously in any nationalist movement, and the question is, which one will prevail? The answer to that depends on many factors—

He further commented:

A frustrated nationalism turns to primitive weapons, just as a frustrated individual may seek release in a primitive nationalism. On the other hand, a strong sense of national identity can be a protection against the crushing conformity toward which technology is constantly driving us.

It seems to me that is the heart of the issue—Whether we are intent in Canada, including Quebec, in creating a new national identity with new national, economic and social institutions that deal proudly and effectively with the problems that face all Canadians, or whether we are prepared to be locked in, hindered by the mind-set and institutions that have in some way blocked the aspirations of the people of Quebec and also the aspirations of a great many other Canadians as well, those for example, in Toronto, in Newfoundland, in the Northwest Territories, in the west, in fact everywhere.

I think that a referendum, while not critical or most important, is a useful mechanism, a useful device in the mobilization of that political consensus. It is not a tool that I am particularly fond of in general political terms, but in the specific political situation that we are faced with today, in the crisis of Quebec and in the crisis of confederation which we face, it could be a vital tool in seeing that federalism is presented fairly, fully, generously, and with the decency and dignity we all want to see it presented in the province of Quebec. I have no faith that the Liberals will do it on their own. As I said before, I have no doubt that if this government, and when this government, is thrown out, there will be other parties to take their place that will be able to govern Canada. Canada is bigger and stronger than the Liberal party. If there are other parties that take this government's place, I want to see a referendum as a mechanism in their armoury as well. It is not a partisan political thing. It is not something to do with the survival of the Liberal party, but obviously that is an aspect of every piece of legislation that comes in here.

Sometimes we have to step back from our narrow armies that we come from and ask ourselves, "What is the crisis of Canada", "what is the crisis of confederation", and what are the mechanisms and the political means that we can use to create something different, something new and something exciting? I say two cheers for referendums. It is not the best mechanism nor is it the only mechanism. But it is not a threat to our liberties, it is not a threat to this institution if it is only consultative. It is not a threat to ourselves if we have the confidence, the ability and the strength to use it in the best interests of people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be briefer than those of some of the previous speakers who indulged in a lot of verbosity, but I will endeavour to be frank and sincere, and I hope that I will not duplicate any remarks that have already been made.

Bill C-9 which we are debating this evening says that it might be cited as the Canada Referendum Act. It is entitled "An act respecting Public Referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada." Quite frankly, I have nothing against plebiscites and referendums or going to the public generally under certain circumstances. I am sure that many members of parliament and other Canadians will agree with me on this. Despite the proposals that have been presented to us within the last 12 months by the government on constitutional reform, and also despite the existing situation in Quebec, one must look at this bill for what it is or is not and for what it is worth.

I understand that in some countries in the Commonwealth, referendums are held with respect to the adoption of amendments to their constitutions or on constitutional problems or questions. However, it should be pointed out that such referendums are held after full debates on the specific questions are conducted in the legislatures or parliaments concerned. Plebiscites are held sombrely and soberly on the questions concerned. Amendments of constitutions then become subject to the approval of the electorate. This is done after unlimited debates in the parliaments or legislatures on the specific questions which are to be put to the people.

Bill C-9 proposes just the opposite. It is a piece of legislation which would allow a campaign, similar to an election campaign, and even the implications of the Canada Elections Act of this country, which result in a great deal of expense to the ordinary Canadian through taxes, tax exemptions and income tax. This bill would put political parties and politicians to work to create greater adversity and hatred over what should be a serious, fundamental and sombre constitutional matter. To make things even more ridiculous, the results of a referendum under Bill C-9 would not even be conclusive or binding upon parliament or the electorate. Bill C-9 is unfair and undemocratic because of its numerous provisions permitting the implementation of regulations by orders in council. This is a dictatorial and improper procedure.

When we are dealing with people's rights at the constitutional level we should not permit the cabinet or a deputy minister, who turns out to be some bureaucrat, to issue orders in council or regulations. That is what parliament is supposed to be all about. We should be here to halt and restrain the issuance of decrees, edicts and regulations. In view of the fact that constitutional questions are basic and fundamental problems, fundamental to the rights and privileges of each and every Canadian, a bill which proposes the matters implied in this bill—and there are several—must not provide for orders in council or regulations.

When the bill comes before us for approval or disapproval, it should contain a specific question. It should contain those matters which are to be changed in the constitution, or any amendment. It must set out the full details of a proposed question or constitutional amendement. For example, if Canada wants to adopt the constitutional amendment act which was presented last spring by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), then such a bill should be presented first for unlimited debate, but every clause in that bill should be presented. If there is a question to be referred to the people, then that question should be so stated in the bill. It should be presented to the people after an unlimited debate has taken place in this forum. Certainly it should not be held at the time of an election.

Furthermore, on any question in a debate of this kind there must be—and this should be pointed out clearly—no guillotine or closure procedures. Specifically, constitutional questions and amendments in any event must be debated without limitation in the House. To be effective they should be presented to the people for approval. If they are not approved by the people, then the statute or question would not become effective.

If the government continues to follow what in the past has been its usual arrogant and ill-conceived procedures, then this bill would prove to be yet another weapon or instrument of separation and division in the country. I am reminded of such items as the B and B Commission report, the Official Languages Act, its improper and costly implementation, and the national task force on Canadian unity report. The list goes on and on. All these items should have been or should be shelved. Referendum, hatred, division, separation, an aura of suspicion and infection are arising from the government benches. It is to be regretted that this has been orchestrated in the emotionalism and steam already prevalent through political motivation.

One need only read the legislation to see that, like a number of other bills presented in past years, it is a horrid piece of legislation. If such a bill were to be presented it should have been presented long ago, certainly long before November, 1976.

Implementation of this bill is likely to be the last straw for Canadians. It is likely to break the Canadian back. It is certainly an example of the government's lack of confidence and faith in Canada and its people. It is also an example of the government's knowledge of the people's lack of confidence and faith in this government.

It is my sincere hope and prayer that the government will review this legislation again, review it carefully, and withdraw it at this time. Quite frankly, I have glad hopes in the future of Canada. I only hope and pray that governments and politicians will refrain from pouring their distasteful and far too potent and volatile fuels upon an already fragile situation.

Surely this government should know what happens when the wrong paths are taken, and many they have taken. Look at the economic and unemployment situation caused in large part by the many errors in judgment of this government, errors resulting in government waste, and errors in government spending caused by government instability.

It may not have been intentional, but throughout this debate there have been references to René Lévesque. Frankly, I do not see this as a positive way of achieving national unity. It is undoubtedly putting Canada and parliament on the defensive. This is very poor strategy. Let us get back to economic issues and sensible issues, issues that will help put bread and butter on the table of the ordinary citizen.

My plea to this government is to withdraw this bill immediately before this country is completely destroyed by an instrument of destruction. We do not need another instrument of destruction such as Bill C-9.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, for I feel this debate has lasted long enough already. Apparently only Progressive Conservative party members are against the adoption of this bill, and considering that this problem must be settled as soon as possible, I suggest that we ought to reduce as much as possible the length of each speech. Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to refute some of the accusations members of the official opposition have made throughout this debate, and object to their actions and remarks.

During the year and a half I have been sitting in the House and during the election campaign when I was chosen as elected member for the Louis-Hébert riding, I have come to realize that official opposition members, ever since the appointment of their new leader, have been willing to accept any compromise, alliance and intellectual dishonesty to oppose the government and gain votes in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I am not alone in noting the many differences between their position in Quebec and their position elsewhere. All editorial writers and reporters seem to be saying that the official opposition has two languages, one for Quebec and one for the other provinces. I would like to give two examples of this. The first is quite brief and concerns the campaign for the by-election of last year when I was elected to the House of Commons and when the Progressive Conservative party was using a very well-known slogan in the province of Quebec: Yes to the Progressive Conservative party. They showed how naive they are, Mr. Speaker, for not knowing that in 1970, the Parti Québécois used the same slogan, that is, "Yes to the Parti Québécois" and that it will use "Yes to the referendum" for the referendum.

It is not a coincidence, Mr. Speaker, that they chose the same logo, the same colours, and the same advertising in certain cases to try to promote their candidate in those by-elections. Instead of aiming at originality they tried to copy something that had already been used by others. I should add that during this campaign, we heard Progressive Conservative candidates, especialy in my constituency, and we saw press cuttings and leaflets distributed by the Progressive Conservative candidates saying: "If you voted for the Parti Québécois last November 15, you must be true to yourself and vote against the Liberal party and for the Progressive Conservative party." If this is logical, Mr. Speaker, must we conclude that the Progressive Conservatives have to get the votes of the Parti Québécois in Quebec? I find this quite dishonest. I believe that it is very dishonest to try to shack up with the party that is trying to destroy this government.

The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) says: Why not? Mr. Speaker, during my electoral campaign in the Louis-Hébert riding, we were surprised to see the hon. member for Joliette at the National Assembly lunching with the chief organizer of the Parti Québécois, the hon. Marcel Léger, to see if it was possible to have the co-operation of the Parti Québécois for the by-elections. This same member of parliament came to this Louis-Hébert constituency knocking on every door to tell the people: If you voted for Mr. Claude Morin, the father of the referendum, you must vote against Mr. Dennis Dawson, because he says he is a federalist while our candidate makes certain concessions. He is running for the Progressive Conservative party and they have become compromise specialists.

We have seen the present leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Clark) hiding away from reporters; he did not show up for press conferences before large groups of reporters in almost three years. As many papers and magazines have pointed out, he could not have answered the many questions. We saw him hiding when the RCMP case made headlines, when his financial critic made startling statements. We have seen him hiding on several occasions since the last election. The only time he did not hide is when he went for a trip out of the country, and we have seen the results, Mr. Speaker. That is when they should have hidden their leader.

The confusion and dishonesty of the Progressive Conservative party have never been as obvious as in the present debate on referenda. I will not repeat the remarks made by the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), by many of my Liberal colleagues as well as by the NDP members who pointed out the dishonesty of the Conservative party and the complicity they seek with the Parti Québécois in order to convince the people of Quebec that they are flexible and that they would be prepared to consider the problems of the Parti Québécois.

I will say nothing either, Mr. Speaker, of the language he uses in western Canada when he says that he is going to put Quebec back where it belongs. I am not going to say anything about that, Mr. Speaker, because I think these are trivial things. What about the statements made by the Leader of the Progressive Conservative party when he said that he would be prepared to negotiate sovereignty association with Quebec, and what about the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) who also said that he would be prepared to negotiate sovereignty association with Quebec, and what about the former president of the Progressive Conservative party who, the day after the hon. member for Rosedale made that statement declared that he agreed on that matter and that being himself from Quebec, he felt that this was very serious. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative supporters have changed their minds since then. They have changed their minds on everything since I first came to this House, but I think that the public is not stupid enough not to understand the situation.

[English]

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) told us that a referendum would divide groups, regions, and even families. He said in his speech yesterday, and I quote:

So I say that this legislation would pit region against region . . . This bill would also pit race against race. That is exactly what happened with regard to the conscription issue. The bill would pit religion against religion and culture against culture . . . This bill would pit family against family and friend against friend.

The hon. member does not understand that the Parti Québécois has decided that there will be a referendum in the province of Quebec. The federal government needs this same tool in order to counteract this possibility. We have seen that elections divide families and regions. Sad to say, parliament is now divided as far as regions are concerned. But are we going to abolish elections because they are divisive? My brother may not necessarily be a Liberal. A man from another region in Quebec will not necessarily be a Liberal. Are we going to abolish elections because there is a division? Are we going to abolish parliament because there is an opposition? We are divided, but we are certainly not going to abolish it.

I am not particularly pleased, Mr. Speaker, and on this I concur with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae), to support a bill setting up a referendum process in the Canadian parliamentary procedure. However, Mr. Speaker, I support that bill because there is already one in the province of Quebec—

Mr. La Salle: You do not have any choice.

Mr. Dawson: Not quite, Mr. Speaker, we do have a choice. I object to it as a normal formula to settle problems, Mr. Speaker, but I support it under the circumstances because we are not merely dealing with a bill altering a department, but the future of the country is involved. Since the Parti Québécois intends to hold a referendum, if we do not provide such a tool to the federal government we would be denying Quebeckers the opportunity of answering a straight question in a referendum. To a certain extent I am familiar with the matter of referenda. My provincial counterpart in Quebec City is Claude Morin, who is the father of referenda. He is the one who proposed the bill on referenda to the Quebec government and he is the one who sought support for it. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Morin does not see a referendum as a means to negotiate. He does not want to use it to obtain more power from the federal government. When he was a deputy minister, he tried to have more power and he figured that what was needed in Quebec was independence and sovereignty association. He wants to have a referendum because he seeks to get 50 per cent of the votes plus one and he will do anything to ask a question which will get him that many votes. As a government I think it is our responsibility to make sure that the people of Quebec will have a real choice before the referendum is held. If the PQ gets 50 per cent of the votes plus one it will be our responsibility to prove that there are not 50 per cent plus one of the people of Quebec who are ready to declare independence, but rather that a majority of Quebeckers are in favour of federalism, even if it has to be renewed.

[English]

I should like to tell members of the Conservative party, because their members from the province of Quebec do not seem to be able to make them understand what is going on in Quebec, that we are not just facing another government, another party in Quebec, which is trying to negotiate an increase in its powers, for example, natural resources like the Albertans, or more offshore rights as in the case of the maritimes. What we see in the province of Quebec is a government whose principal and only aim since its foundation has been to declare the independence of the province. If they have not yet understood what is going on in Quebec it is probably because of the type of people from Quebec who are on their side. They should start listening to what we are saying on this side. If we have 56, 57 or 58 members of the Liberal party from Quebec it is because what the Liberal members from Quebec are saying seems to be what the people in Quebec are thinking.

To those who believe the Parti Québécois is not serious, I say this: let them go to Quebec and see for themselves. Let them talk to members of that party and observe how the people of Quebec are being influenced by the media and by propaganda on the whole issue of independence. Let them see how far they are ready to go in their desire to achieve independence.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government must have a weapon to counteract the PQ referendum, for the PQ government is determined to take Quebec out of Canada.

When I started in politics in 1968, I decided to join the Liberal party because there was in the making in Quebec a party openly seeking the separation of Quebec. And then, Mr. Speaker, in 1970-71, the party changed and started to promote the independence of Quebec. Later on, its members became advocates of sovereignty and finally advocates of sovereignty association. We even heard the Quebec premier talking about Duplessis' great dream of autonomy and about a true confederation. They are prepared to do anything to achieve their aim: 50 per cent plus one at the referendum. It is therefore our responsibility, as the federal government, to make sure that they will be honest in the measures they will take.

[English]

We have heard members of the opposition say that referenda are a danger to the parliamentary tradition. It is true that referenda can overshadow parliamentary procedure. We have heard members opposite say they will undermine the existence of parliament. We have heard it said they could divide Canada. But if we do not have in our possession this instrument, if we cannot counteract the referendum of the Parti Québécois, there will not be any parliamentary tradition to overshadow, there will not be any parliament to overshadow; there will not be any Canada if Quebec is out.

I could continue, but I think it is clear that most hon. members on the government side and in the New Democratic Party, and probably the members of the Social Credit party, seem to be in favour of this instrument which will help protect the future of this country as a whole, not as a divided country with a sovereignty association as hon. members in the Conservative party seem to believe they can negotiate with the Parti Québécois.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me on this very important bill, I should say on this major weapon which is Bill C-9. Indeed, the government wants to arm itself in anticipation of a fight over the results of the Quebec referendum. Even if this bill has been introduced because of the referendum campaign that has already been launched in Quebec, it remains, Mr. Speaker, that every democracy can provide for the need to consult the people directly at some time on a certain issue. Consequently, such an eventuality must be considered and, for this reason, the government is justified to propose a legislative framework for such population consultations. Please note that I said the government is justified, because if this bill had been introduced, say, a year or two before the 1976 events, our reaction would have been different.

● (2150)

But under present circumstances I have some reservations, some doubts about the motives for introducing this bill.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, the short-term objective of this bill is merely to provide a weapon against the referendum law of Quebec. That is why, I imagine, the government chose to restrict it to constitutional matters. Clause 2 defines those constitutional matters as "the customs, conventions and enactments that comprise the Constitution of Canada, and the political and judicial institutions and processes of Canada".

The referendum is a health tool; by that I mean that, to my mind, a referendum is a healthy tool for a healthy democracy; and it is only fair for the people to be consulted about its fate. However, what really concerns me deeply is the use that might at times be made of that tool, in this instance the referendum.

This bill authorizes the federal government to organize a referendum in one or several provinces of Canada. In a way this piece of legislation could become an instrument by which the federal government could force a decision on the elected government of a province through a referendum. We should keep in mind that Canada is a federation of states. Therefore it would not be a good sign to see the federal government go over the head of a province because the latter disagrees on a given point. I am not referring here to the particular situation of Quebec, I am speaking in a general context. We should keep in mind that the provinces have elected parliaments which have clear jurisdictions and which represent directly the people; it is with them that the federal government should first come to an agreement; I mean that the government should first come to terms with the provinces instead of holding a referendum and proposing an election under a sovereign government in a province.

The arbitrary use of this legislation could therefore contribute to perpetuate the endless federal-provincial disputes and God knows we have had a lot of them for many years. The federal government could brandish the weapon of the referendum if it could not reach an agreement with a province. That would further restrict the provincial governments' freedom of action, which is already quite weak, or weakened, I believe, through the present government's efforts to centralize. And that even if the bill stipulates that referenda would only be advisory by nature. The government would not be bound by the results.

So the government has recently been converted to referenda and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) states that it is fair and reasonable to consult the people. But if he really believes in the people's verdict, why is he not bound by the results? That may be because there were two referenda in Canada, one in 1898 on prohibition and the other in 1942 on conscription, and both have created immeasurable problems for the government and each time parliament had to pass legislation authorizing the government to hold a referendum.

I do not want to defend the old system, Mr. Speaker, but there is a limit to abuses which could have created the unregulated use of referenda. If it is so worth while to consult the people, why does the minister not allow referenda by petition? That is a procedure used regularly in Switzerland and several European countries. Then there was Howard Jarvis' famous Proposition 13 in California and I think everyone knows about that referendum.

So Bill C-9 is in many respects an all-purpose piece of legislation. That is why I want to express certain reservations I have with respect to this bill although I support its principle by and large.

I would like to deal for a few moments with the whole matter of the financial controls being established under this bill. As a result, any person could, without being registered, incur referendum expenses provided his or her contributions and expenses do not exceed $5,000. In the case of the Quebec legislation, individuals, whether severally or together, could only spend up to $300 for holding a meeting that is not organized by an umbrella organization. Contributions would be limited to $3,000 per voter and corporate persons would not be authorized to participate. Those contributions could still be paid directly to a political party.

In that respect, I feel the legislation we have before us encourages individual involvement.

[Mr. Allard.]

On the other hand, under the Quebec legislation political parties could before the referendum raise up to $3,000 per voter and each umbrella organization could receive from the parties up to 25 cents per voter. Another limit of $3,000 per voter would apply to funds raised directly by umbrella organizations. Bill C-9 provides that funds earmarked for the referendum campaign could be raised by a party or a registered committee at any time after the tabling of the government's motion.

Mr. Speaker, a comparison between these two approaches reveals some inconsistency on the part of this government. First, they place a ceiling on individual and corporate spending but they do not on political parties.

Pursuant to another provision the government may refund part of the expenses incurred for election campaigns. The amount of the refund would be set once this provision is passed. But indeed, Mr. Speaker, would it not be better to set the rules of the game at this stage? Even the government is showing its political opportunism by trying to make a last minute decision on the reimbursements of referendum expenses. I do not know exactly what the Minister of Justice thinks about it, but I would simply ask him to set the rules of the game before the referendum takes place, not after.

Still the bill contains very clearcut provisions regarding radio and TV broadcasting.

Despite the critical remarks which I have made, I suggest that the referendum bill could turn out to be a necessary legislative instrument, both simple and efficient. Despite certain imperfections, most of the aspects of public consultation make sense. By not showing a preference for the establishment of umbrella organizations, this bill will make things easier for political parties which will not necessarily be forced to join a united front as is the case for the federalist parties in Quebec. Furthermore, referenda will be held within structures which are more or less similar to those provided for by electoral regulations and procedures.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to bring up the pros and cons of this bill. I perfectly agree on the need for a general law dealing with public consultations in Canada. However, just as many other members, I have an important reservation. In its present form, this bill might contribute to worsen the various confrontations and contentions on matters of jurisdiction which already exist between the federal and provincial governments. These confrontations could hurt the state of harmony in this country since they could lead to irreversible scissions. One must not forget the fact, Mr. Speaker, that it is not the man in the street who wants our country to be divided and is calling for a referendum. The farm hand, the unemployed, the worker, the housewife are not asking for a referendum, the only thing those people want to have is security in a great and beautiful country and bread and butter for tomorrow, as composer Tex Lecor would put it: "When Rosalie decides to put something in the fridge." In this case Rosalie is our elected representative, the government which is unable to ensure everyone a just and decent living and to administer the country so that every Canadian has bread—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ASSIGNMENT OF SPECIAL ADVISER IN DEPARTMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) two straightforward questions concerning Canadian representation in the United States and the manner of parliamentary approval for any forthcoming Canadian commitment to a United Nations force in Namibia. Not surprisingly, I received the rhetorical splendour of the minister in response, but no factual answer. That leads to the deeper questions of the ad hoc management of Canada's foreign policy and the level of public information about that policy. Those are vital questions, as quickly became apparent at the foreign policy conference sponsored last weekend by the Progressive Conservative party.

At this important conference held at the Guild Inn, Toronto, 50 specialists in foreign policy, with academic, research, business, church and non-governmental organization backgrounds from across Canada, gathered to discuss the thematic issues of Canadian foreign policy for the 1980s: Canadian interests, security, human rights and development. Some 38 representatives of the diplomatic corps in Ottawa were present. Indeed this was a rare and valuable moment in the history of foreign policy in our country, and reveals the open manner of consultation by the Progressive Conservative party.

A major concern expressed at the conference was that our foreign policy has become confused, vague, and indecipherable by the public. This is not the fault of Department of External Affairs officers, whom I have found to be competent and dedicated. Rather, it is the fault of the government which is so overwhelmed by the national unity and domestic economy problems that it is unable to chart a clear course in foreign relations. To be responsive to the needs of our time, it is not necessary to conjure up grand designs or new slogans. It is necessary to build on the values, tradition and wisdom of our society, and explain to the Canadian people where we are going.

Throughout the 1970s, we have been buffeted by one international shock wave after another: the OPEC price spiral, the escalating arms race, the north-south development imbalance, economic recession and protectionism, China's westward look, and the new demand for human rights. In the face of all these events the most distinguishing marks of Canadian foreign policy were the attempted diminishment of our deep relationship with the United States, the undercutting of our defence commitments with our NATO partners, and a slogan for something called "a contractual link". No wonder we give the impression we are wandering in a jungle at midnight without a compass. Is there some reason why the government fails to define and state clearly what our goals are in the changing global community?

Our conference last weekend was a success because we approached these questions systematically. For the past two years our party has been constructing a foreign policy built on the pillars of security, freer trade, human rights, and world development. With the added insights of the specialists who gave us their views, we believe we can give a sense of direction to Canadians for the 1980s, which sense of direction can be stated succinctly. We recognize we cannot separate our own domestic aspirations for peace, prosperity and social justice from the global questions of the arms race, nuclear proliferation, food and energy shortages, and human rights. Also we recognize worldwide co-operation institutions are not simply the sensible way to approach such problems, but are literally the only way. It is in Canada's interests to extend the security, freedoms and progress we enjoy through improving our global connection.

The priorities in this work are to strengthen our relationship with the United States, so that Canadian economic interests are represented more systematically at the highest levels of the American government. As a western nation, there should be no doubt that our defence requires an ungrudging commitment to NATO and NORAD. The Commonwealth and La Francophonie enable us to maintain the relationships which flow from our historical duality.

For Canadian foreign policy to be implemented in the 1980s, it will be necessary to have much more public support than is now apparent. This means opening up the process to the scrutiny of parliament, the media, and hence the public. I say with shame that in all of 1978 there was not one foreign policy debate in the House of Commons. The whole process today is so secret one would think foreign policy was the preserve of the elite.

Actually, Canadians from coast to coast can benefit from a constructive foreign policy that draws on the entrepreneurial instinct in Canada. This was precisely the point made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in his address at the conference. There is a great amount of business awaiting Canadians abroad, an important finding that the Leader of the Opposition made on his recent trip, and which I also found on a round the world trip last year. I believe the time has come to involve the Canadian private sector in the implementation of foreign policy through stimulating more joint ventures in such areas as oil, rapeseed, fisheries, nuclear technology, STOL aircraft, and housing. There are vast opportunities ahead for more economic co-operation and trade generally. That is a direction for the 1980s that Canadians will support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note the interest shown by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) concerning our relations with the United States. His remarks, as I understand, deal with two issues: first, the situation of our relations in general with the United States and, second, a more specific question he raised about the appointment of Mr. Basil Robinson as special adviser to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Robinson will advise him on matters concerning the Canadian representation in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize what the minister said yesterday concerning the good relations which exist between Canada and the United States. And I think the Americans have the same feeling. Of course, our relations with our southern neighbour are particularly important for us and also extremely complex. It requires tremendous efforts to maintain them and find fair and equitable answers to unavoidable problems resulting from the interaction between two very dynamic societies like Canada and the United States.

I want to mention to the House, Mr. Speaker, that in recent years both governments have a commendable record of achievements. Individual and official relations at the level of the President and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as well as at other levels have been open and cordial. Ministers from both governments have met frequently and maintain very close relationship on many issues. For instance, today the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) and the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) met in Ottawa with the Secretary of the Interior of the United States and reviewed questions relating to Alaska and the Yukon, to relationship between governments and native people in both countries, and to the Garrison diversion project. Indeed they signed an important agreement amending the treaty between the United States and Canada concerning migratory birds. I might also mention the Secretary of State, Mr. Vance, and the Secretary of Energy, Mr. Schlesinger, who visited Ottawa in November. During the last 18 months both countries agreed to co-operate in important fields for their mutual benefit, including the northern natural gaz pipeline. Work has also begun with a view to cleaning the Great Lakes under the revised agreement concerning the quality of water in the Great Lakes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SECOND READING OF BILL CONCERNING ARAB BOYCOTT

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I asked my question about the Arab boycott legislation proposed by the government because I think it is time to focus attention on it again, and I am convinced that this government may need to have a fire lit under it to get it to honour the commitment it has made to the Canadian people on this subject. What is the boycott? The Arab countries have banded together and agreed to try to prevent Israeli products from entering into their countries. As Canadians we may not like that, but it is the business of the Arab countries and Israel whether one wishes to trade with the other or not, and that is not an object of Canadian policy.

But there are two other dimensions to this boycott which are totally unacceptable to Canadians. The first dimension is that if a Canadian company wishes to trade with an Arab country, the boycott requires that it agree not to trade with Israel. This is an effort to create an international restraint of trade which would apply to the detriment of our economy, it is not in the national interest of, nor is it acceptable to Canada. The other dimension of the Arab boycott which is even more unacceptable is that it calls for discrimination within our own boundaries because the boycott requires that a company wanting to do business with Arab countries must give undertaking that Zionist firms, Jews or firms owned by Jews in our country will not be given any participation in those contracts and that the company will not hire Jews here.

Clearly, this is unacceptable in Canada, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was the first to say so when he was asked about it in this House in May, 1975. At that time he said that this aspect of the Arab boycott was against Canadian ethics and everything for which Canada stands. That is a statement with which all Canadians will agree.

The government then proceeded to implement a policy in an attempt to prevent the Arab boycott from having this terrible application to Canadian trade abroad and within Canada. It did not do what the United States did when the Arab boycott became an issue in that country. Legislation was presented which prevented American companies from complying with the boycott and required them to disclose when they were asked to do so. When the United States implemented that legislation they did not completely close the door to the boycott because the legislation does not apply to foreign subsidiaries of American corporations so, for example, an American subsidiary in Europe would be free to comply with the boycott.

In Canada there is no comparable external dimension of economic activity under Canadian control. If we had enacted legislation of that sort it would have been much tougher in effect. The fact of the matter is, however, that Canada put forward a policy which sounded good on paper. We said that we would withhold government services and that we would require disclosure by companies of any efforts on the part of Arab countries to impose the boycott internally in Canada. But having said that, the policy seemed to disappear. There has been very little evidence to the Canadian people that that policy is in fact being implemented by the government. That was stage one.

Stage two was a commitment to introduce legislation to put some teeth behind the stage one policy, and that legislation is now on the order paper. I know that the Jewish community and others interested in civil liberties in Canadian society welcomed that legislation. I expected that it would be brought forward and implemented very quickly, but after many weeks since it was promised no action has been taken on it and second reading has not yet been proposed. I was very glad to hear the House leader say that he was prepared to consult with the parties on the other side to bring the legislation forward quickly. I hope he will do so, and I hope it will be soon.

I cannot sit down without adding that I am not satisfied with the legislation. It has some loopholes which require the attention of parliament. I hope it will be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for study. I do not like the discretion which it is proposed to give to the minister and which would permit him to grant exemptions and extensions to companies that may be in compliance with the boycott. Further, I think the penalty of $250 a day for failure to provide disclosure is a joke. It is not enough of a deterrent in a deal like the Bell Canada deal, although I do not know if the Arab boycott has been imposed there. The Human Rights Commission set up by parliament is now looking into that matter, a deal involving hundreds of millions of dollars. The idea that such a deal would be affected by a fine of $250 per day is a joke.

This legislation should be brought forward so that we can examine it and try to implement the spirit of the remarks made by the Prime Minister in 1975 to the effect that the Arab boycott is totally unacceptable. What is needed is strong legislation to deal with it so that Canadian values will be imposed on and reflected in Canadian trade abroad. I am sure that there is not an interest group in Canada that does not want us to trade with the Arabs. It is a big potential market, which we need. But we must pursue it with integrity.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) questions the government as to the proposed timing for second reading of the bill, one might wish to paraphrase again the assurances provided by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) last Thursday in the House that the bill is part of the legislative program and that it is the government's intention to deal with it as quickly as possible; that he would consult with the opposition party representatives to secure agreement to limit the debate on second reading to a particular time-frame—perhaps a day—and he would be happy to send it to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence if such agreement is forthcoming then.

I think we have to examine the bill. Specifically, the types of activities which the government finds unacceptable are those which would, in connection with the provisions of any international economic boycotts, require a Canadian firm or individual to engage in discrimination based on the race, national or ethnic origin or religion of any Canadian firm or individual; refuse to purchase from or sell to any other Canadian firm or individual; refuse to sell Canadian goods to any country; refrain from purchases from any country; or restrict commercial investment or other economic activity in any country.

More specifically, this legislation would require any Canadian person who receives a prescribed boycott request to report such a request to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) within 30 days of receipt of the request. Furthermore, those persons who comply with the request are obliged to report such fact to the minister within ten days. Failure to report will be punishable by a fine of $250 for each day late in reporting the required information. This amounts to some $90,000 for anyone who fails to report for one year, which is a stiff penalty indeed.

As per current practice, the minister will table semi-annually a report providing a statistical summary of the information filed, as well as the names of those persons who have complied with prescribed boycott requests. Regulations by order in council which have been tabled in the House on December 15 will prescribe those foreign boycotts requests that need be reported. It is not the government's intention to require reporting of primary boycott requests.

In summary, the bill embodies in legislative form those features of the Canadian policy which have been in effect for the past two years, the only difference being that instead of being limited to those Canadians who require government support and assistance—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon).

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COMMITMENT TO INCREASE DEFENCE BUDGET

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we seem to be getting long answers from the government side tonight. I hope that I will not break the mould.

I am rising because of a question that I asked last week of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). Another minister was asked a supplementary question. First of all, I asked a question concerning the fall of the Cosmos and the subsequent bill. In Hansard for January 24, 1979, at page 2512, I asked the minister to explain:

—why the government failed to claim under Treaty 6 where under article 5, paragraph 5, the Soviets would have been required to pay all expenses incurred in the recovery of returning space objects?

To this, the Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

Mr. Speaker, I will as soon as I get a chance to look at Treaty 6.

He went on to say:

I have to tell the hon. member that I have relied upon the advice of our legal experts on this matter. It was their judgment that this was the proper and appropriate way to proceed. I must confess that, not being a legal person myself, I do not know what the answer is to the hon. member's question.

He was not the only minister whose ignorance was all too apparent. I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) what the total cost of the operation was. His department was responsible for the last and longest part of the search and clean up operation. The minister took no less than nine lines of Hansard to inform the House that he did not know what his department's claim was, or that of any other department whose operations he had been responsible for co-ordinating.

The sad part of this ministerial ignorance is the history behind it. The performance of the ministers in particular has revealed a far from adequate level of knowledge and ability to act in the best interests of Canada. What is worse is that there is no evidence that they have yet learned anything from their previous mistakes.

In January, 1978, a similar series of questions was asked. At that time neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nor the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) could do anything about the possible crash of the satellite until a few moments before it fell, despite the fact the Prime Minister had been at Norad headquarters and received what he said was a complete briefing on the matter. In the early days of the crisis it was revealed that there was no grasp of the dimensions of the problem, or how to exercise existing treaties to which Canada and the U.S.S.R. are both parties. To this day there is a lack of understanding of the two simple treaties that govern this matter.

Treaty 6 covers expenses of recovering satellites or parts of satellites. Treaty 7 covers damage that might be incurred by a satellite. We are in the peculiar position of having used up a lot of money for the recovery of parts of the satellite. Obviously this should come under Treaty 6 which covers expenses. In fact in one place it has the words "expenses of the search". Treaty 7 which covers damages is meant to cover damage to buildings or to a city if a satellite crash lands, or indeed damage to another aircraft; it makes provision for that.

When I asked the ministers if they had read the treaties they made light of it, or claimed they were too difficult to read. People who write bills for this government should study the English in these treaties. They are the easiest and shortest I have seen for a long time. Treaty 6, which no one on the government side seems to have read yet, contains only three pages, and is written in crystal clear English. It is not the fact that they did not have sufficient warning on this matter. Last January, 1978, when the satellite fell, my first question to the ministers was with respect to the Cosmos satellite. As reported at page 2347 of Hansard I asked:

—has the Canadian government notified the U.S.S.R. of the discovery on our soil of a space object, or its component parts, believed to be of a hazardous or deleterious nature, as we are required to do under article 5 of the international agreement on the return of objects launched into outer space?

● (2225)

This is in the treaty we should have been claiming under. However, we have to notify them. This we were not doing. The Minister of National Defence replied:

The international regime will meet its responsibilities, as was indicated to the Department of External Affairs by the Soviet ambassador.

In other words, do not worry about the bills, the U.S.S.R. will pay them. When I asked if indeed they had filed under another provision of the treaty, the minister replied, "not to the best of my knowledge." On February 1 I again asked if they had filed under the appropriate section. The Minister of National Defence replied:

There has been no request for Russian assistance from any of our people. The Soviets have offered to assist, but there has not been a need for it.

On February 3 I asked:

Did the government formally notify the Soviet Union, as we are required to do under clause 4 of article 5 of the treaty governing the return of objects launched into space, and have the Soviets responded in the manner they were obliged to do if we so informed them that an object of a hazardous and deleterious nature had crashed in our territory?

The Minister of National Defence replied:

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between officials of the Department of External Affairs and the Soviet government to determine the consequences of this.

I then asked:

That is not quite an answer to the question I asked. I asked if we formally notified them under the treaty. Discussions are a different thing.

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the treaty has been exercised in that manner.

That put us in the difficulty we are in today. I hope the parliamentary secretary will explain why we are not putting our claim under Treaty 6 which covers search expenses. The second question I asked about total costs need not be answered. Everybody in the country except—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the issue raised this evening by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) is important and therefore would require much more time than I am allowed. I would however take this opportunity to repeat the assurances given by my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) in this House on December 14. Hon. members will recall the minister indicated at that time that our NATO allies welcomed our efforts.

Hon. members will also recall the minister recently visited Canadian troups in Germany. Dr. Apel, the minister in charge of national defence in the Federal Republic of Germany joined Mr. Danson for that visit. Both ministers visited Canadian military facilities in Lahr and Baden, and after private and public talks Dr. Apel paid tribute to the Canadian contribution. Later in the course of that trip, the minister visited Greece, another NATO ally, where important and very positive meetings were held. During those meetings with representatives of other NATO countries, it was sensed that the Canadian contribution is very well recognized. Canadian soldiers of both sexes are truly professionals, and I believe that all hon. members here share this view. This is a recognized fact in the NATO organization, the United Nations and everywhere else. We are now in the process of buying the best kind of equipment that will allow our forces to show their ability and complete their training. Mr. Speaker, two especially interesting events occurred last week, one in London, Ontario, and the other in Burbank, California. In London, it was the AVGP, a multiple purpose vehicle. This vehicle was preceded by the Leopard tanks which are now in Gagetown, New Brunswick. The AVGP will be used to train our armoured force, and because of its multiple role, it will also be used by our troops. In Burbank, it was the Aurora. This airplane has the reputation of being the best in the world. Eighteen of these airplanes will be purchased from the Lockheed Company in California. The first will be delivered in May 1980 and the last one in March 1981.

I could give many other examples, Mr. Speaker, such as the progress accomplished in our fighter plane purchasing program and the new shipbuilding project for our fleet. What is important to note, Mr. Speaker, is the quality of our equipment and the professionalism of our people, which are both recognized by NATO.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST THAT SURVEY OF FAMILY EXPENDITURES BE IMMEDIATELY DISCONTINUED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that family allowances are, by law, universal and without a means test and, further, that a survey is now being conducted by Statistics Canada into the personal habits and incomes of every twenty-eighth recipient of family allowances and, further, that those interviewed are told that they must respond to these questions by an interviewer under penalty of a fine or imprisonment of up to three months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That this House directs that the survey by Statistics Canada of the recipients of family allowances which represents an unwarranted invasion of privacy be stopped forthwith and, further, that the minister responsible be directed to explain to this House or to the appropriate committee of this House the reasons for this survey which violates the principle of the universality of family allowances.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

CALL FOR STEPS TO END PAY AND JOB DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House endorses the stand taken by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and by the Ottawa Women's Lobby to the effect that the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, in calling the recent wage settlement between Bell Canada and its clerical employees, most of whom are women, inflationary is dead wrong, it being clear that encouragement should be given to "catch-up" wage increases designed to correct pay distortions between male and female workers; and this House calls on the government to back its commitment to equal pay for work of equal value by taking positive steps to end pay and job discrimination against women in the federal public service.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WATER RESOURCES

ROUTING OF WATER PIPELINE IN SAANICH, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to put a motion on a matter of local, urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) refuses to meet the local member of the British Columbia legislature and the minister of the British Columbia government involved to resolve a difference over the routing of a water pipeline across or around the Dominion Experimental Farm in the Saanich peninsula, and since to route the pipeline around the farm would be more costly to the Canadian taxpayer and to the ratepayers of the municipalities involved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the Minister of Transport abdicate his role as spokesman for the three ministries involved and ask the Minister of Agriculture, who just possibly might be a little less intractable in this matter, to negotiate a settlement so that this pipeline might be routed by the more economic route at no cost to the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPPING

INCREASE IN PILOTAGE FEES—PROMOTION OF MARINE SERVICE BUSINESS ON EAST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

● (1410)

That the increase of up to 69 per cent in pilotage fees in the Atlantic provinces for small vessels recommended by the Canadian Transport Commission and approved by the government to go into effect January 22, be reversed by the government immediately to prevent a further decline in shipping in Atlantic ports in 1979 and to encourage the use of the ports of St. John's and other Atlantic province ports by foreign fishing and other vessels so as to promote the marine service business of east coast Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

HEALTH CARE FOR INDIAN COMMUNITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has delayed her new guidelines for Indian health services for six months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard):

That the minister take steps to rescind the agreement between her department and Blue Cross—Blue Shield in the maritime provinces, that she inform her regional offices of the six-month delay, and that she inform pharmacists, ambulance companies and others directly involved that she has, indeed, made this six-month postponement.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RAILWAYS

USE OF FREE PASSES ON VIA RAIL TRAINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter that is urgent and pressing.

In view of the fact that railway passholder privileges have been restricted by the rationalization of transcontinental passenger service, and since the railway companies and VIA have not yet agreed to continue the existing pass privileges of widows, pensioners and employees, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Transport require that Canadian National and Canadian Pacific employees, pensioners, and widows be allowed to use their passes on any VIA trains.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter or urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the devastating effect to the economy if foreign exchange controls are implemented, owing to persistent and increasing speculation on the part of some of the leading financial experts in this country that this government will momentarily impose foreign exchange controls, and in view of the fact that these same experts are advising Canadian investors to prepare for controls by transferring their investment funds to foreign corporations which they would control from Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of Finance forthwith make a statement in the House of Commons in a clear, unequivocal fashion on his intentions in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FURTHER DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON INFLATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister will know, on January 24 the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, said to the Senate committee:

I feel very strongly that further declines in the Canadian dollar resulting from this interest rate relationship would be much more inflationary.

Would the Prime Minister tell us if that is also the position of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition was complaining that the governor was not appearing before a committee, and now he is quoting words of the governor in front of a committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why not abolish the Senate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is still confused about the difference between the House of Commons and the Senate, but he has not lost his refusal to answer questions in the House of Commons.

I wonder if we might have an indication of the policy of the Government of Canada in relation to the dollar, if it has one. Will he answer my question? Was the position stated by the governor of the Bank of Canada also the view of the Government of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and myself have said repeatedly that the policy of the government since 1970, has been to have a floating dollar and that the value of the dollar is established by the market system operating in the normal way.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the warning issued by the governor of the Bank of Canada is clearly that if the floating dollar policy followed by this government—which amounts to a sinking dollar policy—continues, then we are going to have a very serious inflationary problem in this country.

What I would like to ask the Prime Minister is, given the failure to stop the decline because of the policies that have been followed so far by the Government of Canada, has the government any new policies to propose that will stop the slide of the Canadian dollar? If so, what are they?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the best way to stop the slide in the value of the dollar is to make sure the economy is sound and is responding well. The policies of the Minister of Finance in his budget last fall, the announcements made by the government in August in terms of cutting vast expenditures from government spending, reducing the rate of growth of expenditure and the rate of growth of the public service, are our ways of ensuring that the Canadian economy remains strong.

I doubt very much if it is helped by the Leader of the Opposition saying one day that he wants a two to three year deficit, the next day it will only be a short one, and then having his erstwhile critic saying it will be a few months, or one month—a disappearing stimulus, as it were. That is not very helpful. Fortunately, people are now realizing there is a policy on this side and that on the other side there is just confusion and a welter of policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what the figures released this morning indicate is that there is, indeed, a policy on that side; it is a policy which has increased the size of the Canadian deficit; it is a policy which has brought down the value of the Canadian dollar. That policy is obviously not suitable to Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Since the Prime Minister is now so interested in committees of the Senate, I want to ask why, if he is so proud of his policy, he continues to refuse to allow the state of the Canadian dollar to be examined and witnesses to be called by a committee of this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr.Speaker, I indicated yesterday the many occasions on which this House has had the occasion to discuss economics—the budget debate, the debate on the speech from the throne, and several opposition days that will be available in the next month and a half to the opposition parties who, if they want to discuss their views on this, can put them forward. However, I sense that they are not going to bring these issues forward, for a very simple reason.

The Leader of the Opposition says in his question that a larger deficit causes a sinking dollar, that he is concerned about a sinking dollar, and then goes on to propose a larger deficit. I do not really see that they have anything to contribute in this, except questions to which they do not know the answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COMPARISON OF CANADA'S ECONOMIC SITUATION WITH THAT OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. You will recall that yesterday he gave us some treatises explaining the economic panic that the goverment is in. He stated that various countries ship unemployment out of the country. It was a great reminder of the Prime Minister's comment to University of Toronto students some time ago that if they could not find jobs in Canada, to leave the country.

My question is simply this. Why did the Prime Minister avoid commenting on the United States performance yesterday, bearing in mind that they have a better real growth than Canada, less inflation, have reduced their unemployment, have approximately less than half the current account deficit we have and, of course, have a domestic deficit much lower, relatively, than ours? What have they done so right that the Prime Minister's government has done so wrong, resulting in our current dollar crisis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member returns to the question of shipping unemployment out of the country. I remind him of what I said yesterday, that in Canada in the past ten years we have increased the number of jobs by 2½ billion, plus.

Mr. Clark: Billion?

Mr. Trudeau: Million. In Germany, during the same period, they have lost jobs. They now have nearly two million jobs less than they had ten years ago. If that is something the hon. member—

Mr. Stevens: How about the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Now he asks about the United States. I indicated yesterday that on a ten over ten-year basis, or taking just the last six years, the hon. member will find that Canada has performed better than the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members can challenge the figures if they can prove it. I indicated yesterday that real growth in Canada had been higher than in the United States over the ten-year period. The real disposable income in Canada went up twice as fast. That is, real income of every head of population in Canada, compared to real income of every head of population in the United States. It went up twice as fast in Canada as in the United States.

Just a few weeks ago the OECD indicated that, in terms of standard of living, Canada had just surpassed the United States, being second only, I believe, to Switzerland and Sweden.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand the groans from the opposition. The facts disturb their pessimistic view of the way Canada has performed in the past ten years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1420)

Mr. Gillies: Tell that to the million unemployed.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Prime Minister will make a point, in the coming months, of telling that to the unemployed of Canada.

Is he aware that governor Bouey, apparently feeling he was not being given the opportunity to respond to his critics, invited, on his own initiative, an interview with a representative of The Globe and Mail with a view to having published in that paper the governor's views concerning the current dollar crisis?

If the government is aware of the initiative taken by the governor to have his words put into print, would the Prime Minister tell us why he continues to be so hesitant to allow him to appear before a committee of this House so that, in addition to presenting his views, he can respond to questions by members of this House concerning the current dollar position?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The governor of the Bank has appeared before the committee, and he probably feels that after the kind of questions he was getting from members of the opposition he would have more intelligent questions coming from the reporter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: He gave that interview. He was before a committee of the Senate. The finance committee is presently reviewing the Bank Act, and he is ready to appear there. All I know, after reading some of the questioning there, is that there is such confusion on the other side that the governor probably felt it was his duty to speak directly to the people.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACTION TO AVOID FURTHER INCREASE IN PRICE OF LUMBER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Considering that lumber prices for home builders increased by a full 40 per cent last year, and considering that profits by companies engaged in this industry are at an almost all-time high, ranging up to 358 per cent, I should like to ask the minister what he is doing to head off an anticipated further 20 per cent increase in price this year which will have a major effect on the price of every Canadian home.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As the hon. member knows, until the end of last year the AIB was in place and there was price control to a certain extent, together with monitoring of these prices. The agency no longer exists.

I have recently received representations of a similar nature from members of this side of the House and I have started an inquiry into the situation. I cannot tell where it will lead at the present time. I have been asked to look into the matter, and I shall.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the price increases amounted to 40 per cent last year, and 20 per cent the year before—that is a total of 60 per cent—and that a further increase of 20 per cent is anticipated in the coming year, making it 80 per cent, which is not bad—if a Canadian worker could get that, he would be very happy—and considering that the increase anticipated this year will add at least $1,200 to the price of the average Canadian home, will the minister take direct action, call in the heads of the major firms, draw these price and profit increases to their attention and request them in the strongest possible language to hold down price increases this year?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the figures the hon. member gives for the last year or two. I have come to be very suspicious of information the hon. member gives us in this House; I have often found it to be incorrect. However, I will look into this matter.

There is no longer a price control mechanism in this country. It may be possible to talk to the leaders of this industry if there appear to be unwarranted profits or price increases, but I want to look into this before I make any judgment on the question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister has made what I take to be a gratuitous comment about inaccurate statistics. I challenge him to name one. If there is one, I will publicly accept this criticism and correct the inaccuracy. The figures I am giving are available to the public. There have been substantial price increases in the past two years.

The Prime Minister has lectured Canadian workers over the past week.

Mr. Trudeau: No.

Mr. Broadbent: He has asked them to hold down wage demands, while their increases have averaged just over 6 per cent. If the minister wants action and if he wants fairness in the system, will he call in heads of companies and request them to hold down their prices, because prices profoundly affect the price of every home and, indirectly, the quite justifiable wage demands of workers in this country?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I said I would do that if I thought it was warranted, but I want to look at the facts first. Before the hon. member raised this matter with me, several members of my own caucus did the same thing. I promised them I would look into this matter. I will do that, and I will call on company heads if it is necessary to do so.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED BOYCOTT OF SOCIAL CREDITERS IN INFORMATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, following the motion which I proposed yesterday, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State responsible for the CBC. Considering that the corporation has been given a mandate to present the views of the House and provide consistent and fair news reports to the entire population and considering that this Crown corporation systematically refuses to broadcast any news release from the Social Credit Party of Canada, is the minister prepared to investigate the attitude of the CBC and, if so, would he report the results of such investigation to the House?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Unfortunately Mr. Speaker, being ill yesterday I was unable to read the motion moved by the hon. member. I will read it carefully. If I understand the last part of the hon. member's question, he is asking me whether I am prepared to launch an investigation into the CBC and report the results of that investigation to the House. I must admit that I would not make a comprehensive inquiry, if this is what he wants, but of course I am prepared to consider carefully the suggestion he made yesterday before giving a final answer to the question he put to me today.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I happen to know that the Secretary of State has already contacted the CBC for particulars. What I would like to know now is this: When something important is going on, for instance the Pepin-Robarts task force report, which has been much talked about this past week, if any political party takes an official stand on that issue, would the minister be willing, following the first round of talks he had with CBC officials, to inquire into the time spent over a given period of time to air the views of each political party on daily news broadcasts and would he report back to the House?

Mr. Roberts: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to inform the CBC of the representations made by hon. members and it is my duty to do so as effectively as possible. But it is quite another thing to conduct an inquiry; it is a very serious matter. Before making such a decision, I would like to have time to examine this matter and also the opportunity to consider the evidence or the reasons for such an inquiry. I think this matter would be a very serious one for the House to get involved in and I would like to have time to go into the matter fully before taking such action.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ASSISTANCE IN COMPLETING CHILD TAX CREDIT FORMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Now that the forms in connection with the child tax credit allowance are in the mail—and they are even more complex and worse than we had anticipated—I would ask the minister what extra assistance, extra staff or help he intends to provide the 1.5 million Canadian women in this country who have never filed income tax returns, but who will have to answer what is a very complex and difficult form?

What extra help does the minister intend to provide those women to ensure that they are able to file these returns satisfactorily in order to get the moneys due them under the Child Tax Credit Act?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty that exists in respect of this form arises principally from the fact that many mothers who receive it are going to be filing an income tax form for the first time. I would dispute with the hon. member that schedule 10, to which he is referring, is unduly complex. It is a four-part form on a single page.

I think many persons will require explanations, and there has been a considerable degree of publicity conducted by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who earlier this month mailed out some very helpful information, including a copy of the form. I should point out that my department mailed out some 1.5 million forms to those persons we believe would not ordinarily be paying income tax. We are going to require some 350 additional person-years to process the additional material. However, I would say that in addition to the regular advice given by Revenue Canada, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has allocated substantial funds to make certain that voluntary organizations are able to render assistance in this area to taxpayers.

We are encouraging our own officials to render whatever extra assistance they can, and many of them will be doing so on a voluntary basis. I have also encouraged members on our side of the House, certainly, who have taken a great interest in this, to offer the help of their offices, and I hope hon. members opposite will do the same.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, one part of this form, very briefly, reads as follows:

> Subtract line 7 from line 1 to arrive at your child tax credit on line 8. If line 7 is greater than line 1, you are not entitled to a child tax credit. Transfer your credit to line 78 on page four of your return.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think even the minister himself could understand that bureaucratic gobbledegook. I should like to ask the minister, given the fact—

An hon. Member: Don't you understand it?

[Mr. Roberts.]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I will let the Prime Minister read it. Perhaps if he did, he would not be sending out this stupid form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I would like to ask the minister—

An hon. Member: Has he read it; have you read it; has she read it?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, given the complexity of that form, given the fact that these women have never filed income tax returns before, and given the fact that they are entitled to a child tax credit, will the Minister of National Revenue withdraw the form, particularly if he is not prepared to provide sufficient councillors, which he obviously will need, and instead require a simple declaration, as is the case in respect of the guaranteed income supplement under the old age assistance program? Surely that is all that is required.

If the minister is not prepared to do that, then he will have to answer in this House for the problems he will be creating by this bureaucratic gobbledegook which is going to confuse the people of this country.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the hon. member attempting to mislead the House by his statement and by—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: —extracting the language that is in the form without presenting the form. If he were more fair-minded, he would indicate that these instructions reflect facts that are far more obvious to anybody studying the form.

I do not deny, as I have not denied earlier, that women who are faced with filling out of the form for the first time may find it burdensome. That is why I explained some of the processes to help that are going to be undertaken. I would suggest to the hon. member that, instead of creating apprehensions which do not exist in the minds of most people by extracting information from the form, he should learn more about it himself and then he might be able to help his constituents fill them out.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALLEGED INVASION OF PRIVACY IN SURVEY OF FAMILY EXPENDITURES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, so much for Tony the Tiger.

I should like to direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is there any connection between the survey being conducted by Statistics Canada involving every twenty-eighth recipient of family allowance, asking very personal questions about things from income to the use of personal hygiene products, and the child tax credit bill? If there is no connection, perhaps she could explain to the House and the country why this massive invasion of privacy is being allowed, as it seems to violate, if not the letter then certainly the spirit of the universal Family Allowances Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have directed his question to my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He has been in the House long enough to know who is responsible for Statistics Canada. As the hon. member is probably afraid of my colleague, I have just consulted him and he has assured me that there is no connection.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST THAT UNDERDEVELOPED REGIONS RECEIVE SHARE OF COMMERCIAL OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services.

In view of the fact that the Pepin-Robarts commission has recommended, in the section dealing with unity and the health of the economy, that government purchasing policies be based upon considerations of market costs unless specified social and economic objectives would otherwise be served, could the minister indicate whether he goes along with this recommendation and when he intends to implement it, so that small manufacturers and suppliers within underdeveloped regions may have access to and take full advantage of commercial opportunities made available by Canada as a whole?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria by saying that the federal government being the major purchaser in Canada, it goes without saying that our duty is to use this purchasing power to reach various goals, which include strengthening Canadian industries and, as the hon. member has stated, helping our less favoured regions. In this regard, I might say that I have instructed my department officials to buy this year from our less favoured regions four times as much as they did over the past few years.

EXTERNAL TRADE IN JUNE AND JULY, 1978—EFFECT ON CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would tell us if the misleading external trade figures for June and July of last summer, produced by Statistics Canada, had an adverse effect on the Canadian dollar and, if so, has he taken this matter up with his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in order to prevent a repetition of this latest gaffe by our national statistical agency?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the fact that the figures published in July showed a deficit for the month of June, which was not the situation in the month of July, was not particularly helpful to the Canadian dollar.

You have to give the benefit of the doubt to the organization, because those figures are perhaps being published too quickly. They come out only a few weeks following the end of the month and can be misleading because all the information is not in. Perhaps if this situation is repeated it would be worth-while looking into the possibility of not publishing these figures so quickly. In this way they would perhaps give a real reflection of what happened in the previous few months and the market would not then operate on information that was found to be correct a month later.

The same thing happened for the month of November, when a surplus of $100 million was shown. It could be that the same phenomenon will occur for the month of December. I cannot blame Statistics Canada, because perhaps it is forced to report too early. Maybe we could look at the possibility of waiting a longer period, so there will be no misunderstanding.

STATISTICS CANADA

ABOLITION OF JOB VACANCY SURVEY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question relates also to the subject of statistics and I would direct it to the Prime Minister.

I wonder if he could take us into his confidence and tell us whether he has yet found time to answer the request of the president of the CLC regarding what I understand to be a unilateral decision by Statistics Canada to abolish the job vacancy survey, the only reliable statistics on the labour demand side? If he has not had time to answer this request, perhaps he could tell the House what decision he has made.

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I answered that letter a week or two ago. The first thing I would point out is that it was not a unilateral decision. On the contrary, I had a meeting with the CLC executive and some ministers early in December, I believe—or perhaps late in November—at which time they asked us to bring out, alongside the new consumer price index, the old one. In effect, that is what we did in consideration of their request.

We looked into the cost, it was not very great, to publish these additional figures. We feared it would be confusing because, naturally, there can be only one set of official figures. We cannot have two sets of CPI figures side by side, particularly because of the importance of the consumer price index in establishing indexed pensions, and so on. We must have only one official index. Thus, we brought out that one official index but, acceding to the CLC request, we brought out in a parallel manner the old index, making it clear that the old index was not the official one. If the unions want to use it for certain purposes, of course we will not stand in their way.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Hogan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will hear the hon. member's point of order at three o'clock. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

REPORT ON MORALE OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services: it arises out of a $15,000 consultants' report by Stethem-Gareau Ltd., of Montreal, dealing with the question of employee morale at Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Can the minister confirm the reports that the study, which was conducted at the cost of $15,000 to taxpayers, disclosed serious morale problems within Crown Assets Disposal Corporation? Can the minister tell the House whether, in fact, he has read a copy of the report since he and I first discussed it a month ago?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I will answer the hon. member that the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has indeed commissioned different studies. I will be very happy to make available to the hon. member the one which deals with the performance of the corporation. As regards the study commissioned by the administration on the attitudes of the employees themselves, I do not think it is of public interest, considering it is already somewhat dated.

However, I can tell the hon. member that I asked the president of the corporation to undertake another study on that matter as soon as possible. And if the hon. member would like to have the president appear before the parliamentary committee, I would agree and it will be seen how she has doubled the sales figure within three years with the same number of employees.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer my question as to whether he has bothered to study the report which disclosed very serious morale problems. Can the minister indicate that?

Also, in view of the fact he stated in his response to me that he feels the study conducted just a little over a year ago is stale-dated, can he confirm that in 1978 virtually one-half of the employees of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation left the employ of the corporation? If so, what possible justification can the minister have for suggesting that circumstances have changed since the report was commissioned?

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. member my method of looking at any corporation or board for which I am responsible. As long as I have confidence in them, and as long as through their performance that confidence is justified, I will not act as a backseat driver.

If the hon. member would like her to appear before a parliamentary committee, he can ask her all the questions he wants, and I hope the hon. member will reach the same conclusion as me. When the hon. member realizes that she has increased services in three years, without increasing the number of employees, and all other parameters, I think he will reach the same conclusion. It is not up to me to ask for a report—

An hon. Member: But you are the minister.

Mr. De Bané: —which has nothing to do with the performance of the company but concerns a particular problem which happened two years ago.

An hon. Member: Did you read it?

POST OFFICE

UNION'S ACTION AGAINST WORKERS WHO WERE LEGISLATED BACK TO WORK

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Is he aware that at least 50 letter carriers in Hamilton are facing formal charges by the Letter Carriers Union of Canada because they obeyed parliament's back to work legislation last October?

During that debate, the minister assured the House that no postal workers would be harassed if they wanted to work. Thus, what will he do about this particular situation in Hamilton? Will the minister make clear to CUPW that the government will not tolerate Post Office employees suffering reprisals for obeying the law of the land?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this question has been drawn to my attention. The position of my department was that it was an internal matter with the postal union.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: If these people asked us for help to protect them against their own union, we would consider it; but as a matter of fact at the moment there is no question of harassment. The law is there. If they want help, again, we will consider it.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CHILD TAX CREDIT—REQUEST FOR MORE SIMPLE TAX FORM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue, who is also the minister responsible for cutting down paperwork. My question is supplementary to the questions put by the hon. member for St. John's East.

I plead with the minister and his colleagues that this is not a laughing matter, nor is it a case of anyone trying to mislead anyone else. In view of the fact the mix-up in his department and the complications of the process will result in many thousands of mothers—perhaps hundreds of thousands—not receiving their child tax credit on time, and that when Bill C-10 was before the House we pleaded for the simplest possible arrangement, will the minister now apply himself to finding a way to deal with this matter in very simple terms? Why not accept the simplest statement from any mother that she is entitled to the payment, to ensure she receives it, leaving another year to sort the matter out as far as the details are concerned?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I am more than conscious of the problem created by the process.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: But I think we can be lured into exaggerating the complexity of this problem. I assure the hon. member that the department under my direction, my colleagues, all members on this side and other departments will co-operate fully to help mothers fill out these forms. I reiterate, the hon. member for St. John's East was trying to obscure the fact that this is not a laborious procedure once it is explained or understood.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: Basically, schedule 10 contains four questions: What is the net income of the mother; what is the net income of her spouse; do they add up to more than $18,000—and if not, then they transfer that amount to the regular income tax form, sign their name and send it in.

Mr. Alexander: And that is where the fun begins.

Mr. Abbott: Let me reiterate, I do not doubt that for many mothers even the prospect of filing a return is a problem. It is that problem we are ready to encounter. All the officers of my department are conscious of this problem, as they are of others. Once again, I encourage the hon. member to help his constituents, through his own office, wherever he finds difficulty.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, does not the fact there are 1.5 million mothers who are non-filers of income tax forms, and who are into this situation for the first time, convince the minister that they will not be able to deal easily even with the so-called simplified form to which he just referred? Granted that in the course of a few months the minister might sort it all out, surely there can be a simple arrangement at this time, so that these mothers will get their money in April.

If the minister is caught with the Income Tax Act, caught with regulations, and requires some amendment to the statute to simplify the situation, will he ask the government House leader to discuss this matter with the other House leaders, for I am sure we would agree to put the necessary amendment through in half an hour?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I think we must acknowledge that the system has been agreed upon by parliament. It was devised by the Department of National Revenue for at least this year, to be carried out as effectively as possible.

• (1450)

I have no doubt that if a very small percentage—say 1 per cent of 1.5 million filers—are frustrated, this can amount to a very substantial number of people, by its very nature. But I do not think I could undertake or lead the hon. member to think that a change could be made at this stage. Next year there will be a far simpler return because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: Hon. members laugh. The fact remains that parliament passed this bill on December 4 and it was quite inconceivable that the taxation forms could be amended prior to that date to take account of a bill which might or might not be passed.

What I am suggesting is that hon. members opposite, as they have here, accept the fact that this will present some difficulty the first year and, instead of spending their time belly-aching about it in the House, get out and help their constituents fill out the forms.

CHILD TAX CREDIT—REQUEST THAT TAX FORM BE WITHDRAWN

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. minister that parliament did not pass on this incredible form.

My question is directed to the hon. lady, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering that when we debated the child tax credit bill, we on this side of the House warned the hon. lady that going by the method of the negative income tax, what would happen has happened, and considering that the form now before 1.5 million mothers in Canada is an incredible means test, has she made representations to the Minister of National Revenue to withdraw this incredible, indecent means test and to simplify the whole methodology, as suggested by the hon. member for St. John's East? Has the minister made these representations to the hon. Minister of National Revenue and, if not, will she assure the House that she will do so?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but the hon. member is all mixed up. In the second part of his question he refers to a means test. Granting social benefits by using the income tax is the most dignified way to evaluate the income and means of an individual and his family without having public servants interfering. That is why we have chosen it. Naturally, I do not want to be too long in answering my colleague. This is the method we want to apply. We want to use the most dignified and fair means to give each Canadian family in need an additional share of federal funds. Moreover, in the first part of his question he referred to the problem of filling a double form. It was I who informed the House of this problem, who explained that for the first year of application the revenue computer program had been working since the end of August and that in light of the present situation we had decided that it was better to give this money to the mothers in 1979 than to have them wait a year more to give the department a chance to design a simpler form.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. lady that I am asking this question because of the mothers in my riding who perceive this form as a reprehensible means test. She can call it what she wants. I am asking her again: considering the representations that have been made to members on this side of the House that this is a reprehensible means test, because of the bureaucratic form prepared by her colleague, did she ever determine that that is what it would be, and will she now make recommendations to him to withdraw this nonsense and simplify it; or is she just going to turn a deaf ear to the House?

Mr. Speaker: That is a repetition of the question just asked. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

PROVISION OF PROGRAMS FOR CHILDREN WITH LEARNING DISABILITIES

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that 1979 is the International Year of the Child, and as it appears that provincial governments have neglected many of their responsibilities in the field of education for special populations, has the minister given consideration to hosting a federal-provincial conference with a view to providing adequate facilities and programs for children with learning disabilities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, two years ago my department gave out a grant of approximately $15,000 to the Canadian Association for Children with Learning Disabilities to hold a national conference. We gave another amount of close to $45,000, if my memory serves me well, for them to carry on a study, the report of which is expected in the near future.

If the purpose of the question is to assist these children, the mechanism of a federal-provincial conference in a field which is clearly provincial will not help at all. I would suggest that the Canadian association could act as a pressure group and have the effect of putting pressure on the various provincial governments to help children with learning disabilities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO U.K. ON MOVE OF AIR CANADA OPERATIONS FROM HEATHROW TO GATWICK AIRPORT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. On January 24, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that Canada's High Commissioner had delivered a personal note to the British Foreign Office indicating Canada's disagreement with the apparent decision to move Air Canada's London operations from Heathrow to Gatwick.

In view of the confusion such a move will create for travellers leaving Halifax, for example, en route to European destinations, will the Prime Minister tell the House if he has followed up this matter and, if not, will he now take whatever action is possible to alert the British authorities, if necessary at the ministerial level, of the seriousness of this move as it applies to Canadian air travellers, especially businessmen flying out of Halifax, Nova Scotia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter was taken up directly by me when I met with the British Prime Minister and his minister responsible for air transport when I went to London in early December.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF FLOATING DOLLAR POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance explain, because it puzzles me, why it is that in the course of pursuing the policy of a floating dollar and only making moves to ensure orderly marketing, some $5 billion more has been spent in buying Canadian dollars than in selling them? One would have thought that under the policy stated by the minister there would be a balance. Would the minister explain this to me as simply as possible, so I will understand?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter often. Many times I have said that we have had to borrow abroad, not only for the question of the exchange rate but to supplement the flow of capital into Canada, because some years ago the provinces, municipalities and other institutions were borrowing abroad. These organizations are not borrowing as much at this time because there is a great deal of liquidity in Canada. The savings rate for the third year in a row is at a record level.

Because we are having this balance of payments problem, we must maintain some inflow of capital. We have borrowed in order to achieve this, and as we are operating the exchange market through the Bank of Canada, of course, it is serving that purpose at the same time.

It is a very complex issue and I can understand why the hon. member would be confused when his leader talks about a phantom deficit that is appearing or disappearing from week to week or month to month and deals only with that aspect of the economy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I can still understand gobbledegook and evasion when I hear it. If I understood the minister correctly—and I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—he has just told me that because the provinces have not been borrowing as much as they usually do, the Government of Canada has felt it necessary to support the Canadian dollar.

Would the minister correct me if I am wrong and, if I am, would he explain to me why the purchase of $5 billion more, Canadian, than is being sold does not constitute support for our dollar to that extent?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is very simple. I said that Canada is in a poor balance of payments situation, we have had to maintain the flow of capital from abroad to Canada. In past years it was the provinces, municipalities and other institutions that were borrowing abroad, but now because there are enough savings in Canada and a great deal of liquidity, they are borrowing on the Canadian market and the federal government has decided to borrow abroad to supplement the flow of capital into Canada. I think it is very clear and simple.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister—he has not made it perfectly clear—whether or not, despite all his talk about a floating dollar, the government has actively supported the Canadian dollar in the manner he outlined in the last two answers.

● (1500)

Mr. Chrétien: I have said many times that the governor of the Bank intervenes in the marketplace to maintain an orderly market. In all the currency that is floating in the world—Japan, Switzerland, Germany and the United States—all the governments are intervening to make sure that there is a normal market. It is very simple.

SPORTS

REASON CANADA GAMES PARTICIPANTS ASKED TO PROVIDE SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) which relates to the Canada Games in Brandon. Could the minister explain to the House the rationale for the organizers of this event asking for the social insurance number of all participants?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, that would have been a decision of the organizing committee in Brandon. I presume it is for the same reason as is generally the case in sporting events. Numerous youngsters enter their names in different ways: perhaps they call themselves Bobby Smith, Robert Smith, Robert Smith, Jr., and so on. In order to keep very good track of who is at the games and where they are, they like to keep the numbers straight.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Under the circumstances, has the minister an agreement with the Minister of National Revenue that if there is any confusion, that is the purpose for getting these numbers, so there can be no question about who these people are and where they live.

Has the minister arranged to have access to the computer of the Department of National Revenue in order to make sure that there is no mistake, or is this just another attempt to build up the social insurance number as an identifying number in government generally?

Mrs. Campagnolo: No, Mr. Speaker. I think I am quite safe in saying that the only concern we have is for the welfare of the young athletes who will be participating at Brandon and in assuring their parents that all their goods—their gloves, their shoes, their bags, all the things they take with them—will not be lost.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JARVIS—DISTRIBUTION OF UNITY TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the availability, or lack of availability, to be more accurate, of the document tabled in this House on January 25, known as the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. I was able to confirm—and I apologize that I was only able to confirm this just before question period because there was some uncertainty about it—that one copy only of this document will be made available to members of parliament. I hasten to point out, however, that any Canadian can purchase the document for $3.50 from the Department of Supply and Services, as is the case with many government documents.

I make no comment about the content of the document. That was dealt with by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and others on the day it was tabled. I might say that the style and readability of the document is attractive to me, and I think it is to most members. I should like to deal with what led up to the document, however. The order in council establishing the terms of reference of the commission directs that the commissioners shall, among other things;

(c) contribute to the knowledge and general awareness of the public the initiatives and views of the commissioners concerning Canadian unity;

The first line of the report indicates that the task force was created:

—with a broad mandate to obtain and to publicize the views of Canadians regarding the state of their country—

I emphasize the word "publicize", Mr. Speaker.

Finally, if I may quote briefly from the Prime Minister's remarks on January 25, he said, as reported at page 2552 of Hansard:

I am confident the report will take its place as a document of the first importance—

Later, he had this to say:

I am sure that all members of the House, all members of the provincial legislatures, and many thousands of Canadians will want to read and reflect carefully on this report.

I find myself in the unusual position of agreeing, without reservation or qualification, with the Prime Minister in terms of that particular statement. We have a document about which we may conclude there is no doubt of its importance, no doubt of the mandate the commissioners had to publicize their findings and, finally, there is no doubt, on no less an authority than the Prime Minister, that thousands of Canadians want to read the report.

How does that affect my rights and privileges, given the situation where only one copy is available to me? First of all, I must ask myself why I have the rights and privileges in the first place, and why I share them with fellow members. I believe that part of the reason is to enable me to fulfil the responsibilities that the electorate has bestowed upon me. Whether one interprets those as a quasi-trust relationship, a particular political mandate or not, I believe I have certain responsibilities. Given that position I believe that certain rights and privileges are accorded me in order to fulfil those responsibilities. One tool—whether it be important or unimportant is purely subjective in the mind of a member—is documentary material.

I should like to refer to a situation which I believe to be completely analogous. It was not long ago that certain constitutional proposals were put before us. In relating that to my specific riding, I wish to inform you that in the usual course through an annual questionnaire I consult my constituents on various issues. I was told through my last questionnaire—and I suspected this to be the case—that 82 per cent of my constituents who replied did not regard the constitution as a high priority compared to other issues, namely, the economy. An even larger number, 85 per cent, indicated that they wanted more access to constitutional information. I do not consider those results contradictory, Mr. Speaker. In the minds of constituents, one reason for establishing the priority may be the lack of information. I interpreted those results in terms of my responsibilities to mean that I had an obligation to get as much information to my constituents on that issue as was possible.

As a result of this I—and I am sure many other members have done so—consulted the information service that provided the constitutional material. I received crates of material, Mr. Speaker. It was piled almost to the ceiling of my office. My staff was intimidated by the quantity. I did my best, and was able to distribute about 2,000 copies of this package which was composed of five documents. I am sure many other members were faced with the same situation. We were literally barricaded from our offices by the stacks of material.

Relating that case to the task force, I got only one copy of that report. Maybe I could accept the proposition that my rights and privileges can be changed, can be lessened or ameliorated, given certain other higher priorities. I think restraint of government spending is not a bad argument for changing certain rights and privileges from time to time, particularly in terms of documentary material. I can accept that. I may argue about whether the government should pick that particular document in order to exercise restraint, but I would accept it as a pretty good argument that it wants to cut costs.

How can I accept that it is the restraint on spending that prevents me from getting more than one copy of the unity report on the one hand when, on the other hand, I deal almost daily with the Canadian Unity Information office through the Department of the Secretary of State and in one package alone I received 41 documents? The initial package contained 41 individual documents—posters, pamphlets, booklets—now I can even get phonograph records. I can get them by the thousands and tens of thousands from this office, dealing with exactly the same issue as that dealt with by the task force.

When I can get tens of thousands of copies of gun control documents, tens of thousands of budget documents—even tens of thousands of the speeches of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan)—

An hon. Member: Good grief!

Mr. Whelan: Those are information sheets.

Mr. Jarvis: If such documents are available to me in virtually unlimited copies then I simply cannot accept that I can only receive one copy of the very important document—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot seriously disagree with the contention being put forward by the hon. member. I think he and other hon. members realize that he probably does not have a question of privilege in the technical sense, but it is certainly a very interesting, if not a thoroughly valid grievance. I think the hon. member has raised a point that concerns all hon. members. The importance of the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, its quality, and the high level of interest in it, are things that would lead all hon. members to want to secure and distribute more copies, if that is at all possible. I am not able to say at the moment whose responsibility that ought to be on behalf of members.

I think the hon. member will understand that technically it is not a question of privilege, but it is certainly a very valid point to raise and one that ought to be pursued. If this is the area of authority of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) I hope he will address the problem. I will make sure that the hon. member's remarks to this point are known. If he has any concluding remarks to add, perhaps he would do that now.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, to conclude it will take me less than 30 seconds. I came to you because I did not know where else to go in view of the information I had received before question period. If I have no other responsibility, do I not have the responsibility to see that reasonable number of copies of this document appear in the high schools of my riding? In that case, sir, I understand your ruling. I believe you indicated how you were about to rule. If you can use your offices in any way whatsoever to assist me in what I consider to be a serious shortcoming of this government, I would be very much obliged.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services I am pleased to have the opportunity to tell all hon. members that 16,000 copies have already been produced by the printing department of the Department of Supply and Services. There will be 65,000 additional copies printed immediately. Certainly hon. members will note that if they ask either the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) or the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) and follow the usual course, copies are readily available through the normal channels. I would suggest that to the hon. member rather than having him contradicting himself by saying he supports restraint on one hand yet, on the other hand, wanting everything printed in the thousands.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HOGAN—REPLY BY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has left his seat. My point of order concerns something I brought up last November. It was raised in the question period today by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). The hon. member asked the Prime Minister why the job vacancy survey was cut out and if he had answered the CLC request. The Prime Minister misunderstanding, either deliberately or otherwise, replied concerning the distinction between the consumer price index that included food, and the consumer price index as it is usually known.

A distressing thing about being a member of parliament is that one knows people in the front seats can not only give inadequate answers but do not have to answer. The Prime Minister did not answer the question at all. The hon. member for Central Nova is absolutely correct. Through the cutbacks or through the restraint program there may have been things collected by Statistics Canada that are not vital. However, I cannot understand how the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) can make proper policy in this country without a job vacancy survey which is the only type of measurable demand of labour.

We know from a political point of view what has happened. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) gave the game half away at some of the committee meetings on unemployment insurance because they were so embarrassed that there was only an average of 40,000 and 50,000 in job vacancies, including full time and part time jobs, over the last few years, while there were close to 1 million unemployed. Because of this the government decided that this was a good thing to cut out.

I would say, in relation to price indices, this is one of the biggest failings which shows how poor the policy-making is in this government by the Prime Minister and his finance department. They are responsible for all kinds of nonsense that the press runs across—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has been seen on a point or order. He is now obviously getting into an attack on the positions taken by the ministers during the question period. If I were to recognize every member who wanted to do that every day following question period by way of a point of order, we would probably do very little else. Perhaps the hon. member might want to bring his remarks to a conclusion.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, thank you for reminding me. I got carried away. I do not get a chance during question period to raise these things and debate them. But I would like to make this point. The wholesale price index was dropped as well. If hon. members take a look at what the Council of Economic Advisers to the United States said and look at the president's message on the economy they will see that the wholesale price index was shown there as an indicator of future inflation. We had one based upon a 1939 base. This should have been modernized. Now we have no wholesale price index being measured. How can policy be made that way, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) has put before the House most of what I wanted to say. While I appreciated receiving the answer from the Prime Minister

(Mr. Trudeau) it left a totally misleading effect on the House because it did not relate to the question I asked. I appreciated the answer to the question I did not ask.

I only wanted to ask—to save the question for later, perhaps some of his staff could take note of the question and let me have an answer as to why this most important statistical information, and as the hon. member has said it is the only systematic information about the demand side of the labour market, has apparently been abolished. In conclusion I would like to state it is little wonder, if this level of misinformation and misunderstanding exists over there, that we are in a position where we are spending approximately $1 billion per week while incurring about $1 billion per month deficit in this country. It is no wonder if that is the kind of information that emanates from the government benches.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of privilege raised I would like to say that StatsCan places very high priority on its labour surveys and I want to assure the House of that fact.

Secondly, the job survey that was done by Statistics Canada was found to be burdensome, not very useful and not used very often. In place of that StatsCan has assured labour organizations in Canada that it will continue to compile a CPI figure for them based upon the old basis, purely to assist in determining wage increases and COLA clauses in the years ahead. It was an agreement reached with the government and the labour organizations that the one would be more beneficial than the other.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ALEXANDER—POST OFFICE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to let you know how concerned we are on this side of the House. I want to speak on behalf of the thousands of postal workers who returned to work in light of some very adverse conditions at a particular time. I am sure, sir, you will remember we had a debate concerning the importance of maintaining services to which the Canadian people are entitled.

I was most disturbed when the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne), in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott)—and I do not know how far he went—indicated there was some possibility of 31 odd members being subject to some disciplinary action when they will be appearing at a meeting which I understand will be held on February 5.

To recall, we were all very concerned because at that particular time a number of postal workers wanted to return to work. As a matter of fact it was so important that a question was posed to the then minister of justice. I want to get this on the record, sir, because the Postmaster General has indicated this type of harassment is none of his business, that it is an internal matter dealing with CUPW and their union members. Keeping this in mind, that this is a closed shop, if there is any disciplinary action which would mean they are relieved of their membership, you can well imagine that they will be out of work. These people went back to work with the understanding that they had the full force and clout of the government behind them.

In order to let you know what the government thinking was, which does call for some explanation in light of the answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, despite the importance of his point, will have to persuade me that it has something to do with the order of business, that is to say, by way of a point of order—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, with all respect—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wants an opportunity to debate or take issue with answers given during the question period in a sense that they may contradict earlier answers or positions taken by the same minister or other ministers, surely that is not disorder. It has nothing to do with order in the proceedings in the House. The hon. member will have to persuade me first that he has a point of order before I can let him go on.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that you did not hear me in the first instance, and I beg your indulgence. I did not say that I was rising on a point of order, I said I was rising on a question of privilege speaking on behalf of countless thousands who do not have the opportunity, and who have been misled by the then minister of justice.

● (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question of privilege, he is in the same position. If he will persuade me as to what the question of privilege is, I will hear him further.

Mr. Alexander: After having been asked questions with regard to the protection of those who wanted to work, the then minister of justice said on October 23, as reported at page 344 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, we have been, as has the Post Office, urging the return of these various employees to work, assuring them of every possible protection in the exercise of what is now their legal duty. That is the position we have been taking and will continue to take.

My question of privilege is that the Postmaster General has now abdicated that position. He has left these workers hung out on the line to dry, which is reprehensible, irresponsible, and calls for an answer. When we make statements in this House, the people believe what we say. They believe they will get the full force of this government to protect them from any harassment. We should stand by that commitment. That is my question of privilege. Whether Your Honour rules it out of order or not, I wanted to stand on behalf of countless thousands who take this government at its word.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, when the hon. member talks about a question of privilege he is talking about a tightly defined question which relates to the procedures of the House in a very strict way. As he says, he may have a grievance on behalf of some postal workers in this country. If I am going to entertain that under the heading of a question of privilege, I will equally have to entertain all of those who perhaps disagree with other answers given on behalf of other groups in the course of the question period today or any other day. Surely the hon. member must realize that privilege relates to a very narrowly defined interference with his ability to function as a member, or of all members' ability to function, and a number of other very tightly defined areas in respect to contempt of the House and its proceedings. Surely, as he knows, I cannot find that his grievance today comes within that definition.

MR. LAVOIE—RECOGNITION BY CHAIR DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege will be very brief, maybe the briefest in the history of parliament. It deals once again with the same matter, namely the oral question period. When I raised that question of privilege last week, I was told by the Chair that later that week or this week I would be informed whether or not there are precedents. Since I will be absent as of today on important business in my constituency—because my riding is just as important as parliament—would the Chair give me an answer on that matter?

MR. BEATTY—CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order relating to House business. In the course of the question period today, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) indicated that he was prepared to move a motion to send the whole question of the disorder in the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation to the appropriate committee. I wonder whether the acting government House leader might indicate when such a motion will be moved in the House.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this whole matter will be taken under serious consideration. We will advise the hon. member further.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MacFARLANE—POST OFFICE

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I feel I have a question of privilege. Other members have referred to the postal question. I believe that two thirds of them are in my constituency. My interpretation of the answer did not fit with theirs. I was assured that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) would indeed prevent any harassment, that the internal matters he referred to were their dealings with their union and that, if they reported back, this would be looked at by the government.

MR. McKINNON—PROCEEDINGS DURING DEBATE ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order with regard to the proceedings on the adjournment motion last night. Anyone reading Hansard would certainly be puzzled as to what went on in the third question last night in the adjournment debate. Not only the title of the question I was asking makes very peculiar reading, but the answer of the parliamentary secretary bore no relation whatsoever to the question I asked. I have had some discussion with one of the officers at the table. We will have another adjournment debate in the near future and it is hoped we will get the right question and the right answer at the same time. I hope Your Honour will bear with us through what will be extensive amendments to Hansard in the near future.

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful the hon. member has brought this to my attention. I will certainly look into it.

CANADA COUNCIL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-457, to amend the Canada Council Act (financial accountability).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, this act is in response to criticisms levelled against the Canada Council by the Auditor General, later substantiated in the public accounts committee and supported by Treasury Board, regarding the financial accountability of the council. At the moment the Canada Council is not a Crown agency.

This bill will provide for ministerial responsibility for the Canada Council, so far as constitutional restrictions on private member's initiatives will allow, in order to enable elected representatives to perform more effectively their duties of overseeing government expenditures intended to promote the arts. At the moment the council is a closed organization which refuses to divulge information to the arts community or parliament. As a Crown agency, hopefully responsive to a freedom of information act, the Canada Council will become more open.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT ACT

MANDATORY STUDY OF POTENTIAL HAZARDS ARISING FROM PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-458, to protect the Canadian environment by instituting mandatory impact assessment procedures prior to the construction of installations potentially damaging to the environment.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, an act to protect the Canadian environment by instituting mandatory impact assessment procedures prior to the construction of installations potentially damaging to the environment was written because of the failure of the government's environmental impact review process. I gave a full description of this bill and the need for it on January 31, 1977, regarding its provisions for freedom of information, public access to that information and restrictive time-frames that will add efficiency to the process of evaluation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 682, 683, 865, 871 and 876.

[Text]

LIEFMANN DRUG

Question No. 682—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare presently studying the Liefmann drug for sufferers from acute rheumatoid arthritis?

[Mr. Wenman.]

2. Is the drug presently being tested in the United States?

3. Is the drug presently being manufactured in another country and has any application been received either to import the drug or to manufacture the drug in Canada?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: 1. No. The study and development of new drugs is a function of the private sector.

2. Not to the knowledge of the United States Food and Drug Administration.

3. We have received information that a similar drug is being manufactured and used in the Dominican Republic. The Health Protection Branch of the Department has corresponded with the agents of the manufacturer, and has extended an open invitation to them to meet and discuss the requirements to establish the safety and effectiveness of the drug. The manufacturer has not yet submitted data to satisfy the safety and effectiveness requirements.

DREE—CANADA-NEW BRUNSWICK AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENT

Question No. 683—Mr. Howie:

For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, what amount was paid to farmers under the Canada-New Brunswick Agricultural Development Subsidiary Agreement as DREE's share to assist with (a) dairy production (b) field crops?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: For the fiscal year 1977-78; (a) $222,800. (b) $505,150.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Question No. 865—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1978, what amount was spent to date on fermentation technology by the National Research Council and what amount was spent on extra mural contracts?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the National Research Council is concerned, the reply is as follows: The total expenditure on fermentation technology amounted to $2,849,000 of which $1,682,000 was for extra mural expenditures.

Question No. 871—Mr. Howie:

Did the National Research Council acquire land for the Industrial Materials Research Institute?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the National Research Council is concerned, the reply is as follows: No. The National Research Council in conjunction with the Department of Public Works is currently studying land purchase possibilities for the Industrial Materials Research Institute in the selected site area of the south shore close to Montreal.

NRC LABORATORIES

Question No. 876—Mr. Howie:

How many NRC laboratories are located (a) outside of Ottawa (b) in New Brunswick?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the National Research Council is concerned, the reply is as follows: (a) 7. (b) 0.

MONEY BORROWED

Question No. 276—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Did Canada borrow money between the fiscal years 1968-69 to 1978-79 and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what percentage of the amount was borrowed against Canada Savings Bonds?

2. Did Canada borrow money through chartered banks and, if so, in what amount?

3. Did Canada borrow money abroad and, if so (a) in what amount (b) from what countries (c) from which financial institutions (d) at what interest rate (e) for what period of time (f) what are the terms and conditions of reimbursement?

Return tabled.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 411—Mr. Schumacher:

1. In each year 1970 to date, how many service men and/or women were serving in the Canadian Armed Forces and where were they located in Canada or abroad?

2. For the same years, how many men and/or women were (a) recruited (b) retired from the Forces and, in each case, how many were (i) bilingual (ii) unilingual English (iii) unilingual French?

3. For the same years, how many (a) promotions (b) demotions were made to (i) bilingual (ii) unilingual English (iii) unilingual French service men and/or women and from what ranks to what ranks were such promotions and demotions made?

4. For the same years, what amount was spent by, or on behalf of the Forces for advertising in (a) the French language (b) the English language (c) other languages and, in each case, what media was used?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed from Tuesday, January 30, 1979, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, last night, when I called it ten o'clock, I was saying that Canadians generally do not want a referendum on the constitution, that generally they are not particularly concerned about the constitution. What the majority of Canadians want is a sound administration in which the unemployed can find work, the mother of a family can have something to put in the refrigerator, as I said last night. Mr. Speaker, let us not make a secret of the fact that, since 1976, since the Parti Québécois came into power, we have heard all sorts of statements on national unity from men in the public eye.

In the last three years, we have been able to see that such statements, instead of creating harmony and allowing citizens from the various parts of Canada to better understand one another, has fostered discord between provincial and federal governments. From what I have seen in the last few months, there is a fight going on between the two main parties involved in this constitutional conflict, namely the Quebec premier and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). One of my fellow-citizens pointed out to me recently, speaking of the constitution and the deadlock and disagreements between the Quebec and central governments, that they reminded him of two roosters fighting over the same hen, not to meet the needs of and satisfy the hen, but to gratify their pride and vanity.

So, Mr. Speaker, those two, with their resounding statements, are only aggravating the debate. They are only stirring up more discord between the two governments instead of finding, or attempting to find, ways of appeasing those divergent views. No, Mr. Speaker, it is neither with referendums nor with meaningless speeches that we will find a way to get along together. It is very simply through considerable understanding, by making allowances, even many allowances, and by everyone doing his or her part that we can achieve harmony from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

Mr. Speaker, so long as the federal government is not assuming its responsibilities and placing monetary creations under the responsibility of the Bank of Canada instead of the chartered banks, we shall face problems of this nature. As a matter of fact, we shall only be able to live in harmony in Canada when we all have something to put on our table, when we all have the feeling to live in a beautiful and great country, and are sure that tomorrow will be full of promise for each and every one of us. So I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this government will at last assume its responsibilities and give us assurances in that regard.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I could certainly not refrain from making some comments in this debate on second reading of Bill C-9. I have already heard several speeches, and I may tell you immediately that I do not agree with everything I have heard in the House on this legislation.

Yesterday, I heard members from Quebec, and particularly the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), who urged the hon. members of the House to support the government in its endeavour to acquire this repressive tool because she felt the danger which is upon us. I was sorry to see her lack of trust in the decision that Quebeckers will be making, and I think that she has acknowledged her party's failure to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of a province and meet with the objectives of a majority of Quebeckers as well as of all Canadians, who would want to see, in this constitutional reform, a chance to secure an interesting future for all concerned.

I also heard, one of our colleagues, a member from the NDP, say how surprised he was to see that only the member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), Quebec's representative, would vote against this bill. I think that our Social Credit colleagues are also aware of the dangers of this legislation and of the government's intentions in this regard, and it is because of these intentions, which concern us, of course, and which explain the present mistrust towards this government, that our Quebec colleagues from the Social Credit Party of Canada will, I think, vote against this legislation.

But I think we must first of all try to find the reason for introducing this national legislation on referenda. It is clear, as the Minister of Communications has indicated, that the federal government, in view of Quebec's upcoming referendum, considers it essentiel to pass an act to oppose a possible decision by a majority of Quebeckers. It is obvious that the government has failed, with its Quebec team, and because of this monumental failure in the eyes of Quebeckers, who had expected a government that would have better understood their aspirations, it is trying to give itself a tool which will only lead to the worse confrontation ever.

We, on this side of the House, are confident that with a philosophy that would be concerned with Canadian and Quebec interests as well and should there be a new government, it would be possible to bring about a constitutional reform and to discuss openly a new distribution of powers thus allowing a large majority of Quebeckers to understand that philosophy and the necessity for those changes. The referendum does not frighten us at all because we are confident that Quebeckers in their wisdom and with the necessary degree of flexibility, would reject that idea of breaking away from Canada provided a federal government would come up with those changes that are necessary to meet the natural aspirations not only of the people of Quebec but also the people in various regions and various provinces.

So why that referendum in Quebec in the first place? I think it is important to remind our colleagues in this House, and on both sides, that in this country, because there has been a lot of talk in the past few days about this legislation—and I intend as a Quebecker to remind them also of a few things that might not be the most pleasant—but I don't think I will be saying anything new if I talk about the frustrations that Francophones felt in this country, even long before the Parti Québécois came to power.

I am thinking, for example, of the bitter fight that was fought on a bilingual currency, on simultaneous translation, frustrations that members understand today, but how many Quebeckers came to this place without being able to be understood because there was no simultaneous translation. And bilingual currency. You will say it is symbolic. That was important years ago. Of course, things have improved and people demand more, and that is normal, Mr. Speaker, but those frustrations that were being felt by French-speaking minorities generated, particularly in Quebec, a loss of faith in the federal government and a feeling of alienation towards it.

And to think that all Canadians should have noticed long ago those concerns and that lack of credibility! Of course, the people in Quebec who were living in a vacuum had to put up with the situation, and their governments fought the federal government in the name of autonomy. In the last years, from 1950 to 1960, there was some improvement as some provincial ministers felt the need to co-operate with the then prime minister. But for practical purposes, let us go back to 1960 when Mr. Jean Lesage became leader in the province of Quebec as an Ottawa-trained federalist and sold the slogan "Maîtres chez nous".

At that time, as my colleagues from Quebec will remember, this contributed to develop a certain awareness among Quebeckers. And, of course, Mr. Lesage sold that slogan "Maîtres chez nous." He also made thousands of Quebeckers aware of that objective which was not one of separation but rather a certain concept of autonomy and nationalism which was very well received. But even Mr. Lesage did not succeed in awakening the Canadian nation as a whole and particularly his federal colleagues. In 1966, Mr. Johnson became Quebec premier and nobody will deny, I think, that Mr. Johnson, a true federalist, tried to promote the development of the Francophone bloc in Quebec while respecting the rights of the minority that had and still has its place in Quebec.

And Mr. Johnson in order to reawaken the public and make the federal government realize that changes were urgently needed had to launch the slogan "Equality or Independence". Certainly it was never in Mr. Johnson's mind, and I knew him well, to separate Canada. But he must have been really disappointed and frustrated to add the possibility of independence to his drive for equality. Mr. Johnson was after equal opportunities, equal language status, and also probably a sizeable number of jobs in the public service for Francophones I think the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) knows what I am referring to and he no doubt agreed on gradual entry into the public service of a percentage of the French-speaking population.

We all know the untimely death of Mr. Johnson led to a Liberal government under Mr. Bourassa coming to power in 1970. But then again Mr. Bourassa was compelled to refer to cultural sovereignty, something that gave Liberal members here a good laugh. I remember all the humiliations that Mr. Bourassa had to suffer because of this government even though they were political cousins. This government took credit for the election of Mr. Bourassa, and because of that he could not make any decisions for himself, everything was decided by this government.

Those are comments I heard on the part of Liberal members when I was myself sitting on the other side of the House. I remember hearing comments which nearly shocked me, Mr. Speaker. Because Mr. Bourassa was not supposed to control anything, those in the federal government had decided that he would be elected and so he was. But then he tried to promote the objective of cultural sovereignty. What could be more legitimate than to allow a bloc of more than five million French-speaking Canadians living on the same territory to have the tools they need for their cultural development? It seems to me that there was nothing shocking about it, but this government rejected many times the demands made by the Liberal government headed by Mr. Bourassa. What a lot of deceptions and betrayals! What is even worse, is that they were made by this team from Quebec, by the three doves and the 60 members of parliament from Quebec who arrived on the same side of the House in 1968. Mr. Speaker, what a dream for Quebeckers!

An hon. Member: In 1965!

Mr. La Salle: I am sorry, in 1965. This is even worse. From 1965 to 1979. We were promised a just society and the possibility for Quebec to develop and gain recognition within the constitution. But how many times, as I said earlier, have Quebeckers been disillusioned by the rejection of the representations made by the Quebec government, and this was not a separatist government, Mr. Speaker. How many humiliations did Mr. Bourassa and other Liberal ministers in Quebec suffer in the hands of their colleagues in Ottawa who refused to listen to the quite legitimate requests of Quebec. There is no doubt that it caused a certain alienation. When Mr. Bourassa felt the need to talk about bill 22 in Quebec, it led to the events of 1976 and the defeat of the Liberal government which was replaced by a government which advocates separation from Canada.

Perhaps we should ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, why Quebeckers dismissed the Bourassa government in 1976. Perhaps we should ask ourselves why Quebec federal members here have not been more attentive and have not succeeded in bringing their own government to the required flexibility, that flexibility whose necessity we have acknowledged for a long time and which we will not hesitate to show. How little you know us if you think that we would give the provinces the very shirt off our back and that we are prepared to negotiate the partition of Canada. There is no question about that.

However, we are thinking about a reassessment of powers, a duplication of jobs and we believe in this. We also believe in the aspirations and needs of the various areas and provinces of Canada. We think federalism should undergo radical changes and the Pepin-Robarts task force realized that as well.

This bill is now introduced, because the government has failed to carry out its duty. Quebeckers cannot forget the fight of the "gens de l'air." Quebeckers cannot forget the betrayal about the sales tax, as they cannot forget the recent position of the government concerning Bill C-14. Those are the problems which Quebeckers have to face. With a team of some 60 members, we ought to be able to resolve those problems, Mr. Speaker.

We have failed to cater to the needs of the Quebec people within a reasonable period of time. We have failed to still the concerns of the French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec. We have also failed to dispel the regional disparities which hurt not only the French-speaking community but also Canadians in several parts of the country.

On account of this government, we have had to establish a commission, after the Laurendeau-Dunton commission whose report was laid to rest at the bottom of a drawer even though it did cost plenty to the Canadian people, and they all know that! Today, we have the report of the Pepin-Robarts task force which will not prove too expensive if we are to make use of it, but the government has already shown some hesitation. The report makes it clear that not everything is going fine with federalism as we know it. That has been admitted.

Mr. Corbin: Where do you stand?

Mr. La Salle: I will not explain my position on the Pepin-Robarts report to the hon. member because he probably would not understand it.

Today we are studying Bill C-9 and I hope we will have the opportunity to discuss the conclusions of the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. The fact remains that the task force shows that the government made a big mistake with its policies, and this in the ten years I have been here.

Mr. Pinard: Explain!

Mr. La Salle: This deception in the minds of Canadians is due to the fact that there is a problem. The government thinks that it can put an end to the controversy on national unity by means of a national law on referenda. But this government does not understand that it will be unable to restore links, links of genuine friendship between all groups that make up this country unless it makes them all feel that they really participate in the life of the country, unless it gives them decent incomes, unless it makes the different groups that form the country respect each other.

All that is needed, Mr. Speaker, are changes in attitude, and openness of mind from both French and English-speaking Canadians and all ethnic groups. I suggest that we must demonstrate understanding. Realizing that it has failed the province of Quebec, that its great team has not succeeded in making room for Quebeckers within Canada, which would be acceptable to them, this government has introduced a referendum bill in the hope of offsetting the decision the people of Quebec will make in a few months from now.

Mr. Speaker, the important point is to agree to a change of attitude, commit ourselves to an early study of the Pepin-Roberts commission recommendations and implementation of the proposed reform, and let the provinces know just how much change is required to meet what I regard as fundamental needs and I am not thinking only of Quebec, as that province is not the only one which is dissatisfied with the present system.

There have been federal-provincial conferences which readily revealed disaffection and confrontation as between provinces, and their refusal to accept this government's attitude. So, Mr. Speaker, the lack of response with regard to the Canadian feeling, the lack of solution with respect to constitutional reform, the fact that our provincial partners have been kept waiting for too long and the fact that our provincial premiers have been continuously confronted and treated like school children, all that has caused division in this country.

The country is facing serious questions and Canadians are concerned. Now we are asked to provide parliament with a legislation which according to government members would be the solution to the national unity problem. But how blind can they be to believe that this legislation will solve the problem? How blind and how devoid of ideas can they be to ingenuously imagine that this legislation on referenda will solve the problem in the event of a favourable answer to the referendum on sovereignty association as advocated by the Parti Québécois, by the government of Quebec?

Yesterday, the Minister of Communications said in fact that she was concerned, and this was quite obvious, over the possibility that the Quebec government might win the referendum on its stated objective, and that we should pass this legislation as quickly as possible in order to provide the government with a tool, which would change nothing. Let Quebec decide. Do we really believe that by passing legislation on the referendum we would settle the issue? Absolutely not. I think it is high time we understood the feelings of Quebeckers and the frustrations of other provinces over other issues and that we try to resolve these problems. This national referendum bill is in my opinion nothing more than a political gadget.

The Prime Minister, in the wake of his fiasco and monumental failure on the political and economic fronts, has designed this tool to enhance his image as the great saviour of confederation. Actually he is responsible for and the originator of our present problems with his team riding his coattails and not daring to speak up. I was told yesterday that we were free to support the bill or not. That is a joke, Mr. Speaker, since we know fully well that no living body on the other side would dare stand up and speak against this legislation even if he felt like it. It was the same thing with the sales tax and with Bill C-14. We are all aware of the position, of the state of subjection of those people, and we are also aware of the deep frustrations of Quebeckers.

Today, as a Quebecker, I enumerate those frustrations we have suffered, when we are still waiting for a federal government which fails to understand what changes are needed in order to create the climate we want. Quebeckers are only too willing to find ways of improving our beautiful country of Canada. Nobody will have me say otherwise. We will immediately be accused of sleeping with the separatists. This is the argument of the weak, Mr. Speaker. They will even say, as they did last summer with regard to the sales tax, that we just wanted the vote of the Parti Québécois members, whereas the Liberal and UN leaders supported Mr. Parizeau's position. Of course, government members will keep very quiet about the report of the C. D. Howe Institute issued this morning which says that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) should have copied some of the measures adopted by the Quebec minister of finance. I am not saying that, but the C. D. Howe Insitute did this morning, as reported in the press.

So, one can understand the incompetence shown by the Minister of Finance and the refusal and stubbornness of this government, despite the fact that it is led by a man who should understand Quebec. I certainly would not like to surrender such a tool to this government which will use it to further its political ends, and we all know that.

An hon. Member: Yes, precisely.

Mr. La Salle: This government is, of course, responsible for achieving an ideal that is mine, that of reshaping and modernizing this country and giving all Canadians the status that is rightfully theirs. Such is the responsibility of the government and it is with this ideal in mind that we intend to battle with this government, to fight against this legislation because it is not a solution; on the other hand, with that ideal in mind we shall attempt to convince the majority of Canadians. Whatever may be said on the other side, it remains that Canadians are now witnessing a shocking bankruptcy, both economical and political, and are becoming aware of the fact that our leader is bent on achieving flexibility and the participation of the provinces in the making of our great national decisions.

Those are changes which should be brought about, Mr. Speaker, and this is the way to achieve that national unity, that national harmony which I prefer because it is important, I think, that we begin admitting the existence of those groups who have different views, of those ethnic groups who came here to help us build this country and to harmonize those differences which are remarkable, legitimate and also natural. But both as a Quebecker and as a Canadian, I am looking forward to seeing in this House a government open and positive enough to put forward legislation which coincides with the reality of Canada. But this is not what they did, Mr. Speaker. They conceal the real reasons for introducing this piece of legislation. Thank God we shall not be taken in because we know this government's intentions, namely that they want to move around with that umbrella called Bill C-9 under which they may hide their deplorable performance and the feeling of frustration they have too often instilled all over the country.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat that we shall not be able to achieve national harmony by means of a piece of legislation. I would invite all my colleagues, indeed all Canadians and my colleagues opposite from Quebec to reflect on the historical background of our country. I mentioned the word frustration; well, there has been some frustration, and that is what has nurtured this loss of confidence in Quebec. And if 60 Quebeckers opposite are unable to find a solution in such a coercive measure, then they have failed in their duty. And if they are unable to bring into their caucus the changes that are expected by the population, I suggest they will not only have failed in their duty, but they will have betrayed the province they represent. On this point, I believe Quebeckers are about to pass the required verdict. In spite of the critics that have befallen some of the proposals we have made, in spite of those critics—

Mr. Pinard: What proposals?

Mr. La Salle: Anyone who knows about politics knows what I am talking about.

Mr. Guay: Name one of them, only one!

Mr. La Salle: Still, Mr. Speaker, when we deal with an objective which should be to restore the economy and not to campaign once again on Canadian unity, because what the Canadian people actually need is still bread and butter, and the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) knows how many unemployed there are in his own constituency and he is also going to wrap himself in this flag the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to foist on us with this Bill C-9. They are hiding behind this smoke screen and are telling Canadians that only the Prime Minister can save Canada, when in fact he is the one and only person responsible for the present deteriorated climate. It must be said that Canada has never been more divided, and I will not hesitate to say it on every forum I will be offered in Quebec.

Never has such a large Quebec group been so weak in the Liberal caucus. Never has a 60-member group from Quebec betrayed so often the vital interests of the province of Quebec. This needs to be said, Mr. Speaker, and a bill is not going to solve those problems. So I say to this government which so often broke its word that it can expect to be judged and I hope Quebeckers will not miss the opportunity—we are all longing for that opportunity that will come hopefully very soon—to really see if they are not as intelligent as the rest. In the circumstances, I believe many members may feel a little worried and I can assure them that it is not this little bill that is going to solve the problem, and it is without hesitation that I will deny them that tool that hides the truth, Mr. Speaker, that tool devised here in this House by this government because it has failed in its fundamental duties since it came into power. Therefore, I will be proud to deny them that tool that is obviously devious.

Hon. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): It gives me great pleasure, of course, to take part in the debate on the referendum bill introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid). I listened with great interest to the speech made earlier by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). I admired the serenity with which he managed to make his point. I listened with no less interest but perhaps a little less admiration to the kind of speech that was just made by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), and in his case serenity yielded naturally to passion, and we know what happens in such cases. The hon. member is quite prepared to make all sorts of accusations in this House, and right after making such irrational remarks, he does not hesitate to leave rather hastily.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that in a place like this honest and upright politicians can have different opinions on fundamental positions that may affect the future of their country. What is wrong, Mr. Speaker, is that we are told half-truths and given a very personal interpretation of past history disguised as the truth. This is just about what he did—maybe not on purpose, maybe he simply got carried away in certain parts of his speech, but this is what he did. I would like to give a few examples of this.

He said for instance that for the government, the referendum bill is the answer to the national unity problem. No member of this House can seriously suggest that this bill was introduced for that reason. On the contrary, we have all seen, at least in the last ten years, the constitutional reform process introduced by the government, a whole series of federal-provincial conferences, and more recently, the introduction of a series of working papers prepared by the government starting with a very serious paper entitled "A time for action", as well as the establishment of the Pepin-Robarts task force which has just issued its report. The hon. member for Joliette knows quite well that it would be more honest to admit that this is not the answer of the government on the unity issue. He is well aware of the position of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of the government, to the effect that everything is negotiable during constitutional discussions, except for two requirements, that is the preservation of the Canadian federation—and I would like to know if the hon. member for Joliette agrees with the basic principle which says that the legislatures have certain responsibilities within their respective and largely independent jurisdictions—and we all know the second requirement, Mr. Speaker, which is that basic individual rights be included in a charter which will be enshrined in the Canadian constitution.

And on that score, the political group to which the hon. member belongs certainly has no lesson to teach people on this side of the House. He only has to ask the leaders of other Conservative parties in other provinces, the hon. Premier of Manitoba or the hon. Premier of Ontario, whether they are prepared to grant the minorities who speak the other official language in their provinces the same rights granted to the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec. He should ask them that question before giving us a lecture here.

On this side, our position cannot be more specific and straightforward. We think that all Canadian citizens must enjoy the same fundamental rights across this country which is called Canada. If the hon. member cannot make the same statement, then he has no lesson to give to the people sitting on this side of the House. According to the hon. member, the Pepin-Robarts commission stated that over the years the Trudeau government made mistakes and that it criticized the government policy. He knows quite well and I could quote from the report where the Pepin-Robarts commission gave its unqualified support to the official language policy of this government. I found another point—not very clear I must say—in the passionate address of my friend from Joliette. He also referred to the Laurendeau-Dunton commission and stated that it had not been acted upon. In other words, that report tabled by the commissioners according to him would have simply been shelved. Here again, the hon. member for Joliette knows better than that. And I challenge him to prove me wrong. He was in this House when the government introduced the Official Languages Act which was a direct result of the Laurendeau-Dunton report.

The hon. member has the right, the privilege and even the duty to disagree with the government. But in expressing his opinions he does not have to misrepresent the stands put forward over the years by this side of the House. Besides, Mr. Speaker, we witness here one of the shortcomings of our parliamentary system, in the sense that all along opposition members took a negative stand, always taking the opposite view of that taken by the government.

Still there is a field where I think it would be extremely useful for hon. members to extend their policies and their views. As an example I take the field of external affairs where we do manage to show some sort of common front in the House; even if we do not agree on all points and all incidents that may occur from month to month and year to year, it clearly demonstrates that our position is quite similar. And, Mr. Speaker, unless federalist forces in Canada succeed in the short term in adopting a position acceptable to the majority of federalist forces, I think they will serve the interests of the Parti Québécois which knows full well that for electoral purposes the major political groups of the country will contradict one another. The only winners in that process, Mr. Speaker, are those who want to destroy rather than build the country. And I readily recognize that the hon. member for Joliette, in spite of the half truths he said in the House of Commons, is in fact a true Canadian who wants to build a country which will be even better than it is today, which will be all the more capable of answering the needs of regions and reflecting the duality of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I had no intention to make a partisan or an impassioned speech this afternoon. Rather I intended to pursue one or two of the ideas voiced by the hon. member for Joliette. And I agree with him when he says that the rub of the debate is the phenomenon of alienation and the lack of confidence in our democratic institutions in Canada. I agree with him on this but I do entertain many reservations about his suggestions so far. I for one would like to concentrate on the question of the lack of confidence in our democratic institutions and the alienation of the people and see how the new legislation on referenda proposed by the Minister of Justice might help to a certain extent. I am not saying it is a cure-all, nobody says so, but it would help to strengthen our institutions.

Any question about the integration of the principle of referendums in our system of parliamentary democracy requires that one look fully into the meaning of the concept of democracy in a modern society. It also requires a certain assessment of the state of that democracy. The very concept of democracy, as everyone knows, has changed with the times. The concept of democracy in a modern society has certainly evolved a great deal since antiquity when it was considered as an active, continuing, personal and direct participation of the citizens in the political decision-making process. Representative democracy has replaced direct democracy, if it ever actually existed. This representative democracy is now generally recognized as the only true practical form of political government. It means that the people agree to entrust their sovereignty to a selected group of individuals to whom they have confered the mandate of governing for a limited period of time.

Today, the principle of representative democracy is widely supported by the people. Yet, according to certain studies, it seems that this support is becoming less unconditional. Some feel that a shift is taking place whereby our institutions are perceived in some circles as becoming less and less democratic. In my opinion, it is true that our democracies are experiencing problems the importance of which must not be underestimated. Some years ago, a research group submitted a report on the governability of modern democracies to the trilateral commission. The title of that report was "The Crisis of Democracy". And in their account of the situation, the authors stressed the potential dangers that threaten democratic governments. I should like, Mr. Speaker, to quote one or two extracts from that document. The authors, for instance, quoted a well-known German politician, Mr. Willy Brandt, who at the time of his resignation or shortly after, said the following:

● (1610)

[English]

Western Europe has only 20 or 30 more years of democracy left in it; after that it will slide, engineless and rudderless, under the surrounding sea of dictatorship, and whether the dictation comes from a politburo or a junta will not make that much difference.

[Translation]

Closer to home, Mr. Léon Dion, in his book La société et la politique, la vie des groupes, wrote the following:

> It has never been easy to govern. Leaders and governments nowadays are just as good and perhaps even better than they were before. Their task is often even more demanding, as the paths of democracy are more difficult today. We are entering an era where literally everything is in question. This is a challenge and we must meet it.

These views may seem pessimistic although they want to be realistic, but they bring the problem in a perspective of urgency. We have to ask ourselves questions about the condition of our democracies, either here in Canada or elsewhere, about their viability in the future, and about the means which would ensure their continuity in the future. In the case of Canada, it is up to us and we cannot shirk the problem.

Some people will insist that there is no such emergency at least as far as our country is concerned. They will point to the strong participation rate of the electorate—80 per cent—a typically Canadian phenomenon. It seems to me that if we want to assess correctly the health of our democracy we must examine the question further. One of the revealing factors in that respect is the degree of political alienation of a society. In the case of Canada, in spite of some studies made in that area, this phenomenon is still not very well known. However, the few indications there are point to a few conclusions. Political alienation must be examined at two different levels, the individual and the group.

As far as the individual is concerned, a number of studies in Canada clearly show that people are indifferent to politics. Here in parliament we see only people for whom political life is everything. This is the centre of political life in this country, the place where we hear criticism, the place where major political decisions are taken but, of course, that high level of interest is not found everywhere across the land. The indifference rate is generally estimated at 50 per cent of the people, and more troubling still, those studies also point to a definite feeling of being powerless in the face of politics. Some 45 per cent of the people believe they have little or no influence on political events. In a democratic society, these results deserve to be closely studied by those who are interested in political life in a democratic context.

Although it is difficult to statistically evaluate how these attitudes change in time, it appears that despite higher schooling, which is usually recognized as a factor of increasing participation in political life, a significant part of the people remain indifferent to politics. If we look at political knowledge among Canadians, results confirm the foregoing conclusions. We are faced with a population that has little concern for politics unless it affects their daily lives. For instance, Mr. Speaker, three months after the general election in 1965, a Canadian survey showed that 25 per cent of the people could not identify their member of parliament, 15 per cent could not identify his party and, more important, 58 per cent said they had read or heard nothing about him.

Another survey among 1,000 university students showed in 1973 that while 98 per cent could identify the prime minister and the governor general, 3 per cent only could identify the Speaker of the House of Commons. And we all know, Mr. Speaker, that according to a fairly recent Gallup poll, very few Canadians can even name one federal cabinet minister. I quote, in English, from the October 28, 1978 Gallup report.

[English]

When Canadians were asked recently to name a cabinet member in Ottawa, and to identify his responsibility, 33 per cent were able to supply this information correctly. Another 14 per cent recalled the name of a cabinet minister but were unable to identify or incorrectly identified his responsibility. This compares to 19 per cent who named someone other than a present-day cabinet minister, and to 34 per cent who would not venture a guess.

[Translation]

It would be possible, Mr. Speaker, to support these facts with other examples. Of course, some people will now say that democracy is protected by the existence of a solid and well-established party system which guarantees the possibility of enlightened choice. Unfortunately, once again we cannot be too optimistic. More and more surveys show a continuous erosion of the party identification phenomenon. Thus people are less and less inclined to identify themselves with a political party. The allegiance of individuals has become short-lived, and now, from election to election, more and more citizens change their allegiance, going from one party to the other. I refer now to a survey sponsored by the Gallup firm which was published in La Presse of January 16, 1979. We read the following comment:

At the beginning of December, a Gallup poll showed that 21 per cent of Canadians are tied to a political party; 7 per cent are very committed; 14 per cent, more or less. Another 22 per cent of the adult population can be classified as sympathizing. Most voters, 55 per cent, reject any connection with a political party.

As for the phenomenon of political alienation, at the community level in Canada it is especially felt through regionalism and the task force directed by Messrs. Pepin and Robarts has given a detailed description of that phenomenon. We often hear about the alienation of western Canada toward eastern Canada. We should also include among those phenomena of political alienation the separatist movement in Quebec and probably also the isolation feeling in the Atlantic provinces. In each case there is a deep feeling of under-representation in relation to the real weight and such feeling leads to the disparagement of political institutions in Canada.

Needless to say, that political alienation does exert strong pressures on our institutions. Indeed those pressures are so strong that they even threaten the survival of Canada. Both kinds of political alienation to which we have just referred put Canada in a paradoxical situation which is even dangerous in a certain sense. On the one hand, we are witnessing a lack of political interest and involvement on the part of an important sector of the Canadian population, and as a result a considerable loss of support for our political institutions. Here again, Messrs. Pepin and Robarts pointed out this phenomenon in a very interesting fashion. On the other hand, increasing pressures are being brought to bear upon those very same institutions, even in Canada. In this connection, I should like to quote from the findings of the trilateral commission in its book "The Crisis of Democracy" which deals with Canada. One can read these conclusions, and I quote:

[English]

As identified by this colloquium, Canada's foremost governability problems can be regarded as falling within four major areas: the questionable ability of the evolving political institutions to aggregate an increasing volume of demands efficiently and at the same time to retain their accountability to the public; the increasing rhetoric/performance gap; the decline of a 'public philosophy'; and the problem of communications. Several characteristics of the Canadian system were found actually to enhance Canada's governability, that is, its parliamentary and federal structures of government, a reasonable degree of decentralization of authority and the absence of class-based political parties. However, a general consensus emerged that Canada's governability problems (as redefined) while not insoluble are real and deserve urgent attention and remedial action.

[Translation]

In short, we are being told that our political system has been well served by political decentralization by our parliamentary system and by the absence of events generating a loss of confidence, such as the one the Americans lived through, which culminated in the removal from office of the President of the United States.

[Mr. Fox.]

However, those characteristics, and others as well, are not solutions to the problem; at the very most, they could serve as checks on a growing tendency. It is therefore imperative for us to consider what remedial measures can prevent that tendency from becoming a permanent reality and completely undermining our political system.

We are now discussing the possibility of making the referendum one of our political institutions. We should take advantage of this opportunity to think of that instrument in terms of the revalorization of our parliamentary democracy. Indeed that is the aspect I would like to deal with in the rest of my remarks.

In my opinion, the referendum can constitute a positive means in the context of a more extensive democratization of our institutions. It might enable us to bring closer the government and the people, a move which our system seems to need badly.

As we all know, referendums are used in numerous countries. One thinks immediately of Switzerland, the United States, France and now, of course, Great Britain. In each case it would be possible to show that the institutionalization of this means of popular consultation was brought about by a clearly felt need to associate the people with some very important political decisions. In all cases representative democracy was associated with the concept of direct participation by the people in the decision-making process. Depending on the countries and the needs involved, the use of the referendum has developed unevenly. Some, like the United States, have deemed it advisable to make an extensive use of it, while others have been satisfied with a more restricted use.

Some hon. members have said that the idea of a referendum may not be consistent with our British-type parliamentarianism. In my opinion, they are wrong. However, although there may not be an opposition between the two ideas, I think a certain incompatibility may develop in connection with the use of the referendum. For instance, an excessive use of it would not be in agreement with the principles of a British-type parliamentarianism which are essentially based on the sovereignty of parliament.

It goes without saying that like any other instruments, referenda offer not only advantages, and that an abuse of them may bring about disadvantages which may exceed by far their advantages. It is necessary to realize that a referendum will not remedy all the ills of our democracy. Although it is an extremely useful tool of democracy, it will not solve the problem of political division. As far as Canada is concerned, we must never lose sight of this principle. An excessive use of referenda can also result in a downgrading of the role of politicians and undermine the principles of representative democracy. The most positive aspect of referenda is that it provides an opportunity for grass root involvement in major political decisions requiring a long term commitment. By the same token, it can bring about a sense of belonging in the national community by enhancing the value of political institutions and creating a feeling of genuine participation in the hearts and minds of ordinary citizens. As far as upgrading the image of our political institutions is concerned, I would like to make a suggestion regarding Bill C-9.

Pursuant to clause 1 of the bill only the governor in council may direct the Chief Electoral Officer to issue writs for a referendum. No other person, group or agency has this authority. Accordingly, the government has decided on a government-initiated referendum, implicitly rejecting a parliament or people-initiated referendum. I think that the popular referendum used in some U.S. states does not suit parliamentary democracy and that its serious disadvantages would prevent its use in our parliamentary context.

However, I am not at all convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the same arguments can apply to the parliamentary referendum. It is a principle of government which is recognized in several countries, in Denmark for example. The parliamentary referendum could revitalize parliamentary institutions. The conditions would be subject to discussion and we could easily conceive that could come before the House in committee of the whole following a proposal by two-thirds of the hon. members. This procedure is not at all incompatible with the government-initiated referendum and it would favour the development of a more important role both for the elected representatives and for the people.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in the next few months, perhaps particularly in the debates on matters affecting national unity, we could try to move further and further away from those ad hominem attacks which make perhaps the fame of what happens in the House of Commons to take a much more positive attitude and to demonstrate clearly and precisely our positions and to try to sell them to the Canadian people not because they are taken by a particular individual but rather because they meet the deep aspirations of the population and because they will bring about changes which will benefit the people who elected us. Furthermore, the basic principle which should never be left aside is that individuals should come before governments, that governments are here to serve the individuals and not the other way round.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the bill we are now considering seems to me to be an ill-advised response to a malicious expectation stemming from prejudice. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, if the present debate had been held five, eight or ten years ago, this bill could have been regarded as a reflection of the government's intentions to provide an opportunity for the grass-root participation in government's decisions.

However, even though we advocated, ten years ago, the use of referenda in order to know exactly how Canadians felt about, say the abolition of capital punishment or the legalization of abortion, the whole question was taboo, Mr. Speaker. The government was not the least interested in introducing a bill aiming at popular consultations. How come, then, that today we are considering a legislation dealing with referenda? Nobody can deny that this bill is the result of the government's reaction to the policies and, above all, the expressed philosophy of a provincial government.

And now they try to prove to me that we are dealing with something else; it is a shame to see a government act like that, a government about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself has said that it is merely a local government in a huge country, only one of ten provinces or of 12 provinces if we include the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. That is what the Prime Minister thinks. And yet he maintains a contradictory and unhealthy attitude towards the manoeuvres of a government which a growing number of people in Quebec seem to approve, at least for the administration it provides.

Mr. Speaker, this preamble is to show that we have to do with a controversy that the present government and especially the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) want to win and that they are not concerned about finding adequate solutions to the national problems facing this country. Rather it is for the Prime Minister a matter of winning a controversy that he triggered decades ago; indeed some 20, 25 years ago the Prime Minister was already talking about these issues with René Lévesque and Gérard Pelletier and others and at that time the Prime Minister was already being stubborn the way he is today. This lack of intellectual evolution on the part of a man who is now leading the country means that Canada now faces a period of insecurity and that it is a little hard today for a Canadian to go abroad and see how his country is being ridiculed, at least as far as the dollar is concerned. A determination to resort to confrontation rather than seek fair and equitable solutions is the trademark of the right hon. Prime Minister and his government. Where does such an attitude stem from? Merely from its refusal to accept reality. The government is determined to ignore reality not only on the Quebec political scene but all over Canada nor does it make any reasonable effort to seek equitable solutions.

● (1640)

Mr. Speaker, when the government put forward so-called solutions to the constitutional problems of Canada, by adopting the Official Languages Act, and introducing a motion aiming at upgrading the status of French, I voted against it mainly because I felt that these were not adequate solutions, and now a few years later, the House must recognize that I was right. For what is the result of this band-aid designed by this government? It led to the decision, effective April 1, 1979, to reduce by over 33 per cent the number of civil servants responsible for the promotion of bilingualism in Canada. A cut of over one-third; it was considered they were not important any longer.

On the other hand the top brass in the federal government has not significantly changed in number. And in the higher spheres of that administration, we find only 2 per cent for example in relation to research, with this figure increasing to 5 per cent and 6 per cent in some departments, and reaching 7 per cent and 8 per cent in others. Those are the opportunities for Francophones within that federal administration. On the whole, Francophone public servants account for about 25 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I said then and I repeat it today: Even if the whole federal administration became bilingual, if French Canadians or Quebeckers do not take full and equal part in the administration of this country, absolutely nothing would have been solved. It is not a question of language. It is above all a question of participation. That is why the right hon. Prime Minister and the government would never find the solution in bilingualism. It is not there. It has been put to the test and we see today the results of such a policy. Mr. Speaker, I already said and I repeat once again because it is so true that the problem in this country is not related to a question of language, but amounts to a question of nationality, a question of participation with pride and dignity, on equal terms, in the development and the emancipation of this country.

That is what Quebeckers want. They want nothing less than equality. Equality does not means 25 per cent representation in the federal administration.

Equality does not mean saying in English or in French how much one owes the income tax people. Equality means working together to create the things we must manage jointly. It is as simple as that. Even today, Mr. Speaker, although the Irish people have decided to use the English language as their medium, I am sure they would resent being called Englishmen.

I am saying this to show the difference between national participation as a people and language difference. Those are two things quite different. And this is why the government failed. They forgot that the problem to be solved in Canada, in the first place at least, was not a language problem, but a nationality problem.

Quebeckers, having acquired an objective awareness of their strength and potential, never wanted to infringe upon the rights or privileges enjoyed by the rest of the country; they simply decided to be themselves and to offer their wholehearted co-operation to the rest of the country, so that the latter could truly develop. Our objectives should be aimed in that direction. There should be no more reference to destroying the country because a part of the country wants to rebuild it.

There is a world of difference between rebuilding a country to fit its inhabitants, and destroying it. But whenever someone rises to defend the particular interests of his nationality or his people, he is immediately branded a separatist, and this does away with any difference between that and the opportunity to improve this country, on the basis of separate entities that are nonetheless willing to closely co-operate to promote everyone's well-being.

It is utterly ridiculous and irrational to think we will solve the Canadian problem with references to opportunities for bilingualism in B.C. It is just as ridiculous and irrational to think we will solve that problem with opportunities for total bilingualism in the Trois-Rivières area. Mr. Speaker, let us be serious. We must see things as they are. This is the reason why today, if we want to build a Canada that will really fit our respective aims as Anglophones or Francophones, we must be objective not to fall into animosity and bickering. Unfortunately, there are no other words to qualify this legislation.

Yesterday, I listened to the comments made by the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé). Hers was a vindictive contribution glowing with animosity, if not hatred, and she said things that were untrue if not clearly irresponsible. I feel it is unworthy of someone from the cabinet to find nothing better, in defence of a piece of legislation put forward by the government, than politicking and electioneering against a certain party in a certain province.

In her speech, the minister, for instance, stated that the present premier of Quebec was purposely trying to foster confusion. She went on and on along this line, talking about confusion as if this whole bill was not itself adding to the present confusion. It will be absolutely indescribable and it can create such a turmoil that it could end up jeopardizing peace and order in our country. There is confusion, indeed. This government is looking for it and is creating it. The minister said, for instance, that the Premier of Quebec was confused and dishonest when he was pretending he was following the same line as his predecessors.

Mr. Speaker, I still remember in 1960 and 1962 Mr. Lesage's fantastic team in Quebec, a team which had been elected because it went much further than the Duplessis government had ever gone before on the road to autonomy. They went as far as using, in 1962, the slogan "Masters at home" which became the leitmotiv of the Liberals in Quebec. In 1966, Mr. Daniel Johnson following the same line went even further and declared: "What Quebec wants is equality and if ever Ottawa denies us this equality, we will have to consider independence." Everybody knows it, and why is it that the hon. Minister of Communications does not know it? All this led to the victory of the Parti Québécois in 1976. Their objective was to reshape and restructure the country so that Quebeckers would have absolute control in all areas under their jurisdiction and be able to influence the development of their province and work toward its cultural and social fulfilment. With this objective in mind, they say that this country must be reinvented and that its component parts should be given sovereignty within an association which will create a new Canada, truly reflecting the national realities of the country.

What is so scandalous about it? What is so scandalous when one knows, Mr. Speaker, that we are the thirteenth generation descending from the French settlers who came here in Canada? I do not have any complex with respect to anyone whatsoever. I feel at home in Quebec, I feel at home in this country and at one point, without overriding anyone's rights, I declare that I want 100 per cent respect as I want to fully respect my own partners and to blame me for that, Mr. Speaker, would be just the same as to blame me for loving my own mother and my own father, because if I am a Quebecker today, Mr. Speaker, it is because I was born in Saint-Casimir, in the riding of Champlain, and that is that. If I had been born in Moscow, I would be a Russian; if I had been born in Rome, I would be an Italian, if I had been born in British Columbia, I would be very pleased, I would be a good English-speaking Canadian. Mr. Speaker, let us face the facts. Let us stop making the situation even more complicated in prejudging what is going to happen and looking for evil intentions and objectives which exist only in the mind of some poor frustrated people.

And we have before us a frustrated government that, on November 15, 1976, lost its head and managed to devalue our Canadian dollar from $1 to 82 or 83 cents compared to the U.S. dollar. A government that, for the sake of revenge, caused a flight of capital not only in the province of Quebec but throughout Canada, a mean and small government that tries to destroy our country when we only wish to establish harmony in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, as long as this government will speak with so much hatred and animosity, which is totally inadmissible from a government, from people who should be above all partisanship, there will be confusion like the minister said. We might laugh at the cat and mouse game the government is playing if the consequences were not so sad. In fact, we are studying a bill in case something should happen in Quebec. We never know! What if Quebeckers answer yes instead of no? Just in case the province of Quebec answers yes, we are drafting legislation in such a way that we too will answer yes just to oppose the other government. We are asked to take part in those childish manoeuvres and to give our support to this bill.

I understand perfectly the members of the official opposition who are against it as well as those of the Social Credit party. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly normal. Why do they want us to take part in the four-ring circus? Why do they want us to play that little game where they say: In case they found the answer we are going to take it from them? Mr. Speaker, it is terrible. I understand my friends opposite who wish to expedite the matter. But, Mr. Speaker, I did not want to let this go by without making those few remarks and now I am going to give objective evidence of what I am saying.

A brief analysis of the report of the Pepin-Robarts commission, Mr. Speaker, forces us once again to realize that the personalities appointed by the government itself—although admittedly it had some difficulty in finding them, especially in Quebec—after making a survey of the situation all across Canada could do nothing but add to the objective conclusions one must inevitably come to. But, here again, what was the reaction of the Prime Minister? He immediately said his friend, Mr. Pepin, was naive; he said so right off the bat, without thinking—

An hon. Member: It's true.

Mr. Matte: Someone across the way says it is true. See what I mean! So, the personalities appointed by this government come to the obvious conclusions. That task force was appointed to—It would appear that the Prime Minister wanted the commissioners to support his own views. In other words, the task force would have been appointed only to satisfy the egotistical wish of the Prime Minister to see a supposedly objective commission come to the same conclusions as he.

● (1700)

Since this is impossible since the Prime Minister and the present government are the only ones to support a position which is quite close to an absolute status quo which is totally inadequate for the solutions needed at this time. These public figures, Mr. Speaker, recognized the facts in their objective report, and as long as the members opposite will not recognize them as well, they will not be able to come up with a solution. The facts must first be acknowledged. With regard to confederation, the commissioners state on page 16:

"Ottawa," as we found on our tour, is for many Canadians synonymous with all that is to be deplored about modern government—a remote, shambling bureaucracy that exacts tribute from its subjects and gives little in return.

Mr. Speaker the team we have had in front of us for ten years now has managed to create that image of the federal government across the country, not only in Quebec. Here is the saviour of Canadian unity. They are the ones who put such ideas in the minds of people.

Mr. Speaker, as things stand, referendums will not settle anything. And if the Quebec government has already made a mistake by calling for a referendum, and I say "if", why is this government trying to do better by wanting a referendum also?

Allow me to quote once again the first part of the report where the commissioners say this:

The election of the Parti Québécois, and all that it entails, has compelled or allowed Canadians to confront problems which they would have been obliged to face sooner or later. It would be foolish for Canadians to think of the challenge which lies ahead solely in terms of the forthcoming referendum on the independence of Quebec. A victory for the federalist cause in the referendum will accomplish little, if no effort is made to address the sources of discontent which have occasioned it.

Mr. Speaker, those proposals go clearly against this stupid and ridiculous piece of legislation which only show the pettiness and narrow-mindedness of its drafters. Mr. Speaker, if the commissioners reached such conclusions and dared state them, it must be kept in mind that normally they are prejudiced in favour of the government's position and in spite of this, faced with the facts and the plain truth, they are compelled, for the sake of intellectual honesty, to bring down such conclusions.

I did not have to wait for the task force report to say what I am saying now, because obviously I have always tried to reflect in the House the Quebec reality as it is. I repeat once more that on the night of November 15, 1976, there was at least one federal member who was not surprised, and it was the member for Champlain. I knew that the pride and dignity of an entire people could not be confined and restricted indefinitely. And if this pride and dignity is now ready to take a concrete form in a new Canadian context, what is wrong with that?

Let us now talk in a positive way instead of always talking negatively and let us start talking about restructuring this country. Throughout the report, the commissioners not only refer to cultural and ethnic duality, but they also deal at length with regionalisms.

Mr. Speaker, I wrote a book on that because it seems so obvious to me that in this country you have to take into account the geographical distribution, demographic entities as such and the economic interests that stem from it. It is quite obvious that this country is made up of five separate regions that could be associated in a new Canada. I think that suggestion I have been making for a long time is borne out in that report and I believe we should not be afraid of identifying the real sores to find the real solutions. As I say, and I want to be clear on that, I do not want to be 25 per cent or 33⅓ per cent of Canada.

What Quebeckers and French Canadians want is just to be equal in this country. And if my friends opposite are satisfied with being nonentities, I, Mr. Speaker, will not accept anything short of total equality in this country without wanting to take anything away from anyone. Only by moving toward that objective of equality and thinking about restructuring this country, always in that broad dimension, but within geographical, demographic and economic limitations shall we be able to find proper solutions, I am sure. But if from the outset you reject any solution that closely or remotely resembles the one advocated at this time by a ruling government, that is just electioneering. We should be responsible and decent enough to avoid displaying—at least in this House—that cheap electioneering which is the cause of many problems.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that it is increasingly urgent and essential to have a positive attitude when considering the future of this country. The government would have to change entirely its attitude by withdrawing such a bill that only proves his animosity, and shows his intention to fight a government with counteracting legislation. If you want to fight an election campaign against the Parti Québécois, then wait until an election is called in Quebec, and then go out and fight that government. It is despicable to use this parliament as a tool for vengeance. As worthy members of this House we should not take advantage of our power to legislate to go against the democratic will of any part of this country which, in this case, happens to be a people. That is just being mean, and the culprits are defeating their own purpose.

Yesterday I received telephone calls from people in federal political parties in Quebec and they were simply telling me: "We have just realized you were right". There is nothing to be done in this country. Other solutions have to be found if the Liberals are there. Therefore, we must get rid of these people in the next election and replace them with more responsible people who will know how to see the facts as they are in order to reach the goals and ideals of every Canadian. Therefore it is with this approach and these intentions that we should legislate in this House. And I feel insulted, Mr. Speaker, to think that I am being asked to co-operate and give my consent to a bill which only serves to satisfy some petty resentment. I simply wanted today to make known the views of my constituents and, I am sure, of the vast majority of Quebeckers who refuse to be insulted again in this way and who had enough of these methods. I hope they will have the opportunity to show it pretty soon in an election.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I decided to take part in this debate when on Monday I listened to what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said about Bill C-9 respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada. In a speech made in the best traditions of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Leader of the Opposition acted as if this bill contained a series of threats which, I can tell you, are all in his imagination. I suspect he expressed his so-called concerns with the very serious objective of creating entirely unjustified fears among the Canadian people.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned that with this bill the federal government would be entitled to hold referenda concerning aboriginal rights, religious rights and education because one way or another these matters are included in our constitution. He omitted to say that before any subject concerning the constitution can become the subject of a referendum, we would need a resolution approved by both Houses of parliament after a debate of 40 hours or three weeks, and he also omitted to say that the government is not bound by the results of the referendum and that these subjects are protected by the present constitution and will be even better protected by the constitutional proposals introduced recently by the Prime Minister.

There is also the Bill of Rights passed by parliament in 1960, and finally, the Leader of the Opposition neglected to say that we can always appeal to our judiciary system. He paraded a lot of ghosts to justify his opposition to this bill and to confuse the population. Of course we hope we will not have to use this bill. We hope we will not have to use this tool which, in the hands of the Prime Minister, could counter a false or antidemocratic referendum in Quebec or verify its honesty. The Prime Minister also said: "I do not want the referendum to be at the centre of our action, it is only a counteroffensive tool."

● (1710)

Last Monday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) brought out a list of ghosts and goblins, brandishing the spectre of referendums on educational and religious rights, and rights of expression, implying that somehow the use of this bill could conceivably threaten these liberties which all of us cherish. He conveniently omitted mentioning that the subject matter of a referendum has to be debated for three weeks and passed by both Houses of parliament, that even then the government would not be bound by any result, and that any result would in no way affect existing constitutional safeguards. He neglected to mention that the Bill of Rights passed in 1960 would also be a block to any interference with these traditional rights. He neglected to mention that in the final analysis our court system would provide protection for these basic rights.

We may never need to use this bill, but we do need it as a tool to keep the Quebec referendum honest. The naivete with which the Leader of the Opposition and his shadow cabinet member, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), the former mayor of Toronto, approached the prospect of transacting with a separatist prime minister of Quebec is alarming and dangerous. We need this bill to give us a flexible, tactical weapon that may well be useful from the federal government's point of view in the struggle for minds which lies ahead of us.

The Leader of the Opposition and the Conservative party would deny us this tactical weapon. I just do not understand the opposition's rationale or logic, which would be akin, in my view, to having the federal government going into a wrestling match with the separatist government of Quebec with one or both hands tied behind its back.

The Canadian people should sit up and take notice that the Conservative party and the Leader of the Opposition are not objecting to the separatist Parti Québécois holding a referendum with the avowed purpose of splitting up and dividing one of the world's most admired countries. But they are objecting to the federal government arming itself with the same kind of tactical weapon, couched in far more liberal, democratic and open rules than the Quebec proposed referendum, in order to give itself all the manoeuvrability that would be required to deal with this threat to the economic well-being and the basic civil rights of the people of Quebec in particular.

The Conservative party's reaction to this bill is an expression of the same naivete and shortsightedness which have characterized its whole approach to dealing with the threat posed by the Parti Québécois. This naivete seems really to provide the common ground whereby people like the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who I know honestly and idealistically believes a reasonable accommodation can be worked out with the Parti Québécois in the event of a referendum result favourable to separatism, can agree with those in the Conservative party who all along have favoured a simplistic, two-solitude solution to linguistic problems in Canada.

According to the two-solitude reasoning, there will be nine provinces speaking only English and one province eventually speaking only French. The Pepin-Robarts report seems to have arrived at the same conclusion in its recommendation dealing with language minority rights. If the Pepin-Robarts recommendations on minority language rights were to be accepted, many of the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec would be subjected to irrevocable assimilation, and the English-speaking people of Quebec would lose basic civil rights which are theirs by virtue of both the Quebec Act of 1774 and the British North America Act.

I reject, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rejects, and I think my colleagues reject the proposed Pepim-Robarts formula which neither protects nor promotes minority language rights, and I was pleased to be able to sign a declaration to this effect, prepared today in collaboration with the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

[Translation]

We flatly reject any formula which neither protects nor prompts minority language rights. We also reject the very pessimistic point of view that the minorities would be subjected to irrevocable assimilation. It is not by leaving language minorities at the whimsical discretion of the provincial governments that we are going to strenghten the structure and the basic fabric of Canada. On the contrary, the reason for the existence of the Canadian federation would be seriously hampered.

[English]

If Canada is to survive, a declaration of rights and freedoms, including minority language rights, must be enshrined in our constitution. There are many English-speaking Canadians outside Quebec who are separatist oriented, and there are many separatist oriented French-speaking Canadians in Quebec who have convinced themselves that this two-solitudes solution will somehow work and ease the tensions which have been grabbing headlines for the last 15 years. I want to assure both that this is not going to happen. The French minorities outside Quebec are not going to allow themselves to be assimilated. Even if Quebec should decide to separate, there is still going to be a rightful insistence on the part of French minorities outside Quebec on linguistic and educational protection that will allow the survival of their language. Of course the same is true in Quebec. The separatists in a separate Quebec need not expect, as most of them do, that the English population will be less of a problem in a separate Quebec. I can assure them that will not be the case. In a separate Quebec the English minority will become much more demanding in every single aspect of what western democracies regard as basic human freedoms than has been the case up to now.

[Translation]

As I just said in English, many Canadians believe that the solution to our problems lies in the two-solitude concept of nine English-speaking provinces and one French-speaking province. I want to assure English-speaking people outside Quebec and French-speaking people in Quebec that this is no solution. The French-speaking minorities outside Quebec will never accept assimilation. Should Quebec decide to separate from the rest of Canada, the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec would still insist, and rightly so, on getting protection on matters relating to language and education so that their language might survive. Obviously, the same goes for Quebec.

Separatists should not expect, as most of them do, that in a separate Quebec the English-speaking people will be less of a problem. I can assure them that this will not be the case. In a separate Quebec, the English-speaking minority will be much more demanding that it has been up to now as regards every aspect of the fundamental freedoms as they are now recognized in western democracies. We have renounced violence, we have renounced the use of the armed forces to hold the country together, if the citizens of Quebec, in a completely democratic manner and with full guarantees of democratic freedom to all its citizens, vote positively for a separate country. However, let us keep in mind that if this vote is favourable, which I doubt, it would only be the beginning of extremely complex and delicate negotiations. The Conservative party's position as laid out in this debate would have us hamstrung before we start.

• (1720)

We have renounced force and, rightly so; we have renounced the use of the army to hold the country together, if the citizens of Quebec, in a completely democratic manner and with full guarantees of democratic freedom to all its citizens, vote to form a separate country. But remember if in the unlikely event such a vote were favourable, it would be only the beginning of the negotiations in an extremely complex and delicate exercise. The Conservative position would have us hamstrung before we begin. What naivete. It is a naivete which has crossed the boundary into irresponsibility. How else can one describe the Conservative party's unthinking, intellectually shallow, opportunistic seeking of accommodation, with the regionalism which has tugged always at our national fabric by promoting policies which will strengthen the forces of regionalism in Canada?

This blinkered approach to a strong Canada is evident in the commitment of the Leader of the Conservative party to do away with Petro-Canada, our national oil company, which in a few short months succeeded in bringing back under Canadian control an important percentage of our hydrocarbon industry.

Why do Conservatives want to do away with Petro-Canada? Partly the reason is ideological: pure free enterprisers do not want the government around, even if it means turning around a situation in which more than 85 per cent of the Canadian petroleum industry was foreign owned. According to this line of reasoning, it is all right if companies such as Petro Par, controlled by the Government of France, or BP, controlled by the government of Great Britain, can own a major chunk of our oil resources; but it is not all right if we Canadians do it through our government. As I have said, it is only partly ideology which has driven the Conservative party to a commitment to abolish Petro-Canada. The other driving force in this commitment is the regionalism to which the Conservative party now is catering. In simple terms, some westerners do not want a national oil company in their resource field.

Let us look at the Yukon. The Conservative party now is committed to giving provincehood to the Yukon. What does that mean? It means provincehood to the Northwest Territories shortly after, and eventually it means turning over the natural resources of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to extremely small populations. That policy was enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition and the Conservative party. If that is the position of the Conservative party, the Liberal position is somewhat different. The government considers the natural resources of the north are the common heritage of all Canadians. First and foremost, the inhabitants of the north should call upon those resources to assure themselves a standard of living second to none in Canada. But after that occurs they are the heritage of all Canadians, and they are part of the cement which can bind and can continue to bind the country together.

What is the position of the Conservative party on offshore resources? In effect the Leader of the Opposition wants a turnover of offshore resources to the provinces. The 600,000 square miles which have been added to the Canadian sovereignty are a Canadian heritage; they belong to all of us. In effect, the position of the Conservative party will give these to the provinces.

What will happen to the things required to attract Canadians to a strong central government, if these two policies of giving away our Arctic and offshore resources—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Towers: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Watson: I would be delighted after I have completed my remarks. I alluded to the Arctic and offshore resource situation as examples of the official opposition's movement toward supporting the concept of regionalism in Canada at the expense of a strong federal government.

Just imagine this situation: we are faced with separatism in Quebec. Réne Lévesque would deprive all Quebeckers of their heritage in our Arctic. The Leader of the Opposition would go further. He would deprive all Canadians of their heritage in our Arctic. Réne Lévesque would deprive all Quebeckers of their heritage in the 600,000 square miles recently added to our Canadian sovereignty. The hon. Leader of the Opposition would deprive all Canadians of their heritage in that 600,000 square miles. This debate has made it clearer than ever that the Conservative vision in Canada is lacking, if we want a strong central government.

Mr. Nystrom: Which vision? They have two or three.

Mr. Watson: I do not know if they have a vision.

Returning to the subject matter of the referenda capacity the bill will give to the federal government, it is a necessary tool to deal with the extraordinary situation before us now, which situation will intensify in the months ahead. To increase our manoeuvrability and to increase our ability to have a tactical weapon to play the game of chess developing between the federal government and the separatist government of Quebec, we need every flexibility in the bill.

In my view, the Conservative position is wrong. When Canadians have heard the versions aired in the House during the past one or two weeks, I am sure they will have very, very serious doubts about the Conservative position not only on this bill, but on its entire approach toward Canada-Quebec relations and a solution to the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: In view of the statement by the hon. member indicating that the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should give up their natural resources, the logical question would be: would Quebec be prepared to give up its natural resources, including the James Bay project?

Mr. Watson: I think Quebec would be about as prepared to give up its natural resources as Alberta.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself for a few minutes to this notorious Bill C-9. Several of my colleagues have already spoken, and still others will because this bill is of great interest to us. I also note, Mr. Speaker, that this bill on referenda is being debated after the publication of the Pepin-Robarts report, which is a direct consequence of the election of the Parti Québécois, and also after the decision, taken by Quebec, to hold its own referendum. As the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) said a moment ago, I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that if Quebec had not decided on a referendum, we would never have discussed the issue in this House.

It is always the same thing, I mean the reason for all this bickering, the main reason for all this bickering in the House and across Canada, the fact that the government is not doing its job and is always jumping on the back of the provinces, especially of Quebec. I think that we will have to say things clearly in the future and state whatever is on our minds.

Some people say: Quebeckers are impulsive people. But I was glad to see, in the course of the debate, that there are impulsive people among English Canadians too. I used to think English Canadians were so cool that they had no reactions at all, but they do react as soon as you interfere with their rights. As the preceding speaker just said, if you meddle with the rights of English Canadians in Quebec, we will react, we will rise and we will fight. I congratulate them for such a noble stand, but let them realize that for 111 years, Quebec has respected the rights of English-speaking Canadians and for 111 years, these same rights have been denied to French-speaking Canadians in the other provinces.

I think that French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec—and the hon. member tells me that they agree about that—have been extremely patient. Therefore, we can understand that they are more exacting in the stand they take today. I think English-speaking Canadians should try to understand them instead of bullying them. But I do not wish to develop that point any further since it is not the issue I want to addresss myself to today. Others have talked about that and it serves no purpose to start all over again.

I would like to add a few words to whatever has been said and call attention to the remarks of the previous speaker because deep inside I was pleased having finally realized that English-speaking Canadians are like any other people; when they feel threatened and think they are discriminated against, they can react.

Well, Quebeckers have been reacting for 15 years. I hope that that turning point in history will enable us to restore a sound measure of fairness. Mr. Speaker, the government is now ready to deal with an important issue which concerns the fate of all Canadians. In the interpretative clause 2 of this bill, the following definition was maintained:

"Constitution of Canada" includes, without limiting the meaning of that expression,

(a) the customs, conventions and enactments that comprise the Constitution of Canada, and

(b) the political and judicial institutions and processes of Canada;

That interpretation, Mr. Speaker, is too broad. The government is running the risk of needlessly thrusting its designs and constitutional concepts upon the provinces.

● (1730)

In fact, this definition is so unprecise that it would permit parliament to interfere more and more in provincial affairs by bringing the majority party into play. This bill would make it possible to seek the approval of all Canadians or some of them on all agreements and settlements relating to constitutional matters. Thus it would become the ideal tool for federal intervention into provincial jurisdictions by merely allowing voters all over Canada to negate provincial decisions. This policy would in fact deny provinces their sovereignty. Let us take a look at the confederation act, or read the definition of a confederation in a dictionary: We will find it is the union of sovereign provinces.

Today, it is no longer possible to mention sovereignty, or claim our province is sovereign under confederation without being branded a separatist. Provincial legislative assemblies have received a very precise mandate from the voters whom they represent directly, to the same extent as federal members. Members of provincial legislatures appear to belong to a lower category. Well, no, Mr. Speaker. The purpose of this bill is to do away with the concept that the federal government must act as the co-ordinator of the provinces, the creation on a more or less voluntary basis of a separate political and economic entity, made up of the British colonies joined together. The British North America Act distributed the powers in a precise way, leaving to a central government the responsibility for legislating on behalf of all parties involved certain questions of common interest.

The time-honored customs and agreements of jurisprudence determine to a large extent the current and future destiny of Canada. Under Bill C-9, the federal governement could hold a referendum to make significant changes to these agreements. Since we all know that the present cabinet is not too keen on provincial demands for amendments to the constitution, these consultations of the Canadian public may serve as a means to bypass provincial legislatures. this stratagem has been used in the past and may very well be used again in the future.

We still remember the conscription during the 1939-45 war, Mr. Speaker. We did not forget it. They held an election on that, and it was also under a Liberal administration which said: They will never force conscription upon us. Then they attracted lower Quebec that way, and they knew that Quebec was 95 per cent against that conscription. Well, they established it from coast to coast, and we were cleaned out but we were not forgotten because 4,000 of our young people were killed in the slaughter, in battlefields, as our French Canadians were used to protect the British troops which were behind them.

Mr. Speaker, we do not want such situations to recur through a referendum. Now we are told: Yes, but we shall have a 40-hour debate when we move a motion for a referendum. And the hon. member who spoke before me said earlier: It will have to be accepted by both Houses. Fine. But we know that with the system we have today, when the government takes a decision, with compulsory vote for all its members, sure enough, the legislation is passed. Even if you fight for 40, 50 or 80 hours, it will pass. It does not matter any more.

There is also to some extent some danger with regard to the independence of the highest judicial system in our country. In fact, Bill C-9 would authorize the government to interfere with the decisions made by the Supreme Court of Canada or by appeal courts. This is what could happen. An appeals court making a decision in favour of a province might prompt the government to exercise its right to hold referendums so as to challenge this decision through the electorate. This legal precedent would put into question the whole judicial infrastructure which protects the judiciary system against all political attacks from within or without, from within if the institution becomes a political organization, and from without if the institution is the victim of political attacks. Any government interference in the judicial process would be extremely prejudicial to the independence of our courts of justice.

Those remarks might seem excessive, Mr. Speaker, but they serve to make a very important point in the debate. This bill refers only briefly to the type of circumstances that would prompt the government to hold a referendum. The bill only provides that the governor in council has the responsibility to hold a referendum. The decision is made at the ministerial level.

If the department considers that an issue related to the Constitution of Canada or any amendment thereto it requires the opinion of the electorate, the governor in council may, by proclamation, order that it be put through a referendum to the electorate of Canada or of any province mentioned in the proclamation. Besides, such is the intention now as concerns the province of Quebec.

The circumstances in which a referendum is required are not specified at all. Yet, it seems to us normal and even inevitable that the government should take legislative action to clearly define the requirements for holding a referendum. And only through strict regulations will abuse of discretion be avoided. It is therefore important to make sure that the government will bring forward specific criteria so as to prevent any political group from misusing such a tool.

This referendum bill allows the federal government to hold a referendum within a province, many provinces or across Canada. However, it does not elaborate on instances where a referendum may be held in any area in Canada. The government should define more clearly that clause of the bill so that public opinion will not eventually be manipulated.

Since the bill empowers the cabinet to determine the scope of the referendum, the government might exploit interregional antagonisms in this country to get the results it wants. The bill as worded would allow the government to take away, through devious means, the right to participate of a province expected to fiercely oppose the referendum. This is a possibility since the bill does not say how the government would determine the provincial or national scope of the referendum.

For this reason, the referendum, because of a reactionary hurry motivated by the Quebec referendum formula, may become a political instrument with which the federal government could materially alter the desires of the federated components.

One of the most often repeated points in the verbal struggle launched in the House of Commons on the referendum issue revolves around the fact that the House of Commons could always defend public interest during the period of debate reserved for members under clause 3 of the bill. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) had this to say:

"If there is a particular referendum which we do not think is popular, the point is that we have the means in this House as an opposition to hold things up beyond the eight days. Indeed, if it happened that the government of the day, whether it be this government or any other, rammed through a referendum bill in the face of united opposition in the House of Commons, one does not have to guess what would happen. A referendum of that nature which did not have reasonable support and had to be rammed through would be defeated in advance. Any government would know that."

I am not at all as sure as that, Mr. Speaker, because I can assure you that in the 17 years I have been in the House, every time the government wanted to pass a law there was nothing to prevent them from doing so. They have all the means to have it passed. We believe that the common position of the Liberals and of the New Democratic Party shows a definite lack of perspective. There are very rarely unanimous votes in the House. Following the directives of the caucus of the two main political parties, we have to realize that there will always be an important division in the House on serious legislative measures. In other words the present parliamentary structures are such that unanimity in the House is very rare indeed.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and his friends show a certain amount of dishonesty when they foresee the possibility of a consensus between the cabinet and the federal members. On the contrary, the current political make-up of the House would lead one to believe that on any controversial questions about the referendum there would be a division. If need be a majority government could easily get a motion passed explaining the proposed referendum to this House without serious clashes unless it clearly perceived the unpopular character of that motion among a majority of voters. The electoral vote is always what they fear.

The title of Bill C-9, an act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, makes it quite obvious that if Quebec had not decided to hold a referendum within its boundaries in order to find out the opinion of Quebeckers about a major issue in that province, the central government would never have thought of presenting such a bill. It therefore demonstrates to the people that the federal government can no longer take the initiative because Quebec is always one step ahead. The federal government therefore keeps playing its dangerous game of hide and seek. As soon as Quebec takes a step forward in its struggle for liberation and survival, the federal government comes right after him making the same move in all sectors. When it comes to examples there are plenty of them available. As soon as Quebec opens new fields of taxation, the federal government grabs them. The latest example and the least funny is that of Loto Canada where it got in in order to make unfair competition to the provinces. There would be no end to the list of such interventions if I wanted to state them one after the other.

As soon as they saw that the provinces were making a little money with Loto Quebec, Loto Ontario, etc., they established Loto Canada, and it is like that in every area. And then, Mr. Speaker, they are hypocritically surprised at the present crisis. They are even looking for the causes. I would say that the only cause of that crisis is the ever increasingly centralistic attitude of the central government in the hope that some day it might turn the provinces into simple administrative areas, a solution that Quebec will never accept, and the Prime Minister knows it quite well.

The Prime Minister once said here in this place that the federal government had no business in the bedrooms of the people; I believe the time has come for him to put his theory into practice and to get out once and for all of the bedroom of the province of Quebec before Quebeckers take it upon themselves to get him out in their own way in the next general election. As I said before sincere and loyal Quebeckers are jealous of their sovereignty that is guaranteed under the BNA Act, and in spite of the hundreds of repeated violations by the central government, they will not allow federalists to go and snoop in their province, which is their exclusive jurisdiction.

After being harassed for 111 years without hope for more understanding, Quebeckers are reluctant and we should not wonder why. Therefore I believe that because of the present form and intended purpose of Bill C-9 our party cannot accept it and we are going to vote against it.

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) for the excellent speech he has just given and for the stand he took on this bill. In 17 years of parliamentary life he certainly has seen a great number of bills, but I wonder: has he ever seen a bill designed to achieve as negative a purpose as Bill C-9? The government, the Liberal party, avowedly introduced this bill to counter the Parti Québécois, a party elected democratically within a province by people who, I think, decided they had had enough, a party which may advocate the separation of Quebec, and does decidedly advocate the right of the province to determine its fate, and which also advocates, I feel, through that right to determine its fate, the giving back to all the provinces of Canada the powers that are rightfully theirs under our Canadian constitution.

I note that this bill will lead exactly to the same type of confrontation that occurred at the time of the two Canadian plebiscites. I have here the figures on the plebiscite on the Canadian conscription held on April 27, 1942; they prove the spirit of confrontation it stirred.

In that plebescite, 25 per cent of Quebeckers voted for conscription, and 75 per cent against, while in the provinces other than Quebec the ratio was practically the opposite: 80 per cent of the people in English-speaking provinces were for conscription and 20 per cent against. It led to a state of confrontation at that time, a state of uneasiness and abdication in a country.

This bill will probably create the same situation: confrontation between French and English-speaking Canadians, even though they could live in harmony and respect each other if we had better laws. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) often talks about harmony and I believe it is a good term to describe Canadian unity. Harmony is unity of thought and I believe that the Canadian people can achieve this.

Bill C-9 is rather long. It contains many clauses. One thing that strikes me about this bill is that it authorizes a referendum to be held at the same time as a provincial election or referendum since it says that a national referendum cannot be held at the same time as a federal election. Why such a restriction? Why do we need twice as many expenses? Why not hold a referendum at the same time as a federal election? Why not hold one during a provincial election? Once again, this simply aims at creating confrontation with the provinces.

Quebec could decide to hold an election tomorrow morning and the federal government could say: As we cannot get openly involved in this election, we shall do so indirectly. We shall get involved in the election by holding a referendum at the same time. This is quite legal. We could hold a referendum at the same time as the referendum in Quebec. The bill allows this.

An hon. Member: This is not true.

Mr. Janelle: The government always tries for confrontation. Someone has shouted that this is not true. This hon. member should read the bill!

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on a point of order.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would have us believe that in the event of an election in any province, the federal government could take immediate action through a referendum. He has not read the bill because the question asked in a referendum must be submitted to both Houses for a minimum debate of 30 days. The election could be held twice during that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Each hon. member is entitled to his own interpretation. I think it is the turn of the hon. member for Lotbinière to speak.

Mr. Janelle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Moreover, because of this bill, confrontation will continue. I should like to give an example which everybody can understand. Suppose the Supreme Court of Canada, dealing with Quebec Bill 101, decides that a particular section is acceptable under the Constitution. The federal government, refusing to accept this decision, decides to submit the same question to the opinion of the Canadian public in order to have it judged and reversed.

With this bill, we also run the risk of weakening the judiciary and letting the political power interfere with the judiciary. As a matter of fact the federal government, namely the Liberal party, is trying to impose its will on the provinces and to deprive them more and more of their sovereignty. The powers of the provinces have been eroded since 1968 and even before. The federal government is entering more and more into areas of provincial jurisdiction. A spirit of confrontation is brought about and a little sovereignty is taken from the provinces. This bill will enable the government to go further into the provincial fields of jurisdiction and to take a little more power from each of the provinces of Canada. The spirit of sovereignty does not exist only in Quebec, but also in most provinces which want to have what belongs to them under our Canadian Constitution which is not implemented, which is eroded quietly, day after day, with some little piece of legislation and then another little piece of legislation. Furthermore, the federal government increasingly takes hold of cultural fields, taxation and other fields. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BRUCELLOSIS—REQUEST COMPENSATION BE RAISED TO REALISTIC LEVEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Because brucellosis compensation is totally inadequate and because a number of dairy and beef farmers are being forced into bankruptcy under this compensation law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately instruct his department to raise compensation values to realistic levels.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CAMPAIGN TO DECERTIFY NABET AS REPRESENTATIVE OF "Q" RADIO EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the House on motions or otherwise whether he approves of the policy and actions of the "Q" radio system of Newfoundland in their campaign for the decertification of NABET as the representative in collective bargaining of the employees of the "Q" radio system, 100 per cent owned by the minister in a blind trust, or whether the minister wishes to continue to turn a blind eye to the union busting and anti-union tactics of his family-run radio empire—

REQUEST FOR PASSAGE OF BILLS RESPECTING PROPOSED NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the winter I believe all members will be happy to support the motion I wish to present under Standing Order 43. Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), I move:

That this House urge the Deputy Prime Minister to make government time available next week so that the House can deal either with Bill C-247, in the name of the member for Windsor-Walkerville, or Bill C-363, in the name of the member for Winnipeg North Centre, it being clear that the passing of either one of these bills would result in Monday, February 19, being celebrated by all Canadians as National Heritage Day or jour du Patrimoine national.

STRIKE OF VOYAGEUR COLONIAL LTD. DRIVERS—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF LABOUR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that Voyageur Colonial Ltd. is now crippled by a strike of its 400 drivers; considering that so far arbitration has been unable to bring the two parties closer; considering that this public service is the only one available in many Quebec regions, especially on the north shore, in the Gaspé Peninsula, that is from Gaspé, Sainte-Anne-des-Monts and Matane up to Mont-Joli; considering also that the economy of eastern Quebec generally is affected enough as it is without leaving present conditions to deteriorate further due to a lack of communication, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House urge the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) to intervene directly in that conflict with a view to drawing both parties closer and encouraging them to reach an agreement in the shortest possible time so that Quebeckers, especially in the Gaspé Peninsula, may enjoy that essential transport service which they are entitled to.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In appreciation of an outstanding contribution to clarity of thought within Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That this House call upon the communications department to institute an annual "Communicator of the Year" award, the first recipient to be the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway who, in a westcoast broadcast, said that the Minister of Communications had betrayed the trust of the Canadian people and that she was not competent to run her department.

DEFAULTS AND FORECLOSURES—REQUEST MINISTER OF STATE FOR URBAN AFFAIRS APPEAR BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that as of today CMHC has acquired over 20,000 housing units as a result of default and foreclosures, in light of the fact that this represents almost $350 million in real estate that is costing the Canadian taxpayer additional millions every year, and in view of the projection that thousands more units will be acquired be CMHC this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott):

That this House direct the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and his officials to appear before the appropriate committee in an effort to provide a strategy combining the housing needs, financial resources and the capabilities of government and industry in an effort to redress the inadequate housing policies of the present government.

REQUEST TRANSPORTATION COMPANIES FULFIL OBLIGATIONS TO PROVIDE SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 which will be of particular interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) since it has to do with double-digit increases in incomes. In view of the increased profit gouging by transportation companies in Canada in 1978 over 1977, with Canadian Pacific increasing profits by 31.6 per cent, Canadian National by 386 per cent, Air Canada by 135 per cent and CP Air by 506 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Minister of Transport require these corporations to live up to their historic and statutory obligations to provide transportation service which the country must have.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE INVESTIGATE STAFF COMPLAINTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 and to continuing difficulties at Statistics Canada. Since it appears that neither the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), responsible for Statistics Canada, nor the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) fully appreciates the distinction between the consumer price index and the job vacancy survey, which is hardly reassuring, and since there are continuing morale problems within StatsCan which, unless they are dealt with, will lead inevitably to the type of problems so evident in the post office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce show some ministerial competence and firmness and specifically investigate why, in 1978, over 200 staff complaints in StatsCan, leading to over 100 grievances being file on behalf of clerks and typists by the Public Service Alliance, have been dealt with so summarily and unsatisfactorily; and, in addition, why senior employees are being denied the opportunity to contribute to improving the dismal performance of our national statistical agency because they have no specific assignments.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who will know that, in answer to a request from the hon. member for Don Valley to have the governor of the Bank of Canada appear before a standing committee of the House, the Liberal chairman of that standing committee said in a letter, and I quote:

I certainly agree with you about the considerable public interest in this matter and, like you, I would welcome the opportunity to discuss his decision with him in committee... May I suggest that this important matter be raised in the House of Commons. For my part, I would welcome such an initiative.

Is it still the intention of the Prime Minister to deny the requests from this side of the House and the request of the Liberal chairman of the standing committee to make a reference which would allow this House of Commons to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada and his officials in relation to the interest rate of the Bank of Canada and the dollar policy being followed by this government, at such high cost to Canada?

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Leader of the Opposition has obviously not been listening to the answers I have given to him, Mr. Speaker. I said, and I say again today, that if the opposition or any group in this House wants the governor of the Bank of Canada to discuss these matters, he will appear any day when he is asked to do so by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which is meeting now to consider the Bank Act. He appeared a couple of times last fall and he will appear any number of times this winter or spring, and he will appear again if only the opposition will use the occasion of that standing committee which is meeting many times a week on the Bank Act. The governor is there to answer questions. I doubt very much whether the Leader of the Opposition will be there, and will take his foot out of his mouth and ask any questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister, who yesterday had difficulty distinguishing between the House of Commons and the Senate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —apparently does not know there needs to be a reference in order to allow the kind of inquiry for which we are calling. Will he make such a reference to allow a full examination of the governor of the Bank of Canada by a committee of this House as well as of other relevant officials and spokesmen for investment houses and chartered banks in this country, so that we may obtain all the evidence which is available to the governor and to the government in relation to a policy which has caused the value of the Canadian dollar to fall and fall?

Mr. Trudeau: I doubt very much the sincerity of the opposition in making this request, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If they want to discuss this matter without histrionics—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: They do not want it to go a committee, Mr. Speaker. That is why they are raising the matter every day in the House. They do not know what to say in front of a committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is easier to stand up and ask a question of the government than to enter into a rational argument with the governor of the Bank. They tried a rational argument with the governor last fall, Mr. Speaker, and he had answers to all their questions and they just did not know what to say. They have a second chance now. The committee is meeting. It is meeting regularly, several times a week, on the Bank Act—

An hon. Member: No reference!

Mr. Trudeau: —on the very subject which is of interest to the opposition. If they want the governor to be there, and if they want to call other witnesses—

Mr. Stevens: We would need a reference.

Mr. Chrétien: You have not even raised the subject in the steering committee.

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members honestly want to discuss this, do it in the way parliament always does it. There is a steering committee. They decide the procedure, and that is the way to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister pretends to disagree with me but he is not disagreeing with me; he is disagreeing with his own Liberal chairman of the standing committee—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —who has asked for a reference and which the Prime Minister has turned down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: It is the whole parliament he is attempting to muzzle, not just the official opposition. As a careful student of the press, the Prime Minister will know that on January 13 the Financial Post reported, and I quote, that the slogan floating around New York currency circles these days indicates that the Canadian dollar will sink to 79 cents U.S. I wonder whether the Prime Minister, knowing this information and being concerned about it, as he should be, has had any studies made within his government which would give him reason to believe the dollar will not fall to 79 cents: and if he has carried out these studies, will he make the results available to parliament and to the people of this country?

Mr. Trudeau: On the former matter, the muzzling of parliament, the chairman of the committee is following the business put by the steering committee. If members of the House want to use the steering committee in order to do other things, the president will do his duty and follow the will of the House. The opposition talks about being muzzled. It has a leader who has his tongue in his cheek and his foot in his mouth, and he feels muzzled by himself.

● (1420)

REQUEST FOR AUTHORITY TO MAKE REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also to the Prime Minister. I am sure the Prime Minister has already seen the letter from the chairman of the finance committee addressed to my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley. In that letter the chairman states, and I quote:

> —you seem unaware of the rules governing committees. The committee can only consider matters referred to it by parliament and with no authority from parliament to call such a meeting, I cannot on my own initiative order the clerk, the interpreters, the recording staff or any of our machinery without the authority of parliament.

In view of that committee chairman's clear understanding that he cannot make a reference on monetary matters without the authority of parliament, will the Prime Minister not grant that authority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Bank Act is before the committee with the autority of parliament. If hon. members opposite want to raise a certain matter in the steering committee, we will see that it is proceeded with in the normal way. The governor has been there before. The opposition asked him precise questions on monetary matters, and they were dealt with by the governor.

Mr. Woolliams: They were ruled out of order.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member need only look at the record.

[Mr. Clark.]

INTERVENTION TO SUPPORT CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR DEFINITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, whenever this matter has been raised, our questions have been ruled out of order.

My supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in replying to certain appropriate questions put by my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax, concerning the disappearance of $5 billion of our reserves for the purpose of defending the dollar, which is supposed to be floating, the Minister of Finance stated, as reported at page 2755 of Hansard:

> I have said many times that the governor of the bank intervenes in the marketplace to maintain an orderly market . . . to make sure that there is a normal market.

How does the minister define that intervention, bearing in mind that yesterday and today the Bank of Canada has expended 230 million U.S. dollars in an attempt to defend the dollar, and bearing in mind that that represents 40 per cent of the approximately $500 million loan which has been arranged with Japan? Is that the type of market intervention the minister regards as normal? Has the minister set no limit on the amount the Bank of Canada may expend in defending the dollar?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a habit of throwing out figures which are not accurate. The release of information regarding the use of the reserve during a particular month takes place on the second day of the following month. Information relating to the month of January will be published tomorrow.

The intervention of the bank has been the same since I have been Minister of Finance. I explained yesterday that one of the reasons we have to borrow in foreign markets is that there is a lot of liquidity in Canada. The provinces are not borrowing abroad, and we have decided to substitute for them in that respect. That is why we are borrowing abroad. We want to maintain the flow of capital which is needed because we have a balance of payments deficit.

While I am on my feet I would like to inform the House that never in the steering committee have hon. members asked for the appearance of the governor, who is willing to testify under the auspices of the Bank Act. Last fall we were dealing with borrowing authority, which has no relationship to this problem. Hon. members opposite asked the governor about the monetary policies of the government, and the governor replied to all questions. Hon. members opposite stopped asking questions after a few minutes because they had no more questions to ask.

● (1425)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed again to the Minister of Finance, who knows very well it is not just the governor of the Bank of Canada whom we need before that committee; we need many other witnesses so as to get to the bottom of what is happening to our crumbling dollar.

My final question to the Minister of Finance is as follows. In view of the fact that the dollar has fallen in value approximately 20 per cent in spite of the policies of the government, would the Minister of Finance indicate whether he has any contingency plan which he might invoke if the dollar's retreat is not halted; and second, would he indicate whether he has taken it up with Petro-Canada to see if they will hold back on the purchase of U.S. dollars which is now under way by that Crown corporation in anticipation of the closing of their Pacific Petroleum deal later this month?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that the first question asked by the hon. member is purely speculative and I will not comment on it. I just want to say at this moment that yes, we are willing to go before the committee. Members on this side of the House wanted to have meetings of the committee in the month of January, but it is the hon. member who did not want the committee to meet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Chrétien: It was blocked in December by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are misleading the House.

Mr. Chrétien: He wanted to go on a trip and lose his luggage, and at the same time to invent a new theory—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is not true.

INDUSTRY

PULP AND PAPER—RETENTION OF PERCENTAGE OF PROFITS FOR INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. Just an hour from now the minister will be announcing at a press conference outside of parliamentary scrutiny a multimillion dollar handout for the pulp and paper industry in Canada, which I think is totally irresponsible, instead of bringing the matter before parliament. Considering that the big six in the pulp and paper industry which control most of the industry have made profits in 1977 of $160 million and have just announced a 150 per cent increase in those profits for 1978 up to $379 million, can he tell the House why the government is giving away to this industry many millions of dollars at this time for the development of resources instead of insisting that when they are making profits in the resource sector they must be obligated to hold back for investment in Canada a certain percentage of those profits?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, it is quite correct that the forest products industry in this last year or so has enjoyed a good cash flow and good profits. It is very much related to the temporary situation with regard to the Canadian dollar, a competitive advantage they enjoy now but one which I do not think anyone anticipates may last very long, and one on which they cannot count.

In the meantime, I think everyone who examines this very important industry in terms of the number of jobs it provides in this country, the volume of its export trade in the amount of $8 billion a year, and who examines the significance of this, would realize it is in the Canadian interest to ensure there is investment and modernization of plants, because it is facing severe competition in the longer term from the United States and from other parts of the world. It needs modernization and it needs forest management. All those aspects were recommended by the task force on the forest products industry in which both labour and management joined. We are responding to that and insisting, of course, that any contribution or grant from the government is matched at least three to one by the companies themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I thought that those who believe in the creative private sector, especially spokesmen for the industy themselves, would say that if you are earning profits for whatever reason, you should be ploughing them back into new investments instead of going to the government for handouts.

I should like to ask the minister in all seriousness whether in this context. considering the industry's profits are up 150 per cent, the Government of Canada is saying that the only way to get firms making profits in this sector to invest part of their profits—and I stress in parts of the country that do not rely on regional development, such as many of them do right here in the province of Ontario—is to give them handouts precisely at a time when the federal government is cutting down on health services to hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country?

Mr. Andras: The hon. member is losing track of the ultimate purpose of this which is to maintain and protect, and in fact, we hope, to enhance, employment in this country. This is an industry which is vital to the Canadian economic scene, an industry which is having a temporary respite from very difficult conditions. It is exactly the time to entice them to modernize their plant and equipment. Over the last ten years, their profits have not been sufficiently attractive for them to see an opportunity down the path, compared to other opportunities which they might use, to invest their accumulated capital. This is a great combination of labour, management and the government working together to protect jobs and make the country's industry competitive.

● (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that virtually all Scandinavian countries dealing with forestry management work out long-term agreements with the private sector and make it a condition of earning profits from timber rights, which belong to the people, that they plough back a part of their earned profits into new investment? If the minister is aware of it and is aware that it has worked very well in those countries, why is he giving handouts now to very profitable, large corporations which do not need handouts just before a federal election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, first I should like to deal with the implication of the last comment. This comes about as a result of a consultative process which has been ongoing for many, many months—almost a year—in which representatives of industry, labour and management have made very definite, joint and agreed upon recommendations to the government.

Mr. Broadbent: Labour does not agree with that.

Mr. Andras: As the hon. member knows, forest resources are controlled 90 per cent by provincial governments: the questions of reforestation, timber limits and various matters. We are working this out in co-operation with the provinces across the country. There is no question about the provinces being in agreement. In fact, it is being recommended by Ontario, Quebec and other parts of Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Oh, yes!

Mr. Andras: I think the hon. member is trying to throw a smokescreen over this. In my view we are protecting jobs, and we are hoping to enhance the opportunity of that industry to create more jobs.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE OF VOYAGEUR COLONIAL LTD. DRIVERS—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and has to do with the strike which is affecting the 400 drivers of Voyageur Colonial in Montreal and which is a source of extreme hardship for those living in northern Gaspesia between Gaspé and Rimouski. Because it is the only mode of transportation in that region, because a great many senior citizens and students do not own a car, and because this strike is playing havoc with that part of the province, could the minister advise the House whether he has received information concerning this dispute, whether anybody has asked him to intervene, and whether he intends to step in to resolve this dispute which has lasted too long already?

[English]

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, certainly I understand the hardship being created by this particular dispute in the province of Quebec. I should inform the hon. member that the two parties are meeting again today in the presence of a federal mediator. It would be inappropriate for me to intervene at this time while the parties themselves are trying to resolve their dispute with the assistance of one of my officers.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Does the minister mean to say that if this dispute is not resolved he will not intervene? I think there have been precedents where the Minister of Labour intervened directly to solve a labour dispute.

Mr. O'Connell: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. I said that the two parties have returned to the negotiating table and I hope they will be able to resolve this dispute.

FINANCE

VALUATION OF GOLD RESERVES AT MARKET VALUE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Why does the government not direct the Bank of Canada to value the government gold reserves in the foreign exchange account at market value?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no reason to change the policy.

Mr. Gillies: I am sorry, I did not hear the minister's answer. What was the answer?

Mr. Clark: He said that there is no reason to change the policy. He just does not know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, with a situation where the Canadian dollar has hit the lowest point since 1934, we have been borrowing abroad, and we have no foreign exchange reserves, I would have thought the government would have been interested in looking at some alternative policies.

My supplementary question is: Why does the Minister of Finance not direct the governor of the Bank of Canada to tighten up secondary reserves so that speculators will not be able to do so well speculating against the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised by the question of the hon. member. Yesterday his leader was complaining that there was not enough reserve, and today he is saying that we have an underestimated reserve, because the book value of gold is the same as it was before.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: It is a completly impossible proposition, as all propositions coming from the other side.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the Minister of Finance answers my second question by replying to the first one. If the value of gold was at market price, the government reserves would increase by $3 billion, which is precisely what the United States and other countries have done. It is preposterous that we do not do it.

My supplementary question which the minister did not answer was: Why does the Minister of Finance not recommend the governor of the Bank of Canada tighten up secondary reserves so that there would be less liquidity in the system for foreign exchange dealers to speculate so easily?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the monetary policies of the government have been stated in the House many times.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: They have been stated by the governor of the Bank of Canada many times. I have no intention of giving direction to the governor of the Bank of Canada; he knows how to handle his business very well.

ACTION TO BRING CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT UNDER CONTROL

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. By the way, while there might have been some baggage lost by our party, it is the government that has lost the Canadian dollar, which is not coming back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: That is far more important to the Canadian people than the few pieces of baggage to which the minister referred.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Juvenile asininity.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, there was a $600 million increase only in the trade surplus in 1978, but at the same time the deficit in the balance of payments in the current account is estimated to increase by at least $400 million this year. Since the merchandise surplus will have to increase by at least $1 billion a year to avoid an increase in the current account deficit, how does the minister plan to bring the current account deficit under control? What options is he considering? What action will he take? Never mind the silly baggage to which the minister referred; what will he do about this very serious situation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply by indicating that the Canadian economy performed very well last year; it was a record yearly increase.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We have a surplus of $3.5 million. The Canadian economy has not yet derived all the benefits it is supposed to receive from the more competitive position of the Canadian dollar. I think the hon. member should go back to Newfoundland and talk to the fishermen, the ones who are benefiting very much from the fact that the value of the Canadian dollar has made Canadian fish products much more competitive in world markets.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister said that we have our feet in our mouths. Well, I say that the minister and the department have forked tongues in their mouths.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I would sooner have a foot than a forked tongue in my mouth. Despite the decrease in value of the Canadian dollar by 17 per cent over the last year or year and a half, exports in 1978 increased by 17.2 per cent and imports still rose 17 per cent. So that the dollar, which the minister has smashed down to 82 cents, has still not saved our current account deficit. Will the minister explain how this battered and bruised Canadian dollar that is going down to 79 cents will save us this year when it did not save us on the current account last year, and what does he propose to do? Will the Minister of Finance tell the country what he is going to do and never mind the rigmarole and silly talk?

● (1440)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Canadian economy we know at this moment, as the business community said to the nation last Friday, that many sectors of the economy are operating at full capacity—pulp and paper, steel, fisheries, clothing, shoes and many others. The hon. member should realize that going from a trade balance of $2.9 billion to $3.5 billion is a very nice improvement. I can tell the House that we will do even better this year.

Mr. Fraser: What about your balance of payments account?

Mr. Chrétien: It is very important that we follow the policies we have established and not flip-flop every two months.

Mr. Fraser: Your middle name is flip-flop.

Mr. Chrétien: Two months ago we brought down a responsible budget, and the opposition said that the deficit was too high. Now the Leader of the Opposition has invented a new concept, the phantom deficit which appears and disappears. The country wants steady economic policy, and we are on the right track.

Mr. de Cotret: Steadily down.

Mr. Chrétien: The business community and labour agree with us.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHY CERTAIN GAS COMPANIES REFUSE TO SUPPLY DISTRIBUTORS

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, can the minister inform the House whether he is aware that some gas companies now refuse to deliver heating oil to some distributors because of shortages of the product, they say. Would they not rather be trying to create a strong demand and consequently to raise prices?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have received certain allegations that that kind of situation might develop, partly as a result of the tight supply situation occasioned by the cessation of production by Iran. My department and my parliamentary secretary have been meeting with the companies involved, and I believe that it will be possible to work out a solution which will maintain the source of supply for those marketing companies.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAN—THREATENED DENIAL OF OIL SUPPLIES TO UNITED STATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, before I ask my question I would like to express my thanks to the Minister of Finance, who predicted a change in government in that he said that things are going to be better next year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question is a very serious one, and it is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having regard to the serious situation that has been exacerbated in the last 24 hours in Iran, what has the minister to say concerning the general situation there, particularly with regard to the threat which was made, I believe, this morning to the effect that oil will be denied to the United States? Would he give the House a picture of the situation there and, at the same time, as a suggestion, would it not be a very appropriate time for Canada to show its alliance to the United States by making clear now that if conditions continue as they are predicted to in Iran—that by April the oil shortage will be dangerous to world peace—we will make available large portions of our oil reserves, to the end that in unity we stand together?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain that I can give a total report in the context of the question period. The truth of the matter is, as the right hon. member knows, to put it very simply, that the situation in Iran is far from clear at the moment. The Ayatollah has returned home but he has no official authority. On the other hand, it is obvious that he has an enormous amount of public support.

As of last report, about an hour ago, the prime minister, Mr. Bahktiar, had indicated that he was remaining in office. It appears that he will seek some kind of discussion or meeting with the Ayatollah to see if a compromise can be arrived at. At the moment no one outside the country and very few people within Iran know what the result of the present situation will be. There have been threats, not only with regard to cutting oil supplies to the United States, but to other countries as well, including Israel and South Africa.

I believe it is obvious that, in so far as we in this country are concerned, we will put forth our best efforts, particularly as they relate, as the hon. member has suggested, to the United States; we do not wish to see them penalized in any way. I am not so sure, however, that the answer is a direct exchange or a direct shipment of oil from Canada to the United States. Perhaps it may be within an international context. I can certainly assure the right hon. member and the House that we will be forthcoming to the extent of our ability in diminishing or reducing any of the hardships which proposed actions may create and, of course, we will do whatever we can to resolve the great tension which has come about as a result of this problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister, and I repeat the question. Would this not be an appropriate time to inform the United States of where we stand in this regard, so that that country will realize that united we were in war and united we are today in face of the most perilous situation in the western world in the last three or four years?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that I am at odds with the right hon. member. If he will recall the situation which existed a couple of years ago when severe winter storm conditions caused problems in the United States, we responded with great alacrity and it was appreciated. The message of that action is perfectly clear. To paraphrase a comment which one hears in Canada from time to time, I am quite sure that we would not allow the Americans to freeze in the dark.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

KIRKLAND LAKE, ONT.—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GEOSCIENTIFIC MINERAL SURVEY

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Several months ago a geoscientific mineral survey of the Kirkland Lake area was allotted $2.3 million in a joint arrangement between Ontario and DREE. Would the minister tell the House how soon we can expect a preliminary report, and has it been agreed as to what the use of the survey reports will be?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I hope this report will be submitted to us without delay by those who are drafting it. Once we have examined the report we shall be able to determine what action both governments can take jointly. Of course the studies are being made with the intention of helping industries go into exploration but particularly into mining exploration as such in northern and northeastern Ontario but I think it is too early at this time to indicate what might be the final results of this report.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, as most of the mineral areas around Kirkland Lake are held by private owners, including many of the largest mining companies in Canada, which are showing no interest in gold though the price is at an all time high, will the minister provide leadership by involving the CDD, which now controls Texas Gulf, in a joint venture with the property owners so that employment can be provided and the government can draw benefits from a product that will aid in our balance of payments?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, if the report shows a positive indication of any major resource deposits in that area, namely coal, and if the private companies are not interested in taking advantage of the situation, we along with the provinces will investigate to determine what we can do to entice them, or find some other appropriate means to exploit those resources.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUPPORT FOR CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like a little clarification with regard to some questions I asked yesterday, because I think it is important that the government's dollar policy be understood and, above all, that it be credible. Yesterday the minister said in reply to my question, as reported at page 2755 of Hansard:

> Because we are having this balance of payments problem, we must maintain some inflow of capital. We have borrowed in order to achieve this,—

Will the minister explain why this does not constitute a policy of support for the Canadian dollar and why a policy of borrowing abroad to offset the balance of payments problem is consistent with a floating dollar?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I explained yesterday that because of our balance of payments problems there is constant need for maintaining the level of foreign capital inflow into the country. I also explained that in years past that inflow was ensured by provincial, municipal and private borrowings abroad. Now, this year, as liquid assets are considerable within the Canadian monetary system, the provinces and municipalities do not feel the need to borrow on foreign markets. That is the policy of the government and if the hon. member wants to see it as an intervention in the monetary policy so be it; naturally the balance of payments and the monetary policy cannot be separated, one does not go without the other.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would really like to know whether the Minister of Finance is being stupid or dishonest. I should like him to explain how a deliberate policy of the federal government of borrowing abroad because of a balance of payments problem does not constitute support for the Canadian dollar. Can he explain that?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am very impressed by the humility of the hon. member. I have just said that the policy has been enunciated, that we had decided to borrow abroad. We have not denied that we were borrowing abroad. Of course, we say that the Canadian dollar is a floating currency because we do not want to fix the rate of the currency. We have said many times, however, that the governor of the Bank of Canada has intervened in the market in order to maintain an orderly market, and that is one of the operations.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLIANCE WITH PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS CONDUCT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What steps are now being taken to bring to the direct attention of all foreign-controlled firms the new principles of international business conduct, inasmuch as they were tabled in this House in July, 1975, as a statement of "broad government policy"? I gather from what the Prime Minister said in this House recently that this policy is still in force. When will the minister publish information to update the results of surveys to assess the degree of voluntary compliance with these principles, which in effect call for the application of the FIRA test of "significant benefit" to all foreign controlled companies, including those not covered by that law? I understand that the last of these surveys was published in 1974 for the years 1971-72. Finally, will the government soon be taking steps—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased, and I know my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is particularly pleased, that the press had found out about the business conduct guidelines which the minister enunciated a number of years ago. We intend to make certain that companies operating in Canada adhere to those guidelines and, in fact, we are taking a close look at that specific area in the hope that we can multiply them to improve the benefits to Canada from them.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF RATIONALE FOR FAMILY EXPENDITURES SURVEY

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is responsible for Statistics Canada. The question relates to the StatsCan survey of family spending habits, which constitutes an intolerable invasion of personal privacy.

In view of statements made this morning on national television by the deputy chief statistician for Statistics Canada to the effect that Canadians could be prosecuted under the Statistics Act for refusing to co-operate in this tedious inquisition—which amounts to 45 pages of questions and three hours of work—will the minister advise this House as to the rationale for such a frivolous and costly project at a time when the government needs to borrow billions just to supply essential services?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Actually, Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada has been cut back substantially and in terms of personnel and funding available to it I think it is doing a very good job. That particular survey is one which is carried out from time to time to ascertain the spending habits of the Canadian people. I think StatsCan expressed the view that about 80 per cent of the people surveyed quite readily filled out the questionnaire. The remaining people were not pressed and the department more than likely went on to another person rather than use the power it has under the Statistics Act.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, if this survey is needed for purposes of determining incremental effects on the consumer price index, why can the information not be obtained much more cheaply by reference to the wholesalers and retailers of the country, instead of sampling every twenty-eighth recipient of family allowances and threatening prosecution under the Statistics Act?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, nobody is threatening prosecution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: It is a power that government gives to StatsCan so that they can make an accurate survey. In this particular case it is far more useful to ascertain the spending habits of people rather than what wholesalers sell to the country at large.

RAILWAYS

HALL COMMISSION—INQUIRY WHEN ACTION WILL BE TAKEN ON RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As the minister is aware, about one and a half years ago the Hall commission recommended for the CNR's Inwood subdivision, in the Interlake area of Manitoba, that either this line be abandoned and a spur line built across to the CPR line at Arborg, or alternatively, that grain be trucked some 40 miles to Arborg from the elevators at Fisher Branch on the Inwood line as an off-line loading experiment.

In view of the fact that almost two years have gone by since these recommendations were made, could the minister tell the House and the people in that district when the government is going to take action on the Hall recommendations and which one it is likely to adopt? The farmers of the district would like to know.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Prairie Rail Action Committee looked at some of these questions which were left unresolved by the Hall commission. It examined the "off-line" elevator concept in connection with its other work, as we have also done internally. The proposals now have to be examined from the point of view of alternatives. I anticipate that within the next three or four weeks the government will make a decision on the question of trucking assistance of a variety of kinds. That should affect the Fisher Branch situation.

COMPUTER COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF ADEQUATE SAFEGUARDS TO PREVENT INVASIONS OF PRIVACY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board who is responsible to parliament for setting government-wide standards for security on electronic data processing. In view of the fact that one expert who is here today, Professor Eric Manning of the University of Waterloo computer science department, has stated that the government's safeguards on the networking of computers are so lax that massive invasions of personal privacy will be possible in the near future, can the minister assure the House that no further networking of government computers will take place until such times as adequate safeguards have been put in place?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we have investigated these uses of government computers but we have a limited role as far as that is concerned. Our investigation shows that a series of applications has been made to us in the last little while, all of which have been examined carefully and did not involve any further extension or any further invasion of privacy as far as additional uses were concerned. We are endeavouring to monitor things, as far as the use of the SIN number is concerned; and I would take issue with the assertion made by the professor.

● (1500)

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, unlike the President of the Treasury Board, Professor Manning is an expert in the field.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It relates to the use of the social insurance number. In view of the fact that Professor Manning has stated that the spreading use of the social insurance number as a computer filing number greatly facilitates invasions of personal privacy and that "until we have proper laws to regulate the use of information, the use of social insurance numbers should be pared right back", will the minister act now to put a stop to the proliferating use of the social insurance number?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have in the past answered a series of questions in this area. I have indicated that under the human rights legislation specific provision was made giving authority to the President of the Treasury Board to monitor the use that is made of social insurance numbers to determine if there is in fact any invasion of privacy.

In addition to that, although it is probably not technically within the responsibility of the department, I have indicated that I intend to ask the advisory council to look at the issuance of social insurance numbers so that we can have any recommendations they might wish to make.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKINNON—PROCEEDINGS DURING DEBATE ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) raised a point of order with respect to the reporting of the adjournment debate on Tuesday evening in Hansard. I have checked the record and have determined that the Hansard recording of the events which took place on Tuesday evening is accurate.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WENMAN—CANADA COUNCIL ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have given you notice of my question of privilege, although following the last several days of question period I am tempted to raise another one. I have given notice of my intention to raise the question regarding the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts).

Section 23 of the Canada Council Act specifically states that the chairman of the council must submit an annual report to the Secretary of State and, I quote, "provision shall be made for a review thereof (of the annual report) by parliament". To date there has been no review of the Canada Council's annual report or of the council's mandate. Of course, when the estimates of the Secretary of State's department are before the appropriate standing committee, the Canada Council and its staff respond to various questions put forth. The Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts has, however, never had the council's annual report referred to it, nor has there been a review by parliament as legislated by the House of Commons.

There are several pieces of legislation which place similar demands upon the government as found in clause 23 of the Canada Council Act.

Section 46 of the Anti-Inflation Board Act obliged the government, if it wished to extend the controls period beyond their December 31 expiry date, to present a motion on the order in council which would outline the extension. Clearly if the order in council was given to extend the controls, then three days hence a motion would have been laid before parliament.

Section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act states:

> The House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the expiration of that period that the House of Commons is sitting, take up the motion and consider the matter of the objective.

Clearly, if the procedure in section 20 of this legislation is followed through, the House of Commons must debate that motion.

Finally, section 18(2) of the Government Organization Act obligates a member of the Queen's Privy Council to propose a motion in the House when the governor in council creates a new ministry of state by order in council.

If the government chose not to fulfil the obligations in the above pieces of legislation it would be an indisputable breach of privilege. I, along with other members, would not be able to discharge my duties in this House.

On June 27 in the House of Commons I brought to the attention of the Secretary of State the provision for the review within the legislation and asked him if he would refer the annual report to a parliamentary committee. The Secretary of State replied:

> I would have absolutely no objection to such a course of action, if the members of the committee express their desire to meet through the chairman, and that such should take place.

Immediately I sent a memo to all members of parliament asking them if they felt there should be a review of the Canada Council. I asked for these memos to be returned to my office. Members from all sides of the House were in support that the legislation should be followed and that a review should take place. I forwarded copies of the memos to the Secretary of State and asked him to sponsor in the House the necessary order of reference to the committee so that I might discharge my duty. The minister responded that the request should be placed before the steering committee. The matter of the review was brought up before the steering committee, as suggested by the minister, and support was indicated there for review as well.

Subsequently at the November 23 meeting of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the Secretary of State said:

—I would be reluctant to recommend to the committee that they undertake a study simply of the Canada Council.

After this circuitous route the Secretary of State finally indicated that he has no intention of sponsoring the needed order of reference. This is the "normal" course that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to earlier! There should be ways in this House of Commons that we can have an opportunity to express our point of view and debate the issues at hand.

I am not debating the failure of the committee structure. I am only telling you, sir, that I have followed all courses open to a private member, in order to bring this matter before the House of Commons, and I have found them closed. The last remaining route is this area of privilege where the Secretary of State is in contempt of the House of Commons by not fulfilling his legislative duty under section 23 of the Canada Council Act.

It amazes me that in less than four months the Secretary of State would have such a dramatic change of opinion from saying, "Yes, I agree. I will make the reference." Then, following through the procedure, he has once again thwarted the role of parliament according to the statutes of Canada.

The Secretary of State is treating artists like children by allowing his cabinet colleague—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a point under the heading of privilege which relates to his ability to examine this report by the Secretary of State. He may have other opportunities to critize the Secretary of State, or others. However, I think the hon. member should stick with the basic merits of the argument.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, the Canada Council's legislation makes it very clear that it is the duty of parliament, that is, that members undertake a review of the Canada Councils' annual report. The government's lack of provision for such a review prevents me from carrying out my duties in the House of Commons as the elected member for Fraser Valley West. The Canada Council Act obligates parliament to review the annual report. Admittedly the obligation is unique in this legislation, but the Canada Council's connection to parliament is unique and therein lies the reason for this review. The minister has broken his word to parliament and to the member for Fraser Valley West. He is, in my opinion, in contempt of the legislative direction of parliament thereby preventing the member for Fraser Valley West, as well as other members, from expressing their points of view on such a review.

[Mr. Wenman.]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to comment on the allegations made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman). It seems to me that the hon. member has confused two questions, and as a result it has lead to erroneous conclusions. The first is the question of the obligations imposed on the Secretary of State by section 23 of the Canada Council Act. The motion of the hon. gentleman refers to the refusal of the Secretary of State to fulfil the obligation conferred by section 23. If members of the House were kind enough to read section 23 of the Canada Council Act they would see that the obligation referred to in section 23 is an obligation which attaches to the chairman of the council, not to the Secretary of State.

I would be pleased to transfer to the House a report of the Canada Council. Indeed I do transfer to the House reports of the various agencies which report to parliament through me as soon as I receive them. However, I cannot perform the deliverance of that which I do not have, and I do not have the report of the Canada Council. If there is a failure of obligation under section 23 of the Canada Council Act, it lies not on the part of the Secretary of State but on the part of the Canada Council which is not yet finished that report.

The second matter, which is a distinct and different matter, to which the hon. member has referred, is the question of whether the House or, more specifically, the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts should conduct an inquiry into the operations of the Canada Council. I have said in the past that it is not for me to direct the members of the committee as to how they should work. The proper course of action for a member who wishes to see a certain matter discussed by a committee is to address that question to the steering committee so that the steering committee may consider the matter and make whatever recommendation it desires.

Whether the hon. member accumulates a petition, with goodness knows how many names of members of the House who are concerned to have that happen, is not strictly speaking relevant in that manner. What is relevant is that the steering committee make a recommendation. If that is the concern the member has, that such an inquiry should be undertaken, he should not take his concern to me but to the steering committee and ask that committee, via the chairman, to make a recommendation to me.

If he were to say to me, do I think this is a good moment to undertake such a review, I would say to the hon. member, as I have said to him, frankly, no. The reason why it is not at this time especially appropriate to undertake such a review is that we have under way, as the hon. member knows, in the Department of Secretary of State, a review of the government's cultural policy, our strategy of funding to the arts. It would seem to be much more valuable to the members of the committee to look at the Canada Council and its operations in that larger context which I hope will be available soon, and available to members of the committee soon. A useful discussion of the Canada Council in isolation from that wider perspective should not be undertaken at this point.

The hon. member, as a member of that committee, and in fact all members of the committee, do now and have always had the opportunity to cross-examine the Canada Council on its operations when the estimates in the normal way are before the committee. That right, duty, and obligation have not been taken away from the committee. They are still there. The possibility of the hon. member throwing himself fully into that work, as he has done in the past, is still there. There is no lack of opportunity to examine the Canada Council and its operations in the normal process.

If the hon. member is asking whether we should have a special inquiry, I say that is not the best thing to undertake at this time given the fact there is a more general review under way which will be a more suitable framework for discussing this question, and the question of artistic policy generally.

To sum up what I have said, if his complaint is that I have not ordered, asked for, or agreed to an insurance of instruction to the committee, to undertake an examination of the Canada Council, I would say that is so. It is not primarily my responsibility to take that position. I do not think it would be a wise action to take at this time for the reasons I have just discussed. That may be a matter of debate between the hon. member and myself. However, if his question is whether I have somehow slighted him and the House in general by a failure to meet the obligation of section 23, I must point out that the obligations of section 23 of the act refer not to me but to the members of the Canada Council.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment briefly on the first part and the last part of the minister's comments. He introduced a notion which must be challenged immediately and tossed out. In essence, the minister told the House that, as the minister responsible to parliament for the Canada Council, he cannot be held responsible for the fact that the head of the Canada Council might not obey the law passed by parliament in respect of the operations of that council.

I submit, if that argument is allowed to stand and accepted, it throws quite a different light on the question of ministerial responsibility. There is no way parliament can get at the Canada Council to hold it responsible except through the responsible minister. It is most inappropriate for the minister to stand up and say he may be the minister responsible for the Canada Council, but do not hold him responsible if the head of the Canada Council does not obey the law under which it operates.

Mr. Speaker: For the moment, I have considered the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman). The motion he would move, and of which he gave me notice, is relative to the refusal of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) to fulfil his obligation pursuant to section 23, and the obligation to ensure that this House is provided with an opportunity to review the annual report of the Canada Council. That is the basis of his question of privilege, as I understand it, both from his remarks and from the text of the motion of which he has given me notice.

For the moment the Secretary of State has put that point to rest because he has indicated he does not have the report. I must accept his word. If he does not have the report, he obviously cannot refer it to the House. If the report is in his hands at a later time, or if in fact there is some action to be taken against the chairman for failing to file the report with the Secretary of State, that may be so.

The essence of the hon. member's question of privilege at this time is the refusal of the Secretary of State to ensure examination of the report by parliament. The minister told the House today, and I must accept it, that he does not have the report and therefore cannot ensure that at this time. There may be other matters the hon. member may wish to raise on further investigation. However, for the moment any question of privilege which is today related to a refusal of the Secretary of State has to be set aside subject, of course, upon further examination by the hon. member, to any action which might relate to a failure on the part of the chairman and the council itself.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to exchanges that occurred during the course of the question period between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). They had to do with the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and its jurisdiction with regard to the question of interest rates and the policy of this parliament to examine the fiscal and monetary policies of the government, notwithstanding the fairy tales that we have heard about the goodness of that policy from the Minister of Finance.

I raise this because the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), is now in the chamber. Unfortunately he was not here during the course of today's question period. Therefore we could not put to him directly the matter of the exchange of correspondence between members of the official opposition and himself as chairman with regard to convening a meeting of the committee to deal with the Bank of Canada, the governor of the Bank of Canada, and interest rates.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) has been referred to as one of the addressees of the letter from the committee chairman. I joined the hon. member for Don Valley in directing the original letter to the committee chairman on January 10, 1979, asking that that committee be convened as quickly as possible. I was chided on my knowledge of the rules, that the committee could only consider matters referred to it by parliament. I was told I should know that, as well as the fact the committee chairman had no authority to call a meeting of the committee. The House has been left in that position.

The country may have been left with the impression that during the appearances of the governor of the Bank of Canada at three meetings prior to the Christmas adjournment it would have been within the rules and quite proper for the governor to have been examined with regard to the policy of the Bank of Canada, interest rates, the floating dollar, the differential in interest rates between Canada and the United States, the effect of such differential on the international flow of funds, and a host of other matters such as unemployment.

The reference the committee had at that time was clearly to examine the subject matter of the Bank Act. If we had thought it proper to have that new subject bootlegged into a discussion of the Bank Act and thought that the chairman, who knows the rules of that committee, would have allowed that line of questioning, of course that would have been done. It would have been absolutely inappropriate. The chairman knows this to be the case and he indicated as much in his letter. The chairman knew it would be quite inappropriate for any questions to be asked during those sittings of the committee.

As a result of that, and as a result of a series of increases in the bank rate and the effect they are having on the economy—and despite what the Minister of Finance says, the effect is devastating and is reflected in the level of the Canadian dollar today—we asked the chairman of the committee to convene a meeting of the standing committee. His reply to us was correct, I think, from a procedural point of view. He said he could not do so on his own initiative. He said the committee could only consider matters referred to it by parliament and that, in the absence of authority from parliament to call such a meeting, he could not do so on his own initiative. He is not under the thumb of the government—I assume he is not, because he went on to say that this matter could be raised in the House of Commons and, for his part, he would welcome such an initiative. I asssume the situation is not so improved that the initiative he said he would welcome on January 12 would not be equally welcome now that we have returned to Ottawa. Well, we have renewed that initiative in asking for a special reference to that committee.

The chairman of the standing committee is in the House today, having been absent from the question period at which time we might have put questions to him directly. When inquiring as to the order of business we could have asked him whether or not it is his intention to screw up his courage and request the Prime Minister to make the reference for which we have been pressing—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that, while he may have an interesting argument to advance, it is not a point of order. The question could have been put to the chairman of the committee under the rules during the question period, because questions related to committees can be put to committee chairmen at that time; that is part of our practice. But for me to permit a line of questioning to take place now under the guise of a point of order would be to invite, every day, an extension of the question period on the same basis, and I cannot find a way under the rules of doing it.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—PROPOSED PRESS CONFERENCE TO BE HELD BY MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It relates to the action which the hon. gentleman who is President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) proposes to take this afternoon when he tables the response of the government to the recommendations of the consultative task force on the Canadian shipbuilding and repair industry. I submit it is entirely wrong from a procedural point of view. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) plans to hold a press conference after he has tabled this document; the press will be able to ask questions and discuss that government's response to the recommendations, or lack of it. I maintain this should be done by way of a ministerial statement in the House which would provide an opportunity to members to ask questions and discuss what the government is doing or not doing with reference to that task force report.

I want to protest the lack of courtesy and the lack of consideration we are shown as critics on this side of the House in connection with matters like this. We should receive copies of these submissions earlier. I got one from another member on our side who somehow received a copy—I presume we cannot talk about it until the minister tables it. I want to protest the lack of courtesy and consideration shown to me by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as the critic on this side for matters within this field. Considering he was in opposition for 16 or 20 years, the way he treats us on this side of the House is abominable. We never get advance notice of anything from him, nothing is ever arranged so that we get information ahead of time.

My question of privilege is this: the privileges of members of the House are being abused by the minister tabling a statement which we cannot comment upon here, and then going outside the House and discussing it with the press at a press conference at which we will not be heard, either.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) raises a familiar question of privilege related to the action of ministers making statements elsewhere. I say it is familiar, because it is as old as the history of parliament. The precedents are clear. Ministers enjoy the right to make statements either here or outside the House; it does not constitute a question of privilege for a minister to make a statement outside the chamber.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. KAPLAN—STATEMENTS CONCERNING MEMBER'S LETTERS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, statements have been made here in the House during and after the question period concerning letters I have written and my intention with respect thereto, and whether I am an independent member of parliament or under the thumb of the government. I should like to comment on the remarks which have been made. I feel I ought to have the opportunity to reply—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member's desire to respond to the point which was raised on a point of order, but it was not a point of order and I am not able to give the hon. member an opportunity now.

MR. MARTIN—STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with the subject matter of an exchange today between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on the issue of the finance committee and the work before it. I simply wish to make the point that the question of the appearance of the governor of the Bank of Canada was never brought before the steering committee, which is the normal place to discuss the appearance of witnesses who might or might not be called before standing committees. The issue was never raised either in the steering committee or in the full committee. The governor did, in fact, appear on one occasion on November 28, and I never—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Members on both sides can surely understand that these are disputes either with regard to the content of questions or about answers given to those questions. We cannot carry on a debate like this under the guise of a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to try to upstage the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), but today is Thursday and I wonder whether we could be told the business of the House for the rest of this week and the first part of next week.

Business of the House

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue today with Bill C-9, the referendum bill, and after its completion, hopefully today, we would take up Bill C-2 having to do with the Health Resources Fund, for third reading. Then we would move to Bill C-12, second reading, amendments to various superannuation acts, following which we would take up Bill C-37, amendments to tax legislation and the Canada Pension Plan and providing borrowing authority. Next Friday, February 9, by agreement, we will be calling an opposition day. In the interim—I put this slightly out of sequence because we are not certain of the order—we would like to deal with Bill C-35; presumably an agreement, a House order, could be arrived at to dispose of this measure expeditiously. Of course, we also continue to have an interest in Bill C-29, amendments to the National Housing Act.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for his very complete answer to the question. As he knows, I sent him a note during the question period indicating the questions I would put to him. He has had time to prepare his answer, and I appreciate it.

Mr. Nystrom: Why not thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I also thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am somewhat disappointed with the hon. member's answer, however. Perhaps he could consider with the government House leader the obvious importance of the question of the reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, to which reference was made earlier, in order that the governor of the Bank of Canada could be examined for the purpose of explaining to the people of the country the policy behind the moves which have done nothing but raise interest rates and cause hardship—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Given the exchanges which have taken place, I wonder whether the deputy House leader would undertake to consult with the chairman of the standing committee or with the government House leader, the Deputy Prime Minister, (Mr. MacEachen), to see whether such a reference might be made and this matter dealt with.

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would undertake to do that. I have already discussed this matter with the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and confirmed to my satisfaction that no request has ever been made directly before that committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: There seems to be some dispute. I realize there has been an exchange of letters but I am assured that no formal request has been made directly to the steering committee or to the full committee. I understand that there is going to be a meeting of the steering committee this afternoon, very shortly. I am quite sure that this matter will be dealt with and that a decision will be made. I feel confident that the steering committee and the full committee are capable of dealing with this question adequately, but if there is a disposition by the steering committee and the full committee that they do not have the capacity to deal with the questions which they want to bring forward, I am sure that the matter could be dealt with further. However, I have no doubt that they have full and complete power to deal with all the questions hon. members want to put to any witnesses which are relevant to banking in Canada.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—ANSWER GIVEN BY PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT MINISTERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from an answer given earlier in this House by the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) in response to a question I put to him. Your Honour will recall that earlier I was objecting to the fact that the Government of Canada was giving to the pulp and paper industry hundreds of millions of dollars precisely at a time when this industry experienced an increase in profits of about 150 per cent. This industry does not need any handouts.

In his reply the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers said that the government was responding to a report which had been endorsed by government, by the private sector, and by the workers involved. I was a little surprised when I heard that because I had been in touch with some of those people, and the minister's response certainly did not square with what I understood. So, during the question period I obtained a copy of the report which has been tabled, and on the last page of the report under the title "Membership of the Forest Products Industry Consultative Task Force" there is a footnote, and the footnote reads as follows:

Mr. L. H. Lorrain was unable to agree with substantial parts of the task force report.

Mr. L. H. Lorrain happens to be the head of the largest union representing paper workers in Canada. He is the principal spokesman on the task force for workers, and he flatly disagrees with this report, as he will be saying in a press conference this afternoon.

I suggest that the minister either deliberately or inadvertently misinformed the House because his own task force report says something completely contrary to what he told the House earlier today.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, in response to the point raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) I will simply indicate that the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) cannot, unfortunately, be here at this moment. I would like, on his behalf, to reserve an opportunity to respond to the important point which has been raised by the hon. member, and the minister will do so tomorrow.

Question No. 638—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the Minister of National Defence state before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on March 18, 1977, that the distribution of the new fighter aircraft would be approximately 50 for Europe, 55 for North American Air Defence and about 25 for the North flank and, if so (a) how many would be used for training (b) will the balance be enough to maintain prudent minimum defensive capabilities and to ensure sovereign surveillance and control of Canada's airspace?

2. Can the roles which the NFA will be required to fulfill be arranged in order of priority and, if so, what are they?

3. Of the six planes examined by the NFA Project Office (a) which have the capability to destroy Air Launched Cruise Missiles (b) which in existing configurations can work with Airforce Warning and Control Systems (AWACS)?

4. Depending on which plane finally wins the NFA contract, does the government contemplate asking NATO for a change of our air role in Europe?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

(a) Eighteen to twenty-four aircraft will be used for training depending on the type and number of aircraft purchased.

(b) Yes. Considering the multi-role capabilities of the contenders a dual tasking posture is possible where, for example, training aircraft could be operationally assigned to NORAD or NATO and some sovereignty aircraft could be additionally tasked with the north flank commitment.

2. No. In the event of an emergency, priorities could be established depending on the nature of the emergency and the perceived threat. This flexibility is made possible by the multi-role capabilities of the contenders.

3. (a) All NFA contenders have a capability to destroy a cruise missile.

(b) All NFA contenders will be capable of operating with the airborne warning and control system (AWACS).

4. Currently, there are no plans for a change of the air role capability and the two finalists ensure flexibility, if required.

EXCHANGE RATE FLUCTUATIONS ON CONTRACTS

Question No. 642—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the ADM Material indicate to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on March 14, 1978, that an effort is made to include exchange rate fluctuations in the calculation of the escalation factor on capital purchases and, if so, by what percentage was it anticipated that the Canadian dollar would be devalued or revalued over the life of the contract against the (a) American dollar for the LRPA contract (b) deutschmark for the tank contract (c) Swiss franc for the AVGP contract?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes.

(a) and (b) Inclusion of exchange rate fluctuations in the calculations of escalation factors for the capital program is a recent innovation, and at the time the LRPA and tank contracts were negotiated, currency fluctuation was not considered to be a problem. Consequently, the LRPA and tank contracts did not include a forecast of currency fluctuations.

(c) Since the AVGP project was approved in constant dollars, based on the current DND economic model, which now caters to both inflation and currency fluctuations, it was not considered necessary to forecast currency fluctuation for this contract.

PARACHUTES

Question No. 706—Mr. Jones:

1. Where is the Canadian parachute training school?

2. Are there facilities in Edmonton for packing parachutes?

3. Is parachute jumping a part of the exercises at Petawawa?

4. Are parachutes dried and packed at Petawawa, and if not, where are they packed? What is the cost of transporting the parachutes to Petawawa, if they are not folded there?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Canadian Forces Base Edmonton, Alberta.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. Only on rare occasions. Generally, parachutes are packed at the Canadian Forces Parachute Maintenance Depot, Edmonton, Alberta. The approximate cost of moving parachutes between Edmonton and Petawawa for the period 1 Dec. 77—1 Dec. 78 was $75,000.

CENTRES OF EXCELLENCE

Question No. 747—Mr. Howie:

Since June 1, 1978, how many applications were received by the (a) Ministry of State for Science and Technology (b) Treasury Board, for designation as Centres of Excellence?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology and Treasury Board as follows:

(a) Since June 1978, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology has received a total of 44 proposals and inquiries regarding Centres of Excellence. Of this total, 11 were in the form of applications, 27 were written requests for information or statements of intent and 6 were made by telephone of through meetings with ministry officials (see list below).

(b) Treasury Board has received no formal applications in this regard. Any informal inquiries would have been redirected to the Ministry of State for Science and Technology.

June 1, 1978—December 31, 1978

Order Paper Questions

SMALL BUSINESS FINANCE PROJECTS—RICHMOND

Question No. 835—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Ministry of State (Small Business) finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Ministry planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. The only applicable program would be the Small Business Intern Program. The "SBIP" was initiated in July 1978 with a budget of $5.4 million and it is funded by the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission and administered through the regional offices of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce with guidance from the department's small business secretariat. The objective of the program is to help create new positions in small businesses for unemployed graduates of community colleges and universities.

To date, a total of 132 new positions have been created in small businesses in the province of Quebec under this program. Regional breakdowns within a province are not available.

2. Not applicable.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 840—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

1. Project and Area

	Fiscal Years
	73/74 $	74/75 $	75/76 $	76/77 $	77/78 $	78/79 $
Program to Assist Footwear and Tanning Industries ($61,952)

2. (a) $7,872

[Mr. Pinard.]

(b) Program to Assist Footwear and Tanning Industries—Richmond.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK—N.B.

Question No. 895—Mr. Howie:

On April 1, 1978, how many (a) offices (b) employees of the Federal Business Development Bank were located in New Brunswick?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: four offices and 35 employees of the Federal Business Development Bank were located in New Brunswick on April 1, 1978.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PATTERSON—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 180

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary a question standing on the order paper in my name, and numbered 180. This question first appeared on the order paper in January of last year. I do not think it is very controversial, and I cannot understand why, after over a year, it still has not been answered. I think I have been relatively patient, but I ask the parliamentary secretary if he would make a special inquiry to ascertain the reason for the delay in answering question No. 180.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to look into the matter as requested by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I gave Your Honour notice that I planned to move a motion under Standing Order 26.

This week the Canadian dollar has entered a state of renewed and greater crisis. Yesterday the value of the dollar on international money markets reached its lowest level since April, 1933. In view of the serious and escalating problems this is causing the Canadian economy, and in view of the urgent need to deal with the situation before it deteriorates even further, it is absolutely critical that this House discuss the implications and consequences of this situation and hear from the government about its plans and remedies to overcome the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will know that in raising this matter pursuant to Standing Order 26, of which he has given me notice as he has said, he is raising again for the Chair a very difficult problem because the provisions of Standing Order 26 require some initial decision on the part of the Chair as to whether the matter is in fact, as described in the language of paragraph 16(a) of the Standing Order, a genuine emergency.

I want to refer to some language I have used previously. On January 24, 1977, a matter was raised with respect to unemployment levels. On December 6, 1977, the matter of unemployment conditions was again raised in an application pursuant to this rule. While I will not bore the House with the details of my language at those times, it related to the fact that this was a chronic problem in the country regarding an aspect of the economy, and as a chronic problem it ought not to be considered as the kind of emergency which is the proper subject of applications pursuant to Standing Order 26.

I said the same thing with respect to the value of the dollar, which surely falls under the same general condition.

However, I am sure the hon. member will know that on February 22 of last year, pursuant to a joint application by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I reviewed all the provisions of this standing order and this same application with respect to the level of the dollar at that time. I then concluded that all other conditions with respect to this standing order had been fulfilled, and having some doubt as to whether this matter at that time constituted the kind of emergency envisaged by the standing order I extended the benefit of that doubt to the hon. members and granted a debate.

I now must consider the matter again as a result of the application by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I did so in February of last year and departed for that one time from this line of reasoning. I think I have highlighted the difficulty the Chair is placed under with respect to chronic problems in the country when they are made the subject matter of applications pursuant to this standing order. The Chair is obviously put into the invidious position of saying, for example, "If 7 per cent unemployment is a chronic problem, does 8 per cent become an emergency?" The level of the dollar has been at 83 cents, 84 cents or 85 cents. Does a further one cent drop constitute a continuing chronic economic problem in the country, or does it at a certain level become a crisis or an emergency which should be the subject matter of an application pursuant to this standing order? I think the hon. member and other hon. members will understand that this is not the kind of decision the Chair can make with any more precision than the House.

I do not think the purpose of the standing order was to expect the Chair at some point in respect of a chronic problem to say it has suddenly become bad enough today, or as a result of yesterday's figures, or of a consumer price index release, that a problem which has been with us throughout our history in various degrees suddenly should become the subject of an emergency application. Although I allowed that one exception, because I fell strongly that if this order is part of our standing orders I should not take a position which totally frustrates the operation of the order because, as members will realize, and as I said at that time, when the House turns its mind to a debate pursuant to the standing order, it has an immediacy and a relevance that often the other labours which we put into our legislative timetable lack because of pressures of time and so on. Therefore, I am sympathetic, as I was on that occasion, but I do not think I will continue to make that kind of a decision on a chronic problem, and therefore under these circumstances I say that I do not accept the application at this time.

I wish to say also at this time that subparagraph (5) of the standing order requires me to take into account the opportunity that the House has had in this session, and ones it will have in this session, to examine this problem. I can scarcely overlook the fact that it was not only discussed on several days as part of the question period—I have tried to take a generous attitude toward questions on this subject because of its importance—but was also discussed extensively in the throne speech debate and in the budget debate which was concluded on November 24, which is recent. There are a number of opposition days. I do not like to say how they should be used, but they do present opportunities. So I cannot say that opportunities for a debate on this subject do not present themselves in other ways. So, in general, I have to set the hon. member's application aside.

MR. ALEXANDER—POST OFFICE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up a point of order with Your Honour regarding the question raised yesterday in which the hon. member referred to CUPW. At that particular time the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) accepted that that was the postal union inasmuch as his answer to the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) came after the hon. member had referred to CUPW. The answer of the Postmaster General was as follows:

Mr. Speaker, this question has been drawn to my attention. The position of my department was that it was an internal matter with the postal union.

So I think it was a mix up, but I just wanted to say that my remarks regarding the question of privilege with reference to that union of course were in error because I was following the sequence of events and we were talking about another union, CUPW, which was not the union involved. Therefore, my remarks should be taken in that way, but keeping in mind the fact that the point which was raised by me still stands because we were talking about postal workers who were undergoing harassment from which they should be protected in terms of government statements made during the postal dispute.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed from Wednesday, January 31, 1979, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to resume from yesterday my comments in connection with Bill C-9 which is, in my opinion, one of the most negative ever introduced in the House of Commons. It has been motivated by fear. The government is fearful and, not unlike the events in October 1970, it would like to stir up another crisis but in a different way. With Bill C-9, the confrontation is restricted to Canada, our country.

There are some points in that bill which I would like to raise. It gives a discretionary and discriminatory authority to the government to choose the provinces where in theory a referendum could be held. This means that the bill would not necessarily have a national scope or fall under a truly federal jurisdiction. If it were passed, it would be possible to decide as early as tomorrow to hold a referendum in four Canadian provinces and then on the basis of the results obtained try to enforce a particular decision on that province. This is certainly one of the dangers of this bill. Moreover, the government comes up with a rather doubtful argument to the effect that when the referendum takes place in Quebec, the Parti Québécois could bias the question and phrase it in such a way that people might not exactly understand its meaning. As far as this is concerned, let me refer to the question which was asked during the 1942 plebiscite held by a Liberal government. The question was not particularly clear and I suggest there is no guarantee that the question asked on a federal referendum would be any clearer. In 1942 the question was as follows: Would you agree to discharge the government from any obligation resulting from previous commitments restricting the mobilization procedures for military service? No reference whatsoever was made to conscription. Yet, we all know that this plebiscite was held with a view to drafting Canadians into the armed forces, but it was put in milder terms to entice people into supporting conscription in Canada. We all know what the outcome was. The province of Quebec alone voted against conscription, all the others were in favour. Maybe the English version was clearer. Who knows! That is one of the dangers. We cannot assume that the federal government will necessarily be more honest than the Parti Québécois in Quebec in the way the question will be put. There is a danger of distorting the question. We are assuming that that is what Quebec will do. But Quebec can also assume that we, the federal government, will do the same. We are knee-deep in assumptions.

Also, this legislation is restrictive to an extent. It authorizes referenda only on constitutional matters. Why not other issues such as capital punishment, social policy? We could even go one better, like some countries and some American states, into tax fields, taxation, the people could be consulted on those issues as well. Also, this bill does not allow a citizen to ask for a referendum.

A province is not allowed to pressure the federal level to a referendum. Neither is a group of citizens. Only the governor in council may request a referendum at the federal level. This limits the will of the citizens. I think that such a possibility in Bill C-9 might be more palatable than the restrictive measures which exist now. I suggest the government should consider changing its bill to include at least part of what the opposition is seeking. I feel the federal government exists to maintain harmony in the interest of all Canadians and that it should take into account any constructive suggestion made by the opposition. And I hope that when we reach the committee stage, it will introduce amendments or at least propose some changes to this bill.

There is another clause in the bill which limits the broadcasting time allocated to the federal government and federal and provincial parties to three and one-quarter hours. I must admit that at first sight it does not seem too fair to me. There is a fairly large number of provincial parties across Canada and the air time allotted to those parties will be very restricted. This legislation goes even further when it provides that a party with one member sitting in a provincial legislature will be recognized as a political party. This is not recognized at the federal level but only at the provincial level. They want to divide and rule. There is a danger in monopolizing air time: the federal government could then make a national issue out of it. But if a province or a provincial political party is against the option, it would be restricted within a small region to express its views. This is not giving equal opportunities to all.

One thing that is often forgotten is that if we have a federal parliament, a federal government, it is because there are provinces, and if all the provinces decided overnight to become a specific entity, a separate country, there would be no more federal government. If the federal government were to disappear, the provinces would remain. I think the essence of the Canadian confederation was precisely to acknowledge particular entities, provinces with specific areas of jurisdiction which decided to pool some sectors of activity saying: we will create a central government with powers to administer jurisdictions of our own choosing.

In 1968, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected because he promised to solve national unity problems. Well, if national unity problems have been solved, I wonder in what sector it happened. Things are worsening on the constitutional side because of the adamant attitude of the Liberal government. It does not seem that our Prime Minister wants to reverse this situation. He is chiefly responsible for the state of crisis we are experiencing now and now he will go before the Canadian people pretending to be the saviour of the nation. Some saviour!

In the ten years he has been in power he has tried everything to reduce the jurisdiction of the provinces, to centralize at the federal level, and this loss of powers has gradually led us to the present crisis which we are now trying to solve by means of national confrontation within Canada.

I suggest we should seriously, in our conscience, think that the Fathers of Confederation did not want a divided country, they tried to build a united country by establishing a fair and equitable division of powers. We are no longer talking about a Canadian confederation, the word is federation. Not the same thing by a long shot. A federation is a group of states accountable to a central government, while a confederation is made up of sovereign nations which decide to pool certain sectors of activity, in their common interest. I believe we should come back to a real confederation to establish harmony and national unity in this country.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, we have already heard many different comments on the bill respecting public referendums in Canada. First, let us look at the reasons for this decision by the government. We could dwell on some problems which most hon. members know and which are the reasons for the decisions the government made concerning this new piece of legislation. This formula of consultation has already been used in different countries. There are probably a few advantages to it, provided the many disadvantages which could arise in the style used in the drafting of the questions which will be asked are foreseen in the implementation of the rules.

The general organization of a referendum can be compared with the organization of a general election each time the elements are similar. For example, in both cases there is a national vote and the electors are the same, namely those who are on the permanent election list. The same officers will probably be used and they will probably have the same responsibilities. Finally, the details on the material organization will have to be established in consideration of the experience acquired; it is a matter of convenience and of efficiency.

What gives value and usefulness to a referendum, advisory though it may be, is the attitude of the government of the day in relation with the issue of the referendum, namely whether or not it is prepared to give consideration to the will of the public and consider itself bound by such will. A government can always promise that it will accept the result of a referendum. That is what Mr. Wilson's British government did before the referendum on maintaining British participation in the European Common Market. In our parliamentary system, where the written constitution makes no reference to referenda, it is necessary to enact legislation concerning the holding of a referendum and the way it will be organized. That can be useful in certain circumstances. Everything depends on the events which occur and on the way in which it is used. That is what was done in countries where the parliamentary tradition is similar to ours, namely in Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand. In all those instances a bill was introduced respecting a referendum on a specific matter and even spelling out the question to be put to the voters. In the newspaper Le Devoir of December 17, 1976 there was an article entitled: "Spain Referendum Lesson" summarized somewhat the inconveniences and advantages that can result from a referendum. After having pointed out that, of those who voted, 94.2 per cent voted yes and 2.6 per cent of the population had abstained from voting, it said, and I quote:

● (1600)

This is where some truths must be grasped and the real question put. Might the watchword to abstain not be a strategic error, all the more unforgiveable that it fed—the success of the referendum has proved it clearly—on a false perception of Spanish realities? Ideologically speaking, some will claim great democratic ideals while rejecting compromise. That position could very well be justifiable. But does one defend democracy better when proving one's weaknesses?

I point out, however, that in these times of economic problems of all sorts it may not be as advantageous as some believe to make a permanent institution of a formula that has not been tried.

If we spent more time discovering the reasons which have led to our discussing this bill, we might discover that the most ingenious means would be to solve, beforehand the problems that are likely to crop up later. I remember full well that referendums have been asked for on various occasions in Canada, all bearing on very important topics. I shall mention the suggestion made to the government that a referendum be held before the bill on capital punishment was passed. For reasons that are difficult to explain, our administrators did not deem it wise to agree to those suggestions, but the fact remains they would have given solid reasons to the legislators and so enabled them to give a better orientation to legislation in that field.

In the last few years, we have noticed that polls of all sorts have become quite fashionable. Public opinion poll firms are developing very sophisticated questionnaires to submit to their patients. However they are far from being ready to point out under the group "undecided" the increasing number of those who should be more properly included under the group "disgusted". I also remember reading somewhere what seem to me to be useful advice concerning referendums, namely that a policy of over-control could jeopardize the equal opportunities provided to the options involved.

In a report published in the newspaper Le Devoir on October 21, 1977, entitled "The Referendum War" by Robert Décary, the following could be read:

The campaign for the provincial referendum has hardly been launched in Quebec and already Ottawa has decided to organize its own referendum. It is fair play. Even if the contents of the bill have not yet been disclosed, it is possible that in the near future Quebeckers will be called to vote twice about belonging to the Canadian nation. No provision for the withdrawal of a province appears in the British North America Act, so it seems that Ottawa as much as Quebec could hold its own vote.

It is a clear indication of a sick political system when two levels of government can in turn and each in its own way legislate in the same field; and this is no doubt a further reason to treat the "patient" and to make sure that under the new system, such a situation cannot be repeated. But for the moment, we will have to live with the system and submit to the rules of the game.

In 1942, we had some kind of public consultation in the form of a plebiscite. Many certainly remember the reactions to the announcement of that plebiscite.

The "yes" won nationally by 63.7 per cent to 36.3 per cent. So the country as a whole agreed to release the government from earlier promises. The kind of crisis that followed stirred many Canadians and changed several ideas. It is often when two nations are fiercely opposed that one can measure their vitality. I mentioned that kind of consultation, which was not a referendum strictly speaking, in order to show that one must be careful when holding a public consultation in a country like ours. Since the events that took place in Canada in 1976, all citizens and their governments were led no doubt to reconsider carefully their convictions and their position.

In an article published in Sélections du Reader's Digest for the month of May, 1977, and entitled "Confederation in Danger" I read the following by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) who sits in this House, which I think is quite relevant and I quote:

We must choose between the blind pursuit of our individual interests and the common good. We must give up the narrow-minded visions we have of Canada at times and consider everyone's needs and desires.

And he went on:

The direction taken by political leaders will be of prime importance because it will provide leadership; yet, they can do nothing without the support of every Canadian. The federal government will have to consider the consequences of its actions in the various areas of the country; Canadians for their part will have to try to ponder the effects of their statements, their actions and their individual reactions.

The article ends on this:

Maintaining Canadian unity always had a price. We must be prepared to compromise, to make concessions, even reluctantly. The fate of our country depends above all on our moderation and our will to survive. We are now going through a difficult test and we will know shortly if we are worthy of our heritage.

I have already stated in this House that our duty as legislators would be to allow all Canadians to live as heirs instead of being perpetually indebted. If the government would really try to find an effective remedy to cure that sickness called fear of the future instead of legislating on referendum issues, we would avoid many difficulties, most of which result from our ineffective financial system. When we consider the damage caused by this system which produces indebted heirs, we find many causes which should be understood so that we can put some order in the present confusion.

However, I recognize that in the history of some countries many referendums have been held, sometimes on constitutional issues or to find a solution to controversial matters. Between 1911 and 1928, six referendums were held in New Zealand on prohibition and the sale of alcoholic beverages. Since then they have used that kind of popular vote many times.

In the United States, they held referendums at the very beginning of that nation. At the declaration of independence in 1776, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island had their constitution approved by a direct vote. In 1778, Massachusetts was the first state to have recourse to that practice for its constitution which was rejected in public meetings across the land. Some authors maintain that it was the first time legislation was subject to a popular vote by way of a referendum.

On November 12, 1933, Adolf Hitler held a plebiscite at the same time as a general election. This election was held to obtain approval for a unique list of candidates to the Reichstag and the referendum to get approval for the withdrawal of Germany from the League of Nations. As a matter of fact, Hitler often used a referendum to gain support for his foreign policy. After his rise to power, he used the referendum essentially to show the other countries that his teams had the general support of the population.

We could ask ourselves this question: Of what use would future referendums be? Of course, they would be used to answer or to try to answer questions or problems about which the government must make decisions, but which could cause electoral embarrassment among a large sector of the population. We must recognize that a government must often take certain action which goes against the interests of certain groups. The concept of referendum could therefore be used to justify unpopular policies. Thus, in certain conditions, a referendum could become a strategy much more than a democratization of power. There are many problems too complex for a referendum to solve.

Let us consider for instance our energy problems; they are so complex that the experts themselves do not agree. Should we use a referendum to determine whether or not to develop nuclear energy? The citizens would not know what to decide because they are all more or less afraid of radiation. It would be difficult to use the results of a referendum to develop a long term energy policy. Just as if doctors asked their patients to choose their own therapy and medication.

In summary, referendums are political strategies much more than they are an effective means of popular participation in the affairs of the state. Even if white papers are published on the subject, this does not necessarily mean that the intentions of the government are as pure as driven snow. We sometimes hear about separation and even subdivision. We must not forget that there are citizens with separatist ideas throughout the country. Fortunately, there are not that many of them at the present time. However, at the proper time, it would be wiser to keep the debate on a conversational level, which could eventually lead to a Canadian union based on new and realistic concepts.

It is too late to rewrite the history of our country but we could find a formula of agreement in our modern Canada which would allow us to carry on together, to work in harmony and to develop our enormous potential of resources. Perhaps we could try to develop a few minds which appear to me far too proud to recognize the rights of others at the appropriate time. It is not because we lack legislation in our country, we might even have too much of it. The referendum bill might just be one more law out of many which, most of the time, are written in such a way that they cannot be understood.

Lately I had the opportunity to read in Le Devoir of March 29, 1977 an article about the new government in France and I want to quote an extract of a speech which was given by the French president on that occasion where he attributed to the new government the two following tasks, and I quote:

—First of all, our economy being on the way to recovery, we must pursue in that direction as it is vital for France and for the French. Your standard of living and your jobs depend on that recovery.

Then we must launch a 12-month action program accompanied by specific objectives. This program will have to meet the concrete areas of concern of the French and contain simple measures, explained in plain words easily understandable by everyone."

That is what we forget to do here when we write our bills. They are always very complicated. I remember drawing the attention of the members of the House to the fact that our laws are written in style which is far too complicated. We would need to seek formulas easily understood by everyone.

On April 4, 1978, Le Droit of Ottawa reported the first part of a speech made by Mr. Gérald Beaudoin, a member of the Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity. He was invited to comment on the constitutionality of the referendum. I quote a part of his speech on constitutional jurisdiction:

In 1969, under the Bertrand government, the Quebec legislature studied an organic bill on a consultative referendum. The Lévesque government tabled its referendum bill in 1977. The constitution definitely grants a legislative assembly as well as the central government the authority to pass legislation respecting referenda on issues which come under their respective jurisdictions.

In the last few years much has been said about the constitution of Canada, now to amend, now to repatriate and more recently to renew it, emphasizing what it should be and seldom what it was, stressing the distribution of powers and educational and linguistic guarantees without realizing that we were reducing the 147 initial clauses of this act down to 4 or 5.

The constitution is more than a cluster of powers or rights which may be amended, repatriated or reformulated. It also means a political way of life, a choice of institutions, an almost invisible structure within which every citizen exercises his rights and without which he might have no right at all or exercise them differently. The constitution is the basis and the guarantee of social order.

We should take a more comprehensive and concrete approach to this and provide a more specific framework for the discussions which have been at a standstill for far too long. Our institutions have been set up only to serve the people that founded them and when they have become obsolete it is time to amend or replace them so that they get closer to their objective.

After 110 years of Confederation, Canada is facing the vital need and the moral obligation created by the parties concerned to reassess its attitude and position in a modern world. Our task now is to build the kind of Canada we would like to live in, not one which is imposed upon us from the outside, this does not imply a rejection of our past, but rather a positive, forward-looking attitude and a progressive, humanistic outlook.

Our past is gone by. The present quickly ebbs into the past. We must build the future, not only our own but that of our country and our fellow citizens because only in the future shall we be able to find gratification for our present yearnings and desires. History has decided that Anglophones and Francophones should share the same country as partners, albeit unequal, who have survived in the midst of many difficulties. All Canadians, within and without Quebec, can overcome their fears, prejudices, frustrations and resentment and learn to live together in a true spirit of brotherhood. In our country two races, two glorious histories are living side by side with just one common future. Every Canadian has the duty to make sure that our hopes will be fulfilled.

[English]

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to say a few words in the debate on this bill because in June, 1977, I introduced a private member's bill calling for a national referendum on the question of possible Quebec separation. I noticed that in his introductory remarks on December 12 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) said that was one of the purposes of this bill, the main purpose being to allow the government to ask the people of Canada generally about possible constitutional questions, now that we have been pretty actively engaged over the last few months with the question of a new constitution for Canada. There is every indication that this process will intensify in the months ahead.

What bothers me about this situation is the fact that the government wants to reserve unto itself the privilege of deciding when a referendum will be called, what question will be asked, and which citizens of Canada will be allowed to answer the question. I believe, generally speaking, that we have to give consideration to this system of direct democracy because over the last number of years this institution has not been responsive in a number of areas.

I believe my friend, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), said yesterday there are questions besides constitutional ones that are important in people's minds, for example, the question of capital punishment and that of abortion. Those types of questions could come to a more satisfactory resolution if they were dealt with by referendum. However, the government does not seem disposed to consult Canadians on matters of that kind. I believe it is clear to every member of this House that a vast majority of the population, approximately 70 per cent to 80 per cent, would like to see capital punishment in effect in Canada. But because of the operation of our present system that will is frustrated and thwarted. As a result, people have come to believe they have no representation in this chamber.

In one respect I am pleased that the government is not saying absolutely that the general citizenry is forbidden from expressing a direct opinion, but I feel a means could be provided in this legislation by which citizens at large could determine what type of question they would like to see dealt with by referenda on an initiative basis.

The present legislation allows the government the absolute right and discretion concerning what questions will be asked. It has been pointed out before that a referendum has never been lost in Canada. We do not have a long history on the use of referenda. Some people have said what history we do have is not particularly happy when one considers the results of the two referenda that were used in the first and second world wars with respect to conscription. Many people believe that some of the problems that exist in the country today flow directly from the use of referendums in those times. It appears that all governments are prepared to make use of a referendum when they think it can help them to avoid a problem. In the case of the referendum held during the First World War it was a Conservative government that made use of the procedure, and during the Second World War a liberal government made use of it.

To date we have had the experience of the government being sole arbiter as to how, when, and if a referendum will be held. The government is now moving along to create a permanent structure to allow it to proceed in this manner in an easier way.

I am discouraged that the government is not prepared to allow Canadians to voice their opinion concerning the type of question that could be asked. It seems to me the government should be forced to listen to the people because the government wants to consult with Canadians to get itself out of some tight situations.

I am concerned that the present legislation leaves to the government's discretion the question as to who will be able to vote on any referendum it decides to hold. In the present situation the main impetus for this bill is in response to what has happened in Quebec. Just because the Levesque government has stated it will hold a referendum, the federal government appears to want to hold its own referendum in that province. I suggest that it is incorrect for the federal government to impose a referendum on people living in any one region of this country. The federal government, being a national government, should concern itself only with national affairs. If the question of the status and place of Quebec is a national question, then Canadians as a whole should be consulted.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

The Minister of Justice, in a statement made earlier this week, has given the impression that any referendum on the status of Quebec in a continuing Canada will be dealt with solely by the population of Quebec. I think this is wrong. This legislation that we are dealing with should be amended at some stage to make it quite clear to everyone that, if the federal government decides to hold a referendum, it would be confined to questions to be dealt with by the entire population of Canada. It is not proper for the federal government to be able to conduct a referendum sponsored by it solely within the confines of Quebec. In my opinion, Canadians generally would like to have something to say about the possible break-up of this country. I would like to be consulted as to the possible future make-up of Canada. I repeat that it is absolutely improper for the federal government to say that it wants to be armed with a tool to allow it to conduct a counter-referendum within the boundaries of one province.

I understand there are some members from the province of Alberta who are concerned that this legislation might be used by the federal government to help it obtain the right to control and direct the development and use of the natural resources of Alberta, and to take over control of their administration. I suppose it is quite possible, the way this bill is framed at the present time, that the federal government could conduct a referendum in the eastern part of Canada asking whether the national government should have complete control over the natural resources of the provinces. In this particular case, whether they said it was all of the provinces, the question would apply primarily to one province, that is, my province of Alberta.

As the Minister of Justice pointed out in his remarks, these are purely consultative votes. They are not binding on anyone. However, this type of procedure could be used in a manner that could create more division than unity in the country. I do not think that is the best argument against this bill. Where a question involves an individual citizen so intimately, there must be provision for that citizen to be consulted. There can be improvements made to this legislation.

I am a little concerned about the statement of the Minister of Justice to the effect that any possible referendum on the future of Quebec will be dealt with only by the citizens of Quebec. That was unfortunate to make that statement before the bill is even passed. At least the minister is honest enough to indicate his feelings. However, it is wrong.

I would like to see the bill amended so that if any question is a national question, every citizen in Canada is entitled to vote on it. If it is not national, the national government does not have any right to ask the question.

I hope consideration will be given to my arguments when this bill goes to committee. The federal government should be prevented from becoming involved in provincial politics. That is not their right. It should stay in its own field, the national field.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate at the second reading stage, but in view of what some newspaper articles may cause Canadians to believe concerning us, as members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, a party which serves indeed as the official Quebec opposition in the Canadian parliament, I feel it is my duty to make a number of observations to clearly define the position of our party and that of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) in respect of Bill C-9.

I listened most attentively to the eloquent remarks the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) made when he introduced this bill. Mr. Speaker, many years ago there was in my riding a great nationalist and a great Canadian, Mr. Armand Lavergne—older members certainly remember him—who made resounding remarks in this House while defending within parliament the rights of Francophone Canadians. And I am happy and proud to represent the same riding. And I would like to follow in those steps, to imitate these shows of strong will, of Canadianism, of nationalism, of support for the development of this country and also to be a great defender of what is contained in the Constitution and which guarantees to the French-speaking people equal rights in their country.

Mr. Speaker, to those members who are relatively young, who perhaps are not familiar with our history of the last decades, of the beginning of the twentieth century, I would like to say this: It was during the war of 1914-18 that at a certain point in time, the Canadian government felt that it should take up arms and have Canadians serve in the armed forces and it is then that the conscription act was passed by the parliament and subsequently enforced.

It was under a coalition government that this act was passed and that conscription became compulsory and I remember that Canadians still had the chance to volunteer. I have a brother who volunteered and served overseas for many months, 30 or 32 if I recall, and who fought bravely as all other Canadians did and who at that time believed he was fighting for the course of Christianity, civilization and liberty.

After the war was over, Mr. Speaker, elections were held as they are in our times. I was still very young and I attended one of these political meetings. As we had no parish hall at that time, the meeting was held in the local shoe repair shop. The school building was close by. So, after school, as I already felt a desire to participate in the political life of my country, I went to this meeting and I enjoyed listening to the speeches. Naturally, I was ignorant of those things and I could not pass judgment on all that was said, but my brother who had fought during the war was there. At one point, he challenged the man who was speaking: Stop telling us lies, just tell the truth to these people. I went overseas, I know what happened there and what you are saying now is not true. You must stop this nonsense. The speaker was a brilliant lawyer from Quebec city and he was behaving just like a king in this little town. So he paid no attention to the advice he had been given and he went on. A second time my brother told them. That is enough, just step down from there! He answered back: Nobody is ever going to make me step down. He had hardly said those words that my brother caught him by his tie and took him down. He twisted his tie to the back of his neck and so subdued him, and he had to stop talking. I say this, Mr. Speaker, to show how a battle was started which is still going on today. This is what has brought us to this Bill C-9 respecting public referendums.

Later on, I noticed that during every federal election the same thing happened. This was also involved at the provincial level. Let us remember that Liberals used to tell French Canadians: "Vote for us and you will never be called upon to take part in extraterritorial wars against your will. Vote for us, and conscription will never come to Canada."

Mr. Speaker, it was easy to make that kind of promise when there was no danger of being put to the test. But when the time came to fulfil their commitment, the Liberal government weakened, although on the government side, Liberal members accounted for 99 per cent of members of this House. Then on September 1, 1939 the government proclaimed the War Measures Act and established censorship. Let us make note of the dates: September 1, 1939. The then Prime Minister, Mr. King, called parliament in and stated that were the United Kingdom to declare war, the government had decided that parliament would immediately meet and would be asked to approve efficient co-operation between Canada and Great Britain.

On September 3, Britain declared war. The same day, national defence regulations came into force in Canada. From then on it became a crime to impede recruiting or the success of Her Majesty's forces. Parliament met on September 6. The throne speech referred to the existing state of war. If it were concurred in, the Prime Minister would make a formal war declaration. French Canadian members here in Ottawa en bloc were against Canada's involvement in the war, but they realized that were they to oppose it, the hon. Ernest Lapointe, the then Minister of Justice and the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec, would be forced to resign from cabinet, the result of that resignation being that Prime Minister King would be left in the hands of imperialists, and conscription would shortly follow.

At that time the attitude of French-speaking members was explained in the newspaper Le Devoir by columnist Paul Sauriol.

And they accepted the principle of a moderate participation as the lesser of two evils, as a concession through which conscription could be avoided. Then they changed their mind. They were saying, we are going to participate moderately to avoir conscription. That is what happened later. In the course of debate in this chamber, the hon. Ernest Lapointe made a formidable statement. He said this:

The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther that that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues from the province of Quebec . . . (Dandurand, Cardin, Power) . . . to say that we will never agree to conscription—

Thus, for the sake of national unity, Mr. Lapointe got the idea of a compromise accepted. It was the beginning of the end. Here is what we can read in a monography on conscription:

French-Canadians accept involvement in war whereas Anglo-Canadians accept to limit involvement to volunteering.

The Quebec premier, Mr. Maurice Duplessis, announced provincial elections for October 25, 1939 . . .

I remember the statements made at that time by politicians who were stating on the hustings that it was a scandal to hold elections while the country was at war. Since I have always enjoyed attending political meetings, I have so many memories on that subject.

. . . alleging a federal invasion of provincial jurisdiction by means of the war measures.

Duplessis was a shrewd man. He would sense that during those war years the provinces, and especially Quebec, would lose part of their autonomy. Events later on bore out his apprehension. With that manoeuvre, Mr. Duplessis thought he could transform an election into a plebiscite which would turn to his own advantage.

On the contrary, the election campaign is dominated by Ernest Lapointe who becomes its real strategist.

He heads the troops at the provincial election level.

Lapointe claims that the federal ministers from Quebec having been attacked by Maurice Duplessis, they would take up the challenge and ask the province of Quebec to give them the needed mark of trust. He does indicate clearly that if Duplessis won, the federal ministers from Quebec would resign and French Canadians would not have any supporters in Ottawa.

How extraordinary it is to see how they played with us. And here, I quote again from Mr. Lapointe's commitments:

And if I recall all those statements, it is to warn us against what could happen if we are not wise, if we rush things, if we try to get around legislative measures in other provinces by way of legislation. I for one prefer to follow the course of events. Before saying "yes" or "no" to a referendum, I want to know the question. That is normal! There was another referendum, in 1942, and I shall talk about that in a moment.

Here is what Mr. Lapointe said at the time, and he was very clear:

I told the English speaking majority in my riding and across the country, frankly, honestly, and squarely: we are going to co-operate, but you have to co-operate also to ensure the unity of Canada—

—we have been hearing of national unity for a long time.

—of the Canadian union, the future of our country . . . I pay tribute to my English speaking colleagues, to the majority of parliament, who have accepted this offer in a spirit of generosity, and all of parliament is bound by the promise that was made.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

So, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: That was a long time ago—

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I congratulate members for their youth, but we cannot all be of the same age—

Mr. Béchard: Are you referring to me?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The hon. member for Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) thinks we are talking about him. Yes, I recognize that he is still relatively young, and I hope he will serve parliament and Canada in this chamber for a long time to come.

So, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government then decided to hold a plebiscite. I am certainly not a linguist, and I have to admit that I do not know the difference between a plebiscite and a referendum. But I look at the aims! And indeed a plebiscite was held in Canada to release the government, Mackenzie King, the Liberal party of the commitments he had made to French Canadians and Francophones in Quebec during many elections. Since those promises had been made to Francophones, it would have been normal that the plebiscite be held only among those whom the promise had been made to. But the plebiscite was held right across Canada. Obviously, Anglophones and Canadians in other provinces readily released Mackenzie King of the promises he had made to French Canadians but Francophones voted a massive "no". However, the government had been released by a majority in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I mention that because there is a direct relationship with Bill C-9. There are excellent things in Bill C-9, the procedures for holding a referendum and all that. It looks very much like the Election Act. That is why in principle the bill is great if it were a legislation to authorize the government and the parliament of Canada to hold the referendum on questions considered important, not on a specific question that concerns only the province of Quebec. That is where, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with this bill. Of course I will have to oppose it unless the government changes it when it is considered in committee to allow us precisely to agree with a general legislation on referendums, whether it be for the death penalty or another matter of national interest.

We have to remember history. There is a Canadian, the mayor of Montreal, Canada's metropolis, who, like me and many others, believed in the promises of the Liberal party at that time and when that government ordered national registration he felt justified in saying to his fellow citizens: I am not registering because I trust the promise that was made for years. He said: Do not register. And then he was picked up, sent to a concentration camp, kept there during the whole war, without any trial. I find that extraordinary, abominable. There is another Canadian who was sitting at the time in the parliament of Quebec, at the National Assembly. He died recently in the month of December. I am talking about René Chaloult. Another brilliant lawyer, a passionate nationalist. Thanks to him Quebec has its fleur-de-lis flag. I am annoyed, Mr. Speaker, with those young members in the Quebec government who try to make people believe that this has come as a result of some legislation they have passed. It irritates me. I want to point out that he was the one who introduced the motion; then only did the parliament of Quebec, under Mr. Duplessis, pass a bill giving Quebec its fleur-de-lis flag. Things ought to be set out straight, they ought to be reported the way they are. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chaloult was accused and then prosecuted for having made certain statements, for having repeated things said by Mr. Mackenzie King and others. He brought into court. I have here a booklet which sums up this trial. Fortunately, he was acquitted thanks to the brilliant defense of both his lawyers Fernand Choquette and Phillippe Monette. He was himself a great lawyer. He was able to plead his case while Camilien Houde could not. He did not have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I bring up all these things without any animosity; I would not want people to think that I hold a grudge because I do not, but before we pass this bill, I would like the younger members to look back on our history lest we provide the government with a weapon or a tool for which we could later be sorry. It is our duty to seriously examine the bills that are submitted to parliament, and I hope that at the committee stage, the government will introduce amendments which will revive our confidence in this bill should it ever become law. Since I had said I would be through before five o'clock in order to give someone on the other side the chance to conclude the debate, I shall go no further and I hope that the next speaker will succeed in renewing our confidence.

● (1650)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the minister, I want to give notice to the House that if he speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Hon. John M. Reid (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of fascination to the speech just given by my hon. friend opposite. I am amazed at his recollection of history and of some of the facts he discussed. The referendum called by Mackenzie King in the parliament of 1942 for 1943 was a fascinating exercise of the power of a government to call a referendum.

I want to point out to my hon. friend a contrast between what happened in the First World War and what happened in the Second World War. In the First World War there was no referendum, and the result was that Francophones in Quebec did not go to the polls to express their discontent. They went to the streets in riots. In the Second World War there was an opportunity for them and all Canadians to express their wishes in the polls. As my hon. friend has pointed out, it is true that the vote went against the people of Quebec, but the fact of the matter is that in 1944 Louis St. Laurent was elected in Quebec to become Minister of Justice in the government of Mackenzie King. That was a significant achievement because it meant that the people of Quebec accepted the results of the referendum and Louis St. Laurent as their leader. Otherwise there is no possible way Louis St. Laurent could have been elected under those circumstances. If hon. members go back and look at the record, they will find that St. Laurent campaigned on that point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister does not want to distort history. Mr. St. Laurent was elected in 1942, before the referendum was held.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would like to carry on after eight o'clock.

Mr. Paproski: It is not five o'clock yet.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, it had been arranged that I would have 15 minutes in which to speak. My hon. friend went on for a considerable length of time, and I am not so sure that I should give up my opportunity to speak.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that we not see the clock, allow the minister 15 minutes or whatever he wants, perhaps until 5.15, and then proceed with the vote. I hope that there is unanimous consent for that. I am sure my colleague would forgo his private member's hour today and proceed on another date.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister has just confirmed that an agreement has been reached whereby he would have fifteen minutes before five o'clock to deliver his speech.

According to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), such an agreement was negotiated with the Chair and the time agreed upon was not 15 minutes, but five. A difference of ten minutes is a lot. I still had many things to say, but I wanted to keep my promise. I was watching the clock so that the hon. member could have his five minutes. I gave him five minutes. However, I would not want anyone to make incorrect statements as I myself could have spoken longer. I still had many things to say, but, I wanted to stick to our agreement, and I would like the hon. minister to recognize that I acted in a gentlemanly fashion.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should neither be allowed to mislead the House. He was delivering his speech when the agreement was reached. I was dealing with his colleague. We agreed not on five or 15 minutes, but on ten minutes. There has been a misunderstanding, but I do not think that we should make a mountain out of a molehill.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me five minutes—

• (1700)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do the House and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) give consent to allow the minister to go beyond five o'clock to complete his remarks in five minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, this is so agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it also agreed that the question should be put after the minister has completed his remarks?

Mr. Paproski: Yes, Mr. Speaker, at 5.05 p.m. or 5.07 p.m., or whatever is the appropriate time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I will not object if he wants to go on. This I call behaving in a gentlemanly manner.

[English]

Mr. Towers: Yes, I agree, Mr. Speaker, but has it been established at what time the vote will be taken?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has agreed that the vote will be taken immediately after the minister has completed his remarks, after the five minutes that were made available to him. Is this agreed by the hon. member also?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House for this privilege. I had really intended to try to answer all the criticisms which have been raised on this bill in order to try to give a general summing up, but in view of the desire of the House to come to a decision I will not engage in that. Instead, what I would like to do is to indicate that a number of points have been raised that we would like to look into a little further. There has been the question of definitions that have been raised, and there has been a question on a number of items, particularly with respect to the question of definition of the constitution which has some members concerned. The definition which we have put into the act was the definition, which is a standard one, which describes the Canadian constitution.

The dilemma we face is that the Canadian constitution is not found in any one document or any one place, it is found in a collection of conventions and legislative enactments. When the decision was taken to allow referenda to be held on the basis of the constitution, we were forced to describe what our constitution was. In the United States, for example, it would be much simpler to describe the constitution, it is contained in a series of documents. Ours is in a series of legislative enactments, bills from the British parliament, as well as a number of statutes which we call constitutional, and that is why that definition is there. If we could find another definition which could describe adequately what our constitution was, we would be prepared to look at it.

The second point I want to raise is the apparent fear that members have about a question being put on the constitutional question, or indeed any kind of question on a referendum. The only answer I can give to that is that elections are divisive, people make choices in elections, parties take stands on particular attitudes and positions, and therefore the fear that has been expressed by a number of members that people would make the wrong decision on a referendum question strikes me as one that I cannot really accept because that is the nature of our democratic society. From that point of view I really cannot find that to be serious.

The second point I want to make before I sit down concerns the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who said we could use this referendum power to take away the powers of the province, that is, that a province might give up its natural resources through the referendum procedure. Frankly, we have looked at the bill and we cannot find how that kind of charge could be made. The referendum is not binding; it does not bind anyone to anything, which means it has no legal status. It is, as my friend, the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), pointed out the other day, a glorified public opinion poll in a way, and therefore has no effect in law at all. Therefore it seems to me that the concerns that people have expressed about the possibility of this referendum taking away powers from the provinces simply do not stand up when one looks at what referenda can do. The hon. member shakes his head. I have listened to his speech and I have read it. He raised this point but he did not express anything except the fear of the question being put and what it might do.

It seems to me to be absurd to assume that the people in my home province of Ontario would vote to give up their natural resources to another province or to the federal government if they did not want to do so, and if they did want to do so, why not use the technique of a referendum to find out? I apologize to the hon. member because I have taken his argument to an absurd ending, but the fact is that the fears that were expressed on this point by hon. members opposite do not seem to bear a relationship to reality.

I want to say also, in answer to my friend who spoke just before me and who said he was interested in the fact that the committee would bring forward amendments, that I recognize that this is a complex bill because what we are doing is to build on to our Election Expenses Act a very complex process. We have taken a different route to that which has been taken in Quebec. We are prepared to look at amendments where necessary changes are to be made and where there are disharmonies in terms of two pieces of legislation, and I trust that members will have an opportunity to make their specific wishes known as soon as possible.

CANADA REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HOLDING OF REFERENDUMS ON CONSTITUTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for Mr. Reid) that Bill C-9, respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the motion of Mr. Lalonde for Mr. Reid. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lalonde) (for Mr. Reid) which was agreed to on the following division:

● (1740)

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers)—

An hon. Member: We cannot hear you.

Mr. Paproski: My name is Paproski. It is right here. Can you hear me now?

Having regard to notices of motions for the production of papers No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer who gave up his allotted time during private members' hour today, I would hope that he would be the first one up next Thursday, February 8.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that under notices of motions for the production of documents, motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer shall retain its position on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.50 p.m. the House took recess.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now!

Miss Bégin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for their fine co-operation in considering Bill C-2 during almost three working sittings. During those discussions it seemed obvious, I believe, that the decision to anticipate the final date for the expiry of that Canadian legislation which was aimed at the construction, acquisition, renovation and purchase of equipment and buildings for the individual training of health personnel, will not create serious problems concerning production and health manpower in Canada, or the availability of necessary institutions for that purpose.

As for professional and quasi-professional health groups, we now have in Canada a satisfactory level of personnel with adequate training. During the debate on Bill C-2, the major problem raised by opposition members concerned, as I see it, the financing of medical research in Canada. Support for medical research projects is not directly related to the Health Resources Fund programs being terminated sooner than expected by the bill under discussion tonight in the House.

In fact, under the Health Resources Fund Act, more than $100 million have been allocated to planning, construction or purchasing of equipment for research establishments related to training programs. That might be why many opposition members have used this forum to express their points of view and regretfully, I must admit, to criticize our very good work, not so much to criticize the good work but our attitude toward the Medical Research Council of Canada and, generally, the government financial support program for medical research in Canada. May I be allowed to dwell on it a few minutes.

The Medical Research Council, which is the main institution in Canada granting subsidies for medical research, is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a Crown agency which is distinct from my department and which has its own budget of over $60 million to which is added indirectly, through a specific program of my department, a budget of close to $10 million coming from what the government gives, what the federal government gives back for medical research from taxpayers monies. Those government subsidies amount to some 50 per cent of all subsidies given to that sector in Canada, the other 50 per cent coming mainly from the private sector, from associations like the Canadian Heart Foundation, the Canadian Cancer Society, the association for arthritis and so on, and for a few years, from small but well appreciated amounts given by some provincial governments. I consider that there will perhaps never be enough funds for medical research in Canada, and I understand in this regard the constructive criticism which could be made to ensure funding. It will always be possible to increase the portion which is directed to medical research. But I fail to understand why the government is being criticized, rightly or wrongly, for not having done its part, because medical research is one of its priorities and will remain so.

The last positive decision dealing with biomedical researchers in Canada is the one the cabinet made to allow long-term financing, or in other words, guarantee the stability, of the Medical Research Council funding. A request to that effect had been made a long time ago. As a matter of fact, I believe it was made three years ago. It takes into account the fact that according to public opinion Canadians are eager to see medical research improved in Canada.

Therefore, before Christmas, I was able to announce a formula for determining the annual level of expenditures for the Medical Research Council from 1978 to 1983. It is noted that this five-year stabilization formula is absolutely unique as no government likes to commit itself ahead of time with one of its departments or agencies. Still, with the support of my colleagues, I made the point that the very nature of medical research requires that researchers know in advance where they are going, because the average project lasts three years, and because the money we give the Medical Research Council is used mainly to create jobs for technicians and one or two researchers who at times lead the teams. Jobs and people are therefore involved and I felt it was urgent that they be given some guarantee of stability with regard to the funds granted by the government. The present budget, therefore, amounts to exactly $63,002,000.

With the new formula, the basic budget of the council will now be figured out every year by adding to the current funds the increase in the cost of living index, plus the percentage of actual growth of our GNP, less one per cent. This calculation is intended to counter inflationary pressures that might build up within the system itself. Application of this formula, as approved by the cabinet, will mean a subsidy of $68.8 million will be paid to the Medical Research Council for the fiscal year 1979-80.

I indicated that this formula would be used to calculate the basic budget of the council, but another aspect of the government's decision is to favourably consider any application for additional funding, over and above this basic budget, which the council would submit to us for specific programs or priorities, for new and major projects aimed at upgrading the health of Canadians. Of course, the council is already funding many projects of a national scope. For instance, in 1977-78, it provided more than $3 million for research and training of researchers in the area of respiratory diseases. It provided more than $6 million for research on cancer and an equal amount on cardiovascular disorders. In the current year, the council is giving special encouragement to the expansion of research centres in cardiology. This explains the new programs in Winnipeg and Halifax. To the budget currently allowed to the council will be added, if need be, new proposals that will come from the scientific community.

● (2020)

[English]

The new budgetary provisions for the Medical Research Council will give assurance to those health professional schools in which the biomedical research effort has not yet achieved a solid base so that developmental funds would be available for the recruitment and support of additional faculty members competent in research. It is necessary that each such school have a research base with some depth as well as breadth so that its students will receive professional education which is up to date and the patients in the region will receive treatment which is also up to date. This development grant program has been a priority for the council as it has been for the government for many years. It is paying off, and its momentun can now be maintained without encroaching on the funds required for the maintenance of other efforts. With the new funding the number of highly qualified young investigators who can expect to receive salary support from the council as they develop independent research programs can be maintained at a level considered adequate to meet the demands of those who will also be assured of research funding.

These young scholars and their counterparts supported by the council under other programs may also look forward to a narrowing of the gap in 1979-80 between the salary provided by the Medical Research Council and the university salary provided to their academic colleagues. A slightly larger number of awards for research trainees will be available in the coming year than were awarded this year. Furthermore, the stipends attached to these awards are to be increased to offset somewhat higher living costs. This will be particularly welcome to those who are taking advanced training in centres outside Canada.

The greatest benefit to the research community to arise from the introduction of that new basic formula funding will, however, be felt by the investigators across the country who receive operating funds for their research from the Medical Research Council. The budget now proposed for the council and approved by the cabinet will provide for increases in ongoing grants which are more commensurate with the cost increases of research materials and supplies and the salary increases of the technicians and other assistants who are paid from these grants.

Investigators have in the past complained that on occasion they could only make ends meet by dispensing with the services of a technician. I am not sure of the extent to which that can be documented, but it is certainly true that biomedical research is a labour-intensive industry. I would like to impress on the public that fact, which is not known at all. I suppose if we were discussing this matter with neighbours or with people in shopping centres, they would think more is spent on equipment, including monkeys and experimental animals, but each dollar we give to biomedical research through the grants of the council in fact helps support jobs, basically technicians' jobs. Some 65 per cent of the expenditures by the Medical Research Council grantees are for the payment of technical or other assistants or research trainees. With the proposed budget the president of the Medical Research Council has estimated that instead of jobs being lost, at least 100 more jobs will now be created. A formula based on economic indicators should serve to eliminate the stop-go effect on the biomedical research effort which has been the result of pressures in recent years created in part by inflation and in part by the increasing numbers of well trained young scientists seeking to establish research projects in our universities or hospitals.

Supporting even a minimal number of these young scientists and their research has in some years meant the interruption, if not the disruption, of research by investigators of long standing. Even with the new formula it will probably not be possible to support the research of all those who, in the opinion of their peers, are doing creditable work. However, combined with the realistic forward planning which this formula will permit—I want to repeat that the formula is a five-year funding mechanism—the new formula should ensure that well qualified young men and women with new ideas and new techniques and established investigators of longer experience are on an equal footing in the competition for research funds.

During the standing committee's study of Bill C-2 statements were made by a member of the opposition that the government's decision on the new funding formula for the Medical Research Council had not been well received by the research community. I am very pleased to see that gentleman in the House tonight and I would like to take this opportunity to answer that charge, to state strongly that I disagree with him and to say that, on the contrary, the new formula has been very well received by the Medical Research Council which is comprised largely of well-known Canadian scientists. I should also like to say that all the correspondence received by both Dr. Simard, the president of the Medical Research Council, and by myself reveals a very positive response on the part of senior and responsible members of the scientific community, among them, if I can name only one from my own city, being Dr. Charles Scriver, who appeared on two occasions as a witness at the invitation of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to plead the case for stable funding.

Of course, this new five year plan will not, nor is it expected to, eliminate all the problems linked with biomedical research. It should, however, restore a degree of stability to the research effort which is essential if we are to make the best possible use of our resources.

If I go back to the exact nature of this bill, which is to cancel the health resources fund a few years ahead of its natural termination date, I must acknowledge that many members complained in the committee about the fact that no consultation had taken place with the provinces on introducing an earlier cut-off date after which no new projects are to be approved. The fact is that there was very little time for specific consultation when the final decision was taken. However, given the state of the economy, given the federal-provincial conference of first ministers in 1978, this program, as I explained in committee, was obviously a prime candidate for cuts because the fund had given most of what it could give to Canada. Provinces were informed of the proposed change by telex on September 8, 1978. They were also told that we would fully honour the commitment on projects approved to date. This program is not one with any formal federal-provincial agreement. Hon. members will remember that it was established by a law of this parliament in 1966 to enable the provinces to more rapidly develop health research and training facilities, and it has been successful in meeting this target. There was a need to curtail certain levels of planned expenditures in current and future department budgets for which I am responsible, and this decision was conveyed to the provinces.

[Translation]

When the Health Resources Fund was established in 1966, Canada had 12 schools of medicine and 880 doctors who graduated that same year. There was a ratio of one active doctor for 762 people. Compared to the most recent statistics for 1977 we realize that there are now 16 schools of medicine training twice as many physicians. There is now a ratio of two active civilian physicians for 568 people. When I say active civilian physicians I include in my definition general practitioners, family physicians and all specialists. New specialties have also appeared in Canada in recent years particularly in the field of rehabilitation, ergotherapy, cardiovascular surgery, pediatric surgery, nuclear medicine and cancer treatment medicine. Because of this, hospital environments have become extremely complex bioscientific centres where clinical research is always accompanied by highly specialized therapy.

A detailed study on the need for doctors in Canada by medical specialties was undertaken in 1972 at the cost of more than $300,000 by the federal government. The report on this vast research, which was published in 1975, shows that even though the specialist distribution by specialty is not always adequate and the geographic distribution could be better, the total number of doctors in Canada should not necessarily be increased.

Indeed, the ratio recommended by the members of Canadian medical associations associated with the study is one doctor for 670 people, which excludes interns and residents. If we consider that the latter represent about 15 per cent of the total number of doctors, we reach a figure of one doctor for 566 inhabitants. The fear of seeing an excessive production threaten the balance of medical staff has brought about a drastic reduction in the immigration of doctors through restrictive regulations which have caused a decrease in the number of doctors immigrating to Canada from 1,000 a year in previous years to a little over 300 a year in the last few years. Of course, this is a strict minimum if we want to admit refugees and the spouses of immigrants.

Our medical schools now produce 1,700 graduates a year in Canada. This figure is quite sufficient, and we must realize that if we had to increase it, our present schools have a maximum capacity of 2,500 students. This is based on a study made in 1973 by Dr. Rocke Robertson.

It seems absurd at this point in time to insist in the short term on increasing the productivity of our medical schools, or even expanding our postgraduate training programs. Our present efforts are directed at attracting professionals towards outlying areas where service is poor as well as towards the specialities which are most in demand, and this is being done by joint task forces composed of provincial representatives as well as spokesmen for professional associations and officials from my department.

[English]

Since the onset of the health resources fund, the manpower ratio for all disciplines in health has shown continued improvement. For example, the number of health professionals and paraprofessionals in relation to population shows a substantial positive change for the eight year period from 1968 to 1976. I should like to refer to a few examples.

● (2040)

In 1968, the ratio was one physician for every 740 people, whereas the ratio in 1976 was one for every 578 people. The ratio in respect of nurses was one for every 187 Canadians in 1968; whereas in 1976 the ratio was one for every 129 Canadians. The list continues, but I will not take the time of the House giving further examples.

In the dental field, the number of dental schools increased from six to ten, bringing the output of graduates from 296 in 1966 to 465 in 1976. New dental schools were constructed with health resources fund assistance at Université Laval, Quebec; the University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario; the University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; and the University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia. Substantial assistance was approved to expand and improve facilities at Dalhousie University in Halifax and at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg. The ratio of dentists to population improved from one per 3,097 Canadians in 1966 to one per 2,438 in 1976. Also, the significant improvement in numbers of graduates for other dental personnel is noteworthy. Dental assistant graduates numbered 58 in 1966 and increased to 917 in 1978. For dental hygienists, it was 82 in 1966 as compared to 350 in 1976. Due to market and employment conditions, some provinces are reducing the number of student enrolments in the dental auxiliary field.

In the nursing field, we witnessed the transfer of didactic training programs for nurses from the hospital to the formal educational setting, primarily in CEGEP and community colleges. Similarly, the period of training for diploma nurse graduates was reduced in most instances from a three-year hospital program to a two-year community college program. The number of graduates increased from 7,387 in 1966 to 10,051 in 1976. As I have said, the ratio has improved remarkably. One can even say that Canada has an over-supply of nurses and almost the highest ratio of nurses to population in the world. We have adequate facilities for the training of physicians, dentists, nurses and most other health disciplines. In fact, there is a trend toward a levelling off of new trainees accepted in our training schools, and, in some instances, a reduction policy is being implemented. As a result we now have a surplus of nurses and an acceptable doctor to population ratio. The ratios for all other disciplines have improved and will continue to improve in relation to economic and social requirements.

On the international level, our manpower ratios compare favourably with a number of other countries. The ratio of physicians in Canada in 1974 was better or equal to those of Australia, the United States, England, Wales, Scotland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, Netherlands, Luxembourg, France, Spain and Portugal. We were surpassed moderately by Belgium, Italy, West Germany, Switzerland and the U.S.S.R. As for dentists, Canada fared better than England, Wales, Northern Ireland, Scotland, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Spain, and Australia. Only Australia, the United States, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, France, West Germany, Switzerland and the U.S.S.R. had better ratios. As for nurses, Canada had a better ratio than all countries mentioned except Denmark.

During the 1966-1978 period, the health resources fund met the objective of having the necessary facilities on a national basis to train health personnel in sufficient numbers to meet the current and anticipated demands. For example, our medical schools have levelled off in the number of trainees accepted and some are operating below potential capacity. Recently a great number of projects approved under the fund have been to assist with the expansion and upgrading of teaching hospitals. With the trend now toward a reduction in training in these institutions, this type of requirement has diminished.

In the last 30 years, and to a greater extent in the last ten years, there has been rapid and substantial development of training and other health facilities all over Canada. There will be a need, to a much lesser degree, to maintain and upgrade existing schools and related facilities which in most instances are new or renovated structures. There will not be the demand for large injections of capital in this area, nor increases in the enrolment of trainees in the health field. It is for these reasons that Bill C-2 is before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised at the tone of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). In the last half of her remarks she seemed to indicate she was quite satisfied that everything in the health field is well, nothing further needed to be done, and therefore the health resources fund can be chopped easily without any detrimental results. Perhaps this indicates the minister's lack of appreciation for the health field and her complete disinterest in it. If the minister had bothered to inform herself fully on the problems in the health field, certainly she would not have taken the attitude she did.

The minister began her comments by criticizing my party for having spoken on medical research during consideration of this bill. Then she proceeded to spend at least 20 minutes speaking on medical research. In addition, she was somewhat dishonest when she accused us of criticizing the Medical Research Council. I challenge her to show examples in Hansard or the minutes of committee proceedings of my party criticizing the Medical Research Council. That was a blatant dishonesty on her part. We criticized the minister's policy of starving the Medical Research Council to death in its attempt to fund research in the country. Our criticism has been levelled always at the minister and her government, not at the Medical Research Council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister went on at some length to indicate that the health resources fund had nothing to do with research, and that we were abusing the bill in talking about research. Yet, I have in my possession a sessional paper dated March 10, 1978, which was signed by the minister. I am referring to sessional paper 303-1/156 in which the Health Resources fund is discussed.

● (2050)

In this paper it indicates quite clearly that $75 million has been allocated for the support of health training and research projects of national significance. I do not see how the minister can stand up and state with a straight face that the health resources fund has nothing to do with research, because her own paper signed in her own hand indicates that $75 million of that fund was indeed channeled toward research of national significance.

We have opposed this bill primarily for two reasons. One reason is the high-handed method the government used to introduce the legislation and its failure to consult with the provinces. It was a unilateral decision with an announcement to the press, followed five days later by a telex to the provincial health ministers informing them that the fund would be terminated.

The other reason we opposed this bill was its detrimental effect on research, by cutting off funds for medical research to an even greater degree than she and her predecessors have done over the past decade.

We learned some interesting facts, however, about the minister and this government during debate on this bill. I think the Toronto Star article of January 27 describes what we learned quite clearly. The headline reads, "Boss Bégin's in Trouble. Lack of Leadership has Staff near Mutiny". In reading through this article it clearly indicates why the minister has been so erratic during the debate and why she seems to have flip-flopped at least four or five times on various issues over the past three months. The article is based on information gained from talking to a senior civil servant and perhaps other officials who are close to her. It describes the minister as insecure, and floundering under her scatter gun approach and indecisive dodging. We saw examples of that in her comments earlier. The article goes on to say that it is not easy for a civil servant working with a minister who is so nervous that she specifically ordered senior officials not to discuss her. I do not think I will spend any more time with this article. Anybody wishing to see it can look it up for himself.

Mr. Paproski: What is the date of that article?

Mr. Yewchuk: The article was in the Toronto Star of Saturday, January, 27, 1979.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would like the hon. member to retract what he has said. He said twice and once in particular, that I was blatantly dishonest. Perhaps he did not understand what I said. I said that the opposition had criticized, not the Medical Research Council, but the government's attitude toward it. I would like the hon. member to apologize. When he reads the blues tomorrow, he will see that he made a mistake.

I think that it indicates a very low standard of ethics for this House, but the hon. member quoted from a newspaper article which gives a description of a minister, written by a journalist who never spoke to that minister nor to her staff. I think that should be clarified.

Mr. Yewchuk: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the minister in any way, shape or form can claim that to be a question of privilege or a point or order. I would remind the minister that we are in a debate and, if it is too warm for her, she is free to go out and take a drink of cold water. As a matter of fact, I will not wait until tomorrow to check the blues, I will do it as soon as I finish my comments because she did say that we criticized the Medical Research Council. I noted the words verbatim at the time she was speaking, so I am afraid I cannot back down or swallow anything I have said.

Miss Bégin: You will have to do it in front of everybody tomorrow.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister just finished speaking for 45 minutes, and I have been up for only five, but she wants the floor again.

Miss Bégin: But I did not insult the House.

Mr. Yewchuk: I would like to continue my comments if I could. In her opening comments, when this bill was presented for second reading, the minister indicated her philosophy and that of the government on programs which they have had in place for a number of years. With regard to the health resources fund, the essence of what the minister said at that time is that it was a terrific program, and that, therefore, the government decided to scrap it. The comment took me by surprise, because if you have a good program it is natural to want to continue it and perhaps even expand on it. My party's philosophy is that if a good program is in effect you do not scrap it, you keep it, because it is usually the best in terms of serving the public.

In spite of the self-righteous attitude of the minister with regard to the trained personnel available in this country, she is far from correct. For example, Canada has almost no specialists in the field of geriatrics. This is a very rapidly growing field, and as our population ages and the birth rate drops over the next two decades, it will continue to grow. However, there seems to be no attention whatever paid to this area in the minister's comments.

The minister was proud of the fact that the nurses training program had been reduced from three years in a hospital to two years in a community college. In my opinion, and that is all it is, that program has been a step backward because it has resulted in less qualified individuals providing nursing services. I would suggest that the three-year program be reinstated because that extra year is necessary to instil the proper "Florence Nightingale" attitude in the minds of the young ladies who wish to serve their fellow man in that particular field.

The minister's behaviour during this debate has been rather erratic. The bill originally announced an $84 million cut from the health resources fund, but within just a couple of weeks or a month of the commencement of public debate on the bill, and as a result of the criticism it received, the minister reversed her decision and added $15 million to the pot. I do not criticize her for that move, because I think it was a good one. What I am questioning is why she would announce something and reverse her decision just three or four weeks after the matter became public. Whether it was because it was a bad decision to begin with or because she was not completely informed of what was happening, I do not know. I would say it indicates she made a bad decision, that when the pressure was put on by the public and by this side of the House she caved in and changed her mind in order to reduce that pressure.

Mr. Nystrom: She sounds like Joe Clark.

Mr. Yewchuk: I suppose that the New Democrats will have a speaker to put forth their position in a few moments, but I will not waste too much of my time on them.

There have also been charges from this side of the House that the bill was introduced without consultation with the provinces.

● (2100)

For a long time the minister insisted during debate in this House and in committee that there was consultation with the provinces. She was defended in that position by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). He attacked us very vigorously for being "unfair" and saying things that were "untrue" when we accused her of taking unilateral action and bringing in this bill which affected the provinces directly without having first consulted them. A reading of page 1599 of Hansard for November 28, 1978, would indicate that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs went to some lengths to try to convince the House that there was plenty of consultation with the provinces.

When the bill went to committee, the minister again reversed herself. In the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of December 12, 1978, at page 7:21, the minister said:

> You want a simple answer, why were the provincial ministers not consulted on my cuts, because they are not elected in the federal portfolio; they have no accountability whatsoever of my budget to any Canadian voter and I really resent the suggestion of the member.

After all that defence, she then admitted that she did not consult the provinces. When we pursued the question of why not, she said in essence that she did not have to, that it was strictly a federal program and the provinces did not have to be consulted. Earlier on the same day, referring to a particular research fund, she said, at page 7:8:

> Our national economy is a tight economy, so are the economies of the provinces, and this program is by definition a fifty-fifty venture.

This leads us to wonder where the minister really stands. On the one hand she says the provinces were not consulted because this is strictly a federal program and is none of their business, so to speak, but on the same day she says this program is "by definition a fifty-fifty venture."

It is no wonder that the Toronto Star ran an article on January 27 criticizing the minister's lack of leadership. Whoever it was that the reporter talked to in her department or on her staff said that the department is floundering under her scatter gun approach. These examples indicate why the minister has not been able to do the job that was expected of her.

We criticize this bill on the basis that it has a devastating effect on research. The budget for the Medical Research Council was announced in the usual manner in the blue book. Later, as a result of pressure from the research community and from this side of the House, an additional $2 million was allocated to meet its needs. Six to eight weeks later, however, half a million dollar was subtracted. We then had a situation in which the Medical Research Council, which is largely responsible for medical research in this country, was faced with three different budgets in one year. First of all, the blue book budget, then an additional $2 million, and then a decrease of half a million. I cannot think of a better example of erratic behaviour than that.

The research budget has been eroded very substantially over the past few years. It is true that on this side of the House we have urged the government for a number of years to implement a formula of stable, long-term funding for research over a three-year or five-year period which would enable research organizations to engage in proper planning.

We did not criticize the minister for committing herself to the principle of a long-term funding formula as she seemed to suggest we did; what we criticized was the content of the formula which commits the government of funding the Medical Research Council for a five-year period with increments based on the implicit price index. In essence, this means increases of about 11 per cent per year. We know from the experts in the research community that the inflation rate in research—the increased costs in research—runs from 15 per cent to 17 per cent per year. It therefore becomes obvious that this formula, which increases funding by 11 per cent, will not even keep up to this year's level of funding and that each year thereafter there will be a loss of about 6 per cent. In essence, the government has committed itself to a 6 per cent per year erosion in the Medical Research Council funding for the next five years. If this formula had been applied to the last six years or so the budget this year would have been about $7 million less than it is.

While we support the principle of a long-term formula for funding, the formula itself is somewhat of a joke. It will create greater difficulties for research than have been experienced thus far.

I want to touch briefly on another matter, Mr. Speaker, and that is the Indian health service guidelines which were implemented only a few weeks ago. The minister indicated that she felt the Indian people as a whole were abusing the health care services that were provided. I want to object to that sort of criticism because I do not see why that particular group of people should be singled out. It is quite easy to see that some people in every group in society are abusing the health care system to some extent, and I can give a specific example of that.

I do some part-time work in one of the emergency departments of a local hospital, Mr. Speaker. Each patient who walks in there automatically costs the taxpayer $21 in hospital costs plus $15 or so for the medical service that is provided. If that patient went to see a doctor in his office the $21 emergency hospital cost would be saved. Yet we see hundreds of people from all walks of life in the emergency departments of this country every day. They complain of things like sore throats, runny ears, coughs of two or three weeks' duration, skin rashes, aches and pains—in fact, all the normal things seen by a general practitioner in his office. All kinds of people go to the emergency department, a very expensive place to dispense these simple medical services.

If the minister is concerned about anybody abusing the medical services in this country, she should not single out the weakest group in our society, the Indian people. She should look at everybody else, including herself, perhaps.

It any case, Mr. Speaker, the minister made the accusation and brought in guidelines which resulted in some dangerous reductions in health services. They meant cutting back on prescription drugs, for instance. It is easy to imagine what the effect would be on a diabetic patient who needed insulin, could not pay for it, and the new guidelines perhaps would not allow him to get it free. The patient could be in a coma within 24 hours.

Another important service is the ambulance service. There may be some abuses here, but it is not just the Indian people who are responsible. If there were a genuine need for an ambulance, because someone was unconscious or in great pain, the ambulance driver would make a quick judgment as to whether the trip was necessary. But, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that most ambulance drivers are not trained to make such judgments. This puts everybody in a difficult position.

As a result of pressure from the Indian people and from this side of the House the minister reversed her decision. She delayed the guidelines for six months. We criticized her because she imposed the guidelines without first consulting the Indian people. We took the position that if they were abusing the services, as she said, the proper thing to do would be to go to their councils and discuss the problem, pointing out where the abuses occur and where corrective action could be taken. She decided not to do that. The minister did not want to talk to them, she just cut off the service. But when the outcry came she had to reverse her decision. Why did she announce something which she later had to renounce? Why did she not consult with the people directly in the first place? Was this a bad decision; was she uninformed or was she given bad advice—what was it? Whatever it was it suggests to me that the department, insofar as her authority is concerned, is not being run very smoothly or in the interest of the country. The decision was reversed and the minister has said she will take six months to consult with the Indian people. Why was this not done before?

I had some serious reservations about the actions of this minister which were elicited during the debate on this bill. I put them before the House but I do not expect the government to take any action—it never does. Nevertheless, it is on the record and I hope the next minister of health will try to do a better job in the interests of Canadians.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on third reading of Bill C-2 I must state that my reaction as I sat here listening to the minister's speech was quite different from that of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk).

I have been involved for many years in efforts to secure better health services of all kinds in this country. I am proud of the achievements we have made. But in this respect, like the hon. member for Athabasca, I think a great deal more has to be done. I feel very strongly that any cutting back of funds for a phase of medical care is a serious mistake. As I listened to the minister tonight I realized that she was making the best case she could by use of statistics and references to other countries and so on. It made me feel not only that our efforts over the decades have been worthwhile, but that the pushing and prodding we have done in recent years for more funds for medical research has not been in vain. The minister was able to report some progress tonight and to report changes in terms of providing funds for medical research. She was able to put forward a much better picture than was the case a year or two ago. For the minister to be able to say this kind of thing at a time when the government is practising restraint, and at a time when it is being pushed by the Tory party to practise even greater restraint, is something that should be recognized and applauded, and I am not ashamed to say so.

As a matter of fact, sir, when the hon. member for Athabasca picked up the article that appeared in the Toronto Star on Saturday, January 27 I was aware of it and I wondered how much of the article he was going to read. By way of an interjection I asked my friend if he would read the last paragraph. I wish he had because it would have been much easier listening to him read it than to read it myself. After the way the hon. member for Athabasca attacked the minister personally I have no apology at all for reading the last paragraph of the article that was written by Mary Janigan in the Toronto Star. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) says that the journalist was not in touch with her, but she was in touch with me and asked me what I thought of the minister. This is what appears in the Toronto Star, and let us have it on the record along with the quotations which the hon. member for Athabasca gave us awhile ago.

Perhaps the last word on Bégin should be left to New Democratic Party House leader Stanley Knowles, a lifelong fighter for better pensions for the poor, the disabled, veterans and the elderly. "Her ideas are much more progressive than those of many other ministers in that cabinet and she's trying hard," he says. "Very seldom do I put a question to her that she can't deal with and if she can't, she says so."

"She's doing quite well."

I notice the colour in the minister's face. It may not help her in the cabinet over there to have a member of the opposition say these things about her. Just to make it clear that this view is not held only by me, may I read one other paragraph from the article which refers to persons called insiders. They are not named, but this is the paragraph:

Insiders say now that Bégin is managing to retain her deep devotion to the poor while better understanding how to exercise political clout. Her arguments, often scattered in the past, now are more coherent—publicly and in cabinet. And "she never goes unheard by the Prime Minister."

If the Minister had to have all those nasty things said about her in order to get a few nice things said, maybe the price is not too high.

I have started reading something else in the health field. It is a rather monumental book by Malcolm Taylor on "Health Insurance and Canadian Public Policy." In fact he goes over the whole story and I have been associated with it one way or the other most of the time. It is a story of how inadequate our health services were in Canada a number of years ago and of how many persons, groups, organizations and governments had to get into the battle. It is a story of pushing and prodding. In particular it is a story of a pioneering done by the Saskatchewan CCF government when it first took office back in the middle 1940s. It is a story of pushing and prodding here in this place by some of us having to read many times the 1919 Liberal promises, some 30, 40 or 50 years later. It has not been in vain. We do have much better concern and attention for the health of our people today than was the case a few decades ago.

I may quarrel with the minister because she has so much trouble from the cabinet getting what she ought to get. But I think she deserves credit for fighting as hard as she does, and credit for being able to say tonight that some progress has been made in the matter of getting extra funds for medical research, and in the matter of increasing the personnel who are available to attend to the health needs of our people. I say that my reaction is quite different from that of the hon. member who spoke before me. These were not the thoughts I had when I was getting ready to say a few words on this bill. After his speech I felt that something like this should be said.

Having said that, I want to say that I still do not like Bill C-2. I do not like to cut back anywhere in terms of funds for the health needs of our people. I appreciate what the minister says, that the money is not needed in this area and is being made available in other places. I appreciate her contention that the health resources funds has done most of what it was intended to do. However, while sitting in my seat tonight, I looked over the speech that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), made at second reading of this bill on November 27, 1978. The charges he made against the government in my view still stand. When you consider what money is worth today compared with what it was worth when the Health Resources Fund Act was first brought into being, our contention is right, that the government should not be cutting back on the money available under this bill.

I also want to say that I do not like the extent to which, both under this measure and other health measures, the government keeps trying to push more and more of the costs of medical, hospital and other health services on to the provinces. I know the bind we are in these days with the provinces wanting more authority and some groups in this House calling for greater decentralization and regionalism. We have the Pepin-Robarts report saying the same thing.

I do not agree. I am an unrepentant federalist. I am a Canadian. I like to see standards of living and standards of health maintained at the same high level right across Canada. When you start to push these costs on to the provinces or participate with the provinces in programs and then withdraw and let the provinces carry them, inevitably health care standards are higher in some parts of the country and lower in others. It is the whole move in that direction on the part of the government I do not like. I appreciate that in her speech tonight the minister did not stay strictly within the terms of Bill C-2 but spoke in the context of the whole health program. I like to look at this bill in that same light.

We voted against this bill on second reading because it is a cutback as far as funds for health are concerned. We will vote against it again at third reading. When we do so, I hope the minister will see that it is a matter of continuing to prod, as people in this House have been doing since 1919, the government into bringing forward those measures that will provide in full for the health care of our people.

Despite talk about restraint and money not being available, I know of nothing more important for a society to do than to care for the health of its people. I have no use for any retreating there at all. Our vote against this cutback is a plea by us in the New Democratic Party that health stay at the top of the priority list as far as our people and the budgets of this country are concerned.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, some members are probably wondering why an agrologist is getting up to speak on health care. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is no doubt worried that I may talk about the health of animals and brucellosis. I am tempted to do that, but I know it would be out of order.

I wish to make a few comments tonight with regard to two areas. First, I will plead the case for more research in the health area for native people. I will deal with a number of statistics that are somewhat appalling when comparing native people and non-native people in this country.

I would also like to speak briefly about health resources funds being used to help young graduates attain a higher level of education by providing them with more funds. This is very necessary in the realm of education today. Many students attend university and receive their bachelor of science degrees, bachelor of arts degrees, or whatever. They then find that salaries are so attractive it would be too much for them to continue in their education. Therefore, we are not getting the numbers of young people continuing on to a masters or a doctors degree that will be required. This is because they are not being adequately supported by the governments of the day.

It was pointed out today that the Agriculture Institute of Canada is very worried about the fact that not enough students are continuing in their education to become the scientists of tomorrow. This particular funding is being provided in the health field, but governments should take this as a warning and provide funding in other fields as well.

I can give the example of CIDA. Non-Canadians are brought to this country to attend our universities. They are helped with the cost of their training. Hopefully they will return to their countries after completing their education. These students are provided with sufficient funding that they receive incomes of upwards of $6,000. In addition, their rooms, food and tuition are taken care of. Therefore, they can come to Canada and get their masters or doctors degree with relative ease.

Our graduate students are not accommodated in the same way by the Canadian government. As a result, they are looking for high paying jobs rather than becoming our much needed scientists of tomorrow. I thought I would comment on that because I am worried about my faculty and the research capability that will be available in the future as a result of this important situation.

An area that concerns me more is native health care in this country. The hon. member for Athabasca stated that $75 million of this health resource fund was spent on health research. It is my plea tonight that more funds be made available for the health research area. If they can be found, they should be channelled toward native health research and native health development. The statistics that I read trouble me. I intend to put them on the record. Much of the funding is channelled to health care that will help everyone, but not enough is being channelled to the area of native health development.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The minister recently announced some cutbacks in non-insured areas. The native people were so concerned that some 2,500 of them marched on the federal buildings in Edmonton, Alberta. The maritime chiefs found it necessary to come here to meet with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in order to discuss this.

The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) pointed out that the cost of moving Indian affairs personnel across the river from Ottawa to Hull cost $6 million, of which $500,000 was expended on the actual move. Money is still being spent on the accommodation in Ottawa that was vacated. Some of that funding could be provided for the research and development that is necessary to eliminate some of those areas in respect of Indian health care where these people are not being cared for adequately.

Bill C-2 is a cutback bill in the area of health services. The concept of health, if it is to be meaningful, must be viewed in the broadest possible context. This context must encompass the physical and social aspects of a person's well-being. It cannot refer only to the absence of disease. Indian people do not enjoy the state of health enjoyed by other Canadians. This is revealed most dramatically by statistics. The statistics with respect to the health of the Indian people in my province are horrifying. In Alberta the greatest causes of death among Indians are accidents, violence and poisoning. Dr. Kirkbride, the regional director of the Alberta Region, stated in his address to the All-Indian Chief Conference that accidents and violence accounted for 69 male and 30 female deaths. This represented some 37 per cent of all deaths among registered Indians. Many of these deaths were alcohol-related and could have been prevented. They were useless deaths. Violence accounted for most of the deaths occurring among those in the age group one to 49. Fifty-six out of every 100 deaths in pre-school children are due to accidents and violence. Sixty-six out of every 100 deaths in school children aged five to 14 are due to accidents and violence. Seventy-seven out of every 100 deaths among young adults aged 15 to 29 are due to accidents and violence.

The statistics on child mortality rates are just as frightening. The infant mortality rate per thousand live births for Indian people in Alberta in 1963 was 5.7. In 1970 it was 4.1 and in 1977 it was 2.2. One might say that the statistics show a drop and this is good to see, but it is still much higher than the 1.6 non-Indian infant mortality rate in 1977—1.6 as compared with 2.2 represents a difference of almost 60 per cent. When we look at the national statistics we find the mortality rate for Indian children is 2.4 per thousand compared to a national average among non-native children of 1.6.

I have just one more statistic concerning the average age of death to put on record, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the rate for adults. The average age of male deaths in Canada for the year 1973 was 63.6. For females it was 69.1. If we look at the average age for Canadian Indian males we find it was 41.5 in 1973 and 43.3 for females. In Alberta the statistics were even more alarming. The average age of death for Alberta Indians in 1973 was 37.4 years of age for females and 39.7 for males. This is astonishing and is one of the reasons why I feel compelled to plead this case tonight. I plead for more funds to be made available out of the Health Resources Fund than the $75 million which was available under these provisions and which would be to cut off under the terms of the bill before us.

Why are the native peoples living 23 or 24 years less than we are? If we consider some diseases, for instance, tuberculosis, which most of us do not even think about any more, we find they are on the increase among native people. I only have the statistics for Alberta but in that province there were 75 cases of TB in 1973 among native people. It has not significantly decreased, since the 1977 figure of 67. Treaty Indians in the northern part of the province experienced no incidence of TB ten years ago but in 1975 there were 18 cases and in 1977, 21 cases were reported. These statistics are an alarming indication of the over-all state of health suffered by the native people in this country. I could give many more examples because the Alberta Indian Association came to see me last week and left me some 100 pages documenting the proposition that their health care in non-insured areas should not be cut back.

As I said earlier, we need a broad definition of health. Therefore when considering the issue of poor health among Indians we must regard the socioeconomic conditions in which Indian people live. This encompasses a broad range of matters such as housing, sanitation, recreation, nutrition and employment. If one considers the issue of infant mortality, for example, the general level of sanitation in Indian communities would certainly affect the well-being of infants and children.

I would like here to quote Dr. Lyle Black, a senior official in the Ministry of National Health and Welfare. He is in charge of medical care for Indians and he said that he would not drink the water on the majority of the reserves in Canada today because of the lamentable sanitary and health conditions to be found there. He said that clean water, properly heated, insulated houses and recreation facilities all contribute to a child's health and well-being.

Again, we can refer to the need for good nutrition. It is well known that poor nutrition has long been a major contributing factor to lowered mental functioning, greater susceptibility to infectious diseases, poor oral hygiene and vision problems. Health problems such as gall bladder infection, infectious diseases, high infant mortality, nutritional anaemia, obesity, retarded physical growth, are increasingly plaguing our Indian people in this country today.

Ray Obomsawin, the health co-ordinator with the National Indian Brotherhood, stated in a 1977 paper that the incidence of diabetes among Indians was five times higher than among the general population. Yet one of the guidelines the minister announced would mean doing away with prescription drugs. We see the necessity of these drugs being available to the Indian people when we look at statistics like the diabetes statistics to which I have just referred.

I have noted that the main causes of death among Indians are accidents, violence and poisonings. For example, I will refer to the Hobbema Reserve in my own constituency. The Globe and Mail—an eastern paper but I was glad to note their interest in the subject—reported that people on this reserve were killing themselves at a rate 20 times greater than the national average. The community nurse in charge noted that during an 18-month period ending October, 1977, in addition to the 17 reported suicides there were 21 deaths due to consistent abuse in the use of alcohol and drugs. Seven people were found dead in unusual circumstances, although crime could not be proven. Seven deaths occurred in car accidents and four deaths among infants were due at least partially to neglect. There were four infant and 21 adult deaths due to natural causes. These facts are appalling and I cite them to illustrate the seriousness of the problem faced by the Indian people.

● (2140)

The reserve in my constituency to which I refer is one of the better-off Alberta reserves. There are oil revenues which provide much opportunity, and everything possible is being done to remedy this problem. Two detoxification centres have been established. They are being run by native people, and they are very successful. Attempts are being made to find employment for most of the people on the reserve. Still, we see statistics about people dying because of conditions under which other people do not have to live. That is why trained people who understand the problem are needed to work in consultation with native people to learn the reasons for these problems. Perhaps in this way they can be solved and conditions for native people can be brought closer to the national average.

I wanted to talk about problems regarding noon hour lunches for native Indian children, a policy which was discontinued. However, I will leave that for another time.

It is important that we improve conditions, and I have talked about that in my speech. There are complex problems, but we must consider prevention, research, community involvement and a high level of co-ordination and co-operation on the part of all groups and organizations concerned about the health of Indians.

To date this government has demonstrated that it lacks consistency and that it lacks co-ordination between departments. One department throws up its hands and says a certain problem is not its responsibility. There is no consistent, unified policy regarding Indian health. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has said, and I quote:

> I also recognize that the statistics on health show Indian people generally to be below the Canadian average. However, the basic causes for this are socio-economic, for example, inadequate housing, water supply and sewage disposal and unemployment.

The minister went on to say:

> These matters are outside the control of my department.

I am happy that the minister realizes there are problems in those areas, but she should not throw up her hands, say that they are outside the control of her department and slough the problems off on someone else. It happens too often when people come to departments for help, that departments tell them their problems are not the responsibilities of those departments and that they should go somewhere else.

Then there are cutbacks, and the minister says they are not her responsibility. Surely the minister should have consulted the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) as well as native people. She should have consulted the Alberta Indian association, the Canadian Indian association and perhaps even some bands to decide whether more research funds should be spent.

I talked about consultation. There is to be a six-month period of grace. The National Indian Brotherhood has emphasized the need for involvement of tribal and band governments in the process of clearly defining health goals. Indian people know very well that they should be involved at all stages of negotiation and planning with regard to native programs. They should be involved from the community level up. Indian problems differ from those of the non-native community.

Another area of concern to me is the need for preventive health care. I want to quote Dr. Lyle Black, director-general of medical services, who has said that a shortcoming in the area of medical services "was apparently a total lack of programs related to preventive health".

Dr. Black said further that co-ordination between all government and university health services is needed to reduce the basic unsanitary and unhygienic conditions which can range from house design and house construction to water supply systems and waste water disposal systems which are rendered particularly difficult by such things as permafrost. Dr. Black also mentioned, something which we as non-native people do not experience, that many doctors and nurses who go into native communities, which are often far away from civilization, are not prepared to spend much time there. Because of that, many native people go to their doctor, are examined, subjected to tests and released, only to return a few weeks later when their problems still are not solved to find there is a new doctor who orders new tests and new prescriptions. The poor patients do not know where they stand. Dr. Black emphasized that the Department of National Health and Welfare should consider it obligatory that doctors who go into these areas keep very extensive notes on the problems of patients so that if there is a turnover, doctors who come in as replacements know exactly what treatment should be given, what tests have been done and what the results of those tests are.

I wanted to make a case tonight not only for the Indian and native people in my riding but also for those all across Canada. I hope the Department of National Health and Welfare will take into account the statistics which have been put on the record and the need for adequate research into why these statistics are as they are. I hope the department will attempt to solve this problem and bring the health of native people up to the same standard as that enjoyed by other Canadians.

The minister said she reversed herself when she offered a six-month grace period with regard to cutbacks. I think it is very important that after six months the cutbacks are not just re-introduced, with nothing happening in the meantime. It is very important that the consultation process go on, that native people be taken into consideration and that the health care of this very important group in our society is adequate.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments on Bill C-2 which strikes me as being of capital importance. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, chapter H-4 of our statutes. The act stipulated that payments be made to help the provinces finance medical research with a view to improving the health of Canadians. Bill C-2 says, and I quote:

> No payment shall be made under this Act in respect of any cost incurred in respect of a health training facility unless payment of a contribution toward the cost thereof was authorized by the Minister pursuant to subsection 4(1) or 5(1) before September 9, 1978."

I agree wholeheartedly with the earlier comments of the House leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am convinced he was sincere when he said the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) was doing everything she could to improve research possibilities and give Canadians a chance to improve their condition and their health. Unfortunately he added—and it is with a little regret that I express this reservation with respect to Bill C-2 because I believe that in 1979 the best investment we could make would be to continue to provide assistance for research to allow our institutions to provide better health services.

I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I happen to have a daughter who is in that field and who loves her work very much. She was telling me at Christmas that she deplores that our hospitals could not do more precisely because of those restrictions and the lack of financial resources.

There may be cases sometimes, Mr. Speaker, where money, taxes paid by Canadians are being misused. That does not give the results we would like to see. But considering the percentage of waste that may exist, I do believe that the government should not reduce the funds intended for research because in the final analysis the people of Canada are living in an excessively difficult climate. I sometimes compare our conditions here in Canada with those in some other countries, particularly during the difficult months we are going through. We had a very tough month of January. We had big snowstorms. It was cold. We had difficult climatic conditions. In spite of all that, I say it is one of the attractive features of Canada that countries like those in the far south do not experience.

But we have to be prepared for that. We need very well designed houses, particularly these days, because of concerns with respect to energy reserves. We need well-insulated houses. However, I find complaining all the time a little disgusting and sometimes disheartening because you have to recognize that we have certain advantages in Canada in spite of the climate and the harsh winters. Today is February 1. Tonight we realized that the sun set a little later, so the day was longer, the sun was out longer, and it seems to me that every day we are going to gain vitality.

Mr. Lapointe: That will be something to see.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): No, no, I find that extraordinary. My hon. colleague for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe) says that will be something to see. I do not know what he means by that. For whom? I do not know. But for me it is going to be really interesting, and people who live with me are going to like it too, whatever the hon. member for Charlevoix may think.

Mr. Lapointe: If you have more vitality than you have now, that will be something to see.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): In any event, I want to say to the minister that even if this bill is passed, she will still have some authority and she should use her feminine charm to try to convince her cabinet colleagues and the Treasury Board not to reduce the funds granted for research. The minister says no. I am very happy if this is not the case and if I failed to understand the bill. However, the minister still has a certain authority and certain alternatives.

I hope that what she decides to do will not prevent our institutions and the people involved from doing more because of a lack of funds. If we need to invest some money for a good cause, it is certainly in this area. I have heard many times the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) tell us of her concern for the poor in our country. She wants to alleviate poverty and she wants Canadian families to live a better life, and I can appreciate and understand this. I would have liked to ask her a question today on this subject during question period, but unfortunately I did not have enough time to get to the bottom of the problem.

However, I was sorry to see in a newspaper concerning the child tax credit that since it will be occasionally and certainly granted to the individuals and the families who request it, the government of my province will decrease proportionally its welfare payments. At the federal level, we try to help families with children. I am certain that all members of parliament, whatever their party, try to co-operate in this regard with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to provide additional income for poor families that are in real need of assistance.

We had many discussions during the last session about the famous sales tax reduction. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said in his comments that this would increase the purchasing power of needy families. This was supposed to stimulate the consumption of goods and services in two areas at once: Increase the purchasing power, allow our economy to be more active in order to create jobs because of consumption of necessary goods to increase purchasing power. Then the government of the province of Quebec—I would like my message to be heard by intelligent people. This is where television is important, and radio, and the rest. Blunders—and I hope we do not make too many—boobs make the headlines. But serious considerations are not reported to the people.

I therefore call upon the press, the CBC and all other media to get our message across to the Quebec government, especially the health minister there. If the press report I read is accurate, if income tax credits, as the Minister of National Health calls them, and the 13th cheque sent families in addition to the usual twelve family allowances cheques there will be a 13th with a $200 payment per child. Having made a computation, I must say honestly I am quite happy with this. It will really increase revenues for families with net incomes below $18,000. But if, on the other hand, my provincial government reduces the benefits paid to families living off welfare in the same proportion, the final result will simply be that while we are trying here to increase those families' revenues, to give them added security, to give them a more decent life, the government will take all this away from them. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

LABOUR RELATIONS—REASON AIRCRAFT OPERATIONS PERSONNEL WITHOUT CONTRACT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a few minutes on a matter about which

I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) is very much concerned, and about which I think all government members should be concerned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope you get the correct answer.

Mr. Fraser: I do not participate in these debates anticipating that we will necessarily receive the correct answer. In reply to the hon. member's interjection, quite often we receive no answer at all.

The Minister of Labour and hon. members of the government ought to listen with some care to what I say tonight. The official position of the government is that it is in favour of paying government employees on the basis of comparability with the private sector. This is a principle with which my party agrees. As the critic on labour matters, I am quite prepared to say that this is an appropriate approach to be taken by any government in Canada.

I should like to bring to the attention of the House a situation in which the government, and generally speaking the country, are absolutely refusing to recognize the question of comparability. I refer to the Canadian Union of Professional and Technical Employees, and specifically I refer to the civil aviation inspectors in that group. This is not a large number of people, approximately 400. But, these people are completely responsible for civil aviation safety regulations in the country, and the flying public is completely dependent upon the government's ability to maintain within this group those competent and able people. I am not approaching this subject in a partisan manner, but I do not think there is any member in the House who would deny its importance.

I should like to emphasize what Mr. Walter McLeish, the head of the government's air transportation, said a few weeks ago. He indicated that the civil aviation inspectors are the backbone of the organization, in that they are in conjunction with other related officials the guardians of aviation safety in this country.

This group of civil aviation inspectors has not had a contract since 1975. If one looks at the total average income of the three subgroups within the aircraft operations group which comprises these people, one will find that the total average annual income is $25,240. A survey of 32 small independent aviation companies in Canada, on any comparability basis, indicates that the average annual income is $35,000. These people upon whom we depend to inspect and pass, for safety purposes, the other pilots of the country, are being paid $10,000 less.

The Canadian Airline Pilots Association has given me figures which show that in the current year for Air Canada the average annual wage for a pilot is $44,000 compared to $25,000 for those people who inspect the airplanes. At Canadian Pacific, the other major airline, the average wage for a pilot is $42,000 per year in comparison to $25,000 for the people who inspect the airplanes. We have here a situation where for a number of years we have grossly underpaid a small group of people essential to the safety of aviation in Canada. The government, especially through my good friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell), has indicated that it wants public sector wage levels to be comparable to wage levels in the private sector and other sectors. The Treasury Board does not seem to have heard the minister or the government because their recent offer included an increase of only 5.7 per cent, which amounts to $1,425 per year.

We are facing a shameful situation in which the Government of Canada is deliberately and without justification, based upon a stated policy of comparability, not even giving these people, who have not had a contract for three years, an offer comparable with wages in the private sector. I realize there is necessity for restraint and for not allowing matters to get out of line, but I also realize that as of January 1, 1979, there were 50 vacancies in this vital group, and that since the beginning of January another ten people have left, increasing the number of vacancies to 60.

To the degree that we cannot maintain these highly qualified people, the whole safety system of aviation inspection in this country is in danger. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) has remarked on this matter in the House. We have had some answers from the government side, but they have not been adequate. If the Government of Canada believes that the public service should be paid the same as those in the private sector—a principle with which I fully agree—then the time has come—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

● (2210)

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may think that the answers given in this House last January 25 by my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Miss Nicholson) are not adequate but, as he raised again this matter and said that the government has refused to sign a contract with civil aviation inspectors since 1975, I shall repeat part of the answer given in the House, as I said, on January 25 and I quote:

> The group has been without a collective agreement since July, 1975. Both the former and current bargaining agents refused to enter into a new collective agreement. They thought it might prejudice their attempts to have overturned the order—

The hon. member should listen to what I have to say. He probably did not read the answer given on January 25 and if he does not agree with that answer he should ask a new question tomorrow and ask again for a late show and we shall try to give him more explanations. Mr. Speaker, he just has to listen.

The regulations of the Anti-Inflation Board limited to $2,400 the maximum increase, and the civil aviation inspectors group appealed the government's decision. There being an appeal, the bargaining agents of the group refused to sign the agreement. The government unilaterally granted the maximum authorized in August 1976 by the Anti-Inflation Board for that period, so that the salary of the group has increased by 11.5 per cent from July 1975 to July 1976—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Lapointe: It was the comparability question that was involved, that is what you said. On this question of comparability, I do not think we can say much in this House tonight. I should like to say, however, that since the aircraft operations group recommenced negotiations on January 30, that surely is best way in which to discuss comparability of rates of pay at the bargaining table, rather than this chamber. A system for collective bargaining for public servants is in place and we should permit that system to work without undue interference from members of parliament.

STATISTICS CANADA—ABOLITION OF JOB VACANCY SURVEY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister yesterday was based on the premise that the job vacancy survey which has been done away with was a very important statistic which should not have been done away with lightly. It was a legitimate measure of the job demand and job opportunity for the hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians in this once stable and prosperous country.

In 1974, for example, there was an average number of job vacancies on a daily basis of 102,000. In 1978, the average number of job vacancies on a daily basis was 44,000. This means that only half the number of vacancies existed last year on a daily basis as existed four years ago. This is the part of the government's record of non-achievement, like the devastating $1 billion per month deficit, about which they do not like to have data published.

In the best traditions that existed years ago, when they would shoot the messenger who brought bad news, it appears someone—probably the chief statistician on instructions from the PMO—decided to do away with the embarrassing statistic that showed there were less than 50,000 jobs for the nearly one million unemployed in this country.

People like the president of the Canadian Labour Congress protested and wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asking for a change in policy in this regard. I wanted to know the response given to Mr. McDermott's letter of last November. Instead the Prime Minister, for some reason, gave me an answer which had nothing to do with the question I asked but which referred to the consumer price index.

The minister responsible, and I hesitate to use that word referring to ministers across the aisle—the minister in charge, if I could use that instead—said that Statistics Canada placed a high priority on its labour surveys. If that is so, why did it abolish this important statistical adjunct of labour surveys? One must also ask why Statistics Canada is doing such a stupid, time-consuming, complicated, expensive survey as the one which has drawn so much fire recently in this House, while not being able to carry on the very legitimate and necessary measurement of jobs for Canadians?

The history of Statistics Canada's problems related to this and other matters goes back some distance. It is not just focussed in the recent criticisms of the C.D. Howe Institute or editorials in The Globe and Mail. It goes back beyond that, as most hon. members realize. In an article which appeared in the Toronto Sun on November 8, 1976, Doug Fisher wrote:

> A top heavy executive structure, too many high salaried, well educated, under used, rank and perquisite conscious officers, topped by a boss who has lost control because the structure is too complex for him, not least because he's a relative outsider.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is having problems with Statistics Canada. He was once in charge of it when he was minister of industry, trade and commerce. In that respect, when questioned by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and myself on November 8, 1976, he said he would seek answers from the chief statistician to the vexing problem of unacceptably inaccurate data emanating from Statistics Canada about our national economy. This is the same minister who turned down my request for an inquiry into Statistics Canada and refused the wager of my seat against his regarding conditions in Statistics Canada. All of this is a matter of record. We must consider that only two years later the same minister, now in finance, and, to use a paradox, in charge again of our national economy, has the gall to criticize Statistics Canada for sins it committed while he was in charge. One can check the minister's press conference of last August when he panned the data produced when he was, to use a misnomer, in charge. Were it not for the harm being done to the economy by the data being put out by Statistics Canada, it would be poetic justice if this minister, who is now being hampered by the data from Statistics Canada, were to be victimized, particularly when he had a chance while in charge to to something about it, instead of acting as an apologist. Perhaps the most alarming problem in Statistics Canada in relation to this issue is the number of complaints arising in the department, the number of grievances being filed by the Public Service Alliance and the way in which these grievances are being dealt with when they reach higher levels. It shows dissatisfaction by the employees, so much so that The Globe and Mail in its July 4, 1978 editorial labelled our national statistical agency as "Sadistics Canada."

● (2215)

Speaking of surveys let us not forget the debacle of the costly and time consuming census done in 1971. This cost millions of dollars in terms of taxpayers' money, wasted time and money lost by the private sector. It was mishandled by this agency and it was never used as the committee minutes will reveal. We are not reassured on this side of the House when we find that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), either through inadvertence or lack of knowledge, confused something as well known as the Consumer Price Index with the controversial job vacancy survey.

The president of the CLC wrote to the Prime Minister concerning this last fall, and that was the subject of my question. We need a shake up in Statistics Canada. We need a minister in charge of this department who understands a little about the elementary work and its terminology. We need to remind the Prime Minister that he too has some responsibility. We probably need a new chief statistician in the person of a top administrator. There are lots of people around, believe it or not, who could fill that position. For instance, Mr. Sylvain Cloutier is a name that comes to mind. He is a man with a proven track record in this regard.

We cannot tolerate any longer our national statistical agency seething with incompetence in the production of data, despite the apologists on the other side. It is obvious from the comments made by reputable financial institutions that it is hampering this country's economy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the public expenditure cutbacks announced by the government last August, Statistics Canada's budget for next fiscal year has been reduced. Consequently this statistics agency had to examine and evaluate carefully all its on-going programs to see what could be cut back or discontinued.

The basic principle used in this task was to protect all the major national economic statistics. Except for these, however, all surveys were reviewed and classified by order of importance, the objective being to discontinue some. The job vacancy survey was considered of a lesser priority than other series which Statistics Canada continues to produce.

The decision to cancel the job vacancy survey was taken after consideration of the interest shown by the users for the information collected. After inquiries sent to individuals in the private sector as well as in the government, it was realized that the information on available positions was not systematically used by economists, political authorities nor by those who are responsible for programs nor by any other group of users. To that finding was added the fact that even if it had a general indicative value, the survey did not answer the administrative aims which have finally been felt to be more important. In addition, it was costly and quite burdensome for respondents.

The survey was launched as a result of a study made by Statistics Canada in co-operation with the Department of Employment and Immigration to determine the unfulfilled manpower demand. While Employment and Immigration Canada uses those data on vacant positions to establish its quotas per profession, it is a secondary use in relation with the prime aim and there are less costly and more practical ways to meet that special need.

The collection of data for that survey has been cancelled. The last publication for 1978 will appear in March 1979. The calendar has been approved by the Department of Employment and Immigration.

In the last few years, Mr. Speaker, Canada was probably the only western country to make a regular job vacancy survey on a large scale. The United States abandoned theirs in 1973.

SHIPPING—PILOTAGE RATES FOR SMALL VESSELS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with the question I asked in the House on December 20 of last year of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) about the outrageous increase in pilotage rates in the Atlantic provinces by the Atlantic pilotage authority. I also raised the question last June in the House of Commons when the Atlantic pilotage authority first proposed these renewed increases in Atlantic Canada. I also raised it when the minister appeared before the transport committee on June 15, 1978. I pointed out to the minister that this would be the fourth increase in pilotage rates in Atlantic Canada since 1972.

The minister said they were giving $600,000 to the authority to help with their budget for this year, but that this would stop with his infamous user-pay principle and they had to be able to break even by 1980.

Large increases in pilotage fees were instituted in 1977 after tremendous opposition. Before 12 months had passed, the Atlantic pilotage authority with their voracious maw and insatiable propensity for spending money and increasing their fees were again looking for another increase. This went before the Canadian Transport Commission which held hearings in September. They compounded all of the errors and the felonies involved here by approving increases in excess of what the Atlantic pilotage authority had asked.

The commission approved an increase for small vessels of 62 per cent, for medium vessels of 30 per cent and for larger vessels of 18 per cent. This was at a time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was saying that we must practice restraint in Canada and keep down our wages and prices.

The Minister of Transport should get his black belt for destroying economic opportunities in the Atlantic provinces with this kind of policy, permitting what he agrees is an unsatisfactory situation. The minister says he is not satisfied with the pilotage set-up in Canada and that he will bring in legislation. Why does he not act to stop this huge increase in costs for shipping in the Atlantic provinces?

If the Minister of Transport is left to have his way, he will make a desert of the port of St. John's and other ports in Atlantic Canada. He is choking port business by allowing these huge increases in fees.

Today the Board of Economic Development Ministers announced shipbuilding assistance. What they announced was very stingy, but it will be assistance. They are going to carry out a program. They talked about assistance to the drydock in St. John's and other drydocks. What is the good of that if foreign vessels will not come into our ports because of the huge increase in pilotage fees?

The increases were approved and went into effect on January 22. We only learned of them a week later. They were in effect before we knew about them. I want to quote Captain Douglas Latter, chairman of the authority, as follows:

> Latter said a drop in expected revenues from the recent fee increase may force these fees even higher next year.
> The authority has calculated the higher fees will derive a 21 per cent increase in revenues, if shipping remains at 1978 levels.

● (2225)

But traffic in the harbours of Atlantic Canada is down 12 per cent from the previous year and it may go down even more despite these increases. In fact, it will probably go down because of the increases in pilotage fees. Then they will come back and ask for another increase next year.

This is a policy of choking the ports of Atlantic Canada. There must be a thorough investigation of this situation. The minister should ask that these increases not go into effect. Why the discrimination against small vessels? How can we attract foreign fleets into our ports if we impose these increases of 69 per cent? Take, for example, Spanish pair trawlers previously paid $650 for pilotage inward and outward at the city of St. John's and movement within the port. That fee will increase to $1,100 under the new system, a 69 per cent increase. For a single Spanish trawler the increase will be 48 per cent, from $370 to $550. We spent three years persuading the Spanish fishing fleet to come back to the city of St. John's to conduct their business instead of St. Pierre and Miquelon, the French territories, and now we are going to lose it again because of these huge increases.

Not only that, but the increases originally advertized by the Atlantic pilotage authority are not the increases which have gone into effect. The Canadian Transport Commission which is supposed to defend the consumer approved increases larger than were asked for by the Atlantic pilotage authority. Take the port of St. John's, for example. I will put on record the number of vessels using that port last year. There were 780 vessels of 1,828,000 tons which were Canadian-owned. This shows the small size of the vessels. In addition, there were 846 foreign vessels with a gross tonnage of 1,591,000. Again, this shows how small the vessels are. The increase to which I have referred will hurt the city of St. John's more than any other port in the Atlantic provinces. Of those foreign vessels, 180 were Portuguese trawlers, 100 were Russian trawlers, some 215 were Spanish trawlers. These increases of between 50 and 60 per cent are going to strike that traffic. How can we become the service centre of the North Atlantic in St. John's, in Halifax, in Saint John, New Brunswick, and the rest of the Atlantic ports if the government is going to permit these huge cost increases to be levied on users without concern to the efficiency with which the operation is run?

This is a quasi-independent operation. Why, for instance, should pilots in St. John's be paid on the same basis as pilots in Halifax? Pilots in Halifax have to go out ten miles to bring a ship in while in St. John's they might have to go out a mile, perhaps. In St. John's today we have several class A pilots who were originally supposed to bring tankers in and out of the Come-By-Chance oil refinery; they are now bringing in small vessels yet they have to be paid at the rates applicable to class A pilots. Surely this is not necessary. All kinds of changes could be made to reduce these costs but the government does not care. Apparently the government is not fazed by these huge increases. What is the good of giving assistance to the dockyard at St. John's, putting in a synchro-lift, if we are scaring off potential traffic? Here is Atlantic Canada on the verge of a breakthrough at last in these areas—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. Order at the back of the House!

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Under the Pilotage Act, Mr. Speaker, pilotage authorities should establish fair and reasonable rates which would enable them to make some profits and to accrue all other income needed to finance their own operations.

When the act came into force in 1972, we were aware that considerable increases would be necessary to attain that objective but we hoped that the four pilotage authorities would become financially autonomous from three to five years later. The Pacific and Laurentian pilotage authorities have already achieved that end and consequently they do not need any government subsidy. The Great Lakes and Atlantic pilotage authorities recently published new rates which, according to them, will enable them to become financially autonomous within two years. As foreseen in the act, representations were made to the Canadian Transport Commission which held public hearings and made a decision in each case. As far as the Atlantic region is concerned, the commission recommends an increase in the rates established by the port of St. John's, an increase of 40 per cent for small vessels, 25 per cent for average vessels and 35 per cent for larger vessels.

● (2230)

[English]

The foreign fishing vessels to which these rates will apply are, for the most part, Portuguese, Spanish, Russian or Japanese. Because of the number of vessels moving in the harbour, the pilotage authority believes that pilotage is essential for reasons of security.

In so far as the rates which I have indicated are concerned, the normal review processes of the Canadian Transport Commission are available to interested parties to pursue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

REQUEST FOR MEASURE TO AMEND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion for the unanimous consent of the House. I have sent a copy of this motion to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to give him the opportunity, which I am sure he welcomes, of supporting it in the House.

Action to alleviate the revenue problems of the national capital region and other Canadian municipalities is now past due. Considerable distress has been caused by the failure to update the government's policy on grants in lieu of taxes, particularly in the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton where the decision to send public servants to Hull during the business day has left a large number of taxpaying businesses in serious difficulty. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That the government proceed immediately with the introduction of an act to amend the Municipal Grants Act, and arrange to send the subject matter to the appropriate standing committee, to enable the committee to fully examine the question of grants in lieu of taxes, and hear representatives of interested municipalities.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

RESCISSION OF GRANTS TO PROFITABLE COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) announced a $235 million giveaway at the taxpayers' expense to large, profitable pulp and paper companies in Canada. This morning Domtar, one of the recipients of this handout, announced the acquisition of Reed Paper Limited, of Toronto. In view of Domtar's profits of $63 million in 1978, an increase of 136 per cent over the previous year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House strongly urges the government to rescind the policy announced yesterday of providing large, profitable pulp and paper companies with the taxpayers' money, since the industry is simply using these profits to increase their concentration without providing one additional new job in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PROTECT VICTIMS OF RAPE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The rape bill, C-52, presented for first reading by the former minister of justice has been abandoned by the present minister. The bill redefined rape for the purpose of ensuring the protection of the victim from cross-examination with reference to past sexual conduct, all of which was requested by all women's organizations in Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the Minister of Justice produce a new bill assuring the protection of the raped victim from being brutalized by cross-examination and being categorized as a compellable witness by the defence to determine the right to produce such evidence in a voir dire, meaning a trial within a trial, and its admissibility during the main trial to prevent fear tactics against victims reporting the crime in question.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be debated at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF ALLOCATIONS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of serious and urgent necessity which involves the blatant misuse of public funds and the pursuit of narrow, partisan political motives in allocating funds on a constituency basis under the current Young Canada Works program. An analysis of the allocations made to the 23 constituencies in British Columbia shows that the ridings represented by Liberal members have received 50 per cent of all funds available to the entire province despite the fact that the allocations cannot be related to or reconciled with youth unemployment statistics. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration be required to lay before the House immediately, or at least before any disbursement of the $6 million dollars allocated to British Columbia is made, all documentation and criteria on which the allocations are based and that the minister be instructed to cease forthwith this ridiculous practice of political pork-barrelling.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR DECREASE IN FOREIGN FACTORY SHIPS AND FREEZER-TRAWLERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the stated aversion of the Minister of Fisheries to the construction of even one freezer-trawler by Canadians for the catching of presently underutilized species, while licensing in 1978 some 300 foreign factory ships and some 190 freezer-trawlers within our 200-mile limit, an action which is decreasing the supply of fish for our inshore fishermen, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the minister institute a policy to progressively decrease the number of foreign factory ships and freezer-trawlers within our economic zone for 1979.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LOTTERIES

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF SOCIAL AND SOCIO-ECONOMIC EFFECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on an increasingly urgent matter. Since the establishment and expansion of the number of government-operated lotteries has coincided with a general decrease in charitable donations to private sector volunteer service organizations, and considering that there is evidence that lower and middle income groups are disproportionate buyers of those lottery tickets, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni):

That this House urge the government to undertake a thorough study of the social and socio-economic effects of the lotteries to determine whether they are becoming a voluntary tax aimed at the poor while crippling the ability of private sector agencies to raise sufficient funds to help the same people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR HEARING OF PICKETER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Our "lady of the lonely vigil" has demonstrated to all Canadians her deep-felt injustice by her personal sacrifice and attendance at the entrance to the parliament buildings. FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER CENTRAL BANK EXCHANGES ARRANGED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Has the government arranged or is it attempting to arrange central bank swaps with Germany, Switzerland or Japan?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Stevens: Has the minister or anybody in his department or at the Bank of Canada had ongoing discussions with the International Monetary Fund with respect to our foreign exchange position?

Mr. Chrétien: No, Mr. Speaker. The credit of the Canadian government is very good. We have not gone to the IMF. We are having no special discussions with the fund at this moment, and we are not planning any.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as the lines of credit arranged with Canadian chartered banks and certain foreign banks of $5.5 billion are now more than half used up, would the minister indicate whether attempts are being made to arrange any further lines of credit?

INQUIRY WHETHER FOREIGN EXCHANGE FLUCTUATIONS AFFECT BORROWING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is the Government of Canada hedging against potential losses on its borrowing because of foreign exchange fluctuations?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I explained the system of foreign borrowings on several occasions before the committee. I will appear before the committee next week, and so will the governor of the Bank of Canada, and if the hon. member wishes to ask questions we will be pleased to answer them. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will also attend when the governor will appear before the committee.

[English]

Mr. Gillies: I take it the answer is no, Mr. Speaker. Is the government arranging with the provinces some sort of insurance scheme against losses on foreign exchange fluctuations in order that they can come back into the capital markets?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the borrowing by the provinces is done by them. We have talked with the provincial ministers of finance. I met with them in December, and there was no such discussion.

Mr. Gillies: Will the Minister of Finance consider arranging an insurance program so that the provinces can go back into foreign borrowing?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are not thinking in those terms at all.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ROLLBACK OF ALGOMA STEEL CORPORATION PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday morning Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie raised its prices once again, the third time in 12 months. It is anticipated that other steel companies in the industry are going to follow suit almost immediately. Such increases will permeate the economy and profoundly affect the cost of living. Since Algoma increased its prices last year by at least 10 per cent and experienced profit increases last year of 209 per cent, will the minister insist that this company roll back the announced increase until it can justify further increases and that only at that time will the government permit a price increase?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will refer that matter to the director of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act to see if there is any possible infraction of that act. I will also refer the matter to CSIP, which is in a better position than I am to analyse that type of increase. Following the receipt of information I will be able to know if I am in a position to take any other action; but I should tell the hon. member that I have no legal authority to force rollbacks. We can jawbone and have discussions with business executives, but we have no authority under the law to roll back.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows well that ministers of the Crown and the Prime Minister in particular have very significant moral authority in a political system. Two United States presidents in recent years, Kennedy and Johnson, called in steel industry heads under similar circumstances, requested rollbacks and got them.

Considering that the workers involved at Sault Ste. Marie received increases of only between 7 per cent and 8 per cent, below the increase in the cost of living, last year, and considering that the profit figure for Algoma is up to 209 per cent and it is now going through with a third price increase in a year, does the minister not think it is time to stop referring such increases? The minister has dealt with food prices, lumber prices and Bell increases in the past. It is time to stop referring increases to committees for investigation and to take direct action to stop increases.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, before we take action I think we should be certain of the grounds on which we act. It is not as if we are referring matters to committees. I did not say that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Of course, the New Democratic Party often acts without thinking or checking facts, but we do not do that. I said that these are serious matters, that I will check out the information, and if it is appropriate to do so I or one of my colleagues will talk to these executives and ask them to act in a reasonable fashion.

● (1120)

Mr. Broadbent: Two days ago the minister suggested—and I did not raise this as a question of privilege although it would have been permitted—that my statistics were wrong. A colleague of his many months ago said we were wrong when we pointed out there was hidden unemployment in this country, and not many months afterwards another department confirmed that what we had to say was the truth. If the minister has an accusation to make, I should like to suggest that he make it in the House; but short of doing that, will he take action on behalf of the consumers of this country and on behalf of the workers whose wages and incomes are being held down and have been held down under the controls program to ensure that there is some economic justice, instead of making little speeches against the opposition?

Mr. Allmand: As I said before, Mr. Speaker, we are willing to take action, but unlike the opposition, unlike the NDP, we do not believe in knee-jerk reactions every time something happens. When we act, we want to act on a sound basis. I believe that these price increases are serious and we will take action, but it will be action appropriate to our authority.

An hon. Member: Lots of talk, a great heart and no guts.

Mr. Allmand: You have neither.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER COMPENSATION WILL BE PAID FOR LOSSES OF APPLE PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Apple producers in the Quebec area have experienced losses in the sale of their product during 1977 and 1978. Can the minister tell the House whether he has received representations from that organization asking him to appeal to the Agricultural Stabilization Board so that they be granted compensation for 1977?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, many members have made representations to me on behalf of apple producers in the province of Quebec, some as late as this week. I am happy to say that the stabilization board's submission was approved yesterday. This amounts to 1.95 cents per pound, because of low prices and the poor climatic conditions they have had for colouring of the apples, etc. These apples did not reach the grade enabling them to go into the normal market. Many of them were used for apple juice and cider, and the competition from the low priced apples from across the border in the United States made it impractical for the producers to carry on an economic operation, so we saw fit to stabilize their apple prices for that year.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): In view of the minister's intelligent reply—

Mr. Lapointe: As usual.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): As usual. May I ask, if the problem was definitely settled yesterday, in how many weeks apple producers can expect to get a monetary settlement as a result of yesterday's decision?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the applications are available through our Quebec regional office, the fruit and vegetable division of the food production and marketing branch of my department. These applications are available for producers to fill in, and as soon as they are filled in cheques will be sent out to them as soon as possible. The quicker they receive the applications, the quicker they can send out the cheques.

FINANCE

LIMIT OF EXCHANGE RATE ON FOREIGN BORROWING

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. At what exchange rate will the government consider stopping to borrow abroad?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are allowing our dollar to float just now and we do not intend to change our policy. I have already explained on a number of occasions that we are now borrowing abroad because the provinces, municipalities and corporations which normally do borrow abroad have reduced their borrowing, and we have decided to take their place. Whether it is a federal, provincial or municipal government which is borrowing, the result is absolutely the same on the exchange market.

INQUIRY CONCERNING EXCHANGE RATE

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the Minister of Finance indicate whether the purpose of a major part of his borrowing is to stem the outflow of Canadian capital?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the situation as to the outflow of Canadian capital is not more difficult than it was over the past few years.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER PROGRAM EXPENDITURES TO BE REDISTRIBUTED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. Yesterday he announced with great fanfare massive government infusion of funds to brighten the future of the bleak forest converting industry. Unfortunately the only bright part of the interview was the lights shining on the minister, because they obscured the key phrase in the minister's statement which indicated that the money will come from a gradual redistribution of expenditures of existing and future DREE agreements. Is the minister able to tell us today which of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion programs will be affected and thrown into this shell game? What regional shifts will take place to accommodate the minister's new scheme?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, the expenditures through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for forest products industries in fiscal 1979-1980 will not require one dollar more than the amount already allocated to that department. Therefore, there will be no additional cash flow burden on the fiscal framework. For the subsequent years, ranging from five to seven years, DREE has some projected budgets which will contain additional funding for these particular agreements. At some stage perhaps it will displace some other scheme which might have taken place. There is a possibility of a range of approximately $15 million per year following 1979-1980 which may require new funding; but it is possible to consider containing even that within the projected DREE budgeting.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, since the minister's statement was related to the tabling of the task force report which contained 39 specific recommendations, the major one being the refurbishing of crucial research efforts and the efforts of the forest products laboratories, is the minister able to say whether any of the money he is talking about shifting from other agencies will be directed toward that type of effort? Would he not agree that really he was misleading Canadians yesterday in front of the television camera by letting them believe he was serious about supporting an industry facing a bleak future?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well his last comment is absolute nonsense. As to the need for research within the forest resources management aspect of the program announced yesterday, yes, very definitely there will be research for regeneration and for examining faster growing species. Those will be negotiated with the provinces, but it is intended very definitely to contain a serious effort in that direction.

TRANSPORT

REPORTED REDUCTION IN CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the absence of ministers from the prairie provinces, I have to direct a question to him on a matter which affects deeply western farmers. It has to do with a report of discussions on the prairies in the last few days that consideration is being given to the removal or reduction of Crowsnest pass rates which, according to the Snavely commission, would mean a loss to western farmers of $160 million to $300 million a year. Being fully conversant with this problem, will the minister promise that as long as he is minister this will not be agreed to by him?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely promise the House and the right hon. member that as long as I am minister I will continue to serve western Canada to the best of my ability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Specifically regarding the Crowsnest pass rates, I am fully aware of the extensive discussions which are going on in the prairie provinces today respecting the controversy as to whether the rates are beneficial or harmful. I noted last week, I think it was, that the farmers' union—Unifarm, the farm organization in the province of Alberta—has advocated some changes. I myself, of course, will be taking my own census of the mood of the prairies with regard to this very important subject matter this weekend and in the coming months.

● (1130)

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister deserves no congratulations for having joined in the thinking of a government that is very evasive on this subject. That surprises me greatly. What I ask him again is this: Does his evasiveness indicate that he is now in a state of uncertainty because of the attitude of some of his fellow ministers and that the Crowsnest pass rates, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, to which I referred a moment ago with respect to the loss will not be interfered with? That is the simple question.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the answer is that rarely am I uncertain, and I am not uncertain on this question at all. I think that this government will act in accordance with the wishes of the people in western Canada. The people in western Canada today—Unifarm, the western stock breeders and other farm organizations in the province of Alberta—are suggesting that maybe now is the time to make some changes. I am not saying that I am in complete agreement with them, nor am I saying that Saskatchewan is in complete agreement with Alberta. I am saying that there is a general discussion going on in the prairies and I am fully aware of it. I believe, too, that the premiers of the prairie provinces are prepared to discuss this subject, maybe even next week, I am not certain; but I know this general discussion is going on, and I will continue to monitor it to the best of my ability.

An hon. Member: You make Paul Martin look straightforward.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A final supplementary question. This example of evasiveness convinces me that the minister is going to join with the rest of the government and do away with the cornerstone of western farming operations.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, on that point, I cannot help but note that at the premier's meeting on transportation which was held in Winnipeg, the co-chairman of the meeting, Premier Lyon, suggested that the Crow rates would probably be the first thing on the agenda at the western premiers' conference which will be held in March.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking what you are going to do.

Mr. Horner: I just point out that a general discussion is taking place in western Canada and this government is aware of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And there is general evasiveness.

FINANCE

SPECULATION ON IMPOSITION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, from time to time the Minister of Finance has commented in this House that the government has no plans to introduce foreign exchange controls. However, in the past couple of days the media have commented nationally that perhaps in the near future Canadians may be facing that prospect. Would the minister like to clarify this contradiction?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have said, and I would like to repeat, that I have absolutely no plan for imposing exchange controls in Canada. I have said that for a year and a half and I repeat, I have no such plan for today, for next week, for next month or for next year.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR SALARY INCREASE FOR CIVIL AVIATION INSPECTORS ON BASIS OF COMPARABILITY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns the civil aviation inspectors and the negotiations that are going on. As the minister no doubt knows, in debate last night it was made quite clear that on any basis of comparability these particular people are being paid many thousands of dollars less than other aviation people in the industry. In view of the fact that the Air Canada average is $44,000 per year, Canadian Pacific Air $42,000 per year, and that in three other airlines the average is $37,000, while the average of these civil aviation inspectors I refer to is $25,000 per year, is the Treasury Board going to make an offer to them immediately on the basis of comparability, which is the principle the Minister of Labour keeps talking about?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we are currently in negotiation with these groups. I do not think one conducts negotiations across the floor in the House of Commons, and I think the hon. member should be aware of that. A mandate has been given and the negotiators are endeavouring to reach a settlement. I am optimistic that they will be successful.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the government had dealt with these people with justice I would not have to raise the matter in the question period. In view of the fact that the only offer from Treasury Board is $1,400 per year, how can the minister stand in this House and say this is not the place to raise the issue? This is a matter of straight injustice and is contrary to the policy of the government. I want the minister to give an assurance to this House and the Canadian people that the question of comparability will be applied in these negotiations.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the point very clearly that there was a dispute on behalf of this group which changed its union representation.

Mr. Fraser: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Buchanan: They took the dispute through. They disputed the AIB ruling, they went to the administrator, they went to the Federal Court.

Mr. Fraser: You passed a law that negated their victory.

Mr. Buchanan: During that process, and in spite of that fact, we granted to them at regular intervals the maximum to which they were entitled under the AIB regulations at the time. We attempted to deal honestly and fairly with this situation. As I said, we are currently in negotiation with these groups and are optimistic that we will reach a satisfactory settlement.

REQUEST FOR CONCILIATION BOARD

Mr. Ron. Huntington (Capilano): A supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board on the same matter, Mr. Speaker. I would not want to say that he has misled the House, but it is a fact that these negotiations that started on January 30 have broken off. The other day the minister assured me in the House, or nodded in the House, that a meaningful negotiation would be entered into. They opened with 3 per cent, Mr. Speaker, and ended up with 5.7 per cent. This is an insult to this group which has fallen completely behind all other areas in that industry. The thing that is so important here is that the civil aviation standards—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Huntington: In view of the fact that this is a most serious situation for this country and for the safety of aviation, will the President of the Treasury Board now assure us that they will ask for a conciliation board so that this matter can be resolved once and for all in a fair and proper manner, instead of the games that have been played by his representatives in these negotiations over three years?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything to add to the comments I made to the previous member.

Mr. Huntington: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Treasury Board did not answer a very simple question. Will Treasury Board request a conciliation board so that this matter can be properly dealt with?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously a repetition of the previous question.

REFERENDA

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADIANS WILL BE CONSULTED ON STATUS OF QUEBEC IN CONFEDERATION

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the minister's statement earlier this week that the federal government might organize a referendum on the question of the province of Quebec remaining within confederation if Mr. Lévesque does not set a date for one this year, could the minister say whether all Canadians will be able to express themselves on this subject or will it be confined to Canadians living within the borders of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the legislation which is now before parliament was passed yesterday in the House and is now being studied by a House committee. It is quite clear on the fact that referenda organized by the federal government must deal with constitutional issues. It also stipulates that those referenda can take place in one, several or all provinces. Once this bill becomes law, the government can consider the different hypotheses, the different alternatives and once the government has chosen a particular one, it would be submitted to parliament for discussion and debate, for at least 40 hours in the House and 40 hours in the Senate. I think that when a specific question is proposed to the House, we will have the opportunity to discuss together exactly what fields the question will encompass.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PROTECT VICTIMS OF RAPE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. The former minister of justice introduced a bill, C-52, which redefined rape. Prior to that a former minister of justice amended the Criminal Code to the effect that a victim of a rape would not be subject to cross-examination. The courts have now ruled that these people are compellable witnesses in a trial within a trial, called a voir dire. The matter is to go before the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1140)

Would the minister advise the House if he will again bring forward a bill similar to C-52, something which has been requested by the women's associations of Canada, so that this matter can be clarified and victims of this horrible crime will not be brutalized by counsel for the defence in their questions as to past conduct?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, obviously I would not want to comment specifically on a case which is going before the Supreme Court of Canada at the present time. This case will proceed in due course in its formal way.

With regard to the general provisions brought forward last year dealing with the crime of rape, my intention is to bring before the House a new series of amendments to the Criminal Code which will deal not only with the issue of rape but all sexual offences, following the recent report of the Law Reform Commission, the recommendations of which we are examining.

I have already indicated that there is at least one recommendation which I will not accept, that being the removal of incest from the Criminal Code, but the other recommendations are being examined very thoroughly. I hope very soon to be in a position to table before the House further amendments in this respect. Obviously, the area of rape is one that will be covered under those amendments.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer, which was quite wordy, but I would like him to answer my original question directly. In the bill which he now intends to bring before the House, will this particular matter, the right of cross-examination in order to determine the admissibility of evidence and the right to cross-examine the victim in the main trial, be dealt with and the former amendment—which was introduced by this government and did more harm than good—be deleted to protect the women of this country, as the women's associations have recommended, irrespective of what the Law Reform Commission says? Because these associations do not agree with all of its recommendations.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, last year proposed amendments were brought before this House which had wide support among women's organizations. Certainly the comments made at the time by the hon. member about the proposals were not very well received by women's organizations. As a matter of fact, the hon. member got his party into a great deal of trouble at the time with women's organizations by his comments on this whole issue of rape.

We are reviewing those proposed amendments pursuant to representations made by women's organizations, and the hon. member will have ample opportunity to consider and debate those amendments when they are properly before the House.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

COPPER—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PRICE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since two major Canadian copper producers, namely Texas Gulf and Noranda, have increased the price of copper by four cents a pound in Canada, but by only three cents a pound in the United States, will the minister investigate this price discrimination and cause the companies to justify why Canadian industry and consumers must pay more than their American counterparts for a Canadian-produced product?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I answered to a previous question, I would be pleased to do all I can under my legislative authority. These price increases are serious and important, and I will refer them to my director of combines to see if there is anything illegal under the law and if there is any action that can be taken.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Noranda Mines experienced a profit increase of 117 per cent in 1978 over 1977, will the minister call in the president of the company and persuade him to practice the kind of restraint in price and profit increases which the Prime Minister has recently been demanding of labour, which saw its real wages decline by 2.4 per cent last year?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the details of this particular case, but I said I would look into it. I should point out to the hon. member in the House that many of the increases in profits by Canadian companies have been due to the fact that they are selling a considerable amount abroad, much more in the last couple of years than they have in previous years, owing to the difference in the value of the dollar. Because of these increased sales, of course, there has been an increase in profits. But I will check the particular case and determine if there is anything irregular.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—PURCHASES IN UNITED STATES AT INFLATED PRICE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as well, if I could have his attention. Last year Canada's secondary industry in the manufacturing of steel products had to go abroad to the American market to buy steel which had been manufactured in Canada and sold to the Americans at an inflated price. Will the minister look into this action and see that it does not happen again this year?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if that particular problem falls under the authority of my department. I will check the matter and if it does not I will refer it to the appropriate minister.

LOTTERIES

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF SOCIAL AND SOCIOECONOMIC EFFECTS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Considering the indications that private sector social agencies have had more difficulty in recent years raising money because of the establishment of legalized government lotteries and then the proliferation of those lotteries, and considering that there is a view widely held by many people, including myself, that the major participants—in fact, a disproportionate number of participants—in the lottery programs are the poor and the near poor, I wonder if the minister would support a government investigation into the social and socioeconomic effects of lotteries? If so, would he then urge his cabinet colleagues to initiate such a study?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do agree that such a study is important, and I will take steps to see that it is undertaken. I have already in months past spoken to the minister responsible for lotteries with respect to greater consumer representation on the board of Loto Canada. My department is also checking some of the advertising of the differrent lotteries to determine whether it is fair and honest.

AGRICULTURE

PROTECTION OF FARMERS AGAINST HIGH-PRICED IMPORTED BALER TWINE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and concerns the allegations that foreign baler twine is being dumped into Canada. Has the minister made any representations to the deputy minister of revenue, who has an investigation on at the present time in that regard, to ensure that Canadian farmers are not forced into paying artificially high prices for imported twine out of natural fibres, just so that Canadian manufacturers which make plastic twine will be protected?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have answered a letter from the hon. member in this regard, but I do not know if he has received it. There is an inquiry going on within the department, but I do not think that it is finished yet. My concern, regardless whether it is plastic twine or the old type of binder twine that we use, is that we get it at a reasonable price in order to make operations more efficient.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the minister is mistaken in his answer and that he is referring to another inquiry dealing with getting the Department of National Revenue to remove the sales tax on twine purchased by farmers without having to use end-user certificates. The minister lost that round.

This is a separate inquiry numbered D37-2 by the Department of National Revenue and has to do with an investigation already going on. Will the minister make representations to the Minister of National Revenue or the deputy minister who is causing this inquiry to ensure that, if a surtax or an extra provisional duty is put on, farmers will be able to purchase twine without that extra duty through the use of end-user certificates.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member knows that I do not end a fight after one round. I am not finished with that matter, but the hon. member is entitled to his opinion. I will certainly make inquiries with regard to the hon. member's representation.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION INTO SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO IRAN

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Because of the obvious difficulties of carrying on any further investigations in Iran and the reputed flow out of Iran of millions of dollars of U.S., Canadian and foreign currency credits by members of the Iranian royal family and others, and because of the very serious allegations that have been in the hands of Canadian law enforcement agencies for over two years, can the Solicitor General report now on the results of investigations into these allegations, which in effect were with the full knowledge and complicity of Canadian civil servants and perhaps of the Canadian government itself, that bribes had to be paid to members of the Iranian ruling classes, members of the royal family and others by Canadian suppliers to the Iranian armed forces?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that when these questions were raised previously I took the position that I would not comment on the investigation. I indicated to the hon. member that the investigation was ongoing. He has made certain observations relating to the current status in Iran and indeed, Mr. Speaker, the previous replies I have provided to the hon. gentleman and to this House apply even more so in view of these particular circumstances.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, because of the obvious interpretation that some members of the House are taking, myself included, that the minister is using that type of answer too often to evade reporting to this House on these very serious matters, and also not only because it involves an investigation in Iran but matters relating to tax records of Canadian corporations, income of Canadian civil servants and ex-Canadian civil servants, and other such matters which should have been reported long before this to the House, I appeal to the minister again to drop this evasive manner of his and to come clean on what is happening to these investigations. Are they still ongoing? Are they in Canada? Are they elsewhere? Just what is happening?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. gentleman knows the reason why the replies I have furnished to him tend to be non-committal; the investigations are ongoing. The hon. gentleman knows full well any comment that may be made by me or by him in any context which would tend to interfere with those investigations would be subject to serious review. The police force in Canada is one of the best police forces to be found in any democracy. It is interested, as we are, in unearthing crime, in finding wrongdoing where there is wrongdoing and in prosecuting that wrongdoing.

There is no attempt at all to do anything but permit the police force to carry through its responsibilities. That is exactly what we are doing. I would simply ask the hon. gentleman to recognize that that is what the police force is doing and to offer his co-operation by not making that sort of sensational allegation.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY WHETHER USE OF MARIJUANA TO BE LEGALIZED

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Justice and perhaps two short supplementaries if possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: The Minister of Justice made a statement during the recess that the government intended with Liberal party support to decriminalize the use of marijuana. In the context in which he made this remark during the Christmas recess, did he expand on any previous statements made by the Prime Minister last year or those made by himself in 1973?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, our position is still to oppose the legalization of marijuana. As far as possession is concerned, we believe that the criminal character involved in this act of possession has led to tens of thousands of convictions, resulting in many Canadians, young Canadians in particular, having criminal records for offences which in many instances have been mistakes that should be attributed to their youth. We find that that is a matter that should be corrected.

While keeping possession as an offence, we do not think that a criminal record should be carried by young people and Canadians in general. I believe over 57,000 convictions were registered last year. In the last few years about 250,000 Canadians have had criminal records for the offence of possession of marijuana. We believe it is time to review this situation but obviously it is a matter that I would like to discuss further with my colleagues. If we could introduce a bill in parliament during the course of this session we will have an opportunity to re-examine this situation in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, it is an important topic and I am glad to see the minister has more fully explained some of the government's thinking. However, I think this could have been clarified some six years ago when the government first started talking about it. Is the reason that he announced during the recess that the government would not be able to bring forth legislation to deal with this matter because the chairman of the Liberal election campaign committee, Senator Keith Davey, opposes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Blais.]

MULTICULTURALISM

RECOMMENDATION OF TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Multiculturalism). Does the minister agree with the recommendations stated in the Pepin-Robarts task force report on unity regarding multiculturalism which seem to suggest that these interests can best be looked after by the provinces, when as they well know it is the federal level of government which has initiated and championed multicultural interests?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, the Pepin-Robarts report does one thing which I think is very positive in this regard, and that is to recognize the multicultural character of Canada. The report further suggests that a very heavy responsibility in this area should be assumed by the provinces. I fully support the view that provinces ought to be doing more. If we are to have equality in Canada between peoples, then our educational system ought to be involved. But specifically, if the impression is, or the statement means, that the federal government should not be involved in the role of multiculturalism, I reject that concept because the lead role that we have taken will continue to be very important to the well-being of all Canadians in this country.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY WHETHER INTENTION TO INCREASE OR DECREASE FOREIGN FACTORY SHIPS AND FREEZER-TRAWLERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the minister's stated aversion to the construction of even one freezer-trawler by Canadians for the catching of presently underutilized species, while licensing in 1978 some 300 foreign factory ships and 190 foreign freezer-trawlers within our 200-mile limit, an action that is now evidently decreasing the supply of fish for our inshore fishermen, is it the minister's intention to increase or decrease the number of foreign factory ships and freezer-trawlers licensed within our 200-mile zone in the year 1979?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is no way, in the time allocated to answer a question at this time, that I could correct some of the misstatements made by the hon. member; there are just too many. I recommend for the hon. member's reading and for that of any member who is interested in this matter a speech I made to the board of trade in Halifax in which I addressed this issue. Myths are being spread, some by hon. members on the other side, and particularly by the hon. member for South Shore, on the whole issue of freezer-trawlers. For example, he takes the total number of foreign vessels licensed but does not say that some of them are licensed to catch fish for ten days or 15 days and sometimes even less. Also he does not point out that Canada's share of the fish inside and outside the 200-mile zone is increasing substantially every year. What he forgot to mention was that the share of the catch for the inshore fishery, which we and members of the New Democratic Party want to protect and which he does not, is increasing dramatically.

● (1200)

Mr. Crouse: In March, 1977 the United States passed a law refusing foreigners the right to fish within their 200-mile limit until United States fishermen had reached the limit of their catching capacity. Will the minister indicate whether he has any policy which would assist Canadians in catching some of the presently underutilized species which he is giving away to foreigners while using the excuse that they are surplus to our needs?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the success of our fisheries policy is such that we do not have to ape what other countries are doing. The hon. member seems to forget that the very people who are advocating freezer-trawler licences, which are always conditional on getting part of the fish that small fishermen now catch, were very happy to get fish caught by foreign trawlers and to just act as brokers. The squid went right through the system without creating employment in Canada. Our policy has been to encourage small enterprises to do exactly what we did off Cape Breton last summer, which was to have a Canadian fishermen's co-operative using modest sized vessels to catch and sell fish, squid in particular. They then get some benefit, not only the brokers.

CRIMINAL CODE

FIREARMS CONTROL—NUMBER OF SEIZURES UNDER GUN AMNESTY PROGRAM

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Recently I, like the right hon. member for Prince Albert and thousands of Canadians, acting under the gun amnesty order of the Solicitor General presented for registration an unregistered gun to a designated official of the Ottawa municipal police. While knowing that police forces had been informed it was in their interest to confiscate all the guns they could pick up, I anticipated that the minister stood behind his amnesty order. To date I have not been notified that the permit has been issued or whether it will be. I would like to know if in not supplying a permit as promised in the amnesty the minister is condoning the seizure of any guns turned in under the umbrella of his amnesty order. Will the Solicitor General indicate to the House how many guns presented for registration his friends in the various police forces seized under the surreptitious amnesty order?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): First, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not identify the nature of the gun that was advanced. The amnesty program I announced was to run from November 1 to November 30. During that period 47,400 guns were presented either for registration or were surrendered.

The amendments to the Criminal Code affecting gun control which went into effect on January 1, 1978 provided for an extension of the prohibited gun class. In terms of the prohibited guns, those guns that fit within that category could not be owned or possessed by anyone. If they are presented at any time, they are of course seized because it is illegal to own those guns. In terms of the restricted class, that is the semi-automatic or handguns which fit within that class, those guns upon presentation during that amnesty period would be registered.

After the amnesty period, which lasted until November 30—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of confusion in the hon. member's mind and I would like to clarify it. After November 30, because it had become such a popular program, I made arrangements with the attorneys general of the various provinces to have them accept prohibited guns or the surrender of other guns that would be fit for registration so that they could be registered notwithstanding the fact that the amnesty period had gone by. As I understand it, that went on in order to accommodate those people in the build-up prior to the end of the amnesty period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask one supplementary.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I asked for clarification, not a reiteration of the program. Like others, I turned in guns that could be registered. We were given to understand they would be registered without penalty under the amnesty and returned. Most gun clubs in the country now charge that the minister is seizing those guns. I was promised that I would be notified whether a permit would be granted for my P-38. It has not and I have not heard from them. I must therefore assume that what the gun clubs are saying is true, that the minister is in fact seizing these guns under the amnesty program. Is that what the minister intended or not? If not, why have I not been notified?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have presented that question and not read the piece of paper to which he was addressing himself. There is absolutely no intention of seizing any guns that can be registered in accordance with the law of this country. The allegations to which the hon. member refers are completely unfounded. If the hon. member has not received notification that a certificate is to be issued relating to his registration, I will see that that is done as long as the guns he has presented fit within the restricted category under the Criminal Code.

I would indicate to the hon. member or any other hon. member who has had some difficulty or may be aware of some delay in the issuance of a registration certificate to make me aware of that fact so that we can accelerate the process.

Because of the large number of guns that were presented for registration, there has been a delay in issuing the certificates.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have difficulty in getting answers from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) because he usually comes into the chamber about 15 minutes before the end of the question period. There is a demise of the urban affairs ministry. It is slowly being closed down. We understand that studies are being disposed of. They were done at a cost of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of this country. Is the minister documenting these studies and will the people of Canada have an opportunity to look at something before the department is closed and this minister is gone? It is rather difficult to ask a question ten minutes prior to the end of the question period.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know how many of the hon. member's colleagues were recognized in the question period today, but there was quite a number, thanks to co-operation on all sides of the House. I surely cannot begin to control the content of the questions.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—ANSWER GIVEN BY PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT MINISTERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, I would like to try to deal with the question of privilege raised yesterday by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). The hon. member indicated that he was concerned that I may have deliberately or inadvertently misled the House in my comments, presumably those at page 2784 of Hansard. I wish to inform the hon. member that I did not deliberately mislead the House nor did I do it inadvertently. I presume the hon. member's comment specifically pertains to my remarks at page 2784 of Hansard which, for clarity, I will repeat. In answer to the hon. member's question, I said:

> This comes about as a result of a consultative process which has been ongoing for many, many months—almost a year—in which representatives of industry, labour and management have made very definite, joint and agreed upon recommendations to the government.

The hon. member interjected:

> Labour does not agree with that.

I presume that is the basis of his concern. I did not intend that to indicate a unanimous joining by labour and management in every recommendation of the task force. The hon. member is quite correct in pointing out that Mr. Lorrain, a very senior executive officer of the Canadian pulp and paper workers, indicated at the last meeting before the task force report was finally approved that he had reservations about portions of the recommendations. That did not exclude many of the recommendations with which, my information is, that he definitely did agree. Further, there were two other senior representatives of labour working very constructively with the management and the industry on that task force and they did not at that time join him in expressing any reservations whatsoever. So I think I am entitled to assume there was a high degree of consensus between management and labour in the constructive process leading to the recommendations of the forest products industry task force.

• (1210)

The hon. member went on to indicate that Mr. Lorrain disagrees flatly with the report. Without any attributed criticism, I am not sure whether he was referring to the task force report or to the policy responses that I made public yesterday. The hon. member is indicating it is the latter. I hope that is not the case. I cannot confirm or deny what Mr. Lorrain may or may not have said in a press conference, but I hope very much to meet him very soon, possibly this afternoon, and I will explore with him any reservations he may have. At present the only information I have is through the press, from which I gather he expressed a valid concern, although I do not think it is a valid criticism of the program, that is to say, his worry about the possibility of failure to maintain the jobs and incomes of workers during any period of modernization.

I do not think that is a valid criticism because I and my department will be extremely exercised about any such possible diminution of employment in the forest industry during the modernization process as well. I would make this point, though, as far as I am concerned, the best way to maintain jobs is to have an industry which is competitive and able to carry on generating and maintaining employment. We shall be happy and fully intend to talk to anybody in that area and discuss any specific matters if, in the end, there should be a temporary diminution of employment. I respect the hon. member, as he knows, and I hope I have now cleared up this matter. I certainly did not deliberately mislead and I hope I did not inadvertently mislead anybody, and therefore I do not think there is a valid question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the House will recognize that there is a legitimate difference of opinion between two hon. members but that it does not constitute a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the acting government House leader with respect to government business, having heard his thinking in terms of multiculturalism. He had an opportunity to amend the immigration bill in order to insert one word, that is, "multicultural". At that time the government members did not accept it. In order to give some credibility to that great speech he has just delivered, is it his intention to introduce a bill to amend the immigration legislation to insert the word "multicultural" in the preamble to that bill, because unless that is done his statement is just puff, fluff, and flannel?

Mr. Speaker: That is an excellent try to extend the question period but it is not going to work.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. WOOLLIAMS—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, as the chairman of the justice committee in my party I have always sought to maintain good liaison with ministers of justice because it is so necessary to keep all matters of this serious nature out of partisan politics. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) said to me today that I had made certain statements with reference to rape and that I was in some difficulty. I would like him to produce any evidence that I have made any statements for which I have been criticized by any of the women's organizations in this country. I think the only reason he answered like that—and I want to have just a moment in which to explain—is that having become the new Minister of Justice he knows I have the confidence of the justice committee. I have been told that I have always acted in a non-partisan manner. I hope the new Minister of Justice will not act in his new portfolio as he did in his previous one and put politics into the field of justice.

Perhaps I might just make this one point—and surely I should have the privilege to do so in order to avoid misunderstanding and misrepresentation. The law of rape was changed in order to protect the victim. I have always said the reason we should have reform in this field is to protect the victim of the crime against serious cross-examination. In making the change, the government—and I was not saying this in a partisan way—left it to the judge to decide whether the victim would be subject to cross-examination. Under the law as it now stands, judges have ruled in the trial within the trial to see whether those questions can be asked at the main trial. They hold what is called a trial within a trial. Now the defence is taking the position—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Woolliams: Let me just finish this, Mr. Speaker, please! I have just one more sentence.

Mr. Speaker: I would just like the hon. member to relate all this to a point of order, if he has one.

Mr. Woolliams: It is because I was misrepresented. What I was saying is this: now the law is such that it is working against the victim. My position in this party, as chairman of the justice caucus, is that we want the law reformed to protect the victims of this crime. That is the reason I raise the question. The Minister of Justice tried to twist the handle the other way because of his own errors and his own mistakes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. CAFIK—QUESTION ON MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of State for Multiculturalism is rising on a question of privilege?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Very briefly, my integrity has, I think, been attacked in this House under an erroneous point of order. I would simply say this in response, and I believe I have a right to do so very briefly: in terms of multiculturalism, I will go one better and enshrine it in the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. LACHANCE—CLARIFICATION OF CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the allegations of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I should like to say two things: first of all, on behalf of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) I promise he will answer the matter when he comes back to the House, perhaps tomorrow, when he has had a chance to read the blues; second, the Minister of Justice did not underestimate the problem the hon. member brought up in his question; on the contrary, he himself has stated that the government intends to introduce a bill to follow up the report of the Law Reform Commission, and the matter of evidence is now under study. In addition, when he pointed out to the hon. member that the people who were asking for those amendments had attacked the policy of the hon. member, it certainly was after the remarks of the hon. member to the effect that the Minister of Justice did not listen to the groups concerned. So, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that the minister can pursue the matter further on that question of privilege if he sees fit to do so.

MISS BÉGIN—MISUNDERSTANDING OF SPEECH ON BILL C-2

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to suggest to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) that he correct the statements he made last night during the debate. I checked my speech on Bill C-2 as reported on page 2808 on the French version of Hansard. I spoke French at the beginning of my remarks and mentioned that one of the points under discussion was the fact that the opposition had accused us of not giving enough money to the Medical Research Council.

Twice in his speech the hon. member has called me dishonest. He was speaking English. The second time he said "blatantly dishonest". I then asked him to retract his words. He refused to do so. I personally checked the blues last night and they reflected what I had said, which is the contrary of what the hon. member accused me of having said. Consequently, I want him to retract his words accusing me of being dishonest which are recorded in Hansard.

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a couple of things to say on this matter. On November 27 the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) accused me of being dishonest. I rose on a point of order at that time, and the Acting Speaker ruled that the matter did not constitute a point of order but simply a point of debate. It was on that precedent that I assumed that the word "dishonest" was parliamentary and acceptable language.

● (1220)

The second point I would like to make is that, according to the rules, this type of matter cannot be raised as a question of privilege but as a point of order. I reviewed the rules last night. I also went to see the blues myself, and I must point out that the minister or a representative from her department did make two changes in the French blues. I examined them personally this morning, and the changes were made.

Miss Bégin: I did not read the blues.

Mr. Yewchuk: I said the minister or her representative. I also want to point out that I have been informed that, at best, simultaneous interpretation is only 70 per cent accurate. Perhaps the simultaneous translation was somewhat different from what the minister intended, because what I heard the translator say in committee was slightly different from what is recorded in English Hansard.

In any case, even though there is a precedent for using this language, if it is found to be unparliamentary I have no objection to changing the word "dishonest" to "blatantly confused", if that makes the minister any happier.

Mr. Speaker: The withdrawal of unparliamentary language, as all hon. members know, has been classic in its deviousness over the years. There has been a number of combinations and varieties of withdrawals and retreats from unparliamentary language, and I see no reason why I should not extend that same privilege to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) in this situation. He has indicated that if the words "blatantly dishonest", which he evidently directed toward the minister, are in fact unparliamentary, he wishes them to be withdrawn and endeavours to replace them with other words. That cannot be done, but his withdrawal of words is accepted. They are in fact unparliamentary. He has withdrawn them, and he is attempting to replace them with other words which are not unparliamentary. He is attempting to do precisely the same thing other hon. members have done when compelled to withdraw this kind of language, so I cannot prevent the hon. member from doing so. I am grateful to know that the words declared to be unparliamentary have been withdrawn by the hon. member.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. I would like a clarification on the previous ruling to which I made reference, by the Acting Speaker, which is found at page 1526 of Hansard for November 27, at which time I requested that the hon. member for Winnipeg North withdraw the same language. It was ruled at that time that the matter was simply a matter of debate.

Mr. Speaker: In the first place, the hon. member is not going to get that kind of ruling out of me now. He was kind enough to withdraw the language that he used, and I am grateful that he did. With respect to individual precedents, if the hon. member examines the precedents with respect to unparliamentary language, he will find that the difficulty the Chair has is that the precedents are replete with expressions of unparliamentary language. It has been found in some circumstances by some speakers in certain contexts that certain language has been unparliamentary, and in other cases precisely the same language has been found by other speakers in other contexts and other circumstances to be parliamentary. Therefore, there is not much assistance in the precedents in this regard, except for one or two very clear expressions. For example, wherever it has been used, the word "liar" has never been deemed to be an acceptable expression to be used by anybody. However, there is a whole series of expressions which in one context have been found to be unparliamentary and in others have not been so found.

There are difficulties in applying these precedents to individual situations. I think the best the Chair can do, where there is any doubt, is generally to try to resolve that doubt in favour of maintaining decorum in the House because usually it is not too difficult for hon. members involved to withdraw certain remarks in the name of parliamentary decorum. As I said, I am delighted that that is the course the hon. member for Athabasca followed this morning.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 408, 468, 542, 592, 671, 781, 852 and 853.

BANFF CAVE AND BASIN FACILITIES

Question No. 408—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Since 1975, by year, did the government, in general and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in particular, expend any monies on (a) studies (b) advertising (c) public hearings, in regard to (i) restoration (ii) redevelopment of the Banff Cave and Basin facilities and, if so, in what amount?

2. Were proposals made by persons responsible for restoration and/or redevelopment of such facilities and, if so (a) what were they (b) what is the estimated cost of their implementation?

3. Were (a) petitions (b) group and/or individual briefs (c) general representations received (i) supporting (ii) opposing the proposals of the government and/or the departments in respect of restoration and/or redevelopment of the facilities and, if so, how many and what consideration was given to them?

4. In each case, what are the names of the groups (a) supporting (b) opposing the proposals as outlined by the authorities for restoration and/or redevelopment of the facilities?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a), (b) and (c) No studies, advertising or public hearings in regard to restoration or redevelopment of the Banff Cave and Basin have been conducted by the government since 1975.

2. Yes (a) a preliminary artist's conception was prepared; (b) no cost estimate was prepared.

3. (a) Yes, (b) No, (c) Yes.

The one petition received made a new proposal. The nine letters received supported the preliminary artist's concept regarding restoration of the structure and made additional proposals. Both the letters and the petition are under consideration at the present time.

4. The group presenting the petition was an ad hoc committee composed primarily of Banff citizens.

SULLIVAN COMMISSION ON NEWFOUNDLAND TRANSPORTATION

Question No. 468—Mr. Mazankowski:

To date, what is the total cost of the Sullivan Commission on Newfoundland Transportation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): As of November 7, 1978, the total expenditures for the Sullivan Commission on Newfoundland Transportation were $715,275.05.

DSS—CONTRACT TO W.B. WALKER, OTTAWA

Question No. 542—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of Supply and Services award a contract for $25,000 to W.B. Walker, 1869 Beattie Avenue, Ottawa for acquisition, planning and control services for the Canadian patrol frigate programme and, if so, in what way does the contract differ from contracts awarded to Atlantic Information Systems Ltd., 3032 Cowan Crescent, Ottawa for (a) $30,000 in February 1976 to design a standard network format for planning and control of a design and acquisition process for the Armed Forces Maritime (b) $33,499 in February 1977 for derivation of detailed networks for development and control of the 205 class ship replacement programme?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): A contract was awarded by the Department of Supply and Services in the amount of $25,000 on July 6, 1978 to Mr. W. B. Walker for professional services to the Canadian Patrol Frigate Program with respect to acquisition management analysis, contractor proposal evaluation, contractor selection, contract documentation and contractor performance measurement systems.

The contracts in 1976 and 1977 to Atlantic Information Systems Ltd. related to network design, network installation and network training in Maritime System Design and Acquisition, and detailed networking for the 205 class ship replacement program, respectively.

The requirements of the Walker and Atlantic contracts bear no relationship to each other inasmuch as the Walker contract does not deal with networking but rather with acquisition planning in a totally new procurement process, whereas the Atlantic contracts deal with the specific technique of networking.

DIAND—NORTHERN FLOOD COMMITTEE—MANITOBA

Question No. 592—Mr. Holmes:

1. What was the total amount made available to the Northern Flood Committee of Manitoba and what was the amount in loans and have these been repaid and, if not, on what date will they be repaid?

2. Is the Committee still operational and, if so, what funds has it received directly or indirectly from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Accountable contributions:

1975-76	$ 2,000
1976-77	81,228
1977-78	381,153
1978-79	300
Total:	$ 464,681

Loans
1974-75	$ 168,200
1975-76	300,000
1976-77	964,282
1977-78	250,000
Total:	$1,682,482

None of the $1,682,482 in loans has been repaid by the northern flood committee. As the negotiated settlement did not provide sufficient cash compensation to the claimants to enable them to repay the loans, the full amount will be forgiven by the government. Treasury Board approval to delete the loan was given on October 18, 1978.

2. The committee is still operational. In addition to the funds provided in part I of the answer, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development contributed $112,-500 in 1978-79 to the five individual Indian bands to help them ensure they receive what they are entitled to under the agreement. It is the department's understanding that some, or all of this, has been turned over to the northern flood committee.

Order Paper Questions

CRTC—HOUSE OF COMMONS PROCEEDINGS

Question No. 671—Mr. Parker:

1. Is it the policy of the CRTC that House of Commons proceedings should not be carried on the community channel of cable television companies and is there available time for carrying at least part of the proceedings on virtually all such community channels and, if so, what is the justification for such a policy?

2. What is the justification of such a policy, which restricts access to House proceedings to Canadians who own a converter, when funds to generate the coverage were provided from general tax revenues?

3. Given the audiences attracted subsequent to the establishment of this policy, is it the intention of the Commission to change their policy, allowing the audience potential to increase substantially and, if not, for what reason?

4. Did the CRTC receive any requests from (a) cable television companies (b) private citizens, to provide House of Commons coverage in whole or in part on the community channel, so that a converter would not be required and, if so, how many were received (i) from each province (ii) from the cities of Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax, St. John's (iii) on a basis of time or delayed coverage?

5. Did the CRTC receive any indications of interest from any public or private, radio or television broadcaster, in carrying the question period on a regular basis, either delayed or live and (a) if so, what was the Commission's response (b) if not, has the Commission attempted to stimulate any and, if not, for what reason?

6. In requiring purchase of a converter before coverage of the House of Commons may be viewed, is the CRTC moving towards a license fee for television sets?

7. For each major Canadian metropolitan market, what are the viewing audience figures for House of Commons proceedings in terms of (a) absolute numbers (b) percentage of total viewing audience when proceedings are (i) available live (ii) delayed 3 to 6 hours (iii) delayed 6 to 12 hours (iv) delayed over 12 hours (v) available live and delayed (c) percentage of total viewing audience when proceedings are available only on sets equipped with a converter and are (i) available live (ii) delayed 3 to 6 hours (iii) delayed 6 to 12 hours (iv) delayed over 12 hours (v) available live and delayed (d) percentage of total viewing audience when proceedings are available on community channel and are (i) available live (ii) delayed 3 to 6 hours (iii) delayed 6 to 12 hours (iv) delayed over 12 hours (v) available live and delayed?

8. What are the differences in viewing patterns in all the categories listed in Part 7 when (a) only the question period is available (b) full proceedings on a daily basis are available (c) summary packages or excerpts are available, either daily or weekly?

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

1. It is the present policy of the CRTC to encourage the carriage of the House of Commons proceedings on cable channels other than the community channel. The reason for this is that the commission has for many years adopted a principle of supporting and encouraging community programming, that is to say programming produced in, and for the local community, through setting aside a dedicated cable channel for this purpose.

Over the years there have been many pressures to use this channel for purposes other than community programming, including such matters as educational programming, programming of a general interest nature but not local in origination, and more recently for the carriage of the parliamentary debates.

Although there is unused time on the community channel in many systems, giving over this time to other programming services would have the effect of gradually eroding the special purposes for which the community channel was established, namely to be of direct help to local communities.

It is possible to carry portions of the parliamentary debates which relate to local issues and involve members of parliament from the particular local area in the context of locally produced programs. This would be entirely within the present regulations governing the use of the community channel.

It should be emphasized that the commission is not preventing cable licensees from carrying not only the question period but the full proceedings of the House of Commons on the basic cable service. This would of course mean displacing a United States' channel in most cases, a decision which cable licensees are reluctant to make.

Furthermore, the governor in council could issue directions to the commission requiring the establishment of a special dedicated channel on all cable systems on the basic service for the carriage of the House of Commons proceedings in accordance with section 15 of the Broadcasting Act of 1968.

2. As indicated in the response to question (1), the commission does not have a policy of restricting the House proceedings to Canadians who own a converter. It is simply that cable systems are reluctant to place the proceedings on the basic service and displace United States' signals.

3. The commission considers that the present policy does not by itself restrict the proceedings in any way and sees no reason at this time to change its policy.

5. The commission understands that the Ontario educational communications authority broadcasts the question period from 10.30 p.m. to 11.30 p.m. daily on its over-the-air transmitter throughout Ontario. In addition, the CBC, Radio-Canada, Réseau TVA, and CTV broadcast a synopsis of the proceedings once a week.

There is no practical reason why the proceedings could not be carried by off-air broadcasters in any local area. As a principle the commission is in full agreement with the carriage of parliamentary debates by off-air broadcasters. The programming carried by each broadcaster is the responsibility of that broadcaster subject only to applicable regulations and the commission does not act to force broadcasters to carry any particular programming service. Broadcasters are responsive to the interest of their community and would no doubt wish to consider carrying parts of the Commons proceedings if they receive a significant number of requests from their communities.

6. The CRTC is not moving towards a license fee for television sets and in any event it would not have the power to impose such an obligation on the public since it would represent a form of taxation. The commission does not specifically require the purchase of a converter before the House of Commons coverage may be viewed anymore than it requires the public to subscribe to cable television or for that matter purchase a television receiver. This is simply like any other broadcast service where the option to receive it is entirely up to the public.

7. The commission has no way of providing an immediate response to the question and it would require a major survey which would in our estimation take at least six months and be quite costly to undertake.

8. This is really an extension of question 7 and poses the same problems.

SUBSIDIES TO AIR CARRIERS—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 781—Mr. Howie:

What amount was paid as a subsidy to air carriers operating in the Atlantic Provinces in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission reports as follows: Subsidy paid to air carriers operating in the Atlantic Provinces in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978 amounted to $1.7 million.

Order Paper Questions

LABOUR—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 852—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of Labour finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): 1. No.

2. No.

DSS—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 853—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of Supply and Services finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. No.

2. No.

*MARINE RAILWAY—BIG CHUTE—TRENT-SEVERN WATERWAY

Question No. 627—Mr. Rynard:

1. What was the total cost of the installation of the new marine railway at the Big Chute on the Trent-Severn Waterway?

2. (a) How many bids were received (b) who submitted them and, in each case, what was the amount?

3. Who was awarded the contract and what was the amount of the bid submitted?

4. What was the test period on the railway before construction began and what faults, if any, were discovered during the test period?

5. During the 1978 season, how many days was the new railway in operation?

6. What was the total cost, if any, of repairs made to the new railway and how many days was it closed for repairs?

7. During the 1978 season, what was the total number of boats carried over the (a) new railway (b) old railway and, in each case, how many were damaged while in transit?

8. Was consideration given, at any time, for the construction of a lock at the Big Chute and, if so, for what reasons was one not built?

Order Paper Questions

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The total cost (to date) of the installation of the new Marine Railway at Big Chute on the Trent-Severn waterway is $2,707,519.41.

2. (a) There were seven bids received, as follows:

(b) 1.	Armbro Materials & Construction Ltd. P.O. Box 1000 Brampton, Ontario	$2,576,620.00
2.	Pitts Engineering Construction (Eastern) Ltd. 30 Commercial Road Toronto, Ontario	2,721,355.00
3.	S. McNally & Sons Limited 1855 Barton Street East Hamilton, Ontario	2,982,901.75
4.	E.S. Fox Limited P.O. Box 10 Welland, Ont.	3,294,757.00
5.	Thomas Fuller Construction Co. (1958) Limited 2700 Queensway Drive Ottawa, Ontario	3,340,406.70
6.	Rideau Valley Contractors Limited P.O. Box 700 Stratford, Ontario	3,346,946.00
7.	Paul Carruthers Construction Ltd. P.O. Box 300 Markham, Ontario	3,558,423.00

3. The low bidder, Armbro Materials & Construction Limited, was awarded the contract at $2,576,620.

4. Tests of the slings were made at the Port Severn Marina during design stages of the project, and improvements effected.

5. The new marine railway was operated July 15, July 17 to 23 and September 30 to October 11—a total of 20 days. Between July 23 and September 26 the new marine railway was available for transporting any boats that could not be transported on the old railway.

6. The new railway was closed four days for replacement of hydraulic valves and testing at a cost of $9,843.19. The contractor is also submitting a claim for time spent in investigating and determining that the hydraulic valves were failing. This claim, in the amount of $12,367.42, is being disputed.

7. Total number of boats carried over (a) new railway—884 (b) old railway—5926 during 1978

There was: (a) one damage claim on new railway and (b) two damage claims on the old railway.

8. Consideration was given to building a lock. Due to costs (estimated cost of lock $7,000,000) and in order to prevent sea lamprey migration, a new railway was favoured over a lock.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned yesterday evening we were debating Bill C-2, and I had already made some remarks but I had not had the honor nor the advantage of hearing the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) when she spoke because I was not in the House. Having read her comments, I am going to be briefer, because she answered several of the questions I proposed to deal with this afternoon.

Now I am convinced that before the bill was brought forward the minister asked herself whether the cancellation of the federal contribution to the Health Resources Fund might not reduce the level of health care in Canada. She said the following, and I quote:

> During those discussions it seemed obvious, I believe, that the decision to anticipate the final date for the expiry of that Canadian legislation which was aimed at the construction, acquisition, renovation and purchase of equipment and buildings for the individual training of health personnel will not create serious problems concerning production and health manpower in Canada or the availability of necessary institutions for that purpose.

I am convinced that there were studies on that subject and that the minister decided to recommend to stop the federal contribution from September 9, 1978. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I am also convinced that the minister will tell us at one point of the report stage what was the level of contributions paid by the federal government under the provisions of chapter H-4, of the legislation, and how much the national treasury could save by dropping this program. I hope she will tell us too whether the measure contemplated by Bill C-2 is a final decision or whether she may at one point come up with another bill to maintain the past levels of the federal contributions.

This puts an end to my remarks on this matter and I do hope that the passing of this bill will not limit the efficiency of our medical services or be an obstacle to the training of the staff to meet the needs of Canadians in health care.

● (1230)

[English]

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I want to spend a few moments commenting on Bill C-2 on the health resources fund. I want to congratulate some of last night's speakers, and in particular my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), who, very ably, spoke on the matters of health problems related to the Indians, the Inuit and the native communities. I will come back to that subject and refer to it a little later in my comments.

First, I want to make some general comments regarding the health resources fund. I am sure, as all hon. members will know, that when this particular program was instituted in 1966 it was done in conjunction with the imminent introduction of the medicare program, and indeed of the hospital diagnostic programs, and it was done so that we would be sure there would be adequate facilities, adequate personnel and adequate research, all of those parameters that are essential and necessary if we are to provide an adequate health delivery system to all Canadians.

It was of some interest that on November 30 of last year, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) made reference to this, and I should like to quote from that particular document. She said the following, at the outset:

> With the impending introduction of a medical care program, and anticipated shortages of health manpower to meet program and population requirements for increased health services, the health resources fund was enacted on July 11, 1966, to run for the period 1966-1980.
> The provisions of the act were to offer financial assistance to the provinces and territories in the planning, acquisition, construction, renovation and equipping of health training facilities.

There was a good deal of additional information, but I want to quote from page four of that same document where the minister stated the following:

> In summary, the health resources fund has now achieved its primary objective of assisting the provinces and territories with the provision of the necessary training facilities to satisfy current and future requirements of health manpower in the major health decisions to meet provincial needs.

One of the difficulties with this bill and the implications and conclusions of the bill is that obviously one has to conclude that the minister is implying that all the problems relating to the delivery of health care to Canadians have been resolved. One must come to that inescapable conclusion. As I indicated a moment ago, I want to return in a moment or two to the specific issue of the desperate health problems affecting the native people in Canada, and to review in a general way some of the problems that exist as they relate to our health delivery service in Canada today because, as I indicated, there is an implication in the bill presented by the minister that when she cuts back and then terminates this program on very short notice, all our problems will have been resolved.

Back in 1973 and 1974 I can recall speaking in this chamber, and at subsequent times since then, about the difficulties we have with the health care delivery system in this country. I do not pretend to have adequate time to cover all these aspects, but I thought it might be useful to make reference to some of the deficiencies that exist in our system. I thought that last evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would mention some of them. If the minister were truly responsible and had a genuine interest in the health of Canadians, she would have addressed herself to some of these problems rather than terminating a program which, in my view, has been successful in the past.

When I spoke in past instances I tried to look at the health care system from a different perspective. For example, I like to think of the broad category of what I refer to as the organization and management of the health care delivery system. Let me put it in simpler terms, if I can. When I am referring to that particular category, I am talking about all those aspects of our health care system including manpower needs, including the various facilities that are available, whether they are hospitals, nursing homes or paraprofessional individuals, all those areas that are relevant to the delivery of the health care system as it exists in the Canadian context. I think I should point out that this has been the primary preoccupation with respect to health matters across Canada. Certainly this is where the major emphasis and major concern are today.

There is nothing wrong with that approach; it is important and necessary. There may well have to be a different rationalization of that system, but certainly that organization in its broadest context has served us well.

There are many components to this broad category to which I referred. Let me indicate briefly two or three problem areas that are unresolved and to which the minister has not addressed herself. I think they are pertinent in the total context of health delivery when one talks about the cutting back of funds resolving all the problems of the delivery of health care. Of course this is a reflection of the attitude of the minister.

There are one or two very brief examples which I would like to give in the area of health care organization and management. Let us look for a moment at the whole problem of physician manpower requirements. If you look carefully you will find a major problem in the area, and I have not heard the minister address herself to this problem. I can assure you that in my travels across the country, particularly in the northern parts of Canada, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and the northern part of Manitoba represented by my good colleague, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) I found a discrepancy in terms of the services available and the type of professional individuals who are required to provide the quality care which we would hope for and anticipate from a system that is universal in scope which exists in Canada at present.

Another small area is the various small disciplines in the medical profession itself. I am one of those who has been somewhat concerned in recent years about the disproportionate number of individuals who appear in these various disciplines. For example, we know there was a time when a large number of graduates from our medical schools went into what appeared at that time to be some of the more glamorous specialties. There was a period of time when we appeared to have a lack of general and family practitioners and specialists such as ophthalmologists and psychiatrists. We would see individuals bypassing those specialties which are most important to Canadians and becoming involved in what are considered in many instances to be more glamorous types of specialties.

I cannot avoid commenting on the whole area of physician manpower without making a comment on physicians who are emigrating to the United States, a problem about which I am somewhat concerned. Recently I was talking to my son who is presently doing some postgraduate work in London at the University of Western Ontario. He was telling me about a skit they had put on at one of the med functions. They had a sweat shirt which had on it "Med '78-United States '79". I think that is a particular omen. If one looks carefully at the figures within the last year or two, one will find a very substantial number of Canadian physicians have moved south of the border.

I should like to refer to two colleagues in my own small community whom I know very well. They were born and raised in the area, all their ties were in the area. When they were both at the peak of their careers in family practice, they moved south of the border to Tennessee. The minister should address herself to this question: why are these very important individuals, many of whom were born in and raised families in the Canadian context, moving south of the border?

The minister would find it of some value if she read a recent document produced by four students at the University of Waterloo. As I recall, these students were involved in computer technology, and perhaps mathematics and physics. They undertook the particular project of writing a thesis on the emigration of doctors from the province of Ontario to the United States. I realize the conventional wisdom is that the vast majority are doing so for economic reasons. I suggest the minister, and indeed all members of the House, should read that particular thesis. The reasons are far more extensive than straight financial ones. I have no intention of going into the details, but in many instances the reasons for this emigration have been red tape and fighting with bureaucracy. I am sorry to say also that a number of them virtually have lost faith in the country and do not see a future under the present government.

As I have discussed in the past, there must be some rationalization of the regionalization of health care. I am convinced the minister has not devoted enough time to looking at extended care facilities, home care, nursing homes, and other areas important to the delivery of quality health care across the country.

Briefly, I should like to refer to environmental health matters. I am sure all hon. members are very aware of the so-called conventional environmental health problems, such as the problems of impure air, the quality of drinking water, adequate food processing to ensure the health standards of individuals, and sewage and garbage disposal so that various vectors, insects and animals cannot spread disease. We are all aware of those problems, but it is only the surface of significant environmental health problems across the country. Without going into a lot of detail, I should like to refer to some other examples.

The issue of mercury poisoning was raised in the House of Commons approximately three years ago. The problem of mercury poisoning is a very important one, particularly as it relates to White Dogs, Grassy Narrows and the Cree in northern Quebec. Also there are the problems of PCBs, arsenic poisoning, cadmium poisoning, and lead poisoning. I do not know how many members are aware of the problem with cadmium poisoning, but one governmental departmental official indicated that an Inuit working at Nanasivik Mines in the Northwest Territories had cadmium levels far above those acceptable. I am sure members are aware that cadmium is a very toxic agent. It can be damaging to the liver, the gastrointestinal tract and the nervous system. Also I am sure members are aware of the fact that lead is an environmental problem.

There are many other examples of what I consider to be environmental problems, but if one looks objectively at this area one will find that in most instances the average individual has little control over them. In many instances it is necessary to have government intervention from time to time. We have witnessed such intervention in many instances, yet I am not sure the government accepts or recognizes this very fundamental principle. If one reviews the literature dealing with environmental health problems, one will realize that we have very little knowledge in this area. Of course that implies that more research and development are required.

The minister suggested cutting back health funds, with the implication that there are no problems in the delivery of health care, and virtually ignored the problems of environmental health. Presumably the funds which are being saved could go to far greater use. For example, there is the entire problem of urbanization and the trend toward it in the last 20 years. There are a great number of socioeconomic health problems associated with urbanization, most importantly the noise factor. Indeed the urbanization phenomena have been evident in our native communities, particularly those in the far north which have experienced a sudden inter-relationship of southern Canadians with Inuit or other natives who have not had such exposure in the past. Various health problems exist in that context. In many respects they are environmental health problems, problems which virtually have been ignored by the government.

Another area I should like to deal with is that of human biology. Approximately one week ago I talked extensively about this matter in the House of Commons, particularly in terms of the value of basic medical research. I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not in her seat at the moment. Hopefully she recognizes that there is some importance in long-term planning. I feel that she implied it in her announcements in December, but I object to the formula she applied. Without going into the details of the formula, if one analyses it carefully one will find the index used by the minister is tied to various aspects and products in the normal consumer society, items unrelated to those utilized by the science and technology field.

We all recognize inflation in cost has been far greater in that particular field than the other items included in the index which the minister felt were appropriate to use for the formula. In all sincerity I say to the government and the minister that that particular formula should be reassessed. Even though there appears to be an understanding of the importance of long-term commitments, I am sure the minister and the government will find a further and very definite erosion in terms of the moneys required for adequate medical research across the country.

● (1250)

The last item is what I have referred to as lifestyle health. I think this is emerging as one of the significant problems and one that has, unfortunately, received little attention from this government. Let me give two or three examples to try to explain what I mean by lifestyle health. This means all aspects of activities over which individuals can exert decision and control. It has been calculated that if we had the facilities, the scientific know-how today, virtually to eliminate every form of cancer known to us, we would increase the life expectancy of Canadians by two to three years.

Then there is the problem of obesity. It has been calculated that if every Canadian were to reduce their weight to what is normal, their life expectancy would be increased by six to seven years. That is what I mean by lifestyle health. That is a classic example.

I do not want to get into figures but I should like to list some of the problem areas. One figure which has impressed me over the years refers to what I call potential years of life loss. If we assume that all Canadians should live to an average age of 70 and that someone dies at age 30, what we are saying is that that individual lost 40 years of potential life. If we keep that formula in mind then it is very interesting to look at the list of the causes of loss of potential years of life.

I am not going to quote the figures, but I should like to read a list of causes. At the top of the list comes motor vehicle accidents. The potential years of life lost due to this cause are far greater than in any other category. Next comes ischemic heart disease, then other accidents, followed by respiratory disease and lung cancer, then suicide; cancer of the breast, uterus and ovary; cerebral vascular disease; gastro-intestinal cancer; leukemia and cirrhosis of the liver.

I could go on, but I want to consider another document now to point out what I consider as potential preventable causes in terms of potential years of life loss. I think this is significant in that it has been ignored by this government. The list is as follows: Motor accidents, ischemic heart disease, other accidents, respiratory disease and lung cancer, suicide, and cirrhosis of the liver. I simply say that these are potentially preventable diseases that would fit into the category of lifestyle health.

One of the major problems with this bill as I see it is that the minister has not addressed, nor have individuals in this House, the very fundamental issue of the effectiveness of the universal program that was introduced for hospital diagnostic services and for the medicare program.

Recent studies carried out in Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and Quebec and by the Ontario Economic Council subcommittee on health revealed a number of very interesting facts. I should like to refer to one which substantiates the point that I am trying to make. The studies show that about 65 per cent of the population of Ontario seeks national health care in any one year. Strong evidence is emerging—and this is important—that the 35 per cent not using services represents the poor and impoverished. These were the very groups that precipitated universality and government intervention. The reasons for this pattern do not entirely seem clear but may relate to the sociological variable of how these groups see sickness and the immediate geographical availability of physician manpower.

I think that is an extremely important observation. When the universal health care assistance programs were defined, whether hospital diagnostic services or medicare, we were saying that we wanted a program that would make available to all Canadians, irrespective of background, quality health care. In all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, I say that we have not accomplished that. In the cities of Canada there is still evidence of rickets and other disease. I am convinced that the group of individuals that the universal programs were designed to reach and to assist has not benefited.

That is the significant point, Mr. Speaker. Nowhere is that more obvious then in the Indian and Inuit community of this country. Last night the hon. member for Wetaskiwin referred to this problem in Alberta and gave some very revealing figures which indicated how serious it is.

I have learned that statistics are very boring, Mr. Speaker, but all the same I should like to refer to a document entitled "Mortality among the registered Indian population" by Pauline Jull of the departmental statistics division of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which puts into perspective the seriousness of the health problem in the native community. The report concludes as follows:

> In summary, we conclude that our findings show that mortality is indeed higher among the registered Indian population than among the Canadian population. If mortality differentials can be used to reflect and compare the social and economic conditions of various segments of the Canadian population, then the results just presented in this analysis would tend to indicate that the registered Indian population is substantially disadvantaged compared to the Canadian population as a whole. In light of this fact, it would appear that if the mortality of our native peoples is to be reduced, not only will better access to health facilities have to be provided but significant improvement in their standard of living will have to occur as well.

If I had the time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out some inconsistencies which occur between the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Fisheries and the Environment. It is like musical chairs, Mr. Speaker. There is no corollation, and this was demonstrated in the debate on mercury poisoning which took place on an opposition day.

I should like to give a couple of examples of this mortality because I think it is important that hon. members understand its significance. Six categories of causes of death are listed in this report. The first is infective and parasitic diseases. The age-standardized death rate for the Indian population is 26.77 while the rate for the rest of the Canadian population is 4.98. In endocrine, nutritional and metabolic diseases—and the hon. member for Athabasca referred to the problems of diabetics in the Indian population—49.2—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, this legislation amending the Health Resources Fund Act was debated at some length on second reading and was given a very thorough examination, as I understand it, before the standing committee. It would, therefore, seem that there is little value in extended debate on third reading, because it is perfectly clear that the government intends to use its very large majority to push this legislation through parliament.

I venture to participate in the debate, however, not only because of the impact of the legislation itself, but because of the attitude of mind which it reveals, the emphasis which it gives to certain aspects of our national life, and the disjointed scale of social values which I believe are displayed in the legislation.

We should understand that this legislation comes before the House largely as a result of the announcement which was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on national television on August 1. Prior to this the Prime Minister had attended an economic conference; he had sailed on the Baltic with Chancellor Schmidt of West Germany, he had had a holiday in Morocco, and then returned to Canada to effect a complete reversal of the government's fiscal policies. Up until that time he, and particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), had been telling the Canadian people that what was needed was an increase in the effective economic demand. Therefore the Canadian people should save less and spend more. But on August 1 the Prime Minister announced to the Canadian people that the government would embark on a program of restraint.

His first statement was to the effect that they would cut $1 billion from the estimates. Later this figure was raised to $2 billion which it was hoped would be passed by the Parliament of Canada. It is significant to note that the cabinet was called together ten days later to hear what the cuts in the estimates were going to be. This makes me wonder what has happened to cabinet responsibility and solidarity.

One of the long-standing traditions of the parliamentary tradition has been that the Prime Minister is primus inter pares, first among equals, that the decisions that are made are not those of the Prime Minister but of the cabinet, and the cabinet must collectively accept responsibility for those decisions after due process of consultation and discussion. Not so in the matter of restraint! The Prime Minister made the announcement as if he were a president of a country with a presidential system. He then called his cabinet ministers together who were merely to hear what decisions had been reached by the Prime Minister himself.

In my opinion, that is a very serious indictment of the regard which the government has shown for the parliamentary system. There has been growing concern in this country that we are moving step by step toward some type of presidential system. If ever this was demonstrated, it was on August 1 when the Prime Minister reversed the fiscal policy without even the Minister of Finance or his other ministers having been consulted or made aware of the decision which had been reached by the Prime Minister.

I would suggest that the legislation now before us dealing with the health resources fund has three major defects, and I will deal with them individually.

First, let me point out what this legislation does. This legislation seeks to end the health resources fund which was set up in 1966. It has two years to run and in which there is over $80 million yet to be paid out to the provinces to provide certain essential medical and diagnostic facilities. This was a commitment made in 1966 by the Government of Canada to the provinces of this country as an inducement to sit down with the federal government and work out a medicare program. The provinces came in, some reluctantly, not because they were unwilling to deal with the health problems of the nation but because some of these provinces had very limited financial resources. They knew that the moment they had a medicare program, their research, medical and hospital facilities would not be able to cope with the magnitude of the demand for medical and diagnostic services. Their concern was allayed by the fact that the federal government said that they had no need to worry about that problem.

The federal government said that they were setting up a $500 million fund which would be paid out on the basis of need and as provinces proceeded to improve their health care facilities. The provinces came in on that understanding. This was a contract. This was an obligation entered into by the federal government in return for the provincial governments agreeing to enter into a program which they knew would be extremely expensive and represent a great drain on their financial resources. Now, without any warning and without any consultation, the federal government announces in this legislation that the health resources fund is to be closed, that no more money will be paid out after any commitments made have been dealt with, and that same fund with some $80 million in it, which really belongs to the provincial governments, will be closed. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) put this matter very clearly at page 1520 of Hansard for November 27, 1978, when she said:

> Why put an end to a good fund two years before its natural end?

The minister answered her question by saying:

> The Government of Canada has a difficult decision to make in applying a major, traumatic restraint on its own expenditures.

It not only had a difficult decision to make but it had to decide whether or not it would break faith with the provincial governments on whose behalf this fund was established. It had to decide whether it was more important to cut some other items in its budget, to clean out some of the waste and extravagance demonstrated amply in the Auditor General's report year after year, or whether instead this fund would be completely eliminated. The provinces would then be left holding the baby, with all the responsibility of carrying on their share of a medicare program but without the financial support which had been promised to them.

My second criticism of this legislation is that it assumes the purposes and the objectives of the health care programs have been attained. Of course, they have not. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) said earlier in this debate that the goals for universal health care have not been realized. That statement is true. It is true because we have only covered part of the program to provide the Canadian people with universal health care.

Let me just briefly give an historical summary of the health care program in this country as it applies over the past 30-odd years. As hon. members know, the first hospital insurance and diagnostic services legislation in Canada was passed in the province of Saskatchewan in 1946 and came into effect on January 1, 1947. It was financed entirely from provincial revenues, despite the fact that in 1945 we had been assured at a federal-provincial conference that the federal government was going to come into the program and share the cost on a 50-50 basis.

That hospital insurance and diagnostic services program was financed entirely by the provincial government of Saskatchewan until 1958. During the course of second reading, some members opposite said that hospital insurance in Canada as a whole was introduced by a Liberal government under Prime Minister St. Laurent. Of course that is not correct. I do not attempt to ascribe any suggestion of misleading when I say that. I think these people are just not familiar with the facts.

It is true that in 1956 the Hon. Paul Martin, then minister of health, introduced legislation to provide hospital insurance shared 50-50 between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments. However, it had in it a proviso which said that the federal government would only pay 50 per cent of the cost if a majority of the provinces representing a majority of the population of Canada agreed to enter the program. That was a fairly safe promise to make because everyone knew at that time that the government of Mr. Duplessis of Quebec and the government of Mr. Drew in Ontario had both stated categorically that they would not support a hospital plan. The only two provinces which had hospital insurance plans were Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

It should be to the everlasting credit of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I do not think sufficient credit has been given, that when he took office in 1957 he kept the commitment he had made to the public in the general election of that year to remove that proviso. The result was that in 1958 hospital insurance and diagnostic services became available to any province which wanted to enter into the plan and pay 50 per cent of the costs and accept the other 50 per cent from the Government of Canada. Of course both Saskatchewan and British Columbia immediately became eligible, and the other provinces one by one fell into place.

That only covers hospital insurance. When we come to medical care, the Saskatchewan government introduced medical care legislation in the fall of 1961. As a matter of fact the last piece of legislation which I introduced as premier of that province was the medicare legislation. It came into effect on July 1, 1962. That too was financed entirely by the provincial government out of its own limited resources.

In 1964 the royal commission which had been set up by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, headed by Mr. Justice Emmet Hall, made its report. In my opinion, that was the finest report on comprehensive health insurance that has ever been printed in the English language.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is to the everlasting credit of the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson that his government brought down legislation in 1967 to implement a national medicare program shared by the federal and provincial governments. It came into effect on July 1, 1968.

I enumerate this because those of us interested in this field and those who pioneered this field, and I am not talking so much about politicians but doctors, hospital administrators and sociologists interested in the wider scope of the health program, all reminded the public from time to time that comprehensive medical care would come in two phases.

Phase one was the task of removing the financial barrier between those who render health services and those who receive health services. That is an important phase. As long as that barrier was there, there were people who could not get health services. No matter how deserving or how desperate their circumstances, they could not get those services. Therefore health service had a price tag. It was important to remove that barrier.

At the same time it was pointed out to the people of Canada that removing the financial barrier was only a part of the program. The much more difficult part of a health care program was to reorganize and change the entire delivery system. It had to move from a program which emphasized curative medicine over to a system which emphasized preventive medicine, recognizing that the most important thing is to keep people well rather than merely patching them up after they have become desperately ill.

The hon. member for Lambton-Kent made an excellent summary of what is entailed in that regard, such as periodic check-ups for health care, watching people's weight, X-rays, blood tests, urinalysis, checking heart conditions. He also referred to prescribing a proper diet, taking proper preventive measures and sometimes preventive surgery, saving people pain and suffering later on and also saving great amounts of money.

I am always rather surprised when I come across instances where governments say that medicare and hospital insurance are costing a lot of money and they have to cut back the costs. That is done by imposing deterrent fees. The answer does not lie in putting on deterrent fees which are simply a tax upon the sick. The answer lies in more preventive medicine so that fewer people are ill and need care, what the hon. member for Lambton-Kent called lifestyle therapy, helping people to eat the proper foods in the proper amounts to take care of their health. He referred to the opportunity to come before medical clinics every 12 months, with children and old people more frequently, to help people maintain a high standard of good health.

What worries me about this legislation is that there is no recognition of the fact that we have not even completed phase one. When the medicare legislation was before the House in 1967, sponsored by the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who was then minister of health, we in the New Democratic Party argued for an amendment which would give the cabinet the power at any time to add additional services to the medicare and diagnostic services now provided. That was accepted by the minister of health of that day. However, we have added no services.

We have not done anything about free prescription drugs, particularly for people suffering from such prolonged diseases as diabetes, or other conditions requiring expensive drugs. We have done nothing at all about hearing aids or glasses for people who are not able to supply themselves with those aids. We have done nothing about prosthetic appliances, crutches, wheel chairs, all those things which are part of the very comprehensive health programs of some other countries.

We have not moved at all since 1967 in extending the field of health care. We have not moved at all into phase two, or, at least, we have moved very little—I believe three provinces have set up community health clinics as pilot projects; they are doing very well and demonstrating that programs of preventive medicine can have a profound effect not only in improving the health of communities but in lowering the cost of hospital and medical care.

Instead of reducing the amount of money we are making available to the provinces, we should be saying to the provinces, "We will give you very large sums of money to help set up community health clinics." Or, if the communities are not responsive, we should make money available on a loan or grant basis to groups of doctors willing to operate these clinics. The idea of a doctor going out by himself with a little black bag is as out of date as the concept of an auto mechanic going out to mend cars carrying a little box of tools. The clinic is the place where proper treatment can be prescribed and proper services rendered.

We have not been doing these things. We have done a great deal in this country, and I think Canada can be proud of what it has done in the field of hospital care and medicare. It is true, of course, that we have not advanced as far as some countries in Europe where they have been implementing such programs for decades, but when one considers that the United States, with all its wealth and power, does not have a plan at all, the Canadian people can be congratulated and, indeed, successive Canadian governments can be congratulated for having gone forward, though reluctantly at times, as far as they have. But it is dangerous to assume that the job is finished. We have made a very good beginning, and that is all.

Instead of cancelling the health resources fund and saying "That is all over with", we should recognize there is a tremendous task still awaiting us if we are to give to the people the health services they need and to which they are entitled in a country with the resources we have and with the billions we spend on less important things. Rather than reducing the amount of money set aside for health care we should be increasing it so as to provide the kind of preventive care which would enable our children and their children to live healthier and more productive lives.

My third criticism of this legislation is that it shows a deplorable standard of priorities. The minister of health said the government has been obliged to "apply a major traumatic restraint" to these expenditures, to use her words. I do not quarrel with that. When I think of the various reports of the Auditor General, of the ports we have built and into which we have never put a ship, of the buildings we have put up or leased which have never been used; of the millions of cubic feet of office space we have acquired and which have not been occupied. Of course there is a lot of waste and extravagance which needs to be cut down. But if there had to be reductions, why choose such an important field as that of health services? Consider what the government can find money for. Yesterday the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) announced that the government intends to hand out $235 million to the pulp and paper industry which, over the past year, has shown an increase in profits of 150 per cent. Their profits have gone up from $160 million to $379 million in a 12-month period. We have several pulp and paper mills in my constituency. It is a very important industry. Of course, British Columbia will not get very much of this money; most of it will go to central Canada where there are a lot of obsolete mills. Our share will be very small.

But I want to point out how almost obscene it is that the government should be giving $235 million to an industry making more profit than at any time in its history, while at the same time saying it wants to take $80 million from the provincial governments which in 1966 it promised to pay to them if they went into medicare. Surely this is an indication of a distorted sense of values. After all, the measure of a government's worth is not measured just by the gross national product, or by the balance of payments, or by the amount of the gold reserve.

Surely the worth of a government in the main is to be judged by what it does for the people, the extent to which it improves the quality of their lives, improves their health care, gives them a greater measure of security and a higher standard of moral values. That is what makes a nation great. But instead of recognizing this to be the case, ministers opposite come before the House and ask us to vote to cancel a health resources fund designed to provide facilities to improve the health of the Canadian people. At the same time, as I have pointed out, they propose to hand out $235 million to an industry which has money running out of its ears. As far as I am concerned, and as far as the New Democratic Party is concerned, we shall not agree to this legislation and what it represents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) gives a very learned discourse on any subject before the House and is a person to whom we all listen. It was interesting that he should have referred to two phases in the health care system. What he says is, indeed, true. But he forgot to mention the third phase, one which we have not seen so far in Canada but which is presently unfolding in the United Kingdom under the National Health Service. I submit that the third phase is the phase in which one begins to see the breakdown of a health service which is completely under government control.

● (1440)

In the United Kingdom companies wanting to provide adequate health insurance for their employees so that they can receive adequate care so that they can return to work as quickly as possible, now have to get supplementary insurance from private insurers outside the National Health Service. I submit that that third phase will come to Canada unless governments realize that they cannot afford to interfere in the control of health care provisions to the extent they have been. This may be difficult for the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and some of his colleagues to accept, but if they look at what is happening in Great Britain they will see that that third phase is definitely unfolding there.

Last night a bit of an altercation took place between the minister and the spokesman for my party, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). The hon. member quoted at some length and made references to a recent clipping from the Toronto Star which was anything but complimentary to the minister. I was surprised that the only person to come to the rescue of the minister was a member of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

We still have not heard from anybody on the government side with regard to this bill. No government member has had the courage to come to the defence of the minister. We are debating this same bill again this afternoon. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is not in the House, and neither is her parliamentary secretary. We are still waiting to hear from even one member on the government side regarding Bill C-2.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said that this bill was fully discussed at second reading and also in committee, but it is obvious that the minister has not learned very much.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member refers to government members and indicates that somehow it is reprehensible that they have not stood up to defend the minister with regard to this bill. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the reason hon. members on this side are refraining from standing up and defending the minister and the bill is that we would like to see the bill passed.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I doubt if that is a question of privilege, but I appreciate the hon. member's rising at least to show some evidence that there is support for the minister.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And he gets his name in Hansard.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, there are several philosophies which should be discussed with reference to this bill. We raised these philosophies in committee, and the minister certainly gave us a good hearing and made some interesting comments. I think it is very important that legislators take some cognizance of where we place our priorities in the expenditure of public funds in the health care system. I think we must consider two aspects of funding. We can spend public funds on behalf of individual citizens who need certain health services, and the question is whether the government has a right and a moral responsibility to exact taxes from those people in order to give it back to them in the form of the medical health services they receive.

Another area in the health care system which is very vital and which this government ignores is the area of research. This applies right across the whole scientific community. Individuals citizens have difficulty allocating funds personally to provide for adequate research, and if anybody in society should be responsible for such allocation it should be the federal and provincial governments. If we are coming to a time in our economic history when we are under some pressure, the priority should not be expenditures on behalf of individuals for health care but expenditures on aspects which we as individuals cannot support ourselves. I am referring, of course, to research which requires government action in order to achieve progress.

When I raised this with the minister in the committee, I was pleased with her response. As recorded in Issue No. 7 of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, at page 10, the minister said:

> Usually, I would agree with Mr. Halliday's outlook. I think I would favour programs that equip people with facilities, buildings—all these things that permit people to meet and to do their thing.

The minister agreed with me that a high priority for governments should be to do those things for people which the people cannot do for themselves. I was pleased about that.

I believe it was back in 1966 that the government agreed to provide $500 million for the extension and enhancement of training facilities, for health care personnel and for certain aspects of research. Now we come to this year, and we find that the minister's priorities are different. Although theoretically she agrees with my philosophy that we have to support people in research when they have trouble financing their work, she now turns around and changes her story. I find that very disappointing indeed.

As we look further at the minister's assessment of the situation today, we find that she is cutting back on the funds which her predecessors a number of years ago agreed to provide. We find that she is not making any provision for continuing and upgrading health care facilities. As reported at page 2808 of Hansard for last night, the minister said, and I quote:

As for professional and quasi-professional health groups—

This is the part I want to emphasize.

—we now have in Canada a satisfactory level of personnel with adequate training.

I do not need to tell the physicians who are in the House that adequate training is not a lifetime acquisition. It is said that the half-life of a physician's knowledge is five to seven years, and I remind the minister that she should be making provisions for continuing training and the provision of facilities so that this half-life can be extended beyond five to seven years. If physicians do not receive that kind of support, they will be in more difficulty as time goes on, and we are already beginning to see some signs of that.

In this same vein, when the minister was talking to us last night, she had this to say as reported at page 2811 of Hansard:

There will be a need, to a much lesser degree, to maintain and upgrade existing schools and related facilities which in most instances are new or renovated structures.

Again I say that the minister does not seem to realize that it is necessary to keep spending money on the good facilities we already have if we are to maintain them properly.

Last night the minister criticized us for spending so much time discussing medical research. It is paradoxical that she should accuse members of the opposition in that way, and then devote most of her speech to discussing medical research. The minister raved about the contributions her government has been making to medical research over the last few years. The minister would lead the public to believe that the government has made an adequate contribution to the research community. I could quote a number of her comments which would lead people to believe that the government has done a really great job.

It is very interesting that before I heard the minister speak last night, and before she had the nerve to say that the research community is very happy with all the money which is being granted to the Medical Research Council and so forth, yesterday afternoon, I received a letter dated January 29, just Monday of this week, from the executive secretary of the science policy committee of the Canadian Federation of Biological Societies. This federation is a very learned body. Its members are very knowledgeable about research. It is too bad the minister did not consult this group before making comments about the adequacy of her support for research. This letter was not solicited by me. As far as I know I have never been in touch with Dr. John Kucharczyk, who sent this letter to me.

● (1450)

I will not read the entire letter because of its length, but he points out some of the flaws in the minister's argument and the mechanisms upon which the minister based the funding proposals for the Medical Research Council and medical research in general. The plans over a five-year period are that funding for medical research will be based upon the implicit price index of the gross national expenditure. In short terms, it is condensed to IPI-GNE. In coming to a formula, that is modified by the CPI and the GNP minus 1 per cent. It is a rather complicated formula, but the interesting thing is the net effect of it upon medical research. Dr. Kucharczyk obviously is a researcher who is quite capable of bringing out the inherent fallacies in the program for medical research laid down by the minister. At page two of his letter dated January 29, 1979, Dr. Kucharczyk said the following:

Table 1 shows that from 1969-70 to 1978-79 the IPI-GNE underestimated scientific inflation—measured by the Science Expenditures Price Index or SEPI—by a total of 34.2 index points or $16.2 million.

In a budget of approximately $62 million to $63 million annually, I suggest that is a significant underestimate on behalf of medical research.

He continued as follows:

Yet it is precisely this index, the IPI-GNE, that the government intends to use on its new five-year funding formula for MRC announced by Mme Bégin on December 1.

Obviously it is disappointing to the medical community, particularly the biological research community, to see the minister, who probably did not have adequate research staff, develop an incomplete and inadequate formula. In order to summarize the feelings of the Canadian Federation of Biological Societies concerning the minister's plans for the future, the closing paragraph of the doctor's letter reads as follows:

In short, our calculations do not support the minister's conclusion that the five-year plan is "A major step . . . toward the achievement of greater stability in the federal government's support for biomedical research". The proposed formula neither reflects the true level of scientific inflation nor will it allow health research activities in Canada to expand at a rate commensurate with the growth rate of the economy as a whole.

That is a rather terrible indictment of the minister's plans for medical research. There are more data and several more tables containing information which was gathered by Statistics Canada and the Department of Finance. The figures were developed on behalf of the then minister of science and technology. This information is available if the Minister of National Health and Welfare wants to look at it. I hope the minister will revise her formula to support medical research in a manner satisfactory to the Canadian research community.

Another area I should like to touch on deals with the manner in which the minister brought forth the changes in Bill C-2. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands mentioned today, and as the hon. member for Athabasca mentioned last night, the minister made no effort to consult the provinces prior to the institution of this drastic $84 million cut. Often we have seen this type of action occur, particularly respecting the social service programs of the government. If the government wants to be re-elected, it promises Canadians something they want very much—extra money in their pockets. This could be accomplished by promising increased benefits in health care, unemployment insurance or other programs. Usually a government is re-elected if it makes promises to the people.

In this particular instance, the government involved the provinces but gave them no choice. They were forced to agree with the plan, and the government went along with it for a given number of years. A couple of years before the plan was completed the government decided to cut off the provinces, medical research and medical schools across the country. Canadians are becoming wise to this type of action. If the government attempts to bribe people because of the upcoming election, this time I do not think it will be successful.

I should like to refer to what the minister gave as reasons for the cut. Earlier this week the minister was confused when she attempted to answer my question regarding the distribution and submission of T4A tax forms for old age pensions. I am glad the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) is in the House today, as he is very involved in this matter. He was conned by the Minister of National Health and Welfare into allowing changes to his original plans. This is very upsetting to the old age pensioners, but it is inappropriate to discuss it at this time. I wanted only to acknowledge the presence of the Minister of National Revenue. He can be assured we will discuss this matter in the very near future. Members of my party have received letters from old age pensioners all across Canada who were very upset by what the government did with the refunds they should be receiving.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare appeared before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in order to explain the reasons for Bill C-2. I should like to quote from her four-page introductory comment dated November 30, 1978. The minister made her introductory comments before the committee on December 7, 1978. She said the following:

> In summary, the health resources fund has now achieved its primary objective of assisting the provinces and territories with the provision of the necessary training facilities to satisfy current and future requirements of health manpower in the major health disciplines to meet provincial needs.

If one attempts to interpret that statement, the reason for the $84 million cut was that in the minister's opinion we had achieved the main or primary objective of the total fund, and that our needs as far as training facilities were concerned had been satisfied. I suppose those are nice reasons for stopping, but I should like to refer to what the minister said in the House of Commons on November 27, 1978, when she introduced the bill. At that time she was attempting to justify the introduction of Bill C-2, and there was no mention of objectives having been achieved. As reported at pages 1519 and 1520 of Hansard, the minister said:

> —despite the reduction due to the fiscal constraints which we think are essential to put the Canadian economy back to full productivity.

The minister suggested that the real reason for the introduction of the bill was not because the objectives in health care had been achieved, but because of financial restraints. As reported at pages 1520 and 1521 of Hansard, the minister said:

> Regretfully it is to be terminated now because of the difficult conditions in the country.

I cannot put it nearly as well as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, but obviously it was not a cabinet decision; it was the decision of our president or emperor, as he is sometimes referred to. Suddenly we required cuts in our national expenditures, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare was told to make these cuts. The minister used the economy as the reason for depriving our health institutions of $84 million. I do not know how the minister can explain this contradiction. Of course, we are becoming accustomed to contradictions; the list is as long as my arm; nothing is new.

● (1500)

When one considers the problems associated with research, I think one has to mention also that the minister has failed to recognize that we must have long-range planning in the research community. I give her credit for recognizing this to the extent that the Medical Research Council will now be able to move ahead five years in its planning, but by promising $500 million a number of years ago and taking it away before that fund has reached its maturity, she is denying that planning function to our medical schools and to the research community, and she is taking away any opportunity they had to plan ahead.

I do not want to pursue this subject much longer, but there are two things I should like to speak to very briefly, and one is medical manpower. I raise this issue purely because the minister chose to raise it in her speech last night. We discussed this matter in committee when we considered Bill C-2 there. I asked the minister whether she had any true understanding of what the actual manpower status is in Canada. She had one of her experts from the department with her in the committee that day to whom she referred the question, namely Dr. Law. The interesting thing is that the department has ideas about the physician population ratio and we were quoted a bunch of figures by the minister last night, but if you ask the minister simply how many practising physicians we have in Canada, she cannot tell us. That is how absurd and how inadequate research is in this country in relation to medical manpower; she cannot tell us how many practising specialists or practising family physicians there are in Canada.

An hon. Member: How many are there?

Mr. Halliday: That is the kind of research job the Department of National Health and Welfare should be doing, but they refuse to do it, they refuse to accept that responsibility. They come out with glib figures which look good in the papers and which make it appear as though we had many practising physicians here, but included in those figures are people like the nine of us here in the House of Commons, most of whom are not practising medicine at all, or to a limited extent. All across the country, with increasing bureaucracy, we have more and more professionals working outside the area of delivery of health care, working in some type of administrative capacity with health insurance companies or in various government bureaucracies, yet the minister says that because they are licensed physicians they should be included in the physician population ratio. I have been bugging the minister, as I have her predecessor, to give us some accurate figures, but they cannot do it even after my two or three years of pleading.

I have one final comment that I am prompted to make about one of the remarks of, once again, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) when he spoke about the need for preventive health care. I do not have to be convinced about the need for preventive health care: I am convinced about the inadequacy of governmental efforts to promote preventive medicine, there is no doubt about that. If we have a change of government before too long, we will probably be able to institute some type of incentives in this country which will encourage people to live a lifestyle that will be more conducive to the development of good health. But certainly I want to raise an issue which is a corollary to this very comment regarding preventive medicine that I think needs to be raised here. Not only does it relate to the obligations and responsibilities of the Minister of National Health and Welfare but, I suggest, it relates to the obligations of her sidekick, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo). She has seen fit to cut down the budget of her department by some $5 million to $6 million this year. I was disappointed to hear today, for instance, her announcement of a gift or a grant or some such thing of about $5 million to three cities in Canada for the promotion of professional sport to NHL level. I am a follower of professional sport in Canada. As a matter of fact, I hope to see the Toronto Maple Leafs and Montreal Canadiens play tomorrow night. I have a lot of respect for our professional teams in Canada. There is a real need for them and I think they serve a real purpose. But when I look at the title of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, I see in it very little about professional sport. I wonder where she found that $15 million to hand out to the three cities, much as I think they might deserve to have better arenas, and I am sure that to some extent the money will be used by amateur sport as well. The point I want to make is that if she has that kind of money for professional sport, which is by and large self-supporting in Canada, I wonder why she cannot find some money for fitness, recreation and amateur sport which has a real bearing on the health of Canadians. If we want to talk about the need for preventive medicine here, we should take a serious look at the amount of money that is being spent in this country on amateur sport and on fitness and at the same time be mindful of the fact that the federal government spends about $400 per person per year on health care. At this year's rate we spend about $1.25 per person per year on fitness and amateur sport, most of which does not sink down to the level of the community at which we can do something for the general health of people in Canada by providing them with an opportunity to become more involved in various types of fitness activities and of amateur sport.

I suggest that if we are going to look at the need for cutting back on $84 million in our health resources fund, the minister might well have used that money in another way. If she thinks we have reached the ultimate in our medical plant facilities, in our institutions and in our research, she might well have considered handing over some of that money to her colleague, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, who, I am sure, could have found a way to improve amateur sport with that money and to upgrade the fitness level across the country, thereby doing something worth while for Canadians.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you would understand, after having heard the comments of various members of the opposition—unfortunately we have heard nothing from the government side—our reluctance to support the minister in this third reading debate on Bill C-2.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in this debate together with the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), who has just spoken, and who was preceded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) who led off the debate for us. I understand I will be followed by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) who I know will make a contribution to this debate. Moreover, it is a great honour for me to participate in this debate with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Island (Mr. Douglas) and to be in the House with him during this debate, knowing of his great contribution and pioneering effort in this whole area in the province of Saskatchewan, although he would be the first one to admit that some details of it might not have been to his liking. But in general, members on both sides of the House recognize the great contribution he has made in health care in Saskatchewan and also the contribution he made to the debate this afternoon.

It is absolutely incredible to me that in a debate as important as this one on health resources not one member on the government side has addressed himself to this problem today.

We know where their priorities are today. I have known for years where the Liberal priorities have been because they abandoned true Liberal principles years ago. It is no surprise to me that during the so-called restraint period—and previous speakers have already alluded to this—in a week when the federal government can find millions and millions of dollars to aid the paper industry in this country, an industry which has shown fantastic profits, the government is cutting the health resources fund. What in the name of God are they doing? They are curtailing the health resources fund in the same week they found millions of dollars for the paper industry which is making millions of dollars in profit. Where in the name of God are the old Liberal priorities? I will speak to that point later.

There is a lot of yelling across the way, Mr. Speaker. If hon. members opposite have prepared speeches they should get up and deliver them, but I do not suppose they have. No member of the government will speak in the debate this afternoon because they cannot defend the indefensible—either that or they have been muzzled.

● (1510)

A few months ago budgetary cuts were announced, Mr. Speaker. The only reason for them was that this government has so mismanaged the economy that they have given this country the worst economic management since confederation. Who has suffered because of this? With the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the hon. member for Athabasca, and other members of this party's social policy committee, I knew many months ago on whose back the government's restraint program would be carried. Indeed we have proof positive of it. The low income Canadian will carry the load. The first cut was in the wheat subsidy, which of course affected the price of bread and we know how important that is to people on low incomes. Next came the powdered milk subsidy, then family allowances and significant aspects of low income housing. Now, believe it or not, the health resources fund is the victim.

I have to repeat myself, Mr. Speaker, in saying that they are doing this in the same week that they seem to be able to find millions of dollars for business. Is this the Liberal policy of Mackenzie King; of Lester Pearson?

Mr. Parent: Of Pierre Trudeau.

Mr. Grafftey: Of Pierre Trudeau? Is this the just society?

Mr. Parent: I knew I would hit a nerve somewhere.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member has hit a nerve. Does the just society fight inflation on the backs of the poor and nobody else?

I am not a socialist, Mr. Speaker but I agree with many of my friends in the New Democratic Party. If there is one thing that governments must do it is care for people who are sometimes getting shafted. Why cannot this government bring in a restraint program that is more imaginative than one that is waged on the backs of those who cannot defend themselves.

The hon. member for Oxford who has just spoken and was so articulate said time and time again in committee that the minister claimed this health resources fund was being terminated because it had already fulfilled its usefulness. As he so ably put it, the minister subsequently said she really had to do that because of budgetary restraints imposed from on high. I happen to know that this fund was cut without her knowledge. That is why she is not here today to defend this bill. It was cut by Treasury Board and the Department of Finance, and the minister went right through the roof. Had it been cut with her knowledge and consent she would be here to defend herself today and would have her minions here to defend her, but she as been muzzled.

The minister said she had consulted the provinces, Mr. Speaker, and that they were quite happy—that the fund had fulfilled its usefulness. However, I made a long distance telephone call to each of the ten provinces to find out the facts. This fund was cut without consent from the provinces. Not one provincial minister of health said that the fund had fulfilled its usefulness. I wonder if the minister could come into this House this afternoon or next week and name one provincial minister who told her or her officials that the fund had fulfilled its usefulness.

There is only one reason for the fund being cut, Mr. Speaker. This government has so mismanaged the economy it has had to make cuts in many fields. The cut in the social field falls on the backs of those Canadians who cannot defend themselves.

I should like to return to the very able speech made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands who has done so much in this field. Let me draw an analogy.

Suppose that tomorrow morning most of us were sitting in a city council and agreed that every body in the city should have free bread and we passed an ordinance or regulation to that effect. The second thing we would do would be to vote income supplementation into people's pockets in order to pay for that bread. I assume that the third thing to be done would be to get in touch with the bakers and tell them to manufacture the bread to meet the demand. What has been done with medical and health care services in Canada, though? Generally speaking, not because of men who have done so well in Saskatchewan, like the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, but because of the stupidity of this government, we have invariably voted income supplementation.

I wish the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) would make a speech—if he is allowed to. Maybe the ministers have been muzzled too.

Mr. Cullen: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. I was not laughing at him, or with him for that matter. I wanted to point out that something like 30 cabinet ministers backed this bill. It was supported at second reading. The minister is not here this afternoon because she has other responsibilities.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just 30 ministers? What about the others?

Mr. Grafftey: We can imagine what would happen in the city, Mr. Speaker, if after passing an ordinance for free bread and voting income supplementation into people's pockets to buy that bread, it turned out no bread was available. We do not have to imagine the chaos. The population would be starving.

Is it possible the same stupidity is being imposed on our population vis-à-vis medical health care services? We have decreed that every Canadian should have free health care service and we have voted income supplementation into people's pockets for those services, but what about the third step?

Some members who spoke ahead of me talked about preventive medicine. I am aware that the initial concept of the health resources fund was for educational institutions and research. It was meant to be the government's centrepiece, to make sure that the plan and personnel were in place, if one is to be guided by the speeches made when the fund was set up.

The plan has been imposed on the provinces, and we have been through that debate, Mr. Speaker. It is public policy that the services should be there for everybody in the country, and it is public policy that we are going to vote income supplementation into people's pockets for those services.

Initially the health resources fund was the government's acknowledgement that it had to play a leadership role with the provinces. As the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands have said, it indicated that the plan, the doctors, the institutions, the research facilities—the whole infrastructure, was there.

Today the government has the unmitigated gall to tell us they are cancelling the health resources fund because it has completed stage one of what in my view should be a ten-stage program.

● (1520)

Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether the fund is in the preventive field or the curative field.

Doctors who have already spoken in this debate, such as the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for Athabasca, have suggested that it should be an ongoing fund. I challenge the government to come before this House and say that they have had provincial consent to end this fund. That is just not true. The provinces were not consulted, so how could they have ever said that the fund has fulfilled its usefulness?

Originally the fund was set up for research at the university level. Past federal ministers of health and welfare have said time and again that before we can make sense and rationalize either the cost or planning of services we need to rationalize community planning. At the centre of community planning for the delivery of rational and humane medical and health care services is a high degree of emphasis on preventive medicine, home care, community clinics, emergency care research, the facilities and training of paramedical people, extended care centres, chronic care hospitals, and the list goes on. All these things go into the mix of rationalizing a proper organization for community planning, and all these things can be affected directly or indirectly by the extension of the ongoing health resources fund which the minister is cutting by this legislation.

Very often in this House or outside and in committee ministers talk about our supposedly enviable doctor population ratio in Canada as compared to other countries. It may be enviable in a global sense, but the fact is there are still many underserviced areas in this country, whether it be from the lack of primary care by physicians, specialists or paramedical people. This situation could be rectified with a proper extention of the health resources fund. The facts are here for all to see, that this fund is not being cut because the provinces want it or because it has fulfilled its purpose in terms of its phase one objective, but because of the worst economic management this country has seen since confederation. It is being cut by a government that is waging a restraint program on the backs of the less deserved, less fortunate in this country, and on the backs of the low-income Canadians.

The community hospital should be at the hub of health care and medical services in the community. Medical experts and government planning experts have talked about proper health care service for decades now, but it cannot be realized unless we have public funds allocated for planning and personnel. The only instrument in respect of which the federal authorities had to take initiatives was the very fund which the government is attempting to cut off by this legislation, namely, the health resources fund.

In looking back at the great social initiatives of the St. Laurent government, the Diefenbaker government and the Pearson government—and I am being objective about this—in bygone decades, times before the present, disastrous Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power, we are looking at total annual budgets of $6 billion, I shudder at what we have now. Under the present Prime Minister, who is responsible for devastating our economy, we have seen our total budget go up tenfold from approximately $6 billion to approximately $60 billion. How can they possibly consider themselves a government of a just society? I challenge members opposite, who have voted for increasing the budget by tenfold, session after session to name one major social program they have brought in over the past ten years. They cannot.

This government, while ruining the economy, has not brought in one major social initiative in ten years. The best thing they can do, while passing out millions of dollars to the pulp and paper industry, is to cut out the health resources fund. Where are the great Liberal policies of the past? It is simply "ad hockery" and opportunities which we are seeing from this government. The people of Canada are waiting to turn them out because they are awful.

Mr. Young: How much has the GNP gone up?

Mr. Grafftey: I notice that members opposite are interrupting from their seats because they have been muzzled and ordered not to embarrass their Prime Minister by speaking.

Never in the history of a country in the western world have expenditures gone up tenfold in ten years without the introduction of one major social program. Can the government refute that; no. That is why they are sitting down and not speaking today.

I can well remember the number of federal-provincial meetings held in good faith to get this fund launched. At that time I am sure the provinces did not even imagine that the federal government would just pull out, leaving them holding the bag. Is this co-operative federalism? The reason this country is in such a mess today, vis-à-vis unity and federal-provincial relations, is because of actions like this. Is this sort of unilateral pulling-out of programs the kind of federal-provincial consultation and co-operation that the government feels will help the atmosphere of unity in Canada? I do not think so.

Within the past ten days it has been reported by reliable news media that Liberal backbenchers and senior civil servants in the hon. lady's department are saying that her department is in a mess, that she has lost control, and that she has no co-ordinated policies. Members opposite, so-called government supporters and senior civil servants have said that this is nothing but a bunch of "ad hockery" and that the whole department has broken down because of a lack of leadership from the hon. lady. No single item underlines this more than the fact that the government is now asking us to cut back the health resources fund, a fund which has not even completed stage one of its objective. This is not only a very sad day for the country, but for the people of Canada who expect and deserve better, and who will be getting and expecting better in a very few months.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, we have opposed this bill primarily for two reasons. One reason is the high-handed method the government used to introduce the legislation and its failure to consult with the provinces.

● (1530)

It was a unilateral decision with an announcement to the press, followed five days later by a telex to the provincial health ministers informing them that the fund would be terminated.

The other reason we oppose this bill is because of its detrimental effect on research, by cutting off funds for medical research to an even greater degree than the minister and her predecessors have done over the past decade.

In reviewing the comments made by her on second reading of this bill we find that the minister used the word "dramatic". She said that the government has to take dramatic steps in its restraint program. Whether she realized it or not, she hit the nail on the head when she said that, because those are the only kinds of cuts this government is making in its restraint program—those which are dramatic, and those which evoke or stimulate an outcry of response from the people of Canada. When this kind of dramatic cut is examined carefully, it is revealed as nothing more than political grandstanding. If the government was serious about making cuts it would forget about drama and would look into the Auditor General's report. If ministers took time to study this report they would see the hundreds of pages of suggestions as to where the efficiency of government could be improved and where improved accountability methods could save millions of dollars.

For some strange reason however, these recommendations appear year after year in the Auditor General's report, but each year the circumstances are worse. The government talks about dramatic cuts in spending but seems to avoid those recommendations which would not be so dramatic but which would correct the extravagant waste of millions of dollars.

We in this party have to object to that kind of an approach, an approach by a government that is more concerned with drama than with increasing efficiency and doing something about the excessive waste imposed by its practices and policies.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are not very impressed with the proposals contained in this bill. As the minister indicated, the health resources fund was established in 1966. The sum of $500 million was set aside to assist provinces in the establishment of health training and research facilities. About 25 per cent of this was to go toward research. So far $416 million has either been committed or already spent. The proposal in this bill as it was originally drawn would allow the federal government to welsh on its commitment to the tune of $84 million. Of that fund, three-quarters was allocated to the construction of facilities for training health professionals, acquiring research equipment and training Canada's brilliant young people for careers in the health field.

Through its austerity the government has decided to chop this fund. The thing that concerns us most is the method used, which again is typical of this government. It did not bother to tell the provinces in advance; it did not bother to consult with the provinces in advance, but just sent a telex about five days after the intention was made public.

In a federal system direct consultation among the responsible governments is essential as a means of ensuring that the goals of all governments are better integrated and more sensitive to the regional and national requirements. For a federal-provincial system of government to operate smoothly, effectively and for the benefit of the people, there must be mutual respect between the provincial and federal governments. There must be a mutual feeling of trust.

The provinces need to trust the federal government. If the federal government makes a commitment, they need to rely on that in order to plan for the future. When the federal government takes the position that commitments are made to be broken, the feeling of trust breaks down. This is why the federal-provincial system has broken down and why unity in this country has been so shattered in the ten years of this regime.

I mentioned earlier that about one-quarter of this fund has been allocated toward medical research. We already know from previous comments made in the House, and indeed from comments made by representatives of the research community both inside and outside of parliament, that funding of medical research has already been seriously eroded. Unsalvageable damage has been done to the research capability of this country. As well, numerous laboratories are idle. Hundreds of research workers have left the country or have left their careers to do other things in order to keep body and soul together. Various technicians have been relieved of their duties and are on the already bulging unemployment rolls. In general, the policies of this government have been creating havoc in research and have caused stagnation in the general attitude toward research. It is nothing short of criminal negligence when funds are cut for health research and facilities in this way. We know that in the long run every human being in this country will be affected during his or her lifetime. This government seems to be saying in this particular instance that the saving of dollars seems to be more important than good health. In my view, and I am sure hon. members will agree, this is certainly false.

I want to touch briefly on another matter, Mr. Speaker, and that has to do with the Indian health services guidelines which were implemented only a few weeks ago. The minister indicated that she felt the Indian people as a whole were abusing the health care services that were provided. I want to object to that sort of criticism because I do not see why that particular group of people should be singled out. It is quite easy to see that some people in every group in society are abusing the health care system, to some extent.

Bill C-2 is a cutback bill in the area of health services. The concept of health, if it is to be meaningful, must be viewed in the broadest possible context. The context must encompass the physical and social aspects of a person's well-being. It cannot refer only to the absence of disease. Indian people do not enjoy the state of health enjoyed by other Canadians. This is revealed most dramatically by statistics. The statistics with respect to the health of the Indian people in my province are horrifying. If the minister is concerned about anybody abusing the medical services in this country, she should not single out the weakest group in our society, the Indian people.

In concluding my contribution to this debate, may I commend the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), who is our critic in this area. His participation in this debate has been very worth while. I would also like to commend the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) who outlined the needs of our native people in this country extremely well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, what about a Liberal?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I hesitated for a moment—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There was another hon. gentleman standing up. I did not see the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis).

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the debate. This is a subject which brings back some personal memories. For some nine years, from 1951-1960, I was employed in the Department of National Health and Welfare as an economist. At that time one of the responsibilities of my section was an analysis of the national health grants and their impact. These grants had been introduced in the period following the second world war by the government of the Rt. Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. As prime minister he intervened in the debate when the legislation establishing the national health grants was introduced. Mr. King said at that time that a fundamental prerequisite to health insurance was the concept of health grants. These grants were to be the instrument of making sure we had the resources both in the capital facilities and in the trained personnel to provide services to the people of Canada on a scale which we hoped to provide. The history of these grants has been described in many different places. The nature of the grants has changed. New grants were introduced. The medical rehabilitation branch was introduced in the late 1950s, for example. As we look back today we see that the operation of this program has achieved a good deal of its purpose. No doubt we have not achieved all the purposes in mind. The minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in her remarks the other day pointed to the hospital construction grant, a tremendous contribution that has taken place through the encouragement and incentive that was offered. In those days the grant was only $1,000 per bed. That does not sound much in the days of the cheap dollars we have today. At that time it was an incentive to an orderly planning and extension of hospital facilities, and so on down the line. A good deal of the funds were dedicated to medical research. The minister has pointed out that the Medical Research Council is now to be the instrument through which an extended program of grants takes place. National objectives will be undertaken under the very competent advice of professionals named by that council.

● (1540)

What puzzles me when I listen to members opposite is their inconsistency. They tell us they are going to start everything on zero-based budgeting and then prove the need for programs. They are all for reducing deficits, except now and again they want a stimulating deficit. One never quite knows.

Mr. Nystrom: It is only three months.

Mr. Francis: Time comes into it. I referred to members of the opposition. I wish to exclude members of the New Democratic Party who have not been part of that argument.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you.

Mr. Francis: I suggest that members opposite look at this bill as a bit of zero-based budgeting. That is what they will appeal to the electorate on, if we can believe what they are saying. Mind you, they may change their minds. That is their privilege.

The government is saying that after a period of 30 years, since 1948, we are now going to go to a zero-based budgeting approach on health resource funding. It is going to look at health research, the shortage of personnel, justify what is needed and, if specific programs are needed, and if the case is sold, these will be provided by the government and by parliament. They will be provided by this government.

Hon. members opposite say the program is not over, that 30 years is not enough. They say we should keep it going, that we should vote more money and that it is a betrayal of something or other not to keep it going.

The government is saying the time has come to again start from scratch in this area and look at our objectives and our needs, justify the allocation of resources and the relationship to them, and that this is part of an over-all program of restraint.

It is not easy for me in the seat I represent to defend restraint. I represent a seat in the national capital that has a very large number of public servants, many of whom are carrying the burden of the implementation of these policies. We have the difficulty of eliminating the 5,000 positions declared redundant under the directives which have emanated from Treasury Board. This has not been painless.

I listened to members on the other side talk about the painless method of eliminating 20,000 positions a year for three years. All I know is the people I represent will not buy that. The credibility of the people who try to say they can do all of this painlessly is not going to be accepted either.

If the members of the official opposition mean zero-based budgeting, they have to start practising it somewhere. They cannot say it should not start in the health resources, not any place you look, that it is always a decision to be made somewhere else, and tomorrow. We are biting the bullet. We say the bill represents a decision to reduce a program which has had a very general over-all effect in the health resources funding area. We say we are going to justify the allocations sector by sector, case by case, where they are needed from now on.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to give way to my hon. friend for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) because it is somewhat disconcerting to be involved in a debate where the government side is shocked into silence. As a matter of fact, you cannot get a debate unless you have give and take across the chamber.

The hon. member for Ottawa West has now stated his case which is in some respects typical of the posture he takes. He does not always agree with government policy. However, in this instance he does agree with the legislation before the House in which the government is asking for third reading passage to meet the needs of the health programs in Canada at the present time.

I wish to say at the outset that this expresses the problem we are confronted with at the present time. We are not able to debate this important piece of legislation from a dispassionate standpoint on the basis of its merit, and there is nothing more important than the health and well-being of Canadians everywhere. Rather, we are debating the matter in an electioneering atmosphere. Obviously the government has told its supporters to be silent because the posture they are taking with regard to this matter is indefensible and they want to get this over with as quickly as possible.

Unfortunately the House and the country have been poised on the brink of this kind of uncertainty for almost a year. Parliament has been turned into a huge election machine. Nothing is done unless it is with the government's eye on the election potential.

The confusion that surrounds this piece of legislation at this time arose from the sudden reversal of policy by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It was a fundamental reversal of policy, a 180 degree change when he spoke over television last August 1 and tried to redirect a government that had been wasteful to the nth degree. It had dragged the Canadian economy down to the level of disaster. They suddenly tried to reverse the whole posture and appear as a government led by a Prime Minister advocating restraint.

This not only shook up the whole country, but it shook up the cabinet as well, particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who indicated in a press conference at that time that he really did not know what was going on with respect to government policy. All of us who watched that press club interview over television had great sympathy for the Minister of Finance. He had been placed in an impossible position by the sudden change in direction of the Prime Minister. It is not the first change in direction, as Charles Lynch stated in a recent column. It is the tenth manifestation of the Prime Minister of Canada. We do not know what the position is going to be from one moment to the next.

It is obvious the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) was placed in the same position of uncertainty, not knowing the direction the Prime Minister was charting, or if he even knew the direction he was charting. She was immediately faced with severe cutbacks on policies which the hon. member for Ottawa West referred to with some degree of positive appreciation this afternoon. We agree with that. However, suddenly there is a cutback which faces the provinces that are very dependent on the federal government for leadership, both in terms of its over-all approach to health and welfare and also for the financial basis of health and welfare programs.

Here are some of the cuts: $55 million in equalization grants, $150 million by deferring the community services program, $160 million by deferring the social services legislation. I want to pause there for a moment. For six or seven years we have been promised that there would be a major breakthrough in health and welfare programs with the introduction of the long-anticipated social services legislation. It began with a five-year review which produced the orange paper under the leadership of a former minister of national health and welfare who is now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde). Seven years later, we are still being given nothing but hope and promises with regard to this legislation. But let me continue with the recital of the cutbacks. They include $25 million under the public utilities income tax transfer, making a total of $390 million and the bill presently before the House would increase that amount by $29.5 million, bringing it up to $420 million. One can understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare who assumed the portfolio a little over a year ago was faced with an impossible situation. As my hon. friend from Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) said in his speech last evening, she was obliged to take a scatter gun approach in trying to cope with it.

I have read her speeches with great care. She is obviously trying to put the best possible face on the situation, trying to give the government a humanitarian face, though that is an impossibility. I believe her heart is in the right place, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said; he believes the minister is trying to do her best in circumstances which have been created by the policies of her leader. She demonstrated this quality when she was faced with protests from the Indian community—I shall not dwell on that subject because it has been dealt with by several speeches from this side. It is incomprehensible that the government would attack the most vulnerable group with respect to health care by removing rights which are not only traditional but established by treaty. If there is any group which should be able to claim the benefits of health care from the government it is the aboriginal population. Yet the minister was forced to make the irrational move of cutting back the health services they have traditionally enjoyed. Faced with the facts, she had to acknowledge that it was an impossible situation and she delayed a final decision for six months. That will just happen to coincide with the end of the next election and that is why I say we cannot deal with this legislation in any spirit of reality; it is all being debated under the prospect of an imminent election.

I should like to compliment the minister in another regard. Hon. members will be aware that I have been promoting a private member's motion for four or five years making the simple request that we should deal in depth with the problems, both physical and mental, of the disabled community of this country. All we are seeking is a committee to co-ordinate our activities in this field. That proposition has been repeatedly turned down, but I did receive a letter from the minister dated December 5 which indicates that she is wrestling with this problem and wishes to do something about it even though the social services legislation will not be in place in time for the 1980 World Congress on Rehabilitation. She says in her letter:

> You can infer from these comments that a new motion along the line of your previous ones will receive my endorsation and support.

I appreciate that gesture of support and goodwill; it seems it should have been given long ago. We are now faced with the situation that our social services legislation will not be in place in time for Rehabilitation International, the worldwide community of people and organizations interested in rehabilitation which Canada is hosting in Winnipeg in 1980. I have been talking about the marvellous breakthrough which was on the horizon because we would be implementing the new legislation. At least, the minister recognized her obligations and responsibility and is giving her support to the motion. So we shall get together a committee which will make it possible for representatives of the voluntary sector of the rehabilitation movement in this country to clarify their plans. There are at least 48 separate organizations led by the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled which are making preparations for this great congress. Six thousand people from around the world will be meeting in Winnipeg and we shall be able to hear from those representatives of the voluntary sector; we shall be able to get it all together and make a report on the state of rehabilitation in Canada which will be available as background information.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could call it four o'clock now; I am approaching another aspect in my speech?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, and private bills.

Item No. 9, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Item No. 10, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Item No. 13, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 14, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 15, the hon. member for York-Centre (Mr. Kaplan). Shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

DISPLAY OF THE FLAGS OF CANADA IN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser) moved that Bill C-220, respecting the presence of the flags of Canada in both Houses of parliament, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose and explain the provisions of Bill C-220, which would provide for the display in the House of Commons and the Senate of the other Canadian flag, the Union Jack.

To the uninitiated my bill might seem a reactionary proposal; the placing of a symbol of the British Empire within the precincts of a building which the BBC has called Britain's first, but not last, export of fairyland parliamentary gothic.

But seriously, hon. members should realize two facts: first, the Parliament of Canada, after approving the Maple Leaf flag in December of 1964 immediately designated the Union Jack as another legal and legitimate Canadian flag; and second, the legitimacy of that flag is enforced by its special role as a reminder of our loyalty to the Crown and of our membership in the Commonwealth of nations.

I would like to examine these aspects of the symbolism of the Union Jack with a view to analysing why it should be displayed in this chamber.

To begin with, the Union Jack reminds us of our loyalty to the Crown. Indeed, Canada has always been a monarchy in an unbroken line. From the day that Jacques Cartier planted the fleur-de-lis of the Bourbon kings on the soil of New France in 1534 we have been a royal people whether under French, British or, since 1867 and more particularly 1831, a Canadian monarch.

In 1867 Canadians deliberately and freely chose the monarchy as their system of government. They could have adopted any other form of administration, but they chose, as do their descendents today, deliberately and specifically to maintain a constitutional monarchy, reflective of Canada's heritage dominant in Canada's present, and essential to Canada's future.

In chorus, unbroken from the earliest days, Canadian leaders, citizens and various constitutional conferences of more recent times have methodically decided that Canada should continue to be a sovereign state of which the Queen is head.

Indeed, one might add parenthetically that the monarchy even antedates the arrival of French colonists, for it, in a rather absolute variety, was the form of government known to Indian tribes in the millennium before the white man ever set foot upon this continent.

Of course, the constitutional monarchy is more democratic than a republic, for the Queen of Canada represents all Canadians. A president or other elected head of state would be a divisive factor in our land, as he would owe his selection to some political faction or other. This could divide him from many of his countrymen and make his claim to represent all Canadians less convincing. This danger is inherent in the kind of muddled thinking which obtains in some quarters these days where it is fashionable to suggest that the monarchy and the person of the sovereign are mere ceremonial trappings and where these revisionists would claim the full amplitude of Canadian government is represented in the office of governor. However, now is not the time to enter that debate, but to reflect that the Queen and her heirs have been trained from birth for one profession and therefore by the most ultimate form of democracy—the chance arrangement of genes—they have become the Canadians most eligible to assume their important position.

It is worth noting that the most stable of democracies in the world today, our constitutional monarchy, is in direct contrast to the unstable tyrannies which are so often typified by a republican form of government. Indeed, we have a twentieth century monarchy for, through modern communication devices, Canadians can participate fully in their Queen's life wherever she may be, and she herself, when allowed, is able to visit and is aware of more parts of Canada than most Canadians.

Then, of course, newcomers to Canada today can either identify with the monarchy because they come from countries which enjoy that form of government or feel a special affection for their new sovereign because she typifies unity, rule of law and decency, which have all too often been absent in the countries from which they have fled.

The colour and ceremony surrounding our monarchy attracts the interest of all Canadians, especially the young, in our process of government. No less an ardent French Canadian nationalist than Henri Bourassa referred more than once to "the Crown we have come to respect".

The monarchy, despite its detractors' efforts to paint a contrary picture, is popular in French Canada. Historically, Francophone Canadians have three times chosen the monarchy. Their cultural and religious leaders rejected the overtures to join the rebellious colonists during the American revolution in 1776. They participated enthusiastically in the choice of the monarchy as the new state's form of government in 1867 and continued to accept it, as evidenced by the strong support given to the maintainance of the monarchical system by Premier Lévesque and his minister of intergovernmental affairs, Claude Morin, at recent federal-provincial conferences.

Our Queen is a fluent speaker of the French language, and the early history of her house is closely bound with that of the French crown and French culture. Moreover, the Crown has always been an emblem of the guarantee that the rights of any minority will not be trampled by the will of a majority.

Now, continuing to reflect on why the flag most closely associated in Canada with the Crown and our Queen should stand in this chamber, let us remember that the Queen is the bond joining each Canadian to each of his fellow citizens.

When a new Canadian swears his oath of allegiance, he makes a personal contract to bear true and faithful allegiance to his sovereign. Thus, the immigrant acquires a lifelong tie in common with all other Canadians.

That the Queen is part of parliament, despite the best efforts of some, reflected in Bill C-60, to remove her; that she gives royal assent to legislation; that laws are enacted in her name and bear the year of her reign; that she provides the framework for orderly transaction to elected governmental officers; that the army, the mails and the civil service function in her name: these are not the accidents of history. These are not the curiosities of legal draftsmanship. They stand at the centre of the Canadian constitution, safeguards of Her Majesty's right to be consulted, to encourage and to warn and to provide practically the only check on the untrammelled growth of the power of the political executive.

In 1973, speaking in Toronto, Her Majesty said:

I want the Crown to be seen as a symbol of national sovereignty belonging to all. It is not only a link between Commonwealth nations, but between Canadian citizens of every national origin and ancestry. The Crown is an idea more than a person, and I want the Crown in Canada to represent everything that is best and most admired in the Canadian ideal. I will continue to do my best to make it so during my lifetime, and I hope you will all continue to give me your help in this task.

No one can argue that Her Majesty has kept and continues to keep this pledge, although how much help she has had from some of her ministers in the interim is at the very least debatable.

Thus, as we sit here in this chamber day by day and are looked upon not only by the thousands of young Canadians, especially who sit in the gallery and see our deliberations, but also by the new-found audience of millions brought to us here through television, I ask: is it not well that the flag standing for our affection and duty to Our Sovereign Lady and to the Crown she personifies should be displayed next to Your Honour's chair, a boast of that affection freely given and perhaps the departure point for many questions which will be asked by young Canadians about the significance of that flag, the answers to which will increase their knowledge of our country's institutions?

● (1610)

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we should not forget the second stated purpose of parliament to retain the Union Jack as a flag of Canada, namely, to stand for our membership in the Commonwealth, that unique association of sovereign states with vastly differing populations, traditions and systems of government, which, nonetheless, forms one of the few, if not the only, non-governmentally allied international communities on this shrinking planet.

I do not need to remind hon. members of the many contacts, exchanges and programs which enrich both our own experience and those of other Canadians through the various associations which promote international relationships. But, in that the centre of the Commonwealth is an allegiance to the Crown, and in that Canada is the most senior member of that body, again I ask: is it not well that the flag standing for that shared allegiance and multinational association stand here in this chamber again to provoke questions for the uninitiated and to remind the more tutored of our international dimensions?

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate with a feeling almost of déja vu in that although I was not in this place at the time the great flag debate took place, certainly I was one of those concerned Canadians who listened with interest to what was said here.

Before I get into that aspect of the debate, I think it would be unwise of me to leave unchallenged some of the references made by the hon. member who preceded me to Bill C-60 and particularly the claim he makes that members of this government, or indeed any member of the House, would attempt by that bill to denigrate in any way royalty, the Crown, the Queen or anything having to do with the royal family.

Members of this government and members on this side of the House both in and outside the House have taken the position and have attempted to make clear—and obviously have not made it clear enough for the hon. member to understand—that the words used in Bill C-60 are not intended or designed to remove any of the rights or the authority of the Crown. What they are attempting to do is to delineate, underscore or describe, if you will, the status quo and what in fact is the current position of the Crown and the monarchy in Canada. I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said this in words more eloquent than I can repeat this afternoon, but if those words are not sufficient to describe what is the state of things, then let those persons who feel they do not provide those words that would describe the current state of the Crown, and again I say, not the Crown of 1900 or the Crown of 1867, but the monarchy as it exists today. Surely that is what was intended by the bill and that is what continues to be the intention of the government, as I understand it.

The debate today in a sense almost transports us back to 1964 when the House debated the flag. It was emotional, it was lengthy, and covered the merits of adopting a distinctive flag for Canada, a flag that would reflect our identity as a nation. It was a worthy debate. Those few members who were present in the House at that time may well recall the arguments which took place then. However, the majority of us, as I indicated earlier, were in other places, occupied with other concerns, and although we may have followed the debate with some interest, I think it might be enlightening and useful in the discussion of this bill to outline some of the history behind our national flag and the reasons why parliament in 1964 adopted the practices that surround its display in the House of Commons and in the Senate.

It is hard for us to imagine the emotion and strong feelings that were reflected in the debates at that time. By now, most Canadians have accepted the red maple leaf flag as the symbol of our aspirations, our ambitions, our legitimate national pride, our unity, our loyalty, our Canadian nationality. In spite of the many reservations expressed in 1964, I think that the majority of Canadians have developed an attachment for that flag and what it stands for. In fact, the word "attachment" may even be understanding the case, because many Canadians have developed a respect, and some a love, for the flag that would be very gratifying to those in the government, especially the late prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, who was instrumental in introducing it before the House.

But such pride and acceptance were by no means assured back in 1964. There were many who were strongly attached to the great union flag, more commonly known as the Union Jack, and there were others equally partisan in favour of the Red Ensign, which for many years has served as the de facto Canadian flag. These supporters were difficult to convince of the need for a unique and distinctive Canadian flag, and they mounted a vigorous opposition which at several points threatened to delay and perhaps scuttle the government's plans to introduce the single red maple leaf flag so familiar to us today.

In the present context, when we are being asked to consider the introduction of the Royal Union flag within the chambers of the House of Commons and the Senate, I think we should review and reflect upon the decision of the House in 1964 to limit the Union Jack to be used as a symbol of Canada's membership in the Commonwealth of nations and of her allegiance to the Crown. This decision was not taken lightly or without a great deal of reflection. In giving primacy to the national flag, and in limiting the use of the Union Jack to certain occasions, such as the official observance of the Queen's birthday, the anniversary of the Statute of Westminster, and the occasion of royal visits and certain Commonwealth gatherings, the House was making a strong and deliberate statement on the subject of Canadian identity.

Much thought had been given to the ideal design for a Canadian flag. The committee of the House that was formed to choose a suitable design reviewed hundreds of suggestions sent in by experts and by the public at large. Design after design was eliminated until only three were left. Some of you may recall them: there was a red and white design containing the Union Jack and three fleurs-de-lis, a design incorporating three maple leaves on a white background with a narrow bar of blue at either end, and the familiar red flag with a single red maple leaf on a central white square. As we all know, on October 22, 1964, the House voted unanimously in favour of the single leaf flag that has become so integral a part of our lives. It was officially proclaimed and flown for the first time on Parliament Hill on February 15, 1965—in the words of John Matheson, member of parliament for Leeds, Ontario, who had originally been charged with the responsibility for finding a new flag design, "a flag of dignity and grace, worthy of a great sovereign nation".

Speaking in 1979, it is difficult to project oneself back into the atmosphere of those pre-1964 days and to imagine a time when this nation lacked an official, central symbol of its own identity. Following confederation in 1867, the Union Jack of Britain was retained as the official flag of Canada. That was perhaps appropriate at the time because Canada was still a colony of Great Britain and not a full-fledged nation. Our first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, reacting to the first stirrings of Canadian nationalism, requested formal approval from the British Admiralty in 1874 to use the Red Ensign, bearing the provincial arms of the four provinces then in confederation, as the official Canadian flag. This approval was denied until 1892, and even then it was granted only on the condition that its use be confined to Canadian merchant ships on the high seas. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that Canadians continued to fly the Red Ensign, on land as well as on sea, until the outbreak of the Boer War, when a resurgence of imperial feeling throughout the British Empire revived popular support for the Union Jack, and the Red Ensign was removed from all Canadian public buildings. Therefore, during the First World War Canadians fought and died under the Union Jack. For all intents and purposes they were considered to be British troops, in spite of the fact that most of their regimental badges contained such distinctively Canadian symbols as the maple leaf and the beaver, and that Canadians distinguised themselves in their valorous stands at such battlefields as Vimy Ridge and Ypres.

After the First World War, Canadian nationalism once again became a strong force, and King George V was persuaded, on the recommendation of the government of Sir Arthur Meighen, to grant a Canadian Coat of Arms in 1921. This was incorporated quickly into the Red Ensign, and in 1924 the Canadian government authorized the use of the Ensign on all Canadian buildings outside Canada. Canadians were left in the very peculiar position of being able to fly the Red Ensign outside but not inside their country. Even after the passing of the Statute of Westminster in 1931 when Canada became a fully autonomous nation, the Union Jack remained the official flag. There were numerous attempts by members of parliament during the 1930s to introduce flag motions in the House.

During the Second World War, a distinctive battle flag was designed by the Department of National Defence for use by Canadian troops. It was not a popular success. Many people, and indeed members of the House who were familiar with the military, cannot indicate the design of that flag. In 1943 a return was made to the Red Ensign which was authorized to be flown by the Canadian army formations overseas. After the war the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, announced that he would recommend to parliament the adoption of a distinctive national flag. In the meantime, a 1945 order in council was passed which indicated that until a national flag was adopted, the Red Ensign would be flown over federal buildings both inside and outside the country. This temporary expedient proved to be a much more enduring one than even Mackenzie King would have envisaged. The new flag design placed before parliament in 1946 was rejected on the grounds that it might not be acceptable to all Canadians. In spite of periodic attempts to revive the flag issue, the nation remained in a state of limbo, in so far as the flag was concerned, until 1964 and the events I have already described.

I do not mean to abuse the patience of the House by giving this lengthy history of our attempts to adopt a truly Canadian flag. Instead, I think it is a necessary background to discussions of this bill. For years as a nation we were without one of the central symbols of nationhood. During that time we struggled to identify who we were as a people. As we slowly severed the links of colonial status we gradually came to an understanding that our flag, whatever it might be, could not be a copy or a derivative of any other nation's flag. It would have to be distinctly our own, using symbols which were unmistakably Canadian and embedded in our history.

The final choice admirably fulfils this requirement. In heraldic terms it is described as "gules in red on a Canadian pale argent of white a maple leaf of the first". The maple leaf, the central feature of the flag, is perhaps the quintessential Canadian symbol. As early as 1700 it was already in use in Canada. In 1834 it was adopted by the Saint-Jean-Baptiste society as its emblem. By 1860, when the Prince of Wales visited Canada, citizens of Toronto unanimously approved a motion resolving the following:

All native Canadians joining in the procession, whether identified with the national societies or not, should wear the maple leaf as the emblem of the land of their birth.

As I mentioned before, the dominant symbol of Canadian regimental badges as early as the First World War was the maple leaf. Finally this fact was recognized officially in the Coat of Arms of Canada, which in its original form had three green maple leaves on a single stem and a golden lion holding a red maple leaf above the shield. Later in 1957 the colour of the three maple leaves on the coat of arms was changed from green to red, to correspond with Canada's national colours.

Also the colours of red and white were incorporated into our flag. They strengthen the symbolic significance of the design; the red represents strength and the white purity. But beyond these two admirable qualities, they form a part of the tradition of both France and England, our two mother countries. Red was the colour of St. George's Cross and the colour borne by the French crusaders. White was the colour of the field of St. George's Cross and the colour of the banners borne by Joan of Arc. For a long time white was the colour associated with the early monarchs of France, just as red was the colour of the early kings of England. In his proclamation of the Canadian Coat of Arms in 1921, King George V officially recognized red and white as the Canadian colours. Thus, it was fitting they should form part of our flag.

Having taken 98 years to develop and agree upon this emblem of our country, it is not difficult to understand why our predecessors in the House were reluctant to authorize the equal recognition of another flag within the Canadian context. The debates of 1964 were enlightening. Many members who participated in the weeks of debate preceding the adoption of the flag were singularly unenthusiastic about the motion to adopt the Union Jack as the Commonwealth flag. This was not because hon. members lacked respect for the Union Jack and for what it stood. Many were strong supporters of the Commonwealth and the monarchy; many opposed the superseding of the traditional Union Jack and Red Ensign by any new flag. However, once the red maple leaf flag had become fact, they understood the need to stand behind their decision. There could be no half measures and no recognition of two flags, especially two flags which stood for such different realities. Those members realized that to be a successful embodiment of this country, the flag would have to command the undivided allegiance of its citizens; it would have to be clear indication of Canada's sovereignty and nationhood; and its meaning could not be diluted by legislation which made provision for the recognition of another flag, except in the most unusual circumstances.

The amendment finally adopted limited official display of the Union Jack to those occasions I have outlined already: the Queen's birthday, royal visits, Commonwealth gatherings, the anniversary of the Statute of Westminster, and at war memorials during ceremonies marking anniversaries of events in which Canadian forces participated with other Commonwealth forces. Even on those occasions, the Canadian flag must be flown and must be given the precedence due the national flag. Of course individuals and organizations were allowed to continue to fly the historic Union Jack when appropriate, as long as they took into consideration the form of approval accorded it by parliament. Our predecessors wished to ensure the primacy of the new flag. In the light of subsequent events, very clearly they succeeded.

During the debates several members expressed their fears that Canada was adopting a "two flag" system which would lead ultimately to divisiveness and strife. They saw, some more clearly than others, that the national flag could become a unifying force if it were given a chance, or a source of dissent if it were not.

Looking at the Canadian flag from today's perspective, I think they adopted the correct course. There may be many sources of disunity in this country today, but I do not think the flag is one. The flag flies proudly on all our public buildings; school children wave thousands of tiny versions of it during public holidays and royal visits. It is even a popular form of window curtain among the younger generation, a use which may not be officially sanctioned but nevertheless is an index of acceptance. One of our most moving national moments occurs each July 1 when a giant Canadian flag is raised on the Peace Tower as the culminating moment of a day-long celebration.

Such widespread approbation is no accident. It is a direct result of the actions taken by the House 15 years ago. We were correct to adopt our flag then and to make it the undisputed symbol of our national consciousness. We will be correct now to oppose this bill which proposes that we take a step backward and dilute the authority we have invested in our flag. I urge the members of this House to consider carefully the long struggle toward true nationhood which preceded the adoption of our flag. I urge them to reflect upon its current stature and undisputed place in the hearts of Canadians. I hope they will conclude that in the chambers of this House, of all places, it should remain the sole and undisputed symbol of our collective identity.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few very short comments regarding Bill C-220 before the House at this time. I was gratified to hear the hon.

member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) take a position in his concluding comments. I hope the hon. member has not mistaken the intent of this legislation. We in no way want to downgrade the importance of our Canadian flag, the red maple leaf of which the majority of us are very proud.

● (1630)

I should like to support recognition for the Union Jack in both Houses of parliament. As the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) said, the Union Jack was recognized by an act of parliament of 1964 as one of Canada's national flags and it has played an important role in the history of our country. It signifies our place, and recognition of the role we play in the Commonwealth. For that reason I would be most happy to see it in both chambers of parliament.

I cannot help but be somewhat suspicious when hon. members opposite speak on issues associated with the monarchy. So often we see them use the monarchy for purposes of political expediency. In this chamber and throughout the country they have tried to diminish the role of the monarch in the Canadian way of life, yet when we have visits from the royal family the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is front and centre, trying to gain whatever political points he can.

As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, my comments will be brief in the hope that this bill will come to a vote within the hour allotted for private members' business so that we can see where hon. members stand on issues associated with the Union Jack and with the monarchy in general.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the subject before us, namely the Union Jack.

[English]

I can well imagine that when this debate was going on in this House some 15 years ago, tempers were a little sharper than they are today. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was here at that time and took part in the debate. I would have welcomed the chance to put my views forward at that time as well.

I noticed earlier this afternoon that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was in the House, Mr. Speaker. I had hoped that he would take part in the debate.

The hon. member who spoke ahead of me said that he was glad my colleague the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) stated his position. I state my position categorically, Mr. Speaker. I am opposed to the Union Jack standing side by side with the Canadian flag in this chamber or in the other place. I am as opposed to that as I would be to having the tri-coulour of France if it were brought forward to take its place there.

The hon. member opposite said that our roots are deep in the traditions of England and British history. I do not deny that. Indeed, I am glad of it. This parliament stands today as a model of what was accomplished in terms of parliamentary democracy in England. I would be the last person to make a derogatory statement about the great traditions handed down to us by England. But this was in another time, Mr. Speaker. We should remember our roots but we should also look to what we are in the present and what we hope to aspire to in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, symbols have that remarkable characteristic of combining various and often complex notions in a vivifying and colourful expression. The symbolism of the Canadian flag we are talking about here reflects the history, the beliefs, the ideologies and the aspirations of Canadians who are multicultural and who today, with the passage of the Official Languages Act, are known throughout Canada. In addition, proclaimed on February 15, 1965, the maple leaf became the distinctive, sober and gracious symbol of this country, as the former hon. member for Leeds, Mr. Matheson, put it so well.

Indeed, on February 15, 1965, on Parliament Hill, in Ottawa, the ceremony of inauguration of the Canadian flag took place in the presence of the right hon. Georges Vanier, Governor General of Canada, Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson and the members of the cabinet. These words spoken on that memorable date by the hon. Maurice Bourget help emphasize the symbolic aspect of our flag which is on your right, Mr. Speaker. He said:

> This flag is the symbol of the unity of this country because it represents beyond the shadow of a doubt all citizens of Canada without distinction of race, language, belief or opinion.

In 1964 the Parliament of Canada after adopting the maple leaf as the flag of Canada proclaimed the Union Jack as the official symbol of the belonging of this country to the Commonwealth. I want to describe the use made of those two flags to further emphasize the importance of our Canadian flag.

When physical facilities permit, the Union Jack flies with the Canadian flag on buildings, air terminals, military bases and establishments of the federal government within Canada on the day of the official celebration of the Queen's birthday, the anniversary of the Statute of Westminster, which is December 11, as you know, and during royal visits and certain Commonwealth meetings in this country. It can also fly with the Canadian flag at the national monument commemorating the dead of World War I and in other appropriate public places in Canada during ceremonies commemorating the anniversary of events in which Canadian and other Commonwealth forces participated. Of course, individuals and organizations can fly the Union Jack in Canada as they see fit under the regulations approved by parliament for the use of the flag.

On the other hand, the Canadian flag is, of course, flown in more places and on more occasions that the Union Jack. In general, we can see the Canadian flag from sunrise to sunset flying over all federal buildings, airports and military bases and institutions inside and outside Canada. Regulations also allow it to be flown all night. It can also be used in commercial buildings or to identify Canadian stands at exhibitions. It constitutes the normal national colours of all Canadian ships and boats, including pleasure craft. In fact, the Canada Shipping Act provides that a Canadian ship must fly the flag on a signal given by one of Her Majesty's ships or a ship on the service of the Canadian government and belonging to the government, while entering or leaving any foreign port, and if it carries a burden of 50 gross tons or more, while entering or leaving any Commonwealth port.

Foreign vessels fly the Canadian flag as a sign of courtesy when they lie at anchor in a Canadian port. In the case of merchant vessels and pleasure craft, the Canadian flag must be flown in all ports and in territorial waters. However, this rule does not apply on the high sea unless the vessel wishes to show its nationality to another ship. When a merchant vessel and a warship, whatever their nationality, cross or pass each other, the merchant vessel must salute with its flag as a show of courtesy.

Mr. Speaker, the flag is used, of course, at the unveiling of monuments, plaques and paintings, at the end of conferences or official inaugurations, on national holidays, and so on. It is also used to note the death of important personalities or officials. Thus, the flag on the Peace Tower in Ottawa is flown at half mast on the death of the sovereign or a member of the royal family, on the death of a governor general, a former governor general, a lieutenant governor, a member of the Canadian Privy Council, a senator or a federal member of parliament.

● (1640)

[English]

Besides being flown on top of other buildings, airports government military establishments and federal government buildings, the flag will be flown at half mast from one end of the country to the other on the death of a sovereign, a member of the royal family, the governor general, the prime minister, retired governors general, retired prime ministers or ministers of the federal cabinet. Secondly, within the confines of the provinces, the flag will be flown at half mast on the death of a lieutenant governor, the first minister of the province or any person to whom the province wishes to pay respect. Thirdly, the flag can be flown at half mast on the death of a member of a provincial legislature in his or her riding and, fourthly, the place of residence in the case of the death of a senator, a past member of the Privy Council of Canada or a mayor.

[Translation]

The flag is also flown at half mast on federal buildings and elsewhere according to special instructions on the death of members of the royal family other than the sovereign or of persons related in the first degree with the sovereign and his immediate family, as well as on the death of a foreign head of state or any other person whom we may wish to honour.

[Mr. Parent.]

[English]

Such was the case after the death of President Kennedy of the United States when he was assassinated some 16 years ago.

[Translation]

During half-mast periods, the flag is flown to the top of the mast on all federal buildings, airports and military bases and establishments during all legal holidays, and on the Peace Tower when a chief of state visits Parliament Hill. However, that rule does not apply when flags are mid-masted on the occasion of the sovereign's death, they are hoisted to the top of the mast only the day the new monarch is proclaimed.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, on November 11, Remembrance Day, the flag on the parliament building's Peace Tower is mid-masted at 11 a.m.

In light of all those examples, hon. members will agree that our Canadian flag is significantly utilized. Even when the Queen is in Canada, Her Majesty's own Canadian flag is hoisted.

[English]

She has her own royal flag, and it is not the Union Jack because that is the flag of Britain. The royal flag varies from country to country within the Commonwealth, and the royal flag is flown in these countries when the Queen visits.

[Translation]

Let me go on, Mr. Speaker, day and night the Queen's flag, a unique flag, is proudly hoisted on any building where she is residing or in which she is attending an official or public reception. Generally, the colours also fly behind the tribune where Her Majesty is saluted by the troops she is reviewing, and on Her Majesty's ships when she is aboard.

I therefore feel, as a large number of my electors, that the Canadian flag is the symbol par excellence of our Canadian identity.

[English]

I therefore ask myself why we should adopt the Union Jack to stand beside our own flag. Even though it does symbolize our membership in the Commonwealth, it is not the responsibility of Canada alone to determine which flag should be used to signify association with the Commonwealth, but a decision which should be taken together with all other member nations of the Commonwealth.

[Translation]

Of course, we have no suggestion whatsoever to Commonwealth countries wishing to use the Union Jack as their own flag. Anyway, I sincerely believe we can show our participation in the British Commonwealth by using our own flag, because it adequately reflects our cultural identity.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I oppose for these reasons the Royal Union flag being present alongside the national flag in the Senate and House of Commons.

[English]

The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) mentioned that those men and women who fought in the first and second world wars did, indeed, use as their flag the Union Jack. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs I represented Canada at Vimy last November 11 and was taken on a tour of the cemeteries where our Canadian brothers and sisters of another time lay buried. Engraved on their headstones in a circle was the maple leaf, the same maple leaf which we have on our flag. It took 98 years before we could call this flag our own and before we could fly it on this building. As a fifth generation Canadian, I make no apology for saying that no other flag should stand beside ours. This flag was bought and paid for by all the other Canadians which make up this great country, and, as the hon. member for Kent-Essex has said, we would be taking a step backward if we did not proclaim once and for all that this is the flag of Canada and of all Canadians. It is my flag and I am very proud of it.

● (1650)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the debate that has taken place and to all the members who have made a contribution. It is their right in private members' hour to express their opinions. I will try not to use up all of the time so that my friend on the other side can express his opinion as well. I disagree with the hon. member for Kent Essex (Mr. Daudlin) but only on two matters, as he gave an admirable recount of the history of the time. I disagree with him that Bill C-60 did not appear, to a large number of people in the community, to do something in respect of the monarchy. In my opinion that was evident by the reaction in the community. People can think for themselves, they do not need members of parliament to tell them how to think in that sense.

I do not know if it was a conscious attempt or not, but at least it was perceived as such and as a result the government quite rightly backed down on what they intended. Right across the country the government said they did not intend that kind of thing, and it was even mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. This was all to the good because it was best for the air to be cleared.

The hon. member for Kent-Essex said that this debate takes us back to the flag debate. It may do so in the minds of some, but it should not. The flag debate was a watershed in the development of national symbols in this country. That flag was accepted by parliament, not without difficulty, but it was accepted. It seems to me that the red maple leaf flag has been generally accepted across Canada as a symbol of the nation. One can ask my children and children of other hon. members who were young at that time what is the Canadian flag. There is no doubt in the world that these children can tell you what flag is the Canadian flag. Indeed there is no doubt at all about what members of parliament feel when they distribute these small lapel pins to school children and others who come to visit this building. They are distributing a replica of the national flag. There is no doubt that we have moved past that period of history and so I disagree with the hon. member for Kent-Essex in that regard.

When I look at Bill C-220 I see two things in the explanatory note. First I see that the Maple Leaf flag was proclaimed as the national flag and it says:

—the Union Jack as the symbol of our connection with the Commonwealth and loyalty to the monarchy.

This is a national parliament and a national chamber. As a private member of this House I think the only flag that should be in the national parliament and in this chamber should be the national flag. But that is not to say there is any movement away from those symbols which are important to me and many Canadians regarding our connection to the monarchy. This is a connection which has now been embraced by the government, according to the proclamations that we have heard.

We look around us and see the mace on the table with a replica of the Crown on it. There is a coat of arms on the chair. On top of the calendar on the table there is a Crown. On the ancient ink-well on the table is a Crown. A great deal of symbolism can be found in this chamber which indicates our affection and loyalty to the Crown.

With respect to the flag which is the national symbol of our country, I do not think it is inappropriate that it stands by itself as a national symbol. Symbols are important to people and that is the reason why I make these remarks. I do not want anyone in this House on either side to think that the Union Jack with all its traditions and with its three crosses is not important to a large number of Canadians and not part of the symbolism of the country.

If one looks at provincial flags, for example, the provincial flag of Newfoundland, the newest partner in confederation, he will see it happens to be the Union Jack. I am sure if one would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), a senior member of parliament in that area, how he feels about that flag he will find that he feels a sense of affection and identifies that flag with his lovely province. One can see the Union Jack on the Ontario provincial flag. I think that is quite appropriate. Indeed, the Union Jack appears in the fly of another provincial flag. I am sure the government leader in the Senate and the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) would be distressed if one ever said to them that the Union Jack contained in their British Columbia provincial flag was not important to them. It is an important symbol to many people. It is an important symbol to me, just as I am sure that symbol in those flags is important to others in this chamber who come from various provinces.

I do not believe this bill moves in the right direction. I know what the hon. member has in mind. I think there is a place for display within this building for the flags and the symbols which are important for the men and women who come to this building to serve in the House of Commons and the Senate from all provinces and from our two territories of this country. It would be appropriate if all members of parliament during the course of this debate gave some thought to a place within this building for the provincial flags which contain symbols that mean something to all of us. Some even including the Union Jack, which certainly means something to a great number of us.

As I came in here just before private members' hour began I took a look down the hall of honour. It is a relatively open and vacant place. It has beautiful architecture, lovely ceilings and columns. We might consider placing the flags of the provinces and territories there. I do not know how many members of parliament have gone into the Peace Tower or have seen anything but the clock. Inside the Peace Tower is a small but beautiful symbolic chapel, the Memorial chapel in which is found the book of rememberance. These books contain the names of veterans, about which the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) spoke. These are veterans from the Boer War, the First World War, the Second World War and the Korean war. These men and women came from all over Canada. Every race, creed and colour were represented in those wars and are represented in those books. That might be an appropriate place for us to consider as a place where all these symbols could be displayed. I do not want to reopen the debates of 1964—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RIGHT OF MEMBERS NOT TO DISCLOSE SOURCES OF INFORMATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity having to do with a judgment by the Ontario Court of Appeal on a motion as to whether a member of the legislature—and this applies, of course, to members of parliament—must disclose his confidential source of information.

The finding of the court was that information supplied to a member in confidence is not privileged from being revealed and, as the Globe and Mail points out in an historic landmark editorial in today's issue, the ending of protection against having to reveal confidential information given to members of parliament will pretty well put a stop to information being available. This is no criticism of the majority judgment of the court. That is the law now. But I ask leave, sir, to quote from the dissenting judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Weatherston. He said in part:

> It has long been a major part of his (a member's) responsibilities to intercede on behalf of his constituents who claim to be oppressed by governmental bureaucracy and to bring to the notice of the government cases where legislation is thought to be working unfairly . . . In all these cases the member may rely on information given to him in confidence. His effectiveness as a member may depend on confidences given and received, and the courts should respect those confidences unless the public interest clearly compels a breach of them.

This judgment, as I see it, will go a long way to emasculating parliament. Unless action is taken and legislation passed that members shall not be required to reveal their confidential sources of information, the lips of many Canadians will be sealed. All through the years I have personally taken the stand that under no circumstances would I reveal such information, and I think that is the general feeling of members of the House of Commons.

I would, therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

> That this House assert the right of members to secure information confidentially and not be required, except in cases of treason or felony, to reveal the sources thereof.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Deputy Prime Minister said "No".

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EARLY REVIEW OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT AND IMPROVEMENT THERETO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the matter I wish to raise has been urgent for a long time, but there is increasing urgency for action to be taken before this parliament comes to an end.

Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

> That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to present at an early date his promised review of the War Veterans Allowance Act so that legislation to improve the provisions and increase the amounts paid thereunder can be introduced and passed before the present session of parliament is ended.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSAL TO FAVOUR DEVELOPMENT OF INDUSTRIES IN AREAS OF QUEBEC ADJACENT TO UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

In view of the fact that the government of Maine is increasingly promoting wood cutting on its own lands; considering that this will affect several Canadian companies which hold permits for wood cutting on the American side and that eventually hundreds of jobs will be lost, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That parliament urge the super Board of Economic Development Ministers to consider that problem and draw up policies furthering the development of industries in areas situated along the American border so that they will be in a position, when necessary, to offer jobs to Canadians who will become unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of that motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

CALL FOR AUDITOR GENERAL AND COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF OPERATIONS OF CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of charges that CMHC operates on a system of patronage, and in view of a suggested lack of auditing control which is alleged to have resulted in millions of unaccounted taxpayer dollars being lost, stolen and mismanaged, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House immediately instruct the Auditor General of Canada to undertake a detailed inspection of the financial management operations and computer operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the preceding fiscal year and, further, that this House direct the Minister of State for Urban Affairs immediately to make a reference to the appropriate standing committee to investigate the alleged financial mismanagement and control practices of this Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN WOMEN'S FIGURE SKATING CHAMPION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House congratulates Janet Morrissey, the new Canadian women's figure skating champion, for her outstanding victory at Thunder Bay, the fourth woman from Ottawa to win this title.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt).

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FM STATIONS AT MAITLAND, ONT.—INTERFERENCE WITH TV AND RADIO RECEPTION IN AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning my constituency, and particularly the establishment by the CBC of both English and French language FM stations at Maitland, near Brockville, Ontario, and the fact that the operation of such stations has drastically interfered with television and radio reception by hundreds of people living in the area, resulting in the closing down of such facilities temporarily by the CBC.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government guarantee that such FM facilities will not be placed in full operation, other than for temporary testing purposes, until all technical difficulties have been ironed out, and that if such a thing proves to be, as it now seems to appear, impossible, that the government will order the CBC immediately to remove these two totally unnecessary white elephants which have cost taxpayers thousands of dollars.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AIR TRANSPORT

DETERIORATION OF AIR SAFETY DUE TO DISPUTE BETWEEN AVIATION INSPECTORS AND TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport: it arises out of the very serious deterioration of air safety in Canada and the further erosion which has been caused by the current dispute which has been going on between the aviation inspectors and Treasury Board.

This dispute has contributed to a large number of inspectors leaving their jobs, 60 to date; furthermore, members are leaving on a day to day basis, morale has been declining in this very important component of the air transportation industry, and that situation has deteriorated as a result of this dispute. There are clear indications that major violations are frequently occurring and are not being adequately investigated as a result of shortage of manpower. The most respected aviation trade magazine—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should put his question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it is very important to lay the groundwork and the foundation because—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be so, but only limited time is available in the question period so the hon. member should put his question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Since Canada's record of air safety has declined in performance and it is now thirteenth on the list of 18 nations in the world, having been in eighth place on that list, and since the Minister of Transport has over-all—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: May I ask the minister, since the matter has been drawn to his attention on frequent occasions, what actions his department is taking to ensure, first of all, that the erosion of safety is reversed and, further, what action he has taken with respect to his cabinet colleagues in terms of specifically encouraging a settlement to the dispute which is causing the deteriorating factor?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I think it is unfortunate that the hon. member speaks about deterioration of safety in those generalized terms when he has no basis whatever for making the assertion.

I certainly agree that the group in these negotiations with the employer, the government, at the moment is a very important group in our air operations and I am looking forward to a settlement. These matters are under negotiation and, obviously, I would not comment on these negotiations either with regard to comments between myself and my colleagues or as between the parties.

Mr. Mazankowski: The facts are clearly stated in this very respected magazine and, indeed, by people in the minister's own department. On December 5, the Minister of Transport indicated that additional inspectors would be hired to perform this very important task. We now know that there has been a reduction of inspectors.

May I ask the minister why there has been a reduction in inspectors, rather than an increase to which he previously committed himself, and what action he has taken to fulfil the commitment he made in December of 1977?

Mr. Lang: Once again, the hon. member insists on distorting the situation terribly and I really think it is not very helpful. The commitment which I made in December of 1977 related to an increase in the number of inspectors in particular areas of the country. The increases have taken place and we have had far fewer complaints from those areas since that time.

Obviously, the whole question of how many inspectors we have is itself part of the argument and of the negotiation. Obviously, those people who form a part of this group are interested in making clear how important their work is, and magazines and statements may reflect that fact. I do not think the hon. member should be drawn into that kind of debate, any more than he should expect me to be drawn into it while negotiations are going on.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not distorting the facts, but simply drawing attention to the failure of the minister to fulfil his commitment: that is the fact of the matter. What is happening is that there seems to be a deliberate ploy or a deliberate attempt on the part of the federal government to downgrade the effectiveness and integrity of the inspection group.

In view of the fact that this is the most vital group in terms of the administration of air safety in this country, why has he not, first of all, undertaken to fulfil his commitment to strengthen and, indeed, provide more manpower, provide fair wages and clearly define his role, rather than allowing the group to deteriorate? Is that a specific government policy, is it by design, or is it by accident?

Mr. Lang: The hon. member thinks he supports his case by restating what is false in terms of any commitment on my part. It was a commitment in relation to the northern Ontario situation and the number of inspectors in that region, and that commitment has been carried out. So I wish the hon. member would stop stating these falsehoods and then coming back and repeating them.

● (1420)

The fact of the matter is that this is an important group. As well, the hon. member knows its negotiations and returns to it over the last several years were caught in particular rules under the Anti-Inflation Board program and that that created certain difficulties. Can these now be resolved? That is a matter which is precisely under negotiation at this time. Of course, the hon. member can be friends to everyone by stating irresponsible amounts which he thinks may be correct. Fortunately, he is irresponsible and I hope he remains that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SETTLEMENT WITH UNION TO AVOID FURTHER DETERIORATION OF AIR SAFETY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, assuming the minister accepts the proposition that Canadians are entitled not only to safe air passage but to an awareness that they will fly safely when they are aboard aeroplanes, will he not respond to a very legitimate question and reassure Canadians and the particular inspection group that something will be done before the cautionary words of the union come to bear regrettable fruit in terms of a very serious accident?

Will the minister not do something, take some position and urge his colleagues to join him so that the prediction of the particular union, that the serious downgrading of safety inspection standards could lead to a serious accident, in fact will not take place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, every activity has its risks and obviously no one can guarantee against that. If the hon. member is trying to lay some base that if there turns out to be an accident in Canada, it is related to this matter, he should know it is a rather wild generalization made in advance.

Of course I am concerned about safety in Canada. I am happy to say generally I can be very reassuring in terms of the performance of our airlines, our pilots and everyone operating the air travel system so that Canadians need not be concerned. On the other hand, obviously the question of the particular grievances of these individuals is under negotiation and must await the result.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, if the minister consults with his colleagues he will find negotiations, in fact, have broken off and that they have done nothing to correct it.

In light of the comments of the union arising out of this developing situation, what is the minister doing to reassure Canadians that, in fact, it will not worsen to the point where a serious accident could arise because inspection services are not being carried out adequately? That is the question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously inspection work and all important tasks in connection with it are ongoing.

Mr. Forrestall: All?

Mr. Lang: I hope the hon. member is not suggesting or voicing a threat that some of that will not be done as part of the bargaining process, whether or not the actual negotiations are going forward. I cannot meet all the various statements which may be made by people, but I can attempt to reassure the public they ought not to listen to the two hon. members who have attempted to raise the issue of safety as though there is some new problem of a serious nature in this regard.

An hon. Member: You are being irresponsible in this regard.

Mr. Lang: Indeed, Canadian levels of safety are very good.

[Mr. Lang.]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BEEF—ACTION TO HOLD DOWN FOOD PRICES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. According to reports of this past weekend, beef prices in Canada will increase by a full 18 cents a pound by the end of this week compared to the price per pound of last week. This increase will be the most dramatic in the history of Canadian beef prices.

Keeping in mind the AIB announcement last week that food prices rose a full 19 per cent last year, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister when the House can expect to hear from the government on the promise of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs last week that the government intended to do something about constantly escalating food prices in the country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member, I read the weekend press which described the price paid for beef on Friday and the projected effect this price may have on retail levels. No one is certain, but I am not using that as a method of escaping from the prospect that beef prices indeed may increase.

● (1425)

As the hon. member knows, we have already taken steps to increase import quotas and to assist consumers who may be faced with rising prices. I have also read what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said last week in the House, that in respect of a number of situations he would like to check them out and report back to the hon. member. I will attempt to ensure that this is done.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, these are the same promises of future investigations from the Deputy Prime Minister that we have received for the past three weeks from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In the meantime, prices keep going up, not down.

Has the government considered the implications of the report a few weeks ago of the Economic Council, which showed profits per unit of output in the food and beverage industry had risen some 65 per cent in 18-month period ending in the third quarter of 1978, and that profits during the same period went up to the "highest level in the last 15 years"?

Given that this is the clearest possible evidence of excess profiteering, and given the fact that the head of the agency which made this report said that in view of these profit increases, firms should show restraint in the months ahead, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what, specifically, the government plans to do to ensure that price restraint is exercised so that consumers will see some levelling off in these increases?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it may be the hon. member, in referring to the increased level of beef prices, should bear in mind that there is a delicate relationship between the supply of beef products and the consumer price. If he had read in more detail over the weekend, he would understand that one of the reasons prices are rising at the present time is because of a decrease in supply following a reluctance on the part of cattlemen in previous years, resulting from lower prices, to build up their herds.

The hon. member has to take a more balanced and broad view on price movements rather than just focusing on immediate consumer interests which are not the only interests involved in this situation. As I have said to the hon. member, we have taken some steps already during this current parliament to assist consumers in respect of increasing prices.

Having regard to the report to which the hon. member has referred, I regret to advise him that I have not read it, I do not have the statistics at my fingertips and I will not say that I have given consideration to the various statistical points he has made.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister took a long time in giving an answer to the question I put to him in the first place. The question I should like him to deal with now is the broader one regarding food price increases.

The Economic Council of Canada has indicated that profits in that industry for the last 18 months, going into the third quarter of 1978, were up 91 per cent, and that price increases for the same period have gone up 65 per cent. The head of the institute that produced the study on behalf of the government indicated that measures should be taken now to keep prices down, because profits are very high.

I should like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister specifically in this area whether the government intends to bring forward particular measures which will respond to the requests that price increases be kept down in coming months because profits have already been excessively high in the past 18 months.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that if the government were to embark upon a new policy of price controls, that would be announced in the House in the normal way. It is not my intention, in replying to his question, to go down the garden path that has been laid out and described by the hon. member.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR STUDY OF CONSEQUENCES OF OPERATING U.S. SAWMILLS IN CANADA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I shall direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As our neighbours, the Americans, especially in the state of Maine, are using and sawing their lumber on American territory, which situation will eventually lead to a considerable decrease in sawmill operations on the Canadian side, and as this development can be foreseen even now, would the minister be willing to recommend to his colleagues of the new economic council that they look into this matter seriously and have talks with the American leaders, after which if the situation is confirmed and that policy is maintained, they set up new industries on the Canadian side of the border in order to be able, when the time comes, to offer employment to all those Canadians who will necessarily lose their jobs in the States?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the difficulties certain changes in the regulations governing the lumber industry on the American side are creating for our own Canadian industries, especially in the Bois Franc and Beauce areas.

I have met some of the industrialists concerned who acquainted me with the change in policy from which the problem stems. During coming negotiations, in agreement with the government, especially in this case, we shall have to examine how we could supply from other sources those industries whose operations involve the transformation of timber, and furniture in particular, so that they can get their supplies from other Canadian sources if they can no longer do so from American ones.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

That is an excellent step and I hope it will be successful. But since there certainly will not be enough companies and industries to hire all workers, and as I am acutely aware of the situation, since it is also affecting my riding, and as the potential sources of wood are somewhat limited, I would like to ask the minister if, while he is studying the matter, he could look at the possibility of establishing a special policy, like the one that exists in other regions known as "designated areas", in order to further encourage small and medium sized firms, promote the creation of new ones and help us maintain our population, which is faced with a fairly heavy tax burden, at its present level.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I am very much impressed by the hon. member's representations. We cannot in fact think that our forest resources are limitless; indeed certain firms which use this prime resource will probably reach a ceiling of development in the next few years. That is why my department is actively searching out new firms using other resources than forestry. In the case, for example, of the Eastern Townships and the lower St. Lawrence, and we can also include the Chaudière region, there is an impressive rise of small businesses engaged in the processing of metals used for the manufacture of parts marketed not only in Canada but also in other countries, and I think this is a move in the right direction, which should allow us to come to grips with the issue raised by the hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SALARY INCREASE FOR CIVIL AVIATION INSPECTORS TO ACHIEVE COMPARABILITY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. On Friday, the President of the Treasury Board said they were currently in negotiation with this group, referring to the civil aviation inspectors. Today, the hon. Minister of Transport said that the government is in negotiation with this group. In fact, no negotiations are going on.

Is the Treasury Board prepared to make another offer to the civil aviation inspectors which will place them in a position of comparability, if not with the private sector then at least with those public employees with whom there ought to be comparability?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the government has made an offer to the aircraft operations group, which it rejected. The last meeting was held January 30, 1979. We have asked them to substantiate the demands which they are making upon the government, as employer, but they have not responded. We have indicated that we are ready and willing to resume negotiations at any time, and it seems to me that the onus is now upon the union to respond to that invitation.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the stated policy of the Minister of Labour that public servants ought to be paid on comparability basis, how can the President of the Treasury Board now stand and say that in the absence of any offer which gets close to comparability, whether with the private sector or the public sector, the onus lies upon the civil aviation inspectors to come up with a solution to the problem.

When will this paralysis, which apparently has taken a grip on three ministers of the Crown, end and when will we get back to a reasonable basis of negotiaton with the civil aviation inspectors upon whom the safety of civil aviation in Canada depends?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks of a paralysis. I suggest that he is leaving a very misleading impression with this House. During the three-year period of this union and its predecessor—which has been changed because it lost its certification—the government, as the employer, voluntarily gave to this group increases in excess of 38 per cent which were the maximum increases that could be granted under AIB guidelines.

There has been some dispute on AIB rulings. The case has been carried through to the administrator. In fact, today there is an appeal before the Federal Court asking for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada to deal with the ruling of the administrator.

To suggest that there is a paralysis situation is nonsense. Things are moving and we are asking the union to substantiate the demands which they have made. We have made our offer and they have rejected it.

The hon. member has raised the question of total compensation.

Mr. Fraser: Comparability.

Mr. Buchanan: There is a great deal of room for discussion on the question of comparability with this union as to the elements, the value they put on them, and so on. These are things which should be discussed.

In finishing, I would come back to the suggestion which I made last week, that I really do not think we should be endeavouring to carry on these negotiations across the floor of this House. The negotiations should be carried on between the employer and the employees.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, my question remains. Apparently it is being avoided by the Minister of Transport, and now the President of the Treasury Board, as in the past it has been avoided by the Minister of Labour. My question is: why will the government not make an offer to this union on the basis of comparability? They can work it out any way they want, but will they make a comparability offer?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, that is right on: what exactly is the comparability? We are having discussions in negotiations as to what are the elements, what value they put upon them, and so on. Those are matters which should be discussed at the negotiating table. I concur wholeheartedly with the hon. member that that is precisely what should be happening. However, it should be done at the negotiating table, not here in the House of Commons.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BEEF—STEPS TO PROTECT CONSUMERS FROM PROFITEERING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. As a result of the sharp increases in beef prices at the stockyard level last week, several of the major chains have announced that there will be an immediate increase in the price of beef this week of ten cents a pound.

Given the fact that medium-grade hamburger is already hovering around $2 a pound, and given the fact that the last time there was a substantial drop in beef prices it took three weeks for it to filter through the system, what steps has the government taken to ensure that there will be no profiteering at the expense of both the beef producers and the consumers?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question in my exchange with the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister did not answer that part of my question, but perhaps he has not been sufficiently briefed.

The Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to whom I have already given notice, may be able to enlighten us further. What steps is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs taking to ensure that profiteering is not taking place as a result of these sharp increases in the price of beef at the stockyard level and to ensure that prices will be allowed to work their way in an orderly manner through the system, which would take anywhere from two to three weeks? In other words, are they ensuring that no profiteering will take place?

I do not know why the acting minister looks so alarmed: his office was warned about it.

● (1440)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question asked by the hon. member dealing with profiteering, I am sure he would agree that the first step is to ascertain whether, in fact, excess profits are being made by the increased price of beef. Is the hon. member alleging, as his question would appear to allege, that in this particular case the beef producers of Canada are profiteering at the expense of the consumers?

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER PERCENTAGE INCREASE IN BENEFITS WILL BE SAME FOR ALL CANADIANS

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether she is in a position to tell the House whether mothers who are now on welfare and who will be eligible for the refundable child tax credit will receive the same percentage increase in welfare benefits from the government of Quebec as other people who are on welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, and I think this situation is most serious and unfortunate. We were informed of this by those on welfare themselves because I did not receive an answer to the telegrams nor to the letter I sent to the province of Quebec. In fact, Quebec is one of the three provinces which have a statutory increase in welfare benefits. This province will give the full amount of the increase, half of it being paid by the federal, namely 9 per cent, to all those on welfare but, in order to recover the child tax credit, it will give only a 4.5 per cent increase to mothers with children.

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF GRANT TO RAPE CRISIS CENTRES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

In view of the fact that the grant from her department to the National Assistor of Canadian Rape Crisis Centres will come to an end on March 31, and in view of the fact that the national co-ordinating work is done by the network headed by the assistor in terms of liaison between rape crisis centres on the one hand and police, social agencies and hospitals on the other, will the government give favourable consideration to the continuation of that grant beyond March 31?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the welfare demonstration projects of my department are three-year projects. We fund them for three years only because the direct delivery of services must be assumed by the provinces. We are not in that business: the group knew that.

I have received a letter dated February 1 in which an extension is requested but a new submission seems to have been made to the department. I will not interfere with the usual review system, and I will follow the dossier personally to see if within the usual criteria we can help for an additional year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the government's social services act is being dropped—and I am not complaining about that, for certain reasons well known to the minister—it changes the picture in terms of what the provinces might have been asked to do under that legislation.

In view of the fact that the work of some 30 or more rape crisis centres across Canada will suffer unless funds are available, bearing in mind that this is not only a health matter but that rape comes under the Criminal Code, will the minister do her best to see that the assistance available from her department will continue not only to the assistor but to rape crisis centres across Canada?

Miss Bégin: I shall take that into consideration, Mr. Speaker. Because we were going into a new regime of block-funding, I am not yet familiar enough with what the Canada Assistance Plan can or cannot fund on a 50-50 basis. I cannot say if centres like these could be considered.

As to the more general philosophy that we should make up for the loss of the social services bill, I shall consider favourably everything we can do to help.

Oral Questions

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RIGHT OF MEMBERS NOT TO DISCLOSE SOURCES OF INFORMATION—EFFICACY OF S.O. 43 PROCEDURE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, when Standing Order 43 was being discussed the government took the stand that it was a means whereby parliament would have an opportunity to make a decision.

Today, I made a very bad mistake. I regard the Deputy Prime Minister—or I have up to this moment—as a fine parliamentarian. I have had to amend that after my experience today. I sent him a copy of the motion I intended to move. Normally, there is a "No" group over there whose one source of expected preferment is to be able to say "I said no several times to motions under Standing Order 43." I imagine today that the only one who took that stand was that parliamentarian, the Deputy Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The rest of you were silent.

Mr. Dawson: I said "No" with pleasure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Stupidity needs no identification.

Mr. Dawson: Is that respect for parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will have to ask the right hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always like to answer interrupters, even though it is with great diffidence. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, why did he take that stand today? What is the reason? Standing Order 43 has become a farce because of the attitude of the government. That is the reason I passed on to him early this afternoon the motion I intended to move.

I ask him, why did he take that stand today? I should like to know, because he must have been a student of philosophical innocuity to produce that "No" on his part.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to work hard to be restored to the good opinion of the right hon. member in giving this answer.

I do agree that the question he raised is an important one. I did read the editorial in the Globe and Mail this morning—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It shows you keep up to date.

Mr. MacEachen: —and also the long preamble to his motion and the motion itself. I thought it was a matter of such importance that it should require a little more consideration than we had time to give it when it was read to the House. I had advance notice, but other hon. members did not have the same notice. I do not think the question ought to be dealt with that quickly.

Further than that, I wanted to discuss the legal implications of the motion with the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General: what effect it might have upon, for example, security information. Not having been able to conduct these investigations, I thought it would be wiser not to deny the validity of the intent of the motion. That did not occur. All that did occur was a refusal to give the right hon. member an opportunity to put the motion. I could not give that because of the importance of the motion itself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never heard a more impressive collection of nonsense, Mr. Speaker, than we have now witnessed on the part of the hon. gentleman. In view of the warmheartedness that he expressed for the principle and the necessity of having further time for the giants in the cabinet to examine its implications, I give notice now that on Thursday or Friday, whichever date is more suitable and gives them the longest possible time, I will move it again, because I find it can be done.

I am very glad we are going to have the support of the minister, provided the other ministers do not show him the serious implications inherent in accepting something that, unless it is accepted, will deny parliament information. Every member here has letters from individuals saying, "Do not identify me or I will be destroyed." That is what I am trying to prevent.

ENERGY

CANADA'S ABILITY TO COPE WITH PETROLEUM SHORTAGE IN EVENT IRAN REDUCES OIL PRODUCTION

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to the continuing crisis in Iran, and particularly the question of petroleum supplies from that country.

The United States is now actively considering the prospect of rationing petroleum products. Just this weekend, certain Iranian spokesmen were suggesting a permanent cutback of 40 per cent in production. Is Canada prepared to cope with a possible North American shortage of petroleum, either in co-operation with the United States or otherwise, and to what countries may we look for new sources of supply should that become necessary?

● (1450)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the situation is serious. It is by no means a panic situation at the present time, but it is serious. We may well be facing reductions in supply in the coming months.

At the present time, the situation is still manageable. We are making every effort to ensure that there will be supplies for Canadian refineries in eastern Canada. We are looking to other sources of supply, particularly Mexico, to replace the Iranian production, and to Venezuela. Venezuela, of course, is under pressure from other countries. Venezuela has been our major supplier, supplying some 40 per cent of our imports. I have received personal assurances from Venezuela that those supplies will continue to Canada. We are also working in Venezuela, trying to work out new opportunities with regard to heavy oils. That program is well under way between Petro-Canada and Petroleos de Venezuela.

As far as Mexico is concerned, again Petro-Canada will be the major player on behalf of Canada, working with the Mexican national oil company which handles all exports of oil from Mexico—Pemex. I believe these measures will help to assure Canadians of a continuing source of supply and reduce our dependence on Middle Eastern crude.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RCMP INVESTIGATION OF BOEING CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. I asked questions concerning the Boeing bribes in Canada on October 16, October 19, November 20 and November 21. The answers have run the gamut from "Wait", to "Be patient a little longer", and back to "Wait".

Can the minister tell the House if any progress has been made, and when we may expect charges to be laid? After all, from an even start India laid charges several months ago.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member and, as well, I wish to state how pleased I am that he has pursued this matter over a period of time. I wish to advise him that the investigation has been completed. The judgment is that there are no grounds on which to lay charges at the present time.

Mr. McKinnon: This question goes back to the "sweetheart" treaty signed between Canada and the United States promising not to rat on each other if either government got in trouble over it. Is the minister now telling us that none is guilty of taking a bribe in Canada, a fact that was clearly stated in the SEC findings in the United States?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the advice that I received was from the law enforcement agencies. They have completed their investigation. They found, upon investigation, that there are no charges to be laid.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): In the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

As the legislation now stands, widows of veterans receiving less than 48 per cent disability pensions are left without a pension. Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell me when he plans to bring in legislation to establish prorata pensions for these women, thereby implementing the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the provision of the Pensions Act upon which the hon. member bases his question. However, I have not had a chance to talk with the Minister of Veterans Affairs about this. I will draw the question to his attention. I am sure he will give it his usual sympathetic consideration.

Mr. McKenzie: The recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs were completed and forwarded to the government many months ago. Is the Deputy Prime Minister stating that none of these recommendations has been studied in cabinet? Can he give us some kind of commitment? Will he promise that he will bring forward legislation dealing with the recommendations in whole or in part before an election is called?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot guarantee that legislation will be brought forward during the present session. In the normal course, the minister involved makes a recommendation to cabinet on these matters. Until that recommendation is made, such reports are not normally studied by cabinet.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RCMP INVESTIGATION OF BOEING CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER CANADIAN LAW BROKEN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that posed by the hon. member for Victoria.

The Solicitor General said that no charges will be laid in the Boeing matter. Boeing has reported to the SEC in the United States that some payments were made. Will the Solicitor General advise whether the investigation found that any Canadian law had been broken?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that upon the investigation being completed there was no evidence of any wrongdoing that would lead to any charges. There was no evidence of any breach of the law by anyone involved in the dealings with the Government of Canada.

Mr. Clark: Can the Solicitor General tell us whether his investigations confirmed that payments were made by Boeing, as Boeing reported to the SEC in the United States? If they were made, can he tell us for what purpose they were made?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have no indication that any improper payments were made, or of any payments that could have been made which would have been in breach of any law of Canada.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—DEPRESSING OF PRICE PAID TO INSHORE FISHERMEN

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment arising out of representations made to me by some inshore fishermen in Nova Scotia and about which I wrote to the minister.

Can he assure me that there is real competition between fish buyers in Nova Scotia, and that no parties in the industry are artificially depressing the price paid to inshore fishermen for groundfish and lobster?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what extent I can give that assurance, except to say that I am concerned about the degree of concentration in Nova Scotia, particularly in areas where fishermen have very few alternative counters at which to sell their fish. This is one reason why I have been actively promoting fishermen becoming organized.

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the minister's answer. Would he consider consulting the Minister of Employment and Immigration with regard to encouraging inshore fishermen to market their own catches, and perhaps facilitating changes in the unemployment insurance regulations to encourage this?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I had not heard that this was an issue. We have co-operatives where fishermen do their own marketing through their organizations. If a regulation prohibits fishermen from protecting their own interests, I am sure my colleague and I can find some arrangement.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF EMERGENCY LOCATOR TRANSMITTERS IN AIRCRAFT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In December, 1977, a jet crashed at Churchill Falls, resulting in the loss of eight people, two of whom died of exposure because the aircraft was not discovered for 48 hours, despite the fact it was only a mile from the runway. There was no emergency locator transmitter aboard, because DOT had ordered them removed.

Can the minister advise whether the Deprtment of Transport has ordered all Canadian and civil aircraft to again start using emergency locator transmitters, or what is the situation in that regard?

[Mr. Blais.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the situation is now one of some ability on the part of aircraft to use transmitters, particularly if they are of the type that is safe.

The hon. member knows the reason for discontinuing their use. It was the discovery that the lithium batteries in the transmitters were, in fact, themselves a source of danger and could have been the cause of accidents. In order to avoid that happening, they were removed. Work has been done on finding batteries that are satisfactory. There has been some progress, although not yet enough to ensure that there will be an ELT on every aircraft.

Mr. Crosbie: As the minister probably knows, there has been a magisterial inquiry under way in Newfoundland into the deaths from that crash. Captain Powick of the Search and Rescue centre at Halifax stated at that time that he knows of no dangerous incident involving military aircraft, and that it is costing the taxpayer millions of dollars to search for aircraft that do not have ELTs on board. He said he could see no reason not to have ELTs aboard aircraft, that sufficient time has elapsed to find a suitable replacement for the lithium battery.

What is the minister's department doing? A year has gone by, and anybody who travels on an aircraft today has his life in jeopardy, if he survives a crash, because there are no ELTs on these aircraft. When will the minister show a sense of urgency about the installation of ELTs? They have them in the United States without lithium batteries. When does the minister propose to act?

Mr. Lang: The hon. member says they have them in the United States without lithium batteries. The problem in Canada which made special batteries necessary is the extremely cold weather which is much more common in this part of the world than it is farther south. Perhaps the hon. member does not know that. In Canada, these batteries must be able to work under a variety of conditions, including temperatures well below zero. It is this which led to the search for new batteries to replace the lithium batteries. Obviously, technological development can be forced only so far, but some batteries of an improved kind are now being made and some are available. However, we are not yet at a point at which we can require that every aircraft instals them.

The hon. member told us someone had said he knew of no incidents. Well, our department does know of some incidents and they have been quoted in answers given in this House: lithium-powered batteries have actually exploded in aircraft, becoming such a clear danger that they had to be removed. No amount of protestation on the part of the hon. member will alter that fact.

SOCIAL SERVICES

HOME SERVICES FOR SENIOR CITIZENS—FUNDING THEREOF

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the decision to withdraw Bill C-55, the social services financing act, has the minister any plans to mobilize or offer support to the voluntary agencies in the provision of home services to senior citizens along the lines of her speech of October 14—A New Deal for the Aged.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member who now seems to be interested in the development of social policy should have followed this situation when it developed and talked to his own provincial minister of finance in Ontario, one of the leading provincial finance ministers, who helped kill Bill C-55.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, my concern was not the apportionment of blame. Specifically, a number of people are concerned about the three programs which the minister mentioned in her speech—meals on wheels, health visitors, and home helpers. Has she any plan to obtain support from voluntary agencies with respect to those programs?

Miss Bégin: I do not understand exactly where the hon. member wants to go, but if he wants to make a representation to the minister of social services in Ontario, asking him to back projects for the community in Toronto or elsewhere, I shall be pleased to ensure that at this end we shall pay the 50 per cent which is the federal share.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—REPLY OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with a question I put to the Deputy Prime Minister today following a question which had been raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. It had to do with the question of profiteering. The Deputy Prime Minister took the opportunity to twist my question around; uncharacteristically he imputed motives to me by accusing me of saying I was accusing the beef producers of profiteering.

The whole thrust of my question had to do with the sharp increase of stockyard prices for beef last week and the report in the weekend press by two of the leading supermarkets that beef prices would rise by 10 cents a pound as of Monday. We are told it takes anywhere from two to three weeks for beef prices to work their way through the system, as was the case last June when beef prices went down; it took three weeks for the decrease to reach consumers. My question was: What steps is the government taking to ensure that no profiteering is taking place at the expense of either producers or consumers? We have set up a centre for the study of productivity. I had hoped the Deputy Prime Minister would refer my question to that body. The acting minister, who appeared to be in a state of shock when I directed my question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is aware, I am sure, that he has been airing a grievance about the answer given to his question and the treatment his question received during the question period. He has not come close to establishing any disorder; he has not advanced any procedural argument. If he has a point of order he has yet to persuade me that this is the case. Otherwise, I would be bound to permit everybody who did not like the answers they got during the question period to make similar use of this time.

Mr. McGrath: I believe I do have a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I raise it with great respect. You, sir, in your conduct of the question period, impose severe restrictions on hon. members asking questions, and rightly so. My point is that the same restrictions should be imposed on ministers when they reply. Otherwise, what happens? We had the example today of the Deputy Prime Minister making a cheap shot, knowing full well that somebody else would be recognized.

I did not state or impute in any way that profiteering was going on by beef producers. I was asking the minister to assure us that the government was taking steps to make certain that there was no profiteering taking place in the marketplace as a result of what happened last week to stockyard prices for beef. Surely there is a question of disorder involved here because the Deputy Prime Minister imputed motives to my question though there was no such suggestion in the question I asked. If Your Honour would take the time to examine the record I believe you would find that my point of order is valid.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that I did not intend to impute motives. I believe I concluded my statement by asking him a question. The question was whether he was alleging that the beef producers were profiteering. The hon. member has stated that he was not making any such allegation. Because, in my appreciation of the situation, the only marketplace in which any profiteering could have taken place up to the present time would have been the sales at Toronto, that is why I asked the question. Further, I thought I had assured the hon. member that the government would be monitoring the situation and that if profiteering is established it would consider what steps should be taken.

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. In response to a question I directed to him the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang)—and I am sorry he has left the chamber—suggested that I was irresponsible and that I was distorting some of his previous statements. The issue revolves around a statement he made in the House on December 5, 1977, having to do with the hiring of additional inspectors and the interpretation to be placed thereon.

Trade Practices Commission

I realize the minister suffers from memory lapses from time to time but because a charge has been levelled against me I think I should attempt to set the record straight at the earliest opportunity. In response to my question the minister suggested that he undertook only to provide additional air navigation inspectors for the northern Ontario region. That undertaking may well have been met; as I understand it, it was met by the transfer of inspectors from other regions. But the quotation which I believe puts the commitment in its proper perspective is to be found at page 1534 of Hansard of December 5, 1977. The minister stated as follows:

I have instructed that additional inspectors be hired and a significant number of them made available to the north.

Today the minister suggested he had given an undertaking to provide more inspectors only to the northern Ontario region. I read his commitment as being one to hire additional inspectors. The fact is there are fewer inspectors today than there were on December 5, 1977. I know the minister is very touchy and sensitive on this important matter. It is obvious there is a memory lapse on his part and that he does not have a full grasp of the situation; otherwise he would have answered my question properly.

Mr. Speaker: I will leave that matter in abeyance and see whether the minister has any response to make. I take it the point of order the hon. member is raising has to do with some answer the minister gave having to do with some suggested attempt by the hon. member to distort the minister's position, which the hon. members now disputes. We will first determine whether there is any response from the minister on that point.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is attending the federal-provincial conference on the constitution. I am sure that when he returns to the House he will clear up these unfounded allegations made by the hon. member.

SEAL HUNT

Question No. 587—Mr. Whiteway:

1. What was the total cost to the government of producing the brochure (a) The Seal Hunt (b) The Seal Hunt: Questions and Answers and, in each case, how many copies were (i) printed (ii) distributed?

2. Were any protests received by the (a) Prime Minister's office (b) Department of Fisheries and of the Environment (c) Department of External Affairs through Canadian Embassies and Consulates, protesting seal hunts and, if so, in each case (i) how many (ii) from which Embassies and Consulates?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I am informed by Fisheries and Oceans, the Department of External Affairs and the Prime Minister and Privy Council's Office as follows:

1. (a)	Cost	No. Printed	No. Distributed
The Seal Hunt	$71,717.62	230,000 (190,000 English 40,000 French)	230,000
(b) The Seal Hunt: Questions and answers	$10,890.81	185,000 (150,000 English and 35,000 French)	127,000

2. (a) None.

(b) Approximately 8,250 letters of protest were received between April 1, 1977 and November 17, 1978.

(c) Yes.

(i) No accurate count of the number of persons involved in these protests has been kept.

(ii) Nearly all Canadian diplomatic and consular missions in Western Europe, the United States, Australia and New Zealand reported protests.

INDIAN PEOPLE ON RESERVES

Question No. 593—Mr. Holmes:

How many Indian people on reserves were receiving welfare on March 31 (a) 1971 (b) 1978?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (a) 72,924 (This figure is incomplete as two regions no longer have records available for the year 1971) (b) 98,094.

NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Question No. 648—Mr. McKinnon:

Did Chancellor Schmidt personally or some of the other bidders ask for a few more months beyond the August 1 deadline to improve their bids on the NFA contract and, if so, which companies submitted additional proposals after August 1?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence as follows: No.

DREE—FREDERICTON INDUSTRIAL PARK

Question No. 743—Mr. Howie:

On December 31, 1977, were small industries located in the portion of the Fredericton Industrial Park situated in Sunbury County, eligible for assistance under the Small Industries Financial Assistance Programme financed by DREE and, if so, does such eligibility still prevail and is any change advocated by DREE?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: No industries were located in the portion of the Fredericton Industrial Park located in Sunbury County at December 31, 1977. Sunbury County is one of nine counties in New Brunswick eligible under the Small Industries Financial Assistance Program. Revised boundaries for eligible areas are under consideration by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the province of New Brunswick.

FISHERIES AND THE ENVIRONMENT—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 842—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of Fisheries and the Environment finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): In so far as Fisheries and Oceans is concerned: 1. No.

2. No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 855—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of External Affairs finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Pursuant to its program mandate, which relates to foreign operations, the Department of External Affairs does not normally finance domestic projects. Also, departmental expenditure records are not maintained by region, municipality or constituency. Therefore, statistical data on expenditures by constituency is not available.

2. No.

DREE—OFFICES AND EMPLOYEES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 890—Mr. Howie:

On December 1, 1978, how many (a) offices (b) employees did DREE have in New Brunswick?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: (a) Three. (b) 162.

DREE OFFICE—FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 900—Mr. Howie:

1. For the fiscal year 1977-78, how many applications for assistance were received by the local DREE Office in Fredericton, New Brunswick?

2. How many were (a) approved (b) rejected (c) undecided?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Under the Regional Development Incentives Act: 1. Ninety-one.

2. (a) Forty-nine. (b) Six. (c) Nil. (Thirty-six applications were withdrawn by the applicants).

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in regard to the great number of questions which have been on the order paper for a lengthy period of time not only in this session but also in other sessions. This is the only recourse a member of this House has to draw questions to the attention of the House, and I hope that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) or his parliamentary secretary will take action in this regard.

I would like today to draw attention to four specific questions which are on the order paper in my name. I refer first to one which was placed there two years and eight months ago. It is a very simple question. It asks simply how many members of the Canadian Transport Commission and their wives have Air Canada passes. I do not see why it should take two years and eight months to compile an answer to such a simple question. The question to which I refer is question No. 4.

Question No. 5 concerns the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Three years ago I asked for a breakdown of the $86,703 of public funds which had been spent on the office of the Prime Minister. I raised this matter on a point of order one year ago. At that time two years had gone by and the question was not answered. The Prime Minister replied to this effect: "Let it be made public; put it in all the papers, I don't mind". After three years the answer is still not forthcoming.

The third question to which I would like to refer is question No. 9 dealing with the fingerprinting of public servants. The question asks how many have been fingerprinted. I know that the number would be very large. The question also asks why this invasion of privacy is taking place with regard even to those who are not engaged in jobs of a security nature. In such jobs such a procedure might be understandable, but that question has been on the order paper for two years, and it remains unanswered.

Finally, question No. 10 has been on the order paper one year and seven months. It deals with Martin Goldfarb and Goldfard Consultants of Toronto. The question deals with what contacts they have had with the government or with any government department regarding government business. I am not asking about the hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars they may have received from the Liberal party, just from the government. That question has been unanswered for one year and seven months.

There are other questions, and I think I have the right as a member of this House to rise each day I am here and draw attention to two or three questions which have not been answered. Today I have drawn attention to four.

The parliamentary secretary might rise in the tradition of his predecessors and point to the great percentages and tremendous work which has been done in answering questions, but I do not care whether 87 per cent, 88 per cent, 89 per cent or 90 per cent of questions have been answered. If hon. members opposite are avoiding questions which would embarrass the government on the eve of an election, I think it is high time the people of Canada realized the sham which is being perpetrated by this government.

Will the parliamentary secretary rise now and tell me when these four specific questions will be answered? After three years I think I have a right to know.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member I think I am technically correct in saying that these questions have been on this particular order paper since October 11 of last year. Whether they have been on other order papers of other sessions is a very different question. We are attempting to answer questions which have been put on the order paper in this session. The ones mentioned by the hon. member are dated October 11, and I see other more recent ones dated in November and December. If the hon. member wishes to convey to me or through me to my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) which of those four or five questions out of the few dozen which he has on the order paper he would like responded to most quickly, I will be happy to take that as notice.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

I only wish that when the hon. member brings forward these questions he might also take into consideration the fact that a question such as question No. 9 involves checking with dozens of different government departments and agencies. It would involve going through almost every file to check on how many of the some 300,000 civil servants have been fingerprinted. That is an unbelievable task, and the hon. member knows that.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, when the debate adjourned on Friday I was dealing with the impact which the cutback in the health resources fund would have on the Rehabilitation International Congress which is scheduled to be held in Winnipeg during June of 1980. I complimented the minister for her attempts to deal with a very difficult situation in the face of the cutbacks which suddenly appeared following the television address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 1.

The minister actually has a double problem because she is carrying the torch for promises which were made by her predecessor, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), who for a period of some five or six years when he had the responsibilities of minister of national health and welfare raised the level of expectation to unprecedented heights. Let me quote from a speech the hon. gentleman made on May 30 of 1973 in which he said that under the new social services legislation rehabilitation was to be given top priority to promote the principle of self-reliance among the handicapped. He said that governments and voluntary groups for too long had introduced programs which promoted dependence rather than independence. The minister stated, and I quote:

> The handicapped have the right to be as independent as possible, the right to live like everyone in the community and the services they need to bring this about should be provided.

This refers to a question which the hon. member for Rosedale was asking just a moment ago with respect to the cutback in home care services for the disabled. Then later on in his speech the former health minister spoke about a conference which was held by the disabled themselves.It was one of the first conferences at which the disabled were provided the opportunity to speak for themselves and to express their wishes. The conference was funded by the federal government and sponsored by the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled. Here is the message that came out of this conference:

● (1520)

In every area the message was clear: They "wanted in": into employment, into community living, into maximum participation in community life, into the planning of systems and services designed to help them. At the same time they "wanted out": out of institutions, out of dead-end sheltered workshops, out of welfare, out of being pitied, out of being thrust on to the sidelines with a pension and a shrug.

This is a quotation from a speech which was delivered by the former minister of national health and welfare back in 1973.

One of the main problems with which the minister is wrestling as she faces a cutback in this important area is the necessity of providing adequate personnel resources. In a document which was tabled as Appendix "B" last November 27, at page 1555 of Hansard, we have some very revealing facts with respect to the inability of Canada to provide trained personnel resources to deal with the growing problems of rehabilitating the physically and mentally handicapped, and this is one of the most expensive areas of concern in the whole health and welfare fields.

Looking at the document which was tabled by the minister and printed as an appendix to Hansard, we find that it states that the number of biomedical engineers who had graduated in 1966 was 14; in 1976, some ten years later, that number had only increased to 39. The demand, of course, is far beyond that number. But what is even more revealing is the fact that occupational therapists who play a large role in the rehabilitation process numbered 78 in 1966, and in 1976 there were only 237 of them. I compare this with 3,800 nursing assistants in 1966 and 5,500 nursing assistants in 1976. You can see that the level is quite low by comparison, Mr. Speaker.

Physiotherapists, who are right on the firing line in rehabilitation, numbered 232 in 1966 and 446 in 1976, as compared to 880 physicians in 1966 and 1,700 in 1976. So the time of fully trained medical doctors has been taken up in areas which could be delegated to paramedics such as physiotherapists.

There are no figures available for the training of doctors in physical medicine or physiatrists, so I presume they are not being trained anywhere in Canada, and of course an ordinary MD has great difficulty in coping with the particular demands of rehabilitation.

I had an interesting exchange of correspondence recently in company with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) regarding the case of a young chap who is not a Canadian and had come from another country. He was taking his doctorate at the Chedoke Rehabilitation Centre at McMaster university in a very highly specialized field in the rehabilitation movement. He was being trained in the field of biomedical engineering with a special focus on studying human locomotor function and applying external electrical stimuli to activate paralysed muscles. This work is quite unique in Canada, in the world as a matter of fact, and actually this particular specialist is one of his kind in the world. So hon. members will see that we have a long way to go in training personnel in the rehabilitation field. It became necessary to approach the Department of Employment and Immigration, and this gentleman will be allowed to stay in Canada following his graduation and to serve in this way. But he is only one and we need hundreds of similarly trained personnel. Of course, there will be a setback in this area as a result of the cutback in the resource funding.

Another thought I have in this area is that the whole field of geriatrics will be affected, the special care that is required for our senior citizens. They are a rapidly increasing percentage of the population; 15 per cent of Canadians will be in the geriatric age group by the end of the present century, and obviously with the slow progress we are making, we will not be prepared to meet the special health and welfare requirements of a senior citizen population. They are affected by all sorts of crippling diseases and disabling afflictions, and when you do not have personnel specially trained to deal with these problems, they constitute a crippling demand on health and welfare resources.

This is where one of our problems lies—the escalating cost of providing these services and meeting these needs at present. Insitutional care is not the answer, but this has been the answer we have unconsciously given in meeting this problem. Some of these institutions are referred to as human warehouses. What we want are the facilities, the home care, meals on wheels and attention in the home that will make it possible for the disabled person, the handicapped person and the older citizen to have the benefit and the warmth of a home environment rather than eke out an existence in these cold human warehouses. We want to be able to add life to the years of Canada's disabled.

Let me conclude my remarks by saying that the whole emphasis of the Rehabilitation International Congress in Winnipeg in June, 1980 will be precisely on the points I have raised. The theme of the congress will be prevention and integration, the priorities for the 1980s. These are the areas where Canada is falling down because of the misplacement of our financial priorities. We could prevent a lot of crippling and disabling diseases if only we aimed our emphasis, our priorities, in the right direction.

There will be six preliminary seminars at the congress which will deal with major areas of concern. The seminar on special education will take place in Vancouver. The medical seminar will be in Kingston, the social needs seminar in Winnipeg and the organizational need seminar will also be in Winnipeg. In Toronto there will be a technical aid seminar which will be joined by the inter-agency from the United States and will bring together some 1,500 people to deal with the biomedical aspects of the rehabilitation movement. Toronto will also have a seminar on the vocational needs of Canada's disabled population.

Canada was fortunate to get the congress. I was privileged to be with the invitation committee which travelled to Tel Aviv in Israel in June of 1976 where we attended the Rehabilitation International Congress. There was pretty stiff competition, but the reason Canada was awarded the 1980 congress was that we could guarantee there would be a great breakthrough in social services for the handicapped.

I read some of the speeches of the hon. member for Outremont concerning all the wonders which were just around the corner. As a result of that presentation Canada was selected, but unfortunately all we have at present is great hope and expectations. We can get it all together. As I said the other day, the minister has written to me indicating the problem in this regard and her support for the motion which I put before the House namely that we constitute a special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to gather pertinent information from the voluntary organizations and have a report ready for the congress in 1980.

In December, 1977 I was privileged to go to New York and speak on behalf of Canada in support of the motion declaring 1981 as rehabilitation year. That motion was accepted unanimously, so that rehabilitation international year will flow out of the 1980 congress in Canada. The role of Canada is very large in all these areas, and of course the reputation of Canada is at stake. We must have something very concrete, not only in terms of hope and expectation, but also in terms of legislative proposals. Britain is ahead of us. It has had special legislation since 1971, and now has a minister of state for rehabilitation. We have a long way to go even to match that kind of progress.

I recognize the problems which the minister has as she struggles valiantly to meet the problems created by the sudden reversal of the Prime Minister in funding respecting health and welfare measures, and I should like to make some specific proposals. I hope we will get the subcommittee together as soon as possible in order to gather public sentiment and opinion in preparation for the time when it will be possible to proceed with the legislation. I trust the minister will be able to reconstitute the rehabilitation unit which existed at one time in the Department of National Health and Welfare. It was disbanded because we were moving toward the dawn of the new age respecting rehabilitation matters, as was promised by the hon. member for Outremont in his speeches a few years ago. We were to do away with some of the existing legislation and co-ordinate it under the new social services act.

There are excellent personnel in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I have met them at various conferences. They are competent in the field of rehabilitation. In a letter written on December 5, the minister indicated that it was her intention to reconstitute the rehabilitation unit. I hope people such as Andre LeBlanc, who has had broad experience in this field and has left it temporarily because of the disintegration of the rehabilitation unit within the department, will be called back into service, particularly in preparation for the 1980 congress to be held in Winnipeg. Also I trust it will be possible to have an advisory committee composed of representatives from the privte sector who are providing leadership in this field at the moment. They are ahead of the government in meeting the various needs. I hope an advisory committee will come out of the committee investigating the state of rehabilitation arts in Canada as it moves across the country to hear representations from these people. It could advise the government on how to cut down the huge expenses and waste involved in meeting the needs of our handicapped population because of the lack of co-ordinated policies.

I hope the government will provide a resource centre upon which professionals in the field can call to obtain databank information on all available technical aids. The information centre could co-ordinate all activities and avoid costly duplication to taxpayers as various groups attempt to meet the very difficult problems of rehabilitation. I hope the health resources fund will be built up to such an extent that it will be possible to provide personnel. As I indicated a moment ago, the personnel training program is totally inadequate to provide the needed expertise. We require a sense of direction, rather than an ad hoc approach to fundamental health and welfare programs which are on again and off again, stop and start. Such programs only confuse and add to the waste in meeting needs.

We require a stable long-term program which will last at least three to five years. This is why I say the present program is quite inadequate. It is not good enough for the government to keep changing direction, to raise the hopes and expectations of the people who have held out for the past seven years awaiting a new social services legislation which would meet their needs adequately. This has not been done and this is why we criticize the program at the present time.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the contributions over the last few days respecting the legislation before the House. I believe this particular matter is one of the most important to occupy our attention. When we consider all the assets of life, health is one of the most important.

I should like to deal with the proposal of the government to eliminate the health resources fund. This has caused a great deal of dismay, not only in the Canadian medical community but in the respective provinces and among the public at large.

As this debate continues, there is a tendency to forget the details and the background information on the Health Resources Fund Act. The Health Resources Fund Act was established under the Pearson administration and given Royal Assent on July 11, 1966. At that time the government perceived a need for funding certain types of research in the medical field, teaching, medical and laboratory equipment, and research facilities in Canadian universities and hospitals. The fund was set up and $500 million was allocated and disbursed over a 15-year period as follows: $300 million to the provinces on a per capita basis; $25 million to the Atlantic provinces for joint projects; $175 million to be allocated by the governor in council for particular projects. Approximately $400 million has been spent. About one-fifth of the fund went to medical schools and major purpose buildings in the health science complex. Another one-fifth went to university hospitals. Some money went to affiliated hospitals. Approximately $23 million was contributed to dental schools with $76 million to nursing schools, auxiliary schools and other health and manpower training centres.

To my mind and to the minds of a great many Canadians, this fund was worth while and the money was well spent. By cancelling the health resources fund the government has stated it will save $84 million over a period of 2 years. The minister agreed both at the second reading stage of this bill and at third reading that the fund had been worth while and had done a lot of good for the people of Canada. After devoting a major part of her speech on second reading to saying how great the fund was, she then announced it was to be cancelled. The logic of this leaves one baffled. This was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), at second reading stage when he stated that either the fund is good and deserves support or it is bad and deserves to be cancelled. We find a paradox in that the minister says it is good but it is to be cancelled.

I think one of the reasons that she has taken this position was set out in her speech a few days ago when she said the objectives of the program had been completed. In the course of the debate several of my colleagues have pointed out activities in various areas which have either been left unfinished or untouched in this field of endeavour involving the delivery of health care.

As we listened to other speakers we came to the conclusion that possibly the minister was speaking without a full understanding of the facts or in some way had missed the point of some of the legislative programs. Without question there are areas which have been left untouched, and there are groups of people, segments of our population, that have not been the recipients of adequate health delivery care. For these reasons we feel it is highly inappropriate at this time that this particular program should be eliminated. I would suggest that of all the places to cut expenditures, this type of program should be one of the last.

During the debates throughout the past months we on this side of the House have advised the government that if it is really interested in making some meaningful cuts in expenditures and trimming the expensive fat from its operations, it should pay more attention to the recommendations, observations and comments made in the Auditor General's report. Unfortunately, instead of doing that the government is moving in other directions, eliminating or reducing programs which have a direct bearing upon the personal needs and lives of individuals. This is very unfortunate because in doing so the government is leaving certain people and groups without the essential services necessary if they are to maintain adequate health and serve our country in a productive fashion.

As we consider this particular measure today it is reasonable, and certainly understandable, that we should take so much time in calling attention to the injustices of this cancellation, pointing out ways in which other expenditures can be cut without bringing to an end programs which have been of such importance to the people and the country.

One well-known expert in the area of medical research, for instance, has made a study that clearly shows that, for every dollar invested in research today, $20 will be saved in ten years' time through dramatically reduced health costs. The cutting of research projects in any field does not necessarily save money, but it does in many cases increase the cost to the taxpayer or the individual citizen in Canada.

My colleague the hon. member for Athabasca cited a number of examples of this fact when speaking during another stage of the debate. Let me just refer to one of his statements. He said that it cost $41 million to develop the polio vaccine. That was the total cost. Since polio vaccine has been in use in Canada, beginning in 1955, Canada has saved $200 million per year in medical and health care costs. This is just one piece of successful research that has saved this country more than four times the total expenditure for research in each year since 1955. How can this government in the name of restraint downgrade medical research in such a way?

Some of my colleagues have referred to areas where medical research has not been provided the people of Canada. Reference has been made to the action of the minister and the government in respect of medical care for native people. I noticed that in one instance it was reduced, the next time it was increased, and then it was reduced again. It seems illogical that in an important area, such as this there should be an on-again, off-again, here-again, gone-again, "Flannigan" attitude toward medical care for our native people.

Just yesterday I picked up a publication called "Circlet" put out by the Union of National Defence Employees. The main article on the front page under the heading "Keep health units, Power says", states in part:

> The Union of National Defence Employees is in the forefront of efforts to fight a reduction of health services to federal public employees across the country.
>
> As part of Ottawa's announced restraint program, the Department of National Health and Welfare has announced it is closing a number of health units and is cutting back on the number of man-years for some others. At some Department of National Defence bases, nurses will be available for only part of each week.
>
> The health and welfare department says that each department will be expected to take up the slack by improving available first-aid services.

Then the article refers to a statement of Mr. Joe Power, national president. It states:

> Joe Power, UNDE national president, has taken the matter directly to Health Minister Monique Bégin.
> In a letter to the minister Dec. 22, Power protested "in the strongest terms possible" her department's decision to make an almost 25 per cent reduction in man-years for the public service occupational health program.

This next part is very significant I believe. It states:

> The reduced health services are a false economy, the letter says. It points out that 27,900 work injuries in the federal public service between April 1, 1977 and March 31, 1978 resulted in a cost of more than $16.6 million.

● (1550)

> It is impossible to estimate how much more time and money would be lost if injured workers were not to receive immediate fully-qualified medical attention, the UNDE president writes. However, the figure would probably be in the millions of dollars and thousands of hours, not to mention the possibilty of increased deaths.

I believe that it is false economy, when one is considering the health of the people of Canada, to introduce and to put into place restraints or cutbacks in this particular area. Surely there are other fields in which restraint could be exercised—and we have pointed these out—without removing programs that are of such a direct and urgent benefit to the people.

With regard to the allegation or charge that there have not been adequate discussions with the provinces, I would like to express my support for those contentions. It was rather surprising, after all the discussions with regard to negotiation and consultation with the provinces and with regard to how thoroughly various programs have been dealt with and carried out, to hear the minister say in her speech, as recorded at page 2810 of Hansard, dated February 1:

If I go back to the exact nature of this bill, which is to cancel the health resources fund a few years ahead of its natural termination date, I must acknowledge that many members complained in the committee about the fact that no consultation had taken place with the provinces on introducing an earlier cut-off date after which no new projects are to be approved. The fact is that there was very little time for specific consultation when the final decision was taken.

Those comments are rather significant in view of the fact that the government has reached the point where it would cut off a program worked out in consultation with the provinces, and on top of that say there was not sufficient time to consult with them to reduce the time frame of the program by approximately two years.

We tend to think of all these changes in terms of a reduction in the delivery of health services, its effect upon research and so on. I have in my hand a newsletter published by Canadians for Health Research which contains an editorial that I think is very pertinent to this question. It says:

Much has been said during the past two years about the effect of funding cutbacks on the Canadian scientific community and health care delivery system. What has not been stressed is that Canada has an obligation to the people of the world—

The obligations we have to our own people are fundamental, but here this newsletter is saying that Canada has an obligation to the people of the world.

—to provide knowledge and techniques to enable them to achieve minimal levels of health.

Officials of the World Health Organization speaking at the CHR National Conference pointed out that hundreds of millions of people suffer from severe tropical diseases—

And it goes on to mention some diseases, the names of which I cannot pronounce.

—for which there are no cures. The development of new technologies is essential if advances in the control of these major parasitic diseases are to be achieved. The third world does not have the academic and technical resources to do the research on these diseases. Canada does. We therefore have a moral responsibility to provide not only massive amounts of foreign aid to purchase advanced technological products, but to export our knowledge in the field of biomedical research.

Those comments illustrate very clearly that by making a cut such as the government is proposing in this bill, it is affecting not only the health care services within Canada but also those services which could be and should be provided to other parts of the world.

We hear a great deal about consultation between the provinces and the federal government today. It seems to me that the government ought to take another look at this whole area and reassess their attitude toward provincial responsibility and participation in these programs. At the time the medical care bill was introduced there was a great deal of discussion, and at one point it was thought that the bill would flounder and not be passed, because some of the provinces were not willing to enter into the program as proposed. But finally, after a great deal of arm-twisting, the provinces came in and the medicare plan was put into operation. In this instance the federal government applied strong-tongue tactics—I was about to say strong-arm tactics, but that is not quite right—in order to get the provinces to accept medicare, but just a short while ago the government brought in a measure which put a cap on the expenditures, and the result was that the provincial governments were saddled with additional expenses as far as that particular program was concerned.

Once again, after making a commitment and working out this program with the provinces, the government is reneging and leaving the provinces holding the bag. This is very unfair to the provinces. The result is that there is a great deal of resentment that would not be there had the government taken a more positive position and attitude in their deliberations and discussions with the provinces. This is why we say that the damage to our confederation has been done by a government which fails to recognize the provinces as partners in confederation. I have said before that the relationship between the two levels of government has deteriorated to the point where there is suspicion and distrust, which should not be.

As a result of this bill, the provinces will once again have to accept the fact that another program has been curtailed and, in this case, eliminated two years prior to its cut-off date. The protests have come from this side of the House, and I add my voice to those who have already spoken. But regardless of the protests and representations made, the government will maintain this attitude, which will continue to prevail until the time comes when it is replaced by a government which is more sensitive to the needs of Canadians, a government with policies which are designed to meet those needs in a constructive and adequate fashion.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill before us, as hon. members know, is to eliminate the health resources fund and, in effect, the allocation of $80 million that still remains in the fund which, under normal circumstances, would be paid out to the provinces for essential medical-diagnostic facilities. I, too, would like to add my words of opposition to the elimination of this fund.

I believe that there are many things we can do as a country to improve the health and well-being of Canadian citizens. I want to spend a few minutes on an area which I think is overlooked by almost all modern industrial societies, Mr. Speaker. It is an area, quite frankly, in which all political parties when they are in office have created disaster, and that is nutrition and preventive medicine. I think this is one of the real issues, challenges, perhaps one of the results of an industrial society that the world is overlooking, and I want to make some non-partisan remarks about it.

● (1600)

I recall speaking to a senior official in the Saskatchewan government a couple of years ago and asking him what was new in the area of health. He replied, "We have done everything we have to do. We have medicare, hospitalization, cancer programs, eye glasses programs, drug prescription programs and the like." I said, "I commend you. The government of Saskatchewan has led the way in health care in this country and in North America, but in my opinion it has just begun."

Let us look at some of the things I am speaking about, Mr. Speaker, as they relate to the whole area of health in the industrialized world, particularly in the areas of nutrition and preventive medicine. In the United States Senator George McGovern and a team completed a comprehensive study of health in that country about two years ago. They linked six of the leading causes of death to diet and the types of food people eat. They said that North Americans eat far too much sugar, fats and salty foods—that we are digging our graves with our teeth, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has just commented. The World Health Organization has said that about 90 per cent of cancers are caused by the environment and that a large part of that environment is the type of food we consume.

In a white paper produced about three years ago the Food Prices Review Board said that in 1972 about 40 per cent of the hospital days in this country were as a result of the malnutrition of the Canadian people, and the cost was around $2 billion. The former head of Nutrition Canada, a renowned scientist named Dr. Zak Sabry, about the same time said it probably cost more than $2 billion per year. He said that on an annual basis the total cost of poor nutrition to Canada is about $7 billion to $8 billion, of which about $2.5 billion could be saved each year through improved nutrition.

Heart disease was virtually unknown prior to the turn of the century. Many studies link the type of food we eat with the type of ailment. Another interesting report is one which was issued by the Quebec government. Governments of all political stripes in this country have not placed a high enough priority on preventive medicine and nutrition. Last year the federal government, the provinces and municipalities spent on nutrition and nutritional education only about 1 per cent of what the food retailing and processing industries spent on promoting food. Breakfast cereals that are 50 or 60 per cent sugar and things like that which are detrimental to health were promoted.

The Quebec government issued a paper entitled "Une Politique Québécoise en Matière de Nutrition" which is a comprehensive study of the nutritional problems of people in this country. They are implementing some of the proposals and I hope this will act as a vanguard in this field, as did the actions of the Saskatchewan government in years gone by in the field on the delivery of health services to everyone regardless of income. The document reports on the state of nutrition in this country. Many people claim that Canadians are not malnourished while other people say we suffer from a great deal of malnutrition.

The report also points out that the consumption of alcohol in this country has increased drastically in the last few years. In this regard it states:

[Translation]

It has recently been demonstrated that between 10 and 20 per cent of total calories consumed by the North American adult come under the form of alcool.

And, further:

Mortality due to liver cirrhosis has registered a gross increase of nearly 200 per cent during the last twenty years. The number of deaths has increased from 195 cases in 1951 to 558 in 1971.

[English]

So as we see, Mr. Speaker, the types of food and beverages we consumer today lead to very serious health problems and in many cases lead to deaths which should not occur.

A study carried out a few years ago by Nutrition Canada found that one and one-half million Canadians suffered from malnutrition of one form or another. That means they lack the vitamins and minerals that are necessary for the body to function properly.

Some of the information in that report is startling. For example, in this country about 70 per cent of old age pensioners suffer from calcium deficiency. Imagine that in a country with the capacity to produce an unlimited volume of milk, where two years ago farmers were throwing milk away on the steps of the House of Commons because they did not receive a decent price for it in the market, if they could find a market. The report also found that 44 per cent of Canadians had iron deficiency and 60 per cent had vitamin D deficiency. And the list goes on, Mr. Speaker.

The same thing is true in the United States. According to studies in that country in 1955, about 60 per cent of the population had a well-balanced diet. In 1965, ten years later, about 50 per cent of the population had a well-balanced diet.

If we study our eating patterns since World War II, we will find them absolutely frightening for the future of health in this industrialized society. The consumption of dairy products has dropped by 23 per cent, the consumption of fresh fruit by 25 per cent, while the consumption of soft drinks has increased by 80 per cent. In some cases children in the United States average three soft drinks per day. The consumption of pastries has increased by 80 per cent, and of potato chips by 85 per cent. Is it any wonder that the medical experts tell us today that nearly half the adult Canadian population is overweight? And I am not looking at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)! I do not intend to name names. However, about one half of the Canadian population is obese. That problem can be traced back to the type of diet we have. I was talking about some changes in eating patterns in the United States. The same is true in this country.

One need only look to the Nutrition Canada surveys to find that what is occurring in the United States is also occurring in Canada. I have a study here. The years 1905 to 1910 are given a basic index of 100. You can trace the consumption of certain products, one of them being refined sugar. In the years 1905-1910, the base was 100. In 1973 the base index went up to about 140 or 145. Meat went up to between 145 and 150. If you look at dairy products or cereals and flour, that went down to about 55 or 60, reflecting similar eating patterns that one sees in the United States. The bill before us will eliminate the health resources fund. That $80 million could be spent very usefully on trying to come up with programs and policies which will show Canadians the need to become concerned with the types of food they are eating and with the food system we have in this country.

Many people say that we live longer today, that people do not die as young as they used to. I suggest we take a good look at that argument. If we look at the arguments, facts and data, one point comes very clearly to mind as to why the lifespan is longer now than in 1900. Because of modern medicines and hospitals, we have been able to combat the problem of infant mortality. Babies are not dying as a result of diseases they died of some 70 or 80 years ago. In addition, we have penicillin which has reduced the death rate of people of all ages. If you compare the life expectancy of people over 21 in the year 1900 with the years 1978 and 1979, you find that life expectancy has not gone up significantly. But despite modern medicine, hospitals, surgery, medicare and other services, the average lifespan in Canada in the past 70 or 80 years has not to any significant degree lengthened. The main part of the reason is our food system.

Let us look briefly at the food we consume. The foods we consume in this country contain about 1,800 chemicals or artificial additives. We eat more processed or heavily manufactured foods than ever before. Many people say, "So what?" I remind them that the more food is manufactured or processed, the more vital minerals and vitamins are refined out of that food. I will use the example of canned peas which many of us pick up on the supermarket shelves. When you open a can of peas, warm them on the stove and then consume them, 94 per cent of the food value will have been lost. Only about 6 per cent of the food value remains compared to the value you would get from peas picked fresh from the garden, shelled and eaten in a raw or natural state. I use that as an example of the fact that the more we manufacture our foods, the more we refine out the vital minerals and vitamins.

Let us look at another study. Since World War II the consumption of highly refined foods, canned foods, frozen foods, TV dinners as well as food consumed in restaurants has increased extremely rapidly. Along with the acceleration of manufactured food has been a corresponding decrease in the value of nutrients.

As I have said, many chemicals are put into our food. There is the whole area of artificial colouring. An orange is injected with orange dye to make it more orange. Chickens are injected with dye to make them a certain colour. These things are totally unnecessary and scientists are now starting seriously to question them. This practice has only occurred in the last 30, 40 or possibly 50 years. The cumulative effects of many of these changes are not known in a very concrete or definitive way.

Many Canadians would be surprised to know that the average person consumes over 100 pounds of sugar per year. Not much of that comes out of the sugar bowl; most of it has been added to other foods. There is a lot of medical evidence which indicates that we are eating far too much sugar. It is not good for us. Many breakfast cereals and canned fruits actually contain more sugar than the particular food one is supposedly purchasing.

All these matters are of great concern to me. They are of increasing concern to a larger and larger number of people in Canada and in other countries. In addition to what I have mentioned, there is increasing concern about the safety aspect with regard to the pesticides and insecticides being used. There is growing concern about the hormones given to animals as well as the antibiotics being injected into them. There is concern about forcefeeding of animals in order to fatten them rapidly. There is a lot of concern about how we raise chickens and animals, how we are changing the genetics of some of the animals we eventually eat.

Because of growing evidence that we are so rapidly changing the food system, it would be worth while to put more money into the area of preventive medicine and nutrition. We in this House have often been reminded of escalating health and hospital costs in Canada. Too little attention is being paid to preventive medicine and other ways of bringing down these rapidly escalating costs. None of us have the magic solution. That is why we need a lot more research in this area.

Worth-while research is being done in other countries. Israel, France and Norway all have eating patterns and food different from that in Canada. It is worth taking a look at them. I want to deal with eight or nine points which I feel might improve the health of Canadians.

First, we need a comprehensive educational program. Just the other day I talked to someone who was convinced she eats very well. She consumes three or four cokes a day. Her favourite foods are french fries and macaroni.

An hon. Member: What's wrong with macaroni?

Mr. Nystrom: Anything in a reasonable amount will not harm you. However, if it is your diet for many, many years it will do some harm. Therefore, we need an educational program to inform Canadians about foods they are consuming and those that they should look at more positively.

Second, we should consider a system of nutritional labelling. This has been tried in other countries. People would then know from the label what they are about to consume. The label should indicate the percentage of sugar, fats, cholesterol, solids, and anything else contained in the food.

● (1620)

Another thing that has been suggested by the Canadian Committee on Diet and Cardiovascular Disease is the use of a government logo. The logo would mark foods that are part of a healthy and balanced diet. People would know by the very presence of the logo whether or not what they are consuming is part of a healthy and balanced diet. And here is an idea which could be borrowed from a country like Norway: you could use the taxation system as a way of discriminating in favour of nutritional foods and against foods of non-nutritional value by imposing higher taxes on foods that are unhealthy, lowering the taxes on, and thus lowering the price of, foods which are healthier for people. Norway is experimenting in this direction.

Another thing which could be done, and I thought we had already started to do this in this country, is to subsidize some of the basic foods such as milk and bread. There used to be consumer subsidies on them but they have now been withdrawn.

An hon. Member: Not from milk.

Mr. Nystrom: Very well, there is still a subsidy on milk, but a large part of the subsidy on fluid milk has been withdrawn—

An hon. Member: Powdered milk.

Mr. Nystrom: Powdered milk. It was announced before Christmas that the subsidy on bread would be withdrawn and on January 1 we saw the effect on the price of a loaf of bread in every store in this country. Another thing that could be done is school food programs and school milk programs so that people while they were young would have a chance to eat more nutritious foods in the schools instead of using the classical coke machines and chips, so that children could drink milk and fruit juices and so on in school cafeterias.

Another thing that is very important is the type of advertising beamed at young people. One thing I like that the Quebec government is doing in the area of consumer legislation today is the banning of advertising directed to people under the age of 13. I never used to worry about this until very recently, but I worry about it now because I have a five-year-old son and I see the impact television is making on him and on his preferences. No matter how much we try to tell him that certain breakfast cereals, for example, are not good for him and that other foods such as whole grain cereals are much better for him, we find it hard to convince him because of the fancy ads on television with fancy characters promoting some of the more junky type foods.

An hon. Member: Turn off the television.

Mr. Nystrom: Some people say turn off the television, but that is very difficult to do with young people. In the International Year of the Child perhaps one of our concerns should be getting rid of advertising that tries to promote food of non-nutritional value in the mind of a small child. I see a member of the cabinet shaking his head in the negative. I hope he doesn't really mean that, because it is so important in our society that we give the younger people the proper values and the proper type of education so that they will understand the types of foods and the types of values that are good for them in their formative years.

These are just a few of the things that I think could be done to improve the health of the nation. That is why when this bill came back to the House for third reading a couple of days ago I wanted to get up and say a few words about what I think is one of the great problems of the industrialized food system and what it is probably doing to our bodies and to our health. It seems to me it is worth putting a few more bucks into this system in terms of the future of our country, because nothing is as important as the health of people. I believe politicians have to take a lead in this area, just as politicians had to take a lead in the area of the delivery of health services, medicare, hospitalization and good hospitals, and modern drugs and technology. We must now start delivering the other half of that formula, which is a good, wholesome food system and a good, balanced diet, along with such things as exercise.

I think that by investing a few million dollars we could reap several billion dollars worth of return, as the health officials to whom I referred have suggested, from the improved health and happiness of the country. Perhaps we could create a much better society for all of us and for those who are about to come in the years ahead.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to enter this debate today as one who represents an area with a large Indian population whose health services really need to be questioned.

The minister proposes to cut some $84 million from science support programs and medical research. During the recent controversy about the reduction in Indian health services we heard frightening statistics on this subject. Indian women in Canada live an average of 30 years less than other women; the life expectancy of Indian men is about 22 years shorter than that of the average Canadian male; the infant mortality rate is twice the national average and natives suffer a much higher incidence of diseases such as tuberculosis and hepatitis.

Perhaps even more startling than today's pathology and mortality figures are reports upon the stature of the North American Indian of yesterday. Many of the facts I am about to put on record were noted in an NIB paper two years ago; I thought it was time they were brought to the attention of the House.

The agricultural Iroquois male of the early 1800s averaged in excess of six feet in height compared to the average European male of that same time standing five feet two inches tall. Infections and chronic disease were unknown in the pre-colonial Americas, while in Europe, during the dark ages, whole populations fell to the ravages of various plagues and diseases. Of 30,000 identified diseases, only 87 were known to exist among the Indian people of the Americas. The difference is attributed to the absence of fresh fruits and vegetables in the European diet and the almost total reliance on dried grains and domesticated meat.

Published studies regarding the Indian people show the race is superior in bodily proportions, colour and gesture; free from tuberculosis, syphilis, and the consequent physical and mental deformities. They were strangers to leprosy, scrofula, cancer, and nervous prostration.

Archaeology has failed to uncover evidence among pre-contact Indian burial excavations of modern day bone deficiences, cavities, rheumatism, arthritis, etc. Indian women were unusually strong, often continuing their regular physical activities immediately following childbirth. Infant mortality was rare.

Contact historians of the early eighteenth and nineteenth centuries concur that the Indian people represented a superior physical make-up. Today the Indian people suffer from gall bladder infections, infectious diseases, high infant mortality, obesity, retarded physical growth, and chronic diseases.

● (1630)

The incidence of diabetes among Indians is reported to be five times as high as it is among the general population. A few weeks ago the minister was presented with a blanket by the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs with the assurance that it was disease free. The gift was a reference to blankets containing a smallpox virus given to the Ottawa Indians on the upper Great Lakes by British officers 200 years earlier in an attempt to wipe out native settlements. Significant here is that, whether by intent or not, European immigrants introduced along with fatal illnesses the need for the benefits of advanced health care.

Following the confederation of 1867 it was recognized that the federal government should be responsible for Indians and the lands reserved for Indians. While not provided for in the federal statutes, health care services were supplied to Indians, often by surgeons in the Northwest Mounted Police, and by the Hudson's Bay Company. This common practice was first documented by an order in council dated May 11, 1877, appointing Daniel Haggerty, MD as medical superintendent to the Indians of Keewatin and the northwest. Health care services to Indian people over the next century developed gradually, hindered by a changing or non-existent administration and poor organization.

In 1905 Dr. P. Bryce was appointed medical superintendent within the department of Indian affairs. After five years his position was terminated and not reinstated until 1927. At about that time the first field nurses were appointed to work on reserves. However, the general health of the Indian people continued in a downward slide.

The first nursing station ever to be built in the area I represent was built in 1947. At that time it was a case of survival of the fittest. Many Indian people at that time trapped away from their communities. They came back to their communities to buy groceries, to sell their furs and so forth. It would not be unusual to see a family return in the spring with two or three of their children missing, because at that time the Indian people had to depend either on the medicine man or on their knowledge of how to treat a child when it became sick. As nursing stations were built a job had to be performed by the department, and I must give credit to some of the first nurses to come into the northern part of Manitoba—I am sure the same is true in other provinces—because there was a mood of distrust with regard to the nurses. At that time there were many medicine men who would not accept the fact that there were some who were more powerful than they to treat the sick in various communities, but over a period of time the communities built up a trust for the government's ability to provide health care services.

In 1946 family allowances were introduced, and parents whose children were not attending school could not collect. This brought families closer together. It brought families in from outlying areas to communities in which they were not accustomed to living. They had been accustomed to roaming the land, living in winter camps, trapping, fishing, hunting, selling their furs and raising their families. When the family allowance was introduced, it was compulsory that children attend school. In order to collect family allowances, Indian families had to move into communities. They built log shacks. They began living, not always peacefully, with their next door neighbours and sending their children to school. This happened only 30 years ago, which is a very short time in any country's life.

Then came environmental problems within those communities. The people were not accustomed to living so closely together. There was more money, and as a result there was garbage to contend with. There was no garbage pick-up and no running water. No facilities whatsoever were provided. This is the treatment the Indian people received, and Indian people did not trust the medicine the white man brought in. They did not feel it would be effective in treating very sick people. Medicine men were used extensively just 30 years ago. When we talk about expending to do research on the health of Indian people, we are talking about something which started only 30 years ago. I am sure that some of the studies which began 30 years ago are still ongoing, but they will have to be discontinued because funds are going to be cut off.

In 1945 Indian health services were transferred from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Important here is the fact that only the administration of the diagnostic and treatment aspects of health services was transferred. Control of environmental health conditions remained under the authority of the Indian affairs department. This is when the Indian affairs department became responsible for the health environment of the Indian people and Indian health services came under another department. In that way the buck could be passed and people could say, "It is not our responsibility; it is up to the other department". I will get into that a little later because we do not have one department taking full responsibility for the health of Indian people in Canada.

In 1962 a further amalgamation took place as Indian health services merged with six other federal health programs to establish the medical services branch, as it is known today. The refinement of Indian health care services to a single branch within the government has done little to help status Indians on reserves. Symptoms are treated, but the causes are left to others.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is responsible for the over-all well-being of the Indian people of Canada. In a statement on January 24, 1979, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said that the basic causes of the poor health of Indian people are socioeconomic; for example, inadequate housing, water supply and sewage disposal, and unemployment. That is true, but only in part, because I can cite at least a dozen other examples from the reserves in my constituency.

Just recently I took a two-week extensive trip through the eastern part of my constituency. The Minister of National Health and Welfare visited there last summer. Her visits consisted of dropping into a community, going to the nursing station, having someone meet her to take her out fishing and for a short lunch, coming back, catching the aeroplane and flying on to another community. The minister could then stand up in the House and say that she had visited the communities and that there were no problems. I call it a 24-hour wonder when someone decides to investigate an Indian reserve and 24 hours later comes back with all the information she feels she should have and makes a glowing report. Some people wander in and 24 hours later wander out, and people up there wonder what they really came for.

The minister mentioned the socio-economic aspect. I went to seven reserves which comprise approximately 6,000 people in total. In other parts of the country we have seen school enrolments drop, but in my part of the country enrolment has increased at least threefold over the past seven years. There is not sufficient schoolroom space in many of those communities. Schools that are now only three years old are short of two classrooms. I do not know where the planners were in the various departments, but anyone who had taken the time to look at the statistics and the growth rate in the particular communities could have predicted that more schools would be required. Now, because of the government's restraint program, we see in many communities material which the department had shipped to the community for the purpose of building a school lying there in a heap and not being used because the Treasury Board has cut off further funds to build the additional facilities.

● (1640)

Housing is the number one priority in those communities. I am glad to see the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) is leaving the House.

Mr. Faulkner: Telephone.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): He just cannot face the music, that is all. In many of the communities there are four and five families living in one house. The Minister of National Health and Welfare points to the lack of housing. I am sure there are a dozen people on this side of the House representing Indian communities who could have told the minister that, and who in fact have been telling her that over the past four or five years.

The trouble is that people in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have a phobia regarding the only type of housing which they consider is required in northern Manitoba and in isolated areas, namely, a frame house. Some designer has designed a frame house which he considers to be adequate for the Indian people. I could take you, Mr. Speaker, into the homes that I have visited myself personally in Oxford House, Wasagamac, St. Theresa, Garden Hill and Red Sucker Lake. When these houses were built, they were probably built to the standards prescribed by the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development or some of his officials. These houses are not equipped with running water or with other modern facilities such as a hot water tank. In the winter time, when three or four families live in one house, there are at least two or three tubs of water sitting on the stove in order to heat water for the occupants. This generates massive amounts of condensation which in turn frosts up the windows and the doors, to the extent that neither can be opened. The neighbour, if he can get out of his own house, has to come in and open the door in the morning. There are no doorknobs left in most of those homes. There is a piece of rope attached through a hole in the door, and you have to haul on that to open the door. Until such time as these homes in the north are equipped to provide running water, the people there may as well go back to the conventional log home.

In many of the communities I visited people are saying they will rebel and ask the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to put a log housing program back into operation. They claim that their children were far healthier when they lived in log homes than they are in the sweat boxes in which they have to live today. All you have to do is to talk to the nurses at the various nursing stations. They do a wonderful job but they will tell you how frustrating it is for them at times when they see the idiotic approach taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare cutting back on certain facilities and services in those communities. Those nurses are working their hearts out, not on preventive care but on emergency types of operations. What we need is preventive research in these communities to improve the health of the people.

The reason I am singling out the Indian communities is that I feel they are the ones at this time who are suffering the most. We are removed from it all, living here in the city. If someone here breaks his little toe, an ambulance with a siren comes screaming down and takes him to hospital. In the area to which I am referring, there are no roads or access leading in or out. The only way to get in there is by aircraft, and it is a 350 or 400-mile trip to Winnipeg. Many times the radio facilities are not working. Thank goodness we now have telephones in most of those communities, thanks to the Sterling Lyon Manitoba government. People in the remote areas do not know to whom to turn. At the many meetings that were held in the two weeks which I spent in seven communities, people were pleading with me to do something about the decisions that have been taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, because they could see that the first nursing stations built 30 years ago and the new nursing stations that have been built to replace the ones of 30 years ago will deteriorate and that a slow erosion of the services provided to that community will take place.

The decision of the minister was contained in the first guidelines which were put out. I am sure she flew this flag not expecting anyone to say too much about it, but thank goodness the Indian people spoke up, as did many members of parliament on this side, about the guidelines that came out. Can you imagine a person living on welfare, by no choice of his own, going down with a prescription from a doctor and only being able to have the price of one of the three prescriptions listed covered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Department of National Health and Welfare while the other two would have to be covered by him if he wanted to take the medication? Many people in that situation would not have sufficient money in their pockets to buy the other two items.

The minister spoke about abuses. I can talk about many abuses in this government. Just a few days ago we heard the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) say she would make $18 million available to any city in Canada which would come up with a National Hockey League franchise, while at the same time the Minister of National Health and Welfare was saying she will cut down the medical services to the Indian people.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I cannot understand them. They talk about waste and abuse, but all they are doing is playing politics on the backs of the people of this country, especially the Indian people.

To say that the cause is socioeconomic does not relieve the minister of the responsibility for correcting what I call a festering sore. Rather than side-stepping those serious problems, the minister should be tackling them with all her resources and making additional funds available for research so that we can get on with preventive care, not just emergency care. For this reason funds should be made available for continuing medical research. Only 30 years ago the first nursing station was built in Manitoba. Today the government are taking $84 million out of circulation to build a hockey arena in some city that is going to sponsor a National Hockey League franchise. That is ridiculous! To go beyond the mere symptoms and treat the original cause is what the minister has to do. That is her responsibility. The minister's recent directive requiring treaty Indians to pay for eye glasses, drugs, dental care and transportation for medical purposes is a further retrogressive step affecting those who need help most. When will the minister leave the track rutted by her predecessor and shoulder her responsibilities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1650)

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, particularly relating to measures dealing with health, the government of the day may become known as the halfway house government, because historically it has undertaken programs which seem to reflect the philosophy of the Liberal party, and at a time such as this it has decided to withdraw. It has withdrawn at a time when the objectives of the policies have not been achieved in full. This is a very retrograde step to take. The government made commitments through the Department of National Health and Welfare respecting the improvement of teaching and treatment facilities, but it has withdrawn before they were completed. Perhaps this is as critical a point in the program covered by the act as any and the step taken by the government is one which is inexcusable and unforgiveable.

Every now and then in the life of a politician there comes a point when one finds himself or herself to be a pawn of the circumstances of the day. Certainly the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) finds herself in the unenviable position of being a pawn of the government which cuts back on its promises to Canadians, particularly as they relate to health.

This proposed cutback will build in regional disparities by withdrawing from or reducing programs which were intended to arrest the difficulties in the less fortunate areas of Canada. In particular, the proposal will extend the disparities the government has professed it will cure. It is rather peculiar to watch the expenditures of government as it looks at what is political and how to gain votes. As mentioned by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), the government will build arenas but cuts back on health. It is hard to follow the logic of that type of political philosophy. While the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) may be sitting on the pedestal at this moment in time, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is subject to criticisms of the severest kind which can be levelled at a politician.

I regret very much the transfer of moneys from one field to another, particularly when the job is not complete as the moneys are transferred. There is no indication the government is prepared to honour the projects presently under way by extending federal aid to the provinces. For instance, a project in the city of Saint John was to be financed partly by the federal government. Yet there has been no assurance in writing to the minister of health of New Brunswick as of noon today that the federal government in fact will honour its commitment to this ongoing project. I suppose we will see government members from New Brunswick rise in support of the bill, in spite of the fact that there is no assurance that present commitments will be honoured and that moneys in fact will be advanced.

There were two further projects in the province of New Brunswick which anticipated assistance through the government's program in order to provide better teaching and more intensive care facilities in areas where they do not exist. At the present time the people in those areas are doing the best they can with the available facilities. In the cities of Edmundston and Campbellton two projects were on the drawing board which were to be built with the aid of the program during its term. These projects would have provided better health care within two federal Liberal constituencies in the province of New Brunswick, but federal government assistance has been withdrawn.

There is very little excuse for extending the disparities which exist in health care in the less favoured provinces, as this proposal will do. This is but one example of the inequities which exist in the less favoured areas of Canada. Extended health care is assisted by the federal government on the basis of $20 per capita. Perhaps that does not mean much to Alberta and British Columbia, and perhaps it is not necessary in either case; but $20 per capita in the less favoured provinces is not enough to help them extend their levels of care to those of the more favoured provinces.

I do not wish to carry this to the ridiculous, but it goes without saying that the larger centres always will have the best care of any centres in Canada. That is by virtue of the opportunities for health officials, doctors and nurses to practise in specialty fields, which opportunities cannot be provided in smaller communities. Perhaps there will be only half a dozen major centres in Canada where maximum care can be extended in health; but there are hundreds of communities which need to come a little closer to the level of the greater centres. There was a step which aided them in doing so, but now it is to be withdrawn. At least two projects in New Brunswick will not be favoured with the assistance offered by the program.

The government's proposal contradicts totally the concept of long-term planning for health care. As I am not a medical doctor, I will not try to infringe upon the medical field by suggesting specific methods of extending health care, but as a member of the House I am interested in equality of care. This present step by the govenment will constrict the opportunity for equality in the less favoured areas of Canada, as will practically all programs which presently are being cut back. These will be known as the "Bégin years" in health, when the Government of Canada practised austerity by withdrawing some of its support from medical, hospital care, extended care services and educational facilities. While we have no political common ground, I sympathize with the reflection which people will have upon the term of office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Certainly the minister has become the pawn of the government because of its withdrawal from responsibility in providing health care in the country.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray)—Foreign Investment Review Act—Inquiry as to compliance with principles of international business conduct; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Industry—Takeover of Canadian businesses.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is motion No. 7 standing in the name of the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) stood by unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) stood by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

ADVISABILITY OF IMPROVING VIABILITY OF INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking the appropriate steps to make agriculture a more viable industry in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of discussing in this House a problem which is near and dear to the hearts of the many of us who sit here as representatives of rural ridings. We know that in spite of the great admiration the current federal agriculture minister has for himself and for his abilities, which he has expressed on many occasions in this House, agriculture in this country is indeed having great difficulty. As a result farmers are moving off the land in ever-increasing numbers.

To illustrate the problem briefly, it seems to boil down to one of constantly falling income and constantly increasing costs. The problem can be well illustrated in terms of income. The average farm in this country, particularly in the west, involves a total capital investment in the area of $173,000, including land, machinery, equipment and all those things required to conduct a farming operation. If one were to take that $173,000 in cash and invest it in a savings account, or perhaps in bonds, one could reasonably expect to gain a return of at least 10 per cent. This would mean an expected income from this size of deposit of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $17,300. The fact is that the net income from a farm with a capital outlay of this size is nowhere near the income that could be derived from an investment of that money directly in a savings account of a long-term nature. As a matter of fact, my calculations indicate that the average farm I have described would produce a net income of somewhere between $13,000 and $14,000.

We have a situation in which a man engaged in agriculture in this country not only does not get paid for his work, but he loses money on his investment since he could do better in terms of return by simply taking the money out of farming and putting it into a savings account of some sort.

The result of this situation has been a mass exodus of people in rural areas from farms into the cities, with a subtantial rural depopulation and the destruction of many small towns which dry up when these people move away. Indeed, this has resulted in the destruction of a lifestyle which many Canadians have enjoyed in the past.

The situation has reached the point where virtually no one is entering agriculture, particularly young farmers, because prospects for a reasonable income are poor. If a young man does decide to farm, the capital required is so great that he must borrow a huge amount of money, and he finds it virtually impossible to meet the cost of servicing that sort of loan. As a result, most of these young people must spend nearly half their time, usually in the winter months, working elsewhere at some other type of employment simply to keep the farm running. It seems to me there is something wrong with a system under which that can happen. It is not right that a young farmer who undertakes an operation with an investment of $173,000 must get a job in the oil fields or somewhere else simply in order to stay in the business of farming.

When we examine that situation we see there is something terribly wrong with the policies this government has been following. In my view there are two main things that should be considered and studied if some kind of corrective action is to take place. Steps must be taken to increase gross income to the farmer. On the other side of the coin, something needs to be done to reduce the cost of operation: that is, the cost of machinery, fuel, repair parts, farm labour and so on.

Let me come to the key question posed by this motion. Given the facts I have already laid out, is agriculture really a viable industry? We know that world consumption of food and feed grains has continued to grow on the average 5 per cent per year. If we compound this rate we will see that in 15 years consumption will double. When we look at growth in production in this country we will see that it will not nearly keep up with this expected increase in demand.

The Canadian cattle industry lost more than $400 million in the last four years, and much of this loss can be reflected in the decrease in producer equity of some 18 per cent. In other words, because the beef industry was in such dire straits in terms of low prices, 18 per cent of herds have been sold off, resulting in a shortage even greater than we anticipated. If these herds are to be rebuilt it is essential that producers have confidence not only that the market recovery which is now being enjoyed to some extent remains permanent, but also that the government will not act to frustrate that recovery.

All Canadian producers will remember the action of the Canadian government in 1976 when huge quantities of offshore beef came into our market and seriously depressed Canadian cattle prices. This created major problems in respect of our relations with our neighbours, and certainly major problems for the beef industry.

I recall very clearly the minister standing in this House at the time complaining that there was overproduction, that we had a huge surplus of beef, and asking farmers to cut production as that was the only way to improve prices. What he neglected to say at that time was that the huge surplus we supposedly has was largely the result of huge imports from offshore sources. If we examine the figures in respect to our own production very carefully, even during those years when we had this supposed surplus we will see that our production was not sufficient during any of those years to meet Canada's own demand.

The other question I want to touch upon is what can be done to resolve the situation. After all, the motion does say that the government must take steps to make agriculture more viable, so clearly it is necessary to make some recommendations as to how this can be done.

To begin with, some changes in the tax system are required to make it more equitable. Trade and economic policies must be adjusted so that Canadian agriculture is capable of competing efficiently in both world and domestic markets in respect of the commodities we produce. Government policies must be aimed at maximizing our competitive position and extending our markets, rather than what seems to have become the general trend of this government, simply to be satisfied with bringing forward government support and supply management programs.

In looking at the situation in the long term, it seems to me that support subsidies and supply management are at best short-term solutions and that the long-term solutions must rest on improving efficiency, expanding the market and stabilizing prices through these expanded and reasonable markets.

There have been problems with regard to offshore trade policies. I have already mentioned that too much beef has been brought in, the result of which has caused the artificial depression of our own prices. We on this side of the House have suggested, to avoid this difficulty in the future, that a long-term beef import policy be instituted to protect the producers from artificial world surplus and competition from other products.

There have been problems with regard to grain and they are partially due to the fact that the international grain arrangement has expired. We are carrying on negotiations, but at the moment grains are at the mercy of market forces and as a result prices are not what they could be. There should be greater effort on the part of this government to reinstate the international grain arrangement that would guarantee the maintenance of a reasonable floor for prices of exported grains.

The biggest problem which needs to be studied very carefully and corrected, and regarding which the government has shown great neglect, is transportation. We must take steps to ensure the adequacy of grain transportation and handling, that the cost of transporting grain remains at a reasonable level, and that the structure of the handling industry itself adjusts to function with greatest efficiency.

There has been a suggestion on the part of the government that the Crowsnest pass rates may be changed. If one looks at the history of this government, one becomes very frightened that these changes which they are talking about will only further depress farm income. We want to make sure that if the Crowsnest pass rates are changed, such changes will reflect compensation to the railways for their work and that these compensatory costs will not be borne by the producers but by the government from its general revenue.

Another problem in the area of grain handling is strikes. There have been occasions over the past decade and perhaps even longer when ships from other countries have come to our ports to be loaded, but because of strikes and poor transportation policies they have waited for days and days, incurring demurrage charges of approximately $5,000 per day per ship. All these costs are pawned off on the producer of grain.

The result of this inefficient grain handling system has been that Canada's share of world markets for wheat has dropped from 24 per cent to 14 per cent, while the United States, with its more efficient handling system and vigorous marketing efforts, has increased its share from 38 per cent to 41 per cent. Clearly, this is an area of great importance to Canada, and we all look to this government to take some action to ensure that labour disputes in the grain handling industry be settled in a reasonable way.

My party has suggested that it is time we re-examine the old strike weapon, particularly in areas of essential services, which includes railway transportation and grain handling, and that it be replaced by a body that we have named the public interest disputes commission. The powers of that body would be either to settle a dispute or, at least, to facilitate negotiations toward an agreeable settlement. In either case, something is required beyond what we are currently experiencing that would have the effect of smoothing out the business of grain handling and delivery.

There are other members who have indicated a desire to speak on this very important issue, and since we have only an hour for private members' business I would like to conclude by saying that agriculture is a large business which requires the concentrated efforts of governments at all levels and the concentrated attention of all the institutions involved in transport, production, marketing and distribution of agricultural products. Concentrated attention is required toward keeping our producers in business and maintaining a high quality of product to feed the people of this country.

As I mentioned earlier, we have an aging population in the rural areas and fewer people are going into farming. The danger in the long term is that there will be fewer and fewer producers and, therefore, we will not be able to produce enough to feed our people, making us more and more dependent on imports for our food supply. Given the volatile situations which arise in the world from time to time, it seems to me that a government that has a policy of becoming more and more dependent on other countries for our food supply is not looking after the best interests of this country.

We have two choices, and they are these. Either this government takes action to ensure that we continue to do what Canada does best—to grow food in such a way that those involved in the industry will be adequately compensated for their labours—or, if it fails to do that, the only possible alternative which will assure Canada of a long-term food supply is to replace this lazy government. I suggest that the latter is the only solution to this problem from a long-term point of view.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this very important motion before us. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has called on the government to make agriculture more viable through its policies. My main concern is that unless there are radical changes in the government's agricultural policy, our country will not be by the year 2000 self-sufficient in producing our own needs. That statement was made recently by the Science Council of Canada and is rather shocking in view of the fact that food and agriculture represent $30 billion to this country each year.

Agriculture is our most important industry and a very important part of this country. We must put more stress and emphasis on the food and agriculture system. If we continue as we are now, the day will come when this country will be a net importer of food. Even more shocking is the fact that if we take away the grains and oil seeds which are produced in such great abundance in western Canada, we are already a net importer of food. For example if we eliminate grains and oil seeds from last year's agricultural income, we were a net importer of food into our country in the amount of $1.8 billion. This is a very shocking indictment of the government which sits across the way in terms of its lack of planning in the food and agriculture industry of our nation.

Let us now look at a few statistics which I think are absolutely startling. We are a large country with a relatively small population. If we had planned our food production well we should be producing enough food to feed not only ourselves but other people around the world.

Only 4 per cent of Canada's vast land area is arable land, Mr. Speaker. We have about 460 million acres which can be farmed of which around 104 million acres are under cultivation. This is where things get frightening. We find that through a lack of government policy a lot of that farm land is being paved. We are losing some 250 acres of prime agriculture land per day to factories, highways, housing developments. I understand that the Department of Fisheries and the Environment has federal land use policy under consideration, and I hope this is true. During the past year we have asked the minister many questions about a federal land use program that, with the provinces, would reserve food land for the production of food and that would encourage industrial development on land that cannot produce food. We understand that a policy directive to that effect is being produced. I hope it is a tough policy that will make sure we preserve food land for the production of food.

One of the tragedies of this country is that cities such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver are located on the best agricultural land. Once land is paved over it cannot be reclaimed. Once there is a housing development, an expressway, a city park or anything on it, the land cannot be reclaimed. I do not think that makes any sense whatsoever. There are many places in Canada where factories and developments could be placed—sites not far from Montreal or Toronto on land that is not fit for farming. If it were used for this purpose, then the food land could be reserved for the production of food.

The only government to do anything important in this area is the government of British Columbia under the former premier, Mr. Barrett. It introduced a bill four or five years ago that reserved food land for the production of food. A similar approach is being considered in Quebec. I think the federal government should act in this area because there is a lot of land controlled by the federal government that could be rezoned. Cost-sharing plans could be introduced to entice provinces to put away food land for the production of food. These things should be done if we are to have a more viable agriculture industry.

We know that when urban population doubles the amount of arable land is reduced by one third. Today we are importing foods that we should not be importing. I am not talking of growing cucumbers in snowbanks, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) once spoke about; I am talking about self-sufficiency in such basic things as beef. We produce only about 94 per cent of the beef we consume, and there really is no reason why we could not produce it all.

There are many other products in which we are not self-sufficient, such as broilers. About a year ago the Agricultural Research Institute of Canada said that because of the tremendous importation of chickens the gross economic loss to Canada in 1977 was over $100 million. Mr. Speaker, that means jobs on the farm, in the handling and processing of eggs and food in general. Money could be saved or generated if this commodity was produced in our own country. There would be a positive effect on the balance of trade and on the Canadian dollar. These are reasons why we must strive toward greater food self-sufficiency.

I should like to suggest that we should use a lot of our waste heat and energy to heat huge greenhouses that would produce a lot more fruit and vegetables. So much of what we consume comes from the United States and elsewhere when it should really be produced in Canada.

In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we do not begin preserving farm land for the production of food, if we do not plan the agricultural sector better, if we do not start encouraging farmers to produce food at a stable price then even if we include grain and oil seeds this country will not be self-sufficient by the year 2000, as the Science Council of Canada has said.

My second concern is that the farmer is receiving less and less of the food dollar. About 25 years ago the farmer received around 60 per cent of the food dollar, but today he receives slightly under 40 per cent. More and more of the food dollar is going to the large wholesalers, retailers and processors—to the middlemen who process, manufacture, package and transport the food. This is a matter which should be of great concern not only to farmers but also to consumers, especially when you look at the rapidly escalating price of food—19½ per cent in 1978. The middle man receives the greatest share of that increase.

Questions were asked in the House today about the escalating price of beef. All of us know that the farmer deserves a greater return for his cattle. For three or four years cattle prices have been poor. When the price of beef went up on Friday by 18 per cent at the stockyards, it was predicted that by today or tomorrow supermarket prices would increase by 10 per cent and shortly by another 8 per cent. I question why this should happen so quickly when they are using old inventory beef from their lockers. The farmers and the consumers are concerned about such things as the power of the middleman, in this case the supermarkets and packing plants, to manipulate prices.

Recently when CSIP issued a report showing that profits in the food and beverage industry had gone up by 63 per cent in the last year, consumers were, of course, scandalized. I think farmers and consumers have found a common villain—the middleman who all too often is taking too large a share of the food dollar. This is an area the government should be looking into.

My third and final concern is transportation. I see the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in the House making notes. I hope he will rise to utter a few graceful words on this subject.

The transportation system in this country is a national joke, as is borne out in statistics issued recently by the Canadian Wheat Board. These show that because of a lack of boxcars and because of deficiencies in the railway system in this country, we have lost sales amounting to $230 million. There is no excuse for this, Mr. Speaker. There is no reason why we cannot have a proper rail system, a good delivery system and enough boxcars to transport the grain to market.

We speak of national unity, of a new constitution and priorities for the country. I see transportation as a key to uniting the nation so that all parts of the country have equal access to trade and equal opportunities for development. It often makes westerners angry when they consider the discrepancy in freight rates in the country. Cattle can be shipped from Saskatchewan to Toronto on a pound per pound basis cheaper than the processed meat can be shipped. When that is done, the jobs and the money for the processing and slaughtering of the cattle are in Toronto and other parts of southern Ontario. It should be done closer to the source of the product, in this case western Canada. It is because of things like this that Canadians feel alienated and cynical, not just toward the federal government, but to our whole system today. This may not seem important to some people, but it is very important to the beef producer.

● (1730)

The national unity debate is an opportunity to make agriculture more viable and to make our transportation system more equitable for all Canadians.

These are a few of the concerns I have as a westerner in terms of making agriculture more viable and ensuring that we are self-sufficient in food. We will not be if we do not change some of the government policies.

The government must be a lot tougher on the middle man who is ripping off both the consumer and the producer, taking a greater and greater share of the food dollar. As I said about an hour ago in the House, he is radically changing the whole food system in terms of our safety. It is terrifying.

Finally, transportation must be a tool for national development and national unity. It must work on behalf of everyone so that what the farmer produces is processed, developed, packaged and so on as close as possible to the source. In the case of beef, this should be in western Canada. In the case of dairy farming, it should be in places like Quebec and eastern Ontario. The same should apply to fruits and vegetables. These are matters to which we must address ourselves if we are to make agriculture more viable.

Another item for the future is escalating energy costs which are radically changing farming in this country. These might reverse the move from larger and larger more capital and energy-intensive farms to the smaller, more efficient and, in my opinion, more desirable farms. We must look at the cost of energy. It was brought to my attention last week by the Agriculture Institute of Canada that there is not a single person in the Department of Agriculture who co-ordinates energy policy or energy research as it pertains to agriculture. That is one problem the government should correct. It may save this country millions of dollars in the years ahead.

A lot of experiments are being conducted with regard to alternatives on the farm, energy, using some of the waste heat, recycling by-products, the whole question of biomass and so on. More research has to be done and the government should look into this.

If the farmer could be guaranteed a basic standard of living or income, he would produce the food. It is very frustrating to the farmer not to know what his income will be in the months ahead. When he begins to raise a calf in the spring, he does not know what it will sell for in the fall. The same is true of hogs and other commodities. It depends on the world climate, international markets, the stock exchange and so on. That is what dictates the price for his animal.

I maintain that if we make it a national priority to guarantee the price of commodities to the farmer within certain realistic variations, the farmer would produce food. The consumer at the other end of the food chain would pay a consistent price for the product in the supermarket. One need only compare two commodities, beef and eggs.

This government has done a very good job in terms of guaranteeing a constant supply of eggs through the National Egg Marketing Board. The producer is guaranteed a constant price. On the other side, the consumer pays a stable price for eggs, a price no higher and usually lower than that in the United states.

When it comes to beef, it is the exact opposite. The producer never knows what he is going to get for his livestock. There are tremendous fluctuations in the price the producer receives and what the consumer pays. This is bad for both sides.

A few years ago there was an over-supply of cattle. The price went away down. That is the law of supply and demand. Part of the problem was that the government opened up the borders and allowed beef to come in from the United States, New Zealand and Argentina. The farmers did what they had to do. They sold their herds. They got rid of their cows and did not save their calves. What is happening now is a logical extension of that. There is now a shortage of beef in this country. The price is going up. I maintain that is because there is no planning in that industry as in other food industries, such as eggs.

It is necessary to increase our imports. Prices will go up even more. Most economists say we can expect higher beef prices for the next three or four years. Beef is not like poultry or even like hogs. You cannot get into and out of the cycle quickly. It takes a long time to build up a herd. Most cows have one calf a year.

The situation is not like that with chickens. The chicken in the supermarket freezer is probably only 60 or 70 days old. That is how quickly you can produce a chicken. If there is a shortage of chickens, you merely turn on the tap and in a matter of a few months you have remedied the problem. It is possible to regulate the supply. However, this cannot be done quickly with cattle. That is why we need more planning in that sector for both the farmer and the consumer.

I commend the hon. member for Athabasca for introducing this motion and giving us an opportunity to talk about the reasons why agriculture must be more viable. In the final analysis, it is the backbone of this country from coast to coast.

● (1740)

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am always very happy to participate in the debate on topics concerning agriculture, and particularly today when, first of all, the hon.

member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) put the problem very positively and constructively; I want to congratulate him personally for that. I should also like to tell him that we on this side share his concerns; if unanimity can be achieved we may even be able to give our Canadian agricultural producers the income they need and are entitled to.

As for the viability of agriculture, Mr. Speaker, we can and must speak of it. That is why I congratulate the hon. member for having brought up the matter today; we are that much more concerned about the producer's income that at this time we have reason to express certain doubts about the conditions under which our producers operate; unfortunately, to speak of the viability of agriculture is too often to speak of the industry and forget the producer.

Firstly and importantly, the motion gives us an opportunity to make this House aware of the need to look at the farmer's real income instead of referring to figures and statistics that, because of increases, are very seldom relevant at the individual producer's level.

Second, the motion also provides us with an opportunity to refer both to the need for and dangers of marketing boards in the face of current difficulties. Third, the motion gives an opportunity to deal with the problems faced by young farmers, and this is of tremendous significance because our young farmers are now incapable of meeting today's challenge without support from the government and various farming organizations.

Fourth, this motion could also give us an opportunity to refer to a commitment, not only from this House in a non-partisan effort, but also from our partners at the farming industry level as a whole, because in agriculture perhaps more than in any other industry it is extremely important that everyone understand and assume his responsibilities when the time comes, so that we may collectively support our Canadian farming industry.

In the course of my remarks I will come back a number of times to the dairy policy, because I for one am somewhat disappointed that the dairy producer, usually small and old, apparently is a victim we are unable to protect within the prevailing system. It therefore seems important on the occasion of a motion on farming viability that we be able to address the dilemma we are now placed in by a mechanism that certainly is inadequate to ensure justice to all producers. The motion gives us an opportunity to recall and expose that situation once more, because small dairy producers in particular are victimized.

Mr. Speaker, I mean tampering with the quotas of some producers at the expense of other producers. We know that in 1976 unfair cuts resulted from this, but what becomes even more unfair is that this situation is perpetuated with the complicity of that system.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to denounce something else, the fact that in some cases the regulations of some marketing boards are not adequate to protect individual producers efficiently. For instance, if you refer to our dairy policy, the family farm is too often threatened. Older producers are too often the victims of injustice and forced to give up when they worked most of their lives on the farm. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we know that those injustices are part of the system and that, unfortunately, the conflict of interest at the level of some officials and some producers themselves prevents anyone from attempting to correct the situation.

We asked many for the publication of milk quotas. Of course, as you know, it was always rejected. There is probably some valid reasons for this but some of them are still unknown and I hope that some day they will be given to us. I for one would be tempted to launch an inquiry on the distribution and administration of some dairy marketing boards and I hope that if those charges can be made it will give us an opportunity to throw light on this issue and to put an end to this injustice towards small and older producers that we must witness without being able to do anything.

Mr. Speaker, let me come back to the question of farming income. I do not think that in 1979 farm producers have a fair income. We should revise the system in recognizing, as a first priority, not the concerns of the industry but the producers' income. In fact, we are over-specializing agriculture at the expense of the small and the older producer. I do not think we have the right to do that because until the last few years Canadian agriculture has been based on our farmers who, through the force of circumstances, were small and who, quite naturally, have aged, but who are still entitled to keep on working in that sector of activity if they so wish.

Agriculture is no longer a business best left to experts and economists, a thing that is managed in backroom talks. It is first and foremost the farmer's business and he must be understood and compensated fairly with an adequate and even interesting income. As far as marketing boards are concerned, I think that we and the majority of hon. members must acknowledge that they have a raison d'être, that they are valuable instruments which we should endeavour to improve. But they should serve the consumer and the producer as well.

But it is time that their applicability to the various agricultural productions be recognized because I do not think that we should stabilize some sectors, which would become privileged agricultural sectors, while producers in other sectors must fight desperately to find a place in our economic system. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe we should set up marketing boards as quickly as possible for all types of productions, which will actually serve the interests of producers.

However, Mr. Speaker, the government must always bear in mind its responsibilities towards these boards. I would like, at this point, to examine our responsibilities regarding the Canadian dairy policy. We are fully aware of the conflicts of interest and the bickering going on over the instruments of our dairy policy, however, the government has unfortunately delegated its responsibilities to certains bodies and by doing so has become powerless in the face of certain cases of injustice.

Third, viability is synonymous with continuity. Personally, that was my first objective when I started out in politics, to ensure continuity and a harmonious resurgence in agriculture with our young people who are capable, who can become competent and who have enough courage to hang on and bring agriculture in the modern era. Naturally I had to set this concern aside temporarily because we had to concentrate, and I think that it is still the case today, on establishing marketing boards and solving all the internal workings problem so that the boards could be operative and efficient. Modern agriculture is a business with modern rules which does not tolerate trial and error. It will never again be what it was, and that is an important thing to understand in order to respond appropriately. It must be allowed to become what it should be.

Fourth, we must recall what our responsibilities are and remember that as partners in the Canadian agricultural industry we have a role to play and that role must be played at the right time and in the right place. Thus each one of us has, in his own field, to review his own responsibilities, and each one of the partners must become more knowledgeable, more competent and no less responsible. Because the success of a farm business depends on the capacity of the partners to work together in the sense of farm economy and of the farmers' income, and at the same time to satisfy the consumers.

That is the new challenge of the day and of the near and more or less distant future.

A perfect illustration of the dilemma that I have put, as regards the income of marketing corporations and the responsibilites shared by the partners in the industry, is the national dairy policy, as we all know. And the last annual meeting of the dairy farmers of Canada showed us that on the whole the Canadian industry is doing well. But on the farms, everyday we meet producers who would need higher quotas and who frequently, in the past and even now, are penalized for overproduction. During that period prices for quotas went higher and higher. Three years ago you could buy quotas for $1.37 a hundred weight. Today you have to pay $14, $16, $20, $22 a hundredweight. I for one am prepared to ask the government to take back those responsibilities because it is responsible for the well-being of producers and individuals.

As far as the national dairy policy is concerned, regulations should be the same for everybody and the protection should be effective for all, provided however the protection of small producers is ensured and guaranteed first. The question is: Who can and must protect small producers under the present Canadian dairy policy? Who has that responsibility? Who has the necessary capabilities? The answer is quite simple but at the producer's level, as among people generally speaking, they are not well informed. The solution, Mr. Speaker, lies in marketing boards or federations of producers. However, in Quebec only the Agricultural Producers' Union could require the federations of whole milk or industrial milk to do so as they are always facing conflicts of interest.

For its part, the federal government cannot do anything because it transferred that power and responsibility, I should say, to provincial agencies at their request. Certainly the Agricultural Producers' Union can do what it wants but for my part, I cannot let small producers disappear without trying to do everything I can or to ask the producers' union to agree to do so, something which I think is advisable for the APU and for producers, or ask the federal government to take upon itself to do so when it has abolished the supply management committee and to take control again probably by subsidy quotas.

So it is important to know who is in control and who is responsible for problems and for solutions and to know if we can hope to settle those problems. Time has come now for someone to say that recreation is over and to take the necessary measures. If it is impossible to do so willingly, that must be done forcibly, that is the government should intervene but only as a last resort. In other words, they should not try to do anything if issues are not definitely settled.

As a member who sees what happens in the milk sector, I want people to understand in what kind of situation any hon. member is placed. First it must be said that the administration and the distribution of quotas is the sole responsibility of the federations at the present time. It is a fact which should be recognized. The only responsibility of the federal government or of the Canadian Dairy Commission or of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is to define Canadian needs and tailor production to demand. As a matter of fact, it is up to the producers, or their representatives, or the supply management committee, or their own federation of whole or industrial milk, or by extension to the Agricultural Producers' Union to distribute the quotas among the farmers.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House might give some consideration to a brief extension of this debate. There are at least four hon. members who would like to speak for five minutes or so each, just to round the debate out. I would appreciate the consent of hon. members opposite and of hon. members to my left for a brief extension, on the understanding that there will be no vote. That is over with now, but I would like other hon. members to have a chance to say a few words.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) for introducing this motion and giving us an opportunity to talk about agriculture as a whole. Of course, this debate is very important, and we also have something to say in the area of agriculture but because of the time of the House, we cannot accept to extend the debate because we already gave our point of view through the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the move to withdraw from participation in a program recognized as needed by both the federal and provincial jurisdictions reminds one of the land registration and identification program which was undertaken jointly by the Government of Canada and the maritime provinces. That program was evaluated by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the various provincial governments of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. They studied how land registration problems could be solved, and a program was undertaken. It was agreed each province could afford only so much money on a per annum basis. It was agreed the federal government only wanted to expend a certain fixed amount of money on a per annum basis.

● (2010)

The program was set down for ten years. The expertise and administration structures were assembled. The co-operation between federal and provincial authorities was effected, and the program was under way in a very progressive fashion. It would have placed the maritime provinces in a land registration program which was second to none. As a matter of fact, in the early years of its planning it was examined by several foreign jurisdictions which were somewhat in a bind and needed a comparable or new program.

As was the case in many other financial situations which the government pushed itself into, it chose to withdraw, to limit the available funds, to constrict the program, and virtually to waste the initial years in which much value had been accumulated. If the program is to be completed, it will be completed by the provinces doing their work under a much retarded program during a period of time when the complete program was required.

In the field of health, again the federal government has failed to predict its capabilities. It has failed to estimate properly the amounts of money required for various programs, and to project them in budget fashion far enough ahead to obtain the correct expenditures in the correct years without a breach of promise. Like so many other things, this is breach of promise by a government which has put itself in its own bind.

One can recall the repeated speeches of all opposition parties in the House. They were critical of the government's failure to predict its requirements two years, three years, four years or five years ahead. The government would not put those requirements on the table. If it had put the requirements on the table five years ago and projected to this point in time, one would find that the provinces which share the cost would not be in the embarrassing positions in which they now find themselves. The provinces could have projected their requirements and spread the money out. It could have been done in a manner so that all provinces would have received the benefits of the programs under health and land registration services which are now being cut. This is another example of where the provinces are being used as the guinea pigs of politics by the government.

This afternoon we heard an answer in the House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in reply to a proper request pertaining to health. She indicated that we should speak to our provincial ministers of health, as if there was no responsibility of the Government of Canada in a cost-shared program. That is not the case, because the guidelines are laid down. If a province is not operating as the federal government wishes it to, then the federal government lowers the boom and withdraws money. But when a province wants out, then the Minister of National Health and Welfare says, "Speak to your provincial minister." It is an iniquitous transfer of political responsibility to others who have no control over the situation.

When the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) pulls the puckering string on the purse, the money no longer goes to the provinces, and the provinces must answer to the people. They are the ones who receive the direct blame. It does not make any difference whether it is Ontario or New Brunswick; it constricts provincial programs and planning. This is not in line with any program which is intended to create a unified Canada. It is a continuous confrontation with one provincial minister after another because of the retraction of a position which was in place. It is a reflection upon the absolute need for long-term planning and commitment which Canada can recognize as a promise to be fulfilled and not withdrawn.

If we were to look for promises which have been withdrawn, I suppose we would not have to go very far. We could go back to the Department of Transport release of last week. We would see that while money is being withdrawn from health programs, the government recognizes the political requirements of certain ports in the country and has promised Newfoundlanders a synchrolift in St. John's, for the second time. I wonder if they will get a synchrolift. It was promised in the past, and obviously it is an election promise at this time. It is a promise made by a government which already has broken two promises.

An hon. Member: We never did.

Mr. McCain: The government did. It broke the land registration promise, it broke the contract. It has broken the contract on these health plans which come under the act. Also the government has broken its promise of a synchrolift for Newfoundland. I imagine the announcements of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will be looked at with a very sharp magnifying glass to see if a cheque has been issued, if it is in hand, and if the synchrolift has been ordered. They will be looked at because Newfoundlanders will remember how the government cut back on health services.

There is a great deal to be accomplished in health. I cannot hope to compete with the medical group who have spoken on this matter, such as the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) and others. As a member from a small town, I understand the difficulties small communities have in obtaining doctors. At this point in time it is ill-advised for the government to withdraw anything from the health program because such action further discourages doctors to move into some of the smaller communities. It puts the facilities the program would have bought farther away from those small villages than they otherwise would have been.

The program was undertaken with the idea of first building the most important health centres in the provinces concerned. As soon as the major centres were served, then it was planned to look at the outlying ones. This was not because health care was any less important in more distant points. It was because it was imperative that the capability be in place, province by province, and extended as fast as possible to as many communities as possible. The maritime provinces are faced with an uncompleted program, one which must be completed in due time but at a slower rate than otherwise planned. Once again smaller communities around the country will find it more difficult as time goes on, because of the slowdown in the supply of services which they so badly require to look after their health needs.

Perhaps this is the price of federal mismanagement which is being paid by the communities and provinces of Canada. It was a poor estimate of the general cost of government down the line. It is another example of the government's effort at so-called austerity. It is coupled with the withdrawal of moneys from Indian health services and the proposal to reduce payments for hospitals and medicare. It is a high profile program of federal government expenditure. It is intended to illustrate to Canadians as a whole that they may not want federal government austerity. The emphasis placed by austerity on health research in general indicates that the government is looking for complaints from the public about austerity and trying to say, "There, I told you the people do not want austerity after all. They do not want it at all, they only think they want austerity." That is far from the truth.

We have a program which is being cancelled two years before its proper date, and it is being cancelled without prior consultation with the ministers of health in the provinces concerned. As I said earlier in my remarks, it has been cancelled without any assurance or firm commitment that the projects presently under way will in fact get the money which the provinces thought was committed because this little bird was cut off so close behind the ears even the payments which are committed are not assured to the ministers.

There is no question but that the provinces concerned will have to proceed with the programs which were intended; the buildings, the facilities, and care services, because the provinces in good faith have extended the assurance to these various communities that in year one, two, or three, the facilities they require will be built in co-operation with the federal government. These statements have been made by the provinces in Canada, but now the provinces will have to go back and say that because of the withdrawal of federal funds they will have to move these projects down to year one plus one, year two plus two, and year three plus three. They will apologize, but follow up by saying that this is not too far away. This is a transfer of political liability, political responsibility and political blame, not just to New Brunswick, but to every province in Canada that was trying to improve its extended care and educational facilities in the health field.

We have to look at this from a national point of view and on a national basis. I have tried to do that. I will admit that it is my resonsibility to represent New Brunswick, and I do that to the best of my ability, but not without having a conception in respect of the national impact of all these things.

What this means is that Campbellton will be a little later in getting the facilities which the province of New Brunswick had planned for that city; that Edmundston will be a little later than it had planned in receiving its facilities and services; and that the city of Saint John in the province of New Brunswick will not know whether the federal government's commitments will be kept for the construction of facilities and services already planned with moneys already committed by the provincial treasurer. In this case I happen to know whereof I speak, and I am sure that such a situation is not unique to one province in Canada as this applies on a national basis.

No one is any more anxious than I to see this government cut down on its expenditures, but what I want to see from this government is one single, really sincere effort to cut a low profile item rather than a high profile one, proving to this nation that austerity is its objective, rather than proving to Canada that austerity is unacceptable, which is its present objective. This is totally unacceptable as a program of government under any guise.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in the debate on Bill C-2. Even though it looks quite weak and simplistic, this bill holds some unpleasant surprises in the general area of public health care. Mr. Speaker, the health resources fund, which was created in 1966, will normally be of use to public health care for another two years. However, this government has gotten into the habit in a time of peace and abundance, or at least of so-called abundance, to hack away at expenditures. Unfortunately, it does not cut back on extravagant or useless expenditures, it prefers to cut back on useful and essential expenditures, especially as concerns health care for the Canadian population.

Health is a great gift, Mr. Speaker. It is the greatest of gifts for all mankind. We jealously protect the health of animals and ecological systems, but unfortunately, when it comes to the health of our fellow citizens, we have a tendency to put health aside to save money. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, this has become a real paranoia because certain programs which are well-designed and essential for our welfare will suffer.

The Minister believes that the health resources fund, which was created to provide assistance to the laboratories and the necessary facilities to train medical and health care personnel, must be abolished. In her wisdom, she has thought up this idea. Already, in the sixties, it had become necessary to improve all health services and their availability. Indeed, this has always been necessary. The government had taken the leadership in this field by establishing new health insurance and hospital insurance plans. But today, it no longer wants this leadership. It is unfortunate that it will finally be the provinces who will be the victims of these drastic measures.

Of course, I agree with the minister that the situation has considerably improved in the field of health care, especially as concerns medical personnel. We have today a satisfying number of physicians, a good number of new graduates, but a number of them must now expatriate south of the border. We also have a surplus of nursing workers, human resources are there and the health resources fund has helped in various ways to develop that qualified personnel. However, all is not completed in the health care area.

An area which has been much forgotten is the one related to hospital administrators who have become needed because of the nature and complexity of the problems in health institutions. We must therefore develop efficient administrators for the smooth running of hospitals and to reduce some of the wastes occurring there. The work climate in certain hospitals is unbelievable or unbearable, which lead to the downgrading of health care. There are conflicts between medical and administrative personnel, lack of planning and in certain instances lack of discipline.

All that to say that the training of administrative personnel was neglected relative to the training of medical and nursing personnel. The objectives of the health resources fund program must not be forgotten but redirected to meet new needs. At a time when the provinces must support an increase in part the whole financial burden of social and health services the federal government drops them without much consultation. I do not want to address those criticisms directly to the minister of course who, unfortunately, must abide by the decisions of cabinet on the spending cuts.

So there are areas for which we must do less and others for which we must do more. That is why I think those funds should not be cut but redirected to more urgent areas. One area I feel particularly strong about is that of preventive medicine, particularly in remote areas. Indeed, millions of dollars could be saved if we had personnel assigned to disease prevention. And how could one forget medical research.

In the very words of the minister in the debate last Thursday, over $100 million were assigned to research institutions through the health resources fund. Medical research is not only necessary but primordial in industrialized countries like ours. We know that federal contributions to research institutions have been cut somewhat for quite some time now. We even had examples of that in the area of fisheries and forestry.

Scientific research which requires considerable investments in technology and qualified personnel must nevertheless have all the necessary financial security so research projects will not be interrupted before they are completed. There can be no talk of restrictions when it comes to the health of people. No, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the most precious asset of a people, I do not think it should be a question of dollar signs. I am in favour of eliminating as much useless spending as possible but I will not be convinced that necessary programs should suffer unfairly from that epidemic of budget cuts. We must be careful. We might be criticized by future generations for having failed to make the necessary investments, to wit in essential areas such as those dealing with health care. We are gathered here to provide a better fate to all Canadians and we must not forget it. A well-known maxim says that health is priceless.

When I consider Bill C-2, it is not so much its contents which concern me but rather the fact that it is gathering weight and that we are told that other cuts will soon be made in the health area. Indeed it has already happened in the case of Indians. They did not appreciate the cuts suggested in their health scheme. They are therefore the most deprived in that connection. We only have to remember the mercury poisoning cases and still recently the high rate of tuberculosis cases which have been detected.

In conclusion Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I do not like cuts in the health field. I would rather have a more rational administration of health services so that each Canadian may be provided with every service available and enjoy his most precious asset, his health.

[English]

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, when this bill originally came up for debate, I had not intended to participate, but as the debate began to develop I began to feel that I wanted to participate briefly because I became concerned that it was a continuation of the line of debate put forward by the official opposition in which they try to be all things to all people. In the preceding months the opposition have been preaching restraint, but they have since concluded that that is wrong, and now they want a much larger program of deficit spending.

In this case, however, where the government, as a result of examining programs to determine if the money being spent is being spent wisely, has decided to discontinue a program, the opposition takes the opposite position, that it is creating undue hardship. Surely the hon. members for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) and York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) have come to appreciate over the last few days that it sometimes hurts being on both sides of the fence and hitting the fence posts.

Specifically, I wanted to rise tonight because I had the privilege of—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Referenda.

Mr. Milne: I see by tonight's press that the opposition is on both sides of that issue as well. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has said that they probably would not rule out a referendum if the case called for it. I think that the hon. member should read what his colleague has been saying before he makes comments like that.

With regard to the bill, I wanted to make a few comments because I once had the privilege of serving as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. There have been a number of remarks made inside and outside this House by members opposite to the effect that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and the Minister of Indian Affairs (Mr. Faulkner) were greatly cramping the health care extended to Indians. First of all, I thought it was unique that the opposition would debate this issue in association with this bill simply because this bill deals with the health resources fund, a program jointly shared by the federal government and the provinces in order to build health training facilities. It seems to be acceptable, however, in this debate to offer an opinion on almost any aspect of health care, no matter what it is, so I thought I would take this opportunity to respond to some of the comments which have been made about issues regarding native people.

If hon. members would review Hansard they would find questions and statements made to the Minister of National Health and Welfare which could give Canadians the idea that somehow the government was jeopardizing the lives of native people, that it was promoting suicide amongst them, and that it was causing undue hardship to them in terms of health care by depriving them of a basic service which all Canadians have a right to expect. I would like to clarify the record and indicate that the government, and I am sure this parliament as well, are not at all happy with the level of health among our native people and that we want it to be much better. This is certainly not the situation indicated by some of the members opposite.

In terms of infant mortality, in 1960 there were approximately 79 deaths per 1,000 live births. In 1976 the number decreased to 32.5 for native people. The comparative figures for the white population were 27 in 1960 and 14.3 in 1975 per 1,000. It is interesting to note that in the outlying and remote areas of Canada the rates are just about the same for both white people and native people. The death rate for Indians is almost the same, and their life expectancy is not much different. While there is room for improvement on these figures, I would like to indicate that the situation is certainly not as bad as members opposite have indicated.

I would like to comment on the guidelines the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced some time ago which have been the subject of questions and debate in the House and, indeed, were the prompting of a meeting between the minister, the National Indian Brotherhood and a number of Indian leaders. It was indicated by members opposite that somehow there had been a gearing down in health services offered to native people in Canada. That is not true. Surely members opposite know that primary health and hospital care are provided to the native people through the same medicare programs which are provided for non-native people across Canada.

In cases where there is hardship, as for example on reserves where there is no economic base, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, more specifically, the Department of National Health and Welfare, have spent a good of deal of money to increase their services and support to the program through hospitals, nursing stations, staffing of health care centres and through funds given directly to them.

• (2040)

The guidelines apply to the kinds of expenditures that are not covered, or what would be known as primary health care and hospital care situations, including eye glasses, dentures, prescription drugs and medical transportation services. I should like to put on the record the five things to which those guidelines referred: elective ground transportation by cars and taxis; elective dental care; supply of glasses, especially items such as special frames and tinting unless they were medically indicated; supply of non-prescription pharmaceuticals such as aspirins, tooth paste and hair shampoo. Individual Indians with incomes which are substantially greater than the provincial welfare limit are being asked to contribute to the cost of some of these items of health care as is the situation in the non-native community.

I think hon. members opposite should appreciate that it is incumbent upon the government to analyze these programs from time to time and, if there is waste, and if the administration is such that it is impossible to be sure the money is being well spent, then look at the guidelines. If the expenditure is not necessary, surely that indicates the money will be subtracted from the basic health care. I am sure my colleagues would join me in arguing that discretionary health care expenditure should be as low as possible so that more money is available for the core activities that the native people need, deserve, and should have available to them. I think the debate in the House has revealed there are many situations that really do not relate to the basic health care but which are causing some problems in the native communities.

I do not share all the views of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), but I think he had a valid point today when he referred to some of the problems in regard to native housing. He used the example of an extremely cold house with a high humidity level, and pointed out that if it was sealed and insulated heavily to conserve heat, that may not be the most healthy situation. I would suggest, however, that many of the native problems are related to water supply and sewage, but these are not the kinds of things covered in Bill C-2. Hon. members opposite must know, if they have read the bill, that those are not the things that are indicated.

This afternoon the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) made a good speech and pointed out the advantages of a good lifestyle and how it could help improve health and thus decrease the cost of hospitalization and medical care. His point was well taken.

When the hon. member for Churchill spoke, he was very critical of the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) for contributing to amateur sport. His argument was that the money should be going to health care. Surely if the minister's department is making contributions to a better lifestyle for a generation of Canadians, that will reduce their dependency on health care facilities. Is this not a better approach than funding programs that may or may not be essential for basic health care?

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare met with Indian leaders to discuss this subject, she told them that her department will be most willing to review any cases of individual hardship reported to it. I understand from her parliamentary secretary that to date no cases have been drawn to the department's attention.

The minister was careful to point out to the Indian community that an appeal procedure was contained in the guidelines which could be followed by anyone who felt they were unduly harsh. Also, in order to set aside any of the basic concerns in the native community, the minister agreed to delay implementation of the guidelines for a six-month period. This was conditional upon there being consultation at the band council level with local officials of her department and of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The discussion would then advance to the regional level and, as it matured to the national level the National Indian Brotherhood would be involved and, I suspect also, the cabinet committee. This consultative process should be productive in this case as well as on other issues affecting the native people, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The minister went further and agreed to fund the process. If any case of hardship is drawn to the attention of either department, hon. members opposite can be assured it will be dealt with. If the native people have genuine concerns, the consultative process has been established and is financed by the government.

Another point is the recognition that it is not either a treaty or aboriginal right to provide the kind of health care about which we have been talking. It is just the social policy of this government that has been supported by virtually every member of this and preceding parliaments that have wanted native people to have good health care and were prepared to make sure that the funding is available. In view of the debate that has taken place both inside and outside this House, Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment that this is not a new policy. It relates to the expenditure of money for ground transportation, cars, taxis, dental care that the individual likes to take on his own, the supply of glasses, tinted glasses, special frames, non-prescribed drugs, tooth paste, hair shampoo, aspirin, and also the requirement of asking individuals—be they native people—to pay if they can afford to, as is the case in the white communities.

I think both the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have done a commendable job of affording facilities to native people. Medical care and hospitalization are not affected, nor are essential or emergency services such as ambulance, air evacuation, supply of essential drugs or emergency dental care.

Not long ago I was in the far north, Mr. Speaker. The plane I was returning on was stopped and we were asked for eight volunteers to give up their seats so that a native person who had suffered a serious heart attack and another who required major surgery could be flown south to the best hospitals in Canada. It is a well established policy that natives in the outlying communities are flown to Yellowknife or Whitehorse, and if the medical attention and facilities there are not adequate they are then flown to Edmonton or Montreal, or wherever the facilities exist for them to have the same kind of medical attention that is available to any of us in this House.

● (2050)

The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) inferred that the budget has been drastically cut and therefore is extremely unfair to the natives. That statement ignores the fact that the budget has been increased in this area. The total Indian health activity cost for salary and operating has been increased 13 per cent from the year 1977-78 to 1978-79. I wish to put on record the actual numbers. In 1977-78 it was increased from $78,188,000 to $88,677,000, an increase of some 13 per cent.

In the non-insured services to all Indians, in 1974-75 the department spent approximately $17.5 million. That was increased in the year 1975-76 to $22¼ million, an increase of 27 per cent. In 1976-77 it was increased to $24½ million, a further 10 per cent increase. In the year 1977-78 it was increased to $27.4 million, a further 12 per cent. In the budget year 1978-79 the total is $30 million, a further 10 per cent increase.

In terms of the government's commitment to adequate funding for medical care and facilities for native people, there can be no question that even with the over-all government policy of restraint this budget item has been substantially increased in the last five budget years, ranging anywhere from 10 per cent to 27 per cent.

I wish to speak to the hon. member's last point in connection with the guidelines. He stated that individual Indians with incomes substantially greater than the provincial welfare limit would be asked to defray some of the costs themselves. That is a standard situation across Canada. People well know that those items not covered in a province under the basic health care plan must be paid for by the individual. If they are in a situation where they are elderly, have a very limited income or a disability and are unable to earn income, there are provincial programs that will assist them. In the case of native people, there are federal assistance programs. In those areas where there is no economic base for the native people to earn income, assistance is available.

There are a number of native people who have very substantial incomes. In terms of trying to maximize the health care provided with the $30 million that has been budgeted, it seems only right that those who have the ability could and should pay. Most of the money should go to assist those who genuinely need it.

In conclusion, I again say that I appreciate the opportunity to enter this debate. I wanted to clarify for those who have been alarmed that somehow the government is cutting back on health care services to Canada's native people that the opposite is the case. In spite of restraint this year, the budget has been increased by 10 per cent. The guidelines only address themselves to discretionary spending in the health care area, asking that that be looked at a second time and to verify or authorize before expenditures are made. They ask that native people who can afford those items be asked to pay for them. I would be very surprised if many Indian leaders argued with that point. In adjusting its social programs, the government is trying to direct more money to where the need is greatest and perhaps not as much to where the need is not so evident. With those remarks, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to participate.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal of debate on this bill which is very loosely related to the provisions of the bill itself. In fact we have heard from the government side a self-congratulating account of how it first came to invade the field of health care in the 1960s, forcing reluctant provinces into cost sharing programs on which it has since unilaterally welched. Speakers on the government side, of course, have taken the strange tack of praising themselves for the good work they did in setting up these health care programs, when in fact the whole substance of this bill has to do with knocking down the health resources program. Members on the government side might benefit from reading the bill again. It is only one paragraph long in its essential part. All it says is that the government is backing out of its commitment to the provinces two years early.

Three years ago I had occasion to join in debate on another bill in which the government was backing out of another aspect of its commitment to the provinces. In the mid-1960s the government held out a financial carrot to the provinces to force them into cost-sharing medicare programs. Provincial health ministers could see then that the carrot was rotten, but since the federal government had drawn to itself so much control over government spending and over programs that belong in provincial jurisdiction, the only alternative was to accept this rotten carrot or to be denied funds that were being offered to other provinces.

The result of joining these cost sharing programs was that the provinces became involved in increasingly costly programs whose costs have been escalating through the 1970s to dizzying heights. Ontario had already embarked upon a health care program that suited its own needs as a province. The Liberal government in Ottawa put it in a position of having to opt for the shared program put forward by the federal government, and it has been saddled with that program since.

I do not suggest for a moment that health costs have risen only because the federal government is involved in them. Costs have risen in almost any direction we care to look in the service industries. On the other hand, the pace at which costs escalate can be controlled in certain ways. If the provinces had been left free to find their own solutions to the escalation in health care costs, they might well have been saved from the problems they find themselves faced with when the federal government, finding the heat in the kitchen too much for it, decides to quit and suddenly abandons the programs into which it had forced the provinces.

Medicare costs are not the direct issue in this present bill, but they provide the means of getting at the principle underlying the bill. The government is doing the same thing it did three years ago when it decided unilaterally to throttle the cost-shared program commitment it had made with the provinces. At that time, finding that it was spending more than it wanted to be involved in spending, it simply sat down and said in effect, "We don't like the terms of the agreement any more; we're going to cut back on it." Now, once again, it is doing the same thing with a program it set up with the provinces.

Three years ago when the government decided to renege on its medicare commitments, I said, thinking of my own province of Ontario, "We knew at the outset that the provincial medical care program was superior to the federal program that we were asked to join. We also knew what we were dealing with in this case. There was no way we could be sure that the federal government would honour this agreement. We, like the other provinces, knew that this government's record of keeping its word was hardly conducive to placing very much faith in this particular federal-provincial agreement." Well, Mr. Speaker, sadly but predictably, I say the same thing again today about the program which is being thrown out in the present bill.

The principle involved here, Mr. Speaker, is the principle of good faith. A government that bargains in good faith does not commit itself to particular levels of spending for particular periods of time and then, without consultation and agreement, announce a change of heart. In the previous bill three years ago, the government pleaded that health costs were rocketing out of control. It couldn't stand the heat. It wanted out. Well, this time the government cannot use that excuse, Mr. Speaker, because it sponsored the program which is being scuttled in this bill, a program to increase the health care training facilities in Canada and committed to it an amount of $500 million. Now, having decided that the way to save its own neck is to cut back on spending, it has found this program and has discovered that by chopping it, it can announce a saving of $84 million.

The costs of this program can certainly not be said to have rocketed out of control. The funds were voted for it back in the mid 1960s—$500 million to be spent over a 15-year period. As other speakers have pointed out, those dollars have shrunk mightily by today's standards. Accordingly, inflation has already taken a great toll on the program's funding. Now, two years before it had said the program would end, the federal government wants to end it, dealing yet another blow to the building up of health care facilities across Canada.

There are two ways of looking at the principle underlying the bill, Mr. Speaker. There is the way suggested by the minister when she introduced it. She told us the program had already been 83 per cent spent and had therefore accomplished many of its purposes. Accordingly, she regards it as an easy program from which to steal, to make up the budget cuts to which the government is committed. But there is another way of viewing the principle underlying the bill. It is that the government, seeing itself in disfavour with the electorate throughout the country and realizing that its wild spending habits over the past few years have landed the country in enormous trouble, is looking for a way to save its skin. It has sifted through its programs looking for ways to appear to save money without losing too many votes. Looked at in these terms, this bill has very little to do with good government and a lot to do with this government as it tries to save its own skin.

If the program was good in its conception, then the government should have the courage to maintain its level of funding, especially considering how much more cheaply the government comes by this amount of money these days. Even if it were a flawed program, unilateral decisions to cut off bilateral agreements are far from civilized. They are so close to the law of the jungle that no government which cares to keep good faith with its electorate would ever be guilty of them.

When the Trudeau government suddenly cut the funding of its shared-cost medical aid program three years ago, we in Ontario were faced with the threat of hospital closings in many communities. Now, once again in Ontario we are faced with the possibility that a new fee may be levied on chronic care patients who stay in hospital more than 60 days. There are no easy solutions to the problems of cost in such social programs as these, Mr. Speaker. For that reason, governments must work all the harder to make sure their programs are intelligently conceived and responsibly carried out. How can the provinces plan long-term programs if they are bound to the federal government in a shotgun marriage which always threatens a sudden divorce? How can Ontario—to refer again to my own province—maintain the level of health care it had planned for its citizens if the federal government keeps twisting in the wind? Why did the Liberal government railroad the provinces into these shared-cost programs at all if it has the gall later to leave them hanging?

One fact is obvious. When the federal government leaves a provincial government in the lurch these days, it is never a Liberal government which is affected. The voters have seen to that. And perhaps that is why the Trudeau government has the gall to practice cost-cutting in this way. It forces the provincial governments to cut back on services and the provincial governments, except for the one in Prince Edward Island which will probably not be there long, are not Liberal. Perhaps the Trudeau government hopes, in this way, to stir the anger of the electorate against other parties. But people have lived with this government long enough not to be fooled.

When a user fee becomes necessary for long-term hospital patients in Ontario, the voters of that province will know that it is a Trudeau fee they are being asked to pay. It is a fee for having a Prime Minister in Ottawa who reneges on commitments. In provinces like Ontario the voters are already anxiously waiting for the Trudeau government to get out of the kitchen. The government cannot keep its promises, and the deceptiveness coming out of the goverment kitchen is no longer acceptable to the people.

In terms of the Ministry of National Health and Welfare specifically, the country is already aware of the many aspects of bad administration that prevent programs from operating smoothly and efficiently. Last night we saw a confused health minister appearing on television after the late news to explain the unexplainable to us in terms of the child tax credit. Mothers who have never been asked to fill out income tax forms before are now required to jump through a bureaucratic hoop that even the minister didn't seem to understand. Similarly, many will also have to apply for a social insurance number. And senior citizens who are accustomed to filing their tax forms early in the hope of receiving an early tax rebate must suffer the very considerable inconvenience of waiting in line to get their T-4 slips at the end of February, whilst the minister of health tries to work her way through the jungle of her own red tape.

If the provinces had been given warning that the government was reneging on its commitment, Mr. Speaker, we might have been able to take comfort from the fact that at least the minister of health was giving up trying to run one program. Shortly we shall be able to take comfort from the fact that she won't be running anything. In the meantime, we are faced with the bill before us, which leaves the provinces in the lurch and gives the government an opportunity to say it has saved money.

As other speakers have pointed out, every dollar spent improving medical research and extending health training, especially in preventive medicine, saves many dollars in later health care costs. If we are to have truly effective health care, then some of the money which the federal government is saving will no doubt have to be spent by the provinces. What we are faced with in this bill is one more piece of face-saving legislation by a worn-out government.

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on this bill, primarily because of what it reveals about the way in which the government is dealing with its own understanding of restraint. The minister has indicated that the program we have had since 1966 has been a good program. I think all members of this House have agreed that it has been good and useful in a number of ways. According to her own words, the minister has reluctantly come to the conclusion that because of the need for restraint it is necessary to cut the remaining funds under the program, 83 per cent having been spent. It seems to me that there are three or four things that this reveals about the way the government is going about its business in this matter.

First let me deal with the question of research and development. I think it was June 1 of last year when the government indicated that it wished to re-establish its credentials and become enthusiastic about a policy for stimulating research and development, particularly in the fields of science and technological growth. That was the way the government wished to proceed from then on in. What we see with this bill today is another example of the difference between words and reality. I would like to cite a few statistics with respect to the government's commitment to research and development, and many more could be gathered.

The government has cut out $8.5 million from the support of science in the Department of Agriculture. The government has cut funding of $3 million from the extension to the Lethbridge research laboratory, $2.8 million in contributions toward construction of veterinary colleges, $2.7 million from the Canadian Dairy Commission for product research and promotion programs, $.8 million in grants to universities for water resources research, $1.4 million from the Alberta Oil Sands environment research program, $700,000 from stratospheric research, $2.7 million from the pollution abatement technology program, $2.8 million from the Newfoundland environment centre and maritime forest research centre and $11.1 million from the Department of Fisheries.

There are many examples outside the field of medical research where, over the years, we have seen a continuing cutting away from research and development funds, particularly in the fields of science and technological growth.

It is worth while pointing out that the Medical Research Council is responsible for approximately half of all the biomedical research funding in Canada. Let us look at the record in terms of the government's commitment to research and development in that field. In terms of the total budget of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Medical Research Council's budget has fallen from 1.33 per cent in 1971 to 1.3 per cent in 1972, to 1.14 per cent in 1973, to .87 per cent in 1974, and currently it is batting about .6 per cent. I think that should be underlined because it is a reduction, in the short space of seven years, by two thirds in the field of medical research as it pertains to the ability of the Medical Research Council to obtain funds from the minister's department. That is not a policy of stimulating research and development. That is a policy of constantly cutting back, and it is very much a false economy.

There are a number of reasons why research and development, particularly in the medical field, are important, not the least of which is to remember that the end product of research is prevention. Research is designed to prevent the occurrence of disease and ill health. It seems to me that it is significant that where we might understand restraint in all other forms of industry, enterprise or business, the government fails to understand it when it comes to medical research. The importance of long-term research is that it diminishes the cost of health care. Therefore, to cut off funds at the research and development stage is indeed a false economy. However, it is not something which does not affect people. It affects people very directly because it affects them with regard to something which ultimately matters to them most, that is, their health.

It appears to me, particularly in the last ten years, that when it comes to the crunch and when it comes to cutting out funds, we always make sure that we cut off our future. This government is saying that in the name of restraint it is going to have to cut medical research, which will have the effect of establishing new procedures and new technology with respect to preventing ill health and with respect to providing health care for those who suffer from ill health.

Perhaps it is even more significant, but in an entirely different direction, that when we cut off research programs, particularly in fields which are scientifically sophisticated, we lose not only what we might have gained from research, but we also lose researchers. This country has seen generation after generation of people having to go either to the south, over to Europe, or somewhere else, because the sorry history of this country, especially under this government, has been not to put dollars into improving our future, particularly as that relates to health care.

That is something which is difficult to measure because we cannot measure how many good medical researchers and how many good medical teams are broken up when funds are cut off. This does not mean that we will not finally have the technology. It does not mean that we will not finally enjoy the fruits of that research. We will, as we always have, import it from other countries which are getting information and knowledge from Canadians who have left Canada because they have to go elsewhere to find facilities with which to do their research. That, in miniature, is the way this government deals with the question of research and development. Despite protestations about wanting to stimulate research and development, both inside and outside medical research the government has followed a policy of diminishing them.

The second thing which is revealed about the government is its total insensitivity to the significance of making sure that important programs which affect provinces are undertaken after consultation. This is a matter which many hon. members have raised. It has been raised with regard to almost every program the government has decided either to stop or start. It takes no great intelligence to remember that other governments—not just the federal government—require predictability. Indeed, those who are served and affected by programs also need predictability. That is particularly so in the field of research. We cannot just start and stop research programs. This is even more important in the medical field.

When this matter was before the House at second reading, I understand that some minister indicated that there was no contract or agreement signed and sealed with the provinces. However, whether there was a signed and sealed contract which would be enforceable in a court of law is not the point. Surely when a province made an agreement with the federal government 13 years ago, it expected the program would last the length of time it was supposed to last and, indeed, it might perhaps have been in the interests of medical research, the provinces and the people, if the program were to last longer. It is not a question of legally enforceable contracts; it is a question of trust. Again this government finds itself not worrying or caring whether programs will adversely affect the provinces or, indeed, the people.

There is a third aspect which I think should have been brought to the attention of the minister. Much research in this country is done by voluntary organizations. If the government was going to cut the program two years before the end of its natural life, it might at least have tried to find out if certain voluntary organizations could take over some aspects of the program, given the existing funding commitments, in order that the program would not be affected or cut sharply. The federal government has not been able to come to grips with coping with voluntary organizations as it goes through its program of restraint.

Merely because the government decides not to carry out a program does not mean the need dies. When those government services are withdrawn, surely it is incumbent upon the government to see whether there are voluntary organizations to take up the slack. Indeed it is possible that there will be some funding, but not nearly as much as the government had pledged under this particular program. I might emphasize perhaps that is more important in the field of geriatric services. The government is on record, in a speech by the minister, on caring about the needs of the aged in our society. I believe the minister referred to a new deal for the aged. At least she is sincere in her view. The fact of the matter is that there has been absolutely no attempt by the government to find ways for voluntary organizations to assist Canadians, as it withdraws funds and cuts services and programs which affect a great many people.

Also it is worthy of note that the government has seen fit to withdraw funds from programs which will affect both directly and ultimately those people who are least able to cope for themselves. Everyone who has any experience at all at the receiving end knows that when teaching and training facilities are cut, particularly in the health care field, the services most affected are those to people who are old, poor and handicapped. Those are the funds which go first.

I do not think there is a member on the government side who would step forward and say, "We would like to reduce training services for people being trained to help handicapped people." Government members will not say that. They do not wish to say that, but that is what they are doing. In the final analysis the poor, old and handicapped are not defeated by a direct assault. It is an entire series of subtle withdrawals of programs which were in place to help them out. These programs are slowly eroded away by what used to be called the old trickle down theory. By and large what happens is that the people who would ordinarily be taking courses and learning skills, particularly in health care training, will not be given the necessary funds. Therefore the services which will go are those such as home care, meals on wheels, and others. Slowly they are worn away, they are eroded. Thus, the ultimate effect of this cut will be borne by those who can least afford it.

I was pleased to participate in the discussion of the bill before the House for the following reasons: first, although 83 per cent of the program has been delivered, as it were, and although the minister can argue that by and large the objectives have been reached, anybody who wants to listen will realize that, despite what the government says, it does not stand for stimulating research and development programs. Its record is entirely in the opposite direction. Second, it continues to create divisions in the country by not dealing in an appropriate manner with the mechanism of consultation with the provinces. Third, it seems to have lost its understanding of the significance and importance of voluntary organizations which would be happy to be in this business if the government withdrew. Fourth, it is easier to withdraw funding for programs which affect those people who cannot speak loud enough to be heard. For those reasons, the bill does not deserve the support of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): St. John's East, Mr. Speaker. "East is East, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet."

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member says "filibuster". If ever there was a case to be made for a parliamentary filibuster on a bill, a case could be made for this one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I welcome the suggestion of the hon. member that this is a deliberate filibuster. If what I say during third reading of this bill stimulates others to speak, and perhaps in the process succeeds in getting the government to change its mind on this breach of faith, then it will have been a worthwhile filibuster. That is what we are dealing with, a breach of faith on the part of the government.

It is worth noting throughout third reading of this bill that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has been conspicuous by her absence. I sat through the debate on Friday and the minister and her parliamentary secretary were not in their places. I sat through the debate today and this evening, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare and her parliamentary secretary are still conspicuously absent.

An hon. Member: They really do not care.

Mr. McGrath: They really do not care. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) made an outstanding contribution to this debate. He has provided outstanding leadership in this field. He has sat throughout the entire debate and heard contributions from all sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I wonder if the minister's absence in some way could not be construed as her inability to defend this indefensible bill. Perhaps it is possible the government wanted to keep the minister out of the House because it was somewhat concerned that, if she stayed here, she might stimulate the debate in her provocative way. I hope I can be somewhat provocative and even stimulate some hon. members opposite to rise and defend this bill.

• (2130)

I think it is to the outstanding credit of the ministers who are here tonight, but I think the point has to be made that we have four ministers in the House tonight, the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell), the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané), the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan), the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), and so also is the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik). But the minister who is responsible for this bill is not here. Perhaps the reason she is not here is that she would be called upon to account for the fact that over the weekend her colleague, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo), announced a program whereby the Government of Canada was somehow going to find $18 million to fund arenas in four of the major centres in this country for the National Hockey League.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is restraint for you.

Mr. McGrath: Yet we cannot find the extra $84 million to complete our solemn undertaking made to the provinces 13 years ago when we passed this bill.

An hon. Member: Unbelievable.

Mr. McGrath: Where does the $18 million come from to provide these arenas in the impoverished city of Edmonton, the impoverished city of Winnipeg, the impoverished city of Hamilton, and the impoverished city of Quebec? I do not begrudge whatever Hamilton gets and whatever they deserve, but all I say to you, sir, is that this government has a strange and misguided sense of priorities. They have their priorities all mixed up.

Mr. Nystrom: They are Progressive Conservative.

Mr. McGrath: I have listened to the hon. member from Saskatchewan and I heard—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is not from the whole of Saskatchewan; surely not.

Mr. McGrath: I have heard his contribution to the debate today—he has made a positive contribution—and I hope he will allow me to do the same thing.

I listened to my colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca. And I also heard him when he spoke at second reading of the bill and I heard his outstanding contribution at third reading of the bill. I find his arguments eminently sensible and logical. When the hon. member for Athabasca spoke on behalf of the official opposition he said that we opposed this bill on two counts: lack of consultation, and the fact that it will seriously undermine confidence in the research community of this country by the professional corps of researchers whom we have been able to gather today in this country largely as a result of this program.

With respect to consultation, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has a long reputation in this House for inability to consult with the provinces. Coincidentally, the last major bill which the minister brought before the House was the act to amend the Family Allowances Act, the child tax credit bill. It is rather interesting that throughout that debate it was found necessary by those who are responsible for the management of the business of the House on the other side to withdraw the minister from that debate because that was the only chance they had of getting the bill through without the embarrassment of having to impose closure.

When that bill came before the House, we on this side argued that the bill had been brought before the House hastily and without adequate consultation, that there was no assurance from each of the provinces that they would honour and respect the child tax credit allowance in terms of the payments that were being made from provincial welfare programs to welfare recipients in the respective provinces. Yet over the week end we find, surreptitiously placed in our mailboxes, under the date of February 2, a communique from the Minister of National Health and Welfare in which she bemoans the fact that her province, the province of Quebec, refuses to honour the child tax credit bill in terms of the welfare recipients in that province and that they will in fact deduct the amount of the child tax credit from welfare payments in the province of Quebec. It is shameful, sir. I join with the minister in condemning the province of Quebec for their action in that regard.

I well recall, during the course of the debate on that bill, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in her usual provocative way, challenging each one of us in the House to make sure that we get commitments from our respective provinces that they will not deduct the amount of the child tax credit from welfare payments. That was her response. She went out of her way to identify and point out that the hon. member for St. John's East enjoyed an unusual relationship with the government of Newfoundland because it was a PC government, and she identified the same situation in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Ontario, and in Manitoba, all the governments of this country that have seen the light and that no longer support the Liberal philosophy, save for the lone government of Prince Edward Island which is just hanging on by a straw.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Liberal party's last frontier.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yet is it not passing strange that the minister, who challenged each of us to get a commitment from our provinces that the amount of the child tax credit would not be deducted from welfare payments, could not get that same commitment from her own province of Quebec, notwithstanding the unusual relationship she must enjoy with the government of Quebec because she represents the Government of Canada, she is a minister holding a senior portfolio within the Government of Canada?

Again we see the consequences of the failure of this government to consult adequately with the provinces, because if there had been adequate consultation, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare had called together the various social services ministers of the ten provinces and sat down with them and took them into her confidence, and told them the government would bring in an amendment to the Family Allowances Act and would make provisions for a child tax credit of $200 per child but it wanted an assurance from each one of the provinces that they would not deduct the amount of this child tax credit allowance from the welfare payments that they presently have in place, I believe that provincial governments are reasonable and, when confronted with that kind of reasonable proposition, would respond positively. I am sure that the minister would have been able to obtain an undertaking that no such deduction would be made from the amount of welfare paid.

I talk about the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in which, again because of lack of consultation, we had the unique, the practically unprecedented situation of the ten provinces of this country saying, "We are just not going to take it any more". They came together and they appeared before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration and bemoaned the fact that there had been no consultation, notwithstanding the impact that the changes in unemployment insurance would have on the provincial economies, especially on the eastern provinces, and they put forward positive proposals of their own, proposals which they should have been given the opportunity of making at a federal-provincial meeting.

God knows, we have had enough federal-provincial conferences. Indeed, one wonders about the relevancy of this place when one considers what is going on across the street at the old converted Union station. That has become the real parliament in this city. That is where the action is, and that perhaps explains why the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not in her place tonight. Perhaps she knows that the real decisions are to be made across the street.

If this place is to be relevant and meaningful in terms of its legislative capacity, then I say we have to dig in when the government confronts parliament with a bill of this kind that represents a major breach of faith with the provinces of this country. If we have to dig in, let us dig in, and what better way to dig in?

It is all very well for the minister to talk about the fact that 83 per cent of the program has been completed. Do we ever arrive at the stage where we have completed medical research in this country? Medical research will never end. Indeed, by its very nature it can never end. I believe when this statute was passed by this House 13 years ago the government of the day never had the intention of repealing it. I believe there was an implicit understanding, when the bill was passed, that when the 15-year period was up there would be another program to replace and, indeed, to enlarge upon it.

The fact of the matter is that we are abrogating a solemn undertaking made to the provinces 13 years ago. Why is that so? I suggest it is to save $83 million. The government of this day is embarking upon a spending program that hovers between $45 billion and $50 billion, yet we are taking about $83 million to complete an undertaking to the provinces to provide funding for medical research in this country.

What about the programs that will have to be cancelled, and the research teams which have been brought together and will be lost to this country as a result of the cancellation of this program? I can speak from experience in my own province, that province rich in promise yet so poor in its ability to deliver. We have the newest medical school in the country at the Memorial University of Newfoundland. It is a credit to this country. I would suggest that a large part of the ongoing biomedical research at the Memorial University was made possible by this health resources fund program. The people at that medical school tell me this new institution is going to lose this medical expertise which has been gathered together. That medical school will lose this expertise because it does not have the funding to carry on biomedical research, research in geriatric and family medical practice, those things relatively unsophisticated, yet important things that other medical schools in the country no longer carry out.

What do I say to these people at the university? Where are they to go? Where are they going to look for funding? How can the people involved in a professional research capacity have any confidence in the Government of Canada to fulfil its promise? The answer, of course, is that we will lose these people, as has been so eloquently stated by my friend from Toronto, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), and as has been demonstrated by my learned colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca. We will lose these people to the United States, which is perhaps the intention of this government which seems to be able to come up with dollars from some kind of hidden fund to provide sexy political programs in order to fund arenas in large cities in this country for the National Hockey League, an area in which we have a questioned right to be involved.

Perhaps we will lose these people for ever. What will happen then? I suppose then we will go back to the point we were at 13, 14, 15 years ago when most of the medical research done in this country was funded by endowments from the United States. Is that where we want to be, and is that the kind of situation we want in this country? I submit there is not a Canadian who, given the facts, would support that proposition. That is why I believe this bill, innocent though it may appear, and presented in a manner that would indicate it is a mere housekeeping bill, is a blot on the already tarnished image of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I could ask where the $18 million is to be derived. Is it to come from the $83 million to be saved by cancelling this program? Is that the source of these funds? We have a right to an answer to that question. Is that where the $18 million is coming from in order to improve the image of the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and perhaps to gain a few political yards in those big cities across the country? Perhaps this money is to come from the government's Outreach Program which was cancelled or restricted last year to exclude women. We know about that retrograde step which set back progress in this country by 25 years when it was announced that women would no longer be targets of the Outreach Program. How much was saved by that discriminatory act? Did it save $18 million, enough to finance these arena improvements in Winnipeg, Edmonton, and Quebec City? Where did the money come from? We have a right to know. Did it come partially from the $2 million the government is to save in terms of cutting back on the publications it now makes available for university libraries in this country?

I had to tell the people at my university library that if the government cancels this program they should let me know and I will make the publications available to them if I have access to them. What kind of a misguided sense of priorities is possessed by this government? Why would it eliminate a $2 million program to provide technical publications to the university libraries in this country? What kind of restraint is that? What kind of misguided restraint is it? This is not restraint; this is a facade, a joke, and a misrepresentation of the word "restraint". Nobody expects that kind of restraint.

Nobody expects the Government of Canada to cut back on its commitment to universities, just as nobody in this country would expect the Government of Canada to cut back on its solemn obligation made to the provinces of this country 13 years ago to provide an ongoing program of research in the universities and medical research institutes.

An. hon. Member: It is counter productive.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member suggests this move is counter productive and that it will cost us dearly in the years ahead.

I hope somebody else will take the floor before this bill is allowed to receive third reading. I hope the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), for whom I have great respect, will get to his feet and express his concern over what the government is doing. Perhaps we may even hear from other hon. members. Surely this House of Commons, if it has any sense of responsibility, has the ongoing, solemn responsibility to ensure that commitments outlined by statute to the provinces of this country are honoured and not abrogated by repeal as is happening in the case of this bill now before the House.

● (2150)

I suspect, indeed I know that all is not well within the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Alexander: That is what the newspapers say.

Mr. McGrath: That is what the newspapers say, and I suspect they know what they are talking about. I believe that if we were able to examine the qualified, capable and dedicated men and women who advise the Minister of National Health and Welfare we would find that they agree with us, and that this act should not be repealed. I suspect that they would also agree with our contention that there must be an ongoing consultation, given the limited jurisdiction of the Government of Canada, in some of these areas, particularly the areas of social policy. The fact that the newspapers have identified that there are problems would indicate to me that they have put their finger on the nub of the situation.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and talk about nutrition, child health care, geriatrics, pediatrics and obstetrics, all of which require ongoing research in this country. I could go on and talk about the International Year of the Child and the need for ongoing studies with regard to nutrition, dental care, day care, and immunization. The findings of the nutritional survey of a few years ago, funded by the people of Canada at great expense, for example, identified what is nothing short of a national scandal in this country, the fact that we have a serious problem of malnutrition. It is hard to believe that there is malnutrition and diet deficiency in our young people in this affluent society. It said that our children at age 12 had a physical capability comparable to a 30-year-old Swede. This is all due to inadequate diet, junk food in our schools, and television, as my hon. friend identified, which teaches these children to eat this junk food but does not identify the fact that it has little or no nutritional value.

I could go on and talk about the seriousness of the problem of native people. Indeed, that was a question which came up during the course of the debate on the child tax credit bill when we implored that the government make the child tax credit allowance available in quarterly payments because many of the mothers who would be receiving the one large lump sum do not have the experience of managing that amount of money and, as a result, the money would not find its way to the purposes for which parliament intended.

Canada does not have a school lunch program. There is a school lunch program in the United States, and there has been so for many years. There is no suggestion in Canada, however, of sitting down with the provinces and saying, "Look, we have a major problem in this country, our children are undernourished, and because of that undernourishment their learning process is retarded." Our children are more regressive because they are going to school without an adequate breakfast, because there is an iron deficiency in their diet, because they are drinking too much soda pop, because they are taking too much junk cereal, and because they are drinking too much.

Alcoholism among our children has become a major problem, more serious than the soft drug problem. Our kids are getting high on beer and are drinking beer and alcohol on an empty stomach, yet we see the Government of Canada abdicating its responsibility. Why can there not be a program of alcohol education for our young children? Why can they not be told that alcohol, if taken in moderation, is something to be enjoyed, but if abused it can lead to addiction or danger to one's health? In spite of this we tolerate advertising in this country which presents alcohol drinking as a lifestyle to be desired, ads which are sophisticated and almost subliminal in their techniques in trying to hook our kids on X or Y or Z brands of beer, knowing full well that once they have them, they have them for life. But nothing is done in the area of alcohol education on a national basis.

Perhaps nothing is done because of the power of the advertising industry. I do not know. I understand that the breweries of this country spend approximately $30 million on advertising. That is a hell of a big advertising budget by any stretch of the imagination. Perhaps some of these advertising agencies which handle these accounts are friends of the government and that is why it is a no-no.

We did not hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who likes to talk about social policy as though she had the market cornered, on this matter. This government is bankrupt when it comes to social policy, because it has no social policy. If there was a social policy it would not bring in this kind of bill at this particular time. If there was a social policy, there would be an ongoing education program in an attempt to offset some of the dangerous nutritional habits of our young people, a program to provide for adequate day care for single parent families, and to provide adequate day care for family situations where both parents must work in order to offset the consequences of inflation. There would also be programs for instructing young people who assume family responsibilities, as they are doing at a younger and younger age in this country.

This bill would have provided the Minister of National Health and Welfare with an opportunity to come before this House and tell us her concerns about where this country is going. She has not done so, because I do not think she has any concern. I do not think that she really cares. I regret to have to say that in her absence. I would prefer to say that to her face, but she is not here.

An hon. Member: The parliamentary secretary is here.

Mr. McGrath: The parliamentary secretary is here; albeit he arrived a little late, but he is here. The Minister of State (Multiculturalism), the Minister of Labour, and all kinds of ministers are here, but we do not have the minister responsible for this bill, yet she would like us to give it third reading although it violates a solemn obligation made to the provinces to provide ongoing medical research. To what end? To save $83 million, when in the same breath we can save $18 million allocated to fund NHL stadiums in Winnipeg, Edmonton, Hamilton, and Quebec city for professional sports.

We have facilities in my city of St. John's which we put together for the Summer Games. We are proud of what we did in the Summer Games, but those facilities were closed down for a year because we did not have the money to operate them. We could not get any help from the federal govrnent to operate our beautiful aqua-arena or any of the marvellous facilities we put together to host the young athletes of this country in the Canada Games. Yet we can find $18 million for the National Hockey League in those big cities. What a misguided sense of priority; what a government!

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are getting ready to rise. May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLIANCE WITH PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS CONDUCT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on July 18, 1975, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce tabled in this House on behalf of the government what he called the "new principles of international business conduct." At that time he said they were "intended as an updating and replacement of the guiding principles of good corporate behaviour in Canada." These had been announced by the late hon. Robert Winters on March 31, 1966, when he was minister of industry, trade and commerce. When the minister of industry, trade and commerce who is now the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) tabled the new set of principles he said they reflected "broad government policy regarding the activities and responsibilities of foreign controlled business enterprises in Canada." He made it clear, as he said, that "they are directed toward all foreign controlled enterprises whether they were involved with the Foreign Investment Review Act or not."

According to a press report early last week, however, officials of several foreign controlled firms in Canada do not seem to be aware of these important principles. The author of the article in question could not find any indication that the government was really monitoring the degree of compliance by such companies with these principles. Yet, when they were tabled in this House in 1975, they were described by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce as "broad government policy".

I gather from what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House last week that this policy is still in force. If this is the case, then the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce must have in place, or must set up as soon as possible, a program to bring forcefully to the attention of senior management of all foreign controlled companies in Canada these new and important principles of international business conduct.

It is not surprising that the companies which were contacted by the journalist about the matter told him they had not heard of these principles. After all, senior executives change fairly frequently; they transfer, retire, assume new responsibilities. Therefore there must be an ongoing effort by the government to remind directly all foreign controlled businesses of these principles. Interestingly enough, that was the approach used by Mr. Winters when he announced the first version of these principles. He also had his department set up a survey to monitor the degree of compliance by foreign controlled companies with these principles. The survey was carried out by regularly sending out questionnaires to a representative sample of foreign controlled companies. The results were published for some years. However, the last publication of the results of the survey was in 1974, to cover only the years 1971 and 1972. The parliamentary library has no later publication of the results of this survey in its collection.

The purpose of the survey is important. It is to assess the degree of voluntary compliance with these principles which in effect call for the application of the FIRA test of "significant benefit" by all foreign controlled companies, including those not covered by that law. Therefore, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) at the very least should publish information updating these survey results. He should reinstitute this survey if, in fact, it was dropped some years ago as appears to be the case. At the very least as well, as I have said, he should ensure the principles of international business conduct are brought regularly to the attention of senior executives of all foreign controlled companies in Canada.

But if these principles were and are government policy, meaning something the government believes should be carried out in the public interest, then the government must soon take steps to ensure there is compliance in fact with that government policy it calls the "new principles of international business conduct." It should do this to help accomplish the necessary aim of further expanding employment and economic activity generally in Canada.

The high level of foreign control of our economy is emerging again as a significant political issue in Canada. This is confirmed by a recent Gallup poll showing a high degree of public concern about this high level of control. I believe the government must respond to this concern in a meaningful way if it is to be re-elected by the Canadian people in the coming election. A pledge of action by the government, not just to recognize the benefits but also to deal with the costs to the Canadian economy of this high level of foreign control of our economy, is needed now and in the coming weeks to ensure the re-election of the government but, more important, to assure the long term best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, following their approval in 1975 the new guidelines were distributed to all companies through the information kit provided by FIRA. Those guidelines were also published in the businessman's guide by FIRA and in the FIRA review for 1977. The guide is distributed to companies dealing with FIRA. The review was sent to most financial branches operating in Canada. As for the other question, that is when the results of our survey will be made available and published, it is advisable to point out that the guidelines cannot be effectively controlled on a statistical basis alone. My department is carrying out a voluntary survey among the main branches of foreign companies. The hon. member was right when he said that the results of the last survey were published in 1974. However, the results of the survey up to 1975 were published in May 1978. The data covering the activities for the period ending in 1977 will probably be published in April, 1979. We hope that those results will be effectively used to consider some aspects of operations in foreign-controlled branches. The passage of the amendment in Bill C-3 concerning the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act will surely provide a more effective control and assessment of operations in foreign-controlled branches.

And allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of all written instructions which could be tabled today in the House the best guarantee which can be provided is still the daily control made by officials who are anxious to ensure the sound operation of Foreign Investment Review Agency.

INDUSTRY—TAKEOVER OF CANADIAN BUSINESSES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue the line of questioning pursued by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), a former cabinet minister. I am sure the same parliamentary secretary will read two or three answers tonight.

I rose in my place on October 23 to inquire of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) regarding the purchase of Northwood Mills in Princeton, British Columbia, by Weyerhaeuser of the United States. I was following hard on questions posed by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston), as well as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who was not asking questions specifically about that but about the high percentage of approvals that FIRA gives to foreign takeovers of companies in Canada.

I would like to survey the situation at the moment. Northwood Mills is a Canadian company that is owned by Noranda, a wholly owned Canadian company. An American multinational wants to purchase it. I do not have anything against Weyerhaeuser. Generally speaking, it is a good corporate citizen.

Northwood does not want to sell to Weyerhaeuser. There is a group of small independent sawmills in the area. They realize their future is threatened if a large multinational comes into the vicinity. The wood industry is precarious. Frequently the margin of profit of these small independent sawmills depends on the sale of their chips.

If Weyerhaeuser purchases Northwood Mills and has an assured supply of chips for its pulp mill in Kamloops, it can do without these small independent sawmills. Naturally, these sawmills are a bit paranoid about this. They have formed a consortium to buy Northwood Mills rather than have it purchased by an American multinational.

FIRA in its true form of approving 85 to 90 per cent of all applications, has approved this application, when at the same time the Canadian small independents are wanting to improve their future. It is passing strange that the hon. member for New Westminster should have questioned the extent to which FIRA gives approval to multinationals while in this transaction the union, IWA, as well as the British Columbia president, Mr. Monroe, approved of the purchase by an American multinational of a Canadian company. The hon. member for New Westminster very sincerely asked about these approvals, yet here it is the unions which will support him in the next election which are saying "We would like to see this American multinational take over a wholly owned Canadian company."

I asked one of the directors about this. He said, "Well, the industry has to be integrated." Okay, the industry needs to be integrated, but must it be under the umbrella of one corporation? Surely, there could be co-operation among the small independents to keep the industry going—they have enough ingenuity for that. I cannot believe that it is the giant corporations which have built the strength into our economy which we have known historically. It is not the multinationals which have done it; it has been the risk taking and the initiative of the small independents.

We have now reached the point at which Weyerhaeuser effectively controls most of the Thompson River watershed timber supply. One of the problems is that the company has overcut its supply of timber in the Lumby region of British Columbia and now wants the timber reserves owned by this mill in Princeton. We are now in a situation in which Canadian lumber dealers have to phone to an American company in the United States to place orders for Canadian lumber for resale. The first question Weyerhaeuser asks is, "Is there a Weyerhaeuser agent in that area?" And the company will not sell Canadian lumber to a Canadian agent if the lumber is going to a place where there is a Weyerhaeuser agent.

The minister tells me in the House that FIRA is so structured that it will not approve applications unless it is to the benefit of Canada. Yet here they are rubbing out jobs all over the place and we are allowing an American multinational to determine who can sell lumber and where it shall be sold. Is that for the advantage of Canadians? The fact is, the government believes in corporatism. Unions, too, believe in corporatism because they would much prefer to deal with a large corporation than with a number of independents. The package is a lot neater. This is especially true when very small sawmills are in the picture—operations which might not employ union workers.

Moreover, as we know, the corporations have only one certain way of handling competition and that is not through greater efficiency, it is by buying the competition out. So we face the grim prospect in this area of having one or two large companies controlling practically all of the lumber industry in the heart of British Columbia. I do not think the minister, through FIRA, has been acting in the best interests of Canada.

I have here a list of companies which were opting for the purchase of that mill. I notice Riverside Forest Products of Lumby, B.C., Gorman Brothers of Westbank; Aspen Planers of Merritt; Evans Forest Products of Savona; Wonnok Lumber of Mission; Gilbert Smith Forest Products of Barriere, and Drew Sawmill Limited of Malakwa, B.C., all of which said, "This ought to stay a Canadian concern; we object to an American multinational coming into the country and we want to preserve the integrity—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this presentation deals with two controversial points relating to the takeover of Northwood Mills Ltd. of Penticton by Weyerhaeuser Inc. of Tacoma, Washington. First, lumber retailers from the southern mainland of British Columbia might be forced to go to the United States to buy Canadian lumber from Weyerhaeuser. Second, it is feared that small independent sawmills will be separated from the markets buying their chips.

It is true that Canadian and American lumber retailers ordering Canadian lumber from Weyerhaeuser must dial the toll-free telephone number Zenith 98676 which puts them in contact with that company's business section in Tacoma. The billing is made in that municipality. Remittances are sent to P.O. Box 4844 in Vancouver in Canadian funds and any correspondence with Weyerhaeuser must be addressed to 200 Consumer Road, Willowdale, Ontario. Of course, it is also true that practically all the lumber of that company is exported to the United States. It should be noted that even if the wholesale purchases are to be made in the United States Weyerhaeuser operates a number of retail outlets in Kamloops and elsewhere to serve British Columbia consumers.

Indeed, that company is not the only foreign-controlled corporation to centralize its operations in the United States but sometimes you have the opposite: a few foreign-owned corporations operating in Canada have opened in Canadian cities business outlets to serve Canadian and American retailers. Weyerhaeuser is thinking about establishing an outlet near Kamloops but one could consider that an attempt probably on the part of that good hon. member to compete more fiercely with local producers which could also trigger a reaction. As to the effects of this transaction on the small independent sawmills' ability to sell their chips, a comparison between the current situation and what is proposed will show that the effects will be quite negligible.

Just now, the Weyerhaeuser pulp mill in Kamloops is using 550,000 BD (Bone Dry) units of chips a year. Of these, 100,000 units are being provided by the Weyerhaeuser mills of the area, the rest being supplied by 21 independent sawmills. Weyerhaeuser can produce 190,000 units of chips in its own sawmills, but the current contracts with independent sawmills compel this corporation to reduce its deliveries of chips from its own sawmills in proportion with those of its independent suppliers. The sawmills in Northwood are producing 120,000 units of chips a year, but all their production is sold under contract to B.C. Forest Products Limited.

The independent sawmills are afraid that, as soon as their contracts with the B.C. Forest Products Limited expire, the chips produced by Northwood may be sold to the Weyerhaeuser sawmill, which would reduce the quantities this establishment would buy from them. Several factors are involved here. First of all, in case the contract between the Northwood and the B.C. Forest Products Limited is not renewed, it is to be expected that the latter will try to fill the gap by purchasing the same quantity of chips from the independent sawmills of the region.

RELEASE OF U.S.S.R. POLITICAL PRISONERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Yuri Shymko (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that pressures of world public opinion and intervention by governments, including that of the Soviet Union, requesting full amnesty and the release of political prisoners, have had positive results in Greece, Portugal, Chile and, most recently, in Cuba—with the release of over 3,000 political prisoners—and to promote further international co-operation and detente, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan):

That this House urge the government to make direct representation at the highest level to the government of the U.S.S.R. to grant full amnesty to all prisoners of conscience on its territory, as a gesture of good will, in compliance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Accords, assuring Canada's willingness to consider positively requests for admission to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MILK POWDER EXPORTS TO THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is presently sponsoring a trade mission to five South American countries to sell milk powder and infant feeding products.

As it is becoming increasingly accepted that the promotion of infant formula is unacceptable in the Third World and in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce immediately establish a committee with representatives from CIDA, the Department of National Health and Welfare and Agriculture Canada to evaluate this mission when it returns to Canada and to set up guidelines for milk powder exports so that Canada will not be implicated in any further inappropriate use of infant formula or other milk products in the Third World.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INQUIRY BY SUPERINTENDENT OF BANKS ON DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that on November 8 last, as reported in Hansard on page 915, the Minister of Finance confirmed in the House that the inspector general of banks was conducting an inquiry on the part which chartered banks may have played in the devaluation of the Canadian dollar to make substantial profits; considering the fact also that chartered banks have announced record profits for the financial year ending on October 31 last, increasing by as much as 58.6 per cent in one case; in view of the fact finally that the dollar is falling lower from day to day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House direct the Minister of Finance to table as soon as possible a report on the inquiry made by the superintendent of banks on the part which chartered banks may have played on the devaluation of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

POST OFFICE

DOOR-TO-DOOR MAIL DELIVERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter or urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

The Postmaster General is continuing the freeze on door-to-door delivery of mail in new suburbs in many cities across Canada which are feeling the pressure of a rapid increase in population, and this notwithstanding a continuing unemployment rate of close to one million Canadians. In view of the fact that many jobs are being eliminated by this continuing freeze, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Post Office Department establish this traditional service, thereby providing Canadians with the quality of mail service to which they are entitled and that the money be made available by delaying the costly move to metric announced recently by the Postmaster General and by savings from the unemployment insurance fund.

MARKETS FOR STEEL PELLETS PRODUCED AT CAPREOL, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the announced closure of the National Steel iron ore pellet plant at Capreol, Ontario, at the end of March, the only reason that the U.S. parent company is no longer purchasing pellets from its Canadian subsidiary but from U.S. sources only, resulting in 250 Canadians being threatened with unemployment, and in view of the efforts by the Ontario government and by Harwood Nesbitt to find Canadian purchasers of pellets from this mill, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce take immediate steps to assist the Ontario government in finding markets for the pellets produced by National Steel at Capreol, and to ensure that the plant continues to operate and employ 250 employees, and that he report to the House on motions on the results of his actions within ten days.

POLLUTION OF ONTARIO LAKES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that statements made by Ontario's environment minister yesterday indicate that acidic rain originating, for the most part, in the United States is destroying the fish population in at least 140 Ontario lakes, and in view of the fact that the situation poses a serious threat to the environment and to the tourist industry in Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct the Minister of State for the Environment to immediately enter into discussions with his provincial and U.S. counterparts to reduce the levels of these pollutants before they irreparably damage our lakes and the tourist industry of central Canada which is dependent upon them.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EXPLANATION FOR HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the jobless figures released by Statistics Canada paint the rather gloomy picture of 977,000 Canadians unemployed, a substantial increase when you take into account the rate of hidden unemployment in the country, because using StatCan's own methodology we have a million and a quarter Canadians unemployed in this country.

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, given the minister's and the Prime Minister's propensity to paint such a rosy picture of the economy and of job creation prospects, if the minister could explain to the House and to the country why the jobless rate has increased this month by 120,000.

● (1415)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if one compares the situation this year with last year, there is a decrease in unemployment in that last year we created more than 450,000 jobs from January to January. I think it is a very good result but it is not a satisfactory one. We are always working very hard to ensure that job creation will be better, but one must understand that the participation rate in Canada is very, very high. This month we attained a record high level in terms of the participation rate; in fact, from January to January there were 450,000 more Canadians at work.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, given the minister's reply and his failure to explain why the jobless rate in the country is up by over 120,000, the forecast of the Conference Board in Canada that job creation this year will not exceed 197,000, and the economic forecasts of 4 per cent real growth, will the minister tell the House his latest estimate of job creation for 1979? I am sure the 1.25 million unemployed Canadians would like to know what the prospects are for this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, traditionally, come January the number of unemployed is higher in Canada because of the particular working conditions in winter; there is nothing there to be excited about. I want to tell the hon. member that last August the Conference Board had predicted that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment would reach 9 per cent in January and that this rate is now 8.1 per cent, which is better than was predicted.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the forecast of the Minister of Finance is about as accurate as his forecasts of the rate of inflation which he has had to correct from time to time.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The industrial heartland of the country, the famous Golden Triangle, has the highest rate of urban unemployment in Canada, 13.6 per cent in the St. Catharines-Niagara region. The unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces now is hovering around 13 per cent, 17.6 per cent in Newfoundland.

Given the minister's propensity to tell the unemployed youth of the Atlantic provinces to travel across the country, and that there is an unemployment rate of 13.6 per cent in the industrial heartland, where are the youth to go? Can the minister tell us where they are able to go to look for jobs?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has neglected to listen to the answers given by the Minister of Finance. The number of jobs actually created, year over year was in excess of 445,000 or 450,000. I think that is something which gives hope to our young people.

The other aspect is that at the government level, given the responsibilities we have for making taxpayers' money available, the job experience training program secured 35,000 jobs for young people, the employment tax credit resulted in 13,000 jobs being created, and now they are being created at the rate of 500 per week. The hon. member talks about optimism coming from the Prime Minister. I think that is appropriate, but also it comes from the Conservative leader of Newfoundland when he said:

We have put our province on a solid economic base for the first time in our history, and I am proud of this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is because they have a Tory government.

Mr. Cullen: Also, the leading minister in Newfoundland said the following:

—a province of growing wealth and promise. I know our province has started an era of expansion and development that none of us has ever known and few can begin to comprehend.

I should like to point out to the hon. member that most of that funding comes from the federal government:

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO TAKE TO COMPENSATE FOR LOST JOBS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last October 26 the Quebec minister of state for economic development stated that, according to a study he made public, if no compensatory measures were taken by Ottawa the federal budget cuts would entail a loss of more than 18,000 jobs; since Statistics Canada has reported this morning that from last month up till today there has been an increase of 30,000 more jobless in Quebec, would the Minister of Finance not recognize today the validity of that study and say what compensatory measures he is prepared to bring before the House?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when we announced our budget cuts last August it was to make sure that the Canadian economy would work in a more proper way and because it had then become necessary to reduce the public sector involvement in the economy. We have developed a policy which helps increase the private sector role in job creation. We have also decided that the public sector involvement could not get higher than its present level. The budget cuts we made in August have had a favourable effect on the Canadian economy since they have re-established a climate of confidence in Canada, and that is why we could report in January that the number of jobs in Canada in relation to January of last year was 450,000 new jobs added to the Canadian work force.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

It is all very well for the minister to remind us that jobs are obviously being created, but the fact remains that Statistics Canada has shown that the rate of unemployment has gone up. The Minister of Finance speaks of all provinces, in which of course we are interested, but I represent Quebec, and it is undergoing difficulties: it has been proved that it will pay dearly for the budgetary cuts. As the minister knows that province well, I am asking him whether he has compensatory measures to offer with a view to remedying that situation which in the last 30 days has grown to seemingly disastrous proportions, especially in the case of Quebec.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the budgetary cuts we made in August were made right across the board, the same all over Canada. If Quebec is experiencing particular difficulties at this time, much of it can be blamed on the provincial government policy that scares both capital and people away from Quebec; if Quebec offered much greater political stability than it does now, its economy would be much healthier.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on another supplementary. The minister claims that Quebec's policy is scaring capital away; how then can he explain the fact that, looking at the figures for last year, the province of Quebec had 6,000 fewer unemployed then than it has today, at this point in time?

Mr. Chrétien: That may be true, but the hon. member should compare the present situation with what it was two years ago when Quebec had a federalist government.

Mr. La Salle: No, they have been in power for two years!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance regarding his own difficulties in forecasting, particularly with reference to the unemployment situation which, any way you look at it today, is bad in real numbers with more than one million unemployed.

At the House committee this morning, when dealing with the operations of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey made specific reference to the fact that in dealing with job creation we must expand the economy, especially our exports. I should like to ask the minister whether the government now has any new measures, in the form of either fiscal or monetary policies, such as decreasing Canadian interest rates, in order to expand the Canadian economy and produce more jobs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, monetary policy has been established by the governor of the Bank and I have agreed with that. It is very important to maintain the flow of capital, and in order to maintain stability of our currency it is important that we have these interest rates. There is no discussion at this time between myself and the governor of the possibility of reducing interest rates in the immediate future.

Mr. Broadbent: What the minister is saying, Mr. Speaker, is that the unemployment situation is going to get worse, not better. In this context I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In order to decrease our serious unemployment level and to alleviate our balance of payments problem, the governor of the Bank of Canada agreed this morning with something we have been saying for months, namely, that we have to expand our trade. Bearing in mind that one of the major impediments to increasing our exports is the branch plant nature of so much of Canadian manufacturing, and in view of the fact that the minister said on Friday "our efforts to promote long-term sales are getting cut off by foreign-owned company policies", I would like to ask what specific steps the government is taking to stop branch plant companies from using Canadian-generated profits to drum up business for their parent companies either in the United States or in other foreign lands?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I intend to follow through on what I said on Friday. We are looking at this whole aspect. We have three or four isolated cases where we are, in a way, assisting the export of a commodity to a foreign country. In reply, that foreign company has indicated that it wants more of that product, but the multinational company's operation in Canada has had to tell us that it must direct those future sales to its parent company. As I said, we are taking steps to correct this and I hope to have a further statement on that whole aspect later on.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, given the government's guidelines that it has had on the books for over four years now and which it has not enforced at all, I would like to ask the minister two things: First, will he name the companies involved which he referred to last Friday; and secondly, of equal importance considering that last year branch plants of foreign-owned firms in Canada shipped out more than $4 billion in royalties, management fees and interest payments, will the minister assure the House that the government intends to get specific commitments from such companies that they will, for example, perform a certain percentage of their research and development in Canada and export a certain percentage of their products from Canada where they are making the profits, instead of from the parent company whether it is in the United States or elsewhere?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I would not want the hon. member or this House to believe that I think branch plants are a bad thing. That is not the case at all. In fact, there is not a community in Canada that would not allow the development of a branch plant in its area. I receive requests all the time from community leaders asking if some way or another I can direct a manufacturing plant into their community to assist growth and employment in their area.

What I did say was that there are some multinational corporations which must abide by the rules laid down by their parent company and which do not appear to be very conducive to Canada's export trade in the years ahead, and that we are taking steps to correct that aspect.

With regard to research and development, we would like to encourage its growth as much as possible in Canada, but we must have the end product of research and development, which is that it creates jobs. We must look at research and development in terms of creating jobs, and then the product of that research and development creating many more jobs.

INQUIRY WHETHER REPORT ON DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR HAS BEEN PRESENTED

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On November 8, 1978 I asked him whether chartered banks had anything to do with the decline of the dollar. At that time the minister informed the House that the superintendent of banks was conducting some kind of inquiry to find out. Is the minister now in a position to tell us whether there has been any development in this matter? Has the inspector made a report and were our contentions right or wrong?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the opportunity he just gave me to tell the House that the general inspector of banks has reported to me and that he found no irregularity which might have led him to conclude that Canadian chartered banks had speculated on the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Allard: I thank the minister for his answer. Considering that chartered banks had windfall or at least very substantial profits during the year ended in 1978, and given that one among others made a profit of 58.6 per cent, would the minister be in a position to seek a more in-depth investigation on that profit margin, which if not exorbitant looks at least very attractive?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any abuse on that side. There is some competition among the banks. There was perhaps a considerable increase in profits in a given institution but you should always check from what level there was such an increase. If the hon. member has a particular case to submit, I would certainly inquire to see whether there was any abuse, but I have no reason to think so at the present time.

Mr. Allard: In fact, there might have been some abuse, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure us that he will inquire on that subject?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Toronto I made a speech in which I asked Canadian businesses which are in a better profit position at the present time not to use those profits to issue excessive dividends or to grant salary increases but to use them to reduce the cost of their products, and it would be advisable to use those profits to reduce the cost of loans if necessary, if some banks did make windfall profits.

BOEING CONTRACT—EXPLANATION OF "IMPROPER PAYMENTS"

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and concerns the Boeing pay-offs.

The court of the District of Columbia in the United States, on July 25, 1978, ordered Boeing to file a deposition disclosing "any statistics of two consulting contracts with the same consultant providing for payments of compensation under each contract for the same services, designed to facilitate the payment of money into accounts maintained by the consultant outside his home country."

In reply to this, the Boeing company in a deposition to the SEC stated, inter alia, "The company executed two consulting agreements in connection with aircraft sales in Canada." In view of this, can the Solicitor General explain his remark of yesterday when he said, "I have no indication that any improper payments were made," or does he consider that getting paid a second time for one job and salting the money away in a foreign bank is a proper payment?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I stand by the statement I made yesterday. If the hon. gentleman has any allegation or proof of any allegation that could be investigated further by the RCMP, I invite him to bring it forward.

The investigation has been conducted properly by the RCMP. They have reviewed every lead made available to them. They have reviewed the transcript of the proceedings before the SEC, and they proceeded, in my view, quite extensively in attempting to unearth any wrongdoing. My information is that they have not unearthed any wrongdoing that has been the subject or can be the subject of prosecution.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to clear up a couple of points.

Is it the fact that the Solicitor General knows the individual who received the double payments, but is unable to frame a charge, or does the Solicitor General agree that an illegal act has been performed but he is unable to identify the crook?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking questions that border on the sensational. I simply ask that if he has some basis upon which he can support the allegations he is making, he should advance it.

The RCMP is interested in conducting an investigation to the fullest extent of its capabilities. It has done that, and the result is that there is no charge that can be laid at this time.

I reiterate the invitation to the hon. gentleman: if he has anything to support the allegations he has advanced, or suggestions he is making in this House, he should make them available to the RCMP, or to me, so that—

An hon. Member: He just did.

Mr. McKinnon: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hardly consider it an allegation when the company itself says it has made these payments. Boeing admitted that its payments to countries ranged from $1 million, to a government adviser in Egypt on a sale of $137 million worth of aircraft, to $7.3 million to an in-law of the royal family in Iran on sales of $223 million. Could the Solicitor General tell the House the rough amount of the double payment made to someone in Canada?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is particularizing some allegations with reference to countries that are not Canada. If he has allegations relating to Canada and wishes to put them forward, let him put them forward.

PAYMENTS TO PARTIES INVOLVED IN BOEING CONTRACT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. The Boeing deposition made it clear that payments were made in connection with sales in Canada. The Solicitor General will know that in that period five Canadian companies were involved in sales. By my information, they were the Department of National Defence, of this government, Air Canada, Eastern Provincial Airways, Nordair and Transair.

Can the Solicitor General tell this House which of these arrangements was the admitted payment made by Boeing?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking a question relating to an investigation that has been completed. The fact is that the allegations that were advanced by Boeing before the SEC were investigated by the RCMP. They ascertained there was no fact upon which they could lay any charge or commence any prosecution.

Mr. Clark: A further supplementary question. It may be that is what the police investigation, on a criminal matter, told the Solicitor General. What we in this House are trying to determine is more information about a fact which clearly led Boeing to make allegations on the public record which are very serious and which may touch directly or indirectly upon a government department.

Will the Solicitor General answer two questions: First, does he know the name or names of the person or persons alleged to have received those payments mentioned in the deposition from Boeing; and second, can he tell us in connection with which transaction the payment alleged to have been made by Boeing was made?

Mr. Blais: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The individual who testified before the SEC was a gentleman who was identified as a consultant of Boeing and who was working as a Boeing consultant in Canada dealing with the sale of Boeing aircraft to Canada. Payments were made to that consultant in the ordinary course of dealing with that company.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. To whom did that consultant make subsequent payments?

Mr. Blais: Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is alleging that subsequent payments were made, and he has not any indication that such payments were, in effect, made. If he has allegations of that nature, let him advance those allegations; let him support those allegations and perhaps consult with the hon. member for Victoria so that their stories are not at cross-purposes.

ENERGY

NEB ADVICE ON PROJECTED SUPPLIES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the offer by the Leader of the Opposition to provide Canadian energy resources to Israel and Japan, on his recent around-the-world trip, and the fact that Canadian oil exports to the United States have been sharply curtailed since 1975 and that no new natural gas exports from Canada have been approved since 1970, may I ask the minister if the National Energy Board advised the Leader of the Opposition that there were new Canadian oil and gas supplies available for export to these countries, or was he just having a flight of fancy?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I saw allegations of that kind. I have not seen them yet repudiated by the Leader of the Opposition. Where he got the information from, I do not know.

Mr. Clark: Your seat-mate.

Mr. Gillespie: Certainly, the National Energy Board has not indicated that there is any surplus of oil in Canada. Indeed, we are trying, through the national oil company, to assure the energy security of Canadians for the future. Of course, the Leader of the Opposition is more interested in destroying—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS VIS-À-VIS OPTICAL LENSES

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Yesterday, the minister tabled a report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission entitled "The Ophthalmic Products Industry in Canada" which contained a number of recommendations and conclusions which go toward protecting consumer interests in the Canadian optical industry.

In view of the fact that a great many Canadians will be concerned with the matter if they wear eye-glasses or other optical aids, I wonder if the minister could outline to the House the course of procedure he is willing to adopt with respect to consideration of the report, particularly as it relates to the recommendations on pages 232 to 250?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are presently examining the suggestions in the report and preparing action on them. I cannot say right now which of the alternatives for Canadians would be most appropriate, but that will be made public within a few days.

Mr. Crombie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given that this is not the first time that this matter has been raised, and also given the fact that the report is one week late being tabled by the minister as required by law, could he explain the hold-up and why we have had to wait for so long since this is not the first time?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the story in the Globe and Mail was incorrect. I received the report in my office on January 3, not on December 29 as alleged which would have meant tabling it in the House on February 3. As February 3 fell on a weekend I tabled it February 5 which was the first working day, so it was on time. This morning I had a discussion with the director of investigation for the combines act about that report. He is examining it to see which of the different alternatives would be the most effective to put into operation. He said he would let me know in a few days.

SPORTS

GOVERNMENT GRANTS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). With reference to the minister's announcement of February 2, 1979, offering funding to four cities in Canada for hockey arenas, and since section 4 of the fitness and amateur sport act authorizes the minister to provide grants only in the field of fitness and amateur sport, how does she justify her allocation of more than $18 million over the next four years largely in support of professional sport, when only five months ago she announced a cut of approximately $5.5 million in programs for amateur sport, fitness and recreation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I can see hon. members opposite are opposed to NHL franchise extensions in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I am quite sure that representatives of all of those cities mentioned will be very interested to note the intervention today of the hon. member for Oxford. Obviously the hon. gentleman knows that any high performance sport draws upon a mass participant base.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: If it is the position of the party opposite, the Conservative Party of Canada, that mass participants in hockey in this country should belong to American hockey teams, then I think they should make their point very clear. This government is in favour of seeing more Canadian hockey teams in Canada which will in turn supply work and jobs and a great deal of support for sports at a high performance level in our country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What a phoney.

Mr. Halliday: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the minister be referred to as the "minister of sportness and amateur fits!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, the minister stated in this same news release that the federal government has, and I quote "— the primary role . . . in the development of sport in Canada—". Was this pronouncement based on consultation and agreement with the provinces?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Indeed it was at our last federal-provincial conference that the provinces agreed the primary mandate for fitness and amateur sport was national and the primary mandate for recreation was provincial. I do hope that the hon. member also read the rest of the news release which makes it extremely clear that any usage of these facilities must be provided for amateur hockey players as well as professional hockey players.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY ABOUT HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Since the delay in making a public announcement of the changes in the Canadian Home Insulation Program is putting insulation manufacturers out of production and installers out of business, can the minister explain the delay, and can he assure the House that the $65 million still unspent that was earmarked for this program will be rapidly put to work for the benefit of both home owners and those in the home insulation industry who were lured into the business by government promises of this money?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no delay. The program is in progress and a number of Canadians are taking advantage of it. I hope that the publicity in this regard will explain to Canadians they can insulate their homes, save energy and in the same vein receive some financial support from the federal government to do so.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Is there some flaw in this program which has caused the government to wait so long to announce changes which we understand have already been approved, or is the government waiting to announce these changes when it is convenient for the government politically, instead of when it is useful to the people of the country who are supposed to benefit from it?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, in our discussions with the provinces some of them have suggested changes which represent substantial financial expenditures. The federal government has indicated that if the provinces want to improve the program in making available some extra funds, they could do so, but they should not make proposals to improve the program at the expense of the federal government. We have a program the federal government has put forward and is paying for. We are satisfied that this program meets some of the requirements. However, if some provinces want to improve it, they should do so at their own expense.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED PRICE OF BEEF—MEASURES TO PROTECT CONSUMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister looking into consumer and corporate affairs. As he knows, the price of beef has gone up to the point where farmers are now getting a fair return. Last Friday, in Toronto, beef went up by about nine cents a pound. Supermarkets within hours were putting up the price of beef to consumers by about 18 cents a pound.

I ask the minister if he has had a chance to look into this and investigate why it took only a few hours to raise the price to consumers, when it takes about two weeks to work its way through the system, and why it also takes about two or three weeks for the stores to reduce the price when the farmers receive a reduced price for the same beef?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the hon. member has been looking into this as well. We have started looking into it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: —but I wish to point out to the hon. member that it is much easier to pose those questions than it is to find solutions. This will take a bit of time, but we are very concerned about these matters.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this situation has been happening for years, and every time there is a price increase the minister says he will look into it to see why the mark-up is so high, I ask the minister when is he going to announce to the House his new food policy initiative that he referred to just a few days ago, particularly since wages went up by only six per cent last year and the price of food by about 19 per cent. When will the minister make that announcement, and will the policy include the power to roll back excessively high profiteering and subsidize some of the basic foods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as soon as the new policy is ready, it will be announced. It is not ready yet.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER AGREEMENT HAS BEEN SIGNED WITH QUEBEC CONCERNING IMPROVEMENT OF HIGHWAY 117

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Following a meeting I had with the minister last week because I wanted to know whether it was true that his department had signed an agreement with the province of Quebec regarding improvement of Highway 117 between Val d'Or and Louvicourt, and since he was unable to give me an answer at that time, could the minister tell me today whether it is indeed true—since that announcement was made neither by himself nor by his department, but by the Liberal candidate for the future constituency of Abitibi—that such an agreement was signed?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member that I did check the exactness of that announcement which was originally made from our offices in Val d'Or as well as Montreal and Quebec city. The press release had been issued and sent to local publicity agencies, to local radio and television stations in his region and to the mayor of Val d'Or who, by pure coincidence, happens to be the present Liberal candidate.

TRADE

METRIFICATION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The metric commission has announced that after 1981 Canadian food stores will use the words "ounces" or "pounds" in addition to metric measurements, but in their newspaper and broadcasting advertisements this will be a criminal offence and subject to a fine of up to $1,000. Will the minister review this silly and arbitrary decision of the metric commission and reverse it?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will take a look at it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, that is not the Jack Horner I used to hear in caucus.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As the minister knows, oil companies are now changing their gasoline pumps to metric measurement, and a one cent per litre increase amounts to about five cents per gallon increase. I should like to know what the minister is doing to monitor this changeover to make sure there is not a rip-off. Would he ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to encourage companies to use the comparability standard and show the old price per gallon as well as the metric price, so that the consumer can make comparisons when he buys gas?

• (1450)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): We are presently conducting an information program to help consumers adjust to the new metrication system as it applies to the gas pumps. Under our mandate, we do inspect gas pumps and inspect the prices to see whether they correspond to the amount of gas sold. We already have inspectors in the field doing this. I will bring the hon. member's representation to their attention and see that they follow up the points he made.

STATUS OF WOMEN

EFFECT OF BILL C-14

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Having regard to the demands made by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women as contained in a letter to the minister, wherein the council calls for an immediate change in Bill C-14 which adversely affects women in the labour force, and bearing in mind, also, that this advisory council is a government-appointed group, how is it that the government failed to call upon this group before introducing Bill C-14? Why was it left to the standing committee to call this group as witnesses?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there has never been anything to prevent this particular group advancing its ideas in the same way as anyone else who has suggestions to make with respect to Bill C-14 or amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We did, in fact, receive many representations. I can say, to the credit of the committee to which the hon. member referred, that it saw fit not to adopt a couple of amendments put forward by the opposition which would really have proved discriminatory against women in the work force.

Mr. Clarke: I wish the minister had answered the question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I could ask him to comment on a remark made by an employee of the CAC, who said, "I think it is fair to say we have not done enough study of the place of women in the labour market." Does the minister agree with his official?

Mr. Cullen: Well, Mr. Speaker, we can always find opportunities to do more study. We are, in fact, doing this. The labour market policy division of the department has established five target areas in which we want to show solid answers. We want to set the numbers of women wishing to participate in the work force particularly in skills which are not traditionally associated with women. We have indicated that when placing people in these courses, quotas must be set.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

COST OF METRIC CONVERSION OF WEIGH SCALES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Where did he go?

An hon. Member: He is looking into the mirror.

Mr. Kempling: I will direct it to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In a front-page story, the Financial Post quotes the Retail Council of Canada as stating that metric conversion of weigh scales in Canada will cost $100 million, and that this cost will have to be passed on to the consumer.

In as much as the metric commission has adopted a policy of letting the cost lie where it falls, I would ask the minister whether he discussed with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs the fact that this cost of $100 million will lie on the backs of the consumers.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I think it is rather ironic that the hon. member should be asking such a question, because some time ago when I was in caucus with him he was a very strong proponent of metrication. When I suggested at that time that the changeover affecting the scales would be costly to the Canadian consumer, he assured me that this would not be the case. Today, the tables are reversed. I can tell him that I have looked into this whole question of the scales and the cost of metrication, and I can assure him that the cost is not alarming as at one time I thought it would be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: So I am now in a position to assure the hon. member that he was right in the first instance.

Mr. Kempling: As I say, it all comes back to haunt you, Jack.

Mr. Horner: It is not haunting me.

Mr. Kempling: I have a further question. Would the minister tell us what happened to the idea put forward by the metric commission that this conversion of the scales in Canada would be of such magnitude as to encourage someone in the private sector here to start an industry for the production of metric scales? Can the hon. gentleman advise us whether the metric commission has now changed its mind about this? Is that the reason the Minister of Finance reduced the tariff on imported metric scales—in fact, he reduced the excise tariff by 50 per cent. Why was this course followed, rather than encouraging the manufacture of these scales within Canada?

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Horner: I do not doubt for one minute that the conversion to metric both here and in the United States will greatly enhance the business prospects of many makers of tools in Canada; it will create a new market for them. The same would apply to the scales. It seems to me there is nothing to stop a Canadian manufacturer getting into the manufacture of metric scales. There will be a demand for them. Given the edge which Canadian manufacturers enjoy in this area, I still think we are able to compete very well.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN SUPPLY OF STEEL

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that steel for Canadian users is currently in short supply, what steps is the government taking to ensure that Canadian steel users get priority so that greatly-needed jobs in the manufacturing sector are not lost?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am fully aware of the shortage of steel in Canada which is due, to a large extent, to our increased exports of steel and our ability to compete with the United States steel industry. However, we are trying to assure supplies to Canadian manufacturers who need steel and we are making a strong effort to assist them in getting supplies from Canadian steel mills.

TRADE

POTENTIAL OF TRADE WITH CHINA

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Following his trade mission to China, can the minister outline Canada's prospects for trade with that country and the steps he is taking to inform Canadian businessmen of its potential? How does he intend to assist Canadian businessmen to take advantage of it?

Mr. Speaker: I shall have to ask the minister to confine himself to a very brief answer.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is such a wide subject, Mr. Speaker, that it is very difficult to confine myself. Let me say this: the Chinese are coming to Canada to buy wheat this month. They are coming here again in March to look at our telecommunications systems. They are also coming here in April to look at other materials which we can sell them. We are going to China this month in connection with an oil deal. A group of engineers is going there to look into the possibility of assisting them in the iron ore industry. In March, a group of businessmen connected with the non-ferrous metal industry is going to China to find out whether we can sell them non-ferrous equipment—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL REVENUE

CUSTOMS INSPECTIONS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct questions to the Minister of National Revenue. I believe he received notice about them about three hours ago. They have to do with the policy of his department as it applies to Customs inspection.

Last Tuesday night, of 49 passengers who disembarked at Regina from a charter flight, 41 were cleared and the others had to go to Calgary, stay overnight and come back the next day because they could not get cleared through Customs. I want to ask the minister what the policy of the department is at airports such as Regina with regard to clearing charter flight passengers after Revenue Canada has received advance notice of the arrival of those passengers.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): I might say I have also had a chance to talk to the hon. member for Assiniboia about this problem. There is some justice on both sides in this matter. The air carriers going into Regina fully understand that the facilities there have been limited to accommodating 40 passengers. PWA knew about this and did not advise the Regina Customs clearance people that there would be more than that. When they arrived, the Customs officer interpreted the rules with excessive strictness.

• (1500)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: I can say, without hesitation, that an apology has been given by the department. Obviously, the officer acted with undue strict adherence to the rules, but I might also say that PWA has apologized for not notifying the airport that it would be arriving with more than the limited number to which I referred.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that in the security area at the airport at Regina, 130 passengers can be held and they can be moved ten at a time into the Customs room.

Will the minister refund to those passengers any extra expenses they had to pay for hotel rooms and meals because of something which the minister blames on somebody in Regina but the fault for which actually is in Ottawa?

Will the minister provide refunds to those persons and, after this, when there are more people than the number indicated by airlines or travel agencies, will the matter be taken up with those airlines or travel agencies and not taken out on the passengers?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, as I said—I hope I implied this—in a future circumstance of this kind when there is a misunderstanding I hope the officers responsible will act with a degree of common sense which perhaps was not shown in this case. Nonetheless, I reiterate that the airline knew full well the limit there was to the servicing facilities involved. We are looking at the Regina airport because I think there is clearly a case for an expansion of the number—

Mr. Benjamin: Tell that to Otto.

Mr. Abbott: My colleague is fully aware of this, but at the moment the policy is being reviewed as to the total number which can be accommodated. However, I cannot undertake at this time to offer any compensation.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—ALLEGED USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that yesterday I drew to your attention the choice of language which was used by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and I thought he might rise today to respond to the invitation extended both by yourself and by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). Yesterday I did not have the benefit of reading the exchange which took place. I did, however, raise my point of order at that time on the basis of my best recollection. I drew attention to the fact that the minister had accused me of distorting the facts and of being irresponsible in interpreting a statement which he had made in the House on December 5, 1977. In examining yesterday's Hansard I find that the minister not only suggested distortion but also accused me of insisting on distortions. At page 2869 of Hansard the minister is recorded as having said the following:

> Once again, the hon. member insists on distorting the situation terribly—

Later the minister said that I was "restating what is false", and he asked me to "stop stating these falsehoods". Yesterday Your Honour suggested that the matter should be held in abeyance, and Your Honour anticipated that perhaps the minister might respond today. He has not risen in his place, so I wish to raise the issue again on the basis of having examined yesterday's Hansard.

I see two issues in this matter. I see a responsibility on the part of the minister to put the facts of the matter into an accurate perspective. I attempted to do that yesterday. I put on the record the statement to which I had referred in my question, that statement being found at page 1534 of Hansard for December 5, 1977, which is the following:

> I have instructed that additional inspectors be hired and a significant number of them made available to the north.

Point of Order—Mr. Mazankowski

Yesterday in response to the question I posed, the minister suggested or implied that his commitment to hire additional inspectors was in relation only to the northern part of Ontario. He suggested, therefore, that I was distorting facts and stating a falsehood.

However, on the basis of the information we have there has clearly been a reduction in the number of inspectors since that time, and the statement the minister made as recorded at page 1534 indicates distinctly and categorically that he had ordered the hiring of inspectors, some of whom would be assigned to the northern Ontario region but not specifically limited to the northern Ontario region. There is, therefore, a clear contradiction, and I think the minister should recognize that.

I think it is quite clear that the minister was imputing motives when he used these words:

Once again, the hon. member insists on distorting the situation terribly—

First, the minister has no proof of that. Second, in my view his remarks were clearly unparliamentary.

Citation 320(2) of the fifth edition of Beauchesne, which has just recently been issued, states at page 105:

Since 1958, it has been ruled unparliamentary to use the following expressions:

Then at page 106 we find under the heading "distort" the words "deliberate distortion" and "deliberately distorted". The word "false" is dealt with at page 107, and the words "false statement" are included. In my opinion the words "the hon. member insists on distorting the situation terribly" have the effect of implying the same meaning as "deliberate distortion". To ratify that assumption I refer Your Honour to the Concise Oxford Dictionary and the definition of the word "deliberate" which, in short form, is "intentional". The meaning of the word "insist", according to the Concise Oxford Dictionary , is "to maintain positively". In my view both expressions involve an intention. If "deliberate distortion" is unparliamentary, I believe it is unparliamentary because it imputes to an hon. member an intention to distort. To maintain positively is to intend to distort, and therefore in my view that language is just as offensive or just as unparliamentary as the word "deliberate".

I believe that in his somewhat usual intemperate outburst the minister was perhaps overcome by emotion and a little sensitive to the situation. However, as one who is very distinguished in the field of law as a law professor and as one who should certainly be setting an example by obeying the laws of the land and the rules of parliamentary tradition, I think the minister should do the honourable thing and withdraw his offensive words. Because there clearly was a deliberate attempt on his part to impute motives, and I was not doing that.

My question was phrased with the utmost sincerity. The matter of aviation safety in Canada is very important. It is rather unfair of the minister to suggest that it was an attack to deliberately destroy or malign statistics and interpretations which might or might not have been placed upon his statement. So I certainly suggest you consider it, sir, and if you find that the words are unparliamentary—I believe they are—then I think the minister should do the honourable thing and withdraw his remarks.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

● (1510)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has now switched from a discussion of a point of order along the lines he raised yesterday to raising some issue in relation to parliamentary and unparliamentary language. I do not know whether or not he gave notice of it to Your Honour, but he certainly did not to me. I have not reflected on the language and cannot deal with that matter at all, so I will simply content myself with dealing with the point of order which the hon. member raised yesterday.

Surely any fair minded member would realize that I was reacting strongly to a suggestion by the hon. member that I had been in breach of a commitment. I did react strongly because I knew that that could not be true. I did not have the words and the passages before me to which the hon. member had referred because he did not give notice of the fact that he was going to refer to them; but the hon. member had those passages before him, and in particular, as he noted yesterday, he relied on words of mine quoted in Hansard at page 1534 where I am reported to have stated:

I have instructed that additional inspectors be hired and a significant number of them made available to the north.

If the hon. member has asked me whether I had done as I had committed myself to do, namely, instruct that additional inspectors be hired and a significant number of them be made available to the north, he would have received a firm, positive answer that I did so. He did not ask that question, perhaps because he knew that the answer was indeed positive. But clearly he has no evidence whatsoever—

An hon. Member: You are imputing motives.

Mr. Lang: —of any breach of commitment on my part. I say that when using those words, he twisted them to mean that I was in breach of a commitment which he alleges I made in relation to the number of inspectors. He was being unfair. Whether or not being unfair is unparliamentary, I do not know, but I think the record stands. I think it is a little unfortunate that instead of trying to find the facts on presumably what he thought was a serious issue and asking questions about facts, he insists on raising the issue whether or not there was a commitment. My words on which he relied were:

I have instructed that additional inspectors be hired and a significant number of them be made available to the north.

I gave those instructions, and indeed a good number of inspectors were hired and an additional number has been made available to the north. Those are additional facts which he might have obtained had he asked the appropriate question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has raised a point which relates to answers given by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) yesterday, and taken initially as a point of order based on the fact that the minister had left an impression by his answers which was inaccurate in terms of his position. That was the point of order which was originally raised. Both members have now returned to this matter and it remains essentially a strong disagreement between them. Each is entitled to his position. I would not want to try to classify that disagreement between him and the minister, who now insists that his position yesterday was right, as does the hon. member. That is a disagreement, no matter how strong, to which both members are entitled, and that is what this debating chamber is for. Therefore, I would not want to enter into that as a point of order.

However, today the hon. member has raised, as part of his discussion from yesterday, the reference by the minister to two terms in his answers yesterday, one having to do with a deliberate distortion, the other having to do with returning or insisting on returning to a falsehood which the minister says he is not prepared to argue, and naturally I accept that he is not prepared to argue that point today.

My initial impression, from looking quickly at the precedent that was cited by the hon. member today, is that, without having carefully examined the context in which they were used, these words tend to be unparliamentary; but they may not be so in the context. In any case, I think the minister should have a chance to direct his attention to that language to determine for himself whether or not it is unparliamentary. I will do the same, and perhaps within the next day or two, at an agreeable time, if he wishes to argue further, he may do so; if not, I will ask him to withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the matter deserves your further attention or indeed that of other members of the House.

An hon. Member: You cannot dictate to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: I know that you will either find that the words are parliamentary, and that will be the end of it, or you will find that they are unparliamentary, and in that case you will indicate that it would be appropriate for me to withdraw them, and of course I would then withdraw them. So I would perhaps settle the issue now by saying that if there is anything in those words that is found to be unparliamentary, I will obviously withdraw them; but I think my answer today meets my point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think I can say to the House that on the face of it, without examining the matter further, those expressions at least would come close enough now that, out of an abundance of caution and in order to safeguard decorum in the House, it would be the right thing for me to do to make a preliminary finding that they would appear to be unparliamentary, to ask the minister formally to withdraw them, and the matter would then be closed.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to do that. As I said, I do not think it deserves either your time or mine.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister has made it clear that he abides by that finding and he has withdrawn the language.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And he has been gracious about it, too!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved that the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, presented to the House on Thursday, December 21, 1978, be concurred in.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I would argue on a point of order that this report of the standing committee is out of order, and that therefore the motion to concur in it cannot be debated. First, I would refer you to Beauchesne, citation 323(1), which reads as follows:

> A committee report may be ruled out of order though it has been received by the House, and the motion to concur therein cannot be entertained.

Now the thrust of this particular quotation is quite clear—that the simple fact that a committee report has been accepted in this place does not mean of itself that the report is in fact in order. I will argue that the motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is out of order.

First of all, I should like to quote Beauchesne's citation 304, subsections (1), (2) and (4), to prove my point. Citation 304(1) reads as follows:

> A committee can only consider those matters which have been committed to it by the House.

Quite evidently Bill C-204 does not include any reference whatsoever to the matter referred to the committee in the motion, that is, the penitentiary system dealing with children and adults. The bill does not even touch that particular matter, and therefore the committee has given consideration in preparing this motion to a subject that has not been referred to it, and it is not entitled to do so.

Citation 304(2) reads:

> A committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference. In the case of a select committee upon a bill, the bill committed to it is itself the order of reference to the committee, who must report it with or without amendment to the House.

● (1520)

Under this subsection of Beauchesne, quite clearly the report before us is neither an amendment nor a report of the bill referred to the committee. It is quite evident the report is neither an amendment to Bill C-204 nor a report respecting Bill C-204. For those reasons, it goes beyond the terms of reference of the particular committee.

I should like to refer to citation 304(4) of Beauchesne's fourth edition which reads as follows:

Sometimes a committee may have to obtain leave from the House to make a special report when its order of reference is limited in scope.

This is a very operative section of Beauchesne because it makes very clear that under circumstances such as we face today in the House, if a committee wishes to expand its terms of reference or go beyond the terms it already has in making a report or in any other activity, then it must seek leave of the House to do so. Therefore, it is quite clear unanimous consent would be required before the motion of concurrence can be put to the House. I suggest this motion cannot be put without such concurrence.

Further, the committee has gone beyond its terms of reference by using the words of the motion itself, which seems to be quite evident when it considered the advisability of amplifying and enlarging its said reference. This seems to be a very open and tacit admission that in fact an attempt is being made by the motion to go beyond and enlarge the committee's terms of reference, which attempt is prohibited under the rules of the House. In passing the second report, the committee is admitting openly that it is attempting to go beyond the terms of reference given it by the House.

In my judgment, this motion is one without clear direction and meaning. I find it very strange that the second report requests the House to consider the advisability of amplifying and enlarging its said reference. That seems to be very strange wording. If in fact the motion were put, and if concurrence with the report were accepted by the House, it would not really do anything. It would not do anything because the motion would not enlarge the terms of reference of the committee. The motion is not directed toward the committee; it is directed toward the House's considering the advisability of such a matter. I do not know the mechanism the House would have before it to consider the advisability. Even on that practical ground, I would say that the motion of concurrence would have no meaning in terms of achieving an expansion of the terms of reference of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

This motion for concurrence cannot be put at this time under the rules of the House, under the precedents I have cited, and therefore the motion cannot be debated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know if it is necessary to go into a lengthy discussion on this point of order, but we can set aside one part of the argument immediately. I understand the point that a committee seized of a bill in the ordinary motion of reference of a bill to a committee is under somewhat strict terms of reference respecting that. It cannot attempt to launch into other investigations, or probably it cannot even come back to the House. I am not trying to make law, but the precedent cited respecting that is very clear.

In the ordinary course of second reading, when a bill is referred to a committee for clause by clause study, the committee has certain limitations under which it must act and must report the bill back with or without amendment. To begin with, I understand that this is not a situation in which a bill has been referred to a committee, but the subject matter of the bill has been referred. That is an important distinction to start with, because obviously the committee is not under that stricture. That being the case, it is a committee to which a subject has been referred.

When a subject is referred to a committee, and when the committee looking at the subject indicates that it feels constrained by the first term of reference, which is the reference of the subject matter, and that it wants to acknowledge to the House that its terms of reference are restricted, that it is seeking additional powers, and that it ought not to attempt to exercise those powers without the permission of the House, then the committee reports to the House asking the House to give or consider giving those extended powers.

I would have to be persuaded that a committee cannot do so. That would be very difficult to do. A committee seized of a subject matter, which seeks to extend its term of reference and wants additional authority, must come back to the House. Having done so, it reports to the House and indicates; "This is what we have examined, and we find our hands are slightly tied and we need additional power".

For example, I am sure there have been numerous occasions in the past when an order of reference has been given to a committee to examine and inquire into a certain subject matter in Ottawa, and the committee finds that it wants to travel. Properly it comes back to the House and indicates that it would like authority to travel and to hold meetings in various areas of the country; can it do so? Obviously it must be beyond the original terms of reference or the committee would not be coming back to the House for further permission. It cannot do it without coming back to the House, and if it cannot come back to the House to ask, then I do not know what the committee can do or what course it can follow.

This report of the committee does not tie the hands of the House, but I do not think that is the concern of the Chair. In the end the report recommends or asks the House to consider the advisability of extending the committee's terms of reference. Therefore, concurrence in the report would put the House in the position of having to consider the advisability of extending the terms of reference. It does not constitute a motion for an extended term of reference. I accept that point, as I think the House does. But that is not a procedural matter; that is the content of the report. The report is that the committee seeks an extended term of reference.

If the committee were seeking an extended term of reference which might be argued was not in any way relevant to the subject matter, we might be on different ground; but we are not. Obviously if the committee wanted to inquire into something which was entirely without relevance, it might be argued on a matter of relevance that there might be some difficulty.

Basically I must find in the circumstances that this is not a situation in which a bill has been referred to a committee, but rather one in which a subject matter has been referred. It is a situation in which the committee acknowledges it needs or wants an additional term of reference. Also the committee acknowledges that in order to get it, it must first come to the House. That is what the committee is doing by way of this report. I do not see how a committee can be expected to act otherwise. I do not think I could make any ruling which would prevent a committee from doing so, provided that it is relevant.

Finally, I accept the point that concurrence in this report does nothing more than leave the House in the position of considering the advisability of extending the terms of reference. In my opinion, it would not constitute a direction that that order of reference must be taken as having been extended without some additional motion. That would be the disposition I would make.

I do not think we ought to spend a lot of time attempting to enter arguments into that position. I accept the last point that the content of the report is not a directive to the House. Since this is a situation in which a subject matter was referred to a committee, and since the committee acknowledges by this report that it must come to the House for expanded terms of reference, procedurally it is a proper course to follow and the motion should be put.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I am on solid ground. I am not attempting to challenge anything Your Honour may rule. I did not make a very heavy point of this in my remarks, but I would argue that the attempt to expand the reference in fact is not relevant to the bill before the particular committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is no bill before the committee.

Mr. Cafik: Substantially the subject matter deals with the question of a Canadian bill of rights for children. An attempt to deal with the penal system respecting both children and adults in fact is not relevant to the subject matter of Bill C-204.

● (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to await the debate on the motion itself to find out what is intended by that. Certainly the penal system as it relates to children must, by the very terms of the motion, be relevant. Whether in order to inquire into the penal system as it relates to children it is necessary to inquire into it as it relates to adults at the same time, I do not know. In any event, I will reserve in respect of the last point argued by the minister and listen to the debate as it unfolds to determine whether there is any relevancy in respect of the penal system regarding adults. I think, with respect, we should hear the arguments in order to determine whether that last point is valid.

Therefore, I will put the motion of the hon. member. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has moved that the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, presented to the House on Thursday, December 21, 1978, be concurred in.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of my motion which is now properly and procedurally before the House, notwithstanding the intervention of the deputy government House leader, the distinguished and learned Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik). I cannot resist the temptation to say that any time the government has a weak case it puts up the deputy government House leader to make its statement. I am surprised he has not caught on by now, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps he will after today.

What we have before the House, Mr. Speaker, is a motion for concurrence in the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This is necessary for the purpose of conforming with parliamentary procedure. If you scratch away the parliamentary niceties and brush off all the parliamentary foss and look underneath, what you will find is a mini-revolt by one of the standing committees of this House.

What the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, under the distinguished and learned chairmanship of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), is saying, in the words of Howard Beale, is: "We are mad as hell, we are not going to take it any more, we are fed up with being ignored by the government."

Why is the committee acting this way? Why is that standing committee, made up of such distinguished jurists as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), not to mention the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), acting in this way? We even have a "sea lawyer" on that committee from Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, who perhaps deserves some mention in his own right. Why are those members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs interrupting their proceedings under the terms of reference regarding the subject matter of Bill C-204 to report back to the House? As I suggest, ostensibly it is to broaden the terms of reference to include the matter of the incarceration of children and the penal system as it relates to both children and adults.

Why did we feel that was necessary? We felt it necessary because we are involved in a most interesting and meaningful study. The committee is involved, during the first months of the International Year of the Child, in studying the whole question of children's rights and how we as a developed and enlightened nation treat our children.

The question came up during the course of the proceedings on the subject matter of Bill C-204, which I had the honour to sponsor, as to what became of the last order of reference before the committee. What happened to the committee's very learned and comprehensive report on the penitentiary system in Canada? More particularly, what happened to the recommendations contained in the report of the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on the penitentiary system in Canada?

I was not a member of that subcommittee but my colleagues were, and they worked long and hard in the bipartisan way that has become characteristic of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs under its distinguished chairman. They worked long and hard in the pursuit of this order of reference that they received from the House on October 21, 1976.

That committee travelled across the country and visited all of the major institutions in the Atlantic provinces, in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. It even looked at some of the penal institutions in the United States. It brought in its report with recommendations. This is probably one of the most outstanding reports of any standing commitee of this House, and it is an example of what committees of this House can do given the scope and the means to do so by the House.

We who are charged by this House with pursuing the order of reference now before the standing committee and the subject matter of Bill C-204 have the right, indeed the obligation, to ask the government why it did not act upon the recommendations of the subcommittee regarding the penitentiary system in Canada. That is a study that took over a year and cost the taxpayers over $100,000 in travelling expenses.

Mr. Blais: It wasn't much.

Mr. McGrath: The minister says it was not much. I can understand that comment from a minister who is a member of a government which would take away $83 million badly needed by the medical research community in this country, while on the other hand giving $18 million for arenas. I can understand that kind of comment, particularly from—

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The comment I made relating to the $100,000 is that it was not very much in view of the very profitable recommendations we received from the subcommittee.

Mr. Nielsen: Implement them.

Mr. McGrath: I apologize to the minister for misunderstanding him. Perhaps in that same spirit he will be able to get up and tell us why, if this was of such value, he has not acted upon the recommendations contained therein. We will be anxiously awaiting—

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I fully intend to do so.

Mr. McGrath: We will be anxiously waiting to hear from the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) in this regard. The standing committees of this House have become a bit of a joke under this government. The standing committees of this House have become a standing joke. Nobody bothers to go to committee meetings any more. The press does not bother to pay any attention, and government backbenchers, whose first duty it is to maintain the government's majority and a quorum in the committees, do not bother to go. On not one single occasion during the six or seven meetings we held in connection with the subject matter of Bill C-204 did we have a quorum. There were perhaps one or two government members present. The same was true of members of the opposition. I am not making any distinction there. The parliamentary secretaries were usually there because they are paid to be there, and I make no comment on that as the learned Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) does a very good job in committees, and I commend him for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1540)

Mr. McGrath: The fact is that the members of this House are fed up with playing this government's game of sweeping things underneath the carpet by referring them to committees and then ignoring the reports of those committees.

I intend to document this case because we do not want to diminish or take away in any manner the importance of the order of reference now before the committee, the subject matter of Bill C-204, an act respecting a bill of rights for children, but before we proceed to draft our recommendations in this connection we would like to know what the government intends to do with our order of reference. We have heard distinguished witnesses from across the country, we will be hearing from the Human Rights Commission and, if we are lucky, we may even hear from one of the ministers of the government. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) may decide to honour us with his presence although that has not been the case up to now. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), who has a special responsibility in this regard, may even honour us with her presence and tell us what the government proposes to do in the International Year of the Child and address some of the grave injustices which have crept into our system with respect to how we treat our children in this so-called enlightened society.

The fact of the matter is, sir, that we have a right and an obligation before we proceed any further to say, "Hold on, just a minute; before we play this government's game let's go back to the House and ask the government why they have not acted upon our last order of reference, our last recommendations contained in the standing report of the subcommittee into the penitentiary system of Canada.

I have been an active member of committees of this House since I was resurrected in 1968. I objected to the new rules of the House, which at the time were imposed by closure, because by taking out of the House the right to membership in committees we were destroying the very collegiality that was the core of the committee system whereby the committees built up this collegiality and expertise by the tenure of the membership. We have gone a long way in the destruction of that system.

One of the notable exceptions, however, is the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and that is due to some of the distinguished lawyers in the House of Commons. Another exception is the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. These, however, are the only two committees that I can find which do any meaningful work, which have any degree of collegiality and which have built up any degree of expertise within their membership.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And veterans affairs.

Mr. McGrath: And veterans affairs, of course. I can go back, Mr. Speaker, to reports of committees in which I have been personally involved. I can go back to the last order of reference of the subject matter of private members' bills, one of which I had last year. The subject matter of one of the private members' bill dealt with pornography and obscenity under the Criminal Code. We heard witnesses. Indeed, one of the first witnesses we heard at that time in connection with the subject matter of these private members' bills was the former minister of justice. We travelled to Toronto and we saw evidence first-hand. We realized the gravity of the situation, and we made recommendations to the House.

To date those recommendations have not been acted upon. Why? Surely, we have a right to know why the government has not brought in the necessary amendments to the Criminal Code in pursuance of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs as a result of the subject matter of the private member's bill dealing with the whole question of pornography and obscenity.

I can go to another reference to the committee with respect to child abuse which goes back to 1978. The recommendations of that order of reference were again as a result of a private member's initiative. I can document all of the recommendations of that committee which dealt with child abuse. It is a very serious matter and one that we have been seized with in our deliberations of the subject matter of Bill C-204.

Why has the government not acted upon those recommendations? The House thought that it was important enough to refer the matter to the justice committee, and the justice committee thought that is was important enough to hear witnesses and was seized with the urgency of the matter. They thought that it was important enough to bring in meaningful recommendations to the House which the House concurred in and which the government promptly proceeded to ignore. Why? We have the right to ask why the government continues to ignore the recommendations of the standing committees of this House.

I have another set of recommendations, which, if I may modestly say, are a result of my own initiative. They are with respect to a private member's bill which I brought before this House. The House, after a number of debates at second reading stage, agreed to have the subject matter of the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. That is the bill—I am glad to see that the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) is in her seat—relating to amendments to the Broadcasting Act dealing with advertising directed at children. The House and the government thought that it was important enough to refer it to the committee. The committee thought that it was important enough to examine witnesses from all over the country. Indeed, from many different parts of the world experts were brought in and we heard evidence from them. We saw evidence with our own eyes.

As a result of bringing together all this evidence, we as a committee came to the conclusion that advertising directed at children on television was immoral and had no place in an enlightened society such as Canada's. We recommended that it be banned, and our recommendations were concurred in by the House on July 12, 1973 by a unanimous motion. We recommend that the CRTC pass regulations which provide that advertising not be directed exclusively at children. We made other recommendations which I will not take the time to describe, but they are there for all to see.

What has the government done by way of acting on these recommendations which were not only unanimously passed by a committee after exhaustive studies and many witnesses, but unanimously concurred in by the House? Why does the Minister of Communications not stand up in her place in the House, in this the International Year of the Child, and tell us why the government has not implemented the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs passed by the House in July, 1973 requesting that advertising directed at children be eliminated? That was six years ago.

It is interesting and worth noting that only last year the federal communications commission and the federal trade commission in the United States came to the very conclusion that we as a parliamentary committee came to in 1973, that this kind of advertising should be banned. Yet we still have the shame and the scandal of our children being used by the broadcasting industry, the cereal manufacturers, the toy manufacturers and other advertisers as surrogates. The minister bows her head. Perhaps she may address herself to this question. Who knows, she may even hear from them, if she in fact knows about the report and if she knows about what is happening in the United States with respect to the FCC and the FTC regarding their attitude on advertising directed at children, which came about as a result of the study they commissioned. Perhaps the minister will tell us before this debate is over why the government in this the International Year of the Child has not acted upon the recommendation of a standing committee of this House which were unanimously adopted by this House which would end this form of exploitation of children.

Mrs. Sauvé: We do not interfere in content.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications is saying something and I am not hearing her interjection.

Mr. Alexander: I think she wants to get involved in the debate a little later.

Mr. McGrath: Just to cover the whole spectrum since this government took office in 1968, I will go back to the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. In 1969 the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications had referred to it a study of the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces. It would be well for hon. members to look at these recommendations, which are too numerous for me to place on the record. These recommendations, unanimously adopted by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, unanimously concurred in by the House and ignored by the government of the day—the same government that sits over there today—deal with all the major questions of transportation within the Atlantic provinces.

● (1550)

Had these recommendations been acted upon in 1969, I submit to you, sir, that the economy of the Atlantic region would be much healthier than it is today, because transportation lies at the very root of some of the problems plaguing the Atlantic provinces.

The whole question of opening up the Atlantic region, opening up Labrador by a highway system to connect the north shore of the St. Lawrence to Goose Bay, is one of the recommendations that has not been acted upon to this day. Why not, Mr. Speaker? Surely the members of standing committees of this House have a right to know, before we proceed with any further studies and before we proceed with any further recommendations, why the government ignores these recommendations.

That is why this second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is before the House at this time. That is why the committee unanimously, in a bipartisan way, interrupted its proceedings in pursuit of its order of reference on the subject matter of Bill C-204, to get this report before the House so that we could hold the Solicitor General accountable for his failure to act on recommendations with respect to penitentiaries; so that we could hold the Minister of Communications accountable for not acting on recommendations of the broadcasting committee with respect to advertising directed at children.

The members of this House are mad, Mr. Speaker. The hon. lady opposite, for whom I have great respect, cautions me to keep it non-partisan. I am dealing with the government. Our joint grievance is against the government. That, I suppose, by its very nature will make it partisan because I am opposed to the government. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), who was one of the outstanding members of that committee and was most diligent in participating in the penitentiary study, and who has been a good deputy chairman of the committee, is one of the members who will be contributing to the debate today. I am sure she will have her own grievance as to why the subject of the committee report has been ignored.

Surely the whole broad range of this debate has to do with the relevance of parliament itself. I think it can and must be said that, as a result of the rules changes imposed by closure in 1968, parliamentary committees were supposed to assume a new importance. In their legislative capacity they have functioned well in terms of dealing with government legislation. They are very restricted in that particular case, as was enunciated by Your Honour in the ruling on the point of order. But with respect to what should be their equally important function of dealing with the estimates, they have been a dismal failure. We have not influenced or changed one single estimate of this government because the rules do not permit us to do so. Under the rules of the House all estimates are deemed to have been passed and reported back to the House by committees as of midnight on May 31.

What a farce that is, Mr. Speaker. Is it any wonder that government members and opposition members alike are fed up and do not want to be a part of this meaningless charade? That is all it is, Mr. Speaker, a meaningless charade.

I believe that parliamentary committees under our system should have an ongoing investigatory function. Their terms of reference should be laid on the floor of the House at the commencement of each session so that annual reports would be automatically referred to them. There should be an expenditures committee to work in concert with the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in order to examine expenditures on an ongoing basis.

That raises the whole question of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. Where is it? Why has it not been called? Why has the government not brought in a reference to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization? Only the government can bring in such a reference; only the government can manage the business of the House. The committee has not met this session and did not have a chance to report in the last session, notwithstanding the fact that it put together a very meaningful set of recommendations which would change the whole procedure of this House and bring it more in keeping with the live televising of debates which is affecting this place so profoundly.

What we are debating here today is this government's attitude to—one could almost say contempt for—parliament. Certainly, I have tried to demonstrate its contempt for parliamentary committees; it can only be described as contemptuous. How else can we explain the fact that the reference before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs dealing with a bill of rights for children in this the International Year of the Child has not heard from the Minister of National Health and Welfare who has responsibility in this area, or from the Minister of Justice who has responsibility for the laws of this country? That speaks to their whole attitude toward the committees of this House.

Mr. Young: Neither of them was called.

Mr. McGrath: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General says that neither of them has been called. In the case of the pornography bills that came before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs last year, the first minister to appear was the Minister of Justice and he was not called; he asked to appear. It is not the practice of parliamentary committees to call ministers. If the minister has a bill before a committee or a subject matter that is in his area, it is his responsibility to be there.

Mr. Young: Neither of those ministers was called.

Mr. McGrath: The parliamentary secretary says that neither minister was called, yet the parliamentary secretary knows full well that when we embarked upon our proceedings both the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lachance) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General indicated that they could not say at that time whether the minister would appear. If I am misreporting what the parliamentary secretary said, I will withdraw it without qualification; but that is my recollection.

Sir, we are mad as hell. We are just fed up with being used by this government as a carpet under which to sweep things they do not want to deal with. I think before we proceed any further with the terms of reference now before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, we have a right to know why the government continues to ignore the recommendations of the parliamentary committees of this House. Until we get this answer I submit to you that the standing committees of this House will not be able to function, because they will not be able to get enough members to constitute a quorum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say first of all that I am very glad to take part in this debate and to speak after the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I want to say immediately to the hon. gentleman that I fully intend to support the motion under review, and that contrary to what he suggested in his remarks, we have already implemented most of the recommendations of the parliamentary subcommittee he mentioned.

● (1600)

[English]

The reasons I support this motion are twofold: First, because this motion before us says a great deal about the importance and urgency attached to the subcommittee report by members of the standing committee, and I share that sense of importance and urgency; second, because I am most concerned with the inaccurate impression left by some of the media, and regretfully by some members of this House, that nothing is being done to implement reforms in the penitentiary system, and that the report of the subcommittee is being ignored by the government.

Let me elaborate briefly on both points. Hon. members will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the subcommittee resulted from a motion made in this House by my predecessor more than two years ago. The subcommittee report was tabled in the House in June, 1977 and each of its 65 recommendations was responded to in an initial way in August of that year. There have been a number of documents tabled before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs relating to the implementation of the recommendations. The latest is the one I circulated at the beginning of this week dated January, 1979 and which I believe each member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has received.

In his initial response my predecessor made known his acceptance in whole or in part of 53 recommendations. He made it very clear that the officers and staff of the Canadian penitentiary service and all others concerned in the ministry of the Solicitor General will spare no effort in the implementation of the recommendations.

In November and December, 1977, the standing committee examined supplementary estimates and on that occasion held several meetings to consider a detailed recommendation-by-recommendation progress report on the implementation. That report was tabled by my predecessor. Just eight days after assuming office, less than one year ago, I attended before the committee. At that time I stated:

> I strongly endorse the statement of support made by my predecessor with respect to the general thrust and philosophy of the report, and I share his sense of urgent commitment to far reaching reform in corrections.

Since last February I have tabled two further recommendation-by-recommendation progress reports: last March at the time of the main estimates, and last November at the time of the supplementary estimates. Further reports are being prepared in readiness for the standing committee's consideration of further supplementary estimates and main estimates for the fiscal year 1979-80. Therefore, I will be appearing before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on the supplementary estimates, which will be tabled shortly, and also on the main estimates. At that time undoubtedly the committee will be examining the progress made in the implementation of the subcommittee's report.

But let us not look at the words contained in those reports; instead let us look at the actions. In spite of the difficulty of introducing major change into a complex system involving over 10,000 employees, more than 9,400 inmates and over 7,000 persons released under supervision, a large number of important changes have already been implemented in the Canadian corrections system since publication of the report. Some of these actions culminated in months or years of preparatory work already under way and given impetus by the report; others responded to specific recommendations contained in the report.

In this regard I will explain more fully. Independent chairmen have been appointed in all maximum security institutions to hear serious and flagrant disciplinary cases. A pilot grievance procedure introduced at the Prince Albert penitentiary in Saskatchewan has proven successful and will be implemented throughout the system this year. Incidentally, that is an undertaking I have given to the committee. An inspector general was appointed last spring. He has now conducted more than ten studies at the behest of the commissioner of the penitentiary. Inmate committees, citizen advisory committees and segregation review boards have been established at almost all institutions.

A major reorganization of national and regional headquarters has taken place, placing the institution under the direct command of a regional director general who in turn is directly responsible to the commissioner. Major new impetus has been given to the industries program to make it more productive, more efficient and more meaningful. Vocational training programs have been re-examined to tie in with the industries program and to get valid accreditation from relevant provincial jurisdiction. Just last week I attended in Vancouver in order to announce the closing of the Kingston prison for women, which again is in accordance with the recommendations of the subcommittee.

The probation period for new employees was extended from six months to 24 months. A new code of conduct for employees has been developed. That code has been fully discussed with members within the institutions. Five days per year of refresher training for employees has been instituted. This was done notwithstanding the fact that they have had a shortage of man-years of a result of government cutbacks and expenditures. We have had to find individual posts for training positions to accommodate that recommendation, and that was no mean effort on the part of the Canadian correctional staff.

Emergency response teams have been set up in all regions and most institutions. The "no deals" policy on hostage taking has been implemented. A wholly revised construction program was developed saving the taxpayer more than $200 million in capital costs and $60 million per year in operating costs.

New procedural safeguards for parole hearings were instituted in regulations under the Parole Act. Appointments were made of community representatives to parole panels in cases involving dangerous inmates. Treaties were signed for the exchange of offenders with the United States and Mexico in accordance with the Transfer of Offenders Act. Expansion of alternatives to incarceration available in the Criminal Code are contained in Bill C-21 now before the House.

[Translation]

And I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the process to implement the recommendations of Bill C-21 could be speeded up so that we would really profit by the clauses concerning community service orders contained in the bill.

[English]

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, to outline other specific actions which have been instituted and implemented already in response to the report of the subcommittee, but I hope that I have made my point. A great deal has already been accomplished. I could also go on to outline other actions that are near to being implemented, but perhaps that kind of enumeration should await the meetings to be held by the standing committee as a result of passage of this motion, if it is so passed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the minister?

[Mr. Blais.]

Mr. Blais: First I would like to complete my remarks before entertaining questions from the hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: It will not be necessary then.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: I find this a highly interesting question because the hon. member for St. John's East said that he had a responsibility, as member of the opposition, to oppose, and that regarding this report he had to take a stance. At least that is how I understood it, that he had to take a stance as an adversary, as a legitimate member of the opposition, and I recognize that. But as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) indicated, there is a tendency among committee members not to take a partisan view but rather to try to improve the penitentiary system in collaboration with all members of parliament.

I certainly think that this should continue, but when I list all the advantages and all the basic changes we have introduced in the penitentiary system, I really question the intentions of opposition members who sit on that committee, because I am entirely committed, along with my officials, to implement changes according to the subcommittee's recommendations. I am fully committed to that and that has been one of my major concerns this past year. But when I see the lack of understanding shown by some opposition members in my own good faith and that of officials of the Canadian correctional service, I wonder if opposition members are really interested in ridding themselves of their partisanship and undertake the reforms suggested in their report.

● (1610)

[English]

Now for the second reason I support the motion. Because I had dedicated a great deal of effort over the past 12 months to implementation of the theme of the subcommittee report, and because I have seen at first hand the amount of effort put into its implementation by members of the Canadian correctional service it is with some degree of disappointment and frustration that I listen to suggestions that the government is doing nothing to further the goals set out by the parliamentary subcommittee. To my mind the frustration has been mutual because, undoubtedly, there has been frustration on the part of the committee. I have already recounted the support lent to the main theme and principles of the subcommittee report both by myself and by my predecessor. The main theme of the report, that of establishing and maintaining both a pervading attitude and a reality of professional discipline in corrections, is woven throughout the report's 200 pages, just as it unites the large number of specific initiatives taken by the government in response to the report. As I mentioned a few moments ago, we have already introduced several measures aimed at the creation of a highly disciplined, professional, career-oriented corrections service of the kind envisaged by the subcommittee.

I would be less than frank, however, if I failed to mention that in taking our responsibilities under the Penitentiary Act, and in consequence of the system of responsible government under which we operate, it became clear to my predecessor and myself that some of the specific means suggested by the subcommittee were not the most appropriate or the most effective toward reaching the ends upon which we were all agreed. Because of this, I believe the altogether mistaken impression has been formed in some quarters that reform is not proceeding.

Perhaps I could give two examples. On December 10, 1978 I announced that the five-year construction program upon which the corrections service had embarked was undergoing major revision. In line with that revision a drastic cutback was made in the number of new institutions being planned, saving the taxpayer more than $225 million in capital costs and more than $60 million a year in operating costs. As part of the revision a decision was made to increase the maximum size of new institutions to 350 to 450 inmates, instead of the 250 inmates contemplated in the earlier program.

As I have pointed out, this decision as to capacity contrasted with earlier government policy and with the specific recommendation of the subcommittee, which supported the position taken earlier by the government. However, the earlier decision had not been supported by solid evidence that the smaller institutions were more effective in attaining correctional goals. In fact, the CCS undertook studies which revealed that no such evidence existed.

It is my view that a number of factors affect the success, or lack of success, of correctional institutions but that size is not the most important of these factors. Maybe it is not a very important factor at all, especially when we are talking not of a choice between small institutions and the huge 2,000 plus institutions which many American states operate, but rather of a choice between institutions of 250 inmates and institutions which have the capability of being expanded, should the demand warrant it, to a maximum of 450 inmates. I have made it clear that program quality would not be allowed to suffer, and I have also stressed the point that the living unit concept, another of the CCS policies supported by the subcommittee, would be used in all the new institutions. That is something on which I have insisted. In all the new buildings, even those designated as maximum security, the living unit concept is to be introduced.

I am sorry to say that some have interpreted this decision as a rejection of the fundamental philosophy contained in the subcommittee report. Most assuredly it is not. And this will not be the effect. It is because I am eager to clear up this confusion and correct this interpretation that I support the motion before us. I shall be willing to address this question fully when I appear again before the committee.

There have been suggestions that I have been interested in cutting back offender programs. To the contrary, hon. members will see from the close questioning of myself and my officials that I have been adamant in proceeding with the development of offender programs.

Let me give a second example. The subcommittee made several recommendations dealing with the organization and management of the correctional service, and of these recommendations 24 and 26 formed the core. The main import of this second recommendation was to remove the corrections service from the public service so as to give it the kind of independence, identity and flexibility which the subcommittee saw as being essential to its reform.

Both my predecessor and myself felt some initial misgivings about that package of recommendations, not because we did not approve the goal being sought—we did share that goal and we said so very clearly—but because we were not convinced that the means suggested by the subcommittee were the best for achieving it. My predecessor established a senior interdepartmental working group to examine that package of recommendations. I have received its report and, after studying the issue myself, I have concluded that a different set of measures would better enable us to establish the kind of highly disciplined, more independent professional career service which is the ultimate objective.

On this question, I frankly admit a fundamental difference in opinion with the subcommittee. The subcommittee recommended that the CCS be removed from the jurisdiction of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act and set up on the model of the RCMP. However, it was silent on the question of the acquired union rights of CCS employees.

I would argue that the subcommittee did not adequately think through the implications of this crucial distinction between the CCS and the RCMP. We must bear in mind that only one third of the CCS staff are guards. The CCS has been unionized for more than a decade; the RCMP, never. If the recommendation of the subcommittee were implemented literally, the CCS would automatically come under the jurisdiction of part IV of the Canada Labour Code which gives the employer rather less control in certain areas than do the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act.

• (1620)

In the alternative, CCS employees would have to be stripped of many rights acquired and exercised for more than a decade. This drastic step was never advocated by the subcommittee, and with reason, because advocating such a step would mean that it would be impossible to manage the Canadian correctional service. There would be a very negative reaction within the service which would detrimentally affect morale within that service and the whole operation of the Canadian correctional service.

In light of this I suggested to the standing committee as long ago as last March that a number of very significant steps can be taken within the current framework of employer-employee relations to bring about the result both the committee and I are eager to achieve.

The steps are as follows: Establish in legislation a new and distinct corrections "family" category for all employees providing for the care, custody and training of offenders; establish the CCS as a separate employer under the law, thus giving the CCS direct responsibility and accountability for collective bargaining and staff relations; including the new code of professional conduct in regulations under the Penitentiary Act; fully delegate staffing authority for the new employee category to the CCS from the Public Service Commission, thus enabling the CCS to recruit more directly and more in accordance with its own needs and priorities.

Implementation of this package of changes will further the development of the disciplined professional career service the subcommittee was aiming for. It is a very complex and large task to introduce such major changes into a large scale, highly decentralized and very complex organization with, to say the least, a difficult operating mandate to pursue, but this work is proceeding apace, as I will be glad to demonstrate to the standing committee.

The point of all this is that the quite erroneous interpretation has been placed on these developments that the subcommittee report is being rejected or, perhaps worse, ignored by the government because these differences over specific means have appeared. This impression is one I very much regret, and it is also one I wholly reject.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, obviously there is a misunderstanding here because the reservations I expressed at the first meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on two of the basic recommendations have been given a false interpretation. These reservations have been interpreted as a complete rejection of the entire report. That is not at all the case. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, even as far as recommendations numbers 24 and 26 are concerned, I fully support the principle underlying them and, if I may say so, I am fully geared to implementing them. Mr. Speaker, I would like the House to realize all the efforts that not only I but all my officers are making to implement those recommendations.

[English]

Furthermore, I think it is a most dangerous impression, as the subcommittee itself pointed out, because a great deal of the success or failure of reform depends heavily on attitudes.

I have tried today to stress the fact that penitentiary reform is the most important of the responsibilities I have as minister responsible for the CCS. I have also gone to some length to give my view of the basis for what I see as a major and regrettable misinterpretation of some of the actions of the government and of the government's intentions in this regard.

[Translation]

I shall not go any further today, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want to create controversy. I would like to persuade my colleagues on both sides of the House that I intend to implement the recommendations of the committee, that despite the allegations made by the hon. member for St. John's East. I do recognize that the rules of the House make it possible to undertake a thorough study of the recommendations to further implement these recommendations. We are prepared to appear before the committee at its request in order to justify our course of action, our implementing these recommendations. I simply urge hon. members on this side as well as on the other side to recognize that we operate within a huge, very complex system and that such fundamental changes as those put forward by the subcommittee are indeed very difficult to achieve. I further urge hon. members to recognize that these changes require a great deal of attention, of patience, of tolerance, of understanding from all the involved and interested parties.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) wish at this time to ask the question he wanted to put?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the question I had in mind will not be relevant now because the minister passed over the stage in his speech where it would have been, but I want to clarify something else of great importance. The minister said two or three times during his remarks that the government would be voting for the motion. Having regard to the remarks of the Chair before debate on the motion began, does that mean that the government will be voting for the motion in its present state and in its present wording?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am not absolutely a procedural purist but, as I understand it, we are dealing with the motion which is before the House, and that is the motion I intend to support.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should say initially that I am very pleased that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has indicated that he intends to support the motion. I think we should get into some discussion, subsequent to the vote, on the specifics of the reference with respect to the penitentiary system which has taken up the entirety of the remarks of the Solicitor General. Perhaps we should think about a limited one-month reference. I would like the Solicitor General to consider a travelling option for the members of the subcommittee. It is absolutely vital that the subcommittee have an opportunity to examine, on the ground in the penitentiary system, the impact of all the changes the Solicitor General says he has made and which we have adopted. The Solicitor General could rise in his place now, if he will permit me to complete my remarks subsequently, to demonstrate his sincerity and to say that he is now willing to allow the subcommittee travelling privileges and the opportunity to visit maximum security institutions once more to determine whether any change whatsoever has taken place, and what the extent of that change is.

Mr. Hogan: Get up and tell us, J.-J.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I will not deal with the question of relevance. Since the Solicitor General did not mention the word "child" in any of his remarks, I presume that is no longer a question, and I hope that I will have the permission of the Chair to deal with the same specific subjects dealt with by the Solicitor General.

On the matter of how much of this report has been adopted and how much has not, I think it is important to remember that there are 65 recommendations of varying value. Some of those recommendations are very minor; they are easy to accomplish. Some of them recommend very serious changes, and the committee knew that that would be more difficult and would take a longer period of time. However, I submit that on any fair evaluation of the reaction to this unanimous report only tinkering recommendations have been adopted, and I think this committee will find, when it goes back inside the penitentiary system, that there has not been any change at all. In fact, I would go further and say that we in this country are in danger of being in the kind of situation we were in when the subcommittee commenced its investigation in 1977. I worry about the reports which are emanating from the maximum security systems. I worry about the potential for another crisis in the system.

One of the difficulties in trying to determine what the government's reaction to the report has been is, as I say, the value of the various recommendations. This was a bipartisan committee. It was a non-partisan committee, with more than two parties represented. I am sure that was a slip of the tongue on the part of my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). It is vital that we look at the initial unanimous reaction of the committee to the study, and that was that a crisis exists within the Canadian penitentiary system. It was on the word "crisis" that the government demurred; the government said they cannot agree there is a crisis in the system.

From that point on the reaction of the committee members was one of disappointment, because we had looked at it on the ground and we felt that perhaps the government should have accepted the reaction of the committee members who had spent such a long time on the study. We had visited 17 institutions and interviewed 2,000 witnesses; it was a very extensive study.

It is interesting also to remember that none of the members of that committee got everything they wanted in that report. Compromises were made by all members of the committee, but we felt that in the interests of the country we should bury our differences which we have in the House from time to time, and we found the things on which we could agree for the good of the system and the good of the country. That is why we have been concerned about the fact that the Solicitor General does not have the same kind of reaction, the same kind of concern, that we have in looking at it on the ground.

The Solicitor General indicated in his remarks that he had just been out west where he had announced the phasing out of the women's prison, but I do not recall whether he had had a visit with the guards of, for example, the British Columbia penitentiary while he was there putting out his press release and having interviews on radio and television. I am not sure whether he did a tour of the B.C. pen, but if he did not he should have because one must be inside those institutions to know what is going on. There is no value in relying on rumour and all the things that emanate from there; you have to be on the ground.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order with reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. May I say that I have been to the B.C. pen and I also took the opportunity when I was in Vancouver to announce that I fully intend to close the B.C. pen in order to alleviate the concerns of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Leggatt: My apologies to the minister, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware he had actually toured the B.C. pen and I give him credit for having done so. However, I think he should also have met with the correctional officers in that institution because they have some serious grievances they want to take up with the Solicitor General.

In any event, let us examine which recommendations have been adopted and which have not. Let us take a look at the record. On August 5, 1977, the then solicitor general said: "I have accepted 53 of the recommendations in whole or in part." In February of 1978, the present Solicitor General said: "Thirty-seven of the recommendations have been implemented or are in the process of being implemented." Now we are down to 37. Again, in October of 1978 the Solicitor General said: "As of the end of October, 1978, 22 recommendations have been completely implemented."

Let us examine what really happened. Of those 22 recommendations implemented by the end of October, 1978, two were implemented as pilot projects, one was rejected but called implemented and at least three implementations are questionable: The staff and inmates identification tags, the no deal rule on hostage taking, the completion of post-analysis and dual responsibility for programs and security matters for all staff. This leaves a total of 14 recommendations implemented of the 65 over a period of a year and eight months since the subcommittee reported to the House.

I am sure the Solicitor General and I can get into a rather lengthy debate about the quality of implementation and about what implementation really means. I accept that as probably the kind of argument anyone can have, but the reality is that a careful analysis of the report still leaves only 14 recommendations implemented and the major recommendations have not really been touched.

Let me give some examples. When we recommended early retirement for those who work within the institutions, we asked: Why should the RCMP have a special advantage in terms of their pension when someone who works inside those institutions, who faces hostility every day and who has one of the toughest jobs in the country has to serve until he is 60 years old? We found a great many people within the institutions who deserve to have a chance at a second career or at early retirement. That was absolutely key to doing something about the morale within the institutions. We were seriously concerned about the horribly low morale in the penitentiary system. Where has the recommendations with regard to early retirement gone? That is a fundamental question. If you are changing some of the conditions of the people who work within the institutions, you cannot pick and choose; you cannot take the pieces you like and reject those which, for some reason or other, you do not like. I submit that that has been the attitude of the government.

Let me give another example. The Solicitor General in the course of his remarks mentioned that the department has gone to a regional director system. Allegedly, that was some kind of an acceptance of our report. In fact, it flies in the face of our report; it goes in exactly the opposite direction. We recommended that regions be de-emphasized. We recommended that the director of a penitentiary be master of his own institution. He is on the line, he takes the risks, he must make those important decisions. Instead of regions being phased out, the opposite has happened. There has been an increase of about 20 per cent since our report came out. Not only has there not been acceptance of our recommendations, but decisions have been taken going in the opposite direction. That was why members of our committee have been seriously frustrated by the reaction of the government.

Now I want to deal with a couple of the other recommendations. One of them may be typical of a great deal of what is happening in the Solicitor General's department. It sounds like a minor thing. We recommended that inmates and guards should wear tags to identify themselves in the event of some problem arising, such as a scuffle, an assault, etc. What was the response? We were told that this has been accepted 100 per cent and an order went out that everyone wear name tags. First of all, the guards did not want to wear them, then the prisoners did not want to wear them, so they decided they would make the guards wear them but not the prisoners. In fact, I have recently received a letter from the Solicitor General stating the following:

> Because of these problems, and after extended discussions, it was decided that staff will wear the plastic name tags as part of their uniform, and that inmates will not be required actually to wear name tags but, instead, must have their identification card in their possession at all times and produce it on demand.

Again it is a simple question of morale: Why should one side be required to wear the tags and not the other side? That is how you destroy morale within an institution. That is one of those famous recommendations which we were told has been adopted. A typical kind of reaction was, "We love your report; we are adopting your recommendation". In fact that was not the case. The people have been misled and the country is being misled because of the inadequate response to the report.

I mentioned earlier the concerns about the present condition of the institutions. I will read a letter that came into my hands, and I will not identify the people in it because, as we all know, of the sensitivity within the institution. This letter refers to the present condition of the Millhaven institution. As an ex-committee member I quote from the letter as follows:

> I know and feel the mood of the joint. It's ready to blow and harder than ever before. I don't believe anything can stop it. I am just letting you know in advance. It could make interesting news. Merry Christmas.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

● (1640)

That is typical not of one institution but of four or five maximum security institutions in Canada. Not one serious incident occurred while the committee investigated the institutions of Canada. They were cool, they knew someone cared and was paying attention. They knew that some action was happening regarding these problems. We as members of parliament, the Solicitor General and his department, must go back and convince everyone inside those institutions that we care and will change the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: It cannot be done with three-quarters of an hour of rhetoric in the House. It cannot be done by indicating that it has been adopted, everything is fine, and by throwing around the soft soap. One cannot do that because the penitentiaries are too dangerous. One cannot "con a con". One cannot con people inside those institutions because they live in those conditions and know which changes have taken place. It is important to have another reference. I am not suggesting a long one. It could be a short one. But it is important because again we will be provided with an opportunity to look inside and see whether conditions have changed, whether we can do anything to effect some change in the atmosphere. I do not mean to be overdramatic, but perhaps we can save someone's life. One must remember that many lives have been lost within the Canadian penitentiary service.

I should like to refer to the prison expansion program to which the Solicitor General referred. The government recently cut back the program, but we still are looking at $302.7 million. I do not agree with the philosophy that we should go to larger institutions, because that will not be the absolute key. It is what goes on within the walls which is the important key. I do not believe we should spend another dollar constructing any more prisons in the country until we do something about changing the conditions inside the existing ones.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I agree we need more prisons and that the dungeon prisons need to be phased out at some time, but we cannot phase them out until we have done the hard things contained in the report.

What happened to the prison industry concept? It was one of the more imaginative ideas developed by all committee members. Admittedly there has been some minor progress in terms of the study of this concept. I have not heard how much consultation has taken place with the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and various Canadian industries to ensure that prisoners are productive, that there is a large and massive sale of goods produced by convicts on the market so that prisoners could pay their own way, support their dependants and compensate their victims. It would provide them with opportunities to receive some training and achieve a sense of well-being until they are released. One should make no mistake. There are very few people who will not be back among the public. I have not heard much about such consultation.

In conclusion, I should like to make some comments in support of what was said by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) concerning the frustrations of the committee system. From time to time I have sat on both the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am disappointed that we in the House have not been able to use our committee system more effectively. Because of the fine work of the committee chairman, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), I thought we were making a very interesting beginning. I thought we would be able to say that members of parliament do not sit and think about votes every minute of the day. I thought they could actually sit down and say that we have a national problem. We have identified it, we have seen it. I thought members would agree that we would solve the problem rather than making any more. When a government receives this type of report, it is vitally important that it be taken seriously and adopted. I cannot say that all 65 recommendations should be adopted, but surely the major and key recommendations should be.

When that has been accomplished, we will have gone a long way toward improving the committee system, the House and the manner in which members of parliament can make some positive contribution to the people of the country in general and their own constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: It is the reaction of the Solicitor General and his department to this report which in fact is hurting very badly the committee system of the House.

Of course, I am pleased this motion will be concurred in by the government. I would like the Solicitor General to take an opportunity, as quickly as possible, to specify what the government has agreed to in terms of the new reference. Since the government has adopted the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East, the committee should have no less a mandate than was given to the other subcommittee studying the penitentiary system. I agree there must be a limited time frame, but at least we will have an opportunity to examine the institutions again and see whether there has been any meaningful change.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few comments on the motion introduced by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

First of all, I congratulate the Solicitor General for his good words. He tried to encourage members of the opposition, saying in particular he wanted to see us be non-partisan. I think we have always worked in a non-partisan way in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and I am glad to see he recognizes that we want to be non-partisan.

An hon. Member: That is intelligent.

Mr. Beaudoin: Intelligence comes with non-partisanship.

What I note in the speech made by the Solicitor General is that he says he is prepared to force the officials of his department—he did not quite put it that way but I think that is what he meant—to force the officials of his department to set the main recommendations of the subcommittee on justice and legal affairs in motion. Again I congratulate him but what strikes me is that the only thing new right now is that they want to build other institutions. It seems to me the committee had recommended improving first what is working now in existing institutions—of course, things are going bad in some institutions.

I want to point out two things. First I think that for things to work well in institutions the number of inmates in each should not be increased from 250 to 400 as was recently decided because the committee determined that in an institution where you have 400 inmates it is very difficult to distinguish between those who want to help and better themselves and those who do not.

It is also difficult to separate the character differences of certain inmates. I therefore believe that the minister should consider suggesting to the Prison Guard Association that those who work within our institutions, and especially those who have direct contact with the inmates, not be entitled to belong to a union. In my opinion, as soon as there is a strong union within an institution, the union leaders, which include the president, the secretary and the executive, have a tendency to hide the little things that some of their colleagues can do to upset an inmate whom they do not like very much or whose looks they do not like, and so on. This was proven when we visited penal institutions. To insult an inmate, a guard may doodle on his letters or appear to be opening it or throwing it away, and so on. In my opinion, it is very frustrating for an inmate when a guard whom he must see every day does things like that.

I also believe that we should not spend one more dollar in our penal institutions without solving existing problems. We should also consider providing more reasonable wages for the inmate who wants to help himself. We should also, as recommended in the report, think about visiting rights and about making the prison system more humane by allowing visits for the wife of the inmate, his children, and so on, but in areas where the inmate and his wife and children could be left alone without being watched through a window, when the inmate has shown for example that he wants to amend his ways and become a full-part citizen after paying back society by serving his sentence.

I believe also that we should separate the inmates according to their age in present institutions. At this time, young people of 17, 18 or 19 are not comfortable when they are thrown in with 30, 40 or 50-year-old tough guys or hardened criminals. This is not their place, it is not their way of life. There are some who do not really mind and there is nothing we can do for them, but as for the young people who are put in prison because of an unfortunate mistake or a drug charge—and I am not trying to excuse them, Mr. Speaker—I would like these inmates to have a chance to improve themselves and not be placed in permanent contact with hardened criminals or people who always lived outside the law or are always in trouble. As a matter of fact, they are always the ones to write to us.

We get dozens of letters, often from those who do not want to mend their ways. Those who do tell us either that they have been molested by a guard, or that the letter they sent out were opened, because they are being blackmailed; I feel we must absolutely improve that situation.

As for the committee, the minister is right in saying that it should look into the matter of the incarceration of children, the whole penal system for juvenile delinquents. In that regard, the study should also include what is shown on the state television network, in its various forms, whether it be films or stories which often are amoral, if not immoral as far as our children are concerned.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to recommend first that the possibility be looked into of changing the status of our prison guards. If it were to correspond to that of the members of the RCMP or private police agents, the well-being of our prisoners would be improved. To my mind, that would be a great step forward.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, before asking the House to call it five o'clock let me suggest to you that perhaps after the dinner hour we could confine our speeches to 20 minutes, thus enabling twice the normal number of members who might wish to speak on the matter to participate. I know there are three on this side who wish to speak, and I know for certain there are three members on the other side who wish to speak, all of whom were members of the subcommittee. If we limit ourselves to 20 minutes each we may get seven speakers on before the adjournment hour this evening. Perhaps the Chair could put that suggestion to the House and obtain a reaction.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree to the suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that speakers shall be limited to 20 minutes each during the remainder of this debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Pinard: Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with questions on the order paper before proceeding to the private members' hour?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

BROCKVILLE MUNICIPAL AIRPORT

Question No. 24—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Minister of Transport receive an application for funding from the City of Brockville under file number 5151-289 (A/OAOB) for a grant of $175,000 to improve the runways at the Brockville Municipal Airport and, if so (a) is the Minister aware of the dire necessity that the work be undertaken from the standpoint of safety and increased airport traffic (b) on what date will the Minister reach a decision on the application?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I am aware of the city of Brockville's application for financial assistance to improve their airport. Unfortunately, due to the recent government decision to implement cost reduction, the Airports Capital Assistance Program has been terminated and Transport Canada cannot provide the assistance requested.

MR. JOCK FERGUSON

Question No. 143—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. Jock Ferguson leave the Toronto CBC television news department and, if so (a) on what date (b) was he dismissed and for what reasons (c) what were his qualifications that lead originally to him being employed by the CBC and what reasons, if any, changed the CBC's attitude toward such qualifications?

2. Did he at any time act as an investigative reporter and, as a result, break some major news stories of the last few years and, if so, was his work considered satisfactory and if not, for what reason?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) September 27, 1978.

(b), (c), 2. He was dismissed. The circumstances of his leaving the CBC, together with those of his engagement, career, assignments and performance as an individual CBC employee are among those details of internal management and administration which parliament has not, as a matter of custom, required the CBC to provide. The background to this custom was explained in the reply to question No. 2530, May 22, 1975.

CANADIAN NATIONAL FLAGS

Question No. 348—Mr. Epp:

Does Canada have more than one official national flag and, if so (a) which ones (b) under what circumstances or on which occasions can the different flags be flown?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Canada has only one national flag—the flag described in the Royal Proclamation of January 28, 1965, which took effect on February 15 of that year.

CANADIAN RAILROADS

Question No. 389—Mr. Herbert:

During the past six years, what amount was (a) loaned (b) given or forgiven to Canadian railroads?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada advises as follows:

(a)	1972-73	$ 6,979,060.62
	1973-74	205,321,196.25
	1974-75	143,171,872.50
	1975-76	214,690,345.00
	1976-77	76,375,629.25
	1977-78	57,115,374.79
		$703,653,478.41
(b)	1972-73	$ 17,822,471.00
	1973-74	62,013,306.45
	1974-75	193,776,049.00
	1975-76	16,367,907.00
	1976-77
	1977-78	58,646,120.00
		$348,625,853.45

Note: The above figures exclude any payment for services rendered or goods provided.

The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: no amounts of money have been loaned or forgiven to Canadian railroads.

Amounts "given" to Canadian railroads are broken down into, (a) subsidy payments pursuant to the Railway Act, (b) payments made in accordance with the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, and (c) funds which have been paid from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund.

(a) The commission as a regulatory body has paid subsidies to the railways for the years 1972-73 to 1977-78 as follows:

1972-73	$ 121,614,646.43
1973-74	172,137,997.67
1974-75	242,755,058.48
1975-76	326,168,637.68
1976-77	280,909,197.88
1977-78	302,018,494.92
Total	$1,445,604,033.06

These payments were made under section 256, 258, 261 and 272 of the Railway Act and include the following railways—Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railway, Algoma Central Railway, Northern Alberta Railways Company, Ontario Northland Transportation Commission and The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.

(b)

Payments to Railway Companies

STATISTICAL INFORMATION—DNR

Question No. 464—Mr. Herbert:

What statistical information is provided by the Department of National Revenue (a) automatically (b) on request to other departments or agencies of government?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): (a) Statistical information provided automatically by Customs and Excise: all travellers and immigrants entering Canada, annual report of the Department of National Revenue—Customs and Excise and taxation, comparative statement of excise duty collected, comparative statement of transactions in excisable products, shipment of domestic spirits, statement of tax and non-tax revenue, statistical information for Public Accounts—volume I, II, III, statistical report of container movements, the value and commodity of all goods entering Canada or exported from Canada, wine revenue statistics.

(b) Statistical information provided on request: duty revenue collected by province, gas tax revenue collected by region, revenue collected from excise taxes, beer, spirits and the amount of proof gallons in the warehouse at the end of the year.

Taxation

(a) Standardized tabulations based on a sampling on the incomes, deductions and taxes of taxfilers distributed by such factors as age, sex, income level and geographical location. Eighteen of the most commonly used of these tabulations are publicized in the annual "Taxation Statistics", a publication widely distributed throughout the government and for sale in bookstores. In addition, other standardized tabulations are produced from other computer files on the whole tax-paying population to show all returns by marital status and personal exemptions claimed, for Canada and each province; distribution of CPP contributors; taxfilers by income class by locality and census division or county.

(b) Special rearranged tabulations of the data described above and, to Statistics Canada, any piece of information that has been provided to National Revenue for administration of the Income Tax Act, as authorized under the Statistics Act.

COURT ACTIONS AGAINST TRANSPORT CANADA AND AIR CANADA

Question No. 649—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Since 1974, how many court actions or statements of claim or any other type of litigation were filed in American or Canadian courts against (a) Air Canada (b) the federal Crown with reference to the Department of Transport or any of its employees or the Minister of Transport and (i) what was the date in each case (ii) for each litigation, what was the allegation served and what amount of money was involved?

2. Since 1974, what was the total amount of money involved in all statements of claim filed in American or Canadian courts against (a) Air Canada (b) the federal Crown with reference to the Department of Transport or its employees or the Minister of Transport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada and Transport Canada advise as follows: 1 and 2. The information requested is not readily available and to provide an accurate reply would entail a lengthy and costly examination of the records and accounts of each administration, which cost in manpower and time would be excessive and prohibitive.

MULTICULTURALISM

Question No. 529—Mr. Mitges:

1. Since his appointment as Minister of State for Multiculturalism, has the Minister made any effort to confer with the New Brunswick Government's Director of the Cultural Development Branch on matters pertaining to multiculturalism and, if so (a) on what occasions (b) did the Minister discuss the possibility of cooperation between federal and provincial governments relative to promoting (i) policies and programmes of multiculturalism through the education system (ii) third-language training in the public school system?

2. Has the Minister discovered any duplication of effort between provincial and federal multiculturalism programmes and, if so, in what areas?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): 1. No.

2. No.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Question No. 530—Mr. Mitges:

1. Since his appointment as Minister of State for Multiculturalism, has the Minister made any effort to confer with the Newfoundland Government's Director of Cultural Affairs on matters pertaining to multiculturalism and, if so (a) on what occasions (b) did the Minister discuss the possibility of cooperation between federal and provincial governments relative to promoting (i) policies and programmes of multiculturalism through the education system (ii) third-language training in the public school system?

2. Has the Minister discovered any duplication of effort between provincial and federal multiculturalism programmes and, if so, in what areas?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): 1 and 2. See reply to question No. 529 answered this day.

2. Has the Minister discovered any duplication of effort between provincial and federal multiculturalism programmes and, if so, in what areas?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): 1 and 2. See reply to question No. 529 answered this day.

Question No. 534—Mr. Mitges:

1. Since his appointment as Minister of State for Multiculturalism, has the Minister made any effort to confer with the Alberta Government's Director of the Cultural Heritage Branch on matters pertaining to multiculturalism and, if so (a) on what occasions (b) did the Minister discuss the possibility of cooperation between federal and provincial governments relative to promoting (i) policies and programmes of multiculturalism through the education system (ii) third-language training in the public school system?

2. Has the Minister discovered any duplication of effort between provincial and federal multiculturalism programmes and, if so, in what areas?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): 1 and 2. See reply to question No. 529 answered this day.

STUDY OF MARINE INFORMATION SYSTEMS

Question No. 564—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Did Mr. Roy Illing, administrator of Marine Administration of the Department of Transport, sometime in 1976 commission Mr. Jean Bourguignon, a Montreal-based transportation consultant to make a study of and recommendations for improving the information systems available to shippers and users of shipping and, if so (a) what was the total cost of the study (b) what was the expected date of completion and what was the actual date of completion of the study?

2. Was the executive summary of the study translated and, if so (a) at what cost (b) how many times and, in each case, at what cost (c) by whom and at what charge per word (d) did Mr. Bourguignon offer to translate it himself and for no charge and, if so, for what reason was his offer not accepted?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

(a) $44,772.91.

(b) July 16, 1976 extended to March 31, 1977; April 1977.

2. Yes.

(a) $653.60.

(b) Once.

(c) Rédaction Olympia—eight cents a word.

(d) Mr. Bourguignon offered to translate the executive summary. The executive summary was already in translation when his offer was received.

GOVERNMENT TAKEOVER OF NORDAIR

Question No. 574—Mr. Murta:

1. With reference to the proposed government takeover of Nordair, what is a detailed accounting of the $28.4 million purchase price?

2. What evaluation procedures were undertaken to arrive at the cost of approximately $12 to $13 per share?

3. Is the one million dollars that has been referred to as out-of-pocket expenses included in the $28.4 million purchase price?

4. What is a detailed accounting of these out-of-pocket expenses?

5. Where does the government intend to get the funds for the takeover?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. The figure of $28.4 million is composed of the following elements:

	($Millions)
Price to be paid by Air Canada for the purchase of the outstanding shares of Nordair, plus or minus Nordair's after tax earnings or losses for the period commencing June 1, 1978.	$27.4
Air Canada's estimated out-of-pocket expenses.	1.0

2. The valuation methods used by Air Canada to determine a fair and reasonable price per share for all outstanding common stock of Nordair Ltd. at an anticipated takeover date of June 30, 1978 were as follows:

(a) The basic valuation method used was the replacement cost method. Under this method, Nordair was considered as a going-concern with its property and equipment being valued at replacement cost. Furthermore, all intangibles were eliminated and long-term obligations for leased aircraft were recognized. The estimated after tax profit for the first six months of 1978 was added.

(b) Another test was made with a capitalization of earnings method under which the average of actual 1977 earnings results plus budgeted 1978 earnings results was multiplied by a reasonable earnings capitalization factor.

(c) A final test was made with a discounted cash flow method under which future years estimated cash flows and residual values of assets were discounted at various reasonable rates of return.

(d) The value of Nordair shares determined under the foregoing methods was tested with a liquidation valuation. All property and equipment were deemed disposed of at replacement cost with due consideration given to income taxes payable on recapture of capital cost allowance.

(e) The basic valuation method used, supported by the other tests described, indicated a value per share within a narrow range of reasonableness.

(f) External valuation consultants were asked to review in detail Air Canada's valuations. In their opinion, a reasonable basis, appropriate to the purpose and circumstances, and the principles and methods employed were in accordance with generally accepted valuation techniques.

3. The $28.4 million includes an amount of $1 million for out-of-pocket expenses (see 1 above).

4. These represent Air Canada's estimated costs associated with the acquisition of the outstanding shares of Nordair and include provision for:

(a) Fees for evaluators (valuation of assets and shares of Nordair).

(b) Fees and expenses in preparation for and attendance at hearings before the Canadian Transport Commission.

(c) Legal fees.

(d) Dealer fees.

(e) Depository fees (deposit of shares in trust).

(f) Printing costs (printing of offer).

5. It is intended that the purchase transaction be financed without a requirement for new cash by reducing long-term loans owing to the government by Air Canada.

HALIFAX FISHERIES LABORATORY

Question No. 698—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Will the $2,000,000 reduction in the Technology Development Programme result in the closure of the Halifax Fisheries Lab and, if so, how many employees will be laid-off or dismissed?

2. Have any private interests expressed to the government their intention to assume the research work presently carried out by the Halifax Fisheries Lab and, if so, which ones?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. The Halifax Fisheries Laboratory will not be closed, but selected program reductions will result in the lay-off of 22 employees.

2. No.

AIRCRAFT RADIOS—LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 749—Mr. Jones:

1. Are all pilots required to have an operator's certificate to use air-to-ground radios aboard aircraft?

2. What are the language requirements in order to qualify for Department of Communications certificates needed to operate aircraft radios?

3. What are the transport department policies on language requirements to operate aircraft radios? Are there different policies for different geographical or political areas in Canada and if so, name them.

4. Is it necessary for a pilot to comply with both the Department of Communications and Department of Transport requirements? Does this compliance restrict the areas in which a pilot may fly and if so, name them.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Communications and Transport Canada as follows: 1. Yes.

2. There is no provision in the regulations to restrict the issuance of such certificates on the basis of language. Candidates are therefore examined in the official language of their choice. The successful candidates are cautioned in writing that language restrictions for safety purposes apply at certain airports in accordance with the Department of Transport Air Navigation Order Series 1, No. 1, dealing with voice communication.

3. ANO Series I, No. 1, says in part: "... to authorize formally the use of the French language in air-ground communications in the province of Quebec in a manner that is consistent with the progressive introduction of bilingualism into such communications as it is demonstrated that it can be done without prejudice to safety."

4. Yes, a pilot must comply with both the Department of Communications and Transport Canada requirements.

At the present time, a unilingual Francophone pilot is restricted to the province of Quebec in accordance with visual flight rules only and ANO Series I, No. 1, authorizes the use of specific aeradio stations and aerodromes in Quebec.

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—REVENUE PASSENGERS

Question No. 797—Mr. Stevens:

For (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 (d) the first nine months of 1978, by quarter, what was the total number of revenue passengers (i) enplaned (ii) deplaned at the Toronto International Airport, Terminal 1 and Terminal 2?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The table below presents enplaning and deplaning revenue passenger date for Toronto International Airport, terminal 1 and terminal 2, for the years 1975-77 and preliminary data for the first quarter of 1978. Passenger data for subsequent periods are not yet available.

Order Paper Questions

LOANS TO OR INVESTMENTS IN CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 800—Mr. Stevens

1. As of (a) March 31, 1976 (b) March 31, 1977 (c) September 30, 1978, how much had the government loaned to, guaranteed or invested in Crown corporations, including departmental corporations, agency corporations, proprietary corporations or any other type of public enterprise entity and, what were the 10 largest corporations or entities in which or to which the government had invested, loaned money or guaranteed obligations?

2. (a) What was the (i) net profit or loss for the 10 largest Crown corporations (ii) aggregate profit or loss for all Crown corporations for each of their fiscal years (b) what is the aggregate percentage of return for the 10 largest Crown corporations on the government's investment therein for each of their fiscal years?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The information sought by the member is "set forth in documents equally accessible" to him. Accordingly, pursuant to paragraph 171(ff) of the Rules of Beauchesne, the Department of Finance answers as follows:

The information is available for fiscal year 1977-78:

(1) from volume I of the Public Accounts of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1978, as detailed in the schedules in section 8, "Assets and Liability Accounts", (schedules and explanatory notes to the schedules to the statement of assets and liabilities). Borrowings by Crown corporations under guarantee or as agents of the government are set out on page 8.90 of that section.

(2) (a) from volume III of the Public Accounts which contains the financial statements of Crown corporations

(b) from volume I of the Public Accounts at table 4.10, on pages 4.8 to 4.16, which sets out the amount invested at March 31, 1978 and the total amount realized in 1977-78.

(From this information the hon. member may readily make his own selection as to which corporations he considers the ten largest whether in sales volume, assets employed, shareholder's equity or government investment, and the return on the government's investment.)

For previous years, see the equivalent tables and volumes of the 1975-76 and 1976-77 Public Accounts.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 527 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately. I take it that we have consent in that regard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT CONTRACTS

Question No. 527—Mr. Halliday:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978 up to October 1, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (i) present or future policies, programmes or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (ii) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Ministry of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health and Welfare—Government contribution to health care program; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Veterans Affairs—Prorata pensions for widows of disabled veterans; the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott)—Administration of Justice—Penalties for vandalism.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it seems there is unanimous consent to proceed with second reading of Bill C-410 rather than proceeding with Bill C-213.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that all orders preceding order No. 210 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that we agree that the hon. member be allowed to substitute the bill he wishes to propose in place of the other one that is in his name. In other words, we are willing that Bill C-410 be debated, but that is as far as we go.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE RESPECTING FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved that Bill C-410, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I first of all thank hon. members in the House, specifically the House leader for the NDP, for accommodating me in allowing the substitution of Bill C-410 for Bill C-213 as listed on the order paper. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did speak in response to the subject matter of this bill the last time I brought it to the attention of the House, sometime in 1977. He said at that time he would not even extend me the courtesy of thanking me for bringing the matter before the House so it might be debated. I realize it is quite a concession he is making today, therefore, and I thank him heartily for it.

● (1700)

It is not the first time that I have brought this matter before the House, but I have little reason to believe that hon. members will grant the necessary consent today to allow this bill to proceed further, and this will probably not be the last time I will discuss this bill in the House. I am reminded of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who repeatedly rises in this House to talk about matters very dear to his heart. I can certainly make the commitment that I shall debate this matter until such time as more of my colleagues in the House and more people in the areas concerned with industrial relations in our country adopt a more enlightened view so that parliament can act.

My bill in general deals with the rights of individual workers. I refer, of course, to all workers in the country, numbering approximately ten million; but I am more concerned with the members of our labour force who are organized, which is roughly one third of the work force and amounts to 3.2 million men and women. Strangely enough, as one examines this what I call élite group in our work force, one finds that they either work for the government in Crown corporations, where they are compelled to belong to a union, or they work for large corporations. I am referring to the particular corporations which have managed to insulate themselves from the harsh realities of the free market system and which simply pass on the costs of whatever they produce to the consumer. Some of them are offshore consumers and some of them are within our own country. The government's situation, of course, is that if the cost of labour increases it is simply passed on to the taxpayer. There is no great concern among such employers as to how high the demand for additional wages or additional fringe benefits goes.

I have often asked myself, what is so bad about unions that they must compel members to belong? I know that many members of unions have asked themselves the same question: "Why do I have to be compelled to belong to my union?". I draw my experience from studies which I have made of other labour models throughout the world. I find in looking at our own labour relations model that there are some very serious discrepancies and anomalies.

Having spoken several times on this matter and having brought it forth on other occasions in the House, I have had an opportunity to answer some of the criticisms of the bill that have been voiced. The last time my bill was discussed in the House was in 1977, and at that time hon. members were glad to accept it, with the exception of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who said that he wished to have it disposed of as quickly as possible to get it out of here. I respect the hon. member's views in that regard, but the other hon. members who spoke said it was important that this matter be brought before the House for debate because it is a crucial issue and because in this regard we face a crisis in our country.

There are pressures on many hon. members from their constituents and the unions in this regard, and it is a good thing that this bill is being debated again so that hon. members may air their concerns and the concerns of their constituents and we may take a very serious look at the direction of industrial relations in our country. I am assuming, of course, that some of my misguided friends in my own constituency, who have chosen to misinterpret and misunderstand this bill, as have some members of the NDP, will not, once again, fight me on my position in the next election.

Bill C-410 which I introduced in this House for the first time in 1974 has been deliberately misnamed and misinterpreted by some people. The legislation adopted in the United States, which is similar to what I am proposing, is called the right to work legislation. I would prefer to call my bill freedom of association legislation. I think this title is rather appropriate because of the many things which are being said today about constitutional reform and the need to entrench in the constitution our commitment to certain fundamental democratic principles.

Much is said about the freedom and rights of the individual. The cardinal principle of democracy is freedom of association, individual rights and collective rights. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the present time is encouraging hon. members to give serious consideration to entrenching certain of these rights I have mentioned in the constitution. To what extent, however, does the freedom of the individual have to yield to the collective rights of groups?

The Task Force on Canadian Unity has made certain references in their assessment of these freedoms. The freedoms which they propose to entrench in the constitution are broken down into several categories and are indicated on page 107 of the report. First of all, they say that the right of the individual is paramount. This, of course, is the basis of the political parties represented in this House. The second category embraces the rights of people as individuals within particular groups. The third category covers the collective rights which can be exercised by a group, such as the right of unions to bargain. I have often wondered how far the collective rights of these groups should be allowed to proceed, particularly if they violate the rights or interests of individual Canadians.

The report goes on to discuss the collective rights of groups with a slant toward the right of the Francophone majority in the province of Quebec and the Francophone minorities in other parts of the country to speak their language. I appreciate that collective right and I respect it, but I cannot help but wonder if it could in some instances be taken to the point where a minority language group says, "Look, you are not giving us our way, we don't like you any more, we are going to leave the country". This situation could also apply to unions where they decide, because they are not getting their way at the bargaining table, not only to withdraw their essential service but to opt out of the country, regardless of what that means to the individual rights of Canadians. They say, "We are opting out. We are paralysing the country regardless of what it means to the individual rights of other Canadians. We have that additional power". I wonder just what authority, what forum, will make the final decision on how far these collective rights can be taken.

It is also advantageous to repeat such a debate as this in this House because it gives me an opportunity to answer some of the criticisms levelled against the bill the last time it was debated. I said I based my assessment of the situation on certain models. I have studied particularly the West German model. The criticism has been made that because of the behaviourial attitudes of different cultural backgrounds and different attitudes toward work, one cannot transpose that kind of model on the situation in Canada. If it cannot be transposed on the situation in Canada, can it be transposed on the situation in Great Britain? As you know, Mr. Speaker, many of the principles and traditions we have in Canada are inherited from Great Britain. They were inherited along with the British parliamentary system. Surely it can be said that the average worker in Great Britain has as deep a heritage as has the German worker.

The fact is, however, that the German constitution is somewhat different. It is not an accident that the West German models are somewhat different. Their constitution is only 25 or 27 years old, the most modern constitution in the free world. There are, of course, constitutional guidelines that restrict that particular freedom I have talked about if it offends or injures the freedom of the individual.

The basic principle that is being respected—and this is the crux of the problem in our country—is the freedom of association which my bill intends to restore. Freedom of association, which is one of the great cardinal principles of democracy, is interpreted differently in West Germany than it is in this country and in Great Britain. The worker is free to associate. As a matter of fact, in West Germany he has to have the opportunity to join a union, which workers in this country do not have and which I say they should have. In Germany, they cannot be compelled to join. The freedom of association is interpreted both ways: they are free to associate but cannot be compelled to associate.

If we are addressing ourselves to fundamental changes in our constitution, that is one of the changes that has to be entrenched—restoration of this cardinal principle of democracy, freedom of choice.

One of the arguments that has traditionally been made and was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the last time the bill was debated is to the effect that "Because I am not a Liberal and I do not agree with everything this government does, I should not have to pay taxes." That precisely underlines the argument I have advanced. The union power in this country puts itself on an equal footing with the power of this institution and the power of government. It says, "If I do not agree with what the government is doing, I do not have to pay taxes." At the same time it says: "I have a right to bargain. The right of the worker in an industry is that if he does not like what the union does he should not have to pay dues".

That is what I am saying. If they want to preserve a right that is equal to the institution of parliament, the institution of government, I say that is wrong. It points out precisely the problems we have in this country where the union exercises greater power than we exercise in parliament.

We have an instance at the moment where a union connected with the post office decided to disobey the law of the land. Members of that union will be reprimanded and may well lose their jobs in the public service because they chose to respect the law of the land and ignore a direction from their leadership to stay out when an order was made in this House for them to return to work. This is very dangerous, Mr. Speaker. It borders on anarchy and surely that is something we cannot tolerate in a free and great society such as ours.

The traditional argument is also that unions need protection to safeguard them against exploitation from corporate giants and unscrupulous employers. That is an age-old argument. There is no doubt that there is a need for unions. There was a need for unions when Mr. Justice Rand intervened in the Ford strike and gave unions the right to a closed union shop in the first place.

Times have changed, Mr. Speaker. Technology is light years ahead of the contemporary union structure in our country. We have a very good grip of, and very good control over, the behaviour of unscrupulous businessmen and corporations in this country so that that great fear no longer exists.

What we forgot as we modernized our industrial plant and integrated into it the technology that became available was that we are no longer competitive. We should have modernized as did the countries with whom we compete in world markets.

[Mr. Oberle.]

As they modernized their industrial relations process, so should we.

We are no longer competitive in world markets because of some of the difficulties the unions have created. I am not referring to wages, Mr. Speaker. I agree that some sectors of the economy are underpaid today. Some are overpaid, and traditionally they are always the ones that are unionized and we know that employers simply pass the cost on to the consumer or the taxpayer.

I am saying that because of irresponsible action we have not been able to get our products to market. We have had transportation systems shut down. The post office service has been interrupted. We seem to sit here and accept that it now takes up to ten days for a letter to come from Vancouver, British Columbia to Ottawa, when a few years ago it used to take three or four days.

It is time all that changed, Mr. Speaker. We must modernize our system of dealing with employers and workers and adopt an approach which other countries have found to be beneficial. If we do not, we will go the same route as Great Britain where there is a serious crisis. As we hear in daily news reports, it is impossible even for the Labour government to talk with the unions in a manner which is in the legitimate interest of the country as a whole.

We should not allow ourselves to be forced down this road, Mr. Speaker. Now is time for change. It is time for this bill to be taken to committee, for it to be debated in public, for the public to have their say, for union members to have their say. It is time for that two thirds of our work force to have access to a union and for the small businessmen to enter the debate that is carried on in parliament, in the board rooms of the nation and in the tripartite forum we are trying to establish. All these people have a right to be heard, and that is why I commend this bill to the House.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I just happened to hear the hon. member say this is not a "right to work bill", that it is a "freedom of association bill". I think a rose by any other name would smell exactly the same way. If I were to give this bill a title it would be called "The Sting".

The hon. member talked a lot about freedom—freedom to associate, etc. I wonder where the Tory party labour critic is, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). Indeed, where is the whole Tory party? Where have all the Tories gone? It is important for the workers in this country to hear the Conservative party position being put forward by the small entrepreneur from British Columbia, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). It is important to hear him put forward this so-called enlightened view of industrial relations in Canada in 1979.

It is nothing but a pile of hogwash! It is "right to work" legislation. Let us call it by its real name, "right to work." Let us also understand that "right to work" has nothing at all to do with creating employment. It has to do with union busting.

That is what the small entrepreneur, the so-called small businessman, this sawmill operator from British Columbia, is really talking about—busting the trade union movement. He wants to deny the workers the right to collective bargaining and the right to the union shop. That is what he is talking about, and that is not new, Mr. Speaker. He is not proposing anything new.

This goes back to 1935 when the Automobile Manufacturers Association got together to fight the Wagner act which gave the workers in the automotive industry the right to collective bargaining and the right to a union shop. He wants to go "forward into the past;" that is what the hon. member wants to do. He does not want to go forward with any new, decisive, dynamic industrial relations proposals; he wants to take us back with his Progressive Conservative party views to 1935.

It seems that the malaise of this right to work, which has now infected 20 southern states in the United States, has moved in to of all places the province of British Columbia. It was in 1975 that their founding meeting was held in Trail, B.C. It was made up of independent contractors and a businessmen's association. Incidentally, Phil Gagliardi, "flying Phil," was a key speaker along with Ralph Purdy. Ralph Purdy was the organizer of the right to work movement in the United States. Mr. Purdy happens to be a great John Bircher. He was there telling Canadian entrepreneurs how to handle the working class in this country.

What does this legislation mean?

Mr. Nystrom: Was Oberle there?

Mr. Rodriguez: I suspect the hon. member was there. As a matter of fact, it might be a conflict of interest for him to grind his axe in this House of Commons on his pet project. But what does this legislation mean? When one strips it of all the verbosity which the hon. member has put forward here this afternoon and, equates his crusade for union busting with the crusade of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the poor and pensioned people of this country, it is like comparing Satan with something saintly.

An hon. Member: The holy ghost.

Mr. Rodriguez: But what does it mean? What does it say? It says the corporations will have greater opportunity to put more profit in their pockets. Having torn down the workers' collectives and unions, each employer would then be free to work out an individual pay or wage scale with each worker. Can you imagine that in the work place, Mr. Speaker? Can you imagine each worker working out separately with his employer what he is going to get? Can you see that being healthy for the working environment? Can you see the old British mentality of divide and conquer in all its full glory in effect in the work place? The hon. member calls that modern industrial relations. We had that in the teaching profession in Ontario as far as I can remember. In effect, teachers agreed to move away from that situation because it depressed living and working standards.

What does this legislation mean apart from allowing the corporations, and small entrepreneurs, to put bigger profits in their pockets? It means safety and health rules can be avoided. As each worker becomes concerned about his own job security, he would not complain about environmental security. He would not be concerned about the health hazards in the working place. The situation will be every man for himself. Whoever kisses the boss' toes the most are the ones whose jobs will be protected. That is what the hon. member calls modern industrial relations. That is what the Progressive Conservative party is offering to the working class of Canada as an alternative. The hon. member should be ashamed of himself.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Rodriguez: We experienced that in the Sudbury basin, Mr. Speaker. We all remember what it was like before the unions came into the Sudbury basin in 1943. We remember when there was no union. We had a right to work then and all the workers would be lined up. The foreman would come out and he would say, "Today, you have a job". Then to the next person he said, "You have a job", and so on. He would then say, "The rest of you can go home". To keep their jobs men would allow the bosses to sleep with their wives. The men had to bring chickens as well. There was a chicken in every foreman's pot, but none in the worker's pot.

Mr. Nystrom: That is Oberle's policy. It is PC policy.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is the Progressive Conservatives for you. Is that their charter for industrial relations? I think it is shameful, Mr. Speaker, totally shameful.

Mr. Nystrom: No wonder the people of Canada are laughing.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is the unified, collective strength in the working place that has improved health and safety conditions. Anyone who knows anything about collective bargaining knows of the strides and improvements which have been made because workers have collectively bargained to improve the environment in the working place.

What else does this legislation do? This bill would give a totally free hand to the employer in the matter of hiring and firing. The potential for abuse is evident. Once the freedom is there it is abused. We see it in the banks today. I know banks that have hired flashy young men, posted them to a branch, and their job is to find out which young women in their branch are organizing a union. A man comes in as an assistant accountant. He takes out the young women and wines and dines them in an effort to find out who is organizing the union. The minute this information is secured these people are fired. The record of the Labour Relations Board in its various judgments against the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce gives examples. But like the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, they all believe in the right to work and will do anything to prevent the organization of collectives in the work place.

What else would this bill do? It would depress the standard of living of the working class in this country. Anyone who knows the history of the trade union movement in Canada knows that it has done more as a single force to improve the standard of living and the quality of life for the workers of this country. I say again that anyone who knows anything about the trade union movement knows that that has been so. Employers have not been willing to improve these things. Lives have been lost in the process of trying to improve the work place and the workers' standard of living. For example, in northern Ontario people in the bush have lost their lives when organizing the woodworkers unions. We know it from the strikes and the sacrifices that have been made by workers as they fight, not to get from generous employers what they feel they should get, but to get what is their right to live on a decent wage in order to provide for their families some dignity. What else does this bill do? It undermines the democratic process. A union is a very democratic organization.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: They vote. If the majority of workers vote to recognize a certain union as representing them, the majority wins, and you cannot have the minority going off and doing its own thing. Oh, they would love to have all the benefits of the union. The hon. member's bill would allow this. They would get the increases in pay won through collective bargaining, they would get the benefits of environmental protection won through collective bargaining, they would get the increased rates. But the hon. member does not want them to pay any union dues for these. The second clause would allow them to get all the benefits without paying a nickel. Mr. Speaker, that is contrary to the free enterprise system, the system which the hon. member advocates. He is flying in the face of the very system he idolizes.

Of course, we must not forget that these Conservative entrepreneurs want all the tax concessions. They want everything for nothing. They want socialism for the rich, and free enterprise for the poor. But it seems to us that if you get benefits because of the collective bargaining process, the minority, which does not belong to the union, should make the same contribution.

Mr. Nystrom: And make the same sacrifices.

Mr. Rodriguez: And accept the sacrifices, of course—loss of pay during strikes, and so on. They cannot just take all the goodies and not pay one brass nickel. Can the hon. member not get that basic concept into his head—that we live in a democratic society? I did not vote for those jokers who sit over there in the government, but that does not give me the right to say I will go away on my own, and do my own thing, or form a shadow cabinet as Khomeini has just done. He's nuts. He has got to be nuts.

What else does this bill do? It flies in the face of the Rand formula which has been accepted in this country. I might point out that in accordance with this formula a worker is not bound to belong to a union as long as he pays the equivalent of the union dues to the union on the principle that he is getting the benefits which the majority have worked out in collective bargaining. This allows people who have certain religious orientation, or particular concepts of behaviour, to follow the dictates of their conscience.

So called "right to work" legislation is in effect in 20 states of the U.S., all of them in the south.

Mr. Symes: George Wallace, Spiro Agnew, Barry Goldwater.

Mr. Rodriguez: I cannot resist pointing out that the State of Arkansas is one of the states which has enacted this right to work legislation, better known in some circles as the Taft-Hartley Act. I just want to read a quotation at this point, because these days when the Pope flies to Latin America and we hear the church speaking out for human causes I think it is only appropriate to read what the Bishop of Arkansas had to say on the matter. The Most Reverend Andrew MacDonald, Bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Little Rock, Arkansas, had this to say about the "right to work". In his view the very title "right to work" or "freedom of association" is deceptive. This is what he said:

> Such laws do not provide jobs or fair wages, they merely prevent workers from building strong or stable unions. On that score we judge the right to work law to be morally reprehensible at its very core.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River—I read all these write-ups by people like Fotheringham who are supposed to know all about these things, and they all say the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River is touted to be a cabinet minister.

Mr. Nystrom: My God!

Mr. Rodriguez: Possibly the minister of labour. Here is this very vocal backbencher in the regressive Conservative party, powerful in his caucus. He has a lot of allies—the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). They are among the louder voices in the regressive Conservative party and they are the ones who are going to formulate labour policy in the Conservative party should that party form a government. I shudder to think of the consequence. If this is the kind of thinking that motivates them, we shall be facing continuous labour disruption in the country.

I say they are just as anti-labour as the Liberal government has shown itself to be. We remember how they condemned the Conservatives for advocating wage and price controls, and then introduced them. But they are not prepared to take on the powerful giants among the multinational corporations; they are not prepared to say to them, "Roll back your price increases." Oh, no! Instead they say to the pulp and paper companies, "We are going to give you $250 million more, even though your profits have been spectacular." Now the Liberal government is saying there is a possibility of bringing back wage controls. Look at Bill C-22 which is shortly to come before the House. I say that the thoughts expressed by the hon.

member for Prince George-Peace River find many a virgin listener over there on the Liberal side. The proposition he is advancing finds sensitive listeners on the other side of the House, as can be deduced from the unemployment insurance bill which really cuts at the very base of the workers' fund.

If I were allowed to go beyond 20 minutes I would speak until this bill was killed because I think it is dangerous. It shows the Conservative party's hand; it shows how they would handle labour relations. I looked to see if the "Red Tories" were here today. I looked for the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). I looked to see if the labour spokesman, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), was here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), it gives me great pleasure to participate in this debate on Bill C-410. Incidentally, until the moment when the hon. member started talking about and deferring from the main issue, I must admit it was a good speech.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River that following the presentation of his bill it might be worth while to do an historical account and recall certain things about the Department of Labour. When the former minister of labour (Mr. Munro) introduced his 14-point program on employer-employee labour relations we ended up adopting a bill called Bill C-8. All that was intended, of course, to promote good understanding in labour-management relationships.

When the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River says there were strikes, it is quite obvious that there were strikes and there will be others. What is really important is strictly to have a strong, responsible and respected labour movement both on the labour side and on the management side. And then you can be sure of one thing, labour-management relations will certainly take a big step for employers as well as employees and the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River does not know anything about labour groups. Having myself militated actively in the labour movement up until the early seventies, I had the opportunity to see people doing labour organization work and being forced to promote the labour movement secretly. Imagine that in the late seventies. So, if the hon. member knew about labour relations and really wanted better production and better agreement between the two parties, quite obviously he would have a much more open mind. Another really important point, Mr. Speaker, is that when in a bargaining unit you have people who are dissatisfied, under the Labour Code, you can disaffiliate between the thirtieth and the sixtieth day ending the collective agreement. Then, whatever the bargaining units, you can do it. I cannot understand the position of the hon. member on something like the Rand formula where when you have the majority to get certified, participation should be equal for everyone. In fact, everyone enjoys the same privileges and the same benefits.

When you try to defend the employer, there is an extremely important point to remember, and that is that when a collective agreement is signed for one, two or three years, you are ensured almost automatically of having peace with the union, which means that you can plan your productivity for the next three years in the knowledge that both sides will be protected. Once again, this is to the advantage of the employer as well as the employee. But as I understand it, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River does not seem to take these points into consideration. It is not for nothing that he has left the House and stays in the lobby. Mr. Speaker, these are some of the points that I wanted to make—

An hon. Member: He is afraid to face the truth!

Mr. Dupont: But I would like to say, like my colleague, that we must really face the truth. In this regard, we must not forget that we are in 1979 and that this is extremely important for the whole Canadian economy. These are the few points that I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker.

In closing, I would like to say a few words about the Wood labour relations team. This group is not a new one. It was established in 1960. It made a very comprehensive and specialized study of this issue and its members agreed with what is now provided by the Canadian Labour Code. I therefore fail to understand how, 13 years later, a Progressive Conservative member, as the hon. member for Nickel Belt said, can have the audacity to suggest such changes.

An hon. Member: A reactionary Tory!

Mr. Dupont: I can see that. He is a reactionary Tory.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for having allowed me to speak on this issue and I hope that a bill of this type will never be allowed to pass.

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, for the record it should be stated that this is a private members' hour. That point obviously and patently was overlooked by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). As is customary with the hon. member for Nickel Belt, he tends to run to excess. He tends to exaggerate. He tends to wax eloquent histrionically. He fails completely to mention that a year ago in this House a Liberal member—I may be incorrect in saying it was the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine), but if my memory serves me correctly it was the hon. member for Wellington—introduced a similar private members' bill. It should be said for the record that members on both sides of the House of all parties spoke against that bill. Let that clearly be understood, just as I am also speaking against this bill.

Mr. Symes: Where does the Tory party stand?

Mr. Brisco: The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) intervenes and asks where the Tory party stands. It is patently obvious to me that the hon. member does not know the purpose of the private members' hour. The purpose of the private members' hour is the expression of the private concerns of individual members. As long as we have a parliamentary system I think the provision of private members' hours should prevail. If the hon. member does not like it, why does he not bring in a bill to do away with private members' hours? Otherwise, let each individual member express his concern, just as I am expressing mine now.

Mr. Oberle: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Let us get back to the title of this bill. It should be called right to work legislation. I, and I am sure many members of my party, are opposed to it for a very basic reason, and that is that it would create nothing but confrontation between employer and employee. I agree that there are many things to be desired of the union movement. One of the things I find most irksome is the closed shop. Valued, experienced and skilled workmen in my riding have been denied the opportunity to work at jobs down the street from their residences because of the closed shop constraint. One of the worst offenders was the Rock and Tunnel Workers Union No. 1, which never even bothered to reply to my telephone calls or letters.

Finally, I asked Bill King, then the minister of labour of British Columbia, what was going on with that union. I asked why the union did not reply to its mail or take into consideration the employment rate in Kootenay West. The minister of labour of British Columbia replied to me that he agreed with me, that he wished he could help me, that he was sorry but that he could not interfere. There was an abuse of the union system.

On the other side of the coin, let us consider the example in the United States which is often quoted and abused. There is right to work legislation in 20 states. What are those states? They are nearly all agricultural, they are not industrial. There are five states in the United States which, since 1947, have repealed the right to work legislation. We find three things in these states in the U.S. First, they are principally agricultural; they are less industrialized, less unionized, and they pay the lowest wages. One can accurately state that these three factors were important factors in shaping the political climate since those laws were introduced.

There is no need for me to continue speaking on this subject. I could make a 20-minute speech and I could make a one-hour speech. I simply want to go on record as saying that there are many other ways in which we can accomplish an understanding between union and management, and those ways are by negotiation. I go on record as saying that there are many ills and many irresponsible actions carried out by both the employers and the employees, by unions and by management. I saw a classic example of it in downtown Trail where some elements of the labour movement, when we had a civic workers' strike, decided that that was the right time to scatter garbage all over the main streets of Trail.

That day the announcer said, "Folks, that big labour demonstration in downtown Trail is over now, but some of the irresponsible elements have scattered garbage all over the streets," or something to that effect. That strike had been going on for months. Do you know what happened? That was the only statement on the radio, but how stupid those people looked, how irresponsible they appeared when the citizens of Trail, the children, the high school students, and the housewives and the workers, came down and cleaned the streets of Trail without being solicited to do so. They were showing to the people of B.C. and the rest of Canada that they are proud of their community and that no irresponsible idiots will label them as being people who do not care about their community. The streets were cleaner than they had been for months.

You can look at the other side of the coin too. I know there is another member who wishes to speak on this subject and I would like to give him that opportunity, so, although I would like to continue speaking on this point, I will bow to my friend across the way.

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for giving me five minutes in which to speak. I respect that and thank him very much for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when reading Bill C-410 one is inclined to wonder in which society some people want to live, either today's or tomorrow's. When we look at the ruling made by Mr. Justice Rand, in 1947 I believe, saying that anyone who benefits from the bargaining of a collective agreement should normally, through union fees, also share the cost of such bargaining, we can be concerned by the fact that the Progressive Conservative party, if it still respects the courts, and I believe it still does, is questioning that principle 17 or 13 years later, even though a very respected judge made that ruling. Did the hon. member realize what would happen tomorrow morning if his bill was passed? It is absolutely irrealistic, you must be irresponsible to take away the rights of several hundred thousand workers who fought hard to create unions. And thousands of workers would require an improvement of the labour legislation and this is what we did recently in amending the Canadian Labour Code and extending unionization in radio stations and banks. If you read the bill you will realize that it would bring us back 20 to 30 years. It is impossible to understand that a party that pretends to govern this country some day could have such restrictive views. It is impossible to explain.

Before me a member of the same party spoke against that bill. I appreciate this and I hope that some day after July he will become the opposition critic on issues concerning the Department of Labour. I think that he has at least an excellent judgment. Unfortunately I cannot admit, Mr. Speaker, that someone who decides in 1979 to prevent a union from negotiating freely with an employer when a group of employees got together to form a bargaining unit and decide together that there will a check-off once a month, once a week or twice a month, I cannot understand that someone in this House can believe that such a legislation will deal with labour problems in our country! I think that those people never go out of this House, do not take the trouble to go and see the problems workers are facing to exercise their rights, the problems encountered by some unions to be accepted by employers. The hon. member tells us: We want to correct abuses. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I recognize that there are abuses in the world of labour, but it is not because of one or two cases of abuse that we should ignore those made by employers. You know the maxim that says: When your boss is right, he is right. When your boss is wrong, he is still right. And for those who are not organized, sometimes it is a real problem. It is far from being fair, Mr. Speaker.

We should get together, sometimes, to get justice and, in our democratic system, a group of employees forming a union certified by a labour relations board can negotiate that kind of agreement. I know that the bill introduced a few months ago said explicitly that nothing in this part, and I now quote section 161, Mr. Speaker:

161. Nothing in this part prohibits the parties to a collective agreement from including in the collective agreement a provision

(a) requiring, as a condition of employment, membership in a specified trade union; —that is legal. The Canadian parliament voted for that, Mr. Speaker. Today attempts are being made to take away those rights, rights that were dearly paid for by the unions; to my mind it would be illogical and even immoral, Mr. Speaker, to think that some day, in 1979, those rights might be taken away.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, section 161 also says, and I continue my quotation:

(b) granting a preference of employment to members of a specified trade union.

There again, Mr. Speaker, it was agreed, in a democratic country, through a majority of the House, to allow an agreement between employees and employers, and the particular type of agreement they can reach was specified. And to those who fear that unions might become too powerful, I say this: Go and see what goes on in Germany: the unions are far more powerful than they are here, but they are also respected much more; and being respected much more, they also have greater respect for others, Mr. Speaker.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. McGrath) that the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, presented to the House on Thursday, December 21, 1978, be concurred in.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the committee, the one we are debating now, appears in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for December 21, 1978. As reported at page 8:8, it reads as follows:

Mr. Lawrence proposed to move—That the committee report that it is dealing with the subject matter of Bill C-204 in conformity with the reference to it by the House, and that the committee request the House to amplify and enlarge its said reference, due to certain evidence presented to the committee, so that incarceration of children and the penal system in general be also included in the committee's terms of reference.

That was a committee which had under study a bill of rights for children, and that is the motion which the government today attempted to stonewall with the half-hearted and rather half-baked arguments of the deputy House leader. Let there be no mistake about it. The government did not like the motion, and it tried to get it out of the way with a procedural argument which failed. It resisted the motion. It did not want it to pass. When the Chair ruled that the motion indeed had substance and was procedurally correct, as usual the government shifted its position, as indicated in the speech of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) when he said, as the first speaker on the government side, that the government intended to support the motion. But that is typical of the attitude across the way.

I want to speak for a few moments about the committee system. As the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) put it, the motion really is a debate on the committee system itself. It is a revolt, albeit a revolt of the minority, the opposition minority, and a revolt which will be put down quite easily by the government majority on the other side of the House, as is normally the case in committees where the government enjoys a majority in all standing committees. That is not new either. This is not the first time I have spoken of the inefficiencies of the committee system in this House. It is not going to work unless there is a permanent reference with broad terms to these committees whereby they have some freedom to examine matters that they, in their discretion, should decide require examination.

● (2010)

Even when legitimate matters come before the House, such as earlier in this session, I believe it was, when the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) raised a question of privilege, and it was a substantive question of privilege concerning the activities of the security service, they are not disposed of satisfactorily. The same thing happened to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) just before Christmas. In the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt it involved a matter of his private life being invaded and communications being intercepted. In the case of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham it was a matter of that hon. member being misled by a minister of Crown.

In the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt the Speaker found that he did, indeed, have a prima facie question of privilege. In the case of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, the Speaker again found the same thing, and it remained only for the government majority to overrule the Speaker's decision, which hon. members over there did, preventing a parliamentary committee from examining two very legitimate areas which the Speaker in his good judgment found deserving of inquiry.

Let me give you another example, and there was a debate on this matter last November in this chamber. Since 1976 there has been only one meeting of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, and that one meeting was called in order to elect a chairman. The government has refused to allow that committee to meet, despite the real need for reform of the rules of the House in so far as they are applicable to committees. There have also been a number of procedural difficulties which the Speaker has said, in ruling after ruling, should be studied by this committee, but the government refuses to constitute it.

I often think the impression is left in the minds of those who read Hansard and watch the proceedings here that members of the opposition have unlimited opportunity to examine contentious matters in committee. The truth is that committees only get what the government decides to give them and, even then, they are circumscribed with suffocating rules and stifling government committees in their examination.

An hon. Member: You are hard done by.

Mr. Nielsen: I note the presence of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines. Let me just divert for a moment and tell him about his committee. He knows very well what the terms of reference are for that committee, a committee set up at the instigation of the opposition for the purpose of overseeing the activities of the government and, of the pipeline agency regarding the building of the biggest construction project ever to be undertaken in the world, involving $10 billion, a project that is probably now worth something in the order of $14 billion to $15 billion.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

On the first and second occasions on which we met I asked question after question about salaries being paid to officials of the agency, and their duties. I asked questions concerning meetings which the agency was obliged to have with its counterparts in the provincial and territorial jurisdictions.

I have now received a copy of a letter written by the commissioner of the pipeline agency, amounting to five pages, telling me why he cannot answer these questions. He cannot tell me what salaries these people in the agency are drawing, and he cannot tell me exactly how many dollars are being spent. That was precisely why this monitoring agency was set up by virtue of an amendment to our Standing Orders. Already a brand new committee of this House of Commons, in its infancy is being stonewalled in the usual fashion by an expert in the art of stonewalling, the commissioner of the pipeline agency. He used to be a member of this government and, before that, a very experienced bureaucrat of the Liberal government. That represents the usefulness of committees.

We thought we were making real progress in setting up that committee, but it is not worth the order it is written on in view of this response. We know how much the governor of the Bank of Canada is making, $75,000 a year. We know how much the chairman of the CTC is making, $50,000 a year. We know the salaries of the heads of all these agencies, but are we to know the salary of the commissioner of the pipeline agency? Not on your life are we going to know his salary, or the salaries of his top officials, because he says it is against government policy to release this information. That is an example of the open, honest, forthright government hon. members over there want to have the Canadian public believe they are, but I say that is rubbish. That committee obviously is not going to be able to do its work because it is being stonewalled.

Let me give you another example. The Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments reported, as recently as April 13, 1978, that the increase in postal rates by order in council had dubious legality. The House concurred in that report on April 19. The government chose to ignore the report completely, refusing to bring legislation into the House which would have legalized that increase in postal rates. So much for the effectiveness of committees.

I can recall a report of a few years ago by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Again this was a unanimous report, with concurrence moved by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). That hon. member still sits here. Nothing was done as a result of that unanimous report.

I had high hopes for this report because we took a non-partisan approach to a national problem of crisis proportions. I am not one of those who have been critical of the penitentiary services, or of the ministry of the Solicitor General for what has been done. Indeed, some of the recommendations have been implemented. My grievance, and it is shared unanimously by all members of that subcommittee on the penitentiary system, is not in connection with what the department of the Solicitor General has done, but with what it has not done. We unanimously agreed, Liberals, Conservatives, members of the NDP and the Social Credit party, that this report ought to be taken as a package to be effective. Its core recommendations have been completely ignored.

If one reads the most recent progress report, as it is called, of the 65 recommendations in the report to parliament by the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada, published in January, 1979, one will arrive at the conclusion, particularly in respect of recommendation No. 26 of which the minister seems to be so proud, that all the minister is doing is making excuses. The hub of the recommendations concerned the setting up of an independent advisory board separate from the service. The minister said a flat no to the suggestion and it was rejected. He did not say maybe or that he would examine it, he just said no. That would not have been the reply of his predecessor who had a more humane understanding and feeling for what we were doing.

● (2020)

With respect to our recommendation that a prison industries corporation be set up which would compete in the open market with products produced by labour and paid standard labour rates within the system, a system which is working so admirably in other countries of the world, the minister said no. He did not say maybe. Again, that recommendation met a more humane reception from his predecessor.

We unanimously believed on that committee that those two recommendations were central to the issue. We were also unanimous in the belief that one of the main ills of the system was the correctional personnel themselves, and that the quickest way to cure the ills which existed with respect to that one third segment of the civil service in the system was to create a force entirely independent of the public service which would be structured and administered along the same line as the RCMP.

The minister in his response today said that that would not work and that he could not believe that the committee would intend to deprive the members in the service of a decade of unionism. That is precisely why the recommendation was made. It was not made to deprive them of any union benefits but to get them away from the effect of unionism on the service itself, and to replace it with something else. That something else is a system which is working admirably well in the RCMP. The members of that force are not in a union. They do not belong to the PSAC, but they have a system of employee representation which is very effective. The same matters which are considered by the PSAC with respect to personnel in the penitentiary system are effectively dealt with by a system in the RCMP which is not part of the PSAC. That is precisely one of the reasons why that recommendation was made.

We also recommended that the institutions should be smaller. I know that there are other hon. members who will deal with that matter. I was greatly disappointed when I found that the minister had disregarded that recommendation, because the committee considered it a central issue. The minister said—and it can be found in his report and the speech he made today—that he could find no evidence that smaller institutions would be more effective. I do not think that he visited Penetanguishene.

Another one of our recommendations was that psychiatric units within the system be separate and put under the Department of National Health and Welfare. That was also rejected. The core recommendations we made have been rejected. I can tell the minister, and I am sure that my colleagues on the committee will agree, that without those core recommendations there is not a hope of effective reform in the system. I can tell him also, and I believe that it was a general consensus among committee members, that the reason for the unrest which had reached a peak when the committee commenced its examinations of the penitentiary system would again surface. The unrest ceased because 9,400 inmates knew that something was being done about conditions inside these institutions and that there was a sincere committee investigating these conditions.

What we got, and I say this to the minister without being partisan, is what the inmates in these institutions call word games, in response to our recommendations. That is what this progress report is, particularly when one looks at the progress that is set forth within it relative to recommendation 26. Word games are not enough. The minister and his officials have been warned that unless there is meaningful reform the same ills which plagued the system and the institutions, for example, the hostage takings, the violence and the riots, will reoccur. That warning was sounded and, indeed, such events have begun to happen again. Dorchester was the most recent scene of unrest.

I see the parliamentary secretary shaking his head. It was the most recent one.

Mr. Young: That is not what I was shaking my head about. That was an irresponsible suggestion.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not an irresponsible suggestion to suggest that unless something is done in a meaningful way about the adoption of the package of these recommendations we will be back at square one. We all believed that this is what would happen when we submitted the report. Indeed, I believe that the predecessor to the present Solicitor General believed it as well, but we on this side cannot talk to the present Solicitor General.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nor can they on that side.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not want to lower this debate to a partisan level, because I am really concerned about the adoption of these recommendations. Again, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines laughs in a cynical fashion. If he would consult with the hon. members for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee), Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the other members with whom I sat on that committe, he would find that he is quite wrong about my approach to the work of this subcommittee. I am sincere when I say—

Concurrence in Committee Report

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member because, like other hon. members, he has agreed to limit the speeches to 20 minutes, unless he has the consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I suggested the limit and I intend to follow it.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate and to second the comments made by my colleagues on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I would like to begin with a few words about relevance because I do not have quite the same confidence as my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), that this matter has been finally settled. The Speaker has left it a little bit over our heads, although I suspect that it will not be raised again. I want to comment briefly because, though there was no debate at the committee meeting on this motion as to its admissibility, there was a very extended debate on previous motions. In fact we filled issue No. 8 of the standing committee proceedings dealing only with the motions on this point.

I ruled out of order one motion by the hon. member for New Westminster and one motion by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). There was another motion by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) which was withdrawn. Finally, we came to this motion. Perhaps it was by way of exhaustion, but certainly it was as a result of the narrowing in each case of what was being attempted to be done that it was generally found to be acceptable by other members of the committee.

Of course, there is what I would call the subterranean relevance, and I do not use this term pejoratively with respect to the hon. member for St. John's East. This point was illustrated by him when he talked about the deep feeling in the committee that there was not much point in having any reference if nothing was being done about the previous one. This is the kind of thing which very much occupies the minds and feelings of members of parliament in committees. I believe there are several reasons why the motion is in order if that question should come up again.

One thought which struck me at the time, and it strikes me again now, was that the motion gives priority of place and puts most stress on the question that is already before the commitee—the question of the rights of children. In placing first the question of the incarceration of children and then in talking about the penal system, it again puts children before adults.

More important than that, there is a continuity in concept and in needs in the whole notion of incarceration. It is very difficult to draw a line. In our viewings of the penitentiaries we found, for instance, on at least one occasion a prisoner who had been in federal penitentiary at age 16. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) said, we had been having great difficulty with the reference on children's rights in finding out exactly where the age of a child, as encompassed by that subject matter and by the needs of the situation, could be drawn. We saw the matter in continuity and it was for this reason, among others, that we felt the motion was in order.

I think we would all acknowledge the sentiments that were expressed at that time by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham when he said, as reported at page 33 of volume No. 8 of the report of the proceedings of the committee:

> The purpose, quite frankly is to enlarge the terms of reference so that we can talk about penitentiaries and the penal system in general and not just the penal system as it refers to the incarceration of children.

That was certainly the motivation of the members of the committee and it would be folly to deny it here. But it is not that which is incorporated in the words of the motion, and I think the motion as formally presented is in order.

Having made that case for relevance, I should like to do what others who have spoken in the debate have done—disregard relevance entirely and speak on the aspect of this problem which the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) devoted all of his time to, and that is the penitentiary system. I would say that the penitentiary system has been improving steadily in Canada since the report of the subcommittee in June, 1977. Although it has been improving steadily it has been at a very disappointing pace, and with very disappointing limitations.

I think we would not be having a debate if it were only a question of the pace of implementation. We all know, as politicians, that things usually take longer than we would wish, and sometimes longer than seems possible. What we are concerned about are the limitations which the Solicitor General and the penitentiary service seem to impose on the recommendations we made. Because of the time I have, I am only going to comment on two kinds of questions. One of those has to do with the size of penitentiaries and the other has to do with recommendation No. 26, and, in particular, the comments of the Solicitor General about that and his apparent understanding of it.

First of all, with respect to the question of the larger size of institutions which the government has recently announced, the Solicitor General said this afternoon that there was no solid evidence that smaller-sized institutions would do more for prisoners. I think we should be frank, Mr. Speaker, and admit there is a certain skepticism on the part of listeners that a doctrine which had been accepted up to that point by the whole penitentiary service in Canada should be questioned and discarded at a time when there were perhaps financial pressures which caused the change. If the argument were put purely in terms of the government's restraint program it would be a little easier, but when it is given this veneer of rationalization it is perhaps not quite so easy to accept, and it leaves us with a somewhat uneasy feeling.

In the press conference which he gave on this subject, and presumably also reflecting the views of the Solicitor General, the commissioner of corrections, Mr. Yeomans, is reported by the Globe and Mail on January 1, 1979, as having said:

> Not one of those studies was based on any empirical data—

He said that of the earlier studies on which we relied, especially the famous Mohr report which was the foundation of our recommendation.

He went on to say:

> Every one of those was an emotional study . . . There isn't any evidence anywhere to support 200-man institutions.

Later the article continued:

> Mr. Yeomans says studies this year by engineers and accountants found that the cost of running the smaller prisons, which were to be built over the next five years, would be 'enormously higher' than for larger ones.
> Furthermore, he says, a sociological study of two medium-security prisons—a new one at Mission, B.C., that holds fewer than 200 men, and an older one at Warkworth in Ontario that holds 450—found no substantial difference.
> 'In fact, the advantage if any was slightly on the side of Warkworth because you could offer a greater variety of programs in the larger institutions.'

It would be very interesting for us to have those studies. I would invite the Solicitor General to allow the committee to see these documents so that we could see for ourselves whether the lack of solid evidence he refers to as the basis for our recommendation might also extend perhaps to his decision. While I am inviting him today to table that document so that we can see it, perhaps he would also let us see Dr. Boyd's report on the application of social therapy to institutions in Canada.

This is an especially important matter in the context of the size of institutions because if social therapy were to work, prisons would have to be built in the form of 30-person units, perhaps, which are entirely self-contained for every purpose—for work, recreation, and everything else. The system could not operate in any other way. If that were to be the future course of the penitentiary system we should obviously know that as soon as possible, especially before we build any more expensive institutions. It is very important that we on the standing committee see this document as early as possible, as well as the documents on which the Solicitor General is relying for the change in policy that he has made.

Mr. Beaudoin: Good, good.

Mr. MacGuigan: Perhaps it might be thought that there are no really hard monetary consequences attaching to the decision on size except favourable ones. I might point out that in the package of announcements the Solicitor General made about the size of institutions, he announced one which was very surprising to members of the committee, that is, that the Kingston penitentiary would be restored for business and that Millhaven, which until now had been the maximum security institution in Ontario, would be downgraded to a medium security institution. Perhaps he might consider inviting Monica Dickens, who is the great great grand-niece of Charles Dickens, who was there for the opening in 1835, to attend the reopening in 1980 or 1981 of the new Kingston penitentiary. The cost is to be $33 million, of which $27 million is to restore Kingston to its former glory as the maximum security institution, and $6 million to downgrade Millhaven from its present status to a medium security institution.

The consequences of the government's policies are not always a saving of money, and it is very hard to understand in a document which is otherwise directed toward saving government expenditures that there would be a recommendation of this kind. I shall make a suggestion in a moment about why I think that decision was made.

The other matter to which I wish to turn briefly now is recommendation No. 26. We made this recommendation for an entirely independent penitentiary service because, in looking at the penitentiaries as they are in Canada today, we realized there was no other way the government would ever get control of them. We could hardly expect to control inmates if we cannot control those who are supposedly guarding and instructing them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: The Solicitor General says we have not thought this recommendation through, especially its effect on the unions. I wondered, in listening to some of his comments, whether he has read through the text which accompanies our recommendations. Looking at the recommendation apart from the text, one does not get the full flavour. I want to read into the record a number of points on which some misunderstanding has been expressed.

● (2040)

At page 80 of the report it says:

> We find a high level of agreement on the point that a union is not inconsistent with correctional work with respect to wages and fringe benefits.

At page 81 it says:

> —since . . . the Service should resemble a police force in its discipline and professionalism, employees might well wish to have their interests represented, not by a union, but by an association like that existing in the RCM Police. This should be decided by the employees themselves by secret ballot.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has talked about the advantages of having an association of that kind, and I recognize the advantages are considerable. But, Mr. Speaker, we did not recommend against having a union, and there is considerable misunderstanding on this point. This is an open choice for the employees to make, and I want to make sure the government understands that. As a matter of fact I would find it hard to imagine that the employees would not vote to continue some form of union. That is perfectly within our contemplation. That is their decision to make, not ours, but that union should have some limitations. It should not have the right to strike. It should have a code of discipline and means of enforcing that discipline which could, for the first time, bring about effective discipline within the penitentiaries. It should also be able to have a professionalism which we think would not otherwise be possible.

The Solicitor General, in his choices with respect to the areas covered by recommendation No. 26, does not even go as far as the interdepartmental working group which his predecessor set up. They made recommendations. But with respect to the adjudication of grievances, the Solicitor General says that we should retain the present method, the one which the penitentiary management told us made it impossible to fire anyone, whatever the person had done. This was the one which we found totally unsatisfactory.

The Solicitor General reasons that his policy would be easier to accomplish and it would cause less confrontation. If ease of accomplishment, especially in terms of time, was the criterion—we are already nearing the end of two years from the time of our report—I think we might begin to ask why even that limited reform has not yet taken place. As the hon. member for Yukon has pointed out, in order to achieve anything we have to achieve certain fundamental things. We would prefer to wait, if necessary, another year or two to get the right kind of reform, rather than to settle for something now that is less than satisfactory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: As far as confrontation is concerned, this problem can probably never be settled without some confrontation with some of the people in our penitentiaries at the present time. We should not seek confrontation, but we should not seek to avoid it either. We should establish the policies which we think we should have. I suggest that the reason we are downgrading Millhaven from a maximum to a medium institution now is that we have thrown in the sponge. We have said that we cannot get control of Millhaven. That is the reason we are spending $33 million to do something which, on the face of it, smacks of absurdity.

If one looks at the matter in those terms one can see that the difference between our proposal and that of the Solicitor General is not just some fanciful abstract one, it is one which is having harsh, concrete consequences at the moment.

My time is almost up, Mr. Speaker, but I will conclude with a few words from a letter which I received recently from an inmate. I presume my letter is from a different inmate than the one who wrote to the hon. member for New Westminster. For his own protection I do not want to reveal the person's name. This was a New Year's letter thanking me for what the committee had been trying to do. In part his letter reads:

> After five years in this system I have never really felt fear whether at the B.C. pen during the riots or here.

The inmate is referring to Millhaven when he says "here." He goes on to say:

> But for some reason I sit back now and in looking towards the new year, I feel a deep-set fear which I can't explain. I fear that this year will bring about a lot of pain and the ones that will take the blows will be eventually us. I saw desperation at the B.C. pen. and how it played with an inmate's mind. But here I see hatred. It is so bitter and deep that you could cut it with a butter knife and not even penetrate the surface.

Perhaps that is a little better phrased than some of the comments I receive from inmates, but it is very similar to the comments I get in the 50 to 100 letters I receive each week from inmates in various institutions across the country. Our proposals were not written from the viewpoint of the inmates, but from the viewpoint of the public interest.

Sometimes this is a way of measuring how the system is working by observing the attitudes of consumers. I agree with my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster, that it would be desirable for us to have a look at the institutions to see how the policies which we recommend, so many of which have been put in place as the Solicitor General tells us, are actually working in the institutions.

I wish I had time to deal with all the aspects of this. However, the important point is that I think the committee is unanimously dissatisfied with the way things are going. That is certainly the message I would like to leave tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important debates that have taken place for some time with reference to justice and legal affairs. I want to begin by congratulating the speakers today, first, the member who brought the terms of reference before the justice and legal affairs committee, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I want to compliment particularly the chairman who has always done an excellent job in a non-partisan way in justice and legal affairs, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: If we had more members of parliament like the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville who could show such spirit in a non-partisan way, this institution would certainly show a great improvement. It takes a lot of courage, particularly on that side of the House—who never show any division, they must not divide and everyone must speak alike—to stand up and speak the way the chairman spoke with a depth of feeling and emotion concerning the condition of our institutions.

An hon. Member: And knowledge.

Mr. Woolliams: And knowledge, absolutely correct.

I also want to congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). All these people were members of the special committee who travelled across this country to examine what is going on in the institutions.

Mr. Knowles: Do not forget the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I certainly will not do that. He is always paying me compliments.

Mr. Rodriguez: Lawyers are all the same.

Mr. Woolliams: Some say lawyers are all the same. But I find that human behaviour and difference in personality in the legal profession exist there the same as in every other profession, even with those very strong union people.

I would like to take this opportunity to say that not only should we be looking at the conditions of the institutions, our prisons and penitentiaries, but we should be examining the laws and the environment that got many of those people into those institutions. If John Howard, the prison reformer, were alive today perhaps he would want to see some of those institutions I have seen.

Although I was not a member of the special committee, I have visited institutions. As a lawyer of some years standing, I have seen many conditions under which people live. I have seen in this House of Commons people who believe in reform and crusades, like myself in reference to the criminal code, bring in private members bills only to have them talked out. It has been done by all governments ever since I came here. The backbenchers are practically hired to talk out bills.

● (2050)

I think that when we are talking about children, and when we have a Criminal Code as archaic as the law set out in sections 12 and 13 of that Code, it is certainly time for amendment. Take this, for example:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was under the age of seven years.

Seven years! So if he is seven and a half years old and throws a can of tomatoes at a stepfather who has been brutalizing him—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: I will give an example in a few minutes of a case in which a child was found guilty of manslaughter at nine years of age, and sentenced to imprisonment in one of our penitentiaries. This happened since I came to this House, yet I cannot get the government to act. For ten long years I have asked in private members' bills to have the age of responsibility raised. Nothing has been done, yet we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who talks about civil rights in glowing terms.

An hon. Member: Would you permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: No, I do not have time. I have only 20 minutes in which to make my speech. Let the hon. member make one—he has had lots of opportunities. I will give another example of what I mean:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was seven years of age or more, but under the age of fourteen years, unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct and appreciate that it was wrong.

The age limit set out in those two sections should be raised. Over a long period I have continually asked that this be done. Such action in itself would remedy the situation I have described. In the sixties I raised in this House the situation of a boy called Henri, written up by Mr. Bill Trent of Weekend Magazine at that time. He got the information from Mr. MacLeod of the penitentiary service. This boy was put into one of our penitentiaries in New Brunswick, and he was so small that after they had locked him up in solitary confinement for the night he was able to creep through the bars. The guards, the enforcement officers—I can get emotional about this having been a defence lawyer all my life—took up a collection so that he could have a bicycle to ride around the prison yard during the daytime.

Take a look at what is still going on. These figures are for 1977. Five of the inmates of penitentiaries are under the age of 16, 38 are under the age of 17, 1,343 are between the ages of 18 and 21. What is wrong with the system of law in this country and with the administration of justice that we should be incarcerating more people per capita in different institutions here than any western nation? I might even be critical of the judiciary. It seems to me the belief is held that unless you hand out between five and ten years you don't think you are punishing anyone.

I will make a prediction. We abolished capital punishment and set a penalty of 25 years for first degree murder, without right to parole unless granted after 15 years by a judge. I predict that within five years, at the rate murder is increasing in this country, 800 people will have been found guilty of first degree murder, some of them for the second and third time in the penitentiaries. Are they to be placed in with children? Are they to be segregated? What have they got to lose if they take the life of a law enforcement officer? Nothing.

Look at the figure for Ontario—I could not get the figures for another province. In the training institutions which are really children's prisons and jails—there is no difference—there is one child under the age of nine, there are five under the age of ten, there are ten under the age of 11, there are 25 under the age of 12, 17 under the age of 13, 204 under the age of 14, 384 under the age of 15, and 34 under the age of 16.

Take the case of a fellow by the name of Tony, now 23, serving three years in Collins Bay Penitentiary for armed robbery. He was mistreated by his stepfather, never given anything—if he wanted something he had to steal. He was caught for truancy at the age of 13 and sentenced to a training school for three years. He was small for his age, weighing only 75 pounds. The discipline at the school was extremely rigorous; he was repeatedly beaten by the staff and by fellow inmates. His wrists were so small that when they arrested him the last time the handcuffs fell off his wrists. These are facts which I have discovered through research.

Consider the case of Peter, aged 35, serving a five-year sentence for assault causing bodily harm. When he was a child his parents broke up and he was sent to live with his 89-year-old grandmother. Children's Aid took him away and sent him to detention home for being a truant. One day, when he was 16, he broke a parking meter. He was caught and taken to Cobourg Training School in handcuffs. One of the instructors at the school beat him with his fists because he did not like his attitude. I could go on. I could put dozens and dozens of such cases on record.

As Pierre Berton said in an article he wrote on the subject, one by-product of all this is homosexuality, since young offenders are often dumped into prison compounds along with old and hardened men. It is almost axiomatic when young people are placed in such prisons, especially children as young as 13. I referred to this when I spoke in the sixties. Nowadays they are sent to what are called training centres. In my own city of Calgary they have incarcerated kids. It is the same wherever you go.

Surely it is time for reform. I am proud to have belonged for a number of years to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, a non-partisan committee in which we are able to come to grips with many of these problems in the spirit of good will rather than in a partisan way. Those are the circumstances in which we get a speech like the one the chairman of the committee made this evening. We hear such speeches from all quarters of the House by members who are endeavouring to get the recommendations of the subcommittee approved. These members are asking for an extension of the time of the reference so that they can go back to these institutions and talk to those who are incarcerated, some of them in solitary confinement, in what they call the hole. We want to find out what improvement has taken place in the year which has passed since the committee travelled across the nation.

I was glad to see that today the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) bent under pressure—his henchmen had earlier tried to get this motion ruled out of order. In my view, not nearly enough encouragement has been given to the committee. I say that surely, at a time when conditions are such that riot after riot is taking place—trouble and dissension are everywhere—the government should look once again at what is taking place in these institutions.

It is my philosophy that young people, when they come into this world, are like a piece of white paper with no writing on it. What happens to them along the trail of human life is often the result of factors in their environment. We are all a part of everyone we have met. Once a person is incarcerated it is a case of "out of sight, out of mind." That is why this debate is so important. That is why the committee, which did such an excellent job, much of it during the recess, travelled across the nation to examine at first hand the problems of these institutions.

● (2100)

I will make two points before I sit down. Let us get on with one of the great reforms of all time. In one of his articles Doug Fisher said that I am not a reformer. I do not know where he has been. I have introduced bill after bill, as the committee knows, to try to amend the Code. The Law Reform Commission should stop philosophizing and get down to redrafting the Criminal Code of Canada, which is 100 years old.

Mrs. Holt: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I could read section after section which does not apply to the modern world. Let us streamline the law and bring it into line with the eighties, but we will not do so with this worn out, dried up old prune of a government. This government has had it. We must get some new blood.

Sometimes we have to become partisan. I agree with the lady who interrupted me a moment ago that sometimes we have to become partisan. She herself does so in order to get her own party to move. The hon. member is a reformer. Other hon. members opposite are not reformers, they are sitters. They like their jobs, their salaries, and their executive capabilities.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is nothing partisan about the truth.

Mr. Woolliams: I must agree with my House leader in that regard.

The second thing we must do is get our institutions in line with the eighties. We should set up family courts and bring in a young offenders' law so that people will have a chance when they are brought before our justice system. There should not be the confrontation and the antagonistic system of criminal law we have now where defence counsel is against prosecutor, and where judges are against this person or that person. Young men and women should have a chance in this society of ours instead of ending up in institutions which are such a disgrace that even John Howard would have blushed if he had seen them.

That is my message in this debate. I hope it will penetrate the government, for whatever time it sits, and God help us if it sits much longer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, 20 months ago this committee was called on to serve its country at a time when our maximum security institutions were rocked by more riots, bloodshed, anger, pain, and cost to the taxpayer in two years than in all of the 42 preceding years. Twenty months ago in our first recommendation we wrote that "a crisis exists in the Canadian penitentiary system, that it could be met only by the immediate implementation of large-scale reforms and that it was imperative that the then solicitor general act immediately on the report as a matter of the utmost urgency." This month the status of recommendation No. 1 is that "the balance of this report is a statement of the actions to January, 1979, on the implementation of the recommendations in this report."

I say that the status is non-existent with regard to the state of crisis and tragedy which I know now exists. The implementation, for example, of what is called a special handling unit in Millhaven has become a basis for the continuing bullying, harassment and hoodlum activity of a few men who pretend to be leaders of a so-called union. I think that union exists to the disgrace of all of us who strongly believe in trade unionism.

I was a trade unionist. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) and all of us on the penitentiary committee went to great pains to find a way not to ban or attack the union because of these horrible people. Because of these people there was havoc in the prisons and much damage and injury to inmates, as well as guards.

Mr. Leggatt: You don't mean every local.

Mrs. Holt: No, not every local. I am talking about Millhaven, and I am not talking about all the guards in the prison. The union to which I refer did not represent the full staff—not all the guards or treatment people. It represented a handful of people who made sure that there was no representation at meetings.

Today we are going to rebuild Millhaven at a cost of $33 million. I say that it would be cheaper to implement our report, to fire those hoodlum leaders, and face the courts, if necessary, than it would be to rebuild a prison without finding a solution to the tragedy of Millhaven and those who are inside. Both guards and inmates are victims of those few people. Guards are still finding their tires slashed. They are still threatened at pubs. If they want to serve on a committee to help in rehabilitation, they face injury and suffering.

I am proud to intervene in this debate as a continuation of my duty as one of a non-partisan committee. It is remarkable that the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for New Westminster and all the members of the committee managed to sustain non-partisan standards right up to this time. One or two did come in latterly who created some change. I was very uneasy about trends towards partisanship instead of sincerity in this matter.

I am intervening for two basic reasons. The first is that the penitentiary committee should be given a reference so that it can return and check claims of new unrest and administrative wrongs. I, and perhaps others on the committee, suspect that things are being covered up by the word "implementation". I do not believe that the most important and crucial recommendations have been implemented—those that can save taxpayers money, eliminate useless and damaging bureaucracy, and eliminate control by a handful of hoodlum guards who will not even allow treatment programs to go ahead in some of our prisons. In fact, with regard to one of our most important recommendations, recommendation No. 26, there are 17 pages devoted to the pretence that there has been implementation with regard to the union. Those pages are a cover up with social worker terms as "discussions held", "selected, separate employees involved", "questions put", "analyses", "assessment of effectiveness", "review of reasons" and "consultation". Those words indicate there has been no action, just talk. At the end of all talk and at the end of all dreams, must be action.

As the hon. member for New Westminster noted, there was not one significant incident while our committee was working. I know that every member of the committee who gets letters and who goes to the prisons today asks inmates "please wait". We ask the guards not to get angry, and to stick it out. We ask them to, "please, please wait, don't blow it because we are still trying to work out the prison problems and implement the report."

I hope that does not give false hope. I know I write letters saying, "Keep it cool, the parliamentary committee is serious and honest." I am certain that is why there was minimum violence for a considerable time, even after one report was tabled. We did manage to keep the lid on because of our contacts.

The report of the penitentiary subcommittee is not bits and pieces. It is not the kind of report of which only small parts can be implemented with the expectation that the prison system can be improved and the lives of those inside can be restored.

The reference with regard to the bill which is before the committee now is relevant, because I can see that children's rights may very well be written in beautiful language, but that will not matter if we put children through a prison system which makes them more dangerous when they come out than when they went in.

The one thing society must worry about is protection of society. That is not done by cruel security. It is not done by locking men and women into cages for 23½ hours a day, by abusing them, gassing them and harassing them. This only guarantees they come out more dangerous than before. And 99 per cent of all those in prison do come out—they come out as of law, as of right. They walk beside us on the streets; they shop with us in the stores; they go to ballgames with us and sit beside us at hockey games. If they are more dangerous when they come out of the prison system, society is not served. Our report as a whole—not in bits and pieces—was designed to change the whole prison system, to assure the reformation of those committed to federal care.

Now, what are they doing? I suggest that the commissioner and his group of executives—that bureaucracy at the top—are not implementing our recommendations but rather are spending millions of dollars on task forces which travel all across Canada to find ways to avoid implementation. I see members of those task forces all the time on the planes. I hear them talking about how they have just done this job in a prison, and laugh about it. The task forces are redundant, they are repeating our work at the cost of millions of dollars to Canadians. I suggest they are not implementing our report but rather finding ways not to implement it. For example, the directors of prisons and of regions would not want the regional headquarters closed as our report recommended, because it would mean a loss of jobs at the top.

The second point I want to make which is so important—probably the most important reason for my rising to speak here tonight—is in regard to the whole system of committees of the House of Commons. Are we, members of committees, working long hours on these committees—sometimes on three committees a day, one committee meeting running into another—simply strutting and fretting on the stage as we are doing here, or are we there to serve the people of Canada? I suspect it has reached the stage where we rubber stamp budgets in our committees and the bureaucracy takes control from there.

It is similar in the CBC where we approve the budget and the executives, the officials, take the money and use it to pay Knowlton Nash $20 a minute, $90,000 a year; they use the rest to perpetuate people at the top, instead of for good programming. The same situation exists when we pass the solicitor general's budget; the money goes to the top bureaucracy. It does not go down to the treatment of the inmates, to treatment programs, to reform programs. The top people want to keep their top men working and their task forces happy.

I say that unless a real study of the whole committee system is undertaken and reforms are brought in, we might as well not work in this House. The role of our committees is crucial to the whole democratic process. I will consider a speech to change the committee system the most important I can make in the House. Let me emphasize that the motion before the House now is absolutely crucial in the discussions of the future of our work in a democratic system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: The feeling that we waste time in our committees is proven by the fact that we were an all-party penitentiary subcommmittee and that this report was accepted unanimously in the House. There was no dissension on it. It could very well have been implemented, even including the very difficult problem of dealing with the union leaders and with the removal of regional headquarters.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that about eight years ago regional headquarters for all of western Canada, for the four western provinces, consisted of eight people in a mobile home on the prison compound of the B.C. penitentiary? Today it probably comprises 181 people, I do not have the exact figure. Twenty months ago we recommended that regional headquarters be eliminated. Possibly the most they should do is to monitor the prison and see that prisoners are supplied with things likes towels and toilet tissue. That is all it is worth. What has happened since our report was tabled? Regional headquarters were enlarged. This goes to prove that we are held in total contempt. The officials tell us that they are implementing our report in this regard. Well they have not cut, but added, a regional director general. All that means is we have another level in their bureaucracy, and our committee is held in total contempt, as is this House.

The partisan comments that have been made here about the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) disturb me very much because I feel that there was a genuine attempt to understand and implement the report by the previous solicitor general, who worked closely with us during our work and this has been continued by the present solicitor general. I am convinced that the bureaucracy in every department of government has become very strong, and I must say the opposition and the media make it impossible to clean up the mess.

For example, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in one case why he did not fire a few people to show that parliament is the boss. He told me that when he fired one government employee the opposition tore him apart, the media tore him apart, and he was even brought before the courts. I say, "Fine, fire a few, go before the court, face the court, but let us not have this contemptuous approach to our system and to our whole democratic process."

I am serving notice in this House that I have a case right now that I intend to fight right here. Probably, Mr. Speaker, I am behaving quite improperly and I am not following the rules because I still am not fully acquainted with all the processes here. It is the Faibish matter, that CRTC commissioner who behaved so contemptuously toward this member of parliament. It is not just the incident involving the threat to do something crude with a pin but the whole principle that if this public servant had been in private business he would have been fired for gross misconduct. But here he can stay, and probably be promoted! The same is happening in the prison system.

I say that if the Faibish salary is not cut to $1 in the estimates which will come before us in March,—as an example—then I will vote against the supply bill in the House. I do not see why we should automatically accept the fact that these people should get their salary and yet not behave with respect for the public and for members of parliament. This is exactly what has happened in the penitentiary service. The commissioner says he cannot keep in touch with the 50 prisons. I suggest they are not all in riot and there are only six maximum penitentiaries. If he cannot handle them, then he should either resign or be fired. That is one of the reasons why he will not implement our report.

I want to say, before I complete my statement, that if we can all work as we did in the committee, recognizing right from the start the fact that there is a crisis in our prison system, as well as recognizing the other crises in our society and working together as a unit, we will not be destroyed by the bureaucracy. We will not be divided, and our parliament conquered, split, and held in contempt across this country.

I want to say also that last week I brought out two points to the Solicitor General. One involved my concern over parole and the management of the parole system. I learned later that immediately he contacted the parole director and the parole board and has been working with them since. On Thursday I was out to dinner at the halfway house, the post release house of the John Howard Society here.

I discovered it had opened two months ago, but in that time there were only three people in it. We keep being told that there is a shortage of after care for the transition from penitentiaries into society of hard core prisoners. But here we have only three people; there is space for 14 people. I mentioned that to the Solicitor General and apparently the remedy has been started. So it is not fair to talk about politics and political neglect by the Solicitor General, because this is a big job which, I suppose, must be handled by officials. But the officials must be the servants, not the masters of the people and of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to participate in a debate such as this, particularly when one has been preceded by such fine speakers speaking with unanimity, having one common goal and, by and large, forsaking the concept of political partisanship.

I must admit I approached this debate with hesitancy, knowing this was going to take place since some time last week. I was concerned about what would result from the debate today so that, on my own initiative, I approached the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) to express to him the fears I had about some adverse effects which this debate might have. At the same time, I spoke to the liaison official between us in the subcommittee on the penitentiaries and the commissioner. I see that Mr. Fife is here in the gallery tonight, I presume to carry back our thoughts to the commissioner.

I approached this day with hesitation because I thought there would probably be some adverse results from this debate which would further impede the success and the implementation of our prison report. I say this because, when I sat through the last meeting of our committee on justice and legal affairs, I sensed that a real problem might arise as a result of the feelings of the officials of the Canadian correctional services. There was no doubt in my mind that those officials felt that things were not going right so far as their relationship with the committee was concerned. I felt that myself, and I seized the opportunity to write to the commissioner about it. Indeed his reply to me confirmed what I had observed at that meeting.

The problem is the same one identified in the report of the subcommittee. The difficulty with the prisons is not a problem of bricks and mortar, it is a problem of people. The last time I sat in the Standing committee I saw a people's problem. In fact there were two adversary positions. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) very admirably described, there was the position of the public service. Perhaps the hon. member has put her finger on the most important problem, not only in the area we are discussing tonight but in the total area of government as I have seen it in the last four or five years I have been in Ottawa. One could feel the tension and failure to communicate between the two sides in committee. On the one side there was administration representing the Canadian correctional services, and parliamentarians on the other. When there are those types of adversary positions, we will not be successful.

When I realized that this debate was to take place today, I was concerned we would exacerbate the problem. I felt that the justifiable indignation of some of the officials would be aggravated. Also I felt that prison inmates would be aggravated. Also I felt that prison inmates would lose some faith in the committee. Those inmates felt that they had something going in the committee which would correct and improve the situation. Tonight the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) read excerpts from letters which indicated how the situations in Millhaven and perhaps other institutions were about to explode again. We have heard how there was complete quiet in the prisons while the subcommittee was meeting. Although this debate may provoke the government to do something, I felt it might exacerbate the feelings of prison inmates.

Perhaps this debate has damaged the reputation of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). I thought he would have known better than to attempt to oppose the motion coming from the standing committee. This resolution was supported unanimously by the committee. It came to the House in good faith. There was no partisanship showing in the desire of the standing committee to bring the entire subject before the committee in its proper sense. Yet, for some reason, the Solicitor General attempted to block it with a procedural move. I am pleased the minister reversed his position of being opposed to the motion. I gather he will support it now, but I am sure it embarrassed the government. We are at a time when the government is anxious to get legislation through, but now we are spending an entire day debating this issue. I am sure the time of the House could have been used considering some other issue. As this issue could have been handled very adequately within the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs if the opportunity were available.

In his presentation this afternoon the Solicitor General made comments concerning all the matters which have been implemented arising from the 65 recommendations of the report. I should like to refer to nine recommendations brought to my attention recently which have not been implemented. Where is the report on the inmates' rights? What about the problem of the in-House grievance and disciplinary hearings which are not as good as the minister led us to believe in his earlier comments today? The Solicitor General attempted to convince the House that the citizens' advisory committees are working effectively. We know that is not true, as I am sure he knows as well. The inmates' committees are not functioning well. I understand one of the inmates' committees in Kingston has been disbanded completely, because it was felt that it had no place or no role to play in the institution any longer. The training programs recommended in the report have not been implemented as they should have been.

The new prisons are another problem. There is room for discussion concerning the size of prisons, but obviously no adequate study has been conducted to justify the recent decison of the Solicitor General. The pay for work done by prisoners is grossly inadequate. The other day we learned that in some prisons there was privileged correspondence between inmates and parliamentarians openly available on charts of certain inmates for others to see. The recommendation in the report that the prison law library should be enhanced and improved has not been followed.

Today we heard some talk about partisanship. As many members have said, it is quite true there was absolutely no partisanship in the subcommittee set up to study penitentiaries. In fact, if there was any rift within that subcommittee, it was more often on an incidental basis between two members of the same party. Very rarely was there a rift between two parties. As a relatively new member of the House, it was encouraging to see that parliamentarians could work collectively toward a common goal in this case, namely, the improvement of our prisons. I was somewhat disappointed when things changed a little. This was alluded to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. Some time last week government members of the standing committee received an updated progress report, and we were not allowed to have ours until this week.

Mr. Nielsen: I got it today.

Mr. Halliday: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) received his copy today. One of the recommendations in which I was particularly interested was recommendation No. 62. It dealt with some changes in the administration of prisons at the local institutional level. The government undertook a research study to assess the feasibility of such an innovation. The green book indicated that two studies were done. It was concluded that it would not be a wise idea to attempt such an experiment. When we telephoned the office of the Solicitor General in an attempt to receive a copy of those two studies, we were told that they were not for publication and that we could not have them. That was not the type of co-operation which we experienced throughout the workings of the subcommittee on penitentiaries. The only reason such an excellent report was produced in the end was the perfect co-operation which existed. As other members have indicated, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville did an excellent job as committee chairman in keeping the committee non-partisan. But under the leadership of the Solicitor General, we see it falling apart.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway put her finger on the most important issue facing not only the prisons but governments in general. We have lost track entirely of the relationship which should exist between the elected representatives of the people and the people we hire on behalf of Canadians to administer and carry out the legislation we see fit to pass. There is no doubt in my mind that this is the crux of the problem.

We have heard about the failure of the CCS which I believe was in one particular area. Perhaps we have abused some of those officials in that in many cases they have attempted to implement certain recommended proposals for which we did not give them due recognition. As officials, they have assumed the role of the elected representatives. It is absolutely absurd that they have taken on the roles of policy-making and implementation.

One can look at other public institutions in the country, such as the public school system in Ontario. Its policy is formed by an elected or appointed board. Policy recommendations are passed by the board and implemented by the professionals. It is absurd that in the present system the professionals in CCS seem to think they are better judges of the needs of the country than we are. We were sent to Ottawa for the very purpose of determining what that policy should be. We made 65 recommendations, and they have turned around and told us they do not like them and are not going to put them into force. What do you think of that, Mr. Speaker?

● (2130)

An hon. Member: Who do they think they are?

Mr. Halliday: Who do they think they are, precisely? That is what galls me about what is going on in Ottawa at the present time, and I get quite disturbed about it at times. I am quite prepared to sit down with those officials and talk with them. If they have any questions to ask, they should ask us. They come to these committee meetings and sit on one side, and they inform us in their printed report that they do not agree with our recommendations and are not going to implement them. Why do they not come to us and say, "We see a problem in respect of recommendations Nos. 24 and 62?" They do not do that; they simply say they cannot make them work. They do not come out and say, "Perhaps we can come to some compromise in order that we can make them work." This is the attitude that is causing cynicism around this country about the parliamentary system.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has talked about how our parliamentary committee system is failing. I suggest it is failing for the same reason. We as the elected representatives are not being given proper recognition. That is due in part to the failure of the government, specifically, and in large part to the failure of this government in allowing a body of officials to run this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Halliday: There are two recommendations about which I feel particularly concerned, namely, recommendations Nos. 24 and 62. They have reference to the management of our prisons. Strangely enough, and this substantiates my total point, those were the two recommendations of the 65 that were virtually rejected out of hand.

Recommendation No. 24 suggested a five-man board that would recommend policy to the commission. It would be responsible to the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General does not understand it. If you read what is suggested in recommendations Nos. 24 and 62, Mr. Speaker, you will have to admit that he does not understand what we are suggesting. He thinks he would be deprived of a line of authority. Obviously he does not understand the system at all, yet he comes from Ontario where this has worked beautifully in our school jurisdiction. He refuses to admit that.

The minister has been conned by this body of officials because they realize that if recommendations 24 and 62 were approved they would no longer have the power to make policy. I suggest they would be better off with the implementation of these recommendations. They would be in position to recommend policy to those who are responsible. They would have to substantiate that policy to those who are responsible for approving policy, namely, the elected representatives, who would then be prepared to accept it. Is my time running out, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: No, you have five or ten minutes.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I am a little disappointed that we have not seen the Solicitor General here today, except for a few minutes this afternoon. He disappeared well before the debate was interrupted before the dinner recess, and he has not been here at all tonight. Perhaps his parliamentary secretary will explain why that is, later this evening.

I want to say something more about this attitude that is exemplified by our paid officials, particularly those in the CCS. That is an area where we have the opportunity of observing this attitude.

I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 1, 1979. It is entitled "Deregulation" and is written by Geoffrey Stevens. It hits the nail on the head and appeared, fortuitously, not long before this debate. In dealing with this problem of deregulation he has this to say:

—where does the role of the independent regulator end and the role of the accountable politician begin?

He goes on after a paragraph to state:

And there are times when the politician should step in. In an article published in the Yale Law Journal in June, 1975, two Washington legal experts, David R. Johnson and Lloyd Cutler (the latter being, coincidentally, Washington's negotiator in the Canada-U.S. fish war), argued that he should step in more often. "The necessity of delegation should not disguise the fact that whatever legitimacy inheres in agency action stems from a delegation of politically based power—

That is what I was trying to say a few minutes ago regarding those we appoint to run prisons.

The article goes on to state:

"Only elected officials can provide the requisite overview, co-ordination, and practical political judgment to weigh competing claims, make the necessary ultimate decisions, and stand accountable at the polls."

I have a beautiful excerpt here which one might think comes from a journal of recent date. It carries the headline "Sessional Papers (No. 18.)", and it is dated 1898. The portion I have here is a report from the inspector of penitentiaries, Mr. Douglas Stewart, who signs off as "Your obedient servant". It is dated, as I say, 1898. He is writing in the sessional papers recommending, I presume, to the Department of Justice, under the heading "General System of Control", certain things. It seems that back in 1875, over 100 years ago, the management of penitentiaries was vested in a board of directors, the very thing this subcommittee saw fit to recommend in 1977. In 1875 that board of directors was abolished and replaced by departmental control under the minister of justice.

In 1879 a commission was appointed to study penitentiaries, headed by Messrs. Taché and Miall. Mr. Stewart, the inspector of penitentiaries, had this to say:

The trend of opinion among those most closely identified with the prisons has been adverse to direct departmental control, and the case from that point of view is forcibly set out by Messrs. Taché and Miall in their report in connection with the management of the penitentiaries, dated 23rd December, 1879.

Let me read a couple of quotations from this report of Messrs. Taché and Miall because they point out that in 1879, one hundred years ago, the very problems we are trying to correct by recommendations Nos. 24 and 62 then existed. The first quotation is as follows:

"The study of the subject of prison management, if pursued free from the influence of preconceived ideas, must lead an unbiased mind to the conviction that such institutions should be governed and directed by an organization or body of men free from political or other extraneous influences."

I would like to have another opportunity to refer to this document at a future date, Mr. Speaker. Let me conclude by saying that there is evidence to show that the system we now have did not work 100 years ago and it is not working now. It is high time we, as elected representatives, insisted that these managers do the job we want them to do rather than the job they think they should do.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in the remaining few minutes I should like to speak on the motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I shall try to be as brief as I can as I know the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) would like to speak for a few minutes. If I can leave him one or two minutes perhaps we can be in our seats before ten o'clock and the question can be put.

Underlying the motion presented by the hon. member for St. John's East there is an evident feeling that prison reform is not proceeding. That is a feeling that can be disspelled by a consideration of the facts, if one will take a quiet and objective look at those facts. Many of the accomplishments of the ministry in implementing the recommendations of the subcommittee on penitentiaries were outlined by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) this afternoon. Since that time we have had a number of speakers from all sides of the House presenting their particular points of view.

I could say to all members in this House, and to anyone who is watching, listening or may eventually read the report of this debate, that the minister and myself as his parliamentary secretary, I think, are as aware as anyone in this House of the situations which exist in the prisons of this country today. The minister and myself, on his behalf from time to time, are in charge of the operation of these institutions from a policy and directional standpoint. We receive daily reports on the incidents and troubles which exist within the prisons.

That is not to purport that anybody who has entered into this debate is attempting to suggest that they are any more concerned about prisons than any other member or the minister himself, but surely the minister and myself are no less concerned about our prisons and about prison reform in this country today. It is evident from the comments which have been made that, for many members in this House, prison reform has become in essence a motherhood issue. To say that it is a motherhood issue—

Mr. Nielsen: Oh!

Mr. Young: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) groans. I wish that he would hear me out for just a second. To say that it is a motherhood issue is not to denigrate the issue at all. I use that term to emphasize the importance of this issue to all of us. It is an issue on which everybody, including the members of this House, has different points of view.

Mr. Nielsen: Not the committee.

Mr. Young: Not the committee? I think there are different points of view. I will explain my remarks for the hon. member. I am not trying to lessen the importance of the matter when I say that, but what I mean is that it is like trying to define motherhood. Each of the 264 hon. members in this House has a slightly different interpretation of what motherhood is, and of what the best parts of that subcommittee report are.

It is evident from the debate this afternoon that each of the members has concentrated on slightly different issues in the report. In sum and substance all those who served on the subcommittee wish to see the recommendations implemented as soon as possible.

Mr. Nielsen: All of them.

Mr. Young: I would think that hon. members out of necessity should feel that way, otherwise they would be casting doubt upon their own work. I would expect the members of that committee, who worked for almost a year travelling across this country interviewing many different witnesses, to be very interested in seeing those recommendations carried out.

Prison reform is a matter of prime importance in this country. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) has made the comment that privileged mail was being opened. If he has actual cases with facts and names, I wish that he would report them to me because I, like the hon. member, am one of those people who correspond almost daily with inmates in the various penitentiaries. I do it on behalf of the ministry, and I receive a good number of letters in return from inmates commenting on the letters which I sent to them personally as a member of parliament, aside from the ministerial or quasi-ministerial duties which I perform in my work.

The hon. member for Oxford commented on studies which are being done with regard to pay for prisoners who work in the prison industries. He said that the studies which were being done were not sufficient. Those were his interests in the debate. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), my colleague, was very concerned with recommendation No. 26, that officials were doing too much travelling across the country studying the recommendations which have been made.

The recommendations in the subcommittee report, although they were expanded upon in chapter after chapter, were general recommendations which must be taken and put into practical effect. They require work in the form of intensive study as to how they can be carried out.

Going back to the hon. member for Oxford for a moment, he said in relation to the letter from which he quoted that he felt the prison system had not been the best in this country for a 100 years, and was not today. I do not accept everything he said, but if that were the case, how can the members of the subcommittee expect that history, that period of 100 years, through different governments from different sides of this House, to be turned around in a matter of months following the tabling of their report? I suggest that that is not humanly possible, to turn around 100 years of history overnight, as much as we might like to clear up all of the problems. To expect that it would be done in a few months is a bit of a "Pollyanna" attitude.

Mr. Nielsen: None of us expected that.

Mr. Young: There have been comments to the effect that the ministry has not responded to the subcommittee report.

Mr. Nielsen: No, there have not.

Mr. Young: There has been response. I have a copy of the progress report which hon. members received a couple of days ago.

Mr. Nielsen: Today.

Mr. Young: I delivered copies to some of the hon. member's colleagues yesterday, and if he was not here in the House, then I apologize for that. I got copies to hon. members as fast as I possibly could.

Mr. Nielsen: You had them a week ago.

Mr. Young: Here is a progress report dated January, 1979, and it is only one in a series of progress reports which have been put out by successive Solicitors General.

The subcommittee report was tabled in the House in June, 1977. In August, 1977, the then solicitor general submitted to the House a detailed response to the recommendations and followed that up by tabling detailed recommendation-by-recommendation progress reports on the implementation of the subcommittee's report. The present Solicitor General, having assumed office in February, 1978, was very quick to announce his intention to honour the commitment of the previous solicitor general. Subsequent progress reports were developed and given to all hon. members.

Mr. Nielsen: At the same time?

Mr. Young: The present Solicitor General has appeared twice before the standing committee to update members on the progress of the implementation of the recommendations, so I do not think that it is fair to say that there has been no response.

Mr. Nielsen: I didn't say that.

Mr. Young: I have said that hon. members who have participated in this debate each touched on a different point which was of particular interest to them. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was interested in the size of the planned new penitentiaries. His request was that he be given the studies done and data developed upon which the ministry calculated the necessary size of prisons to be built or remodelled. I am suggesting that a good deal, if not all, of that information, can be made available to hon. members when the minister and his officials come before the standing committee very shortly to deal with supplemenary estimates and the main estimates for the coming fiscal year. Those two occurrences are to take place very shortly, and all members will have a very adequate chance to ask for that data.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not true.

Mr. Young: I have come to learn, Mr. Speaker, that the answers hon. members receive in committee are as good as the questions asked. If hon. members would put pertinent questions and ask about the data in the studies, I will do my best, as a member sitting on that committee and in my position as the parliamentary secretary, to see that they get their answers, because that is part of my job.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was concerned about prison industries and the atmosphere in prisons today. For the hon. member for Yukon the concern was disruption in the penitentiaries today, and the treatment of the committee's report. He mentioned a recent incident at Dorchester penitentiary. I want to suggest to him that the incidents which took place at Dorchester recently were from other causes than the ones he feels were responsible.

● (2150)

I recently received a letter from an inmate at Dorchester. I will not reveal his name, not because he would suffer any retribution or harm and I would be happy to show the letter to any member of the House, but he is an inmate whose name would be recognized by almost all hon. members. In the past he has been a prolific letter writer. He has corresponded with me on a number of occasions, and with the chairman of the subcommittee on a number of occasions as well. The letter to the minister and to the commissioner praised the new director of Dorchester and the measures which have been instituted there.

I think I may have answered some of the comments of the hon. member for St. John's East, Mr. Speaker, who complained that there had been no response to or comment on the report of the subcommittee.

I would like to sum up very briefly, Mr. Speaker. A wealth of information is available to hon. members in the progress report dated January, 1979. It follows in a logical sequence those studies which have been done in order to implement the subcommittee report. It is true that it takes quite a number of pages to cover the work being done on recommendation No. 26—17, in fact, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. My colleague may feel that those are just words, but in the margin there are dates running all through this year by which those studies will be completed. If hon. members doubted the work that is going on, I encourage them to ask the officials when they appear with the minister before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs very shortly.

I could outline a number of other things the ministry has done. The Solicitor General has suggested to the standing committee that a number of significant steps can be taken within the current framework to bring about the result that he and all hon. members want to achieve and that will further the development of a disciplined and professional career service. Steps have been taken to create a career management system and a corrections "family" classification category. There are steps to provide the service with special status and authority under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. There are provisions for a new professional code of conduct in the Penitentiary Act regulations. There is the delegation of full staff authority to the service on the basis of "prime user status" under the Public Service Employment Act.

I know that the commissioner has sent to members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs an outline of the steps taken by his service in 1978, entitled "The CCS Major Accomplishments in 1978", which runs to eight or nine pages.

I want to leave a few moments for my colleague to sum up, Mr. Speaker. He asked me to leave him five minutes at the end, and I am leaving him exactly that. I know that hon. members waited with baited breath and, I hope, with not too jaundiced an eye to hear the few remarks I would make this evening. I thank you for allowing me to participate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for bringing this motion forth. It is very timely and is of great importance to this House. Unfortunately, my time is so short that I will barely get started before I have to finish.

We are all concerned about the incarceration of children, the penal system, and penal reform. The children of today become the adults of tomorrow. That is all the more reason we should consider this in depth, and not only consider the ten principles of the United Nations mentioned in Bill C-204 as presented by the hon. member for St. John's East but also the penitentiary system which may affect the lives of all of our children today.

I do not want to go over a lot that has already been covered by hon. members tonight, because basically I subscribe to virtually everything they say about the report. As a member of the committee and one of those who spent seven months looking at the prison system in this country and in the United States, I appreciate the problems, and I want to see that something is done about them.

The most important recommendation in the report is recommendation No. 65, which I should like to read into the record:

> The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs should have a permanent reference during the rest of the 30th Parliament and for the 31st Parliament to enable it to review the implementation of this Report in the context of the criminal justice system.

To my mind this is the most important single recommendation in the report. If it had been implemented we would not have to implement all the rest, because the committee would be able to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson: I tried to make a point earlier to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) but he would not allow me, to the effect that we must consider the Juvenile Delinquents Act as well as the Criminal Code when we speak of children. Many sections of the Criminal Code are important, such as section 43 which concerns discipline of children, and Section 159(8) which deals with obscenity. Hon. members will remember that we prepared a report on obscenity for this House. Section 166 deals with parents or guardians procuring defilement. There are assault provisions in the Criminal Code. Section 150 concerns incest, seduction, and other matters. Section 206 is with regard to children becoming human beings. Section 251 is on abortion, Section 196 deals with abandoning a child, Section 197 deals with providing the necessities, and there is a host of other provisions in the Code that will be opened up now so that we can deal with these matters.

I do not want to talk out the motion, Mr. Speaker. I know it is going to get unanimous consent and I thank the minister for agreeing to that. I am sure I speak for all members of the justice subcommittee and many other members of the House when I say that we want to see this report implemented because it is so important to the penitentiary system today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that the House call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION TO HEALTH CARE PROGRAM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I drew the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to a problem of an increasing number of aged patients and the lack of proper chairs of medicine being established in the universities across Canada for this purpose. The over 60 years of age is the fastest growing group in our society and we have created a social and economical problem for the government with this new breed of patient with whom we have had only limited experience. Those who suffer from degenerative diseases are not cured by a pill or an antibiotic. They create new problems in medicine.

At the beginning of this century a doctor had few drugs but his presence created trust and confidence. His suggestions were indeed potent weapons, and his competence and spiritual faith carried many back from severe illness which might otherwise have proved fatal. He was often the sole comforter in the home. Today the situation is different. This is almost a lost art. His work is now largely a hospital practice. He makes his rounds, sometimes with an army of paramedical personnel. This destroys the closeness that existed when the doctor, the patient and the family were the only ones concerned.

Let us take a look at the beginning of this century when life expectancy was just over 40 years. Today life expectancy is just over 75 years. In the over 75-year age group the average woman lives 5 years longer than a man. In the over 85-year age group there are two women to every man. With the advent of scientific medicine at the beginning of the century life expectancy increased.

In 1900 there were many diseases. The first medicine we discovered of any real concern which made an impact on the world's scientific field was smallpox vaccine. Along with that was the development of antiseptic surgery by Dr. Lister. At the beginning of this century there was recognition that typhoid fever was caused by an organism. This organism was found in the environment and in polluted drinking water or food that was handled by someone with the organism. It would have been impossible to have fought the First World War if we had not discovered the cause and prevention of typhoid fever.

Then we come to the scientific era of antitoxin and diphtheria. This disease was one of the great killers in 1905. I remember a family of five who lived next door to me who died from diphtheria. An antitoxin had been used in the first case discovered in the neighbourhood but it had been used in too small a dose. Quickly followed by the diphtheria and scarlet fever antitoxin was a whole host of disease preventives. Next came the discovery of insulin for the treatment of diabetes, by Drs. Banting and Best. As a result of this a number of young lives were saved. I remember a Dr. Gilchrist, a childhood diabetic, who later became a famous doctor in Toronto. I could give many more examples, including the treatment of pernicious anemia.

Following that came the sulphur drugs and antibiotics, with the advent of penicillin and the golden age of aureomycin followed by the tetracyclines etc. Then all at once we found that infections were not the biggest killer of people up to the age of 35 or 40, instead today accidents take more lives.

Then we found some people approaching the age of 50 were developing chronic diseases. These diseases included those of the heart, the lungs, the arteries, the cardiovascular system, rheumatoid arthritis, emphysema, and so on. Sometimes people were not just afflicted with one ailment but two. We found out that by comparing a person aged 60 with a person aged 20 or 30, the 60-year-old would have three times the number of illnesses. As a result of many postmortems performed on people in their nineties it has been found that not only do these people have one disease but sometimes three or four, and perhaps as many as one to three cancers in their vital organs. It was found too that the cancer had not always been the cause of death.

This field has never been explored fully because all at once it is ongoing. Ten years ago we were told this field would be opened up, but nothing has been done yet. The geriatric specialty is not taught in this country, and I want to give you a brief illustration of that. Very few physicians have special training in the complexities and the needs of the aged patient. Older people very often manifest symptoms entirely different from those commonly associated with certain ailments among those less advanced in years. Many diseases occur to me in this context, but I shall not refer to them now. A fellow who is 80 can show symptoms quite different from those which would be expected in the case of a younger man like yourself, Mr. Speaker.

● (2205)

The place to generate the new training which is required has to be our medical schools. And listen to this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time has expired.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will begin by commending the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) for his persistence in bringing up this whole question of the need for geriatric care. He speaks with knowledge, interest and enthusiasm, and he will probably continue to do the same in the future. He is a doctor and a senior citizen, an expert on this topic, so it is good to hear from him this evening.

On December 14, 1978, the hon. member drew the attention of the House to the changing health requirements of an aging population. The shift in composition of the Canadian population is a major consideration of health planners at all levels of government and in the health professions. A number of issues related to these changes were raised at a national symposium on aging held in Ottawa in October, 1978.

Demographic forecasting is very complex, and trends may be altered considerably over the course of several decades. Nevertheless, there is considerable agreement among experts that the proportion of the population aged 65 years and over is likely to rise from the 1976 level of 8.7 per cent to about 12 per cent by the turn of the century. One need not be overwhelmed by this transition; Great Britain, France, Austria, East Germany and Sweden are among countries with 12 per cent or more of their population over 65 years of age.

Planning for the future does not only involve services for senior citizens. All segments of the population are affected by demographic transition, and comprehensive planning is needed. The provinces, of course, have direct responsibility for provision of most health and welfare services. Several provinces have initiated programs for adjusting their services to the needs of a changing population. The increased flexibility in provincial use of federal funds provided under the new financing arrangements assists them in making these modifications.

In response to suggestions from a number of provincial and voluntary agencies, a bureau on aging has recently been established in my department. This bureau will serve as a communications link between the federal government, provincial governments and organizations for the aged, and will become a contact point for individuals and senior citizens' organizations.

The health of senior citizens is not determined solely by the availability of "geriatric medicine". An objective of the department is the promotion of a healthful lifestyle and an increased sense of personal responsibility for one's physical condition. Prevention of damage to our health at earlier stages of life may have a profound effect on our state of health and well-being as we grow older.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PRO RATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on February 5 I raised a question in the House with regard to pro rata pensions for widows of disabled veterans. As the legislation now stands, widows of veterans receiving less than 48 per cent disability pension are left without a pension. I also asked whether the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) would tell the House when he plans to bring in pro rata pensions for these women, thereby implementing a recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. The Deputy Prime Minister said:

● (2210)

Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the provision of the Pension Act upon which the hon. member bases his question. However, I have not had a chance to talk with the Minister of Veterans Affairs about this. I will draw the question to his attention. I am sure he will give it his usual sympathetic consideration.

I then asked the Deputy Prime Minister whether he would promise to bring forward legislation dealing with the recommendations in whole or in part before an election is called. He answered:

—I cannot guarantee that legislation will be brought forward during the present session. In the normal course, the minister involved makes a recommendation to cabinet on these matters. Until that recommendation is made, such reports are not normally studied by cabinet.

The question here is why the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) did not raise this matter in cabinet. It seems very strange that a recommendation which was made in 1975 by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has not even been raised in cabinet by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The recommendation was as follows:

Your committee also recommends to the House that consideration be given to amending the Pension Act to provide that a widow's pension be awarded on a sliding scale as follows:

When at the time of death of the prisoner he was, or would have been in receipt of a pension assessed at 47 per cent or less, that pension be paid to the widow in double proportion to the assessed degree of the pensioner's disability as it relates to the basic pension granted to widows.

That was the basic proposal, and now, three and a half years later, we learn from the Deputy Prime Minister that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has not even raised this matter for consideration in cabinet. That is unbelievable.

That brings us to the question of priorities. It was announced just last week that the government has found $18 million to build hockey arenas across the country. Hockey arenas have a higher priority than finding money for the widows of veterans. That is a strange priority.

It seems to me that bribing the Canadian people with hockey arenas just before an election is just a gimmick, and it should not be a higher priority than the widows of veterans. We also found out just last week that the government has found money so that Statistics Canada can conduct a study on the amount of toilet paper and the number of sanitary pads female members of a household use. Those are the strange priorities of this government. It conducts studies on what people do in their bathrooms, but it cannot raise money for the widows of veterans. We will be passing this information around the nation, and to all widows and veterans' organizations, in order to point out this government's priorities. Its priorities are toilet paper, sanitary napkins, and bribing voters with hockey arenas.

Another recommendation which has not been fulfilled dates back to 1970 and deals with the basic rate of disability pension. As a result of the work of the committee to survey the organization and work of the Canadian Pension Commission—that was the Woods commission—the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs recommended to the House of Commons in June of 1970 that the basic rate of the 100 per cent disability pension should be the same as the average or composite wage of five categories of unskilled employees in the public service, and that subsequent increases in the pension should be based on the same formula.

Obviously, the Minister of Veterans Affairs has not discussed this in cabinet either. A junior minister just appointed to the cabinet recently makes more headway than the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who has been in the cabinet since 1972. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has not raised these matters.

There are other matters we had hoped the minister would raise, but apparently he has not. One of those matters is compensation for prisoners of war over and above the disability pension. Another recommendation the committee made is that the government ensure that disability pension increases are not accompanied by reductions in other awards or allowances.

● (2215)

I would suggest that the government take a second look at its priorities. With the uncontrolled inflation which exists in this country and the problems that our senior citizens are having, this is not the time for squandering money on the useless statistics that Canada studies. It is time they looked at our veterans affairs problems. I hope we will have a straightforward answer from the parliamentary secretary tonight, some assurance that legislation will be brought in, before an election is called, to deal with widows' pensions, because if it is not brought in before an election, six or eight months could elapse before the next Conservative government could deal with these problems. Now is the time to deal with them, not six or eight months from now.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing his question forward. I discussed the matter with the minister, and I am pleased to bring the information that the question of providing pro rata pensions for widows of veterans who had been in receipt of disability pensions at a rate less than 48 per cent is being currently studied. At present if a veteran's pension has been assessed at the rate of 48 per cent or more, his surviving dependants would be pensionable. It should be remembered that, in addition, a widow will be pensioned if her husband's death occurred during war time or was attributable to service, regardless of the degree of the assessment of disability.

All veterans' benefits undergo constant review to see what changes can be made to improve their lot and that of their dependants, and I assure the hon. member that the government considers their well-being as a priority.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—PENALTIES FOR VANDALISM

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, while my remarks tonight are being addressed to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), I should like to point out that he is the third minister of justice since I first introduced this subject more than two years ago. On October 29, 1976, I asked the then minister of justice during the question period what response, if any, he had made to representations from a number of Canadian municipalities asking for federal assistance in combating the rising wave of vandalism throughout the country.

I became concerned when I learned that the Minister of Justice had not made any effort to follow up on these requests, especially those from Ontario municipalities led by the town council of Trenton, Ontario. The Trenton council, and the councils of other municipalities across the province, felt that the problem was serious enough to warrant a combined federal-provincial assault on this senseless crime. So far as I can determine, neither of the two previous justice ministers has even expressed an interest in following through on these requests. They both answered my questions in much the same way, namely, that vandalism is purely a provincial matter and that any initiatives concerning federal-provincial co-operation in this matter must come from the provincial attorneys general. I reject that argument on both counts.

The answers given by the minister lead me to believe that they have failed utterly to get the point I have been trying to make over the past two years. In the first place, the minister admitted that vandalism is covered by the Criminal Code, which is the federal body of law. But the Criminal Code is administered jointly by the Minister of Justice and the several provincial attorneys general. In the second place, the initiative for establishing a joint federal-provincial effort to combat vandalism could come from the federal Minister of Justice as well as from the provincial attorneys general.

What the two previous justice ministers failed to understand is that much of the vandalism of which I speak is directed against federal institutions, such as post offices. In some areas of the country, post offices have become favourite targets of vandals. While the federal government is responsible for apprehending and prosecuting in these cases, it does not do so in isolation from the provincial agencies and departments.

Apart from the senseless nature of vandalism and the appalling cost to the law-abiding public, there is another good reason why the federal Minister of Justice should be interested in mounting an effective campaign against vandalism in co-operation with the provinces.

The opinion widely held today among law enforcement and social agencies is that vandalism is more than just a senseless crime against private and public property. It is believed that vandalism is a step along the way to more serious crimes such as muggings, assaults, robberies, rapes and others. The nature of vandalism itself indicates a serious lack of respect for the law and for the rights and property of law-abiding citizens. When vandals operate undetected or when they get a slap on the wrist instead of a deterrent sentence when they appear before the courts, they become bolder, and the logical progression is into more serious types of crimes. Our only protection against this senseless and costly criminal behaviour is a more vigorous pursuit of vandals and stiffer penalties when they are apprehended and convicted. These are just some of the reasons why I believe it is imperative that the federal government get into the act through the office of the Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Justice should initiate contacts with provincial attorneys general to see if there is any real interest on their part in a federal-provincial assault on vandalism. A higher success rate in apprehending vandals would do much to convince such people that they are in a very real danger of being caught and convicted, which should reduce the incidence of such crime. In any case, serious contacts between the pertinent federal and provincial authorities could have some beneficial results. Surely it is worth some effort on their part to serve notice on vandals that their days are numbered.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Vandalism does not exist as such in the Criminal Code. What is generally called vandalism is provided for under the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with mischief, section 387, and the wilful damage of property when the alleged amount of damage does not exceed $50, section 388. Mischief is one of those offences where the prosecution can proceed by way of indictment or summary conviction.

If the prosecution proceeds by way of indictment, there are three possible sentences. When the mischief causes actual danger to human health, the accused is liable to imprisonment for life. If the mischief is in relation to public property, the maximum punishment is 14 years. Finally, if the offence is in relation to private property, the accused is liable to imprisonment for five years.

In all cases of mischief, whether in relation to public property or private property, the prosecution can choose to proceed by way of summary conviction, and in that case, the maximum punishment is imprisonment for six months, a fine of $500 or both. Damage under $50 caused to property is an offence punishable on summary conviction, and there again the maximum punishment is imprisonment for six months, a fine of $500 or both.

It should be noted that those punishments are a maximum. The courts very rarely impose the maximum punishment. They rather use other forms of sentences available to deal with each case individually. Those other forms of sentences are conditional or unconditional paroles, fines, suspended sentences and probation.

If the court decides to impose a period of probation it can include in the terms of that probation a proviso that the accused will have to make restitution or reparation to any person aggrieved or injured by the commission of the infraction. And if the accused wilfully omits to comply with one of the terms of the probation he is liable to be charged with a summary offence and punished for such a violation. The Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1978 introduces in our criminal law new types of sentences, such as the community service orders provided in Bill C-21. Moreover, this bill provides for compensation and restitution. Under these new provisions, the court must assess each case to ensure that it can make an order of compensation or restitution without placing the accused under a probation order.

According to the terms of our constitution, the role of the federal parliament is restricted to establishing criminal law. Parliament has attacked squarely the issue of vandalism by including criminal misdeeds in the Criminal Code and providing sentences of five and 14 years of imprisonment and life imprisonment for this offence. The courts have all the necessary freedom of action under the present provisions to use their discretionary powers. Increasing the provided penalty would be like trying to kill a fly with a cannon and the courts would simply not impose the new sentences provided.

It is extremely difficult to imagine a particular case of vandalism against private property which would justify a sentence of more than five years in prison. The administration of justice in a province is under strict provincial jurisdiction. If vandalism is a problem in a particular area, the Criminal Code gives the substitute of the attorney general all the flexibility required to solve the problem. He can use an indictment rather than a summary conviction. Moreover, once the guilt of the accused has been proven, he can suggest a prison term to the court rather than a fine or a suspended sentence.

Finally, the provincial attorney general can appeal the sentence to the appeals court if he finds it insufficient and fears that it does not constitute an acceptable precedent as a sentence for a misdeed. I wish to thank the hon. member for having brought up this question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

REQUEST FOR TWO-DAY DEBATE ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the increasingly alarming situation in which freedom finds itself today in Europe, Africa and Asia, as freedom-loving nations are falling under the domination of the U.S.S.R. and its satellites, and with the massive Soviet military expansion posing a frightening threat to the west, which a few days ago was described by the former prime minister of the United Kingdom, the Right Honourable Harold Macmillan, in these words, "The Soviet Union seems to get away with anything, just like Hitler got away with anything", in my opinion Canadians and the western world generally have a false sense of security. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That before the dissolution of parliament, two days should be set aside for the discussion of the terrifying international situation and the need for action to be recommended and taken by Canada to meet the situation in so far as our country is concerned, before it may be too late.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INFLATIONARY IMPLICATIONS OF UNCONTROLLED CORPORATE PRICES AND PROFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The business press reports that in 1978, corporate profits grew at a faster rate than in any period since 1973.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I expected that cheer for profits from a party which has done nothing for prices. The government's monitoring agency, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, reports profits in a comparable range. In light of the obvious inflationary implications of uncontrolled increases in corporate prices and profits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemns the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who recently lectured badly paid bank clerks, who are mostly women, for leaving completely untouched the country's largest corporations which are overcharging consumers and making their largest profits in recent history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT STUDENT AIR CONTROLLERS' TRAINING PROGRAM BE TRANSFERRED FROM CORNWALL TO DORVAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

On October 25 last, 16 Quebec students in training at the Cornwall air controllers' school voluntarily boycotted their classes because of discrimination against them. In view of the serious reasons given by the students, the minister responsible asked that an immediate inquiry be launched and its results have shown that there was some discrimination against the French-speaking group; considering that those students were willing to resume their studies on December 18, always in Cornwall, provided they were given fair treatment, but as six of the sixteen French-speaking students have since been notified that their training was ended, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the House unanimously urge the minister responsible to see that those students are transferred to the Dorval regional school in the shortest possible time for the sake of justice and equity.

REQUEST FOR REVOKING OF AGREEMENT PREVENTING CANADIANS WITH CRIMINAL RECORD STAYING IN UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 and seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that since January 1, 1979 an agreement between Canada and the United States forbids any Canadian who has a police record of some kind to stay in the United States unless he obtains a special authorization certificate; that such an agreement is a direct breach of individual rights and liberties; and that it uselessly penalizes law abiding citizens who have had the misfortune of making one mistake, however small, in their life, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House deplore the existence of such an agreement and instruct the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to take the necessary steps to abolish this practice as soon as possible since it seems to me to constitute a violation of human rights.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REMOVAL OF ARSENIC STORED AT ST. PIERRE, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the responsibility the federal government has in that it banned the use of arsenic for pest control, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the federal government take its share of the responsibility of moving arsenic now stored in St. Pierre, Manitoba, as the provincial government has undertaken to do its share in the removal of the stored arsenic.

PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS FROM UNJUSTIFIED PRICE AND PROFIT INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Economic Council reported yesterday that as a result of huge price increases, profits in consumer sectors increased tremendously, with large department stores' profits increasing by 87 per cent, those of motor vehicle dealers by 42 per cent, of food stores by 42 per cent and other retailers by 33 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House instructs the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to take some active interest in his portfolio and do his job of protecting Canadian consumers from unjustified price and profit increases.
