Mr. PROULX. I do not intend to discuss the matter. I only wish to draw the attention of the government to the situation which exists and I would like the government to bring the matter to the attention of the Railway Commission and have the railway companies try to solve the difficulty. In some parts of my county I know that they have hay awaiting shipment, and if it is not shipped before the spring freshets come on they will not be able to ship it for many months. In other parts of eastern Ontario the situation is the same, and I hope the government will do their utmost to help the farmers and shippers to ship their hay. One of the reasons of the difficulty seems to be that most of the hay is going to the United States; there is a lack of foreign cars and our railway companies are reluctant to send their cars across the border. I hope that the government will take the matter up with the railway companies.

Mr. COCHRANE. This is the first I have heard of the matter excepting what I saw in this morning's paper. No complaint has been laid before me, but now that the matter has been called to my attention I certainly shall be glad to bring it to the notice of the commissioners, and I have no doubt that they will deal with it promptly.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I ask the right hon. leader of the government if he has read the despatch published in yesterday's paper about the international boundary line in British Columbia? I read in the 'Witness' of last night the following despatch:

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY LINE—SENSATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND WASHINGTON OVER NEW SURVEY.

Vancouver, B.C., Feb. 8.—A story which reached New Westminster this morning from the Canadian side of the international boundary line has aroused tremendous interest here. It states that the boundary line between Canada and the United States, in the coal district, will be shifted two miles south and that two growing towns and coming cities which are now reckoned without protest from this side of the line to form part of the United States are really part of Canada.

Then the despatch goes on to give further details. Has my right hon. friend learned anything about that?

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). My attention has not been called to the article, and I have heard nothing of the statement except what the hon. gentleman has just mentioned. I shall direct the attention of the proper department to the matter.

VACANT SENATORSHIP.

Mr. MICHAUD. I wish to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) if he has received any correspondence from the French people of the maritime provinces in connection with the appointment of a senator to fill the place left vacant by the late Senator Comeau. There are actually in the maritime provinces about 165,000 French people; they have only one senator and I believe that they are entitled to three or four according to population.

Mr. BORDEN. The appointments to new senatorships are now under consideration.

THE GRAIN ACT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting grain.—Mr. Foster (North Toronto).

On section 80—Grain shipped from public elevators, re-inspection.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It will be remembered that I proposed to insert after the word 'quality' in subsection 2, the words 'or is manifestly not of the grade called for by the certificate.' This is to provide for what occasionally takes place where a lot of grain turns out to be manifestly of a different grade from that shown on the certificate. There is no recourse so far as the Act is concerned in such a case and this simply proposes that in such a case the grain shall not be regraded but that the inspector shall endorse across the face of the original certificate a statement of the facts as he does in respect of the other two conditions mentioned in the section, where the grain has deteriorated or has gone out of condition.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend will agree that there is always grave danger in attempting to provide for special cases by general legislation. The amendment is intended to provide for a case that should not arise. If the inspection and transportation of the grain has been carried on in accordance with the Act the condition would not arise, and this is particularly an instance where general legislation should not be invoked to cover a special case.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We have already tried to cure two special cases by general legislation, the cases of grain going out of condition and deteriorating in quality. These are not normal conditions, they are abnormal, and so they are special cases. If general legislation is invoked to cure two cases like that which do not occur frequently what objection can there be to curing a third condition which occasionally occurs where, through neglect or mistake or any circumstance not referable to the owner of the grain, this condition arises so that the owner of the grain would not be prejudicially affected thereby. There is no regrading, the inspector simply makes a statement of fact upon the certificate as in the two preceding cases.

Mr. OLIVER. The two cases already provided for in the section as it stands arise in the natural course of events and cannot possibly be prevented from arising, but the case now being provided for can only arise through mistake or lapse of some kind for which it is true the owner is not responsible, but for which the interests handling the grain are undoubtedly responsible, and I say that such a case is not a proper one to be met by general legislation. My hon. friend says there is to be no regrading, but as a matter of fact the endorsation by the inspector upon the certificate that the grain is of such and such a character is to all intents and purposes a regrading. It is true that the certificate is not withdrawn and another issued, but across the face of the certificate is written the responsibie statement of the inspector that the grain is of such and such a grade, and I take it that the statement by the inspector is as good as a grade in the world's market; it is for all practical purposes a regrading.

The owner of the grain is not likely to call attention to the fact that it is of less value than when it was graded. That is the situation which is provided for already in the Act. It is where the grain has deteriorated, and the owner of it, to save himself from the consequences of the supposition that it has deteriorated more greatly than it has, calls for an inspection. But in the proposed amendment, it is not a question of the grain having deteriorated, because if it has, the owner is the last man to call attention to it. It is the shipper or the man who is interested in the grain who will draw attention to it. Let me emphasize this point, that in the carriage of the grain from the head of the lakes to the mill in eastern Canada or to Montreal there are several occasions when bulk is broken, and when there are opportunities to mix the grades, and the provision that my hon. friend proposes to introduce would give the man at the eastern transfer elevator an opportunity to mix the grades to his own satisfaction, and to get the benefit of that mixing. That is objectionable from every point of view. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that the grain is not re-graded. In one way it may be said not to be; but the grain has the inspector's certificate that instead of being No. 2 it is No. 1, and I take it that carries the full weight which the owner of the grain would get the benefit of. The proposed amendment is of a most serious character, and the reasons which have been offered for the change do not appear to me sufficient to warrant a provision which would open the door to mixing, in order to meet a case which in the nature of things cannot arise if every part of the business is transacted as it should be. It does not arise in the course of nature, but only in the course of administration. Deterioration is provided for already. I want the clause left as it is. I think it is the only safe thing. The clause is dangerous as it is, but it goes as far as it is safe to go, and any further change in that direction would be much more dangerous.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). My hon. friend's argument has not convinced me that we are opening the door to any troublesome results in the administration of the Act. The simple case is this. Here is a man in the east who has his car of wheat, and he has paid on the grade at Fort William, we will say No. 2. It comes to him and is about to be delivered. When he opens it and sees it, he says: That is not No. 2; that is No. 3 or No. 4; it is not the grade I bought. He calls in an inspector, and the inspector views the grain, and if he thinks it is manifestly not of the grade certified, he writes that fact. He does not say that it is No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, or No. 4. The Act expressely provides that it cannot be re-graded. He simply writes the fact on the certificate that in his view the grain is manifestly not of the grade it purports to be. What damage is done to anybody or anything by that? But you have made it possible for a man to be relieved and to right himself in the transaction between himself and the original shipper. My hon. friend seems to think that because that is not natural it should not be provided for. The truth is, we do not have to provide so many safeguards against things that are natural as against mistakes that arise out of human fallibility and human frailty. We provide for all the inspection and control that we think is necessary, but these are all instruments that are fallible and may make mistakes, and it is against any case of that kind that we want to provide some sort of direct remedy. This places the man who receives the grain in a position to obtain his rights. How it lends itself to mixing is something I have not been convinced of by my hon. friend's argument.

Mr. TURRIFF. Suppose a cargo is shipped from Fort William as No. 3. It arrives at the eastern elevator and is taken in as No. 3. If it should happen to be a very strong No. 3, would there not be a possibility of an inspector thinking that it should be No. 2?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is not the inspector, but the person interested in the grain, who calls attention to it.

Mr. TURRIFF. The person interested in it might think it was stronger than No. 3, and might easily get a certificate as No. 2. He could go to an inspector at an eastern elevator and point out to him that that was a better wheat than No. 3, that it had been manifestly wrongly graded, and he would secure from the inspector a certificate that it was not No. 3, which would practically make it No. 2.

An hon. MEMBER. He might make it No. 4.

Mr. TURRIFF. He might, but if it were very much out of line so that the owner wanted a change of grade, it would not be at a grade lower.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What is the object of that amendment anyway?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Representation was made to me by the Dominion Millers' Association in eastern Canada that sometimes lots of grain came down, which were manifestly lower than the grade given before shipment. Two or three concrete instances were given of grain shipments in carload lots which were purchased as No. 2 but which were manifestly lower than No. 2. The purchaser buys a carload of No. 2 at a price but the grain is manifestly not that grade. It is a mixed grain and worthless to him for milling. The buyer calls the attention of the inspector to it, and if the inspector agrees that the grain is obviously not of the grade at which it was sold, he writes that across the certificate. Then the man who bought No. 2 and finds a car at his door which is No. 4 or no grade, has the written statement of the inspector to that effect. I have had this clause looked over by my inspecting officers and they agree that it is a provision which may be helpful in certain special instances and they cannot see that it will lead to any dangerous results.

Mr. STAPLES. Why is it necessary to write across the certificates? Could you not get a declaration from your inspector in writing and not tamper with the certificate?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). In the two preceding instances, where there has been a loss of condition or deterioration in quality, that is the course thought best to adopt, namely, to write on the back of the certificate the facts and have the inspector sign that writing. Then the matter is referable to the chief inspector at Winnipeg, and if necessary samples can be taken and the thing be readjusted.

Mr. STAPLES. The object is simply to protect the buyer? I do not see why that could not be done by calling in an inspector and have him make a declaration of the facts instead of tampering with the certificate. In that way the same protection could be afforded.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The certificate is the document which starts at the source and accompanies the lot until its disposal. It is not quite right to say that the certificate is tampered with because under the law a plain statement is written across it, signed by the inspector. I cannot see that any one can be injured by that.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. As I understand it now, the amendment comes from the suggestion of the millers, and the only thing they contemplated was that the grain would be of a lower grade than mentioned in the certificate. That the grain might be raised from No. 3 to No. 2 did not enter the minds of the millers.

Mr. OLIVER. With all due respect to the milling fraternity—and no one has more respect for them than I—I think it was the other suggestion that occurred to them. I want to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that a principle of the Grain Act has always been that the inspection made at Winnipeg shall be final with the exceptions mentioned, and the proposal of my hon. friend is an absolute departure from that principle. If a miller finds himself defrauded in the grain he receives, there is no necessity to provide a remedy for him in the Grain Act. The law courts are open to him as to any other man. I can see no reason, therefore, why we should in any way tamper with the important principle of the Grain Act to which I have referred. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Macdonald that the inspector should be bound to make a declaration at the demand of the owner of the grain, he must remember that this does not say it is only the owner who will have the right to demand reinspection. Anybody interested can do so. While the miller might not want the grain to be graded higher, the man who sold it might. I want to be very strong on this point that the principle of a single inspection is the very foundation principle of the Grain Act, and the maintenance of standard grades. My hon. friend will notice in going through the Act that there are many places where a little latitude might be given but where it is not, just because it was necessary to stick to that principle. Here is however, a proposal to depart from it, which is most objectionable from every point of view. I notice that these sections are headed 'Eastern inspection division' as though they applied only to the grain grown in that division. But clearly, from what the minister has said, it is intended that these provisions shall apply to grain coming from the west, inspected at Winnipeg as western grain and arriving at the mill in the east. But on the way the bulk is broken at different places where there has been every opportunity to mix the grain. Under this amendment, there would be an open door for the mixer to get the benefit of his work.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) starts out with the statement that the bed rock principle of the Bill is that there shall be the inspection, and that the grades shall not be meddled with after that. And then he immediately makes exceptions.

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Why does he make these exceptions?

Mr. OLIVER. Because they were necesary.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Of course, because they were reasonable. But why? For the protection of the buyer. Having made two exceptions to the principle, surely it is not for him to raise an unreasoning outcry against exceptions, but to show where this exception will be disadvantageous. We have shown where it will be helpful in protecting the buyer. Why should a carload of grain, which has been inspected as No. 2 or No. 1, but which by some neglect, change, metamorphosis, turns out to be a car of feed go further under the false grading of No. 1 or No. 2? Are we so blindly attached to a principle that we will not permit the rectification of a wrong to an individual?—and in the case I have mentioned must the wrong be permitted against the whole grading system of a profligate car of feed sailing through a civilized country under the certificate of No. 1 or No. 2? The first opportunity to right the wrong should be availed of, it seems to me. I give my hon. friend credit for his stern adherence to principle; but we do not live long in this world without knowing that every principle has its exception.

Mr. OLIVER. Whilst we must admit that every rule has its exceptions, and every principle must have exceptions, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster, North Toronto) will agree that the fewer exceptions the better.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Quite so.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that the two exceptions made are no precedent for the exception the hon. gentleman proposes to make, because they arise out of entirely different circumstances. These exceptions arise out of conditions which are unavoidable, while the exception he proposes to make arises out of avoidable conditions. If this grain becomes metamorphosed, if it is changed, as it should not be changed, in its course from the inspection to the consumer, the system of inspection is at fault, or the system of transport is at fault; and if there is a fault, it should be brought to attention and cured as quickly as possible.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. If the miller who receives that grain has to seek redress at law, there is no doubt that attention will be drawn to the fact that the transportation system is not working in accordance with the terms of the Act and means will have to be found to remedy that wrong. But if, when the miller receives the changed grain, all that is necessary is for the inspector to write across the certificate and the miller will suffer no loss, there will be no reason for particular inquiry into the method of transportation and the abuse will go on. Provision is made in the Act to practically sanction, yes to actually sanction, deviation from the terms of the Act. I think that most remarkable legislation, and objectionable in proportion as it is remarkable.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). As war is the last recourse between nations, so law is the last recourse between individuals. If there is any way in getting a wrong righted between individuals without going to law, by all means have it taken advantage of; settle the matter before you get into the hands of the lawyers and before the judges. I see a lawyer on the other side of the House shaking his head. He sees possible advantages disappearing if a theory of that kind be generally acted upon. But I think that the commission generally, including the lawyers, will say that this is right. If you are against mixing, seize the mixed or metamorphosed grain as quickly as you can. Trace the wrong back to its source. If it is a bad officer, chuck him, if a bad method, have it changed. In this case, it would be referred to the chief inspector with a sample of the grain. The chief inspector has means of tracing the matter and quickly detecting where the mixing or wrongdoing took place. But my hon. friend would give his allegiance to principle, and that on a mere basis of numerals,—a principle with two exceptions is all right, but a principle with three exceptions cannot be allowed at all. That does not seem to me reasonable.

Mr. TURRIFF. There is a good deal of force in what the minister (Mr. Foster) has said. But when he comes to handle the men in charge of the terminal elevators and the receiving elevators for a few years, he will find that there is no class of men so well able to take advantage of the leeway that he gives and so get around the main intent of the Act. And they will mix that wheat to their advantage whenever they can get a regrading of it.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). They cannot get a regrading; the law absolutely forbids it.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is practically a regrading.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Under no circumstances shall such grain be mixed or regraded.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is practically a regrading.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I take only the common sense view of it and leave my officers to give me the official view of it. I talked over the matter with Mr. Gibbs, our chief inspector, who is present, and I would not have proposed it if it could have been shown me by the opinion of my chief officer where it would work out wrongfully. In fact, if I had been shown to be mistaken in the assertion I make that this would be the means of tracing out and actually preventing mixing or other wrong things, I would not have brought it down.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster, North Toronto) is very insistent on the point that this will not be a regrading. Now he has said that his purpose is to avoid litigation. Speaking of grain that is of a lower grade, it must be assumed from what he has said, that the inspector's notation on the certificate will be a sufficient protection to the receiver or purchaser of that grain.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It will be an evidence.

Mr. OLIVER. Unless it is a sufficient protection it will not avoid litigation. If it is a sufficient protection in the case of degraded grain to avoid litigation, I presume it would be just as sufficient a protection in the case of grain that was found, at the instance of one of the parties concerned, to be of a higher grade; in other words, that it would for practical purposes be a regrading of that grain. Now, I want to deal with this question of the effect upon the operations of the department as two propositions, one the accepting of the notation of the inspector as a settlement of the question, and the other, the leaving the miller to the recourse of law. In the case of accepting the notation of the inspector as a settlement of the question, whose interest is it to go through the department and the operations of the trade, and find where the fault was? It is nobody's interest. The miller has got what he wants, the inspector has got the trouble off his hands, and the department never hears about it, and the officials of the department are encouraged then to think that the next time such a thing occurs they will get away just as well; whereas, if every man in the department knows that if that grain goes through and is not as it ought to be, the man who receives it is going to take recourse, and the department is going to be informed, and then somebody will lose his head. That is the view I take of the matter. For the sake of the administration of the Act itself it is necessary that that which is a fault on the part of those who are operating under the Act, should not in any way be condoned by the mere notation of the inspector.

Mr. TURRIFF. I wish to ask the minister if a record will be kept of all the wheat that may be changed in that way, and a return made to the department, so that we will know a year afterwards just how it has worked out?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Undoubtedly. My hon. friend said that what he feared was that the department would not be notified, and would not be kept alive to it. To my mind, this is just what will keep the department alive to it. So long as the department is under my charge I intend to know everything that is going on, and if anything goes wrong, whose fault it is.

Mr. TURRIFF. And a report made?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 90,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Section 90 reads as follows:

All grain placed in public or terminal elevators east of Winnipeg in the division shall be subject to inspection both inwards and outwards.

Mr. OLIVER.

The proposal is to drop out the words 'east of Winnipeg.' That leaves no exception in the city of Winnipeg, or in St. Boniface, or anywhere else. All grain in public or terminal elevators is to be subject to inspection, both in and out.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the minister explain the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is to make the principle of the Act dominant in all cases. At present it is possible to have elevators in Winnipeg or St. Boniface that are not subject to this. There are, I think, two elevators in St. Boniface at the present time, and I see no reason why an elevator in St Boniface, public or terminal, should have privileges otherwise than an elevator which is a mile away, and just outside the district of Winnipeg.

Mr. OLIVER. I presume there is a prohibition of the mixing of grades in all public and terminal elevators.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Grain goes into the elevator in St. Boniface of all grades and all kinds, and it stays there. Then it can be sent out from that to Fort William or Port Arthur, and can be there inspected and given its grades. What takes place in the elevator no man knows.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to know whether there is some specific provision in the Act as it stands that grain stored in a public or terminal elevator shall not be mixed?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There is a general clause against mixing.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to read that clause in connection with the proposed amendment. Unless there is a prohibition of mixing, it would be possible, under this amended provision, to put grain of a number of different grades into an elevator, and take out a number of entirely different grades.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). At present that is what is done.

Mr. OLIVER. That is what we wish to avoid and we would not wish to have that done under the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The amendment is to prevent that. In section 126, subsection 8, you have the clause that:

In no case, whether in a terminal elevator in the western inspection division or in a public elevator in the eastern inspection division shall grain of different grades be mixed together while in store.

That takes in all of the western division.

Mr. OLIVER. All the terminal elevators but not the public ones.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). And all the public elevators in the eastern division.

Mr. OLIVER. But the public elevators in the western division are not included in that.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would prevent the mixing of two grades in the hold of a vessel. Would it prevent running No. 2 and No. 3 wheat simultaneously into a vessel and mixing them?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). When grain is inspected out at Port Arthur into a vessel all grains of the same grade are to be put into one hold unless the owner of the different grades of grains wants them to be put into a hold together. That is his own business, but in that case, he only gets the grade of the mixed grain with the quantities or the weights of each.

Mr. OLIVER. The minister will, perhaps appreciate my curiosity in regard to this section when he reads the first subsection of section 91, where it states that all grain grown west of Winnipeg, shall be inspected at Winnipeg or at a point within the district, and that the inspection shall be final, that is to say that there shall be one inspection. Do the words 'shall be subject to inspection, both inwards and outwards in section 90' mean an inspection to verify the original inspection, or would it be considered possible, to constitute one of these as a reinspection? It would perhaps be just as well, if we are going to stand by the principle contained in subsection 91, to be a little more specific in section 90, in regard to that matter.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Let us see how it reads:

90. All grain placed in public or terminal elevators east of Winnipeg, in the division, shall be subject to inspection both inwards and outwards.

That is plain.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). When it goes into the elevator it is inspected in; when it goes out it is inspected out. Then,

91. All grain produced in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and in the Northwest Territories, passing through the Winnipeg district en route to points to the east thereof shall be inspected at Winnipeg or a point within the district——

The car shall be inspected.

—and, on all grain so inspected, the inspection shall be final as between the western farmer or dealer and the Winnipeg dealer.

Section 90 refers to public and terminal elevators and to grain in passage from the Winnipeg district in cars.

In the case of grain which is shipped east from an elevator in Winnipeg or St. Boniface, the sample for inspection shall not be drawn from any car until the car has been billed for shipment by the railway company.

It goes into the elevator in different grades and it may be kept there for two, three, four, five or six months. They then draw a car up and fill it. They get the bill of lading for that car before it can be inspected; otherwise they might return it to the elevator, but, having the bill of lading, they call for inspection and that car goes forward under that inspection grade. Then, in subsection 4 of section 91, there is another one of these exceptions:

When, owing to extreme pressure of business, the railway company, or other transportation company, finds that cars containing grain are being unduly delayed for inspection purposes in Winnipeg, then the company, upon notification to, and with the consent of, the chief inspector, or, in his absence, the inspector, may remove a special number of cars to Fort William without inspection at Winnipeg.

Arrived at Fort William they have to be inspected there, and a grade given to them. Any grain inspected at Winnipeg, or other western point, may be reinspected at Fort William or other terminal elevator in the division without additional charge. That is to provide for an appeal in case of difference as to the grade. Whilst the car is en route to Fort William, or when it arrives at Fort William a sample may be drawn to be brought back to the inspector at Winnipeg to settle a dispute, and that is done without additional charge. But any grain not inspected west of Fort William shall be inspected at that point, and a certificate shall be issued on payment of the usual fee which catches the last possible residue of grain coming through in these different ways. It looks to be all sealed up.

Mr. OLIVER. Is the inspection of grain out of the elevator a commanding inspection, or a verifying inspection?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). By a verifying inspection my hon. friend means is it to make sure that the same grade goes out as comes in. That is what it is for.

Mr. OLIVER. The words in section 1 hardly express that idea.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is what we understaand them to mean.

Mr. STAPLES. If ten cars were inspected in as No. 1 Hard, and were inpected out on a different grade that would be evidence that there had been mixing going on. Then you would follow and prosecute under the Act.

Mr. OLIVER. I wanted to find out if the two inspections were to prevent mixing.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The second inspection is for the purpose of verifying the first inspection and preventing mixing.

On section 91, inspection,

Mr. OLIVER. Would it not be better to say that the inspection is final, subject to certain provisions of the Act when the intention of the Act is that it shall be absolutely final. The words following the word 'final' in the second last line in the first subsection seem to me to limit the authority of the inspection for no reason.

Section 105,—qualities of grain,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I propose to add the following as subclause (a) :

All changes in the designations or weights of grades made in this section shall only apply and have effect on and after September 1, 1912, and until the said dates the grades of grain shall have effect as previously defined in the Inspection and Sale Act and the Manitoba Grain Act as on January 1, 1912.

That is to prevent any interference with contracts made on the old grades.

Mr. OLIVER. Should there not be some words at the beginning of this section stating that these grades apply only to the eastern inspection division, and not generally?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The inspector states that whilst these have so far been applicable only to the east, it might occur that in the west some of these grades might be grown; and, if so, this clause should be applicable in the west, while the clauses applying to the western section would hold for the west as well.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot understand how this section, worded as it is, will hold with the section regarding western grain. If this section were amended to make it apply generally, with the exception of those provisions relating to western grain, there would be no conflict.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When this matter was under discussion in the House the other day, I referred to section 115 dealing with rejected grain. This section defines rejected grain as follows:

Rejected grain shall comprise all spring wheat for warehousing, but too low in weight or otherwise unfit to be graded as No. 3. This includes seed dirty grain, also screenings from elevators.

I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the importance of regulating the disposal of this rejected grain. One hon. gentleman the other day said he thought it was covered by the Act for the Inspection and Sale of Seeds. I find, on looking over the Act, that it does not cover it. The report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1910 deals particularly with rejected grain, in the following terms:

Noxious weed seeds in ground feeding stuffs and screenings from commercial grain, which are distributed for the purpose of stock feeding, have been the cause for some serious complaints during the past year. Investigation thus far would seem to indicate that the causes for these complaints are restricted quite largely to the province of Ontario, where the screenings from the cereal grains grown in the prairie provinces after being recleaned at the large elevators on Lake Superior and elsewhere are marketed.

Again, in his report for 1911, the Minister of Agriculture alludes to the same cause of complaint, and there states:

I, therefore, instructed my seed commissioner to continue the investigation into the condition of ground feeding stuffs distributed for sale to farmers, and, by collecting and examining samples and by inquiry, to ascertain what practical means, if any, may be adopted to prevent the distribution of vital weed seeds in ground mill feeds. The investigation has shown that, as in previous years bran manufactured by the larger flour mills is comparatively free from weed seeds; but the forty-eight samples of bran collected had an average of two hundred and forty-six weed seeds per pound. Crushed or ground meals were often found to be in a worse condition, sometimes containing more than eighteen hundred weed seeds per pound.

These statements are enough to convince every one of the importance of careful supervision of this rejected grain which is to be dealt with by the commissioners to be appointed under this Bill. The Minister of Agriculture indicates that Ontario is the greatest sufferer from the purchase of this rejected the weed infested grain from western Canada. Even this year, while the field crop of Ontario was not as large as those of previous years, the value of that crop almost equalled the field crop of the three western provinces. These commissioners, dealing as they do with the grading of the grain not only of western Canada, but of the whole of Canada, have, or ought to have, under their control the disposal of noxious weeds that comprise a large portion of many shipments of grain to the elevators. I believe that there are to-day in Ontario farms that are harder to reclaim from the weeds that have taken possession of them than they were when covered by the original forest. The importance of some one in authority having power to deal with this matter cannot, I think, be too strongly impressed on this House. I have not studied the Bill as carefully as no doubt many members from western Canada have done.

But this particular evil has been so patent to every one in Ontario during the past few years that something has to be done. I believe that in the Inland Revenue Act provision is made for looking after the seeds contained in feedstuff by inspectors, but such inspectors are altogether too few in number to attend to this. But there is no provision whatever as far as I can find for preventing the sale or distribution of weed seeds in screenings or unground grains. There is scarcely a town or city in which there are not many people who keep a number of fowl and who buy screenings from the elevators in western Canada. The manure from this source is frequently hauled to the farms and distributed in that way to an extent most people hardly realize. I would, therefore, strongly urge on the hon. minister that some provision be made in this Bill which would enable the commissioners to regulate and control this evil, they are in a better position to do so than anybody else. I am satisfied that the time has arrived when so drastic measure must be adopted in order to prevent this evil from spreading throughout the country.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There is no doubt at all about the importance of the subject to which my hon. friend has alluded, but the means of remedying the evil is a little more difficult. I doubt whether the machinery provided by this Bill is the best means for that purpose. I am told that the province of Manitoba absolutely prohibits the sale of these screenings, either from the elevators in the province or the terminal elevators, and has done so the last five years. That would seem to be an effective method of getting rid of the evil in the province of Ontario as well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What becomes of these screenings?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). 90 to 95 per cent of them go to the American market. They are ground into feed and sold into the United States at from $5 to $12 per ton, and the value of the screenings turned out at the terminals would be from $300,000 to $500,000. They are fed to hogs and stock and poultry.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would not the value of these screenings be largely enhanced by separating the weed seeds from the broken wheat? I think that could be done by putting the screenings through a finer mesh. I have it on good authority that a great many of those weed seeds ground up into bran and shorts are not only unfit for stock but are actually poisonous. I believe that by more careful screening, a larger proportion of these weed seeds could be extracted.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto) moved that the words 'shall weigh not less than 64 pounds to the bushel' be added to the section defining the grade of No. 1 peas.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto) moved that the words 'shall weigh not less than 62 pounds to the bushel be added to the definition of No. 2 peas, so that these clauses shall read as follow:

No. 1 peas shall be white, clean and sound, not worm eaten and free from bugs, and weigh not less than 64 pounds to the bushel.

No. 2 peas shall be reasonably clean and sound, and reasonably free from worm eaten and buggy peas and weigh not less than 62 pounds to the bushel.

No. 3 peas shall be such as are too dirty as to be graded No. 2, or are worm-eaten or buggy, and weigh not less than sixty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. NEELY. Where does the Minister get those weights?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). From the inspectors divisions in Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. NEELY. I do not know why the minister is changing the established standard for the weight of peas.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I am not changing the standard; I am putting into an enactment what are now standard grades in the east. That is all.

Mr. NEELY. As a matter of fact, the farmer has been getting the benefit in all grades of peas in the sixty pound bushel. The minister is raising the standard so far as weight is concerned, so that the purchaser of the peas is going to get the advantage of this extra weight. No matter what customs may prevail, no matter what private standards may exist, the legal standard has been 60 pounds to the bushel. It looks to me as if the minister were making a concession to the man who buys and not to the man who raises.

Mr. AIKINS. How will these weights of eastern Canada affect western Canada?

Mr. NEELY. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) as I understand him, is one who deprecates invidious distinctions between east and west. This legislation is for the whole of Canada and not for any particular section. We are to legislate for all Canada and not for any particular part of it, and, even though these weights were applied only in the east, yet, as a member of this House, I am as much interested in the farmers of Ontario as in the farmers of the west.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), is mistaken if he thinks that these grades apply only to the east; they apply all over Canada, as the minister has said, and it is generally admitted. There are other grades that we shall come to, that apply only to the west.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The minister is well aware that there are few peas to be obtained in the country, in Ontario especially, which used to be the great pea section. What weights are proposed?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). 1, 2 and 3 grades, 64, 62 and 60 pounds respectively. And the inspector says that in all these cases the actual weights are from one to two pounds above that. So, there is plenty of room.

Now, with reference to the question of nomenclature for grades in the western inspection division I proposed to change the name in all these wheat grades from 'Manitoba' to 'Canada.' It will then read 'No. 1, Canada, Hard Wheat.' This is in pursuance of the discussion we had the other day which was pretty full and in which the view was expressed that the name should be broadened from the sectional to the national. It is proposed to carry that through these grades of spring wheat, winter wheat and barley. In reference to flax, I propose instead of the word 'Northwestern' to insert 'Canada.'

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I took exception to this the other day. I was fairly in earnest then, but I am much more in earnest now. I am more in earnest because I was speaking before without opportunity to consult anybody and, as the saying is, off my own bat. But since then I have talked with many men engaged in business, who understand the importance of a trade-mark better than I do, and perhaps better than many other members of this House. It is an exceedingly important matter, this change of the name from 'Manitoba Hard' by which our wheat and flour have been known all over the world, and known as surpassing any grade grown elsewhere. I do not wish to detain the House with a long discussion, but I would like the minister to think that over. I cannot see that this change will be of much advantage to my hon. friends from Saskatchewan and Alberta; I cannot see that it makes much difference to them. Another name is to be adopted which is neither that of Saskatchewan nor Alberta. I do not see any advantage in the making the change that would compensate for the disadvantage incurred. It will take a long time for buyers in Europe to understand that this change is made.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggests that we should place in brackets the word 'Manitoba'. Well, that would help us out a little. But I cannot agree to use the word 'Canada' alone in designating this grain. If you are going to change the word from 'Manitoba' to some other name, then make it signify the country in which this grain is grown. It certainly does not grow in eastern Canada. I think the name should be either 'Canada Western' or 'Western Canada' grain. I suggested 'Western Canada' the other day, but I will agree to 'Canada Western'. But I do say there must be some further designation than merely to call it 'Canada' wheat. I would much prefer, and I believe that all commercial men who know the feeling on the English market or wherever our flour or wheat has been sold, would still prefer to retain the name 'Manitoba'. But if we are going to change it, let us take some name that will designate the wheat properly, and leave no doubt that it is grown in western Canada.

Mr. NEELY. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Schaffner) that the name 'Manitoba' should be retained. I think the minister's contention that the broader term should be used is only just and fair to those other provinces of Canada, where wheat is grown similar to the wheat grown in Manitoba. More than that, I think the country generally would derive much more benefit from the production of its grain if the national name of 'Canada' were used. It would have more effect in advertising this country than the designation by which this hard wheat has been known for so many years in the markets of the world. On the other hand, I do agree with the hon. member for Souris when he says that if the change is to be made there should be another word added to the word 'Canada'. We are not a selfish people in the west, we do not claim to be able to grow apples as they can grow them in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia; but we do claim that our soil and our climatic conditions are the only soil and climatic conditions adapted to the growing of hard wheat, and we are jealous of the reputation of this grain, and of the reputation of that section of the country where the grain is grown. So I consider that the minister might very well add the word 'West' without any detriment whatever to the rest of Canada. We would still use the national name, but would designate that particular section of Canada in which the grain was grown, and which I think is justly entitled to the credit that belongs to that part of the country from any advertisement there may be in the name itself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I cannot say that I admire the assurance of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Neely) in appropriating to 'Western Canadian' the credit of being the only place where No. 1 Hard wheat can be grown in Canada. I want to say that in Ontario we can grow No. 1 Hard wheat, that even in competition with wheat from all over the world, at the Paris International Exhibition in 1900 was awarded the gold medal. This wheat was grown in northern Ontario near New Liskeard. I believe that in northern Ontario there is a country that will yet be growing millions and millions of bushels of wheat, therefore, I consider the minister is right in changing the word 'Manitoba' to 'Canadian'. I do not think it should be 'Western Canada.' That distinction should be left out. We are all one people here, we have a country of whose possibilities we have as yet no conception. I may say that in the province of Quebec also there is unoccupied land that will in future years be producing immense quantities of wheat, land, both in northern Quebec and in northern Ontario, that is now being opened up by the Transcontinental railway. There is no finer section of land in Canada than that through which that road passes in northern Ontario. The word 'Canadian' I believe is the proper word to use, because it will do justice to the whole of Canada. It will show that we do not claim that there is only one part of Canada that can grow No. 1 Hard Wheat, and that no other section can. I quite approve the change the minister proposes to make.

Mr. AIKINS. The reason for the change I think is sentimental. If it was going to be productive of any benefit to the wheat producer, then I certainly would support the change. But it is going to be productive of loss to the wheat producer. The Manitoba Wheat has a reputation that has been acquired by years of care and trouble and expense, and if that name is changed, I venture to say that the wheat produced in western Canada will not bring within a few cents at all events the price at which it now sells in the European markets. Therefore, it seems to me we will be getting the benefit of a sentiment at a sacrifice of the price of wheat. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta producing the same kind of wheat will get the advantage of the name of 'Manitoba' as well as that province itself; they produce the same class of wheat and they will get the benefit of that trade name. I have known trade names sometimes to be so valuable that they were stolen and the courts had to intervene to prevent it. It seems rather singular that people would be quite willing to give away a trade name that has such advantages as the trade name 'Manitoba Wheat. Neither can I agree with the last speaker (Mr. Sutherland) that we should adopt the name 'Canadian.' If the same class of wheat was produced all over Canada, then perhaps there might be some ground for it. But that wheat is not produced in all parts of Canada, and the name would be misleading; it is produced mainly in western Canada. I do not suppose it is produced in British Columbia, but it is produced in the three wheat growing provinces, and that is an additional reason why it would be better to restrict the name to 'Manitoba Wheat,' than to call it 'Western Canada Wheat,' because to call it 'Western Canada Wheat' would include provinces which do not produce that class of wheat. I would much prefer, therefore, to have the name left as it is. But if the majority insist on a change, I certainly would prefer the words 'Western Canada' to the word 'Canada.'

Mr. TURRIFF. I do not think either the member for Brandon (Mr Aikins), or the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), have very good grounds for the line of argument they have taken. I do not think that dropping the name 'Manitoba' will affect the price of wheat to any considerable extent. It is a very poor compliment to the English wheat buyers, and the Canadian millers to say that they buy wheat on the name instead of on its intrinsic quality. If the wheat is called 'Western Canada Wheat,' and the old designation is bracketed for the next year or two, as suggested by the minister, you will guard against any loss whatever, and you will protect everybody. I am sure my hon. friends from Manitoba will realize that owing to the actual condition of things, of the total amount of wheat produced on the prairies in future, only a very moderate proportion can be produced in the province of Manitoba.

It would not be fair to the other provinces which will be in the future producing the great bulk of the hard wheat, that it should be named for that one province, which is producing the smaller portion of it, especially when you can give it a name that will be fair to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and yet designate it as wheat produced in the western part of Canada. As to wheat produced in British Columbia, there will never be any considerable quantity grown there. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), there will no greater objection to calling the wheat 'Western Canadian' than calling it, as it is at the present time 'Manitoba Hard.' There has been no objection from the wheat growers in Ontario or Quebec to the name 'Manitoba Hard.' They do not produce Manitoba Hard wheat or wheat of the quality of 'Manitoba Hard.' I do not doubt that in some portions of the northern part of Ontario and Quebec they might grow a little wheat of that quality, this has only reference to the western provinces of Canada, and there should be no injustice done to anybody. I am, therefore, in favour of the adoption of the name suggested by the minister, but adding to it the word 'western.'

Mr. BLAIN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the position taken by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). I think the name should be 'Canada.' If there have been any people in the House who have been chastising those who live in the east for making a division between the east and west, it has been our friends from the west on both sides of the House. It seems to me that the minister has taken a very wise course, in proposing to stamp the name 'Canada' on our wheat to make us one Canada, not an eastern or a western Canada, but one united country. That has been the tendency of the eastern people who are producing different classes of goods. The manufacturers of Ontario have adopted the phrase to be stamped upon their manufactured goods 'Made in Canada,' not 'Made in Ontario,' or 'Made in Quebec,' with the view of impressing upon the purchasing world that these goods were manufactured in the Dominion of Canada, without any specification as to whether it was in the east, or in the west. If any part of Canada has any complaint, I think that complaint would naturally come from the province of Ontario. I do not think that the west would be injured in any way. I do not think it would interfere with the west in any form and I would not want to say anything that would interfere with the splendid position that the people of Manitoba have given to the Canadian people generally, by the production of wheat. But, we are putting through a Bill, which is likely to remain on the statute-book for many years, it is successful and operates well, and therefore, it seems to me that this is the proper time to obliterate all those divisions and put into it simply the phrase 'Canada,' instead of 'east' or 'west.'

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I move that it be amended to read 'Canada Western.'

Mr. OLIVER. I second the motion. I would think that the purpose of a name is to express an idea or to state a fact and, whether there are questions of sentiment or questions of business, when we are legislating we should think that it is a part of our business, and an important part of our business, to see that our legislation expresses a correct idea and states a fact. There is no doubt that the use of the word 'Manitoba' as describing wheat that is raised in the western provinces, is not a correct or adequate description. It does not convey an idea, it is not a statement of fact; it is contrary to the fact, indeed. For that reason there clearly should be some name that would be descriptive and common to all the western country which raises a particular kind of grain. The whole western country, possessing similar soil and a similar climate, naturally has similar products; differing in quality, because of varying soil and climatic conditions, from like products raised in other parts of Canada. Therefore, it is only reasonable and right, when we have varying products, that we should give them a name that would be descriptive. As to the name 'Canada' or the like, the matter strikes me in this way: We are giving a name to a grain described in a certain section of this Act as being raised in a certain section of Canada. If that were the only grain raised in Canada then it would be all right to call it 'Canada' grain. There is no misstatement of fact or difficulty of idea in speaking of Canadian grapes, or Canadian peaches, but when you speak of Canadian apples there is a great difference between the apples in Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia, and it is only fair and right that these different classes of apples should be described so as to set out their differences such as they may be. So I say in regard to grain. While wheat, barley and oats are raised throughout Canada, there is a certain distinctive character to the wheat and the oats particularly, and there is in some degree, I believe, also to the barley that is raised in these prairie provinces. For business reasons, as well as other reasons, which I have already stated, it is desirable that the grains of these prairie provinces should be distinguished by name from grains of like variety raised in other parts of the country. If you use the word 'Canada' alone as describing western wheat there is no reason why wheat raised in Ontario should not also go forward as 'Canada' wheat. It is 'Canada' wheat as a matter of fact, and all the legislation we can put on the statute-book will not prevent it from being Canadian wheat, and the people who are dealing with that wheat, if it is to their advantage, are entitled to use that advantage and we cannot prevent them. Now, I think that under these circumstances there is a business reason, from the standpoint of the trade of the country, as well as the sentimental standpoint, why there should be a distinction in name between grain raised in eastern Canada and grain raised in western Canada If it were all of the same kind and character there would be no reason for a distinction in the name, but the wheat raised in the prairie provinces, being of a distinctive character from the wheat raised in the rest of the country, it is in the interest of business that there should be a distinctive name. While the name suggested by the hon.

member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) is not as short as would be desirable it is certainly absolutely descriptive. There could be no question about the wheat that is labelled 'Canada West' or 'Canada Western' being properly described and no question about identifying wheat by that name.

The objection that the name is a little long for use might be overcome by providing that the initials should be used as a contraction and should be a sufficient identification. This would be a solution of what is now really a business difficulty as well as an infringement on reasonable sentiment.

Mr. KNOWLES. I think the time is opportune for abandoning the name 'Manitoba.' We are changing the name from the Manitoba Grain Act to The Canada Grain Act. If we want simply a name descriptive of the wheat, then the word 'Manitoba' does not fulfil that requirement. It is a small part of the wheat growing country in the west, it was at one time the only part. I do not share the view that 'Canada West' should be used. That term at one time was applied to western Ontario, and while it might apply to the grain growing section now, in a few years it might mean British Columbia or the Yukon. We hope that in a very few years the prairie country will be spoken of as the main part of Canada as we think to-day, in our modesty, it is. If the people in eastern Canada get any benefit from the use of the word 'Canada' we do not begrudge it. We are keeping the rest of Canada anyway and if our name is going to help them it is only a small thing to us. I am in favour of having the word 'Canada' without the adjective 'west.'

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I feel very strongly that the name should be left as it is at present. Manitoba was the pioneer province of western Canada, it opened the way for the rest of your children who come further west and why should you wish to change your old father's name? The fact remains that in southern Manitoba is grown the best wheat in Canada to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no. Nonsense.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). You may say nonsense, but analysis will tell you that the best bread-making wheat comes from southern Manitoba. The trade mark of 'Manitoba' has become established in relation to our grain and I am strongly in favour of leaving the name as it is now.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If I thought the substitution of Canada for Manitoba would degrade the quality or lessen the price of the wheat I would hesitate before even advocating the change, but after taking the best advice I could get it does not seem to me it can possibly affect the price. Wheat is bought on its quality and the price will be according to its quality, and although the trade-mark has become familiar as an indication of quality, it is, after all, nothing more than an indication of quality. While there might be disturbance of trade by a sudden change in the name we guard against that by arranging that it shall not come into effect until next season and on the certificate we place after 'Canada,' 'Manitoba.' Commission houses and grain men all over the world are alive to that, information spreads rapidly, and I think that by the first of September of next year no grain buyer in the world would have any confusion in his mind on account of the change in name. The national idea appealed to me to a certain extent on the ground of sentiment. The use of the word Canada could not degrade the quality or value of the grain, but it would be a distinctive name which would take in a larger area than Manitoba. So it would tend to the general advantage of our producers.

There are some here who want the word 'Manitoba' and nothing else; there are others who want the name 'Canada' and nothing else. To my mind those who prefer the name 'Canada' stand on the strongest ground and on the widest platform. Those who want 'Manitoba' want it because of their love of old associations as well as may be a lingering fear that some confusion may arise. There are others who argue that the word 'Western' should be put in, and that suggested the term 'Canada Western'. I said when I came down with this Bill to the House that I was not bigoted about non-essentials, and that I wanted to make it the result of consultation with both sides of the House, always with the understanding that the government would be responsible for the Bill when it became an Act. For my part I have no objection to adopting, as a compromise, the term 'Canada Western'; so that we should have Canada Western No. 1 Hard wheat, and so on. I would commend that as a half-way step. Hitherto we have given everything to our friends from the west. I suppose we must look on them as spoiled children and treat them very kindly.

Mr. STAPLES. I wish again to raise my protest against dropping the name 'Manitoba', not because we are so jealous of it that we are not prepared to do what is for the general advantage of Canada; but that name has a commercial value in the markets of the world. If you are going to adopt the name 'Canada', I think you could get a better term than 'Western' to put with it. Why not use the term 'Canada Prairie Wheat'? All of that part of Canada west of Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains and for some distance east of Winnipeg is known as the prairie west, on which this superior quality of hard wheat is produced. I think the term 'Prairie' is a better term than 'Western.'

Mr. BLAIN. A similar question to the present one was pretty fully discussed in the House in connection with the Fruit Marks Act. The question arose as to which part of Canada produced the best apples. Some claimed that it was Nova Scotia, some British Columbia, and some the province of Ontario. There was a demand on the part of members from Nova Scotia to continue the words 'Nova Scotia', and to stamp that name on the barrels of apples which came from that province. It was finally decided to put in the Act the provision that every package found to be fairly and properly packed the inspector was to brand 'No. 1, Inspected Canadian Apples', 'No. 2, Inspected Canadian Apples', and so on. The names of all the provinces were left out, and all the apples for export were to be stamped as inspected Canadian apples. That is an example of the former administration adopting a Canadian policy, and for my part I think it is only fair that the same policy should be carried out with respect to wheat, as suggested by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that it should be branded as Canadian and not with the name of any section of Canada.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. How about the commercial value of those apples from different sections of Canada?

Mr. BLAIN. I am bound to give to Manitoba the credit of having gained for our wheat the prominence that it has; but our policy is to do away with the lines of demarcation between the east and the west, and for my part I support the suggestion of the hon. minister.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not a resident of Manitoba or Saskatchewan or Alberta, but I think we shall make a mistake if we drop the name 'Manitoba Hard'. There are other countries in the world that produce hard wheat. If I mistake not, The Argentine produces hard wheat, and I think there is hard wheat produced in Russia. Ladoga wheat, which is produced in many parts of the northwest, originally came from Russia

Mr. OLIVER. It was a soft wheat when it came, and a very poor one.

Mr. HENDERSON. We hardened it after we grew it in the northwest. My point is that in the British market there is a well-founded meaning of the term 'Manitoba Hard', and I think we shall make a mistake if we change that name to any other, whether it is 'Western' or even the larger name 'Canada.' I think we shall lose something in the market that we have now and that we shall not get back for ten or twelve years. The people of Great Britain are very jealous. The sacks will go forward labelled 'Manitoba Hard' or 'Canada Hard'. When they are put upon the market in Great Britain, and the baker is asked to buy a sack of flour called 'Canada Hard', he will say, 'That is not what I want at all; I want Manitoba Hard, and I will take no other.' You could not make him believe in ten years that 'Canada Hard' was the same thing as 'Manitoba Hard'. In England people are accustomed to speak of Canadian cheese as American cheese, and if we labelled our cheese Canadian, I think we would lose much. The name 'Manitoba Hard' is to my mind simply a name. I do not think it belongs to Manitoba any more than to Saskatchewan or to Alberta. Manitoba Hard can be grown in any one of those provinces, although perhaps it can be grown to greater perfection in Manitoba. I say to the people of the west on behalf of the people of the east that I think we shall make a tremendous mistake if we change its name. Our millers in the east want Manitoba Hard.

They may be told that Canada Hard is the same thing, but they will say: Manitoba Hard is what we want, it is what we are accustomed to, and we are not going to buy any other. Therefore, I would urge that we should go slow and not give away the good thing we have, and we have a good thing in that name. It is worth millions to the people of Canada and the people of the northwest. If you change the name to 'Western' or 'Canada' it will not bring the same amount of money as if you left the name as it is. I would be sorry to see any change; but if there is to be any change, I would rather simply call it 'hard wheat,' instead of changing the name to 'Canada' or 'Western.' But I would prefer that we should still cling to the name Manitoba Hard. Let us keep the advantages we have gained throughout a long series of years. If we change the name, the people of the northwest will be the ones to suffer most, but the people in the east will suffer as well, because they will scarcely know what they are buying. Whether the wheat was raised in the northern or southern regions we want to know that we are buying the kind of wheat known as Manitoba Hard. I hope that the promoter of this Bill will be conservative enough to hold it to the good old name of Manitoba Hard

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to add a word in support of what has been so well said by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson). I entirely agree in every word he has said with regard to this matter. I can see no good purpose than can be served by making a change. If it could be shown that any advantage could be had by making the change proposed, I would be willing to agree to it, but I cannot see any. As has been well said by my hon. friend, we would be liable to create a wrong impression and thereby do a large amount of injury and serve no good purpose. It is undoubted that Manitoba Hard wheat has established its value on the markets of the world. That brand Manitoba Hard, was given in the early days when Manitoba was the pioneer territory producing this hard wheat, and we have from that day until now, endeavoured by our laws, rules and practice to preserve the identity of that wheat in the markets the world over. In those markets it is known as Manitoba Hard, and I do not see what advantage can be gained by changing that name. I do not sav this with a view of attempting to reflect on the wheat grown in Saskatchewan and Alberta, but it nevertheless is a fact that the wheat grown in the Red River Valley of Manitoba is undoubtedly the best milling wheat grown anywhere to-day. If you change the name, you will not bring any benefit to the people of Saskatchewan or Alberta; on the contrary, the further west you go the softer is the wheat, and therefore, you will create a distinction and a difference in the high standard of Manitoba No. 1 Hard, which is recognized the world over, and if you make that change, you will do exactly what my hon. friend from Halton has pointed out. You will bring about a loss to the people of western Canada and serve no good purpose in any other respect.

Mr. TURRIFF. I cannot allow the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) to go unchallenged that southern Manitoba grows the finest wheat raised in the west. I have heard millers, dozens of them, say that the wheat grown as far west in southern Saskatchewan as wheat is grown—that is right up into the Dirt Hills and to a large extent now in the Dirt Hills—right through southern Alberta and around the great plains of Weyburn, which is one of the largest shipping points in Canada to-day—the wheat grown in that portion of Saskatchewan and Alberta is fully equal to that grown in southern Manitoba or any other part of the country, and I have no doubt that many other parts of Saskatchewan further north grow an equally good variety of wheat.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). If my hon. friend will go to Dr. Saunders at the Experimental farm and see the tests of the different wheats grown throughout the whole of Canada, he will find that the highest tested wheat in the world is that grown in southern Manitoba. I wish to move in amendment to the amendment that the name remain as it is in the Bill at present, namely Manitoba Hard.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member for Macdonald has raised the only objection that could be validly urged against the use of the word Canada Western, namely, that it would include British Columbia, and to that extent the name would not be accurately descriptive, because the wheat raised in British Columbia is not of the same character as that raised on the prairies. But British Columbia is not a country, and in all human probability never will be, which exports wheat, so that the wheat raised in British Columbia does not come into the argument at all. With regard to the use of the word 'Manitoba' and the effect which would follow the dropping of that word out of the grades of wheat, I have before me the Manitoba 'Free Press' of February 7, giving a list of the market prices for wheat. The prices are given for fifteen of the grades of wheat on the Winnipeg market, and in none of those grades will be found the description 'Manitoba,' showing conclusively that, as a matter of actual practice in grading wheat, the use of the word 'Manitoba' is not significant to any serious extent.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). In the province itself?

Mr. OLIVER. The wheat is sold as Northern and not as Manitoba wheat. The word 'Manitoba' is not used generally speaking in the market report. I am quite aware that there are some brands of flour which use the word 'Manitoba,' but as a descriptive term for a particular class of export wheat produced in the prairie provinces it has practically no significance at this time, if the market reports found in the public journals are any guide of value in describing wheat. I give you here seventeen different grades of prairie wheat, in none of which is the word 'Manitoba' used. When we come to oats, the description is 'Canada Western,' in the contracted form of 'C.W.' When we come to winter wheat the words 'Alberta Red' are used. So, I think it is clear that, as a descriptive term 'Canada Western' comes closest to giving a description that will be in accordance with the facts and will be absolutely intelligible to the business world and avoid confusion in business transactions.

Mr. STAPLES. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) drop the word 'Alberta.'?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly, what I want to get at is a term that will be descriptive of and common to all the grain that is raised in the prairie provinces. In 'Canada Western' we have a name that is accurately descriptive, is not cumbersome, can be easily contracted and its use, on the evidence of the market reports, will not seriously clash with the terms used in the market quotations.

Mr. STAPLES. Why not adopt the word 'prairie'?

Mr. OLIVER. The word 'prairie' is more thoroughly descriptive than any of them, and if there were any considerable willingness in the House to take that word, I would agree.

Mr. STAPLES. I would only suggest that if the House is bound to defeat the word 'Manitoba.'

Mr. OLIVER. I am quite willing to accept the word 'prairie'; but, as the minister has expressed his willingness to accept the name 'Canada Western,' then, to follow a form of expression of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), even if the minister does agree with that view, I still think it right.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). The parallel of the case of fruit suggested by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) is no parallel at all. The same kind of fruit is grown all over Canada, but that is not the case with regard to wheat and other grain.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? He knows that there are no apples grown in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BLAIN. Hon. members should wait until I finish my sentence, I say there are no apples grown in Manitoba, Alberta or Saskatchewan for the export trade that I know anything about.

Mr. KYTE. There are none grown in Canada so good as those grown in Nova Scotia.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). I do not think the explanation of the hon. member (Mr. Blain) shows that there is a parallel between the case of fruit and that of wheat. It is true, some places in Canada do not ship apples, but the apples that are shipped from all over Canada are designated in the one way; and, while there may be differences, and while the representative of each district contends that the product of his district is the best——

Mr. BLAIN. Does not that apply to wheat?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). No, by this very Bill you enact that it shall not apply to wheat, for those grades apply only to the western inspection division. With regard to the word 'Manitoba,' while I sympathize with my hon. friends from that province who do not like the name changed, yet, outside of the sentiment of the thing, I do not think the change will amount to much. I agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) that if he inserts 'Manitoba' in brackets, it will be needed only for the time. I am growing wheat in the western country, but I am not a bit alarmed about the change of name, even if we do not insert the word 'Manitoba' in brackets. I expect to sell my wheat according to quality and not according to name, and I shall not lose a cent a bushel—or even part of a cent a bushel—because it is not called 'Manitoba,' I do not care what you call it——

Mr. STAPLES. How do you like the word 'prairie'?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). I do not think we had better bring up fresh names; we have enough. Now, as to the claim of the Manitoba people that they market a superior wheat, I think they should produce more evidence before they claim that our wheat is inferior to their own, which is practically what they claim. The Thousand-dollar prize in Chicago went to Northern Saskatchewan wheat, and I think we can do it again.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I do not wish to go on with this Bill after six o'clock, so I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Between now and the time when we take this Bill up again, we can think about the names of wheat.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 50) respecting the Ontario and Ottawa Railway Company.—Mr. Currie.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Windsor, Chatham and London Railway Company.—Mr. Wilcox.

SUPPLY—PAIRS IN VOTE ON TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Mr. MONK. There was an item reserved in Harbours and Rivers generally, an item for Quebec.

Quebec—harbours, rivers and bridges—general repairs and improvements, $60,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) if the breakwater at Anse-au-Canard, Gaspé, for which an amount was voted in the estimates, will be built. I understand that tenders were invited some months ago for the construction of that breakwater and that, as appears by an answer given by the hon. gentleman to a question which I put some weeks ago, the tenderer had not made the necessary deposit, the tenders were, of course cancelled, new tenders were invited and on that second occasion the tender was considered too high for the department. Since that time nothing has been done. I received a letter to-day from a merchant of Newport, county of Gaspé, because Anse-au-Canard is one of the coves of Newport, and he states that he has learned on good authority that the work will not be proceeded with. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if any decision has been reached by the department in regard to that work. This is one of the public works in the county of Gaspé. I take an interest in those works because I have been somewhat associated with that county for fifteen years. There is another work in the county of Gaspé which does not appear in the list of items. I refer to the Gaspé landing pier. My hon. friend will remember that some three years ago a large amount was provided in the estimates for the construction of that pier, a contract was entered into with the firm of Dussault of Lévis or Quebec, I am not sure which. The work has been started and not seeing anything in the main estimates perhaps the hon. gentleman would let me know if it is his intention to place something in the supplementary estimates for this year? I may tell my hon. friend that Gaspé is the terminus of the Gaspé railway, better known as the Atlantic, Quebec and Western. The Atlantic Quebec and Western railway was started a few years ago. It runs from Paspebiac, or New Carlisle, for a distance of about 105 miles to Gaspé Basin. It is a first-class railway. It has been built at a cost to the company of a sum that is nearer $5,000,000 than $4,500,000. The company, in order to settle the railway position in the peninsula of Gaspé, has acquired the other railway, well known as the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway, so that to-day you have a continuous railway running from Metapedia on the Intercolonial railway as far as Gaspé Basin a distance of over 200 miles. The new company has made very substantial repairs to the old road and this coming year more repairs are provided for in its estimates. It has been the aim of the company from the beginning, and the hope of the people of Gaspé, to have a direct ocean connection between Gaspé and Liverpool or some port in Ireland. Steamers, if they were running between Liverpool and Gaspe, would, notwithstanding the claims of St. John, Halifax and Quebec, run by the shortest route, and, as regards the carriage of the mails, could afford a much better service to Canada than that which is at present provided. However, that is only for the future; let us see if, for the present, the government intends to build the landing pier at Gaspé. A large amount was provided for the construction of the landing pier. The Gaspé company intends to run its trains as far as the water's edge. Though I have no more political interest in my old constituency I yet look upon that work as a national work, at least as far as my native province is concerned. The peninsula of Gaspé is probably the first land that was sighted by the discoverers of Canada when first they came to the St. Lawrence river; in fact, looking at the archives the other day, I read a description of a trip made into the Bay of Gaspé by no less a traveller than Jacques Cartier himself. He called at a place well known in the country as Fontenelle. There he planted a cross and took possession of the soil in the name of God and the King of France. But this peninsula, although exceedingly wealthy in all sorts of resources, rich in timber, in minerals and in agriculture, has been tremendously neglected. That was due not so much to the fault of the governments of the day, although they were partly responsible for the state of affairs there, as to the existence of a company well known in the maritime provinces and on the coast of the Labradors. I refer to the Robin firm of Jersey.

This is a great company, which may in some respects be compared to the Hudson's Bay Company. The Hudson's Bay Company were engaged in the pursuit of fur-bearing animals while the Robins were engaged in the fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They have established in the gulf I do not know how many agencies. The oldest establishments are situated in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure. During the last 150 years they have extended considerably and now their stores and establishments are dotting the shores of the St. Lawrence river and the gulf. The Robins were anxious to keep the people to the fishing industry and they knew that the construction of a railway would perhaps induce the fishermen to go abroad and they have bitterly opposed, during half a century, the construction of any railway on that coast. I do not say that in disparagement of the business methods of the Robins firm. They were, I suppose, working for No. 1. At the same time they prevented the people of Gaspé from getting their due in whatever government grants were given at the time for the expansion of the country. Gaspé is a very rich peninsula, and the construction of this railway will give the county an enormous development. The object of the company was undoubtedly to keep the people there and not allow them to go into any lumbering operations outside of the peninsula, in fact I do not think it is too strong to say they desired to keep them in a state of semi-slavery. In fact in 1896 when I was first elected for Gaspé, I travelled for many days along the 200 miles of coast in that county, and I found in many little places, in the little coves bordering the coast, old men and young men who had never seen the colour of a red cent in their lives. They were fishing and selling the fish to the Robin firm, receiving in return merchandise or goods. I obtained from the government of the day the establishment of a steamer service running between Montreal, Quebec and these various ports on the coast, in order to give a little more competition to the merchants in that far-away district. The result was most beneficial, but it was only the beginning. It was only when the construction of the railway was started that a new era dawned on the coast of Gaspé. The railway after many vicissitudes has been completed. It took about ten years of hard work on the part of the then member for the county of Gaspé to secure the completion of that road through federal and local subsidies.

My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), decided upon a landing pier at the point called Sandy Beach. With his knowledge of the conditions in that section of the maritime provinces, he could appreciate the value and importance of that new feeder to the Intercolonial railway. In fact, the railway at Gaspé will, in the near future I am quite sure, through its connections with the Intercolonial railway, and at the boundary line with railways in the State of Maine, be an excellent railway for Canada and that section of the country as it will bring it into close touch with the United States, New Brunswick, and that part of the province of Quebec which is near the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This landing pier was decided upon at the terminus of the railway, the contract was given, a large amount was voted, but the pier is not completed, and I see nothing in the estimates to complete it. I hope, however, that in the supplementary estimates the hon. gentleman will put in an amount sufficient to complete it. As I have said, I have no political affiliations with the county, I have only my reminiscences to connect me with it, and they are of the happiest nature. Although I was defeated at the last general election, I bear no illwill to the electors of that constituency which supported me during 15 years. But I am very much interested in the completion of that railway, and I see in the completion of the landing pier, the termination of a work which I do not hesitate to qualify as one of national importance.

Mr. BRODER. What is the length of the branch?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is over 200 miles. It connects with the Intercolonial railway at Metapedia, at the point where the Intercolonial railway crosses the Restigouche river into Quebec. The first 100 miles were built many years ago, and the railroad was well known as the Baie des Chaleurs railway. Later, it passed to another company, and took the name of the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway. It was built as far as Paspebiac. The charter of the company gave it the right to build as far as Gaspé basin, 102 miles further, but as that first company at that time, was almost insolvent, I asked parliament to grant another charter to another company, which was known as the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway company. This company built from the terminus of the old company, New Carlyle to Gaspé basin, has merged with the old, and it is now one trunk line running between Metapedia and Gaspé basin. The company has had many vicissitudes and for some time it was feared that it would stop its operations.

But fortunately the company is now in the hands of a strong organization in London, having at its head Lord Ranfurly, ex-Governor of New Zealand, who came to Canada and inspected the road, and did not hesitate to take charge of the whole system. The company even this winter has been able to operate except for a few days, and I know, from the reports of the engineers in the Department of Railway and Canals, that it is a first-class railway. It was built by English engineers, and the only reproach to offer in regard to it is that it was built perhaps in a little too costly a way. At all events, it awaits only the completion of the landing pier at Sandy Beach in order to be fully equipped. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if he has come to a decision in the matter, and if we may expect that there will be in the supplementary estimates an amount sufficient to complete the work.

Mr. MONK. I am anxious to give my hon. friend all the information possible in regard to the two questions he has put. The first has reference to the breakwater at Anse-au-Canard. The second question has reference to the landing pier at Gaspé Basin at the terminus of the railway to which he has referred. Of course, it is more easy to explain the items for which credits are asked than to explain the reasons why the estimates submitted do not contain further items. However, I believe that my hon. friend has correctly stated what happened at Anse-au-Canard. Tenders were called for, and they were found to be too high. Other tenders have been called for, and I believe that the amounts of the tenders exceeded the amount claimed originally by the government for the execution of the work. A number of works were projected, regarding which some calculations were made under the late government which are not to be found in these estimates. Naturally a new government coming in to exercise power under different circumstances and perhaps with a different view as to these different works, could not be expected to see absolutely eye to eye with the previous government in regard to each and every one of these works. I have mentioned on more than one occasion to the committee that we found ourselves confronted with I think larger demands than have ever been made in the past with respect to our principal shipping ports, our national ports, which were referred to at length in the reports of the Transportation Commission, dating back to 1903, and it has become to me evident, and it seems so to the government, that we must take steps without any delay to equip those national ports to meet present requirements. We are behind the times. We are far behind our American neighbours, in the equipment of our ports, and unless we make speedy preparation to secure the amount of trade to which we are legitimately entitled, we shall see that trade go gradually to the United States. We have found ourselves this year under the necessity of equipping with as great speed as possible our Atlantic ports, and the prospective opening of the Panama canal has made it necessary for us to prepare for considerable expenditure on our Pacific ports.

Nevertheless, in spite of these rather pressing requirements, the government is anxious to provide for local necessities as well, as far as that may be possible. As regards the peninsula of Gaspé, what my hon. friend has stated is perfectly true; and I may say that the hon. member who now represents the county of Gaspé, and who is I believe domiciled there, has brought to my attention on many occasions the needs of that county, which was to a certain extent unnecessary in my case, because I have had occasion to visit that important territory, and have become convinced by personal inspection and by much that has been written of extreme interest with regard to its possibilities. There is room, we are told, within the Gaspé peninsula for over 50 thriving settlements still to be founded and developed; there are immense fisheries all around it; it has lumber wealth, mineral wealth, oil, and wealth of every other kind. The railway along the coast to which my hon. friend has referred will at least contribute to open up that peninsula. There is still the interior to be developed, however. The port of Gaspé is an important port, and there are other ports along that coast which it is claimed could be kept open all winter. The landing pier at Gaspé Basin has certainly received the attention of the government, and I hope and expect to be able in the supplementary estimates to provide for the final execution of what work remains to be done. That will depend on what will be placed at the disposal of the department for the completion of those very important works which we desire to carry out as soon as practicable.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it is due to the committee that some explanation should be given why there is no item in the estimates for the purpose of completing this work, because a contract was let by myself as Minister of Public Works pursuant to the authority of parliament, a portion of the work has been done, and the contractor will be entitled to go on with the work and receive his pay. My hon. friend is aware that in these main estimates provision was made for all works which were under way, I think without exception.

My hon. friend's attention was called to one or two when these estimates were under consideration before, and he says that if they had been omitted through an oversight he would restore them in the supplementary estimates. In the estimates which he brought down, and which had been prepared by the late government, for the year ending 31st March, he included an amount of $87,500 for this wharf. Surely he ought to be able to tell us why that amount was left out, whether intentionally or by mistake. He has told us that the hon. member for Gaspé had called his attention frequently to the necessity of completing this wharf. Then why did he omit this item? As this work was under contract, he must recognize that the committee is entitled to some explanation.

Mr. MONK. If the facts are as my hon. friend has stated them, it is a case of omission, and will be provided for in the supplementaries. My hon. friend will admit, I suppose, that it is possible to make some omissions. In all cases of works under contract, my instructions were that they must be provided for.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The committee have some reason to complain with regard to the information the hon. minister is giving us concerning items that have been dropped from the estimates. I can quite understand that he cannot be prepared to give reasons why certain new works, that were never projected up to the present, are not provided for. But in the case of works which have been examined and reported on, and for the construction of which provision was made last year, we are entitled to some explanation. In my own province about two thirds of the whole estimates of last year have disappeared altogether from the present estimates. The House committed itself to the expenditure on these works on two several occasions. The late government laid these items before the House and got five-twelfths voted. Then the incoming government laid the same items before the House last December, and got the remaining seven-twelfths voted. In some cases tenders had been called for, but when we come now to examine the main estimates, brought down after recess, we find a great many of these items have disappeared altogether, and the minister does not appear to know why. I drew his attention on two occasions to the item of the extension of a breakwater at New Harbour in my own constituency, and have not yet been able to get any reason why that item was dropped. I have no doubt that if the hon. minister would look into the reports and examine what his own engineers have said, he would not agree that this should have been struck from the estimates. That breakwater was started a great many years ago, it was built a part of the way out into the harbour. It became too small for the requirements of the people, the number of boats now fishing there could not be sheltered by the breakwater as it stands to-day, and an expenditure of $10,000 was voted last year for the purpose of extending that work. It is a very urgent work in my county. I have been asked by the people for some explanation why the item has been dropped, but have not been able to get any. In Nova Scotia out of $1,300,000, voted last year, two thirds of the whole has disappeared, and the minister does not explain why.

Mr. CURRIE. Is not the hon. gentleman losing sight of the fact that although these items appeared in the estimates last year they were not voted by this House? There were 400 docks in Nova Scotia which the House refused to vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY. These items I refer to were absolutely voted, all of them.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is an old parliamentarian, and I would call his attention to the fact that we are slightly outside the subject under discussion We did not reserve any item from Quebec. We did reserve an item in Ontario for harbours and rivers in order to allow the members from that province to offer any observations they might judge fit. When the question was put with regard to Gaspé basin I thought it better to answer it, but the question which the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has put to me I have answered very often.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I do not think the hon. gentleman has answered it at all. He has given no reason why that item was struck from the estimates.

Mr. MONK. It seemed to me I have answered in the only way possible. It is not an argument to say that a public work has been reported on favourably by the departmental officer, that all the preliminaries have been gone through and that the previous parliament voted an amount for the execution of that work. Parliament may approve of an appropriation, but if nothing was done with it, the new parliament can consider it as not having been utilized and can set aside that appropriation and vote another one. When the present government came into power there were a number of works in the estimates, five-twelfths of the amount for which had been voted, and the House will remember that the whole of the previous year's estimates were passed by parliament. That, however, did not entail on this government the necessity of carrying out these works. Every year amounts are voted by parliament that are not expended, and those votes pass out of existence. It is absurd to pretend that at present the government is obliged to justify the leaving out of these works, the moneys for which had been voted but never expended. What answer could I give my hon. friend. I could not explain to him what occurred in council when these particular items came up for discussion, if they were discussed at all. I can only give reasons for the appropriations that are submitted. It is quite open for any hon. member to criticize these estimates by comparison.

I submit that there is no special duty upon me at this stage to explain why previous appropriations that do not appear again in the estimates have been left out. That would be an impossible task. A number of these appropriations being considered by the government, were set aside. New estimates have been placed before the House for other works deemed more necessary and urgent. While I am willing to give all the information at my command, I have not come here to explain why public works for which no appropriations are asked are not in the programme of the government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) does not quite recognize the rights of parliament in this matter. He seems to assume that whatever the government does is right.

Mr. MONK. By no means; I am too old in this business to have any such opinion as that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. See the extraordinary position in which the hon. gentleman places parliament. In the estimates which he submitted to this parliament, he asked for an appropriation for Nova Scotia of $1,309,166. Hon. members may have voted for other public works throughout Canada, having in view that justice was being done by that province. (Because, after all, in endeavouring to discharge one's duty in connection with the estimates, one must have regard to the necessities and claims of the different provinces). The hon. minister will remember that, when he asked for the part of this vote of $1,309,166 not already voted, I called his attention to the fact that these were substantially the same items as had been submitted to parliament by the late government. He agreed. I said: We take it for granted that, speaking in the main, the government, in asking parliament for this vote, intends to go on with these works—of course, is not bound to go on with every item if subsequent reports should show that it was not necessary. We voted the estimates on that understanding. That was the pledge made to parliament. Now he comes and, without rhyme or reason, reduces the vote for Nova Scotia from $1,309,166 to $445,000—leaves out two-thirds of the amount for which he solemnly asked.

It looks like trifling with the House. Parliament would not have voted these amounts if it had supposed that the government had no intention of going on with the work, or if it had supposed that he was going to discriminate against Nova Scotia —and the same remark applies to my own province of New Brunswick, whose vote under this head is cut down from $800,000 to a little over $200,000, the total appropriations, including those on capital and on revenue account being reduced from $1,800,000 to $1,200,000. Has the hon. gentleman discovered that these works are unnecessary? Has he examined the reports of the engineers? It seems to me he is not discharging the duties he took upon himself when he said that the government recognized the utility of these works, and would proceed with them, and parliament voted the money.

Mr. MONK. The hon. gentleman's (Mr. Pugsley) memory I think is at fault. Those who were present at the time the seven-twelfths estimates were put through, will remember that they were put through without explanation, merely the balance of the year's estimates, and there was scarcely any discussion. But even if matters were as the hon. gentleman has presented them, yet, the discussion of one year's estimates is entirely different from that of the following year. When these estimates were being prepared, the government was called upon to formulate its policy, if I may use that expression, with regard to each of these public works. I may say to my hon. friend, that if there have been any heart-burnings or omissions, the supplementary estimates will be found to be as satisfactory as possible.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I would like to have some better explanation from the Minister of Public Works than he has given. I am asked by the people in my county for an explanation of the omission of this item, and I have not been able to give it. I have to tell the people that the former government agreed to make that expenditure, also that the principle was agreed to by this parliament by voting the seven-twelfths of the appropriation last December; but when I ask the minister why he has dropped the matter, I am only told that I must not ask such an absurd question. I hope the minister does not seriously mean that I am to tell the people that it is an absurd thing for me to ask why important items like this have been dropped. If I could persuade him to read the papers and go into the matter seriously, I would leave it to his own judgment whether he should not go on to complete these works. We have spent some $27,000 in connection with the protection of that harbour. It is in an exposed part of the coast and the completion of that harbour is much needed. If it is the policy of my hon. friend to build no public works in counties represented by Liberals, of course, there is no help for it, the work will have to remain unfinished. But I hope that when the supplementary estimates come down, we shall find that he has given consideration to the matter. But I would like him to give to-night some more satisfactory explanation than that which he has given.

Mr. MONK. There is not a single harbour in the country where the work is finally completed. The government is endeavouring to complete work in all the harbours as soon as possible. In the case to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) refers, the government has not seen its way clear to continue that work at the present moment. The reason that he supposes—that the counties represented by a member who is not friendly to the government are discriminated against has never entered my consideration.

But it happens, as my hon. friend knows, that appropriations are made for several years and are not used. In cases where the works were actually begun, we are continuing them. Where contracts were made we are keeping faith with the contractor.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Does the hon. gentleman say that if a different result had happened in Guysborough, and a supporter of the government had been sent here, he would have struck that item out of the estimates?

Mr. MONK. I can tell my hon. friend that at the present moment members on this side of the House are complaining that we have struck a number of items out of the estimates which concern their counties, and which were in previous estimates.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may tell my hon. friend that not only will there be one railway having its terminus at Gaspé, but there is another railway which is now under construction, partly in the county of Rimouski, and partly in the county of Gaspé. There is a railway which was started a few years ago at St. Flavie, and has now reached Matane in the county of Rimouski, and from Matane I understand it is the intention of the company, a very substantial company, to build to the village of Cap Chats, and as far as Gaspé Basin. I think it is the intention of the company to have a port at Mont Louis which at all times of the year is an open harbour, according to statements made by navigators of experience. Then from Mont Louis this railway would join the main line of the Atlantic, Quebec and Lake Superior, using the Atlantic pier as a terminus. The port of Gaspé is an open port at least nine months and a half during the year. In seven seasons out of ten Gaspé is open the whole year round, practically it is open all winter. I do not know what is the case this year, but I have known ships sailing to and fro from the port of Gaspé several months after December. I wish also to refer to another matter connected with the terminus. The late government had granted a certain amount for the construction of a road leading towards the terminus on the coast. If my hon. friend will look at the map of Gaspé he will see that the coast is indented, and the largest indentation is at Gaspé where the arm of the sea practically divides the peninsula in two. Now this bras de mer prevents the people on the other side from reaching the railway, and they have to go a long distance before they reach the landing pier. The population on that side of the peninsula is not so large as on the other side, but it is quite large. The road which was provided by the ex-Minister of Public Works gave to the people of that section of the peninsula a commodious route, which enabled them to reach the landing pier. I understand that work was started some months ago. I know the sentiments of my colleague from Gaspé on that subject, and I specially commended this work to his care after the election. I hope my hon. friend will take note of that fact. The road which starts at Ste. Majorique, and goes towards its terminus, is of great importance to the people there, and one might say that it is part and parcel of the terminus.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend the sitting member for that constituency has pointed out to me the necessity for terminating these works, and has done so with so much insistence that I am afraid that, out of sheer exhaustion, I shall have to give way.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). From the discussion we have had, and the explanations the minister has given on these items in the estimates prepared by the late government and afterwards approved by this government, but which he has dropped, it would seem to be a fair inference that the present government were not disposed to give any promise of the performance of these works at a later date. But the minister has held out a hope that when the supplementary estimates come down a great many of these appropriations asked for at the present time, and that were in the estimates last year, will likely re-appear. But he has not explained why these items were allowed to drop after receiving the approval of this parliament some months ago. If it were not proper that these appropriations should have been made, then when the minister prepared his estimates he should have had before him information which would justify him in dropping such as were not retained, and he should have had the reports of his engineers as to the works that were of a pressing character. I can understand that in the old estimates, there were votes for new works of which, under the circumstances, he might feel constrained to delay the construction until a later period. But where these appropriations were for repairs, for works begun but not completed, and he had his reports to that effect, and the man who prepared the estimates for him saw the necessity of going on with these works, as is evidenced by the fact that they appeared in his estimates, I say it is up to the minister to explain why he dropped them. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has suggested that if the minister would take the House more freely into his confidence, and would tell us which of these dropped in the estimates last year he proposed to have in the supplementaries, then we would be able to get along much faster.

A great deal of the discussion could be avoided and time saved, if the minister would tell us what he proposes to do with regard to these works. In the county which I have the honour to represent, there are over a dozen works, for which appropriations were made in last year's estimates, in some cases for the maintenance of works already constructed and in others for slight extensions to make the works of service to the community. All of these items, with the exception of two, have been dropped. They are not new works. There are a number of other works that I asked the department to have attended to, which are new works. The minister could very well say that these could not be attended to this year. But these works, to which I refer, were provided for in the estimates last year, and they were approved of by members on the other side of the House, when they agreed to vote seven-twelfths of the amounts appropriated for them a couple of months ago when last year's estimates were voted on. If the minister would explain that he intends to bring down these items in the supplementary estimates the grievance would be remedied. When last this matter was up for consideration, I asked him if these items would be in the estimates, but he evaded my question. I think that my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is quite right in stating that we have not yet been able to get from the minister such information as we are entitled to. The minister states that to reply to our question would necessitate him telling us what took place in council. Surely he does not mean to tell us that in council, when these items were up for consideration, he was told: You will have to cut out these items in Nova Scotia in order that the national ports shall receive proper treatment. Surely he is not going to confess that he was weak enough to surrender and leave out these items which are of such vital interest to the fishermen and other residents of the county which I represent. The Minister of Militia can get all the appropriations he wants. I observe that he finds no difficulty in getting the large appropriations which he demands. Yet, these little works in the province of Nova Scotia are neglected. To some hon. gentlemen on the other side these may seem of very little importance. It is quite right that the national ports should be attended to, but look at the conditions along the shores of Nova Scotia. A great many of these places are distant from the railway, from 20 to 50 miles, the means of communication they have is by water, and they require these little wharfs and breakwaters along the shore which some of our friends opposite have in the past minimized. I remember that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), used to have a set of photographs, of works in the maritime provinces. I do not know where they came from, but, they were supposed to represent some of the harbours and coves down in Nova Scotia. Most of them were the figments of his own imagination, I have no doubt. He held them up to ridicule, but these hon. gentlemen opposite minimize the importance of these works along the shores of Nova Scotia, because they were trifling in cost. Is that a reason why the minister should drop them or fail to see that they are provided for? Thirty-four thousand dollars was voted the year before last for works in the county which I have the honour to represent, a good many of which items were revotes of the year before that. It is only a very trifling amount, yet it covers a dozen different places and it means convenience and accommodation for hundreds and hundreds of people, a great many of whom are engaged in the fishing industry and it accommodates others who have to use these ports for the purpose of transportation. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the minister should frankly answer the question which had been put to him. I read a list of places when this matter was up the last time, for which appropriations are desired and he promised to take the matter into his consideration and give me an answer.

I have heard nothing since. My hon. friend from Guysborough has done likewise. If the minister would tell us frankly that these items are dropped because he did not want to allow the late government to get credit in the country for providing these works and that he intended to provide for them later on when the supplementary estimates came on so that somebody else might get the credit for having secured these works a great deal of our anxiety will have been ended.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend offers a very great temptation. If I can tell him that I have provided for the public works of his county in the supplementary estimates the work of the committee will be much shortened. I know what that means but I am afraid I must resist the temptation. I cannot at this moment tell my hon. friend what provisions will be made in the supplementary estimates. Nor is it relevant to the present discussion. I could not do it under any circumstances. I have told my hon. friend also several times since these estimates were under consideration, when I was asked in regard to leaving out public works in the county of Inverness, that my hon. friend refused to name a superintendent of works. I have a memorandum in my office which I will bring here for a number of these works where the district engineer reported that, although the amount had been voted by parliament, and he had applied to the sitting member for a superintendent of works, he had refused to give any answer.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). It is not the county of Inverness that I have the honour to represent. It is a much better county—the county of Antigonish.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend will pardon me; I am not as familiar with Nova Scotia as he is There are several instances where the district engineer thought the sitting member did not find the work important enough to indicate to him a superintendent of works. I give that as an instance why the minister might naturally conclude that the work is not necessary.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I think the minister has got the two counties confounded. As far as Antigonish is concerned you cannot produce any evidence from the district engineer or anybody else of the fact that I refused to name a foreman.

Mr. MONK. I think it is Mr. Bernasconi who is the district engineer.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). No, he is at North Sydney, Cape Breton. Mr. Millidge is the district engineer there.

Mr. MONK. I will look up the memorandum. I was under the impression that although he had applied for a superintendent of these works he had received no nomination. However, that is not the main point at issue. Where works were begun, where there was any contract, where there was an obligation upon the government to carry out the engagements of the previous administration, these works have been provided for, or they will be in the supplementary estimates. They have to be provided for because the government is not free; it has to keep faith. But, where the whole matter was open, I submit to the committee that the government was free to prepare its estimates as it thought fit, just the same as the government is free to prepare its estimates without reference to the estimates of the year before. The government is perfectly at liberty to follow the estimates of the previous year or to change them. It is a new operation every year. The minister must be prepared to justify those items for which he asks a credit from parliament. It must be evident that the whole discussion of a previous debate cannot be reopened at this stage.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). The minister has conveyed the impression that the failure in going ahead with these works was due to my neglect in not complying with the request to name a clerk of works. I give that information which he has received the most emphatic contra diction. In no case did I refuse to name a clerk of works with perhaps one exception. He referred the other evening to the McAra's Creek work and said that the engineer had asked me to name a clerk of works. Perhaps that is correct, but the reason was that only five-twelfths of the money was available and it would be useless to start the work with only five-twelfths of the amount required on hand. The work would be stopped when the money was exhausted and the five-twelfths might be wasted. I refused to name a foreman, in that particular case, and that case alone. Then too it was on the eve of an election, and I did not think it was the right thing to start these works then, it would be said they were being use for election purposes, and the county of Antigonish is not susceptible to that kind of influence, and cannot be brought to support the government by the refusal of public works. The people are not built that way, they are too independent for that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) is not here to-night, and he wished to speak upon a work in Ontario. Could it be arranged that on any item an hon. member might be allowed to speak about this Ontario work?

Mr. MONK. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wrote a note to the minister informing him that I desired information about a number of small works in my county. The minister has just said that he is not very familiar with the geography of Nova Scotia. The county which I represent has not a large population, but it has a tremendous coast line, perhaps as as long as any other county in Canada, so we have quite a number of small works such as wharfs and breakwaters. The first section of the coast extends from the head of East bay to the Grand Narrows, and then you follow along the sea coast to North Sydney. On the other side of the Bras d'Or lakes there is another 75 miles of sea coast, all in my county. There is a large island in the centre of the Bras-d'Or lakes with a coast line of 70 miles, and there is the regular Atlantic sea coast of 150 miles. All of these stretches of sea coast are fishing grounds, and all are more or less exposed to the terrors of the Atlantic ocean. The minister will thus understand why we seek the opening of larger harbours to enable our people to go out and fish and return to shore with some degree of safety. Breakwaters have been built during the last 15 years at a number of places along the shore. Before their construction the only boat the fishermen could use was such a boat as could be hauled up over the beach away from the surf in the evening, shoved out in the morning and reballasted. Since the construction of the breakwaters they have been able to use fairly good sized schooners, and in many instances gasolene boats which take shelter in some of the little harbours we have made, or behind the breakwaters. I am sorry that I have the same complaint as other members from Nova Scotia that many works which have been started are dropped out altogether. For instance the wharf at East bay, which is almost finished, built by day work and to cost only $4,000, cannot be utilized as it requires a little further work. Then at Rose Point an old wharf built under the Macdonald government requires repairs, the material was on the ground, but it has been left out of the estimates. I cannot believe that Mr. Bernasconi, the chief engineer in that part of the country, would report that works which were halfway finished should be dropped.

I picked out the items for which the money was voted in the estimates of last year, and I sent the list to the minister on the 6th of February, and I will ask that the attention of himself and of his officials be given to these works, and that he will at least proceed with those which have already been begun. The most important work on my list is the opening of the harbour at Aspey bay. That is in a section of the country where there is no available harbour at present. There is what is called a harbour, but the water is not deep enough. It is a magnificent fishing place in a good agricultural section of the country, which is within easy reach of the large markets at Sydney, North Sydney and Sydney Mines; and if the people could only get in touch with the steamer which passes their doors every day but cannot go in, it would be a great benefit to them. For the last 30 years there has been an agitation for the opening of this harbour. This could be accomplished simply by cutting through the bar, which would enable the steamer to go to a splendid harbour inside, 6 miles long and a mile and a half wide. At low water there is at present sometimes not more than 6 feet, and it is impossible for steamers to go in. Last year I prevailed on the late Minister of Public Works to put $50,000 in the estimates to make a start on this work; everything was in readiness for the calling of tenders, and I was told that tenders were called; but I was afterwards informed that some slight changes in the plans were necessary before the work could be put under contract. I find that this work has been dropped altogether from the present estimates. If nothing else were done in my county, I would ask the hon. minister to give some consideration to that work, as it is of the most vital importance to that section of the country. His officials will tell him that it is supported by all the influences which both sides of politics in the county could bring to bear; every public body in the county has sent petitions for it, which are on file in the department. Therefore, I hope that when the supplementary estimates are brought down something will be provided for that work. Even if I had to sacrifice every dollar for other public works in the county, I would be to a certain extent pleased if provision were made for the opening of that harbour.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a few very necessary public works in my county, in the hope that he will provide for them when he makes up the supplementary estimates. The first is the extension of the breakwater at Charlos' Cove. The breakwater there has been partly built, but it is not long enough to be a proper shelter for boats as it stands at present. It requires to be extended about 150 feet or more. A considerable sum of money has been spent upon it, and it is a very important work in that locality. Another work is the dredging of the Tittle at Canso. This is a narrow channel connecting Chedabucto Bay with Canso harbour. It makes a short cut for the fishermen in stormy weather, but it requires some dredging. Orders were given, I understand, last year that this should be done, but owing to the confusion connected with the election and the difficulty of finding any one to undertake the work, it was not carried out. It would only require a very small expenditure. Then, there is an application for the dredging of St. Mary's river, which my hon. friend will find on the files of the department. This is a very important river, as it the only means of communication with the sea for a large district. It is a lumber district, and the logs are floated down the river and are sawn at Sherbrooke; but the river is not deep enough to enable steamers to come up. Some dredging has been done in the river in the last few years, and there is urgent need that it should be continued. Also the breakwater at Lower Half Island Cove on Chedabucto bay is another important work. The dredging of Guysborough harbour is another. There is a bar at the mouth of the harbour, and it is filling up to some extent, and something will have to be done to make the harbour suitable for the purpose of navigation. My hon. friend will remember that the branch railway that was to be built in that county was struck off, in the slaughter which was made in the estimates, and unless we can get these harbours dredged so as to afford some communication with the sea, it will be very difficult for our people to carry on their business at all. There should also be a small appropriation for cutting a channel at Port Shoreham to enable the fishermen to get shelter. A few hundred dollars would be sufficient for that. If the minister will examine the applications for these works which he will find on his files and deal with them when he brings down the supplementary estimates, I shall be very much obliged.

Mr. KYTE. I desire to call the attention of the minister to some works which are similarly situated in the county I represent. For the breakwater at Little Anse, provision was made at the last session of parliament, and tenders were called for, and the contract awarded during the month of September last. I would like to call the attention of the minister to that item particularly as the timber has been purchased by the contractor, and I hope he will not lose sight of it when he comes to prepare the supplementary estimates. There were also provided for breakwaters at Port Richmond and Charlos Forest Cove, a wharf at Louisdale and a wharf at Forchu. Tenders were called last year for the construction of these works, but I am informed that contracts have not been entered into up to the present time.

These works are all equally important and I would urge on the hon. minister that he should give attention to them in his supplementary estimates. There are repairs to breakwater at Petit de Grat which are urgently required. This is an important public work which was built years ago, but it is to-day in such a condition as to make the expenditure of public money on it absolutely necessary. The same remark applies to the wharf at Poulamond, which is in very bad condition indeed, and for which an appropriation of $1,600 was voted last session. The objection which the hon. minister raised in connection with the public work asked for by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm), namely, that he refused to recommend a clerk of works, does not apply in this instance. A clerk of works was appointed a year ago, and I trust that these repairs will be made at the earliest possible opportunity. If the hon. minister will look at the estimates voted in the beginning of the session, he will observe that amounts were appropriated for other public works in my county which I shall not now enumerate, but I would ask that he would give some attention to these in his supplementary estimates, so that the people living in these localities may reasonably expect that in the not distant future these very necessary works will be constructed. I desire to impress upon him the fact that these expenditures are asked for solely because they are absolutely required and because the works in question are very important. If he will refer to the reports of his district engineer, he will learn that he has testified to the urgency and necessity of these works being carried out.

Mr. CLARK (North Bruce). I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite do not imagine for a moment that they have a monopoly of grievances against the Minister of Public Works and the government generally with regard to public works in the various constituencies. I hope they do not imagine that items have been struck from the estimates of the Public Works Department merely because the counties interested happen to have returned members supporting the opposition. Hon. gentlemen on this side, myself among the number, have grievances of a similar nature against the minister and the government. I do not think we are making complaints; but if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to file their orders for items in the supplementary estimates, then hon. gentlemen on this side should do the same. We have had the hon. gentlemen rising and filing their claims in this public way on the Minister of Public Works and insisting that he shall place these claims in the supplementaries; and if he is going to do that for his opponents, I insist that he should also do it for his friends.

Mr. KYTE. I shall be very glad to think that he draws no distinction between his friends and his opponents in the matter of appropriations for public works.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is rather a new departure to find hon. gentlemen opposite taking that line. I wonder if my hon. friend remembers how the Minister of Public Works in the late government (Mr. Pugsley) acted when he met with demands for public works from those who were not in sympathy with him in his public policy. I remember when he was quite ready to give a public building to a county adjoining mine in a place not very important and where the population was small, but absolutely refused to spend a dollar in the adjoining constituency.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What about Aylmer?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not in the county of Halton. I am speaking for my own county, and I remember well the ground the hon. gentleman took in the last session of parliament when he refused any explanation in the county I represent. I then told him that the people of my county were not beggars, that the Liberal party was not going to remain in power for all time, and that we were willing to wait. I did not know that I was such a good prophet, but we did wait and I hope that my representations will have a little more effect on the present Minister of Public Works than they had on the previous one. At any rate it will not be my fault if I do not succeed. I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman who spoke before me saying that he wanted the government to give their attention to both sides indiscriminately, but that is a new policy for the Liberal party.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). I wish to say a few words to press on the Minister of Public Works the claims of the county I represent. I think it is the duty of hon. members to place before the government the requirements of their various counties, and in my opinion any one who fails to do so is not performing, as he should, his duty to his constituency. I do not think that anybody in this House has a right to hold his tongue in such matters. I perhaps have been doing a little too much of that during the last two or three years, and I now propose, when I have something to submit to the government, to urge it openly in committee. I may say that I have implicit faith in the desire of the hon. minister to treat every county properly; and now that he is preparing his supplementaries, I have some suggestions to submit to him with regard to requirements in my county which no doubt will receive fair treatment. There are several works in the county of Inverness which I would like to see provided for, if possible, in the supplementaries. They were all provided for in the supplementaries of last year. I wish briefly to enumerate these works. I shall take first the work at Tory Harbour. That is an artificial harbour, which was provided for in the supplementaries of last year. It is an important harbour, intended to afford shelter for perhaps some 40 or 50 fishing boats. There are some forty or fifty families depending on the fishing industry here. If the hon minister will look over the reports of his engineer, he will see that the expenditure on this harbour is one which the engineer declares absolutely necessary and urgently called for. Then there is Long Point wharf. That wharf was built five or six years ago, but is now practically of no use as it is almost covered with sand, and it is necessary to extend it out some 200 feet if it is to be of any benefit to the people. I need not enumerate the various reasons why these works should be attended to, as the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has gone over that ground already and the same conditions obtain in my county as in his. Then there is Crignish where a wharf is urgently needed. The lumber has already been bought for this work, and I am sure, from what the hon. minister has told us, he will see that the necessary amount will be provided in the supplementary estimates to carry on this work. I now come to Mabou Harbour which is another important work, as the hon. minister will see if he looks up the engineer's report. It is the only harbour in that part of the county, which is very prosperous and has large exports, and where this channel protection and dredging is urgently required. At Finlay Point, there is another wharf which is now practically of no use. That wharf requires to be extended some 200 feet, as the minister will see by the report in his department. Then there is Margaree Harbour where a sheer dam is required, and I would lay particular stress on the importance of this work, because that is the only harbour in the stretch of country some 40 miles in extent with a population of some 17,000 or 18,000 people. $10,000 was appropriated last year for the purpose of building a sheer dam there.

The minister will see, by reference to the report of the engineer, the importance of this work, and will understand that it should be continued as soon as possible. Then, there is a little harbour, the Friar's Head harbour, which is for fishing boats. It was partly built four or five years ago. The amount necessary to finish this harbour is not large, and I am sure that when the hon. minister knows the number of fishermen there, he will see the importance of completing it. There are over 50 fishermen depending on this harbour for boat protection. Then we come to Cheticamp Point. When I tell the minister that from this point over two hundred fishermen go out to the fishing grounds, and that a settlement of something like three hundred families depend for a living here on the fishing industry, which is depending upon the shelter of this breakwater, he will see the importance of it. I might spend half an hour enumerating the various necessities for this work, but it is not necessary, as the hon. minister has the report of the engineer before him. There is a work at Pleasant Bay, also, an extension of the wharf that is there now. The wharf is of no use unless extended by building another breakwater to the northeast. There is a thriving settlement here of over 40 families who depend on fishing for a livelihood and this wharf is the only protection the fishermen have. Then we come to Marble Mountain. The minister has a report on this work and he will see thereby the importance of this work also. I simply place the demands of the county before the minister that he may provide for them in the supplementary estimates. I have always found the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), courteous, and I hope he will see his way to grant our reasonable demands. All these grants are contained in last year's estimates.

Mr. MONK. I am glad to hear suggestions; but I corroborate what has been said by hon. members on this side, that it is a great mistake to imagine that claims and complaints come only from the other side. I have had quite a number of complaints on this side of the House. I may say we have a heavy budget, I suppose $30,000,000 when all is considered, but four or five hundreds of millions would not suffice to build all the public works asked for of the department. The hon. gentleman must not forget that during all the years we were in opposition we got very little from the government. I was fifteen years a member of the House and never got a single public work, except on one occasion, when I asked the Minister of Public Works of that time for a small wharf. He said he would give the wharf, provided I would not speak about it in the House. I do not say that that is the right way to obtain public works, but you might try it.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I was struck with the faith of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Wm. Chisholm) who said that he had no idea that counties would be discriminated against that were represented by opponents of the government. In reply to what has been said by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), I might say that the experience of which they spoke was that of my own county during eighteen years of Conservative rule, with the exception of four years when the county was represented by a Conservative. During those four years a few public works were built along the coast. It was not that the requirements of the county were not brought before the government, because Mr. John A. Kirk and Mr. D. C. Fraser, who represented the county, urged the government year after year to do something about the coast of that county. But during fourteen years, the name of the county, or any place in the county, does not appear, I venture to say, in the estimates. On one occasion a Minister of Public Works came to the shire town of my county and told the people in plain language that the only way for them to get appropriations for the county was to vote Tory—'support the government and you will get something.' That was the doctrine. I hope we have improved since then. I could give many instances to show that under the late government that did not prevail. For example, the late government was asked to do something for the construction of branch lines in eastern Nova Scotia. They looked over the ground and found a hundred and fifty miles of that country without a railway. Half was in the county of Halifax, represented at that time by the leader of the present government and Mr. Crosby, two Conservatives, and the other half was in Guysborough, represented by myself. They laid down two branches of railway one for each county and put about $1,000,000 for each in the estimates. And what did the present government do? When they came into power they struck the pen through the appropriation for Guysborough and left the appropriation for the county of Halifax. That leads me to fear that my hon. friend behind me has too much faith in the present administration, and also that the hope expressed by my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) may not be realized. But you cannot starve or drive the people of Guysborough into supporting the Tory party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SINCLAIR. You may try it, but you cannot do it. During fourteen years when the Conservatives ruled before, it was tried and it did not work and it will not work now. I should like to feel that this was not going to be the policy of the present administration. But, apparently it is to be their policy. They are doing the same in the case of officials, cutting off heads everywhere in order to give jobs to their friends. They are even cancelling mail contracts, taking advantage of a clause in each contract which enables them to cancel. We know that the prices will go up for the carrying of mails. Owing to the greater expense of living, the higher price of horses, &c., it is certain that when they let the mail contracts they will have to pay for them. But they are cancelling these contracts merely to give them to their friends.

Mr. CURRIE. Did the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) really take seriously the votes for his county in the estimates last year, made on the eve of an election? Did the hon. gentleman really think that the government were going to spend that million dollars in his riding?

Mr. SINCLAIR. I don't think there is any necessity to answer a question like that. My hon. friend knows very well that the late government always took these matters seriously. They not only put items in the estimates, but they spent them. If the present government will carry out the policy of the late government, it will be the best thing they can do for themselves and for the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how his county fared during the régime of the Liberal party?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Fairly well.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, tell us all about it. My impression is that the hon. gentleman has got so much that there is scarcely any room for any thing more. Where would he put any more public works in his county after fifteen years expenditure by the government he was supporting?

Mr. SINCLAIR. The hon. gentleman is quite right, the late government treated my county much better than ever it was treated before. But the great requirement in my constituency for its development was a branch railway, and it was a great disappointment to the people when the present government was returned to power, because they felt that this important work that had been started by the late government might be stopped, and that fear has been realized.

Mr. CURRIE. It is a well-known fact that this branch railway in the hon. gentleman's riding always appeared during the régime of the Liberal party just on the eve of an election, and it has never been built yet. I am sure that if the Liberal party were in office again, every time an election came round there would be an item in the estimates for this railway down in Guysborough. The hon. gentleman should have grafted the plum tree with the plums on it, he should have had that railway built before there was any chance of an election.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the question of branch lines was only decided on last year, and there was no time lost after the government committed themselves to the policy of building branch lines to the Intercolonial. Immediately on that announcement being made, the supplementary estimates were brought down with a million dollars for Guysborough county, and engineers were placed at once on the work to get ready for construction. There was not a day lost by the late government in regard to that matter. The statement of my hon. friend that this road has been used by the Liberal party for election purposes I absolutely deny. The people in my constituency have been endeavouring for many years to get the government committed to this work before they were finally successful. The contracts that were made with the different companies were not made at the time of an election, but between elections. Hon. gentlemen opposite had better not talk too much about election promises. Let me remind them that their leader, when he went out west last summer promised the people everything that was in sight, promised to give them back their natural resources, to give them back their mines, their lands; and coming down to the head of Lake Superior, he promised terminal elevators at the public expense, promised chilled meat refrigerators out in the west when there appeared to be no public demand for them. I need not go over them all. On the very eve of the local election in Prince Edward Island he sent a telegram down to the Conservative party in Prince Edward Island, saying that he was going to build a car ferry across the strait, and to widen the gauge of the road, in order to help them to win the local elections. Why, Sir, on the eve of the election he issued a manifesto to the fishermen of the maritime provinces promising that he would give them free medicine. There was nothing he could think of that he did not promise in order to get votes. There was never anything known like it in the history of Canada. Hon. gentleman had better not talk too much about pre-election promises.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am a little surprised at hearing the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) complain that estimates brought down by the late government previous to the elections have not been renewed. As a matter of fact it is known to every person in the province of Nova Scotia that, during the last fifteen years, public works have always been dangled before the constituencies just on the eve of an election. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) made a similar complaint a little while ago. He knows very well that his county has always been promised some great public work just previous to an election, and after the election was over no more was heard of it. The federal government and the provincial government, in 1904, started to build a bridge across the Lennox Passage, a necessary work, just previous to the election, but after the election nothing more was heard of it. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Guysborough assert that the branch line in his county had not been used for election purposes by the late government. As a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman from Guysborough, owes his election on more than one occasion, to promises to build this very road. The hon. gentleman himself was a member of a provincial legislature for some years, which, just previous to the general elections, made a declaration that this road was going to be built; I went through his county in 1905 and I found that men were actually at work with wheelbarrows, building that road. As a matter of fact, it has only been used as a kite to amuse and attract the people of his constituency. Everybody in his constituency, everybody in Nova Scotia, knew that when this branch line was proposed, it was only as a vote catcher, and that as soon as the Liberal government were returned, nothing more would be heard of it for another five years. But now we have a business government in power, and something will be done. I think the policy pursued by the hon. gentleman, his bickerings and objectionable language, would, in my judgment, deter any government from taking any interest in his constituency.

Mr. KYTE. As the hon. gentleman has spoken of my constituency, it is only fair that I should not take his observation with silence. The statement that he made in respect to public works in the county of Richmond only being commenced on the eve of an election is absolutely untrue——

Some hon MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. KYTE. I profess to have more knowledge of the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. KYTE. I am quite willing to withdraw the statement and say that the hon. member for Annapolis is not as familiar with the conditions in that county as I am.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I know something about the Lennox passage bridge.

Mr. KYTE. The Lennox passage bridge was an incident merely between the provincial government and the municipal council. The municipal council of Richmond passed a resolution in 1903 by which they undertook to contribute $25,000 towards a bridge across Lennox passage if the provincial government would spend $25,000 as well. The provincial government accepted that proposition and made all reasonable speed in the preparations for the construction of that bridge. After the work had been commenced the municipal council met and rescinded their resolution. When they did that the local government felt that they were absolved from carrying out their part of the undertaking and the work lapsed. So much for my hon. friend's story. The hon. gentleman has been drawing a distinction between the conduct of the Liberal government and the Conservative party in the matter of public works. I remember that in 1891, upon the eve of an election, the then Minister of Public Works in the Conservative government, went into the county of Guysborough and, speaking in the shire town, told them in plain language that unless Guysborough returned a Conservative to the House of Commons, there would be no public money spent in that constituency.

With respect to public works in my county, I would say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the late Mackenzie government, in 1877, constructed a breakwater in the district of L'Ardoise at a cost of $30,000. In the course of time repairs were needed upon that breakwater, but the county was represented by a Liberal and the Conservative government absolutely refused to spend one dollar for repairing the breakwater much less to expend money upon new public works. The consequence was that in the course of years continued storms so destroyed the breakwater that instead of it being a protection to the fishermen it became a menace to them and it was not until the breakwater had been absolutely destroyed that an appropriation was finally made to renew it and it cost the late Liberal government twice as much to rebuild that breakwater as it would have cost if the late Conservative government had spent a reasonable amount each year in maintaining it. The hon. member for Annapolis is perhaps not conversant with these facts, and I would suggest to him that before he undertakes to discuss matters in my county again he should inform himself of the facts and not take up the time of the House in making observations that are not consistent with the actual facts as they exist.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The hon. gentleman claims that I am not conversant with the facts on which I pretend to speak. These facts I am conversant with and I propose to make them known to this committee: In the year 1905, two weeks before an election, work was begun upon the Lennox passage bridge. My hon. friend, who now represents the county of Richmond, came to Ottawa some time previously. He was paid a fat sum by the municipal council of Richmond for the purpose and it was supposed that he came to get the assistance of the federal government in the undertaking. He went back to Richmond and made it appear to the electorate there that the federal and local governments were assisting the municipal council in the construction of this bridge. Work was begun on this bridge two weeks before the election, two days after the election it was discontinued and nothing has been done since. There are the plain, unvarnished facts.

Mr. KYTE. I state that the résumé of alleged facts indulged in by my hon. friend is not in accordance with the actual conditions. What election took place in the county of Richmond in 1905?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Well, it was in 1904.

Mr. KYTE. Then my hon. friend is not as familiar with these things as he professes to be. There was no election in 1905 and I repeat again that the work was not continued because the municipal council met in the meantime and passed a resolution withdrawing the offer which they had made towards the construction of that bridge. No federal assistance was promised then or at any other time. The people of Richmond are quite competent to deal with all these matters without any assistance from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Chairman, I wish you would permit me to answer what the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) said in regard to the commencement of the construction of a railway line in my constituency for political purposes. His statement is not in accordance with the facts. I took the opportunity on one other occasion to explain this matter, and I think my hon. friend knows what the facts are. He is repeating an old story about wheelbarrows that some one told him and from which he seems to have got an incorrect impression. I would like to tell the committee that this company that was using the wheelbarrows on this road was composed of his own political associates, his own friends, and for their own purposes. A company was formed to build a line of railway in my constituency and one of its principal members was Mr. Fitzpatrick, a Conservative local member in Nova Scotia. Associated with him were my late friend Mr. George McCormick of Parry Sound, Ontario, and Mr. McLeod who, I think, represented North Ontario in this House. Three leading Conservatives of this country were associated with one or two other gentlemen and formed the company that was organized for the building of this line of railway. They got two years in which to commence the work and about the time that the two years' period was expiring they asked an extension from the local government of Nova Scotia. The local government at that time were not inclined to give that extension, but the contract contained a clause that if they commenced work on the line before the expiration of two years it would hold the contract until they could float the company and secure the capital. That is the explanation. Failing to get the consent of the local government these gentlemen, consisting of the leading Conservatives in this country, started with their wheelbarrows to build a short piece of the railway. They built about half a mile of the railway and Conservatives have since that time thrown that up to the Liberal party as if the Liberal party had something to do with it. It was done without the consent of the local government of Nova Scotia, or of the Liberal party, and it was done by a company consisting of leading Conservatives for the purpose of holding their contract and for no other purpose. When the hon. gentleman comes here and misrepresents questions of this kind in the House and tries to make members of this House believe that that piece of road was built for political purposes by the Liberal party he is going very far astray and I do not think that I should remain in my seat without endeavouring to put a few of those wheelbarrows right down his throat.

Manitoba—harbours, rivers and bridges—general repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. STAPLES. I would ask the minister to send an engineer to inquire into an expenditure at St. Lorette on Lake Manitoba. The expenditure was made by the late government for political purposes, but it has been left in such a condition that after spending $15,000 of the people's money it is of absolutely no value.

Mr. MONK. Do I understand that my hon. friend is asking that we should repair all the errors of the late government? An ocean of money would be insufficient for such a task. Within the limits mentioned, we will be glad to see if something cannot be done to remedy the state of affairs he has mentioned.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) is claiming that while the work is a useful public work more money ought to have been expended on it. The information was reported to me that the work was completed so far as the public needs require. The request now made is a reasonable one that the minister should send an engineer to look into the matter and I hope he will look into it carefully, and not spend more money than is needed. That is the conclusion we came to from the reports of our engineers.

Mr. STAPLES. When the ex-minister says it was completed, he is not stating what is consistent with the facts.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is quite parliamentary.

Mr. STAPLES. It was thrown up there for political purposes in 1904, and the day before the election the men engaged went off for a jollification, they went to the polls and voted, and there has not been a dollar spent on that work since, although in every session I brought it to the attention of the ex-minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The report of the engineer was very clear that that work was completed so far as was in the public interest.

Mr. STAPLES. That is information I could not get out of the ex-minister all the time he was in office.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why is the item for the Winnipeg beach breakwater dropped? That was advertised for; tenders were received and the contract was let. Has that important work been completed?

Mr. MONK. I do not think any contract was completed for that work, or it would have been provided for in these estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think a contract was given to Messrs. Dunn, of Winnipeg.

Athabaska river, removing boulders and deepening channel through sand and gravel bars, $12,000.

Mr. OLIVER. What part of the Athabaska river is it intended to improve?

Mr. MONK. At Grand Rapids, amongst other smaller rapids. The work was started in 1911-12, blasting rock in an endeavour to improve navigation. The amount of rock blasted it is impossible to estimate as much of the work was done through the ice, and the measurement could not be taken. River pilots claim great improvements in the rapids this spring, but a large number of rocks still need to be removed.

Mr. OLIVER. The amount asked for the coming year is somewhat less than for the current year. I want to impress the importance of the improvement of the Athabasca river and the amount of good that may be done by a moderate expenditure for that whole northern country. The whole country that constitutes the basin of the Mackenzie river, 1,500 miles from north to south, by about 500 from east to west, nearly one sixth the total area of Canada, is available to the navigation of this river and its tributaries. River navigation is reached at Athabasca Landing by a branch of the Canadian Northern now about completed. There is then river navigation from that point to the Arctic ocean with the exception of the rapids of which my friend has spoken, and another serious rapid at Fort Smith. It would be impossible to improve the rapid at Fort Smith, but the Grand and a succession of rapids below are quite capable of improvement to such a degree as to permit navigation by loaded scows down stream very freely.

My criticism would be that the amount asked by the minister is small for the purpose, and that a moderate expenditure there would be of immense benefit in developing that northern country. Until these recent improvements were made at Grand Rapids, all scows going down the river had to be unloaded and the goods had to be portaged from the head to the foot of the rapids, the scows being taken down light through the rapids or brought out of the water and carried on a tramway. By the improvement already made it is possible to run the loaded scows through the rapids, without portaging, but there still remains a great deal to be done to make it reasonably safe.

It is now possible, but it is not safe, and a reasonable further expenditure would make the rapid, while not absolutely safe, so improved that there would be no extra charge on the goods by reason of their being taken over the Grand Rapids, whereas at present the extra charge amounts to something like 50 cents per hundred pounds. Below the Grand Rapids is a succession of rapids extending to Fort McMurray. In a distance of about 80 miles there are six or eight rapids, each one of which requires some improvement to make it safe for the passage of scows. Scows do run down now without discharging except at the Big Cascade. In low water they have to discharge part of their cargo, which adds greatly to the cost of freight and the risk of navigation. I am informed that it is practical to improve both the Big and the Little Cascades, so that the scows can run through full at low water. I would urge the minister to make additional provision in the supplementary estimates to carry on the work which has already been begun.

The reason why it is more desirable now to push these improvements than it was before, is because, rail communication having been established with the navigation of the river, the great impediment that formerly existed to the transport of heavy machinery and supplies is done away with. Until the railway was built to the Landing all goods had to be transported by wagon or sleigh, and only comparatively small pieces could be taken; but now the largest and heaviest machinery can be taken. A great deal of money is being invested in the attempt to develop petroleum wells on the Athabasca below these rapids, a very large quantity of machinery was taken down last summer, and there is no doubt a great deal more will go down in future years, particularly if a successful strike is made. The expenditure already made has been of great advantage, but I would urge the hon. minister to increase the amount so that substantial work can be done that will afford an open channel for loaded scows down these rapids, so that they can carry the heaviest machinery necessary for the development of the mines and the wells without unloading at the rapids and without danger of destruction.

Edmonton—wharf, $10,000.

Mr. OLIVER. I see that this is a revote of a similar amount which was in the estimates of last year. May I ask what the prospects are of translating the promise into performance?

Mr. MONK. It is intended to carry out this work, which was asked for by my hon. friend. Plans have been prepared, and we will proceed as soon as these estimates are passed.

Dredging—Maritime Provinces, $500,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Has my hon. friend outlined his division of money yet?

Mr. MONK. Not yet. As my hon. friend will see, there has been considerable reduction in the amounts appropriated for dredging generally from last year, but I think it will be necessary to restore a large proportion of these in the supplementaries. Perhaps I shall be able to give some details when we come to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The same remark will apply to Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Grand river bridge at York, Ontario, repairs, painting, &c., $500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is a provincial bridge, entirely within the province, why should we repair it?

Mr. MONK. This is a bridge that was built by the federal government years ago, and we have always maintained it. These are urgent repairs.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not remember that my attention was ever called to that bridge. Over what river is it?

Mr. MONK. Over the Grand River. It is in York county, Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When was it built?

Mr. MONK. Long before the late government came into power.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would my hon. friend get the information before we come to concurrence? He will remember a discussion in the past as to the responsibility of the different governments for building these wholly provincial bridges. My hon. friend had something to say on that question. Perhaps he would get the information before we come to concurrence?

Cape Breton—new telegraph lines, 13, $12,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the intention to go on with these lines which have been started in the county of Inverness between Nyanza and Rossville, and also between Ferry Landing in the county of Victoria, and Peters Point in the same county? There are some other lines in Cape Breton partly under way, and I would like to know if it is the intention of the government to complete them?

Mr. MONK. It is the intention of the government to complete lines which were projected and commenced.

Improvement of repair service, province of Quebec, $3,000; new telegraph line and repairs and renewals to existing lines, $1,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like to know what are the rates charged on those telegraph lines

Mr. MONK. I think they are the same, if not lower than the rates generally charged.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Department of Public Works has a land line on the Magdalen Islands to connect the several islands together, and that telegraph line connects with the mainline at Meat Cove, N.S., by a cable. The islands are closed from November until April each year when there is no navigation. I urged some years ago the establishment of a Marconi station at Birds' Rock, which would be of very great service to navigation because that is the first land sighted by the steamers when navigation opens. A Marconi station there would be a great advantage to the business interests of Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere.

But, it seems to me that the people of the Magdalen Islands, being shut off from communication for several months each year, are entitled to low rates. I made an arrangement with the department of Public Works some years ago, under which the people of the Islands might send a letter on the telegraph lines to Meat Cove in Cape Breton, and the operator there would post the letter so telegraphed, and for this service the rate was very low—I do not recall the figure exactly. The reason for this was that the merchants of the Magdalen Islands are very anxious to know the condition of the fish market. Commercially speaking, the Islands depend chiefly, if not wholly, on Halifax and Pictou, their business connections being mainly with those places. Does not the minister think that the low rate to which I have referred should be reinstated? The government telegraph is not a paying institution, being mainly for the use of the government itself. Surely, the government can afford to give the people on the Islands facilities for communication which are given to other parts of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman knows that some years ago we built, at considerable expense, the line from British Columbia to Yukon. The Magdalen Islands, I think, supply a larger population than that of Dawson. The last census showed a population in the Islands of about 6,000 people. They are well-to-do people, very brave and very industrious. I think they are abundantly entitled to the concessions I suggest.

Mr. MONK. I will make a note of the hon. gentleman's observations. I do not remember having heard, since becoming Minister of Public Works, of any complaint regarding the rates. Certainly, in that instance, the rates should be as low as possible.

Mr. McKENZIE. Meat Cove is in the county I have the honour to represent. The telegraph extends through the county in connection with the cable that lands there. The fishing towns along the coast of the county are connected with the line which is an immense advantage to them. There is one exception—White Point, a fishing village which has grown up about ten miles off the course of the line. It would be a great advantage to this village to share the privileges in this respect of other towns, as it would bring them in touch with the markets of the world. It is only a matter of extending the line nine or ten miles. White Point has about fifty or sixty fishermen, and growing all the time. The expense of construction would not be heavy considering the number of people who would be served. I have been bringing this to the notice of the department for some time and I had an understanding with them that the work should be done. But it has not been done yet. I hope the minister will direct inquiries to be made and that he will give to this village of White Point the same facilities that are given to other places.

Mr. MONK. I will call the attention of the superintendent of telegraphs to what my hon. friend has said.

Telegraph lines—Saskatchewan and Alberta—Athabaska Landing—Peace River—landing line—extension to Grand Prairie, $5,000.

Mr. OLIVER. Is this amount believed to be sufficient to complete the line to Grand Prairie, and will it be completed during the coming summer?

Mr. MONK. That is what we expect.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This amount is entirely a revote.

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Construction of line from Athabaska Landing to Fort McMurray, $21,000.

Mr. OLIVER. Has any work been done on this line? If so, what route is it intended to follow?

Mr. MONK. I do not think that is quite decided. But, if not, it will be decided before the supplementary estimates are put through and I can give the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER. With regard to the line from Edmonton to Fort McMurray, I wish to place before the minister the alternative routes. One plan is that the line shall follow the Athabaska river either actually or approximately, from Athabaska Landing to Fort McMurray.

The other proposition is that the line shall follow the trail to Lac La Biche. and from there directly to Fort McMurray, and through the interior without any regard to the river. There are advantages by either route. The advantage of having the line follow the river would be that if the line were made a telephone line with telephones at different points, it would be a vast convenience to the river navigation in the summer time. An immense amount of freight necessarily follows the river in summer. So if the line followed the river it would be of great advantage during the summer navigation. In the case of oil development for which prospecting is being carried on, the telephone line along the river would also be of great advantage. On the other hand, the winter trail is by way of Lac La Biche, and the line similarly would be of advantage during the winter. The Lac La Biche line would have the advantage during the winter that the river line would not have, because there is practically no travel by way of the river during winter. For my part, I have always held that the weight of material advantage in assisting the development of the country is in the river line, and that it should be a telephone line so that telephones could be put in at different places where there is permanent settlement on the river, and would be of advantage to the navigation of the river, and to the mineral development that is now going on.

Mr. MONK. I am not familiar with the locality, but I note what my hon. friend has said. There has been difficulty with these telegraph lines, as there has been with other branches of the service, in the preparation of the estimates. I will see that my hon. friend's observations are brought to the notice of the superintendent of construction.

For the construction of a loop extension of the telegraph line from a point near Moose to Durlingville, $3,570.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria). Has there been any work done on that loop line? I see the revote is $3,570, and in the 1912-13 estimates it was $6,650. I would like to know if any of the money has been spent?

Mr. MONK. I think it has all been expended, the work has been progressing.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria). Last year when the late government decided to extend that line to Durlingville, the people expected it would be extended on to Cold lake. There is a large settlement at Cold lake, but there is no railway, and no means of communication with the outside world. Coal lake would be about 100 miles from the Canadian Northern railway. It is quite a large settlement, and a telephone line would be of great advantage to the people in case of sickness, or other necessity. I understand that a telegraph line costs only about $150 a mile, and there is plenty of timber in that country for poles. I think the government might well expend that amount of money to afford telegraphic communication, until such time as a railway is built in order to bring these people into communication with the outside world. They are very anxious about it; sometimes they have to travel 100 miles on matters of business, so one can easily understand that in the winter time especially telegraphic communication would be of great advantage to them. I have received a petition from the people asking for an extension of the Athabaska line to Lac La Biche. They are in a similar position, they are 40 miles distant from railway communication, and it is a long distance to travel. I think it would cost between $150 and $200 a mile to build a telegraph line to meet the needs of these people. There is no immediate prospect of a railway, and it may be two or three years before they get a railway. I would like the minister to give consideration to this matter, and try to give the people the relief they need.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend's request seems to be very reasonable, and I will endeavour to meet it. Perhaps my hon. friend might confer with the superintendent on that particular point, as he is much more familiar with the locality and with what has been done.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria). I have conferred with the district superintendent with regard to Cold lake. He resides in Edmonton, and he thought that if application was made to the government, with proper representations, the government would possibly extend the line.

Mr. MONK. Who is the local officer?

Mr. WHITE (Victoria). Mr. Macdonald.

Mr. MONK. Has he made some report?

Mr. WHITE (Victoria). I do not know whether he has made a report. He is the man who made the estimate for the line from Moose Station to Durlingville. I took the matter up with him about the extension, and he thought it was really needed.

Moosejaw—Wood Mountain Telegraph Line—renewals and reconstruction, $11,900.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) is not here, and I would ask the minister what explanation there may be with regard to this work, what has been done, and what is it intended to do?

Mr. MONK. I could not give precise information this evening, but I can get a report of what is to be done and give it to the member for Moosejaw.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the government put in telephone lines as well as telegraph lines?

Mr. MONK. In some instances I think they do.

Mr. McKENZIE. In the part of the country I come from, the government telegraph lines are serving useful purposes. If they could be exchanged for telephone lines they would be of infinitely greater service.

Peace River—telegraph line—office building, $2,900.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps the minister would be good enough in this case, as in regard to the Moosejaw line, to furnish a memorandum at a later date, in regard to the office buildings on the Peace River line, that is in the constituency of Edmonton. If my hon. friend will give me a memorandum showing where the buildings are to be, those which have been completed, and what is to be done with regard to the others, I would be very glad.

Mr. MONK. I will do so.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). I would like to ask the minister if it is the intention of the government to grant the privilege of stringing telephone lines on telegraph poles ?

Mr. MONK. I believe that has been done.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). What are the conditions under which it is done?

Mr. MONK. I do not think there has been any rule laid down. Sometimes the privilege has been granted to telephone companies who wish to extend their line to some other point. The matter is discussed and then some agreement is arrived at.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). Will the department be in favour of granting the privilege, say, to a private company of placing their lines on the government telegraph poles. I have now in view a certain section of country supplied with telegraph lines and where I know the telephone company would be pleased if they should be permitted to put telephone lines on the telegraph poles. Of course, it is quite an expensive matter to erect telegraph poles, but if such companies could have the privilege of placing telephone lines on telegraph poles a large section of country that I have in view would be served with telephone communication.

Mr. MONK. I should think that would be reasonable. Of course, it would be a matter for discussion and arrangement, but I think that in most cases the thing might be done under conditions which would protect us against loss.

Telegraph line from North Battleford to Isle la Crosse—loop line to Nesta, $13,000.

Mr. OLIVER. This is in the constituency of the hon. member for Battleford (Mr. Champagne) who does not appear to be in the House, and I am sure that he would be very glad if the minister would give the information now, or, if he cannot do it now, at some future time, as to what has been spent on this project and how far it is intended to carry it. It would seem there has been some expenditure or that it is not intended to carry out the project much further.

Mr. MONK. I have not the information under my hand. I think some work has been done, but if the hon. member for Battleford requires the information I can give it to him.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would not my hon. friend have a note of it? There will have been an expenditure of $26,000 by the 31st March. There must have been a great deal of work done.

Mr. MONK. There has been a great deal of work done but I have no note of the information.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend would take a note of it and have a memorandum prepared by the officers of the department and let the hon. member for Battleford know, I am sure it would be satisfactory.

Mr. MONK. I will see that he gets it.

Monument to the memory of the late Hon. George Brown, $10,000.
Monument to the memory of the late Hon. Thomas D'Arcy McGee, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the hon. gentleman located the site upon which the statue to Thos. D'Arcy McGee is to be erected? I see that there is at Ottawa quite a quarrel about the statue to D'Arcy McGee. I read in the papers the other day a protest against the suggested intention of the government to place the statue on the Plaza in front of the post office. The correspondent stated that the Plaza was a site which should be kept for the statue of the late King Edward. Has my hon. friend made up his mind where that statue is going to be placed?

Mr. MONK. No, I have not, I confess, given the matter a thought since the last time it was mentioned en passant, in the House. I believe it was to have found its place on the Plaza, wherever that is, but nothing has been determined whatever. The statue is not finished. I have no doubt a suitable place will be found for all our great men without exception when we get their statues ready.

Monument to the memory of the late Sir L. H. Lafontaine, and the late Hon. Robert Baldwin, $17,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What about the site of the Lafontaine-Baldwin statue? Has that been decided?

Mr. MONK. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is a monumental statue.

Mr. MONK. I must confess that I have not given much attention to these statues. I have been so busy with wharfs and breakwaters. I thought that these were mostly under contract.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, I saw the other day the statues of McGee and George Brown in Montreal. But, I am speaking about the sites. This Lafontaine-Baldwin statue is a very considerable monument, and I thought that perhaps my hon. friend had made up his mind about the site.

Mr. MONK. No, that remains still undecided.

Monument to Madeleine de Verchères, to be erected at Verchères, $25,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This statue to Madeleine de Verchères is, I suppose, carrying out the idea suggested by the late Governor General, Lord Grey to the Laurier government. I am very glad that the present government has thought it proper to include an amount for the erection of this monument. It is a splendid idea.

Last summer an incident took place at Vercheres, which I might perhaps recall to the memory of the minister. The government of the day, and especially the Postmaster General were taken to task because, forsooth, the Postmaster General did not furnish to the postmasters of Quebec signs for their post offices in the French language. The Postmaster General is not obliged to furnish signs in paper or in enamel, or in wood to any of the postmasters, yet there was great excitement in the province of Quebec, the Postmaster General was a very bad man indeed, he was a traitor to his language because he did not furnish to the postmasters of Quebec signs in French to distribute all over the post offices. But a very ingenious priest from Verchères, who was more engaged in politics than in the duties of his office, began writing letters and making an agitation against the Postmaster General. He had a sign artistically painted and sent his bill to my department for payment of same. He was very patriotic, but at the expense of the country. He wanted the Postmaster General to pay $25 or $30 for that sign, and when I refused him very courteously, stating that the Post Office Department did not provide signs to the 15,000 post offices in the country, he immediately started an agitation, and one day he gathered the school boys and the young girls from the convent, he organized a procession, and there and then installed the sign 'Bureau de Poste' on the post office. It was a triumph for the French language in the village of Verchères, and of course the Postmaster General was roundly abused by that lover of the French language. I am glad to see, in view of the abuse that was heaped upon the late government by the Rev. Father Baillargé, that the reverend gentleman will have within his parish a splendid statue of Madeleine de Verchères, the great heroine of New France. This is the answer of the Laurier government to the Nationalist agitation of the Rev. Father Baillargé.

Mr. MONK. This is all very interesting, but it is perhaps not quite relevant to the vote under discussion. We are very greatly indebted to Lord Grey for the idea of having a statue erected to Madeleine de Vercheres, not perhaps known throughout the country, but a very heroic character indeed, in our early history of New France. The work has been entrusted to one of our artists. It has not yet been completed, but I have seen the model, and although I do not claim to be a very good judge in matters of art, it will be, I think, an admirable statue, and everybody will feel grateful to all those who had a part in securing this commemoration when it will be erected in the old historical place of Verchères which was the theatre of her indomitable courage and womanly perseverance.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I want to have a hand in this, I think I am entitled to a very considerable amount of credit in connection with this monument.

Mr. MONK. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was I who had the honour to submit to my colleagues the proposal that we should erect a monument on the Verchères bluff in memory of this young lady, whose name stands out in history as one of the most courageous of Canadian women. It gave me very great pleasure to ask my colleagues for the very handsome sum of $15,000 for the purpose of erecting this monument.

Mr. MONK. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It gave me great pleasure to direct the officials of my department to enter into a contract with Mr. Philippe Hebert for the doing of the work, and I desire to bear testimony to the good judgment which my hon. friend has shown in putting that amount in the estimates for the purpose of completing the good work which we began.

National Art Gallery, Ottawa, $35,000.

Mr. OLIVER. I was always curious about this item even when I was a member of the government. As a member of the government, I was forbidden to ask too many questions, but now I am relieved of the responsibility, I am going to ask what is done with this sum, and who does it.

Mr. MONK. I think it is a most praiseworthy effort whoever started it, of giving us some beginnings of an art gallery here at the National Capital. An advisory board was organized by the late government; composed at present of Sir Byron Edmund Walker, Dr. Shepherd, of Montreal, a man of a great deal of taste in artistic matters, and the Hon. Mr. Boyer. These gentlemen give their time and a great deal of care and attention to the expenditure of this small sum of $35,000 which we vote each year, for the purpose of purchasing paintings and objects of art, as much as possible, from our own Canadian artists. In the last volume of the department's report my hon. friend will find a list of the purchases, which have been made so far. These paintings and works of art, are installed in the Victoria Museum in this city. Some time before we came into office, Sir Byron Edmund Walker and his colleagues secured the services of a curator on trial. Mr. Eric Brown has been found by the advisory board to be a competent man, and I expect in the supplementary estimates to ask the House for an additional sum to provide for a larger expenditure next year on these works of art, and a more complete installation in the Royal Victoria Museum. It is a very modest beginning, but the men who are acting on our advisory board, give it a great deal of time and attention without any remuneration and we are doing our best in a very small way, as my hon. friend may see, to do something towards establishing art in this country, developing artistic tastes and encouraging our young artists. The amounts expended for the purchase of works of art are small, varying from $500 to $1,500. I have not had time since I have been in office, to visit the gallery, but I am told it is well worthy of inspection, and certainly I hope the House will encourage this movement in a very proper direction.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). When is the gallery to be opened?

Mr. MONK. It is expected that it will be inaugurated in March or April. A couple of days ago I saw Sir Edmund Walker, who is taking a great deal of pains to have a suitable catalogue prepared and in other ways. We expect to have a rather good opening in the early spring. We hope to have the presence of their Royal Highnesses and to draw the attention of the public to the efforts we are making to establish an art gallery.

Mr. STAPLES. Is it the intention to have all Canadian artists of note represented in that gallery?

Mr. MONK. It is, I understand from the Advisory Board, the intention to encourage as much as possible, our own artists. I only saw one painting in the list that was not the production of a Canadian artist, that was one by Sir Joshua Reynolds, for which $3,000 or $4,000 was paid —and it must have been a bargain at that price.

Mr. STAPLES. Then I desire to call the attention of the minister to a Canadian artist, of the name of Mrs. Hamilton, whose family happens to come from my constituency. She had an exhibit at Wilson's here a couple of weeks ago. Her paintings have been on exhibition in Paris, and she has been recognized there and all through Europe. She has also been recognized in Canada to the extent that the Duchess of Connaught has purchased several of her paintings. Therefore, I think that this government should see that her work is represented in the National Gallery, and also somewhere in these buildings. There is no doubt about her ability and the splendid work she has done. I ask the minister to investigate her work and give her the place to which she is entitled as a Canadian artist.

Mr. MONK. I certainly will do so. I am glad my hon. friend has called my attention to her work, and I will bring his observations to the attention of the Advisory Board.

Mr. CURRIE. Will the minister tell us who the Advisory Board are?

Mr. MONK. Sir Edmund Walker, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce; Dr. Shepherd of Montreal, who is quite an authority on matters of art, and the Hon. Senator Boyer.

Construction of water storage dams and regulation works on the upper Ottawa river and tributaries, $200,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend inform the committee how this will be expended?

Mr. MONK. For the continuation of the works already undertaken—the Timiskaming dam, the Quinze dam and the Kipawa dam.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is the condition of the work on the Timiskaming dam?

Mr. MONK. The department is continuing the work by day labour under careful supervision.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The reason I ask the question is this. I have noticed in some of the Conservative newspapers reports of information supposed to have been given to them by the commission which this government has appointed—I refer to the commission of which Mr. Morine is the chairman, and the other members of which are Mr. Lake and Mr. Ducharme; a commission which is sometimes spoken of as an impartial commission, consisting of two defeated Conservative candidates, and the president of 'Le Devoir,' a strong partisan newspaper. Now, I object very strongly to this commission giving out partial information with regard to any matter they are investigating, until all the evidence has been heard, and all the facts can be submitted to the public. I have read what purports to be a statement which they must have given out to the Conservative press in which these allegations are made: That, in the first place, the work was let without tender; that it was changed to a concrete dam; that no tenders were called for the concrete work; that afterwards the contract was again changed and the contractors received great favours. One might infer from these statements that the contractors were still going on with the work and were to receive the sum of $350,000. Now, I can imagine nothing more unfair than for these one-sided statements to go to the public. I have no objection whatever to all the facts connected with any public work with which I as minister had anything to do, being made public; but what I do object to is that a commission shall give to a section of the press, to the newspapers supporting the government, a one-sided story, and not all the facts of the case. With regard to the Timiskaming dam, the facts are simply these. Tenders were called some years ago for a dam to be built partly of timber and partly of concrete. After the tenders were received it was decided to make a change in the plans and construct the dam entirely of concrete. Members of the committee know that during the last few years there has been a great change in the views of engineers as to the desirability of constructing works of this character as far as possible wholly of concrete. Concrete is rapidly taking the place of timber in the construction of dams as well as many other works. So far from the contractors not being the lowest tender on concrete, they were the lowest. The tenders were called on the unit plan, so much per cubic foot for timber work, and so much per cubic foot for concrete work. They happened to be the lowest tenderers as the matter was figured out by the engineers of the department. When it was decided to change the work and make it wholly of concrete, the work was given to the contractors, who were the lowest on concrete work as well as on the dam as originally planned.

It is not from newspaper reports supposed to be given out by the commissioners that I am speaking. Not one step was taken except upon the report of the responsible engineers of the department. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has very properly born testimony himself to the very great experience, good judgment and the devotion to the public interest of these gentlemen. Not a step was taken by me in connection with the Timiskaming dam except upon the report of the responsible engineers of the department. When it was suggested to make the work entirely of concrete, the contract was given to the lowest tenderers and they proceeded with the work. I believe a change was made in the site of the dam. Hon. gentlemen know that there is no more difficult work coming within the purview of engineers than subaqueous work, as it is difficult to ascertain with accuracy the nature of the soil under water. A slight change was made in the location, with the result that there was a vast deal more unwatering to be done than had been figured up by the engineers. After that was brought to the attention of the engineers and myself as minister it was decided that, under all the circumstances, it would be reasonable to allow the contractors the actual cost of unwatering, doing it on the force system—that is adding 15 per cent to the actual cost and paying that to the contractors. Subsequently there was an unprecedented pressure owing to the spring freshets and the coffer dam, which the contractors had built, at great expense, was carried away. That gave rise to a dispute between the contractors and the department. The contractors contended that by reason of the change of site, they had encountered quicksand and there were enormous difficulties which they had not anticipated. The matter was gone into fully by the engineers. On more than one occasion Mr. Coutlee, who has charge of the work, was sent to make a careful examination, and the result of his inquiry was that the engineers recommended it would be better for the department to release the contractors, to take the work out of their hands, and proceed to complete it by day labour; and it was agreed that the contractors should be paid exactly what they had expended on the work—not one dollar more. They were not to be allowed any profits but simply their actual outlay, the amount to be determined by the experts of the department. That was done, the department proceeded by daywork, and the government of the day has carried out that plan. That is the whole story with respect to the Timiskaming dam. Yet these commissioners have allowed to go out to the public the impression that some great fraud has been committed on the public by the contractors with the connivance of the department. I thought it my duty to state the facts, and I took occasion some time ago to move for the papers, and I shall be glad if any hon. member will take the trouble to go through the papers, which will verify every word I have said. This matter gave me great anxiety. I was careful to take no step except after the most careful examination by the engineers of the department, in whose judgment, integrity and regard for the public interest I had the greatest confidence after four years experience; and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, after his experience of four months in the work they are carrying on, has the same confidence in these gentlemen which my four years experience taught me to place in them. I wish to repeat that I took no step of any kind or description in the matter, and gave no order except upon their recommendation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) expects any justice from these hon. gentlemen he will be sadly disappointed. As regards the personnel of the commission, I know very well our late colleague Mr. Lake. I know that he was a very bitter partisan when he sat in this House, but he is certainly a gentleman. As regards Mr. Morine, I know nothing about him except that he was a defeated Conservative candidate twice, I think, in the maritime provinces. But I happen to know Mr. Ducharme by reputation. He is a citizen of Montreal, and one of the bitterest opponents of the late government that one could find in that city and district. He is president of the company, which publishes 'Le Devoir,' the organ of the Minister of Public Works. He is also president of the company which publishes 'Le Nationaliste,' a Sunday paper, which has been condemned, I do not know how many times, by our courts for libel, not only against private citizens but against the judiciary. Two of the editors of that paper were sent to jail for their gross libels against the judiciary of the province of Quebec. While Mr. Ducharme of course found at all times the means of avoiding costs and responsibility, we know that he is the financial backer of those who are publishing that sheet. If I were to be investigated officially as head of a department by Mr. Ducharme, I would strongly object for many reasons which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works knows very well. Mr. Ducharme, besides being strongly biased politically, has had a very notorious career in Montreal. My hon. friend knows that for a few weeks he was president of La Banque Provinciale and was forced to resign because the shareholders would not have him any longer as president, and he has ceased to be a member of the board of directors.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Was he a defaulter, and what reasons does the hon. gentleman assign for making these very serious charges that will go out to the public against this gentleman who is not here to defend himself?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I shall bring shortly before the House the facts in connection with that case. Mr. Ducharme was obliged to resign as president of La Banque Provinciale, a position he occupied for a few weeks only.

He was also secretary of the municipality of Ste. Cunegonde, a suburb of Montreal, for some years. People know what has been his success in that capacity. I say he has a very notorious reputation in Montreal, and the country surrounding Montreal; and I would certainly refuse to be investigated by Mr. Ducharme. I think he rather needs investigating himself than to be engaged in investigating others. I repeat to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that he cannot expect justice from Mr. Ducharme. He is there as a party man to render services to his party. to do the muckraking work and nothing else.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). He is likely to find plenty of muck to go into.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Perhaps, if he could go into my hon. friend's (Mr. Bennett) constituency, he might find lots of muck.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). He will find lots of it in that riding in the acts of friends of the late government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman has only to denounce them and bring them to the bar of the House, or if they are in this House to name them. I am not afraid to tell Mr. Ducharme that I would refuse to be judged by him, for he has been judged by the citizens of Montreal, by the shareholders of La Banque Provinciale and by the people of Ste. Cunegonde, who know what he is.

Mr. MONK. Nobody will find fault with the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) for claiming that his own administration of the department was a proper one. But I am surprised to hear a man of his experience attribute to members of the commission reports published in the papers, which I am perfectly sure could not have emanated from any of these commissioners. How these things get into the papers we do not know.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That report which I saw, stated that this was information which the commissioners had discovered.

Mr. MONK. It cannot be. Nor is there ground, very often, unfortunately, for the statements made by newspapers. It is quite conceivable that newspapermen may have had access to the report of the Auditor General, which report if I am not mistaken, went at length into this Timiskaming dam matter. I remember, long before this government came into power, correspondence given at some length, with comments of the Auditor General, in the report of the officer in regard to these contracts and the way the works were carried on. There alone, so far as I know, the newspapermen could have found information. I do not think my hon. friend has any justification for the aspersions he has cast upon this commission. The commission is composed of honourable men of high position, chosen amongst many by the government, not for the purpose of discovering anything against ex-ministers, but to endeavour to place all our departments upon a proper footing and to make suggestions which would enable the government to improve many branches of the public service that are now defective. I take the responsibility as a member of the government, of having insisted that the appointment of this commission was necessary for that purpose, and I asked particularly that it should enlighten me with suggestions for the best administration of my own department, a most important one. Was there no room for improvement? Will my hon. friend, or will any man who has looked into the system, say that our dredging as it has been carried on, is not susceptible of improvement? — without thereby reflecting on any officer of the department or anybody else. Short though the time is during which I have had charge of the department, it has been long enough for me to learn that not only in the branch of dredging, but in other branches as well, improvements are possible and desirable. I have great hopes that when these men, who have leisure, who have business ability, have looked through my own department, they will be able to make most useful suggestions.

My hon friend (Mr. Lemieux) finds fault with the nomination of Mr. Ducharme. I very much regret this. Not that I feel it necessary to defend Mr. Ducharme in any way, I can assure the committee of that, his name not being as well known outside of my native province as it is there. I took the responsibility of suggesting his name as a man who has worked his way up in life and bears an honourable name where he is known. A man of wide means, a capitalist and a man of great business ability, I felt that if our province was represented on that commission—which I thought advisable—it should be properly represented by a not only able, but honest man, one holding a high financial position as a man of business. I am confident that, if his health—he is a man of weak health—enables him to remain there, he will amply fulfil the expectations I have formed. The hon. member for Rouville says that he is a director of a newspaper, 'Le Devoir.' Why, I am interested myself in that newspaper. A number of us in Montreal have contributed, as far as we could, each according to his own limited means—Mr. Ducharme more than myself, because he has more means—towards the foundation of a newspaper, utterly, absolutely independent, not under the control of anybody but its editor. That newspaper has rendered service in our municipal elections. It is not, so far as I know, affiliated with any party.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Except the Tory party.

Mr. MONK. The hon. gentleman is very much mistaken. He must see evidence of absence of such affiliation in the paper every day I think the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) is mistaken in the view he has taken of the commission. It is not a muck-raking commission, though it may, in its investigations, find out things that are not commendable. The prime object of its creation was to look through the departments and find out what improvements could be brought about. We have had several commissions which have produced good results. There was one of which Mr. Fyshe was president. Another was that of Judge Cassells. And I am convinced that the present commission also will produce good results. I think it would be better for the ex-Minister of Public Works not to anticipate what the conclusion will be. These commissioners are not charged with a partisan investigation. They are going to look into the administrative departments, and I do not see what reason there is to find fault with them beforehand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I saw in the papers did not profess to be what was contained in the Auditor General's Report. I have no objection to every word stated in that report being published.

What this professed to state was certain discoveries which this commission had made; it professed to be information coming directly from the commission.

What I object to is that partial information, one-sided information, half the truth mixed with considerable falsehood, should go to the public as being the true facts of the case. The public naturally look to a commission, particularly that portion of the public which does not know the partisan character of this commission, for the true facts in the case.

Mr. MONK. Has my hon. friend any evidence that these statements were made by the commissioners to newspaper men, because I am sure they were not.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I simply judge from what I saw in reputable Conservative newspapers, which gave the impression that these were discoveries which the commissioners had made. Now I do not complain, notwithstanding the character of these commissioners, of a full and complete investigation of the department while I had the honour to preside over it, and I suppose my hon. friend would not complain of a full investigation of the department while he presides over it. But would not my hon. friend expect to be treated fairly in such an investigation; would he not expect a full and complete investigation, before any facts should be given to the public with respect to any particular case? No one reading what I saw in the newspapers purporting to come from these commissioners, would imagine for a moment that this work, under the circumstances I have indicated, was taken off the hands of the contractors on the recommendation of the engineers of the department. Their reports are all on file, but you would not imagine from reading this newspaper report that these commissioners had been able to find a single report of the engineers.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would it not be better to let that item stand until there is a larger attendance of members of the committee?

Mr. MONK. I have waited patiently to get the remaining estimates for my department through, and I expect to be extremely busy next week with preparing the supplementaries.

Mr. McKENZIE. The hon. Minister of Public Works must not expect to escape criticism as to the character of the commission he has appointed. He says he expects to put his department on a better working foundation, and to establish a better system of bookkeeping in the department, inside and outside. If that is to be brought about, it cannot be brought about by novices who know nothing about that business. If there is to be an improvement in dredging, for instance, we want a man who has some knowledge of mechanics, who has some knowledge of building and operating dredges, engines and machinery generally. I submit that there is no qualification along any of those lines in the gentlemen of this commission. Mr. Morine and another gentleman who was at one time a member of this House, have no qualifications along those lines. Mr. Morine is a very estimable lawyer, a very clever lawyer, and if the Minister of Public Works wanted anything along the line of the profession of that gentleman, it would be well done. But when he asks him, who is only a lawyer, to take in hand the establishment of a new system of bookkeeping for instance, he is taking a man who does not know the first thing about double entry bookkeeping, a man who could not close a system of books to save his life.

Mr. MONK. I would suggest to my hon. friend that there will be an item in the supplementary estimates for the expenses of this commission, and perhaps it would be better to defer criticism until then.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have nothing to say against these gentlemen along their own lines. But when he asks us to provide money to pay this commission, we would expect them to be men with a reputation in the direction of the purpose for which he has appointed them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Minister of Public Works has mentioned to-night what he has said before during the session, that he expects these men to give him some idea how to improve the dredging system now in vogue. Is my hon. friend serious in that? Are there more than two ways in in which you can do dredging, one by contract by the cubic yard by scow measurement, the other by cubic yard in situ? Will the hon. gentleman suggest any other way except those two ways in which to make improvement?

Mr. MONK. I would ask my hon. friend not to insist upon such an explanation at this moment. He has mentioned a measurement in place and a scow measurement. Without going further than that, does he think that the scow measurement that has prevailed in the past on our dredging contracts, instead of the place measurement, has been productive of good results? Does he advocate a continuance of the system of scow measurement as it exists to-day? I would ask the hon. gentleman not to enter upon that chapter this evening, because the hour is late. When the expenses of this commission come up at a later day, we will have an estimate for dredging in the supplementaries, and I will be prepared to go fully into that question, and to prove to the hon. gentleman that there are advantageous changes to be made in our dredging system.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Where are the commissioners sitting at present?

Mr MONK. I believe they are sitting in the Canada Life Building at the present moment. They have merely begun their labours, I do not think they have investigated any branch fully.

Mr. LEMIEUX Will their central office be in Montreal or Ottawa?

Mr. MONK. In Ottawa.

Mr. LEMIEUX I ask, because I have seen Mr. Ducharme lobbying in the House, and I thought he had an office in this building.

Mr. MONK. I suppose a man may come up to the parliament building for other purposes than lobbying.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why does my hon. friend think that Mr. Morine, a lawyer formerly of Newfoundland, and latterly of Toronto, could give him any assistance in dredging? Does he think that Mr. Lake, a gentleman who came out from England, and engaged in farming at Qu'Appelle, in Saskatchewan, could give him any assistance in dredging? Does he think Mr. Ducharme——

Mr. MONK. Surely my hon. friend is joking.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Surely it is the engineers of the department who can tell my hon. friend best how to let these contracts for dredging. Of course, when contractors are guilty of fraud and inspectors lie in with them and try to defraud the government that is something that has to be carefully watched. But, my hon. friend does not require Mr. Morine, or Mr. Lake, or Mr. Ducharme to tell him that. My hon. friend knows that he has to employ honest officials and honest engineers. There are only two ways in which you can give out dredging work, one being to measure in the scow, and the other to measure in situ. It depends upon circumstances as to which is the better way to let the work. In some places, like canals, you can better let it by the contents in situ. In harbours, where you cannot get at the quantity very well in situ, you must let it by the quantity as per scow measurement. If my hon. friend will be good enough to bring down the papers relating to the Timiskaming dam before the supplementary estimates are brought down it will answer all my purposes.

Mr. MONK. Yes, they will be brought down at once. I cannot allow to go unchallenged what my hon. friend has said as to whether a lawyer is a proper judge of dredging. Of course a commission of that kind has the power of hearing not only engineers of experience but men who are absolutely conversant with the dredging business. Had this commission not been constituted I intended inviting to an examination of this branch of my department the well known firm of Price, Waterhouse & Co. who have looked into these transactions, and have an immense experience of them. It is not the fact that Mr. Morine is a lawyer, or Mr. Lake, a former English civil engineer, and now a farmer, or Mr. Ducharme, a financial agent, that impairs in any way their judgment when they have conducted their investigation in a proper way and looked into these transactions. But, we will have this matter up for discussion again.

Quebec harbour—improvements at mouth of River St. Charles estuary—to complete contract, $66,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would my hon. friend explain that item?

Mr. MONK. These are the large wharfs that are being built at present. Mr. Dussault has the contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is it not for damming the St. Lawrence?

Mr. MONK. No, it is for building the large piers in the estuary of the river.

Quebec harbour—River St. Charles—improvements to navigation, $500,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is that for?

Mr. MONK. This is a revote. We have not decided exactly the character of these improvements. The matter will be taken up as soon as parliament has adopted the estimates. I think the plan which consists in providing a dam and lock at that point is the one which seems to commend itself most to the people of Quebec. It is at present under the consideration of the engineer. Nothing has been determined.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is it the intention of the government to have some of the large ports declared to be national ports? I know it was a very eloquent theme of my hon. friend when he was on this side of the House. I thought that as his estimates were coming up he would refresh his memory by the report of the commission which was appointed and which was presided over by Mr. Reford. The conclusions of that report were that a bold and aggressive policy should be adopted by the government, that national ports should be declared and associated with that recommendation was the suggestion that such ports as St. John, Halifax, Montreal and Quebec should be declared to be free ports. I think I went so far as to suggest that Gaspé be a national port, but at all events my hon. friend was very sanguine about it, and on several occasions in the House he advocated that as being a sound policy. Would my hon. friend say now, or later on, whether he is going to take a decision this year or wait until another year about declaring national ports?

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend recalls a position which I took and which I maintain to the present day. I think that the report to which my hon. friend has alluded is the ablest report we have had on the transportation question since the matter has been under study in this country. The conclusions were admirable. National ports were recommended on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Great Lakes and these ports really exist at the present time. They do not require my weak voice to proclaim them national ports. They are national ports. They require our attention and I think my hon. friend sees in these estimates some evidence that they are receiving recognition. We are approaching a realization of the dreams that I dreamed when in opposition.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But my hon. friend does not say which are free national ports.

Mr. MONK. Paris was not built in a day.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I know that; nor Rome.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does calling a port a national port mean that it shall be a free port?

Mr. MONK. I think it ought to mean that, but it is not yet accomplished.

Mr. McKENZIE. A national port is a good sounding name and we have lots of excellent ports on the Atlantic. I would like to know the rule by which the government decides that a certain port is a national port.

Mr. MONK. There is no strict meaning, we have used that expression since the report of Mr. Reford and his colleagues, because in that report they recommend that certain of our ports be declared national and free ports and treated as such, national in this sense that the country shall undertake all the necessary expenditure to equip them. There were I think 11, Vancouver, Victoria, Prince Rupert, the Great Lake ports, Depot Harbour, Midland, Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax. They were to be not only national ports but free ports as much as possible. My hon. friend knows that Antwerp and Liverpool and Bristol are national in that sense but they are not absolutely free ports. The commission was of the opinion that they should be made absolutely free. Whether we will be able to realize that or not I cannot say.

Mr. LEMIEUX. For the present the hon. gentleman is simply following the footsteps of his predecessor. He has not initiated any new policy.

Mr. MONK. Oh yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In what respect?

Mr. MONK. We are making a start at giving greater development as far as our present resources will allow to these free ports mentioned in the report of the commission. I believe myself that we are 25 years behind the time in the equipment of our ports. If we made a loan of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 and got our ports on a proper footing we would be in a better position to compete with the American and other great ports of the world. To-day on the Pacific, we are asking for a paltry half-million in Vancouver and Victoria, while in Seattle they are spending $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 and in Buenos Ayres they are spending £10,000,000 sterling for the equipment of that port. My hon. friend knows the immense sums spent in great European ports, never less than $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. We are behind the times and ought to carry out improvements with rather a more generous hand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend was rather taking credit for doing something that we had not done, claiming that the government were making a new departure. Let us see how. He speaks of national ports at Port Arthur and Fort William. We appropriated for these ports last year $1,050,000 while my hon. friend is this year asking only $1,000,000.

Mr. MONK. Wait till you see our supplementaries.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then take Quebec harbour, we asked $625,000 and there is only $500,000 this year, and all of that is a revote.

Mr. MONK. You did nothing.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes we spent $625,000 last year.

Mr. MONK. Does he say that some real improvements were carried out in Quebec on any fixed plan?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, we built a pier, 1,450 feet long, right along the shore of the St. Lawrence, where we have 40 feet of water, large enough to accommodate steamers bigger than any now on the Atlantic. We built a 'T' for that wharf, and we were making improvements inside on the St Charles' river, doing a lot of dredging and giving very great additional accommodation. My hon. friend is simply carrying out improvements started by the late government. The only increase of any consequence, is in the cases of Victoria and Vancouver, where he is putting in $500,000. We were doing this out of the dredging vote, but he is treating them as national harbours, and changing the amounts to capital account instead of paying them out of consolidated revenue.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend forgets that in the race for business, the harbour of Montreal defeated her great rival New York during several seasons.

Mr. MONK. In what business?

Mr. LEMIEUX. In the grain trade and butter and cheese.

Mr. MONK. The figures would be edifying.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is due to the excellent adminstration of the harbour of Montreal by the three commissioners, who, fortunately, were not under the thumb of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MONK. I must take exception to that statement. These men are friends of mine, and I would not like that statement to go abroad.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He said they were not under your thumb.

Mr. MONK. And I never pretended they were.

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are under the direction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and it is due to their ability and efforts that the harbour of Montreal has been made such a great success. When my hon. friend said that our harbours are not equipped, surely he does not speak for Montreal.

Mr. MONK. Does the hon. gentleman say Montreal is properly equipped now?

Mr. LEMIEUX. As far as circumstances allow it is as well equipped as any other port in the world. Of course we are proceeding now to spend a large amount. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is introducing legislation to lend more money to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, I expect that within a short time the harbour of Montreal will be unexcelled on the continent of America. So far it has been so well administered and equipped, that we have been able in two or three years, in succession, to beat the record of New York.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. MONK moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. MONK. The Grain Bill and the other government Bills, and then Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.43 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 12, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster) moved the adoption of the first report of the Select Standing Committee to supervise the debates of the House, which reads as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration the subject of the organization of the office of the official reporters, and, with a view to promoting efficiency and economy, would recommend:—

(1) That the official heretofore styled the chief reporter be henceforth designated editor of debates, and be given the direction and supervision of the reporting and of all other matters connected with the preparation and publication of the official report other than the translating; and that he be exempted from the work of reporting except in cases of emergency.

(2) That one of the reporters be designated associate editor of debates, and, in the absence of the editor, discharge his duties and have his authority, but when not so acting continue as at present to take his turn at reporting.

(3) That the official, at present styled assistant to the chief reporter, be designated assistant editor.

(4) That, to enable this arrangement to be carried out, it is advisable that an additional English reporter be appointed.

(5) That, with a view of attaining greater efficiency in connection with the reporting, the proper authorities be requested to give effect to the application of two members of the reporting staff who are applying for superannuation.

(6) That the analytical index to the English and French editions of the official report of the debates of this House be discontinued forthwith.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like to have a word of explanation on this report.

Mr. TAYLOR. There are three recommendations in this report. The first deals with the organization of the 'Hansard' staff and it is precisely the same as contained in a report presented to this House last year by the Debates Committee and which stood over because exception was taken to it in that the committee thought fit to recommend certain of the reporters by name, it being considered that in that respect the committee was exceeding its authority. The report is presented again this year and there is omitted from it anything that seemed to be in excess of the authority of the committee. The first recommendation is that the chief reporter, as he has been called, shall be relieved from duty on the floor of the House and assigned to duty in the 'Hansard' office as editor and controller of 'Hansard.'

The next recommendation is that another member of the staff shall be known as associate editor, who will take the place of the editor in case the latter is absent; the associate editor to do duty as usual on the floor of the House. In place of the editor an additional member is to be added to the reporting staff. The next division of the report deals with the application for superannuation made by two very old members of the 'Hansard' staff who have rendered faithful service in their time. They were the very best men in the country, but they are no longer equal to the arduous duties imposed on them, and after long years of service they ask to be retired. The committee recommends that the proper authority should give effect to these two applications for superannuation. The last section of the report deals with what is known as the analytical index. This index was discussed in the House not long ago by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), who stated he had examined it and found it was of no use. He appealed to the Minister of Finance for an opinion and Mr. Fielding replied as reported in 'Hansard': 'If it is not held against me, I must say that I have never seen it.' Upon inquiry we have found that this analytical index is some years behind and that the last copy for the session before last was only delivered in the office of the King's Printer in January of this year. The fact that no person has noticed that the index is two years behind seems to show that no interest whatever is taken in it. Upon finding that this index cost $4,600 last year to prepare and print, the committee thought they were performing their duty in recommending that the index be discontinued. Summarized, the report recommends: the superannuation of two reporters well entitled to superannuation, the addition of one member to the staff and the abolishing of the index which cost $4,600 a year and which is of no use.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER. May I ask the hon. gentleman who are the reporters who are recommended for superannuation?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Duggan and Mr. Abbott.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think nobody will object to the superannuation of Mr. Abbott and Mr. Duggan. They were very good reporters, as everybody knows, and the House will regret that they have been obliged to ask for superannuation, but of course, as with everybody else, the years of service have told upon them, and they feel they are no longer equal to the arduous task of reporting on the floor of this House. May I ask, if the analytical index is discontinued, whose services will be dispensed with?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am sorry to say that I cannot tell upon whom this will fall, because, as nearly as I understand it, the persons who have done the work are not the persons to whom the cheques issue. I think I can tell the persons who have done the work, but I do not know in whose name the cheques issue.

Mr. G. W. FOWLER (Kings and Albert). May I ask a question with regard to the appointment of officials upon the 'Hansard' staff. As I understand it there are now some vacancies, and I noticed in the last issue of the 'Gazette' an advertisement to which I would call the attention of the House. It is headed 'Civil Service Commission' and it gives notice to the public that there are vacancies on the 'Hansard' staff, and it states the requirements for the position of a 'Hansard' reporter. Some of it is rather amusing. In the first place I had always supposed that vacancies on the 'Hansard' staff were to be filled from class 'B' of the second division, which includes the gentlemen who are now acting as reporters for the various committees of the House. There are three gentlemen acting in that capacity, and they are very competent. I think any person who has had experience in the committees of this House for a number of years will bear me out in saying that these gentlemen are most competent. I always supposed that the reporting of the committees was a sort of training school for reporting on the floor of the House, but I find that the Civil Service Commission has advertised far and wide throughout the country for persons to come forward and pass the examination. There is no doubt but that some of the questions specified by the Civil Service Commission are necessary, and perhaps the one to which I am going to call attention is necessary too, but it does seem to me that the Civil Service Commission might have been more sparing of the feelings of the members of the House and left this requirement out:

4. Sufficient literary skill to reconstruct in correct and concise form, with proper paragraphing and punctuation, passages containing awkward or ungrammatical expressions, or words inaccurately used.

The Civil Service Commission possibly from practical experience in listening to the debates in this House, seem to think it necessary that a high degree of skill along the lines of reconstruction of sentences should be possessed by any person appointed a 'Hansard' reporter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOWLER. However much the Civil Service Commission may be impressed by that idea, it would perhaps have been just as well to have said nothing about it in the advertisement, but to have examined the candidates upon it when they presented themselves for examination.

There are many other things in connection with these examinations which seem peculiar. It is all very well to pass these examinations, and you may ask what objection would the gentlemen who are now in Subdivision 'B' have to presenting themselves for examination for promotion to Subdivision 'A' as 'Hansard' reporters, but when one comes to look over the list of subjects of which a knowledge must be possessed by candidates, one is not surprised that these gentlemen would rather not present themselves for examination, however well equipped for the general duties of 'Hansard' reporters they might be. For instance here are some of the subjects: They are to write an essay on: 'The Follies of Fashion.' Now what in the world that has to do with any qualification for a 'Hansard' reporter I do not know. Some of the members of the 'Hansard' staff we know are of the 'glass of fashion, and the mould of form.' I have one in my mind's eye at the present time, but I think we can leave that to the individual preference of the gentleman himself rather than ask him to be proficient and efficient along those lines. Then also they are to write an essay on the 'Boy Scouts' or 'My Favourite Recreation', whether that be at the Golf Club or at the bar, or where. Bicycling is another subject. The great snow storm is another. I suppose, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries suggests, that was on the 21st of September. The 'First Money I Ever Earned' is another that the examiners may see whether or not the candidate is economical in his business affairs.

It does seem to me that this promotion should be by merit and should be made from the service. I am sure I will be supported by every member of this House who has knowledge of the subject in the statement that the gentlemen who now occupy the positions in Subdivision 'B' are thoroughly competent and efficient in every way and they have had experience as 'Hansard' reporters. I think it might very well be left to the chief of the 'Hansard' staff to say whether or not these gentlemen are competent. He would be a better judge of the subject than would be the Civil Service Commission, because he has had a far greater practical experience along these lines than has any gentleman who is an examiner for the Civil Service Commission. The gentlemen now in Class 'B' have had the very best possible experience to qualify them as 'Hansard' reporters. They have sat for years in the press gallery of this House. They have gone around the country reporting the speeches of members and the long experience they have had has given them an insight into the political history of this country which it is most essential to any 'Hansard' reporter to have in order that he may do his work correctly, intelligently and well. It is important, I suppose, that the 'Hansard' reporters should have the ability to reconstruct sentences because many of us are apt to make errors in hasty extempore speech, but the great essential, it seems to me, is to have a close and intimate knowledge of the political history of the country. I hope that the government who have charge of this matter will allow these examinations to go on as the Civil Service Commission have advertised them, but that they will be for men to take the place of the gentlemen now in Subdivision 'B', who will be promoted to Subdivision 'A'.

Mr. LENNOX. I noticed this advertisement in the 'Gazette,' and my attention was brought to this matter in another way. Without wishing to at all interfere with the functions of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners, I must say that, to my mind, an examination such as appears to be aimed at there, is not the best means of getting the proper men to discharge the important duties of 'Hansard' reporters for this House. I realize, as probably most of the older members realize, that our sentences at times require to be reconstructed, and that a mere slavish report of the proceedings of the House would be very unsatisfactory, particularly to the members who have been guilty of the utterances, and for that reason, I think that a mere competitive examination is not the best means of securing just the men we require as 'Hansard' reporters. I have a good deal of experience with the three gentlemen who have already been alluded to, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Matthews and Mr. Blue. I know that one or two of these gentlemen received a very bad early education upon 'The Globe' reporting staff, but I had experience of them since, and I have great pleasure in certifying to the splendid character of the work they do in the committees where they report. With the experience they have had, I would be very sorry indeed, to see them passed over at this time, when we have an opportunity of placing them upon our regular 'Hansard' staff. I believe that the training in the press gallery here, a practical experience of these inaccuracies committed by some of the other members, I am not speaking of myself, and their experience of public life, fit them in the highest degree for 'Hansard' work, and I believe that we will be wise in getting from the ranks of those who report our speeches in the gallery, the men to report them on the floor of the House. We have had a happy experience of the appointment of men from the press gallery to the 'Hansard' staff, the men thus recruited to that staff have been most efficient reporters, and the three gentlemen to whom I have alluded, are men of that class. I think I am expressing the feeling of a good many members, when I say that I hope no system will be pursued which will compel men who have had that amount of experience and have given such proof of efficiency as they have given, to enter the lists upon a competitive examination, which may be a fairly good test of rapidity and slavish exactitude, but which is not a test of the editorial skill and judgment which is required in a 'Hansard' reporter.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I am sorry to hear that the committee have decided to discontinue the analytical index. I have found the index very useful myself. It gives a short synopsis of the speeches.

And it is much easier to refer to it than wade through so many volumes of 'Hansard'. I was surprised to find, on looking through the index, that there were only three or four years in which the English edition was printed at all. I thought at first that it was continued right from the time the analytical index started, but I find that the English edition was printed one or two years, then discontinued, then started again and kept up a couple of years and then again discontinued. I do not know what other hon. gentlemen may think, but I have found the analytical index very useful, and I trust that it will be continued. I would suggest therefore that the committee should reconsider their report. I think it would be well worth their while to devote some further consideration to this matter, look over it again before coming to the conclusion that this index should be abolished.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). I have before me a copy of the analytical index, and I must say it is a most useful compendium of the proceedings of the House. For my part I shall certainly be at a loss in hunting up statements made by ministers and others should this recommendation to abolish the index be adopted. Take, for instance, the second session in 1906 when the policy of constructing the National Transcontinental was being discussed and when the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) had, as was naturally to be expected to answer a great many questions, how could one turn up any of these without this index? Do away with it and if you want to refer to any statement made on any subject, you will have to look through three or four volumes of 'Hansard'. Why should any hon. gentleman be obliged to attempt this if he wanted to find out what was said on any particular occasion or subject? With the aid of an analytical index however he can find without any trouble the particular page where the statement is printed to which he wishes to refer. Take again the naval policy of the late government. The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) answered a great many queries on that subject, which are to be found scattered through hundreds of pages of 'Hansard'. Without the aid of this index, it would be impossible to discover any particular one of these without going to the almost impossible labour of wading through every page of the reports. This index costs about $4,000, and possibly that cost might be cut down by judicious condensation and some of the time be saved that is now taken in making it, but I think the expenditure serves a most useful purpose. If any hon. gentleman wishes to refresh his memory at any time in regard to any debate, he has in the analytical index the most ready adjunct for that purpose. As regards the filling of vacancies on the reporting staff, I think it would be grossly unfair to the gentlemen who are now on the reporting staff of the House of Commons that they should not be given the preference and the promotion to which they are entitled. Messrs. Dickson, Matthews and Blue have had long experience in this House, they are well known to the members of this House, and have proved themselves most competent at their work. Every hon. gentlemen, particularly from the province of Ontario, who has had anything to do with politics in the past 20 years will know that these gentlemen have attended all the large political meetings in that province and consequently should be more at home in reporting the debates than any new man could possibly be.

I hope the committee will be pleased to withdraw their report, consider the matter and bring down another report, leaving the matter as it was, namely, that the Debates Committee shall consider any applications submitted to them, and then let the House adopt that report as they see fit, and leave out the recommendation to do away with the analytical index.

Mr. SPEAKER. That portion of the notice in the official 'Gazette,' which deals with the examination of candidates for the position vacant on the 'Hansard' staff, has nothing to do with the report of the Debates Committee at all. The Civil Service law provides that these vacancies have to be filled in a certain way. In pursuance of that law, I asked the commission to find three men competent to do the work, leaving the competition open to all. Names have been mentioned, no doubt, from their experience as newspaper men and as reporting the proceedings of this House and its committees, they will be more likely to distance their competitors. I have simply taken that which the Act provides should be taken. As regards the other portion of the report, that is altogether another matter with which the Civil Service Commission have nothing to do, but which is entirely in the hands of this House.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would like to give the opinion to the House of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), and the late Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), with reference to the utility of this analytical index. Discussing that subject in the session of 1907-8, the Minister of Trade and Commerce used these words:

> If there is one useless thing that comes to a member after it is two years old, it is that analytical index to 'Hansard,' which is almost as large as 'Hansard' itself. I do not know whether anybody ever looks at it. I have looked at it only to wonder how the ingenuity of man could devise anything that could possibly be so useless. You open it and think you are going to get something, but you get a mere fragment, and you have to go to the 'Hansard.' But it comes out some two years after 'Hansard' and is of no earthly use. It is a large volume, pretty nearly as large as the Trade and Navigation reports. What it pretends to do is to give a digest of what everybody says on every subject, and as it is impossible to do that to any extent or with any accuracy, it defeats the very purpose for which it was intended. It is a perfectly useless piece of mechanism, and I do not see why it is kept on. Other members may find some use for it, but it has never been of any earthly use to me. Might I ask the Minister of Finance if he ever used it?

Mr. Fielding then said:

> If it could not be held up against me, I have never seen it.

I have taken the trouble to inquire of hon. members around me, and have not found one who would say that he had ever used this analytical index. Some of them have never seen it. I certainly never did, and it seems to me perfectly useless that we should spend $4,000 a year on something that nobody ever makes any use of.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would ask the chairman of the committee to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and withdraw the report for the present. The analytical index is certainly a most valuable adjunct to 'Hansard.' In reply to the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Middlebro), it seems to me, speaking from memory, that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman refers, afterwards corrected his opinion and withdrew his opposition to the continuation of this index. I speak of course, subject to correction. Now with regard to the appointments on the reporting staff, the Civil Service Commissioners have only followed the law. These appointments have to be made, under the law, by the members of the Civil Service Commission. I think, however, the commissioners would have shown better judgment if they had asked competitors to write an essay on folly and fashion, and how I earned my first money, or a snowstorm, than have asked them to give us something of the contemporary history of Canada. Messrs. Dickson, Blue and Matthews, who are at present in the employ of the House on the reporting staff of the committee, are very competent men. They are quite familiar with the political history of Canada, and I think they should come out ahead of anybody else in any competition as regards fitness for work of this kind.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). I would suggest that it might be advisable to adopt all of this report except the paragraph relating to the analytical index. As regards the new appointments, the Civil Service Commissioners have to follow the law and cannot take any other course. I entirely concur in the opinion that the gentlemen on the staff of the committees have been doing excellent work, and should have every consideration possible.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to say that the Debates Committee are entirely in the hands of the House. We had no other idea except to serve the purpose of the House in procuring an efficient report of the debates and in eliminating what we thought to be entirely useless.

We attempted last year to influence the course of things so far as the appointment of the staff is concerned, and found to our regret that we had no power in that connection. It was only because we felt that we would be exceeding our power that we did not make any suggestion this year as to the persons who should be appointed to the debates staff. Speaking for myself, I know very well the three gentlemen mentioned and should be pleased indeed to have authority to recommend their appointment, because I do not think we could get three better men. However, as to the portion of the report which deals with the analytical index, I am quite sure that no member of the Debates Committee wishes to force that on the attention of the House; therefore, with the permission of the House, and in deference to the wishes of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I ask permission to withdraw that recommendation.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that that report be concurred in, with the exception of paragraph 6, which deals with the analytical index?

Report, amended as proposed, concurred in.

AID AND ENCOURAGEMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 100) for the aid and encouragement of agriculture. He said:

Mr. Speaker, in asking leave to introduce the Bill which stands in my name I trust the House will permit a reference to matters which, though not directly explanatory of the Bill, do in a very real sense refer to the reason for introducing a measure of such a character. It will be recalled that in the speech from the Throne the following passage occurred:

> It is essential to recognize that, in a country possessing so great an area of fertile land as that with which this Dominion is happily endowed, the great basic industry is agriculture. My advisers are convinced that the time has come when greater aid and encouragement should be given to those who are engaged in the cultivation of the land. To this end, a measure will be introduced under which it is hoped that there may be co-operation between the Dominion and the various provinces, for the purpose of assisting and encouraging our farmers to secure the best results in production, and at the same time preserve the fertility of the soil.

This paragraph may be instanced as an implementing of the promise made during the recent elections by the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the House.

Since assuming office as Minister of Agriculture, I have endeavoured to give the question of aid to agriculture in Canada the serious consideration which the importance of the matter warrants. The more closely the subject was studied, however, the more clear it became that a policy of co-operation with the provinces for the betterment of agricultural conditions throughout Canada could not be worked out in any intelligent or satisfactory manner without a thorough examination of the actual agricultural conditions of the country and exhaustive survey of the work being performed by the governments of the various provinces, and without a definite conception of the aims of the provinces along the lines of agricultural expansion.

Co-operation means something more than mere expenditure of money by federal or provincial authorities. It is true that criticism, perhaps not altogether undeserved, has been directed at governments in this country for not spending enough money in aid of agriculture. It is not always easy to get the money for such a purpose and we shall agree that, even when obtained, it is not less difficult to spend it wisely. Financial assistance given to provinces, associations or individuals, which results in the tendency to look entirely for external help in the solution of agricultural problems, is certainly not wise assistance. The only justification for increased governmental aid—the very meaning of the word co-operation—is that assistance, while making for the healthy expansion of agriculture, should stimulate individual energy and better enable provinces, associations and individuals to help themselves.

We have been faced with the same difficulties in Canada that have faced the people of other countries. Many of those countries have revolutionized their agricultural methods in recent years and have organized their Departments of Agriculture in such a way that all branches are directly related to, or closely associated with, this industry.

Co-operation in its broadest sense has been fairly systematized, working along lines of co-ordination of work with the provinces and with the associations. This is not the time to touch that phase of the subject which is concerned with agricultural co-operative societies though it might be said in passing that the principle has been adopted to an increasing extent in Europe, and that to-day in Germany alone there is an imperial federation of co-operative societies, which represents externally and officially the interests of more than 19,000 co-operative societies, comprising nearly two million members. There is much to learn from other nations. We are young. The potentialities of our country are of a magnitude not yet grasped by any of us. We have already accomplished much, and if mistakes have been made, or injudicious courses embarked on, there is ample time to rectify the mistakes and direct our energies to better purpose.

As there has been a lack of full co-ordination of practical agricultural work in the past in this country, between the provincial and federal governments, so also there has been a lack of legislative co-ordination. The British North America Act, article 95, states as follows:

> In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province and to immigration into the province, and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may, from time to time, make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any of the provinces, and in relation to immigration into all or any of the provinces, and any law of the legislature of a province relative to agriculture or immigration shall have effect in and for the province as long as and as far only as it is not repugnant to any Act of the parliament of Canada.

In respect to this, Lord Carnarvon in a debate in the House of Lords at the time when the British North America Act was passed remarked:

> The real object which we have in view is to give to the central government those high functions and almost sovereign power by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in these questions that are of common import to all the provinces, and at the same time to retain for each province so ample a measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow, and indeed compel them, to exercise those legal powers which they could exercise with great advantage to the community.

He further pointed out that:

> There is concurrent power of legislation to be exercised by the central and the local parliaments. It extends over three separate subjects—immigration, agriculture and public works. Of these the two first will in most cases probably be treated by the provincial authorities. They are subjects which in their ordinary character are local, but it is possible that they may have under the changed circumstances of a young country a more general power and therefore a discretionary power of interference is wisely reserved to the central parliament.

Now, Sir, it was having in view these matters which I have touched upon that I became more and more convinced that legislation this session designed to embody provisions which would make for a maximum of harmonious co-operation and a minimum of friction between the various parts of Canada was impossible. It seemed clear that it was the duty of the government to lay a sound foundation for any permanent constructive legislation. Various ways suggested themselves. It might be done—imperfectly I think—through the ordinary channels of the department, involving correspondence with the different provinces. It might be done, also I think imperfectly, by conferences with the various governments of the country. It appeared to me, however, that the purpose the government had in view might better be accomplished by securing the services, if possible, of a man whose practical experience with agricultural problems, and whose broad grasp of agricultural questions should specially qualify him for the performance of this work. It would be his duty to become thoroughly conversant with the conditions, and with the methods carried on in the different provinces; to find out on what lines the educative, legislative and practical agricultural work was being conducted, and thus put the government in a position which would make for action of a truly co-operative and stimulative character, and which would tend to the excision of unnecessary duplication, and promote efficiency and progress all round. It was not easy to find such a man, but we believe we have done so, and arrangements are being made by which Mr. C. C. James of Toronto will devote homself to the task, the nature of which I have outlined. I need hardly state what the House well knows that Mr. James has qualifications peculiarly fitting him for this work; he has been for more than a quarter of a century the deputy Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Ontario—in that capacity he has had much to do with the notable advance that Ontario has made in agriculture; his reputation is more than a provincial one, and I think that the House will agree that substantial benefit will accrue to the country as a result of appointing Mr. James as a special commissioner for this work.

This, of course, will involve a severance of Mr. James' relations with the Ontario government, and here I may read to the House what Mr. Duff, Minister of Agriculture, says of Mr. James:

> I repeat that you could not do better from the standpoint of Canadian agriculture than to secure the services of Mr. James, and I trust the plan you will evolve will redound very largely to the benefit of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come directly to the present Bill, it has been felt by the government that, though the general policy in respect to co-operation with the provinces cannot well be worked out under the present conditions, yet it would only be keeping faith to do at least something in the way of aid this year. Accordingly, although I do not want to be understood as necessarily accepting the principle of cash contributions for this purpose as a permanent policy, the Bill which I am asking leave to introduce provides for powers to assist the provinces by means of direct grants of money under agreement between this government and the provincial governments, it being understood, of course, that such moneys will be expended purely for agricultural purposes

The principle upon which grants will be apportioned will be that of division based on population, the census of 1911 governing. The government has given a good deal of consideration to this phase of the matter, and has arrived at the conclusion that the population basis is one which is open to the fewest objections. The question of whether aid of this kind should be given to agriculture need hardly, I think, be debated. We are expending, and have expended, large sums in various public works; we have always liberally assisted railways, have given large subsidies to shipping companies and in various ways contributed financial assistance to the industries of the country. An attempt by more generous financial support to place our great agricultural industry on a better footing is one that I believe will have the cordial support of this House. I may add that there is no desire in this matter to favour this or that of the various provincial governments. We recognize that in every province a government has been placed there by the people, and I am voicing the sentiments of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in saying that the sole purport of this measure is to do what the title declares it is designed for, viz.: to aid and encourage agriculture.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the report in the morning press that a commission is to be appointed to investigate the Farmers' Bank, is correct. Might I ask whether or not the Prime Minister is in a position to make an announcement to the House on the question?

Mr. BORDEN. Not in a position to-day; probably to-morrow.

OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF GOVERNMENT ELEVATORS.

Mr. KNOWLES. I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether any decision has been reached to place a sum in the supplementary estimates for the securing of elevators by lease, purchase, or expropriation.

Mr. BORDEN. That question has not yet been formally considered. An announcement will be made in connection with the supplementary estimates.

Mr. KNOWLES. Might I ask the right hon. gentleman if he sent the following telegram to Mr. F. W. G. Haultain:—

F. W. G. Haultain,
Regina.

Telegram received. The statement you bring to my attention is utterly untrue. Bill now before the House includes power for purchase, lease or expropriation of terminal elevators; an appropriation to be placed in the supplementary estimates for this purpose.
(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, I sent that, but it is quite true that the supplementary estimates have not yet been formally considered, and that an announcement to the House will be made when that takes place.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Bank of Saskatchewan.—Mr. Knowles.

PATENTS OF THOMAS WADGE.

House in committee on Bill (No. 16) respecting patents of Thomas Wadge.—Mr. Aikins.

Mr. CURRIE. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed further with this Bill, I desire to say that this is a measure of very great importance to the public, and especially to the farming community. Unfortunately, I am not a member of the Private Bills Committee, but perhaps some members of the committee who are here can enlighten the House as to the merits of the proposal contained in this Bill. I understand that this Bill deals with a patent on windstackers, that the patent is about to expire and that the Bill is for the purpose of renewing the patent for a further term of years. I would like to know if that is so, because, if it is, it will add about $100 to the cost of every thresher that our western farmers and our Ontario farmers buy. I understand that every manufacturer of threshing machines in Canada is now making these windstackers, and if we put this Bill through, royalties will continue to be collected to the extent of from $50 to $100 on every thresher, which does not seem to be desirable. I may be wrong, but I am given to understand that such is the case. I would like some enlightment from a member of the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie), and particularly in the absence of the hon. promoter of the Bill, (Mr. Aikins), I think it well that this Bill should stand.

Progress reported.

PATENTS OF THOMAS D. RAMBAUT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 84) respecting certain patents of Thomas D. Rambaut.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. NESBITT. What are the patents on?

Mr. ROGERS. As the member promoting the Bill (Mr. Ames), is not here, you might let it stand.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF A TARIFF COMMISSION.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 88) to provide for the appointment of a Tariff Commission.

On section 3,

Mr. EMMERSON. Has any action been taken with respect to the personnel of this commission? In one of the New Brunswick papers it was announced that a gentleman representing a New Brunswick constituency was to be appointed.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The personnel of the commission has not been decided upon; it has not been under consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Have the qualifications of the gentlemen who are to occupy these very important positions been considered, and what are they?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I am convinced that the success of the commission will depend to a very large extent upon its personnel and that we need men of the highest qualifications. As to what the calling, profession or occupation of such men should be I am unable to say at present. The duties of the commission are set out in the Bill and while we have not decided upon the personnel I am of the opinion that we should have men of special aptitude for the duties so prescribed. The commissioners should be of high class ability because their duties will be quasi-judicial and administrative, they should be men of energy, ability and high standing. I cannot say further at the present time because we have not considered the personnel.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It goes without saying that the men to be entrusted with the duties contemplated by this Bill should be men of ability within their spheres. It would appear to me, however, that they are simply to be statisticians, simply to collect information, which we have already to some extent in some of our departments. Clause 4 of the Bill sets out that they are to make inquiry into:

(a) The price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption;

(b) the cost of production in Canada and elsewhere;

(c) the cost of transportation from the place of production to the place of use or consumption, whether in Canada or elsewhere;

(d) the cost, efficiency and conditions of labour in Canada and elsewhere;

(e) the prices received by producers, manufacturers, wholesale dealers, retailers and other distributors in Canada and elsewhere;

(f) all conditions and factors which affect or enter into the cost of production and the price to the consumers in Canada;

(g) generally, all the conditions affecting production, manufacture, cost and price in Canada as compared with other countries.

I repeat that some of this information is already in our statistics which are given to the public from year to year, and, in a larger measure such information is collected in the United States through their Labour Bureau or some such organization. I would say that the proper way to collect such information is by attaching statisticians to the Department of Trade and Commerce or the Department of Finance.

But it is intended to prepare a brief and to secure information for the Minister of Finance in support of his own conception of what should be considered proper political economy. My hon. friend the other day, in the course of his observations on the second reading, told us he was a protectionist, a moderate protectionist as he qualified his own statement. He did not tell us nor have I read anywhere what is the difference between moderate protection and immoderate protection. I do not know that I ever heard of a protectionist who called himself an immoderate protectionist, he is always moderate. The line of demarcation between moderate and immoderate protection is a hazy one and rather difficult to define, it is like seeking the line between moderate drinking and immoderate drinking. My hon. friend will tell me that his ideas are in favour of moderate protection. For this I do not quarrel with him, these are his views, but there are men in the country who do not believe in protection, who are in favour of absolute free trade and men who believe in a tariff for revenue only. Then there are men who call themselves moderate protectionists who are prepared to go any length in the direction. The object of this Bill is to collect information in order that the minister may find therein a support for his views of moderate protection. Perhaps my hon. friend will disclaim that idea and will tell me that the information collected under this Bill by whomever it may be collected will be uniform and will be for the advantage of all.

There is another manner of collecting information. My hon. friend perhaps remembers what old Dr. Johnston said in his latter days. Speaking of the time when as a younger man, he was engaged in reporting he stated that his reports were always fair and accurate, but he always took good care that the weak dog got the worst of it. I believe that under this system the free trade dogs and the tariff-for-revenue dogs will also get the worst of this information. Let us have the information which is collected for all, for the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who does not believe in moderate protection but who is a free trader as well as for those who are moderate protectionists, and even for the man who wants to have the barrier as high as Haman's gallows.

We know now the character of the information that we are going to have. It is to be exactly of the character which I have stated, it will not be impartial information, but it will be information for an object. I may be asked what reason I have to speak as positively as I now speak. I have gathered my conviction from the debate of the other day, more particularly from the speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) who, I regret to see, is not now in the House. The hon. member for St. Antoine spoke on this Bill as if he had been the power behind the throne. When my right hon. friend opposite (Mr. Borden) formed his Cabinet everybody expected that the hon. member for St. Antoine would be included in it. Everybody thought that both his exertions and the ability which he is known to possess in financial and business matters entitled him to a seat in that Cabinet. But although he is not a member of the government he seems to be the power behind the throne. He has proved that he has even more power in the government than those who are members of it, and, therefore, I attach a great deal of importance to the information which he has given us, and he has told us in so many words that the men who are to be appointed on this commission are to be in sympathy with the sentiment of the present administration. He stated that in his speech and repeated it in answer to my hon. friend for Carleton, New Brunswick. He said:

> I beg your pardon, the words 'high protectionist' were not used by me. I said they must be in sympathy with the well known sentiment of the present government.

Well, the well-known sentiment of the present government as defined the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), and we knew it before, is in favour of moderate protection. Therefore, the men who are to be appointed on this commission are to be moderate protectionists, they are to be in sympathy with the sentiment now ruling the country. I ask my hon. friend opposite is it in accordance with British institutions that this commission should be formed on such a basis as this? Is it in accordance with what we know of the continuity of government that partisans should be appointed in the Civil Service or on any commission? If you appoint a temporary commission the government may put on that commission any man they think will serve an object, but if you appoint a permanent commission such as this is intended to be, is it in accordance with the spirit of British institutions that you should appoint partisans, or if you wanted to put it less strongly than I do, men who would be in sympathy with the government of the day? This is absolutely repugnant to our system of constitutional government. The very nature of our institutions is based on party government, and contemplates that there should be an alternation of party in the administration. The very nature of our administration is predicated upon the fact which we know by the experience of British countries that governments are not immortal, governments are like men, born to die. Even this government is not eternal or immortal, there will come a day when it will give way to its opponents. If we appoint this commission composed of partisans, men intended to be in sympathy with the present policy of the government, what justice will it be when their opponents come into office? That is not in accordance with our principle. The principle upon which this commission must be governed is that the men who are appointed to it shall be absolutely free from any political bias.

If justice is to be done to the whole country, not only to supporters of the government but also to its opponents, you must appoint men who are not biased or partisan and who will give the information they collect without any colour at all so that every one may ascertain the facts as they are. They should be men, not influenced by sympathy with the present government, but anxious to give the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. The very manner in which it is proposed to appoint this commission justifies our opposition to it. I object to a commission entrusted with the collection of information on all subjects mentioned in the Bill which will do it with the view of preparing a brief for the minister and not simply for the purpose of collecting information, whether that information will help the views of my hon. friends or the contrary. I think the principle of the Bill is altogether wrong and that the method to be followed under it is not that on which my hon. friend should proceed. Complaint has been made that our statistics are not as perfect as they should be. I agree in this, but I submit that any legislation to improve our statistical records should not be enacted for a political object, but simply for the obtaining of information.

Mr. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman is unduly alarmed. I am afraid he is not following out the principles he exhibited to the country during some fifteen years in which he held office. He objects to partisans being appointed on this commission. Well, nobody would select a man because he was a partisan, but on the other hand I do not suppose any one would reject any man, otherwise fit and suitable, because he had some political opinions. It would be difficult to find any one who is not affiliated with one or the other of the political parties. During the fifteen years during which my hon. friend was in power, when he appointed a great many commissions, I am not aware that ever, from first to last, he appointed a single Conservative to any one of them. Yet he informs us this afternoon that any such course is absolutely outrageous. How is it that this has occurred to him to-day for the first time and not on some previous occasion during his fifteen years in office? It is well known that in this country men who have taken very active part in political affairs are frequently appointed to positions on the bench, and we know that, with very occasional exceptions, they all, in spite of their political affiliations, administer justice as it should be administered. My right hon. friend suggests that if any one appointed on this commission should have any particular opinions regarding the trade policy of this country, that will affect his inquiry into the matters brought before him. The same objection might be urged to the trial by judge of a matter between two men, one of whom had been a strong supporter of his in politics and the other an opponent. Yet no one would venture the opinion that he was therefore not fitted to administer impartial justice between these two. I do not see the force of the right hon. gentleman's objections, nor do I think this is the proper time to consider the principle of the Bill, because we did that on the second reading and are now only concerned with its details. As my right hon. friend must understand, it would be impossible to name now the personnel of the commission. What we are endeavouring to do is to have legislation passed, and then we shall consider who are the most suitable persons to appoint. It would be reversing the usual order to decide on the personnel of the commission first and then bring in legislation for the purpose of establishing that commission and appointing them to office. The government will be responsible for appointing the best qualified persons as commissioners, should this Bill become law, and I have no doubt the selection will be one which will commend itself to the judgment of all fair-minded people.

Mr. GUTHRIE. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has surely a short memory with regard to the appointments made by the late government, commissioners or otherwise, during the last fifteen years. Turning around to his followers and waving his hands he said that during the last fifteen years my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the late government never appointed on these commissions any but partisans. If my right hon. friend will reflect for a moment, he will see that the statement was very inaccurate. If he will refer back to one of the important commissions appointed in the last four or five years, the Civil Service Commission, he will find that the chairman of that commission was, prior to his appointment, a Conservative of the most pronounced type. And if he will refer to the second Civil Service Commission, consisting of one man, Mr. Justice Cassels, he will find that Mr. Justice Cassels, who was appointed by the late government judge of the Exchequer Court, was not, in his political career, on the Liberal side at all events. I think I might recall other commissions of which the same may be said. In the appointment of the Civil Service Commission, care was taken that no one appointed could be considered a partisan in any sense of the word.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE. My hon. friends laugh at that statement, but they know that Prof. Shortt was a non-partisan. I have frequently heard him speak, I have discussed party matters with him, and I can say that he was distinctly non-partisan at the time of his appointment. In the appointments of judges, the record of the late administration is anything but a record of partisan appointment, in Ontario, Quebec or Nova Scotia.

Mr. BRADBURY. Name one in Manitoba.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Let me name one or more that I am familiar with. I recall the case of Mr. Justice Nesbitt, now Hon. Wallace Nesbitt, who retired from the Supreme Court. There was Mr. Justice Middleton, at present a judge of the High Court of Ontario. I think I am also right in saying there was the case of Judge Phippen, now connected with the Canadian Northern railway—a case in Manitoba, I believe. There was the case of Mr. Justice Townsend, appointed by the Conservative government and promoted to the chief justiceship of Nova Scotia.

Mr. EMMERSON. And Chief Justice Barker of New Brunswick.

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. GUTHRIE. And others could be named. In regard to judicial appointments or the appointment of commissioners whose powers were judicial, the late government did not seek the line of partisanship, but appointed, as far as was in their power, men who were non-partisan, men of independent judgment. The question, of course, becomes important in view of the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds), himself speaking on the motion for the second reading of the Bill, that various schools of thought in regard to the tariff existed in this country. He stated openly that there were high protectionists, moderate protectionists and free traders. Surely it is all-important for the members of this committee to know from which of these classes he will appoint the gentlemen who are to compose this commission. If we had some reasonable assurance that there would be one from each class, I think it would be rather satisfactory at this juncture. In the United States, in their proposed measure, they certainly recognized this, for they provided for the appointment of five, of whom three were to be Republicans—leaving two to the Democrats or whatever the other parties might be. I think we should have some assurance of the personnel before the clause is passed. Perhaps, if the clause stood over my hon. friend (Mr. White, Leeds) might make up his mind on the subject.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friends opposite, I think, have not been earnest and sincere in their opposition to this Bill. This has not been a real fight, but a sham fight, a pillow fight. That was quite apparent on the second reading. These gentlemen have simply been setting up bogies and attacking them. They have been reading into the Bill what was never in the Bill, and no one knows it better than themselves. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has assumed a good deal. Where is there a word in this Bill with regard to high protection, or reasonable protection, or free trade ?—or as to partisans being appointed commissioners? There is not a word; these hon. gentlemen have simply read this in the Bill for the purpose of their own arguments. As I have said, the duties of these commissioners are quasi-judicial and administrative. I want men who are capable of getting the facts, of sifting out information and presenting it in a form that we may rely upon. It will be valuable to us, as I have said, in framing a tariff. And it ill becomes Liberals to stand in the way of light and information. The consumers of this country want information.

Mr. GUTHRIE. We want the facts.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). We want the facts, and hon. gentlemen opposite are standing in the way of the facts when they oppose the appointment of this commission. They are standing in the way of the light. The consumers of this country complain, as some of our free trade friends complain, that an undue measure of protection is enjoyed by certain interests. How can we tell whether these interests make unduly large profits, unless we get the information? And that information is not available at the present time. How are we to get at that information otherwise than is here proposed? Hon. members opposite talk about this as subverting the constitution. I think that argument is completely destroyed by looking at the case more in detail. Suppose we proposed here to appoint a commission to investigate one particular industry, let us say the cement industry, with the idea of finding out the cost of production and the prices at which the product is sold at various points in Canada, would hon. gentlemen opposite say that this would involve a subversion of the constitution? In the Customs Tariff Act, I think, it is provided that if there is evidence that a conspiracy or combination exists for the purpose of unduly enhancing prices, the government may appoint a judge to investigate and ascertain the facts. And what may the government do on the report of that judge? They may reduce the customs duty in order that the public may have fair-play in the matter. What essential difference is there between this and having an inquiry with regard to one particular industry and appointing a Tariff Commission for the purpose of investigating not one, but all industries, to ascertain the cost of production and the prices of commodities throughout the country? What is there prima facie wrong in that? Is it not commendable instead of being prima facie wrong? The only thing that can make it appear wrong is that hon. gentlemen opposite have read into it their own suspicions. They have approached this proposal in a suspicious manner, instead of in an open and a fair manner. As I have said, there is not a line in this Bill that suggests high protection or reasonable protection, or free trade. My hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made some observations with regard to a statement of mine that I was not a high protectionist, but believed in a reasonable degree of protection, and he asked me what was a reasonable degree of protection? That is not an easy thing to define, but here is what I would say to my right hon. friend: If an industry which is capable of being maintained in this country, an industry in which we have some advantages and not such great disadvantages as to make it improper that this industry should be developed at all, and if this industry is capable of furnishing work to our labouring population and of giving reasonable profit to the men who are developing it, and if, by reason of a protective tariff an undue return is obtained by the men who are developing that industry, a return above what might be deemed an adequate and fair return, then I should say that industry was too highly protected. If on the other hand, we can build up industries in this country, if we can develop our resources by a tariff which does not permit undue profits to those engaged in that development, an industry which affords work to our people and produces here goods that otherwise would be produced abroad and imported into Canada, I think we may say that the protection that would have this result would be reasonable protection. And in saying that, I believe I am expressing a view which is not substantially different from that of my predecessor in the office of Minister of Finance. Read 'Hansard' and note carefully what he said, and you will find that the party for which he was the spokesman in tariff matters was not a free trade party, or even a tariff-for-revenue-only party. I think you will find any number of utterances on the part of my predecessor in favour of a policy of reasonable protection. This was subject, of course, to our having advantages for the development of industries in this country. I think he would assume—and I would say the same and would have no hesitation in giving adherence to this view—that there may be some things that we cannot manufacture to advantage, and, in the case of such industries, it might be fairly argued that there should be no protective tariff.

Now, I have said that hon. gentlemen opposite are standing in the way of light and information in opposing the creation of this Tariff Commission. And let me say to them that I believe that if they had had a Tariff Commission to supply them with the facts, there would have been no election on the 21st of September last.

I state that it was because they were not possessed of the facts that they negotiated the reciprocity agreement with the United States—simply because they were not possessed of the facts and the United States was possessed of the facts by means of a tariff commission. My hon. friends opposite were not possessed of the facts, and the result is that we are here and you are there. My right hon. friend might have been sitting here to-day, and no election would have taken place, but instead of that, he is sitting over there, and I must say that he looks pretty well in either place, because he is a distinguished looking man.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Happy on either side.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). See that you are not on both sides. Now my hon. friend has spoken with regard to these commissioners being mere statisticians. I must take issue with him; they are a good deal more than statisticians. He has read some of the subsections there which would indicate that statistics were to be accumulated, and I agree with him that as to certain of these subsections, statisticians might reasonably obtain information. But if he will look over them all carefully, he will find that very much higher qualifications are required in these men to discharge their duties than the qualifications of mere statisticians. For example, the cost of production in Canada and elsewhere—one of the most difficult things to ascertain, requires judicial qualifications, and other abilities of an unusual kind, because in the cost of production you find so many different factors and elements. In the first place, you have the cost of the raw material and the cost of laying it down. Then you have to consider how much capital is invested in that enterprise, and that may mean an investigation as to whether a company is over-capitalized or not. Then you have to find what are the fixed charges, the cost of management, and the efficiency of the management, because with poor management as distinguished from good management, your cost will be increased. You have to consider whether the capital invested was paid bona fide, that is, if it is watered, and to what extent it is watered; in other words, judgment of a very rare kind is required for the investigation into the cost of any commodity or product. In the same way the cost, the efficiency and the conditions of labour in Canada and elsewhere must be inquired into.

Mr. NESBITT. In deciding whether a company has been over-capitalized, will the minister require this commission to report the facts, or will he judge for himself?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friend will observe that in the reports that have been made, there is to be a copy of the evidence. Let me say this—because I do not desire that there should be any misconception as to the scope of this Bill—I do not say that because the commission makes a report that it is to be absolutely conclusive. As I said the other day the minister himself, must keep in touch with living conditions, he must see what is going on about him, as he does to-day, he must keep in touch with business conditions; and while this Tariff Commission will supplement the information he may have, at the same time he must use his own judgment, and if he has any cause to suspect or to believe that the evidence furnished with the reports of the Tariff Commission is not accurate, of course he will re-commit such questions to the commission, to be taken up again for further consideration. As I remarked on the second reading, we do not desire to be relieved from responsibility with regard to the tariff, and all the Tariff Commission does, is to enable us to obtain information on which to act. Let me say this, that of all the people in Canada who desire information to be obtained, those who call themselves free traders, and the consumers, should be the most anxious to get it. If my hon. friends think they can score on that, I believe they are very much mistaken. I believe the consuming population of Canada are greatly interested in the question of the tariff, they want the facts and our protectionist friends, those who enjoy or think they enjoy a reasonable protection, want the facts also; in other words, it is in the interest of all the classes in Canada without exception, I do not care what their economic opinions may be, to have reliable information.

Mr. KNOWLES. The minister says that he does not desire ministerial responsibility to cease. Suppose a couple of years hence the minister should ask the House to place a duty on certain articles and some of us should object; does the minister think that he would be justified in closing the matter by simply saying that the commission had found certain facts to exist?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I would say this, that great weight should be attached to the reports of the Tariff Commission. But I am far from saying that they should be conclusive in the sense indicated by my hon. friend. I think the report of the Tariff Commission should be available to every member of this House as well as to the minister, and then no doubt it will carry great weight. But that is far from saying that it is absolutely conclusive.

Mr. KNOWLES. It would not be a justification in itself?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Not an absolute justification, no, but it will have its due weight.

Mr. CARROLL. I think this is a reason why we should know the personnel of this commission before this Act passes, because the minister argues that it is in the interest of the producers that this Tariff Commission be constituted. But it will not be in the interest of the consumers or the labouring classes if three high protectionists are placed on this commission.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Where does my hon. friend find in this Bill one word to indicate that high protectionists are to be appointed commissioners? Not a word, he is finding it in his own imagination, and no where else.

Mr. CARROLL. We are simply asking for information as to the personnel of this commission.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I can tell my hon. friend that the question of the personnel of the commission has not yet engaged our attention. Let me ask my hon. friend, did he ever know in this case of any legislation going through this House, of the personnel of the commission being announced in advance of the passing of the Bill creating the commission?

Mr. McKENZIE. The minister says that he will take the report of the commission. Does he mean the comments or conclusions gathered by the commission, or the evidence itself?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My idea is this, that the information and reports of this commission will be departmental information, available for the government in considering tariff questions. Now that information, like all other information which is departmental, may be called for by this House, and may be laid on the table. I would be the last man to suggest that the House of Commons should be denied the information obtained by means of the expense which they have authorized. There is no intention of that kind in this Bill. My hon. friends have been simply raising spectres with regard to this Bill. The object of this Bill is to obtain information which could not be obtained in any other way. But because we propose to obtain information which hitherto has not been obtainable and cannot be obtainable otherwise, does not mean that the government seeks to be relieved from its constitutional responsibility for the tariff, and for tariff rates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend, in his opening remarks, was kind enough to tell me that he would endeavour to meet my inquiry as to his idea of moderate protection.

I do not know that he has made the subject much clearer than it was. Perhaps it is clear to his mind. I wish I knew myself, but the difficulty is that nobody, whether in this country or any other country, has ever been able to draw the line between what is moderate protection and immoderate protection. I never knew a protectionist, not even the gentleman who stated in Toronto that he wanted the protective barrier against foreign goods to be as high as 'Haman's gallows,' who ever pretended that he was anything but a moderate protectionist. The idea of the moderate or immoderate protectionists with regard to protection is very much like the idea of the old squaw about whisky. Her idea was that a little too much was just enough. A little too much is just enough protection for the purpose of the manufacturer or of the man who is a moderate protectionist.

My hon. friend says that the object of this Bill is to have the facts. I agree with him that that ought to be the object of the Bill. It ought to be to get the facts and nothing else, and if I saw in this Bill evidence of an intention to have the facts and nothing but the facts, the truth and nothing but the truth, for my part, I would be satisfied with it. My hon. friend tells us that if we had had the facts there would have been no election on the 21st September, that we would not have been where we are now but where he is. Well, I must say, that looking at the long faces of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, there is a compensating feature to the fact that we were defeated on the 21st September. There is more joy on this side of the House than there is on the other side. I have noticed on several occasions during the present session that the faces of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have lengthened and lengthened until they were looking very much the picture of despair. Perhaps we may see the same thing again during the present session. I do not want my hon. friend to waste any pity on this side of the House; we are quite happy where we are and where hon. gentlemen will be some time or other.

My hon. friend tells us that if we had had the facts, as they had them in the United States, we would never have committed the imprudence that we did of making an arrangement with the United States. They have the facts in the United States, and we have not. But, if I am correctly informed, in the United States they collected the facts that they have without a Tariff Commission, and simply by a statistical bureau. I understand that they want a Tariff Commission in the United States just as my hon. friend wants to have a Tariff Commission here, but they were able to collect the facts with a simple statistical bureau such as they have now. I understand that in the United States, as in this country, the dominant party is not satisfied with having a statistical bureau which will collect the facts and present them as they are, but that they rather desire to give a colour to them in favour of their own view, which is the view of the present administration. Of course, my hon. friend tells me that there is nothing of that kind in the Bill. Who expects to find anything of that kind in the Bill? There is such a thing as an Act and an ulterior motive to that Act not to be found within the four corners of the Act itself. My hon. friend did not put in his Bill that the object which he had in view was to have, not the broad facts as they exist, but simply a commission to prepare for him, and for the government of which he is a member, in favour of the view upon political economy which my hon. friend and his colleagues entertain. He did not tell us that, it is true, but we had an influential member on the other side of the House telling us that that was the intention of the government.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the meaning of these words spoken by the hon. member for Montreal St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) the other day? Speaking of the personnel of the commission he said, not that they must be high protectionists, but that they must be in sympathy with the well known sentiment of the present government. Well, if these are not partisans what are they? They may not be offensive partisans. It is difficult to lay down the line and say what is an offensive or an inoffensive partisan. Under the present administration we find that offensive partisanship is simply to be a partisan. These men who are to be appointed commissioners under this Act, must be men who are in sympathy with the sentiments of my hon. friend. That is the qualification that was laid down by the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine. If I am told by my hon. friend (Mr. White) that the hon. member for Montreal is wrong, that he did not speak by authority, that he did not know what he was talking about, all I can tell my hon. friend is that until the words of the hon. member for St. Antoine have been disavowed by him, I will persist in believing that the members of the commission will be partisans and that they will be appointed with the object of supporting the views of my hon. friend. My hon. friend tells us that we shall have the information. Certainly, we all agree to that, but he tells us also that we shall be the first to agree to this Bill which is to be put upon the statute-book, in order to get the information. He tells us that those who are against high duties ought to be in favour of this Bill. He tells us that there are men complaining to-day that the duties are too high, and that their complaints should be investigated. Investigated by whom?—by men who are against high duties? No, by men who are in favour of high duties. That is the kind of justice that we are going to have. You are going to appoint a commission composed of men in sympathy with the present government. Men are men after all. We can all agree to this that we have our own passions, our own prejudices, and our own views. My hon. friend belongs to the legal profession, and he knows that in a court of law the same fact may be presented by two men, who will give an entirely different colour to it, each of them honestly and acting in good faith. My hon. friend knows that men are unconsciously biased in favour of their own proclivities. Does he mean to tell me that when the facts are investigated by men who are of his own way of thinking, who are in favour of duties—call it moderate protection, if you like—you can expect from these men a report which will be in favour of the converse view of no duty upon the articles under consideration? They would not be men, they would not be acting in accordance with the dictates of human nature, if it were to be supposed that under such circumstances they would give such a report. What alarms us in this matter, Sir, is that, as stated by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), when speaking in answer to my hon. friend on the second reading of the Bill, you are taking this Yankee device, which has not yet become law in the United States, but is intended to produce such an effect as to promote the view of the dominating party in the United States. The same thing must obtain here if you adopt the same methods. That is the reason why I say that the Bill of my hon. friend is not intended, according to the statement of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, to result in the preparation of an unbiased statement of the facts, but that it is intended to prepare a brief in every case for the administration in favour of the views which are held by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated to the House that if the purpose of the Bill were simply to provide information, he would be glad to support it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would the right hon. gentleman suggest to the House what might be added to or substracted from the Bill that would make it such to his mind?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Simply to organize a statistical bureau such as they have in the United States and such as we have, to some extent, in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The right hon. gentleman states that he would favour the Bill if it organized simply a statistical bureau such as exists in the United States. I have been at some pains to look into the legislation in the United States, to ascertain how the tariff board which exists at present, and which has existed for two years back is operated there, and I can see in it nothing more of the nature of a statistical bureau than that which is contemplated by the present Bill. The tariff board appointed by the President of the United States under the authority of the Customs

Act of 1901, is a tariff board designed for the purpose and with the powers of the Tariff Commission contemplated by this Bill, and has done work that is not of a statistical character at all, as well as work that is of a statistical character.

So that if the right hon. gentleman contemplated a board clothed with the power and having the objective of the tariff board of the United States, then he must be satisfied with this Bill as it stands, and I suggest to him that the Minister of Finance cannot devise an amendment either by addition or omission that will better provide for what the right hon. gentleman himself wants. Does the right hon. gentleman suggest that a definition of a moderate protectionist should be inserted in the Bill? The right hon. gentleman is greatly concerned this afternoon because he does not appear to know just what a moderate protectionist is. I suggest that he turn to the hon. gentleman behind him who has acknowledged to the House that he is a moderate protectionist and ask him what in the world he is. Then the hon. member for Richmond also made the same avowal to the House, and the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) refused to state that he would eliminate protection from our tariff, and I do not think he would say that if he is a protectionist. He is anything but a moderate protectionist.

Mr. OLIVER. I must protest against the hon. gentleman using a suggestion that was made in a previous debate to which it did not suit me at the moment to reply. But when the question comes up, if my hon. friend will bear with me, I will give him all the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am at a loss to understand how the question can be up if it is not up now.

Mr. OLIVER. At all events I am not up at the moment, but I shall take care to be up and to enlighten my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN. He was up and very much up, and was enthroned in office for seven years, but then he was a protectionist just in the sense the late government was and that, I think, was moderate protection although in some cases it was immoderate, and in some cases not protection at all, just as political exigencies or necessity might dictate. The right hon. gentleman, surrounded as he is, and with the experience he has had, surely should be in a position if any man in the world is in a position, to define what moderate protection is.

The position as it appeals to me, is this. The tariff in this country must be framed on either one or another of two hypotheses. It must be framed to suit the fair exigencies of business and the people, or to suit the exigencies of politics. The right hon. gentleman while he was leader of the government professed to adhere to to a policy of moderate protection, interweaving in some way with a tariff for revenue only, but he framed his policy, that is to say he drew the line where it would suit the exigencies of politics. I make that statement advisedly, and from having observed the policy of the right hon. gentleman, both as a member of this House, and as a citizen of Canada. I do not think the right hon. gentleman will deny that that was the policy that guided him in the framing of his tariff. If I require further authority I read from an editorial in the Manitoba 'Free Press', which is the organ of the right hon. gentleman in western Canada, and which strenuously conducted newspaper warmly supported him in the late contest.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend honours me when he says that the 'Free Press' is my organ.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am always pleased to honour my right hon. friend when I can do so with truth. The editorial is headed 'A Permanent Tariff Board,' and contains the following sentence:

> The late government was as protectionist as it thought it necessary to be to placate powerful interests and make them neutral or friendly.

Now that is the talisman, according to the organ of the government itself, that regulated their protectionist policy. So that while the hon. gentleman who lately represented western Canada, and whose views this doubtless interprets exactly, will, I hope, not disavow the authority of his organ in the west. If we are to follow that principle then the method adopted by the late government is beautifully suited to the case, authorizing a rambling band of politicians to pass over Canada and find out just what would be the political effect of a certain schedule here or there, and then fixing the schedule with a view to getting as large a percentage of votes as possible. That being the case, a tariff board certainly is an unnecessary luxury in Canada. But, if, on the contrary, we are to base our tariff on the business, commercial and industrial effects it will have, and so have the objective of the successful carrying on of Canadian industries and Canadian industrial life, we cannot have too much light, and no schedule in our tariff that cannot stand the light should stand without light, and on the other hand no schedule and no set of business people in Canada should be made to suffer the odium of ignorant suspicion in this country. That is the purpose of the tariff board. But hon. gentlemen want to know who the men on the board would be. There is not a responsible man on the opposite side who would suggest that it was the duty of the government or of any one to assert now who the men would be. They say: If we do not know who they are, tell us their opinions. The hon. gentleman who sits behind the first minister has acknowledged that we know constitutionally no differences of party in this country and consequently it would be impossible, and not to be expected that the government would state from which party they were to come. The hon. gentleman is greatly concerned about a statement of my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames). No one in this House has more admiration for the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) than I have, and his conviction evidently is that most people in this country are, on tariff matters, in line with the government of the day. I think he has ample evidence to support his conviction because the great majority of the people in this country do believe in the policy of reasonable protection that is the policy ot this government.

The hon. member (Mr. Ames) made some remark from which the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) draws the inference that he would debar a man if he had leanings towards free trade. For myself, if the appointee were qualified in every other way, if he came to the duties of his office with the qualifications which I think he should have, qualifications as a student and as a fearless investigator, qualified, in a word, as the minister has stated he should be qualified, then my opinion as a private member is that he should not be debarred from serving on the board. No minister has stated that any political opinion is to disqualify any man from serving on this board, if he is qualified fairly to investigate and to report, these are the qualifications insisted on by the government.

Now why should this Bill not pass?

Mr. NESBITT. Because the hon. member is keeping it back.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. member says I am keeping it back. I feel quite confident that my hon. friend, when he comes to speak, will follow my illustrious example.

Mr. KYTE. The Minister of Finance intimated that if there was more information the consumers of this county might be more reconciled to the policy of reasonable protection. I think that is the key of the whole situation.

Mr. WHITE. Did I say that?

Mr. KYTE. I regret very much if I have misinterpreted any statement of the hon. minister, but he said that what was needed was more information, and that if the consumers of Canada had more information perhaps they would be more reasonable in their attitude towards protection. That is a paraphrase of what I understood the hon. Minister of Finance to say, that is the key of the situation. So far as one can gather from ministerial statements, this commission will be an institution for the purpose of gathering information of one kind with the object of inducing consumers to believe that they are wrong and that what is needed is more protection. It seems to me that that is a manifest deduction to be drawn from the speech of the Finance Minister. A year ago a commission was appointed for the purpose of getting information on the subject of technical education. That is a question in which different classes of the community are deeply interested. Had the leader of the late government proposed on that commission the representative of one particular class, such as the manufacturing interests, he would have been met by protests from all over the country.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. When the Bill appointing that commission passed this House, were the names given of the men who were to be appointed?

Mr. KYTE. They were not then, and I do not think anybody on this side has asked the present government to name the particular persons to be appointed.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Did anybody ask for a guarantee, when that commission was appointed, that the labour and other interests would be represented on it?

Mr. KYTE. Whether that was asked or not is entirely beside the question. As a matter of fact all interests were represented on it. The manufacturers, the labouring men, the universities, were represented on that commission. Every interest likely to be affected by its proceedings and report was represented. Further than that I would remind my hon. friend that in the composition of that board, the Conservative party was not overlooked because in the appointment of Mr. Simpson and Mr. Murray of Toronto, the late government named two men affiliated with the Conservative party.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I want to deny that. Mr. Simpson is an avowed Socialist.

Mr. KYTE. From the experience I have in this House, I am quite prepared for interruptions from the hon. gentleman and do not take any account of them. But to come back to the question, what we desire is to have some guarantee from the Minister of Finance that the consumers of this country will be represented on this commission, and that it will not be an institution devised simply for the purpose of educating people into the belief that protection is the best policy for this country. If the sympathies of the men composing the commission should be entirely in favour of protection, we have reason to believe that they will be careful to summon before them only those who would be in sympathy with a higher tariff. As I pointed out the other evening, there is no provision in this Bill to enable a man to come forward voluntarily and give his evidence. It is provided that witnesses shall be summoned before this board to give evidence, but I submit that there should also be a provision enabling any man, no matter what may be his views on the tariff, to come forward and state them. The omission of such a provision justifies the conclusion that this institution is simply created to lead people into the belief that protection, and protection alone, is the proper policy for the country.

Mr. CURRIE. Does the hon. gentleman declare himself a free trader?

Mr. KYTE. I do not know that whatever the hon. gentleman's views may be can have much significance, but, since he appears anxious to ascertain mine, I am in favour of such protection only as is necessary for the revenues of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I must confess that I am much surprised at what I have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite. I thought that on the second reading of the Bill we had arrived at a conclusion as to what its real intention was, namely, to procure information for the government and the country in order that we might frame a tariff measure suited to our needs. And let me say now that if there are hon. gentlemen more in need of information on that subject than any other they are to be found on that side. During the second reading of this Bill they exhibited the most extraordinary ignorance of the character of our tariff. I say that without any intention of being offensive, because they have been taught by their leader that the tariff in force is a low tariff, instead of which it is one of the highest taxation tariffs we have had during the last thirty or forty years. Go through it item after item of articles of every day consumption, and you will find the taxation on these increased enormously. Take the article of sugar, which is consumed by every family in the country, rich and poor. Now, if these hon. gentlemen, who plume themselves on being the low tariff party, were anxious to keep down taxation, why did they so enormously increase the duty on sugar? Raw sugar is the basis of the refined article, and the higher we increase the price of the raw the higher we raise the price of the refined. Hon. gentlemen opposite were not satisfied with the duty on raw sugar as they found it, but immediately on assuming office set to work to see how high they could make it. They told us that their tariff was for revenue only, and they were determined to get all the revenue they could out of sugar. If we apply the tariff of the late government to the imports of sugar of the last year, we will find that they had increased the duty in 1911 on raw sugar alone by $344,000, which is a very considerable item for a low tariff government. It looks rather strange that they should be so extremely alarmed lest the Bill before the House should result in a higher tariff when they themselves have acted along that line by increasing duty after duty on articles of daily consumption.

Now, I say that there is no excuse for that increased duty on sugar; and if as hon. gentlemen opposite say the Finance Minister is going to put somebody on this commission who will work along the line of increased duties, I think these hon. gentlemen should welcome it, because that has been their policy for many years. Without making special reference to what any hon. member said on the second reading of this Bill, I must say that I am amused at some of the statements made on the other side of the House on the subject of the tariff, for that subject came largely into the discussion. But let me point out a few concrete examples to show how far these hon. gentlemen are astray in their opinions of their own tariff. If these hon. gentlemen want a tariff in accordance with their ideals, and if they think that Tariff Commission will have the effect of raising the tariff, I think they should welcome this Bill instead of opposing it. But I do not think that is the intention of the Minister of Finance. He wants a commission simply to give information. During the last fifteen years I have given great attention to the study of the tariff; in fact, I venture to say I have given as much attention to it as any other hon. member of this House. I do not boast of it; it was my duty to do it. As a result of that study, I venture to say that, if any hon. member on that side thinks he has been supporting a lower tariff on many articles, he is sadly mistaken. And I believe that information to show how he is mistaken is what this commission will supply. I have given some instances of increased tariff in this House before, but let me call attention to a few of them now. Take the case of fire-arms. I was charged years ago with being a high protectionist by a gentleman who claims to be a free trader. But when I pointed out that his free trade principles carried him far above my idea of moderate protection in the rate of tariff duties, I think that hon. gentleman was quite surprised. When the late government came into power the duty on fire-arms was 20 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite immediately put it up to 30 per cent. That was not very like a free trade or lower tariff government..

Mr. EMMERSON. Dangerous weapons.

Mr. HENDERSON. Anyhow they thought they would put the tariff on a higher plane. Many people in this country wish to buy rifles and guns for hunting and that sort of thing, and they had to be taxed by this additional rate of duty. But the answer was that the British preference would regulate that. It would take one-third off the 30 per cent and bring it down to 20 per cent, at which it had stood before. But they forgot we did not buy our firearms entirely from Great Britain, but largely from the United States. Firearms coming in from the United States or other countries pay 30 per cent duty, and only those coming from Great Britain enter at 20 per cent. I see, Mr. Chairman, you are looking at the clock, and I must be brief, otherwise six o'clock will arrive before we get through. But let us consider the clock for a minute. This is an instrument you will find in every household—abundance of them. Did the Liberal government, when it came in, leave the duty on clocks where it had been? No, they wanted 'tariff for revenue' so they increased the duty on clocks. They said: Here is a thing that every man must have in his house, and here is a chance for us to get more money. And the same with watches. They knew that everybody in Canada desires to have a watch, so they said: We want revenue, so we will make them pay higher duty on their watches. I looked up the figures the other day to see what the increase was. The duty on watches under the much abused National Policy, had been 25 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite raised the duty to 30 per cent. But they said the British preference would regulate that, and bring the duty on watches a little below 20 per cent. But they forgot that Great Britain was not a watch making country. This is exactly one of the things in which our tariff commission could help. They would be able to tell us that Great Britain is not a watch making country, and that consequently the hope of applying the British preference to the duty paid on watches will not be satisfactory. We get our watches chiefly from Switzerland, the United States and France. So, instead of paying 25 per cent on watches, as it was under the national policy, last year we paid over 28 per cent on watches from all countries, notwithstanding the British preference. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been supporting that tariff since 1897, and they are crying out to-day about the high tariff, when as a matter of fact this is the very tariff they made and supported. I might go on with item after item. Take linen goods. The duties were increased from 25 to 30 per cent. Of course, the British preference applied, but everything in this line that we get from countries outside of Great Britain came in at the higher rate of duty. Take even the grey cottons, which are made very largely in Canada. The duty was 22½ per cent, but these hon. gentlemen, when in power, increased that duty to 25 per cent, of course, expecting the British preference to bring it down to 19 per cent. But the fact is that we do not get all our grey cottons from Great Britain. It is a fact known to every business man in Canada, that grey cottons made in Great Britain are not sold in Canada to any great extent. Why? because they are not so good. They are not of the same quality as the American and Canadian cottons, and the people of this country will demand the American or Canadian goods in this line in preference to those made in Great Britain. They have to pay now 25 per cent instead of 22½ per cent as it was before. But you may tell me that on the Canadian grey cottons of course there would be no increase, because they are made in Canada and do not pay duty.

Have we forgotten the theory of Sir Richard Cartwright and his friends, when they advocated so strongly, that if you place a tariff on an article of Canadian manufacture the price will just work up to the price of the imported article? That is the case, and there may be a great deal in it. Why, we are paying an increased duty price on all our Canadian made grey cottons. Take coloured cotton, 30 per cent under the old government, raised to 35 per cent by the hon. gentlemen who are now crying high tariff, and who now dread a commission, a partisan commission that may be appointed that will increase the duty, after having sat here ever since 1897 and supporting a high tariff. I am surprised that such is the case. But nevertheless, remembering what we heard during the second reading of the Bill, that seems to be the feeling of hon. gentlemen. After raising the duty on coloured cottons from 30 to 35 per cent, the government became alarmed, and reduced to 32½ per cent, leaving it still 2½ per cent higher than under the National Policy. They thought that all our coloured cottons were coming from Great Britain, and were coming in under the reduced tariff. We do get a great many from Britain, but I tell you the best coloured cottons in every day wear by the women of this country are the coloured cottons made in Canada, no doubt about that. Take cotton prints for every day wear, the Canadian women want them and they will have them. They buy American prints, of course not high class prints, those they will buy from Britain, and the duty will be somewhat lower. That seems to me to be unfair. The preference is given to the woman who wants a high class article, but the woman who wants an article that will wear and wash, has to pay a higher duty on it, practically. That applies to coloured cottons of every class. Take the men who wear ducks, denims and all these coarse goods that are used by the farmers, workingmen and the labourers for summer wear, they are all called upon to pay a higher duty by reason of this increase, because British goods of that class are not imported into Canada. You can go through the shops of Canada and you do not find ducks, denims, cotton tweeds and cottonades on their counters to any extent, the people do not want them and consequently they are not to be found there. The result is that we have been paying during the last ten or fifteen years, duties on the articles that we do want, that the people want, a great deal higher than we did before. Why, then, all this alarm that the government is going to appoint a Tariff Commission that will be in favour of increasing the duties? Why, that is exactly along the line that hon. gentlemen have advocated and supported for the last ten or twelve years. I do not see why they should be alarmed about it. My hope is that the Tariff Commission that will be appointed will do away with a great many of these anomalies; it will have the effect of pointing out to the government the unfairness of a great many clauses in our present tariff along the line I have indicated. I am not finding fault. Hon gentlemen may say I am complaining about the British preference; nothing of the kind. But I say in many things it works against the interests of the people of this country, inasmuch as the duty on so many articles was abnormally increased before the British preference was made applicable to this country. It may be said that this whole discussion, perhaps, is a little aside of the Bill which is before us. But after hearing what hon. gentlemen opposite have said, who are so extremely alarmed that a high tariff is going to be the result of this commission, I thought that I could say something on the question. I am not alarmed that our tariff wall will be made higher; I am under the impression that the very effect of this commission will be to lower the tariff. We heard something this afternoon about some gentleman in Toronto having talked about a tariff as high as 'Haman's gallows,' and the insinuation was thrown out that that was the kind of tariff this commission was going to recommend. I hope the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and who made reference to that this afternoon, will not forget that the man who made that remark in Toronto was a Liberal friend of his own, not a Conservative.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Gurneys were Liberals, there is no getting over that. It was Mr. Gurney who was the author of that statement, a friend of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Gurney was a Liberal, as the Minister of Finance is a Liberal.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, the Minister of Finance is a mighty good Liberal, I think; he is going to give hon. gentlemen more Liberal government than we have had for a great many years. But the late Minister of the Interior admits that Mr. Gurney was a Liberal when he made that statement.

Mr. OLIVER. No, no.

Mr. HENDERSON. I remember well the criticisms about it and there is no getting over the fact that Mr. Gurney was a Liberal, and I am not aware that he ever changed his politics. I do not know how he voted, whether he voted for or against reciprocity, I never inquired into it. But on the question of the tariff, Mr. Gurney had been a Liberal.

Mr. OLIVER. How long ago?

Mr. HENDERSON. When he made this statement, and I am not aware that he changed his politics since.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) has stated that Mr. Gurney was a Liberal when he made that statement. Is it not correct that Mr. Gurney left the Liberal party in 1878 when the Conservative party introduced the policy of protection, and he has always been a Conservative from that time to the present?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have lived near Toronto ever since 1878, and I never so understood it, and I believe the people of Toronto do not so understand it. I do not think Mr. Gurney is a Conservative today; if he is, I do not think his conversion has been thorough. Now strong objection was taken to something said I think, by the hon. member for St Antoine Montreal (Mr. Ames), and the inference was that he was recommending that partisans be appointed on this commission. Now what is a partisan?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear; ask the Postmaster General.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now I will ask the right hon. leader of the opposition, in fact I do not need to ask him, because I remember in this House when the right hon. gentleman, who was then leading the government, in discussing a question similar to this, said: Why, we are all partisans; he said that he himself was a partisan, and I do not think he has changed his mind. Has the right hon. gentleman forgotten that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. He remembers that, he is a partisan, and we are all partisans. That does not apply only to the members of this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am disqualified from sitting on this commission.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the hon. gentleman could hardly take that small exception. I understood the remarks of the right hon. gentleman at that time to apply to every man in the country. Who is the party man?

An hon. MEMBER. The Minister of Justice.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, the Minister of Justice was, even judges on the bench, because it is very difficult to get rid of political feelings, but where are you going to find men to put on a commission of this kind if you do not take partisans?

An hon. MEMBER. They would be no use.

Mr. HENDERSON. They would be no use because they would be men who had no opinions of their own. I do not wish to obtrude beyond the hour of six o'clock and I shall be very happy to give way to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte).

Mr. KYTE. I do not object to partisans being appointed to the commission, but I object to partisans from one party alone being selected.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) has developed into the humoristic apologist for the low tariff ideas which prevail so markedly and so suddenly amongst those who sit on the government benches! In view of what the Minister of Finance has said with respect to the light that is to be thrown on the whole question of the tariff by this commission, and in view of the attitude taken by the hon. the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) it is, I believe, an opportune moment to have light thrown on the course that is likely to be followed by the commissioners when appointed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) claimed that in view of the recognized policy of the present government, favouring a high protective tariff in Canada—

Mr. MEIGHEN. He did not say that.

Mr. EMMERSON. Well, I do not wish to misquote what the hon. member (Mr. Ames) said, but I gathered from his remarks that there are three schools of economic thought in Canada, the free trade cult, the tariff-for-revenue cult, and those who advocate the protective theory, whether you call it high, low or moderate. The hon. member (Mr. Ames) took it for granted that in view of the attitude this government had taken for many years on their fiscal policy, the selection of members of the board would be from among those who favoured protection. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) was pleased to give utterance to some very witty remarks with respect to the attitude taken by members on this side, and these remarks read in contrast with some utterances of Sir Charles Tupper, leader of the opposition in 1896 and 1897, are undoubtedly humorous. When we recall the jeremiads and lamentations of Sir Charles Tupper as respects the havoc that would be created in Canada by reason of the Fielding tariff in contrast with the prosperity of Canada under the so-called National Policy, the humour of the remarks of my hon friend will be quite apparent.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say a word? He can recall, as I can, that the speech of Sir Charles Tupper to which he refers had reference to the first tariff brought down by Mr. Fielding and not to the second tariff of the same year, which was a very different tariff.

Mr. EMMERSON. Both tariffs were practically on the same lines, the difference being that the latter one provided for a greater reduction of duties.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), viewed the question from the exigencies of politics, but the exigencies of politics are one thing and the exigencies of the country are another. After all, it is not what tariffs have been in the past or what practice has been followed that we are interested in, so much as the course that is likely to be pursued under this new departure with respect to tariff creation. The Minister of Finance says that we on this side have created spectres and that we are fighting these spectres, but it seems to me that if spectres there be, they have been created by the utterances of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), and of other supporters of the government. I asked a question of the Minister of Finance to-day about a rumour which was given wide currency in the eastern press which supports the government, and that rumour was to the effect that a member of this House, who represents a New Brunswick constituency, a lawyer by profession—indeed I might name him, I refer to the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket)—is to be appointed one of these commissioners. Now, when the resolution with reference to this Tariff Commission was first introduced by the Minister of Finance, he told us that he had in his mind ideals with respect to the experts—he used the word experts—who were to constitute this tariff board, and I gathered from his remarks that we were to have an effort on the part of the government to create a scientific tariff board, and that qualified experts would be appointed with the view of recognizing all the interests of the country. I regret that the Minister of Finance failed to take the House into his confidence this afternoon, and to give his ideal as to the personnel of this board. The hon. gentleman has been charged with adopting a Yankee device in promoting this legislation, and it may be interesting to know what course has been adopted by the Congress of the United States, with respect to this same matter. In the very elaborate Payne-Aldrich Tariff Bill of 1909, there was nothing especially creating a Tariff Commission, but it had it it a very innocent clause in these words:

To secure information to assist the president in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section, (relating to the application of the maximum and minimum rates) and the officers of the government in the application of the customs laws, the president is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

That clause in no sense created a Tariff Commission, but in pursuance of it appropriations were made to pay the salaries and expenses of the persons who might be appointed, and last autumn we are informed that these all told, amounted to over one hundred officials.

At first it was to be a body composed of three members. They had a staff of officials, experts and agents which Congress provided for them. It is interesting to know the character of the board constituted by President Taft, because he acted upon the authority of the Payne-Aldrich Bill. As chairman of the board he appointed Henry Crosby Emery, a Republican. He was formerly professor of economics at Yale University. He appointed as the second member of the board, James Burton Reynolds, who was a newspaper correspondent and editorial writer, a man in a quasi public position, a strong Republican, connected with party management in one of the states. Then he appointed Mr. Alvin Howard Saunders, a prominent Republican in Illinois, owner and manager of the 'Breeders' Gazette,' a stock review in the central states, a man interested in stock raising. I may add that Mr. Reynolds was the assistant secretary of the treasury for four years in one of the Cabinets, where he had charge of customs affairs. He had also been chairman of the Parliamentary Reciprocity Tariff League. It was alleged that this was a partisan board, and it was the object of considerable criticism on that account. The President, in order to remove any ground for criticism, appointed two additional members to the board, because the Bill, under which he organized the board, did not fix any limitations as to the number. He appointed Mr. William M. Howard, a lawyer by profession, and a Democrat. He had, I think, held some public position which gave him particular knowledge with respect to tariff matters. The fifth member of the board was Thomas Walker Payne, a Democrat, a man of great ability and high standing, who had been formerly professor of economics at the University of California. Previous to that he was a teacher of economics in the University of Virginia, and at a later date, I think he was connected with the University of Texas in a like capacity. There was a board consisting of three Republicans and two Democrats. Two of them were professors, one was a newspaperman, and two others were publicists, of whom one was a lawyer. Those gentlemen were supposed to be well qualified to aid as experts the government and President with respect to tariff matters. But this board did not even then come up to the ideal of those who had advocated the constitution of a non-partisan board, and there has been a good deal of criticism of it, both on that ground and in respect to its power. Up to the present time it has aided the government by and through its staff in gaining information. It is true that in procuring this information they relied more upon their experts and officials, and practically it would be on the same footing as if the department of my hon. friend were to create a staff of experts to procure for him the information which this board procured for the President of the United States through their experts and agents. Since then, Congress has made two efforts to create a Tariff Commission apart from this Tariff Board. One Bill was introduced by the Republicans, and another by Democrats, but neither Bill has made much progress up to this time. Now it will be admitted that the people of the United States were seeking some such body as I have described. The object of the board was undoubtedly to eliminate special privileges which were supposed to be favoured by the tariff. The object in view, as stated by the President and understood by the people, was to secure information which would justify the elimination from the tariff of all special privileges. Now, they have not yet accomplished that object.

There is a suspicion that the object of a Tariff Board such as is constitued by this Act is not to eliminate any special privileges, but to create special privileges iu favour of this or that particular class. In view of this suspicion, whether it is well-founded or not, we should have information from the minister if not with respect to the actual personnel of the commission, at least as to the class of men who are to be appointed. If the appointees are to be politicians, men who have been closely identified with the tariff policy of the party now dominant in this country, then this Bill merits very severe criticism at the hands of the members of this House and I am sure it will be severely criticised if not condemned by the people of Canada. A witty writer in speaking of the Tariff Board of the United States compared them to setting hens, and asked: What will the Tariff Board hatch? The minister, in saying that we have no right to ask at this stage for the information for which we have asked should bear in mind that what will be hatched will depend very materially on the character of the eggs which are to be placed under this board. If they be high tariff eggs, and if the commission is appointed to seek out devices whereby due privileges can be given to special classes, the proposal would be strongly condemned by the people of Canada. If a man is particularly interested in one class of industry he is likely to favour that class as a member of the board. I hold that the manufacturing interests are not alone interested in the tariff, that the great consuming body in Canada are entitled to have representation on that board and I think the minister would be doing himself great justice if he would candidly say to the consuming classes of Canada that it is his purpose to see that their interests shall be represented on this Tariff Commission when he makes a selection of the members of that board.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would the hon. gentleman then support the measure?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend cannot answer my question by asking another one. The responsibility with respect to this Bill does not rest on me. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has placed upon himself the responsibility of creating the board in the interests of the whole of Canada. If a board should be created representing all interests in Canada then the fears and alarm felt by the consuming class throughout Canada——

Mr. CURRIE Would the hon. gentleman tell us who are the consuming classes apart from the producers in this country?

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friend wants to have private instruction with respect to that matter we shall try to arrange with a night school. I have looked into the conditions prevailing in connection with the board in the United States, and the criticisms of the board there have taken two forms. There are those who believe that that board will hatch out wisps of nothing, and there are others who believe that it will hatch out more high tariff snakes in the interests of the privileged classes, of the big manufacturing interests. It is true they say it is not a Tariff Commission, that it is only a board of advisers, and they do and hope to do nothing and will not hatch out anything. But in this Bill we have a proposition with respect to an investigation as to the cost of production at home and abroad, and I could not do better than refer to a criticism that has been made with respect to the attitude taken by the President in this regard. At first the President simply took the advice of this board with respect to the maximum and minimum tariffs. The scope of their inquiry was only within those restricted limits, but later on he, of his own motion, issued instructions to the board requiring them to inquire into the cost of production at home and abroad. My hon. friend proposes by this Bill to have an inquiry as to the cost of production at home and abroad, and this criticism of the American board is certainly very pregnant of ideas for my hon. friend in any inquiry they may have prosecuted in that direction. They said:

> Moreover, as the President himself has indicated, and as shrewd observers have pointed out, there is no such thing as determining the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. How can we even say that the cost of production at home is this much or that much? Costs differ, do we mean the cost of the largest mill or the smallest.
> Do we mean the cost in the average plant or in the one that is run at an efficiency higher than the average? Do we mean the cost under the very worst conditions and in the factory which takes the booby prize in good management? Horrid thought. The truth of the matter is that there is more difference in cost of production between plants right here at home than between plants in the United States and those in foreign countries.

They go on to state the reason:

> There is a reasonable answer to this criticism. Political policies must be broad enough to work with. Tariff policies, to be stated, must be stated in broad terms. Platforms must say 'free trade' or 'tariff for revenue only,' or 'tariff to equalize the difference in cost of production at home and abroad' or 'high protection,' or 'prohibitory tariff.' This difference in cost of production was a plank in the Republican platform. President Taft attempts to conjure with it and instructs the 'tariff board' with it, not because it is the name of a perfect tariff theory or even a practical method.

This difference in the cost of production was a plank in the Republican platform, and after the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff, President Taft told the country that it was his determination to go into the matter so that there would be a reduction of the tariff in the United States and he caused this board to inquire into the cost of production at home and abroad. Yet the President of the United States said:

> There is no such thing as determining the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad.

And it is laid down as a conclusion:

> The precise difference in cost of production is not capable of definite ascertainment; all that even the most scientific person can do is to exercise his best judgment in reaching a conclusion.

That is almost axiomatic. If you consider this matter solely from the point of view of political exigencies well and good, but if you want to get at the real conditions, you certainly do not want a Tariff Board such as is proposed in this Bill. You say that these men are to collect evidence and that that evidence is for the benefit of its Finance Minister. Well, the evidence should be drawn from all sections and there should be a provision in this Bill compelling the board to draw evidence from all sections and all interests throughout Canada, whether in the remote west or here in the east. If any one desires to go before the board and state the facts relating to his business, he should have the right to do so. This Bill falls short of any such proposal and places in the hands of a select body of men, who possibly might be biased or coloured in their economic views, the gathering and the culling of evidence, the eliminating from it of features that might be an important factor in enabling us to reach the conclusion on this tariff question. There is the danger in connection with this Bill. The varied interests of the country are not safeguarded. It is all very well to say that these are bogies and spectres, but they exist, not in our minds, but by reason of the character of this Bill, by reason of its phraseology, its limitations and its restrictive methods. To say that the commissioners can do so and so or will do so and so is not sufficient. What we ought to do is force them to take evidence from every section and every interest. They should be bound, just as the Railway Commission is, to hear the application of every body interested or who has any grievance. Any man in Canada can compel the Board of Railway Commissioners to inquire into any matter which he may deem a grievance as respects himself or the community in which he resides in connection with transportation interests, and if the commission should not answer his appeal, he has the right to call on the Minister of Railways to bring it to the notice of the Railway Board.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Is the hon. gentleman in favour of some tribunal investigating these conditions?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am not framing a Bill, I am not inviting my hon. friend to consider any Bill that I am proposing, I am discussing this Bill and I say it does not go far enough. If the hon. gentleman wants to know my views on economics, I may tell him that I am a free trader in every sense of the word.

An hon. MEMBER. Since when?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have been a free trader for a long time, but I recognize that it was impossible to make a sudden change to free trade. The day will come, however, when that policy will prevail in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE. Never.

Mr. EMMERSON. The silent member has spoken. We are told by that silent modest retiring gentleman, the member from Simcoe, that we are never to have anything nearly approaching free trade. I suppose that settles the question. But after all we are dealing with this Bill as to its possibilities and the fruits it may bear in the future, it is not a matter of material moment whether this one or the other favours free trade or a tariff for revenue only or protection pure and simple. But it is a matter of supreme importance to the people whether, in constituting this commission, we are creating an agency that will act in the interests of the manufacturers, and erect greater barriers in favour of the privileged classes against the welfare of the people. If there is anything in this Bill tending in that direction, it should be eliminated.

There should be every opportunity given to discuss this Bill clause by clause, minutely, and, if possible, to remedy it. I assume that it makes no difference what my opinion in respect to the Bill is.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. I say 'hear, hear' to that, because I know that my hon. friend proposes to put it through and he has a ready and willing supporter in the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) and other members who are quite willing to nod just as he beckons. I take it for granted that this Bill is going through whether we are in favour of it or not. But it is of great importance as to whether the people of this country will favour a measure of this kind which will have, even if not intended, the result of affecting the interests of the consumer. The farming and consuming classes are compelled to buy in the dearest market, and in whose interest? In the interest of the manufacturer and only recently, on the 21st September, we denied to the producers the privilege of selling in the best and the widest market. So, they are clipped at both ends. We have given them a hobble skirt. We have hobbled them on all sides and now all through the country they are hobbling along by reason of the attitude of this government and the party which supports it. If this measure is to go through, I want this hobbling removed and as hobble skirts are not in favour in the fashionable world——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, and as they are not in favour in the fashionable world, so is our hobble skirted policy with respect to the tariff not in favour among the consuming classes of Canada and the sooner the government realize that, it will be very much better for them and, regardless of the benefits which might accrue to them, it will be very much better indeed for the people of Canada.

Mr. BLAIN. Mr. Chairman, the Bill before the House is a very important Bill, and one which should require careful consideration by every hon. gentleman who represents a constituency in Canada. We have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) and I am quite sure that they were interesting to the House even although they were not as instructive as my hon. friend thought they were. I have looked very carefully into the Bill and I find it to be a very simple one and one that appeals to every class of people in Canada. Every man who has taken any part in politics for the last few years, knows that the tariff has been, and will continue to be, a very important question in politics My hon. friends on the other side of the House, when in opposition many years ago, made an effort to put the farmer against the manufacturer, pointing out to the farmer that protection was in the interest of the manufacturer and that it could not possibly be in the interest of the farmer.

Mr. TURRIFF. That is right.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend agrees with that old policy?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. I am sure that a very large majority of the people of Canada differ from my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is not a large one.

Mr. BLAIN. And I would say to my hon. friend and the Liberal opposition, that whatever impression they were able to make on the farmers of Canada in the years gone by, they will not be able to make any now. The farmers have realized that there is no class of people in Canada who have benefited to a greater extent by the National Policy, if you might call it that, than the farmers themselves. They have built up in Canada, under the so-called National Policy, put upon the statute-books by the Liberal-Conservative party and continued in the main by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office—a splendid home market.

Mr. EMMERSON. It must have been very sick for about eighteen years.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend has argued it from that standpoint, but I am arguing it now from the standpoint of the Bill before the House. The farmers pronounced on the 21st September upon that question. The policy of the late government, when introduced, was a bid for the farmers' vote. They threw out the policy of partial reciprocity between Canada and the United States and it made a distinct issue in the last election that ended on the 21st September, with what result? With the result that the farmers all over Canada, almost in every part, turned to the Liberal-Conservative party and said: We will give you our support, and they did it on the 21st September last.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They are sorry for it now.

Mr. BLAIN. I may say to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that his Minister of Militia came up from the battle on the 21st September and, when interviewed in the city of Montreal and asked the question: How do you account for the defeat, said: In my county the farmers went against me.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They are sorry for it now.

Mr. BLAIN. The only sorrow I see in Canada anywhere is on the other side of the House.

Mr. TURRIFF. No, no.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friends have not and cannot discuss any question since this House assembled a few months ago without introducing the reciprocity proposition in some part of the debate, showing that whatever else may have been on their minds there is this important question upon their minds which was settled on the 21st September.

Mr. EMMERSON. You would like to have it forgotten.

Mr. BLAIN. I am a frank protectionist. I am not ashamed of that position, and the farmers who sent me here are protectionists too.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Moderate or immoderate?

Mr. BLAIN. I am for moderate protection, of course. We have never had a man in this House who was a protectionist to say that he was anything else than a moderate protectionist. I was looking over the tariff the other day that was in force when the Liberal-Conservative party were in office before, and I made some comparisons between that old tariff and the boasted Fielding tariff of 1907. Go over item after item and you will find that in many cases items that hon. gentlemen condemned for so many years while they were in opposition and condemn now are exactly the same as in the Fielding tariff that they boasted so much of. Take, for instance, the article of apples; 40 cents a barrel was the duty put on long years ago. That was condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite. They said: Of course, protection cannot protect the farmer; but when they came into office and brought down the boasted Fielding tariff the same old duty of 40 cents a barrel was placed on apples. They condemned it when they found it had been placed upon the statute-book by the Liberal-Conservative party and applauded it when they left it as it was in the measure of the Liberal government. This question of establishing a Tariff Commission was introduced into Canada only a few months ago, but in reality it had been referred to in this country and in the House for many years.

When it was mentioned, some months ago, before the House assembled the newspapers took it up. The newspapers on either side of politics understood what was meant, and nowhere did they take from it what hon members on the other side take from it, that it is a Bill designed to take away legislative powers from the government of the day. In proof of this, let me cite an editorial from the Toronto 'Globe', a newspaper that would not be too friendly to this government. On January 6 last, the Toronto 'Globe' said, referring to the Tariff Bill:

> The Canadian Commission will have no executive functions, and will in no way usurp the right of parliament to regulate imposed duties. It will report to the government findings of fact and evidence upon which the same are predicated, and these will be laid before parliament in justification of such fiscal changes as may from time to time be proposed by the government.

So the 'Globe' understood it very well, for it points out the very substance of the Bill the Finance Minister has introduced. It does not for a moment suggest that this Bill will take away any functions of the government or of this parliament. It is understood that the functions of the Tariff Commission will be to lay before parliament for the use of every member, and I suppose particularly for the use of the Cabinet ministers now in office, such important facts as are necessary for an understanding of any proposals to alter the tariff. Surely, that is something that commends itself to every man. Surely it will commend itself to that class of people who suggest that the manufacturers of this country are too highly protected. To hear hon. gentlemen opposite when mention is made of manufacturers, one would think that the manufacturers were the enemies of this country instead of its friends. I do not think it becomes any member of this House to cast reflections on the manufacturing class whose members are to be found in both parties and who paid last year no less than $250,000,000 in gold in wages to the people of Canada. They do not require any defence on my part; they are well able to take care of themselves. Imagine the manufacturers of Canada, who have their money invested, who watch their business closely, and enterprisingly seek a market for their products, coming to the Finance Minister and suggesting to him to put on the statute-book a protective policy, as hon. members opposite would call it, diametrically opposed to every interest of the farming class in Canada. The farmers are the main customers of the manufacturers.

Without the home market afforded by the farmers, the manufacturers of Canada could not succeed. I cannot see how any man on either side can suggest—I doubt that any man really would suggest—that the manufacturers would come to the doors of parliament demanding such increases of duties as hon. members on the other side speak of to kill off the farming industry of this country. I believe that the farmers are interested in the tariff and that the manufacturers are equally interested. I believe that hon. members on the other side are in favour of tariffs—they proved themselves so by keeping the National Policy on the statute-book. It was a debatable question in this House what changes they would make on coming into power in order to keep the pledges that they had given to the people years before. They failed to keep those pledges. And I do not think the people of this country will take them at their word any more. For my part, I am thinking the Bill should commend itself to this House, and I am sure it will commend itself to the people. If there is a manufacturing establishment now that has the benefit of protection higher than it should have, the duty of the Tariff Commission will be to gather such information in respect of that establishment and manufacture, and lay it before parliament and the people so that the case may be understood. That is all my hon friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds) is asking. And I think it will be time enough for hon. members on the other side to condemn the Tariff Board when it has been in operation and has made some mistake. It is all very well for hon. members opposite to declare that they are seeking information. The leader of the opposition declared in this discussion that he was anxious for facts. He was crying for information because my right hon. friend said that when we were discussing the reciprocity proposition a few months ago there was some suggestion that we of this country did not have sufficient information, that we suffered in that respect in comparison with the legislature on the other side of the line which had complete information. I think my hon. friend is correct in that we did complain of lack of information. Some hon. members suggest now that they want information, but that information could be had in some other way. In what other way? By adding to the staff of the Finance Department. Would not that cost money? The only difference is as to whether these new officers should be called a Tariff Commission or whether they should be called officers of the Finance Department to gather these statistics and lay them all on the table. That is a small matter, so small that I do not think the hon. members opposite will interest the people of Canada in their criticisms. Looking over the Bill, its simplicity appeals to me. This commission is to investigate

(a) The price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption.

That has always been a subject of discussion when tariffs are before the House:

(b) The cost of production in Canada and elsewhere;
(c) the cost of transportation from the place of production to the place of use or consumption, whether in Canada or elsewhere;
(d) the cost, efficiency and conditions of labour in Canada and elsewhere;
(e) the prices received by producers, manufacturers, wholesale dealers, retailers and other distributors in Canada and elsewhere;
(f) all conditions and factors which affect or enter into the cost of production and the price to the consumers in Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say there is nothing in the Bill relating to consumers. Surely this is a reference direct enough. And why should not the Finance Minister be as much interested in the consumer as hon. gentlemen on the other side? The Minister of Finance and his colleagues will have to report in a few years to the people of Canada. I should think that the Minister of Finance would be as much interested in the consumer as any hon. gentleman on the other side who has no particular governmental responsibility. Therefore, I think, it is rather narrow criticism, if I may put it that way, for gentlemen on the other side to suggest that this Bill has nothing in it but suggestions for increasing tariffs, that there is no thought in it from the consumer's standpoint, and is merely bolstering up the manufacturing interest. I do not so read it, and no one can fairly read into the Bill any such interpretation. And the Toronto 'Globe,' which I have quoted, understands fully the purpose of this proposal of the government for a National Tariff Commission to lay before the people all the facts, so that proposals in changes in the tariff may be dealt with on the basis of those facts.

If, for example, on looking over the tariff, it is found that one manufactured article has more protection than it should have, then the machinery of the Tariff Commission is called into operation and the commission considers the price of the raw material, the transportation cost, the cost of labour, and it goes into a close examination of everything that enters into the cost of manufacturing that article, and that information is laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. TURRIFF. No.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend says no, but the fact is that all information will be laid upon the table of the House except such information as may be of a private nature, and which would allow one business man to take advantage of his competitor. I do not suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) would argue that such information should be made public.

Mr. TURRIFF. There is not one word in the Bill that compels them to lay any information on the table of the House. The information is to be supplied only to the Minister of Finance, as I understand it.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the hon. gentleman think that the Minister of Finance is going to change the tariff without consulting his colleagues and without submitting it for the approval of parliament?

Mr. TURRIFF. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Then, who is the information for?

Mr. TURRIFF. The whole trend of the Bill is that that information should be given to the Minister of Finance, and he and the government can use their judgment as to whether they will submit that information to parliament or not.

Mr. BLAIN. I have sat in this House for many years, and I have heard the late Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, give reasons why certain changes should take place in the tariff, but to hear these hon. gentlemen opposite talk now, you would suppose that the present Minister of Finance was intending to appropriate this information for himself and in the interests of the manufacturers.

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) says 'hear, hear,' and he is the gentleman who, in years gone by, has advanced free trade and low tariff propositions in this House and out of it, but who experienced a change of mind, and for fifteen years supported a protectionist government and helped to keep them in office. Perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has experienced another conversion. My understanding is that the Tariff Commission will gather all the necessary information, and that when the proper time comes the Minister of Finance will give to the House the reasons why such a rate should be raised or lowered, as the case may be, and the only class of information that will not come up for public discussion, is that information which may be obtained from one manufacturer or one farmer and which, if made public, might injure the business of another manufacturer or another farmer. The whole burden of the opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite to this Bill has been—notwithstanding that the explanation given by the Minister of Finance has adequately answered that objection—that this Bill is going to take away from parliament the power to legislate on tariffs, and give it to the Tariff Commission.

Mr. NESBITT. Not a word.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt) was frank enough to compliment the Minister of Finance upon the clear statement of facts he gave to the House when he introduced the Bill.

Mr. NESBITT. I did not say a word about the other thing.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nesbitt) who is interrupting me, whether he is a free trader or a protectionist.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Mr. NESBITT. I told my hon. friend the other day that I was for a reasonable tariff.

Mr. BLAIN. Oh, yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BLAIN. Well, here is the long list of articles mentioned in the tariff, and will my hon. friend point to any single item which during fifteen years he ever ventured to put his finger on and say: The rate is too high. It is, therefore, fair to conclude, that the tariff, as it is now, is a moderate tariff.

Mr. NESBITT. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Then, the hon. gentleman is perfectly satisfied with it, and no doubt there are some people in the country who differ from him on that point. There are many people in this country who are protectionists because of the existing conditions, and because that to the south of us we have a very highly protected country. I suppose that everybody, other conditions being equal, would believe in the principle of free trade.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAIN. Well, the right hon. gentleman advocated free trade on the people of Canada for many years. When he was in opposition before he stood on public platforms, and he told the people if they put him into power he would give free trade as they have it in England. He went from one end of Canada to the other telling the people the same thing, telling them he was not in favour of tariffs, that tariffs had made the manufacturer rich and bled the farmer——

Mr. TURRIFF. White.

Mr. BLAIN. Yes, bled the farmers white, and the people of Canada took the right hon. gentleman's word and they put him in power, but he did not give them free trade. The right hon. gentleman is trying that on the people again, but I can assure him that they will trust him no more. The right hon. gentleman has prided himself as a peacemaker, and I do not wish to detract from any credit which is due to him in that respect. He has been a very prominent man in Canada for many years, and he is entitled to credit for anything he has done in the interests of the country. But, the right hon. gentleman cannot claim that he is now assuming the attitude of a peacemaker, because his speech of this afternoon was an evident attempt to inflame the manufacturer against the farmer and the farmer against the manufacturer in this country. Judging from the discussion in this House of last Wednesday, and of this afternoon, the members of the opposition seem to desire, notwithstanding the verdict of the 21st of September, to make a further effort to take Canada out of the ranks of protectionist countries. Well, I do not think the right hon. gentleman and his supporters will have very much success in that line. We, on this side of the House, are reasonable protectionists, and we are willing and ready to say so in this House or out of it, but hon. gentlemen opposite who during fifteeen years of office were protectionists, are afraid or ashamed to say so. One of them is in favour of protection on coal, another in favour of protection on iron, another, when he was sitting on the government benches moved for an increased duty on pork, and so on down along the line.

There is the hon. member for South Wellington, a protectionist of course, who is credited with saying that he could change as quick as any other party in Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to deny that.

Mr. BLAIN. To me it is necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do deny it.

Mr. BLAIN. Does my hon. friend say he is not a protectionist?

Mr. GUTHRIE. I stated on Wednesday what my position is, I believe in a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, of course.

Mr. BLAIN. Here is an item in the tariff with a duty of 30 per cent. Would my hon. friend state whether a duty of 30 per cent is for revenue or a protective tariff.

Mr. NESBITT. Tell us the item, perhaps it is revenue.

Mr. BLAIN. Here is 10 per cent a bushel on oats, is that protective or revenue only?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is your own view?

Mr. NESBITT. As the hon. gentleman is making the speech I would like to know his view.

Mr. BLAIN. Forty cents a barrel on apples. The Liberal-Conservative party put that on, and my right hon. friend and his supporters retained it.

Mr. NESBITT. My hon. friend knows that I voted to take that off.

Mr. BLAIN. When?

Mr. NESBITT. On the 21st September.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend voted to take it off, and I would point out that the people of Canada differed with my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. NESBITT. My constituency did not.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend had rather a close call.

Mr. NESBITT. Not very close when they trebled my former majority.

Mr. BLAIN. If I wished to do so I could tell the reason.

Mr. NESBITT. Let us hear it.

Mr. BLAIN. It had nothing to do with reciprocity. My hon. friend sits for a county that used to give 1,500 Reform majority. What is the matter with it now?

Mr. NESBITT. I polled more votes on the 21st September than ever were polled when they gave 1,500 majority.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend comes from a province that left him and his leader only 13 members out of 86. There was some little difference of opinion in that province as to whether they wanted those duties taken off or not.

I am heartily in accord with the Bill. I want to compliment the Finance Minister upon his frankness when presenting it to the House. He told the House what the duties of the commision would be, and how far their findings would go in the settlement of the tariff. He said the duties of the commission would be simply to gather information for the use of the government and people of Canada, and that the government and the party would be responsible for whatever tariff changes were made, if any were made after that information was brought before the House. I am willing to trust the government, I have faith in the government as the people of Canada have. I am not going to say that this Tariff Commission will be a bad one before it has had an opportunity of giving its views to the people of Canada. I am going to wait, as my hon. friend has often twitted us on this side to wait, until the Tariff Commision is appointed, I am going to wait until I have an opportunity of looking into the work they have done, and if I find as a supporter of the government, that they are not giving an equivalent for their cost and for their position, then I will be one of the first to condemn the commision. There is a demand for it in this country, when there is such a diversity of opinion as to whether the tariff is too low or too high. I am going to join with my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance and his government, in giving to the people of Canada an opportunity to have an independent tribunal to furnish this House and this country with such information so that the government of the day can make certain changes, if changes are necessary, either up or down. It may be down, it may be up, but this information will be for the use of the government in determining that, and I am heartily in accord with the Bill and will give it my support.

Mr. NEELY. This is a very important section, because we all know that no matter what may be the object of this Bill, or the purpose in creating this commission, a very great deal will depend on the personnel of the board. Early in the session, I put some questions on the order paper, relative to the personnel of this proposed commission, and as to what walks of life they would be selected from. The information I received at that time, was very indefinite, so indefinite as not to be information at all. I do not know that hon. gentlemen opposite have any right to criticise or find fault with those on this side of the House, who ask for information as to the character of the personnel of this commission. That appears to me to be a very vital point. It was pointed out in the debate on the second reading of the Bill that there had never been any demand in Canada for the creation of a board such as this, except the demand made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. We have never heard of any body of farmers or agriculturists, of any labour unions, of any other labour interests in this country calling for the creation of a tariff board with this single exception of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

There is fear in the hearts of a great number of people in Canada over the prospect created by this Bill. That is the fear, the well-founded fear, that the government are projecting an important departure in our fiscal policy in the interests of the manufacturers. When has there been any demand from any section of the people except the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, for this measure? That being the case, we are justified in wanting to know from the minister what class of men he proposes to appoint on this commission. If they are to be partisan politicians, men who believe in a high protective duty, we all know what we may expect from the appointment of such a board. We have no definite knowledge as to who would constitute the board, but judging by the influence which puts this government into power, we can draw a very fair inference. There are more people interested in the tariff question than the manufacturers. The great consuming classes are still more interested, because it is they who pay the larger share of the duties, and in their interest we would like to know whether they are going to be represented on the personnel of this commission. We on this side have been accused by hon. gentlemen opposite of being sometimes free traders, and sometimes protectionists. Well, so far as my information goes, the Liberal party in this country is a unit on the tariff question, but what about hon. gentlemen opposite? Take my hon. friends in the province of Manitoba, one of the things they found fault with in connection with the late reciprocity agreement was that it did not sufficiently reduce the duty on agricultural implements. They are low tariff men. Take our friends from the province of Quebec, if newspaper statements are correct, many of them secured their election, not on the ground of sympathy with the Conservative party in its fiscal policy, but on the ground of being in sympathy with the Liberal party on its fiscal policy, but against it on the question of the navy.

Mr. PELLETIER. That is news to me. I never heard that before.

Mr. NEELY. I would like to know from the Postmaster General if his followers in the province of Quebec did not take up a position in favour of reciprocity.

Mr. PELLEITER. That is news to me. On election day, in the city of Quebec, when we had the results of the election from all over Canada, I said to the large crowd which was listening to us that we were glad Canada had written this glorious page in its history and had shown it was in favour of Canada for the Canadians and of British connection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am prepared to say that some of the Conservative candidates were in favour of reciprocity, but against the navy.

Mr. PELLETIER. I know of none.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I know of several.

Mr. PELLETIER. I had something to do with the elections and ought to know.

Mr. NEELY. Many things are said after the elections which are not said preceding and during them. I may tell my hon. friend that possibly his friends in that province of Quebec, may have something to tell him later on, about another question than the one before us, and which was instrumental in bringing him and his supporters to this House.

Mr. PELLETIER. What was that?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Tell us now.

Mr. NEELY. Let my hon. friends have a little patience, they will be told about it in due time. The question of the personnel of this commission is a very important one. We know at whose demand and desire this commission is being appointed by this government.

An hon. MEMBER. At whose?

Mr. NEELY. At the request of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

An hon. MEMBER. Give us some evidence of that.

Mr. NEELY. I would like to know of any other representative body in Canada who ever asked for it?

An hon. MEMBER. Did they?

Mr. NEELY. They passed resolutions calling for a Tariff Commission at their annual meetings.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Not of this kind.

Mr. NEELY. Of course the Canadian Manufacturers' Association did not actually draft this Bill, but they have taken a position year after year in favour of appointing a permanent Tariff Board, and we know perfectly well that the manufacturers of Canada were largely responsible, by their assistance, for bringing this government into power. What is the situation that is going to be brought about in matters political by the creation of this board, if it is to be constituted from active partisans? We know that in certain provinces of Canada there are liquor interests which have to go to the governments of those provinces to secure licenses and which consequently have to stand in with the license boards appointed by those governments. Well, we are asked to appoint a Board of Commissioners who will have it in their power, if they should be partisan, to do great service to the present government. Is it not true, that, if they should be partisan, they could say to these manufacturers: if you are not good, if you do not give an active support to the Liberal Conservative party, we will fix you when the time comes for us to recommend what tariff rates should be imposed on the goods that come into competition with yours?

So, I say, it appears to me that this question is not the idle question hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe, this question raised by hon. members on this side as to what information the Minister of Finance and the leader of the government have in their possession with reference to the class of men they propose to appoint on this commission. In a discussion on this particular question, I do not wish to enter upon many of the matters which were brought up by the hon. members for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and Peel (Mr. Blain). They, in fact, discussed the whole tariff situation and the fiscal policies of different parties. I do not propose to do that. But, perhaps, I may be permitted a word with reference to what was stated by the hon. member for Halton. Before he concluded his remarks that hon. gentleman expressed the pious hope—it was a pious hope, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman was sincere in it—that if this Tariff Commission got working, we should find that the result of their operations would be to lower tariffs rather than to increase them. Though he expressed a hope on that point, my hon. friend did not express very much conviction. I should be glad to entertain the hope, even without the conviction, but I am very sorry that even that hope is denied me. Let me tell the hon. member (Mr. Henderson) also that he did not deceive the House or the country when he picked out from the tariff list a few items on which the late government had increased duties to some extent, as intimating to the House and to the country that the government had actually increased the duties. The items so carefully selected by the hon. gentleman were, in the main, not items of production in this country but of manufacture outside.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sugar.

Mr. NEELY. An hon. member says 'sugar.' That is produced to some small extent in Canada, but not to an extent worthy of consideration. By carrying his argument to its logical conclusion, my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) could prove equally well that there is no such place as free trade England, for while England is a free trade country, she does put taxes on goods brought in from other countries not produced within her own borders. On the items mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and basing the tariff on revenue, the late government might well have been justified in placing considerable duties upon them. But, having made such a careful study of the tariff as he told us he has done, the hon. gentleman should not have left out of consideration the very important statement given to the House, I think on the 4th April last, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster, Toronto), in the form of a table of figures demonstrating that taxation had been, on the average, largely decreased since the coming into power of the Liberal government in 1896. But I do not wish to digress.

The Finance Minister has been complimented on having made a frank statement on introducing the Bill. Well, why cannot he be frank with all the members of the House while we are dealing with this section of the personnel of the commission? Why cannot he tell us now that he will appoint men who, he is confident, and the government is confident, and who he is confident the country will be confident, are men who will see to it that every class in Canada shall be carefully looked after in the work they propose to carry out? Cannot he tell us that?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I thought I had said that, in substance.

Mr. NEELY. Perhaps the hon. minister did say it in substance. But we all know very well that human nature is human nature the world over. And if the hon. gentlemen propose under this Bill to appoint three gentlemen as members of this permanent tariff board who are known throughout the country to be partisan politicians or who do not represent in themselves the various and to some extent the conflicting interests of which this country and every country are made up, then we shall be justified in suspicion as to the operation of the Bill.

Mr. STAPLES. What three elements does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) think should be represented?

Mr. NEELY. If I were responsible for the Bill, I should tell the hon. gentleman very quickly. Not being responsible, I have no hesitation in telling him any way. In the first place, I think the farmers should be represented; in the second place the great labouring interests should be represented; then, as I have no fight with the manufacturers—none whatever—I see no reason why the manufacturing and industrial interests of Canada should not also be represented. And while I am opposed to the creation of this board and think it unnecessary, and think that the effect will probably be bad, yet I say to the hon. minister that if he will state that these interests shall be represented, much of my objection to the Bill will absolutely disappear.

Mr. STAPLES. I am not going to make a speech, for I think that ample has been said on both sides and the Bill might go forward. But I want to put a question or two to my hon. friend (Mr. Neely). He seems much concerned about the interests of the people of the west. I think he is quite justified in being so, he also stated there is serious and strenuous opposition to this legislation. I want to ask my hon. friend, is he not aware of the fact that when the right hon. leader of this House (Mr. Borden) came to the western country previous to the campaign, he stated clearly that he would appoint such a commission as is here proposed? Does he not also know that when the speech from the Throne was made on the 10th of November last, this subject was mentioned in that speech? Does he not know also that in fulfilment of these promises this Bill has been presented to this House? Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken of certain elements in the country as deserving that such a commission should not be appointed. Let me ask him, has he any resolutions from the farmers organizations or any other organizations opposing this measure? The whole opposition is on the part of the other side of this House. And for what purpose? For political purposes and nothing else.

But you are not making any headway; even the press of the country is not coming to your assistance. You are simply wasting the time of the House for no other object than political advantage.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think I should call the attention of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) to the remark he made a moment ago, when he said that the Toronto 'Globe' understood the nature of the Bill now before the House, and he read an extract from the 'Globe' of January 6. I remember that article in the 'Globe' because it rather complimented the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) for the stand he is supposed to have taken in the Cabinet Council in opposition to the broader measure which it was the intention, I believe, of the government to bring down. The point to which I take exception is that the member for Peel read an extract from the editorial column of the 'Globe,' and anyone who did not understand the situation would say that the 'Globe' must have known on the 6th of January what this Bill contained, that the 'Globe' must have had some private wire from the Minister of Finance. But what he read, in fact, was the Toronto 'Mail and Empire's' words, and not the 'Globe's' words at all.

Mr. BLAIN. Will my hon. friend pass it over to me?

Mr. GUTHRIE. The article reads as follows:

A statement in the 'Mail and Empire' as to the scope and functions of the Tariff 'Commission' to be created by the government as soon as parliament gives authority therefor, indicates that the 'commission' is not to be a commission at all in the commonly understood significance of the term. The Canadian commission, we are told,——

Now come in the inverted commas:

—'will in no way correspond to the proposed tariff commission in the United States, where the tariff commission, as distinguished from the tariff board, contemplates the creation of a body authorized to raise, lower, or suspend customs duties with the approval of the President. The Canadian commission will have no executive functions, and will in no way usurp the right of parliament to regulate imposed duties. It will report to the government findings of fact and evidence upon which the same are predicated, and these will be laid before parliament in justification of such fiscal changes as may from time to time be proposed by the government.'

That is the statement of the Toronto 'Mail and Empire' quoted by the 'Globe.' I will send the paper to my hon. friend. He marked it himself where he was quoting, and he will see the quotation marks. How, in the very nature of things, could the 'Globe' know the contents of this Bill? Nobody on this side of the House knew it until Wednesday last when it was introduced.

Mr. BLAIN. I was careful to say, and my hon. friend must know, that when this matter was first introduced, the press on both sides of politics understood fully what the intention of the government was. I did not suggest for a moment, that this article was written after the introduction of the Bill, because I knew, as my hon. friend knows, that the Bill was only introduced last Wednesday, and I gave the date of the 'Globe' when I read the article.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That is not my point, my point is that the hon. gentleman led the House to understand that he was quoting from the 'Globe' article. My hon. friend knows very well, that what he read, is not a statement from the Toronto 'Mail and Empire' at all, it is an editorial of the Toronto 'Globe,' commenting upon a statement made a few days ago by the Toronto 'Mail and Empire.'

Mr. BLAIN (reading):

The Canadian Commission will have no executive functions, and will in no way usurp the right of parliament to regulate imposed duties.

Hon. gentlemen will see at once, that that was not a quotation from the 'Mail and Empire.' I have the 'Mail and Empire' now under my hand, and I will read it again. This is the Toronto 'Globe' commenting upon an article written a few days prior by the 'Mail and Empire,' not a quotation at all, but in the editorial columns, without any suggestion, except the suggestion that the 'Globe' itself was agreeing with a statement in the 'Mail and Empire.'

The Canadian Commission will have no executive functions, and will in no way usurp the right of parliament to regulate imposed duties. It will report to the government findings of fact and evidence upon which the same are predicated, and these will be laid before parliament in justification of such fiscal changes as may from time to time be proposed by the government.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Is that clause not in inverted commas?

Mr. BLAIN. No, I think not, and my hon. friend must know that.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Why, I can almost see them from here.

Mr. BLAIN. Without taking up the time of the House, I will produce before the debate closes, the article written in the Toronto 'Mail and Empire' to which this 'Globe' editorial refers.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Now the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Porter) is looking at the article. Does he not see the inverted commas?

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend from Hastings says no, and I will put the article in the hands of the Chairman.

Mr. CROTHERS. The principal argument presented by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and many of his supporters was based upon a statement alleged to have been made by the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, (Mr. Ames). I do not think the right hon. leader of the opposition was quite just to my hon. friend from St. Antoine in not reading all that he said on that occasion. The House will bear with me for a moment while I read two or three sentences, including the phrase referred to by the leader of the opposition. On page 2702 of 'Hansard' my hon. friend from St. Antoine is reported in these words:

If I may be permitted to offer advice to the ministers, I would say that they should not necessarily confine their choice to men who have fought and bled for the Conservative party. I think that if there is any man in Canada who is eminently fitted for this position, he should not be rejected by reason of his previous political record. We want the biggest men we can get, but we want men who are not out of sympathy with the policy that the party on this side of the House avowedly stands for. We want men who are not out of sympathy with the idea that protection, reasonably applied, is what Canada needs for her development. Let us have three big, broadminded Canadians, every one a man of administrative ability, who can organize and arrange the work and prepare the lines of investigation.

I do not see what the hon. gentleman could have said in favour of men to be appointed to this position more clearly than what he did say. To say that he desired three men who were in favour of protection to be appointed to this board, was only an indirect and polite way of saying that he did not desire the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), to be a member of that board.

Mr. NEELY. Is the hon. gentleman apologizing or explaining the position of the member for St. Antoine, when he says that the member for Red Deer should not be appointed on that board? Is it not simply a question of the information that this board is to get?

Mr. CROTHERS. I am coming to that. I say that is only an indirect and polite way of saying that he was not in favour of the member for Red Deer being a member of this board, because he could not find a gentleman, even on the other side of the House, who was not in favour of protection. The difference between members on this side of the House and members on the other side of the House is that we preach protection and practise protection; whereas hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House preach free trade and practise protection. Now, in dealing with trade and commerce by way of tariffs, the legislature may take one of several positions. It may say that it is in favour of absolute free trade.

I do not know any civilized nation that has ever taken that position, that has ever adopted absolute free trade, trade unrestricted in any respect whatever. It is not pretended that free trade in that sense is practised even in England. Another position may be taken in favour of a tariff for revenue only. Many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have referred to that position. To speak of a tariff for revenue only with incidental protection is misleading. You may have a tariff for revenue only and still have eliminated from that tariff all principle of protection. Is there any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who desires to take a position in favour of a tariff for revenue having eliminated from that tariff the principle of protection? England collects a large revenue.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Does England collect any revenue on material produced in England?

Mr. CROTHERS. I was just coming to that. The point I was trying to make is that you may have a tariff for revenue and have eliminated from that tariff all principle of protection. That is the sort of revenue tariff, as I understand it, that is practised in England. England collects a large revenue from imports into England consisting of things that are not produced in England. England is consistent as a revenue tariff country and from that tariff is eliminated all principle of protection. As my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) knows very well, that is the principle of free traders. They take the ground that if they are to raise a revenue at all they are to collect that revenue upon imports of articles that are not produced in the country. As an illustration of that you have in England a tax of 10 cents a pound on tea. Is there an hon. gentleman in this House who will say that he is in favour of a tariff of that kind from which the principle of protection is entirely eliminated? Not by any means. Hon. gentlemen opposite never attempted to introduce a tariff of that kind. They went up and down this country from the time that Sir John Macdonald introduced the National Policy resolutions in this House in 1876, until 1896— twenty years— leading the people to believe that if they were successful at the polls they would introduce the principle of free trade. But, when they came into power they proceeded to practise protection, they have practised it ever since and they are in favour of it to-day; that is in the sense that they are not in favour of eliminating from our tariff the principle of protection. I do not think the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will get up in this House and say that in that sense he is a free trader; nor would any other gentleman on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) said a few minutes ago that he was in favour of a tariff for revenue. That is not the question. If he is a free trader, to be consistent, he must say: I am in favour of a tariff having eliminated from it all principle of protection, and if he is not prepared to go that far he is in favour of protection and not free trade. So, I say that there is not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who is in favour of free trade.

An hon. GENTLEMAN. There is one.

Mr. CROTHERS. Except the hon. member for Red Deer. It was stated by my right hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Borden), this afternoon, in answer to a statement to the effect that the members of this board would likely be three Conservatives, that he was not aware that during the fifteen years when the Liberal government were in power they had ever appointed a Conservative to a prominent position. I think he was substantially correct. I have thought over the matter with reference to the Supreme Court of Ontario, and I find that durilng the fifteen years of the Liberal government they appointed sixteen members to the Supreme Court, that out of the sixteen, fifteen were pronounced Liberals, and one was a mild Conservative, and we all know the influences that secured him that position.

An hon. MEMBER. And every judge in Manitoba.

Mr. CROTHERS. And every judge in Manitoba. As far as I am aware my right hon. friend the leader of the government was quite right in saying that there had never been a Conservative appointed to any position of influence in this country during the whole fifteen years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. I do not think that I would go as far as my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). I think the government will be able to find in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, three Conservatives well qualified to fill the position, and I hope they will appoint three Conservatives. I have no doubt they will appoint men who are in favour of protection, just as the leader of the opposition is in favour of protection in that he is not in favour of eliminating from the tariff all principles of protection. It seems to be admitted by all parties that it is not safe to proceed to revising the tariff without securing some special information. If I remember aright, the Conservative government, in the year 1893, prior to the revision of the tariff, sent three or four members of the government about the country to gather special information. I suppose they were all partisans. They went about the country, and manufacturers and others appeared before them, each man who appeared before them presenting his particular view of the matter. Then, we had a revision of the tariff in 1897, and we had three members of the right hon. gentleman's cabinet going about the country, and I suppose they were partisans just as the committee of the Conservative Cabinet in 1893, went about the country, partisans, gathering up evidence. Again, in 1907, the Liberal government sent three members of the Cabinet, three partisans, through the country to procure information with regard to the revision of the tariff. So it is admitted by all that it is essential, before dealing with the tariff, to secure special information with regard to it. The methods that we have heretofore adopted have been to send out three or four partisans to get that information, and yet the right hon. gentleman objects to this board, because, he says, it will be composed of partisans. We have nothing but partisans heretofore going about looking for such information. This board will not only get facts, but they will investigate, they will inquire, they will not accept the statements of gentlemen, perhaps manufacturers or others, who desire a particular duty placed upon a particular article. They will investigate and inquire into all the facts, they will find out what the article costs, what proportion of the cost of production is and should be assigned to wages. I am specially interested in that. I would like to know what proportion of the cost of any article should be assigned to wages. So, we must boil it all down to this question, whether we are to have an independent board who will inquire and investigate and get at the bottom of things, or whether we shall endeavour to get at the information as we have done heretofore by three or four members of the government going about the country, and in a desultory manner getting such facts and views as they could from different parties interested in regard to the tariff. There seems to be no ground whatever, for objection to this Bill, and I think it should be accepted at once.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Mr. Chairman, my fear is the very opposite of the hope which has been expressed by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers).

He expresses the hope that the Tariff Commission would get down to the bottom of things; my fear is that it will get the tariff up to the top of things. My hon. friend threw out a very curious challenge when he knew that my humble personality was on this side of the House—I rather think he withdrew that challenge afterwards in my own particular case, but for fear it might be still standing I accept it with cheerfulness and I hope with courage and with the ability to give a good reason for accepting it. The hon. gentleman said: was there any hon. gentleman on this side of the House who could go in for what he very correctly described as a tariff for revenue only. Well, I would and for this most obvious reason; that the tariff is a system of taxation, and we are all seeking science in a system of taxation. Now, when you collect on things that are only made outside of Canada, everything you take except the expenses of collection goes to the revenues of the country and, therefore, that is an approach at any rate, to a scientific system of taxation. When you put a tariff upon an article produced in the country, you collect duties for the country, and so far so good; but you collect two revenues, you collect another revenue for the interested minority inside the country. It is to the second revenue I object as being the most unscientific thing in taxation that one can conceive. I would like to say a word or two about the very interesting remarks made by my hon. friend, from Peel (Mr. Blain). I always like to hear my hon. friend, and sometimes he has followed me in debate and I was not even then very much put out by him, but the boot is on the other foot to-night, and I certainly will not try to put him out by anything but fair argument. I was very much struck with what seemed to have occurred to him, namely, that the tariff is still and constantly with us. I think that is a most peculiar circumstance; it is a curious thing that the tariff is everywhere. I read a paragraph in a leading paper in the United States the other day, which said: Congress will have most of its time this year taken up with the tariff; Congress has had most of its time taken up by the tariff for the last three years. Here, we in Canada have talked tariff for twelve months, fought the hardest and best-natured battle we could on tariff, and we come back to parliament and we meet tariff again. It is peculiar; I agree with my hon. friend. He says the tariff will be with us for many years, and I say it will be with us until it is treated in the only way it is proper to treat it, and that is with a bludgeon. The only thing to hand out to the tariff is a club, and when it is treated in that way, you will get rid of it, at any rate for a long time. It is perfectly true, that in the fifty years during which Britain was so busy building up a world trade which will baffle all readers of all future times, she could not attend to tariff matters at all; it is perfectly true that after fifty years a very great statesman was able to get some thought concentrated upon it, but I think the people are over-hopeful who at the present moment are looking for a return to protective principles in Britain.

It is a very unwise thing to prophecy, but I will prophecy that Germany will be a free trade country before Britain returns to protection, and I make that prophecy with, I think, some kind of authority, based on the marvellous results of the recent elections in Germany. As I have said, it strikes me as being most peculiar that this government, of all others, should be dealing with tariff questions at this moment, because we have just fought an election, and we fought it on a specific principle on the part of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, laid down by the leader of their party who is now Prime Minister of the Government. One of the strongest points in the right hon. gentleman's speech in this House was: Let well enough alone. Well, why is not the government doing it; are things not well enough? The position of the government is the most vastly illogical I can conceive. They have won the election and they all proclaim that protection won it; then why have they not the courage of their convictions to put the tariff up? What are they frightened about? However, that is anticipating what I am going to say. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) also made a very impassioned defence of the manufacturers of the country. I cannot understand his point of view; of course, I suppose he cannot understand mine. He said: these gentlemen have put their capital into their business. Where did they get the capital? Well, just as the consumers have got a very much smaller amount, by making it for themselves, the only way a self-respecting man wants to get capital. I tried to teach in a little debate the other day, in which I am afraid I was misunderstood by some of the workingmen of the country, the idea that you will only have good workingmen when you teach them to be self-supporting, but I have more sympathy with the workingman than with the manufacturer, who wants to lean upon the shoulders of a bolstering and supporting government. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain), occupies a little more detached position than some of his colleagues, he does not have that seat in the Cabinet which many of us would have liked to have seen him have, and I do not for one moment, say that as a taunt. But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) used to be a very active member of the Opposition side of the House, and I want to argue with him on this question and to try to make my position clear to him. He looks at the interests of the manufacturers; while I look upon the interests of the consumer, entirely so, and I do it on a very simple principle, I can find it in Adam Smith, and I can find it in almost the same words in Bastiat. They both lay down the principle, the end of all production is consumption. I do not think there is a man or boy in Canada to-night who does not believe that this is obviously true. If the end of all production is consumption, and if you look after the consumers, you are looking after everybody. That is the difference between my point of view and the point of view of my hon. friend from Peel. Is it not as clear as a sunbeam at mid-day that if you see that you have plenty of consumers in your country, and plenty of things that they consume, there will be nothing wrong with the producers? If you have consumers in great numbers there will always be plenty of consumption and the producers are the natural consequence. I do not feel that I need, in this informal discussion, go further into the subject of the general position of free trade versus protection. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) is not in the chamber, but I know he will do me the honour to read what I say about him in 'Hansard.' I always like to see him rise in the House; I like the lineaments of his face, and I like him when he goes on to show up what I must confess are the variegated views of the party, even on this side of the House. But I wanted to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) that I am not at all sure that he is not the real Diabolus in this play. We all remember that when he was once asked in this House, he was then sitting in Opposition, what he would do about the British preference, he made no bones about the kind of protection he believed in; there was no sentiment about him. He replied: you give me fifty of a majority on the government benches, and I will soon let you see what I will do with the British preference.

May I again appeal to the courage of my hon. friends opposite. If those are their opinions, why do they not carry them out? If they are not their opinions, why do they seek to put the subject on one side by referring it to a Tariff Commission? We have heard a good deal of the need of information. Well, we cannot have too much information; I concede that point very readily. We have, however, some information on tariffs, and on tariff commissions already. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance interests me. I have heard the hon. member described as a moderate protectionist. Well, Sir, they all begin that way; the becoming of a full-blown protectionist is a rake's progress, they all begin in that fashion. I remember very well Mr. Morley pointing out, when Mr. Chamberlain first began his propagandism in England, that in France they put the modest little duty of 1 shilling and 10 pence on flour, and said there would never be any reason to raise it. There was soon a duty of 12 shillings, an increase of 500 per cent. All protectionists begin as moderate protectionists. I am afraid I would have to describe myself as an immoderate anti-protectionist, because I reaffirm my strong belief in the club as the proper way to deal with all tariffs. We have some facts about the tendency of tariffs, and we have these facts as to the tendencies of tariffs under commissions. I have given a fact as I could give many others, as to the tendency of tariffs, which is nearly always to rise. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) has tried to prove that that happened under the government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and with men struggling in the strength of their low tariff ardour to hold the tariff down, if the rates rose under such aegis and protection, what route would they naturally take when they have their friends behind them? How can they do anything but rise? I should be very much mistaken if I should be successfully contradicted when I say that the tendency of tariffs is to rise under commissions, and that that was proved to the hilt in the countries of Germany and the United States, which have always been the countries from which supporters of protection have derived their main argument. You appoint your commission, up goes the tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman say that applies to the United States?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). As far as my information goes.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It must go a very short distance.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I would like to have successful contradiction. I said the kind I wanted was successful; I did not know that there had been any reduction in the United States since the time a tariff was first made. When were the reductions made?

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. gentleman stated that wherever a commission was appointed, the tariff went up and that that applied to the United States. I contradicted that. I wish plainly to state that I am right and my hon. friend is wrong, that the tariff has not gone up in the United States since the commission was appointed, and furthermore, every recommendation based on the commission's report has been for a revision downwards.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Will my hon. friend be good enough to specify some of the articles which have been reduced by the action of the commission, and will he state in addition that there has been no rise in the tariffs?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I shall state positively that there has been no rise. The Payne-Aldrich tariff went into effect in 1909, and under the same Act that put that tariff into effect the Tariff Board was appointed. Since that tariff went into effect there has been no rise. The hon. gentleman for Red Deer stated the contrary. On the facts adduced by the Tariff Commission, and I refer specifically to wool, known as schedule 'K' in the Customs Act, the President of the United States has made strong recommendations to Congress for the reduction of the wool schedule.

Mr. NESBITT. It has not been done.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It has not been done, but the commission in so far as it has interfered has endeavoured to have it brought down and it is only a matter of time.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I am very glad that my hon. friend has been able to prove that in the United States a Tariff Commission has actually produced a recommendation for a reduction, I am glad to have my information on the tariff increased.

Mr. MEIGHEN. May I refer to the pulp and paper schedules in which a reduction has actually taken place?

Mr. NESBITT. That had nothing to do with the recommendation of the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The board reported on the schedule.

Mr. CLARK (Ded Deer). That happened as part of an arrangement of which my hon. friend was one of the most bitter opponents.

Mr. MEIGHEN. What difference does that make?

Mr. CROTHERS. Are you prepared to retract what you said to the effect that wherever there was a Tariff Commission appointed the duties had gone up, and your reference to the United States?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). If my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie says he has handed his honour and his ability to conduct a debate over to the Minister of Labour, I will do anything that he says.

Mr. CROTHERS. That is not answering the question.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I would remind my hon. friend that this is the second time he has had to be reminded of that kind of thing, because the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) told him emphatically one evening that he felt quite equal to looking after himself.

Mr. CROTHERS. I ask you whether you would retract the statement I have quoted?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). If everybody on that side of the House including the Minister of Labour was as anxious to learn the true facts on the tariff question, three-fourths of the people of Canada would be free traders at the next election.

Mr. CROTHERS. That is no answer.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). It is a general statement which conveys an answer, it tells my hon. friend of an honest and open mind. Does he think I want to gain a single point in debate or in my position on the tariff question by making a statement which I know to be false? If I think it is right, why what can I do to retract it, but I am going to reiterate the statement and I am going to say that the evidence drawn from the United States is an extremely slight one, as to the tendency of tariffs under commissions. It is a certainty they went up permanently in Germany. They could not go up much higher in either Germany or the United States. With two-thirds of the people in Germany becoming Socialists and two-fifths of those in the United States becoming paupers, it is extremely difficult to say what the course of the tariff will be in the future.

The Minister of Finance referred to this as a pillow fight. After he has had a little more experience of tariff debates in this House and is a little more able to take care of himself, than he can possibly be now although his abilities are very great, we will give him as much as he likes but he need not be afraid of suffering from too much pillow fighting on this question. He spoke of it being a bogey. It is a bogey if a bogey is a thing that frightens. You talk about new facts. We have too many facts. He proclaimed his belief in the new facts and followed that by a reference to the election of September 21st.

He said that if we had known more facts then we would not perhaps have had that election. Well, I can only inform him and the government that we know more facts in the west now. I received a letter this morning from a friend of mine, an intelligent farmer in my own constituency. It comes from a part of the country where is to be found the finest land in Alberta. It was written by a sturdy, strong-headed Scotsman originally, who was for many years in the United States and came to western Canada when so many other men in the United States came over. He tells me that ninety per cent of the inhabitants there would be anxious to-day to sell their holdings at $10 an acre less than they would have been induced to take for their land by any means before the 21st of September last. My hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) smiles incredulously, but of course he has no regard for the farmers on the prairie. His regard is limited to the lumber combine of British Columbia. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) said that reciprocity lay heavily on our minds, and this intelligent farmer in my constituency tells me in his letter that the wheat is lying heavy on the prairie. How can you expect to make Canada a great and successful country by means of a ridiculous economical fiscal policy of that kind? Can you not see that we are more likely to make Canada the prosperous country she ought to be by filling the stomachs of hundreds of poor families in the slums than by building up multi-millionaires in the palaces of our cities. I see that I am exciting some interest among hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have no doubt that in a little time we may succeed in getting some sound ideas accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, because they are not bad-hearted men, but just a little wrong-headed on this question.

Mr. STAPLES. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to read that letter?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has it. I do not expect credence from my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples), but if he wants to challenge my statement I am quite willing to accept his challenge and let the House judge between us.

Mr. STAPLES. I only wish to point out that when an hon. gentleman refers to a letter or any other document, he may be called on to quote it and put it on record in 'Hansard.'

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). For my hon. friend's information and that of the House, I would point out that a few days, or it might have been a few weeks—and a few weeks are only a few days in the history of a country—before September 21 there were 600 inquiries sent to a real estate office as to the value of lands and the opportunities for investment and immigration to that part of the country, but since the election those inquiries have dwindled down all told to 24. I need hardly point out to hon. members of this House, whose fathers were pioneers in this country, trying to make an honest living out of it, that it is all very well to build up millionaires, but you will never build up a strong, prosperous country unless you have strong yeomen on your farms, and you cannot have these unless you give them a square and fair deal in this matter. Facts are what we want, and I have given a few.

I now come to close quarters with this proposition for the establishment of a tariff commission. It is the business of government and parliament to get the facts for themselves. Imagine Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Goschen, or Lord Randolph Churchill, or Mr. Low, or Sir Robert Peel, or Mr. Lloyd George, or Mr. Asquith, all Chancellors of the Exchequer within the last two generations—imagine their being told that they should appoint a commission to do those things which it is essentially the function of parliament and governments to do. When I came to this country Mr. Fielding with other members of the government, of which he was a distinguished member, were members of a temporary commission—very different from that which we are appointing under this Bill, which is to be a permanent one. Mr. Fielding has gone from this House now and has left behind him no personal enmity but many strong admirers. When Mr. Fielding went about the country on that temporary commission he showed on many occasions that he knew more about the business of the men who appeared before him than they even knew themselves. In that respect he was superior to other members of the board which is a criticism that I know will commend itself to hon. gentlemen opposite. One gentleman who appeared before that commission in connection with the tariff on dried apples, said he was as quick as a needle and knew everything about that subject. It was his duty to know it for the information of his own department.

An hon. MEMBER. Dried apples?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). There are some interruptions, Mr. Speaker, which I must pass over in silence. We had in Mr. Fielding an example of greater industry than we have had in parliament this long while. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) introduced into this House a resolution in favour of free agricultural implements. If my memory serves me rightly my hon. friend corrected me before, and he now has an opportunity to set me right if I have not accurately stated his resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am sorry that I shall again have to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). What then did my hon. friend do? I guarantee it is not what he is going to do now.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I would have thought that the hon. member for Red Deer, before discussing what I did would have tried to know what really was the resolution I did move on that occasion to which he refers. That resolution was to the effect that in my judgment the time had come when the agriculturists of Canada were entitled to substantial reduction on farm implements, such as would not, under the circumstances, be inconsistent with a protective tariff.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I stand corrected with all the grace possible, but let me tell my hon. friend that in every western constituency, where I took any part in the last election, certainly in my own, every three cent advocate—and I am not using that expression in a professional sense—of anti-reciprocity said that Mr. Borden, if elected to power, would give this immense boon of free agricultural implements.

I should not be surprised if there were three-cent advocates—again not in a professional sense—in the constituency of Portage la Prairie to promise some things of that kind on behalf of my hon. friend. However, the question about the terms of the resolution is a small one. My point is that he made a speech in support of that resolution, a speech which I do not know I have any great reason to admire. For he was not very kind to me at the beginning. He referred to me in a way that hurt me, and I have always regarded with favour a dictum of Cardinal Newman that a gentleman, even if he have not the term 'hon.' before his name, will not willingly wound any man. The hon. gentleman called me an 'exotic.' Mr. Chairman, I have observed that if ever I want a slur upon the person of the Englishman or the policy of England, I must always go to the English party in this country for it; I have not got it on the other side. However, I was not very much put out, I would like to tell my hon. friend. But I was a good deal more put out than I would have been if he had brought his resolution on at a time when we could all have debated it, for if I had had a chance to reply to him, I should not have been put out—at least, I would have tried to do as much putting out as was done to me. After all, the term was not a very worthy one. The question of a man's views on protection and free trade is not a question of whether those views do or do not come from England. If they do come from England, are they any worse for that in the eyes of hon. gentlemen who, forsooth, have just refused to have truck or trade with the Yankee, because they are such Englishmen? Why, then, should a man or opinion be called 'exotic,' because he or it comes from England? The question is, does the man stand for freedom, does he stand for truth, does he stand for justice? If he and his views stand for freedom, truth and justice, I want to tell my hon. friend that the more 'exotics' of that kind you get into Canada the better. But I want to tell him also that truth and justice and freedom are not exotics in Canada, though we could do with a little more freedom—a great deal more freedom—on the trade question.

We have a speech made by the hon. member, I listened to that speech, and it seemed to me very admirable and very convincing; that was not very difficult for he had a favourable audience when talking of reduction of tariffs. But he was kind to the House. He told us the mechanism of the speech, the process of its manufacture. He said: I collected these statements myself. So, we knew how he went about it. I am not criticising my hon. friend; he must not be uneasy, I am commending him. He did these things himself, he told us, and he produced an admirable and convincing speech. I believe it is unanswerable. I was not incommoded by the man who came into my riding and spoke in favour of free agricultural implements, because I am in favour of free agricultural implements myself—as I am in favour of free everything else—But what greater credit could come to a young and ambitious member of parliament than to take up a case like that and prove it? Is not that his high duty and function as a member of parliament? What are these ministers going to do to earn their salaries when they get all these commissions appointed? Probably the most scholary and best informed individual Tory I have met in this country said to me: I do not see what responsible government is coming to; what are we doing, making all these commissions? I agreed most emphatically with what he said. It is nothing less than an infraction of the principles of responsible government—You are handing over your duties, as we are handing over our responsibilities, to a commission. We have the word of the Minister of Finance that he would in every case give very great weight to what the commissioners said. And why not? If you pay men anything from $5,000 to $7,500, they ought to have some weight,—they certainly get some weight. They are to be an advisory board. If they give you advice and you take it they fix your taxes. If they give you advice and you do not take it, you take back to the government and to parliament the responsibilities of which you have divested yourself and which you have given over to the commission. There is no getting away from the dilemma.

I was surprised to hear my right hon. friend the Prime Minister compare his commission to a court. The highest court in any British country is the high court of parliament itself; and when you make a smaller court—call it a commission or what you may—and give it the duty that parliament has performed within the British Empire from time immemorial, you reduce the dignity and effectiveness of parliament and make it very likely that the status of a member of parliament and a member of the government will be lowered. Parliament has been called not only 'the high court of parliament' but also the 'high inquest of the nation'—the high inquiring place, inquiring by the operations of their own minds. That is how they have earned the distinction that has crowned English statesmen in all generations, and that is how we have built up the greatest parliamentary institutions the world has ever seen.

Something has been said of the cost of production. My view is that there is a thing which a member of parliament has no right to talk about. For my part, I would begin to discuss the tariff at a much earlier point. And, personally, I do not want any one to tell me about the cost of production on my farm; that is my business; and, under freedom, I would run it and compete with the world. Talk about the defence of interests by acts of government—I wish men on this side of the Atlantic would study, more than they find time to do in these busy days, the works of some of the biggest men. Ralph Waldo Emerson, than whom no prose writer is more worthy of our attention, dealing with this very argument, said: If you want to make men do not protect them by the shabby artifices of cunning tariffs; let their work defend them, let their works speak for them. That is the 'cost of production' that I would like Canadians to go into.

I have tried to say a few words upon the principle of this Bill. I believe that it is emphatically a new and a wrong departure. We have heard something about it being borrowed from the United States, and borrowed from Germany. I can conceive of no smaller rôle for Canada than borrowing the discarded ideas of any country, and in borrowing higher protection to-day, not even the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) can say that he is likely to be borrowing very long from Germany. In Germany has happened an election only less in its consequence than that which happened when the repeal of the corn laws was carried in Britain. For the remarkable thing about these German elections is that the universal opinion of the population in the cities of that country that have returned Socialists is in favour of free trade. Their victories have been won even at the seat of royalty itself, there are 4,400,000 men, every one of them pledged to free trade, and thank God, also pledged to a reduction of armaments. We have had a scare on the question of armaments, which I do not think is affecting Canada so much now. But I am afraid that on this question of a Tariff Commission we have a scare with much more reality in it, but I shall only be too pleased if I happen to be wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) opened with a statement that I had rather offended him in what I said in January, 1911. I was not only surprised but I was quite unable to conceive anything that I said that could have given rise to that conviction in his mind. However, it appears that the word 'exotic' was not congenial to my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). It was very flattering. It means a rich, rare and tropical plant.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It is still more difficult to understand the offence that my hon. friend took from the word as it now appears to him. There is no one less desirous of wounding the feelings of the hon. member for Red Deer than myself. Since the days that he entered the House I do not think that he has had a more attentive listener to his remarks than the humble member for Portage la Prairie. I have often marvelled, at and indeed I have studied to ascertain the secret, of that most unusual power by which he is able to make what appears, when read in 'Hansard,' as a very unconvincing speech when heard in the House itself spoken from his lips, most impressive. The term which I used of course strictly in the sense in which I understood it, that is to say as representing one born in another clime of thought, if I may so speak, and on another soil who has not yet reached in this country the stage where conditions are as familiar to him and as conducive to sane opinion as were the conditions in the old land. That was the sense in which I used it. My recollection of the word hovers around a very illustrious statesman, I think Robert Lowe, who first used that word in the English parliament, and Mr. Lowe, as the member for Red Deer will remember, was one of the most talented debaters that ever sat in the British House of Commons. In introducing this word he applied it to no less a distinguished institution than the established Church of England, and referred to it as an exotic plant on Irish soil. So the hon. member for Red Deer must realize that when I used the word in January, 1911, it was far from being intended in an offensive sense, because I have every respect for his opinions, as I have for the opinions of every other member of this House. The hon. member seems to think that I harbour some opinions antagonistic to English immigration. How could he take such an inference from anything I said? I am sure that we welcome in this country every Englishman, no matter how rabid a free trader he may be. When I study history, I find that the right hon. leader, whom the member for Red Deer so humbly, and at one time so servilely followed, only fifteen years ago, preached doctrines now firmly believed in by the member for Red Deer; and when I reflect how far he has advanced since coming into closer contact with conditions in Canada, I may hope that in the course of fifteen years longer he (the hon. member for Red Deer) will even become qualified for a Conservative administration. The member for Red Deer also regretted that he did not have an opportunity of replying to my remarks last January. Now it is quite true that the motion was moved on Wednesday, but the member for Red Deer well knows that on three subsequent occasions it was reached on the order paper, and on each occasion the right hon. leader of the opposition, then leading the government, moved the adjournment of the House. I think on two of those occasions, I myself, rose and protested, and urged that the right hon. gentleman should permit a further discussion of this question, but every one was silent on the government side, and no one was more silent than the member for Red Deer himself.

Mr. TURRIFF. Before this clause passes, I would like to say a word or two. I am opposed to this Bill for the particular reason that it is asked for, and is in the interest of only one class in the country. Outside of the manufacturers, no class of people have asked for a Tariff Commission. There is no class of people outside the manufacturers who can benefit by this Tariff Commission. This Tariff Commission is to be appointed by the government for only one purpose, there is only one purpose that it can serve, and that is to advance the interests of the manufacturers of Canada. The Manufacturers' Association time and again, year after year, have asked that this commission should be appointed. Now, if it were simply for the purpose of getting statistics and information, the Minister of Finance has had a good business experience, and he could very well, with the officials in his own department, procure all the information that he needs. If it was necessary to appoint more officials, he could do so; but he would have officials who would be more likely to be non-partisan than any men who will be appointed by this government.

I think that if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, was himself naming these commissioners they would be fairly well selected, but the Minister of Finance, if he will allow me to say so, is still somewhat young and innocent in political life, and I am afraid that it will not be only his voice that will carry weight, but that it will be the voice of the older sinners in that respect, who will want to make this commission an instrument for the purpose of helping out the manufacturers. Why is the government so ready to fulfil at once this particular promise that the Prime Minister made when he was touring the west? He made several other promises just as emphatically as he made the promise to appoint a Tariff Commission. We have not heard of any steps on the part of the right hon. gentleman or his government to carry out and fulfil those promises because some of those promises were in response to the demands and applications of the farmers of Canada. This particular one was made in response to the demand and application of the manufacturers of Canada and nobody else. The Minister of Finance acknowledged last Wednesday, when he introduced the Bill that in so far as he knew there had been no demand from anyone else outside the manufacturers to have this commission appointed.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), a few moments ago, referred to what protection has done for the farmers. I can tell him what protection is doing for the farmers at the present time in my part of the country. Protection has done this for the farmers, that they have from 50,000 to 500,000 bushels of wheat lying in the open, the way you would pile broken stone to make a macadamized road, simply because the elevators are filled up with wheat, and the railways are paralyzed, and cannot supply cars; whereas, if the farmer were in absolutely the same position as the manufacturer he would have a market for his wheat, roads to carry it to market, and he would not be losing that wheat. We who represent agricultural constituencies are naturally afraid of what the effect of this Bill will be, it being a Bill absolutely in the interest of the manufacturers.

Mr. BLAIN. Will my hon. friend explain to the House wherein the farmer differs from the manufacturer?

Mr. TURRIFF. In what regard?

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend was pointing out that the manufacturer had a better opportunity than the farmer to ship his product. Will my hon. friend explain that?

Mr. TURRIFF. The manufacturer is not limited in his market. The manufacturer gets his raw material free of duty, but the farmer has his raw material taxed by the manufacturer, and does not get it free of duty. In that respect he is at a disadvantage.

Mr. BLAIN. The manufacturer does not sell his raw material, and if he wishes to send his manufactured goods to the United States he has to meet their tariff the same as the farmer has to meet their tariff.

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend can twist around it as much as he likes, but the fact remains that the farmer has been asking for a market for his product. The manufacturer is not asking for a market for his product outside; he is asking to have the farmer hampered by keeping the duties up so that he will get the market at home. How are you helping the manufacturer, particularly when you are paralysing the purchasing power of the farmer? Where is the purchasing power of the farmer who has 1,000, or 2,000, or 5,000, or 10,000 bushels of wheat lying out with the snow and rain falling on it, and not allowed to send it to the market that is open to the wheat, to the market that wants the wheat and to the man who is willing to pay for the wheat, and who would send that money into Canada where it would go eventually to the manufacturer, because it resolves itself into this, as pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer, that all production ends in consumption? We are afraid of this Bill, because as the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, (Mr. Ames), told us the other day, the whole tendency of this government, with its well defined protective policy, is to increase protection. My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, shakes his head. What about the duties now being levied, and the taxes collected on the lumber the farmer uses? What about the engines that are coming in, and that came in at a lower rate of duty a few months ago? They now come in at a higher rate of duty. There is one case in which they have taken the duty off altogether. Why? They took it off at the request of the manufacturers, because it was levied on an article that the manufacturer uses.

Mr. AMES. These are merely preventing and correcting misapplications of the tariff.

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, preventing and putting on another interpretation, but all in the interest of the manufacturers and against the interest of the farmers. That is why we are afraid of this Bill. Let us see what the manufacturers have been doing for a little while back. During the past three years there have been forty-one mergers; 190 individual companies were consolidated into these forty-one mergers.

Mr. AMES. Is the grain growers merger for the purpose of speculating in wheat included in that number?

Mr. TURRIFF. So far I have never heard of any grain growers merger. I have never heard of the grain growers merger, and if it were so the grain growers are not asking for protection to help them but they are asking for free trade. The grain growers have not issued millions and millions of dollars of watered stock on which they want to collect from the consumers of Canada, 6, 7, or 8 per cent—stock that is not represented by one dollar of investment; yet that is what the manufacturers are doing and that is what this Bill is going to help them to do. These forty-one amalgamations represent a capitalization of $334,938,266, or almost $350,000,000. Let us see how that works out. I will take one or two individual instances. I will take the first on the list and I am quoting now from the 'Monetary Times.' I find first on the list Amalgamated Asbestos, which is a merger that took stock in six other companies with a total capitalization of $3,550,000 and I know, as a matter of fact, that of that $3,550,000 a large amount was watered. What was the new capitalization?

Mr. STANFIELD. What are the bonds selling for to-day?

Mr. FOWLER. That was before the 21st September, was it not??

Mr. TURRIFF. If my hon. friends will just keep quiet for a moment they will get all the information they want. This amalgamation has a capitalization of twenty-five million dollars; and, for the three and-a-half million dollars the capitalization of the companies they took in, they issued eight million dollars worth of bonds, one million eight hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars preferred stock, and eight million one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars common stock. The object of that amalgamation was to enable the men who got the common stock for nothing, to collect dividends from the consumers on that common stock. That particular company has been a failure, as naturally they should, because they went a good deal too far and the bonds are selling at a very low figure to-day, and, so far as I know, the common stock and the preferred stock are worth nothing at all. Now, let us take the Ames-Holden-McCready, Limited, Montreal. That amalgamation took in the Ames-Holden Company with a capitalization of $2,500,000, and the James McCready Company, Limited, with a capitalization of $1,000,000, a total of $3,500,000. They capitalized that at $11,500,000, but they did not issue all that. They issued in bonds $1,000,000 and in preference stock $2,500,000, which covered exactly the capitalization of the two companies amalgamated. Then, they issued three million five hundred thousand dollars of common stock, all watered stock, not one dollar of value in it so far as anybody knows. And, this legislation that we are passing to-day is for the purpose of helping such amalgamations as I have mentioned to take out of the farmers and the consumers of Canada interest on that common stock that has been issued.

Mr. AMES. As the name of a company I have a connection with has been mentioned, may I say one word to the hon. member? I would like to say this: that if, upon investigation, it should be discovered by the Tariff Commission that the merger to which the hon. gentleman refers has in the slightest degree enhanced the selling price of the articles to the consumer, I shall be most willing to consent that the thirty per cent duty which the Liberals put on boots and shoes should be reduced to twenty-five per cent, as it was under the Conservative government.

Mr. TURRIFF. And so, the hon. member (Mr. Ames) excuses the whole thing on the ground that up to the present this amalgamation has not increased the cost of boots and shoes. That is a statement that I accept from him, but I have heard dozens and scores of people within the last year or so complain of the advanced price of boots and shoes. I am to-day wearing boots exactly the same as I have worn for years and I am now paying $1.00 a pair more than I paid for the same boots a few years ago. They are not made by the firm with which the hon. member is connected, but by others. You can go into any store in Ottawa to-day and price boots and shoes and I venture the assertion that they are twenty per cent or twenty-five per cent higher than they were two or three years ago.

Mr. AMES. We should be delighted to have the Tariff Commission investigate the cost.

Mr. TURRIFF. That is exactly what the hon. gentleman wants; he wants a Tariff Commission, and he wants to name the commissioners, and there is the whole trouble.

Mr. AMES. And if the government should change in the meantime, we would not drop the investigation on that account.

Mr. TURRIFF. I want to point out to the Minister of Finance that I do not care how honestly he may try he will not be able in the highly protected company he sits in at the council to get a commission that is not more or less partisan, and this commission is for the purpose of reporting and ascertaining whether these manufacturers such as I have mentioned, and hundreds of others ought to be entitled to get protection enough to enable them to pay a dividend on common stock which is really watered stock. A year ago when the cement merger business came up, what was the argument of these gentlemen? It was, that they were entitled to get dividends on their money. What was the argument in connection with the bounty on steel? Not long ago I was in Montreal and a friend of mine who bought some of that common stock was complaining. Some twenty million dollars of common stock was issued and never one dollar of it went into the treasury of the company, but the innocent purchaser of that stock to-day says: Why should I not get paid interest on that stock.

Mr. McCURDY. Does the hon. gentleman say that no cash was paid into the treasury of the Dominion Steel Company for that common stock?

Mr. TURRIFF. That is what I said, and I got circulars from the Dominion Iron and Steel Company's brokers offering the preference stock at $85, and $100 of common stock thrown in as a bonus, and it was advertised all over the Dominion.

Mr. McCURDY. I may state for the information of the hon. gentleman that a certain part of the issued common stock was paid for in cash; at least five million dollars was paid for.

Mr. TURRIFF. Will the hon. member deny my statement that I was offered preference stock at $85 with one share of common stock thrown in as a bonus, for nothing. I know that statement is correct because I had the document in my hands making the offer and it was sent to me by mail.

Mr. McCURDY. I do not know what offers you may have received, but the preference shares were offered for subscription at $85 without any common stock bonus. I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia is entirely mistaken in his statement regarding the preference stock. I would say further that part of the Dominion Steel Company's issued common stock was paid for in cash, $5,000,000 at a substantial price.

Mr. TURRIFF. May I ask the hon. member what the five million dollars' worth of common stock he has referred to was sold at?

Mr. McCURDY. About 60 I think.

Mr. TURRIFF. My information is that it was sold at 15.

Mr. McCURDY. That may be some additional cash which went into the treasury of the company.

Mr. TURRIFF. Well, I do not care what the particulars are in any one particular case, but I do say that the whole tendency of these mergers is to put out millions and hundreds of millions of dollars worth of common stock, just exactly as in the case of the two companies I have mentioned, and the consumers and the farmers of Canada are expected to pay enhanced prices in order to pay dividends on that common stock which does not represent one dollar in the treasury, and that is all watered practically and should never have been issued. And, the intention of this legislation is to help the manufacturers by having a commission that will be favourable to them. That is what they are asking for. They are asking for a commission to get this information for the Minister of Finance. We all know that if you send out two or three different persons to collect information and make a report they will each differ as to the facts and possibly present reports from their own point of view, but when you have a commission working, as my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) stated, for a government that has well known protective principles, you will have their report and the evidence, and the manner of taking the evidence, all with protectionist ideas and leaning towards higher protection.

So far as I can judge from the Bill, they will take the evidence that suits them, any that does not suit them, they do not need to record, and any evidence they take that does not suit the government, the Minister of Finance can place before the House or not, as he likes. There is nothing in this Bill to state that all information and all findings of the commission will be laid before parliament for the use of the members and of the people of Canada.

Let us see one or two more companies that have amalgamated. Let us take the Dominion Canners, Limited, of Hamilton, Ontario. That company absorbed a large number of canning and preserving companies in Ontario. These companies had a total capitalization of $1,574,000. The companies were merged into the Dominion Canners, Limited, of Hamilton, Ontario, with a capitalization of $12,500,000, and for the $1,574,000 of combined capital of all those companies the Dominion Canners issued $1,500,000 in bonds,, $2,100,000 in preferred stock, and $2,100,000 of common stock. The balance of all this stock is in the treasury and it is to their interest, to the interest of the men who were in all these mergers, to have this Tariff Commission, and they are the men who have demanded it from the government, they are the men who want it, who will benefit by it. Nobody else wants it, nobody else has asked for it, and nobody else will benefit by it. The government is, I presume, carrying out pre-election pledges to these people, they are now delivering their part of the bargain.

Mr. GOODEVE. Would it not be to the interest of the consumer to have a statement of what these men are taking out of the consumer? That is the object of the commission.

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, and the Customs Act provides that a judge of one of the High Courts should investigate that, but this Bill takes it out of the hands of the judge, and puts it into the hands of partisans appointed by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) and his friends.

Mr. ARTHURS. How many investigations were there into combines since the introduction of the Act?

Mr. TURRIFF. The Minister of Labour will have all of that information in his department. The paper companies were investigated by a judge and the duties were reduced in consequence. So my hon. friend will see how much better it has been to leave that part of it as it is, to leave the investigations in the hands of an independent judge, instead of men who may, or may not, be partisans, but who are much more likely to be than not.

Then there is the Matthews-Laing Company. This is an amalgamation of the George Matthews Company with a capital of $1,000,000; the Park Blackwell Company with a Capital of $500,000; and the Laing Packing and Provision Company, Limited, with a capital of $500,000, a total of $2,000,000. This company has been formed with a capital of $7,000,000 and they have issued in bonds $1,200,000, in preferred stock, $2,000,000 and in common stock, $1,250,000. You cannot buy a dollar of the common stock on the market unless you buy some of the preferred stock or bonds as well. If you buy the preferred stock they will give you a bonus of common stock and allow you to buy a further proportion of common stock but they will not sell one dollar's worth of common stock to a man who is not prepared to buy the preferred stock as well, showing that they expect, although they have capitalized at almost twice the capital of the companies that formed the merger, that the common stock will become very valuable. Will any one say that that has not had an effect on the price of meats? Any one in Ottawa will tell you what has taken place in the last few months in reference to the cost of meat and other products controlled by these men.

These are the men from whom the commission will get information; they will give any information they please to the minister and the minister will give any information he pleases to the House. If the leader of the government had been as ready to carry out other promises he made prior to the election, his course would have been much better received throughout Canada because in all parts of the Dominion you have consumers, but you have not always manufacturers. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) pointed out that the manufacturers had put their money into these concerns. Will any one say that the farmer has not put his money into his business, and for every dollar engaged in manufacturing interests, how many hundreds are engaged in agriculture? I am not prepared to say what the proportion is, but I know there is a great deal more invested in agricultural pursuits than in manufacturing.

Mr. BLAIN. My point was that we should have protected the farmer as well.

Mr. TURRIFF. But the manufacturer is asking for this commission and he gets it, and the farmer has asked to have the protection taken off and he cannot get it.

Mr. BLAIN. When?

Mr. TURRIFF. They asked for free trade in natural products of the farm.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, take the requests made by all agricultural societies throughout the Dominion of Canada, and they are practically all on the lines of getting free trade in natural products. Take the request made by all agricultural societies throughout the Dominion, and they are all practically in favour of free trade in natural products.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TURRIFF. Well, the great majority of them anyway.

Mr. AMES. Paid agitators.

Mr. TURRIFF. If my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) chooses to call the 700 or 800 farmers who appeared in this Commons chamber a year or two ago paid agitators, he may do so and let him take their judgment on what he says. They were not paid agitators—not one quarter of, or one tenth as much as the men the Manufacturers' Association sent around to get their ideas put into force. The manufacturers are the men who have the money to hire agitators.

Mr. STEVENS. Did not that large delegation of representative farmers ask the late government to remove the duty on agricultural implements, and did the late government do it?

Mr. TURRIFF. They asked to have the duty taken off agricultural implements and they also asked to have reciprocity in farm products with the United States, also to have the British preference increased and a general reduction in the duties. Is my hon. friend, who interrupted me, prepared to give them what they ask?

Mr. STEVENS. Did the late government acquiesce in their request for a reduction or abolition of the duties on farm implements?

Mr. TURRIFF. The farmers did ask for a reduction on agricultural implements, and my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was then leading the government introduced a measure reducing the duty on agricultural implements but it was defeated by hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. MEMBER. How much?

Mr. TURRIFF. It was in my judgment not sufficient but more than the farmers are likely to get from the present government.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it not true that the late government reduced the duty 2½ per cent? And is it not also true that official valuation of binders coming to this country prior to that was $80 each and that subsequently that was raised to $160, so that the farmer paid more duty than he did before?

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend from Vancouver shows that he does not know much about farming and agricultural implements. In the one case he is speaking about the duty on a six foot binder and in the other on an eight foot binder. The resolution before the House is not in the interests of the farmer and as a representative of the agricultural interests I am opposed to it.

Mr. FOWLER. I have been somewhat amused, in common with other members, at the lectures we have been receiving from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). He has produced no facts on which to ground his arguments. He has dealt entirely with suspicions and inuendoes in which he has considerable experience, and in this connection he reminds me of what took place some years ago when he was an official of the then government of the day. At that time he had something to do with the opening of tenders, and on a certain occasion—I cite this to show the suspicion which certain persons who were tenderers entertained of the good faith of the hon. gentleman—a certain gentleman from Simcoe, or some part of Ontario, who had submitted a tender for certain timber lands insisted, so strongly did he suspect the good faith of the hon. gentleman, on being present when the tenders were opened. This hon. gentleman, who now poses as such a staunch friend of the farmers, reminds me of a certain individual who for many years had been engaged in the liquor traffic and had made a large fortune in selling liquor, and who, after he had acquired his fortune, became a very strong temperance advocate, but he took good care, while insisting on the necessity of prohibition, to hang on to the fortune he had acquired in the liquor traffic. The hon. gentleman reminds me very much of that temperance advocate in the state of Massachusetts.

Mr. TURRIFF. As my hon. friend has referred to me while I was an official of the Department of the Interior, I may be allowed a moment to reply. My hon. friend and others who were then in the Cabinet, were very ready to make insinuations and cast suspicions, but when an investigation was called there was not one of them who had the courage to summon me as a witness, although I was waiting at the door day after day, demanding to be called, and give evidence. If my hon. friend wishes to revive any of these old matters he is at perfect liberty to do so. My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) was equally free with his insinuations. He went out to my constituency with his magic lanterns and insinuations, and at every place where he held meetings I doubled my majority.

Mr. AMES. It knocked out some of you all the same.

Mr. TURRIFF. I noticed at the next session of parliament that my hon. friend never opened his mouth in the House, he was in such bad odour with his own party. If the hon. gentleman wants to go over that ground again, well and good. Let him come out again with his insinuations and his magic lantern and my majority will be still further increased. I repeat that if any man wants to make any charge against me in connection with the opening of tenders, or the handling of Crown timber lands in the northwest, or anything else in connection with my official career, I shall be most happy to meet him and prove him a falsifier and his charges as lies.

Mr. FOWLER. If the hon. gentleman was not called as a witness before the investigation to which he has referred, it was no doubt out of kindness to him, because the committee knew the kind of evidence he was prepared to give, and did not want to hear him.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONK. I had intended moving the House into Committee of Supply. There are two resolutions in the Department of Public Works, and I wish to complete the work of this department so as to open the door for another department to take up its estimates to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think we ought to adjourn now. The time has come, when we ought to adjourn.

Mr. MONK. If the House is not disposed to pass these two resolutions—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know whether it is so disposed or not.

Mr. McKENZIE. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) will remember that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) specially wanted the resolutions to stand as he had something to say about them. He is not here—

Mr. MONK. They stood at his request.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes, and naturally he would not expect that they would come up at this time of night.

Mr. MONK. I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Will we take up this same discussion to-morrow?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

APPOINTMENT OF A TARIFF COMMISSION.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 88) to provide for the appointment of a Tariff Commission.—Mr. White (Leeds).

On section 4,—matters to be investigated.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Would the Minister of Finance kindly explain the difference between subsection 2 and subsection 4 of section 4? In one case the commission may make certain inquiries under the direction of the minister and in the other when they are authorized to do so by the Governor General in Council.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Both sections are purposely broad and designed to cover matters that have not been particularly specified. Take subsection 2. It is a matter of common experience in the Department of Finance for an application to be made for the lowering or abolition of the duty with regard for instance to certain machinery on the ground that it is not manufactured in Canada and is not likely to be. That is a matter of fact which might very well be referred by the minister to the commission for a report as to the probability of that certain article being manufactured in Canada. Subsection 4 is also designedly broad in its terms. It is for the purpose of covering more important matters, for example the chance of increasing trade with certain other countries and the effect that certain tariffs might have. It is purposely broad so that the commission may be utilized, under the instruction of the Governor General in Council, to report upon matters of that kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think the matter is practically all covered by subsection 1 with the various subsections. I do not see any object in giving the commission the general power in subsection 1 or giving the minister the general power in subsection 2 or giving the Governor General in Council the general power set out in subsection 4.

The minister has informed the House that this is not only to be a permanent tariff board, but, so far as it is possible to make it so, an independent tariff board. There is no doubt that he has secured for it a reasonable degree of permanency, for under section 3 of the Bill it is provided that the commissioners are to be appointed for a definite period of 5 years and cannot be removed except for cause. But I think that the independence of the members of the commission is challenged by every subsection of section 4. The board has no power to initiate anything, no power to take a single step without the special instructions of the Minister of Finance or the Governor in Council. I understood, when the Bill was first brought in that the board, was an independent and permanent board of inquiry, and would be instituted to make, apart from any special instructions from anybody, the inquiries set out in subsection 1 of section 4. But when we come down to analyse the sections of the Bill, we find that the functions of the board are subject to the direction of the minister. They cannot enter upon an inquiry, they cannot make a suggestion, they cannot do any of the things which the Bill contemplates they should do, and which the public believe they are to do and which are made the main excuse for the introduction of the Bill. Now, I would suggest to the minister that the words in section 4, 'under the direction of the minister,' be struck out. The clause now reads:

> 4. In respect of goods produced in or imported into Canada the commission shall, under the direction of the minister, make inquiry as to——

But why limit it to the minister. Is it not just as has been predicted in the earlier part of this discussion that this commission was designed by the government and the Finance Minister to aid its own purposes and his own purposes in tariff matters, and is not for the House or the public of Canada at all? Is it not so that the whole design and scope of the Bill is to furnish the Finance Minister and his party with, special information, in disregard of the rights of the House and of the people in general to receive that information? To my mind, the Bill would be far less objectionable if these words were eliminated as I have suggested. Though the board must be, and I presume will be under the Bill, established by the government, it should have a certain amount of independence to be able to inquire here, there or elsewhere without any directions or instructions from the minister. If you give it that power, that freedom of action, it will have a certain confidence, and, I think it will gain greater respect in the country than it will otherwise achieve. Now, in passing to the concluding words of subsection 1, I would suggest to the minister that he also strike out the words 'and report to the minister.' Without such an amendment, see how this plan works out: Here is a board of commissioners, a permanent and so-called independent board of commissioners who cannot make a move in gaining the information or facts which the government deems it important to know, which cannot even start an investigation without the positive direction of the minister. And when that investigation is completed, the report must be made to the minister. The matter starts with the minister, and, so far as this clause goes, it ends with the minister. Now, if these facts are essential to be brought out, and if this information is necessary, and we want facts, we want information, the more accurate and fuller that information the better. But where do the members of this House come in; where do the people of the country come in? I am very strongly of opinion that if this commission is to report, it should report to parliament and not to the minister. It may be beyond the power of members of this House either to get the result of the inquiry or the evidence on which the results are based if the Bill is allowed to go in its present form. It may be that a large fund of information will be available to the minister and his friends, but that surely is not the object of the Bill. It should not be the object, and if it is not, I hope the minister will consent to the elimination of these objectionable words. I ask him in all seriousness if he will consent to strike out the words in subsection 1 of section 4, 'under the direction of the minister,' and the concluding words of subsection 1, 'and report to the minister,' and in the latter case, replace the deleted words with 'and report to parliament.'

Now, I can understand that if a commission of independent men, men properly selected—not such men as were suggested by my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) but well qualified, independent men —the information gathered by them may be of the greatest benefit to every member of this House. We on this side contend for that. We agree that the government cannot go too far in obtaining accurate and complete information on the subject set out in these subsections; but we do object to these facts being elicited by any secret process and only by special directions. We object to any limitation placed upon the power of the commission to inquire. And I think we are all interested that the report when it is made, and the evidence when it is collected, shall be available, and that the report of the commission shall be a report to the parliament of Canada instead of to the minister. I think that is a businesslike proposition. I make it sincerely, and I hope the minister will give it his serious consideration. It may be necessary, if he does not take that view of it, to move in the matter, but I hope that the suggestion may meet with his approval. I would like to hear from him on the subject.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). I would point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) that a commission of this kind, and the duties that are allotted to it, must be under the direction of some minister not so far as their methods in making the inquiry are concerned—because in making that inquiry they will be acting independently of any direction from the government—but an inquiry into a particular matter might be more urgent, more insistent in the opinion of those charged with the duties of government than some other matter. Therefore, in view of such considerations it was entirely necessary that a commission of this kind should be under the direction of some department of the government. I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that his own leader, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) yesterday told us that all this information could be better acquired by appointing statisticians in connection with one of the departments, that of Trade and Commerce, for example. It is perfectly obvious to my hon. friend, I am sure, that, if he is in accord with the suggestion of his leader, these statisticians would be acquiring information which would be the exact equivalent of the information to be obtained by this commission. With regard to the publicity for which the hon. member is so anxious, the statistics acquired in the manner suggested by the leader of the opposition would be reported to the minister and would come down to parliament in the ordinary course. There is nothing more in the provisions of this section than what has been already suggested and approved by the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition. There is no provision in the Bill for any secrecy, except so far as the principle of secrecy has already been applied, by the late government and all preceding governments, with regard to the business affairs of this country. In respect of that provision, the Bill is only carrying out a well recognized principle of the government. There is no such provision in the Bill as that which my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I take issue with my right hon. friend's explanation of the section, and also with his statement in regard to the position of the right hon. the leader of the opposition. It is one thing to have a statistical bureau or a statistical branch of the Department of Finance under the eye of the minister. That is the proper course, and one which in this instance should have been adopted. That is the well established British way of obtaining statistical information. I have heard it stated that the trade statistics of Great Britain are the most convenient and most accurate published by any country in the world. They are collated and published under the authority of the Board of Trade, the president of which is a member of the Cabinet. Why not adopt the British system in preference to this cheap Yankee device? You could adopt that system simply by establishing, in the Department of Finance or in some other department, a bureau manned with a sufficient staff to collect all this information. In that way you would have the doctrine of responsibility fully carried out; you would have no independent commission to pass on matters on which the minister or the government should pass. What is now proposed is a system modelled in fact upon the United States system. You appoint a permanent board the members of which are not clerks in any sense of the word. They are commissioners with high standing; you have exalted and dignified them, and you are preparing to pay them handsome salaries; you are giving them very wide and high powers; but these men, an independent board appointed for the purpose of acquiring information, cannot move hand or foot until the Minister of Finance beckons to them what to do; and upon getting the word from him as to how they shall proceed, there is no doubt that they will proceed in accordance with his wishes and those of the government of the day. Why not let this board have powers broad enough to enter upon an inquiry without the direction of anybody? I can understand that cases may arise where information is required speedily. Subsection 2 provides for that, and the minister can get the special information he requires. But all that is contained in subsections 'a', 'b,' 'c,' 'd,' 'e,' 'f' and 'g' should be open to the commissioners, and it should be their duty to enter upon the inquiry and continue it to the end, and make the result of that inquiry public, without instructions from the minister or the government. That is what we are establishing them for, and I think it would improve the Bill very much, in the judgment of the House and the country, if they were given that free hand. They cannot do anything but inquire and report. They have no power to make recommendations or to offer any opinion. We want the information; why not give them a free hand to start in, uncontrolled by the desire of the minister to send them on this expedition or that? The more I look into this Bill the more I realize the almost impossibility of obtaining the information which the government and the House would desire to obtain with regard to facts and conditions as they exist in Canada or elsewhere. Now, 'elsewhere' is going to be the troublesome part of it. The Board of Tariff Commissioners in the United States have realized that.

They have had the greatest difficulty in foreign countries in getting satisfactory information, although the United States has a consular system in regard to trade and commercial matters superior to any of the consular systems in the world. In every country, and practically at every port, there has been located a United States consul. The duties of these officers are not so much diplomatic like those of British consular agents. They are to a large extent trade and commercial agents, and one can gain a great deal of information from a persual of the reports of the United States consular agents in Germany, France, Belgium and Holland. I had occasion to go through them two or three years ago in connection with a proposal in regard to technical education, and I found that they dealt almost wholly with trade and commercial matters. The United States consular system is well developed throughout Europe; but, for all that, according to the statement of the Chairman of the United States Tariff Board, they have found the greatest possible difficulty in acquiring accurate information as to conditions, the cost of raw material, wages, transportation and the like in European countries. The Finance Minister is going to be confronted with the same difficulty to a much greater extent than have the Tariff Commissioners of the United States. It may be a comparatively easy matter to send representatives to Great Britain and ascertain these facts there; it may be a comparatively easy matter to obtain fairly accurate information in this country. Greater difficulty will be experienced in the United States. There is no power to compel any one in a foreign country to give us this information, and United States manufacturers will not be the easiest men to deal with when the Canadian commissioners seek information from them. But when they go to European countries, where we have no consular agencies, and where we have few trade agencies, I believe the difficulties will be almost insurmountable, and the information obtained will be highly inaccurate and thoroughly unreliable. I do not consider that much information of value will be obtained from an investigation in foreign countries; but I do believe that a great deal may be obtained in Canada, in Great Britain, and possibly in the United States, which will be of benefit to us in the future in determining upon our tariff legislation. Now cannot that all be gone into by the Board of Tariff Commissioners without any direction from the minister or the government, or from any other person? It is their duty to do it, they are there for that purpose, and why not let them go ahead, without any special direction, and without limiting their report to the Minister of Finance, but giving it to the public in general?

Mr. AMES. I think if you examine this clause 4 carefully, you will see that it proceeds from the lesser to the greater, that the first and second paragraph are more narrow, and more definite, and more specific than the 3rd and 4th paragraphs, and that the 5th paragraph really refers wholly to clause 4. Now let us see just how this works out in principle. Who is it that brings a Tariff Bill into this House, that presents the case for the revision of our tariff? It is the Minister of Finance. Clause 1 and clause 2 naturally give to the Minister of Finance the power of direction over that body of experts, that will collect for him the facts and information which he will need in order to make his draft Bill relating to the tariff, which draft Bill, I have no doubt, he submits to his colleagues which his colleagues, when satisfied with it, as a government, submit to the House. Therefore, whether we express it in the Bill or not, it will be the Finance Minister who will have the general charge and direction over that Tariff Commission, and it will be through the Finance Minister that that commission makes its report to the Cabinet and through the Cabinet to parliament. We may or may not specifically state in the Bill that it shall be under the direction and control of the Finance Minister, but whether we do that or not, that will actually be the case.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Why not say that the commission is independent?

Mr. AMES. Now, as to making the commission independent, I think that hon. members will see that if there is anything that will lead to confusion and general dislocation, it is that proposition made by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). This Tariff Commission, if they are to accomplish anything, will have to take up the work in a regular and definite way, and naturally the way that they will go about it, is to take up in order such schedules in the tariff, as in the judgment of the government call for first and earliest attention. Now there is no other body but the government of the country who can take upon themselves the authority to say that the wool schedule, for instance, or the iron schedule, or the cotton schedule shall first occupy the attention of this commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That is provided for by subsection 2.

Mr. AMES. Therefore, I say it will be necessary for the government to say to the commission, we desire that an inquiry shall first be directed upon such and such schedules, and surely through no one but the Finance Minister will these commands actually be given to the Tariff Commission, and when they prepare their report, whether it is stated so in specific words or not, it will be actually made to the Finance Minister and through the Finance Minister to the government.

Mr. GUTHRIE. If the hon. gentleman will read subsection 2, would not that meet the very objection he is urging to my argument? That gives the Finance Minister the power, when he desires to bring in a tariff, to investigate certain things. But I want to point out this contingency: Suppose there is a demand on the part of the public to have a certain industry investigated, for instance, the shoe manufacturing industry, and the Finance Minister does not think it should be investigated. Should not the Tariff Commission of their own motion, be entitled to go into that question, under subsection 2?

Mr. AMES. If anything is to be accomplished by this Tariff Commission in the way of gradually accumulating a library of facts and definite information that will serve as a basis, not only for the first tariff Bill, but for all subsequent tariff measures, they must proceed in an orderly manner. Naturally there will be but one authority to which applications for dealing with specific subjects will be made, and that is the government, and naturally there must be some special commission that will determine in the various claims which are made which claim is the most urgent and of the most immediate importance. Somebody has to take the responsibility of saying to that commission: You will study such and such subject first, and such and such subjects next, and you will report to us from time to time as you complete your inquiries in these various categories, and then we shall determine what action to take, and as to whether that action shall be immediate or deferred. You will surely get into confusion if you sit here and say to them, Go away, start on any subject you like, take your own time, study any subject you please, and report at any time you please, and we in the meantime will go on with our business. This government will have to decide on what subjects they consider tariff legislation is of most urgent importance. Therefore, they will say to that commission: Devote your energies first to such and such a subject, and when you have dealt with that, go on with the other schedules. I think I am right in saying that in the course of two or three years every item in our tariff schedules, we may reasonably expect, will be submitted to the consideration of this commission, they will send in probably a dozen volumes of reports in due course to the government, and in due course these reports will reach this parliament; but the order they will take will have to be determined by the government, and through the Finance Minister indicated to this Tariff Commission. Now clauses 1 and 2 deal with a limited, definite and narrow sphere of activity, in which the order would be determined by the Minister of Finance. Clauses 3 and 4 are much wider, they are of a general character, and in 3 and 4 the indication comes from the Governor in Council, and probably the report will be made to the Cabinet direct. Those are matters somewhat out of the routine, not a consecutive investigation of tariff schedules. Number 3, I think, relates to combines, 4 relates to trade treaties, and those, as they from time to time come before the House and require attention, will be referred to the commission only when the government think it is of sufficient importance to interrupt them in their regular work, and ask them to take up these special subjects from time to time as they arise.

Now, as to foreign countries, the hon. gentleman suggests that we shall be able to obtain no information in foreign countries. In the first place, let me point out that the United States is having no difficulty in getting information from a great many sources. That information can be obtained by us through consular assistance, we can get it through the assistance of the British Embassy. Further than that there is no reason why we should not avail ourselves of some of the information that has been acquired by other commissions of investigation; we will not be above taking advantage of any investigations that the American Tariff Commission have carried on abroad, which, in the opinion of our commissioners, will be of use to this government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The more we proceed with this Bill the more it becomes apparent that we are moving in a vicious circle. Everybody agrees that we should have information that will be of assistance to the government, as well as to the public generally, to enable them to form a correct judgment upon tariff matters. This is a general proposition to which nobody objects. There are two methods of obtaining this information. It was suggested from this side of the House that we might employ a statistical bureau to be attached to one of the departments, the Department of Finance or the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that this information might be collected, as it is collected in Britain, to some extent in this country, and to a larger extent in the United States.

A statistical bureau would have been under the jurisdiction and control of one of these departments and would have done everything that is now suggested by the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). But, this idea has been set aside. They are not satisfied to have a statistical bureau. The idea has been spread, and nobody has spread it more widely or solemnly than the hon. member for St. Antoine himself that we should have a big, independent commission composed of the biggest men we can find for the task. If we are to have such an independent commission, if it has been settled by the great majority, that we shall have such a commission, and that it shall not be merely a statistical bureau under ministerial responsibility, I take it that it should be a very high toned commission and that it should be composed of the biggest men, to use the language of my hon. friend, that the country can afford. Well then, if we are to have such a commission, if it is to have the character which the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, wants to give it, is he of the opinion that this commission should be under the control of the minister as any clerk might be? That is what he wants it to be. He wants these big men, the biggest men the country can supply, to be placed under the jurisdiction and control of the minister, to obey his commands, as they might be given to any clerk in the Department of Finance, or in the Department of Trade and Commerce. I would have been satisfied to have had the work done by clerks as it is done elsewhere, but that is not the idea of the hon. member for St. Antoine. He has combated that idea, he wants the biggest men the country can afford to come here at $7,000 a year, and be under the control of the minister as any clerk might be. The idea which has been suggested by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Guthrie) is that if we are to have such a commission, it should be an independent commission, to undertake this work and that the commands should go to the commission not from a minister but from parliament, itself, to do the work which it is suggested to do. It has to do what?—To collect information which would be reported to parliament, available to everybody, to the minister, of course, primarily, I admit, but to everybody else, also. The commission would do that work and at the end of the year we would have a volume giving us all the information that it had collected. The command goes to the commission to do what?—to collect information regarding:

(a) the price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption;

(b) the cost of production in Canada and elsewhere;

(c) the cost of transportation from the place of production to the place of use or consumption, whether in Canada or elsewhere;

(d) the cost, efficiency and conditions of labour in Canada and elsewhere;

(e) the prices received by producers, manufacturers, wholesale dealers, retailers and other distributors in Canada and elsewhere;

(f) all conditions and factors which affect or enter into the cost of production and the price to the consumers in Canada;

(g) generally, all the conditions affecting production, manufacture, cost and price in Canada as compared with other countries.

If the character of this commission is to be maintained, as we conceive it should be, since we have discarded the other method which I mentioned a moment ago, I think the commission should not be subjected to the control of the minister or of the Governor in Council, but of parliament alone. It must collect that information, put it in book form, and report to parliament.

Mr. AIKINS. Assuming that the government wishes to formulate a policy when parliament is not sitting, and that the information has already been collected by the board, to whom should the board report in order that the government might formulate its policy?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The commission will report to parliament, the government will formulate its policy upon it, and I shall have, like anybody else, as a member of parliament, the right to criticise the action taken by the government. What I contend is, that if you are to depart from the principle which has been adopted elsewhere, of having information of this character collected under ministerial responsibility by a statistical bureau, then the commission must be under the direct control of parliament. It should not be possible for the government to interfere with its work. If the government, as was suggested a moment ago by the hon. member for St. Antoine, wanted to have some particular information upon some point, the minister, under section 2, could say: I want a special report upon this or that point. If somebody comes to parliament and asks to have some matter investigated if somebody comes, as was suggested by the minister a moment ago, and asks for a duty upon such an article, or the removal of the duty upon another article, and it becomes a question whether or not that article is manufactured in Canada, the minister may refer the matter to the commission, and get the information in that way. If the Governor in Council wants to have some information upon some other matter, then again, he can apply to the commission. What I suggest to my hon. friends is, that if they want to be consistent in this matter, and if we are to have all we expect to have from this commission and the work that is intended to be done by it, and which is enumerated in clause 4, the commission should not be subject to interference by the minister. The commission should be primarily responsible to parliament. I repeat that this does not prevent the minister or the Governor-in-Council, if they want to have special information upon any matter, from applying to the commission, and securing that information, but I feel very strongly that if we are to have this commission as it is intended, and as we always understood it to be, an independent commission, it should not be liable to be controlled by the—I will not say caprice,—but by the authority of the minister. It should be under the control of parliament and of parliament alone, primarily. My hon. friend to use his own words, states that this commission should be composed of the biggest men the country can give us. Does he believe that, if we have a commission composed of the most eminent business men of the city of Montreal, they will be satisfied to be treated as clerks, under the Department of Finance or the Department of Trade and Commerce? Is it not better, if we are to have the benefit of their business ability, training and knowledge, that they should go on untrammelled and prepare for the next session of parliament a report on these important subjects which are enumerated in section 4?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has returned to the question of whether it is advisable to have a bureau or a Tariff Commission. One would think that the idea of a Tariff Commission had never come to the mind of my right hon. friend before. I desire to call the attention of the House to the report of a speech which my right hon. friend delivered in the City of Montreal in October, 1908, on which occasion he was the honoured guest of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, about which we have heard so much during the last two days. I intend to read some extracts from what he is reported to have said. Discussing the woollen tariff he said:

As you know—you have referred to it, it has been part of your debates—you approached the government during the last session to have an increase in the woollen duties, and I will preface whatever remarks I may have to offer now by the fact that I was not a member of the Tariff Commission which prepared the tariff which was adopted in 1907.

That was a commission or committee of ministers.

The members of the commission were my colleagues, Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, Sir Richard Cartwright, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Paterson, the Minister of Customs and Mr. Brodeur, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

When they brought in their report, and when they embodied it in the form of the Act of 1907, I think it was pretty generally accepted at that time that they had reached about a happy medium, and taking it all in all, that the tariff was fairly satisfactory. But it so happened that in the course of a few months, the woollen industry, which it must be admitted has not been flourishing very much for the last few years, became embarrassed and was brought into very serious difficulties. Then we were approached to make some concessions to increase the duties.

I understood the right hon. gentleman to say yesterday that he was a free trader, or that he believed in tariff for revenue only, and if I am under a wrong impression as to that I would like to be corrected now. Well, at this time, the right hon. gentleman had been asked to consider the question of the tariff duties with regard to the woollen schedule, and he said to his audience further on in his speech:

Why is it that you cannot produce what is produced by the British manufacturer? Well, Sir, if it be that the conscience of the Canadian manufacturer is too severe, that they will give only pure wool and nothing else, I say that is not business. I tell you I am not a business man, but the first rule of the business man is to give to his customer what he wants to buy. And if that be true, why is it that you do not give him that cloth which he wants to buy? That is the reason and it seems to me to be a very strong argument. This was the answer which was given to me upon the very anxious inquiries which I made —the answer that was given to me was this —the British manufacturer can produce the cheap article of cloth from East India wool and from cheap waste which he gets at a price which the Canadian manufacturer cannot have. Well, Sir, that is a satisfactory answer, so far as I am concerned.

I am sorry my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is not here; yesterday he said the end of production was consumption and I set out that doctrine of the hon. member for Red Deer against the statement of the right hon. the leader of the opposition when he says that, so far as he is concerned, the answer is satisfactory:

If it be true that the Canadian consumer wants that cloth, if it be true that the British manufacturer can have the raw material of that cloth cheaper than the Canadian manufacturer can have it in Canada, that is a condition of things which is in itself one to be considered, and which cannot be overlooked.

Why cannot it be overlooked; what is wrong about the British manufacturer obtaining this raw material more cheaply than the Canadian manufacturer; if there is anything in the theory advanced yesterday by my right hon. friend, where is he concerned in the cost of the raw material to the British manufacturer? I say that this statement here does not square with the policy laid down by the right hon. gentleman yesterday. He wants to know what the cost of the raw material is to the British manufacturer, and he says that if it is lower than the cost to the Canadian manufacturer, then, so far as he is concerned, that is a satisfactory answer. But this speech of the right hon. gentleman indicates a good deal more than his views with regard to the tariff, and, he proceeds to say:

How are we to proceed with this?

Remember they are discussing the question as to whether there shall or shall not be an increase in duty. To hear the right hon. gentleman yesterday one would naturally think that the minister should inquire into it, probably personally, or to some extent in his office, but this is what the right hon. gentleman said when he was addressing an audience of business men:

How are we to proceed with this? Gentlemen, I read to-day very carefully the discussion which has taken place in your convention during the last two days, and I noticed that a friend of mine, whom I do not see in this audience, but I believe he must be there amongst you somewhere, stated that there was a remedy at hand and that remedy was to send to England and to Germany a commission not of politicians, a commission not of party heelers, but a commission of good substantial business men.

In other words, the right hon. gentleman is considering the question of what he should do with regard to tariff increases and what is it that he suggests? Why, precisely what is suggested in this Bill: that instead of the government acting through its ministers, busy with other things, not able to go and make an investigation themselves, that the investigation be made by a commission of substantial business men. Yesterday we heard from some of my hon. friends opposite that this Tariff Commission should consist of a farmer, of some one representing the labouring interests, and of some one representing the manufacturing interests, but I wonder what these hon. gentlemen would have to say to a commission of good substantial business men to inquire into the situation and report, as is advocated here by their leader. Then the right hon. gentleman continued to say:

Why, sir, I subscribe to that with both my hands.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Please read again what I said before that.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). This is what my right hon. friend said:

There was a remedy at hand and that remedy was to send to England and to Germany a commission not of politicians, a commission not of party heelers, but a commission of good substantial business men.

My right hon. friend says 'hear, hear,' but let me ask him who was to appoint that commission? Why, of course the government would appoint that commission, and the arguments advanced here as to the kind of commission this government might appoint would apply equally to the kind of men my right hon. friend would appoint on his commission. Let us see what my right hon. gentleman says with regard to that:

Why, sir, I subscribe to that with both my hands.

There is nothing qualified about that; he has both hands up for it; he has both hands up for a commision of business men to investigate and report, so that his government, upon the report made by them may take such action as is necessary in connection with the tariff. And remember, these remarks of the right hon. gentleman are in reference to only one schedule of the tariff, and if the principle is correct with regard to one schedule, why not in connection with two schedules, or ten schedules, or twenty schedules for that matter. Where is the difference in principle? Why there is no difference in principle at all. No hon. gentleman opposite would, I am sure, contend for a moment that there is any difference in the principle of the thing; it is only a question of what number of inquiries shall be made by the commission. The right hon. gentleman says further:

Why, sir, I subscribe to that with both my hands if there is a case made out for investigation; but I have to say to my friend who has made the suggestion, that this very idea the Canadian government has already adopted. The last time that we received this delegation at Ottawa, some time in the month of July——

That refers to a delegation about this very matter of customs duties, and, as I indicated in my speech, delegations and petitions come to the Minister of Finance from time to time on matters of tariff, and the first question that comes up is: what are the facts. The right hon. gentleman continues:

—in the conversation I had with my friend the Minister of Customs, when I told him that we must do something, or look into this case and see whether or not something should be or should not be done, he suggested himself that we should send at once a commissioner to England——

In other words, the quest for facts that I have been talking about.

—he suggested at once that we should send a commissioner to England; not a party heeler——

The right hon. gentleman is evidently afraid that in some way they might succeed in getting a party heeler on his commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My right hon. friend seems to suspect his own government because, remember, it was his own government that was to appoint this commission. He seems to have it in his mind, it was an impression probably based on past experience, that there might be a party heeler on his commission and so he announces twice that there should not be a party heeler, and then he says:

Not a politician.

He is afraid also of politicians. The right hon. gentleman's own experience leads him to believe that there must necessarily be a party heeler or a politician on his commission, and from what has been said by him it would seem to me there was reason for suspicion that possibly, in spite of his best intentions there might be on his commission a party heeler or a politician. Well, let me assure my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, that the same conditions will not obtain with this government as appear to have obtained formerly in that regard. He himself suggested in his speech that we should at once send a commissioner to England, not a party heeler, not a politician, but a business man, an expert, just what we are contending for in this commission; a commission of experts, of business men, of capable men, to obtain information upon which we may act rationally in connection with tariff matters. That is just what my right hon. friend was aspiring to, only he did not carry it out as we propose to carry it out. The right hon. gentleman continued:

—not a party heeler, not a politician, but a business man, an expert, and I have reason to believe, though I have not spoken to Mr. Paterson since this expert has already been sent by him to England, and he is now doing the work. (Applause.)

That statement was followed with applause, as no doubt we would expect to have such a statement followed with applause, when made by my right hon. and eloquent friend. He continues to say:

Gentlemen, I am not here to say that your demand is just or unjust; I am not here to say that your request is fair or unfair, that it is right or not right——

Here, he is not in a position to pronounce, because he has not the facts. He continues:

—but I am here to say that your complaints are such that they are entitled to the fullest consideration on the part of the Canadian government. We have not been willing up to the present time to disturb the tariff; it is only 24 months old, not even so yet; and therefore, if we are to have a principle of stability about the tariff we should proceed very leisurely upon all such inquiries. But at all events there is a grave condition of things and we are prepared to meet it and to meet it in the manner which I have suggested.

And the manner he has suggested is, by appointing a commission to obtain the facts upon which the government might act, and that is precisely the principle that is embodied in this Bill.

I hope that this will command the assent of every reasonable man, as you are all reasonable men at this board.

Now, if that commanded and should command the assent of every reasonable man, why is it unreasonable that we should appoint a Tariff Commission by this Bill to do precisely the same work as that which my right hon. friend has in view, and with precisely the same object, namely, that we might have information on which we can construct a rational tariff?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). What date was that?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). 1908.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not a bad speech, either.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It was a splendid speech It is a lesson and a model, and I am only sorry that my right hon. friend has retrograded from the principles he laid down in that speech. It is one of the best arguments that I have run across for the appointment of a Tariff Commission, because it is based upon the desire of my right hon. friend for facts at a time when the question was up for his decision. My right hon. friend goes further, and talks of a permanent Tariff Commission. I wish to be fair to my right hon. friend: I do not say that the commission of which he appeared to approve was precisely on all-fours with this proposed commission; but I am going to show from what he said that the principle of obtaining through a commission information on which the government would act is by no means a departure from the policy which he himself has laid down in the past. He said further:

There is just another idea as to which I want to have a word of expression. You have stated, Mr. Chairman, in your address that you desire to have a permanent Tariff Commission.

I must believe that my hon. friend was sincere in his address to this association, and was not merely flirting with them politically. He said:

I do not exactly realize yet what is meant by a permanent Tariff Commission; but I am free to say that if it be meant that you would have a permanent commission such as I think they have in the United States——

What about that cheap Yankee device which we heard about from the hon. member for South Wellington?

—to follow the workings of the tariff from day to day, to follow the incidents, to follow the effects upon the producers and the consumer, and its daily effects upon the community, I do not see any reason why such a commission should not be appointed.

My right hon. friend and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association were evidently in perfect accord after that historic dinner, which took place in October, 1908. How far he has modified his views since, and how consistent he is in his modification of such views, I leave this House to judge. A little further on he said this:

I must be careful.

What he has said he has said carefully, and I think he said a good deal. If he had not in mind that he must be careful, I do not know how much further he would have gone. He went on:

You know parliament was dissolved yesterday and we are in the heat of an election now. My second is Mr. Monk, a prominent member of the opposition, and I must not make any promises, because I don't know what will be the consequences. I make no promises, but I say the matter will be looked into very carefully by my associates any myself.

With regard to what the right hon. leader of the opposition, and the hon. member for South Wellington have said with regard to the members of the commission being treated as clerks, either they have entirely misconceived the purpose of this Bill, which I can hardly believe possible in view of the explanations which have been given, or they are continuing to read into this Bill something that does not and never did exist in it. Now, what is the principle of the Bill? Hon. gentlemen talk about a Tariff Commission independent of the government. The principle of this Bill is this, and it cannot be anything else under our constitutional system: The government is responsible for the tariff, and that responsibility cannot be devolved upon an outside body. This commission is a body ancillary to the government, directed by the government to accomplish certain purposes, namely, to give us the information that we need in framing a rational tariff. The expression 'under the direction of the minister', means simply this, that instead of letting a commission, who are not directly responsible to the people, as the government is, pursue any desultory investigation they desire, they must be under the control or direction of the minister, who must know what matter is more urgent than others.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Is not that provided for in subsection 2?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). No, it is not. The first clauses are general clauses. To say that a commission might start out and pursue its investigation into anything here, there or elsewhere, would be simply to destroy the very purpose of a commission, which is to accomplish results, to bring about efficiency, to give us the information that we need from time to time in order to frame our tariff rates, and in order to remedy defects in the tariff as they become known, and the minister, informed by public opinion in many ways, realizes that there are certain things that must be investigated before anything else, and he is responsible. This only means that the minister must give the commission direction as to the lines of inquiry it is to pursue in order that it may be a useful part of the machinery of government for obtaining the information desired.

My hon. friend evidently has the conception that this should be an independent commission roving at its own sweet will in a desultory fashion about the country, not directed in any way, not responsible to the government, and bringing down reports and handing them to parliament. My hon. friend spoke about subverting the principles of the constitution. If the Bill were drawn along the line he suggests it would go very far to justify that criticism. The purpose of the Bill is to enable the government primarily responsible, to obtain information upon which it might first make up its mind as to tariff changes and then bring them down to this House. As I have said, the information is departmental, it is contained in reports to the department and as such as subject to the orders of the House as is other departmental information. Let us assume that instead of a Tariff Commission, we had a bureau of statistics. A great deal of information would be acquired from time to time by that bureau. Does any hon. gentleman mean to say that if this House asked that the information accumulated by the bureau should be brought down, it would not be produced? It is preposterous, of course, it would be brought down. There is no difference in kind between the information accumulated by the Tariff Commission and that which would be accumulated by such a bureau, as my hon. friend has referred to, it would be precisely the same kind of information obtained in one case by a tribunal and in the other by a sub-department of the finance department, by clerks or experts as my hon. friend has said. That being the case, all the arguments that have been brought forward by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) must fail of their effect.

Subsection 2 refers to other matters, as for example whether Canada is able or likely to manufacture certain commodities. This commission should in time, become skilled with regard to matters of this kind. What are the resources of Canada with regard to raw material, what would be the effect of a certain change in tariff, anything that, as a matter of fact, relates to the tariff or is connected with its administration and not included in the preceding sections may, by virtue of that subsection, be referred by the minister to the commission for inquiry and report. Subsection 4 has been made very wide indeed to cover matters not specifically covered by the preceding subsections. I think the objections raised are fanciful, they disappear when we come to examine them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What we are discussing at this moment is what should be the character of the commission which parliament is now creating, should it be an independent commission or a commission ancillary to the government. My hon. friend (Mr. White), has endeavoured to fortify himself by opinions expressed in 1908 during a debate in which I discussed two questions, one of them being the woollen duties. I then said that I had no objection whatever to sending a special commission to Great Britain and Germany to investigate the matter. That is done by all governments at all times: The government have power now to appoint men for the very purpose of obtaining information upon certain matters. There was nothing extraordinary about my suggestion, but that is no precedent for what we are doing now. My hon. friend would have found something more to the point in the other part of my speech, in which I said that we might consider the advisability of having such a commission, as they then had in the United States. That was considered perhaps too ambitious. There was then in the United States no such commission as has been appointed by President Taft, they had something very much in the nature of a bureau of statistics that collected very valuable information upon prices, methods of production, raw material &c., and I thought at the time that we might very well create a similar bureau. But this idea has been discarded, my hon. friend is not to-day introducing legislation to provide for such a commission as they had at that time, he is copying rather what has been done since under the administration of President Taft, he is really copying the Bill introduced in Congress, but not yet passed. We have discarded the idea I then had of having a commission ancillary to the government, a branch of the administration and we are appointing a broad and wide and big commission. The impression has been created in the public mind since the introduction of this Bill that my hon. friend is creating a very broad and independent commission. The commission ought to be one thing or the other, it ought to be an ancillary commission or rather a statistical bureau such as we have designed, under his own control, or else a parliamentary commission primarily responsible to parliament. What is the objection of my hon. friend to this? He said that an independent commission could go at its own sweet will and do anything it pleased. I beg to differ from him. This commission could not go at its own sweet will, it would have to do what it was enjoined to do, to collect information on this, that and the other subject, upon the cost of production, upon raw materials, upon transportation, upon methods of manufacture, upon prices, and bring that information before parliament. That would be the first thing to be done, such a commission could not go out at its own sweet will but would have to fulfil the duty imposed on it by parliament. My hon. friend in another part of the Bill very properly reserves to himself the power to impose certain work upon the commission and he reserves to the Governor in Council also the power to impose certain other work upon the commission. To say that under such circumstances the commission should be simply under the jurisdiction of the minister is not in accordance with the conception of the feature of the commission which would give it its greatest usefulness, that is that it should be an independent commission. The present government have appointed several commissions to deal with different subjects. These commissioners have been given certain powers, they have been instructed to do certain work. Does the minister believe now that it would be possible for the Governor in Council to go back to these commissioners, and say: You shall do your work in such and such a manner. Such a course is inconceivable. This is the same thing, this should be above all things a parliamentary commission, of course with power to the government to use it when they think it advisable to do so.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). In the creation of this commission and of previous commissions, I think we are taking rather the wrong method. We should not spend too much time here in discussing what the powers of the commissioners are to be, we should rather follow the example of the United States where the special commissioners are placed under the direction of the President or with us it would be under the general direction of the government. The Bills creating these commissions should not go into details as does the Bill creating the Grain Commission.

But the responsibility should be on the government of directing the commission. The government having full responsibility, ought, in each case, to define the reference made to the commission. In that way, you would reach an ascertainment of the facts and a realization of the object of the commission, far better than by detailed definition with regard to the commission under an Act of parliament. Rather than maintain the policy that we appear to have adopted here, I would see the powers of the commission made very general, the whole placed under the direction of some responsible minister, and then hold the government to responsibility. And the government ought to assume that responsibility and define the reference in every case. In the case of the Railway Commission, the work to be done is different. In that case you have to be more definite in outlining the powers to be exercised. But in the case of commissions of this kind which, as has been said here, are ancillary to the government, the definition ought to be broad and general, and the responsibility ought to be on the government. There will be cases that cannot be reached, even with all the care that we can exercise. My view with regard to these commissions is that we must have more of them, and that we are going to have more of them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Government by commission.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Yes, I have no doubt that there will be more and more government by commission, but with it should go more and more responsibility on the part of the government for the work of the commission. What I wish to keep clear is the absolute responsibility of the government to the people. That secured, I am not so much concerned about the details. Our Statute-book is getting too large; we are taking up too much of our time with all these details. I contend that you would get a better administration and a better investigation if you maintain clearly the responsibility of the government. It may be that after a while a commission of this kind will build up a practice and will have rules that will have the effect of law. The courts that we have created, while they administer the law, have made rules that are particularly a part of the law, and that are observed and respected by every one. That is what we want to get into our commissions; we want to get a flexibility and yet an effectiveness that will be equal to the occasion, and this cannot be attained with too much limitation and definition. Create a commission with broad powers and under a responsible head—as they say in the United States, 'under the direction of the President.' I regretted to hear the discussion of details here in the matter of the Grain Commission. I would rather see a law creating a Grain Commission under the direction of the government to deal with the grain trade of the country. I am not so much dissatisfied with the Bill now before us, but rather object to the discussions here of limitations in connection with the commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That sort of doctrine would well have suited Charles I.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I am not talking the doctrine of Charles I, but the doctrine of responsibility to the people. And the way to maintain an effective responsibility is to give broad powers and then hold those to whom they are given responsible for the exercise of those powers. If you have that as you ought to have it, in this commission, something will be done.

What little study of the tariff I have made leads me to believe that the facts can be ascertained by some kind of inquiry, and that men outside of parliament, men authorized to do it, will get thost facts, will analyse them and present them. And these men will be a board or court where those who wish to be heard can be heard, and all the facts presented. That will relieve parliament. We are talking of parliament being overworked. If the threshing out of facts can take place outside of parliament, and if we can get a statement for the guidance of parliament, it will facilitate the work of parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Or dispense with it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). No, facilitate it. I know of nobody who did so much to take away the responsibility of government and the rights of parliament, as did the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself.

An hon. MEMBER. Explain.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). We have seen it time and time again in this House. What I am proposing here is a means of securing efficiency and responsibility, of establishing a commission that will do work. As a result of that work, I hope, we shall get a tariff law that will fulfil the best wishes of the people of this country. And we do want a law in regard to the tariff that will fulfil those wishes. We do want the people of the west to have an opportunity to say what they think of the tariff of this country, and the people of the east also; and we wish them to be heard, as much as possible, free from political bias. We want a statement of facts, and if we can get such a statement before parliament acts, there ought to be no objection to the establishment of a commission to bring that about. I gather from the debate that went on in the country, and has gone on in this House, that the government was prepared to have some kind of commission that would collect the facts, and would present them to parliament and especially would collect the facts, as the Minister of Finance has stated here to-day, of such cases as were then pressing upon the attention of the government. There must be some direction of a commission of this kind, and some choice of the topics to be taken up. Let broad powers be given to the government, hold the government always responsible to parliament and you will get the work done and the rights of parliament will be preserved.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would like to say a word; and first, to express a little faint surprise at the position taken by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) which I have heard here for the first time, not having had the pleasure of hearing him the other afternoon. I think it will help us in parliament and in the country as well to look a little at the genesis of this commission. What has given rise to the talk about a commission, and to the idea that such an instrumentality as the commission was necessary? It arose out of the practical difficulties met in obtaining information for tariff legislation and out of the general impression, not only with the ministers themselves, who had to gather information, but with almost every interest in the country, that the information gathered was fragmentary and was not in its width or accuracy information upon which a tariff should be based. Sometimes the committee of ministers that went around the country were referred to as the 'Tariff Commission.' They were a tariff commission in no sense at all. They were a commission in no sense at all. They were simply three or four gentlemen who having gone about certain portions of the country hearing people giving their various views for and against different phases of a tariff measure, tariff proposals, tariff wishes and wants, made up their minds as best they could.

But I think I am not violating any confidence, when I say, as a member of one of those so-called commissions, or better, committees of parliament, it was never satisfactory, and never resulted in what was intended. In fact, the ministers themselves, passing to and fro through the country, listening for an hour to-day and an hour to-morrow to the divergent and different views, almost always sketchy, ended by having a more hazy idea than probably they had when they started out. I went over this country from one end of it to the other, holding, in connection with my colleagues, open meetings, where everybody was welcome, and where we listened to what the people had to say. It resulted in this, that mostly you heard long-winded statements made by people who were fond of talking, and generally people who had some particular fads to air. You could not turn them down, you were a committee of ministers, and the public was invited, and you had to listen to them courteously. You got another kind of information. You had carefully prepared expert statements by those who were advocating a certain interest, who came there to advocate a certain side of it, who would not look at arguments on the other side, who made as completely an ex parte case as they possibly could, and added to it their figures and their statements; a bulky document was filed away by your secretary, and taken along with you for the rest of the trip. Now, after that had gone on for one, two, or three months, or more, the ministers came together to frame a tariff. What had they? A lot more or less hazy impressions, where one blended with the other to such an extent that you scarcely had any clear idea of any one phase of the question; bundles, and bundles, and bundles of documents and statements, which you never afterwards looked at, which you were not able to digest, and which, when parliament called for them, were stacked up on the table so numerous that any man who looked at the outside of the package never thought of going into them. You had long statements, but no digestion or analysis of those statements. The ministers themselves were not able to digest or analyse those statements, the secretaries were not able to do it. It required expert men who understood that kind of thing, who made it their study, and had gone over them, had gone to the very bottom of them, and had added to the knowledge of them, knowledge gained otherwise, to make any fair analysis. I put it to my right hon. friend, and if his late Minister of Finance or his Minister of Customs were here, I would put it to them, whether what I am saying with reference to the modus operandi is not absolutely true. As a matter of fact, in the olden times my colleagues and myself came and sat down in the hurly burly of an approaching or a continuing session, hearing everybody, without having time to make investigation and making a more or less rule of thumb tariff. Hoping that we might do what was the best in the main but hardly ever sure, and basing it upon no careful analysis of the conditions. I do not doubt for a moment, that if Mr. Fielding were here, he would rise in his place and say that his experience was much like mine. Out of that, the ministers began to feel, and the people of this country, especially the business interests, began to feel, that there was a better way to get at the basis of a tariff, namely to choose men whose whole business it should be, not to make schedules, not to lay down percentages, not in any sense to recommend that this should be protected or that should be protected, not to tell you that you ought to have a tariff here and you ought to have a certain tariff there, not to intimate to you what protection they thought was necessary in this case or that case; but men whose sole business and duty it was to get at the whole facts of the case, and place those facts before the government, before parliament and before the people at large. You say sometimes that this is to relieve the government. It is a very poor idea of it, that, if you say it is to relieve members of parliament, it is a very poor idea of it, that. The business of making tariffs will be just the hardest, and most delicate, and responsible business, when you have a basis of facts that a good commission has gathered, that it has ever been in this country. No minister or ministry will hereafter be able to shield themselves behind generalities. Parliament itself will be put in possession of every fact that the ministers possess; every one of the 220 members of parliament will be an efficient check upon the ministerial quota that are laying before them what they propose to do in the matter of the tariff, and in the matter of charges. They will be able to judge. Heretofore a minister has been able to escape behind generalities, he has been able to shield himself behind the ignorance of parliament with reference to the real conditions of every item upon which it was desired to act. After this, if this commission is rightly appointed, and if it rightly does its duty, not only the members will be judging the ministers, not only will the ministers be put on their mettle, because they have got to come to the touchstone of facts, but the intelligent country outside will have a chance of judging of a tariff such as it never had before.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Is it my hon. friend's idea that these reports will be brought down to parliament?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I never had the least idea that they would not.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Is there any objection to making the Bill definite in that respect?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). All these reports given in the line of what is called for, in getting information which is the basis of tariff measures, is the property, not only of the government, or of the minister, but of parliament and of the country. Nobody, I think in this House, has ever had any other idea of it.

Mr. EDWARDS. The Minister of Finance distinctly stated that yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I think we elaborated this matter in council. So far as I am concerned, I never had any other idea of it than that. So I say that that will be the position of things. No one will be able to shield himself behind an ex parte statement, or behind lack of knowledge when the knowledge will be there, and every intelligent man will be able to draw his own conclusions.

Now I consider this to be another great effect of a Tariff Commission of this kind. A basis of facts is what we want to get at. It is invaluable for the legislator, it is invaluable for the minister who is framing a tariff, it is invaluable for the business man; it is invaluable in this respect, that it prepares and puts before the country a touchstone where competent and incompetent men meet, as it were, on common ground, when grievances are raised or are alleged. To-day men honestly think that the tax upon agricultural implements is too high, that the men who are making them are making fortunes, and that this tax ought to be lowered.

They get the best information they can and they cite that information as a proof that their assertion is right. The man who is making implements, knowing, perhaps a little more about the modus operandi and about the business itself, combats the farmer and says: No, you are wrong in your information; it is thus and so. Both of these are ex parte statements, whatever else you may say about them. The farmer never wants to get rid of any fair proportion of taxes that he ought to contribute to the government and upkeep of this country. The farmer is willing to pay his proper proportion of taxes, but he wants to know that he is not paying more than his proper proportion of taxes. He does not want to shirk his taxes, neither does any other good citizen of this country. Now, in a dispute like that, is it not invaluable to have the absolute facts, as near as you can ascertain them by a commission or a committee of men, whose duty it is to get at the facts, who become skilful in getting facts and skilful in placing them in the way in which they can be most easily read and understood? Surely it is the touchstone to the farmer and the agricultural implement maker and their grievance is settled by reference to a standard of fact. But, if it is proved that, taking into account the whole business, its costs and charges, the tariff is too great upon that article, down it comes and no ministry can keep it up, because it is shown by the facts and the ministry could not find support in parliament unless they were right in that matter. Show that and it comes down. Show the opposite and every fair-minded man who believes in keeping the industries of Canada intact, will surely say, if it is not enough, let a little more be added. But no commission dare say whether it shall be lowered or whether it shall be heightened, whether it shall be 17 per cent, or 25 per cent, or 10 per cent. It is not their business and they go outside of their business entirely when they attempt to do anything like that.

In addition to that, such a commission must have some directive power. It must have guidance. Who shall guide it? Shall parliament guide the commission? You could not have a more bulky unmanageable guide than parliament to guide the commission. Parliament cannot discipline itself, cannot agree within itself; it is actuated by two entirely different ideas. The only way you can have correct guidance for a commission of this kind is by a committee of parliament which is responsible to parliament and responsible for its guidance of this commission. Why all these fanciful views as to what the government purpose to do or as to what will be done by this commission? The government cannot shield themselves behind incorrect or wrong methods or methods which are not thorough in regard to this matter. Your commission is moving through the country in the sight of the world and of parliament, its results come to parliament through the report which has been made to the minister. No ministry could successfully delegate their work to a commission.

But remember that the minister is a politician. He is a Tory; he is a Grit; that is a fact, but there is neither Toryism nor Gritism in absolute facts, and this commission is told to go and get absolute facts. A commissioner may be a Tory when he starts or a Grit when he starts, a protectionist when he starts or a free trader when he starts, but when he comes to the cost of cotton everybody knows that there is neither Toryism nor Gritism in determining the cost of cotton or wool, or leather, or the cost of the processes which are put upon them. Toryism or Gritism, free trade or protection, will have nothing to do with the matter; yet, you know that the men who get the results of the investigations of the commission will go to work and place upon these articles a tariff of so much per cent here and so much per cent there. It will be so whether they are protectionists, whether they are tariff reform men or whether they are free traders. This seems to me to be the simplest thing in the world. I do not want to give my hon. friends advice; they are older in experience and certainly older in wickedness than I am; they do not need any advice from me, but my wonder is that they have taken up this position of absolute opposition to getting the facts. Liberals are not supposed to fear the facts. The time was in the years not long gone by when we tried to lift the lid, but the lid was nailed down tight and fixed by their parliamentary majority. Why? Because they feared the facts? Was that it? Is it this lingering fear in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that when we get this basis of clean and clear and absolute fact there will be created a substratum upon which the industries of this country and the development of this country can be based and it will no longer be possible to talk protection and practise free trade or to practise protection and talk free trade as they have been able to do? It will be not theories but facts. We have had too many theories in this parliamentary life of ours so far. Let us get hold of good honest facts and then we can build better upon them than we can upon theories.

Now, what is troubling my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) anyway? I do not believe that he is troubled in his heart. I think he believes that this commission is the very thing it ought to be. It is the very thing that he once said it ought to be. No man can read the speech of the right hon. gentleman quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) this afternoon without believing that the right hon. gentleman had in his head exactly the idea that we have in our heads, because it is the same word for word, principle for principle, and it has the same object to be attained. What is the difference? Only this, that my right hon. friend is now on the other side of the House.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Mr. Chairman, I only want to make a very few remarks on this important question and if I did not feel my responsibility in connection with the people that I have the honour to represent I would not perhaps trouble the committee at all. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) came west last fall and made the declaration that he would give the people a Tariff Commission. The more I have heard this question discussed in the House and the more I have thought over it, the more convinced I am that we are going to solve the problem of distrust between the two great divisions into which we might say the citizens of this country are divided. We can almost say that these two divisions are composed of the manufacturers on the one side and the agricultural class on the other. So far as my experience goes, I think I can say without fear of contradiction that there has been for a great many years a feeling of distrust, of want of confidence, between these two great classes of citizens. Speaking for the west, I think I can say that we are almost tired and weary of the word 'tariff.'

Mr. FOSTER (N. Toronto).

Since I came to this House, the tariff has been a potent factor in our discussions. We read in history that one of the queens of England said that after her death the word 'Calais' would be found written on her heart, and I believe, Sir, that if a post-mortem is ever held on the members who have been sitting in this House for several years past, the word 'Tariff' will be found written in their hearts. And, why is it that we have been so long in coming to a practical conclusion in connection with this great question. I have said that I believe there is distrust and want of confidence between the manufacturing and the agricultural classes in this country, and, personally I believe, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, that that feeling has arisen simply because we fail to understand each other as is the case with regard to other questions which engage the attention of the people of this country. We in the west think we pay too much for our agricultural implements; I am mighty sure that the farmers in my constituency think so, at any rate. The manufacturers of Canada say, I suppose, that we are not paying too much, and who knows? I do not know, and one of the duties of this commission will be to find out. If we have the right kind of a commission, and I am strong on that point of having the right kind of a commission, one of the utilities of that commission will be that they will give us such definite, such fair, and such independent information that you can place it before the farmers or any other class of the community and allow them to judge for themselves whether they are paying too much, or whether the manufacturer is asking too much. I have always listened with a great deal of pleasure and interest to the remarks of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) but I never heard him labour so, as he did the other day in this House, when he was trying to read into this Bill something which it absolutely does not contain. I say, Sir, if it contains what he and other hon. gentlemen opposite say it contains, I am opposed to it, and I go further and I say that if it contains all that was read into it by my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) I am also opposed to it. The great question is: who is this commission to serve. Hon. gentlemen opposite say it is going to serve the manufacturers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear hear.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: 'Hear, hear,' to that, but my belief is that it is intended to serve all classes of the community, and that is the kind of commission I want, and if we are honest about it, that is the kind of commission it will be. Once this Bill passes, then the most important question is as to the personnel of this commision. The Minister of Finance told us that no man would be appointed because of his occupation, and while that was a good thought, I would like if he had gone a little further, and said that no man would be kept off the commission because of his occupation. We want broad, big men on this commission, and, if the commission is going to do what I believe it can do, and what I hope, it will do, then we must have at least one member of it, whose environment has been amongst the great agricultural classes of this country. I believe that the men appointed on that commission will be fair, and will try to be fair, but in order that we may get out of that commission all there is in it for the best interest of Canada, we must have some man who understands the great agricultural classes of the community, and who is in sympathy with them. Now, as to whose charge this commission should be under. I have something to say, and there is no doubt that there must be somebody to run it, and by that, I do not mean to say that it is a machine.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am afraid it is.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I know my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff), is very suspicious, but I say to him that if we are to act in the best interests of all the people of Canada, we must get out of our minds this suspicion, and deal with the question fairly and squarely, as it presents itself to us.

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Schaffner) has himself expressed more suspicion than any gentleman who has yet spoken on the Bill.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. All right, if you believe so, but I am saying what I think. Of course, this commission comes very properly and very logically under the Minister of Finance, who has to do with tariff matters. The Minister of Finance must direct the commission, but, when I say that, I do not mean to be understood as saying that when this commission goes out to investigate any particular industry, the Minister of Finance is to direct the commission what to do. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, if he goes that far, and if he does, I am opposed to it. Supposing, for example, the farming industry of this country comes to the conclusion that something in connection with the tariff is bearing on them too heavily, and believes that it should be investigated, I do not take it that the Minister of Finance could or would prevent this class of the community from having this investigation into what they want to have investigated. I do not think he goes that far.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The Bill goes that far.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I do not believe it does. The Bill says that the commission shall be under the direction of the Minister of Finance, but what part of the Bill goes any further than that?

Mr. OLIVER. Subclause 4 of section 4.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What that clause says is this:

> It shall also be the duty of the commission to inquire into any other matter or thing in relation to the trade or commerce of Canada, which the Governor in Council sees fit to refer to the commission for inquiry or report.

Is that what the hon. gentleman refers to?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Suppose the minister does not direct, what happens then? We want to give the commission power to investigate that without the minister.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I am not very familiar with responsible government; but it seems to me that the strongest point in favour of this commission is that it will remove the distrust to which I refer. While I am quite willing that the minister should direct the matter, I think that the agriculturists of this country who form a large proportion of the population, should be able to go to him and ask him to investigate any matter that they think should be investigated. I think that is a fair proposition, and I cannot think that the Minister of Finance would refuse such a request, whether it is provided for in the Bill or not. The whole object of this Bill, as I understand it, is to get information. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the Bill. I think it is the most progressive piece of legislation which has been introduced into this House since I entered it, barring perhaps the Railway Commission, and I do not know but it is broader than that. I have always been in favour of the Railway Commission, and in my constituency I have given the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition the greatest credit for establishing that commission, and have always recognized the good work it has done; and I believe that is an example of the good this Tariff Commission will do. I think that on both sides of the House we are reading into this Bill far more than it contains, because broad and big men are not all in the manufacturing institutions, the railway institutions or any other particular institution. A broad and big man means a man familiar with the great work in which he is engaged, whatever it may be; and the personnel of this commission should be composed of men from at least two of the great classes in this country.

Mr. BORDEN. I think there has been on the other side of the House a great deal of misapprehension as to what these words, 'under the direction of the minister' are intended to convey. In subsection 1 of section 4, the character of the information to be obtained by this commission is set forth in considerable detail. Then, subsection 2, in order to make the scope of the commission thoroughly comprehensive, declares that 'the commission shall make inquiry into any other matter upon which the minister desires information, in relation to any goods which, if brought into Canada or produced in Canada, are subject to or exempt from duties of customs, and shall report to the minister.' The third subsection deals with inquiries under the Customs Act. The fourth subsection enables, not the minister but the Governor in Council, to direct the commission to make inquiry into any other matter or thing in relation to the trade or commerce of Canada. No one can deny that the scope of the commission is pretty comprehensive. In the first subsection the character of the information which the commission is to obtain is stated in considerable detail. The subjects in respect of which the commission is to obtain that information are not enumerated. Take, for example, the item of agricultural implements, which has entered into every tariff which we have had in this country for many years. In some section of the country an agitation might arise with respect to the duties on agricultural implements. The commission might be going on in the ordinary course, without any particular direction from the minister, to make inquiry into this or that or the other item of the tariff. It would be competent for the Minister of Finance, by virtue of those words 'under the direction of the minister,' to say to them: Drop everything else, and investigate the conditions with regard to the production of agricultural implements in Canada, and ascertain whether or not, having regard to the conditions of production in this country as compared with the conditions in other countries, the tariff is too high. It is precisely for the very reason to which my hon. friend calls attention that these words 'under the direction of the minister' have been inserted in the Bill. The ministers of the Crown are responsible to parliament, and responsible through parliament to the people of this country; and if the people of any particular district in the country should find themselves pressed by conditions which prevail under the tariff as it may exist at any time, it should be open to them to make representations to the Minister of Finance, and it would be proper for him, having regard to those representations, to direct an inquiry into that particular grievance to the exclusion of everything else for the time being. That is the object of the Bill; and, as I apprehend the matter, the omission of those words from the Bill would prevent the Minister of Finance from directing the attention and energies of the commission to the matter to which I have alluded or to similar matters that might at once demand the attention of the government and the inquiry of the Tariff Commission. That is the whole theory, as I understand it. The people will have a commission which can make these inquiries, it will be the right of the people at all times to make representations to the government through the minister in charge; and it will be the duty of the minister in charge, upon these representations, to direct a proper inquiry to be made by this commission into all the conditions both in this country and in other countries which ought to control the framing of a tariff in that regard.

Mr. GERMAN. Will the right hon. gentleman confirm what the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated, that the reports made by the commission would be laid before parliament on request?

Mr. BORDEN. That is entirely my apprehension of the matter.

Mr. OLIVER. I think my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) is well advised in looking upon this Bill with some measure of suspicion. There has been so much protest as to what the Bill did not contain as to lead those of us who are, like my hon. friend from Souris, inclined to be suspicious, to think that perhaps after all there is something in it that is not disclosed on the surface; because often a Bill is important from what it does not contain rather than from what it does contain. I agree with my hon friend from Souris that the purpose in the mind of anyone who spoke in this country on behalf of a Tariff Commission was that it would give all classes of people in the country a fair deal. The hon. gentleman was particular to inquire as to where the farmers of the west came in, under the terms of this Bill. The right hon. the Prime Minister undertook to show him, but he did not find it and does not find it in the four corners of the Bill.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. He said he did.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend has just given this House an example of what this Bill is intended to do; as I said on the second reading, its purpose is to humbug the people of this country.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I do not think so for a moment.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is at liberty to have his own opinion, but I think the very statements he made to-day as to his understanding of the Bill and as to what he understood the Prime Minister to say, is the evidence of that.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That is your opinion.

Mr. OLIVER. Because there is not within the four corners of the Bill anything to show that there is any provision or that provision will be made or can be made under that Bill for considering the interests of the farmers in the matter of the tariff. It was open to the Finance Minister as to the Prime Minister to show where that is contained in the Bill. It is not contained.

Mr. EDWARDS. In section 4.

Mr. OLIVER. It is a question as between my hon. friend and myself as to the knowledge of the English language, and I declare that in section 4 there is nothing which contemplates the consideration of the interest of the farmer by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then there is no part of the section that contemplates going into the consideration of the condition of any class, it contemplates a consideration of the condition of the farmer as well as of any other class.

Mr. OLIVER. That is where my hon. friend is entirely mistaken and it is another evidence of the success of the Bill and its promoter in humbugging the people of the country. My hon. friend has said no class is specified in this Bill. If he can find in the first eight subsections of section 4 anything but a direct allusion to the interests of the manufacturers of this country I will concede that he is right.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think I can.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no need of our discussing the matter, I have expressed my opinion, my hon. friend has expressed his and our opinions are in the judgment of the House and of the country.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Has my hon. friend's attention been called to the interpretation clauses of the Act:

'Goods,' means products, wares and merchandise,

And to the phrase in section 4:

In respect of goods produced in or imported into Canada,——

In other words, to the fact that goods means products, the products of the farmer? I desire to tell my hon. friend that products were put in in order that there might be no doubt that this Bill applied to the products of the farmer as to the products of the manufacturer.

Mr. OLIVER. We are very glad to have the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) on the subject, but I would call his attention to the fact that this is the first time that any such interpretation has been put upon any provision of the Bill from start to finish.

Mr. EDWARDS. In the interpretation of the word 'goods' has he overlooked the specific mention of horses, cattle and other animals?

Mr. OLIVER. I am dealing with section 4 and with the discussion that has gone on in regard to this Bill, and I say that by neither the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce nor the right hon. the Prime Minister, my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) or any other member of the House, who has spoken in regard to this Bill until the hon. member for Souris, has the question of the interests of the farming community been discussed or alluded to. It has been taken for granted by every one who spoke in regard to the Bill that this was a Bill to deal with the manufacturing interests and with nothing else.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). As they affected the farmers too.

Mr. AMES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct his statement. At the beginning of my speech he will find this:

Read the definition at the beginning of the Act. Goods are treated of throughout the whole Act, and what do goods include? They include products of the farm, horses, cattle and other animals, and everything that the farmer produces is just as highly subject and likely to be subjected to the inquiry of this commission in the interest of the farmer as are the goods which the manufacturers themselves produce.

Will my hon. friend please withdraw his remarks that I have not referred in any way to the farmer.

Mr. OLIVER. I regret that I had not the privilege of hearing my hon. friend speak, so I must apologize for having made that allusion to him, but I heard his speech quoted by other speakers, and I took it for granted that that expressed the leading idea of his speech, as I am certain it did.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Might I remind him too that the other day I also referred to the same matter?

Mr. OLIVER. Of course I accept what my hon. friend has said, but I must admit that the fact is not in my mind as he has stated it. However, this Bill to provide for the appointment of a so-called Tariff Commission is a Bill to lay the foundation of a revision of the tariff upwards and everything that has been said on the other side of the House on behalf of the Bill, must lead us absolutely to that conclusion. There has been no suggestion that anything was likely to come out of the work of this commission that would tend to tariff revision downward. It is the farmer who is interested in tariff revision downward, and it is the man who represents the farmers and speaks for them, who is taking serious responsibility in supporting and advocating a measure which has no other purpose than to lay the foundation for a tariff revision upward, to lay more heavily than they lie to-day, the burdens of the tariff upon the farmer.

I am sorry my hon. friend from South York is not in the House. I wanted to agree with him as well as with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner). The committee will remember how strongly he insisted on the desirability of retaining the responsibility of government, he thought we were paying too much attention to detail in discussing this Bill and that what we should do, was to provide a short Act that would place all power in the hands of the minister. We on this side are exactly at one with my hon. friend in this desire. What we want is that the minister shall take full responsibility for collecting such information as he sees fit to collect and shall place it before the House on his responsibility when called upon to do so.

That is our idea of the proper way of collecting information upon which the minister is to base his revision of the tariff—to collect that information on his own responsibility and that of the government, and place it before parliament when called upon as a report of the department and the government, for which he and his officials are responsible. But that is not what these hon. gentlemen want. What they want is that parliament shall take the responsibility for the collecting of information which shall be presumed to be independent and comprehensive information, and which shall to that extent be a fraud upon the people of the country, which shall, be partisan information collected at the direction of the Minister of Finance, taking such as he wishes to be taken, leaving out such as he does not wish to have taken. This information is to be placed before the country and before parliament, as occasion arises, as the report of a commission of parliament.

We do not object to information; we want information; we want the governmetn to get all the information it can, and we want parliament to have all the information it can get, because in the last resort, although the government brings down a tariff measure, parliament has to support or oppose that measure. Each individual member must declare himself on that measure upon his responsibility to his constituents. Therefore, every member of parliament is just as much entitled to the full information collected by a commission as the government is. And it is because this means which is being taken by the government to collect information, is being taken in the name of parliament and under the name of a commission, when it is really, to all intents and purposes, departmental information, that we object to it. We say that if it is to be departmental, let it be departmental; and if it is to be a commission, let it be a commission. Let it be on the responsibility of parliament for the information of parliament, if this is to be a commission. But, if our friends opposite do not wish to give us a commission of that kind, then let them get their information as a department on their responsibility which it is within their right to do and which is just as proper a method of collecting information as the other;—under the responsible system of government it is a more correct method. Let them get their information that way; but let them not come before the country assuming to give the country an independent commission. An independent commission, if you please; when it is, in the last degree, a partisan commission directed by the minister, and reporting to him alone as if they were the hired officials of his department. We say: Play fair; Play fair with the people; If you want to get credit for appointing a commission, if you want to claim that the information collected by this commission is impartial information, then let it be so. But do not come before parliament and the country claiming an impartial commission, when, as a matter of fact, you are doing neither more nor less than collecting information as though it were under the control, absolutely under the control, of the officials of the department.,

I would like to know how the position which is taken can be justified. They say that this commission is to be merely statistical. If so, there is no justification for the salaries that are to be paid. We are to have three commissioners drawing the same salaries as the members of the government—nay, the chairman draws a higher salary than the members of the government. And these commissioners, we are told, are to collect information; simply to collect information. I say the price is too high; if the work is only to collect information they should not be paid ministerial salaries. But, if they are to be paid ministerial salaries, then their responsibility ought properly to be greater than merely to collect information. The position taken by the government is illogical and untenable in that regard.

But I want to have a word to say on my own account in regard to the provisions of the Bill contained in section 4. And I want to insist that there is something else to be considered by the government in connection with the tariff than merely the interests of the manufacturers.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. There is something more to be considered than whether a manufacturer is making a dividend or not. If this to be the purpose of the commission, then this commission is simply a means to enable the tribute-takers to increase their exactions. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that we are in this country at a very serious stage in the evolution of our affairs. We have had great development during the past few years, and with that development has come about a condition which is new, so far as this country is concerned, a condition which calls for the most careful attention of all representative men and certainly of the government of the country. I speak of the aggregations of capital which have come together as mergers, a new feature in the development of our country, a feature that has grown so rapidly and has become of such stupendous proportions that it claims the attention of our government; and particularly claims this attention in connection with any tariff adjustment that may be made. I find on reference to the 'Monetary Times'—and it is a good authority—that in the past three years there has been an increase of industrial capitalization by means of mergers from $125,000,000 to $335,000,000, and of this increase no less than $100,000,000 is capitalization that represents no actual investment. Now, the purpose of the merger is to earn dividends on the capitalization—otherwise there is no purpose in issuing that capital. And one way to secure the dividends is by manipulation of the tariff. And if this Tariff Commission, appointed by a government which owes its existence to these very combines——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER——which owes its very existence to these very combines——

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Where were the Massey-Harris interests in the last fight?

Mr. OLIVER. The Massey Harris Company were with you, strongly.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Does the hon. gentleman seriously say that Senator Jones and Senator Frost were supporting the Conservative party, and if so, where and when did they speak?

Mr. OLIVER. I will say certainly that they did not support the Liberal party.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Who is the head of the cement trust he has so severely criticised in the House?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not say at the moment, but it does not make any difference who is at the head of any trust. I am not discussing persons, I am discussing facts and conditions, and I am trying to draw to the attention of the government the serious nature of these conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman not remember that one year ago yesterday, when this subject was under discussion in the House a member of the government in which he had a place practically defended these mergers, and declared they were for the good of the country?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not really see what my hon. friend's allusion has to do with the question. I am dealing with a condition not with a theory; I am not dealing with what somebody else did at some other time or at some other place.

Mr. MEIGHEN. You were a party to it.

Mr. OLIVER. Never mind. My hon. friend, if he votes for this Bill, is a party to an undertaking to give value to the over-capitalization of these mergers.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I would be glad if you would show that now.

Mr. OLIVER. I have said that there is a hundred million dollars of stock issued for which not one dollar in money has been paid, and it is the purpose of the merger, by every influence it can bring to bear, to secure earnings on that common stock, that stock for which no money was paid. It is the business of mergers, and it is their interest, to secure such adjustment of the tariff as will bring about that result; and if section 4 of this Bill does not contemplate that inquiries of this kind shall be directed especially to the purpose of finding out just how far the taxation of the people can be increased so as to give earnings on that valueless stock, then I will admit that I do not understand the meaning of the English language.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Just read the words.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does not the section provide for ascertaining the facts, whatever they are?

Mr. OLIVER. For ascertaining the facts as directed by the minister. And who put the Minister of Finance in this House? Who does he represent in this House?

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). South Leeds.

Mr. OLIVER. He represents the interest of the mergers, he represents that section of the Liberal party which was Liberal as long as Liberalism meant profit; but as soon as Liberalism meant principle was with the other side.

Mr. PELLETIER. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us at what time Liberalism ceased to represent profit and began to represent principle?

Mr. OLIVER. The day that the Hon. Mr. Fielding announced the result of the reciprocity negotiations in this House so far as these people were concerned. It is to the Minister of Finance that we are to look for protection against the exactions that will be demanded from time to time by these mergers. The minister will excuse us if we have some suspicion as to the consequences. And we say again to him, he is in the saddle, he and his friends have secured the price, the responsibility is upon them. Let them take their price, but give us fair-play; and when he brings a Tariff Bill into this House let him do it on his responsibility as to the information upon which he bases it. Don't let him come here and ask this House to legislate to provide an independent commission that will be absolutely under his thumb. We want fair-play, nothing more; we want fair-play for the farmers as well as for the manufacturers.

Now I want to say that I am not here to represent the interests of the farmers as against the manufacturers; and in order to relieve the mind of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), who wants to know what my opinion is with regard to tariff questions, I will take the liberty of giving it. I believe the tariff is levied for the purpose of raising a revenue, and if it is not, it ought to be. That is the foundation purpose of a tariff, and when we have a tariff that is adjusted for the purpose of raising a revenue, it is not unreasonable that such protection as is incidental to that tariff should be enjoyed by whoever may be fortunate enough to come under it. What I wanted to say was that the tariff, in my judgment, ought to be established not for the purpose of raising a revenue, and when the tariff is established not for the purpose of as the Minister of Finance suggested in his speech, of developing our resources or increasing our industries, then, in my judgment, that is a perversion of the proper purpose of a tariff; because you cannot develop resources, you cannot increase industries by increasing taxation. I hope I have made my position clear in regard to the tariff. Hon. gentlemen on the other side declare that we on this side stand for free trade. For my own part I believe that free trade is the ideal way of carrying on the trade of the country, and that the revenue should be raised by direct taxation. But because I have a certain ideal, that is not to say that I expect that ideal to be attained. I must accept conditions as they are, and I have stated to the House, frankly, exactly what my views are, and what are the views of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. gentleman says he believes in protection incidental to a revenue tariff.

Mr. OLIVER. No I did not.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am in the judgment of the House. Will the hon. gentleman repeat his sentence in which he used the term 'protection' incidental to revenue tariff?

Mr. OLIVER. I say, I believe in a tariff so adjusted as to produce a revenue, and I am willing to concede, and it is not unreasonable to concede, that the incidental protection should go to the advantage of such interests as may be affected by it.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman say that there should be any protection incidentally, or does he agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that there should be a tariff for revenue without any incidental protection.

Mr. OLIVER. I have tried to put to my hon. friend that my ideal is exactly the same as the ideal of the hon. member for Red Deer, but, having tried to show my hon. friend exactly how I looked at this question from a practical standpoint, I hope I have made myself clear although I cannot hope that I have altogether suited my hon. friend by my expression.

Mr. MEIGHEN. What does my hon. friend understand by an ideal that we cannot enforce?

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend will pardon me if I just emphasise this point that when we have declared from time to time that there was such an ideal in our minds, we have not by any means, declared that that ideal is our policy. Our hon. friends have been trying to humbug the public in trying to place us in that position. We are dealing with practical matters in a practical way, and I have told my hon. friend exactly what my view is in regard to that matter, a view which will, I think, be accepted by the large majority of the people in this country.

But what I want to deal particularly with is, the position in which our farmers in the western country are at present, by reason of the accession of our friends on the other side to office. I do not intend to go into the matter fully, but I just intend to give one or two facts to the House and to show to the Minister of Finance that it seems to me that, in the face of these facts and if he has due regard to the welfare of the country, he will be well advised to have his Tariff Commission go into these facts with the view, not of revising the tariff upward, but of revising the tariff downward. The committee knows that the reciprocity arrangement provided for the free entry of agricultural products into the United States markets. That privilege was secured by reason of certain concessions granted on this side. I do not know that it was ever contended that the concessions granted on this side were unreasonable, improper or injurious, but it was declared that it was not in the interests of the party that my hon. friends belong to that the agricultural products of Canada should secure free access to the markets of the United States. I will not trouble the committee at any great length on this matter, but I just want to place a few figures in the possession of the committee so that hon. members will know just how hard this country has been hit by the tariff policy that they stand for to-day. I have here the record of three shipments of barley from Carman, Manitoba, over the Great Northern to Minneapolis and the sale of the grain there. They are as follows:

Bushels	Price in Minneapolis.	Duty.
804..	$727 64	$241 22
1253	1240 15	375 92
1243	1155 54	372 96

I find on looking at the records of the Department of Trade and Commerce that something like a million and a half bushels of barley have gone through the elevators at Fort William this season that the 1st September to the 11th December. If that barley had all gone to Minneapolis instead of to Fort William it would have netted the producer just $450,000 more than he got. On every million bushels of barley produced and sold in the west the men who produced that barley lost $300,000 by reason of the success of the tariff policy of our friends.

Mr. GOODEVE. Is the hon. gentleman contending that the farmer would have got the additional price represented by the amount paid in duty for his barley?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, I am contending that absolutely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOODEVE. Then, the producer, not the consumer, pays the duty?

Mr. OLIVER. The producer in this case is paying the duty; there is no question about that. If there had been reciprocity the duty would not have been paid and the duty would have remained in the farmer's pocket. Then, to show what the farmer has lost on his wheat, let me give a few figures showing comparative prices:

No. 1 NORTHERN WHEAT, JANUARY 8, 1912.

	Winnipeg.	Minneapolis.	Spread.
May	$1.00¼	$1.07⅞	.07⅛
July	1.01⅛	1.08¼	.06⅛
Cash	.94¾	1.08½	L13¾

I should mention that No. 1 Northern in Canada is not the same as No. 1 Northern in the state of Minnesota.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Can the hon. gentleman tell us what the spread was on the 19th and 20th of September last?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It is very important. It was about a cent.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think it is very important. What is important is that the spread is what it is now and what it is going to be. Just to establish my point that the price of No. 1 Northern as quoted in Minneapolis is not in proper relation to the price of No. 1 Northern quoted in Winnipeg, I want to give the facts with regard to a number of cars sold in, on the Minneapolis sample market, samples from which cars were brought to Winnipeg, examined and valued by members of the grain exchange, the result of which is as follows:

Car No.	Price Minn.	Grade Ft. Wm.	Price Ft. Wm.	Spread.
	$ cts.		cts.
34554	83	No. 5 tough.	64	19
71558	96	No. 6 "	59	37
17052	83½	No. 5 "	69	14½
46593	1 00	No. 4 "	79	21
11786	99	No. 4 "	79	20
23040	1 01½	No. 3 "	85	16½
10918	87	No. 4 "	79	8

This gives the committee some idea as to what is the actual difference in the actual price of wheat between Minneapolis and Winnipeg, and what the farmers of the west have lost by reason of not getting free access to the markets of the United States.

PRIVATE BILLS.

PATENTS OF THOMAS WADGE.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 16), respecting patents of Thomas Wadge—Mr. Aikins.

Mr. OLIVER. It is quite apparent that the ordinary member, having this Bill placed before him after it has passed the Private Bills Committee, is hardly in a position to decide on its merits. Therefor, I think whoever is in charge of the Bill should make a full statement of the reasons for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am not in charge of the Bill, but, in the absence of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), I desire to state to the House what I understand to be the reasons for the Bill. It appears that Thomas Wadge purchased patent No. 73,790, being an improvement in grain separators, commonly called fanning mills. When Mr. Wadge purchased the patent through his solicitors in Winnipeg, Messrs. Metcalfe, Sharpe & Stackpoole, he had an investigation of the title made. Mr. Wadge understood, when he purchased the patent, that it had been taken out for the usual period of 18 years. This I understand was the statement of his solicitors. It was not until very recently, when he took possession of the actual letters patent, that he ascertained that an error had been made in the office of his solicitors, and that the fees had been paid for only 6 years. Under the patent law a patentee may pay the fees for a 6 years term, and, on the expiration of that term, may pay the balance of the fees for the whole life of the patent, which in Canada is 18 years. Consequently Mr. Wadge is under the necessity of applying to parliament for the continuance of the patent for the full term of 18 years. I have the affidavit of Mr. Wadge to the effect of the statement I have made to the House. I think I need not read this to the committee. It has been read in the Private Bills Committee, and they accepted it. I simply make this statement, from which it appears to me that Mr. Wadge is entitled to the relief asked for.

Mr. McKENZIE. When did this patent first issue?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I cannot give the date of issue. There are two patents—No. 73,789 and No. 73,790. It was on the 29th of March, 1904, that Mr. Wadge purchased them from the Twin City Separator Company, and he at once proceeded to manufacture, and has been manufacturing on a large scale since, and it was not until July, 1911, that he ascertained that his patents had lapsed by reason of the error I have stated. So that it would appear that the patents were taken out only shortly before 1904.

Mr. OLIVER. Where does Mr. Wadge live?

Mr. MEIGHEN. The city of Winnipeg is the place of manufacture.

Mr. EMMERSON. Has this Bill been examined by the Department of Agriculture? It has been customary in the past to have a report from that department in respect to Bills of this class, and that report has always had great weight with the committee. In connection with every Bill, so far as my observation has gone, the attitude of the committee has been: we should not do this, and it ends by saying, we will do it this time, but we will not do it again. But we have always required from the Minister of Agriculture some statement to the effect that the Bill is satisfactory to his department, which usually inquires to see whether there is some interest that may be affected, or whether there are patents of a like character that may become in some way prejudiced by the proposed renewal. While we certainly want to do justice to the one, we do not want to do injustice to the other. It seems to me we should have some representation from that department.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). As a member of the Private Bills Committee, I remember the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Mr. O'Halloran, being present, and being asked his opinion with reference to this and other Bills of a similar nature. His reply was that the policy of the department was adverse to the passing of private legislation of this character, but that the Private Bills Committee, and the House invariably overrides the policy of the department in that respect, where the negligence is that, not of the individual, but of the solicitor.

Mr. EMMERSON. Suppose we tried the experiment of refusing to pass this Bill and forced Mr. Wadge to go back to his solicitors, would it have a good and salutary effect? Would that not have the salutary effect of reducing the number of these Bills coming before parliament, would it not remind solicitors that they might be called upon to respond if they did not give attention to such matters?

Mr. CARVELL. I understood the deputy Minister of Agriculture to say that once you admit the principle of renewing expired patents there was no reason why this one should not be renewed. From the evidence there is no doubt that this is a going concern manufacturing large quantities and the proprietors would be damaged to some extent if this was not renewed.

Mr. OLIVER. We should have from the Department of Agriculture a statement on their responsibility that this is a going concern and that there is no conflict of right between this establishment and some other of which we have no knowledge. I would be strongly in favour of passing the Bill on the merits as stated, but I think we should have some such assurance from the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It has not been the habit of any department in relation to the Bills within its purview to go into the questions of fact and make itself responsible for such statements as that the concern is a going concern. That fact appeared to be established by evidence before the committee. The solicitors in charge of the matter are a very responsible, good and careful firm in Winnipeg. The head of the firm was recently appointed a judge of the Court of King's Bench by the late government. I would not like to have it go out from anything I have said that they were guilty in this case beyond what is inevitable in a large office occasionally. I think it would be a hardship to Mr. Wadge if the relief were not granted. As to the conflict of rights no one else could manufacture lawfully until the expiry of the patent and any one who has commenced the manufacture since its expiry is protected under section 2 of the Act.

Bill reported.

PATENT OF THOMAS D. RAMBAUT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 84) respecting certain patents of Thomas D. Rambaut.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. OLIVER. I would again suggest that the member having charge of the Bill should make an explanation for the convenience of the committee.

Mr. AMES. This Bill which was very carefully considered in the Private Bills Committee is one for keeping alive a patent now possessed by Thomas D. Rambaut. The circumstances in this case are very exceptional. The original patent was granted to William Ernest Cook, who in due course undertook to transfer the patent as he had a right to do, to Thomas D. Rambaut. Rambaut on legal advice concluded that his title was not altogether good. He went back to Cook to get his title made good, but found Cook seriously ill, in fact on his death bed, unable to sign his name, or in any way deal further with it. Cook died shortly afterwards and there then followed considerable litigation as to who were the heirs, and during this time Rambaut, not being certain that the patent was his, did not want to spend money on it. By the time he found that his title to the patent was valid, the period in which manufacture must be commenced in Canada had expired. He, therefore, made petition to the committee, the committee heard the claim and unanimously decided that the case was so exceptional that a further opportunity should be given to him to manufacture. No one has done any manufacturing or used the patents in Canada so it does not in any way infringe on any rights.

Mr. EMMERSON. What is the device?

Mr. AMES. A patent process for dessicating vegetables, and we have documentary evidence that if this patent is kept alive an important company is prepared to come into Canada, build a factory, and at once give employment in the manufacture of dried vegetables in the method herein described. We felt it would be an advantage to have the industry giving employment to workmen and giving an opportunity to farmers to sell their vegetables. No objections were taken to the Bill, even the departmental officers said that while they took generally an attitude of uncordiality towards requests of this kind there were no special reasons why in such a case as this the application should not be granted.

Mr. EMMERSON. I see that Rambaut is a citizen of New York. Is there any suspicion underlying this that would in any way affect our constitution?

Mr. AMES. I do not think there is any fear of the subversion of the constitution in this particular case.

Mr. CARVELL. What was the result of the litigation, was it decided that Rambaut had the legal title to the patent, or would we be legislating away the rights that might belong to Cook's heirs?

Mr. AMES. It was subsequently found that the transfer was legal, and it was with the full consent of Cook's heirs that Rambaut undertook to commence the manufacture. Then, after his death, when the estate was settled up, it was, with the full consent of the heirs that Mr. Rambaut proceeded to utilise the patent which came to him by regular transfer.

Mr. GUTHRIE. When did the patent expire?

Mr. AMES. My recollection is that it expired on the 16th February, 1911.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That is the expiration of the period for commencing manufacture?

Mr. AMES. It was registered in the Patent Office, 16th September, 1911.

Mr. EMMERSON. Is this legislation being secured with the knowledge and consent of the heirs of Mr. Cooke, the original patentee?

Mr. AMES. Such were the representations made to us in the committee by the promoters of the Bill.

Mr. EMMERSON. What was the character of the evidence submitted?

Mr. AMES. I think the solicitor for Mr. Rambaut had with him documents to that effect. I know he said he was prepared to submit evidence for every allegation he made in connection with the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL. I must say as one member of this committee, I am not altogether satisfied with the explanation. This is a matter which is so perfectly plain. Mr. Rambaut controlled this patent from Mr. Cooke, and had the documents whatever they might be. There is no reason why Mr. Rambaut should not have begun manufacturing in Canada within the two years allowed, or have obtained the necessary extension of time which the department has the right to give under certain conditions. He did not do it. He remained asleep on his rights. This is not at all in the same category with the case of Thomas Wadge. In that case, we have a citizen of Canada, carrying on a legitimate business, who finds that, through the fault of his solicitor his patent has expired. But here we have a bunch of New York fellows. We don't know whether they are genuine or not. They have not spent a dollar in Canada, and probably will not. But they want to sell out and make some money. Why, if I had half the nerve that my hon. friend has shown, within the last year I could have made a lot of money. A man from the state of Maine came to me and wanted to get legislation to renew a patent which had expired under circumstances not nearly so barefaced as this. But I was so modest that I told him I could not ask parliament to renew his rights when those rights had been lost through his own carelessness. I do not think that the parliament of Canada has a right to grant such concessions to these people. Why, Mr. Chairman, you know we do not love Americans nowadays——

Mr. EMMERSON. Under which flag?

Mr. CARVELL. I think there is strong reason for opposing the passing of this Bill.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). As I read this Bill, it does not affect the rates as between Cooke's heirs and Rambaut; it leaves the legal status of the parties where it was, simply revives the patent rates involved. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture was present in the committee and gave the same opinion with respect to this Bill as with respect to the previous one. Rambaut acted upon the advice of his solicitor which was that this assignment was valid. It is true that, under these circumstances, he slept on his rights. But when the matter was investigated, he found that he was out of court unless he could get this special legislation. It seems to me that this is on all fours with the previous Bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think that this is not on all fours with the previous Bill. In that case manufacturers had already taken action to a very large extent, with a large capital outlay, and every evidence of bona fides. In this case, it looks a little like a speculation in patent rights, a kind of speculation more common in the United States than in Canada. It would appear to me that Rambaut had made a speculative purchase of certain rights, and, after the deal had gone through simply slept on his rights, not thinking it worth while to comply with the Canadian law, even to the extent of getting the necessary extension of time. I suppose that now he sees the chance to transfer his patent to some one else and make something out of it. He has spent no money in Canada, has done nothing to make good on this patent; and I for one take the ground that patents are not to be lightly renewed under these circumstances.

Mr. AMES. Let us see what will be the logical outcome if the advice of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) were followed. Here is a concern that is prepared to come to Canada and make an investment for the manufacture of an important article, establishing an industry that will employ Canadian Labour and give a market for Canadian producers of agricultural products. Through no fault of his own, but through an error of his legal adviser, he finds he is debarred from using the patent which he has had assigned to him for valid considerations. Are we going to say that on that technicality we will deprive him of the opportunity of coming to Canada and manufacturing as I have suggested? Is it wise to do so? On the other hand, what interest is going to be injured by passing this Bill? No one has attempted to use this patent in the country. Either this man will use it or it will not be used. And by granting this legislation no one else's rights are infringed upon in the slightest degree.

Mr. NESBITT. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) say that he personally knows that these people are coming here to manufacture?

Mr. AMES. There was filed with the commission by a thoroughly responsible party, a written statement to that effect, and that satisfied the committee unanimously, so far as I could see.

Mr. NESBITT. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) does not know personally?

Mr. AMES. I know Thomas D. Rambaut personally, and I know him to be a thoroughly responsible party.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend (Mr. Ames) would make this committee believe that if this man's patent is not revived, he cannot enter into the manufacture of this article. Why, it is the very reverse. Not only can Rambaut manufacture the article, but any man in Canada can manufacture it. I would point out to my hon. friend that a man has the right to manufacture an article exclusively, under patent only when the law gives him that right. In the absence of the patent, everybody has the right to manufacture it. This is an improvement that is well known to the public. I presume it is patented in the United States; it has been patented in Canada for five years. So, the public know about it. How do we know how many men are standing up with capital ready to enter upon this manufacture and build up a business in Canada? I think the hon. gentleman is trying to prevent the carrying on of industries in Canada, rather than encouraging them. The strongest reason I have heard for opposing the Bill is the reason my hon. friend has given why we should pass it.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would suggest that we act in this matter as the Railway Commission frequently acts; where there is a pledge as to what they are going to do we require them to put up a deposit. We will take 'greenbacks' in this instance, we won't require a gold deposit.

Mr. AMES. I can't see what good object can be served in treating this Bill in a different way from what you are treating other Bills of the same character. This person has acted in perfect good faith from the outset. It was erroneous advice given him by his advocate, which he afterwards discovered to be inaccurate, that led to his losing his rights in the matter. He was under the impression that his patent was not altogether valid, and that it was necessary for him to secure additional signatures on the part of the original owner of the patent, Mr. William Cook. Immediately he discovered this fact he sought Mr. Cook, but Mr. Cook was in extremis and was unable to sign the papers necessary therewith. If Mr. Cook had been alive and well and the additional papers had been signed, the result would have been that everything would have been complied with by Mr. Rambaut, and there would have been no necessity for this Bill. But that is the way the case stands to-day. It seems to me that we would be creating a precedent in this Bill quite different from that we have followed in other cases, if we said that this Bill should not go through. I may say that the departmental officials that were present with us from the Department of Agriculture raised no serious objection to this Bill, any more than they would raise to any other Bill of a similar character. I have seen much more strenuous opposition to other Bills than was taken in this particular case. I do not see why the opposition should deem it advisable to single out this particular Bill for slaughter.

Mr. NESBITT. I think we had better let it go through.

Mr. OLIVER. I take exception to the statement that this Bill is on all fours with the Bill we agreed to a few minutes ago. The conditions are absolutely different, and the reasons that made it proper to pass the other Bill are reasons which make it improper to pass this Bill. If this committee has any responsibility at all it should not permit legislation of this character to go through, unless there are better reasons given for it than we have heard. As has been suggested by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), however good the intent of the applicant may be, on the face of the Bill it would appear to be purely a speculative investment, that he has not shown good faith, and is not entitled to consideration. The refusal of the committee to pass the Bill will not in any way injure the industries or the welfare of Canada, although it may do some injury to this man, who is responsible for his own undoing if he does not get what he wants.

Mr. EMMERSON. In the previous case, the man had made an investment, he was manufacturing, and if you did not give him legislation, he would have been seriously interfered with, and perhaps his investment would have been depreciated in value. In this case, you do not affect any such right, but by refusing to this man the privileges which he seeks, you do not give him an advantage over others, who apparently, have just as much right to the privilege of manufacturing this particular commodity for preserving vegetables, as would the gentleman named in the Bill, Mr. Rambaut. This becomes a serious matter when you consider that you may be depriving Canadian citizens of a privilege which certainly will be theirs if this legislation does not go through.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not want to block the committee in coming to a conclusion, but I think if ever, in my experience in this House, a case has been presented for the renewal of a patent which absolutely lacks merit, it is this case. It is true that in the past we have been rather lenient in granting applications for renewal, where rights have lapsed. But in all the cases I can recall, there has been some merit to the application, there has been some investment of money, something has been done by the owner or the promoter. But here is a case, where people deliberately slept on their rights for four or five years, did not take enough interest in the matter to see whether they were the owners or not, until the time has lapsed during which they are entitled to manufacture goods in this country under a patent. If we grant this renewal, we grant to a body of United States patent speculators and promoters the right to come into Canada and manufacture on the basis of a monopoly, under a patent right, at all events. They have not made out any case strong enough to justify such action in this parliament, and I do not believe that hon. members opposite think they have either. Had they gone ahead with an investment, had they placed their money here within the last two or three years, as they might have done, and shown some bona fides in the matter, the case would have been entirely different. But if you grant this patent right to those New Yorkers, it excludes Canadians from entering into that line of manufacture in Canada, and I am opposed to it on that particular ground. If other patents come up with no more merit than the present one, I will have no hesitation in opposing them also.

Mr. CARVELL. On more careful reading of the Bill, I want to give another reason why I oppose it. It seems to me that it is the most vicious renewal of a patent right I have ever seen since I have been in parliament. This man some years ago bought a patent. He says, according to the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), he was afraid that his rights might not be perfect, and he tried to get a new document from Mr. Cook.

He had rights in that, however, under which he could justify the manufacture of these goods in Canada. He did not do so. He went on for five years. Now, they come in with this Bill and they propose not only placing this man in the same position as he was in when he got the right from Mr. Cooke, but they give him two years in order to exercise the right of manufacture, and they do more than that because I am satisfied that, under clause 2 of this Bill, they are giving him rights which are not in his patent at all. They are bringing him under the provisions of that section of the Patent Act which gives the commissioner the right to excuse him from manufacturing the article so long as he holds himself in readiness to grant the license to some other man to manufacture it and pay him a royalty. The more you examine this clause the more you see that it is something which ought not to be granted to a Canadian citizen, let alone to a foreigner. You are placing this man in the same position as if he had come to Canada to-day for the first time, was the original inventor of this process and applied to the Patent Office in the ordinary course of business to get his patent. If he had done that they could not have given him one day longer, they could not have given him one more advantage than they are giving him under this Bill. They are allowing this man to have slept upon his rights for five years, they are preventing the people from enjoying this invention, they are preventing people from entering into the manufacture of this article, they are placing this man in the same position as he would have been if he had been the inventor of this article and they are giving him rights and privileges which the original patent did not give at all. But, they give him something that is provided in the amendment which was made to the Patent Act in 1907. I think that if there ever was a case in which an American citizen has come over here and presumed upon our innocence it is the case of this man coming here and wanting this patent renewed.

Section agreed to: Yeas 44; Nays 42.

On section 2, power to receive petitions and to make orders.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 2 be adopted?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

On section 3, saving of rights acquired.

Mr. CARVELL. Are you discussing clause 2 or 3?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 3.

Mr. CARVELL. The chairman is sometimes so rapid in getting through these Bills that we have not time to object. I think, if it is necessary we may have to ask the Chairman to read the clauses. We do not like to be driven to that. I object to clause 2 particularly.

Mr. AMES. Clause 2 is passed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CARVELL. No, I will take the ground that clause 2 has not been read, if my hon. friend wants to lock horns.

Mr. AMES. The Chairman has declared clause 2 adopted and we cannot go back to it without the consent of the House.

Mr. CARVELL. Clause 2 has not been read.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that it is not necessary to read the clauses.

Mr. CARVELL. But the rule of parliament says that they shall be read.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Unless the Chairman is asked to read them.

Mr. CARVELL. I am asking now to have clause 2 read.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As I understand it has been passed and I was not asked to read it.

Mr. CARVELL. If my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) believes that I cannot talk for three minutes, I think perhaps he is mistaken. I do not want to do this. I want to discuss clause 2 because I have a valid objection to it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can move to reconsider clause 2.

Mr. CARVELL. I will then move to reconsider clause 2.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CARVELL. Now I will state my objection as briefly as possible. I would like the promoter of the Bill to give me some information as to whether the original patent is entitled to the provisions of the latter part of clause 2. Section 44 of the Patent Act is as follows:

On the application of the applicant for a patent, previous to the issue thereof, or on the application within six months after the issue of a patent of the patentee or his legal representatives, the commissioner, having regard to the nature of the invention, may order that such patent, instead of being subject to the condition with respect to the construction and manufacture of the patented invention hereinbefore provided, shall be subject to the following conditions.

Without taking time to read these conditions I may explain that they mean that the commissioner can absolve the manufacturer or the patentee from the necessity of manufacturing, so long as he will agree to grant a license to other people to manufacture. I would like to know if the original patent comes under that provision of section 44 of the Patent Act, chapter 69 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. AMES. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman that. I can only say that this is the standard clause which you will find in a great many other Bills of a similar character.

Mr. CARVELL. That was not in the Thomas Wedge patent which we just revived a few moments ago.

Mr. AMES. It was not necessary in that case.

Mr. CARVELL. It was not in it, and it seems we are giving this man rights which he is not entitled to. We are giving him a better patent than his patent really calls for. Surely, if we place him where he was before his negligence, he has no right to come to this country and ask for more; he has no right to ask us to put him in a position in which he may never manufacture this article in Canada or in which we may never have that industry so long as he holds himself ready to permit the manufacture and reap the benefit of the royalty from it?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a matter of serious moment as to whether or not we should place this man in a better position than he was entitled to at the inception of his patent.

(The hour for private Bills expired.)

APPOINTMENT OF A TARIFF COMMISSION.

House resumed in committee on Bill (No. 88) to provide for the appointment of a Tariff Commission.—Mr. White (Leeds).

On section 4.

Mr. OLIVER. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was discussing section 4, and pointing out that there were matters of serious importance in connection with the tariff that, in my judgment, were not contemplated to be dealt with by the commission appointed under this Bill. It was stated by the Minister of Finance that these matters did, as a matter of fact, come under the provisions of this section, but even admitting that statement to be correct, I still hold that so far as the reading of the section on its face is concerned, and so far as the discussion upon the Bill has gone, there is no indication whatever that this Bill was intended in any degree, to cover that side of tariff legislation, present or prospective, to which I was drawing attention. I was drawing attention to the loss that has been suffered by the producers of the west in the defeat of the reciprocity arrangement, under which they would have secured free access to the United States market. I gave a statement of the difference in price on barley and wheat as between Fort William and Minneapolis, and in the case of wheat I gave the price of nine cars actually bought on the Minneapolis sample market, and the samples examined in Winnipeg by competent men and the grades and prices attached and it would appear that the spread or loss to the Canadian farmer between Fort William and Minneapolis ran from eight cents to thirty-seven cents per bushel. Assuming that the average loss is fifteen cents per bushel, and assuming on the statement of Mr. Thompson of the Ogilvie Milling Company that there are some fifty million bushels of grain in the west still to market, the western Canadian farmer stands to lose by failure to secure free access to the United States market for his wheat, seven and a half million dollars.

Mr. EMMERSON. When?

Mr. OLIVER. Since the 21st of September. This, it seems to me is a matter of sufficient importance to warrant the attention of the government and of the Minister of Finance. A dead loss of seven and a half million dollars, not in watered stock, but in actual cash value, cannot be contemplated without serious thought by any one who has regard for the wellbeing of this country. This loss of seven and a half million dollars on one-third of the farmer's crop which he has for sale in this bad year is equal to the prospective profit on the one hundred million dollars of common stock representing no value which has been loaded upon the industrial activities of Canada by the merger interests within the past three years. The farmer is actually losing in this one year, on one-third of his wheat crop as much money as these people hoped in their wildest dreams to make on these stupendous speculative organizations that they have been going into for the past three years. I have said and I verily believe that the purpose of the government, the purpose of the Minister of Finance, and the purpose of the Bill, is to find some way whereby interest can be earned on that one hundred millions of watered stock of absolutely no value. The Minister of Finance is bending all his attention to that end; he is going to appoint a commission that will cost this country in salaries alone $24,500; which will cost no doubt an equal amount in ordinary expenses for the members of the commission, and there will have to be a staff added at what expense we do not know. In the case of the United States body, which he takes for his example, the latest report that we have is that their staff numbers over seventy, and if the Minister of Finance continues to follow along the lines of that organization, this country will be lucky if it gets out of this precious Tariff Commission with an expenditure of less than one hundred thousand dollars a year; and all with the ultimate purpose of giving value where no value was, and of laying that much of extra tax upon the shoulders of the people of this country. Now, he does not need any Tariff Commission, and he does not need any one hundred thousand a year expenditure; he does not need any expert evidence to find a means to save to the farmers of the west the seven and a half million dollars to which I have called attention.

There is to-day on the statute-books of the United States a law which says that if and when the Canadian government makes provisions which are parallel to those of that law, it shall come into effect, and the effect of the law would be to put $7,500,000, at a minimum calculation, into the pockets of the producers of the western prairies, and through their pockets into the currents and channels of trade and industry and commerce and transportation all through the Dominion of Canada. May I believe that the suggestion is at any rate worthy of some consideration, which, so far as the form of the Bill or any indication of intent on the part of the government is concerned, has not entered into their calculations at all. But wheat is not the only grain affected. I might mention a little item which I gathered from the 'Pioneer Express' of Pembina, North Dakota, which makes this statement:

From November 1 to December 20 there have been imported into this district from Canada 138,062 bushels of barley, which paid duty at the rate of 30 cents a bushel, which duty amounted to $41,418. The most of this barley is marketed direct by Canadian farmers who are contiguous to the line.

The barley crop of the western prairie provinces is estimated by Sir Byron E. Walker at 37,000,000 bushels this year. It is not to be supposed that the whole of that crop is for sale. A large part of it is grown for feed purposes, but it is a well-known fact that this year a considerable amount of the wheat of the western prairies is only fit for feed, while the barley is of good quality, and it would be a happy condition if we were able to send our barley to the United States markets free of the 30 cent duty and use our feed wheat for the purposes for which barley would otherwise be used. I am informed that last year the United States used 150,000,000 bushels of barley, and there is every reason to believe that its market would absorb every bushel of barley the Canadian west could spare, and at prices which would not only give our people the United States only, but a handsome profit over and above the duty.

Mr. CLARK (North Bruce). Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We are discussing clause 4, and the rule says that speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the clause under discussion. I submit that the hon. gentleman has for the last ten minutes been out of order.

Mr. OLIVER. We have been discussing the question of the responsibility of the government in regard to the commission, and I have been pointing out that the government, in the discharge of its responsibility, is not taking consideration of one of the most important features of the tariff. I think I am quite within the limits of the section, but I have not completed my argument, and if my hon. friend will only have patience, I think I will demonstrate to him and the whole committee that every word I have said is absolutely pertinent to section 4.

Mr. CLARK (North Bruce). I would ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the point of order is well taken. It seems to me that the hon. member for Edmonton has travelled pretty wide of the scope of the question, and I would ask him to keep his speech strictly relevant to the question.

Mr. OLIVER. I certainly will bow to the ruling of the Chairman if he says that I am not entitled to use the arguments I am making, but I certainly am well within the example of other members who have spoken on different sections of the Bill, and I would respectfully ask that I be not restricted more than other members. I claim the same privilege as other members, but no more.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must admit that some hon. members have gone too far, but my attention has not been drawn to their cases. In the present instance, as my attention has been drawn to the matter, I have to rule.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, if I am not permitted to conclude my remarks, I shall have to bow to your decision, and give place to some person else.

Mr. EDWARDS. As I have the honour to represent one of the most strictly agricultural counties in the Dominion of Canada, I may be permitted to say a word in regard to this Bill. The Bill presented to this House by the hon. Minister of Finance is one of the most important as well as one of the most logical pieces of legislation which has ever been presented to the parliament of Canada. I believe that the carrying out of this idea of the appointment of a Tariff Commission as outlined in this Bill will result in great good to the agriculturists of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite throughout this debate have endeavoured to make it appear that this Bill was designed entirely for the benefit of the manufacturers, that they were the only class who could be referred to by the Bill. The hon. gentlemen from Edmonton, Humboldt and Assiniboia, have all advanced this idea and they have an object in view, that of trying to create the impression in this country that the Conservative government is here in the interests of the manufacturers and is opposed to the farmers.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I rise to a point of order. I assume that you are anxiously waiting for some gentleman to call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the clause before the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman to refer to the Bill. He is apparently discussing the principle of the Bill. I would remind the hon. gentleman that he must speak on clause 4.

Mr. EDWARDS. I fully expected this little act of courtesy from my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). I should have referred to section 4, which is a very important section, it must be a very important section because it has been discussed at such great length by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have been surprised at the conclusions arrived at in the discussion of section 4 of this very important measure. Some hon. gentlemen have drawn from section 4 of this Bill the conclusion that it was designed solely in the interests of the manufacturers. The hon. member for Humboldt made this assertion notwithstanding the statements previously made by the Minister of Finance. The minister said:

> We do not desire to be relieved from responsibility with regard to the tariff, and all the Tariff Commission does, is to enable us to obtain information on which to act.

That was very explicit. He said further:

> I think the report of the Tariff Commission should be available to every member of this House as well as to the ministers, and then no doubt it will carry great weight. But that is far from saying that it is absolutely conclusive.

The Finance Minister further said:

> I would be the last man to suggest that the House of Commons should be denied the information obtained by means of the expenditure which they have authorized. There is no intention of that kind in this Bill. My hon. friends have been simply raising spectres with regard to this Bill.

Notwithstanding these very clear and specific assertions on the part of the minister, hon. gentlemen opposite have stated repeatedly just the opposite of what the minister has said. The hon. member for Edmonton could not see wherein this clause of the Bill had any reference to the farmer. One would infer from his remarks that farmers were not even thought of when the Bill was brought before the House, that there was no possibility of the farmer getting consideration of his wrongs. I do not think the hon. gentleman was justified in coming to that conclusion. Take the various sections of this clause, they clearly set out that in respect of goods produced in or imported into Canada, and you will note it does not say in respect of some goods, but, in respect of goods, which has the same meaning as if the word 'all' was prefixed to goods—in respect of goods produced in or imported into Canada the commission shall, under the direction of the minister, make inquiry, &c. The word 'goods' is very clearly defined in the beginning of the Bill and the definition makes it clear that this Bill is not confined to the consideration of manufactured articles. There is a great chance for the farmers to be benefited by the appointment of a Tariff Commission. Take, for instance, the question of wheat. There is a duty at present of 12 cents a bushel on wheat. The United States has a duty of 25 cents a bushel on wheat. Is it not right that information should be obtained as to the cost of production, the cost of transportation, to the place of consumption; is it not right that the Canadian farmer should have, in fairness to himself, some protection against wheat produced, for instance, in Argentina?

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Did I catch a whisper from the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that sounded like 'hear, hear?'

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. And yet the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) strongly supported on the 21st of last September a proposal which would have denied to the farmers of Canada the very thing that he says 'hear, hear' for now.

Mr. OLIVER. In order that the hon. gentleman may not be under any misapprehension, I meant the 'hear, hear' sarcastically.

Mr. EDWARDS. I suppose the hon. member wishes me to regard even a little sarcastic reference from himself in the way of a compliment.

I assure the hon. gentleman that I have not that estimate of him, and cannot accept a word of his, even sarcastically spoken, as a compliment. Now, let us take the question of the production of wheat in Argentina—rate of wages, 64 cents a day. Is not that a reason which, in all fairness, should be considered in framing a tariff for Canada. Is it fair that the farmers of this country who have to pay the rate of wages they do should be asked to compete on even terms with the farmers of Argentina who pay wages at the rate of 64 cents a day?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask what is the difference, in regard to propriety under the rules of order, between my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) discussing the question of the cost of raising wheat in Argentina, and basing thereon a question of the duty on the wheat from that country, and my discussion of the duty on Canadian wheat going to Minneapolis?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLIVER. I asked for the Chairman's opinion.

Mr. EDWARDS. I wish to know what the point of order is.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, if necessary, I raise the point of order that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) is not keeping within the proper discussion of clause 4, according to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EDWARDS. Discussing the point of order, let me call to your attention that clause 4, and I assume that that includes the subsections—provides that the commission shall investigate price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere. Am I within my right in discussing in the debate on that subsection, the cost of materials in Argentina? They are to investigate the cost of production in Canada and elsewhere. They are to investigate the cost of transportation from other countries to Canada. Am I within my right in referring to the cost of producing wheat in Argentina and transporting it? If I am not in order in doing this, it seems to me we cannot discuss the question at all.

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. That is vastly different from wandering from Halifax to Victoria as the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was doing.

Mr. OLIVER. If my information is correct, Argentina is much further away than Minneapolis. I ask your ruling on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EDWARDS. It may be further if you measure it in miles. But in application to this section, it is much nearer.

Mr. OLIVER. We will have the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that if the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) goes no further he will not be out of order.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not catch the ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. So far the hon. member is not out of order, provided he does not go further.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am glad to have been the humble means of providing a little much-needed information for the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I may say, lest he take that as a compliment, that I only mean it sarcastically.

Mr. OLIVER. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. EDWARDS. If I am out of order, I will sit down. But, if I am not out of order, the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) is out of order.

Mr. OLIVER. May I make a suggestion to my hon. friend, with your permission, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. EDWARDS. I have the floor, and with all due regard for the hon. member for Edmonton, I do not think that any suggestion of his will add very much to my knowledge or information in this debate. I trust he will not regard that as discourteous—it is spoken sarcastically. Now, I submit that there is every chance for the farmers of Canada to be benefited by the appointment of a Tariff Commission. The subsections of section 4 to which I have referred, at once direct the attention of any member of this House, coming from a rural constituency to the possibilities of good from a commission of this kind. As I pointed out, it does seem to me that, in investigating the position of the farmers of Canada they will consider the cost of producing wheat, for instance in Argentina—as they will have the right to do under the subsection—the rate of wages in Argentina—as they will have the right to do under the subsection—and the cost of tarnsportation from that country as they will have the right to do, under the subsection. And I firmly believe that when this Tariff Commission gets its information as to the various countries with which the farmers of this Dominion have to compete, their work must result in benefit to our farmers. There are many articles produced by our farmers on which, I maintain, they are not treated fairly, and have never been treated fairly by either party in this country,—and in making that statement, I only repeat what I have said before. I submit that it would be the right of the Tariff Commission, under the subsections of this section to inquire into the reasons why, for instance, American bacon should be allowed to come into this country paying 2 cents duty, while the duty on our bacon going into the United States is 5 cents; why eggs, butter, cheese, and various other commodities—

Mr. OLIVER. I must ask for your ruling again on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EDWARDS. I maintain that this is directly in line with the subsections of section 4 and with what these subsections call upon the Tariff Commission to do.

Mr. OLIVER. May I insist upon my point of order. I was discussing exactly what my hon. friend is discussing and in exactly the same way, and I was called to order. And I must ask for the same consideration at your hands for my hon. friend as was accorded to myself.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) is arguing that under section 4, the commissioners will have the right to investigate such and such matters. But I understood the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) desired to make a long argument on the effects of reciprocity.

Mr. OLIVER. If I may be allowed, I beg to say that my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is discussing the question of the mutual duties between Canada and the United States on farm products. And that is exactly what I was doing.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). May I make a suggestion? I think the hon. member for Frontenac is perfectly in order.

Mr. OLIVER. So do I.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). And I think the hon. member for Edmonton was perfectly in order. I think it would be fair to permit the hon. member for Edmonton to resume his remarks.

Mr. OLIVER. No, Mr. Chairman, what I wished to say to the hon. member for Frontenac a few minutes ago was that I believe the discussion will be seriously hampered under your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Of course, I accept your ruling, and I do not wish to be disrespectful. As I think the discussion would be seriously hampered under that ruling, my suggestion would be that the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) be perfectly free to make his remarks as he sees fit on the Bill and that I be accorded the same privilege.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) is in order.

Mr. EDWARDS. That last suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton was more in keeping with what should be expected from one who occupies his position than some of his previous remarks. I thank him for his suggestion that I should be allowed to continue without these frequent interruptions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will assume that hon. gentlemen opposite, in discussing this very important Bill, are sincere in their expressions of opinion; I want to think that of them, although I frankly confess it is a difficult thing to do sometimes. I was trying to point out wherein the farmers might be benefited by a Tariff Commission, and I was referring to certain commodities which they produce. I assume that under the powers granted to this commission by section 4, they will take into consideration the cost of producing these various commodities raised by the farmers, together with the cost of producing the same in the United States and other countries. I feel satisfied that if the Tariff Commission does turn its attention to these things, they will see to it that the farmer, on these various commodities, is allowed a higher protection than he has at the present time. I do not think the farmer is properly treated at present, I think he is entitled to more protection on these various commodities I have named than he is getting. I think if you will look carefully into the matter you will find that it really costs less to produce many of these commodities on the other side of the line, and in other countries, than it does here; and if we are to maintain our standard of civilization, our rate of wages, and all that sort of thing, the Canadian farmer must get more protection on many articles than he is getting at the present time Therefore, I say that under section 4 of this Bill I do not know of any class of the community who are more likely to get justice from this commission than are the farmers of the Dominion of Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen on the other side have assumed quite a lot in discussing this matter. They have assumed that the Bill was designed exclusively for the benefit of the manufacturer, that the manufacturer was the only man who could possibly benefit by it. They have tried to make it appear that the Conservative party was antagonistic to the agriculturists of this country, that the Liberal party was the great friend of the farmers, and was the party to which the people would have to look for protection against the encroachment of the manufacturers. Now that contention is not borne out by the history of the Conservative party, or by the history of the Liberal party. I could refer to many acts and expressions in the history of the Liberal party to show that that was not the case. The duty on agricultural implements, up to 1907, was 20 per cent, and it was left there by the Liberal party as they found it in 1896. In 1907 the Fielding tariff was brought down, that was the year before a general election, and they reduced the duty on agricultural implements from 20 to 17½ per cent. But at the same time they raised the value for duty purposes of binders, for instance, whereby they collected a duty of 17½ per cent which amounted to more than they previously collected with a duty of 20 per cent. At the same time they appealed to the farmers for support on the ground that they had begun to carry out the policy they had advocated for 18 years previous to 1896, the policy of destroying protection entirely. That is only one of many instances that could be cited. When the manufacturers' delegation came down to Ottawa to interview the late government, the right hon. leader of the opposition, in answering those gentlemen, said that there was one thing at least the Liberal party prided itself on, they were proud of the fact that they had been very careful not to do anything to disturb the manufacturers of this country. Yet we find hon. gentlemen opposite getting up here and trying to set class against class, trying to make out that the manufacturers are the enemies of the farmers, that the present government is disposed to favour the manufacturers to the detriment of the farmers. I remember the leader of the opposition stating in this House that the best friend the farmer had was the manufacturer. He will find that in 'Hansard' of 1911, page 8459. That was his opinion then. Now the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), in speaking all around, or about, or at this Bill, made use of this expression, a very remarkable expression, even for that hon. gentleman.

The Liberal party in this country is a unit on the tariff question.

The amusing part of it is that he made that statement after listening to several hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House. Let us see the position. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) believes in a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, of course. Then the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) says:

I am for reasonable protection.

That is quite elastic. Then we have——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. gentleman that he is out of order and is not speaking on the Bill.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then I will not continue that matter any further, as I do not wish to trangress the rules of the committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing absolutely clear, there has been ample evidence during the last few years that the people of this country want something definite in regard to the tariff. For instance, there was a deputation of six or seven hundred delegates representing the dairymen of eastern Ontario and western Quebec asking certain things. There was another deputation of seven or eight hundred farmers from the west making certain requests. That was followed by a delegation of ten or twelve hundred fruit and vegetable growers. Then the meat packers also made representations to the government. All these delegations, it seems to me, warrant us in concluding that the people have not been satisfied with the tariff in the past, they have not been satisfied with the way the late government handled the tariff.

I claim as evidence of this, the large deputations which have come here. In considering whether it is advisable to appoint such a commission, take an article that I have it in my mind to mention. I may hold the view, and I will candidly say I do hold the view, that the duty on agricultural implements might be substantially reduced. That is my candid opinion. I have expressed it in this House before. I am sincere in holding that opinion, but I can conceive that there are hon. gentlemen in this House, who may be equally sincere in holding the opinion that the duty should not be reduced. How are we going to arrive at a conclusion as to what should be done? This very Bill and this very section which we are now considering, gives to the Tariff Commission the very powers which we want them to exercise in arriving at a correct conclusion in regard to the duties on agricultural implements as to whether these duties should be lowered or not. It seems to me that when they get that information, their figures will show that these duties should be reduced. Possibly I am wrong. Possibly those who hold the opposite view may be right, but it seems to me to be reasonable, right and proper that a commission should be appointed to collect valuable information and especially when the responsibility of the government is not lessened thereby. They will be held responsible, and when the information gathered by this commission, is placed before the Minister of Finance and before the members of this House, and we have had the very emphatic and distinct statement to the effect from the Minister of Finance and other members—it does seem to me that we will be in a better position to judge with regard to this great question than we have ever been at any time in the past. I do not think it is worthy of hon. gentlemen opposite to assume the attitude which they have been assuming, in the discussion of this measure. From first to last on the face of it, in its very language, there is the utmost candour and the desire plainly manifested by the framer of this Bill, to give the widest opportunity to any and every class in this country, to the farmers as well as to the manufacturers, that justice may be done to all. I submit again that it seems to me that a measure of this kind is along the right lines. In stating that I am stating precisely what I said when my right hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Borden), last year in this House suggested the idea of a permanent Tariff Commission. I thought at that time that it was a wise suggestion. Personally, representing a farming constituency, I am more than ever impressed, especially after the able presentation of the case by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and other gentlemen who have spoken, that this Bill providing for a Tariff Commission is one of the wisest and most logical measures that has ever been introduced into this House. There are several other things that I would like to take up without getting out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on, go on.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to refer to some of the arguments made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) in regard to barley, wheat and a few of the other items which he referred to. I would like to call his attention to cement and to ask him to look up and see what his party attempted to do by the reciprocity pact with regard to cement. They proposed a reduction of 1½ cents per 100 pounds—that is all, notwithstanding the fact that there was strong evidence in favour of more decided action in the rise in price of from 40 to 50 cents a barrel while they had matters in their own hands. When these hon. gentlemen are out of power they interest themselves on behalf of the farmers. Yet, during all the years they were in power they did not avail themselves of the standing offer of the United States for free trade in agricultural implements. The offer was there, they could have accepted it, if they had chosen to do so. They had the power and the opportunity. Did they do so? Not at all. Their record shows very clearly where these hon. gentlemen have stood for years, preaching, when in opposition, free trade, the destruction of the last vestige of protection and then, coming into power, and giving the lie to all their professions for the previous eighteen years by maintaining the policy which they had up to that time condemned. We had some gentlemen in the course of this discussion getting up and professing to be free traders while others favoured a tariff for revenue, and incidental protection. Such a conglomeration of political thought, or want of thought, on the other side I do not think this House has ever seen. They do not seem to know where they are at in regard to tariff matters; yet the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) says that the Liberal party is a unit in regard to the tariff. The hon. gentleman shakes his head but I am in a position to be able to prove by 'Hansard' that he said just what I allege he said.

Mr. TURRIFF. Just read it will you please?

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman discussing this very matter yesterday——

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to hear it.

Mr. GUTHRIE. It was about the last speech in yesterday's 'Hansard.'

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. gentleman need not look through my speech, because I did not make the remark.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not wish to misquote the hon. gentleman. I would not do so intentionally. I am quite sure I read it in some of his remarks. It may have been the hon. member for Humboldt; I would not be certain as to that. It is immaterial at all events. One hon. gentleman on the opposition side certainly did make the statement and if the hon. member for Assiniboia did not that is one sin less that he will have to answer for.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is true all right.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to confine myself to section 4 as closely as my hon. friend from Frontenac has done and I hope I will have your permission, Mr. Chairman, to discuss it within these limits. First of all as to the bearing of section 4 on the agricultural industry my hon. friend from Frontenac corrected me this afternoon when I said that on its face section 4 had not any bearing on the agricultural industry, and, I think, pointed me to the interpretation clause.

I shall deal with this interpretation clause and its application to section 4 and the committee may then judge how far I was justified in my view. The interpretation clause says:—

'Goods' means products, wares and merchandise or movable effects of any kind, including, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, horses, cattle, and other animals.

Then, under section 4, the duty of the commission shall be, under the direction of the minister, to make inquiry as to:—

The price and cost of raw material in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption.

If the contention of my hon. friends is correct, we are to read into that subsection 'wheat,' and 'horses,' but I must say that when I undertake to read these words into the section, they do not make very good sense, and I find the same disability in regard to the other subsections. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that it is possible to read into the first clause of section 4 references to the agricultural industry, I think everybody must admit that the references are very remote, and are not in any degree indicated by the nature of the wording of the section. Clearly, the section is intended to apply simply to the manufacturing industry, that is to say, to define the duties of the commission as being for the purpose of inquiring into the conditions surrounding the manufacturing industry, and the words introduced into the interpretation clause are simply, so far as the face of the section is concerned, inapplicable and out of place.

Mr. BORDEN. Why?

Mr. OLIVER. Because they are inapplicable and out of place.

Mr. BORDEN. I think they are not inapplicable.

Mr. OLIVER. I bow to my right hon. friend's judgment.

Mr. BORDEN. But I would like to understand your meaning?

Mr. OLIVER. I am only giving my hon. friend and the House the benefit of my poor opinion.

Mr. BORDEN. But what is the reason?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know that it is pertinent to discuss the reasons for my arriving at the conclusion. That is the conclusion at which I have arrived and I am taking the liberty of informing the House to that effect. I hope I have that privilege. I say that when I undertake to read these words into subsection A, for instance, the result does not seem to me to be pertinent or applicable, and in my humble judgment the other sections of clause 4 are in the same position. So much so, that on the face of it, according to the wording of the section, the intent and purpose of it, and the instructions to the commission, are instructions to make inquiry in regard to manufacturing industries only. That is the purpose as I read section 4. The commissioners are to be appointed by the government to work under the direction of the minister, and to report only to the minister, and every word uttered by the minister and by every member of the House supporting this Bill (until the speeches of the last two or three members who have spoken to-day), absolutely recognized that that was the purpose of the Bill, and that it did not have even the most remote connection with the agricultural industry, or the adjustment of the burden of taxation on the agricultural industry so as to be for the benefit of that section of the community. What I further wish to point out is that this agricultural industry is of such importance, and the conditions surrounding it, at the present moment, are so urgent, that if the intention of the Bill was to consider the agricultural industry on the same footing as the manufacturing industry, it should have so appeared on the face of the Bill, and it should not and would not have been necessary to hunt for it in the interpretation clause, and to put, as it appears to me with all deference, a strained interpretation on that clause, in order to bring in any reference to the agricultural industry. I was trying to place before the committee the facts in regard to the extreme conditions prevailing and the urgency of those conditions in connection with the agricultural industry, as my argument why this clause should be framed differently if it was to convey the intention of dealing with that industry as I wish to see it dealt with, and, in pursuance of that purpose, I was showing that in the case of wheat there was an opportunity before the government to secure access to the markets of the United States for the wheat of our prairies, to the benefit of the producers to the extent of seven and a half million dollars on that part of this year's crop that yet remains to be marketed. I was discussing the advantage that would accrue to the producer from access to the United States market for the surplus barley of this year, and if I might carry the matter one step further I would draw attention to the fact that on January 19th last, sixty thousand bushels of Canadian oats were sold in the New York market, paying the duty, and thus showing that there is a market for Canadian barley and for Canadian oats as well as for Canadian flax in the United States, and that to-day our oats and our barley are going to the United States to a limited degree and paying the duty, and that the demand in the United States for the products of our farms is such that if the duty were removed, as the duty might be removed so far as we can judge by the action of this government, that benefit would result directly to the producers of that region, and to the trade, and commerce, and finance, and transportation of this whole Dominion of Canada.

I have said something as to the magnitude of the case; may I say something now as to the urgency of the case. The Manitoba 'Free Press' has been making an investigation of the conditions as to the marketable wheat in the prairie provinces, and I have before me the issue of February 10th instant, in which I find a despatch from Harris, Sask., a portion of which I shall read. I think when I have read it the House will agree that the matter is urgent and is worthy of the attention of the government in the most marked degree. The article reads as follows:

Harris, Sask., Feb. 7.—This afternoon at Harris I saw a sight that has surely seldom been witnessed on the western prairies. I saw 100,000 bushels of wheat piled in the railway yard like coal. It was in rough bins made of lumber. The bins have been built on the ground with no foundation but mother earth, and the only roof is a mantle of snow. Most of the bins contain from 500 to 1,000 bushels, but one of them, which looked from the outside something like a roofless rink or a large cattle pen inclosed 50,000 bushels of wheat. This wheat a local lumber company had had to accept from the farmers in lieu of cash. Besides the bins there were in the yards about a dozen grain wagons all full of wheat, and I am informed that every available nook and corner in Harris is stored with wheat.

A large quantity of lumber has been used in the construction of these emergency bins. None of them could have been erected for less than $50, while the large one must have cost very much more. The idea of erecting the bins is to have the wheat in hand the moment anything in the shape of a freight car presents itself at Harris. To-day the yard was as bare of cars as Minitonas was of gold, and I understand that that has been the condition of things for some days past. There were 141 cars on the order book to-day, but that by no means represents the number wanted. Many farmers need three or four cars, but cannot order more than one at a time. About 308 cars of grain, practically all wheat, have been shipped from here since the season opened. Last year only 192 cars were shipped from this point.

Since the middle of December all cars with the exception of four have been loaded from the temporary bins above described. Much of this wheat is tough. Worse still, there are at least 75,000 bushels of wheat lying on the farm in heaps, just as it came from the separator. Most of it is tough and will spoil if it is not got out during the next few weeks. At present the cars are coming into Harris at the rate of four or five a week, a rate which is entirely inadequate, and which will mean heavy loss unless it is speedily increased. The three elevators have been full continuously. It is claimed by the railway company that only 7,000,000 were estimated for the Goose Lake line, whereas the actual crop has turned out to be nearer 14,000,000.

The business men of Harris are weary of waiting for cars which come not. In the meantime, there is financial constipation, or as one should say, 'nothing doing.' In all the stores and in the hotel notices are up, 'Positively no credit. We have closed our books.' If the grocery store adhered strictly to this rule, there would be actual starvation or suffering in the neighbourhood, but it does not. In other stores the rule of 'No credit' is closely followed. Clerks have little to do and pass the time chatting with farm hands who are waiting for the farmers to sell their grain and pay them their wages. I talked to-day to Thomas A. Stevenson, a Harris farmer, who told me that he finished threshing 2,000 bushels just before Christmas. His wheat had quite a bit of ice in it. After threshing it was placed in bins in the field. The wheat was still in the bins. He had put his name down for a car immediately after threshing, and there were still two pages of the order book ahead of him.

Now, I think I have established that the condition is one of stupendous magnitude, that it is a case of extreme urgency; and if our hon. friends say that the tariff has nothing to do with that condition, I can only reply that the tariff has everything to do with it—that had it not been for the tariff it would have been possible to have delivered every bushel of the wheat that is now left without shelter on those western prairies, safely at some terminal point, either Fort William, Duluth or Minneapolis, before the spring came that would destroy all the damp wheat that remained at that time.

Mr. BLAIN. Is not that wheat permitted to go into the United States in bond to be ground for export free of duty?

Mr. OLIVER. No. At the present time the duty is paid, and it is refunded after the wheat is ground; but up to the present time the railway rates, in addition to the duty, have been such as practically to prevent that being done on any large scale. If the railway rates were suitable, no doubt a great deal of the grain could be absorbed in that way. But that is a very inadequate remedy for the terrible condition that prevails to-day. What was needed was that every possible avenue should have been opened, not only the privilege of grinding in bond, but the privilege of grinding for home consumption, and, what is more urgent, the privilege of entry for feed purposes. But that has not been done, and the condition which I have described prevails all over the western country. And my hon. friend the Minister of Finance brings down a Bill which absolutely ignores on the face of it the interests that are represented in that condition of affairs. I cannot agree that such a provision is satisfactory or is in accordance with the wellbeing of the country.

Mr. MORPHY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that a part of that grain was cut but unthreshed?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. MORPHY. Well, how could you have got that grain out, no matter what the conveyances were like?

Mr. OLIVER. That could not have been got out until it was threshed; but will the hon. gentleman tell me what purpose a farmer would have in threshing grain that was standing in the stook when, after having threshed it, he would have to put it in a bin where it would remain until it was heated and destroyed, because he could not transport it?

Mr. MORPHY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him again—

Mr. OLIVER. Will the hon. gentleman answer my question?

Mr. MORPHY. I am not answering questions. What government was in power that permitted such a disgraceful condition in the west without providing transportation facilities for carrying the wheat away?

Mr. OLIVER. It is the government which my hon. friend supports, which has been in power since the 21st of September, and since this condition began to exist, and I have placed before the government to-night a course which they could and should have taken in order to have remedied that condition.

But even yet if they would take that course it could well be remedied in some measure. However, I have no hope from anything I see in this Bill or from anything I have heard here spoken from the other side of the House that any such action will be taken. While the wheat, which is practically the gold of our country, upon which not only the western farmer but the trade and commerce and industry and finance of this whole country depend, is depreciating in value, and may, in large measure, be actually lost, this government brings in a Tariff Commission Bill upon which they propose to found a tariff at some time in the distant future, and that is their answer to this condition that exists. My hon. friend thought that opposition to this Bill was something of a pillow fight, that there was not any sincerity in it. May I return the compliment to him, and may I say that the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), who sits comfortably here in Ottawa, who spends more or less of his time in adjusting offices in the various departments of the public service while the country is in the condition that I have described, and it is in the power of the government to remedy that condition, stands in much the same position as Nero fiddling while Rome burned.

I do not want any member of this House to think that the conditions are exaggerated by me. I want the House to understand that these conditions are so serious that neither newspaper nor public man has dared to give full effect to the facts in regard to these conditions up to the present time, and I am at a loss to understand a government which sits quiet and still, knowing, absolutely knowing, that these conditions do exist.

Mr. STANFIELD. If conditions are as bad as the hon. gentleman stated, how is it that the merchants in the west are ordering more goods to-day than they did a year ago?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot answer that at all; it may be that the people are hopeful for the future, and it is a matter of fact that there has been an immense increase in population and an immense increase of acreage in the past year. An enormous crop has been raised, even with the damage. But that does not affect the case of the thousands and tens of thousands of men who did not have a crop that they were able to ship out. My hon. friend reflects the attitude of mind, I am afraid, of the government in this matter. They say, as long as business is good, as long as we are able to collect interest on our mortgages, and as long as we get returns on the goods we have sold, times must be good and things must be good in the west. But I am trying to give them actual inside information in regard to it; no, not inside information, information that is absolutely contained, letter by letter and word by word, in their own government reports, so that they cannot claim lack of knowledge, and my hon. friend, I say, actually reflects the attitude of mind of the government when he says: How can business be in such a condition when the people are ordering more goods? I do not wish to lay too much stress on this feature of the case, I do not think it is wise. I only want to take this opportunity in the discussion of this Bill to say to the government how far they have fallen short of their duty in this case, how far this Bill falls short of meeting the requirements of this country in regard to tariff adjustment.

I said this afternoon that we feared the influences particularly behind the Minister of Finance in connection with tariff adjustment. I think I am not going out of the way when I say that one of the strongest institutions behind the government of the day is the Ogilvie Milling Company, and that the milling interests of Canada, speaking generally, are amongst the strongest stays and supports of this government, I find that in an interview given in Montreal on January 11——

Mr. EDWARDS. What particular subsection of section 4 has this reference to?

Mr. OLIVER. I think I was fair to the hon. gentleman and he should be as fair to me. I am discussing section 4, I am trying to show that it falls short of the requirements of this country in regard to tariff legislation and that we are fearful, we are suspicious of the danger to the producing classes from this legislation. I am surely permitted to do that.

Mr. EDWARDS. I was not permitted as much latitude as the hon. gentleman by several miles.

Mr. OLIVER. It was no member on this side who called the hon. member to order or interfered with him. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was surprised at the suspicion with which this Bill was viewed on this side of the House. I am going to give the House a reason for this suspicion on behalf of the interests for whom I have been speaking, and I wish to give what Mr. Thompson of the Ogilvie Milling Company said in the Montreal 'Gazette,' on January 11, speaking of the crop condition in the west. He said:

Export Duty Suggested.

Even Canadian millers may experience considerable difficulty in getting sufficient high grade wheat to fully meet their requirements and the question of an export duty on the high grade wheats as a matter of protection to home requirements and seed may with every justification be seriously considered.

I think that we who represent the interests of the people of the west who raise the wheat and who need the money that the wheat will bring, are justified in viewing with grave suspicion a Bill which proposes to place in the hands of the Finance Minister and of the government the fullest authority to collect information that would help to maintain them in the position they have now taken in regard to the wheat situation in the west. And for all we know, establish a position such as is suggested by the representive of the Ogilvie Milling Company, one of their strongest and best supporters, and one who, I presume, is high in their councils in this matter.

In regard to this Bill and this section of the Bill, I have heard my hon. friends from Peel (Mr. Blain), Halton (Mr. Henderson), Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and Souris (Mr. Schaffner), all declaring their support of the principle of the Bill because they hope to get that which, as they declared, they never got from the old government—a lower tariff. The purpose of the Bill is more important than its matter; the purpose of the section is more important than its form. If I could see in this section, or in any part of the Bill, any prospect of tariff revision downwards, I would be willing to forego many objections that might otherwise be raised. But I think my hon. friends will have some difficulty in convincing their constituents that they had any reason to suppose that this Bill was an indication of a revision of the tariff downwards. This Bill, and particularly this section, is an indication of tariff revision upwards. On that point let my non. friends make their minds easy. They may have been able to becloud the issue for their electors in the past; they may have been able to do, as my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) and my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) very cleverly did yesterday—take one, two or three items of the tariff which had been increased by the Liberals and put these forward as proving a general increase. I have no doubt that these hon. gentlemen won their elections on that campaign. I will not give my opinion of the political morality of such a campaign—let that go. But I want to warn them, that, after this debate and after the passage of this Bill, they will not be able to becloud the issue any more. For this Bill defines the issue clear and square between tariff revision upward and tariff revision downward. The Bill gives power and authority to a government elected on a policy of higher taxation and trade restriction. And any one who thinks he can get the people to believe that such a government is going to use the power of this Bill for the purpose of giving them lower taxation or trade expansion, is too innocent for this world. I do not think he ever was a voter anywhere or ever will be. So, my hon. friends from the west and from the rural parts of Ontario and from the rural parts of Canada generally, may have been able to fool the farmers in the past and before this Bill was brought in; but I give them warning now, that they will not be able to fool the farmers any more. And, more than that, they will not be able to fool the seventy-five per cent of the people who are really the burden-bearers for this country. They have not yet shown, and they will not show, how increased taxation and restriction of trade, how the boosting of the tariff at the dictation and in the interests of the mergers, trusts and combines, is going to help the labouring man to keep his family or the farmer to cultivate his land to better advantage. Cleverly though the Bill is drawn, smoothly though it is introduced, it is still a declaraton of policy; it is the challenge of the special interests to the people of Canada; and as such, it is accepted.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Coming back from what may be considered a little digression from section 4, though on a matter of the greatest importance to the House and the country as stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), I have one or two amendments which I propose to move to section 4, and which I think I may now place before the committee, the matter having been pretty well discussed. But before doing so, I would like to make one or two references more particularly to the speech delivered this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster, North Toronto). I am sorry that hon. gentleman is not in his place to-night. He rushed in this afternoon, flashed a few bright thoughts on the discussion—illuminative thoughts they were—rushed out of the chamber again and has not reappeared. But he discussed the section now before the committee in a manner in regard to which I can only congratulate him. I agree with the Toronto 'Globe' of the 6th of January last, in part of the item, read last night by my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain), in which the 'Globe' goes out of its way to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the stand he has taken throughout the whole discussion on the appointment of a Tariff Commission, as the buffer between the desire of the majority of his colleagues in the Cabinet to establish a Tariff Commission, giving it full power over our fiscal policy, and the more modest Bill which has been brought before the House. It is currently rumoured, and the newspapers have commented upon it, that but for the strenuous efforts of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a much more drastic piece of legislation would have been presented, one which would have deprived this House of a great many more of its functions than does the present measure. I stated that the address of the Minister of Trade and Commerce was illuminative. It was. And I think it was instructive to his own colleagues. Fortunately or unfortunately the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster, North Toronto), had not heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds), speak or the right hon. the leader of the government (Mr. Borden), this afternoon; and when asked by myself his interpretation of section 4 of this Bill, he gave an answer which coincided exactly with what I had said this afternoon, which had been challenged or contradicted by the hon. the Minister of Finance and by the right hon. the leader of the government.

That was in regard to the question as to whether this commission, when reporting was to report to the minister or to parliament. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said distinctly it was to report to parliament, for the use of members of parliament. That is the suggestion which I asked the Finance Minister and the Prime Minister to accept. When challenged on it, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, certainly, that was his understanding of it when he discussed it with his colleagues. Passing from that point, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said to the House: Let us go to the genesis of this movement in favour of the appointment of a Tariff Commission, let us see where this demand comes from. Now I ask any hon. member of this House to state where the demand does come from. Is there a demand at all, apart from one source? The Minister of Trade and Commerce premised his remarks by saying that there was a demand, and I will ask the Prime Minister now, where is the demand from? I ask the Minister of Finance, where does the demand come from? The only answer they give is the resolutions and various discussions of the Manufacturers' Association. My right hon. friend says that he has spoken some forty times throughout Canada, and has mentioned it in his speeches. But I submit there is no demand, and there has been no demand; and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to give us a chance and adjourn this debate for even two or three weeks, to allow the country to become familiar with the terms of the Bill, because I take it that ninety per cent of the electors know nothing at all about it, and ninety per cent of the newspapers of Canada have never discussed it. If we could only have a respite of two or three weeks, the government would know what kind of a demand there was for or against it.

Now how does the Minister of Trade and Commerce justify clause 4? He says that in his time, back before the year 1896, he and a number of his colleagues were sent from province to province to gather information, to hear deputations, to hear ex parte statements through deputations, accompanied by lawyers, by huge piles of documents and reports of evidence. He says that when he concluded his peregrinations he knew less about the tariff than he did when he started, and was less able to produce a perfect document than when he commenced his investigation. Then he says he came down to the House with a tariff made by rule of thumb. That was the predicament he was in. He has never made the confession before, but he has been challenged to do so. Hitherto he has always justified that tariff, and told us how, with one stroke of the pen, he wiped out four millions of taxation. Now he says that after three or four months travel throughout the country he came down with a tariff made practically by guesswork. Is it any wonder that conditions detrimental to Canada followed such a tariff as that, that the revenue went down and the expenditure went up, that there was business stagnation throughout the country under a tariff made in the manner described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, made, as he says, by rule of thumb. Then he had the audacity to say that if Mr. Fielding was in the House he would admit that his tariffs were similarly made. I challenge that statement. If Mr. Fielding were in the House to-day there would be no stronger opponent of this measure. Mr. Fielding's tariff was not made by any rule of thumb, it was made after careful and critical investigation. It was made, it is true, after a prolonged course of travel throughout the country, after much thought and consideration. It was made after obtaining the facts and information which any Minister of Finance should obtain. His tariff stood practically from 1907, until the present moment, and take it year by year from the date upon which it was passed, and all classes of this country I believe will accord it united praise. It left Canada on the 21st of September last in such a good condition that the Prime Minister was one of the champions of that stock in trade remark during the last election, 'let well enough alone.'

Now the Minister of Trade and Commerce did disagree with me in regard to striking out the words 'under the direction of the minister.' I still hold to my opinion that these words should be stricken out; I still hold that the Tariff Board should be an independent board. If the Finance Minister will put in an alternative clause there, I will be perfectly satisfied, though still protesting against the general principle. If he will allow an alternative clause enabling, say, five or ten individuals to request the Tariff Board to make an investigation into this, or that subject, I will be satisfied. But if he leaves it in its present form it is most highly objectionable, because any board he may see fit to appoint will be his own creation, subject only to his own direction, men who cannot in the very nature of things make what may be called an independent finding. Now, if the Minister of Finance is sincere, he will admit some alternative clause, or will consent to strike out these words, and rely upon clause 2, which gives him every power imaginable over the board. Then leave the commissioners free under subsection 1, or put in an alternative clause allowing five or ten individuals, who make a bona fide application, to have this, that, or the other investigation held by this Tariff Commission. I have taken advice of the Speaker with regard to this, and I understand I can move several amendments. My first amendment then will be to strike out the words I have mentioned in subsection 1; 'under the direction of the minister.' Then coming down to clause (g) of subsection 1, my amendment will be to strike out the two last words 'the minister,' and insert the word 'parliament.' At present it reads 'report to the minister,' and I think the wisdom of the House will be with me in my suggestion that the report ought to be made to parliament. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that was his idea from the discussion he had with his colleagues in council.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). How would my hon. friend reconcile subsection 6 with section 5, where it speaks of confidential evidence that must not be made public?

Mr. GUTHRIE. We will have a good deal to say on that section.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). Does the hon. gentleman expect confidential evidence to be submitted to the House?

Mr. GUTHRIE. I have a good deal to say on confidential evidence. I do not believe in confidential evidence in a matter of this kind. I believe the facts on which the government is going to act should be made public to everybody. But I do think, in all fairness to the individual members of this House, outside of government circles, that the report should come down to parliament to enable us to judge, and not be in the nature of secret departmental information to be given solely to the Minister of Finance.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) proved my case. He said that this was the forum for disputants to come to, both parties could meet, thresh the matter out, all parties would know what the facts were and the facts would be public and come down to this House so that we could all examine them. Why not abide by that? The request is reasonable and if the request is not granted it makes me feel that there is an ulterior motive in the mind of the Minister of Finance in regard to this Bill and that our criticism that there is something behind the Bill is only too well founded.

Then, I come to the next amendment that I am going to move and that is to strike out subsection 3 altogether. Subsection 3 is the provision that this commission may investigate trusts, mergers and the like. If we pass the subsection in its present form we are placed in this peculiar position; we have not less than three forums in this country authorized to investigate trusts, combines, mergers and the like. We have the proceeding prescribed by the Tariff Act which provides that an investigation into combines and mergers may be held before judges and these investigations may be held upon the recommendation, appointment, or order of the Governor in Council. I think it would appeal to any reasonable man that the proper forum for such an investigation would be before a judge or judges of the courts of this country. I think the whole House will agree with me that the judges from one end of Canada to the other are men in whom the public have every confidence and for whom the whole nation entertains the very highest regard and respect. I believe that we could all submit such a matter as this is to the judges with absolute confidence that their views will be unbiased by any feeling of partisanship or by any school of thought in regard to tariff, high tariff, low tariff, tariff for revenue or free trade, and that before the judges and perhaps before them only, you can have, from beginning to end, a fair, square inquiry that will go to the root of things and a fearless finding of results. I think that the section in the Tariff Act is broad enough to provide for this inquiry taking place as it should take place. My suggestion a day or two ago was that a reasonable amendment to that particular clause of the tariff law would suffice. Appoint some gentleman as counsel on behalf of the people or the government and make him the active agent of the government in the prosecution, or in the inquiry, or examination into the affairs of these mergers and combines. That is the forum which I would approve. But, there is another forum. Under the combines Act, I believe, it is provided that any five or seven persons—I think it is seven—may make application for an inquiry. There are two forums. Now comes this proposal for a third forum. Is a third forum necessary or essential? Is there any reason why one or both of those now existing should not be used in preference to the third? The third forum is to be the Tariff Commission appointed by this government and I have no doubt in my mind that the hon. member for St. Antoine, was quite fair, quite candid, quite accurate in his statement as to the qualifications of the men who will sit on that board. I do not think he took advice from the members of the government when he made the statement but I have not heard any of them repudiate the statement and I am satisfied that he stated the fact when he said that the commission will be conservative and protectionist. The commissioners will have to be men in sympathy with the protectionist feelings of the present administration. Would you not rather have a board of judges? Would it not be fairer to have a board of judges to inquire into this matter? There are so many mergers to-day that one is almost afraid to count them up or to imagine what the actual capitalization of these concerns is as apart from the watered capitalization. When one considers the effect which they may have, or which they have to-day, upon the great question that is agitating the public mind in regard to the cost of living one sees the necessity at once of going before the tribunal which is most likely to go into the question fearlessly and fairly and to reach a proper result. Would it be this board of tariff commissioners or would it be a board of independent judges in the courts of this country? I have no hesitation in saying, as I said before, that the mergers of Canada would laugh at your Tariff Commission. Give them a chance of selecting the forum to conduct this investigation and they will select the Tariff Commission and not the judges.

Something has been said about mergers —I do not know that I shall go into it now —perhaps at a future time I may have an opportunity—but there is this to be said that, notwithstanding the statement made last night by the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, who I believe, said that if it could be demonstrated that the effect of the merger of the Ames-Holden and other companies had been to increase the cost of boots and shoes, the product of these factories, to the consumer, he would readily consent to have the present tariff wiped out.

Mr. AMES. No.

An hon. MEMBER. No, reduced 25 per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Reduced. Well, I do not think it is necessary to prove that. My view of it is that with the over-capitalization of that and other companies and prices are too high to-day, it is not the question of increasing the price or reducing the price to the consumer, who is the wearer of boots and shoes. It is so apparent on its face, that one hardly need state it in this House, or to make anything more than a passing remark with regard to it. Take a company—I do not mean the Ames-Holden Company,—but take any company in which there is an actual capital of $100,000 invested—that money has been paid into it—and the effect of these mergers that take place is to double, treble and multiply that capital, not by new money, but simply by the issue of new stock. A company with $100,000 invested in actual cash, may be recapitalized by the modern process into a company with $1,000,000 of bonds preferred stock, common stock and you see the result. In order to obtain five per cent. on the nominal capital, you have to earn $50,000 on the $100,000 that went into the business. You have to earn $50,000 on the actual investment in order to pay five per cent on the capitalization.

Mr. AMES. I suppose the hon. gentleman is quite aware that many of these companies pay no dividend whatever on their common stock and will not pay any dividend until the water has been entirely squeezed out.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I know there are all sorts of processes in connection with these schemes and I will admit that the hon. member from Montreal, St. Antoine, is more familiar with practices of this sort than I am. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will give us both pointers.

Mr. AMES. The only thing I object to is that this is criticised by men who know very little about it.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I am trying to give a few plain, blunt facts that appeal to me and it certainly appeals to me on the face of it, to be wrong in every sense of the word, to see the Ames-Holden Company, or any other company into which a limited amount of capital has been placed, being capitalized up to two or three times that amount. That is a fraud on the face of it. While I do not know the various processes by which these ends are attained, I state plainly and bluntly that an investigation in regard to them should take place and while the Ames-Holden merger would very gladly submit their affairs to the Tariff Commission, they will be very reluctant to submit their affairs to a board of judges that were appointed under the Canadian Combines Act.

Mr. AMES. Will the hon. member allow me to give him one piece of information, because I know he always tries to do what is just and fair in debate, and I have not had occasion hitherto to criticise him on that point. He repeatedly has referred to this company with which apparently I have the misfortune to be connected, and I shall make one statement for his benefit because it is a statement that will be applicable to the allegations made by other honourable gentlemen on that side of the House. My statement is: Every dollar of the bonds and preferred stock of the Ames-Holden-Mc Cready Company represents actual money invested. So far as the common stock is concerned, there has never been a dollar of dividend paid upon it, nor is there expected to be a dividend paid upon it until that also represents actual assets.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Well, Mr. Chairman, so much for that clause——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I know there are a great many gentlemen on the other side who applaud these mergers. I cannot find it in me to do it, and I know there are seated in this House many personal friends of my own who are very deeply interested in the question of mergers.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Does the hon. gentleman not remember that a year ago, the day before yesterday, a motion was made in this House to investigate such mergers, and the government that the hon. gentleman supported, and he himself amongst them, voted that motion down.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not remember the question to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I can tell you.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I say it is no part of the duty of parliament to investigate mergers; we have a law which provides a way in which they should be investigated and why not put that law in force now or at any time.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Why not put it in force then?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Who made the complaint?

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

Mr. GUTHRIE. What merger does my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) refer to?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I refer to the motion made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), now the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not remember it at all. I do not know whether I was here, but even if I were here I probably would have voted against the motion because I have no doubt the motion was wrongly brought or it would not have been voted down by parliament. But, I find to-night, from the generous applause that greets the question of mergers from the other side, that there is a tremendously strong feeling in their favour among the Conservative ranks in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Well, I have noticed the marked applause that greets the mergers from hon. gentlemen opposite. I heard the Minister of the Interior a few days ago make a distinct statement in regard to mergers, on the question of the cost of living. It was a very excellent statement. He said that no question had given the government so much trouble or called for so much consideration from the government as that very question of mergers and the cost of living. I thought at the time that the Minister of the Interior was serious, but I do not know that he will make very much headway against mergers, trusts and combines with the present representation on the Conservative side of the House of Commons, because evidently there are only two questions brought before this House which they will applaud. One is: whenever the question of mergers is mentioned there is applause loud and prolonged, and again, the only real cheer hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House can get out of them is when the sacred word 'protection' is used; 'protection' cheers from the government side; 'high protection' more cheers; and 'highest protection' loud and prolonged cheers.

Mr. BLAIN. If my hon. friend will permit me—

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not wish to be interrupted again. There have been occasions in this House, recently, when there was anything but a government cheer. We did not hear much united cheering from the government side when the Ne Temere was up; we did not hear any united cheer when the government's naval policy, or lack of naval policy, was before this House, but you talk of trusts and mergers, then my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) is cheered to the echo by his friends, when I am almost prevented from speaking because of interruption. When you talk of protection, or higher protection, or highest protection, then cheers from the government supporters ring throughout the walls of this Chamber. However, these remarks are a little beside the question and I shall get back to the clause. I now beg to move, seconded by Mr. Carvell:

That the words 'under the direction of the minister' in line 2 of subsection 1 of section 4 of the Bill, be struck out.

Amendment (Mr. Guthrie) negatived, Yeas 40; Nays 76.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Carvell:

That the words 'to the minister' in the last clause 'g' of subsection 1 of section 4 be struck out and the words 'to parliament' be substituted therefor.

Amendment (Mr. Guthrie) negatived.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I beg to move seconded by Mr. Carvell:

That subsection 3 of section 4 of the Bill be struck out.

Mr. TURRIFF. Before that amendment is put I want to point out this phase of it. It is proposed now to put the trying of these mergers and combines practically out of the hands of the judges in whose hands it is at present.

Mr. BORDEN. It is not so proposed at all.

Mr. TURRIFF. The object of this Bill, if it means anything, is that this commission shall be in a position to try such cases as have previously been tried by the judges. You appoint this commission for five years, and let us suppose that just before those five years are up, one of these combines or mergers is complained of, and it goes before this commission for trial. This commission knows very well that the government is in favour of these combines and mergers, and is it likely to be in as good a position to try the case impartially as would be one of the judges of the Superior Courts? I think this clause ought to be struck out. We have already two tribunals before which these cases can be tried, and why appoint a third? To take the matter out of the hands of the judges and to put it in the hands of a partisan commission seems to me to be absolutely unfair.

Mr. BORDEN. We are responsible for the Bill, and not for the hon. gentleman's understanding. There is nothing in the Bill that takes away the present power to have any such matter investigated by the judges. There is simply power to send it to this additional tribunal if so desired.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But no reason has yet been given why this second tribunal should be added to what we have already, or to show that it would be more in accordance with the public interest. Up to the present time we have had a law on the statue-book declaring that under certain circumstances an investigation, if it took place, should take place before a judge. Has any reason been given to show that the public interest would be better served or more justice done to the people at large if such an investigation took place before this commission? Although this is a new jurisdiction, I say it is not an improvement, but rather a deterioration. It is not possible to expect that men who would be of the character stated by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), that is to say partisans, men in sympathy with the policy of the government, will do more substantial justice than men who are out of politics altogether. This is a very good reason why we should adhere to the present law and not adopt this amendment.

Mr. BORDEN. We have explained in the House, at least six times, that this tribunal, having practical knowledge and experience of such matters, is a very desirable tribunal to add to those already appointed under the Customs Act. It does not seem to me that it would require a great deal of intelligence to understand that. The right hon. gentleman asks questions about it. He might just as well ask, why did you add the judge of the Exchequer Court to the judges of the other courts ? The question would be just as relevant and just as intelligent. There is nothing taken away from the power to send an inquiry to any judge at the present time; but because a commission is to be established which will have knowledge and experience in these matters, we have thought it desirable to give power to send an inquiry to that tribunal if it should be thought best. Nothing is taken away. Additional power is granted to the government, which is responsible for these matters, and which will be responsible as to the tribunal to which they send them. That is all that is comprised in the suggestion that this commission shall be created as an additional tribunal; and there are other reasons which could be given.

Mr. CARVELL. My right hon. friend is trying to draw a herring across the path of this Bill when he intimates that anybody is suggesting that he is trying to take away from the judges the power to investigate these combines. Nobody has made such a suggestion. My right hon. friend knows that the judges have no power to investigate combines until he and his council ask them to do so, and he knows that he is providing a tribunal to which he can send these complaints instead of to the judges, and that is what we are finding fault with. I wonder if the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) would not rather have his boot and shoe merger investigated by a commission of good Conservatives well grounded in the principles of protection, than to have it investigated by a non-partisan judge, who will render a finding in accordance with the facts. I wonder whether there is a trust in Canada which would not rather have its case investigated by a partisan commission such as this Bill provides than by the judges of the land. There is no use in trying to cloud the object of this Bill from the members of this House or to make the country believe that we do not understand what we are talking about. We know exactly the object of this Bill, and we are trying to make it plain. We know that the object of this Bill is to take, not the power, but the actual fact of the investigation of these combines away from the judges of the land, and place it in a partisan commission which will without doubt give the kind of answer the hon. gentleman wants when he sends it to them.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It is most amazing to me that all the mergers, combines and trusts in Canada have sprung up since the 21st day of September last. If they existed before that date, why did not the late government take advantage of this clause in the Customs Act, and take steps to dissolve them? We have had a good deal of talk from hon. gentlemen opposite, but better evidence of their real opinion is offered by what they did or refrained from doing than by what they say. All the capitalizations that have been spoken of to-day existed prior to the 21st of September last, and did the late government take any action on their own initiative to investigate these combines for the purpose of ascertaining whether prices were unduly enhanced or not? I heard some one say something about a paper combine. After 15 years of power, that was the solitary instance of governmental action in regard to combines. All I have to say is that no matter what hon. gentlemen opposite may say to-day, they were not, when in power, on unfriendly terms with the trusts, mergers and combines of this country.

I say that their actions then do not correspond with their words now, and I prefer as between words and actions to rely upon their actions rather than upon their words, although I do not mean in any way to be offensive, because I understand this is a debate and they are trying to give an appearance to this Bill that it does not fairly bear. We have heard talk about almost everything in the Heavens above, and the earth beneath and the waters under the earth in reference to this Bill. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has traversed almost the known universe but has failed to debate this Bill on its merits and he knows it. I would do injustice to his intelligence if I believed that he was in his own judgment fairly interpreting that Bill this evening. He said that this Bill had been drafted without regard to the farming population. He is an intelligent man, and as I pointed out this afternoon in the interpretations clause here, which is taken from the Customs Act, the word ' products ' was deliberately added to the wording of the Customs Act in order that it might include the product of the farmer. I ask whether the word products does not include the products of the farmer. Is not ' agricultural products ' an every day expression, is it not an ordinary use of the word 'product' which. was put in expressly for the purpose of meeting the case of the farmer? I say that of all the people of Canada who will derive advantage from the information that will be collected by the Tariff Commission the farmers stand to benefit the most. Take the interpretation clause:

(d) 'Goods' means products, wares and merchandise or movable effects of any kind, including, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, horses, cattle and other animals.

Is there any merger or trust in horses, cattle and other animals? Are they not products of the farm? Do they not come within the provisions of this Bill and are not the farmers who raise these animals entitled to the benefit of the information which will be obtained by this commission? I would do injustice to the intelligence of the House if I assumed anything else.

Take subsection 4, in respect of the cost of production, and compare it with the interpretation clauses. It refers to the product of the farmer as well as of the manufacturer or of the company or combine, and the farmer is represented there. What do we wish to obtain? The cost of production in Canada as well as elsewhere for the farmer as well as for the manufacturer and merger. The cost, efficiency and conditions of labour in Canada and elsewhere in order that we will know what the farmer pays for his labour as compared with farmers in other countries. 'The prices received by the producers, merchants, &c. This clause includes farm products.

Mr. OLIVER. Is the minister going to fix the tariff on farm products on the basis of the prices paid by the farmer for the labour he uses?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I say that labour enters into the price of the products of the farm just the same as of any commodity or the products of any factory in Canada, all conditions and factors which affect or enter into the cost of products. One of the great questions of the last campaign was the price of horses and the advantage of the man on the plains over the Ontario farmer for the supplying of horses for northern Ontario. Is that not pertinent and important to the farmers who raise the horses? It is an absolute perversion to say that this Bill does not provide for the case of the farmer. This Bill meets the case of every class of people in Canada. It is designed to meet the cases of all the population of the country and it is an absolute perversion to read anything else into it.

My hon. friend this afternoon paid me the compliment of again saying that I was the representative of interests. Let me tell him that I am a representative of interests, I am here as the representative of the public interests, I represent the interests of the people of Canada, and while I am here I shall endeavour to discharge this trust and if the hon. member keeps as free from sinister influences as I do he will do well. I said before and I say now that I never have had and I have not now any connection with any trust, merger or combination, and I defy any man in Canada to prove that I have. Hon. gentlemen may find some fault with my capacity but I want them to understand

Mr. OLIVER. I never made any insinuation against the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). He said from his place that I was the representative of the interests, of the trusts, mergers and combines.

Mr. OLIVER. I never made any insinuation against the hon. gentleman of having any interest in any trust, merger or combine.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). You said I represented the interests——

Mr. OLIVER. And I adhere absolutely to that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I say I am not the representative of such interests, and that I am quite capable of discharging my duties in an impartial manner, and I think he might very well omit these suggestions although I take it from him that he has withdrawn anything in the nature of a personal allusion.

Mr. OLIVER. I never made any or wished to make any.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). You said it.

Mr. OLIVER. Not personally, no.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). To come down to the matter of this particular case with regard to the investigation of trusts, combines and mergers, as I have said, hon. gentlemen opposite lament that we are about to withdraw the privilege of submitting these cases to the courts. We are not withdrawing them, we are simply adding a tribunal. While hon. gentlemen speak in this way, yet in 15 years of power one single solitary instance is all that can be cited by hon. gentlemen opposite of their having recourse to the courts with regard to trusts, mergers and combines. They say it is a tremendous national loss that the courts should be lost to them, and yet to what extent did they use the courts? Let me state what my predecessor, a very able man, of whom I shall always speak with the greatest respect, said about trusts, mergers or combines:

In that shape the resolution passed the House, and is part of the tariff law to-day. While it imposed a check on the government, it had this disadvantage, that it provided a somewhat slow piece of machinery. Justice in the courts is somewhat slow; judges are busy, and men who thought there were combines, were slow to take advantage of the provision.

That answers my right hon. friend, it is from his righthand man, who said that justice is slow, and I add to that that justice is sometimes technical. We are not taking away from the court the hearing of these cases, not for a moment; we are adding a tribunal which can hold an inquiry in a very informal manner, which is not so bound by technical rules and which from the nature of the investigation into industrial conditions would be the best possible tribunal to inquire. That is all that we have in view in regard to this Bill. All this afternoon we have listened to iteration and reiteration as to keeping knowledge from parliament and yet if there is anything that has been made as plain as daylight, by every man who has spoken with responsibility, it is that parliament is to be entitled to all the information we may obtain. Nothing could be clearer than that.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had agreed in the view that this information should go to parliament. So he did, but it was precisely in the same sense that the rest of us agreed, it must come to parliament because my hon. friend said in his trenchant and clear way that parliament was not disciplined and organized to take the initiative at all and if any one will consider for a moment the principle of responsible government, he must realize as a matter of fact that the government which has to take the initiative, must have the information given to it in order that it may take the initiative. It is the government that takes the initiative, that brings down its tariff Bill.

The very purpose of this legislation has been explained time and again in this debate. Over and over again it has been stated that the government wants to get information on which it may rely when it is considering the tariff law. Now, I said the other day that my hon. friends opposite were creating bogeys. I say so now. They are reading into this Bill what does not exist in the Bill, what never was intended to exist in the Bill, and what I think most of them know, does not exist and was not intended to exist in the Bill. But they wish to make things different from what they are—it is not what things are, but what they may be made to appear, that counts. These hon. gentlemen were so long in power that they grew skilled in that kind of thing. They have not lost this skill, and they are using it to-day to try to give a false appearance to the Bill. The Bill is precisely what it purports to be, a means of obtaining information, a means which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) endorsed in his speech before the manufacturers in Montreal, as I proved before. These hon. gentlemen are fighting bogeys which they themselves have raised. But all this will fail of effect when the work is in hand. It is measures and acts that count; and when the Tariff Commission is in action, my hon. friends will see that this is a beneficial measure. They will find it used for the best interests of the country. And, if it is not so used, the government is responsible, and the people will take care that a government is placed in power that will act in their interests through the Tariff Commission, and otherwise. That is the principle, and that principle has not been departed from in the least in connection with this Bill.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). It seems to me a very significant circumstance that we have just heard from two ministers of the Crown, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds). I am not naturally the best tempered of men myself; but I really cannot congratulate either of these ministers on the temper in which they have addressed the committee. My right hon. friend the leader of the government, whom I have always regarded with almost affection, referred to me and to other members on this side in terms that were hardly respectful. He said that 'any man of intelligence surely could see that.' The imputation was that nobody on this side of the House had intelligence.

Mr. BORDEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He misunderstood me. I thought my hon. friends opposite did see it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Yet the right hon. gentleman knew they did not see it, for they had so declared. The Minister of Finance has shown an amount of temper that is a perfect surprise to me. He has been wreathed in sweet smiles since he came to this House. That hon. gentleman also is a lovable personality. Yesterday, he was complaining that we were only engaged in a pillow fight. Well, when at boarding school, I had pillow fights, but I am bound to say that I never saw a boy in a pillow fight get into such a state of temper as my hon. friend has shown. There was no need for temper, no need for defending his personal character, because there has been no imputation on his personal character.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). That is a pretty general interruption, but it is somewhat inarticulate. If I were charged as a farmer in this House with acting in the interests of the farmers, I should not take it as a charge that I had a personal object to serve or that I was occupied by my own personal desire for gain, being personally tied up to the farming profession. A public man—and really one has to say these things, for after all is said and done, we are all public men here, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who is a very young parliamentarian must not take every charge made against him in his public capacity as a charge upon his personal character. I venture to say that to the hon. gentleman; and I think if I had had the opportunity to speak some such words before he rose, he would not have got so angry. I do not know what the cause of anger is in this case. But I must say it makes me apprehensive. If it be the statement of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) well, that hon. gentleman always makes his statements emphatically. If it be that hon. gentleman's statements about trusts, mergers and combines that makes the Minister of Finance so angry I am apprehensive. For there is an old French proverb: Qui s'excuse, s'accuse. These hon. gentlemen are defending themselves with too much warmth on this subject of mergers for a western farmer to be quite comfortable. They make me fearful—not of their debate, because the man who loses his temper in debate is done—but fearful that there is a closer connection between the mergers and themselves, than they are willing to admit—I mean a public connection; the hon. gentleman must not be angry with me.

As to the amendment, the law as it is at present puts the initiative for examining these conditions into the hands of the people; that is my understanding of it. The anti-combines Bill enables any seven people to make an application to the Governor in Council for a court, and action is taken. The initiative is in the hands of the people, and that seems to me a very good thing. But I am afraid that the people are not going to get the consideration in these matters that they should have. I have explained in regard to the general matter my fears upon this question, and I have not heard in any of the subsequent parts of the debate anything which has cleared my mind of these fears. From the time of Magna Charta to the Lloyd George budget—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). The interruptions are still somewhat inarticulate, Mr. Chairman. From the time I first mentioned until the other day—perhaps it suits my hon. friend better to have it put that way; his knowledge of history may be a little limited—the British people, who, after all, have laid the foundation of free institutions and parliamentary governments the world over, have fought for the right of taxation as the inalienable right of parliament. They have been most jealous of any interference with that right. They cut off a king's head to take away from him the power to interfere with them in that matter. And in the next generation they drove a king from the throne, still fighting for the power of the people to tax themselves through parliament and the executive government. And the other day, in Great Britain, the House of Lords had taken from it forever the power of veto of an Act of the House of Commons and the power to interfere with a money Bill at all. I take it that this reference, being met with laughter or smiles in many parts of the other side of the House, is an indication of the hollowness of the professions of hon. gentlemen opposite of affection for the mother country and its institutions. My attachment to those institutions cannot be questioned,—never has been questioned; my attachment to the flag has never been questioned. But I am bound to say that there are hon. members here who seem to regard these institutions in another light from that in which I regard them.

Now the initiative in this thing arises with the people. It has been contended that the Tariff Commission is meant to get the information. Analyse the taxing power of the people a little further, and our information has been got to guide parliament and government in their taxing power. What is the constitution of Canada, as in the United Kingdom? It is that on a wider or narrower suffrage parliament is elected, and from that parliament an executive government is appointed. In Canada there is a little difference. We appoint our Cabinet ministers in a different way than in the old country, and I cannot think that the innovation is a good one. But that is the constitution in both countries. In various departments of the government you have the whole power of the people, for the time that you are in office, to make each of your departments as powerful as you want them to be, to spend all the money you like, to get what information you like. That has been the method of government from time immemorial in every country that forms a portion of the British empire. Now why have the British people gone through with that fight? Because the power of the purse resting in parliament is the only thing which guarantees the liberties of the people. We fought in the past against the despotism of kings, we fought until the other day against the unrestricted despotism of the House of Lords; and it is a sad thing to me that I come here to be subjected to another despotism, forsooth of the representatives of trusts and mergers. I must say that the tyrants of the past had some dignity about them. They had some tradition, but the conscienceless millionaires of this country have neither dignity nor anything else; they are guided by one consideration and that is the support and strengthening of their own interest at the expense of the general public.

Now what do you propose to do in this clause? Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have said that you are not restricting that power, you are introducing a new power, it is an added power, and it is the knowledge of British history and of what we have had to do to establish the power of parliament that makes me fear this additional power. The Anti-Combines Bill, I did not know that it was likely to do much. When it was discussed in this House in the last parliament I described it as a pill to cure an earthquake. A bludgeon is the only cure for the diseases that arise from a tariff, and so far as this went it was thoroughly constitutional. What does the Minister of Finance say about this added power? I hope I am quoting him correctly. He says: 'The power we have added, we think, will be the best possible tribunal.' Why, that is an extraordinary confession, it is a confession which justifies everything that has been said on this side in support of my hon. friend's amendment. If it is the best possible tribunal, why is it so? It is not that in the light of history, it is not that in the light of establishing the taxing power of parliament, it is the best possible tribunal because it is the instrument of the government. I am afraid to utter the next sentence, but I do it without any personal reflection; it is the best possible tribunal and the best instrument of the government, because the government is, I fear, the instrument of another power, another despotism—care I say trusts? The word might make them angry. It is the best possible tribunal, I repeat, because it is a tribunal which the government themselves are creating, it is their instrument, and I very much fear that they are using the forms of the old constitutions of this country, and of Britain, to put a buffer between themselves and the people, to put a buffer between themselves and their responsibility. That is why I most heartily support this amendment.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said that actions count Well, I admit it. But after all, in discussing parliamentary measures we have to talk some. I remember an instance in British history of a great statesman who held the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer, a position analogous to that held by my hon. friend the Finance Minister. That statesman was William Pitt, he got there in a year and a half, and he got there by means of three speeches which at once marked him out as the most brilliant parliamentarian that had been seen in England for a century. So he went on and proved himself to be. I must say, for a man who discards any belief in words, as my hon. friend did, he is a pretty good talker himself. He speaks extremely well, and frequently. If he goes on as fast as he has since he came to the House, we will be able to remind him of his saying that it is actions that count and words are nothing. I told my hon. friend yesterday that I feel an interest in him, I ventured to describe him with the best of good temper as a man who had entered upon a rake's progress. I hope I was thoroughly wrong, and that his political history will turn him out as a man who will restrain those men behind him who are at present cheering protection to the echo. But I have my fears. However, I am here as a representative of the western farmers—who have no interest in this commission, of course. The real fact is that you cannot protect the farmers of this country, the great bulk of the farmers, for the simple reason that they produce far more than they can use, and have to send the overplus abroad. No protection to them is possible, that is why they are excluded from the operation of this Bill.

As a representative of the western farmers I can only say that I take the statement of my hon. friend that actions count as equal to an assurance of good conduct on his part. I take it as almost equal to an assurance that he will show us—I do not say in his next budget because he has not got his commission into working order yet—but in the budgets of this parliament some real and substantial reductions of taxation. I hug that hope to my heart and I need some soothing of my alarms because I am very much afraid that the result of this measure will be the raising of the tariff and not the lowering of it. In the meantime I will get such consolation as I can from the assurance of my hon. friend. I have very great pleasure in supporting this amendment.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. One would hardly be human if he did not feel stirred by the outrageous abuse which has been hurled from the other side for many hours past at all men who may be considered as at all connected with the manufacturing industries of Canada. I do not wish to pursue the argument in the vein in which hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued it but all I can say to them is that they are barking up the wrong tree in my judgment and that no party will stay long in power that attempts to pull down that which during the last thirty years has been built up—the vast industries of Canada. I want to tell these hon. gentlemen—and I have specially in my mind the two hon. gentlemen who are sitting on the second bench, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, Mr. Clark (Red Deer) and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie)—that they are not speaking for the people of Canada to-day. They say that the manufacturers number two or three thousand and that all this is for their benefit. These manufacturers are employing about 500,000 workmen who are dependent upon the manufacturers for their daily bread and they are just as much entitled to respect and to honour as are the farmers of Red Deer. I want to say to the hon. member for Red Deer—I have not had an opportunity of speaking with him before—that he is not speaking for the whole people of England to-night. I know a little about England as well as he does. I have taken part in two campaigns in England and I want to tell him that half the people in England are against his economic principles. I want to tell him that there is a greater chance of protection being introduced into Great Britain than there is of the policy of free trade being introduced into Canada. There is no doubt that the hon. gentleman has free trade at heart, but there is a doubt whether he understands the people of Canada to-day. We have been engaged for thirty years in building up this nation. We have employed in the factories to-day 500,000 workingmen. There are only 700,000 upon farms with 900,000 workers of all kinds who are not upon farms. Do not run away with the idea that this is a purely agricultural country and that every other industry must hide its head because the farmer says so or because those who profess to represent the farmers say so. The hon. gentleman has just told us that the farmer cannot be protected. Let me refer him to the pages of the Ottawa papers last week which quoted potatoes at $2.50 a bag. Is not that a fit subject to be investigated by the Tariff Commission? What is the cost of producing potatoes in Canada? Is it any thing like $2.50 a bag? The workmen have to pay that price and they pay it uncomplainingly. I take the ground that we are going to be a united people from end to end, a people who will give and take and this cry of mergers combines and so on is not going to down long the people of Canada. These gentlemen sat for fifteen years with these mergers and combines at their back and they did not make the least effort to put them down. But, as soon as they begin to pull down the industries of this country, they will find that the farmer of Canada will suffer along with other citizens. We are all bound together in one common interest, and I say to these gentlemen who would endeavour to strike at the manufacturers because he only represents two or three thousand people, that when they hit at the manufacturer they hit at every man who is working for him, and I am proud to-day that the workmen of Canada are much more contented and much happier than are the workmen of the country from which the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Clark) comes. Let him explain what is the matter in Great Britain to-day, when every great industry is threatened with strikes. What about the coal strikers who have voted by four to one to go on strike? What is that for? The hon. gentleman has given us no reason, and he cannot say that free trade has banished all industrial and economic ills. They have tried all kinds of quack nostrums in England under Lloyd George to cure the evils by which they were oppressed—their pension Bills, their old, worn-out insurance against unemployment, and that sort of thing—everything but giving an honest day's wage for an honest day's labour. The first right of a citizen is the chance to have an honest day's pay for an honest day's labour. Still, we have this hon. gentleman coming out from England to tell us that for thirty years we have been on the wrong track, that we do not know how our people are being wronged by tariffs, and taxes, and mergers and combines. These words flow glibly from the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member from South Wellington and others. The people of Canada are being well served by the manufacturers and the workman, and with all this howl about the farmer we have not heard one single word in the debate about the interests of the working men. They are struggling just as hard as the farmers. They have just as much right to live, and I believe that when the people of Canada look this question over they will tell these men that they are wrong. They will tell the hon. member for South Wellington, at least the people of Guelph will, if I know them, that he is not preaching sound doctrine. I do not wonder that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) drew the line at allowing them a trip hammer the other day when they wanted one brought in without paying duty. There is a trip hammer there now and the Minister of Customs did not want another to get in without paying duty, and therefore my hon .friend will have to pay the duty, and rightly so. If the manufacturers in other centres have to pay duty on trip hammers, why should my hon. friend be permitted to bring his trip hammer in free? What I ask the hon. member for South Wellington, the hon. member for Red Deer and the people of Canada to do is to look this question in the face. This measure has been brought down to better conditions. I am not prepared to say whether, in its working out, it is going to do all the things that are expected, but it means the searching for information, and if information is going to make any difficulty, it is the first time I have known it to make difficulty. The information that is to be searched for is to enable us to have a scientific tariff. Unlike free trade, a protective tariff is a science, not a fixed science, but an applied science, and the beauty of the tariff is that you can apply it to the conditions. Then the hon. member for Red Deer said that goods ought to be brought in more freely because the revenue is too high. That will produce more revenue. A reduction in the tariff has been known in times past to produce more revenue, and it may do so again. Why reduce the tariff if you want to reduce the revenue? Increase the tariff and stop imports, stop the hundred million dollars excess that is spent on imports from going out of this country to the other nations of the world and keep money in our own pockets. It is not as the hon. member for Red Deer or as the hon. member for South Wellington says, oversea commerce that counts—not by a long way.

To-day the test of a nation's success is the degree of efficiency and economy with which it can supply its own wants. Compare the United States, that great protectionist country, with Great Britain, that great free trade country, if you can call her so, and I say that the condition of the workingman and of the farmer in the United States is far superior to that of the corresponding classes in Great Britain. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) may question that, but I can point to the report of a commission which recently came from England to investigate the conditions in the United States, and which on its return sets forth that the workingman of the United States, with all your high cost of living, and your high tariff, is better off than the workingman in so-called free trade England. I tell the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that there is a great probability that in the near future, we will see a tariff for protection in the British Isles, and that no longer will it be pointed out that there is one great free trade nation, and, equally true there is not likely to be any more. For fifty years free trade has been tried and found wanting all along the line. If you take Great Britain as a sample of free trade, you will find if you look at her taxation, that she raises millions of dollars on tea and coffee and many other such things that are regarded as absolute necessaries of life, and which are staple articles of consumption by the workingman. Let me ask the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and I hope he will be honest enough to admit it, what class in Great Britain to-day is anxiously demanding tariff reform; who cry the loudest in Great Britain for protection? Is it not the agricultural classes that are demanding tariff reform? I tell my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) that tariff reform in the old land is coming without doubt, and that when it does come Great Britain will see an era of prosperity such as she never witnessed before. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to now let this Bill go through, they have fought it for hours and hours and it is time for them to cease vain argument. These gentlemen opposite tell us that this Bill is for the manufacturers only, but we have not asked for it as manufacturers. I am glad to know that under this Bill the cost of living will be investigated, because if potatoes are sold at two and a half dollars a bag when they should be sold for one dollar or one dollar and twenty-five cents, the workingman may have a remedy; if eggs are selling too high at fifty cents a dozen, and if wheat, oats, and barley are sold at too high a price, there may be a drop, and so we will see to it in the cities that if you get after the workingman we will know what is the matter with the farmer also that he does not produce at a lower price than he now sells for. I tell hon. gentleman opposite that the whole thing is a question of live and let live. I would advise hon. gentlemen opposite to cease their denunciation of the manufacturers and the workingmen of Canada; I would advise them to let this Bill go into force, and then, if they have any complaint against it, I am sure it will not be found in the measure itself but in the working of it. I believe here will never be any fault to be found with this measure if the men who are appointed as commissioners are the right kind of men. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) shed big tears because no room could be found on that commission for a free trader. Certainly not; my view is that the man who goes on a board to handle tariffs must be a man who believes that tariffs must be handled.

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) says that a bludgeon is the only thing that ought to be used on a tariff and my answer to him is that the man who sets out to handle tariffs, must be a believer in tariffs, and must not be a man who would use a bludgeon on tariffs. I would ask the Minister of Militia if, when he is going to arm the militia of Canada, he would select Andrew Carnegie or the Rev. J. A. MacDonald to select a fit and proper rifle to put into the hands of the defenders of our country. Surely not, because they believe in complete disarmament, and they would pick out a gun that would not go off. And, that is exactly what would happen if you put men of the calibre of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) on a Tariff Commission; you would be arming the commission with a gun that would not go off, and that is exactly what we don't want to do. There is no chance of the Minister of Militia asking the Peace Society to step in and pick out weapons with which to fight our enemies, and there is no chance of anybody who would use a bludgeon on the tariff being able to decide as to what is a proper tariff for this country. I would appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to let the Bill now go through, and let the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) think overnight on it before he moves any further amendments.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I am sure the House, during the time I have had the honour of sitting in it, has not had to complain of my occupying on the whole, more than my share of its time, and I ask for an opportunity to utter what I hope will be a few goodnatured sentences in answer to such direct appeals as have come to me from my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt). I might tell the House, if I wanted to be critical or to get angry, that I found the speeches of my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) very useful campaign literature when I first fought for a seat in this House in 1908. I had recourse to 'Hansard' and I found on the whole no more useful speeches to me for securing my seat in the House of Commons than the speeches of my hon. friend. Now that I have heard him, I can understand that. I appeal to the right hon. the leader of the House to say that there has been no undue delay in the discussion of this measure. We must admit that this legislation is in the nature of an innovation; it is a new thing; it is a very large measure, and I do not think the time that has been spent over it has been unduly long as yet. I should be the last man to countenance in any way any form of Parliamentary obstruction. I know the fight we had against it years ago, in the mother of parliaments, and I should be the last to counsel it. But, I contend, there has been no need for such an impassioned appeal as I have just heard from my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) for the immediate settlement of this question. That impassioned appeal reminds me that I will need a large stock of soothing syrup, if I have first to administer it to the members of the Cabinet and then to take up private members afterwards. When my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) began in so stormy a tone, I thought we were getting from bad to worse, and really my duties in the way of soothing hon. members opposite will soon come to be very onerous indeed. I want to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) that there is no man in Canada who wants to set class against class less than I do. I am a farmer; he is a manufacturer. I had explained in the few remarks I made to the House that, as a farmer, I make my living without protection. I have no protection. It is economically impossible for you to give it to me. I produce, or help to produce, more of the material of the farm than is needed in Canada, and I cannot be protected. I have got to sell every year what I produce; every thing that is ready for the market must go.

The manufacturer is in a different position. But the only point I want to put to my hon. friend is that I am protected, and I ask him, if he be so strong a man as his voice would indicate, to put himself alongside of the feeble Briton that he sees before him and live without government pap. Of course, I am under no illusions as to the early arrival of free trade in Canada; I know too much about fiscalities to expect anything of the kind. I have argued again and again that the benefit of the western farmer is the benefit of the whole of Canada, and I honestly believe that what I am supporting is good for the whole of Canada and not simply for any class of the community. My life-long connection with the British Liberal party is a guarantee that I stand for the masses, and not for minorities of any kind, and my whole argument in this House will support me in that modest claim. I do not know whether my hon. friend was present when I spoke last night. or whether, if he was not present, he did me the honour of reading what I said.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I read it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). It has not had a very good effect up to the present. If he read it at all carefully, he would have found one statement which after all was an emphatic contradiction of something he has just said. He said he had not heard anybody mention the consumers in the country.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I said the workingmen.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Does the working man not consume? I have known a number of workingmen who had excellent appetites. I tried to make my argument clear that the consumers included everybody in the country. I would be loath to go into a discussion as to the comparative merits of the old country and Canada. A great many of us in this House love and respect both lands, and I do not think an acrimonious comparison of the two countries would be a good way to promote the sane imperialism in which we all believe. I would like to say in conclusion that I have never, in private or in public, said one word against Canada which was not justifiable criticism; but in parliament, as on the platform, we must discuss measures for the public good of the country in which we live, and it is only in that spirit that I criticise. If I did not do that, I would not be doing my duty to my constituents.

Mr. VERVILLE. For the first time in this House we have a manufacturer proclaiming himself to be a great friend of the workman. He has not been a great friend of the workman all his life, if I am well informed. As he has said, there are about 500,000 workmen in the different industries of the country, and as he has brought the question before the House, I am in duty bound to say a few words in support of the workmen of the country. We have heard a great deal about a scientific tariff. I believe the 500,000 workmen that the hon. gentleman has mentioned regard that scientific tariff as a one-sided affair, because it is entirely in favour of the great manufacturers of the country. Protection, if I understand it aright, has the object of preventing goods from another country coming to this country without paying a heavy tax; that is for the benefit of the manufacturer. But what about the labour to manufacture those goods? Is there any protection for that labour? My hon. friend from Brantford knows that there is not. If there is no protection for labour, I claim that the tariff is a one-sided affair. In this House, and elsewhere, I have often heard men rise and say what good friends they were of the labour classes. In Brockville at the present time we find law-abiding Canadian citizens put out of work and strangers from the other side of the line put in their places.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. Is there not an alien labour law that protects the labourer?

Mr. VERVILLE. I will cite to my hon. friend a case which was before the Montreal courts. The manufacturer, who was the Canada Car Company, stated that they could not get competent men in Montreal, which was untrue, but the presiding judge said that that statement by the manufacturer was enough, and we lost our case. There is the kind of protection we have, and it is a one-sided protection. My hon. friend is not satisfied with the expression 'trusts and mergers.' It is not my intention at present to discuss this question in detail, because I hope to do so in the near future. We talk about legislation, but if we were spending one-fourth of the time of this House to make legislation and three-fourths of the time to see it carried out, we would be doing better for the country. We are passing one piece of legislation after another, because I understand that this is an addition to existing legislation, and then we will probably have another piece added to it, to make it so that nobody can understand it.

My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has no right to say that the working people of this country are satisfied, and the very remedy for tariff evils, the very remedy against the trusts and mergers, was presented before the people last year, on the 21st of September. Whether it was carried or not makes no difference; it was presented, and if it had been presented and left bare as it should have been, without any waving of the flag or cries of all sorts, in fact if you were to take a referendum on that question alone to-day, I am convinced that a strong majority would pronounce in favour of that measure. I declare that nobody has the right to say the working people are satisfied. My hon. friend knows that very well, and if he had not said what he said to-night it was not my intention to take part in this discussion. I am not discussing the Bill, I am not a law maker, God forbid me from being a law maker of that kind. I am here representing the very finest division in the Dominion of Canada and the largest one. I have any number of manufacturers in my riding and it is not their fault that I now sit in this House. I claim that you can send your Tariff Commission all over Canada and abroad to make investigations as to the conditions of manufacture, but most of the information desired is now to be obtained in the Labour Department. The government will find there information on the hours of labour, on the wages paid in different industries, on the wholesale and retail prices of goods. If it is desired to obtain information on the value of the plant of a manufacturer, will they be able to determine whether the manufacturer is overrating his plant? The fact that practically all the manufacturers and the mergers and combines were wholly against the measure submitted to the people in September last, is enough to show that that measure was in favour of the people. The hon. member speaks about potatoes at $2.50 a bag. What about butter at 40 cents a pound that was bought at 25 cents and put in cold storage until the merger raised the price to 40 cents? You can go to Ottawa stores and buy eggs at 50 cents, out of cold storage. One grocer told me to-day that he had to sell the fresh eggs at the same price because the people could not afford to pay more. Does the farmer derive any benefit from the butter which he sells at 25 cents and which is retailed at 40 cents out of cold storage or from the eggs which he sells at 15 cents or 16 cents a dozen, which are now being sold at 40 cents? Where is the profit of the farmer in that? What about the third party in that case, the man who is responsible for the enhanced price? We don't seem to touch him at all.

I claim that this is done through the mergers and the trusts and when the time comes I shall produce figures to show that we have 30 or 40 mergers and to prove their over-capitalization. I do not want a commission to find out the cost of living, I go from store to store and I have found exactly the real conditions of the cost of living in Montreal and Toronto, I will compare that with the cost in the United States and then we will have something to show to the members of the House the effect of the merger whether that merger has a right to exist, and whether the investigation that we are now going to make into mergers will be beneficial to the masses or not.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I have been astonished that any opposition to this Bill is received with great surprise by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that they have not exhibited the best of temper in replying to any objections urged against it. Supporters of the government speak of this measure as if it were of divine origin, as if it was perfect and not open to criticism and amendment. The motion before the House is that clause 3 be struck out. The right hon. gentleman who leads the House stated in reply to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that the reason for subsection 3 of section 4 being in this Bill had been explained three or four times, but he did not give a single reason for its existence in the Bill. Nor did the Minister of Finance give any reason for the presence of that particular clause. The House is entitled to some logical reason for the existence of this clause in the Bill. The purpose of the clause is to empower the Governor in Council to authorize the holding of an inquiry by the proposed Tariff Commission under section 12 of the Customs Tariff Act.

Under section 12 of the Customs Tariff Act the Governor in Council was empowered whenever it deemed it to be in the public interest to inquire into any conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement alleged to exist among the manufacturers to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers in any article at the expense of the consumer. That clause of the Tariff Act empowered the Governor in Council to direct an investigation by certain judges.

If the judges reported that there was a conspiracy, the government had the power to remove the tariff upon the particular article. I would point out that a conspiracy in restraint of trade, a condition of things such as was contemplated under section 12 of the Customs Tariff Act, is a violation of the criminal law of this country. And the party guilty of any violation of that part of the criminal law is liable to a penalty of $4,000 as a maximum, and $200 as a minimum, or two years imprisonment. I contend it is quite clear that an investigation of this kind should take place before judges of a court, parties competent to make an investigation.

It may be said that under section 12 of the Customs Tariff Act, the penalty is not the one described in the Criminal Code. But, if the judges report that there has been a violation of the law, that a conspiracy exists, it becomes the duty of the Crown to prosecute the conspirators criminally. This is a serious matter and those powers should not be delegated to the members of this commission. We do not know who they may be. They may not be members of the legal profession, or qualified to take evidence under oath or to reach true findings on the evidence. I am not trying to delay the course of the Bill, but I submit that there is fair room for a debate about this section, and the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance should not treat it in the way they do. The whole question is: Shall the commission have power to conduct inquiries or shall they not? The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) urged that the clause be struck out and that the power of investigation be left as at present under section 12 of the Customs Tariff Act. I submit that in all fairness, the amendment of the hon. member is a reasonable one and I think it should be supported by the committee, at least until some reason is given stronger than any we have heard from members of the government in support of the clause as it stands.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems to me that this is a matter of really more importance than the Minister of Finance thinks it is. I was entirely unable to understand the reason why he objected so strongly to our criticism of this section and to our support of the amendment of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I think it much against the proper administration of the law to have two or more different tribunals to try out the same matter. As has been pointed out we have a provision in the customs law that reference may be made to a judge of the Exchequer court, or the Superior court or of the County court, and if such judge finds that there is conspiracy under which prices have been unduly increased the Governor in Council may reduce or abolish the duty. We have also the very excellent provision of the Combines Investigation Act. Section 1 of that Act makes provision almost in the same words as section 12 of the Customs Act that where, as the result of the investigation that is provided for, it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that there is a combine to unduly enhance prices, the Governor in Council may reduce or abolish the duty on the article.

That is a statute which may be invoked by the people—any seven residents of Canada may invoke it—and investigation takes place before a judge of one of the courts of the land. The Minister of Finance proposes that an investigation of a matter of this kind may be taken out of the hands of the people, or a portion of the people, and handed over to the commission to be appointed under this Act. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) seemed to get very excited and urged that we were fighting the manufacturers, because we were supporting this amendment. What is the fair inference from the hon. gentleman's position? It is that he thinks that a tribunal like a judge of the Exchequer court or of the Supreme court will not be as favourable to the manufacturers as the commission which the government is to appoint under this law. And I have no doubt that there might be cases when such an investigation would not be so favourable to a combine as would be the judgment of this Tariff Commission. Surely the Minister of Finance must see how objectionable it is to have two tribunals with authority to inquire into the same matter. The hon. gentleman has provided what may be in the nature of an appeal, giving the Governor in Council power to take the matter out of the hands of the tribunal. This may lead to endless confusion. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman should show some reason why the courts cannot be trusted to make these investigations. It is only within the last two or three years that combines and mergers have existed to any large extent in Canada. These organizations create a new situation in the country. We know that under the late government, after the Combines Act was brought into force, an investigation of the United Shoe Machinery company was undertaken at the instance of a number of people, who complied with the law. That matter is going on to-day; I believe the Minister of Labour took it up where it was left by his predecessor. Everybody admits that the Combines Act is an admirable law, well calculated to inquire into these combines. That law is being tested. Nobody finds fault with it. We should not form another tribunal to take up cases which are already provided for.

Why should parliament be asked to ignore the tribunal which the law now provides, and give the Governor in Council authority to refer these cases to a tribunal which, from the very nature of its appointments, will be favourable to the manufacturers, to the producers, to the dealers, and against the interests of the consumers? I fail to see any reason whatever for this Bill. We ought not to enact a law simply for the fun of the thing, we ought to have clearly shown to us that some evil now exists, and that there is a prime need for additional legislation on the subject. The government has wholly failed to present any reasons to the committee why this section should be adopted. Therefore, I am in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. MARSHALL. I have listened with much interest to the discussion on this Bill. I must say that, although I have been in the House for five or six years, I never saw so much time lost over a Bill as over this. The Bill certainly points in the right direction. The Dominion canners have been mentioned as robbers and thieves. It is a strange thing to say, that we got our charter from a Liberal government and we operated under a Liberal government ten years. During all that ten years I never heard any fault found with the Dominion canners until this Bill was brought forward, and now we are styled as robbers. I want to say that the Dominion canners are doing a great business in this country, we are giving employment to about 9,500 people. We are also furnishing a market for the products of our soil, many thousand acres. Hon. gentlemen opposite are entirely wrong in what they have said against our industry. If you compare our prices with the American prices you will find that ours are much lower, our goods are better goods. Owing to the condition of the labour market, it is impossible for us to put up goods as cheaply as they were put up a few years ago. We are paying the farmers ten or twelve per ton more for peas than we were a few years ago, for the reason that they have to pay more for their help. It is this great northwest we have heard so much about that has taken away the help from our farmers, and we can scarcely get sufficient labour to harvest our crop.

Mr. OLIVER. They are the people who buy your canned stuff.

Mr. MARSHALL. Very true, and we are glad to sell it to them, and we are selling it to them at a reasonable price. The hon.

member for Regina (Mr. Martin) the other day said that we had raised the price of tomatoes to $1.75 a case. The committee will be surprised when I tell them that the canners sold their tomato pack last year for less than $1 a dozen. After the goods leave our hands we have no further control over the prices. We do not control the whole packing business. There are thirty or forty other canneries in the Dominion with which our company has to compete. I am strongly in sympathy with this Bill, because I think it will do justice to all. I am astonished at some of the arguments I hear from the opposition, they seem to me very unreasonable. Speaking for my own company, I am altogether in sympathy with the Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 4 be adopted?

Mr. CARVELL. I had an amendment that I wished to propose to section 4. If I may have an opportunity of bringing it up at a later stage, I would have no objection to allowing the section to pass at the present time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Carried.

On section 5,

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the time has come to adjourn.

Mr. BORDEN. We have had a great deal of discussion, and have made very little progress. If we are ever to get through the session we will have to get along faster than we have done. I would like to sit here for an hour or two longer and get something done, if it will be convenient for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend knows that the discussion has been perfectly legitimate, at least on our side; there has been no intention of delaying the progress of the Bill. It is now one o'clock, and I think we should adjourn.

Mr. BORDEN. The discussion may have been legitimate, I am not saying that it was not. All I complain of is that the greater part of it has been repeated ten or fifteen times.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does that remark apply to both sides?

Mr. BORDEN. It applies to any gentleman who happens to have been guilty of it; I am not discriminating.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It does not apply to me.

Mr. BORDEN. If my right hon. friend is anxious that we should adjourn now, I will agree to it. But I want to say distinctly that if we are going to discuss matters in that fashion, we will have to sit later, or else the session will have to be prolonged, and I do not think any one wants to prolong the session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Nobody wants to prolong the session. But we have seen sessions lasting five or six months, and I think the hon. gentleman and his friends have contributed to prolong them. There has been no obstruction of this measure, only legitimate discussion. Our arguments may not impress the right hon. gentleman, and I am sorry for it.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not finding fault with the quality of the arguments, except so far as they may be controverted. But I do find fault with unreasonable repetitions. It is not only waste of time, but it is wearisome.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I know it is wearisome, but I have been listening to just such arguments for fifteen years.

Mr. BORDEN. I have no way of preventing it. The only result will be that we will have to sit a little later, or else have a longer session. I know we are all anxious to bring the session to a close at a reasonable date. The other alternative seems to be the only one, namely, that we must sit later. At the request of my hon. friend, I will move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, but with the understanding that if we are going to take so long with every one of the sections of this Bill, we must sit a good deal later.

Progress reported.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to give notice to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) that on the first convenient occasion upon going into Committee of Supply I wish to bring up the question of freight rates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What will be the business of the House to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN. Order No. 20, Bill respecting National Transcontinental railway; Order No. 18, Bill to encourage and assist the improvements of highways; Order No. 17, consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 66) respecting the public archives; Order No. 13, Bill to amend the Civil Service Act, and after that Supply. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) will probably go on with his estimates.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.52 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

TOLLS ON GOVERNMENT WORKS.

Mr. MONK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 103) respecting Tolls on Government Works for the Transmission of Timber. He said: The object of this Bill is to correct a clerical error in the Revised Statutes of 1906. In former days the collection of these tolls was under the Department of Inland Revenue. Subsequent statutes transferred the collection to the Department of Public Works, but in the Revised Statutes of 1906, the interpretation clause is made to say that the word 'minister' means the Minister of Inland Revenue, whereas, in conformity with previous legislation, it should be the Minister of Public Works.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate The British Western Loan Company—Mr. Martin (Regina).

Bill (No. 102) for the relief of Edna Wells—Mr. Beattie.

Mr. CROTHERS:

(a) The minimum wages paid and hours worked fluctuate greatly from seasonal and other causes. The exact figures are not in the possession of the government. The Census and Statistics Bulletin No. 1, 'Wage Earners by Occupations,' gives information placing the average earnings of male waiters at $300, and of female waiters at $265.

(b) The names of the cities of 50,000 or more of population are Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal, Quebec, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.—GRADES AND SALARIES IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PELLETIER. moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolutions:

(a) changing the classification of the clerks in the City Post Office, offices of the Post Office Inspectors, office of Superintendent of Railway Mail Service, and in the Money Order Exchange Offices by abolishing the stampers and sorters class and fourth-class clerkships, and substituting therefor third-class clerkships, ranging from $500 to $1,000, and divided into two classes known as third-class 'A' and 'B.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. I presume that the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) will make a statement to-morrow.

Mr. PELLETIER. Perhaps. But, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) thinks it well, we might have the discussion of the matter when the Bill is before the House.

Motion agreed to.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL—HOLLAND RIVER BRANCH.

On the orders of the day being called.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland). I desire to submit a question for the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden). I observe in the 'Newmarket Era' of February 2nd the report of a meeting of the town council which reads as follows:

TOWN COUNCIL.

A special meeting was held in the council chamber last Monday evening, Mayor Cane in the chair. Present—Councillors Roadhouse, Vale, Lyons, Cane, Wesley and Dennis.

The mayor stated that the meeting was called to consider the question of the government stopping the work on the Holland river branch of the Trent Valley canal.

The following resolutions, moved by N. J. Roadhouse, and seconded by Dr. J. H. Wesley, was carried unanimously:—

Whereas this council has learned with regret the decision of the Minister of Railways and Canals to abandon the Holland river division of the Trent Valley canal;

Whereas this work was undertaken at the request of a large deputation representing Aurora, Newmarket, Holland Landing and Bradford, also the township of North Gwillimbury, Whitchurch and King, which visited Ottawa and waited on the government asking that this work be undertaken for the purpose of obtaining reduced freight rates;

Whereas a large amount of freight is handled in this district, much of which would be supplied by water at a greatly reduced cost;

Whereas the route opened up by this canal was the old natural route to the north, the building of the Trent canal is again opening it up;

Whereas this work is almost completed—No. 2 section which contains the three locks and all the bridges is finished to the extent of 85 per cent. No. 1 section could be completed by a government dredge in a few months' time at a moderate expense;

Whereas the feeling here is strongly in favour of finishing the work;

Be it therefore resolved, that the Minister of Railways and Canals be requested to withhold his decision until further investigation has been made;

That copies of this resolution be sent to the right hon. Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and the member for North York.

Several citizens spoke in favour of the resolution before the vote was taken.

Council adjourned.

I desire to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) or the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) whether this matter has been brought to their notice in the form stated in this report.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have received a copy of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) has read.

Mr. BORDEN. A copy has been sent to me.

DISMISSALS FOR OFFENSIVE PARTISANSHIP.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) in the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) to an article of news which appeared in the 'Journal' of last Tuesday which is of considerable importance to the country. The article is headed 'Did they take active part', and is as follows:

The investigation of charges against civil servants who took part in the recent Dominion election was opened this morning in the Hull court house before Mr. M. Chauvin, of Hull, who was appointed by the federal government to inquire into this matter.

Joseph Piché, of the Public Works Department, appeared this morning in answer to the charge against him, of taking part in the election. Several witnesses were called and swore that he had talked reciprocity, and said that it was a good thing, and also that he distributed pamphlets which contained Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech on reciprocity.

Mr. BORDEN. Without desiring to prevent my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) asking any questions he may desire to ask, I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the practice of reading long newspaper articles with the desire of asking if the government have noticed them. I do not think this a desirable practice. I would ask you for a ruling so that we may have some consistent practice in this regard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a very old practice.

Mr. BORDEN. But not a very desirable one.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Mr. Devlin) is indulging in a procedure not in consonance with our usual practice. It is permissible to ask a question at this stage, but, in my judgment it is not quite in order to read a long controversial article upon which an argument may be begun, or to ask a question that invites an argument. There is another feature of the case which appeals to me and on which the rule seem to be explicit, and that is that it is improper to deal with anything in this House that is before the courts.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that this is simply a court of inquiry constituted by the government. But I submit to your ruling and will not proceed with the reading of the article. The question I have to ask is this: In view of the fact that Mr. Joseph Piché, who was an elevator man in the service of the Public Works Department and was charged with having taken an active part in the election, but was honourably acquitted as the court of inquiry declared, of taking any such part, I would like to know, before other gentlemen come before the court of inquiry, whether it is the intention of the government that these gentlemen who did not take part in the election but who have been dismissed and have been caused considerable expense to defend themselves will be reinstated in the public service?

Mr. BORDEN. I have not undertaken the administration of the various twenty-five departments of the government at Ottawa, but I assume that any man who had been dismissed without cause would be reinstated.

APPOINTMENT OF UNDER SECRETARIES.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Montreal 'Gazette' of yesterday contains an elaborate dispatch stating that it is the intention of the government to create under-secretaries for the various departments. Has the attention of the minister been called to that article, and is there any truth in it? Is it the intention of the government to appoint a Solicitor General?

Mr. BORDEN. I have not had the opportunity of reading the article in question. The subject has not yet been under the consideration of the government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The writer seems to speak authoritatively.

Mr. BORDEN. I presume he was stating his idea of what is likely to take place, but, as a matter of fact, the subject has not been considered by the government. I have nothing further to add to what I have said on former occasions with reference to the appointment of a Solicitor General.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Under consideration.

Mr. BORDEN. My right hon. friend, from reminiscences of the past, is answering for me.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am very sorry to see that my hon. friend is copying so assiduously.

THE GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. DEVLIN. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister in this House about two weeks ago that he would declare the policy of the government on the Georgian Bay canal last week, I would ask if he is yet in a position to declare whether the government has any policy on the Georgian bay canal scheme.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not remember the statement attributed to me. If my hon. friend will send me a reference to it, I shall give him an answer at some other time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

SALARIES OF COUNTRY POSTMASTERS.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to increase the salaries of country postmasters during the present session, or within a reasonable time?

Mr. PELLETIER. It will receive my most earnest consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If I may help the Postmaster General in coming to a decision, I may say that I had decided to do it.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the National Transcontinental railway. He said: When moving the resolutions preceding the introduction of this Bill, entitled An Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway, I mentioned all the facts relevant to the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, mentioned in the Bill. I also furnished to all members of the House copies of the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the Privy Council. I also submitted an estimate showing the liability to date in connection with bond sales that have taken place and an estimate of future liability in connection with bond sales that will be made in the future on the assumption that no higher price will be realized than from the last sale. I assume, therefore, that the House is fairly in possession of all the information they desire. I wish, however, to make it clear to the public in connection with this Bill of which I now move the second reading, that the responsibility for this very heavy obligation, in whatever degree such responsibility exists, must belong to the preceding government. So far as this government are concerned, we are merely taking authority under this Bill to discharge the obligation imposed upon the government of Canada by the contract of 1903, entered into between the late government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I stated that with regard to bond sales which have taken place the amount of liability under the implementing clause is about $5,000,000, and that a similar sum may be reasonably expected to measure the liability in connection with the sale of future bonds required for the construction of the road. The public have been shocked, I think, by the announcement of this very heavy liability. I think the onus is distinctly upon hon. gentlemen opposite, on behalf of the late government, to exculpate themselves, or to extenuate what appears, prima facie, at all exents, to have been a very great blunder. I reserve any further remarks that I have to make in regard to this subject until I hear what explanation is offered by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the matter. I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, the second reading of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I have no exception whatever to take to the statement which was made by my hon. friend (Mr. White, Leeds), the other day, when he moved the resolution and now in moving the second reading of the Bill, as to the circumstances which have originated and made necessary this legislation. If blame there is to be it ought to attach to the parties who were in office when this legislation took place. This legislation is simply an incident of the construction of the Transcontinental railway which was decided upon by the government in the year 1903. When the Bill was presented for the construction of the Transcontinental railway it had not at that time struck everybody, as it struck us, that there was an immediate necessity for the construction of such a highway. On the contrary, it may be said that there was a cleavage of opinion and a good many members of this House and a good many people in the country thought, in good faith, I have no doubt, that the construction of such a railway was, at least, premature. If such an opinion existed at that time, and I quite admit it did exist, I think it has been dispelled long ago. There is no doubt now, I believe, that public opinion is unanimous that the Transcontinental railway which was undertaken in 1903 was an immediate necessity to the rapid development of the country and especially to the settlement of the provinces west of Lake Superior. We have evidences more than one of this fact. Indeed, public opinion is so much reconciled with the idea of having a Transcontinental railway such as was provided for by the legislation of 1903 and 1904 that, last year, when we introduced legislation into this House for assistance to a further Transcontinental railway, not a single word of objection was heard from anybody. I conclude from this that everybody was agreed then that the action we had taken was in the public interest. We have still at this moment another evidence of the wisdom of the legislation which we put upon the statute-book in the condition of things which exists in the northwestern provinces. We have to-day in the northwestern provinces three different railway systems, the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway, every one of them is taxed to its utmost capacity, at the present time they are unable to cope with the requirements of the country and at least one-third if not more of the crop is now lying in the fields awaiting railway transportation. No better justification could be advanced of the necessity under which we were to provide for the immediate wants of the settlers and the wants of the settlers are connected with transportation above all things. Indeed, if we had more railway facilities than we have, if the railways were better equipped with storage capacity and rolling stock, a heavy burden would be lifted from the mind and the heart of the settler at the present time.

But, it was not an easy task to induce any company to enter upon what was, after all, an arduous undertaking, and, it might be, an uncertain one. After negotiating with the Grand Trunk Railway Company they undertook the task of providing for the construction of the Transcontinental railway and the House is familiar with the conditions which were imposed upon us and which have been described by my hon. friend in introducing this motion. In so far as it is necessary for the purpose of the present discussion it may be sufficient to say that in order to induce the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company to undertake the construction of this second transcontinental railway we agreed that upon the western section of the road, from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean, we would undertake to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to the extent of three-quarters of the cost of the construction of the road, limiting the liability, however, upon the prairie section, to $13,000 a mile and, upon the mountain section, to $30,000 a mile. This agreement was modified, as has been shown already by my hon. friend, in the following year and, as I said a moment ago, I have no reason at all to complain of the statement of the hon. gentleman in introducing the motion because I think he presented the case in a very clear and a very fair manner. I will quote his own words in introducing the motion the other day:

At the time this agreement was entered into, the 3 per cent stock of the Dominion of Canada stood at about par. Shortly afterwards there was a fall in that stock in common with other high class low interest-bearing securities, and as a result it was seen that the 3 per cent Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company's bonds guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada would not realize nearly par. In order to meet that situation a supplementary agreement was entered into in the following year. Among other things it removed the limit as to the $30,000 a mile upon the mountain section, but allowed the $13,000 per mile as a maximum of bonds to be issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company on the prairie section to stand.

That is a very fair statement of what took place and of the reasons which induced us to make the modification which we made of the agreement of 1903. Shortly after we had introduced the legislation of 1903 the financial market commenced to decline and declined steadily. It was not supposed, however, that it would be permanent. It was expected that, on the contrary, the financial market would resume its buoyancy and that our securities, which, at the time we entered into the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in 1903, stood at about par and, which had declined would resume their former position. However, in this we have been disappointed as everybody knows. The financial market has been going down steadily ever since, not only in regard to Canadian securities, but in regard to the best securities in the world. English consols, for instance, which ever since the wars of Napoleon had been the most favoured stock in the financial market, and which, during the later years of the last century, stood not only at par but at a large premium, sometimes ranging as high as 10 per cent, have declined steadily ever since and if I am not mistaken—indeed I am not mistaken—in the month of December English consols went down to 77. I have not looked at the quotations recently, but I think they have been still declining. So that, if our securities have been declining ever since it is not on account of any want of confidence in our credit, but it is simply on account of the larger demands that have been made on the money market, the result being that the price of money has risen accordingly. Everybody knows that the impetus which has been given to the development of natural securities, especially electrical securities, has been almost phenomenal in the last ten years. This is regarded as a gilt-edged security, but the price of money has risen on account of the extraordinary demand to meet this new development in the industrial world. Under these circumstances, the value of our securities has been steadily declining. That is the origin of the legislation we passed in 1904, and which we are now about to implement by providing to meet the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, rendered on the agreement which was passed between us and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in 1904. I may say that I acquit the Minister of Finance and the government from all responsibility in this matter; the government in introducing the legislation is simply taking the proper steps to comply with the judgment of the Privy Council. Under the enactment of 1903 we guaranteed three-fourths of the cost of construction of the western section of the road, limiting our obligation on the prairie section to not more than $13,000 a mile, and limiting our obligation on the Mountain section to not more than $30,000 a mile. The modification we made in that is to be found in section 5 of the Act of 1904, which reads:

Notwithstanding anything in the said contract contained, the government may and shall, preserving always the proportions in the said contract provided as between the Prairie and Mountain sections of the eastern division, implement for the purposes and subject otherwise to the provisions of the said contract, its guarantee of the bonds of the said company to be issued for the cost of construction of the said western division, in such manner as may be agreed upon, so as to make the proceeds of the said bonds so to be guaranteed a sum equal to seventy-five per centum of the cost of construction of the western division ascertained as provided in the said contract, but not exceeding in respect of the Prairie section, thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) per mile.

There were two provisions in this agreement, one, was that the restriction of the liability of the government with regard to the mountain section of $30,000 per mile was removed, and we also undertook to implement the difference between the face value of the bonds and the price they would bring in the market. Now, we did this because it became evident that at least some of the bonds which were to be issued from time to time could not realize par or anything like it. We were in hopes that the money market might become more buoyant, and that we would not have very much in the end to make up, but in this our expectations were not realized. The money market has been steadily declining, and, as the Minister of Finance has very properly said some of them sold at 92½ and others sold at only 80, making a great difference between the face value and the selling price. Now, why did we make this arrangement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company?

It seems to us that under such circumstances if the Grand Trunk Pacific company was bound to raise its money at that sacrifice, that its credit and its resources might be impaired, and the enterprise might be jeopardized. We thought on the whole, that it was worth every effort on the part of the Canadian government, on the part of the Canadian parliament, on the part of the Canadian people, to provide for this Transcontinental railway, which would be of such benefit to the settlers of the west, in enabling them to bring their products to the market. We all know that what has contributed most of all to make Canada prosperous, has been the rapid settlement of the western prairies, and that the more facilities were given to the settlers to dispose of their crops the more prosperous they would be, and the more prosperous would be the country as a whole. The government at the time placed itself in the judgment of the House and the House approved our action, and I believe the Canadian people also approved. Even though the cost may be heavy, I do not think it is too heavy for the resources of the country or for the results which have already been achieved, and which still remain to be achieved. The only difficulty that arose in connection with the matter, was as to the interpretation of this agreement, and as to in what manner the implementing should take place. That has been a question between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the government for some years past. I need not tell the House—many of the old members remember it—that when we made the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway company, the government engaged the services of some of the most able counsel who could be obtained. We had the Minister of Justice, who did not himself take any technical part in the framing of the contract, and who left this largely to Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice, and to one of the most able counsel of the Dominion, Mr. George F. Shepley. These gentlemen prepared the contract for our guidance, and even though our best efforts were given to make it a document that could not be disputed, still, as doctors differ, so will lawyers and judges. When the difficulty arose, Mr. Shepley and Mr. Newcombe advised us that the proper method of implementing would be to issue bonds, so as to make up the difference, whereas, the Grand Trunk Railway Company took the position that the implementing should be only by the payment of cash to the amount of the difference between the face value of the bonds and the price they realized. Then, the matter was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. Before I proceed, might I refer to a remark made by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance a moment ago, when he said that the blame, if blame was to fall upon anybody, must fall upon the previous administration.

I agree altogether with my hon. friend that if blame must fall upon anybody, it must fall upon us. But in such a matter it may well be considered whether or not we are very much to blame after all. The question was one of law, and let me before I go further, state to the House what was the opinion, as to the construction of the contract which we made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, of a gentleman well versed in law, whose eminent ability as a lawyer is well known; I mean the Deputy Minister of Justice. When the difference arose with the Grand Trunk Railway Company as to the interpretation of this contract, the matter was referred by the Minister of Finance to Mr. Newcombe, and this is the opinion which was given by Mr. Newcombe:

> In reply I beg to state that in my opinion that method of implementing is still open to the government. In the first place I think that the whole transaction shows that there was no intention that the government should pay cash otherwise than as expressly provided, and it is my opinion that under the legislation and agreements the government has not the power to pay the deficit in cash as proposed by the company.
> Then, section 5 provides that the company is to implement its guarantee 'so as to make the proceeds of the said bonds so to be guaranteed a sum equal to seventy five per centum of the cost of the construction of the western division, ascertained as provided in the said contract but not exceeding in respect of the Prairie section $13,000 per mile.' It will be seen that the method of implementing proposed by the company would not fulfil the object for which the implementing was to be undertaken, that is to say, it would not make the proceeds of the bonds a sum equal to 75 per cent. of the cost of construction, &c., while the other method would comply with this requirement to the letter.
> Again, the recital of the implementing clause in the mortgage schedule can hardly be taken to have had any other object than to account pro tanto for the amount of the issue to be made under the mortgage, and we know as a matter of fact that there was included in that amount the sum of $4,255,125 in respect of bonds to implement on a basis of 92½ per cent.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the right hon. gentleman give the date of that letter?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The 11th of June, 1908. In support of the statement of

Mr. Newcombe, which I have just read, that in the preparation of the bonds the sum of $4,255,125 had been provided in respect of bonds to implement on a basis of 92½ per cent in the papers which were brought down by my hon. friend there is an opinion of Mr. Shepley in which this point is more clearly put. In preparing the mortgage, Mr. Shepley said:

> The company's officials have furnished a memorandum, and this memorandum has been checked by the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, and the limit finally agreed upon (£14,000,000 sterling) has been fixed with reference to the principles stated above.
> The memorandum furnished by the company's officials required correction in some details, and after correction the figures based upon that memorandum appear to be as follows:—

Cost (including terminals) of both sections..	$51,560,000
15 per cent. for contingencies in respect of the mountain division	5,175,000
3 years' interest capitalized..	3,854,250
Bonds to implement upon a basis of 92½ per cen.	4,255,125
Total..	$64,844,375
or..	£13,340,000

That is to say, as stated by Mr. Shepley, there was an estimate furnished by the company of £14,000,000 sterling of bonds to be issued under the agreement, and there it is shown that there is a provision made of $4,255,125 of bonds to implement the difference between the cost of the bonds, 92½ per cent, and their face value. Mr. Newcombe, in his letter, goes on:

> As Mr. Shepley states, page 3 of the memorandum respecting implementing provision, enclosed with your letter (top of page 3), the implementing contemplated is an implementing of the guarantee and not an implementing of the proceeds, and the implementing is to be such as will make the proceeds of the bonds in the whole guaranteed a sum equal to 75 per cent. of the cost of construction, &c.

Mr. Newcombe then concludes with these very suggestive words to which I call the attention of the House, especially of those who are disposed to blame us:

> I may add that the construction thus put upon the contract as to the competence of an implementing such as that proposed by the Minister of Finance does not seem to me to admit of any serious doubt.

The House now understands the whole kernel of the situation, which was this: There was a difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance representing the government, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, as to the nature of the implementing. The government contended that the obligation of the government was discharged by an implementing of the guarantee, whereas the company contended that the obligation of the government could be discharged only by implementing the proceeds of the bonds. The question was referred to the Supreme Court. I need not go into the technicalities of the questions which were submitted to that court. If I remember rightly, there were five questions, all of which bore upon this question: Was the obligation of the government discharged simply by implementing the guarantee, that is to say, by issuing more bonds to cover the difference betwen the face value of the bonds and their cash price, or was it to implement the proceeds? The matter was argued before the Supreme Court, and all the judges of that court unanimously decided that the implementing was one of the proceeds, but simply of the guarantee, as contended by the Minister of Finance, supported by the law officers of the Crown. The matter was taken before the Privy Council, and that body reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court, holding that the implementing should be of the proceeds and not of the guarantee. Therefore the legislation of my hon. friend becomes necessary.

Now, of course I need not say that we must all bow to the judgment of the Privy Council. They are the supreme authorities, and their judgment is final, whether that judgment be right or wrong. I am not reflecting in any way on the competence of that court, but looking at the facts as they are, there is one thing to be said in favour of the construction by the Supreme Court of Canada. To the courtesy of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) I am indebted for the factum of each party in this case. On reading the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, I was impressed by the statement therein made which I thought worthy of consideration. Upon the contention that the implementing could be done by an issue of bonds, this consideration is expressed:

> To issue additional bonds ranking equally with the said mortgage bonds would involve a breach of faith with the holders of the said second mortgage bonds inasmuch as it would weaken their security.

That view seems to have been very largely the one which induced the Privy Council to give the judgment it did. By the contract, when the government was authorized to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent of 75 per cent, the Grand Trunk Pacific also undertook that the bonds necessary to complete the other 25 per cent should be guaranteed by the Grand Trunk railway, and this undertaking was carried out. Therefore the second bonds were issued after our own, and there was a good deal of force in the point I have just cited. But it seems to me that this objection cannot hold for this obvious reason. It cannot hold, because the purchasers of the second bonds must have known the condition agreed upon, namely, that if there was a difference between the par value and the cash price of the bonds guaranteed by the government, that was to be implemented by other bonds. Therefore they took these second bonds subject to the possibility that there might be required an additional issue to make up that discrepancy. But the view taken by the Privy Council was that it would be a breach of faith to implement by a new issue of bonds the deficiency arising from the discrepancy between the market value and the par value. Here are the words of the judgment of the Privy Council:

With the utmost deference their lordships are unable to accept the interpretation placed by the Supreme Court on paragraph 5. It seems to their lordships that there is nothing in paragraph 5 importing that any further liability was to be imposed on the company in respect of the first mortgage bonds and that it falls upon the government to implement their guarantee so as to make the proceeds of those bonds issued and to be issued equal to their par or nominal value. It would be a breach of faith with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to let in any further charge in priority to their security, and as it appears to their lordships the company has no power to issue bonds other than those authorized by the original contract.

This is the final decision, but I have this to say that our contention was a hazardous or an improvident one. It was one which had the authority of the law officers of the Crown in its favour, also that of Mr. Shepley, one of the most eminent counsel in Canada, and I have here the words of Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice, who, under his own signature, said that the construction we had put upon the claim was one which, in his opinion, could not admit of serious doubt.

However, the Privy Council has spoken and we have only to submit. My hon. friend says this will involve a further outlay out of the treasury of some $10,000,000, but is there not after all some reason why we should console ourselves if such should be the case? A moment ago I said that the condition now existing west of Lake Superior is one which must cause a great deal of anxiety, not only to hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, but to every hon. member of this House, and to everybody who has any concern for the welfare of his country.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Might I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? Does he admit that if it had been pointed out to the government that an amendment could have been made which would have prevented the rendering of the judgment now given by obviating any doubt of the position taken by the late government, that amendment should have been accepted?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is very easy to be wise after the event.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the right hon. gentleman say that the possibility of a different construction was not pointed out to him at the time?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That point was taken up and discussed by our counsel.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I mean in this House when section 5 was being discussed. Was it not then pointed out to my hon. friend, and to his Minister of Finance and Minister of Justice that the clause might have the very result which the Privy Council has given it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I know that my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker), did make a statement to that effect; but the Privy Council understood the clause in one sense, our own Supreme Court, and our own counsel understood it differently. It was a case of disagreement between lawyers, and the final judgment is in favour of the contention of my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker).

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But when it was pointed out to the right hon. gentleman and his ministers that there was a possibility of such a construction being put upon this clause, and when they had it in their power to amend the clause so as to remove any doubt, why did he not have the clause amended and save the country $10,000,000?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have said already that we had the opinion of the hon. member for Hamilton on the one side and that of Mr. Shepley and Mr. Newcombe on the other. Let me again read the opinion of Mr. Newcombe that in his view the question did not admit of doubt.

Mr. BORDEN. But that opinion of Mr. Newcombe was of very much later date.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly, but he was construing the contract and he said that it did not admit of any doubt. As I have said there is a condition to-day in the Northwest which must cause anxiety, not only to the gentlemen on the treasury benches, but to the whole Canadian people. You have in that country any amount of wheat awaiting transportation for lack of railway accommodation. It is to be hoped that the railway companies will be able to give more storage facilities and provide more cars than they have been able to give hitherto, and in that way mitigate to some extent the condition now prevailing.

Mr. S. BARKER (East Hamilton). Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the Bill, I shall perhaps take a little liberty with the House, by going back upon some of the facts, and I may not altogether agree with what the right hon. gentleman has just said as to the facts. I think, however, that there can be no question in this House that the Bill introduced by the Minister of Finance, should be supported. I shall do so simply because there is not now any question whether we wisely undertook certain things in 1904, but the simple fact that we did enter into a certain undertaking by which the highest court of the empire has decided we have obligated ourselves to pay the money that is asked for. Therefore, Sir, if it was three times the amount involved, there should be no hesitation now, and I trust that as Canadians we shall not allow any question to be raised upon that point. What we have agreed to, what we have undertaken, we will abide by, and I therefore sincerely hope that every member in the House, for the credit of the country, will vote for the Bill.

But, Sir, while doing that, I think we are justified in asking the House to go back upon the history of the transaction which has involved us in this very serious loss of public money. It is due to members on this side of the House, who were then in opposition and to the country which after all, must bear the brunt, that we should look back now and see how this was all brought about, and whether the case is as simple as the right hon. gentleman affects to think it is. If I understand the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) aright he is under the impression to-day that when this question was first opened in the country, there were a great many people who thought that the construction of the railway was not needed then, that it was premature. I do not know just what my hon. friend is referring to. If he says that many people thought at that time there was no need for additional railway facilities for the transportation of the grain produce of the great northwest to the ocean, then he is altogether outside the facts. I was in the House at that time and I can vouch for the opinion of every member of the Conservative party; I venture to say, there was not one man on the Conservative side who doubted for a moment the absolute need of another through railway at the earliest possible moment. There were in the Conservative party at that time members who were interested in other railways, some in the Canadian Pacific railway, and others in other roads, but every one of them, whether interested in the Canadian Pacific railway or not, agreed that another railway should be built, that the party should unanimously support any generous liberal subsidy the government would propose to give, and that we should facilitate the construction of the road in every way. That is putting it according to what I know to have been the feeling then on the Conservative side; and so far as my knowledge and observation went, it was the opinion of every man on both sides of the House.

Hon. gentlemen will recollect that in November, 1902, a notice appeared in the 'Canada Gazette' of an application to parliament for a charter for a company to be called the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. That was the root of this whole matter. I shall read, before concluding, the application of that company to the right hon. (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as Prime Minister of Canada for a subsidy and the conditions they proposed. The application will show that they proposed a line from the Pacific ocean at or about Port Simpson to and through Edmonton, and to and through Winnipeg, and then to North Bay. At North Bay their proposed line would have connected with the existing railway system of Ontario, which would have carried the line through from the Pacific to Montreal, where it would meet the Intercolonial owned by the government. Thus by the project proposed to the right hon. gentleman there was offered to us at the earliest possible moment a through line from the Pacific ocean to Halifax, another real transcontinental railway about whose early construction there was very little doubt.

I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that there was a great deal of difficulty in inducing any company to undertake the construction of such a line. The hon. gentleman had in his own hands that proposition as early as November, 1902, and he did not allow the people of this country or of this House or his followers to know that he had that until two years afterwards. He treated that paper as a confidential letter and he kept it in his own possession. Yet knowing that he had that he tells the House that it would have been impossible at that time to get any company to undertake the construction of such a road. This is not new to us. We have been charged with opposing the Transcontinental railway. We never opposed that system at all. We did not know exactly what the proposal of the Grand Trunk Company was to be for the best reason in the world, that the right hon. gentleman would not let us see it. It was impossible for us to know, we did not know what terms they proposed or what subsidy they expected, but we thought they would ask a good deal more than they expected to get and that the government would have dealt reasonably and liberally with them and no more. So, from every possible point of view, opportunities were presented to the government for the construction of that railway at the earliest possible day.

It was not possible for the proposed company to do what they desired to do, and what events have shown would have been the very best thing for Canada. In 1903, there were in the city and province of Quebec certain personal and political friends of the right hon. gentleman who had various railway, bridge and other projects and schemes more or less visionary and more or less financially hopeless. After the private Bill of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had been introduced in the House, it was referred to the Railway Committee. Immediately there were rumours of all kinds. We heard of personal negotiations between the right hon. gentleman and the Grand Trunk railway officials. The right hon. gentleman undertook to negotiate 'off his own bat' with some of the ablest railway men in the country—did it all himself. When, some weeks afterward, the Bill came up in the Railway Committee—I was present—the right hon. gentleman informed us that he had made another arrangement than that proposed by the Bill. He proposed that the railway should be constructed easterly from Winnipeg towards Lake Abitibi and thence to the city of Quebec. And there was to be a branch from the neighbourhood of Abitibi, to North Bay and a branch to Montreal. This was announced to us as a perfectly new idea. The Grand Trunk railway officials were there, and if I am any judge of men's countenances, they assented very unwillingly and under pressure. I do not think that any man who saw them could possibly doubt that. The next stage was that another set of men came in. The right hon. gentleman had political and personal friends away down east in New Brunswick. After a week or two, and after further private and personal negotiations—it was said at that time that the right hon. gentleman was meeting the railway officials in private cars, away from the Cabinet and from his ministers; doing the whole thing himself—we had another meeting of the Railway Committee; and we found that the proposed line was to be extended down into New Brunswick, Moncton being ultimately named. And that line as proposed then by the right hon. gentleman paralleled the government's own railway for hundreds of miles. That is not all. The right hon. gentleman had some more friends: he had some friends in Quebec and vicinity, and so it came about that the taking up of the two sections from Winnipeg to Quebec and from Quebec to Moncton involved taking up that most lamentable affair, the Quebec bridge. And thereupon, as we find, the bridge company was taken over. They had received bonuses from the Dominion of Canada towards that bridge, from the province of Quebec and from the City of Quebec. They had spent all they had received and were in debt something over $900,000. They were utterly bankrupt—stranded; their charter was not worth a dollar. But a very prominent Quebec gentleman was at the head of the company, and the next thing we knew the government was buying up this concern. The government took over its liabilities, compensated the shareholders and directors of this bankrupt concern, and it became part, to all intents and purposes, of the great Transcontinental line. It is almost amusing to think that the hon. Mr. Fielding, in 1904, when addressing this House, put the amount at which the bridge should be chargeable to the Transcontinental railway at $2,000,000;—he thought that was excessive, but he generously charged that amount against the bridge. Every one who knows the history of that bridge is quite sure that the cost of that part of the project will be seven times two million. But in the airy way they had of handling millions in those days, they put it down as $2,000,000. It was perhaps, the most unfortunate part of the whole project—though we have not yet, it may be, heard all the misfortunes of the eastern division. That bridge, as we all know, dropped into the St. Lawrence, carrying with it scores of poor workmen. We had been paying millions on the bridge and the government had not even insured the payments it made. And the government contract for construction was with a corporation in the United States, the capital of which was $100,000. This was another instance of the business abilities brought to bear upon the construction of this gigantic work. The one visible asset we got from the bridge company was a lawyer, a political and personal friend of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was taken over as supervisor and superintendent of construction of the eastern division of the great Transcontinental line at a handsome salary. We got him, and that is about all we had, I think, for the money the country expended in buying out the old bridge company.

Now, it may be just as well here to consider the difference in the two propositions. The first is that which the skilful railway men had planned out, a simple undertaking, that would have been profitable to them and most useful and most profitable to the country. The Grand Trunk's proposition was to carry a line from the Pacific to North Bay. That was to be the whole construction. And they would undertake it for certain subsidies to which I shall refer presently,—we did not know what they were then, for the reason I have already stated, but they were a subject for consideration, and no one would have objected to a generous treatment, but not necessarily giving the company all they asked. The Grand Trunk Railway Company were willing to carry that traffic to Montreal, and there hand it over to the government railway. They put that proposition in writing. So, in every possible way, in which you could regard it from the point of view of the people of Canada, the Grand Trunk Railway proposition, apart from any subsidy they may have asked, was the most feasible, the most useful, and the most profitable, that could possibly have been advanced. And what did we get in exchange? The Grand Trunk being coerced—I think there is no doubt about that—into the views of the right hon. gentleman, stipulated that the government should undertake the construction from Winnipeg; and the government did undertake it. They let the Grand Trunk off all the distance between Winnipeg and North Bay and undertook to build it themselves. The government also undertook the construction from Lake Abitibi to Moncton and they undertook the bridge at Quebec. Then they made a further bargain with the Grand Trunk Pacific that the company were to build only from Port Simpson to Winnipeg.

The country undertook the enormous expenditure involved by the construction of a line through all the wild country to the north. It assumed that, and it was to rent the road to the Grand Trunk for seven years free and afterwards at the rental specified. The charter having been laid before parliament to meet the new terms interjected into it by the Prime Minister, we had a discussion in the House in 1903 and we endeavoured, by every means in our power, to introduce into the contract an obligation on the part of the Grand Trunk to deliver the traffic at Montreal to the Intercolonial railway, the government road. We were opposed in that by the right hon. gentleman and his followers. Every possible reason was given why they could not do it. One day it was impossible to carry it out, another day the Grand Trunk would not agree to it, and so we spent months in weary debate in this House endeavouring to get it made perfectly clear that the traffic which was to be brought over the Transcontinental should go through Canada and not to the United States ports. After all the objections and all the efforts we were making it was a surprise to us long after to find that the Grand Trunk had actually offered in writing to the right hon. gentleman to do that themselves. They had actually offered to hand over the whole of the traffic to the Intercolonial at Montreal and yet the right hon. gentleman kept that concealed in his pocket, defied us and prevented us from getting that most important concession from the Grand Trunk railway.

I think that, perhaps, I might here refer to what occurred on the 10th July, 1903. The country was astounded one fair day to hear that the right hon. gentleman's railway minister had resigned. He had left the government and why? He says that he resigned merely on account of his objection to this railway project. He is reported at page 6738 of 'Hansard', 1903, in these words:

> Now, Sir, I want to say emphatically here that until the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific came up for consideration before council, the thought of resignation never entered into my mind.

He then gave several cogent reasons why he objected to the plan, and at page 6742 will be found his letter to the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I will read one or two extracts from it. He says:

> Again, as respects my being open to the charge of want of fairness to yourself, it rather appears to me that an allegation of that character more properly lies at your door. The Grand Trunk proposition had been made to you, and you had consulted with other ministers, and those ministers had met Mr. Hays on several occasions, as I am advised with your knowledge and approval, long before you made me aware that negotiations or discussions on this subject had been entered upon and were being prosecuted. I do not say that I was unaware of them, because information indirectly reached me to that effect.

I would not be surprised at that because it reached all of us.

> But I do say they had made progress and had been well advanced before my chief had considered it proper or necessary to acquaint me with the facts. I think I might justly complain that so important a matter of policy, arising within the sphere of my own department, should have been conducted and continued in this way behind my back, and without my knowledge.

It was rather a serious charge for the member of a responsible government to make against his chief that, in a matter concerning the department that Mr. Blair presided over and in a matter of such enormous importance, the right hon. gentleman was negotiating with railway men behind his back. At page 6746 of that volume will be found Sir Wilfrid Laurier's reply to Mr. Blair:

> Privy Council, Ottawa,
> 14th July, 1903.
> My dear Blair,—I received yesterday afternoon, your letter dated the 10th, placing in my hands your resignation as member of the Cabinet and Minister of Railways.
> I have received at the same time another letter in which you set forth the reasons which have led you to the course which you have adopted.

This last communication opens with a review of the deliberations which have taken place in council on the railway question. In this review, matters are stated which, in my estimation, come within the rule that 'the deliberations of the council, upon all matters which engage their attention, are strictly private and confidential.' I, therefore, refrain from discussing them.

With regard to the charge that negotiations with Mr. Hays made progress and were well advanced, before I considered it proper or necessary to acquaint you with the facts, I have only to remind you that I thought it advisable at first, to retain in my hands the negotiations of this important subject, keeping the council constantly informed, until I referred the matter to a sub-committee, of which you were one.

Now, in the course of business, one can understand that, with the right hon. gentleman holding negotiations privately with skilful railway men, he would get so far committed and get the terms so far settled and in shape that his colleagues would be committed themselves, and it would be too late for them to take any real part in conducting negotiations properly and with due regard for the public service.

He says:

The plan which we have adopted for the construction of the line from Moncton to the Pacific coast, has been purposely selected so as to keep in the hands of the government the key to the transportation problem from the prairies to the ocean, and to leave to the initiative of a private company the section of country where energy and enterprise will be constantly required to meet the exigencies of an ever-changing situation.

The right hon. gentleman wants to keep in his own hands the direction of the traffic, and it would not have required much effort on his part to do that had he simply shown his colleagues the application of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company where they offered to hand the traffic over to the Intercolonial. That did not require very much skill, but it did require a great deal of skill to get in these Quebec lines and the bridge and other things. That did require skill, but it had not much to do with securing the traffic for Canada. Then, Mr. Blair goes on to say, and I call the attention of the House to these words because they are the words of the Railway Minister:

But, Sir, if I am capable of exercising any judgment on a matter of this kind, I am bound to say that if I had come to this parliament, and, with what little knowledge and experience I have had of railway questions, deliberately advised this parliament and this country that this was a scheme which merited their acceptance, I do not believe I should have been doing my duty to myself, and in not doing my duty to myself, I should not have been doing my duty to the party with which I am allied.

I do not know that a responsible minister, whether he be the leader or otherwise, could have more severe condemnation passed on his conduct than these words convey. The right hon. gentleman had a Cabinet minister there particularly charged with this railway business; he was the man selected by the government to administer the railways of the country, and he says he could not accept the terms which the right hon. gentleman himself had negotiated. I do not know that I need say much more on that point.

Now, with regard to the agreement made in 1903, I wish to inform the hon. gentlemen in this House who were not here in that year, that from early in the session until I think October the discussion of the Bill went on and every clause of it was minutely examined. I do not believe anything within the last twenty years has occupied so much of the time of parliament as that Bill of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in 1903. The result of it all was that the right hon. gentleman carried his Bill just as he wanted to. He had a large majority in this House and every member of his party voted straight all the time. I do not want to say they were subservient, but they certainly did obey the right hon. gentleman and went straight for the Bill, and it was impossible for us to get anything at all into that Bill that would have served the purpose that we had at heart, namely, to secure the traffic for Canadian lines and Canadian ports. That was the strong point we were fighting for, and the right hon. gentleman would not yield one inch to us. The result of the agreement made at that time was that while the government undertook what was perhaps the most difficult part of the whole line, that part from Winnipeg to Moncton, the Grand Trunk Pacific took only a portion of the part they were originally to construct, namely, that portion from the Pacific to Winnipeg. That portion of the road was divided into two sections, the Prairie section and the Mountain section. The government agreed to guarantee the bonds on the Prairie section to the extent of $13,000 per mile and on the Mountain section to the extent of $30,000 per mile. That was in clause 28 of the agreement, and it was a very simple clause indeed. The company issued the bonds and the Dominion guaranteed them. There was no implementing or undertaking that they would produce par or anything else. The proposition set out in section 28 was the proposition that was accepted by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. But, that agreement was subject to the approval of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk railway, and when in the spring of 1904 it was laid before them there was a good deal of discussion as to the cost of the mountain section. It had been at first assumed that it would cost about $45,000 per mile, and on that they were to get a guarantee of seventy-five per cent or $30,000 per mile. At the meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders in London, the President Sir Rivers Wilson, addressing the meeting, told them that upon the latest information the cost of construction would be not $45,000 per mile but $56,000 per mile. Other negotiations ensued and again Mr. Hays appeared here and informed the right hon. gentleman that he could not accept the conditions of the 1903 agreement, and he asked for several alterations. It will be observed throughout all this, at every stage of the discussion, that the Grand Trunk Pacific people never hesitated to ask for what they wanted, and the difficulty always seemed to be that the government would never ask for anything, and were only too willing to yield.

Then the agreement of 1904 was made, and we have a very good example of the right hon. gentleman's method when he introduced that agreement to the House. At page 715 'Hansard,' 1904, Sir Wilfrid Laurier is reported as saying: That the Grand Trunk Company had considered the conditions imposed on them by the agreement of 1903 too onerous, that they had made several requests, and that the government had agreed to certain modifications, to which he now asked parliament to consent. Now, remember gentlemen, he was introducing to the House a new agreement which contained all the altered provisions involving this loss of $10,000,000 and here is what he said about it:

> The modifications are not numerous, and I venture to say that our hon. friends opposite, when they saw the narrow extent of the concessions which we had agreed to, were surprised at the moderation of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the comparatively unimportant modifications which we were called upon to make. Not only were they surprised at the moderation of the concessions which we made, but I believe they were vexed, because it deprived them of a good deal of the thunder which they were prepared to fulminate here.

He treated it as the merest trifle. He went on:

> At all events, the proposition is before parliament and the time has now come to discuss it. I would suspect from the smiles which I see on the faces of my hon. friends opposite that to-day they are not quite satisfied. I suspect that they will have some fault finding even yet, but I have been so accustomed to that from these gentlemen, that anything which they may say will not surprise me now. I am not after all surprised, nor do I find much fault, if on this, as on every other occasion, it has not been found possible to satisfy the gentlemen on the opposition benches.

The right hon. gentleman then dealt with several of the clauses of the 1904 agreement not directly connected with the resolution now before the House, and, therefore, I pass them by at present.

Coming to the change made in section 28, which change was, of course, one of those which would surprise us as to the moderation of the Grand Trunk Company, and which would cause us to be vexed because it deprived us, the opposition, of a good deal of the thunder which we were prepared to fulminate, he proceeds to inform the House that the restriction of the guarantee to $30,000 per mile of the cost of construction of the Mountain section was removed, and that now the government undertook to guarantee 75 per cent of that cost whatever it might be. Then, too, he said the government undertook to implement the proceeds of the sales of the bonds, so as to make the amount actually going into the construction, 75 per cent of the total cost of construction.

So there was one modest little demand which was to vex us, the vile opposition of that day, from its very moderation. Let us see what it meant to Canada.

The president of the Grand Trunk, addressing his shareholders at a meeting a few weeks previously, had said, on the latest information, that the mountain section would cost for construction $56,000 a mile. Therefore the government knew that in removing the restriction of $30,000 per mile they were subjecting the country to a guarantee of $42,000 per mile, or an addition to our obligations on that section of $12,000 per mile, or for, say 500 miles, an increase of $6,000,000 with interest.

Having thus crushed us with such a trifling concession, the right hon. gentleman proceeded to lay before us another of his little arrangements, but this one, he admitted, in certain possibilities might cost the country a little more. He apparently had not at all realized how much was involved in omitting the restriction to $30,000 a mile.

Well, not content with removing the restriction of one guarantee to $30,000 a mile, he further undertook that the government should implement the guarantee so that the company should receive par for the bonds guaranteed as to both the Mountain and Prairie sections. That might, he admitted, cost us a little more. So far, as you see, it is costing us in round numbers about $10,000,000—and we must not forget that that money is gone forever —not recoverable—and there will be more to follow.

Now, let us see just where we stand as to this $10,000,000. The Finance Minister will of course borrow the $10,000,000 at interest, and hand it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific as a gift. But as we have guaranteed the bonds to the holders, then if the Grand Trunk Pacific fails to pay, we must pay that money again to the bondholders with interest. And under section 32 of the agreement, we must, for the first seven years from the date of the bonds guaranteed on the Mountain section, pay all the interest to the holders and have no recourse against the Grand Trunk Pacific. And, further, for the next three years, if we pay interest on those guaranteed bonds, we must accept re-payment from the Grand Trunk Pacific not in cash, but in 40 year bonds bearing interest. So that, about 47 years after the date of the bonds, we will get only the three years' interest back.

Now, there was something said by the right hon. gentleman as to their misunderstanding. There was no misunderstanding. The right hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that there was a question about the meaning of that clause. Does he suppose that if there had been a doubt raised on the side of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company as to its meaning, they would have failed to get it put beyond a question? All that he had to do was to say to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company: There seems to be a doubt as to the meaning of this implementing.

I had pointed out that if the bonds should not realize par, the government must bear the loss, without recourse; and so it would be wiser to require the company to issue additional guaranteed bonds for which the government would only be a surety. But the then Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) said in reply to me:

> I have no doubt the hon. gentleman's method would be the best, but I do not think he has any justification for assuming there is going to be a loss on the sale of the bonds. We all hope that the market will improve.

So they preferred to take the risk, and we had the right hon. gentleman and his ministers gambling on the stock market. The right hon. gentleman was inclined to admit that there might be a little more loss in dealing in their methods than there otherwise would have been. He used the expression: 'it might cost a little more.' That was just like the $14,000,000 Quebec bridge which we were told was likely to cost $2,000,000. The cost of everything undertaken by the late government was belittled. He knew perfectly well the risk they were taking, yet he would not ask the Grand Trunk railway to insert a few words in its agreement which would have made the meaning clear. The addition of ten words to that clause would have made its meaning clear beyond question, and every word inserted would have been worth a million dollars to the country.

As I have just made reference to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I think I ought to read to this House the very words he used in a celebrated statement. We have all heard discussed in the press and on the hustings the $13,000,000 prophecy of Mr. Fielding. He told us that all that railway from Moncton to the Pacific was going to cost Canada would be $13,833,356, and we could pay that out of one year's surplus. Let me read his words. They will be found in the fourth volume of 'Hansard' of 1902, page 3631, 26th May:—

> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Total present sum required to cover 7 years' interest (all other interest being paid by the company) on cost of eastern division.. .. .. .. | $10,655,562 |
> | Total present sum required to provide government portion of 7 years' interest (all other interest being paid by the company) on cost of mountain section, western division.. .. .. | 3,177,794 |
> | | $13,833,356 |
> 'That is to say, if out of our large surplus this year, we should set aside $13,833,356, it would provide for the full payment on the seven years' interest which is all the obligation that the government are to bear as respects the whole line from Moncton to the Pacific.'

You will observe that he absolutely ignored the obligation to make good the loss on the sale of bonds, which we then pointed out to him. He was satisfied the market was going to improve and we were not going to lose on the sale of these bonds, and we now have to pay $10,000,000 of a loss; he did not take that possibility into his calculation at all. He just figured out the interest, and told us that $13,833,356 would be the cost to the government of the whole line from Moncton. How many other items did he ignore?

I started out by saying that I would read the original proposal of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the late government. That will be found in volume 2 of 'Hansard', 1904. It is a very important document. It is a document which the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) received before this question came before parliament at all. It is a document that was never produced although time and again the opposition made formal motions in the House for the production of every paper relating to this undertaking. My right hon. friend the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and several other hon. gentlemen moved again and again for the papers. They called the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that we wanted every paper relating to the subject, and he assured us that the government had brought down every one. He was most emphatic. He made that statement so unequivocally that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), then in opposition withdrew his motion. The right hon. gentleman knew that my hon. friend withdrew his motion on the faith of that assurance. Well, that paper I now propose to read. I should add that when the right hon. gentleman was charged with unfairness, he said that it was a confidential paper, and he did not undertake to produce confidential papers. He called it at other times a confidential letter to himself. Well, here is the document:—

Confidential.

Montreal, Que., Nov. 3, 1902.

To the Right Honourable
Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., P.C.,
Premier of the Dominion of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—Your petitioners desire to memorialize your government in regard to the construction of a first-class line of railway from the northern terminus of the Grand Trunk railway, at, or near, North Bay, Ont., through to the Pacific coast, for the reasons and upon the conditions set forth:

1. That it is considered very desirable and in the public interest that there should be, without any unnecessary delay, a second transcontinental railway reaching from the Atlantic ocean to the Pacific ocean, in order that additional facilities may be provided for the large growing business of the Northwest, which might otherwise find its outlet through American channels.

2. That your petitioners propose, as soon as authorized by your government, to undertake the construction of such a line from North Bay, Ont. (or some other point north thereof, to be defined) to the Pacific coast, the terminus to be at or near Port Simpson, with all necessary branches along the route, to be designated.

3. That your petitioners, therefore, ask that their application for authority to construct such a line of railway, to be called the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, shall be granted.

That was, of course. a personal application to the right hon. gentleman, for a charter to construct this line.

4. That your petitioners will be prepared, immediately an agreement is entered into by the government, and the concessions hereinafter mentioned are sanctioned by an order in council, to place a corps of engineers in the field, both at the eastern and western ends and at other points on the projected line.

5. That the routes to be selected shall be submitted to and approved by the government, after proper surveys have been made.

6. That as soon as plans and routes are approved, work shall be commenced and the road shall be completed and in operation within a period of five years from the time the Act is in force.

If the government had passed this Act in 1903 these men were willing to undertake that by 1908 the line would be running throughout.

7. That all the work shall be subject to the inspection and approval of the chief engineer of the government.

8. That in order to provide for the connections with the Atlantic seaboard all the year round and through an all-British territory route, your petitioners will be prepared to enter into an arrangement with the government for an interchange of traffic, or other satisfactory agreement, with the Intercolonial railway at Montreal, or to consider such other proposal as the government may submit.

Will the right hon. gentleman say that that was not a material thing to be laid before parliament when we were discussing this measure? We were contending that under his arrangement it would be possible for the Grand Trunk Pacific railway to divert the traffic to Portland instead of going on to Halifax or St. John.

9. That your petitioners would have the advantage of all the eastern connections, in Ontario and Quebec, of the Grand Trunk railway, and by this means on the completion of the Transcontinental line there would be established and opened up a complete system from ocean to ocean.

10. That the conditions referred to in clause 4, upon which your petitioners would undertake the carrying out of the proposed work, may be set forth as follows:—

(a) That the Dominion government will grant a cash subsidy to your petitioners of $6,400 per mile of railway, and in addition 5,000 acres of land per mile.

(b) That the payment for the carriage of the mails shall be calculated on the same basis as provided for under the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

(c) That rails and materials of every kind used in the construction of the railway—if dutiable—shall be admitted free, if such material cannot be obtained in Canada upon equally favourable terms.

(d) That the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and all stations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenaces required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be for ever free from taxation by the Dominion or by any province hereafter to be established or by any municipal corporation therein; and the lands of the company in the Northwest Territories (until they are either sold or occupied) shall also be free from such taxation, for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

Your petitioners ask that your government will give the prayer of this petition their early and most earnest consideration.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

On behalf of the petitioners,

GEO. A. COX.
WM. WAINWRIGHT.
CHAS. M. HAYS,

At page 3705 'Hansard' 1904, the right hon. gentleman, in referring to this paper which I have just read, a most formal petition to him as Prime Minister to be laid before the government, said:

This confidential letter was in my own possession.

I have thus gone over the history of this transaction. I do not wish to discuss the question of the law; that has been settled by the highest court of the empire. If there was a doubt such as the hon. gentleman mentioned, when he was taking the advice of counsel as to what that meant, the simple way was to put it clearly in the agreement and settle the thing altogether. Why did he need to take advice afterwards and then injure, as he must have injured, the credit of this country by trying to get out of the legal obligation he had entered into? It was not creditable to the government of that day or to any government. The matter was clear, they were to make good the proceeds up to 75 per cent. Would it require a lawyer to say what that meant? It is more a question of business. The whole thing was brought to the attention of the minister in 1904, and all he had to do, as I said, was to have ten words added to the agreement and there would have been no trouble. It would not have made any difference because the right hon. gentleman intended to go on with it anyway. Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, was also determined to do it. The right hon. gentleman thought it was going to cost a little more. Mr. Fielding thought that my plan was the better one, but he had hopes that the price of bonds would improve in the market.

The right hon. gentleman made a point of this opening up new country to the north, and he said that some people thought it was too early, that it was premature. That is where the point arose of some people thinking the project was premature; they thought it was premature to go through the wilds of the north, but not that the construction of such a railway as the Grand Trunk proposed was premature, everybody agreed on that. What ought to have been done in or since 1904 was for the province of Quebec to do what Ontario is doing, build a railway up in to the territory to the north. They are doing that, and they will in that way open up and develop that northerly country. Quebec should have done the same thing in the country up to the north of the old settled portion of that province. The Dominion might have helped them if necessary, and after they had opened up and developed the country there so that we would have known positively what there was in that country, it would have been time to build the line east and west. Those people who said the project was premature in this respect were right, and I think the more we have seen of it the more we are convinced of that fact. But the right hon. gentleman preferred being poetic. He spoke of the roses that bloomed away up in the north, and he had other quotations. He prayed Heaven it was not too late, he must go ahead blindly without surveys or anything else, and, great as the loss has been as we now see on that western division, I very much fear that it is a trifle and will be a trifle compared with the exposures we may expect on the eastern division.

All that we are talking of to-day has nothing to do with the eastern division—the government is building that; and we have yet to learn what disclosures are in the right hon. gentleman's possession as to it.

I hope there are no more 'confidential letters,' no more private negotiations. I do not know whether there were any private negotiations about these bonds or in any other respect. But the right hon. gentleman certainly did an extraordinary thing. The Grand Trunk Railway company were allowed to sell these bonds in England. It mattered not to them whether the discount was 10 per cent or 20 per cent, because the government had to make good the loss, and he apparently put it in their power to sell as they pleased on the market. Of course, I do not mean to charge him or the company with dishonesty or any desire for dishonesty; but it was not businesslike of the right hon. gentleman to put that in their hands. It is true, there was a provision that the government should be consulted about the selling of these bonds. Have we ever heard anything as to these consultations and negotiations? If there were such, why have we not heard of them? The right hon. gentleman, so far as we know put the whole thing in the hands of a company that did not stand to lose one dollar whether the discount was 10 per cent or 20 per cent. I say it was a monstrous thing for any business government or any body of business men to put the country in that position.

Mr. OLIVER (Edmonton). I am sure the House is indebted to my hon. friend (Mr. Barker) for the information he has given in regard to the history of the Grand Trunk Pacific project. I do not know, however, that we can altogether appreciate what he is pleased to consider as the important features of that history. He has given us his recollections as to what took place, and his imaginings as to what may have taken place. May I trespass on the time of the House to say something about the same project from my point of view? First, let me say, there is no project so great that fault cannot be found with it in detail, and no project so good but some person can find something bad to say about it. So my hon. friend has given us the benefit of his knowledge as to transactions within the Cabinet, private and confidential communications, and a large number of other matters which may be of importance to him and to those who are of his type of mind; but to my understanding these matters are not of importance as compared with the great question of the establishment of a Transcontinental railway in this Dominion and the results that necessarily follow, and have followed, and are following, the construction of that railway. My hon. friend has told us that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company made a proposition to the government for the construction of the railway from Port Simpson to North Bay. And he has told the House that, in his estimation, the country would have been better served if that project had been accepted. For my part, I would take issue with him and say that the country, in my opinion, would not have been as well served as by the present project; and will give my hon. friend some reasons for my belief. If the building of this road has any purpose at all, that purpose is the development of the prairie provinces, it is to enable the further development of these provinces as wheat-growing areas and to provide means whereby the wheat grown in these provinces can reach the markets of the world by the most favourable route. I contend that the road from the prairies—say, from Winnipeg taking that as a starting point—to Montreal, by way of North Bay, is not, and cannot in the nature of things, be as favourable a proposition for the development of the western country as a road of less length direct to the city of Quebec. A road which cuts out two hundred miles of haul between the wheat fields and the market is the better of the two propositions. I think that will not be denied.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Not necessarily the best.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) denies it.

Mr. NORTHRUP. And will prove it.

Mr. OLIVER. That will be his privilege. In order that we may have no misunderstanding, let me re-state the proposition. By the Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Quebec, the prairie producer reaches the Liverpool market by 200 miles less haul than by the route by way of North Bay and Montreal. That is, it is a somewhat shorter distance by rail from Winnipeg to Quebec than by the present rail route from Winnipeg to Montreal by way of North Bay. And Quebec is approximately 200 miles nearer Liverpool than is Montreal. My point is, then, that the prairie producer reaches the Liverpool market by this route with nearly 200 miles less haul than by the route via North Bay and Montreal. And I say that is unquestionably the better proposition for the development of the prairie country. Now, as to the prairie country itself and the effect upon it of the construction of this railway. I will say nothing, or little, of the actual mileage of railway constructed. There is now railway communication from the head of the lakes to the summit of the Rocky mountains. There are branches from the main line throughout different parts of the prairie country. There is, everybody must admit, a necessity for greater railway communication in the prairies. Settlement could not have increased without that communication, and the results of settlement, that is production, the creation of wealth which has added so tremendously to the upbuilding of Canada, could not have taken place had not it been for the construction of that railway mileage. But the most important feature of the railway project is not in the mileage that has been constructed under the arrangement.

This Grand Trunk Pacific proposition was the effort of the government of Canada of that day to break the condition of railway monopoly which had up to that time prevailed throughout the whole of the prairie area from the Red River to the Rocky Mountains. It was that condition of railway monopoly which was the great deterrent to the progress and prosperity of the prairie country and there was no other way of securing the advancement of that country except by breaking that railway monopoly. The mere addition of the number of miles of railway that the Grand Trunk Pacific has constructed would have been a benefit, but it would not have been all the benefit that the construction of that mileage by an independent railway system would be, so that it would be essentially a competing system and I say the result could not have been achieved in any other way. The railway system that would compete with the railway system already occupying that territory would certainly have to be a substantial system. It would have to have strength behind it and the fact that the Grand Trunk and the government of Canada were behind it would be, in the minds of everybody, evidence that the Grand Trunk Pacific was able to compete with the Canadian Pacific and the result has been the progress and prosperity of that western country. In order to get right down to the finest point, let me explain to my hon. friends here just how this question of railway competition affected the development of that country. As long as there was only one railway system operating it was thoroughly understood that the man who desired to invest in that country was absolutely at the mercy of that railway system and, whether he invested in land, or in any industrial or commercial enterprise, he knew that, being absolutely at the mercy of that system, he was practically working for the railway rather than for himself, or, as it was usually phrased in that country, he was working on shares with the railway. Under such a condition capital could not be expected to invest in that country and capital did not invest. But, when the Grand Trunk Pacific project was launched, when it was known that the Grand Trunk was in the enterprise and that the government was behind the enterprise, when it was seen that the work was going on and was certain to continue, then, and not till then, Mr. Speaker, did the investing public have confidence in the west and from that date begins the era of prosperity that has spread over the west because of that project and that legislation.

As a result of the principle of competition introduced into that country there is not only the feeling of which I have spoken, a feeling of confidence resulting from the fact that every man knows to-day that he is not at the mercy of a single railway company, but the railway company that previously occupied that territory, that acted as though it owned it and believed that it did own it and everything in it, gives to-day a service throughout its whole system in the prairie country such as it never thought of giving until the principle of competition was introduced. To-day, as you travel over the prairie country, now that we have three competing systems, I will guarantee that you will get railway accommodation equal, or superior, to what you will get right here in this province of Ontario, because of the competition that was introduced into that country by the policy of the government in regard to this project of the Grand Trunk Pacific and in regard to the aid given to the Canadian Northern as well. It is true that this project has cost money, it is true that it has cost more money than it was expected to cost, and I am one to say that in my humble judgment it is immeasurably better for the country that the railway costs what it does than if it had cost only half as much. Let me explain why. The Grand Trunk Pacific line could have been laid from Winnipeg to the summit of the Rocky mountains for half the money that has been spent upon it. There is no doubt about that, but I say that it is to the interest of the producers of the country, it is in the interest of the principle of competition and it is to the credit of the government whose policy and project it was, that we have across those prairies a perfect line of railway that can haul freight, and give a service such as could not be given on a cheaply constructed line of railway, a line of railway that is not excelled in capacity by any line in the world. By reason of the character of that construction, by reason of the money that has been spent, by reason of the fact that to-day we are compelled to vote $10,000,000 in addition to aid already given towards the construction of the road, we have a standard of railway construction, and a standard of service in that country such as I have already said we have not got in this older, eastern part of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the road is better because the country is paying the $10,000,000, and not the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. OLIVER. I mean to say that the road cost that money or it could not have been as good a road. I mean to say that the money that this parliament is asked to vote has gone into the construction of the road, and that without that money the road could not have been as good as it is. Do I make my point clear? It is for the good of the country, it is for the benefit of the western country particularly that that amount of money has gone into the road and the parliament of Canada is not doing any injury to the country in paying that amount of money.

Mr. NORTHRUP. We did not think that they received the money. That is the reason for the Bill which we have now before us.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend will have his opportunity. I suppose I may say that the money has gone into the road, and this money has to be voted by parliament to recoup the company which put the money into the road. But, the road is there, it cost the money, and there is no question about that. Again, in regard to this eastern section of the road; I have heard it said time and time again that the government had broken faith with the country, because they had said that the total cost to the treasury of this whole proposition would be only $13,000,000.

It is pointed out that whereas it was expected that the eastern section could be built for $25,000 per mile, it has cost $50,000 or $60,000. Again I say it is immeasurably better for the west and for the east too, that the road does cost $60,000 per mile than if it cost $25,000 per mile. It would have been possible to build a road for $25,000 per mile from Winnipeg to Quebec, but such a road would not have been of serious value to Canada as a means of delivering the grain of the west to the ocean ports. The kind of railway that was the standard of construction in Canada, at the date this project was brought forward, would not have fulfilled the requirements of the country as will the road that is being constructed. To-day, with grain piled on the prairies, with millions of bushels of grain that will in all human probability, be destroyed because it cannot be carried forward, is it not of the last importance that the link of communication between the prairies and the seaboard shall be of such character that it shall carry the last pound and the last bushel it can possibly carry. Is not that economy, and is it not in the best interests of the country? I have had the privilege of travelling over some parts of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and while I am not an engineer, it was borne upon my mind very strongly how the cost of construction was multiplied by keeping the grades and curves down to a minimum. It is absolutely true that the road has cost from one-third to one-half more because it has been kept down to the minimum grade, but, just in proportion it is twice or three times as valuable to this country because that has been done.

I heard my hon. friend (Mr. Barker) say that no person in this House at the time the railway project was under consideration opposed it. Perhaps the gentlemen then opposite did not; I must say that I thought they did. My impression was that in the session of 1903, they said they would keep parliament here until the snow flew, and they did, rather than let the agreement pass. And, because of that delay in the passing of the agreement, and the depreciation in the money market that took place during that time, it became necessary to pass a supplemental agreement out of which arises the question of this ten million dollars. It is a matter of record that had my hon. friend and his friends agreed to that bargain when it was brought down, it would have been signed then and there by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and there would never have been the question raised that has been raised on the supplemental agreement that had to be brought forward during the second session. If there is blame in regard to this matter, my hon. friend (Mr. Barker) and his friends will have to carry the blame, on the historic facts of the case. In regard to this sum of money that must be paid, I have no doubt that the idea will be sent abroad that the people of Canada have been stuck to the tune of ten million dollars, because of some fault, or flaw, or mistake, on the part of the late government. That is not a fact. Parliament agreed absolutely in the session of 1904, to the amended arrangement whereby the Grand Trunk Pacific Company was to get seventy-five per cent. in proceeds of the cost of construction, up to $13,000 per mile, and the only question was, whether it should be in an additional issue of bonds or in cash. It seems to me, with all due respect to the opinion of my hon. friend (Mr. Barker), given at that time, that it was his business to differ from the government. The government took one position and he was bound to take the other. It did not make any difference what the government did, he was bound to oppose it, and to-day he comes along and claims credit for having done so. If the case had not been carried from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council, he would have been deprived of that credit, because the Supreme Court said he was wrong.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The higher court said he was right.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, on the off chance of having made a successful guess, my hon. friend (Mr. Barker) is entitled to consideration.

Mr. NORTHRUP. And the government made a wrong guess.

Mr. OLIVER. We will admit the government guessed wrong, but the point that I want to make is, that the money has gone into the construction of the railway, that the railway is worth the money, and that the country is not paying one cent more money than the parliament of Canada agreed to pay. We may be paying it in a different way, but we are paying this money for something we are getting. We are getting a good bargain, and the country, and particularly the western country, is getting ten times the value of the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific Prairie section. And, at this particular time, let me again just mention that if ever a government was justified in declaring on the introduction of that railway project, that there was no time to lose; if ever the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was warranted in saying: 'pray God it may not be too late,' it was in the case of the proposed construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, because to-day we have the knowledge that unfortunately it is too late, and dreadfully too late. I say that if the road from Winnipeg to Quebec were completed, as it might have been completed, were it not for the obstruction of my hon. friends in the session of 1903, the country would have been better off, judging by the conditions to-day, in the result of one year's transportation of crops than the whole sum mentioned in the present Bill amounts to. If to-day that road were completed from Winnipeg to Quebec, with the grades and curves and under the conditions under which it is built, that loss of wheat which is doing the country such stupendous damage would have been alleviated to a very large degree if it would not have been wiped out altogether, and our friends opposite would not be in the dilemma in which they are to-day of either going back on their principles or letting the grain spoil in the fields.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Mr. Speaker, the Finance Minister has raised the curtain on another act of that comedy, or to speak with perfect truth, that tragedy of errors, whose successive acts ever since the opening in 1902 have followed with wearisome regularity and painful monotony. It certainly is not a moral play, its best friends, if it has any outside the actors, and scene shifters, and box-office, would not say that the only interest in the play, outside the dazzling extravagance of the stageing, is in the fate of the actors, and the mystery that hangs round the future of the star actor, and the unhappy victims that have to finance the enterprise. Luckily, I believe, we must be coming to about the last act, for one cannot but notice that the actors other than the star have already vanished from the stage on which they have lagged superfluous far too long. The star actor is apparently pacing from one side to the other, calling the judgment of Heaven, or in other words, of the Privy Council, on the devoted heads of the Canadian people, whilst his faithful henchmen are urging him to seek a harbour of refuge in an alien port, which they are at the present time deliberately preparing for him.

Now, as I said, the curtain has been raised on what is apparently nearly the last act. Let us consider the position in which we are to-day. In my humble judgment there seems to be a complete misapprehension as to the judgment lately given by the Privy Council. I agree with every word that was said by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) this afternoon as to the duty of this House, the necessity with regard to the honour of the Canadian people, that we should bow to the judgment of the Privy Council. But one is so apt to be misunderstood, or even misrepresented, that I take the opportunity of saying that nobody, not even the magnates at the head of the Grand Trunk Pacific, bow more readily or humbly to that judgment than I do. But I do contend that there is an entire misapprehension as to the real meaning of that judgment, and so, like the hon. member for Hamilton, I shall certainly vote for this Bill because we think the government of this country should be placed in funds so that if it ever comes that, as honest and honourable men, representing an honourable country, we can fairly and properly be called on to pay $10,000,000, we should be in a position to do so. But I sincerely trust—and I regret the right hon. gentleman who leads the House is not in his place to hear my appeal—I sincerely trust it will be many a long day before the people of Canada will be victimized by paying the $10,000,000, which some people most wrongly have spoken of as a judgment against this country.

Now let us understand exactly the legal position in which we stand, bowing as I say, humbly and respectfully to the judgment of the Privy Council. It must be admitted that, by the judgment of the Privy Council, accepting their construction of that clause, the meaning is that Canada is to implement—if I must repeat that unhappy word which has cost us so much already—we must implement the guarantee of the bonds by paying in cash the amount which these bonds fall short. But supposing it were a covenant between the government and individuals. Supposing, instead of the government on the one hand and the Grand Trunk Pacific on the other, it was a case of a contract like that, and in order to make it perfectly plain, supposing it were a mortgage, or a covenant, between A and B, and B made default, I am willing to assume that Canada as represented by B made default, and that the mortgagee has a perfect right to call upon his mortgagor for payment, does it necessarily follow that the mortgagor must allow the judgment to go by default? Not at all. There may be a hundred defences he may have to his covenant, admitting that the covenant is there, and that, as a matter of strict legal interpretation, he is liable to the amount called for by the company. Let me illustrate. Supposing A has covenanted with B for $10,000 on a mortgage; B could say it is perfectly true, it is my covenant, and under that covenant I owe you $10,000, but you and I had a deal together in north west lands, and the result was that you have in your hands to-day $15,000 of my money, the result of our speculations in northwest lands. If B could prove that in his defence, does anybody pretend that a court would give judgment against him for $10,000? Far from it. The court would take the account between the two parties, and assuming that A owed the $10,000, if B owed him $15,000, then, by subtracting the 10 from the 15, the amount of the judgment for B against A would be $5,000. That is the view I take of the position at the present time. I think we are amply entitled to say to the Grand Trunk Pacific: We have had dealings with you, and we claim that whatever the ultimate result of examining the accounts may be, before we pay you this $10,000,000 or $5,000,000, we will have an accounting between us, and if we owe you money we will pay it. But if on examining the accounts it is found that we don't owe you the money, and you owe us more money than we owe you, pardon us if we decline to pay you the $10,000,000. Now let me illustrate this by a further case. Let it be understood that I am not venturing to say that, when the accounts are taken, they will turn out one way or the other; but I do say that from one end of this country to the other there is hardly a man but honestly believes that all the dealings on the part of the government with the Grand Trunk Pacific have been such that it would not be idle or useless for the government to set up a counter claim against them. Supposing the government were to say to the Grand Trunk Pacific: It is true, under this covenant, you were entitled to $10,000,000, because we agreed to guarantee the bonds up to 75 per cent of the cost, and then to implement the balance. The bonds sold on the average at 85, some for 90 and some for 80, but on the average 85; supposing that the Grand Trunk Pacific deliberately sold those bonds at a lower figure than they could obtain in the market, the government is entitled to have the accounts investigated to see whether those bonds realized the total amount they should have realized. In order to illustrate the point again, suppose it turned out that a higher figure could have been obtained, but through the negligence or something worse of the Grand Trunk Pacific, through the dishonesty of some body, those bonds were sold for a lower figure than they should have brought in the market, that surely is a fair matter to be taken into consideration in estimating the counter claims the people have against the Grand Trunk Pacific. Again, when we guarantee the bonds for 75 per cent of the cost of the road, what is the meaning of the cost of the road? I do not know what the cost of that road is, and I do not think any man in this House or for that matter in the country, knows what the legitimate cost of that road is. But to illustrate the point again, assuming that we guaranteed bonds for $100,000,000, and they were sold at an average of 85, $85,000,000 would be the amount realized on the bonds, on the nominal sum of $100,000,000. In that case, on the face of it, this country would be liable for the shortage of $15,000,000, because that is the amount that is required to complete this road. But supposing that the Grand Trunk Pacific had formed subsidiary companies, supposing that the very men at the head of the Grand Trunk Pacific had formed a subsidiary company, and had given the contract to themselves; supposing these contracts were so outrageously exorbitant that they sublet those contracts to others and, without turning over their hands, raked in millions of money on those contracts, so that instead of the road costing $100,000,000, as was our supposition, it cost only $75,000,000 or $80,000,000, it is perfectly clear that instead of this country being liable to the Grand Trunk Pacific for the difference between what the bonds realized and the alleged cost of the road, the Grand Trunk Pacific would be liable to this country and would have to make good the guarantee on the bonds over what the road actually and honestly cost.

Then there is a question about interest. I shall not speak very positively about that because so many statutes have been passed that it is very possible, and I think not unlikely, from my perusal of these statutes, that the Grand Trunk Pacific may have hoodwinked the government and succeeded in covering up the weakness that otherwise would have existed in the original contract as far as they were concerned. Under the original contract the interest was to be capitalized at the end of the year, and would be a fair amount to be added to the cost of construction under the statute. But the road was not constructed within the five years specified, it has gone on year after year and, instead of being completed in 1908, it will not likely be completed until 1914 or 1915. Heaven knows when it will be completed. But all this time that interest has been accumulated and has been bonded, and the government is asked to endorse bonds for the amount of that interest as a part of the cost of construction. Unless that point is covered by some of these statutes, and I hope that the government will look into these statutes and see if it is, I would say that the government are entitled to set up as a set-off or counter claim against the $10,000,000 the claim that the Grand Trunk Pacific agreed to finish construction in 1908, that the government agreed to pay as part of the cost of construction the interest on the advances capitalized each year, and that if the Grand Trunk Pacific have taken an extra five or six years to complete the construction and therefore the bonds are so much more than they would have been had the agreement been lived up to, then the government have a counter claim against the Grand Trunk Pacific for the amount of bonds on interest account that have been necessitated by the negligence or failure of the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry out its contract. There are other offsets or counter claims that might be raised. I am not prepared to go into all of them to-night. I am giving this as a sample case, which I hope the government will consider and find out if under the circumstances it is not only possible but altogether probable that when the accounts are honestly and fairly taken between the Grand Trunk Pacific and this government, it will be found that instead of the government owing the company $10,000,000, as appears on the face of the matter, the company owe the government a good many millions.

As an illustration of the way these matters have been carried on—and I do not think this would be a defence to this contract, but I think it would be a splendid justification for declining a further loan—I will take the loan of $10,000,000 made a short time ago to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. We know that that went to pay for the rolling stock, for the purchase of which it was said the Grand Trunk Railway Company had advanced money to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, millions of dollars advanced by the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific to purchase rolling stock, when the Grand Trunk Pacific had not a foot of rail to run it on, or a locomotive to draw it, and every man in Ontario knows that in travelling through that province at every siding on the Grand Trunk railway one sees dozens of cars with Grand Trunk Pacific on them, used for the purposes of the Grand Trunk railway. If this government loaned money to the Grand Trunk Pacific for the legitimate purposes of that road and if the Grand Trunk Pacific, managed by the same men who manage the Grand Trunk railway, chose to take that money and buy rolling stock which was absolutely useless to them, and let the Grand Trunk Railway Company run that rolling stock (which certainly is not like wine and would not improve with age), then if an application were made for a further loan, and I believe that this Bill is to be followed by such an application, we would be amply justified in looking into that whole matter and saying we want an accounting as to this before we again consider a loan.

Then take the case of townsites in the west. Is it not a matter of notoriety that the Grand Trunk Pacific, after obtaining their townsites practically for nothing, formed companies which have disposed of these townsites at enormous profits? I am not saying that there was anything illegal or criminal about that but I do say that if the Grand Trunk Pacific comes back to this House and asks for a loan in order to enable it to carry out a great national undertaking, we are surely justified in saying: What did you do with the townsites? Have you given all these to your friends? If you have not, you will not require this loan, and if you have given them to your friends you had better get the loan from your friends and not from us. I was surprised when I came to look into this matter, to gather together the various statutes that have been passed by this House in connection with this unhappy enterprise of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this afternoon spoke of this as a project which everybody in Canada approved of. I want to now and here express my dissent from that statement, and to say that in 1903 and in 1904 and from that day to this, I have entirely disapproved of that proposition and speaking with all sincerity I do not believe that a similar proposition has been presented to any civilized land since the days of Ali Baba and the forty thieves. I have here the various statutes which this House has passed in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that members on this side of the House perhaps neglected their duties by not being always present and carefully perusing every word of these statutes. It may be some excuse when I say that I have here fifteen statutes in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Townsites Company, passed since 1903. I would like any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, and I throw out the challenge now, to point to one single statute of these fifteen that was passed in the interests of the people of Canada. Application after application has come in with wearisome regularity—and I think that expression is justified when I say that I have here fifteen statutes passed in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and its Townsites Company—and not one of these statutes has been passed in the interests of the people of Canada.

This afternoon we heard something about the inception and history of this railway, I do not intend to endeavour to cover the ground which has been covered by my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) much more ably than I could cover it. But I wish to lay before you a few salient points. In the first place an application was made by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to the government of this country, addressed to the Premier, for permission to build a road from North Bay to the Pacific coast and giving the terms on which they would build it. I think myself, to be perfectly frank, the terms were rather impudent, but I do not for a moment believe that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company ever thought the government would give them 100 per cent of what they asked and, therefore, they asked for a great deal more than they expected to receive so that on a fair, reasonable compromise they might perhaps get all that they dared to hope for. This House considered this matter in 1903. Perhaps the most vital point in the whole problem was what was to be done with the freight when it reached Montreal. This House, with the exception of the Prime Minister and possibly his colleagues, if he showed them this petition, were in absolute ignorance as to the contents of the petition of November, 1902, signed by Messrs. Cox, Hays and Wainwright, so that throughout the whole discussion, until the 26th of October, only the Prime Minister and his colleagues were able to consider intelligently the position of the case. Those of us who were in the House at the time know that when we came to Ottawa we had the application of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to build a road to North Bay and we know that certain negotiations took place and the result of these negotiations was that a railway was contracted to be built from Moncton to the Pacific coast which, I venture to say, not one single man in Canada wanted built. My hon. friends opposite say that I am speaking recklessly, but I am speaking with knowledge of what occurred in 1903, and I say that there was not a man in Canada from the Premier down who wanted the wretched system that was unfortunately for some reason adopted by the government of the day. The Grand Trunk railway did not want it, I do not suppose that anybody will say that Mr. Hays and his colleagues are men of such stupidity that they do not know what they want. And they put very clearly and particularly what they did want. Now the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific wanted a road from North Bay to the Pacific coast. But they could not get it; they were held up by the government. As the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), told us—and I have 'Hansard' here to prove it if necessary—the government imposed upon the Grand Trunk the building of this subsequent line. How did they do it? Those hon. members who were here in 1903, will recollect that when we met in the committee to consider the application of the Grand Trunk railway, we were held up in a mysterious way. Suddenly the route was changed, so that it was to run to Quebec and not to North Bay. The Grand Trunk railway did not want to run to Quebec; if they had wanted it, they would have put in their application to that effect. But as the hon. minister of that day put it, the Grand Trunk railway had imposed upon them the building of a road from Quebec to the Pacific coast. And the Prime Minister of that day must have wanted the road from the Pacific to Quebec, or he would not have insisted on that change in the order. But, in compliance with that insistence the change was made. Well, why was not the road built to Quebec? Is there a man here who does not know why it was not built to Quebec? When the right hon. gentleman came down with all the influence of the government to propose the building of the road from Quebec to the Pacific, his supporters from Eastern Quebec and the maritime provinces declined to support the Bill. They said if it was going as far as Quebec, it must go to the sea. And, after a wearisome discussion, the government was obliged to concede what was demanded, and agreed to run the road—from where? From Halifax? From St. John? No, the government had not the courage for that. The declaration was that the road was to run from sea to sea, and that was the stipulation. But the difficulty was that, running the line down to the sea, they had to choose a terminus on the sea. If the government road were run to Halifax, the government would lose the support of the New Brunswick members, and if it ran to St. John it would lose the support of the Nova Scotia members, who were very numerous on that side at that time. And, because they dared not go to Halifax and dared not go to St. John, they stultified themselves; they made their followers, after voting for a road from sea to sea, then humbly vote that a road running from Moncton to Port Simpson was a road from sea to sea. There is hardly a schoolboy who has not a better conception of the geography of the country than had the right hon. gentleman in forcing that through—a road from sea to sea, with one terminus at Moncton.

That was the first stage of this Bill. We were told this afternoon that if the Bill had not been held up by the opposition everything would have been lovely and the road would have been completed years ago. There was no proof of that. The fact is the Grand Trunk Pacific people had agreed to accept this, but they realized the influence they had over the government, that the government was committed to them, that the government had become partners with them in the line. I do not wish to take the time to prove the statements I make, but if anybody contradicts me, I have 'Hansard' here to prove that Mr. Hays, Lord Welby, one of the directors, and Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, the president, in their messages and addresses to the board of directors and in their letters to the Prime Minister of that time, said specifically and unequivocally that they were partners with the government of Canada in building this road. I think we cannot afford to forget the statements made by the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific authorities in letters which were brought down by the government of the day, without repudiation or contradiction, that on that side of the water and when appealing to their shareholders, they declared: We are partners with the government of Canada, in this road we are building.

Now, if they were partners with the government in this work that fact may afford us some light on some of the proceedings in this House. When we come to the clause already before us altering the original arrangement, we can understand the difficulties in which the government stood, being partners of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We heard something else this afternoon from the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and from the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as to the position of the government and the legal advice they took with regard to this clause. But the legal advice they took was in 1908 and this clause was passed in 1904. Would it not have been the part of reason and wisdom in the government to take advice when they were passing the clause? I have 'Hansard' here which will show that my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Barker) told this House exactly what the effect of the clause would be. The Minister of Finance agreed with him, and in 'Hansard', 1904, and at pages 3634 and 2430—I will not take time to read them unless any hon. member doubts that I am quoting correctly—we have the Minister of Finance agreeing with my hon. friend from East Hamilton. When the implementing of the guarantee was spoken of, it was stated that it could be done in one of three ways, and the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister agreed. You could issue bonds for a high rate of interest so that they would produce par. Or, if you wished to issue them at a lower rate, you could issue more bonds guaranteed by the government to make up the difference, or you could pay cash. And they all agreed that the payment of cash was the most objectionable way. The Minister of Finance said in his remarks that it had been agreed in this discussion that the issue of additional bonds guaranteed by the government was the wisest course. We had the member for Annapolis of that time discussing the matter, and he, in the presence of the minister, stated clearly and squarely that of course the only way was to guarantee additional bonds. Thus, though there were three possible ways of doing it at that time, will anybody tell me why such peculiar phraseology was used as is used here, when half-a-dozen English words would have made it clear that what they intended to do was to issue additional bonds? While I do not intend to say a word against the judgment of the Privy Council, and while I know very well that it is contrary to the law of evidence that they could be guided by the statements made in this House, yet, when we come down to the question of equity as between the parties to the contract, we find that these Grand Trunk Pacific magnates sat still when the representatives of the people were told by their partners that this meant that we were to guarantee additional bonds. But a little later, when it was too late for the government by any legal device to escape the dilemma in which they were placed, then their partners come forward and say: 'It is true there were three ways in which the word "implement" could be applied, and that one was the issue of additional bonds at a high rate of interest;' but you cannot do that, because second mortgage bonds have been issued, and it would not be fair—and no doubt they were right in that—after issuing second mortgage bonds —to issue new bonds to go ahead of them. And you cannot issue more bonds for the same reason. So, when it came before the Privy Council, they did not pretend to say that in 1904 the meaning of these words was necessarily what it is, but two ways of applying the word 'implement' have been eliminated by the action of the government, and so they say there is direct liability and you must pay the cash. I suggested a short time ago that there might be a counter claim. If the government, on looking into the matter—and I don't pretend to say but that it is their duty to look into it—and if they find that the bonds were not sold for the highest price that could have been got, surely we should be entitled to claim a set-off against the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent to which the bonds were sold at a rate below that which was obtainable. I desire to call attention to a significant fact which does not affect this case except as the principle of good faith comes in.

Here we find the government of this country with its credit guaranteeing bonds for the Grand Trunk Pacific and they are selling at 80. We find the Grand Trunk which never pays any dividend upon its ordinary stock also guaranteeing bonds for the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the bonds guaranteed by the government of Canada sell at 80, while the bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk sell at about par. Is that a subject of congratulation to the members of this House? Does it not rather cause one to wonder what business acumen there was behind this proposition when we see government guaranteed bonds going at 80 and Grand Trunk guaranteed bonds going at par? The former being at 3 and the latter at 4 per cent.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will the hon. gentleman give us the dates at which these bonds were sold?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I have the papers in my hand, and I will give it before I sit down. I see it is London, January 31.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I am referring to the fact that the market quotations differed on different dates.

Mr. NORTHRUP. This is the market in London, on the 31st January, 1912.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Has my hon. friend the dates at which the bonds of the Grand Trunk and of the government were sold and also the rate of interest?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I thank the hon. gentleman for his inquiry. I think it shows how some hon. gentlemen view questions of this kind. I was careful to state expressly before the hon. gentleman rose, that one bond paid 3 per cent. and the other paid 4. The point is, and I stated it expressly, that the Grand Trunk Company had a great deal more shrewdness than the ministers of the Crown because the ministers of the Crown had not the shrewdness to insist that their bonds should be issued at 4 per cent. and if that had been done they would have not only gone at par, but they would have gone above par. If the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to pay interest on its bonds, why should the interest on the bonds not have been put at a figure that would bring par? These bonds were issued practically simultaneously. Formerly the government bonds represented the first mortgage and the Grand Trunk the second, but now the Grand Trunk is in many respects the first, and in no respect the second, owing to the very material changes made in the Act in 1904. When we find these Grand Trunk bonds going at par, the Grand Trunk are not to be called upon to put up any more for the guarantee of these bonds and if the road is a success, there is no pecuniary responsibility on the part of the Grand Trunk, but, the unfortunate country, if the road is the biggest success in the world, under this bargain made by the ministers of the Crown, has to pay $10,000,000 which the representatives of the people were told it was not the intention to pay. Here then is the result and I think we are justified in saying that there was every warrant for the statement by gentlemen named before, that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the government were partners in this enterprise. But, there is another reason why one has to consider these matters. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) made a statement this afternoon to the effect that the more the road cost the better. I admire his acument. I do not differ in the slightest from his conclusion, looking at it from his standpoint. There is not the slightest doubt in the world that if the Grand Trunk Pacific could have been made to cost a thousand million dollars, it would have been all the better from a certain standpoint. It is quite evident that the hon. gentleman has been whiling away his time in the recess, by reading the records of the Ontario courts because those records embody the history of one O'Gorman. That man was the purchasing agent for the company known as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and he was convicted because, as purchasing agent of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, he went around to parties from whom he had purchased goods and after the contract had been made said: There is to be a rake-off of 15, 20 or 25 per cent to the government. That is the reason that the cost is as high as it is. But, he ran across an honest firm in Toronto who declined to pay the money, the facts came out and the gentleman was convicted. I have never yet heard, although I have inquired in different quarters, that this trifling conviction in any way impaired his usefulness as purchasing agent of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I suppose that is because the government of the day and the Grand Trunk Pacific were partners in this great enterprise.

In his speech the hon. member for Edmonton also told us with great unction that the proposed road would be 200 miles shorter than some other road, and my hon. friend laid the law and the gospel down distinctly and unhesitatingly that if the road was 200 miles shorter than any other road it would be more desirable to the country. Is it any wonder that we have such a wretched, accursed contract weighing down the people as that which we have with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and which the ministers of the Crown never intended in 1903 and 1904, but which the judgment of the Privy Council has shown to exist, when we have an ex-minister of the Crown who would dare to stand up in this House—I should not say 'dare' because the hon. gentleman spoke with absolute honesty—and make the statement that as long as the road is 200 miles shorter it must be a better road? It never seemed to enter his mind that curves, gradients and the cost of the traffic might make one road more expensive to operate than another, that one road might run through a thickly peopled country and the other through a wilderness, or that it would necessarily follow that people being at one end of the road and desiring to ship their grain to the other end could not ship it more cheaply by sending it through the wilderness than through the thickly peopled country. Did it ever enter his mind that if the curves and gradients on one road were almost such as to make the road utterly impassable, it would mean that that road was not in as good a position as the other, notwithstanding the fact that it might be 200 miles shorter? That never entered the mind of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. I would be too just to the hon. member for Edmonton and to the right hon. leader of the opposition, I would be too just to their supporters who voted for these measures, to believe that they understood the law or the facts of the case when it is laid down by an ex-minister of the Crown, that 200 miles difference in length was the only question, irrespective of cost. I would have believed that the great problem which confronted them was to get light curves, a low gradient and good materials as cheaply as possible. But it never entered the mind of the hon. member for Edmonton that cheapness was any factor. If you can shorten the line, he tells us, the more it costs the better. Does he mean that the more it costs the less they can carry freight at, and the less people there are in the country through which it passes, the fewer there will be to interfere with the traffic? Let us take the case presented by the hon. member for Edmonton, who says that wheat is rotting on the ground because we have not this outlet for it. Why have we not this outlet? Because the hon. gentlemen opposite refused to agree to the proposition of the Grand Trunk when they appeared before them in 1903 and asked for authority to construct a road to be completed in 1908 through to North Bay, where there was a line which would take the grain to Montreal, and where they guaranteed to hand it over to the Intercolonial railway, the government road. We would have had that road some years ago had these hon. gentlemen yielded to the suggestion and to the motions made by the opposition in the House in 1903 when this important question was before the House.

Now, Sir, it is a matter of the utmost importance that we should understand exactly with whom we are dealing. The Grand Trunk Pacific is, of course, a road under the control of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I presume there will be no particular doubt on that matter. Then, the Grand Trunk magnates controlling the Grand Trunk Pacific, I presume, will deal with the Grand Trunk in the way they have been accustomed to deal with the people of this country. I am not here to make any attack on any individuals, but I am here as a Canadian, sincerely and honestly believing—I may be wrong in my belief, we are all liable to error, but no member of this House ever spoke with more sincerity than I speak now—that one of the greatest dangers to the unity of the empire is the conduct of the directors of the Grand Trunk and of the Grand Trunk Pacific. One can go up and down this country from one end to the other and the denunciations one hears from the man in the street of the conduct of the magnates of these two roads, conduct which extends to the directors in the mother country, are such as to make you shudder at the dissatisfaction which it has excited.

Why; because, after all, you are never going to have true unity between Canada and the motherland, except on the ground of mutual respect. Now, if the magnates of the Grand Trunk—the greatest road we have in Canada under old country management—allow that sort of thing to be said and done by their managers in this country; if they allow the people of this country to be hoodwinked, as was the case in 1894, by their managers, sitting quietly by and allowing the representatives of the people to be told what the meaning of this clause was, and saying not a word to correct these false statements, so that there is now only one contingency left for this country, and that is to pay ten million dollars, you cannot be surprised if the ordinary Canadian begins to suspect that that is not the kind of fair business dealing they ought to expect from the people in the motherland. The result of that kind of thing is, not what those who like myself desire to see the unity of the empire preserved, can approve. It is only a year or two ago that the name of the general manager of the Grand Trunk and the president of the Grand Trunk Pacific was brought before this House in connection with a telegram sent to him by the then acting Premier of this country. We had a strike on the Grand Trunk and Sir Richard Cartwright, the acting Premier, sent the telegrams to practically every collector of customs in Ontario asking for a report on the state of the strike. He also sent a telegram to Mr. Hays, of the Grand Trunk, asking what could be done about the strike, and the answer came back from Mr. Hays, there was no strike, it was over, all the company wanted was protection for their property. And, at the same time, practically every collector of customs in the province of Ontario sent telegrams to Ottawa describing the fact that trade was paralyzed, that trains were at a standstill, that factories were closing for want of raw material, that merchants were losing their money through being unable to obtain goods to carry on their business. I am not going to say where the truth was, but it would not be a bad idea for the present government to investigate whether or not there was collusion between all the collectors of customs in this country to tell one story, or whether there was something wrong with Mr. Hays when he told his story. Then, at the termination of that strike an agreement was made by the Grand Trunk with two ministers of the Crown, that all the men, except certain ones who were specified, would be returned to their places within ninety days. These men were not returned to their places, and the only answer that the railway magnates designed to give was that the Grand Trunk had a right to employ such men as it saw fit to discharge the duties of its service. That of course is perfectly true as an abstract proposition, but it is somewhat irrelevant, and, may I say it is contemptuously impudent as an answer to the promise that the Grand Trunk would return the men to their places within ninety days. I would not pretend to give in my own words the records of some of the acts of the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, but surely I cannot be astray if I read the judgment given by one of our courts in Ontario; the judgment of a judge whom every one will admit is perhaps the most popular judge with the people of Canada, a man whose unswerving integrity, whose great ability, and boundless courage, has made him a bulwark, as the people of this country think to defend them from the aggression of some railway corporations. I refer to a judgment given by hon. Mr. Mabee, in a case brought before him, in which the Grand Trunk Pacific—I will use his own words:

The Grand Trunk Pacific, in fixing its location plan which was approved by the Board, located on lot 882 station grounds. That was approved showing stations grounds.

Later on, it entered into negotiations with the then owner of lot 882 and some considerable correspondence has taken place between them, to all of which it is not necessary to refer.

The judgment then goes on to give the facts, it is not necessary to read them, but I quote the following from the judgment itself:

It is now suggested that all they were dealing about was sufficient land to put a siding in. It is idle to say, in the light of this correspondence, that there was no other object in view except the getting of enough ground for station purposes; whoever would think of locating a townsite at a siding without any station facilities?

Apparently the railway company was unable to get from the owner of the property a conveyance, as they were requesting, of a half interest in the land for a townsite.

There is this patriotic road holding up this man. Then the judgment goes on to say:

It seems to me that this man with whom this contract was made and whose lands the railway company obtained for the location of a station on lot 882 is in no way proceeding with haste when he discovers that the company in effect repudiate their agreement and are advertising the lands for sale in a townsite in competition with what I presume he is trying to exploit on lot 882, and on which they promise the public that a station will be built in the spring of 1912, within three or four months.

Now, it is perfectly apparent that there is only one thing to be done in this case. This company has got to carry out its agreement. It is a public scandal that a railway corporation should go about the country and obtain conveyances of this kind under false pretences.

If a private individual had done what this company through its officials have done, he would probably be landed in the penitentiary. At any rate he ought to be in the penitentiary. The land was obtained through the grossest deceit on the part of the representatives of this company and it is a breach of faith of the worst character that they should attempt to repudiate their contract. It is true that the time is not yet ripe for the construction of a station. The road is not built. It is not yet ready to open for traffic, but an order may go requiring the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to construct and have ready for use by the public a station, the plans to be filed and approved by the Board's engineer, on lot 882, where it was intended originally to construct it. That station must be ready for operation at least as soon as the road is open for traffic.

An order may also go refusing the application that was filed with the Board on the 11th of December for the location of station grounds and a station on lot 851, and restraining the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company from the location of a station at that point. It is out of line with what they originally intended to do, done with bad motives, and it is done in violation of their solemn contract with the predecessor of Kelly in title.

Now, Sir, in quoting that language, I am not giving my own opinion, but the judgment of a judge, one of the principal judges in Canada, the Chief of the Railway Commission. My whole appeal now is that the country should not pay over this ten millions without investigation. Let us investigate first and pay, if necessary, afterwards, and not pay first and investigate afterwards. I think the wisest course for us is to investigate first. I have called attention to the action of the Grand Trunk Pacific magnates. It may seem to be going out of the way to attack an individual, but this whole country is concerned in what this individual is doing. Reputation will tell, and if a man is found under certain circumstances suspiciously situated, his reputation will help him out, or it may ruin him entirely. Having said this much as to the way the country has been treated in the past, let me remind the House for a moment of two clauses in the contract. I presume I would not be wasting the time of the House if I were for a moment or two to refer to the fact that this was to be a Canadian road. It is so stated in the preamble of the first Bill, Chapter 91, 1903, and in the agreement made on the 29th of July, 1903, between His Majesty the King and Sir Rivers Wilson and other representatives of the Grand Trunk I find the following clause:

Whereas, having regard to the growth of population and the rapid development of the production and trade of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, and to the great area of fertile and productive land in all the provinces and territories as yet without railway facilities, and to the rapidly expanding trade and commerce of the Dominion, it is in the interest of Canada that a line of railway, designed to secure the most direct and economical interchange of traffic between eastern Canada and the provinces and territories west of the Great Lakes, to open up and develop, the northern zone of the Dominion, to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada and to develop commerce through Canadian ports, should be constructed and operated as a common railway highway across the Dominion from ocean to ocean and wholly within Canadian territory.

Clauses 42 and 43 of the contract also referred to the fact that it was to be a thoroughly Canadian road from ocean to ocean, with Canadian ports, and this is the ground upon which the government assisted the railway.

I think I need not occupy any more time to establish my chief proposition, that every dollar that this country has given to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway—and Heaven knows it has given mighty sums, and apparently will have to give mighty sums more—is based on an agreement that it was to be a thoroughly Canadian road, running from ocean to ocean wholly on Canadian soil, for the benefit of our inland commerce and our ocean ports.

I noticed in the month of August last that in the state of Massachusetts a railway charter was granted to some gentlemen, and I will read the names of the lucky men. I have here a copy of the charter, which is certified under the seal of the Commonwealth, so that for all practical purposes it is as good as the original. It reads thus:

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Be it known that whereas Charles M. Hays, Earl H. Fitzhugh, Ezra H. Baker——

And a number of other names unknown to me, which I will not read—and the Grand Trunk Railway Company —have associated themselves with the intention of forming a corporation under the name of Southern New England Railroad Corporation for the purpose of locating, constructing, maintaining and operating a railroad.

And they get their charter to build a railway through certain places in the state of Massachusetts. Now, there is at the present time a Bill before the House of Representatives of the state of Massachusetts, a copy of which I hold in my hand, entitled an Act to enlarge and extend the corporate powers of the Southern New England Railway Corporation, and, without going into details, I may say that this Bill gives them the right to build a number of branch lines, among them one into Boston. It also authorizes the company to increase its capital stock to $10,000,000 and to issue bonds to twice the amount of the capital stock actually paid in. So that these gentlemen, who are so hard up that they are coming to us for a loan of $10,000,000 to enable them to complete this road, are applying for power to increase the capital stock of this Southern New England Railway Corporation, for which they have obtained a charter, and to bond it to twice the amount of the capital stock paid in. Now, what is this road for? I confess that it is a mystery to me why our Canadian papers have not apparently been aware of what has been so frequently and conspicuously published in the Boston papers. I have here a file of the Boston papers, representing every paper published in Boston, and those papers for weeks and months past, day after day, have been full of this new enterprise to make Boston the Atlantic terminus of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I will not ask the House to take my word for this; I will read from some of these papers. But before doing so, let me say that the Senate of the state of Massachusetts has referred to a committee, which is to report not later than March 30, a number of questions which will enable the Senate to decide how far the Grand Trunk Pacific Company intends to make Boston its main port, and what advantage it might be to the Commonwealth to acquire the property of any or all of the railways entering the city of Boston, and issuing bonds, &c., for that purpose. Let us see what the Boston papers themselves are saying about these matters. The Boston 'Globe' of the 17th of January, 1912, says:

Plans of the Grand Trunk—Advantages offered to New England—Direct Rail Connection with Canadian Grain Country—Four Days from Boston to the Pacific.

Plans for bringing to the attention of the Massachusetts legislature the advantages to the state through the proposed extension of the lines of the Grand Trunk-Central Vermont system to Boston and Worcester are well under way.

E. H. Fitzhugh, president of the Central Vermont railroad and the recently chartered Southern New England railroad, and one of the chief assistants to Charles M. Hays, the American president of the Canadian Transcontinental railroad, came to Boston yesterday to meet the attorneys who will conduct the legislative hearings on the petition of the Southern New England railroad.

President Fitzhugh was in consultation yesterday afternoon and evening with lawyers, engineers and officers of the Central Vermont, who have been collecting the details concerning the proposed new line, which are to be submitted to the Committee on Railroads of the Legislature.

From the attitude of President Fitzhugh it is evident that President Hays is serious in his intention to build the line from Worcester, Vt., across New Hampshire and Massachusetts to Boston, to construct the branch from Boston to Blackstone and the cross-country road from Douglas to Worcester as quickly as possible.

President Hays and President Fitzhugh are anxious that the railroads to Boston, Providence and Worcester be completed and ready for occupation by the time the last spike is driven on the Grand Trunk Pacific, now under construction from Moncton, N.B., to Prince Rupert, B.C. Hundreds of miles east and west of Winnipeg are ready for operation, but it may be a couple of years before the long road across the continent is finished.

During this period of construction the Grand Trunk wishes to build the 130 miles or so that separate the Central Vermont at Windsor from a Boston terminal, in order that Boston may be one of the terminals of the railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The purpose of the Southern New England railway, as will be argued before the committee of the legislature, is to give Boston and New England a direct rail connection with the great grain country of the Canadian west and northwest, to place the manufacturers of New England in touch with the market of the growing agricultural and purchasing sections of the Dominion.

The Grand Trunk railway through the Southern New England railway, is coming to Boston to bring business here and to create a traffic between factories here and the prosperous communities that will be developed along the new transcontinental road.

The idea of President Hays is to stimulate commerce by adding Boston and the New England manufacturing centres to a line that will stretch across the continent and will be the longest railroad in the world under one management.

The Southern New England from Boston will be as much a part of the transcontinental trunk line as is the section of track which is now being laid across the Rocky Mountains in British Columbia.

It is for the purpose of shortening the distance from the New England factory to the farmer of western Canada and putting the manufacturer in touch with the purchaser on the same line of railroad that the Grand Trunk has applied for the authority to build a railroad to Boston and Worcester.

At the same time the Grand Trunk is seeking the traffic from the large manufacturing cities of New England to the British Columbian towns that are springing up as fast as the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific are laid. President Hays wishes to reach all the manufacturing centres of New England.

After speaking of the possibility of tapping the mill centres, the article goes on:

The building of the proposed Southern New England from Boston, upon the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, will mean the possibility of trains being operated from Boston to Prince Rupert, the Pacific terminus, in a running time of within four days.

The Grand Trunk Pacific is being built with an average grade as low as four-tenths of 1 per cent. The grade through the Canadian Rockies is as low as that across the plains, which will give to the Grand Trunk Pacific a train capacity of far greater tonnage than that of any other transcontinental road.

When the proposed railroads are completed a train running on the time now made by the Intercolonial Limited between Montreal and Toronto will cover the distance between Boston and Prince Rupert within four days. All of the construction is of the heaviest rails that are now rolled and there is not a wooden bridge on the road.

The Grand Trunk in extending its line to the Pacific has looked with particular favour upon the port of Boston and the mill cities of New England. President Hays thinks that a great deal of business for the new railroad across the continent may be developed in the territory to be tapped by the Southern New England railway. The Grand Trunk has to make traffic for its transcontinental road and New England is considered to be an inviting field.

There is an editorial in the same issue of the Boston 'Globe' headed 'Welcome, Grand Trunk.' I do not wish to occupy the time of the House by reading, as I might do, editorial after editorial on this matter. But I wish to refer to a long article in the Boston 'Sunday Herald' of January 28, 1912, in which there is a map showing the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway running directly from Boston to Montreal, then to Scotia Junction, then to Cochrane, and then to Prince Rupert. Here is the great Transcontinental line, which we have been subsidizing to such a tremendous extent, going to Boston, and the Boston papers publishing maps showing its route from Boston to Prince Rupert over which the trip will be made in only four days. The heading of this article is: 'Linking Boston with the Far Pacific.' In the article there are two or three striking passages. It points out that when the railway is completed it will be possible for passengers and freight to make an uninterrupted journey from Boston to Prince Rupert, and then says:

This means such men of affairs as Chairman Hugh Bancroft of the directors of the port of Boston, President Hays of the Grand Trunk, Augustus S. Cobb, the physiographic expert, and others point out, that Boston is going to share heavily in the enormous development of the Canadian Northwest, to be one of the vital links in the commerce between Europe and that district, even a link in the trade of the three continents. When this huge transoceanic, transcontinental line of travel gets really under way, the traveller from Liverpool bound, say to Yokohama, need buy only two tickets, one at Liverpool and another at Boston.

And to such simplicity it is played for freight to make a journey of this length, 12,000 miles, that the shipper at Liverpool need put only a through tag on his goods and away they go over the sea, then over land and over seas again to their destination—the nearest approach to an airline route that the wizards of transportation have yet conceived with certainty of realization. In these days of talk about the development of business in Boston generally and that of the port in particular, there is much material for thought in the approaching completion of this transcontinental railway from Boston to Prince Rupert.

Now, the Transportation Committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce and the Worcester Board of Trade have both passed reports favouring the Grand Trunk extension to Boston on the ground that Canadian ports cannot furnish an outlet for the exports of the great northwest.

It seems that the Boston 'American,' one of the Hearst papers in Boston, was the first to start the scheme by sending out petitions signed by 100,000 people, which it transmitted to President Hays, asking him to do what is being done now. I have here a copy of the Boston 'American,' January 14, containing a large picture of President C. M. Hays. On June 26, President Hays, of the Grand Trunk Company wrote this letter to the editor of the Boston 'American':

Dear Sir,—Mr. Warman has called my attention to your letter of June 1, and the box of signatures to the petition inviting the Grand Trunk to come to Boston.

All of us here appreciate very much the good offices of the Boston 'American' in securing this long list of petitioners, and I write to assure you of my personal appreciation of your efforts.

Then there is an interview with Mr. Hays, and this is what he said:

The London representative of the 'American' acquainted President Hays on the last day of April with all that was being done in the 'American' campaign. The 'American' sent President Hays a cablegram reporting progress. In the morning the 'American' received this cablegram in reply:

To the Boston 'American,' Boston, Mass.

When the Boston 'American' petitions and the official resolutions referred to in your cablegram have been received by me to be placed before the Grand Trunk board of directors, I am certain the subject will be duly considered by that body.

To be placed before the Grand Trunk Board of Directors. The applicant for the charter is Charles M. Hays, with half-a-dozen other names, but the petition is to be laid before the Grand Trunk directors.

President Hays returned to Canada late in May, and just before the last Sunday in the month received a reporter for the 'American.' The 'American' wanted a message for its readers, the great boxes of petitions were almost ready for shipment to Canada. Not yet ready to take the public into his confidence, President Hays sent a brief message, which was interpreted to be an admonition to New England to keep on working and to 'hold the fort.'

This is what President Hays said in the 'American' last May, in Montreal, just before the arrival of the petition of the 'American' readers to 'come to Boston':

The officers of the Grand Trunk railway are certainly very grateful to the people of Boston and the neighbouring section of New England for the display of confidence in our company. We could not well be otherwise.

The part your newspaper has taken, in the matter of inviting us to Boston, is little short of amazing. I believe the very first person who met me in London, on my arrival from Plymouth, was a representative of the Hearst News service. He called upon me several times subsequently.

He told me—your representative in London—about the unanimous vote of the Massachusetts Senate, the Massachusetts House, and the Boston City Council; and assured him that I would place the resolution before our board of directors just as soon as the official records had come to me.

I have been away a month. To-day for the first time I saw the transcript of these votes. To-day also, I received the letter of his honour the Mayor, and saw the statement of His Excellency the Governor. You tell me I am soon to have the petition of 100,000 New Englanders.

Such a testimonial as this would make any railroad man happy. It makes me very happy. What shall I say to make New England happy?

I will say this. I will say that not only the original resolutions passed by your House of representatives, your Senate and your City Council, together with the letter of Mayor Fitzgerald and the statement of Governor Foss, but also the 100,000 petition of the 'American,' will go to London and be formally placed before our board of directors.

Moreover, I believe I can safely say, to Boston and New England, that these votes, these expressions, this request, will receive all the consideration—all the courteous consideration—to which they are entitled.

For myself, personally, I wish you would say to the people of New England that I fully and deeply appreciate the good-will back of this movement.

Without taking up the time of the House longer, I may say that for some time back, and at the present time, there is a wide spread movement in Boston, supported by the legislature, the senate, the Boston City Council, the mayor, the Chambers of Commerce, and Boards of Trade in neighbouring cities, all urging the Grand Trunk to come to Boston; their papers are full of articles all along the same line, that Boston is to be the terminus of the Grand Trunk Pacific line, when it will be only four days to Liverpool. Now, in view of that fact, in view of the express contract which was made between the Grand Trunk Pacific and this government, in view of the fact that the millions and millions that we have given to that company, were given with the understanding, and for the purpose of getting a road wholly over Canadian soil to Canadian seaports, I think I am justified in calling on the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, and calling on the Finance Minister, to pay heed to these facts, and I say to them it is their duty, before they pay over one dollar of this money, to investigate and see whether there is a wilful and deliberate attempt to break the contract made by the Grand Trunk Pacific with this country.

If it be the case that all the people in Boston whose views are expressed here are in the right; if it be the case that the Grand Trunk Pacific is coquetting with Boston; if it be the case, as stated in one paper, that it would cost $10,000,000 for the Grand Trunk to construct its terminals in Boston; at this very time when this country is being asked for $10,000,000, it would be well for this government to see whether or not Canadian money is being poured into the coffers of the Grand Trunk Pacific to be poured out into Boston, or whether this country is to have an entirely Canadian road from sea to sea over Canadian soil. In conclusion I wish to say, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, that I do not for a moment repudiate the judgment of the Privy Council; but I wish to impress on the House and the government the construction I give to this judgment, and I hope they will investigate, before paying a dollar to this company, to find out whether there is anything in any of these points I have raised. But if we find that this country has defences which, as between private individuals, would be ample defences and ample counter claims, so that no court would think of ordering one to pay the other a dollar, then I say the present ministry will fail in their duty, and will deserve to be ranged in the same class as the late ministry, if they fail to protect the people of Canada, as the late ministers so ignominiously failed to protect them.

Mr. GERMAN. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance how much money at the present time the Dominion of Canada is liable for under the sale of these bonds by reason of the judgment of the Privy Council.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The implementing obligation upon sales of bonds already made amounts to about $5,000,000. Any funds that are due by way of implementing must be paid into the bank to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada, in like manner as the proceeds of the bonds are paid into that bank to be disbursed upon certificates of the government engineer from time to time as construction proceeds.

Mr. GERMAN. That is practically the answer I desire. I knew something about the agreement, and about the legal situation when that agreement went through, and I had an idea of my own that the common legal gentlemen whom the government at that time were getting advice from, were wrong. I thought at that time, and I think at the present time, the Domin on of Canada should protect those bonds, and if necessary borrow money at 3 per cent to buy them.

The agreement, as I understand it, provided that the bonds should not be sold without the concurrence of the Dominion government. Then, the Dominion government, whether it was a Liberal or a Conservative government, should have seen that those bonds were not sold below the price for which the Dominion government securities are sold. I think that at this moment the present government should protect the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and if necessary borrow the money to purchase the bonds with the 3 per cent guarantee, and then the government of Canada and the people of Canada would lose nothing because the bonds would be worth 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The questions my hon. friend has raised have been very fully considered by the government. It has been suggested, and it is a thought that at once occurs to a financial man, that in order to save the amount of implementing on bonds sold in the future (because the others are sold, they are gone), if the government should purchase at par those bonds from time to time as required for the purposes of construction by the Grand Trunk Pacific they would then have the 3 per cent bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific and would save the difference between their selling price, say 80 net, and par.

Mr. GERMAN. Sure.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Not too sure, it requires some further consideration. There are $25,000,000 worth more of bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific to be sold. I would point out to my hon. friend that these are 50 year bonds from the present day, that they mature in 1962. Where my hon. friend is wrong is just here: These are 3 per cent bonds. My hon. friend says why not have the Dominion borrow at par, because it can issue its securities approximately at par, and buy in the 3 per cents, you would then have the 3 per cents and you would save the difference. What he has overlooked is this. The standard security of the Dominion of Canada is not a 3 per cent security, but a 3½ per cent security. If we borrowed money on a 3½ per cent basis, practically speaking, issuing our bonds at par or a little under, then if we bought the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific let us consider our position. On the one hand we would be paying out 3½ per cent on the amount we had borrowed to take them up and on the other hand we would be getting 3 per cent only from the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds. In other words we would be losing half a point of interest. Putting it on a financial basis, Grand Trunk Pacific 3 per cent bonds on a 3½ per cent basis, at 82 are equivalent to 3½ per cent at about 94. In other words, the equivalent of the Grand Trunk bonds guaranteed by this government at, we will say, 82, is on a 3½ per cent basis, about 94, between 93 and 94. The transaction would be this: The Dominion would issue its securities at or near par and would take up the remaining bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and in doing it they would save, on the estimate I have made, about 5 points, not 20 points, not the difference between 80 and par but the difference between the rate of 93 or 94, because that is the corresponding rate on a 3½ per cent basis, and the price at which Dominion securities would sell. So on $25,000,000 of bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, if we took them up and paid for them at par, that is to say implementing as we went along, the government would save about $1,250,000, or possibly a little more. But let me point out two considerations to my hon. friend. In the first place, in order to do that the government would have to increase the National debt by an amount of $25,000,000. In the second place we should have to consider the desirability of holding as an investment, bonds of the railway company, it is true, guaranteed by the government. The situation is not essentially different from this, that this government at any time can make 5 points if it desires to do so by buying the bonds of any Canadian railway Company guaranteed by the Dominion government standing at 93 or 94.

Mr. GERMAN. Oh no.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Yes. The Dominion to-day can issue its securities at about par and can turn around and buy on the London market Canadian Northern or any other securities on a 3½ per cent. basis, now selling at about 93, and in that way, we could make the difference. The difficulties are these two: Is it wise to increase the National debt by $25,000,000 to help out that transaction for the amount that would be saved and second, is it advisable to hold securities of the railway company, guaranteed as they are by the Dominion government.

Mr. GERMAN. Will you allow the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, guaranteed by the government, to be sold at 20 per cent. less than par, rather than have the Dominion government itself take them up?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I have said that that is a matter for very careful consideration on the part of the government, and it is under consideration by the government. There are no discoveries being made with regard to this matter. It is the most obvious thing in the world for a financial man to say we can save the implementing by taking them up, but these considerations I have mentioned are important considerations and not the least important is the question of the desirability of the government holding those bonds with the interest maturing from year to year, that is bonds which they have purchased with the proceeds of their own securities. It is not true that you save 20 points, because you must put the security on the same basis as that on which the Dominion sells its securities.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to accept the motion?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). If there are no other speakers, I shall say a few words in reply as the mover of this motion. My hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has brought up some very interesting points in connection with this matter, all or nearly all of which have had my careful consideration. The Bill which I am introducing, enables the government to carry out the obligation, whatever it may be, on the Dominion arising under this agreement of 1903, as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that bonds were sold at less than par and he raises the very interesting question as to whether, if those bonds were improvidently sold, there would not be a set-off.

Now I may say to him that that is a matter about which I have made, and am now making, very careful inquiries. The results of my inquiries to date have been these: It is provided somewhere in the statute or in the agreement that the bonds which have been sold from time to time were sold with the consent of the government; in other words that the government consented to the time of issue and the price of the securities. That, of course, is not conclusive. But it is a fact, I am advised, that my predecessor in office and the government of that day approved of the sale of these bonds from time to time as required. Now, while these bonds appear to be selling at a very low price—at 80, a discount of 20, a very heavy discount—yet it must be born in mind, as I have pointed out originally that at the time the bonds were to be issued, it was thought that they would sell at par or nearly at par, but since that time there has been a fall in all high-grade low-interest bearing securites. Among these, as mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this afternoon, are British Consols, which have fallen to 76 or 77, a very great fall indeed. The standard security to-day that is the Dominion's direct liability security, is about par,—there have been sales at 100¼ recently. It is a fact, and a curious fact, that a guaranteed bond never sells as high as a bond that gives a direct obligation. You would think that in the case of the Dominion, its guaranteed securities would sell at precisely the same price as a security giving its direct obligation to repay. But it is not so, and this is probably the reason; Under the law, one of the most easily defeasable contracts is the contract of guarantee; and, though the wording of the instrument of guarantee generally states that, notwithstanding anything that may be done, the covenant of the guarantor is absolute, nevertheless guaranteed bonds will not sell within some points of as high a price as the bonds or debentures or securities which represent the direct obligations of the Dominion. Let me repeat to my hon. friend from East Hastings, that all the sales will be carefully checked, that is the sales which have taken place in the past will be carefully checked. And let me say to him further that I understand that the auditor of the Railways Department has checked the disbursements—(I am only giving what I am told, for I have not had time to verify it myself.) At all events, the hon. member may assume this, that before anything is paid out in respect of bonds which have been sold in the past, a careful accounting will be made with regard to the matters which he mentioned— as to commissions and as to whether the sales were in any way improvident. My own opinion is—I must be frank with the House—that these sales are not improvident. And for this reason: If you put a 3 per cent bond of the Grand Trunk Pacific on a 3½ per cent basis and check it up with a 3½ per cent debenture or bond on the London market, you will find that there is just about a parity. Consequently, the real question that arises in my judgment is an accounting to find out what the net proceeds actually were, so that in paying the difference between the proceeds and par you are careful that the Dominion does not pay too much.

Now, we come to another point raised by my hon. friend, the cost of production and interest. In the trust mortgage securing the interest on these bonds the expression 'Construction work' is thus defined:

The said expression 'construction work' in regard to the section in respect of which the same is used, shall also include any sum or sums of money paid or to be paid by the Pacific Company as interest——

That is, interest is part of construction:

——accruing, or about to accrue, during the period of construction, as hereinafter defined, upon the bonds issued by the Pacific Company and guaranteed by the government under this mortgage——

The expression 'period of construction,' that is, the period during which this interest shall run, is defined in this section V, which is the one I have read:

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

Section 7. The expression 'period of construction' in section 5 of this article shall mean the period of time which shall elapse until the western division shall be completed under the provisions of the Transcontinental Railway Acts, or of any Act of parliament extending the time for completion, and the government shall fix the date of such completion by order in council accordingly.

My hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) may remember that the matter came up in the House prior to the recess, and an Act was passed giving the Governor in Council the authority to extend for a certain time. If it is extended 'construction work,' as defined in the clause which I have read, would cover interest during the period of construction to which the time had been extended.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I am afraid that is the case.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I am glad to have the hon. member's opinion, because I know he has gone into the matter thoroughly. With regard to this money which is due, using the expression generally, to the Grand Trunk Pacific, of course this money was to be received and held in trust by the Receiver General of Canada, who is the Finance Minister, under the terms of the trust mortgage securing this issue.

Mr. GERMAN. How much is the exact amount at present?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). According to the statement which I made to the House the other day, it amounts to $4,900,000. Now let us see how that is to be paid up. That money is not to be at once handed over by cheque to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and it has never been suggested that it is so to be dealt with. Under section V, of this trust mortgage, provision is made for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds:

Section 3. All of the said bonds shall be so issued that the purchase price of any of such bonds (hereinafter referred to as 'the proceeds' of the said bonds), shall be paid by the purchasers thereof from time to time into the Bank of Montreal, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Merchants Bank of Canada, or such other bank or banks as the government may approve of (which are hereinafter collectively and distributively referred to as the 'Bank'). The bank shall receive and hold the said proceeds and any interest accruing thereon at the credit of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada, in a special account in one of the offices of the said bank, in accordance with and subject to the provisions of section 4 of this article.

That is, the proceeds of the bonds sold by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. And I have pointed out to my hon. friend from East Hastings, that these bonds which were sold from time to time were sold with the consent of the Minister of Finance of Canada. I have explained also —the hon. gentleman was not present at the time—that there has been an accounting, I understand as to the disbursements, and I believe there was a check by the auditor of the Railway Department. However, that is a matter, as I have said, which will engage my most careful attention before the money is paid over. In other words, the interests of the Dominion in regard to that will be absolutely safeguarded so far as it is possible to do so. Now, in regard to this implementing money, that is, additional money, it is also covered in the trust mortgage, section V.:

Section 5. Whatever the method of the implementing by the government, in accordance with the provisions of the scheduled agreements in such manner as may be agreed upon as therein provided, of its guarantee of the bonds to be issued by the Pacific Company and guaranteed by the government under the provisions of the scheduled agreements, the results of such implementing shall be paid into the said bank and shall be dealt with by the said bank in the manner provided in sections 3 and 4 of this article.

In other words, the implementing money goes into the bank to the credit of the receiver general in the same manner as would the proceeds of the bonds which had been sold by the company. My hon. friend from Hastings has raised a very interesting question indeed, and one which, as I say, has received to some extent our attention. It is like this: Would the government have the right to set off as against this any claim of the nature that he has mentioned? Let me submit this to my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup), who is, I know, a very good lawyer. I do not understand that he says we should refuse to carry out this transaction. Let me point out to my hon. friend, as a financial man, a little jealous of the standing of the securities which are issued directly by the government or guaranteed by them, that the Receiver General of Canada, under the trust mortgage, is a trustee for all the bondholders. The bondholders are interested in the construction of this line; therefore the Receiver General would be trustee for all the bondholders entitled to the security of the mortgage. Let us see what that means. There is a third interest set up. I wonder would it be fair—I have no doubt myself that it would not be—I wonder would it be legal, would it be against the rights of the bondholders if the Receiver General, as the trustee under this mortgage, declined to pay out the proceeds on the ground of set-off by reason of the failure of the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry out part of its contract.

Mr. McKENZIE. Was not the condition under which the bonds issued under the guarantee well known to the purchaser of the bonds, and would he not know that he took these bonds subject to compliance with the contract by the company?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). This trust mortgage secures all the bonds which have been sold on the English market. The bondholder has notice of everything that is in this mortgage, but the point I am making is that, these bonds being sold, their proceeds have been placed at the credit of the Receiver General and the implementing money will be paid into the credit of the Receiver General for the purpose of providing for the construction of the line. Let us assume that the government deliberately took exception: We will not pay any more money at all on account of some counter claims that have been set up. Of course, the Dominion guarantee is absolute, but the intention was that this money would be used for the purpose of constructing the road on which the bondholders have a first charge as a part of their security. I have in my pocket the opinion of the Department of Justice with regard to some of these matters which have been mentioned, but, let me say this generally: The matters which have been discussed here to-night will be most carefully considered by myself and by the government. I think the House can assume that no moneys will be paid out without the matter being most carefully considered, and without the best advice of counsel in regard to them. I think that covers the main points which have been brought to our attention by my hon. friend from Hastings who has gone into the matter with such very great care.

My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who, I am sorry is not in his seat to-night, I think went out of his way to score a point against this government with regard to the wheat, which he says is lying on the plains of Saskatchewan. I do not think there is any man in Canada who has more sympathy with that situation than I have, I do not believe there is any man or any government that can be more solicitous about that situation than I am or than we are. But, let me ask my hon. friend and the former government of which he was a member, why it is that the National Transcontinental railway is not completed to-day from Winnipeg to Cochrane? Whose fault is it if there are not sufficient railway facilities to bring part of the grain from the west? Why has there been such a delay in connection with the construction of the western part of the National Transcontinental railway? The Grand Trunk has its connection up to Cochrane and if the section were completed from Cochrane to Winnipeg the Grand Trunk would bring trains down and relieve the situation in the west. The western line of the Grand Trunk Pacific is hung up in the air because that line is not completed and I am advised that it will not be completed in less than a year and a half or possibly two years. If the late government had been energetic in regard to completing that end of the railway which was the natural part to be completed almost at the first then I say we should probably have heard less about lack of cars to bring the grain from the west. I want to be fair in these matters, but I say it is an illogical argument in connection with a debate of this kind on this particular matter to endeavour to place the blame upon this government because grain lies on the plains of Saskatchewan. In so far as I am concerned in my humble capacity as a member of this government, I am satisfied that they will do everything possible to improve conditions in the west not only now but in the future. They will endeavour to give them all necessary railway facilities to take out their grain. Large questions arise, the question of extending this line through to the Pacific coast and, when the line is completed through to the Pacific coast, which we hope will be in a couple of years, the question of terminals. These questions will engage the attention of the government. The government has pledged itself to the building of the Hudson Bay railway. We are doing everything we can to facilitate the movement of grain, but everybody knows that the situation in the west is a most exceptional one and in a debate of this kind it ill becomes hon. gentlemen opposite to raise any question so far as blaming this government is concerned in regard to the movement of grain to the south. If it is meant by that that the grain cannot go to the south by reason of the rejection of the reciprocity agreement I would ask: Who rejected the reciprocity agreement? Not this government, but the people of Canada rejected the reciprocity agreement. Is it fair to place blame upon this government in regard to a situation brought about by railway congestion in the west and by climatic conditions when the government took office only a few months ago? If there is any blame because of the lack of cars and railway facilities to bring the grain out a large part of that blame must be borne by the government formerly in office in not having hastened that part of the National Transcontinental railway between Cochrane and Winnipeg.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition only the other day called attention to the long faces that he had seen on this side of the House. I am sorry that I have not the pleasure to-night of presenting to my right hon. friend a photograph of the faces of the opposition this afternoon when he arose to make his masterly address in connection with this matter. If not by their words, then by their looks, they expressed contrition and they will not do it again. I can assure my hon. friend from East Hastings that the question he has raised will be very carefully considered by the government because, as we all know, large sums of money are involved.

No money will be paid out unless in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, after taking the advice of the Department of Justice, and considering the other matters that have been brought to our attention.

Mr. GERMAN. Do I understand the Minister of Finance to say that at the present moment the liability of the government, under the judgment of the Privy Council, is a trifle over four million dollars?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I have a statement prepared, which shows that the amount required for implementing upon the sales of bonds which have heretofore taken place is about $4,900,000. I desire to say to my hon. friend, and it will apply to both sides of the House, that if ever we attempt to use the word 'implement' again I think we ought to use it only in its agricultural sense.

Mr. GERMAN. Will the Minister of Finance allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Certainly.

Mr. GERMAN. Will he implement that by buying the bonds himself for the Dominion?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I was just wondering whether my hon. friend was really interested in the Dominion saving a few points, or whether he was really more desirous that we should supply a ready market for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. Now, I am not going to add anything to what I have said to my hon. friend; I have told him that that matter is engaging at the present time my attention, and the attention of the government. I have told him that it is obvious that if you bought in bonds at 80, if they happened to be bonds issued at the same rate per cent as you can borrow money at, that you would save twenty points. But I point out that you would have to put the threes on a three and a half per cent basis and consequently there is no such sum saved, but there would possibly be saved five points. I repeat this because my hon. friend was not in at the time. The real question that arises is this: is it advisable to increase the National debt to the extent of twenty-five million dollars, for the purpose of saving the amount of money I have indicated, and in the second place is there any consideration to be attached to the fact that if it were done the Dominion would become holders of three per cent railway bonds to the amount of twenty-five million dollars, guaranteed of course by the Dominion government?

Mr. GERMAN. Does not the same thing apply to the last sale of bonds, as to whether or not the Dominion government should supplement?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Do you mean those that have been sold already?

Mr. GERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Well, I have already pointed out to my hon. friend and it answers his question now, that the Dominion government can at any time it so desires, go into the matter of buying guaranteed bonds, and make five points on the transaction, but up to date, the Dominion government has not done that. For instance, you have Canadian Northern Ontario Railway bonds and Canadian Northern bonds, guaranteed by the Dominion, and selling several points less than the direct obligation of the Dominion. Does my hon. friend seriously suggest—and if he does, why did not the late government do it—that this government should go out and sell its securities to the amount of $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 more on a three and a half per cent. basis, and buy in the bonds of all these railway companies for the purpose of making five points? But, if that were done, what would happen? In the first place, if we attempted to do it, our own securities would drop several points, and the chances are that before you got through you would defeat your own purpose entirely. There is no difference, so far as the bonds sold, are concerned, between Grand Trunk Pacific bonds bearing the guarantee of the Dominion, and the bonds of any other railway company bearing the guarantee of the Dominion. In other words, they sell on a parity, and on the same argument my hon. friend advances, the Dominion might well consider going out to the open market and buying in these bonds, which are in the hands of purchasers at eighty or eighty-two,—because they are at an exact parity at ninety-three and ninety-four on the three and a half per cent. basis—the same argument will apply to buying in all your guaranteed securities.

Mr. GERMAN. Certainly it would.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). All I have to say to my hon. friend (Mr. German) is this: If he seriously advocates that, and if that is the proper thing to do, then he should have been the Finance Minister in place of my predecessor, who, I am sure, would do nothing of the kind.

Mr. NESBITT. What do you estimate the price of these bonds on?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I estimated the balance on the basis of the last sale.

Mr. NESBITT. What was that?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Net, about eighty.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

GORDON GRANT.
Chief Engineer.

OTTAWA, February 10, 1912.

I might also say that there has been no interest from the commencement charged up, so that the figures in the above table do not represent the total cost of construction of the Transcontinental railway from Moncton to Winnipeg. I submit the following:

Statement showing the cost of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental railway, based on the estimated cost submitted by the chief engineer at $171,726,000, and on the supposition that it will be completed and handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway on the 1st January, 1914, and that the money could be borrowed at 3 per cent.

Interest during construction at 3 per cent to 31st Dec., 1911	$ 7,690,128 68
Interest on estimated expenditure at 3 per cent for 1 year at Dec. 31, 1912	3,730,000 00
Interest on estimated expenditure at 3 per cent for 1 year to Dec. 31, 1913	4,635,000 00
Estimated cost of completed road exclusive of interest at Dec. 31, 1913	171,726,000 00
Capital cost estimated to January 1, 1914	$187,781,128 68
Interest on $187,781,128.68 at 3 per cent for 7 years (January 1, 1914, to December 31, 1920)	39,434,031 00
Add betterments, &c., during 9 years (January 1, 1912, to December 31, 1920) unforeseen and unestimated	7,884,840 32
Interest on $7,884,840.32 at 3 per cent based on expenditure of 1/9th per year, about	900,000 00 or a capital cost of $130,800 per mile.

If the road does not earn 3 per cent in excess of 'working expenditure' for the 3 years ending December 31, 1923, then interest is added to the capital for three years longer, adding $22,050,000 to capital cost, making the capital cost of the railway $143,015 per mile, plus expenditure for betterments for 43 years.

Capital cost estimated to January 1, 1924	$258,050,000 00

If the road is not taken over by the Grand Trunk Pacific railway on January 1, 1914, each years' delay will add in interest about $4,500,000 to the capital cost.

It will be noted that in the above calculations interest is not compounded except at the period the road is supposed to be handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific, January 1, 1914, and for arriving at the interest for the 3 years, January 1, 1921, to December 31, 1923.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does that statement include the Quebec bridge?

Mr. COCHRANE

Mr. COCHRANE. No, but it includes the terminals.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does it include the $10,000,000 which the company is getting now?

Mr. COCHRANE. No. In order to give the right hon. leader of the opposition some further particulars—because he is entitled to all the information that we have—I will go over some of the returns made to us; and I might say that the following statement is made up and certified by the engineer, Mr. Grant:

The hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) wanted a copy of the order in council. I have a copy of it here. I may say that I find that there was a mistake in that, in the statement that it was recommended by the commission instead of by the chairman of the commission. But I took the matter up with the chairman, and he informed me that his law clerk had advised him that he had a right to do what he had done, and that the matter was brought before the commission, and Mr. McIsaac, one of the commissioners, thought that he was acting within his jurisdiction in appointing Mr. Macpherson. I also wish to say that I was misinformed, and misinformed the House, when I said that Mr. Macpherson's salary had not been increased. I am informed that it has been increased.

Mr. KYTE. What is Mr. Macpherson's salary at the present time?

Mr. COCHRANE. $7,500.

Mr. KYTE What was it before?

Mr. COCHRANE. $5,000, I think.

Mr. AMES. What is the total value covered by the $236,000,000?

Mr. COCHRANE The total mileage from Moncton to Winnipeg is 1,804·7 miles.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am obliged to my hon. friend for the information he has brought down. The figures which he has placed before the House cannot of course be taken in at once, but they will be there for future reference.

The one thing in which I was particularly interested to know was the condition of the road to-day, and how far it had proceeded from Cochrane towards the Lake Superior Junction.

Mr. COCHRANE. District E is 195·19 miles in length, from 204 miles west of Cochrane, Ontario, to 399 miles west of Cochrane, or 125 miles east of present Lake Superior Junction. Grading completed, 154·8 miles or 79·3 per cent. Track laid, nil. Telegraph lines, nil. Bridges, nil.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend may have been under the impression that he sent me a copy of the order in council to which he referred, but I never received it. The first information I have received is from the lips of my hon. friend just now. When the Bill was first moved in the committee, certain information was asked for and no progress whatever was made with respect to the Bill. I thought I heard the chairman speak of the second section. There must be some mistake. Surely the committee is not going to understand that the first section has already passed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bennett, Simcoe) Clause 1 is initialled as having been passed.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think it will be within the memory of all members present on the former occasion that there was no progress made, and my hon. friend withdrew the Bill from the consideration of the committee, awaiting a further opportunity to procure the information.

Mr. COCHRANE. No.

Mr. EMMERSON. I state distinctly that that was the case. I raised this question with respect to the first clause relative to the appointment of one commissioner, as I felt it was necessary that we should be furnished with information, not only with respect to the work that remained to be done, but also with respect to the status of the commission. We were under some misapprehension, I know I was, as to who really constituted the commission at that time. We were told that certain members of the commission had sent in their resignation. Whether any of the resignations had been accepted we were not able to ascertain. I felt it important that we should know that. Before we take into consideration the question as to whether we should reduce the numbers of this commission from four to one, we should know the work yet to be done. When this matter was first under consideration by parliament, parliament determined the number of commissioners to whom should be entrusted the responsibility and the duty of the construction of the Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Moncton, and parliament, in its wisdom, entrusted that work to a commission composed of four men. Had the proposition been to entrust it to a commission of one man, I am sure parliament would have hesitated before taking action. When it is proposed to reduce that number to one man, it is necessary for us to have information as to what part of the work remains uncompleted. We have had that here to-night, and although I listened as closely as I could, I am not yet in possession of the information which I require. We must remember that when the Intercolonial was constructed it was placed in the hands of a commission, I think there were three commissioners, and they remained until the road was completed. Had there been a proposition to change the number when the work was half or two-thirds completed, I do not think parliament would have consented to it. Now when two years' work remain to be completed, I think it is an amazing proposition to place upon the shoulders of one man the responsibility of completing the work, and determining the final settlements of contracts. The work yet to be done involves most serious responsibility. I care not how able a man may be, it is not wise, it is not in the interest of the public to entrust this great work to one man alone. Subsequent to the request I made to my hon. friend for the information he has just brought down, I moved that there should be furnished to the House certain other information. I moved for information with respect to the proceedings of the commission from the day this government came into power to the present time, from the time of the resignation of the present chairman down to the time I made my motion. That information has not yet been furnished. I do not think that this committee is in a position properly to consider the proposition involved in the first section. The committee may determine when it has all the information that one man is competent to carry on the work, and that it would be wise to entrust it to the responsibility of one man.

I do not think the committee is in a position to say whether or not that would be a wise course. If, in 1903, the then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had proposed to place the construction of that line from Winnipeg to Moncton in charge of one commissioner, parliament would have hesitated and perhaps have declined to give its sanction to such a proposal, and it is quite a serious matter at this moment. While there is not so much work yet to be done and while it does not involve so many years' labour, yet the responsibility in the final winding up and completion of the work is, in my judgment, a very large percentage of the responsibility that was involved in the whole work at its inception and it would be a dangerous precedent to establish. We must go upon precedent in these matters. At the time of the construction of the Intercolonial railway the precedent established was a commission of three members. That perhaps was not so great a work as this although for that period it was a very great work and meant much for the future of Canada. The precedent established by parliament on that occasion is certainly worthy of being followed on this. I do not know if my hon. friend had not confidence in the commissioners, he placed no imputation on the members of the Transcontinental Railway Board. If lack of confidence in the commissioners was the reason for his desire to change the board, then it might have been well to consider the substitution of other gentlemen on the board, but it is quite a different proposition to wipe out the commission and place in the hands of one man the whole responsibility and the complete control of this great work including the final accounting with respect to contracts. It is a serious responsibility for any man to assume and it is a serious consideration for this parliament whether they are willing to entrust that responsibility to one man and to rely upon his judgment, I care not how great, how able or how well qualified he may be, from an administrative or engineering or other standpoint. There are involved decisions of great importance not merely to the railway but to the people of Canada who are looking forward to the completion of the railway as a work that will mean much for the future. We may differ with respect to its cost, indeed there were differences with respect to its advisability in the first instance. As to the character of the road that was proposed to be built there were those who favoured its construction as a government work and those who felt that the whole project should be entrusted to a private railway corporation; but parliament in its wisdom determined that it should be built but not operated as a government road, that it should be built not by the Department of Railways as canals have been built for years, directly under the control of the minister, but by a commission, and parliament wisely determined that that commission should consist of four men. Before we change this, before we entirely overturn the decision of that parliament, and appoint a different commission, we should have every possible information with respect to the status of the road, the character of the work yet to be completed and I hold that we have no such information, that it was not brought before the House as promised, and that certainly it has not been given to us at as early a moment as we should have had it. I think we should have had an opportunity of perusing the returns that have been brought down. The minister should bring down the other return; the Board of Railway Commissioners should furnish him with copies of the documents, and we should have an opportunity of at least closely reading those returns. I have no desire to in any way impede the progress of this Bill, but I think my hon. friend should give an opportunity to hon. members to read over these documents to ascertain the nature of the work yet to be completed. When my hon. friend first brought the Bill before the committee he gave certain information with respect to it, and it shows how easy it is to be mistaken. The very first statement of my hon. friend with respect to the status of the commission was wrong.

Mr. COCHRANE. Oh, no.

Mr. EMMERSON. With all deference to my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane), let us consider the matter of the change in the character of the employment of Mr. Macpherson. Mr. Macpherson has been assistant chief engineer, and in receipt of a salary of $5,000 a year. He was subordinate to the chief engineer. By an order in council, which I hold the government was not empowered to pass, the character of the commission was changed. Mr. Macpherson was appointed assistant chairman, an appointment which was not authorized by the Act; no such official was contemplated within the four corners of the Act. The Governor in Council had the power to appoint commissioners, a chief engineer, and a secretary. And they made these appointments. But under the terms of the Act the commissioners have the power and the right to select all other officials, engineers, experts, and agents and employees of every character. But it appears that the government, on the 14th of December last, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals, assumed to appoint Mr. Macpherson as assistant to the chairman, to take effect from the 1st December, 1911. So, this was retroactive in its terms. Of course, it will be understood, that I am not raising objection to Mr. Macpherson. I believe he is a man of eminent ability, and has the qualifications to fill such a position, were such a position authorized under the Act. I am dealing with the order in council from an entirely impersonal standpoint. The character of his engagement was changed. He had been the assistant engineer, and he is given power and authority over the chief engineer, with a salary higher than that of the commissioners. I understand that the chairman received $8,000, and the commissioners received $7,000 each, while the chief engineer received $6,000. And Mr. Macpherson was appointed assistant to the chairman with a salary of $7,500. There must have been some reason for all this, but we have not heard what it is. It may be an entirely good reason; I might quite coincide with the reasons which influenced my hon. friend in making that recommendation to council, and this committee might approve of his action. But he has not taken the committee into his confidence by telling us the reasons which actuated him in making that recommendation. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that it is a fair request I make of my hon. friend, that the further progress of this Bill should be deferred until an opportunity is given to look over the terms, and until an opportunity is given the hon.

gentleman himself to bring down the returns which this House has ordered that he shall bring down.

Mr. COCHRANE. I was not asked for any returns.

Mr. EMMERSON. The House ordered it.

Mr. COCHRANE. No; the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked me to give him a statement of the progress of the building of the road, which I have brought down, I think to his satisfaction, and if not I shall be glad to meet his wishes if I can; and the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), asked for a copy of the order in council appointing Mr. Macpherson, and that I have furnished.

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) may not be informed of it, but the very day after I made the request for this copy of the order in council which he has so courteously brought and laid on the table at this moment, I made a motion in the House that certain other papers should be furnished.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not see that.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman's attention has not been called to it. It was the duty of his officials to have informed him of this matter. The motion is on record in the proceedings of this House as having been passed. There was no discussion; it passed as a matter of course. I think we are entitled to that information, because of the want of definiteness in the information with respect to the situation of the commission. My hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) when he first took the House into his confidence at all, said that one man could look after this matter alone, and one man is going to do it; and it was by reason of that fact that the commissioners had resigned—and we were led to suppose that they had resigned and gone out.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. gentleman is wrong. I made a frank statement to the House and stated that one member had resigned without condition, that one had resigned asking for three months, and that one had resigned asking for six months. The commission is all sitting yet.

Mr. EMMERSON. I accept that statement as I accepted the previous one. But my hon. friend subsequently corrected his first statement and said that the commission would continue to act in conjunction with the chairman, and I have assumed that that is the case. But I think that the House is entitled to all the information with respect to the proceedings taken by this commission from the date when its members sent in their resignation down to the present. And I think we should have a copy of that procedure on the part of the commission. My hon. friend will find out—I have not time now to refer to and quote the records of the proceedings of the House—that a motion was passed calling upon him and his department and the Transcontinental Commission to furnish this information. And I ask my hon. friend in all seriousness and in all sincerity, to have the further progress of this Bill deferred until I, at least as one member of the committee having the right to make the request, shall have an opportunity of perusing, not merely the information brought down by him, but also the further information for which I have asked in the motion to which I have referred and which information has been ordered by the House to be furnished by his department.

Mr. COCHRANE. Can the hon. gentleman give me the date when that motion was carried?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not carried this in my memory, but I think it was on the 27th of January.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). It was on the 26th January, page 297 of the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. EMMERSON. The motion was as follows:

For a copy of all minutes of proceedings, records, orders, instructions or other writings made and had, or given or authorized to be made, had or given by the Board of National Transcontinental Railway Commissioners, from the date of the appointment of Mr. R. W. Leonard, as a member of the said board and chairman thereof, to the present date; also of all letters, telegrams, instructions or other documents made or had or passed, since the said appointment, by and between the Minister of Railways and Canals, or other members of the government, or by any person by authority of the government, and the said chairman of Board of National Transcontinental Railway Commissioners, or the secretary of said board; also of any orders in council relating to the appointment of an assistant chairman or an assistant to the chairman of said board, together with a copy of all letters, papers, instructions or documents relating thereto; as well as a statement of all payments of monies in the way of salaries or compensation made to the incumbent of the office of assistant chairman or assistant to the chairman of said board, and of all papers, letters or instructions made, written or received by the said minister or the said chairman, relating to or in any way connected with the payment or authorization of said salary or compensation.

It will be observed here that I have designated the gentleman as assistant chairman and then as assistant to the chairman, because when I first asked my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals with respect to the appointment as to whether Mr. Macpherson had been appointed assistant chairman, he said: No, but that he, or somebody, had been appointed as assistant to the chairman. I fail to see the fine point of distinction with respect to the difference in the names. But, I ask for this information, and in all fairness I think I am entitled to it as a member of the committee if no one else is desirous to see it. I observe by the order in council that Mr. Macpherson has been appointed as assistant to the chairman. I want no misapprehension as to the tenor of my remarks with respect to either the gentleman who occupies the position of chairman of the commission or the gentleman who occupies the position as assistant to the chairman. I believe that no better selection could have been made than has been made with respect to Mr. Leonard as chairman of the board, and from my knowledge of Mr. Macpherson I think he is entitled to a position of that great responsibility and even of greater responsibility, if my information with respect to him is correct, and if my observation is at all measurably near what it should be. But, it is only the information that I ask for, and I trust that my hon. friend will do me the justice to furnish it.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, there has been a tendency in this debate, and in preceding debates, for members on the other side of the House to be very voluble in their defence of this present commission. The astounding statement that the minister has made to-night with respect to the cost of the National Transcontinental railway, in so far as the eastern portion is concerned, is enough without any further evidence to enable this House to decide that the sooner this commission is got rid of the better it will be for the country, and when we consider that we have a good man who understands railway building and that we will be far more likely to reach an end of this unparalleled expenditure without making any further blunders, my impression is that instead of continuing these commissioners, the quicker they get out the better it will be for the country. One member of the commission has resigned and he was wisely informed to do so. The others know that they had better do so as quickly as they possibly can before the country becomes thoroughly seized of the figures which the minister has laid before the House to-night. I wonder if members of the House realize the astounding statement that the minister laid before us to-night? It comes in srange contrast with the quotations which have been given from the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Mr. Fielding who, some years ago, made the statement that this railway would cost the people of the country $13,000,000, an amount which would be met out of the surplus of a single year. Compared with the figures which we have here to-night the $13,000,000 which was originally mentioned, is a mere bagatelle. Let us look at these figures which the Minister of Railways has given us. This railway has cost up to date, $113,000,000 and it is now estimated that it will cost to complete $57,000,000 which will make an amount of $171,726,000. That will be the capital outlay as close as we can come to it now. That is only for the eastern section, without reference to the obligations we have undertaken on the line from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert, without respect to the guarantees we have given and without respect to the $10,000,000 that we are asked to make a present of to the Grand Trunk. This is only the cost of the portion of the line from Winnipeg to Moncton, and the total is $171,726,000. That is without any interest at all. We know that during the time that the road is being built and until the work is completed, the interest has to be met and we know that we have also to meet the interest for seven years thereafter. The interest to the date of completion will be $16,055,000 and, supposing it is completed by 1914 we still have seven years during which we will have to pay interest and that will give us $39,434,000 more. That brings the expenditure up to $227,215,000. If we add to that the betterments that will surely take place, it will amount to $7,885,000 more and if we take the interest on one-ninth of a year, which means that $900,000 must be added, we have the astounding sum of $236,000,000 as the cost of the railway from Moncton to Winnipeg. That does not include the $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 that the Quebec bridge will cost. Contrast that with the statements that were quoted this afternoon and it seems perfectly astounding that these hon. gentlemen could be so far astray in their calculations.

Let us see how our share is going to figure out. I could scarcely believe it after the quotations which were made from the speeches of the right hon. leader of the opposition and his Minister of Finance, who assured the House and the country repeatedly that $13,000,000 was all that the road was going to cost. To date the interest has been $16,055,000; seven years interest will amount to $39,434,000, and if, as in all probability will be the case, we have to provide for an extra year's interest at least, it will mean an addition of $4,500,000; so that $60,000,000 of interest is going to be paid out by this country in connection with the road instead of the $13,000,000 we were told it would cost by the right hon. gentleman and his Minister of Finance, calculations which are not within one-fifth of what the road is going to cost us.

Let us look for a moment at the Grand Trunk side of it, and, although I have only had an opportunity to glance at the figures, I think I can make the House see the magnitude of the undertaking. What is the position of the Grand Trunk in this matter? The Grand Trunk will have to pay interest on $171,726,000, on betterments $7,884,000, and on three years interest, or, in all, about $201,710,000. That means that the Grand Trunk will have to carry a burden of interest of three per cent. on $201,000,000; that means they will have to carry a burden of $6,000,000 a year of interest or $3,300 interest per annum on every mile of that road from Winnipeg to Moncton. You talk about reducing the freight rates on the grain coming from the west on a railway that has got to carry an interest charge of $3,300 per annum for every mile of its line. How much do you think there would be left over to reduce the rates after working expenses are paid? I can tell you that the other railways in this country are laughing in their sleeves at the result of this enormous and colossal blunder on the part of the late government. They realize that this railway will never be a factor in reducing freight rates, because they know there is not a railway in all Canada that can begin to carry an interest charge on one thousand eight hundred miles of road, where every mile of that railway on an average has cost $130,000 a mile. I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House ever heard of a railway staggering along under such a burden as that. Is that going to be any relief to the farmers of the west? I fail to see it. Except it be in one way, and that is that the Dominion of Canada step in and take a bigger share of the burden than they are carrying to-day, and if the Dominion is willing to do that it may possibly make it possible for that railway to be operated in such a way that it will be a relief to the west. But, when we think we are through with $60,000,000 we are again on the horns of a dilemma. We have to offer to relieve the Grand Trunk Pacific from a large portion of the burden they carry, which will increase that $60,000,000 very materially, or else we have got to let them stagger along alone under that burden, in which case there will never be a reduction of freight rates. Instead of wasting the time of the House in sympathy for that commission which has got the country into this tremendous expense, it is far better that we should pass this Bill and let these gentlemen requiescat in pace; let them pass out of the public sight and be glad they are permitted to do so, and let us get down to one good, reliable railway building man and put him in charge and say to him: Make the best you can out of the bargain, get us out of it as reasonably as you can, and finish the road as best you can. In the meantime, we will be glad to have a full impartial investigation that will try to find out where some of this $235,000,000 has gone.

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend (Mr. Ames) tries to make out that there can be no possible reduction of freight rates from the west on account of the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but there is just one feature of it that he has taken good care not to mention, and that is, that when the Grand Trunk Pacific is completed it will be able to haul freight from Winnipeg to Montreal or from Winnipeg to the winter ports in the lower provinces, at less than one-half the cost that the same freight can be hauled for at the present time. That can be accomplished by the Grand Trunk Pacific owing to its low grades. Another point my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) has forgotten to mention is that when this road is completed the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will not have to spend millions and tens of millions of dollars, as the Canadian Pacific railway is doing now, in order to put the road in a position to compete on anything like even terms with other railways. It was stated the other day by some hon. gentlemen on the other side that the Canadian Pacific railway was only too willing to reduce freight rates, but they did not do so because while they could stand it the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern could not. There is absolutely no ground for a statement of that kind. I can show to the utmost satisfaction of this House that on many products that are being carried by the Canadian Pacific railway in the west to-day they are charging very much higher rates than they did a few years ago, so that instead of lowering the freight rates of late years, in many cases they have been putting them up. While the Grand Trunk Pacific has cost a good deal of money to build it must be remembered that when the road is completed it will be able to haul grain and other products at less cost than any transcontinental road either in Canada or in the United States. I have not the slightest doubt that when the Grand Trunk Pacific is completed it will be able to reduce the enormous freight rates that are in existence to-day and which are fifty per cent or a hundred per cent even, higher in the west than they are in the east. I believe the Grand Trunk Pacific will be able to do that, while rendering a good service to the country, and that it will earn money to pay the interest on its cost, although that cost has been heavy. I believe, Sir, that the Grand Trunk Pacific will be a great blessing to the western farmer and that it will not have to ask the government for further aid.

Mr. LALOR. On the portion of the Grand Trunk Pacific completed from Edmonton to Winnipeg are the freights any lower now than they are on the Canadian Northern or the Canadian Pacific railways?

Mr. TURRIFF. The Grand Trunk Pacific will not lower their freight rates of their own volition any more than any other railway will, but they can be compelled to do so by the Railway Commission, and the freight rates will be cut down and they can still earn interest on the charges. On account of their low grades the Grand Trunk Pacific will be able to carry on one train four times or five times as much as can be carried on one train of the Canadian Pacific railway from the Pacific coast to Winnipeg. From Winnipeg to the Atlantic ports they have a four-tenths of one per cent grade, which means that an engine can haul on that road any load that she can start with on an absolutely level track.

Mr. LALOR. Did the government in making the bargain with the Grand Trunk Pacific reserve any control over the freight rates?

Mr. TURRIFF. Every road in Canada is under the control of the Railway Commission.

Mr. LALOR. Only under the control of the Railway Commission?

Mr. TURRIFF. The railways are under the control of the Railway Commission; the Railway Commission is under the control of the government; the government brought the Railway Commission into being and the government can dissolve the Railway Commission if they want to at any time. The Railway Commission is under the control of this government just the same as any other commission. Let no one run away with the idea that because the Grand Trunk Pacific cost more than it was expected it would, simply because they built a better road than they started out to build, that it is going in the end to have any ill effect on the freight rates, because the fact is that on account of it being a better road it will be able to haul freight at a less rate than any competing road.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. May I ask that the Bill be allowed to stand over until we have looked into the figures brought down by the Minister of Railways. It must be apparent that it is impossible, after simply hearing the figures. to come to any conclusion with regard to them. I hope my hon. friend will have no objection to allow the Bill to stand.

Mr. BORDEN. I am unable to see how the passing of this Bill depends so essentially upon any examination of these figures. So far as the figures are concerned, they only give the details of what has been stated here over and over again, that the road is at the present time about two-thirds completed. So far as the cost is concerned, there cannot be any doubt about that. However, if the consideration of the Bill, in the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, does involve an examination of these figures, and if we are to have an exhaustive discussion of all these statistics for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not, so far as the construction of this railway is concerned, it is to be placed under one instead of four, I am willing to accede to his suggestion although I cannot see the importance of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the Bill itself does not depend upon these figures; but the figures have to be discussed—my hon. friend will not deny us that privilege—and they might as well be discussed upon this Bill as upon any other.

Mr. COCHRANE. I do not think the appointment of Mr. Macpherson has anything to do with the Bill. I am quite satisfied that the appointment of Mr. Macpherson was recommended by the chairman, and that the order in council was perfectly regular. I might say, for the information of the hon. gentleman who has taken exception to it, that there was no authority under the Act for the commission to buy a foot right of way. It was only last year that the late government passed an order in council giving them the authority, and the consequence is that the right of way is in a very bad mix-up. Mr. Macpherson is put in charge of right of way, and is held responsible for it. He is also at the head office when the chairman is away on the work, because I think it is most important not to tie the chairman down to the head office all the time. He should be out to see for himself whether the divisional and other engineers are performing their duties. But I have no objection to postponing the discussion, and I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. KYTE. Before we pass from the consideration of the Bill, I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to page 1,909 of 'Hansard' where he is represented as having said:

> Young asks—on the ground of having had no holidays, but one out of the seven years he has been in office—for six months salary. Mr. McIsaac asks for three months, and Mr. Calvert resigns without any condition.

I understood the minister to say that Mr. McIsaac had resigned without any condition and that Mr. Calvert had asked for three months' salary. I would like the minister to correct this statement

Mr. COCHRANE. I have not the letters here, but the facts were fresh in my memory when I spoke before.

Mr. KYTE. Will the minister give us the information again?

Mr COCHRANE I will give you all the information you want.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend 'The Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908,' by providing for the appointment of an additional Civil Service Commissioner, who shall have the salary of a Deputy Head of a department.—Mr. Borden.

Mr. BORDEN. It may be perhaps more convenient to have a general discussion on the Bill if the right hon. gentleman has no objection. At the moment, I would simply say that the reasons for introducing the proposed Bill are twofold. In the first place, I understand that some difficulty has been experienced in the operation of the Civil Service Commission from the very fact that it consists of only two members; for if these members are divided in opinion on some matter of more or less importance, no action can be taken, and some very awkward situations are likely to be created, and I think have been created, for that very reason. In the next place, it is hoped and expected that the operation of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908 will be extended as expeditiously as may be practicable to the outside service. I do not intend to suggest that that can be done at once. It will be done only after some investigation and some inquiry, but we hope to make progress in it from the very first, and in view of that extension of the operation of the Act, it is thought desirable for that reason also that there should be another member of the commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not intend to go into any general discussion of this measure at the present sitting, as I think that can very properly be deferred until the second reading of the Bill; but in the meantime may I ask my right hon. friend if it is the intention of the government to extend the operation of the Civil Service Act within the present session or during the present year? I understand that there are several officers in the outside service whom it will be difficult to bring within the scope of the Act; but there are, on the other hand, a good many who can be brought in. For instance, the officials in the post offices, customs offices and inland revenue offices in large cities, might very properly be brought within the operation of the Act at once. With regard to extending it further to the service, I would not be prepared to offer any suggestion now; I am quite aware that it is a matter of great difficulty. It may not be so very easy to apply the Act to the service of the different departments in the country districts. With regard to the other point mentioned by my right hon. friend, it is not perhaps outside of the possibilities of human nature that two commissioners might not always see eye to eye. I have not known, however, that a deadlock has occurred except in very minor circumstances. It appears sometimes that on legal questions the commissioners have to refer to the Department of Justice. I offer no suggestion, I merely make this remark.

Mr. BORDEN. In reply to the right hon. gentleman, he will realize that as we were obliged to meet parliament within four or five weeks after assuming office, there has not been much opportunity, at least so far as I am concerned, to make any effective study of the matter he has mentioned. He has asked whether the Civil Service Amendment Act would be extended to certain officials in the outside service during the present session. I would not like to say at the moment that we will find time to make even the investigation that would be necessary for that purpose. He has asked whether its operations may be extended during the present year to some portion of the outside service. I would hope, and indeed I believe, that it will be possible to do so during the present year; but it will be impossible to pronounce at the present any opinion as to how far that would be practicable. I would like, however, to have it understood that it is our desire and intention to proceed along that line so far as it is practicable.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is no question that the Civil Service Amendment Act introduced by the ex-Minister of Agriculture was a great relief to public men. Until then ministers were pestered from morning to night by applicants, and they were very many. That amendment gave great relief to ministers, and allowed them to do some work in their offices. Now, to extend the principle to the outside service would be a further relief. I am quite sure that when my right hon. friend visits Montreal or Halifax on public business, he is besieged by a troop of applicants for public office. I do not see any reason why the same rule which applies to the inside service at Ottawa should not be applied to the other large cities of the Dominion.

Mr. GERMAN. I do not agree at all with the remarks of the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux). You cannot apply the Civil Service Act to the outside service as it is applied in Ottawa. I have one instance in my mind now in the county of Welland. A postmaster has been dismissed very lately, a young man, active, intelligent, acceptable to all the people of the locality, from the post office. His name is Mr. Buck. He kept the post office at Crystal Beach, in the township of Bertie, in the county of Welland; he was dismissed, and a Mr. Rebstock was appointed in his place, who is a United States citizen. I want to call the attention of this government to the fact that they dismissed a Canadian citizen, who is not a partisan at all, who never took any part in politics except to vote as an intelligent man should, and that is for me, and they have appointed a young man of good ability, but a citizen of the United States, to that position. Now that young man wanted the position several years ago, and I refused to recommend him, because he was a United States citizen. But these hon. gentlemen, who were so much afraid of being tied up to the United States in a reciprocity agreement, have appointed a United States citizen as postmaster. I would like the Postmaster General to be here. I hope his colleagues will call his attention to the wrong that he has done. They did dismiss one postmaster in the county; I was not so much dissatisfied with that, because I dismissed a Conservative, and had him appointed. Now, I am frank to say that it is a serious problem to apply the Civil Service Amendment Act to the outside service. I doubt very much if it can be worked out. You may, by your Civil Service Commission, regulate the appointment of officers in the inside service, as in Ottawa, and probably in Toronto. But when you take it over the country generally, to whom will the commissioners who have to make the appointments, apply for information? They will apply to the men who are the leading men in the locality, and the leading men in the locality will be the men who represent the constituencies, or the men who have endeavoured to represent the constituency. The commissioners will take their opinions from these men; if they do not do that, what will they do? You cannot appoint men strictly on examination. You may get good men who will pass excellent examination, and who may be absolutely unfit for public positions, from disposition, from character, or other inability. You cannot appoint young men simply by reason of the fact that they have passed a first-class examination. I venture to say, and I want to say now in the presence of the hon. gentlemen who are leading this government, that we have in the county of Welland the best contingent of customs officers and immigration officers that exist in the Dominion of Canada.

I stand in the judgment of the commissioner of Customs and of the Commissioner of Immigration. They are all young men, they are all intelligent men, and I will put them up against any similar class of young men in the inside service who have been appointed by your commissioners. They are intelligent, good young men, I do not want to see them dismissed and I do not expect they will be dismissed because they should not be dismissed. They may dismiss a few labourers on the Welland canal but I hope not many. The government cannot appoint a Civil Service Commission who can satisfactorily control the appointment of outside officials; if they undertake it they will make a mistake. It should be left to the men in the various counties in whom the government have confidence. If these men do not make proper representations to the government and the government have no confidence in them, then the government should select someone in whom they have confidence and be guided by his advice, even in the county of Welland, if they happen to be guided by mine.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not know anything of the cases to which my hon. friend has alluded, but I shall bring his remarks to the attention of the Postmaster General.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 104) to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN. To-morrow we propose to take government Bills, beginning with the Grain Act and after that Supply, taking up the estimates of the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of the Interior.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.23 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

ACCUSATION AGAINST JUDGE TOURIGNY.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. Does the government know that accusations of extreme gravity are said to have been brought, at the time of the last elections, against Judge Tourigny, one of the judges of the Superior Court?
2. Does the government also know that Judge Tourigny has not replied directly to those alleged accusations and has not taken any proceeding whatever against his accuser?
3. In face of such a situation and the apparent unconcern on the part of a man thus publicly accused, does the government intend to take measures to assure itself of the truth or falsity of the accusations brought against Judge Tourigny?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1 and 2. The government has no knowledge.

3. The government has before it no accusations in any form that would justify it in taking cognizance of, or action upon them.

THE FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. MURPHY asked:

1. Has the attention of the government been directed to a speech delivered by hon. T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour, at Kerwood, Ontario, on September 1, 1911, in which he is reported by the London 'Free Press' of September 2, 1911, to have said:—

I am in favour of indemnifying every man who lost a dollar by the operations of the management of the Farmers' Bank. Some people have said that the depositors only should have their losses made good, but I hold that others are in the same position as the depositors. . . .

We intend to see that every man who lost will be recouped.

2. Has the attention of the government been directed to a further speech delivered by said Minister of Labour at Fingal, Ontario, on September 4, 1911, in which he is reported by the St. Thomas 'Times' of September 5, 1911 to have said:—

I am in favour of indemnifying every man who lost a dollar by the operations of the management of the Farmers Bank. Some people have said that only the losses of the depositors should be made good, but I hold that others are in the same position as the depositors. . . .

We intend to see that every man who lost shall be reimbursed.

3. Did the Minister of Labour repudiate the said reports of his speeches as published in the London 'Free Press' and the St. Thomas 'Times'? If so, when and where?

4. If no such repudiation has been made, is it the intention of the government to carry out the promises of the Minister of Labour?

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister):

It was suggested to me yesterday that this question is not in proper form, as it sets out allegations of fact. I would like to have it amended or dropped

POSTMASTER AT COLDBROOK, N.S.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Who is the postmaster at Coldbrook, Kings county, N.S., and when was he appointed?
2. Does he live at Coldbrook? If not, where does he live?

4. What is the postmaster's business?
5. Is it the policy of the department to appoint postmasters who do not reside where the post office is, but who live and transact business in other localities several miles distant?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. There is no post office named Coldbrook in the county of Kings, N. S. There is a post office called Cold Brook Station, of which Mr. W. E. Porter is postmaster. He was appointed on the 17th November, 1911.
2. The department has no specific information as to his place of residence.
3. The map of Canada shows that. The department has not been called upon to look into it.

UNITED SHOE MACHINERY COMPANY.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York):

1. Is the taking of testimony still in progress before the Board of Investigation under the Anti-Combines Act of 1910 in the United Shoe Machinery case?
2. What legal counsel, if any, are following the investigation in the public interest, and employed by the government of Canada or any department thereof?
3. Was any application made at any time to the Minister of Justice by the Minister of Labour for the employment of counsel in the United Shoe Machinery case under section 30 of the Anti-Combines Act or otherwise?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Testimony was taken before the Board of Investigation at sessions held in Quebec on February 6 and 7, 1912. It is understood to be the intention of the board to sit in Toronto on or about February 20, 1912. The government is not aware whether it is the intention of the board to take further testimony.

2. No counsel has been instructed by the government of Canada or any department of the government to take any part in the proceedings before the board.

3. No application has been made to the Minister of Justice by the present Minister of Labour for the employment of counsel or otherwise, and, so far as the present minister is aware, no such application was made by the former minister.

EDUCATION IN KEEWATIN.

Mr. BARRETTE:

1. Did the government or one of its members receive towards the end of November or December last, or at any time, since, a petition signed by Messrs. Arthur Larose, Mastai Poirier and Joseph Smith, residents of Le Pas, district of Keewatin, Northwest Territories, asking for the creation of a council to assist the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories in the administration of the Territories, clause 6 of chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, the authority for the commissioners in council to enact ordinances in matters of education; the creation by competent authority and in the manner desired, of a school district at Le Pas, in the district of Keewatin, Northwest Territories?

2. Was this petition addressed to His Royal Highness, the Governor General in Council? If not, to whom?

3. Who received it, and when?

4. What reply has it produced?

5. To whom was the reply communicated, and when?

6. If no reply has yet been given, what does the government intend to do in the matter, and will it reply to the petitioners? If so, in what way?

7. Whatever reply the government may have given or intend to give to the petition of Messrs. Larose, Poirier and Smith, is it its intention to avail itself of the law regulating the Northwest Territories, to appoint immediately, by virtue of clause 6 of chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, a council to assist the Commissioners of the Northwest Territories in the administration of these Territories, and to permit in favour of those who ask it, the regular working of the administrative machinery which parliament has foreseen and for which it has provided statutory provision?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. It was referred to the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories towards the end of December for report.

4. None.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6 and 7. The report of the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories will be given full consideration by the government when received.

In 1905-6	$1,295 55
In 1906-7	48 70
In 1907-8	1,144 05

WHARF AND DREDGING AT FRASERVILLE.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Referring to the sum of $70,000 mentioned in the estimates of 1912-1913, for wharf and dredging at Fraserville, Quebec, and lately voted, is it the intention of the Minister of Public Works to ask for immediate tenders in order that the projected works may be constructed as soon as possible, in the interest of the general public and especially in that of the Intercolonial railway, which could discharge its coal at Fraserville, instead of Lévis, thus saving fifteen or twenty thousand dollars on its annual expenses?

2. If so, will the honourable Minister of Public Works make use of the plans and specifications now existing in the department, and on which the preceding government was ready to ask for tenders at the time of the dissolution of parliament?

3. If not, what does he propose to do for the port of Fraserville?

Mr. MONK. It seems to me this question contains allegations of fact; however, I will endeavour to answer it.

1. It is the intention of the government, as soon as the appropriation of $70,000 referred to has been passed by parliament, to take the necessary steps to execute the work referred to in that appropriation.

2. The plans and specifications prepared already will no doubt be used by the department when the appropriation is at its disposal.

3. Answered by 1 and 2.

JUDGE BLAISE LETELLIER.

Mr. LAVALLEE:

1. At what place is the fixed residence of the Honourable Judge Blaise Letellier, one of the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec?

2. Is it within or without the judicial district of Chicoutimi, for which he was appointed?

3. Is it the intention of the government to favour the interests of the honourable judge in permitting him to continue to reside in Bruce, or will it, in the interests of the public, require the honourable judge to reside in the midst of those who could utilize his services?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. His residence was fixed by order in council, in accordance with the Quebec statute, at Chicoutimi.
2. Within.
3. The government is not aware that Mr. Justice Letellier resides elsewhere than at Chicoutimi, but the attention of the honourable judge will be drawn to this question.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT PASPEBIAC.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. Was Mr. Notary Beauchesne, of Paspebiac, county of Bonaventure, dismissed as collector of customs, who has been collector at the same place since 1905? If so, what was the exact date?
2. For what reason and who requested his dismissal?
3. Is the collector of customs at Paspebiac, Mr. Marcil, a brother or a relative of the member for Bonaventure?
4. Who recommended the appointment of the present collector of customs at Paspebiac and on what grounds?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. P. C. Beauchesne, collector of customs at Paspebiac, Quebec, was superannuated from 15th November, 1910, on his application for retirement.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. Thos. H. Marcil, the present collector of customs at Paspebiac, is a brother of the member of parliament for Bonaventure.
4. His appointment was recommended by the Hon. Wm. Paterson, Minister of Customs, on the grounds that the position was made vacant by the superannuation of Mr. Beauchesne.

2. Has a lease for such purpose been at any time drafted?
3. Has such lease been executed by the government and the trustees of said village?
4. If not, is it intended to have such lease completed? If not, why not?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. No.
4. This is receiving consideration.

Mr. LAVALLEE.

MR. J. F. THERRIEN.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has J. F. Therrien, Inland Revenue Officer of Nicolet, P.Q., been dismissed?
2. If so, on what grounds and at whose request?

Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. Mr. J. F. Therrien, Assistant Inspector of Weights and Measures, residing at Nicolet, has been dismissed.
2. His dismissal was on the grounds of political partisanship, and was the result of charges brought against him by the member for the riding of Nicolet.

IMMIGRATION FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TURRIFF. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), and to make the question plain it will be necessary for me to read a letter:

Winnipeg, February 12, 1912.
Re Wm. Pearson Co., Ltd.

As you are no doubt aware, the above mentioned company, of which I am vice-president, is conducting an extensive colonization business. During the years 1910 and 1911 we have paid out in actual cash something in excess of $600,000 in the business of bringing in settlers, and we have met with a large measure of success. During the past year we have sold some 60,000 acres in quarter and half sections to actual settlers, and we will have three train loads of settlers effects coming in this spring to settle on the lands disposed of last season.

Naturally the attitude of the Dominion government towards American immigration is of great importance to us, in view of the fact that we have still some 200,000 acres to settle.

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg to say to the hon. member that it is not permissible to bring in documents of a controversial character like that, and read them in the House for the purpose of founding a question upon them. I gave that ruling only yesterday.

Mr. ROGERS. It is all right.

Mr. TURRIFF. I submitted this to the Minister of the Interior, and it is necessary to make public the information in order to let the minister know——

Mr. SPEAKER. I have only to say that the ruling I gave is in accordance with the rules of he House.

Mr. TURRIFF: It is not a controversial matter; there is nothing of controversy in it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

NAPIERVILLE POST OFFICE SITE.

Mr. R. LANCTOT (Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if he has given instructions to the Justice Department to pay Mr. Pierre Bourgeois, of Napierville, for the land bought from him last summer, as a site for a public building.

Mr. MONK (Translation.) Does the hon. member ask me if the department has given orders to begin the construction of a public building at Napierville?

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation) No, order to pay the land bought by the government during last summer for this building.

Mr. MONK (Translation.) My department is just looking after the settlement of this part of the transaction conerning the land, and I think there is something left over; the transaction is not yet completed.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation.) Here is the answer which the hon. minister gave on 1st of February:

Mr. MONK (Translation.) The information which I have given to the hon. member, is the one which has been furnished by the officers of my department. I think that this business has been sent over to the Justice Department. I will make inquiries, and I will be afterwards in position to inform the hon. member.

This question has been, I think, delayed long enough. The cheque has been sent at Napierville since many months, and I think that in justice the Department of Public Works should pay that land immediately.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I have already ruled, the introduction of any controversial matter to be read in the House for the purpose of basing a question on it at this stage is against the rules of the House. An infraction of that rule cannot be tolerated on the plea of asking a question. I call the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Lanctot) to that rule. I trust that the hon. member, speaking in a language with which he thinks I am not familiar, would not assume to himself rights, which under other circumstances, would not be granted.

SOUTH AFRICAN BOUNTY SCRIP.

Mr. KNOWLES. I wish to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior, and also to call his attention to what I think is a matter of grave importance. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman when we may expect to know the action of the government in respect to the South African Volunteer Bounty Act and to call his attention to the fact that his delay is causing a great deal of inconvenience and suspense to the people who are waiting the decision of the government with respect to the extension of the South African Bounty Scrip.

Mr. ROGERS. I am fully conscious of the delay that has taken place and I hope to be able to bring the Bill down early next week.

IMMIGRATION FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TURRIFF. I wish to put a question to the Minister of the Interior. It is generally reported through the American press that the present government is opposed to American immigrants coming into Canada, and that report has been circulated in a manner to do a great deal of harm to Canadian interests.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member is quite out of order in trying to discuss a question like that at this stage, or to place before the House any subject that may be of controversial character, and which may lead to discussion.

Mr. TURRIFF. I shall not transgress any further, but I think I am entitled to ask a question, and I want to ask whether the government is opposed to immigrants coming in from the United States. I could have put the matter a great deal plainer, if I had been allowed to explain it a little.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. ROGERS. This is a very important question and in case it might be misunderstood, I hope I will be allowed to answer the question put by my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) I may say in the first place that I regret to learn from him that the American newspapers have given expression to the statement that this government is opposed to American immigrants coming into Canada. We want to get as many settlers from the United States as we can, believing as we do, Mr. Speaker, that we will get a class of immigrants from the United States who will make highly desirable settlers in this country, because, as we know, they have a knowledge of the conditions prevailing here. I want to say to my hon. friend that we will continue in that course in the hope that we may bring about a very large immigration from the United States, feeling as we do that these immigrants will better their conditions in this country as have those who have already come to us.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House in committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act by providing—

(a) for the temporary employment of railway mail clerks for a period of not more than one year, at a salary of $500 and mileage allowance;

(b) for the appointment of temporary railway mail clerks as permanent clerks, with salaries not exceeding that which they received as such temporary clerks, but who shall not be eligible for an increase of salary until they have passed the necessary examination. —Mr. Pelletier.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. PELLETIER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 105) to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act by—

(a) changing the classification of the clerks in the city post offices, offices of the post office inspectors, office of superintendent of railway mail service, and in the money order exchange offices by abolishing the stampers and sorters class and fourth-class clerkships, and substituting therefor third-class clerkships, ranging from $500 to $1,000, and divided into two classes known as third-class 'A' and 'B.'

(b) abolishing the junior and senior second-class clerkships and substituting therefor classes 'A' and 'B' of the second-class, and increasing the maximum of the class formerly known as junior second, and now known as class 'B,' to $1,200, and increasing the maximum of class 'A,' corresponding with the former senior second-class, to $1,400.

(c) dividing the first-class clerkships into division 'A' and 'B' with maximum salaries of $1,800 and $1,600, respectively, and increasing the minimum of the first-class clerkships from $1,200 to $1,400, and creating a new class of clerks, to be known as chief clerks, in the city post offices, subject to certan restrictions;

(d) improving the position of office superintendent in city offices, and changing what was formerly a fixed salary of $1,800 to a minimum of $1,800 and a maximum of $2,500;

(e) providing for the employment of temporary clerks in the above named offices for a period of not more than one year, at a fixed salary of $500, and temporary helpers to meet the exigencies of the service at a salary not exceeding $2.50 a day;

(f) increasing the salaries of certain inspectors, assistant inspectors and superintendents of railway mail service in recognition of years of service;

(g) increasing the minimum of the salaries of inspectors and superintendents of the railway mail service from $1,600 to $1,800.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. PELLETIER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to amend the Civil Service Act.

Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I ask the Postmaster General if he would be kind enough to have prepared a tabulated statement showing the number of offices affected, the number of employees and the amount involved annually by the changes which are brought about by this legislation? At first sight I am quite favourable to the principle, but I would like to see a tabulated statement showing the number of offices and the amount involved by this legislation. I think the minister will find in the department forms covering that information because formerly, when similar legislation was introduced, tabulated statements were furnished.

Mr. PELLETIER. I have had a memorandum prepared for my own information and when the matter is taken up in the committee I will be pleased to supply the information.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I just want the figures with reference to the various classes affected.

Mr. PELLETIER. I am afraid that it might take some little time. I might let the hon. gentleman have my copy.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the minister will send me his copy I will be very glad.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE GRAIN ACT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting grain—Mr. Foster (North Toronto).

On section 46:—fees for examination.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is a clause upon which there was a little discussion and it was allowed to stand over. After looking into it I cannot see any way of making a change in it that would be more satisfactory. There are eight or ten examiners, there are not many who go up for examination, the maximum fee is $20 and with travelling expenses, secretarial fees and whatever is necessary there is not much left to be distributed and these examiners get nothing else except what they get from fees. There are no statistics in the department with reference to the matter at all. It is arranged by themselves and as far as I know there has never been any complaint in regard to it.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is responsible for the Bill and its amendment and I would not delay the committee at all to discuss this provision further than to state that I entirely disagree with the position he takes and I think that what has occurred in the past and the fact that there is no information about it in the department is no evidence as to what course should be pursued in the future.

Section agreed to.

On section 48, subsection 3:—standards.

Mr. OLIVER. In section 48 there was a subclause added. We had a subsequent discussion on that subclause. Has the minister reached any further conclusion in regard to it or does he still stand by the subsection?

Mr. FOSTER I think there was an addition made to that clause.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, there was an addition, but I called the minister's attention to the fact that it was possible that the addition had been made under some misapprehension and I asked for his further consideration on it. The point considered under this section was that the grade established by the standards board would be subject to approval by the commissioners. These grades are fixed by a board of experts and then their decision is made subject by this provision to review by the Board of Commissioners who are not experts.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I gave further consideration to that and probably under the circumstances it is best to leave it with the standards boards itself.

Mr. OLIVER. I would think so.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will move to strike out subclause 2 of that section.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 80,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We made an adition to that clause, adding a third to the two already existing exceptions to the general rule. Further investigation shows that the number of cases of that kind so far have been very few, and there is a possibility that if the person who is receiving the grain, having bought it some time before, finds that the price has gone down in the meantime, there is an incentive to raise the question and to try to get out of his obligations. I therefore move that section 80 be reconsidered, and that the amendments placed there the other day be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 91,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Section 91 now reads:

All grain produced in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and in the Northwest Territories, passing through the Winnipeg district en route to points to the east thereof shall be inspected.

There seems to be no reason why the words 'en route to points to the east thereof' should be considered in that section. All grain has to be inspected which passes through the Winnipeg district. It may be routed to Fort William or any point in Eastern Canada, but it may also be routed south, or, when the Hudson Bay railway is opened up, it may be routed north. I move that these words be struck out.

Mr. OLIVER. Where is the grain inspected, that goes by the Great Northern line from southern Manitoba to Duluth.?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). At Duluth, by one of our inspectors.

Mr. OLIVER. Does not all this grain originate in the Winnipeg district, and it passes out of the Winnipeg district.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Where does the Winnipeg district extend to?

Mr. OLIVER. It is indefinite, but it certainly extends just as far as Portage la Prairie.

On section 96—regulations as to binning and cleaning,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I move that the following be added as subclause 2:

2. In any terminal elevator where facilities do not exist to permit of the inspecting officer securing proper samples of grain which is being shipped from such elevator, the board may order the warehouseman of such elevator to immediately supply such additional facilities as in its judgment will secure the desired results. Any terminal warehouse man neglecting to comply within thirty days with the order of the board as aforesaid shall be guilty of an offence and punishable upon summary conviction with a fine of not less than five hundred dollars for each such offence.

In some elevators the light is so defective that the inspector is unable to obtain a good view of the grain as it passes. He has to reach away down in a rather dark place to take his sample, and while he is doing that things may happen. This provision simply lays on the warehouseman the duty of providing fair facilities for the inspection, and imposes upon him a penalty if he does not comply with the request of the board.

Mr. OLIVER. The amendment is probably necessary, but it is fairly long and cumbersome. Would the minister have any objection to let it stand until we have the opportunity of seeing it in print tomorrow?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Not at all.

Motion allowed to stand.

On section 104—offices in Winnipeg,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). For some time past there has been a demand more or less strong, and gradually growing more strong, for the establishment of a grain survey in the Calgary district; and in view of its geographical position and of the outlet to the west at the head of which Calgary stands, it is proposed to make provision in the Act for the establishment of a Survey Board and for placing Calgary in that respect in the same position as Winnipeg in the eastern part of the western division. Therefore, I move that the following section be added immediately after clause 104:

104A. An additional Survey Board shall be established appointed for the District of Calgary in the western inspection division, with such powers and under such special regulations and restrictions as the board may from time to time determine.

2. The said Survey Board shall consist of six persons, to be nominated by the Board of Trade of the city of Calgary, the competency of the persons so nominated to be approved by the board.

3. The provisions of section 101, subsection 3 of section 102 and section 103 of this Act shall apply to any such Survey Board.

I propose to move this, and then allow it to stand for the consideration of the committee. It involves looking into some sections, and it involves an amendment to another section which I intend to introduce.

Mr. OLIVER. I would ask the minister to take into consideration the advisability of distributing to some degree the right of nomination to this board. I do not wish at this moment to suggest anything definite; but I think that in the case of the standard board certain other important and responsible bodies are given the right of nomination. I think it would be well to apply that principle to this Survey Board at Calgary.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have paid some attention to that, discussing the matter with my officers. The governments practically of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, had the right of nominating one half the Survey Board as it at present exists. The question that my hon. friend has raised is, as to whether similar procedure should not be carried out with reference to the Calgary board.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). As a matter of fact that portion of it which was thought to distribute the nomination of the different provinces in conjunction with the Winnipeg Board of Trade, has practically operated to no advantage, the result being that in the process of working out, those from a distance never attended, and it has practically been the work of the nominees from the Winnipeg Board of Trade. Whether or not the same machinery should be created for the purpose of lying there inoperative, was the question that I considered, and concluded that it would be as well to put the power where there would be an active, personal ready responsibility. However, we can discuss that question when we come to it later.

Mr. NEELY. Would that mean that all grain going east of Calgary as well as grain going west, would be inspected at Calgary?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is inspected in Calgary now.

Mr. OLIVER. Grain going west?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES. By government inspectors? I wanted to ask the minister if he would take into consideration the question of amplifying this amendment so that it would if necessary operate in other places. It is not necessary to describe Calgary, or any other town, at present, in the Act, to recognize the principle that it is possibly in the development of trade to have one not only at Calgary, as it seems now, but at other points from where, in course of time, the grain may eventually be found to be moving in large quantities. I would ask the minister to take into consideration the drafting of a clause such as this: That the board and the Governor in Council, if sometimes they found the necessity to arise, may have power to establish at other places what we are in the Act proposing to do and establish at Calgary. In this way every precaution would be provided. The Governor in Council would have to approve of it, and the board, and there would then be permanency in our legislation, and we would not have to go back to parliament any time a change was suggested.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). At present my hon. friend (Mr. Knowles) will recollect that the Act gives power to the board to make subdivisions within the inspection division if they wish. At the present time it would seem as though Calgary were the important point, and the only very important point, requiring this. The time may not be very long distant when Edmonton may be a city which stands at the opening of an avenue of grain to the Pacific coast through the new railway when it is completed. But parliament always meets once a year, and it is probably just as well for parliament to pass upon important matters of that kind. In any case if the board should come to the conclusion that a subdistrict was necessary within the inspection division for inspection purposes that could be done. Of course other points, and similar requirements, could not be arranged without special legislation We have discussed that matter pretty fully, and I think at the present time this legislation will be all that is necessary.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it proposed to make provision for constituting Calgary an order point?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will come to that a little later.

Mr. KNOWLES. I would ask the minister if within the subdivisions the grain is already inspected and gets the regular government certificate as to its grade the same as at Winnipeg?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If a subdivision was made and a district constituted, it would then carry with it the inspection of the grain, and the inspection of the grain would carry with it the grade. But my hon. friend will see that it is inadvisable to amplify this unless there is some real necessity for it for various reasons.

Section allowed to stand.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We now come to the matter of the standards which were left off the other day. In section 105 some changes were made in the definitions under oats, barley and peas. That necessitated the placing of a clause in section 105 to prevent confusion as between the time of the passing of this Act and the first of next season. The law clerk has looked over the amendment which was proposed and has come to the conclusion that it does not quite meet the case and is not quite in legal phraseology, and he has drawn a clause which I will move to substitute for subsection 2 of clause 105. It reads:

2. This section shall not come into force until the 1st day of September, one thousand nine hundred and twelve, and until the said date such provisions of the Acts mentioned in section 247 of this Act as relate to matters dealt with by this section shall continue in force.

That I suppose is plain enough. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) want this to stand as well or shall we substitute it?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would be as well to let it stand.

Section allowed to stand.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). In the case of section 107 the same remark applies and the same procedure will be carried out —the clause prepared by the law clerk will be substituted. I move to substitute it for the present standing subsection 2. The clause reads as follows:

2. This section shall not come into force until the 1st day of September, one thousand nine hundred and twelve, and until the said date such provisions of the Acts mentioned in section 247 of this Act as relate to matters dealt with by this section shall continue in force.

Section allowed to stand.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We next come to the matter of changing the names of the grades, which was pretty fully discussed in committee on a previous occasion. Two things are apparent—that the committee is not all agreed upon either one or the other names. The proposition I made was to eliminate 'Manitoba' and substitute the words either 'Canada' or 'Canada Western'. I have not particularly changed my views with reference to it. But I never like trouble in the family, and some of the younger members of the family are very tenacious of the old name. I do not like to inflict any unnecessary pain upon good members of the family by withdrawing from them a name which has been dear to them from their youth up. They seem to have been cradled on Manitoba wheat, brought up on Manitoba Hard or No. 1 Northern, and it has gone to the very root and fibre of their being. I am not so hard hearted as to try to pull it up. However, there is another consideration that has been presented to me that although it would not make much confusion in the matter of wheat. I am told by exporters of flour that to change the name from 'Manitoba' might have a far-reaching effect in the matter of flour, it would not have so much effect in respect of wheat. The flour which is made from wheat is sold in countries to which it is exported under 'Manitoba' of different grades, and the fear has been expressed by large exporters of flour that some confusion and possibly loss might ensue if the names were changed. Under these considerations I think it would be just as well for us to leave the matter stand as at present.

Mr. OLIVER. In regard to all the different grades?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes, so far as wheat is concerned.

Mr. OLIVER. I hope the committee will pardon me for saying that I think this is a case where second thoughts are not the best. I think the committee came practically to a certain conclusion on the previous occasion. The committee accepted the minster's suggestion, but added somewhat to it; it was the suggestion, at any rate, upon which the majority of the committee would have agreed, I think. I would strongly urge that if there is any difficulty about changing these names that difficulty will increase year after year, and not diminish. There is no doubt at all that the names at present are an anomaly I venture to express the opinion that the reason given by the exporters of flour has absolutely no foundation. They are at liberty to call their flour by whatever name they please; as a matter of fact any change we would make in this Grain Act would not prevent them from doing so still. I cannot think that there is any warrant for their position in this matter. They would be, by all the laws of right and reason and morality, perfectly entitled to name their flour 'Manitoba', although it was made from northwestern wheat, or wheat that carried the name 'Canada Western.' They would surely have just as much warrant in giving their flour the name 'Manitoba' as they have to-day in giving their flour that name, although the wheat from which it is made never saw Manitoba. I presume that is exactly what is done. We will suppose that flour ground at Moosejaw carries the name 'Manitoba' but it never saw Manitoba. There is in that no moral wrong, that I know of. There is a certain quality expressed by the name, and that quality would be expressed by the same name just as well, though the wheat was marketed under a different name. I would urge this upon the minister, who I am sure takes a deep interest in this Bill, and I have no doubt he is taking a pardonable pride from his connection with it. But there are many others of us also who feel an interest in having legislation passed in such a shape that it would reflect credit upon us, and not condemn our judgment, not to say our common sense, if we allowed legislation to go through that, on the face of it, was not reasonable, and did not convey the idea that it purported to convey. Particularly is that the case now when we are submitting a new Act such as this, and under existing conditions it would be scarcely creditable to us if we did not, at as early a stage as possible, correct the anomaly that I have mentioned. We have no fault to find with those who in the first place gave these names to those grades, but conditions have changed since that time.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to emphasize if possible the line of argument taken by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Whatever difficulties exist now must become greater and greater each year as the proportion of wheat grown in Manitoba to the total wheat grown in the three prairie provinces, becomes less and less. I am sure the members for Manitoba will realize that we are not asking anything unreasonable. We are not asking for a name that will designate Saskatchewan as the producer of that wheat, or designate Alberta as the producer; we are only asking for a name that will be as satisfactory to Manitoba as to the other two provinces. Since this matter was up for discussion the other day I have had an opportunity of talking with a member of a large milling concern, and he says that if the change is made as proposed by the minister, that is, to bracket the former name, with that protection the millers cannot suffer any injustice. I am sure that if this name is not changed at the present time, it will be a continual source of more or less irritation, it cannot be otherwise As the hon. member for Edmonton says, we are revising this Bill from one end to the other and we ought now to make this change, especially as we are not suggesting anything that anybody in Manitoba would have any good ground to object to.

Mr. KNOWLES. I thought it was settled the other day that we were going to change the name, the understanding being that we should adopt the name of either 'Canada Western' or 'Canada.' I am more strongly of the opinion that the time has come to change the name than I ever was. The other day the minister was not able to see any reason why the Act should not be amended in this particular, and I will say without flattery, that he has, I think endeavoured to be reasonable in this Bill and to do what the committee thinks best.

I think he will agree with me that it is the only practical thing to do, that the name should be changed and that the time is opportune for changing it. I question very much if the minister has changed his opinion. The only reason that he has given us is that he has light on the question different from what he had before with regard to millers giving a name or designation to their flour that they supply to the world's markets. As a matter of fact they call their flour by different names but the word 'Manitoba' does not appear in connection with it. Amongst the most famous brands of flour that I know are the 'Purity Flour,' 'Five Roses Flour,' and 'Robin Hood Flour.' These three, and the greatest of these is Robin Hood, which, everybody knows, is made at Moosejaw, these brands are known all over the world. I never heard of any well-known flour that has the name 'Manitoba' associated with it at all. As my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has said, they can still, especially in the foreign markets, call their flour by any name they like; they can call it Manitoba, or Saskatchewan or any other name. But, the point remains that the name 'Manitoba' is not a proper name, it is not suitable, it is not just. Manitoba at present raises only a small proportion of the wheat that is grown on the prairies. I do not think an argument can be made out by hon. gentlemen from that province for the continuation of the name 'Manitoba.' I appreciate the view which the minister took in the first instance, and I do not appreciate the view which he expressed this afternoon. He says that the change is due to the expression of views which he has had from members of his family. I can realize that the members of his family, especially those who come from the province of Manitoba, are quite capable of expressing their views, because I know that they are not notorious for hiding their light under a bushel. I am afraid that the change is due to the fact that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) has been able to influence the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am on the side of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I want to uphold his hands, I think he held the right view and that he holds the right view still, but that he was influenced by the Minister of the Interior. I can see his fine Italian hand in the matter and I have no doubt that he and the gentleman at his back from that province have been able to exert sufficient influence to cause the Minister of Trade and Commerce to change his mind and to adopt the suggestion that the name 'Manitoba' be retained. I can quite appreciate the views held by hon. gentlemen from Manitoba; I suppose that if I came from Manitoba I would hold the same views, but I think that, taking an impartial view of the merits of the case, the view expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and practically agreed to by hon. gentlemen from Manitoba the other day, is the view which should still prevail, and therefore I beg to move:

That section 107 be amended by striking out, in line 18, the word 'Manitoba' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'Canada Western.'

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Mr. Chairman, I spoke on this question the other day, and I said then that the wheat that was grown in southern Manitoba was the best wheat in the world. Some hon. gentleman took exception to that. I looked up the proof in the meantime and I wish to give the evidence in connection with this matter. We had Dr. C. E. Saunders giving his evidence in the Agricultural Committee in 1910 and on that occasion he said:

By Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar):

Q. What reason do you give for the quality of wheat in Manitoba being better than the quality in other districts?—A. A more favourable ripening season; warmer weather.

Q. Superior to Saskatchewan?—A. Yes, I think, from my baking tests.

These were actual tests in baking.

Q. If you were a miller would you pay more for Manitoba wheat than Saskatchewan wheat? A. I think probably I should be willing to pay a little more especially in an unfavourable season, provided the Manitoba wheat was of the same grade and equally good in appearance.

Here we have the statement of the best qualified man we have in Canada, a man who has gone into this question fully and made actual tests by baking the flour, and his evidence goes to show conclusively that the wheat coming from southern Manitoba is the best wheat grown in the world to-day. As for this change that is proposed by my good friends from the west from 'Manitoba' to 'Western' or 'Canada' wheat, as far as 'Canada' wheat is concerned, I do not think we should consider that for a moment, and as far as making it 'Western' wheat is concerned, I do not think we should consider that either, because, as I stated the other day, Manitoba was the first province to go into the growing of wheat in western Canada, and I think that Manitoba is entitled to have the name of the wheat remain as it is.

Mr. KNOWLES. Why has she any more right than the rest?

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Because the name is there and it is established all over the world. There is no reason for the change.

Mr. KNOWLES. The hon. gentleman surely will not say that because a person has had a favour he is entitled to a continuance of that favour?

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). It is not a favour at all; it is a name that is established all over the world, and why change it?

Mr. KNOWLES. We might let you keep it if you said it was a favour, but when you say that you have a right to it, that is different.

Mr. TURRIFF. If the grain grown in southern Manitoba is the best that is grown, how does my hon. friend account for the fact that last year, when there was a prize given of $1,000 in cash for the best wheat, the wheat that won that prize was produced not in southern Manitoba and not in southern Saskatchewan, but in the more northern portion of the province of Saskatchewan. I have no doubt but that you can take samples of wheat from southern Manitoba, which grows fine wheat—I cannot complain of the quality of wheat in southern Manitoba—compare that with wheat from some parts of Saskatchewan and the Manitoba wheat may be found to be better. But what I claim is that wheat on the average grown throughout southern Manitoba is not any better than wheat grown throughout southern Saskatchewan, because it is practically the same class of wheat, and I know as a matter of fact that the millers, who are better judges than anybody else, keep their analysts there every day to test every car load of wheat having reference to where it comes from, and they say that the wheat of southern Saskatchewan is equal in every respect to wheat from any other part of the west. A great many portions of northern Saskatchewan also produce equally as good wheat for milling purposes; so that the claim that Manitoba wheat is better cannot be made good if you go to the men who buy wheat for grinding purposes and pay for it, because they pay just as much for wheat grown west of Manitoba as they do for wheat grown in Manitoba.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). The hon. gentleman asked me how I accounted for wheat in Saskatchewan winning the thousand dollar prize. That brings us to the question of the grading of wheat in western Canada, and, in my humble opinion, the grading of wheat in western Canada is on a wrong basis.

I consider that all wheat should be tested, and graded according to the test, and that the system should not be as it is at the present time. In the grading rooms in Winnipeg, you find a long table with hundreds of samples, and they will look at each sample and they will grade it according to its appearance as No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 and so on, while, as a matter of fact, if you would test each of these samples, as has been done in some cases, you would very often find that No. 3 would make just as good flour, as No. 1 or No. 2. I consider that the system should be changed, and the wheat graded according to actual tests.

Mr. BLAIN. When the matter was considered before by the committee, I expressed myself in favour of the change proposed by the minister to call it 'Canada Wheat.' I still hold the same opinion, but I have strong objections to the proposition of my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) because that name would make the distinction between one part of Canada and the other even more pronounced than the original name 'Manitoba.' I say this for fear I may be misunderstood. If the alternative is between calling it 'Canada West' or 'Manitoba' for my part I would prefer to make no change and all the more so because the name 'Manitoba' has earned a distinction in the markets of the world for which the Province of Manitoba is entitled to credit.

Mr. ROBB. When the question was before the committee at its last sitting, I took the position that the word 'Manitoba' should remain. I am glad to know that the minister has repented and decided that he is not going to unduly interfere with the trade of Canada in the markets of the world by changing the name from 'Manitoba.' It is quite reasonable that our friends in Alberta and Saskatchewan should each stand up for the name which concerns his particular province, but I trust these hon. gentlemen will take a wider view of the question. Remember, that Canada has built up a large trade throughout the world on the word 'Manitoba' not only in wheat but in flour.

We might in this respect, take a leaf out of the book of our American friends under whose system all the wheat grown in the hard wheat belt of the United States northwest is practically recognized on the markets of the world as 'Duluth.' The mills in Minneapolis and Duluth grind millions of bushels of Kansas wheat, but they ship that flour out branded 'Minnesota,' and they do that because that name has earned a world-wide reputation. In the same way the word 'Manitoba' on our wheat to-day is worth millions of dollars to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. These other provinces will gain nothing by changing that name. Manitoba has a reputation in the wheat markets of the world, and it is worth more to the province of Saskatchewan than it is to the province of Manitoba, because Saskatchewan now produces more wheat than the older province. The hon. gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) made reference to the methods of inspecting wheat which he thought were wrong, and he gave as an instance that No. 3 wheat sometimes made better flour than No. 1, but he did not tell the House that No. 3 did not make as much flour as No. 1, and in that respect the grading is not too far wrong. I am glad the minister has decided not to interfere with the trade and commerce of the country by changing the name of our wheat. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) told us of a conversation he had with one of the large millers who said to him that our trade would not suffer any if the name were changed. Well, I have had conversations with large millers, and they expressed the opinion that if the government unduly interfered with the business of the country in attempting to change this name, there would be a great loss to the whole Dominion, and I fancy that the opinion of these millers has had something to do with the change of heart which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has experienced.

Mr. STAPLES. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) stated that we had practically agreed at the last sitting of the committee that we should change the name.

Mr. TURRIFF. No.

Mr. STAPLES. Well, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) certainly did make that statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no recollection of having made it.

Mr. STAPLES. My recollection is that nearly every man who spoke on the opposite side of the House stated that we on this side were agreed to change the name.

Mr. OLIVER. I want to say right here now that I absolve the hon. member (Mr. Staples) from having agreed, because I remember very distinctly his request for a different name.

Mr. STAPLES. That is just the point I want to come to, because I thought the hon. member (Mr. Oliver), had me in his mind when he made that statement. I was very careful to say that in case of a change I would prefer the name 'Prairie,' and I agreed to that only on condition that the word 'Manitoba' was to be changed at all. Of course, I would rather have the word 'Manitoba' remain. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), who is a practical miller, has told us that other millers in this country have stated to him that there would be a material commercial loss if we changed the name, and there is no doubt about that. I trust this committee will vote to retain the name 'Manitoba' which has done so much to establish throughout the world the high quality of wheat we are able to grow in Canada.

Mr. BRODER. We should consider the matter very carefully before we attempt to change this name. It is my opinion that whether you change it or not, the buyers on the markets of the world, who know the brand, will continue to call it 'Manitoba.' My advice is: let well enough alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRODER. We are often told that there is a broad spirit throughout the west, but some of the representatives of the west are very provincial when they get down here. The people of the other provinces were glad to call their wheat 'Manitoba Wheat' at one time, and that name has made a reputation well-deserved. Anybody who has experience of the markets of England, knows that there is great danger in changing a trade-mark, if that trade-mark has been satisfactory to the market, and that applies to wheat as it does to anything else. I believe we should retain the name 'Manitoba Hard' until we find something better.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend (Mr. Broder), has told us that no matter what name we apply to this wheat the millers will continue to call it by the present name.

Mr. BRODER. The change of the name would lead to confusion.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think so, there is no confusion when they grind Kansas wheat and call it 'Duluth,' and the hon. member (Mr. Broder), has said that the millers give the name 'Manitoba' to wheat that never saw Manitoba.

Mr. BRODER. I did not mention a word about the millers.

Mr. OLIVER. There is one point that I want to submit to the committee to show the absolute unfairness and injustice of the use of the name 'Manitoba' as applied to wheat. The higher grades are called Manitoba; the lower grades are not called Manitoba. So far then as the name goes as an advertisement, it is a notice to the world that the only high grade wheat is grown in Manitoba, and that wheat not of a high grade comes from other provinces. That is an absolute injustice to the other provinces. I produced here the other day the market quotations in the Manitoba 'Free Press,' and in these quotations the word 'Manitoba' was not used, because it happened, the grades that would call for that name were not on the market. I would like it to be thoroughly understood that this is not a mere matter of whim or caprice; I should think it is a case in which a very serious and grave injustice is done to three-quarters of the prairie area at the demand of one-quarter. That is not legislation that should commend itself to this parliament.

Mr. HENDERSON. As I stated the other day, I am not a resident of any of the prairie provinces and, therefore, I am not prejudiced in favour of one or of the other. I can quite understand that hon. members from Alberta and Saskatchewan may be prejudiced against the use of the name 'Manitoba.' The class of wheat and flour branded as 'Manitoba' has attained a high name in the markets of the world. I simply regard this name 'Manitoba Hard' as a name for a certain kind of wheat and I do not think it has anything to do with the particular part of the country in which it is grown. I believe that the western country would lose heavily if the name is changed. I think that people in Great Britain, and even Ontario, where they ask for 'Manitoba Hard' and are sent wheat called by another name, will have their suspicions aroused and will not pay the high price for it they otherwise would. I am conservative enough to stick to the old name and I do not think it is going to injure any of the other provinces. On the contrary, I believe it will be for the general benefit of the Dominion. I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce has decided to leave the matter where it was, where it is, and where I hope it will remain. For example, Indian corn is called Indian corn, no matter whether it is grown in Japan, or in Asia, or in The Argentine, and the giving it of the name Indian corn does not in any way injure the corn grown in the states of the American union. Indian corn is simply the name of a certain grain, and so it is that 'Manitoba Hard' has come to be the name of a certain species of grain, irrespective of where it is grown. We should leave it as it is and not take any chances.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived. Yeas, 38; Nays, 72.

Mr. KNOWLES. The other day there was a diversity of opinion as to whether, in case a change was made, we would adopt the term 'Canada Western' or the term 'Canada.' My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) on that occasion was so convinced that 'Canada Western' was the proper term that he made a motion to that effect. I find on page 2831 of 'Hansard':

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I move that it be amended to read 'Canada Western.'

I had an idea that the hon. gentleman's views would remain in a certain consistency for this length of time, but the Bill has been deferred longer than we expected, and his views have evidently changed. I do not know what view he would have taken if the Bill had gone over to the week end. Probably he would have come back to the view which he held on February 9. Of course, he is entitled to his views after the question had been discussed, as the minister said, in the family; and I congratulate him on the fact that the family gathered in a good sized audience without any desertions. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) the other day spoke with considerable emphasis in favour of the word 'Canada;' and hoping that he has not had the same experience as my hon. friend from Souris of getting lame in his views, I am going to move:

That section 107 be amended by striking out, in line 18, the word 'Manitoba' and inserting in place thereof the word 'Canada.'

This was the view which the hon. member for Peel held when we last discussed this matter, and I am sure he will second the motion.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I do not think any member on the other side besides the hon. member for Moosejaw was not aware that I stood strongly for the word 'Manitoba' and I gave my reasons. I was the first man to speak in favour of the word 'Manitoba' being retained. I am not at all fond of post mortems. I wanted a name that would designate our wheat as a western wheat, and if the word 'Manitoba' was to be changed, I was in favour of 'Western Canada' or 'Canada Western.' But first and last and all the time I was in favour of 'Manitoba' if it was possible to retain that name.

Mr. HENDERSON.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is hardly fair to myself, who promptly seconded the motion he made. I think he should in fairness have consulted his seconder before he changed his views.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That would perhaps have been more parliamentary, but I like the word 'Manitoba' better.

Committee divided on amendment of Mr. Knowles: Yeas, 31; nays, 43.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. OLIVER. I notice that the hon. member for Peel did not vote, and I would ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no ruling to make.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). With regard to barley, I move that after the word 'grain' in the 32nd line be added the words 'and shall weigh not less than 48 pounds to the bushel.'

Mr. OLIVER. I do not want to delay the committee, but I think really that in this particular case the name 'Manitoba' is so utterly preposterous that it might very well be changed. I think even the Manitoba millers would consent to that change, because Manitoba is not the barley growing part of the west; that province has no prominence in barley. Not that it makes any serious difference, but still for the sake of appearance in the Act I would respectfully suggest that a change should be made. I should think there ought to be no objection to giving it the name which was given to the oats in the immediately preceding part of the section, 'Canadian Western,' or 'Canada Western.'

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). This is a matter entirely for the committee so far as I am concerned. We have a general list already adopted and under that, eastern barley has been already dealt with.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). This deals with nothing but barley in the western division. Perhaps my hon. friend did not think of that.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to press it, but still it seems to me really so absurd that we could afford to make the change here so as to be conforming to the oats. The oats are classed as 'Canadian Western,' and it really seems to be very proper if the barley were classed in the same way, either 'Canadian Western,' or 'Canada Western.'

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Then if the committee will consider this: 'No. 1 Canada Western Barley.'

Mr. OLIVER. 'Canada Western,' I think would be better. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we make the designation 'Canada Western' in the case of both oats and barley.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is so in oats.

Mr. OLIVER. 'Canadian West,' as it is in oats.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have it changed in my notes.

Mr. ROBB. Perhaps the minister will explain to us what is the difference between the barley in the eastern division and the barley in the western division. I can see no difference, excepting in No. 4 grade, it is practically the same specifications.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I find the same weight.

Mr. ROBB. Excepting in No. 4 grade. In the eastern division it is 44 pounds and in the western 45 pounds.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I am not going to change the western. I find that although I made the suggestion and marked it in my notes, that in reference to oats, the title was left 'Canadian' instead of 'Canada.' I move to substitute 'Canada' for 'Canadian.' 'Extra No. 1 Canada Western Oats,' and the same in the other divisions 1, 2 and 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I move the same with regard to the items under the barley schedule. 'Canada Western Barely.' I move that the word 'Manitoba' be struck out in sections 1, 2, 3 and 4, and that the words 'Canada Western' be substituted. 'No. 3 Extra Canada Western Barley' shall be in all respects the same as No. 2 barley, except in colour, weighing not less than 46 pounds to the bushel.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I propose to make a little more change in the nomenclature or description of No. 3. Instead of No. 3, I propose to substitute the following:

No. 3 Manitoba barley shall be reasonably clean and reasonably free from all other grain and shall include weather stained and slightly shrunken or sound barley free from frost, and weighing not less than 44 pounds to the bushel.

And in No. 4 after the word 'All,' insert the word 'damaged.' The damaged barley comes down then from No. 3 to No. 4, and 45 pounds becomes 44.

Mr. ROBB. Would the minister explain what barley will come under No. 4? He says: 'All damaged barley.' Supposing that barley was so wet it would not be fit to ship, would it get the grade of No. 4?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If my hon. friend will refer to section 115 under all grains he will see where that was dropped.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Now at the top of page 30. We are going to be consistent and move that the word 'Manitoba,' in those two sections be struck out and 'Canada Western' substituted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). With reference to the next schedule, that of flaxseed. A conference was held by all the different interests represented, the growers of flaxseed, our inspectors, and the linseed oil men who manufacture from flaxseed, and some changes were unanimously agreed upon. I will give them, if members of the committee will follow the changes. No. 1 Canada Northwestern flaxseed should be mature, sound, dry and sweet, and contain not more than twelve and a half per cent of damaged seed, and weigh not less than 51 lbs. to the bushel of commercially pure seed. That is, 51 is substituted instead of 53, the idea being that flaxseed dries out rapidly. Instead of 52 pounds substitute 50, for the same reason. Then the third paragraph will read in this way: 'No. 2 Manitoba Flaxseed,' dropping out the word 'all' beginning the clause. Then it will read:

No. 2 Manitoba flaxseed should be flaxseed which is immature, or musty, or which contains more than twenty-five per cent. of damaged seed, and is fit for warehousing, and testing not less than 47 pounds to the bushel of commercially pure seed.

Mr. TURRIFF. Would that mean that it all had to be commercially pure seed?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes, it has to be commercially pure seed.

Mr. OLIVER. Would not my hon. friend make that name 'Canada Western'?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is what I proposed.

Mr. OLIVER. Would not my hon. friend consent to make the name 'Canada Western' the same as in the case of oats and barley? I think it would be better to have it uniform.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There is no objection. It is suggested that the first section should read as follows: 'No. 1 Northwestern Canada flaxseed.' Then the second one to read: 'No. 2 Canada Western flaxseed.' That makes it the same as oats except the first one.

Mr. OLIVER. I thought it would be well to make them all 'Canada Western.'

There is no possible significance in the words 'Northwestern Canada.'

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The commissioner thinks that it will be very much better to keep in the word 'Northwestern' because it is very well known.

Mr. OLIVER. I am informed that the proportion of western flax that is grown in Manitoba, and particularly Northwestern Manitoba, is infinitesimal. I do not think that Northwestern Manitoba is a flax growing country at all and I know that northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan are not.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is a grade that is widely and well known in the United States.

Mr. OLIVER. Having assented to one absurdity there is no reason why we should not assent to another. It is only for the sake of the credit of the grade and of the Act that I call the minister's attention to it.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If absurdities get deeply rooted in the market, whatever we may think of their getting into the law, I suppose they will have to stay.

Mr. OLIVER. I am informed that the whole of the exported product of northwestern Manitoba for one year is about one car load. There is no doubt that most of the flax grown in Manitoba is grown in southern Manitoba.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It has that name no matter where it is grown.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, my hon. friend is privileged to keep the name. I would like to ask the minister the reason for making the weight so far below the standard weight of flax as stated in section 58. In section 58 the standard weight of flax is placed at 56 pounds and we are making the maximum weight under this section 51 pounds. Would the minister give us the reasons for making that difference?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The weights under these grade standards are not put according to the weights in the section to which my hon. friend has referred: The section says:

58. In contracts for the sale and delivery of any of the undermentioned articles, the bushel shall be determined by weighing, unless a bushel by measure is specially agreed upon and the weight equivalent to a bushel shall, except as hereinafter provided, be as follows:—

Barley, forty-eight pounds;
Buckwheat, forty-eight pounds;
Flax-seed, fifty-six pounds;
Indian corn, fifty-six pounds;
Oats, thirty-four pounds;
Peas, sixty pounds;
Rye, fifty-six pounds;
Wheat, sixty pounds.

Mr. OLIVER.

the present standard is 53 pounds in the first case, 52 pounds in the second and 49 in the third, all of them, as my hon. friend will see, several pounds lower than the standard. These are lowered again as the result of a conference between the different interests on account of shrinkage by drying.

Mr. OLIVER. The matter comes with particular force because with all other grains we adopt a standard for the higher qualities which is higher than the weight laid down in the Act and I am afraid it will be argued that our flax seed is inferior on account of the lighter weight allowed notwithstanding the fact that we claim it is higher. That is a claim we make with respect to other grains for the higher qualities of which we prescribe a weight heavier than the standard.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is a matter that is more technical than my knowledge goes. I find that in the Minnesota grades in the United States the same disparity exists

Mr. OLIVER. What is their maximum?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Fifty-one pounds for No. 1 North Western flax seed. The others are exactly the same weight as ours.

Mr. TURRIFF. I think it is very advisable that our standard of flax especially should not be any higher than the standard in Minneapolis.

On section 115: no grade; condemned; rejected; scoured grain,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is proposed to remodel clause 115. The remodelling of the clause really brings things into parity with that which is now, and has been for years, the practice in the inspection followed by all the inspectors. I, therefore, propose that the clause shall read:

All good grain that has an excessive moisture, being tough, damp, or wet, or otherwise unfit for warehousing, shall be entered on the inspecting officer's books as 'No Grade' with his notations as to quality and condition.

Subsection 2 stands as it is in the present Bill. It is proposed that subsection 3 shall read as follows:

All grain which is unsound, musty, dirty, smutty, sprouted, or contains a large admixture of other kinds of grain, seeds and wild oats, or from any other cause is unfit to be classed under any of the recognized grades, shall be classed as 'Rejected,' with the inspector's notations as to quality and condition.

Subsection 4 and 5 stand as they are. As this is a change which is a little radical, although in accordance exactly with the practice of the inspection, I will move that, and let it stand for consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. When this section was considered before there was some suggestion with regard to hospital elevators, and it was suggested that some provision be made in this section. Has the minister made provision further on for preventing the mixing of good grain with inferior grain in hospital elevators?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). No, we will come to that in section 124.

On section 120: receipt and investigation of complaints,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The subsections there are (a), (b) and (c). It is proposed to add (d) and (e), and the purpose of the addition will be seen when I read the clauses:

(d) Of any violation of the provisions of this Act or rules or regulations in pursuance thereof.

(e) For the purpose of any such investigation, the board shall have power to summon witnesses, to administer an oath, to examine such witnesses under oath, and to compel production of all books and documents relating in any way to the matter complained of.

In the preceding investigations, it was found that they were much more difficult and in some cases, that they fell through for lack of these powers.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 124.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There was an opinion expressed against the mixing of grain in hospital elevators, and I understand the suggestion was carried so far as to say that no good grain should be taken into these hospital elevators at all. If that were done, I am told that the existence of these hospital elevators would be jeopardized, as it would leave little chance for them doing any work in seasons when there is not much damaged grain. The hospital elevator has been in existence for some years and it has given added value to a great deal of grain that would be otherwise valueless. I am informed that the hospital elevator has been caried on in a satisfactory manner so far as our officials know.

Mr. OLIVER. I am aware of the difficulty of preventing the mixing of good grain with the treated grain, once it is allowed into an hospital elevator, but, at the same time, I would urge on the minister that it is desirable to declare in the Act that such mixing shall not take place and then we would have to trust to the administration of the commission to ensure that mixing did not take place.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The Act now expressly forbids any mixing of grain in an hospital elevator.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think it is explicit in that.

Mr. FOSTER. (North Toronto). Yes, it prohibits mixing in a terminal elevator, and a terminal elevator is interpreted to include an hospital elevator.

Mr. KNOWLES. The restriction says that hospital elevators can only be at terminal points. I can conceive that there would be a possibility that an hospital elevator might be required at some other place. There is at present an agitation for the establishment of internal storage elevators and a concomitant of this is an hospital elevator. I believe the railways are regarding, with very considerable favour, the proposition to establish these internal storage elevators at different places. This past season has shown, as never before how it would have been profitable to have internal storage elevators to take grain away from the prairies to some railway centre where it could be stored and treated. If this plan were adopted by the railways at their own expense—I am not leaving out for the present the question of the government financing such internal storage elevators—there would be a necessity for hospital elevators in connection with them. A great many prominent farmers in the west are of the opinion that this question should be taken into serious consideration by the transportation companies and the government. If we had had such a system this year it would have meant the saving of millions of dollars to the farmers of the west. I would suggest that the restriction of confining hospital elevators to terminal points be omitted. Then again, the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed me some time ago that it was possible inspection might be arranged for at different internal places, calling them subdistricts within the inspection division. It is possible for the board, with or without the concurrence of the Governor in Council, to establish machinery, at points such as Saskatoon, Brandon and Moosejaw, for instance, without coming to parliament for further authority.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). So far as it appears to me now, I see no reason in the world why an hospital elevator should not be at at any other place as well as at Fort William or Port Arthur. In any case, there is no reason why at say an important place like Calgary, which may have a large storage elevator, there should not be an hospital elevator. If internal storage elevators are to be established throughout the west, it would be of the very greatest benefit that there should be hospital elevators in connection with them. While this section would not permit it, and while I do not see any reason why it should not be done, I will not make any change without further consideration. As to whether the board has authority to establish complete inspection districts, within inspection divisions, and to equip them as order points and the like of that, I think my hon. friend will come to the conclusion, when he studies the question, that the lesser the number of these subdivisions the better for the general working of the Act. My information is that they should be extended very conservatively and not without great public necessity.

Mr. KNOWLES. Suppose in the town of Moosejaw an internal storage elevator were to be constructed, and there would be an hospital elevator in connection with it, one of the advantages which is spoken of as being a strong one if that were done is, that the farmers would be able to get certificates showing the amount of grain they have there and the grading of it, and then be able to finance as now, when they have it in the ordinary elevators. Would this Act give power for the appointment of such necessary government officials as would grade that wheat and give such a certificate, without coming back to parliament to get the Act changed?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Sections 18 and 20 give full power to the board and the Governor in Council to establish inspection divisions for the inspection of grain, and therefore for the granting of certificates.

Mr. KNOWLES. That is satisfactory.

Mr. ROBB. The minister has promised to consider the advisability of permitting other hospital elevators throughout the country. I would point out to him that one of the functions of an hospital elevator is to remove certain small seeds from the wheat, and perhaps the best market we have for these screenings is in Montana where they feed sheep. If an hospital elevator were permitted at a point like Moosejaw, there would be a considerable saving of grain, for instead of shipping this stuff out to and back from Fort William, it could go in a direct line to the consumer south. Then again, when the Grand Trunk Pacific is ready to do business, no doubt they will have terminal elevators at Superior Junction or some point there for all their rail business in winter, and the grain may have to go into an hospital elevator for treatment, so that it would be necessary to establish one there. I would like the minister to take that into consideration.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That seems very reasonable.

On section 126, subsection 8—grades not to be mixed—

Mr. OLIVER. Should not the word 'public' be inserted in the first line of this subsection, before the word 'terminal,' so that the prohibition against mixing would apply to public elevators as well as to terminal elevators in the Western division? If there is mixing to be done, it would be done in these elevators.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will look into that.

On section 133—delivery of grain on return of receipt—

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). This clause has caused a good deal of protest, and I propose to divide the section into two parts, one referring to vessels and the other to cars; because under the conditions as they are to-day, and as they probably will be, it is pretty difficult to treat the two on the same plane. I propose to add to the marginal note after the word 'receipt' the words 'to vessels.' In lines 36, 39 and 45 I propose to strike out the word 'cars' and substitute the word 'vessels.' These changes will make the clause refer entirely to vessels, and they necessitate a second clause to meet the case of the delivery into cars. I propose to make that in this way: insert for the new sub-clause 2 as marginal note the following: 'delivery of grain on return of receipt to cars.' I propose this as subclause 2:

2. Sub-clause 1 shall apply in every respect to the delivery of grain to cars upon the return of any terminal warehouse receipt, with this exception, that the owner of such receipt or the terminal elevator warehouseman shall make demand in writing upon the railway or railways to place a car or cars upon the elevator track. Should their demand not be complied with within the said twenty-four hours, they shall have the right to apply to the board, who shall thereupon investigate the case. If upon investigation it is found that the railway company is not using due diligence in providing a reasonable number of cars, the board shall thereupon so notify the railway company. Should the railway company fail to comply forthwith, the board may make application to the Board of Railway Commissioners requesting them to issue instructions ordering the said railway company to forthwith provide the necessary cars. In case a reasonable number of cars are not so furnished the railway company shall be held responsible for such extra storage as is fixed by the board and shall upon demand pay the same to the board, which shall thereupon pay it over to the owners of the terminal elevator receipt.

The board shall make such regulations for application for and delivery of cars as may seem necessary to the Board for the proper carrying out of this clause.

There is nothing in the Act at present to make it necessary that the railway company shall furnish cars upon demand

The man whose grain is stored, and who wants to take it out for shipment to the east or anywhere else, surrenders his warehouse receipt and makes demand for transport, and the cars are requisitioned by the warehouseman; but if the cars are not provided, the grain of course cannot be moved, and the storage charges remain and are to be paid by the man who wants to take out his grain, but cannot get it taken out simply because there are no cars to carry it.

Now of course if we made the legislation in this way, that upon the surrender of the certificate the warehouseman, if it be a railway, should furnish the cars necessary, or in default of that should have to pay the storage himself, it could easily be seen that a very sharp game could be played on the railway. Those surrenders might be made over and above any possible chance for the transport being carried out, consequently storage would be thrown upon the railway company. It is proposed to guard against that in this way: That the cars shall be granted forthwith to the reasonable amount that that railway can be required to place at that point, and that if the railway do not acquiesce therein and the matter is brought to the attention of the board, then the board shall apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the Board of Railway Commissioners shall give its instruction according to its findings in the case. That protects the railway against anything unfair, and it gives the parties who have the grain stored here, a recourse as far as the railways can reasonably reach the demand for carriage. For the moment I will move this, and then allow these amendments to stand.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 151, country elevators and warehouses defined.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I want to make provision for seed elevators, of which I think there are two or three at present in operation. The seed elevator men want to be relieved from the obligation of storing grain, as they contend that indiscriminate storage of grain brought in interferes with their selection of seeds. I propose to add the following as 151a:

Any country elevator which is used exclusively for the purpose of receiving, preparing and shipping seed grain, which is the property of the owner or the property of such elevator, shall not be obliged to store the grain therein for any other person or persons than themselves.

'They should not be obliged,' they may if they choose. Then the following sections should apply to any such elevator, namely, 152, 153, except subsection 4, 154, 155 and 178. That brings them under the operations of the Act for statistical purposes and for bonding purposes, and for the inspection of their books. I move that addition, but as hon. gentlemen opposite would perhaps like to consider the question, I will allow it to stand.

On section 153, owners to be licensed.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The drafting of this section is objectionable, and the law clerk has given me a clause which reads better. I propose an amended clause to read as follows:

No owner or lessee of a country elevator shall receive, ship, store or handle any grain in or for such elevator unless he has first procured from the Board a license for such purpose.

Mr. KNOWLES. Are you going to leave the rest of 153 as it is?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES. I think there is need of re-drafting there. Clause (b) says the license shall specify the name of the person owning or operating such elevator. This would give to the applicant the alternative of giving the name of either the owner or the operator of such elevator. Supposing he wanted to suppress the name of the person operating, and to give only the name of the owner, he might do so. If it is important enough to have either one given, it should be necessary that the name of the person operating should always be given. If they give the name of the person operating, that is the person who would be the licensee.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The board will have that entirely in its own option. If it wants the name of the owner it can get it.

Mr. KNOWLES. I think it ought to be obligatory to give the name of the person operating, because that is the person who would be transgressing, if anybody did.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). The important matter in this section is to get the name of the person operating the elevator in the license. I do not think it matters who owns the elevator, because the lessee would be the licensee, and he must be responsible. I would suggest to strike out the words 'owning' altogether, that would make it obligatory.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We will strike out the words 'owning or' in (b).

On section 159, warehouse receipts.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) proposed that subsection 4 of section 159 be struck out and suggested a substitution which appears to be very satisfactory. I would move that subsection 4 be struck out and that there be substituted therefor the following:

Notwithstanding anything in this section the owner of such grain upon payment of all lawful charges as set out in subsection 2 hereof, may at any time within 48 hours after delivery of such grain at such country elevator, or at any time before such grain is shipped to a terminal elevator, require it to be shipped to any other terminal elevator herein provided, or to any railway station of the line of the railway on which the receiving country elevator is situated or on any line connecting therewith, unless the owner of such grain waives in writing his rights under the section.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 164, shipments out of elevators.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would move to insert after the word 'may' the words 'upon giving twenty-four hours' notice to the owner or his local agent appointed in writing.' Also to strike out the words 'at any' in line twenty-four and the word 'town' in line thirty-four, and to insert after the word 'therewith' the words 'and on the Great Northern railway.'

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I fear that subsection 4 of section 159 will conflict with section 164. You have in section 159 forty-eight hours' notice while section 164 states that he may ship it at any time on giving twenty-four hours' notice. Twenty-four hours' notice is too short to be of any service in the Northwest Territories, certainly in the portion of the country from which I come. If section 164 were made to read 'subject always to the provisions of subsection 4 of section 159,' you would have something reasonable.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I thought that clause 159 was more general, but I see that it refers to the shipper. They both appear to have about the same range. The object of the amendments in both cases is to give the owner of the grain a little longer absolute control so that if in that time he wishes to transfer it to any other place differently from the original intention, or to the far-off terminals, he shall have the privilege of a change in his mind or in conditions. Section 164 does not appear to differ very much, except that it refers chiefly to the elevator man. I think that in order to make them consistent we will have to make this 48 hours instead of 24, so that there will be no clash between the two, and it is not of so much importance to the elevator people whether it is 24 or 48 hours.

Mr. KNOWLES. I do not want to oppose this because I have no doubt it is done with the good intention of helping the owner of the grain. Personally, I cannot see how it is going to help him. I think that in the country elevators their clerical work will get all balled up if they have to give notice to the owner before they ship any grain. They are busy men, they are working where a gasolene engine is going all the time, and there is a considerable amount of noise. They remember the quotation of wheat that they get by wire every day and that is about all they keep in their heads more than running the concern. If you are going to make a rule that the elevator man has to notify the farmer 24 hours ahead of time as to what wheat is going out and that he has to post up the notice I think you will get these men into such a condition that they will not be able to do their work well. What the farmers themselves want is good service. The farmer wants to get his grain out. The one nightmare that troubles him is the difficulty of getting his wheat to the terminals. You are putting a brake on the machinery that is not necessary. Although the farmers have asked for this I cannot see why the farmers are going to object if their wheat is sent on after it has remained in the elevator 24 hours. This provision is not of very much use to the average farmer. He probably gets his mail three times a week and he may not get it as often as that. If this were simply left with the operator and were made subject to subsection 4 of section 159 it would serve the farmer fully as well. I think this other would lead to confusion and put a brake on the machinery for getting the wheat to the terminals.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). 'This other,' as my hon. friend terms it, gives a wider leeway and just as much leeway as is given by the amended section 159.

Mr. KNOWLES. I do not think the minister is correct in that.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The object of the request and the practical agreement we came to the other day with reference to it was to give to the owner of the grain, after he had put it in the elevator, a short period of control to enable him, if he wished, to direct it to some other place than that which he had in his mind when he first put his grain in there. You cannot give too much leeway in that respect; otherwise you ball up the elevator in the matter of delivering itself of the grain which is in store for others and the only way in which it can be practically worked out is to have the farmer, who does not live in the town, have somebody there to represent him. This is not a difficult matter at all. Every farmer has a friend in town. I suppose a great many of them make the elevator man their agent or ask the agent of the railway, or some friend, to become their agent. If you insist on a letter notice, registered or otherwise, you cannot give anything that will help the farmer and at the same time be fair to the transport and elevator interests. The simplest way seems to be that you should give notice to the agent of the farmer. The farmer can easily appoint in writing a friend, the elevator man, the station agent, or any one he pleases, as his agent. The agent can be notified and he will get word to the farmer if he thinks it is right to do so. I do not think that there will be any difficulty in the matter. As to balling up the elevator men about keeping track of their operations, I think they are quite able to keep track of their operations; in fact, the general impression out there among certain classes of people seems to be that they are quite too well able.

Mr. KNOWLES. I am not aware that the elevator men claim to be experts in clerical work. I do not think the minister has studied this matter as fully as he should have done. Subsection 4 of section 159 says that in any event after the wheat is put in the elevator it will remain 48 hours, unless the right to have it held is waived in writing. In any event it stays for that time. This clause has in contemplation to leave that wheat after it has been there probably a week or a month. The effect of subsection 4 of section 159 entirely ceases after the wheat has been there 48 hours. It has no more possible effect upon that wheat. This piece of legislation would have reference to wheat that has been there a month or three months. It will work out in this way. These elevator men do not know when the cars are going to come. My hon. friends on the other side of the House who live in the west know that nobody knows when cars will come. They will wait perhaps a week, when somebody gets busy down in the superintendent's office and then cars will be shooting in at the rate of eight or ten a day.

These men want to start loading as quickly as possible and they don't want to hang up everything until they write a dozen notices and mail them and wait twenty-four hours. If the minister is going to insist upon putting this provision in I am not going to protest against it any further, but I would ask him to insert in it the provision we have in subsection 4 of section 159, so that the man may waive the right to this in writing. I believe that when the farmers once understand it they will all waive their right and let their wheat go ahead.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Under subsection 4 of section 159 the man has to put his grain in the elevator and has his certificate and in that section the privilege is given to the owner and not to the elevatorman. That provision does not compel the elevator man to keep it there for forty-eight hours.

Mr. KNOWLES. I think so.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Not at all. This is a privilege granted to the owner provided his grain still remains there for that length of time and most of it remains longer than he wants it to remain. The owner has that length of time to change the consignment of the grain. If it is not previously shipped, he has that right unless he waives it. On the other hand section 164 deals not with the owner of the grain but with the operator of the elevator whose business is to store grain and also to get it forwarded. You should put no undue shackles upon him which will hamper him in getting the grain quickly away from his elevators and to the terminals. It was thought, especially by gentlemen on the other side, that to give the elevator operator the right to immediately without any notice at all ship the grain out, in a manner not contemplated by the owner of the grain, was a little arbitrary, and that the owner of the grain ought as far as possible, and to a degree which would not interfere with free transport, be warned or notified before his grain was shipped out by the operator to the terminal elevator. Then the difficulty arose as to how you were going to give a notice to a farmer living at a distance, and it was thought that the farmer should appoint an agent near the elevator to whom the elevator man would give notice. The two sections refer to different things.

Mr. KNOWLES. I cannot agree with the interpretation the minister puts on section 159. The minister interprets it to mean that a person may ship it where he likes only if it still happens to be in the country elevator, but I think the purpose of the amendment is that it must be in that elevator forty-eight hours unless the owner has waived that right in writing. There is no question in my mind but that the amendment gives to the person forty-eight hours absolutely, and he has the right to order that grain to be sent to any of these respective places within forty-eight hours, and he has a longer time if the grain happens to be there. However, I will let it go at that.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles) mean to say that the grain must remain there for forty-eight hours? What is the object of providing that the grain will have to stay there for forty-eight hours?

Mr. KNOWLES. I will state what was the idea in our minds. Suppose grain is put in at Swift Current, and the man wants to send it to Moosejaw mills, (which before they were burned down consumed a large quantity of grain, and which, when rebuilt, will require twice as much as they formerly did) and supposing these elevator people for some reason should endeavour to prejudice the business of another mill, they can tell the man the day after the wheat was put there that it had been sent to the terminal. This provision is to prevent that occurring. The elevators are sometimes owned by those who have interests in milling concerns and this provision is intended to prevent them in any way hampering the business of their competitors if they should think of doing so.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The man who stores his grain in the elevator with the idea of consigning it to a certain place can within 48 hours change his mind and consign it to another place. If he does not make up his mind within 48 hours, and makes it up later, if his grain remains there more than 48 hours, he will still have the same right. That is all that the section seems to me to convey. It imposes no obligation on the elevator man to hold the grain after the man's car comes.

Mr. KNOWLES. I would like the minister to ask his law clerk about that. It is a question of the interpretation of a statute.

Mr. STAPLES. Why should not the farmer have the right to order his grain where he sees fit so long as it is in the elevator, on giving due notice to the operator what he intends to do with it? As a farmer I have put wheat into an elevator, and before I could turn around it was forwarded to the terminals, when I could to my material advantage direct it to some other place. When I place my wheat in the elevator, I place it under the law that governs the charges. I am charged 1¼ cents a bushel for storing it for 15 days, and after that in proportion to the time it is there, and I do not think the operator has a right to send my wheat out without giving me notice. If I happen to be 10 or 15 miles away from the elevator, and the cars come, the elevator operator has a right to be protected. He may reach me by telephone if I happen to have one, but if he has to wait until he notifies me by letter, that takes a considerable time. If I want to protect myself as a farmer, the least I can do to facilitate the forwarding of that grain is to appoint an agent in town. I think the Bill as it stands covers the ground very fully.

Mr. KNOWLES. The wheat is tied up for 48 hours. I do not think the provision makes for the speedy handling of the grain if the car comes.

Mr. KNOWLES.

Mr. STAPLES. There could be difficulty only if the elevator were full and every man had to be notified; but there is always somebody whose grain is to go out without notice. It is a very extreme case that my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I suppose the operator of an elevator is not very much surprised when a car comes to his elevator. He keeps track of his orders, and knows pretty well whether he is to have a car or a couple of cars within a certain day. It seems to me there is no hardship to be apprehended on either side from the clause as it stands.

Section agreed to.

On section 191—loading platforms, location and dimensions—

Mr. STAPLES. I asked to have this section stand. The only suggestion I wish to make is that the railway company be compelled to make their loading platforms at least 24 feet wide. I ask for this not altogether for the convenience of the farmers in loading, but also for other reasons. It is found very inconvenient to unload such machinery as threshing outfits, separators, engines, etc., onto these loading platforms which are only 18 feet wide. The railway companies do not make them any wider or longer than the Act compels them to do. Therefore I ask that the width be made 24 feet instead of 18 feet.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would like to hear the opinion of the committee about that. These dimensions must have been fixed as being thought to be in the main satisfactory. Perhaps some other members of the committee would state their views.

Mr. STAPLES. I can speak from practical experience.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. STAPLES. I have loaded considerable grain on a loading platform and according to the way in which they are now constructed they are only 18 feet wide. You can only approach that car by driving alongside it, consequently you must build a spout from your wagon box in the car to slide your grain over. But I also have loaded off a platform that was some 20 feet in width. I discovered that I could drive on to that platform direct my horses as I thought fit, and back up to the door, and I was right up close to my work. I also found that two or three farmers utilized that very same platform, which is 54 feet long, and they could come up and do likewise. Three or four cars can be loaded from the same platform by extending the width just as you can load one from an 18 foot platform. Now the other point is this: When you get in heavy machinery such as threshing outfits you can unload off a flat car on to an 18 feet platform. You have got to use all kind of appliances, to get it shifted over and to run your machinery off. But if you have the 24 feet you simply cramp your front wheels when you draw it off on to the platform, and go on about your business. These are points I have in mind and I think they are worthy of a good deal of consideration.

Mr. CRUISE. As a farmer I have loaded considerable grain off the platform, and I have loaded it also off the ground, and I must agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Staples) who has just sat down. We have had great inconvenience with our platforms in Dauphin owing to their being too narrow. We have two platforms there and when you get two cars alongside of these platforms it is almost impossible to load them at the same time, whereas if they were extended to a width of 24 feet—and you might double that, but 24 feet is sufficient—that would be wide enough to back up to the car. I believe that if a platform is made 24 feet wide, so that the farmer can back up without any trouble there will be no trouble in loading the two cars off one platform. Of course there the platform is long enough to have three, but in the case of our platforms at Dauphin they are only long enough to load two cars, and it is very hard to load two cars when your teams have to be placed sideways to the car. My hon. friend (Mr. Staples) spoke of unloading traction engines. That recalled to my mind an incident that occurred a few years ago. We were unloading engines off the car on to one of these platforms, and owing to the narrowness of the platform the engineer, when he started the engine off the flat cars on to the platform, went right over the platform with the front wheels. He broke his collar bone—in fact was very nearly killed—and was in the hospital for three or four weeks. This is certainly a very important question, and in my opinion the platform ought to be at least 24 feet wide.

Mr. ROBB. Does the hon. member from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) claim that he can load three or four cars at the same time from a 54 feet platform?

Mr. STAPLES. I say that under the present conditions we can only load one practically, but you can load two, and if the farmers were agreeable and got their cars placed in the most convenient points, three cars could be loaded off the one platform.

Mr. ROBB. Off a 54 feet platform?

Mr. STAPLES. I never measured the platform, but I would say offhand that you can certainly load two.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). To give the Board of Grain Commissioners a right to say to a railway what the dimensions of their loading platforms and sidings should be, goes a long distance. I would rather not say positively in an Act that every loading platform should be 24 feet wide. At the same time, I would like to give some leeway to advice by the board. To say that the loading platform should be of such dimensions as may be prescribed by the board goes a little too far. You put into the hands of the board absolute power to make these loading platforms any length and width they please, and cause the transporting companies to build them and pay for them. They might make it very onerous for the transportation company.

Mr. CASH. These platforms are for loading grain on the car, not for loading machinery.

Mr. STAPLES. I would not like to extend to the board the powers the minister has just mentioned. I do not want to exact too much from railway corporations, and I do not think we are asking too much when we ask them to make these platforms at least 24 feet wide.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We will let 191 stand as it is; we will not get through the Bill for a few days.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to draw attention to section 169, which I think is mixed up. It mixes up both the country elevator and the flat warehouse. It reads as follows:

> Nothing in this part shall be construed as permitting the owner or operator of any country elevator to allot special bins to any buyer beyond the time allowed by the provisions of this part, or for purposes other than as stated in the provisions of this part as to flat warehouses, or shall require the owner of a flat warehouse to insure grain while in his warehouse.

Now, the provision for leasing bins in a flat warehouse provides that a farmer can have a bin in a flat warehouse for six days, and then one day to load the car, or whatever time is necessary. I was talking to one of the senators about this matter. This clause is exactly as it was in Bill Q last year, but this senator, who is pretty well posted, said that it got in by mistake. I think that clause should be separated, and the part referring to flat warehouses should go into section 185. In the first part of the clause we are dealing with country elevators, in the last part we are dealing with the insurance of wheat in the flat warehouse.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will make a note of that.

On section 207: equitable distribution of cars during car shortage,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). This relates to special powers given to the warehouse commissioner under the present Act, and to be given to the board under this Bill, giving them discretion to interfere with or make other disposition of cars in certain cases which seem to call for it. The two cases in which this can now be done are, first, the case of an elevator which is in danger of collapse; and, second, where the operator of any country elevator reports in writing under oath that some portion of the grain in such elevator is heated, and that it is necessary that the grain should be shipped for treatment in order to save it. The House also passed, and the Senate has to-day passed, a Bill to extend that discretion to two other cases, one for the purpose of distributing seed grain to any point in the western division, and to other places where the grain is damp, and thereby liable to become damaged. I propose to reconstruct that clause to include the provisions of the special Act just passed and to add thereto the following subsection:

Whenever after due examination the board considers it necessary and advisable in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the dispatch of grain.

I propose to have this added to the sections in the old Act and in the special Act, giving this further discretion to the board. As this is new matter I propose to leave the section in order that it may be printed and take it up at the next sitting of the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES. Has the minister had representations from the Credit Men's Association with regard to the legislation on the distribution of cars?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We have received a large number of petitions from this association. The prayer of the petition was that in order to effect the more speedy and economical transportation of grain, and, as it alleged, with the view of opening avenues for sales to farmers who have less than car lots to dispose of, the part of the Act relating to car distribution should be suspended. We have also received many petitions contrary to that from all parts of the country, and they are still coming in. At present there is a mild bombardment of opposing petitions, filling up the vacant spaces in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Western members will realize that the legislation on car distribution is very important and the prayer of the petition in that regard is not considered by myself to be one that can be complied with. In 1902 and 1905 the legislation was undoubtedly necessary, and I do not believe that it should now be suspended; but I believe that the commission may be trusted, in the case of great congestion or of unforeseen difficulties, to grant a further distribution of cars. It is a discretion which I believe a commission conversant with the conditions and disposed to do everything they can to improve those conditions would use with wisdom and possibly with very great advantage.

Mr. KNOWLES. I am in receipt of different communications, one a night telegram from Mr. F. W. Green, secretary of the Grain Growers' Association of Saskatchewan, who says that he has received many letters from people who had signed the circular petition of the Credit Association under a misapprehension and had asked to have their names removed, but the request had been refused, and from farmers generally denouncing the Credit Association's underhand trick. Could we have a copy of the petition?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Certainly.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am glad the minister proposes to allow this clause to stand over. When he comes to consider what, if any, amendments shall be made, I hope he will bear in mind that this petition of the Canadian Credit Association is probably engineered by the elevator companies. If there is one clause in the Grain Act that has been satisfactory to the farmers of the country it is the clause governing the distribution of cars, and while there may be certain odd cases where a small farmer may have been put to some little disadvantage, generally speaking it has worked extremely well and the farmers generally engaged in growing wheat in the west are very jealous of any change being made in that clause, as they feel that if any change whatever is made, it will work to their disadvantage. I am sure that every member from the prairies has received many circulars and letters from farmers and Grain Growers' Associations all urging that on no account should any change be allowed in the clauses of the Bill relating to car distribution.

I am merely mentioning that now, so that the minister will consider very, very carefully before he decides to make any change that would give any latitude more than there is at the present time on that particular subject.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I think the remarks I have just made will satisfy my hon. friend and the committee of the way in which I regard that section of the Act. I am not going to hunt around for any motive behind the petitions that have been circulated by the Credit Men's Association. Everybody has the right to petition, and these gentlemen, whoever they are, whether they are elevator men or business men—and I should scarcely be inclined to believe that it was entirely engineered by elevator men—but whether it be so or whether it be not so, the petition will be judged by the justice of its prayer rather than by how the petition was engineered or who got the names to be signed. I am quite aware of the importance of this clause to the farmers who wish to do their own shipping in car lots, or less than car lots. At the same time, I believe that in the hands of the commission a limited discretion may be vested and that it will be found to work well in the general administration and for the purpose at which this Act is aimed—the quick and speedy transportation of grain. The matter will stand, the amendment will be printed, and I invite members on both sides of the House to think this matter out and to help us to come to what will be the best conclusion in regard to it. Now, there is one other clause that I want to put upon the record. It is in regard to the completion of the Calgary district. In order to make the amendment which I gave notice of to-day, and which is upon the records, effective, something more has to be done and we are doing that in clause 208. It is as follows:

208. In line 35 strike out the words 'east of Winnipeg.'

Subsection 6, lines 17 and 18, strike out the words 'east of Winnipeg.'

Strike out paragraph (9) and substitute therefor the following:—

2. To the extent to which any provisions of subsection 1 of this section are stated therein to apply to Winnipeg or St. Boniface, such provisions shall also, to the like extent, apply to Calgary, and in every such case wherever the words 'Winnipeg,' 'Winnipeg-St. Boniface,' or Winnipeg or St. Boniface' occur, the said subsection shall be read as if the word 'Calgary' were inserted instead of the words 'Winnipeg' or 'Winnipeg-St. Boniface,' or 'Winnipeg or St. Boniface.'

3. The provisions of subsection 1 of this section shall have effect only from the 15th day of December in any year to the first of September in the following year.

The effect of this, when enacted, will be to erect Calgary into a point of inspection with a survey board and an order point as well, and to allow it to conduct operations from there as they are conducted in Winnipeg, in the eastern part of the division.

Section allowed to stand.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Then I propose the following amendment to section 247:

Insert at commencement of clause 247 the following:—

247. 'Except as regards the matters dealt with by section 105 and section 107 of this Act.'

And add the following to the end of the clause:—

'And as regards the matters dealt with by section 105 and section 107 of this Act, the said enactments shall be repealed on the first day of September, one thousand nine hundred and twelve.'

Section allowed to stand.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, in accordance with a notice I gave the other night, I wish to discuss for a short time the question of freight rates in Canada, and more particularly as they relate to the west. I wish to point out to the House the discrimination which exists not only as regards the freight rates paid by the people in the west as compared with the rates paid by the people in the eastern part of Canada, but also the great difference there is in the freight rates in the Canadian west as compared with the rates in the American west in those states immediately to the south of the Canadian boundary line, the rates in the Canadian west being much higher than those charged in the adjoining states. This matter has been up once or twice in the House during this session, but it is a matter of such immense importance, not only to the people of the west but to the people of Canada as a whole, that I feel I am quite justified in taking up a little of the time of the House to discuss it and to show in a practical form the great difference that exists. On a previous occasion when this matter came up for discussion I was asked by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, how came it that during all these years nothing had been done either by myself or other hon. members on this side of the House, and the hon. gentlemen opposite took it for granted that no effort had been made to bring this matter before the attention of the Railway Commission until the matter was brought to the attention of that body by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane). I want to tell these hon. gentlemen such is an absolutely erroneous impression, because, in so far as I am personally concerned, many months ago I went to the Railway Commission, took statements of the difference in freight rates, put them before the member of the commission who was particularly dealing with this subject and pointed out to him, on behalf of the people I represent in Assiniboia, that I complained of every overcharge that was specified in those papers.

I left these papers with him for over a week, and he pointed out to me that this was a very large question, that it would take a great deal of information to come to a decision, that there was the Vancouver rate case already before them, and that they hoped later on they would be able to give a decision that would be satisfactory generally. Therefore, the Chairman of the Railway Board was speaking without full knowledge of the facts, when he said that the case had not been brought to the attention of the commission until the Minister of Railways submitted it. In addition to that, I also brought this matter to the attention of Mr. Graham, the late Minister of Railways, and of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I had the promise of Sir Wilfrid that if the matter were not dealt with before this present session—at that time he thought he would be in office still—he would end the discrimination against the west by action taken in this parliament.

Mr. STAPLES. Did the hon. gentleman ever bring up the question on the floor of the House?

Mr. TURRIFF. I brought it before the Railway Commission, where gentlemen opposite have told me time and again was the proper place to bring it. I gave Mr. Graham, then Minister of Railways, notice that I intended to bring it up last session, but the obstruction tactics of the gentlemen now in power who were bound to prevent a vote being taken on reciprocity, precluded any possibility of my carrying out my intention then.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That is a poor reason.

Mr. TURRIFF. Well, the hon. gentleman from Souris (Mr. Schaffner), and his friends are now in power, and I intend to show them to-night the extent of the discrimination we are suffering under in the west, and it will be for them to remedy the existing evil.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. We will do it as you never did. You never brought the question before the House when your friends were in power.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am willing to admit that the late government did not do as much as they might have done, and perhaps were derelict in their duty in that respect, but they have been punished for their sins. Now that gentleman opposite are in office they have the power to give a remedy. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who will defend the principle that the people of the western provinces should pay from fifty to one hundred, and in some cases one hundred and fifty per cent higher for the same service than is paid by the people of the east? Will any one defend that state of things in face of the testimony of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company themselves that it costs very much less to operate the railways in the west than it does in the east. This is not a political matter; Liberal and Conservative alike have to pay the freight rates. The question is what remedy shall be applied, and in my judgment the best remedy is for this House to express the opinion that the time has come when the discrimination that exists against the west in the matter of freight rates shall be put an end to. The only thing that would justify that discrimination against the west would be if the cost of building railroads there and operating them were greater than in the east, but we have the testimony of the Canadian Pacific railway, as I have said, that the reverse is the case. I purpose to-night moving an amendment which is practically in the words of the resolution adopted by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, a body of business men largely interested in the welfare of the west, a body composed of men on both sides of politics, and that board has come to the conclusion that there should be no further discrimination against the west. I want to give credit, where credit is due, and I say here that a very large part of the information I purpose putting before the House to-night was obtained by me from the articles in the Manitoba 'Free Press' on this subject. The particular editor of the Manitoba 'Free Press' who had charge of this work, has done more in the last year to help us to get a change in these freight rates than did the late government, or this government, or the Railway Commission, or any other body. I admit, with regret, that before the publication in the 'Free Press' I did not know one-tenth of the extent of the discrimination against the west, and I do not believe that the former government, or this government, ever realized it. The man in charge of that particular work for the Manitoba 'Free Press', has I say, done more to bring about a change in the existing conditions than all the rest of us in Canada put together. Why, if the Board of Railway Commissioners had appointed one man like this gentleman on the 'Free Press' to do the work, they could get all the necessary information to enable them to take hold of the question and to deal with it. The chairman of the Railway Commission wrote to the Minister of Railways that no specific case has been brought to his attention, but if wrong-doing exists on the part of the railways, it is not necessary, and it ought not to be necessary, for some one to lay a specific complaint before that board.

The Board of Railway Commissioners is appointed for the express purpose of dealing with these matters, and in the Act appointing them they are given special powers to act on their own initiative. For such a board to say that there was any amount of wrong-doing going on, but that nobody had brought it to their attention, is to my mind only begging the question. They are there for the purpose of finding it out, and they have or should have a staff of experts to give them the necessary information. I do not want to say anything in criticism of that board. As I have said in this House before, I believe its chairman is the best man for the position in the Dominion of Canada. There are other good men on the board. But they have been crowded with work, much of it of a trivial character. They have been kept busy by the railway companies on one pretext or another, so that they have not had time to give, or at least have not given, the attention that should have been given to the subject of freight rates.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If they have not had time, what are you censuring them for?

Mr. TURRIFF. There are plenty of good men to be engaged. How did the Manitoba 'Free Press' get all the information? I do not suppose that its chief editor had time either, but he had the common sense to hire a man who could get it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Why didn't you have the common sense to advocate what you are doing now when you were on this side of the House six months ago?

Mr. TURRIFF. I did go to the Railway Commissioners six months ago, and if I sat on the other side of the House, with my friends in power, I would have brought the matter up before this time, and just as strongly and earnestly as I am doing now. This is not a matter of party politics at all There is an injustice to be rectified, and our hon. friends opposite are in a position to be able to rectify it. We on this side of the House can only bring it to their notice. But I think my hon. friend the Minister of Customs will have enough to do if he rectifies everything that is wrong in his own department. He may have trouble enough on his hands without trying to take the weight off the shoulders of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, who, I am sure, is quite able to look after his own department, and will be quite willing, when he sees the extent of the injustice, to relieve the people of the west. In order that the Board of Railway Commissioners may be enabled to handle this work, I am satisfied that that board must either be enlarged in number or be given more money and more help. They are not able, with the help they now have, to handle properly the business that comes before them. This House for the last three or four years has been placing one thing and another on the shoulders of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I think they have more than they can do. My judgment is that the board should not be divided into an eastern and a western section. I do not think that is necessary. I have no doubt there are injustices in the matter of freight rates existing in the east as well as in the west. My view is that one of these sections should deal solely with freight matters from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and that there should be on it representatives not merely of the east or west but of both. If this parliament expects the board to do the best work that is possible, it must supply it with the necessary amount of money to enable it to engage the proper kind of staff, so that it may be able to attend to the business. Suppose it did cost $50,000 or $100,000 per annum more than it costs to-day to bring that board up to the point of efficiency, it would be the best spent money this House could vote. Why, if you take the extra rates that have been for years imposed on the people of the west over and above the rates charged in other parts of the country for the same services, you would not count it by hundreds of thousands, but by millions and tens of millions. We are not going to argue that we in the west should be given cheaper freight rates than obtain in the east; but we think the time has come when the railways should not be allowed any longer to charge more in the west than in the east for the same service, unless they can prove that it costs them more to handle the business, which I am satisfied they cannot do, because they have already proven that it costs less. Some years ago a change was made in the passenger rates. Up to four or five years ago there were different rates charged all over the country. One branch of a railway would charge one rate, and another branch a short distance away would charge a higher rate. The matter was brought up in the House, and the rates were made equal from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic ocean—a flat rate of three cents a mile. If the railways can carry passengers at the same rate in the lower provinces, the centre provinces and the western provinces, why should they not carry a ton of freight at the same rate in the western provinces as they carry it in the eastern provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would it be inconvenient for the hon. member at this stage to give us his amendment?

Mr. TURRIFF. No. I will be most pleased to do that. It is as follows:—

Moved by Mr. Turriff, seconded by Mr. Martin: That in the opinion of this House the time has arrived when the government of the Dominion should, by legislation, lay down the principle that the rates to be charged by the railways in the western provinces shall not exceed those charged in Ontario and Quebec for a similar service, to a greater extent than necessary to cover any excess there may be in the cost of operation in the west over that in Ontario and Quebec.

As I stated in the beginning of my remarks, this resolution was adopted by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, practically in its entirety. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it goes without saying that if we are to have anything like unity of feeling throughout this Dominion, if we are to have the good feeling that should exist between one end of the country and the other, you cannot possibly bring that about if the people at one end of Canada feel that every day, from the first day of January to the last day of December, they are being deliberately robbed by the railway companies charging them from 50 to 150 per cent higher freight for the same service, that is given in eastern Canada. Nobody will say for a moment that the railways are not getting a good paying price for the freight they are carrying in this part of the country. We had evidence of that when a strike occurred a year or two ago on the Grand Trunk railway in eastern Canada. That company refused, or objected, to pay the same rate of wages that was being paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. And what was their plea? That the Canadian Pacific railway had a large traffic in the west, where they got a very much higher rate of freight for the service rendered than either railway received here, and that the Grand Trunk, under those circumstances, could not really pay their men as high wages as the Canadian Pacific paid; but as soon as the railway to the west was completed, and they were able to get into that part of the country and obtain the high rates that the Canadian Pacific railway were then getting, they would be able to give their men better pay. I have not the slightest doubt that when the Grand Trunk Pacific railway is completed, that company will, if allowed, charge just as high rates of freight as the Canadian Pacific railway is getting now. And the Canadian Northern will do exactly the same thing. But it is for this House to say whether the time has come, or whether it has not, when we should lay down the principle that unless it costs the railway companies more to handle the freight and to build their lines, they should not be allowed to charge more in one part of the country than in another. We thought at one time than when the Canadian Northern commenced to operate in the west they would reduce the freight rates. Well the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway in some places run into the same town, from Winnipeg say, and thus we have the peculiar fact that in places where the two railways are operating the freight is higher for the same mileage in the Canadian Pacific railway. That is one of the things no man, apparently, can understand. That is one of the things, it appears to me, that the railway commission should look into and settle, without waiting for somebody to make a specific complaint. That is their duty, that is their work, that is what they were created for, and they should carry out that principle and see that there are fair and even rates in existence all over the country. Another matter that I might bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. TURRIFF. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the hon. gentleman tell us at what point this difference in rates becomes apparent between the east and the west?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes. If my hon. friend will just wait about five minutes I will reach that branch of my subject. There is one other thing, Mr. Speaker, that we in the west have to complain of, and it is this: In the eastern part of Canada the weight for a carload on which you can get carload rates is much less than it is in the west, and, therefore, it costs the western shipper just that much more to ship his product.

Mr. COCHRANE. Can you give us the difference, what the weight is in each case?

Mr. TURRIFF. I am not sure that I can give that to-night to the hon. minister, but I will look the information up and hand it to him to-morrow. There is another matter of complaint. If a shipper here in Ottawa, for instance, wanted to ship a carload of goods to Windsor, Ontario, or Port Arthur, Ontario, or to Montreal, St. John or Halifax, he can put in one part of that carload as fifth-class goods and the other part as fourth-class goods, and then he can get that carload rate by paying on the fourth-class a carload rate on fourth-class goods. But if he ships that car one station west of Port Arthur he cannot do it; he has got to pay by the 100 pounds on the whole lot because there is not a carload of it. If he has half a carload of fourth-class goods and half a carload of fifth-class goods, and he ships to any station west of Port Arthur he has to pay by the hundred pounds and cannot take advantage of the carload rate, and pay that rate on the highest class. If he ships out of Winnipeg to Vancouver, or out of Winnipeg to Calgary, or out of Winnipeg to Port Arthur it is the same thing; he has to pay by the hundred pounds. Why should there be—and I ask the Minister of Railways to think that over—why should there be this discrimination against the west? Is there any reason for it? Is there any common sense in it? It is just simply that when the railways started out there was but the one line, and as a matter of fact there is still but the one through-line to eastern Canada. They have practically done as they wished in spite of, or irrespective of the Board of Railway Commissioners and they have done anything and everything. They are doing just as they like to-day and they are charging us up to 150 per cent higher, for the service rendered out there, than they charge for the same service in the east. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the one way to deal with this matter is for parliament to lay down the principle enunciated in my resolution, and in future to make the railways disclose to the Board of Railway Commissioners exactly what it costs them to handle the traffic. The Interstate Commerce Commission in the United States make the statement in one of their reports that you can ascertain the cost of carrying freight on a railway as exactly as you can the cost of manufacturing nails, it is merely a matter of compelling the railway companies to give this information. In the past these companies have hedged around this matter of freight traffic, freight rates and railway operations as if it were something sacred, something mysterious that the ordinary man knew nothing about, and that nobody but one well versed in railway work could speak on, or give any statement regarding the cost of operating. But as I pointed out a few minutes ago an enterprising newspaper in the west has, by the expenditure probably of a thousand or two dollars, placed an expert at work and gathered information that has been a surprise to everybody who perused it.

Here let me read again what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stated as to the respective cost of handling freight in the east and in the west. You will remember that a year or two ago the city of Vancouver entered a case before the Railway Commission complaining of the high tolls that were charged by the Canadian Pacific railway for carrying freight to that city. The company, in order to justify the freight tolls they were exacting, produced before the commission evidence as to how much it cost them to handle the traffic in British Columbia, and also what it cost them to handle the traffic on other parts of their road. This is the information they gave the Railway Commission:

> In the Vancouver case, which has been before the Dominion Railway Commission for a considerable time, application was made for an order by the Commission that the C.P.R. should furnish the figures of the cost of operation in each of the divisions of its system.
> The order was made, and the statement that has been furnished to the Commission by the C.P.R. shows that the actual cost of hauling one thousand tons of freight one mile (exclusive of interest or fixed charges) is as follows, for each division of the C.P.R. system:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Eastern division—Montreal to Chalk River, Ont., and branches | $5.45 |
> | Lake Superior division— Chalk River to Port Arthur | 3.70 |
> | Central division—Port Arthur to Swift Current, and branches | 3.73 |
> | Western division—Swift Current to Field, and branches | 4.71 |
> | Pacific division—Field to Vancouver, and branches | 7.12 |
> So you see, that while it costs $5.45 to carry a thousand tons of freight one mile in the province of Ontario, or the eastern part of the province as far west as Chalk River, and in the province of Quebec, it only costs about $3.75 to carry a thousand tons of freight one mile in places between Chalk River and the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. LALOR. Does the hon. gentleman think that the freight rates are higher in the west, proportionately, than they are in the older provinces?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes.

Mr. LALOR. I would like to read an extract of his own speech last session, in which he takes an entirely different stand. On page 105 of 'Hansard' of last session, in speaking upon freight rates, the hon. member for Assiniboia makes this statement:

> The freight rates charged by the railways in the west are practically on the same basis as the rates charged in Ontario and Quebec. I think my hon. friend will find there are as many overcharges for freight on the C.P.R. and G.T. and the C.N.R. in Quebec and Ontario as there are in the west, so that the hon. gentleman does not need to put all the blame on the west. If there is such work to be done he can commence in Ontario.

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, I remember very well making that statement, as I said a while ago, I acknowledged when I began my address that I did not know more about the subject, and it was only——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TURRIFF. That is all right, I am quite willing to acknowledge when I am in the wrong, and that is more than some hon. gentlemen I am looking at are willing to do. I stated I regretted that I did not know more about the subject, and I pointed out that it was not until this expert was put at work by the Manitoba 'Free Press' that either I or anybody else had any idea of the extent of the difference in the rates that were charged. I said a little while ago that I had no doubt there were overcharges made in the east as well as in the west, and I still have no doubt. So my hon. friend who thought he was doing something very smart in reading that out was doing nothing of the kind. I had already stated that I had not realized, until this information came out from the 'Free Press,' how bad the situation was in the west.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Is the hon. gentleman sure he is right now?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, quite sure. I can assures the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), that I am right now.

Mr. COCHRANE. According to the 'Free Press'?

Mr. TURRIFF. That I am right now according to the 'Free Press,' and there has not been one railway man on the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway or one member of this government, or any member supporting them, who has been able to put their hand on one single item the 'Free Press' has brought out, and show that it was wrong, and what is more, they cannot do it. If any hon. gentleman thinks he can, it is open to him to do so. But I say now that I am right, and it is for the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), to show if he can that I am not.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman think that his resolution can have any possible effect unless he amends the Railway Act in about 25 or 30 different sections?

Mr. TURRIFF. Well, I have great respect for the legal opinion of my learned friend (Mr. Lancaster). At the same time if this House realized, as I do, that an injustice exists, and should be remedied, and if this House expresses an opinion to that effect, I have not the slightest doubt that the Railway Commission can issue an order that will remedy all these matters. The Board of Railway Commissioners have it in their power to say what the freight rates shall be, and if this House expresses an opinion, the Board of Railway Commissioners should take that stand, and should put an end at once to the existing discrimination.

Mr. LANCASTER. Notwithstanding what the Railway Act says?

Mr. TURRIFF. This parliament is in session and can amend the Railway Act if it is necessary, and my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), knows that very well. I do not think, possibly, that he is very anxious to have it amended.

The following are the rates for the first five classes of freight for corresponding mileages east and west.

—	Miles.	1st Class.	2nd Class.	3rd Class.	4th Class.	5th Class.

I ask you, Sir, I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, I ask any hon. gentleman in this House whether he thinks that that is a reasonable condition of affairs. I ask any hon. member if he thinks it possible to have a happy and contented people when one section of the country is being robbed to that extent, because there is no other word that expresses it. That condition has existed for a long time and I ask this House if the time has not come when this matter should be remedied once and for all.

Let me give you a comparison of rates between the rates in the western prairie country and the prairie country on the south side of the line. The Canadian Pacific railway is operating on the American side just as it is on the Canadian side of the line. On the Canadian side, in connection with the Soo road, the Canadian government gave the Canadian Pacific railway a large cash subsidy to build their line from North Portal in my own constituency, up to connect with the main line a few miles from Moosejaw. On the American side of the line they received no assistance from anybody, they had to put into the line every dollar that went into it, yet the Canadian Pacific Soo line on the American side of the boundary is hauling freight for the American settlers for about two-thirds or less of what it charges the Canadian farmers on the Canadian side of the line.

Let me give you a few examples. I beg to submit a table contrasting the rates for varying distances for different classes of goods on the Canadian and American side of the line in the west.

	100 miles.	200 miles.	300 miles.	400 miles.
Implements re-shipped from Kirkella, Man., and from Fargo, N.D., carloads.
Western Canada rates higher by	140 p.c.	55 p.c.	44 p.c.	43 p.c.
Binder twine re-shipped from Kirkella and from Fargo, carloads, each car stopped in transit to unload 10,000 lbs.
Western Canada rates higher by	180 p.c.	100 p.c.	82 p.c.	86 p.c.
Cement Building blocks, dimension stone, carloads.
Manitoba rates higher by	55 p.c.	44 p.c.	27 p.c.	33 p.c.
Saskatchewan rates higher by	64 p.c.	56 p.c.	36 p.c.	42 p.c.
Drain or sewer tile, building tile, fire bricks, fire clay, carloads.
Manitoba rates higher by	118 p.c.	100 p.c.	82 p.c.	92 p.c.
Saskatchewan rates higher by	136 p.c.	112 p.c.	90 p.c.	108 p.c.

Is there any justification for that state of affairs? I feel sure that I need only call it to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals in order that he may see that this is an absolute injustice to a large section of Canada, a notable injustice that if continued is bound to cause dissatisfaction and trouble. It is so manifestly unfair that I am sure I need only bring it to his attention to have him take the matter up and have it remedied.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman want us to understand that the Railway Commission are refusing to deal with the state of affairs which he has described as such an injustice?

Mr. TURRIFF. I am not going to say that the Railway Commission have refused to decline or deal with it. My statement is simply that this state of affairs has existed for the last 10, 20 or 30 years and that the Railway Commission have not dealt with it.

But that is the proper body to deal with it and there is no doubt that it will deal with it especially if this House expresses the opinion that this is an unsatisfactory state of affairs and that it is a state of affairs that ought to be remedied without unnecessary delay. It has always been stated that the grain rates of the west were very moderate. I am free to confess again that I was under the impression that the grain rates in the west were very reasonable, but when you come to compare the grain rates we are paying in the west with the rates that are paid in Ontario and Quebec for the same service you will find how very unreasonable the western rates are. I find that we have been overcharged in the past and that we are being overcharged at the present time, and I say that that condition of affairs should be put a stop to, and that the rates should be reduced in the west to the same level as they are in the east. I have here a comparative statement showing the rates on grain in carload lots charged by the railways in the eastern part of Canada and in the west per 100 pounds:

	Rates, in cents, per 100 lbs., carload shipments.
	100 miles.	200 miles.	300 miles.	400 miles.	500 miles.	600 miles.
Eastern rates	6c.	9c.	11c.	13c.	15c.	17c.
Rates in Manitoba	12c.	16c.	20c.	23c.	27c.	31c.
Rates in Manitoba higher than rates in Eastern Canada by	100 p. c.	78 p. c	82 p. c.	77 p. c.	80 p. c	82 d. c.

The rates in Saskatchewan are higher still as compared with the eastern rates than those in Manitoba. The rates in Saskatchewan are as follows:

Rates in Saskatchewan	13c.	17c.	21c.	25c.	30c.	34c.
Rates in Saskatchewan higher than rates in Eastern Canada by	117 p.c.	89 p.c.	90 p.c.	92 p.c.	100 p.c.	100 p.c.

Surely every one will acknowledge that this is an unsatisfactory and an unfair state of things. Now, take the rates on grain per 100 pounds in less than carload lots:

Eastern rates	9c.	14c.	17c.	20c.	23c.	26c.
Rates in Manitoba	23c.	34c.	43c.	53c.	61c.	69c.
Rates in Manitoba higher than rates in Eastern Canada by	155 p.c.	143 p.c.	153 p.c.	165 p.c.	165 p.c.	165 p.c.
Rates in Saskatchewan	25c.	37c.	47c.	57c.	67c.	79c.
Rates in Saskatchewan higher than rates in Eastern Canada by	178 p.c.	164 p.c.	176 p.c.	185 p.c.	191 p.c.	188 p.c.

Mr. BURNHAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the late government was a party to this outrageous extortion?

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) asks if the late government was a party to this. I acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that the late government was a party to it. I say it is to their discredit that they did not remedy it. I will say further that it was never brought to the attention of the House. I brought it to the attention of the late Prime Minister; I asked him if he had read these statements and he said he had. He said further that it was the most damnable state of affairs that he had ever heard of and that if the matter was not remedied by the railways themselves before the House assembled after the election, if he was in power, as he expected to be then, and as I expected he would be then, he would take the matter up in the House and put an end to that state of affairs. The question of the hon. member for Peterborough was a fair question and I do not object to it. I do not believe that there was a man in Canada, except the railway people themselves, who knew how bad the state of affairs was. I am satisfied in my own mind that had my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), been in power to-day he would have remedied it, and I am satisfied that the right hon. gentleman who leads this House (Mr. Borden), with the assistance of his Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), of his genial Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), who is as much interested in this matter as any one can be, and of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), will remedy this matter now that it has been brought to his attention. I am not going to say that I have no confidence that these gentlemen will rectify this evil. I know that, as one of the supporters of the government the hon. member for Peterborough agrees with me, that it is an unfair condition; all we have to do is to bring it to the attention of these hon. gentlemen and they will rectify it, and rectify it thoroughly. I will be very much disappointed if they do not.

It has been stated by the railway people —I have heard them state it time and again—that every time they haul a train load of grain they lose money, but that they make it up on package freight. According to their statement it has been figured out that the net profit on a train load of fifty cars from Brandon to Lake Superior is $2,674. For this result we take their own sworn figures that they have returned to the government. It is no further use for any railway company, the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway, the Canadian Northern or any other, to go before the Railway Commissioners or before the government and make the statement that they are not making any money hauling grain at the present rate. There are a great many figures in this book which I hold in my hand that I am not going to give now, but there are one or two other points that I want to touch on for a moment. I have heard it stated by the railway authorities that they have to charge higher rates for the short haul than for the long haul because the cost is very much less per ton per mile for the long haul than for the short haul. Everybody who knows anything about railways realizes that. If you load up a train with goods, haul it a hundred miles and then unload it, it will cost you more per ton per mile than if you send that train 1,000 or 2,000 miles. That is the excuse the railway companies always make when they give very low through rates where they have a long haul of 1,000 or 2,000 miles. Let us see how our friends the Canadian Pacific railway have worked that business. They have just simply reversed the position and they charge the low rates for the short haul while for the long haul of the goods which come out into our country they charge high rates. I am sure that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who represent Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia are particularly interested in this matter, because thousands of carloads of goods go out from this country to the west. Let me give you some of the Canadian Pacific railway rates for the short and the long haul.

The following table shows the all-rail car load rate in cents per 100 pounds on the fifth-class freight, and shows also the same rate figured out on the per ton per mile basis and the same rate figured out for a carload, from Montreal to Port Arthur (or Fort William), from Montreal to Winnipeg, and from Montreal to each of the divisional points on the Canadian Pacific railway, west of Winnipeg as far as Calgary, Portage la Prairie and Regina, which are not divisional points, being included in the table for the sake of making the showing full and fair:

From Montreal to—	Miles.	Per 100 lbs.	Per ton per mile.	Per carload.
Port Arthur... ..	991	$ 42	·847c.	$126
Winnipeg..	1414	0 71	·976c.	213
Portage la Prairie...	1470	0 75	1·020c.	225

It was once stated by Sir William Van Horne that as soon as the Canadian Pacific railway had their traffic properly organized, the Canadian Pacific railway would see to it that the longer the haul the cheaper the rate, but the Canadian Pacific railway has done exactly the opposite, and now the longer the haul is the greater the price per ton per mile. It was stated here the other night that the Canadian Pacific railway were anxious to lower their freight rates and that they were willing to do so, but that they could not do so because, while they could stand it, the other railways could not stand it. I want to tell the Minister of Railways and the House that on many lines of freight the Canadian Pacific railway are charging much higher rates than they charged four or five years ago. In spite of the Railway Commission and right under the nose of the Railway Commission the Canadian Pacific railway raised its freight rates in many respects. Several glaring instances of that will be found in the following table which shows how much higher the freights levied on a carload of oats—60,000 pounds—are now than they were on September 14, 1907, from the points named to Winnipeg:

From.	Sept. 14, 1907.	Present.	Increase.
Moosomin	$ 96	$108	$ 12
Regina	108	132	24
Moosejaw.	108	150	42
Swift Current..	120	186	66
Medicine Hat ..	132	222	90
Calgary	144	246	102
Red Deer	162	252	90
Strathcona... ..	168	240	72

Just imagine the farmer at Calgary, or at Red Deer, or at Edmonton, who raises a car of oats and ships it to Winnipeg, where there are hundreds and, I suppose, thousands of cars used, paying from ninety dollars to one hundred and two dollars a car more than he paid five years ago. The farmer is just bled that much extra over the rates charged five years ago. Will any one say that is a satisfactory state of affairs; will any one say that during all the years prior to the 14th September, 1907, the Canadian Pacific railway was not charging a paying rate to haul oats from Calgary, or Edmonton, or Moosejaw, to Regina or Winnipeg. Nobody would believe such a thing; everybody in the west knows that the Canadian Pacific railway were charging high rates even previous to that. Were not the old rates high enough? Certainly, they were, and the Canadian Pacific railway raised them right under the nose of the Railway Commission of Canada. I say again that the Railway Commission has apparently not been able to handle their work. They have too much work to do, and what they want is a man, or two or three men, or a half-dozen men on the job, men of the calibre of the man who prepared that information for the Winnipeg 'Free Press.' Let them get a man of that description and they will soon be able to get the facts. It is not necessary that the Railway Commission should have furnished to them a special complaint by the people who are suffering and suffering every day. Time and again, when the excessive coal rates have been brought to my attention and I have asked: Do you want the matter brought up, the answer was: No, we don't want to get into any fight with the railway companies. The fact is that the shippers prefer to be bled rather than to get into a fight with the railway companies. The Railway Commission should not wait for anybody to make a complaint. What are we paying them for? Pay them $50,000 a year more if necessary to get the commission up to the mark. The men themselves are all right; give them the experts they require and give them the duty of finding out what is wrong throughout the country and then let them dictate that the excessive freight rates of the west shall be brought down to the level of the freight rates in the east.

I tell the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Railways that until you do that you will never have contentment and peace and satisfaction in the western part of Canada. We have suffered long enough, and the time has come when this state of affairs should be remedied, and I believe I have only to bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood the ex-Minister of Railways at the last session of parliament to state that the freight rates to the farmers in western Canada were cheaper than the freight rates to the farmers in the western part of the United States.

Mr. TURRIFF. I heard the ex-Minister of Railways make that statement, exactly as my hon. friend from Peel has said. I think he spoke of the freight rates on grain; I would not be sure. But whether he referred to the freight rates on grain or anything else, he was absolutely mistaken. I have quoted figures to-night to show that the rates on the Canadian side of the boundary line are much higher than those on the American side.

Mr. BLAIN. I quote the following from page 5247 of 'Hansard' for 1910-11:

Mr. GRAHAM. My honourable friend (Mr. Maclean) has referred to rates in western Canada. During a recent trip in the west, I had prepared for me a comparative table of rates on farm products from the interior of Western Canada to Port Arthur and Fort William, and of rates from the interior of the western states to Duluth, and these were the rates I was discussing in the House when I said that the farmers of the Canadian west had cheaper rates on their products to the Great Lakes than had the farmers of the western states, and I have no reason to change my mind on that.

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend is perfectly right. I was in the House when that statement was made, and it just goes to prove what I have said, that apparently nobody, either the late ex-Minister of Railways or the late government or the Board of Railway Commissioners knew the facts of the case, and it remained for the man whom the Winnipeg 'Free Press' put on the job to get at the exact facts of the case and to show how much more we were paying in the west than the people of the east were paying, or than the people of the States immediately south of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were paying. I think a great deal of credit is due to the Manitoba 'Free Press' for the information it has brought out on this subject, and I feel satisfied that it will have a very good effect. I believe that the very fact of the people of Canada understanding the condition of affairs will bring about a remedy, because it is too extreme to be allowed to continue. Now, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and to the House for taking up so much time, but I felt that the subject was worthy of the time and attention of parliament, and I trust that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will see his way clear to do something in the near future to put an end to this state of affairs.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, I trust that my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff), who has just taken his seat, will not consider me discourteous when I say that he cannot expect the hon. members of this House or the people of this country to treat any statement or resolution coming from him in regard to the freight rates that prevail in western Canada in any serious manner. If my hon. friend had a desire to be serious, there was a fitting time and place for it. He might have taken that course when the government that he supported sat to the right of the Speaker and had it in their power to remedy the condition of which he complains to-night. But, as has been shown, when this parliament was in session last year, the then Minister of Railways, and even my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) declared that the railway freight rates in western Canada were fair, just and reasonable to the people. Now my hon. friend undertakes by his resolution to say that nothing but the cost, especially the cost of operation, must be considered. There is more than the cost of operation to be considered in determining the railway freight rates that are charged to the people of this country. We had an exhibition in this House yesterday which I am sure will long be remembered by every hon. member who was present at the time, when my hon. friend the Minister of Railways laid upon the table a statement that went to show that, as a result of the incompetency of the late Administration, we have a condition of affairs in the railway life of our country to-day which is most deplorable. I say more: We had presented to the people of this country through that official statement of the Department of Railways and Canals a state of affairs that goes to show not only the incompetence of the gentlemen who had in charge the government of this country, but a state of affairs that should make every member of that government and every gentleman who supported them in this parliament for the past 15 years hang their heads in shame before their fellow countrymen. If the hon. gentlemen who formed that Administration, and the hon. gentlemen who supported it, do not feel keenly enough their position to hang their heads in shame, I can tell them that there is not an intelligent citizen in this Dominion of Canada to-day who understands the railway situation and will study that statement as presented by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, who will not blush with shame owing to the fact that we have had in the government of this country for the past eight or ten years men who are so utterly incompetent to discharge the public trust that has been reposed in them.

We had, Mr. Speaker, a statement to show that the eastern division was to cost us $250,000,000—I think that was the amount—and in addition we had the extraordinary statement—

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. My point is that this speech should have been made yesterday. I think the hon. minister ought to speak to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think there is any point of order raised. The hon. minister is quite in order.

Mr ROGERS If we are to have an intelligent understanding of what our railway freight rates are to be, we must take into consideration the cost of construction, and not, as my hon friend (Mr Turriff) said, the cost of operating alone. And it is because of the necessity that arises for us to take into account the cost of construction that I am dealing with the figures I have just quoted. We have in addition the extraordinary cost of the prairie section, and the very extraordinary cost of the mountain section which, in the case of the two, will amount to over $100,000,000. Therefore, we have, Mr. Speaker, a National Transcontinental railway being built, according to the latest statement, at a cost of something like $350,000,000 to the people of this country, instead of $15,000,000, as was stated. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who now leads the opposition, appealed to this parliament for its support and endorsation nine years ago, pointing out, as he pointed out yesterday, that there was then necessity for the construction of such a railway, by reason of the fact that we had in western Canada great development in progress; and that need existed for a reduction in the railway freight rates in this country, and especially western Canada. He appealed for support in the first place in order that he might be allowed to spend $13,000,000 to accomplish these results. His Finance Minister a few months later, discovering that a mistake had been made by the right hon. gentleman, rose in his place, and presented a supplementary statement showing that that railway should cost $51,000,000, instead of $13,000,000. And just a day or two ago the official figures were published, showing that the cost will actually amount to $350,000,000. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) has talked of the necessity of reducing railway freight rates notwithstanding the conditions which his party have created, and with which we, as a new government, have to grapple at the present time. Not only did the right hon. gentleman, at the time, I speak of, appeal to this House for support and endorsation, but he went outside this parliament and appealed to Heaven in order that he might be protected in carrying out this great work, and in order that the railway freight rates should be reduced in the interests of the people. Sir, he was protected in respect to that policy in the elections which followed, and he was similarly protected in the elections of 1908. But last year, when it was discovered that his humbugging policy was not productive of any good results to the country, a change took place, and not only Heaven, apparently, withdrew its support from him, but the great majority of the people in Canada withdrew their support, and relieved him of the high office which he held. Having those conditions to grapple with, nevertheless the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) rises in his place and declares that this parliament should at once dictate what the means of remedy should be. We have a Railway Commission of which we are all proud. We have vested in that commission all the powers necessary to remedy the evils of which my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) has complained to-night. He has treated us to a dissertation by the hon. member (Mr. Turriff), but let me contrast it with a statement made about a year ago from his place in the House by the late Minister of Railways. Speaking on the 17th of January, 1911, Mr. Graham said:—

I am not sure that they are so ready as that. However, the Railway Commission has complete control of rates in Canada. I agree with my hon. friend from South York, and I disagree with him. I believe that the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada is the best body, with the widest jurisdiction, of all such bodies in the world. I have had reason lately to make some investigation of this matter. In Germany, though the railways are government roads, the freight rates there do not compare for one moment with the rates in Canada. They are three times as high as our rates. Their hauls are short, it is true, but their rates should be low, because their cars are all loaded. France has not approached the control of rates as we have. England has a board, but in the control of freight rates it does not compare with the Interstate Commerce Commission or with ours, and the control exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission does not for a moment equal with the control exercised by the Canadian Commission. Our commission can take anything they like as a basis for fixing the rates of the Canadian Pacific railway; they can take the dividend paid on the stock or the actual cost of the road, or they can have the company file a tariff, which will be as they see it a fair tariff for the transportation of freight and passengers. Let me call my hon. friend's attention to another point. I am not defending the Canadian Pacific railway. But if you take the rates in the United States——

——I want the House to bear this in mind because one hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) dealt especially with the rates in the United States.

—from the west to Duluth, and take the rates for a corresponding distance in Canada, you will find that our rates are lower in every instance. A statement which I had compiled last summer showed that the people in the United States were paying higher freight rates for the same distance than the people on our side. I have no hesitation in saying that, with all the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with the great population in the United States and the great strength of their western railways, the rates to and from the west are higher than those in this country for the same distances. Being very much interested in this matter, it strikes me that whatever we are to do in this House, we ought to keep clearly in mind this fact, that we have established a board composed of able men. No part of the government of Canada does it more credit than the Board of Railway Commissioners. Their judgments are quoted as my hon. friend quoted them in the case of the express companies, and they have done a great deal of good; and I would not like to see anything done that would have a tendency to take out of their hands the complete jurisdiction we have given them, because they can exercise it better than we could and with more beneficial results to the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a statement made by the late Minister of Railways and Canals from his place in this House. What does the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), mean? If it means anything, it means that we are asked to vote want of confidence in the Railway Commission. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this government accept and acknowledge the Board of Railway Commissioners as the only legitimate child of the late government during their whole career. So accepting that Railway Board in that form and in that manner, we are not going now to vote want of confidence in their administration. We are not going to take the course taken by our predecessors, because they never appealed to that Railway Board, notwithstanding the statement of the late Minister of Railways that the Board of Railway Commissioners have complete control, and that they can exercise that control according to their own judgment. We recognize on this side of the House the conditions in western Canada, not alone with regard to freight rates, but the deplorable conditions that exist in the prairie provinces, conditions for which the late administration are solely and entirely responsible. Now, Sir, recognizing that fact, having the most complete confidence in the Railway Commission, having asked them to take up and consider all complaints with regard to freight rates with a view of dealing with them in a fair and reasonable manner, not alone in western Canada, but throughout the Dominion, having also employed three of the ablest lawyers we could find to present the case of the people before the commission, then I say, having gone that far, it would be treating the commissioners, in whom we have the utmost confidence, with disrespect, it would be showing a lack of confidence in their judgment if we were to pass this resolution. Therefore, I take objection to this resolution on these grounds, and I ask hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to reject it, believing as we do, that it will serve no good purpose, inasmuch as this government have already taken the only legitimate course open to them of securing a remedy of the grievances of which the people complain, in the matter of railway freight rates.

Mr. OLIVER. I regret that I was not present to hear all the remarks of my hon. friend, but I take it that his remarks apply to one point, namely, the question whether this House should make a declaration as to the authority to be exercised by the Railway Commission over freight rates in western Canada. It is desirable, before we reach a decision as to whether we should pass or reject this motion, fully to consider the important question that it has raised, and the attitude of the people who are most directly interested. I understand that my hon. friend who opened this discussion moved a resolution which had been adopted by the Winnipeg Board of Trade on November 14. I happen to have in my possession certain correspondence connected with this subject, which will show more fully the position taken by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, that is to say by the business men of western Canada on this matter. The resolution was passed by the board of trade on November 14, and was forwarded, I understand, to the Minister of Railways for his consideration. The Minister of Railways referred it to the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the Chairman of the board communicated with the Winnipeg Board of Trade under date of November 24, as follows:

The hon. the Minister of Railways has forwarded to me a copy of a resolution passed at the general meeting of your board, held on Nov 14th instant. This is the first complaint that has been made directly to this board regarding freight rates generally in the west. There is no necessity in calling upon the government to deal with the matter, nor is any further legislation required. The powers of the board are ample to deal with not only specific rates but those generally. The resolution you have forwarded is of an extremely general character. If you desire the whole subject to be investigated by this board, it would greatly facilitate matters if you would have your traffic officials formulate a specific case. Our rules are by no means hard and fast, nor do we confine ourselves to the specific case set forth in the complaint but it is a difficult matter to take up in the way it is placed in this resolution. Indeed, strictly speaking, the resolution is not a complaint to this commission at all, but is a request that the government pass legislation. I should be glad to hear your views upon the foregoing.

Yours truly,
J. P. MABEE,
Chief Commissioner.

Mr. LANCASTER. What is the date of that?

Mr. OLIVER. It was dated the 24th of November, 1911.

That is the reply which the Minister of Railways did not give to the communication he received from the Board of Trade. He apparently handed the communication of the Board of Trade to the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners answered.

Mr. COCHRANE. That was a letter directed to the board and not to me. I had not it in my possession. This letter was in answer to the resolution of the Board of Trade and was not to me, so you need not lay any charge to me for not producing the letters.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not making any charge.

Mr COCHRANE. I did not have the letter.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to be understood as making any such suggestion. Such a thought was not in my mind. I said that the Board of Trade had communicated their resolution to the minister; the minister did not reply direct to the Board of Trade, but handed the resolution to the chairman of the Railway Commission, who replied to the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade, on receipt of this communication from the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, wrote direct to the minister as follows:

Winnipeg, Manitoba, December 4, 1911.

Sir,—The Board of Trade has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of November 20, 1911, in reply to the resolution of the board, forwarded to yourself and the hon. the Premier of the Dominion, stating that the rates charged for freight within the prairie provinces are greatly in excess of those charged for a similar service in Ontario and Quebec, and asking that the principle be affirmed that the rate of charges shall be no greater in these provinces than in Ontario and Quebec.

And the board is also in receipt of a communication from the chairman of the Railway commission stating that the said resolution has been turned over to him and that the commission has full power to deal with the same and that no further legislation is require, and the board now desires to lay before yourself and the members of the government the reason for asking that the principle be affirmed by Act of parliament namely: That the Railway Commission has now been in power for a considerable number of years.

That is the view of the Winnipeg Board of Trade after hearing direct from the Railway Commission on the point raised by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, so I would ask the House to give it especially careful attention as being the statement of the position as understood by people who were not political partisans but who were speaking simply for the business interests of the western country. The letter continues:

That the Railway Commission has now been in power for a considerable number of years, and this board complained of the freight charges in this country in 1907 when a stated case was prepared showing the charges which were then being put in force by the railways operating in western Canada and which were not only higher than those charged in the east but were a material advance upon those previously in force in Manitoba, and that on that occasion they were refused relief.

And further, that during the summer now passed the express companies were authorized to put into effect a scale of charges based on $5 per hundred pounds in this territory for a similar service for which they were allowed $3 in the east, or an advance of 66⅔ per cent. over eastern rates. And this board has felt that a grave injustice was done to the western country by the continuance of such a state of affairs and felt that the prairie provinces were entitled to be put on an equal basis with the east except to the extent that it could be shown that the cost of operation in the western country exceeded that in the east.

This principle this Board believed to be a fair, and equitable one, and one that as a matter of public policy should be affirmed and carried out and that the government and parliament of Canada are the right parties to affirm and see to the carrying into effect of the same.

The Board begs to enclose herewith a copy of the letter received from the Chairman of the Railway Commission in which it asks that our traffic officials should formulate a specific case. This is exactly what the Board objects to doing. Their charge is that the whole scale of rates in the prairie provinces is in excess of those charged in the east. They attached to their original resolution a copy of rates covering distances respectively in the east and west and covering from 100 miles to 1,050, showing that in each case the charges in the three prairie provinces were materially in excess of those in the east, the whole averaging an increase of 78 per cent, a copy of which statement is hereto attached, and it is this whole matter of grave injustice in the west that it wishes to have taken up and remedied, and the Board believes that the cost of operating in the three prairie provinces is no greater, if as great, as in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

That if it is the desire of the government that the matter should be relegated to the commission and an investigation held by them and the facts ascertained, under such circumstances this Board would urgently request that under the terms of the Railway Act, the Board of Railway Commissioners be instructed to inquire into the facts regarding the whole scale of charges in the prairie provinces, and their relation to those in the east, and that an investigation held with this object in view, should be held in the city of Winnipeg, and elsewhere in the west, if necessary, and in view of the fact that it is a matter of public policy in which the whole people of the west are concerned, they would further ask that counsel resident in this city and free from all railway corporation control, be appointed to act with this Board and other public interests, in establishing the facts complained of, and that further, as soon as such facts are established the railway companies be required to reduce their charges in the west to the basis before alluded to.

To this letter from the Winnipeg Board of Trade the minister replied on December 19, 1911:

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of December 4, in reference to western freight rates and must apologize for not replying sooner. Your letter was mislaid and hence has not had attention. It seems to me that your Board has made out a pretty strong case and I shall be pleased to go into it with Judge Mabee of the Railway Commission, and shall urge that the Board investigate these charges on the ground.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) F. COCHRANE.

C. N. Bell, Esq.,
Secretary Board of Trade,
Winnipeg, Man.

The position so far as this correspondence shows then is that while the Minister of Railways takes the same ground as is taken by the Minister of the Interior that the Railway Commission has full power to make such regulations as the Board of Trade asks, provided the Railway Commission thinks these are fair reductions and decidedly holds out the hope or prospect that the commission will hold an investigation and, if satisfied of the facts, make these reductions. On the other hand, the Board of Trade points out that a specific request was made in the year 1907 and that the request was ignored or that action as requested was not taken by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and further they point out that when a parallel case, that of the express rates, was brought to the attention of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the Board of Railway Commissioners accepted the principle that express rates in the western country should, of right, be 66 per cent higher than in the eastern country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to understand how my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, speaking as a representative of the western country, can justify the position which he took here to-night in view of these facts which are unquestionable and which are set forth by such a responsible body as the Winnipeg Board of Trade. It does not matter what the theoretical authority of the board of Railway Commissioners is; the actual authority rests with this parliament and if the Board of Railway Commissioners, for good reason or bad, did not see fit, or have not yet seen fit, to do substantial justice to the western country in this important matter then the responsibility rests upon this parliament, upon this government, upon the members of this government and, may I say, particularly upon that member of the government who especially represents the western country, to see that justice is done.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Did not the two cases that the hon. gentleman quoted in which he claims the commission were derelict occur some years ago, one in 1907 and the other the following year?

Mr. OLIVER. One occurred in 1907, I do not know whether the other occurred in the following year or the year after, but the fact is that both occurred when the authority of the commission was just the same in that regard as it is now, and if the commission did not do justice then I submit it is the business of parliament to see that it does justice now or that justice is done.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Who was Minister of the Interior at that time?

Mr. OLIVER. I had the honour of being Minister of the Interior at that time. If I might digress for one moment, I perceive the trend of my hon. friend's question as also that of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) and I would only say this that it never was expected of the late Liberal government, any more than it is expected of the present Conservative government, that everything that could be done would be done. If any government, during any possible term in which it might hold office, could do everything that the country required to be done there would never be any need for any more government. When these gentlemen rise in their places and say: Oh, you should have done that, they make no argument whatever. If any government of any country ever had reason to be proud of what it did the late Liberal government had reason to be proud.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is another joke.

Mr. OLIVER. If that is a joke, I beg to repeat it, and to say that the history of this country written in the last 15 years under the administration of the Liberal government, is the proudest chapter in the history of Canada to date, beyond any question and, certainly, if the chapter that shall be written during the tenure of office of our hon. friends opposite approaches to it, they will have great reason to congratulate themselves and the country will have to be congratulated as well. There is a condition which, according to the opinion of the business community of western Canada, is a condition of injustice and whether the late government was remiss or was not remiss, is not the question to-day. The question is: What is this government going to do about that condition of injustice? Is it going to permit it to be perpetuated? Is it going to be a party to the perpetuation of that condition? In order that there shall be no misunderstanding, let me say that I do not wish to throw any discredit upon the Railway Commission, but if it is asserted that this question is new to the consideration of the Railway Commission, I will ask the House to bear with me while I read from a document, which has been placed in my hands, a document which is the rejoinder of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, or a section of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, to the reply of the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway companies to the allegation of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, or a section of that board, made to the Railway Commissioners protesting against the freight rates then in force. This rejoinder is dated November 29, 1911, shortly after the resolution which was presented to the House and agreed to by the Board. I shall take the opportunity of informing the House with regard to the contents of this document, or a portion of them at any rate. It is addressed to A. D. Cartwright, Secretary of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and is the 'answer of shippers' section of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and the Winnipeg Exchange to the contention of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian Northern railway companies.'

2. The contention of the shippers section of the Winnipeg Board of Trade and Winnipeg Grain Exchange was that the local tariffs in the territory west of Lake Superior on grain and grain products are too high (a) Because such rates are higher than similar rates in eastern Canada, and (b) Because they are too high in themselves.

3. (a) The contention that the rates are higher than the rates in eastern Canada does not mean merely that the rates themselves are higher, but further, that the rates on the commodities mentioned in western Canada are a much higher proportion of the maximum standard rate (flour and grain products classify 8th class) than the rates on the same commodities in eastern Canada are of the maximum standard rate there. A statement was put in by Mr. Carpenter, Traffic Officer Shippers' section Winnipeg Board of Trade, at a sitting of the board held at Montreal, a copy of which is attached thereto.

I would ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of the House to have this statement embodied in 'Hansard,' without my being required to read it. If I am not granted permission, I will be compelled to read it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the Speaker has authority to give permission. It is the rule of the House that nothing can be inserted in 'Hansard' except what is read other than official lists and figures given by the ministers. I think that has been the practice.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, I will give the House this table as well as I may:

Miles.	Eastern Canada.			Manitoba.			Saskatchewan and Alberta.
	Standard 8th Class.	Flour and Grain.	Percentage of Standard.	Standard 8th Class.	Flour and Grain.	Percentage of Standard.	Standard 8th Class.	Flour and Grain.	Percentage of Standard.
			p. c.			p. c.			p. c.
50	10	4	40	11	9½	86	12	10	83
100	14	6	43	15	12	80	16	13	81
150	14	6	50	18	13½	75	19	15	79
200	19	9	47½	20	16	80	22	17	77
300	22	11	50	25	20	80	27	21	78
400	25	13	52	29	23	79	31	25	81
500	29	15	51	32	27	64	35	30	86
600	34	17	50	36	31	86	39	34	87

In eastern Canada the flour and grain rates average about fifty per cent of the standard eighth-class rate, but in Manitoba the flour and grain, which are the great commodities carried in carloads, average eighty per cent of the eighth class rate, and in Saskatchewan and Alberta they average about the same. I am sorry to have had to take up so much time, but it is desirable that the facts in regard to this matter should be placed where they can be got at in a convenient way. The statement of the Winnipeg Board of Trade goes on to say:

This statement shows a comparison between rates in western Canada and eastern Canada. For example, for 50 miles in eastern Canada the maximum standard rate is 10 cents, and for the same distance on grain and grain products is 4 cents, the grain and grain products rate being, therefore, in eastern Canada 40 per cent. of the maximum standard rate. In Manitoba for the same distance the maximum standard rate is 11 cents, whereas the grain and grain products rate is 9½ cents, the grain and grain products rate thus being 86 per cent. of the maximum standard class rate. In Saskatchewan and Alberta for the same distance, the maximum standard class rate is 12 cents, while the grain and grain products rate is 10 cents, the grain and grain products rate being, therefore, 83 per cent. of the maximum standard rate. The statement filed by Mr. Carpenter shows that approximately there is a similar difference as regards all distances. Why should not the grain and grain products rates in western Canada be the same percentage of the maximum standard rates as they are in eastern Canada? The Railway Companies have made no answer to this question.

(b) We further urge that the rates are too high in themselves, the rates being such as to unduly increase the cost of grain and grain products for local consumption on the local markets of western Canada, especially such markets as Winnipeg and the lumbering and mining districts between Winnipeg and Fort William where large quantities of grain and grain products are consumed. For instance,—

Wolseley, Sask., to Winnipeg	296 miles.	20 cents.

Mr. BLAIN. Have you given the points in eastern Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. The points in eastern Canada are not given here, but I presume my hon. friend would not question the statement of the Winnipeg Board of Trade on this subject.

Mr. AMES. Is the quotation between Wapella and Savanne for way-freight rates or through rates?

Mr. OLIVER. They are way-freight rates.

Mr. AMES. There is no grain stopping at Savanne, Ont.

Mr. OLIVER. This whole question is a question of local rates and not a question of through rates.

Mr. AMES. What is the use of discussing what it costs to take grain from Wapella to Savanne when in all probability there never has been a bushel of grain left off at Savanne? Tell us what it costs from Port Arthur or Fort William.

Mr. OLIVER. We are not discussing through rates; we are discussing local rates.

Mr. AMES. You are discussing a condition of affairs which never exists.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is at issue with the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which purports to know something of the conditions in western Canada.

Mr. AMES. Even in the face of the declaration of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, one can hardly be expected to put aside his common sense.

Mr. OLIVER. If it is a question between the common sense of my hon. friend from St. Antoine, and the statement of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, my vote will be with the Board of Trade.

Mr. AMES. It was not with the Winnipeg Board of Trade on reciprocity.

Mr. OLIVER. It is possible even for the Winnipeg Board of Trade to be mistaken on a question of theory, but not on a question of facts and figures within their knowledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Was reciprocity only a theory?

Mr. OLIVER. It was a theory, and hon. gentlemen opposite prevented it from becoming practical; that is what is the matter with the country to-day. Now, as having some bearing on the point which my hon. friend has raised, the Board of Trade goes on to say:

While the Canadian Pacific local mileage rates apply on all local shipments west of Fort William, in U.S.A. territory the terminal rates to Duluth, Superior, etc., apply as a maximum between intermediate points. In some cases this would mean a reduction in the local rates of almost 94 per cent, and we contend that as a matter of fact that a large volume of local shipments of grain in the United States territory covered by Mr. Lanigan's statement is handled under the terminal rate (applying as a maximum), and not the local rate at all.

Mr. MARSHALL. Are these carload rates, or less than carload rates?

Mr. OLIVER. They are carload rates. This is a rejoinder to the statements made by the representatives of the two railway companies. In paragraph 11 they say:

Regarding Mr. Lanigan's statement (page 6462) that only 12 per cent of the grain crop moves under the rate complained of. The Northwest Grain Dealers' Association estimate of the 1911 grain crop in western Canada, is 304,207,500 bushels. 12 per cent of this would be 36,384,900 bushels, no inconsiderable amount.

Now, if my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) is under the impression that there is no local business doing in that western country, here are the facts given by the Winnipeg Board of Trade on the authority of Mr. Lanigan of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. AMES. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to assert that the whole 300,000,000 bushels moved, and that 12 per cent of it ought to move in this particular way?

Mr. OLIVER. The whole crop does not move.

Mr. AMES. Then, is it not only 12 per cent of what does move?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, precisely.

Mr. AMES. Then give us what moves.

Mr. OLIVER. Instead of giving us the figures given by the Board of Trade, suppose we cut them in two. I suppose that my hon. friend will admit that half the crop does move.

Mr. AMES. No.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I do not think I need argue with my hon. friend any more.

Mr. AMES. I do not think anybody will admit that 160,000,000 bushels of the grain of the west does move.

Mr. OLIVER. Then my hon. friend and I do not agree, and I think he had better take his own opportunity of placing his views before the House. When he makes such a statement as that, I would not undertake to argue with him at all. Suppose we say that only half the crop moves, then, according to Mr. Lanigan's calculations, that 12 per cent is carried under local rates and these would affect the handling of 18,000,000 bushels of grain. Again I would say, with all due respect to this honourable House, that this is a matter of sufficient importance to take its attention for a few minutes.

Mr. LANCASTER. Did the Railway Commission deal with that complaint?

Mr. OLIVER. This is a rejoinder to the defence made by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways to a complaint made by the Winnipeg Board of Trade.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then it is all a part of a case before the Railway Commission —the complaint, the rejoinder and the reply. It is all before the commission still.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot say what has become of it; but the expectation of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, as expressed in the letters which have been read, was such that they believed that it was necessay to get an authoritative statement from this House as to what was required in the case. On the basis of the judgment given by the Railway Commission in the express case, they did not expect substantial justice from the Railway Commission.

Mr. LANCASTER. Did not the Railway Commission tell them in the early part of the proceedings that the law was ample and provided fully for dealing with the case?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly they did.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then why should they want more law?

Mr. OLIVER. It is not that they ask that the commission should have more authority. The commission has authority, but it has not exercised that authority to remove this stupendous injustice, and the Board of Trade come to this honourable House and asks it to remove the injustice.

Mr. LANCASTER. The commission is trying the case.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all, there is no case to try.

Mr. LANCASTER. The case is before the commission still.

Mr. OLIVER. It may, or may not, I cannot say, but I am taking the liberty of putting the case before this House, if I may, and it is of sufficient importance, both in matter and in principle, to warrant our attention. Speaking of the rejoinder of the railway companies, the Board of Trade says:

Mr. OLIVER.

A comparison is made of local mileage rates in Ontario, with rates from western points to Fort William. We submit that this comparison is unjust for the reason that a local mileage rate is compared with a terminal or proportional rate governing a part of a through haul, and necessarily the latter is much lower.

The board goes on to say:

Regarding paragraphs 5 and 7 of Mr. Shaw's answer of October 12th wherein he contends that the price paid the farmer for his grain is based upon its expert value, and that, therefore, while a reduction in mileage grain rates would not increase the value of the grain to the farmer, it would needlessly reduce the railway's revenue. We contend that for the purpose of this investigation it is immaterial to the commission whether the producer or the consumer suffers as a result of the unduly high local mileage grain rates. Of necessity it must be one or the other. However, as a matter of fact, the prices paid for feed grain are not in many cases based upon its export value but its value for feed in the locality to which it is consigned. However, in all cases, whether for feed or for export, the freight charges are deducted from the price paid for the grain in making settlement with the farmer. Therefore, the producer pays the freight charges.

The defendants contend that their local mileage grain rates between points in western Canada are reasonable because these rates compare favourably with rates shown in local mileage grain tariffs in the Dakotas and Montana. We submit that in so much as it is clearly shown in paragraph 9 of this letter that the local mileage tariffs in Dakota and Montana do not as a matter of practice govern the cost of moving grain and grain products between local points, for instance, between local points and such large centres of consumption as St. Paul and Minneapolis, and intermediate points to Duluth, Superior, etc., the unduly high rates charged for the movement of grain and its products between points west of Lake Superior cannot be justified by the comparison made by the defendants.

The defendants further contend that all privileges etc., connected with the milling of grain in eastern and western Canada must be considered in arriving at a reasonable rate for the carriage of grain and its products between points west of Lake Superior, and endeavour to justify such rates by stating that different privileges are granted western millers than those extended to eastern millers. We submit that because a carrier applies different regulations for the milling of grain in transit is no reason or justification for charging unduly high rates on grain and letter, the same regulations govern the milling of Manitoba grain in eastern Canada as in western Canada. Furthermore, in placing this argument before the commission, the carriers omitted to state that in eastern Canada special less than carload commodity rates are granted on grain products out from the mills, whereas in western Canada full class rates are exacted. For instance:—

100	9	21	23
200	14	31	33
300	17	39	43
400	20	48	52
500	23	55	60
600	26	62	68

Rates in cents per 100 lbs.

The board says further:

We do not request, nor have we ever asked, that rates on grain and grain products between local points west of Lake Superior should be on as low a basis as the terminal rates to Fort William and Port Arthur. These terminal, or proportional rates as they are specified in the tariffs, are simply one charge for part of a through journey, or in other words, part of a through rate, and those terminal rates, as has already been pointed out, were a matter of contract with the Manitoba and Dominion governments where the railways received value for the reductions made. We submit therefore, that it cannot be urged that because these terminal, or proportional, rates are low that local rates between points west of Lake Superior should be unduly high.

At the hearing in Montreal on July 23, 1911, our representative asked that local rates on grain and grain products between points west of Lake Superior should be reduced so as to show no greater difference over rates for similar service in eastern Canada than the 8th class maximum standard rates in western Canada shows over the 8th class maximum standard in eastern Canada (grain and grain products classify 8th class in carloads).

Since that time, however, copy of the evidence in the Vancouver rate case has been received, and the exhibit filed by the Canadian Pacific in that case shows a greater cost to move 1,000 tons of freight one mile in a portion of the territory where the eastern Canadian rates referred to in this answer apply, than in the territory west of Lake Superior where the rates complained of govern. For instance—

Cost to haul 1,000 tons of freight 1 mile, exclusive of interest or fixed charges.

Exhibit 17, eastern division, Chalk River to Montreal.. .. .. $5 45

Exhibit 7, central division, Port Arthur to Moosejaw.. .. .. 3 73

Exhibit 7, western division, Moosejaw to Field.. .. .. 4 71

We submit, therefore, that no higher rates should be charged for the movement of grain and grain products between points west of Lake Superior to the mountains than is charged on the eastern division of the Canadian Pacific railway, where the cost of haulage is greater than in the former territory, and we would respectfully urge the commission to order that rates on grain and grain products handled under local mileage tariffs between points west of Lake Superior and the mountains should be reduced to an equivalent of those charged upon the eastern division, or, at least, that rates on grain and grain products handled under local mileage tariffs west of Lake Superior should not exceed the 8th class maximum standard rates in the western Canada by a greater percentage than the local mileage grain rates in eastern Canada exceed the 8th class maximum standard rates in eastern Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have taken the liberty of placing before the House the statement of the Winnipeg Board of Trade in regard to this important matter. The board contends first, that the local rates on grain and grain products in western Canada are higher than the service rendered warrants. They are higher in proportion to the rates charged for like service in eastern Canada or in the United States, and they are higher in proportion to the rates charged by the same railway for carrying goods of the same class in western Canada than they are in eastern Canada. What they ask, and all they ask, is that the rates be placed on the same level, and made in the same proportion for the like service rendered, west of the lakes as east of the lakes. The conditions which exist in the prairie provinces at the present time makes it a question of more than ordinary importance. We have had the action of the government, taken in conjunction with the railway companies, for the purpose of securing the transportation and an outlet for the grain that is blockaded in the western provinces to-day, or a portion of it, to Duluth and Minneapolis. It is proposed to secure that outlet by a reduction in the rates Here is a condition which, according to the showing of the Board of Trade based on the figures given by the railway company, reduced again at the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. Antoine division of Montreal (Mr. Ames), which affects 12,000,000 bushels of that product in reaching its market.

It affects the transportation of 12 million bushels of the product, that to-day lies in the fields because it cannot reach the markets of consumers. If it was right and reasonable that this government should take action with the railway companies, and take action with the United States Commerce Commission in order to secure a reduction of the rates to United States points, surely it was just as right and reasonable that this government should take action with our own Railway Commission to secure a reduction in the rates within our own country. To-day, because the grain cannot be transferred from the field where it is produced to the local points of consumption, there is a burden on the transportation of that grain of from 40 to 90 per cent more than it should properly bear, according to the value of the service rendered, and the charges made for like service in other places, and on other lines, and even on the very same lines of railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. Has not our government taken exactly the same action with regard to our commission as the United States government have taken with regard to their commission?

Mr. OLIVER. Not as I understand it, and not as the Winnipeg Board of Trade understands it.

Mr. LANCASTER. We are not responsible for their understanding.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend sized himself up with the Winnipeg Board of Trade, he would find that he did not have much advantage over them. They are generally reputed to be able to hold their own, intellectually or otherwise, with other people in this country, and perhaps to have some advantage. Now, is this a case of sufficient importance to warrant the consideration of parliament and of the government? The contention of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and the contention which I make, is that the case is of sufficient importance to warrant the consideration of this parliament and government. Then the question is, is this government and parliament to take no action, on the pretext that the matter is one for the Railway Commission and that they are entirely responsible for it? In my judgment on the case, as stated to the Minister of Railways by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and from the fact that the Railway Commission decided that a discrimination was proper between the east and the west in the matter of express rates, I think I have made out a strong case why this government should take immediate action in order to relieve the very undesirable conditions that exist in the west. This government and this parliament are responsible for the continuation of those conditions, and the people of the west will not cease earnestly to ask them to act without undue delay.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the hon. gentleman contend that the Railway Commission has not jurisdiction over rates in western Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. No, I said repeatedly that the Railway Commission has jurisdiction under the law. But in practice, the Railway Commission has not exercised that jurisdiction in order to bring about a general reduction in the rates such as the resolution asks for.

Mr. HEPBURN. As I understand it, just as soon as the attention of the Minister of Railways was called to this matter he took up the question with the Railway Commission, and has been assured by them that they will immediately look into the freight rates in western Canada. The chairman of the board asserts that they have full jurisdiction over all rates, and will attend to the matter at once.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver). I wish to make my position clear in regard to this matter. We have in British Columbia, as the House is aware, a strong grievance, the same as other sections in the west, and we have been fighting this question before the Railway Commission for a number of years. This week we closed a very long and technical argument on behalf of the Board of Trade of Vancouver before the commission. This whole question is going to be dealt with, and the initial steps were taken on Monday last. It seems to me therefore that the offering of this resolution is simply embarrassing the action of the board, that is, it is placing on the decision of the board, which is not yet given, the condemnation of this House. We all acknowledge that this Board has been created for the purpose of dealing with just such matters as this, that the board has been constituted in such a way, that its personnel is of such a character as to make it very efficient. This board has done noble service for the people of Canada. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite are asking this government to condemn the board before they have had an opportunity of considering the question. As I have said, the board have already taken the initial steps to deal with this question, and the present government have appointed counsel to look after the interests of the people on the prairies. I can assure hon. gentlemen that while the question, on the face of it, seems simple, it is one of the most intricate and difficult questions that can possibly be dealt with. Everybody who has had anything to do with traffic questions knows that railway traffic rates, the equalization and adjusting of those rates, is one of the most intricate questions that come before the Railway Commission. I have taken a deep interest in this matter for a number of years, and I think it would be exceedingly unwise to bring this question to a vote. Hon. gentlemen themselves will acknowledge that this is a political move pure and simple. I will go this far with them, I will agree to a large extent with the statements made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and with the statements made by the Winnipeg Board of Trade. I myself have a mass of figures to substantiate those statements, to a large extent. But what is the use of making arguments of this kind to the House, and condemning the Railway Commission who are pursuing the only course that they can pursue? If we take action of that kind, we should logically follow it up by abolishing the Railway Commission, and I do not think that even hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to do that. As I understood it, the Winnipeg Board of Trade is objecting, apparently, to the decision of the commission on express rates. I have not gone through the whole evidence and argument but I venture to say, from the experience I have had, that the board must have had good, sound reasons for the decision they have given. We in British Columbia suffer a great deal more than they do on the prairies, that is the percentage is increased as you go west.

Mr. TURRIFF. Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS. But I do feel that we should leave it to the Board of Railway Commissioners to deal with, give them all the assistance we can; I think it is well to air these things once in a while in the House, but I feel that to adopt a resolution of this kind, which must be construed as one of want of confidence in the commission, is inadvisable. The hon. member who moved the amendment (Mr. Turriff), has had the opportunity of getting this mass of information on 'Hansard' and he might withdraw the motion. I feel that to adopt his amendment, would be to cast a reflection on one of the finest institutions we have in Canada.

Mr. JAS. McKAY (Prince Albert). Mr. Speaker, before making a few remarks on this motion, I would ask the hon. member for Edmonton, if, when the question of express rates was brought before the Railway Commission, the public was represented by counsel?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not say.

Mr. McKAY. While I am not in favour of the rates that now prevail in the west, I must say that I cannot support the amendment for the following reasons among others: The trend of the remarks that have been made by opposition members, who have spoken to this amendment, is, that although the Railway Commission had jurisdiction to deal with this matter, they remained passive, and in a decision given in a previous case somewhat analogous to this, that of the express rates, the board did not follow the principle which hon. gentlemen endeavour to lay down in this amendment. Consequently, hon. gentlemen fear that in this other case, which is now before the Railway Commission a similar decision may be given.

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McKAY. The hon. members who have spoken, are seriously endeavouring to redress the grievances that prevail in the west, and I am with them in the statement that such grievances exist with regard to railway rates, but I would remind them that in a case now before the Railway Commission with reference to freight rates, the present government has taken hold of that matter, placed it before the Railway Commission and employed counsel to watch the interests of the public.

Mr. TURRIFF. In connection with the express rate investigation, counsel was employed to represent the public.

Mr. McKAY. Even admitting that, the hon. member who moved this motion, himself admitted that on a previous occasion, when he made a speech in this House, he was not in possession of facts with which he is now familiar, and I presume that as these facts had not then become public property, the gentlemen who were conducting the case with regard to express rates, were not in possession of facts of which hon. gentlemen and the country at large are now in possession. I submit that the principle which it is endeavoured to lay down in this House, will be followed by the Railway Commission as the facts are now before the members of the Railway Commission and the counsel who will conduct the case for the public. I cannot conceive why that principle should not be followed to a great extent by the Railway Commission when it deals with this case, because it is a just and proper principle. I am against the amendment, for the reason that the Railway Commission now has this case in hand. it is in possession of the facts, and will deal with them in a proper manner. If the case is not dealt with in a proper manner, why then it can be dealt with by this House so as to afford the west relief from the grievances under which they are now suffering.

Amendment (Mr. Turriff) negatived on division.

Motion agreed to and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Mr. MONK. There are two votes at page 62, which I wish to dispose of.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have done a good day's work, and I hope my hon. friend will not insist on going on to-night.

Mr. MONK. There remain only one or two resolutions, and I have been bringing the officers of my department up here for a week. I am anxious to complete the preparation of the supplementary estimates, but that cannot be done until these items are disposed of.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand the hon. the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), has something to say.

Mr. MONK. I have postponed them twice already. I do not think the hon. member for St. John can have any objection to these two resolutions which are yearly votes, for the lighting and heating, etc., of Rideau Hall, and public buildings.

Mr. OLIVER. I certainly do not wish to delay the passage of the estimates, but the votes that my hon. friend speaks of relate particularly to the city of Ottawa, and I would like to give my hon. friend the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), who is partly representing the city of Ottawa, an opportunity to be heard when the votes are being considered. If my hon. friend will amicably consent to allow these items to stand until to-morrow, so that the hon. member for Russell can be here, I would be very glad, and if the member for Russell is not here I will promise that I will withdraw all objection to the items going through.

Mr. MONK. I do not like to be disobliging, although it seems to me that I have been as patient as possible. If it is desired that the hon. member for Russell should be here when we discuss these items having reference to the city of Ottawa, I will consent to what my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) proposes. There remains one item with reference to harbours and rivers in Prince Edward Island which we might pass and then adjourn.

Harbours, rivers and bridges—generally—repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not think that the hon. gentleman is fair at this hour of the evening in asking us to take up this item, and I would strongly object to passing any more estimates.

Mr. MONK. I proposed that we should dispose of that item and then leave the items for Ottawa.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). I have to ask the minister for some information in regard to this matter. I find that a number of items that were in the estimates passed last year and submitted by the late government have been dropped, particularly in regard to the county I represent. More than fifty per cent of the amount that was voted last year for harbours and rivers in Prince Edward Island has been left out of the estimates this year, and I would ask the minister if he could tell me the reason why.

Mr. MONK. The main estimates for Prince Edward Island were prepared in a hurry. Parliament was assembling a very short time after the new government took office, and it is intended to restore many of those items in the supplementary estimates. I can give that assurance to my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) right now.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). There are some things I would like to point out to the minister before he prepares the estimates.

Mr. MONK. Would it not be more convenient for my hon. friend to give me a list of the works that he proposes?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). I wrote to the minister giving him a list and asking him if he would give me an interview at any time and place that would suit himself and I would be glad to go over the items with him and point out the reason why I thought they should be put in the supplementary estimates. The minister answered my letter, but he did not reply to that request.

Mr. MONK. I will be glad to meet my hon. friend at any time.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings). If the minister would give me that privilege I will meet him in his office at an early date.

Mr. MONK. Yes, certainly, any time that will suit my hon. friend.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. MONK moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. What will be the order of business to-morrow?

Mr. MONK. We will take up the estimates of the Public Works Department to-morrow.

Mr. OLIVER. That will be the first order?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, February 16, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following letter from the secretary of His Royal Highness the Governor General:

Office of the Governor General's Secretary,
Ottawa, February, 16th, 1912.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. the Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Royal Highness the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at 3.30 o'clock for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and the House of Commons during the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
H. C. LOWTHER,
Lieut.-Colonel,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

SUPPLY—CABLE RATES TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Before you leave the Chair, I would like to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to the question of cable rates. This question has already come before the House in a previous debate, but I thought this occasion favourable for bringing it again to the attention of the country. We all know that the news received some months ago, through the channel of the Post Office Department, that cheaper rates had been granted by the cable companies was welcome news to Canada. When it was announced to the House by the Postmaster General, I was the first one to congratulate him over this signal success of our many efforts to obtain a reduction in the rates. For several years past, and notably since the time of Sir William Mulock until the present, there has been a continuous effort on the part of our postal authorities to join hands with the many British subjects abroad who are interested in the solution of this problem, namely, cheap telegraphic communication between the mother country and the various British colonies. I said, however, to my hon. friend the Postmaster General when he announced some weeks ago that a small reduction in rates had been agreed to by the cable companies and the British government, that in my judgment it was but one instalment, and that we should expect more from future pourparlers between the companies the British Post office and our own post office authorities in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to say to the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux), before he speaks further, that it seems to me doubtful whether he is not infringing a well understood rule of the House by anticipating a discussion of a notice on the order paper. The hon. member or Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) has a notice on the order paper which now stands at the head of Public Bills and Orders.

Further consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Armstrong (Lambton), that, in the opinion of this House a commission should be appointed to investigate the systems of national telegraphs and telephones, wireless telegraphs and cables.

A discussion took place on that resolution, and now stands to be resumed. I would like to be advised by the House whether it is the judgment of the House that the hon. gentleman is or is not infringing the rule which would prevent another discussion taking place at the present time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I somewhat anticipated the objection, but I thought that, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) had a fixed purpose to his motion, that of the appointment of a commission to investigate these various questions and problems, my own motion—because I will conclude with a motion—would be in order. Of course, the hon. member for Lambton has mentioned several questions in his motion, while I desire to draw attention only to one of those subjects. I think our purposes are different. My hon. friend moves for a commission; I wish simply to obtain an expression of the opinion of the House my motion reads as follows:

That in the opinion of this House steps should be taken by the Postmaster General of Canada with a view of obtaining further reduction in cable rates between Canada and Great Britain.

I do not think the two motions clash.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish again to submit the question to the judgment of the House. While there is considerable force in what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) says, I am not fully convinced that his motion is not an infringement of the rule. But if it is the desire of the House that the hon. member should continue, of course the Speaker has no objection.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am in the judgment of the House. If my hon. friend the Postmaster General sees no objection I might be allowed to proceed.

Mr. PELLETIER. The motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) seems to be along the same line as the motion of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), whose motion, it is true, refers to only one of the many branches contained in the motion of the hon. member for Lambton. Personally I have no objection to this matter being gone into. If the hon. member for Rouville wants a discussion of the matter in the House, it might help us on the other side of the sea to know the opinion of the House of Commons of Canada. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not intend to press the motion very far. I do not think there could be much objection to his going on; anyway, I hope he will be short.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN. (Prime Minister). As there seems to be some difference between the new motions, as this is an important subject, and as the time to be occupied will not be very great, perhaps it might be considered in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman continue the debate?

Mr. HENDERSON. Before that motion is passed I would say that I think it would only have been fair to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), to have had notice that this discussion was to go on so that he could have taken part in it. I understand that, under the rules of the House, he is debarred from continuing the discussion which he was obliged to drop at six o'clock on a Wednesday night, and which he will not be permitted again to take up. But, if the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), is to be permitted this afternoon to discuss the same question, I think it only fair that the hon. member for East Lambton should have notice. He should have been notified, and he should have been given an opportunity of being here to take part in the discussion and to continue his speech to the end.

Mr. BORDEN. I think that is fair, perhaps under the circumstances, and as my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), does not appear to be here, it might be convenient to postpone it until another day. When I suggested that the discussion might go on I was not aware that my hon. friend was not here.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not wish to press the matter, but I may say that I understood the other evening that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), was allowed to proceed with a motion of a similar nature which dealt with one of the many subjects mentioned in the omnibus motion of the hon. member for East Lambton, and it seems to me that the same rule should prevail.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not suggesting that it should not prevail, but I was suggesting that it would, perhaps, be convenient to postpone the debate until my hon. friend from East Lambton is here.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Under the circumstances I bow to the desire of the Prime Minister. We might fix a day when this question might be brought up. I have no objection under the circumstances to the postponement.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Ottawa—grounds, $25,000.

Mr. MONK. This item of $25,000 is asked to be voted to make provision in accordance with an estimate submitted by the chief architect for keeping the grounds in connection with the public buildings, the Lover's Walk, Major Hill Park, and the mint and archives buildings, in proper condition during next year. For the grounds of Parliament Hill the estimate is $14,000, and for Major Hill Park $11,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is there any plan of the work to be done in these grounds? I understood there would be a bridge connecting this side of the hill with Major Hill park?

Mr. MONK. There is a project of that kind, but that does not enter into the calculation of this estimate. I can give my hon. friend the details if he wishes them. This is the usual appropriation for plants, pay-lists, lawn mowers, arc lamps, electric lights and repairs.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am glad that my hon. friend has mentioned arc lamps in Major Hill park. At the present time Major Hill park is not lighted. I am glad to see that my hon. friend has taken some measures towards lighting it. We had some pour parlers with the city of Ottawa in regard to the lighting of the park. It has never been lighted up to the present time. Nepean Point park is lighted by the commission but the other park has not been lighted up to this time and the park has been of very little use to the public, because it could not be used at night. Has anything been done with respect to the matter?

Mr. MONK. I had that question under consideration two or three days ago, and I asked my officers to look up the deed of agreement between ourselves and the city of Ottawa in regard to Major Hill park so as to make sure of the conditions under which we held that park. I believe there is an old deed between the city of Ottawa and the government in regard to the park. At any rate, we have placed in the estimates an item of $139 for additional arc lights in that park.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As I understand the deed, I do not think the city of Ottawa will dispute that they are bound to light the park—I never understood them to dispute that point—but what they wanted was to have a plan showing where the lights should be placed. That was the condition of things when we left office and I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman has taken the matter up because the hotel will be ready early in May and we will be deprived of a great deal of the advantage it will be to the city if the park is not lighted.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What does the government intend to do with the grounds which were expropriated on Sussex street to form the site of the new departmental buildings? There has been quite an agitation in favour of leaving this space vacant so as to round off the parliament grounds and make it a sort of a park. Does the minister intend to erect the departmental buildings on this vacant place or is he expropriating land elsewhere for that purpose?

Mr. MONK. The appropriation is the annual one for the care of the parliament grounds. I stated the other day in the House that the government had not yet come to any conclusion as to the use to be made of that space on Sussex street acquired by the late government, nor has it come to any conclusion as to the plans for erecting a departmental building. A Committee of the Privy Council has been named to give the matter careful and prompt attention, but it has been utterly impossible during the progress of the session for that committee to give such a large subject the attention it requires. We will proceed in the matter as soon as possible. The late government acquired that site on Sussex street several years ago, and yet, so far as we have been able to discover, it had not formulated any plan for erecting buildings there. If the hon. gentleman wishes to know what I think myself, I may say that it has occurred to me that we might utilize that space which has been so long idle, and in which we have made such a large investment, for the erection of a justice building, which would accommodate the Department of Justice, the Supreme Court, the Railway Commission, the Exchequer Court, and all other branches in connection with the administration of justice. There was a plan prepared by Mr. Maxwell, architect of Montreal, for a very handsome Justice Department building on that space on Sussex street, and I think it might be properly erected there, leaving large open spaces around which would give a park effect. It is out of the question to hope that we could put all the departmental buildings that will be required on that long narrow strip of land, and it puzzles me to know how such a thing could ever have been contemplated. We are considering the acquisition of other lands where a departmental building might suitably be erected.

ROYAL ASSENT.

A message was delivered by Major Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of your honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that His Honour the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the Royal assent to the following Bill:

An Act to amend the Manitoba Grain Act.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Mr. MONK. When the present government assumed office, we found that we were paying a very large amount as rental for accommodation in the different parts of the city of Ottawa. The amount has increased greatly within the last five or six years, and more space is wanted. At present, I believe, there is not one department in Ottawa that is adequately accommodated, and every day requisitions are made to the department for further accommodation. The departments are broken up one part of a department being in one building and another in another, so that communication between the segregated branches of the department becomes inconvenient and costly. It seems to be absolutely necessary for us to settle now definitely what space we shall require for the erection of departmental buildings, and to begin that erection without delay, so as to avoid as far as possible incurring new liabilities for rental, although I do not imagine that it will be possible even if we begin building next summer, to continue much longer without leasing additional space for the accommodation of the departments. This work the government will undertake as soon as it has been relieved of its sessional duties.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman has mentioned some eastern ground. Will he please state where it is located?

Mr. MONK. The ground around the three main buildings here.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Surely my hon. friend does not anticipate such vandalism. I am quite sure the public will be aroused if it learns that he intends to take any of that space for the erection of new buildings. We have gone, I think, to the very limit by the additions which have been made to the House of Commons and to the Eastern Block. If my hon. friend has any feeling for the artistic and architectural beauty of the parliament buildings, he surely will not encroach further on the remaining land.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend misunderstood me. There is no thought of adding to the present buildings except some addition to the Library. The idea is to acquire land to the east of the present buildings on which to erect new buildings.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would that be on Wellington street?

Mr. MONK. In that direction. I cannot speak positively, because nothing has been decided.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the hon. gentleman contemplate erecting a building on Sussex street for the Supreme Court and the Department of Justice and the Railway Commission, might not the space at present occupied by the Supreme Court building be utilized for the proposed extension?

Mr. MONK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I would like to call the minister's attention to the fact that the long-distance telephone at present in the basement is very inconveniently placed for the use of members. If there is any way by which the minister can have it placed on this floor, near the Chamber, it would be a matter of great convenience, I am sure, to every hon. member of the House. I would be much pleased if he would immediately direct some of his officers to look into the matter.

Mr. MONK. I will attend to this request. I may say that as soon as we are free I intend taking up the question of the installation of telephones generally for government purposes. We pay from $20,000 to $23,000 for telephone service. It has been suggested to me by several who have some knowledge on these matters that our whole telephone system needs to be reorganized in the interest of both comfort and economy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What does my hon. friend mean by saying 'when we are free?' Is he not free now?

Mr. MONK. My right hon. friend surely knows what I mean. It is extremely difficult during the sittings of the House to attend to the matters that have been referred to.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In view of the fact that there are so many telephone connections with the parliament buildings and the public offices generally, would it not be well for the hon. gentleman to have prepared a special telephone directory covering the several departments and the House of Commons?

Mr. MONK. I do not think that it is in that direction that we can very much improve, because the present telephone directory seems to be very correct. I have been told, however, that we might have one, two, or three exchanges—for instance, one in each block by which means communication would be much easier and more prompt, and there would also be a great saving of public money.

Mr. CRUISE. I would like to ask if it is the intention of the government to build a customs house next summer at the town of Dauphin, in Manitoba?

Mr. MONK. I cannot answer that question off-hand. I do not think it is the intention of the government to proceed with that construction this year; but the supplementary estimates are not yet completed. If my hon. friend can give me a special reason for that construction, we will consider it.

Mr. CRUISE. I would like to take this matter up with my hon. friend at some time. It is very important that there should be a customs house built there in the near future, and it is not necessary to buy any land for the purpose, as the new building could be erected on the ground on which the post office is now built. At present the post office is in an upper room, and it is not very convenient.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is the maintenance of the parliament grounds done by contract?

Mr. MONK. No, it is done by day work, I believe, as in the past.

Mr. LEMIEUX. How many men are employed for that work?

Mr. MONK. About 25.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When were the men appointed whose names figure on that list?

Mr. MONK. I have not on this list the date of appointment of each of the men, but I am under the impression that there are men who have been employed for quite a long time. Most of them are employed during the summer. I do not think there have been any appointments lately. I can give the names to my hon. friend, but I have not the date of appointment. There has been no appointments lately in this branch of the Public Works that I am aware of.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does the minister take care that competent elevator men are selected? Are they required to undergo an examination as to their ability to run an elevator safely, or are they appointed merely on the recommendation of the members for the city?

Mr. MONK. They are not appointed merely on the recommendation of the members for Ottawa, and they are chosen only after they have undergone careful examination by the heads of the branch. As a rule these employees are very competent and capable men.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Who examines them?

Mr. MONK. We have a superintendent, and I think his name is Mr. Shearer. The elevator men, I may say, are fully tested. Although we may make mistakes sometimes, I have had no complaints at all about these employees except that one of them was past the age when a man could carefully handle an elevator. That case will be investigated.

Mr. MACDONALD. Those of us who come from distant parts of the Dominion and are immured on the third floor have to use the elevators very frequently, and especially on Saturday. Referring more particularly to the elevator which is used by the public who go to the galleries, the man in charge, and who has been there since Christmas, is not only incompetent to discharge that duty, but he lacks the necessary intelligence which every elevator man should have. This elevator is probably used three times as much as any other elevator in the building, and I would suggest that this man be removed and stationed somewhere else. I think those in charge of elevators should be bright and intelligent young men, who, in addition to a knowledge as to how to run an elevator, should possess some additional features of intelligence that would render them useful servants. Another complaint I would make is that on Saturday, when the elevator is most required, the man goes away. I would ask the Minister to give instructions not only to place a proper man in charge of this elevator, but that it shall be kept running on occasions like Saturday when it is so much in demand by members from a distance.

Mr. MONK. I will make a note of the remarks of my hon. friend, and we will try and see that the difficulties of which he complains are remedied. Of course we cannot expect to have perfect men in charge of elevators.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The question is a more serious one than the hon. minister seems to think. Elevator men are usually subject to very severe examination because the lives of the passengers who use the elevators are in their keeping. In all large cities a rigid examination is required by the civic authorities. In the city of Montreal no man is appointed to take charge of an elevator without having passed a very severe test. I would call the minister's attention also to the fact that the elevator men smoke whilst on duty. This is objectionable to members of the House and also for the ladies who use these elevators. On one or two elevators which I have occasion to use daily the elevator, men may be seen smoking vigorously, and the smoke they puff is quite offensive. That is not at all respectful to members, and these men should be compelled to discontinue the practice. I have also noticed other officials, probably recent appointees, indulging in smoking in the lobbies. You would not see that in any great building owned by a corporation or controlled by a legislature. You never see elevator men, watchmen, and any officials smoking and puffing their smoke as do these men in this building.

Now, as we are talking about elevators, might I mention that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) dismissed the elevator man in the eastern block soon after he took office. The man is a good officer, works faithfully, from early morning till late in the evening. But he was seen speaking with some of the ex-Cabinet ministers, and, of course, was spotted at once by the spies, and his head was cut off by the guillotine erected by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) on Parliament hill. This man is the father of thirteen children—it seemed to be an unlucky number in his case. But, fortunately, this country has as Prime Minister, a man with a big heart. He found the head in the basket, replaced it on the shoulders of the poor elevator man—for this purpose acting over the head of the lord high executioner —and reinstated to his old post, the father of thirteen children. In the name of the country, and especially on behalf of those who have large families, I thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) for his kindly act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The minister has evidently had previous notice of the incompetency of one of the elevator men, and, apparently, the one to which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) referred. There was no justification for the appointment of such a man to the place he holds, and I submit to the minister (Mr. Monk) that he had no right to take time to consider the matter of the man's dismissal. He ought never to have been appointed, and he ought to be dismissed.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, Halifax) is not so generous, apparently, as the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The only report I had about this man was that he is afflicted with old age. I am very cruel, perhaps, but I do not dismiss men because of their age alone. The matter was mentioned to me by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Boyer) who thought that this man was too old to be able to handle the crowds that use that elevator. I thought that deserved investigation. If my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, Halifax) thinks the man is so thoroughly incompetent that he must be dismissed at once, I will take that into consideration; but I do not think that on the strength of a passing remark I should have dismissed him at once. But I will look into the matter. As regards the state of affairs reported here by my hon. friend about dismissals, I can only say that it is absolutely without foundation. Notices were sent out to some employees in the Public Works Department. Representations were made to me and I at once appointed an investigator, one who seemed to me a fair minded man, and to that investigator every man was entitled to go and explain his case, whether he had received notice or not. The man to whom my hon. friend referred came before this investigator, and it was found that there was no ground for removing him. There are a number of other similar cases. The investigation is going on, and nobody has been dismissed without investigation. Every man in my department has an opportunity of laying his case before the investigator. Some of them are assisted by counsel, as I believe my hon. friend is aware. That is very different from what happened at the last change of government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) refer to Mr. Chauvin's investigation?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He is the one who investigates these cases in Ottawa? Now, has my hon. friend a list of the day labourers who are appearing before Mr. Chauvin? In other words, has he the black list?

Mr. MONK. The list of those charged with infraction of the rules of the department was placed in the hands of the investigator, and the parties were invited to go to him and explain the accusations made against them by members of parliament and others.

Mr. MACDONALD. Are parties permitted to be represented by counsel?

Mr. MONK. Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD. The man appointed by the Department of Railways and Canals in the eastern part of Nova Scotia to conduct these dismissals is a partisan so violent that I have no hesitation in saying, on the responsibility of my position, that he is not the man to hear or adjudicate on any matter involving questions of party politics. He will not permit counsel, nor will he permit the party to ask a question of the witness, unless that question is first submitted to him; and if he does not approve of it, he will not put it. I am glad to know that in the Public Works Department methods different from those of the notorious Judge Jeffreys are followed in these investigations. I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) to the fact that the Jeffreys methods ought not to be encouraged or permitted in the Railway Department.

Mr. MONK.

Mr. BORDEN. I have not had my attention directed to any such matter. I shall inquire into it. I am afraid the commissioner referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) must have been misled by the example of the late Insurance Commission.

Mr. MACDONALD. He should not follow a wrong precedent.

Mr. BORDEN. No. But I did not hear my hon. friend's voice raised against the action of that commission. I am glad that we discern in him the symptoms of a newly-awakened conscience.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not wish to get into a general discussion. But I think that when I made such a statement as I have just made, the Prime Minister of this country should not rely upon so old-fashioned a method of reply as the tu quoque argument. I think he has pretty thoroughly exhausted that form of reply. It must surely seem clear to him that the course taken by the Public Works Department, of which we have the assurance of the minister (Mr. Monk), is the one to be followed.

Mr. BORDEN. I think it is; and I have said that I will inquire into the matter the hon. gentleman mentions. At the same time, it is proper to call attention to the fact that, under a commission of very wide-reaching powers issued by the late administration, precisely these methods were adopted.

Mr. MACDONALD. Not into an inquiry into partisanship.

Mr. BORDEN. That is a distinction without a difference. However, apart from that, I agree that every person who is under investigation should have an opportunity of being represented by counsel and of cross-examining witnesses if he desires to.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would the right hon. gentleman say, if a case is not proven, who should pay the costs? The poor day labourer?

Mr. BORDEN. That is a question upon which I would not like to pronounce an opinion at the moment; I do not know whether there is any precedent in regard to that. It is, however, a fair matter for consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I would like to ask the Prime Minister what disposition he will make in cases where a man is declared to be innocent. Will he restore him to his position again? I have had some cases in the Marine and Fisheries Department, in my constituency, where lighthouse keepers have been turned out of office without trial. In one case the minister has agreed to give a trial; he informs me that the man has protested that he is not guilty of any partisanship, and he will give him a trial. There is not much use of our going through the expense of a trial unless it amounts to something afterwards. I would like to have the Prime Minister's view of a case in which nothing whatever has been proven against the official, and he has been dismissed after trial.

Mr. BORDEN. No case of that kind has been brought to my attention. If any such case shall arise, it will be a matter, in the first place, for the head of the department. Eventually it might have to be considered by the government.

Mr. STANFIELD. Last week I was present at two investigations being held by the Commissioner of the Railway Department. In both those instances Mr. Lane told the gentlemen that they could be represented by counsel if they wished.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am quite prepared to believe that. I know Mr. Lane, who is an old schoolfellow of mine, and I would expect him to do that. The gentleman whom I referred to is Mr. Duchemin, and I did not expect him to do it, from what I knew before; and I am not surprised to learn that when he did undertake to do it, the commissioner said he didn't do it. Therefore, I call the attention of the Prime Minister to the case.

Mr. MONK. I would not like to lay down the principle that an investigation is to be granted in all cases, far from it. I was induced to do that here in Ottawa because there was so great a number of complaints. It was alleged that the employees of my department had been turned into a regular political organization, of which I have the proof. I stated on previous occasions that it is extremely unfair and cruel for candidates to insist that public employees, poor day-labourers, men who would not meddle in politics, men who drive a team or who are engaged in a similar humble occupation, should necessarily attend committee meetings, go out canvassing, and represent the candidate at the polls. These things are all forbidden, and I say that any candidate who asks a public employee to do that is committing a great injustice, because he knows what the consequences are. But where the minister is perfectly satisfied that these practices have been resorted to, and that an employee has infringed the rule, violated the regulations and laws, is the government to investigate simply because the employee asks it to investigate, although the minister is perfectly satisfied without an investigation? That would involve the country in immense expense, without any utility whatever. Something must be left to the discretion of the head of the department. I had a case where a good employee was accused, and I thought I had convincing proof that he had been an active partisan and had violated the regulations. I explained the law to him, he was a good man with a family; he insisted that there was no proof whatever against him. I caused an investigation to be made—it must have cost $300 or $400, I suppose, when all the expenses have been paid, and there was evidence absolutely uncontradicted, that he had violated the regulations. That case is still pending before me. I do not admit, therefore, that in every case there must be an investigation. In Ottawa there were a very large number of men accused, and when I saw the number and knew that the accusations might or might not be well founded, as I could not investigate them myself, I named an investigator. I am satisfied that justice will be done.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). All these expressions of sympathy from the hon. minister are very good, but what we are concerned with now is to secure a fair investigation in all cases so that justice may be done. As far as the commissioners are concerned, I am afraid there is too much in what my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said. I am afraid that in some cases the partisanship of the commissioner gets the better of his judgment, and causes him to conduct investigations in a manner that would not be tolerated in any judicial inquiry. I could instance a case with which the commissioner to whom the hon. member for Pictou has referred had to do. He did not confine himself to the charges that were made against the person to be investigated, but he constituted his court a fishing commission. He goes around looking for evidence against others than those against whom charges are made; he tries to ascertain who constituted the executive committees and controlled the party organization in certain places. He inquires who are the men that had contributed towards legitimate election expenses and furnished teams, &c. He is an inquisitor, and goes outside the functions of a court. I saw a copy of the evidence in a certain case that was taken before the commissioner referred to by the member for Pictou, and I have described the nature of the investigation he was conducting in that case. He was supposed to investigate a charge of offensive partisanship against a man whose position somebody else wanted, and he went on with an inquiry into the conduct of the whole campaign in that locality. I think that, in addition to giving the accused an opportunity of being heard in his own defence, it is only right that these commissioners should confine their inquiry to the specific charges made. Surely any person who makes a charge of partisanship and tries to take the means of a man's livelihood away from him, though the latter is only exercising his right of citizenship, should be prepared to make his charge specific, and not go outside it.

Mr. McKENZIE. There is one matter I have for some time wished to bring to the notice of the Prime Minister, namely, his understanding of what is meant by an 'official'. It always occurred to me that a man who works with pick and shovel around these buildings, shovelling snow, or doing some menial work of that kind, can hardly be called an official. I notice that, in a discussion which took place on the 6th of December, the Prime Minister gave two reasons for his decision on this point. He gave two grounds, one was a section of the Civil Service Act of 1908; the other a resolution of this parliament. The section of the Civil Service Act which he read was:

No official, clerk or employee of the Civil Service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election if under the laws governing the said election he has a right to vote. But no such officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with said election.

The resolution which the right hon. gentleman read was this:

That while it is desirable that every official in the employ of the government of Canada should enjoy perfect freedom of political opinion and the untrammelled exercise of his franchise in accord therewith, no official should be engaged or be permitted to engage in partisan work of any description in the election of a representative to the provincial or the Dominion legislature.

In the first place, he deals with those who come within the operation of the Civil Service Act, and who are not allowed to take any part in election campaigns, or otherwise interfere politically. The provisions of the Civil Service Act do not take in such men as I have mentioned—men working on the sections of the Intercolonial railway, doing ordinary day-work, and men who are handling freight in the freight sheds of the Intercolonial railway, or loading cars. Men of that kind are not covered by the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and they would not be subject to dismissal under that section. In the same way, the resolution dealing with officials certainly does not contemplate men who are working round the grounds here, shovelling snow, or running elevators.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman want us to understand that men doing this particular kind of work should be at liberty to take part in elections?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish).

Mr. McKENZIE. I think that every man who is earning $1.50 or $2 a day has a perfect right to do what he pleases, and that he should not be interfered with because he is politically one way or the other. I certainly say that it is degrading and bringing too low the idea of government supervision in this country to interfere with men in matters of this kind.

Mr. LANCASTER. What about the interest of the public?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know that when a man cuts a drain so many inches wide and so many feet long and does a good day's work, or when a man shovels so much snow and does it well, the public is particularly concerned as to what his mental outfit is politically. I do not think that it would interfere with the character of the snow shoveling or the water carrying capacity of the drain. The hon. member for Lincoln might have a different idea.

Mr. LANCASTER. I learned my idea in Lincoln where the late government dismissed everybody without cause.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not aware that the late government has ever dismissed a man from employment of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANCASTER. In Lincoln county they dismissed everybody.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not familiar with what has taken place elsewhere, but in the part of the country from which I come such a thing certainly has not happened. We have the Intercolonial railway from the Strait of Canso to Sydney, and I defy the hon. gentleman to name one man who was working at day's labour on that road who was dismissed by reason of his politics. The records of that stretch of road, which is the only part of the Intercolonial railway of which I can speak with knowledge, are before him, and he is at liberty to inquire into them. I am not, at all events, addressing any person in particular except the Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister, and I say that the line of demarcation should be drawn somewhere. There should be some distinction between a head officer in a department who is getting a big salary and has a comfortable position, and the man who is doing small things. If he does his work well I think it beneath the head of any department to interfere in a case of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understood the other day from the Minister of Public Works, that under no circumstances—he was very emphatic—had a man been dismissed without being given an investigation, if he claimed the privilege. That statement was published broadcast in the press and immediately after I received a letter from an old friend of mine in the county of Gaspé, Mr. Geo. T. Harbour. Mr. Geo. T. Harbour is a good old Scotchman, a fine old Presbyterian, and a most respectable man. He wrote the following letter:

Sandy Beach Centre,
January 23, 1912.

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I have been dismissed from the position I held——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think I must remind the committee that the discussion has travelled a little far from the item under consideration. If it is the intention of the committee to go on with a general discussion upon dismissals, it is for the committee to so decide.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This will be the last name. We are getting to the climax. I will read this letter and that will be all. It is in order to put my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works right. I want him to explain and justify himself, and I feel quite sure that he will be able to offer some explanation.

—held at the Deepwater wharf, and I just wish to tell you that I took no part whatever in the September election, as I held a government appointment, and it is against the law to do so.

This is a good old Scotchman who has a deep reverence for the law. He says: It is against the law to do so and so and, therefore, I have taken no part in the election.

I read in the papers that Mr. Monk says no one is dismissed except those who took an active part in the late elections, but he must have been misinformed in my case unless he calls being deputy returning officer taking a part. Will you be so kind as to state that ——fact to the Minister of Public Works——

I am merely carrying out his wish:

—not that I expect to regain the position but simply to let him know that I was dismissed without cause.

With best wishes, I remain,
Yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) GEO. T. HARBOUR.

Here is a man who has taken no part whatsoever unless being a deputy returning officer and fulfilling a public duty is regarded as taking a part in politics. He was the representative of the Crown at the poll, not of the candidate, and he acted in the most honourable way. Then he was dismissed without any investigation. He is a most respectable citizen, and I must warn my hon. friend that he is a Scotchman too and that there is a large number of Scotchmen in the country. 'Nemo me impune lacessit'—the hon. gentleman must remember that if he did an injustice to one Scotchman the whole Scotch community of Canada will resent it. I appeal to the many clans of Scotchmen in Canada to stand up in defence of George T. Harbour, who is a true and faithful descendant of the Highlands, and who has been dismissed without cause.

Mr. LANCASTER. Let me ask the hon. gentleman if this wandering Scotchman ever stopped to contemplate the fact that he was paid by the government to work at something else than being deputy returning officer that day, and that if he had been performing the service for which he was paid he could not have acted as deputy returning officer in the election, I suppose, in the interest of the people who appointed him.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is a very good lawyer; at least I was told so the other day by the Prime Minister that he was so good a lawyer that his cases are submitted to the Privy Council. I will have this case submitted to the Privy Council.

Mr. LANCASTER. And his answer was the same as it is to my hon. friend that he had better talk common sense in this House.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Now that the discussion has ranged to matters of this kind, I may mention that I have the case of a French Acadian——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The committee asked me to rule that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I have only a word to say. If necessary I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. MACDONALD. I want to say a word, Mr. Chairman, about your ruling and your attempt to interfere with and prevent debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is well known

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MACDONALD. Excuse me; I want to take exception to the ruling of the chairman and to his putting off debate. When we are voting Supply is the time, under every British precedent, when the rights of the public have to be ventilated by the representatives of the people. The chairman has applied a limitation to debate which I have never seen applied previously in this parliament. I want to object most strenuously to the rule being interpreted in the way in which the chairman has attempted to interpret it because I intend to assert my rights as a representative of the people to discuss these questions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member has his recourse by appealing from the ruling of the Chairman of the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am protesting against your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. My duty is to see that the committee should follow the rules of the House. I have allowed the debate to wander from the subject to a large extent, but when I see that this irrelevant discussion is extending, and that it is likely to last for some time, my duty is to remind hon. gentlemen that the rule is not being followed.

Mr. MACDONALD. I want you to understand that I am protesting against any such attitude on your part, and I intend to assert myself——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will say what I please.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) should conduct himself in that way; he cannot say what he pleases.

Mr. MACDONALD. I object to the Chairman limiting the rights of the representatives of the people here.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman surely knows that there are certain rules enacted for the governance of the House and its committee, and the rule which is invoked by the Chairman is a very plain one. That rule is that the discussion must relate to the matter before the committee. The discussion has proceeded in a general way for some time, and I do not think the Chairman did any more than his duty in calling the attention of the committee to that fact, saying at the same time that if the committee desired that the discussion should be continued he would permit it to proceed, or otherwise he must enforce what is a very strict rule.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Had my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) been presenting something which was not in connection with the Department of Public Works it would be out of order, but we are now discussing the public works estimates, and anything which refers to that department is quite in order. The question is whether the minister who is now at the head of the department has or has not done something which ought to be discussed in parliament. Of course, under the present Act, it would not be in order to discuss dismissals from the Department of the Interior or from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but certainly when these dismissals have occurred in the Department of Public Works the discussion is in order.

Mr. BORDEN. I think that is a very fair statement of it, but the right hon. gentleman surely knows that we have been wandering over every department of the government.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). The matter to which I am about to refer comes under the Public Works Department. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) when discussing the dismissal of a public servant who was of that nationality, has spoken about the Scotch people being clannish. But I am now going to bring to the attention of the House the case of a French Acadian. I may say that in the province of Nova Scotia we have a large number of French Acadians, and better citizens in every respect we have not in this country. It is remarkable that the only French Acadian in the employ of the government on the dredges was dismissed by the present government without an hour's notice. He was dismissed within a very few days after the present government took office; he was harshly treated, he was given no notice that there was any accusation against him, and he was not allowed an opportunity to defend himself. When the Minister of Public Works tells the House that he did not dismiss any employee without charges being made and without an inquiry, the minister is labouring under a misapprehension. It is my opinion, after reading the papers, that in this case the minister was imposed upon and deceived. But, that is a very good reason why the minister should proceed very carefully in these matters, and not take the word of some person who may have a grudge against an official, without making due inquiries. In this case, the captain of the dredge 'Cape Breton' was dismissed without any explanation, or without any charge having been made against him, and so when he seeks employment elsewhere naturally the first question asked him is, where was he last employed, and if it is ascertained that he was dismissed without the reason therefor being assigned, then he might be suspected of incompetency, or dishonesty. It was in order to vindicate this man to some extent that I moved for the papers, for of course I had no expectation that he would be reinstated or that justice would be done him by this government. I believe that the result of making the facts public will demonstrate that there is no stain on the reputation of Captain Decoste. Let us see the evidence on which this man was dismissed. There is here a letter from Thomas Gallant, who was Conservative candidate in Inverness last election, and the letter was written on October 14, very shortly after the present government came to power. In that letter Mr. Gallant says:

I would beg leave to recommend that Captain Peter Decoste of the dredge 'Cape Breton' be dismissed and Captain Dan Gillis of Port Hawkesbury succeed him. Captain Gillis is a most capable officer. He was dismissed in 1896 for absolutely no reason but that he favoured the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Hon. gentlemen say: 'hear, hear' but I will have something to say about that later on. The letter continues:

I think I can safely say that all the members from the Island of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia are thoroughly in accord with this proposition.

Yours very truly,
THOMAS GALLANT.

Now, if it were true that Captain Gillis was dismissed in 1896 for no other reason than that he favoured the Conservative party, it would be a very high handed act on the part of the Liberals and possibly Captain Gillis should be reinstated. But the record of Captain Gillis must have been in the department and there is nothing here to show that the Minister of Public Works examined that record to find out whether the reason given for the dismissal of Captain Gillis in 1896 was the right reason. As a fact, the record will show that that was not the reason why Captain Gillis was dismissed, and, as to the statement in the letter that all the members of the Island of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia are in favour of Captain Decoste's dismissal, it is only necessary to point out that all these members are Liberals, and it is not likely they would ask for the dismissal of one of their own friends and the reinstatement of a man who was said to have been dismissed solely because he was a Conservative.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would not these Liberal members ask for the dismissal of their own political friend if it was in the public interest?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Your mind is too acute for me, I cannot follow you. I can say it is not true that a single one of the members from the Island of Cape Breton or the eastern part of Nova Scotia asked for the dismissal of Captain Decoste. I may say in justice to Mr. Gallant that probably what he really meant was that the defeated Conservative candidates at the last election and not the members from the Island of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia wanted to have this gentleman dismissed, and the other statement was probably an error in typewriting. I do not think that Mr. Gallant intended to misstate the facts because I know him to be a thoroughly respectable gentleman and one who would not deliberately mislead the Minister of Public Works or any one else. But I think he was used as a tool in this case, that he was imposed upon, that he was not seized of the actual facts before writing the letter. And there are other letters on the record which sustains this assumption or belief on my part. There is a letter from one William Macdonald, president of the Pictou Conservative Club, who says:

As far as I know, the whole of eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton insists on this appointment.

That is, the appointment of Captain Gillis. It is evident that there is some fine Italian hand behind the attempt to get Captain Peter DeCoste out of his position. How is William Macdonald in a position to speak for the whole of eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton? But to show how confident these men were of being able to secure anything and everything they wanted from this government in the way of beheading unfortunate Grits, he winds up his letter by saying:

Kindly communicate your decision to me as soon as possible, as Captain Gillis is at present here.

They could not wait for an investigation; there was no suggestion that an inquiry should be made. All that these men wanted was the place for Captain Gillis, and they felt sure that the minister would fall into the snare and do what was asked without an inquiry. Next I find a letter from J. A. Gillis, who was the Conservative candidate in Richmond county. I mention this to remove any idea that Thos. Gallant tried to deceive the department. Mr. Gillis says:

I beg leave to recommend the dismissal of Captain Peter Decoste of the dredge 'Cape Breton' and the appointment in his place of Captain Daniel Gillis of Port Hawkesbury, Cape Breton, at present of Pictou, Nova Scotia, Captain Gillis is an exceptionally competent man and was dismissed without cause in 1896 to make way for Decoste.

What is the first thing that the minister should have done when he received that letter? Should he not have inquired whether it was really the case that Captain Gillis had been dismissed without cause in 1896? I cannot find any evidence to justify that statement. You will also observe that there is not a single scintilla of evidence to show that Captain Decoste was a partisan, or was in any way offensive to the community.

Mr. DAVIDSON—Why was Captain Gillis dismissed?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). The records of the department are there, and the minister will be prepared to explain that, I presume.

Mr. DAVIDSON. You said that the statement made by Mr. Gallant that this man was dismissed without cause was incorrect.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I made the statement that the minister should have looked up the records and ascertained whether that statement was correct or not. He had no right to assume such an alleged fact. I will go further to satisfy my hon. friend, and will say that Captain Gillis was not dismissed because of offensive partisanship. He was continued by the late Minister of Public Works as an employee on one of the government dredges up to the day of the election; after the day of the election, and up to the time he took the place of Captain Peter Decoste. I would be sorry to say anything against Captain Gillis. I think he is a pretty good Liberal, but I hope that will not hurt him, and that the minister will not dismiss him from the service on that account. He was dismissed for other reasons. I think the member for Cumberland county made some charges against him, but they were not charges of offensive political partisanship. I do not want to go into that, because I do not want to say anything against Captain Gillis. But I do blame the Minister of Public Works for not having ascertained whether the charge made in these letters which I have read, was correct or not, that Captain Gillis had been dismissed for political partisanship; and I blame him for dismissing Captain Decoste without any accusation having been made against him. He should at least have insisted that J. A. Gillis, Thomas Gallant and William Macdonald and the others disclosed and undisclosed or some of them should have made a charge that Peter Decoste was guilty of offensive partisanship and on that account was not entitled to remain in charge of the dredge 'Cape Breton.' All through this correspondence you will not find one hint or suggestion that Captain Decoste was an offensive partisan, or that he had done any wrong, according to the standard by which the minister has been judging officials since he came into office. I find a letter here from John McCormick, who also was a defeated Conservative candidate in North-Cape Breton, as follows:

> I beg to recommend the dismissal of Captain Decoste of the dredge 'Cape Breton' and the appointment in his place of Captain Daniel Gillis of Port Hawkesbury Cape Breton, who in 1896 was dismissed without cause to make way for said Decoste.

How does he know that Captain Gillis was dismissed without cause? There is no doubt that he was sincere in the matter, but why did the minister act on this statement? Why did he not verify the facts for himself? You will observe that in this letter there is no hint or suggestion that Captain Decoste is a partisan. There is a similar letter from J. W. Maddin, the late representative for Cape Breton South, who goes one better. He says:

> Captain Gillis is a man of great experience in the dredging business, and was dismissed in 1896 to make room for Decoste.

If that is so, it would be only right that Captain Gillis should be reinstated. Is it so, however? Where is the evidence of it from the record or otherwise? But if we go a little further, we find Finlay Macdonald, president of the county of Cape Breton Liberal-Conservative Association saying:

> Captain Gillis is a most competent man against whom I believe no complaint was ever made. Captain Decoste's record you will be able to get from your officials.

Is this correct? Was there no complaint ever made against Captain Gillis? Here is another reason why the minister should have asked these men to make their charge against Captain Decoste, unless there was something in his record which satisfied him that Captain Decoste should have been dismissed. But I have a copy of all the correspondence relating to this dismissal, and I cannot find a single word against his record. Then, we have a letter from the Liberal-Conservative Association of Inverness county. In that letter it is said that Captain Decoste is a man of no experience whatever.' That is ridiculous. He has had experience under the late administration from the time he took the place until he was dismissed. His record was good, excellent. But behind that he had the experience of a quarter of a century as a navigator and had the highest certificates. How was this dismissal brought about? The only information he had of it was in a telegram dated October 26, 1911, from the assistant engineer to Mr. Graham, the superintendent of dredging as follows:

> Kindly arrange to have Captain Gillis of Port Hawkesbury replace Captain Decoste of dredge 'Cape Breton' giving him all necessary instructions regarding his work.

Then Mr. Graham writes to the assistant engineer under date of October 27, 1911:

> I am to-day in receipt of the following message from Mr. A. R. Dufresne, assistant chief engineer, Department of Public Works, Ottawa:—'Kindly arrange to have Captain Daniel Gillis of Port Hawkesbury replace Captain Decoste of dredge Cape Breton, giving him all necessary instructions regarding his work.' The above telegram is self explanatory and I have instructed Captain Gillis to report at my office to-morrow morning in connection with the same. When Captain Gillis arrives at the dredge I will feel obliged of you will give him any information you can in connection with the work being performed at St. Ann's, and also as to the operation and maintenance of the dredge. On his arrival on board the dredge, Captain Gillis will take charge of the plant.

Evidently Mr. Graham felt that Captain Gillis was not competent to take charge of the dredge 'Cape Breton' without first having received instructions from Captain Decoste—without first being schooled in the work to be done. Now, you will observe that immediately after this government came into power, or a very few days afterwards, the minister, without any investigation whatever, and without any notice to Captain Decoste, sends a telegram to Mr. Graham, the superintendent of dredging, and asks for the dismissal of this man, Captain Decoste. The mails in due course would be too slow; the lightning rapidity of the wires had to be used. That certainly was high-handed dealing and gross injustice towards Captain Decoste. But I desire to say, in all justice and fairness to the minister, that I believe he was imposed upon. Possibly he read the letters, or somebody else read them for him, and then he assumed that there was a charge of partisanship against Captain Decoste.

He thought that these men who had written these letters would not ask for a dismissal on any flimsy charges, or without having some justification for such action, and he took it for granted, perhaps, that Captain Decoste was an offensive partisan, or that these letters contained an accusation of offensive partisanship. But the correspondence does not show any charge whatever against Captain Decoste. The whole thing is simply this: it was desired to make a place for Captain Gillis, and, therefore, Captain Decoste was removed. I would ask the minister whether in justice to Captain Decoste, and in justice to himself, he will not insist upon charges being made against Captain Decoste first, that then the charges should be communicated by the government to the accused, and that he be given an opportunity of exonerating himself.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would ask the minister to inquire into the charges upon which Captain Gillis was dismissed. I am informed that he was dismissed not for political partisanship, but because of insubordination, or trouble of that kind, and I think the records will bear that out.

Mr. MONK. I must take the liberty of telling my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) that in my opinion he is making a great to do about nothing. I can assure him there will be no investigation in the case of Captain Decoste; we are well rid of him. He was quite unfit for the work of commander of that dredge, and in any event he would not have been retained in command any longer. The proofs of Captain Decoste's unfitness are in the department.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). If there are charges against him, why have those charges not been brought down?

Mr. MONK. There were complaints against Captain Decoste.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). We have no record of it.

Mr. MONK. There is a record in the department where my hon. friend can see them. There are quite a number of reports and my superintendent of dredging told me that Captain Decoste was not a satisfactory man. I have no doubt whatever that he was an unsuitable man to command that dredge, and I would not have maintained him there anyway. As to Captain Gillis we will see. I have never pretended that there would be an investigation in all cases where charges were made against officials. What I stated the other day, and what I repeat to-day, is that in Ottawa no dismissal would be effective without the man accused having an opportunity of going before the investigator. Some notices of dismissal had been sent out, but the general order regarding inquiries was given, and Mr. Chauvin was appointed to investigate every case without exception. I do not by any means intend to apply that rule everywhere. Where there is ample proof before the minister that the employee has transgressed, he will be dismissed without any unnecessary investigation. In Ottawa the circumstances were different. The charges covered over 100 cases, and I thought it was better to have a general investigation. And I was right in saying that in Ottawa no employee has been dismissed without an investigation of the charges against him; and in every case where the investigator reports to me—some reports have already been presented but I have not yet had time to look into them—that the charge is unfounded, justice will be done, whatever notice the accused man may have received. Replying to my hon. friend from Cape Breton I would say that every man employed in my department has had clear intimation, whether he is temporarily or permanently employed, that he is not to become an offensive partisan. Violations of this notice will be treated in the same way without any exception whatever. Of course the hardship is much greater where the person concerned is a permanent employee, but to make a distinction which my hon. friend invites me to make would be extremely unwise. The law is there, and the regulation is in force, that no man employed and paid by the public can meddle in politics whether his employment be of a permanent character or not, and I intend to adhere to that rule in my department as strictly as possible.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is Mr. Chauvin paid a per diem allowance of $15 or is he paid so much per case?

Mr. MONK. All the investigators are paid the same per diem rate of $15.

Mr. SINCLAIR. How many commissioners are engaged in investigating charges against officials? Can the minister give their names?

Mr. MONK. I have not the names of all of them. If my hon. friend will move for that information it will be supplied to him.

Mr. KNOWLES. I want to call the minister's attention, but not in any critical spirit at all, to the desirability of a public building for the town of Swift Current, and I trust that he will take the claims of that place into his consideration when he comes to prepare his supplementary estimates.

Mr. MONK. All the facts in regard to Swift Current were placed before me yesterday by a delegation, and they are now being considered by the officers of the department who have charge of the preparation of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. KNOWLES. I thank the minister for giving me that information, but I still deem it urgent and necessary to press upon him as strongly as I can the necessity for the construction of this building. The town of Swift Current has grown faster, proportionately, than any other town in Saskatchewan. It is a very important centre for the reason that no other town of any consequence is located within anything like reasonable distance of it. It is 111 miles from Moosejaw, and 89 or 90 miles from Maple Creek, and the territory to which it ministers extends southward for probably 100 miles, and northward for 50 miles. The town is going to be an important railway centre. The main line of the Canadian Pacific railway passes through the place, and construction of two other lines, one to run in a southeasterly, and the other in a northwesterly direction, has been commenced. The amount of business that is transacted in the federal offices in Swift Current indicates the importance of the town. In this connection let me read a letter I have received from the accountant of the Post Office Department dated Ottawa February 2, 1912:

Dear Sir,—Replying to yours of the 1st instant addressed to the secretary of the department, I beg to inform you that the revenue of the Swift Current, Saskatchewan, office for the calendar year ended 31st December 1911 was $11,912.91.

Yours truly,
W. J. GLOVER,
Accountant.

I want to read a similar letter from the Department of Inland Revenue showing the revenue of that department at Swift Current:

Department of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa, February 2, 1912.

Dear Sir,—Replying to yours of the 31st ultimo, I beg to inform you that the moment of duty collected during the fiscal year ending the 31st March 1911 at Swift Current was $9,268.01.

I regret that I cannot give you the figures for the calendar year as the books of the department only indicate the amount collected during the fiscal year.

Yours truly,
WILLIAM HIMSWORTH.

That is a good criterion. Now, let me read for the information of the minister a similar communication from the Department of the Interior, and, with all due respect, I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has this information:

Department of the Interior, Canada.
Ottawa, 5th February, 1912.

Statement of Revenue of the Dominion Lands Office, Swift Current, for the calendar year 1911, including payments made direct to head office.

Dominion Lands Revenue.

	Total.
Agency	$246,238 26
Head office	14,214 10
	$260,452 36
School Lands Revenue.
Agency	$1,080 34
	1,080 34
	$261,532 70

Then I have the following from the Department of Customs, showing the revenue at Swift Current through that department:

Department of Customs,
Ottawa, 5th February, 1912.

W. E. Knowles, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 31st ultimo, I have the honour to advise you that the customs revenue at Swift Current, during the calendar year 1911, was $30,362.85.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN McDOUGALD,
Commissioner of Customs.

So the minister will see that there was a total revenue of well over $300,000 at Swift Current in the last year. I submit that the minister might well use that town very generously. If he will contemplate the enormous revenue which is received by the government through this town, he must see that that puts the town in a different class from ordinary towns in the different parts of Canada. There are the two facts —a revenue of over $300,000 and nothing whatever in the shape of a public building. There is great need of a public building. The post office service suffers for lack of it and is very poor there at the present time. The Postmaster General is paying a large rent for accommodation there, also the Customs and Interior Departments. It would be economical to put up a public building; it would be just to put up a public building, especially in view of the enormous revenue which comes to the treasury of this government from that centre.

Mr. MONK. Would the town give us a site?

Mr. KNOWLES. I have not heard that point discussed. As a representative of the people I must say that I do not see why the town should be asked to give a site. The people of that town are paying up to the hilt in the way of customs and one thing and another, the town and district as I have shown, paying over $300,000. I should think that this is one of the towns in whose case the government would not be justified in insisting upon a site.

Mr. MONK. Many towns give us a site.

Mr. KNOWLES. But very few of them can present so good a case as that which I have been able to make to-day. I doubt if he can show any other town yielding a revenue of over $300,000 and without anything in the way of a public building. The site need not cost a great deal. At the same time, I doubt if the town will give it. I have not consulted my constituents; but I would not recommend them to furnish a site when the town affords so large a revenue. I hope the minister will decide to buy a site; he could probably get it for $40,000. And I hope he will not think the cost of the site too much. A large sum besides this could be put into a public building and still keep within lines of economy. He could probably put up a building for $125,000 that would meet the present requirements of the town and reasonably anticipate the growth which is sure to take place there. I would ask the hon. minister to give me the assurance this afternoon that he will give the matter consideration with a view to providing means for a public building, not next session but this session, because the need is imperative and very urgent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think this is only another illustration of the maladministration or lack of proper administration during the regime of the Liberal party.

Mr. KNOWLES. How so?

Mr. HENDERSON. Here, according to the hon. gentleman is a most urgent case He pointed out the large revenue derived from Swift Current. But while these large revenues have been coming into the treasury for years and years past the government of which he was a strong supporter paid no attention to his request and left the town without proper accommodation for its business. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should make such an exhibition of the incompetence and neglect of the administration of which he was an ardent supporter. Had the place been represented by an opponent of the government, I should not have expected, under the rules laid down by the previous government it would pay much attention to his request. But there would be a candidate who would be responsible for bringing the claims of that town to the attention of the government. But this is only another illustration of the lack of interest of the late government in many parts of the country.

Mr KNOWLES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) is entirely in the dark. His assertion that this revenue has been received 'for years and years' is without foundation. The Customs Office in Swift Current the Dominion Lands Office, and the Inland Revenue Office there are not two years old. If the hon. gentleman would come west he would understand that the conditions that prevail in my riding, have not existed 'for years and years' to use his own beautiful expression. But the fact is that, had our Conservative friends in the last parliament not adopted that remarkably stupid system which they did adopt of obstructing all His Majesty's estimates, it is probable the late government would have provided for the case. Prior to that, there was no great urgency and immediate need such as now exists. Perhaps the hon. member will take my word for it that he does not understand the condition. I presume that he knows something about Ontario that he thinks highly of it, and is highly thought of in that province. But he is absolutely at sea when he attempts to discuss the situation in a western town. And I am sorry that he, so prominent a supporter of the government, should, in this indirect way, throw cold water on my request for favourable consideration of this matter on the part of the government.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am surprised, indeed, at what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles) says, that the town of Swift Current is only two years old.

Mr. KNOWLES. I did not say that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, that the town was of no importance until two years ago—that is what I infer from what he says.

Mr. KNOWLES. The hon. gentleman infers too much.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then, I do not know what he did say. I remember going through that country twenty years ago, and I am pretty sure there was a place called Swift Current then.

Mr. KNOWLES. The Tories were in power then; why did not they put up a public building?

Mr. HENDERSON. It had not a revenue of $300,000 at that time. But it was growing and has grown very rapidly. The 'current' has been 'swift' for the last two years, yet the government of which the hon. gentleman was such a swift supporter did not do anything to help the town to accelerate its motion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles) says that we who were of the opposition of the day were responsible because we obstructed the estimates. Well, I do not know that the late government's majority ever came so low that any obstruction that we could offer would prevent them from putting an item through if they desired it. We criticised the estimates—very true. But I have no recollection of an item respecting Swift Current being criticised. The hon. gentleman has not told us that he had an item in the estimates for Swift Current. The probability is there was no such item. So, the hon. gentleman has no right to find fault with the government for not giving attention to this important place. It is only an illustration, as I have said, of how the former government, when they thought they had a constituency absolutely certain to return a supporter, failed to give it attention. I am not opposing this estimate. The Minister of Public Works tells us that a deputation waited on him no later than yesterday and had presented the needs and demands of Swift Current more forcibly, if possible, than the hon. gentleman has presented them.

It was not necessary for the hon. gentleman to come forward at this time and repeat what had been so well stated by the deputation, because the minister has all the facts, and probably the minister will listen to the deputation, and the hon. gentleman will find to his surprise that there will be a public building there—I will not say of the dimensions he speaks of. But is was a matter of curiosity to me why the hon. gentleman rose at all, when he knew that the government had been already provided with the information, and that everything was going along smoothly. Perhaps he wanted to make a little cheap political capital by causing the people out there to think that the very forcible speech which he delivered this afternoon in support of a public building in Swift Current was the reason for its erection. I hope the hon. gentleman will succeed in getting his building, proportionate to the size of the important town to which he refers.

Mr. KNOWLES. We all well remember that when the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), was in opposition, he had a hardy annual request to the government then in power for something for his riding.

Mr. HENDERSON. And I never got it.

Mr. KNOWLES. My hon. friend is not finding fault with me because I haven't got it, but because I asked for it. Great as is my respect for that hon. gentleman, when I think well to ask for a public building I will ask for it, and I will keep on asking, and he can make his little speech as often as he likes. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me. But my hon. friend knows nothing about the circumstances. Let me tell him that the town of Swift Current, although it did not give me a majority in 1908, in 1911 it gave me a majority of 80. I do not think the people will find that I am neglecting their interests. No matter what deputations may come down here, I have my duty to discharge to my constituents.

Mr. MONK. I did not understand the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) to throw any cold water on this request.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. MONK. But he was endeavouring to point out the real reason why the town of Swift Current was put off so long in getting this request. I have in my department a number of public buildings that are either being terminated or will have to be paid for, whose erection had been decided upon by the late government, but where one-tenth of the necessity did not exist that exists in the town of Swift Current, and where there is not one-third of the business done that is done in Swift Current. There is no doubt that the late government started upon a lavish erection of public buildings, and we have fallen into that hereditas damnosa, where there is nothing like the need that there is in Swift Current. It is surprising that the late government should go into those towns in the west where the price of sites is so terrifically expensive, where you have to pay for comparatively new towns, all the way from $40,000 to $125,000 for sites. It is astonishing to find that there was so little foresight in the last administration, and that they did not acquire sites at a time when they could have been purchased comparatively cheap. But they thought nothing of the future.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is always difficult to predict what changes will take place in a country like Canada, and especially in the west. It is also hard to implement promises that have been made in the past. For instance, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who was so lavish in his promises when he sat on this side of the House of what he would do in the future, now that he is in office is very reluctant to implement those promises. The other day I asked what he was going to do with the harbour of Montreal, if he was going to make it a national and free port. My hon. friend said: No, not now, I am too busy, we have had no time to consider it.

Mr. MONK. I do not recollect saying anything of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well, my hon. friend has no recollection at all, he is sleeping all the time. He promised his electors the Georgian Bay canal, to make Montreal a free port——

Mr. MONK. That is coming quickly.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is like Rip Van Winkle. After sleeping for a century, probably he will wake up and find that all these things have been done, not by his friends, but by us.

Mr. MONK. Much you did for Montreal.

Mr. LAW. I would ask the Minister of Public Works what he proposes to do to give increased accommodation to the post office in the town of Yarmouth. The late government purchased a property directly south of the public building there, but I see nothing in the estimates this year for the extension of the post office so as to give the needed increased accommodation. I may say to the minister that the people of Yarmouth have complained for some time of the inadequacy of the post office quarters there. The late government purchased a building directly south, and it would require quite a sum of money to extend the post office to that building. I trust the minister, in his supplementary estimates, will put an amount sufficient to give this increased accommodation to the town of Yarmouth.

Mr. MONK. I will do my best.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I wish to bring another matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works before this item is carried. Last November, I asked him why the captain of the dredge 'Cape Breton' had been dismissed. He did not intimate that his services were not satisfactory, that he was incompetent, or that he had discharged his duties in a way that did not meet with the approval of the officers of the department. On the contrary he suggested that I should move for the papers in the matter. I got the papers, and read them to the House, and there is not a word in them to indicate that a charge had ever been made during the whole fifteen years or thereabouts that Captain Decoste was in the employ of the government. He never had any accident to his men during all the time that he was employed, he never lost a tug, or steamer, or any of the equipment used on a dredge. His record, to my own knowledge, has been good. If since the change of government, my hon. friend the minister has discovered anything against the ability or the fitness of Captain Decoste to hold that position, why didn't he bring those papers down with the rest of the correspondence? I asked for all the papers, letters and correspondence in connection with his dismissal. I have a right to assume that all the charges that could be made against Captain Decoste are found in the papers that are brought down, but there is not a single line in the form of a charge against him. Now it is decidedly unfair to Captain Decoste that the minister should shift his position, and say: that might is right, I am Minister of Public Works, I am a member of a government with a strong majority behind me, and Decoste must get along the best he can, he is only an insignificant French Acadian down in the county of Antigonish, and he has got to face the music. Now, the minister practically says to those who inquire on behalf of Captain Decoste that he dismissed him without having any charges made against him, and he refuses an investigation. I submit that such conduct is not what you would expect from a minister of the Crown, it is not compatible with those protestations of fairness and justice from the lips of the Minister of Public Works again and again since this session began. I submit that it is only fair to Captain Decoste, that he should know what the charges are against him, and that he should be given an opportunity to vindicate himself.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is very lengthy in his complaint, but I do not say there were charges against Captain Decoste. I said that my officers reported to me that he was a very unsatisfactory captain of the dredge. I can demonstrate that to my hon. friend if he will come to my office. I can show him the complaints——

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Are they in writing?

Mr. MONK——and produce before him the officials of the department who will confirm what I am saying now. As to Captain Decoste being a French Acadian, as alleged by my hon. friend, I may say that side of the question was never considered by me. He is probably an Acadian of French descent, and as such is extremely interesting to me. But, there was no national question, fortunately, in this matter at all. I believe that Mr. Gallant is also an Acadian by descent. Mr. Girouard is an Acadian. I believe, and he was dismissed in 189t without any reason whatever by my hon. friend and had to go and earn his livelihood in the United States. I do not think that the national question will help my hon. friend very much in this matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I have the honour to represent several thousand French Acadians in my constituency adjoining the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Chisholm, Antigonish); I am acquainted with Captain Decoste and I feel I should enter my protest against what the minister has been saying with regard to him this afternoon. I was sorry to hear the minister say that Captain Decoste would not have any investigation. I do not say that because he is a French Acadian, but because he is a British subject and a good citizen of this country, a man who has the respect of his neighbours and of people generally in eastern Nova Scotia who know him. I think that for these reasons he ought to be accorded an investigation. The minister has told us that there are some charges against him by some officers of the department, which he has not produced to the House. It is a serious matter to Captain Decoste, it means his livelihood, it means his future, it means an end to his business as a captain if the statement made by the minister should go abroad and be believed by people who wished to employ Captain Decoste in the only capacity in which he is capable of serving. It is a very serious matter to him, and I do not think the minister was justified in stating so positively that there would be no investigation into the case of Captain Decoste. The reason was that he had some papers, some statements in his possession——

Mr. MONK. He was found an unsatisfactory officer.

Mr. SINCLAIR——reflecting on the character, I suppose, of Captain Decoste. If there are documents of that kind in the department I would remind the minister that the House passed an order that all documents relating to the dismissal of Captain Decoste should be produced. We have the documents here that were produced and we do not find any complaint of that character. I do not think that this is a position that the minister should take. I think he should say that he will bring down these documents and that he will give Captain Decoste an opportunity of being heard. It is not a question of getting back his job, but it is a question of his character, and that is very important to him. If he has an opportunity of clearing up his reputation as a captain he might get employment somewhere else, but when the minister summarily discharges him and states in parliament that here will be no investigation in Captain Decoste's case, it will be a serious matter for Captain Decoste personally. I have a very high respect for him. He acted as captain of a dredge on work in my constituency, he gave thoroughly good service and there was no complaint against him by anybody. He did his work very well and I think there must be some mistake somewhere, because I do not think that Captain Decoste got fair play or that documents could be produced in the Public Works Department or anywhere else that would show that he was unfit to perform his duties. I would like the minister to reconsider the decision that he has come to this afternoon and to tell the House before this matter closes that he will give Captain Decoste an opportunity of being heard for the purpose of clearing his character.

Mr. MONK. I did not say there were charges or accusations against this man. I said that he was an unsatisfactory officer by general report and that we did not consider that he was a loss to the department.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). There is another matter that I want to mention to the Minister of Public Works and particularly while the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) is in his seat. Some years ago a person in the town of Digby was appointed by the Department of Public Works to attend to the winding of the clock in the public building in the town for which he was to receive $25 a year. I understand that he is in no sense a partisan and not considered as such in the town of Digby. Recently some person, whether by authority or not I do not know, placed on the door entering to the clock in the tower a padlock which prevents the proper person gaining access to the place where the clock is in order to wind it. This may be a very serious matter to the town of Digby if some day they ascertain that the clock in the public building is stopped. I would like the Minister of Public Works to look into this and instruct the man who put the padlock on the door to take it off so that the person employed some few years ago to wind the clock may have an opportunity of getting at it.

Mr. MONK. I will look into it.

Mr. JAMESON. I think that I will possibly be able to explain the situation to my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean). This gentleman to whom he refers as having charge of the clock in the public building at Digby has been reported to me as having been unsatisfactory. It was said that he did not care for the clock sufficiently well to keep it going, that at times it was, owing to lack of attention, stopped, and that otherwise it was not attended to in a satisfactory way. I brought the matter to the attention of the Department of Public Works and the department removed that gentleman from office and appointed another. The man who was appointed to office received a notification to that effect, but through some oversight, as I am given to understand, the person who had previously held the appointment, did not receive notification. The result was that when the new official went to discharge his duties, after attending to them, he put a padlock on the door. The padlock, however, was removed by the gentleman who had previously attended to the clock. I think the matter has been explained to the satisfaction of all concerned by a notification from the department which has reached the first official to the effect that his services are no longer required.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). He has been dismissed?

Mr. JAMESON. He has been dismissed.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). And notified to that effect?

Mr. JAMESON. And notified to that effect.

Mr. LAW. I was not able to be present when the item of $100,000 for dredging and improvements in Yarmouth harbour came up. I would like to ask the minister what he proposes to do with the $100,000 that was voted, whether it is to be expended upon dredging or other work.

Mr. MONK. That is under consideration. The matter has not yet been decided, but I think dredging probably.

Mr. LAW. It seems to me that before the estimate passes the House we should be entitled to know something about the work that is to be done. There is an obstruction in Yarmouth harbour at Sollow's Rock ledge which has been there for many years and for the removal of which $75,000 was placed in last year's estimates.

Owing to the dissolution of parliament that money was not expended, and I would like the minister to state definitely now what he purposes doing with that vote and whether there will be an additional vote in the supplementary estimates. The port of Yarmouth is one of the most important in the maritime provinces; there are more first-class passengers landed there in the course of a year than at any other port in the maritime provinces or probably in the Dominion. We have a line of steamers now between Yarmouth and Boston and we are looking forward to having another line from Yarmouth to New York. The Canadian Pacific railway have purchased the Dominion Atlantic railway, including their steamship line, and it is proposed in a short time to put larger boats on the route between Yarmouth and Boston, while of course the New York boats will also be larger than those plying at present to that port. I point out to the minister the urgency of the need of improvements at the port of Yarmouth. While the late government had been lavish in its expenditure there, and had greatly improved the harbour, yet there is a great handicap to shipping in the inadequate channel leading from the mouth of the harbour to the business part of the port. There is a ledge situated outside of the harbour on which there is at low water fourteen feet six inches, and that will require to be blasted out at a large expenditure. I submit to the minister that the necessity and importance of the port demand early action on the part of the government. There is considerable dredging also required in the harbour. We have in the channel a depth of twenty feet, but if the Canadian Pacific railway should put on larger boats as they intend to, a great deal of dredging will have to be done. The people of Yarmouth will appreciate the $100,000 which is now in the estimates, and I have nothing to say against it except that it is altogether too small. I trust that the minister, when he looks into the matter, will be able to place in the supplementary estimates an equal amount. When some gentlemen from Yarmouth attended the liquid banquet which was held in Halifax last fall, they said when they returned home, that they had seen the Minister of Public Works and the report was current that he intended to expend two or three million dollars on Yarmouth harbour, and although we appreciate the $100,000 in the estimates, the drop from two or three millions is great indeed. Has the minister any idea as to how he will expend the $100,000 in the main estimates?

Mr. MONK. I have a general idea, and that general idea which is very firmly imbedded in my mind is that when the late government spent so much money in that locality it is a pity it did not remove that ledge to which the hon. member has referred. That was the key of the situation in the harbour of Yarmouth, and instead of employing the dredges in the neighbourhood of private docks, probably with the object of advancing private interests, if they had removed the ledge at the entrance of the harbour it would have been a far more profitable service to the port. The port of Yarmouth will require our attention and there is a vote in the estimates for it.

The determination of the Canadian Pacific railway, having acquired the Dominion

Atlantic line, to place new boats on the route, is not yet an accomplished fact. Although Yarmouth is an important port it is not the only port in Nova Scotia. There are other important ports along the Bay of Fundy, and until we know exactly what the plans of the Canadian Pacific railway are, and how far our improvements may meet these plans, the matter remains to a certain extent in doubt. Justice will be done to the harbour and certainly the work will be more profitable to the general interests of the port than anything done in the past by the late government.

Mr. LAW. In denial of what the minister has said, I wish to state that if he goes to Yarmouth he will only find a very few partisans who will say that the dredging done in Yarmouth Harbour has been done for the benefit of private owners of wharfs. There has been no work done in the port of Yarmouth solely for the benefit of owners of wharfs; the work done there has been done in the interests of the general navigation of the port. I deny most emphatically the statement made by the minister. He has apparently been posted by some gentlemen from Yarmouth who have taken considerable interest in the matter, but I know that the statement he made to-day is absolutely wrong, I know that ninety per cent of the dredging done in Yarmouth Harbour has been done largely in the main channel, and while it certainly has improved private wharf property it undoubtedly has improved the harbour facilities as well. There was a channel dredged at the south end of the town which has opened up a large fishing industry and I doubt if the Minister of Public Works will find even a Conservative in Yarmouth who will object to that work. I know what I am speaking about and I say that the work done by the late government was done for the benefit of Yarmouth Harbour and was not done for the benefit of any private wharf owner. If the minister will spend this $100,000 to as good purpose as the late government spent the money, there will be no fault found. As to why the late government did not remove this ledge, I may say that there was only a certain amount of money voted and the dredging was done first, leaving it for the present government to take out the rock. Had the Liberal government remained in power, and I am sorry it did not—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear hear.

Mr. LAW. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, but if the rest of Canada had given as intelligent a vote as the County of Yarmouth did, we would have been on the other side of the House to-day. I feel satisfied that had the late government been in power to-day I would have got a vote of no less than $250,000 for the development of Yarmouth Harbour and if the present government puts that amount in the estimates they will be doing a lot of good in the public interest.

Mr. DAVIDSON. As a representative of one of the western Nova Scotia counties I wish to corroborate in a measure what has been said by my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Law). It is in the memory of this House that on a certain occasion when there was to be a banquet in the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Law) and when the officers of the great Canadian Navy were required there to furnish partners in the dance for the charming ladies of that locality, the 'Niobe' was ordered to that port.

And notwithstanding the large expenditures of the late government for dredging in that harbour, it was in such a condition that the 'Niobe' met with a very great misfortune.

Mr. LAW. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. She met with no misfortune in the port of Yarmouth. What the hon. gentleman is stating is absolutely false, and he knows it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I would ask the hon. gentleman to take back that statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The statement should be withdrawn.

Mr. LAW. I say then that it is not in accordance with the fact.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The point I wish to make is this, that owing to the order given by my hon. friend, who wanted to make a day of it in Yarmouth, the warship 'Niobe' was despatched to that port. In carrying out that order she got into trouble and got the Dominion government into a great deal of trouble. Therefore I would like to see such expenditures made in that locality that not only would the people engaged in the dredging business be benefited, as I know they were by the expenditures previously made, but such improvements would be made in the port of Yarmouth and its vicinity that on the occasion of another visit to the port of Yarmouth, the Canadian navy, if it happened to be in existence at the time, would safely ride in and safely come out.

Mr. LAW. I do not want to allow the statement to go unchallenged that the 'Niobe,' before she left Yarmouth, met with a bad accident. The hon. gentleman will not hear that statement made in Yarmouth harbour or Yarmouth county. It has been made by the hon. member and circulated by every Tory newspaper in the Dominion of Canada, but I say that the 'Niobe' met with no accident in the port of Yarmouth.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings, N.S.) Will the hon. member for Annapolis tell us what business the 'Niobe' had at Yarmouth at that time?

Mr. McKENZIE. She was loaded with potatoes, apparently.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Before this item passes I would like to impress upon the hon. minister the necessity of doing some dredging at the Magdalen islands. Last year I obtained from my colleague the late Minister of Public Works the promise that a dredge belonging to the department would be sent to the islands, and one was sent. As my hon. friend knows, there are several harbours around these islands, but the sands are continually shifting, so that the harbours are very difficult of ingress and egress. No dredge had been sent to the Magdalen islands since 1875, and it has always been difficult to obtain from the department the services of a dredge for that district, because the dredges were all monopolized by the various harbours in the maritime provinces. But, last year the late Minister of Public Works sent a dredge to the islands. The great difficulty, I am bound to say, is to get the work started at a stated point. Every man on the islands—I do not except my own friends—wanted the dredge to start in his locality. This is a great mistake. There are certain harbours which should be attended to first, because the steamer stops at them.

Mr. MONK. What is the name of the dredge that is there?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not know the name. The resident engineer should select the places where the dredge should work. I told him not to be dictated to by any of the residents, but to follow his own judgment. I may say that I lost heavily on the Magdalen islands because I followed the straight path and adhered to it from beginning to end. The dredge is still there, and I expect will be working next summer. The man who should be consulted in this matter is Captain McClure, the captain of the steamer which plies between Pictou and the various ports of the Magdalen islands. He has prepared a map of the islands, which shows the places where the work should be done. I believe there is a duplicate of that map in the Public Works Department, and I would urge my hon. friend to give instructions to the resident engineer to follow the advice of Captain McClure, who is more experienced in such matters than any one else in that region.

Mr. MONK. Strong representations similar to those I have just heard have been made to me by the sitting member for the county (Mr. Gauthier), and we will endeavour during the coming summer to carry on the dredging in the wisest way.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), says that about the bars and harbours of the Magdalen islands there are shifting sands. If that is the case, no benefit will be obtained by dredging in the ordinary way. All that can be done is by dragging or harrowing. If the minister will consult the officers of the department, I think he would find that they will agree with that statement.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It was a dredge used by the department for ordinary dredging, but in view of the shifting sands of the Magdalen Islands the then Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), sent a special dredge for the work.

Mr. OLIVER. When the estimates of the Minister of Public Works were under consideration before, I asked the minister some questions, and, if I remember correctly, he promised to furnish me with answers by letter. I have not yet received any communication from the minister, but I hope he will keep the matter in mind, and let me have the desired information at his earliest convenience.

Mr. MONK. I got my officers to prepare answers to all the questions put during the discussion in committee that I was not able to answer at the time. I will put this information upon the table so that hon. gentlemen interested can have access to it.

Ottawa—Heating, including salaries of engineers firemen and watchmen, $150,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What explanation has my hon. friend to give about this?

Mr. MONK. It is the usual vote, but somewhat increased this year. It is a vote to make provision for a large number of items of expenditure which are incurred every year in connection with the heating of the public buildings here.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What system of heating is adopted by the Public Works Department?

Mr. MONK. I believe there are hot water furnaces in most of the departmental buildings, and in others the heating is by steam.

Mr. LEMIEUX. How many firemen are employed?

Mr. MONK. We have 57 firemen whose wages range from $330 to $660 a year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the minister dismissed a fireman named Gariepy?

Mr. MONK. I do not remember the name. If any complaint had been made against him, his name would be handed to the Ottawa investigator.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Why have the services of Mr. Williams, door-keeper at the door of this chamber, been dispensed with. This man is a British navy veteran, and possessed a number of medals gained in active service?

Mr. MONK. I know nothing of the circumstances and doubt very much if this man was in my department. If so, and there was complaint against him, his case would have been referred to the investigator, Mr. Chauvin.

Ottawa—Removal of snow, including Rideau Hall, $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. How many men are employed in removing snow?

Mr. MONK. I could not tell exactly, but the number is a little larger than last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. By whom are the men employed in removing snow recommended?

Mr. MONK. The men are engaged on the recommendation of any reputable person. Part of the work of removing snow is done by contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the explanation of the increase in the cost this year?

Mr. MONK. I suppose there are more buildings to attend to. I do not know of any other reason.

Ottawa—Repairs, including ventilation and lighting, furniture, &c., $250,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What has the minister to say about this item? The item for furniture was very severely criticised during the last parliament.

Mr. MONK. This vote is asked for the purpose of carrying out works of improvement, and repairing and procuring furniture. We find this necessary from time to time in order to maintain the public buildings in the city of Ottawa in a proper state of efficiency, and to meet the requirements of the public service. There is an increase from last year. The men who mainly perform these works are mechanics and labourers, employed under the direct supervision of the officers of the department, in compliance with requisitions received from the various departments.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When furniture is required by the department for the various buildings is it furnished by the department itself, or is it purchased outside?

Mr. MONK. As a general rule it is purchased outside. I do not think we manufacture furniture.

Mr. LEMIEUX. From what firm?

Mr. MONK. I really could not tell my hon. friend. It depends upon the kind of furniture that is required. I think that where a large purchase is contemplated, the purchase would have to be by contract. I have not had myself any transactions of the kind carried through since I have been in office. The demands have been limited to desks and things of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my hon. friend complied with the $5,000 limit in these cases?

Mr. MONK. In every instance.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

PATENTS OF THOMAS D. RAMBAUT.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 84), respecting certain patents of Thomas D. Rambaut.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. CARVELL. When the hour for private Bills expired on Wednesday last, I think we were discussing section 2 of this Bill. I have certainly an objection to this Bill, but as the promoter is not present, I do not wish to force on a discussion, although, if the committee think it proper to go on, I will do so.

Mr. REID. We will let it stand.

Mr. CARVELL. Would the minister be willing that it should not come up on Monday, as I shall not be able to be here until after dinner on that day?

Mr. REID (Grenville). We might let it stand for a few minutes, and if the member in charge of it does not come in, we will let it stand till another day.

Bill allowed to stand.

PATENTS OF THOMAS WADGE.

Bill (No 16) respecting patents of Thomas Wadge reported from Committee of the Whole without amendment.

Mr. CURRIE. Mr. Speaker, I hold that this Bill is still in the committee, and has not been discharged from the committee.

Mr. CARVELL. According to my recollection, this Bill was passed by the committee and we entered into the discussion of (Bill 84) and discussed it until nine o'clock, when Your Honour took the Chair without the Bill being reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. On the Bill is printed, 'as reported by the Committee of the Whole.' It was not reported to the House, as the hour for private Bills having expired while the committee was sitting, it could not be reported.

Mr. CURRIE I do not go by anything that was expected or understood at the last meeting of the committee. I go by the order of proceedings as laid down in the order paper, and item 41 says:

February 13—Further consideration in Committe of the Whole of the following two Bills——

And it names Bill (No. 16) and Bill (No. 84). I do not want to sultify the order paper, and I hold that the Bill is still in the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must rule that the Bill has passed the committee, because I was here waiting until the business of the Committee would be reported, but as the hour for private Bills expired before this Bill was reported, although to my personal knowledge it had passed the committee and was ordered to be reported therefore I must treat it as reported now. There will be an opportunity for any motion or discussion on the third reading.

Mr. STAPLES. I happened to be out of the House when this Bill was last in committee, but I certainly want to oppose it.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I move that the Bill be now read the third time.

Mr. STAPLES. This Bill is for the renewal of a patent on wind-stackers, which the patentees have enjoyed the benefit of for 18 or 20 years. The patent covers a piece of machinery that is used on threshing machines in the western country and also in other parts of Canada and in the whole world. I think in the interests of the consumer it is now time that such a patent should lapse. The effect of this would be a reduction in the cost of that piece of machinery of possibly a couple of hundred dollars.

Mr. CURRIE. I certainly think that the Bill should be allowed to stand, and be compelled to stand, especially as the hon. member who has charge of the Bill is not here. I called the attention of the House to these Bills when they first appeared. I said that they should be accompanied by an explanation of the specifications to prevent a fraud of any kind on the public. No explanation has been given of what these patents cover, and this Bill is so framed that you cannot extract from it any idea of what the patent is. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Armstrong) took occasion to inquire at the Patent Office what the specifications of this patent were, and he received a letter from the Commissioner of Patents that the specifications would be sent to him for $6.50 or $7. Now, I think that the hon. member who desires to have the Bill read the third time, might just as well, in the interest of peace, let it stand until we satisfy ourselves whether the patent deals with a stacking apparatus or not. I have never heard in the House an explanation of what the patent is. If the House does not adopt the rule that there should be such an explanation on every patent Bill, we shall have applications coming here for the renewal of the patent on the Bessemer process of making steel, and on a hundred other things, and the result will be that this country will be burdened down with patent rights which do not exist in other countries. We have stopped patent Bills before, and the people of Great Britain have been compelled to prevent the patenting of articles not patented in other countries. If a corporation has a patent such as this, it need not manufacture in Canada unless it likes. In view of these facts I think it would be well that the Bill should stand over; therefore, I object to the third reading at present.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) is in error as to the facts connected with the Bill, which I excuse him for, as he has not been intimately associated with farming for many years. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is, however, on a different footing; I think there is not such an excuse for him. Had he been in this House when this Bill was passed by the committee last Tuesday, he would have known that the very explanation which he asks for was then given. To correct first the hon. member for Macdonald, I may say that the patent does not cover anything with wind-stackers at all. The patent originally covered something connected with a fanning mill for cleaning grain. Just when the patent was taken out I cannot tell, but I know it was only a little over seven years ago. Mr. Wadge is the purchaser of the two patents. What the specifications cover I do not know, and it is not material to the Bill. Mr. Wadge purchased the patents in the ordinary way, on an 18 year basis; but owing to an error of his solicitors, who did not discover that the patent period paid for was only 6 years, he went on manufacturing, and has manufactured very largely in the city of Winnipeg, in the belief that he had the title for 18 years.

Mr. CURRIE. Is the patent in existence in any other country for this additional term or is it the fact that this six, or eight, or fourteen years required here does not hold good in the United States?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I do not think we are concerned with the United States?

Mr. CURRIE. Of course, the patent law of Canada states that when a patent expires in the United States, it expires here automatically.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I could tell the House what I know about the patent law in a short time, I confess, to my hon. friend from North Simcoe. But, I know this, and it is sufficient for the present Bill, that Mr. Wadge, who purchased the patent, purchased the patent for Canada and that is all we are concerned with. The patent for Canada expired at the expiration of six years, although he had purchased it for 18 years. The reason that it expired was owing to an error of a firm of patent solicitors—a very competent firm—in the city of Winnipeg. In the spring of 1905 he began to manufacture this patent in Canada and he has manufactured it continuously since. Last year he made 1,800 and this year expects to make 2,400 of the articles covered by the patent. This is simply to correct an error which was no fault of Mr. Wadge's, but only his misfortune. What is the result if we do not? In the first place, no one is injured if we do. This was all explained to the committee before and the House will forgive me if I traverse it again. The rights of all who may have acquired rights since the expiration of the patent are reserved in the Bill. Any rights acquired since the expiration of the patent are protected but Mr. Wadge's patent is continued to the expiration of the time he purchased it for. Had he known, which he did not, that it would expire at the end of six years, that being the only term that was paid for, he would have paid the very small fee and secured this renewal. This is simply to correct the most obvious of errors. It may be obtuseness on my part, but I cannot see why United States rights have anything to do with the Bill that is before the House.

Mr. STAPLES. It is quite natural that a man who is off the farm for a period becomes a little rusty in his farming pursuits. According to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has evidently become a little rusty in his law. However that may be, I frankly admit to the committee, according to the affidavit which I have now read and which was not brought to my attention before, the rights contained in this Bill do not extend as far as I thought they did. I thought the Bill renewed the patent for pneumatic stackers, and if such had been the fact I certainly would have opposed it. After hearing the explanation of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie I withdraw my protest against the Bill.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURRIE.

PATENTS OF THOMAS D. RAMBAUT.

On the order for further consideration in Committee of the Whole of certain patents of Thomas D. Rambaut.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. CARVELL. If this Bill is going over to the next sitting of the House, will it be understood that it will not be taken up on Monday before six o'clock?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. CARVELL. I want to offer some objection, and I cannot be here before six o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS. All right.

SUPPLY.

House resumed in Committee of Supply.

Rideau Hall (including grounds)—improvements, furniture and maintenance, &c., $35,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would the minister give an explanation of this item?

Mr. MONK. This vote is to be applied to carrying on the works of renewals, improvements and repairs, procuring furniture, &c., required for Rideau Hall, and maintaining the grounds in proper condition in accordance with the specifications of the chief architect. It is a smaller vote than last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand the vote is to complete the refurnishing of the interior of Rideau Hall. What will be the cost of that?

Mr. MONK. The cost was very considerable, amounting in respect of furniture and fittings to the sum of $5,000. The furniture was in a very poor state when the new government took office, and it was deemed absolutely necessary after an inspection to make this provision.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is it the intention of the government to carry out the idea propounded by the late Governor General? Lord Grey was of opinion that the government should procure another site and build a new gubernatorial residence, in fact he had himself selected a piece of ground not far from Rideau Hall which was better suited for the purpose than the old estate. If I remember well, he had committed to his views gentlemen like the Prime Minister, and I believe also the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I remember being present last year at an afternoon tea when this question was discussed freely, and every one agreed that too much money had been spent on the old building and that there ought to be a new residence occupying another site.

Mr. MONK. I think the idea is a very good one and ought to have been carried out. However, we have already made considerable expenditure for repairs. The cloak rooms have been built up, and other repairs carried out, and I do not think there is any immediate prospect of carrying out the project which nas been so often mooted. The residence was a wretched building for the purpose in the first place, and if some years ago a more suitable residence had been erected on a better site it would have been preferable to what has been done. The expenditure of large sums, however, has made the dwelling, I am informed, tolerably comfortable. And it will be suitable enough for the present. We have such large expenditures to make in the immediate future for departmental buildings, that until greater necessity arises I think we can leave the matter as it stands.

Dominion buildings—furniture, $19,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is this vote for new furniture?

Mr. MONK. The vote is asked for the purchase of new furniture for the use of employees of the federal government in the Dominion buildings in the various provinces.

Power for running elevators, stamp cancelling machines, $35,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. From whom do you get the power?

Mr. MONK. From the Ottawa Electric Company.

Mr. MACDONALD. I take advantage of this opportunity to draw attention to a somewhat important matter. Not long ago a friend of mine who is interested in a Canadian Coal Company, while visiting these buildings suggested that there was no reason why heat, and power also, except such as that obtained by hydraulic means, for the public buildings of Canada might not be developed from the use of Canadian coal. The coal at present used in our buildings is brought in from the United States, and although there may be some difficulties in the way, I would like to see the opportunity taken to assist Canadian industry. I draw the minister's attention to this point as perhaps it is one which he has so far overlooked. We all glory in Canadian made articles, and why should not Canadian coal be used in connection with the heating and lighting of our buildings in preference to coal from the United States. I do not know whether the minister has considered this question?

Mr. MONK. I have not.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then I would like the minister to give the matter his attention, because when we have a coal production in Canada of something like 10,000,000 tons, the least we can do in the way of rendering patriotic assistance to the men who produce that coal is to burn Canadian coal in our public buildings.

Mr. MONK. I have not had occasion to give this question very much consideration but it is certainly worthy of attention. I hope the time will come when we will be able to get all the heat we require through the medium of the immense water-powers which surround this city.

Mr. MACDONALD. Pending the time when we shall see the development of electricity on such a large scale in this district, and the long expected ventilation of these buildings in a modern way such as the members of this House have been talking about for the last 30 years, I hope the minister will not lose sight of this important question of the use of Canadian coal in our public buildings. I ask the minister's serious attention to the matter, and hope he will look into it.

Mr. MONK. Is the coal produced in the province from which my hon. friend comes suitable for heating purposes in buildings of this character?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes; people in the maritime provinces depend entirely upon the bituminous coal produced there for keeping their houses and buildings warm in winter.

Mr. MONK. Is it used in the government buildings in Halifax?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, in the government buildings in the maritime provinces generally. The Minister of Public Works calls for tenders every year for the supply of coal for the public buildings in eastern Canada. There is no reason why he should not extend that so as to include the public buildings in central Canada as well. The coal from Alberta should be used, if it is not, as far east as Manitoba. Of course, the element of cost will enter into the question of supplying coal from the east and from the west for the central area; but, I submit, that every Canadian ought to be patriotic enough to prefer to have Canadian coal used in the public buildings, even if it costs a little more.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Did the late government do that?

Mr. MACDONALD. This 'late' government business is becoming a habit with my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). He is always looking to the past. We have a new government which came in with great professions of what they were going to do for Canada, particularly in such matters as this. We were told that if we ventured to buy or sell with the people of the United States, our loyalty would be endangered. I call the attention of the government which came in with these hopes and professions to an opportunity for action in line with those professions, and I hope they will not fail to act upon it at an early day.

Mr. MONK. All the same it must seem a little singular to people not familiar with political idiosyncrasies to find that the coal which is used this evening to heat this very building was bought outside of Canada to fulfil contracts made by the friends of the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) in violation of the principle which he is so energetically defending to-night.

Mr. MACDONALD. I decline to have a matter so serious as this dismissed by hon. gentlemen opposite with an excuse so hackneyed as the tu quoque argument. How long are they going to keep it up?

Mr. MONK. Very long.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then, I think the best thing they can do is to take up everything the late government did and imitate it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) seems to forget the virtuous professions made on behalf of the party now in power of what they would do if they were given control of public affairs. But when we ask them to fulfil their pledges, even in a small degree, their answer is: We are not going to do it because you did not do it. I say we have had about enough of that proposition, if these gentlemen are to make any pretence whatever at standing to the principles. I am surprised specially at the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk). I have brought this question of the use of Canadian coal to his attention at the suggestion of a friend of his own. It is no answer to tell me that the late government did not do it. The hon. minister ought to look into the matter. If there is good reason why Canadian coal should not be used in the public buildings, let us know it.

Mr. MONK. I have given the hon. member the assurance that I will look into the suggestion. But when he becomes irritated and indignant on this question of Canadian coal, I think it fair to remind him that the coal we are burning at this moment, and which, I think, was supplied under contract to the late government—I do not recollect giving any order for coal—was bought in contravention of the principle which the hon. gentleman laid down. We have had absolutely no opportunity of putting in practice the principle he is defending so valiantly; and, in answer to his indignant protests, it seems fair to say that that which excites his indignation was the act not of this government but of his friends.

Mr. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman is worried because of any supposed indignation on my part, I beg to assure him that I am in the best of humour. I accept the minister's assurance that he proposes to look into this matter. If so, I hope that, if not this season then next session, we shall find that he has looked into the matter and has seen to it that Canadian coal is purchased.

Mr. SINCLAIR. There seems to have been a very clear and decided difference between the attitude of hon. members on the other side and that of the late government in regard to these matters. It should be remembered that the late government was disposed toward freedom of trade with the United States, while our friends opposite were very much opposed to it. What we are asking them to do is simply to live up to their professions. The fishermen in my county thought it would be a good thing if they were enabled to sell their fish in the United States. But a trooper representing the conservative party came down with a poster 'Canada for the Canadians,' 'God save the King,' and so on, and the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite declared that it would be a bad thing to adopt the policy which the late government proposed. And now, when we ask the Minister of Public Works, in pursuance of the policy of his party, to burn Canadian coal in the public buildings, his answer is that the late government did not do it. That is no proper answer. These gentlemen ought to be ready to live up to their professions, and one would think that to ask them to burn Canadian coal to heat the public buildings would be to call upon them to fulfil only a very small part of those professions. I notice by the public returns that Canada imported last year something like $50,000,000 worth of coal from the United States. I believe the greater part of that coal was burnt by those who were so much opposed to our doing business with the United States—by the combines, the railway magnates and the big manufacturers. Of course, if Nova Scotia could get a larger market in Canada for her coal it would be a good thing, and I would like to see everything done in that direction that we can do. I would like to see Nova Scotia coal go further west than it does at present. It is not sold much further west than Montreal. Could we sell it in Toronto and other places in Ontario, we should have a much larger business than we have at present. Anything this government could do to promote the consumption of our own coal would be but an attempt to live up to the professions they made on September 21st.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton). I do not know whether the suggestions of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) are practical or not. But I would like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Public Works with reference to lighting the public buildings in Ontario. I would like him to take into consideration the fact that the Hydro-Electric Commission are doing a great public service for Ontario, and as far as possible we should make use of the power they supply to light and heat the public buildings.

Mr. MONK. I will make a note of it, and when we take up the question of lighting I will look into the matter further.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I notice in this item a vote for 'Power for running elevators, stamp-cancelling machines, &c.' What are the stamp-cancelling machines?

Mr. MONK. A number of post offices have stamp cancelling machines, and they require electrical power to operate them.

Dominion Buildings—rents, $340,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has the minister rented any new buildings since taking office?

Mr. MONK. I have rented one building on Metcalfe street since taking office. Last year the amount of our rentals was $306,485.89. This year we will require $340,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are rentals cheaper or dearer this year as compared with former years?

Mr. MONK. We are paying something like 98 cents or $1 a foot for the building on Metcalfe street, which is a somewhat high rental.

Mr. SINCLAIR. How much a foot was paid for the Woods building?

Mr. MONK. I think it is considerably more than that, but that was some years ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The minister means considerably less than $1 a foot, does he not?

Mr. MONK. No, I think it was more than $1 a foot in the case of the Woods building, but it would be difficult to establish any comparison because rents have gone up a great deal during the past few years.

Mr. SINCLAIR. My recollection is that the rent of the Woods building is less than 80 cents a foot.

Mr. MONK. That is one way of estimating rentals. We have found in the case of the last lease we made that we are paying 6 per cent upon the expenditure. I think in the case of the Woods building and other buildings rented at that time the percentage was far greater than that on the cost and that in some cases it went to 20 per cent.

Mr. SINCLAIR. What is the length of the lease of the Metcalfe street building?

Mr. MONK. Five years. I made that lease as short as possible, but I do not anticipate that we will be ready in five years, unless we use very great diligence, to install our departments at home.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has the minister made any comparison between the rentals paid by the departments and other people who rent buildings or does he find that the rentals paid by the government are just about the same, or sometimes less, than the rentals paid by other people?

Mr. MONK. I took the trouble to get special reports on that and I find that our rent is the same as that paid by other lessees in the locality.

Mr. MACDONALD. What arrangement has the minister made in regard to lighting the building?

Mr. MONK. I am not in a position to give full information to the House in regard to lighting, but I have heard that there was a contract signed for a considerable space of time—four or five years—with the company that is at present lighting the building. I have not been able to verify that fact. The only thing that I have before me is the amount we ask to meet the requirements of lighting for the coming year. However, I intend to look into that as soon as I have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the contract require that the building is to be lighted by the government or by the owners?

Mr. MONK. We provide for the light if I am not mistaken.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is it included in the $1 per foot?

Mr. MONK. I am under the impression. but I am not absolutely certain. The elevators are.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Have you a list of the new rentals?

Mr. MONK. The only new building rented by the government is this building on Metcalfe street. They asked us $19,000, and we brought it down to $16,000. I think that we are paying $13,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR. If it is true that we are paying at the rate of $1 per foot for floor space in this new building, and that we rented the Woods building at 80 cents a foot, I would like to draw the fact to the attention of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). I would have expected to hear some protest from him when the rental is increased to such an alarming extent.

Mr. MONK. I do not know exactly what the conditions of our occupation of the Woods' building are. I think we heat that building. We do not heat the building we have rented on Metcalfe street, but, in any event, a comparison cannot be established on that footing at all. The increase in rentals within the past two or three years in Ottawa is something quite abnormal.

The real test in regard to the point raised by my hon. friend would be, what percentage does the proprietor receive upon his investment? Clearly, I think, there is no doubt that, in the case of the Woods' building, the percentage received by the proprietor far exceeded the sum of 15 per cent. In the case of the building rented on Metcalfe street the revenue of the proprietor does not exceed six per cent upon his investment. That is the proper test of what is a fair rental, because, in a city like Ottawa, or Montreal, where rents vary a great deal and increase in such a large proportion, you cannot say that $1 per foot at one period of time is a heavy rental when compared with a period four or five years previously, when the rentals were very low.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I suppose that if we are to make that the basis of the value of a building we must take the value of the building during the present year. Suppose that the owners of the Woods' building erected that building at a small cost twenty years ago and property has increased so that it is very valuable to-day, I do not think we should place the valuation altogether on the original capital that was put into the building. The same would be true of the Metcalfe street building if it were of any age. It would increase from year to year, as the city got larger.

Mr. MONK. The Woods' building was built especially for the government.

Mr. SINCLAIR—If we are to adopt that principle we should take the value of the building as it stands in the market to-day, and find out what the proceeds of that value would be. That is what would be done in this case. If any one else were going to rent the building the proprietor would expect to get the value of his property as it stands in the market to-day, and not the value as represented by what he originally put into it.

Mr. MACDONALD—Are there any offers to rent buildings other than this one?

Mr. MONK. We are receiving offers every day. People imagine that we do not intend living in any other way. People come and offer buildings that they have on their hands, or offer to erect buildings suited exactly to our requirements provided we will pay the rent. I think that condition of affairs is regrettable, and that as soon as possible we should deal with the question.

Mr. MACDONALD. What policy does the minister adopt in dealing with these men who want to erect buildings for the government?

Mr. MONK. My policy at the present time is, in spite of the discomfort and want of accommodation that we are undergoing everywhere, to try and rent as little as possible and push as quickly as possible the adoption of some comprehensive scheme for erecting buildings of our own and getting out of these rented buildings.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the minister contemplate renting any additional buildings at the present time?

Mr. MONK. I am afraid that before we are in a position to get into our own departmental building we will require further accommodation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. For what departments?

Mr. MONK. All the departments seem to be in want of further accommodation. Many departments are divided up in different parts of the city and they complain a great deal of the inconvenience that it causes them. Some departments are unduly congested and cannot accommodate their staff. They are prevented from securing the necessary help for the work of the departments not because they have not money to pay the employees but because they have no accommodation for them.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I suppose the buildings for the departments are scarce?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Dominion buildings—salaries of caretakers, etc., $250,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Would the minister permit this item to stand as there are some returns which are coming down and I would like him to hold it over until we get them?

Mr. MONK. There is no objection excepting that we will have further items in the supplementary estimates which will enable the question of caretakers to be discussed and I am very anxious, if possible, with the indulgence of the committee, to get rid of the main estimates to-night and allow the committee to take up the items on some other department.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). This will be the only item that we will ask to be held over.

Mr. McKENZIE. I call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the salaries paid to the caretakers of public buildings in Nova Scotia, and while I do not know how they compare with the salaries paid to similar officials in the other provinces, I submit that the salaries in Nova Scotia are altogether too low for a living wage. It is not hard work, but it takes all the time of the caretaker from early morning till late at night. In eastern Nova Scotia the mails arrive sometimes at midnight and at four o'clock in the morning and the caretaker must be there to receive them if the post office happens to be in the public building. A salary of $400 such as is paid in these places is not sufficient to support a man and his family. I should think it ought to be $600 or $650 to the man whose whole time is taken up in any government service especially, as of late years, the cost of living has gone up to such an extent.

Mr. MONK. The salaries paid to caretakers in Nova Scotia appear to range from a minimum of $400 to $770, whereas in Quebec, except in Montreal where they are $500 and $600 the salaries range from $150 to $300. There is $150 paid in Laprairie, $300 at Longueuil, $300 at L'Assomption, $150 at Hull. There appears to be no disproportion between the salaries of caretakers of public buildings in Nova Scotia and in the other provinces, but I will make a note of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and inquire into the matter.

Water supply—$28,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Last year, Dr. Black, then member for Hants, called special attention on several occasions to the water supply furnished to the public buildings by the city of Ottawa, and as Dr. Black is not here this session the matter is not engaging the attention it deserves. The Minister of Public Works will remember the epidemic of typhoid we had in the city last year, and I think it was the present Speaker of the House who suggested that parliament should be prorogued or adjourned for a period rather than that the members of the House should take the tremendous risk of drinking the water we had to drink in this city last year. That epidemic has passed, and I fear there will be very little done to improve the water of the city until we are in the throes of another epidemic. The government pays large sums of money towards the upkeep of municipal work in Ottawa, and as the representatives of the people are bound to come here, they should feel that they are as safe in this city as anywhere in Canada, and that they are not forced to drink water which may bring disease and possibly death. I have remarked nothing in the proceedings of the city council which would conduce to bring about a better state of affairs in this respect than we had last year. I think the Minister of Public Works should refuse positively to contribute any money from the treasury of Canada to the upkeep or beautifying of the city of Ottawa until there is a pure water supply in the city. Nothing will bring people to their senses like stopping the money supply, and as long as the city of Ottawa is getting the money of the country without any protest it is not likely that anything will be done. It is quite within the power of the city of Ottawa to give us a supply of pure water. The minister should say to the city authorities that they will not get any more money from us until they put themselves in a position to deserve that treatment from the government. I bring this matter most seriously to the notice of the minister.

Mr. MONK. I am afraid I cannot take the rigid position which my hon. friend has suggested, and refuse to pay for any water until I have an absolute certainty that the water is pure. The subject is a very interesting one, and so far as we can help to solve the water problem in Ottawa or anywhere else we will do the best we can as a government. I think I have in the department a full and interesting report on the water conditions in Ottawa, and if so I shall lay it on the table of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What truth is there in the report published in the press that the Minister of Public Works has signed a contract for the St. John harbour works?

Mr. MONK. The fact is not as alleged. There is no contract signed yet, but we intend carrying out the improvements contemplated at Courtenay Bay on the east side of the harbour of St. John, as soon as I have the necessary authority to enter into that contract.

Graving dock, $35,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There are rumours afloat that the Levis graving dock will be enlarged or that a new dock may be built. If I remember well, there was formed a year ago, a company composed of Sir Montague Allan and other gentlemen of very high repute, and they asked the government for the usual subsidy, but owing to some difference between them and the government as to the amount to be guaranteed, the project fell through. I see by the papers in Quebec that a delegation from that city is to meet the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works shortly, and that one of the questions to be discussed is that of a new dock in Quebec. Will my hon. friend state whether the dock to be built in Quebec will be built by a company under the Dry Docks Subsidy Act, or built by the government? In Quebec the opinion generally expressed is that the government should build the dock and operate it. On the other hand, there are people who think that it should be in the hands of a company. I have no opinion to express myself, but I would like to know what is the policy of my hon. friend. It is stated in 'L'Evenement' that this meeting is to be strictly private, only a select few to be present; but this is a matter of vital concern to the whole country, and I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman will receive suggestions only from this Quebec delegation. Many people believe that a graving dock at Quebec is a national necessity; many believe that the harbour of Quebec is superior to all our other harbours. I regret to see that neither the hon. Postmaster General or any of the Quebec members are present, but I know that they are very optimistic with reference to the future of Quebec, and I would like to have an expression of their views on this question. I hope the hon. minister will give us a peep into his department, and let us see what his policy is in regard to it.

Mr. MONK. The question is a very large one to discuss at this point, but there is no doubt that there exists at Quebec a great necessity for a suitable graving dock. No port anywhere nowadays is complete without a graving dock. European ports, which have cost anywhere from fifty to a hundred million dollars invariably have graving docks, and the same is true of properly equipped ports according to modern notions in the United States and in South America. Quebec is one of the ports recommended by the Transportation Commission to be improved as a national port. There is a graving dock there which I visited some time ago, and while I was convinced that a graving dock there could be made a paying concern, the existing one is too small for modern requirements and it has never been administered in such a way as to pay, although it yields a fair revenue. Another, and large dock, is an absolute necessity if Quebec is to be equipped as a national port. Nothing has been done for that port during the last few years. No equipment of any serious and durable value has been carried out under a general scheme of improvement. Such a general scheme or plan is the first step to be taken. It is the first step we took in Montreal under somewhat different conditions, and even though we had there a plan which would take years to carry out fully, the equipment of the port of Montreal is at present very far from complete. The policy of the late government was to grant subsidies, under the legislation of 1908 and 1910, to companies for graving docks. I do not think it is a bad system, but the legislation requires to be improved in many respects. I am not prepared to say that the government should undertake, in all the 12 or 13 national ports of this country, the construction of graving docks; but the necessity of an improved graving dock at Quebec, in keeping with modern requirements, is apparent, and as soon as possible that matter will be taken up.

Mr. EMMERSON. We are all familiar with the legislation of 1910, and previous legislation to stimulate the construction of dry-docks. In connection with that legislation several projects were mentioned, at Collingwood, St. John and other points.

The provisions of the legislation were that if a dry-dock of a certain character were constructed, a subsidy, proportionate to the cost, would be given. The first legislation failed to bring about any results, and amendments were made increasing the subsidies. My purpose in calling attention to this is to make an inquiry of my hon. friend in respect to the St. John dry-dock. An appropriation was made recently by this House for improvements at Courtenay Bay at St. John, and since then I understand that tenders were invited for the construction with the terminals at Courtenay Bay, for a breakwater for the protection of that portion of the harbour of St. John which is exposed to south-easterly gales, and for dredging that portion of the harbour.

Tenders for all these works were invited en bloc, but any one who desired to bid for other portions of the work would necessarily have to include in their tenders an offer to construct a dry dock. Tenders were received and I understand the contract has been awarded, but it would not be opportune nor relevant for me at present to criticise in any way the course taken either by the present government or its predecessors. I do not desire at present to criticise any action that has been taken, however much I might be disposed under proper circumstances to do so. The firm which holds the contract for the construction of these several works, will, I assume construct a dry dock. Will they be entitled to receive any consideration as a firm under the subsidy Act, or is the work to be constructed and paid for by the government and owned and operated by it when completed, entirely apart from any consideration under the Act now in force?

Mr. MONK. I am glad that the hon. gentleman narrowed his question down to the one he has just put, because the general question of the improvement of St. John harbour would require extensive application. Therefore I will simply answer him by saying that the tenderer for the work obliges himself to build a dry dock at St. John and nothing more. It is as if he had applied for the subsidy under the terms of the Subsidy Act of 1910, and after the proper formalities have been complied with, the works will become entitled to the ordinary subsidy as defined by the Act. The government will not own the dock. It will be the property of the party who constructed it just as in ordinary cases and that party will be entitled to the subsidy. The reason of this is that it was not supposed that we could get anybody to undertake the risk of constructing a dry dock in St. John except under the conditions of that person having the contract for the construction of the other works referred to in the tender. My hon. friend understands, I hope, that it is absolutely a construction under the ordinary conditions of the Dry Docks Act.

Mr. EMMERSON. Would I be correct in understanding the minister to state that when the contract of the Messrs Griffiths is completed, they will naturally receive the compensation under that contract, and the government will naturally have paid for the construction of a dry dock as well as for the other works contemplated under the contract?

Mr. MONK. No, my hon. friend is mistaken as to that. It is not a block contract such as my hon. friend stated. There is no contract as yet. It is contemplated to make a contract with unit prices and details, but it does not enter into the sum we mentioned in the contract price of the dry dock. The condition was that they would execute the work, and furthermore oblige themselves to build a dock under the Dry Dock Act.

Mr. EMMERSON. Then my hon. friend having stated that it would be impossible to secure a dry dock under the subsidy Act at St. John, apart from the consideration of these other works, it is to be assumed that the contractor will perform these several works— that is the construction of a breakwater, the dredging of a harbour, and the construction of the docks—for a certain sum of money calculated of course upon the schedule prices? Is it not also to be inferred that the government will have paid them not only for these several works, but in addition have given them in the prices awarded, a contribution to the construction of a dry dock? That would be the inference—that apart from the amount of money which he had received for the construction of these other works, they would not be willing to construct a dry dock under the terms of the Dry Docks Subsidy Act. That seems to me quite apparent. It may be all right—I am not going to question it at this moment, it would not be proper for me to do so—but I simply want to understand the situation; and therefore while we know as to the cost of the several dry docks which may have been built in Canada, on the Pacific coast or on the great lakes, under the terms of the Subsidy Act, in the case of St. John we do not know, because a portion of the consideration for the construction of that dry dock is involved in the construction of the breakwater, the dredging of the harbour, and the construction of the loading docks known as the terminals. That would seem to be the clear reasoning to be gathered from the circumstances as detailed by my hon. friend. I do not quite so understand it.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend has made a natural inference, but he is entirely mistaken. No doubt the House will desire to see the contract when it is prepared so as to examine the unit prices in order to convince itself that the dry dock it not at all provided for by the consideration therein, and the inference of my hon. friend is very natural until one has occasion to look into the details of the contract. The situation is this: It was deemed impossible to induce anybody with a harbour such as St. John, unimproved, possessing no equipment of a modern kind whatever, to undertake the construction of the dry dock there; but when these works of importance will have been carried out, the shipping will undoubtedly greatly increase, and with a harbour properly equipped under the terms of this arrangement there will be a better prospect of a dry dock. Therefore it was deemed necessary, I think very wisely, to include in the contract with a large and powerful firm, the stipulation that when these works of improvement had been carried out, a dry dock would be constructed. But my hon. friend bears in mind, no doubt, that when the time comes for constructing that dry dock an estimate of the cost of it will have to be laid before the government and carefully gone into by its engineers in order to determine what subsidies will be paid to the company. When this estimate is fully gone into, and when the unit prices mentioned in detail in the contract is considered, it will be seen that the natural inference of my hon. friend is absolutely not founded.

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friend is correct and the works are not to be carried on contemporaneously, then I can see some reason for the action taken. Apart from that, it seems to me that no concern in Canada would compete for the several works in connection with the harbour terminals, if associated with that work there was required to be an undertaking to engage in the construction of a dry dock even at a later date. That is to say that practically, if not wholly, it prevents competition in the dredging, the breakwater, and in the terminal docks so far as Canadian contractors are concerned.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend knows that the form of tender was established before this government came into office. I have examined it very carefully. I find the tenders that are in greatly reduced the price, as the House will see when the matters come before it. But I cannot find fault with the form of the tenders; I think it was a good form in every respect.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand that the part tendered for by Norton, Griffiths & Co., has been awarded.

Mr. MONK. No, there has been no award of any kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No partial award?

Mr. MONK. No, there will be no partial award. The whole work will be undertaken 'en bloc'.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Referring to the Quebec proposed dry-dock, has the minister received any offer from a syndicate or a company which would undertake the construction of the new grading dock at Lévis?

Mr. MONK. There is no proposition now for either Lévis or Quebec before the government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am told that a syndicate has been formed in Quebec and that it has already had some interviews with the minister, with a view to obtaining a subsidy or guarantee from the government in connection with the construction of a graving dock at Levis.

Mr. MONK. I have no knowledge of that. I saw some gentlemen to-day who are interested in some such construction and who made some representations to me in reference to the Subsidy Act of 1910, which requires amendment in several particulars, and they laid their observations before me. Whether these gentlemen constitute a syndicate or not, or what they intend, I have no knowledge.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would the hon. gentleman have any objections to giving the names of the gentlemen who interviewed him?

Mr. MONK. I do not know if my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) is right in calling them a 'syndicate'. Mr. Webster, of the Quebec Harbour Board saw me in reference generally to the very urgent improvements required in the port of Quebec. With him was a gentleman whose name I do not remember, who seemed to be very much interested in dry-docks, and a couple of members of the district. Sir Rodolphe Forget was also of the number. They made representations merely with reference to the Quebec harbour improvements and the necessity of enlarging the scope of the Dry-dock Act. No mention was made of any particular scheme.

Mr. CARVELL. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the tenders put in were at lower prices. Does he mean to say that there has been an actual reduction in the prices, or has the change in the specifications meant that the total, as his engineers figure it out, will be a reduction in the cost of the work?

Mr. MONK. I meant a general reduction, calling at the same time for lower prices. The tenders are all very high. The department did not think it would be possible to recommend the adoption of even the lowest tender unless it was possible to bring the lowest tenderer within a more measurable distance of the estimate. That was what I alluded to.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As I understand it, the Department of Public Works has nothing to do with the dry-dock at Montreal.

Mr. MONK. We have everything to do with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I thought it was under the supervision of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MONK. Under the Dry-Dock Subsidy Act, all dry-docks subsidized are constructed under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, but I understood that arrangements had been made between Vickers Maxim and the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. MONK. There have been various contracts and arrangements between the Harbour Commissioners and Vickers Maxim who are constructing a floating dock; but the determination of the subsidy and the class of floating dock came under the consideration of my department before my time. The documents are all in my department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand that before the department pays over the subsidy the work will be inspected. I understood that the builders had made arrangements with the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. MONK. I cannot speak with absolute knowledge as to that. I believe so, and all these arrangements would come under the purview of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. There may have been some sales or leases of land or contracts for the preparation of the cradle of the floating-dock. Where we come in is the determination of the subsidy, the inspection of the work and the approval of the plans.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There are rumours about a sale of land. The hon. gentleman ought to know that no lands were sold to the company but that the arrangement made with the Harbour Board of Montreal is with relation to the lands which are being dredged by the company; but they have had no sales of land from the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. MONK. When I say 'Sale of land,' they must have come to an arrangement with the Harbour Commissioners as to where they would install the floating dock and must have concluded a lease or alienation of some kind in order to have a place within the limits of the harbour of Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, the hon. gentleman is not right in that. I say that with all due respect. I would like to make that point very clear in order to dispel the rumours afloat.

Mr. MONK. What rumours?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The rumours which the hon. gentlemen probably knows.

Mr. MONK. I have not heard any.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal have made arrangements with Vickers Maxim that the material dredged out of the river St. Lawrence over a long distance will be used by the Vickers Maxim Company for their plant. But there has been no land on the main shore sold to the company.

Mr. MONK. I know nothing of that.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am very glad the hon. gentleman states that. Has he any idea when the dock will be completed?

Mr. MONK. I have heard a rumour that it is nearly finished. It is being constructed in the old country and is to come out to us in the spring. It is a floating dock. The cradle, or place where it is to be put is at the foot of the harbour of Montreal, and I imagine the dock will be installed there about the month of June.

Public Works—chargeable to collection of revenue—telegraph lines—land and cable telegraph lines, lower St. Lawrence and maritime provinces, including working expenses of vessels required for cable services, $140,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my hon. friend looked into the case of the Magdalen Islands cable linking the islands with the mainland? For several months in the year these people are cut off, and I obtained several years ago the advantage of a cable line and a cheap rate. I would like to know if the rate is being maintained or if it has been changed?

Mr. MONK. I do not think there has been any change.

Mr. McKENZIE. Referring to the item including the working expenses of vessels required for cable service, have you more than one vessel, or is the 'Tyrian' the only vessel?

Mr. MONK. I think so.

Mr. McKENZIE. Some two years ago the headquarters of this vessel, the 'Tyrian,' was moved from Halifax to North Sydney. The most of the work performed by this boat is in the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, and it was considered that North Sydney was a central place for the homes of the crew, and also a place at which coal could be obtained more economically and conveniently than Halifax. I am told lately, although not departmentally, that this vessel has been moved back to Halifax. Would the minister tell me anything about this?

Mr. MONK. As far as I know the 'Tyrian' was moved to Halifax before the 21st of September last. I think that at present the vessel is at Dartmouth or Halifax and there has been no change since the government came into power.

Telegraph lines—Yukon system (Ashcroft-Dawson), $213,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is that for maintenance?

Mr. MONK. No, this is for some very important extensions. We expect to have a revenue this year from our telegraph lines of $110,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my hon. friend any idea what rate the people pay, or is it the rate of the ordinary telegraph lines?

Mr. MONK. I think it is the same rate as that of the ordinary telegraph lines.

Telegraph service generally, $7,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is that item for?

Mr. MONK. That item is to be applied to cover a number of unavoidable expenditures in connection with the Dominion telegraph service, including Point Pelee telegraph line service, superintendent, repairs, operators, use of instruments, travelling expenses, and stationery. The appropriation for 1911 was $7,000 and the expenditure from the 1st of April, 1910, to the 28th of February, 1911, was $5,548. A request has been made to keep in abeyance the item under Dominion buildings, salaries of caretakers. There is no special objection to that except that if my hon friends would allow that item to pass it would enable us to take away a large quantity of documents required in the department and questions which might be raised under the item can be brought up under several items of the supply estimates. It will be a convenience to the department if the committee will adopt that item completely, which would close the main estimates in so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned.

Mr. MACDONALD. Unfortunately, I was not in a few moments ago and perhaps the minister would let me know something in regard to the item for telegraph lines between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Has the minister received any request from the Maritime Telephone Company which has telephonic communication with the island in regard to assisting their project in substitution of the old agreement which was made with the Anglo-American Cable Co.? I understand that they are prepared to give a better service. I am surprised that our friends from Prince Edward Island are not here to refer to the matter. I understand that the Maritime Telephone Company are making some representations in regard to the matter. Does the minister recall anything in regard to it?

Mr. MONK. Application was made quite recently by the Telephone Company of the maritime provinces to us to lay a cable to the island. The matter was considered and we came to the conclusion, as far as I can recollect that we could not do it.

Mr. MACDONALD. Of course the matter is one in which the people of the island are primarily interested. There is a long standing complaint in regard to the lack of accommodation furnished by the Anglo-American Cable Company, which has some old contract, and I assume that that may be the difficulty that the minister anticipates in connection with this matter.

Mr. MONK. Is there any telephone communication at the present time?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes there is. The reason I speak of the matter is because there is an island midway between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, which is in my county, which this present telephone service touches, which is inhabited by quite a number of people, and which is a very fertile place. I understand that the company were making some application to the government—I do not know exactly what the nature of it is—but I should hope that the minister would be able to find some method of dealing with it which would give a better service than that which is obtained under the vote which, I think, is one which is given to the Anglo-American Cable Company. It formerly was impossible to have a telegram delivered in Prince Edward Island after eight o'clock at night, owing to some regulation of the cable company. If that financial assistance were diverted to the telephone people, the whole of the maritime provinces would be benefited. I hope the minister has not fully closed the door against considering the proposal that these maritime province people have submitted and if the minister could see his way clear—having regard to existing contracts to make any arrangement with them, it would be much to the public advantage.

Mr. MONK. There is quite a recent application—I do not remember the circumstances very well, but I would be very glad to show the file and correspondence to anybody who is interested in the subject. I was impressed with the idea that they were asking the government to lay a telephone cable largely for the benefit of the telephone company in question. It may be that there is some public interest operating in favour of our laying the cable between the mainland and the island, but at the time it seemed to me that we were invited to render this service to a private corporation. If I am mistaken in that I shall be very glad to look into it again.

Mr. MACDONALD. Of course, at the present time the service is performed not by the government but by a private corporation, which is not locally interested, and does not attempt to serve local interests.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). They have a monopoly.

Mr. MACDONALD. They have a monopoly, as my right hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) states. There is this consideration, that the government do grant assistance to private companies and if this company of local people were to undertake the service the minister might be assured that it would be very much improved.

Mr. MONK. Calculations were made in my presence that it was a considerable expenditure from which we did not appear to stand to derive any revenue.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There have been telephone companies formed of late in the peninsula of Gaspé, and when they came to provide for putting up their lines they found that the distances were so great and the patrons so few that it was very difficult for them to find money sufficient to erect the poles. I understand they intend to ask the Minister of Public Works for permission to use these telegraph poles to string their wires on. The settlements are very scattered around that peninsula, and the telephone has become such a modern necessity that I hope the Minister of Public Works will be generous when applications of this kind are made to him. I trust he will allow the telephone companies in such a remote region as that to string their wires on the government telegraph poles.

Mr. MONK. In these sparsely settled regions I think it is a good policy for the government as far as possible to grant the right to telephone companies, under certain circumstances, to string their wires along our poles. We have had no applications so far, but I would be inclined to favour the idea, provided the public interests be safeguarded. Of course, unless there are very special circumstances it is a bad principle to follow.

Immigration—salaries, agencies, in Canada, Great Britain and Foreign countries, $400,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Has the government settled upon any immigration policy for the maritime provinces? The subject was discussed here some few weeks ago in the House, and I would like to know if the minister or the government has arrived at any matured plan.

Mr. ROGERS. I have had a deputation wait on me from New Brunswick, in the person of the Premier and Mr. Grimmer, and one other of their colleagues, and we discussed a proposition suitable to that province, and which appeared satisfactory to them. With regard to Nova Scotia, I had the pleasure of being waited upon by a large deputation, the spokesman of which was Mr. Cummings, a government official of that province, and we discussed a plan which was apparently satisfactory to them, and which included the appointment of one or two agents in London to work together with our own staff in European countries, and the appointment also of one or two agents in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Was Mr. Cummings delegated by the government of Nova Scotia to interview the minister?

Mr. ROGERS. I think he so represented himself.

Mr. STANFIELD. I think Mr. Messenger was appointed by a farmers' meeting in the province to meet the minister, and Mr. Cummings happened to be here and went along.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). About what date did the department engage the services of Mr. Hawkes, and was he promised the position prior to the last election in the event of the defeat of the Liberal government?

Mr. ROGERS. I may tell my hon. friend that the matter of Mr. Hawkes' appointment was never discussed previous to the election, so far as I know. In fact it was my own suggestion to Mr. Hawkes, probably a month or more after the election, that he should undertake this work.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the minister give us a statement in regard to the officers in Great Britain and the Uunited States?

Mr. ROGERS. In May, 1911, A. F. Jury was transferred from Liverpool to Exeter, succeeding Mr. Alex. McOwan, who resigned on the 1st March, 1911, John McLennan was transferred from Aberdeen to Liverpool, and G. H. Mitchell was transferred from Birmingham to the High Commissioner's office in London; J. K. Millar, formerly of Saltcoats, Sask., was appointed Agent at Birmingham. W. B. Cumming, formerly of Saskatoon, Sask., was appointed Agent at Aberdeen, Scotland.

In the United States, J. S. Crawford was transferred from Kansas city, Mo., to Syracuse, N. Y. in January, 1911; W. H. Rogers from Indianapolis, Ind., to Kansas city, Mo., March, 1911; George Aird appointed agent at Indianapolis, March, 1911, and in January, 1912, Mr. R. A. Garrett, of Manitou, Man., was appointed acting agent in charge of the office in St. Paul, Minn., relieving Mr. E. T. Holmes, who is seriously ill. No new offices have been established in Great Britain. No office is closed in the United States except the one in Boston for reasons which my hon. friend can appreciate. We have established offices in the United States at Crookston and Des Moines, Iowa.

Mr. OLIVER. Who are in charge of these two offices?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Askett at Crookston and Mr. Black at Des Moines.

Mr. MACDONALD. In regard to the appointment of Mr. Hawkes, who has been touring England at the expense of Canada and writing flamboyant articles about himself and sending cables to Canada about his activities over there, I do not know whether the minister promised this gentleman his position during the last election campaign or not. I had the honour of a visit from Mr. Hawkes in my constituency, where he undertook to instruct the men who had come from old England and Scotland as to their duty in regard to political matters in this country. I am glad to say my constituents had the good sense to resent the attempts of this gentleman, who had hardly reached the standard that he could call himself a dignified Canadian, to direct them how to vote in the somewhat aggressive manner in which he did. I am sorry my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) is not here so that he might tell the minister of the performance which his appointee indulged in in his county when the hon. member had to apologize for his utterances and his conduct in discussing public questions.

I do not know whether the minister saw the very keen review and discussion of Mr. Hawkes made by the Victoria 'Sunset.' It does seem to me on general principles that a man who goes forth to represent this country, in immigration matters or anything else, should stop talking about having been born in Scotland or England or anywhere else—that he should be a Canadian first, last and always, and should go forth in that capacity. But that does not seem to be the method of this electioneering agent of my hon. friend or of some of his friends. The performances of Mr. Hawkes are not such as to bring very much pride to the average Canadian who is proud of his country. From what I saw and heard of him in the maritime provinces in the last election, I am surprised at the minister, who is usually given the credit of being a man of sound judgment, selecting a man like Mr. Hawkes, who seems to be running papers for his own glorification. I saw in Montreal the other day the British 'News,' which is his newspaper, and which contains quotations from his own speeches delivered in the old country, and writings as to his various performances. You would think that he was the centre of interest for the whole of Canada from the very hour he arrived in Great Britain, and that nobody else who had ever gone there before knew anything about Canada. It seems to me that the minister should send for that gentleman and give him a lecture as to his performances instead of attempting to foist him on the Canadian people.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not had the privilege of reading any of the articles to which my hon. friend refers, but I am informed, and I believe correctly informed, that Mr. Hawkes has now no interest whatever in the British 'News,' or whatever the name of the paper is. I regret that Mr. Hawkes met with such misfortune in the maritime provinces on the occasion to which my hon. friend refers; but I am glad to say that he had not the same misfortune in other provinces which he visited about that time. However, that had nothing to do with the appointment which he at present holds, further than this, that I recognized in Mr. Hawkes a suitable man for the work of immigration, in bringing to the notice of the people of England, Scotland and Ireland the great advantages of Canada for immigrants. I think still that Mr. Hawkes is a desirable man for that work, and from the statements of my hon. friend, he is evidently a man capable of securing a good deal of advertising——

Mr. MACDONALD. He advertised himself.

Mr. ROGERS——and that is the right sort of man as an immigrant agent. I may say, with regard to bringing Mr. Hawkes back from the old country, that I believe he is on the ocean now, and he will be here in a few days.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Will his mission be completed then?

Mr. ROGERS. He is not engaged for any definite period. That will be determined when we get his report.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What is his work for the department?

Mr. ROGERS. His work was first of all going to the different provinces of Canada with the view of enlisting the co-operation of the local governments with the Dominion in the matter of a general immigration policy. He visited all the local governments with a good deal of success. Then he went to London for the purpose of visiting our different agencies and offices there, in order to make a report as to whether or not it would be advisable to make any change. I hope we shall have his report in a few days after he arrives, and I shall be glad to submit it to my hon. friends for their consideration.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Could not that work have been done by somebody else in the department?

Mr. ROGERS. I regarded Mr. Hawkes as a very suitable man for this work, and he has certainly done it very well up to date.

Mr. McKENZIE. Were any definite arrangements of a lasting character made between the department of the hon. minister and the government of Nova Scotia, for instance, with regard to immigration? What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that this gentleman met with considerable success?

Mr. ROGERS. He met with success in interviewing the government of British Columbia, and I believe he met with the same success with the government of Alberta. I have had a letter, I think, from a member of every local government in the Dominion of Canada, after Mr. Hawkes' visit, expressing satisfaction with the idea of their co-operating with us in immigration work.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). That was not a new idea in this country.

Mr. MACDONALD. It was not Mr. Hawkes' idea.

Mr. ROGERS. No, it is our own idea.

Mr. MACDONALD. What credit is he to get for it?

Mr. ROGERS. He was selected as the man to have the interviews and to arrange the plan of co-operation with each province as far as we possibly could. Take the province of Ontario: We are combining our forces and saving a considerable amount of money instead of duplicating our work. The same applies to New Brunswick, and it was only a few days ago that I had a report from a member of the government of Nova Scotia, shortly after Mr. Hawkes had visited that province, and we had the deputation the other day with regard to co-operation in an immigration policy suitable to that particular province.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is a tribute to my hon. friend's judgment, if the idea had not existed before, that it would be a good thing to co-operate with the provinces. My hon. friend is altogether too modest. He need not fancy that Mr. Hawkes is of some consequence because the minister conceived the idea and Mr. Hawkes was sent to carry it out. I am satisfied that the minister had in the department men of experience, whose knowledge of this whole immigration business would have enabled them to carry out the minister's idea better than Mr. Hawkes. The minister is adroitly confusing the fact that he conceived this idea with the notion that that is a defence of Mr. Hawkes. A man who had hardly any root in this Canadian soil, was hardly the man to send forth with all the panoply of the greatness attributed to him in his own newspapers, for this work. The cablegrams about his movements in the old country are sent by himself, and of course the government pays for them. I am quite sure that the hon. minister has gentleman in his department who could have done more effective work. From what we have seen of Mr. Hawkes in this country, he is not a man who should be sent abroad bearing any credentials from this government as a sample Canadian agent. The minister is putting forward his idea of co-operation as if it were some defence of Mr. Hawkes.

Mr. ROGERS. I am afraid that my hon. friend is not acquainted with Mr. Hawkes, or he would not have made such a statement. Mr. Hawkes has spent years in western Canada, and he knows our conditions as few men do, so that I felt that he was a suitable man for the work. While we have first-class men in the Immigration Department, every man there has a special work of his own, and it was necessary to have some one else, and I selected Mr. Hawkes as a suitable man to stir up interest in immigration.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Hawkes was given the work of interviewing the various provincial governments and formulating with them a policy of co-operation in immigration. My hon. friend has told us that. I think that he should give us some idea of what the proposition is in regard to each of the provinces. While there has been some co-operation in the past, I understand from what the hon. minister says that it is intended to adopt the principle of co-operation as an important part of our immigration policy from this time forward. That policy having been decided on, Mr. Hawkes the special agent of the government, having interviewed the governments of the different provinces, and amicable arrangements, we are informed, having been arrived at, I think the minister should give us an idea of what those arrangements are, so that the House may judge of the merits of the scheme.

Mr. ROGERS. With certain of the provinces who have agents as we have had in the past, and as we have in London, we are uniting the offices, in so far as we possibly can, and are working from the same office, instead of having dual work. As between the Dominion and a particular province, we are working and co-operating together to that extent. Now, Mr. Hawkes will be here in a few days. He left rather hurriedly for London about Christmas time without presenting his report on his tour of inspection through the different provinces of Canada. However, the report will be prepared by the time he returns here, and I will be pleased to present it to the House in order that the full details may be gleaned as to his work.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am very much interested in this work which Mr. Hawkes is carrying on. I do not know whether the government has had a report from that gentleman of an interview which he apparently has had with the representatives of the province of Quebec, which province within the past few months has established in London a new agency. It was a new departure and one which has been much commented on by the people of Quebec. I should be very pleased to learn that Quebec's agent in London is working in co-operation with the officers of the Department of the Interior. Speaking with regard to the province of Quebec, and the immigration policy as it affects that province—and not only Quebec, but the Dominion as a whole—I know that necessarily the immigration from Europe must above all come from the British Isles. I favour that policy, and I believe it to be a wise and good one. Of course we get good citizens from the continent of Europe, and we make good Canadians of them. That has been seen in the mixed population of the west where the foreign element has been quietly absorbed and to-day forms some of our best citizens. The minister himself, born and bred as he was in the province of Quebec, and being one of its bright sons, is aware that his native province has sent thousands of her sons into the maritime provinces, over hundreds of thousands into the province of Ontario, and many thousands into the far west; and he will admit that the province of Quebec deserves to be helped somewhat by a slight sprinkling of French emigration from Belgium and from France. I have given this question some consideration for years past. At the request of myself and some of my colleagues in the late government we obtained from his predecessors the appointment of agents in Belgium, and in France. An announcement recently appeared in the press that the salaries of the agents in France had been cut off. I do not believe that statement was true, and I am glad to see my hon. friend take exception to it. It would be a very unjust proceeding if that were done because the men who represent the departments in Paris, Mr. Wiallard and his assistants, are very able and active, and they have become experts in the matter of French immigration. The minister knows that it is very difficult for a Canadian agent, or indeed for any agent, to make any headway in France, as regards emigration to this country. The French government is opposed to emigration and they have very many good reason for that attitude. They have a standing army and compulsory military service, they have their own colonies, and more than that, lacking the virtues of their descendents in New France they lose in natural growth of population thousands of citizens. Naturally the government of France is not favourably disposed towards emigration, in fact it adopts many precautions to prevent it. Yet there are a certain number of people in France who are prepared, of their own volition to emigrate to this continent, and among that class our agents are quite able to get their proper share for this country. Many of these French immigrants go to Argentina and the United States. During the last fifteen years we have received our fair quota but we could find room for more. We must always remember that it is very difficult for our agents to make any active propaganda in the various provinces of France, in fact some years ago the then Prime Minister, Mr. Clemenceau, issued an edict or circular, prohibiting agents from conducting any active propaganda in the interests of emigration to this country. I read that circular myself, being in France at the time of the death of the late Mr. Prefontaine, and I saw Mr. Clemenceau who was then the Minister of the Interior. He explained to me the reasons which I gave a moment ago, that they could not see their way to facilitate the activities of our agents. However, he said, out of the people who did go abroad they were quite satisfied that the Canadians should get their fair share. As regards the Belgians that country is small in extent but numerously populated, and we can get from there an excellent class of immigrants. We all know the qualities of the Belgians: they are very thrifty, very industrious, and very excellent gardeners. Around our large cities such as Toronto, Montreal, and Winnipeg there would undoubtedly be a large sphere of operations for them. Some are located around Montreal and they are probably the best gardeners on the island. I would ask the minister to enable our agents in Belgium to send, not only in Quebec, but elsewhere our fair share of this very interesting population. The province of Quebec deserves that consideration. The results of every decennial census show that in that province we are doing our duty towards the Dominion, and we are spreading throughout the whole country. In order to maintain Canada as loyal and as proud as it should be, we should get some recognition from the Minister of the Interior.

In that way, we get from abroad a sprinkling of French blood. It is good blood. Look at the Anglo-Saxon race, the finest race in the world, after the French-Canadian. It is a mixture of French, Saxon, Dane and many other races. But the Norman predominates in the Anglo-Saxon and is the best part of him. I hope that Mr. Hawkes, who has been employed by the Department of the Interior, to promote co-operation in immigration with the provincial governments, will not lose sight of the fact that, while it is a good policy to have the British-born in Canada, to have the bulk of our immigration from the British Islands—which I approve, sincerely approve—yet we can make excellent British subjects of those of pure French and Belgian stock. For these people find natural affiliations in this country, not only in Quebec, but in parts of Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and in the maritime provinces as well. I was pleased to read the other day the interview given to the papers by Hon. Richard McBride, the Premier of British Columbia, commending to attention the words of Rudyard Kipling of some years ago, 'pump in the whites,' referring to the need of this policy in order to keep British Columbia as a white man's country. And Mr. McBride made a special appeal to the French-Canadian race, declaring that it was the best race for British Columbia. Send more French-Canadians, was his conclusion, and British Columbia will be ultimately saved. When I think of six Tories from British Columbia in this House, I cannot but think that the province needs salvation. If we had more French-Canadian inhabitants in the Rocky mountains, British Columbia would soon give a good account of herself. But, speaking seriously, I hope my hon. friend, who knows the French, having been brought up in the good old county of Argenteuil, will not forget that they have some claims on his department.

Mr. ROGERS. I am sure I have but little fault to find with what my hon. friend has so well said. First, with respect to the matter of co-operation with the province of Quebec, we shall undoubtedly be as well pleased to co-operate in regard to immigration with the province of Quebec as with any other province in Canada. My hon. friend has just stated what I already knew, that the province of Quebec has opened offices of its own in London and elsewhere. I believe we gain advantage by working together, especially in respect to literature. The Dominion is preparing literature suitable for the different provinces at all times, and literature suitable for the local governments and under their direction will be distributed by our agent, as well as in the localities in which they may have their agent's offices. So far as immigration from France and Belgium are concerned, and especially with regard to our office in France, I may say that no change has been made in the officers or their salaries. The only change made since I took charge of the department is to provide better and more suitable offices for the officers in that place. My hon. friend correctly states the position which we occupy in sending our agents to France. The government there has adopted a view which the hon. gentleman describes, and we are prevented from pursuing a general policy of immigration such as we pursue elsewhere. We are obliged to do what little work we do under the head of an information bureau. If we can expand, even in that way, I can assure my hon. friend we are ready to increase our staff or do anything more we possibly can to secure additional immigrants from France. We only secured something like 10,000 during the past ten years. And, while as the hon. gentleman says, conditions are a little different in Belgium—we have more freedom there—I think we have only secured 8,000 from that country in twelve years. In the meantime, we shall be glad, if possible, to introduce assistance there and adopt a more vigorous policy with a view to inducing people in France and in Belgium to take advantage of the many opportunities which offer, not in the province of Quebec only, but in the other provinces as well, for people to better their positions and live under conditions where they can carve out a place for their children and do much better, I am sure, than they could do by remaining at home.

Mr. EMMERSON. There may be some misapprehension as to the course pursued in the past with regard to co-operation. If it should be thought that there has not been co-operation hitherto, certainly the person so thinking labours under a misapprehension. I know that when I was connected with the provincial government of New Brunswick, the agent-general of that government in London, who had charge of immigration for the province, co-operated with the federal officials and an active propaganda was carried on. It was particularly active between the years 1897 and 1900 inclusive, as I personally know of. And since then the province of New Brunswick has had an agent-general in London whose chief duties were to give attention to immigration matters in co-operation with the federal Department of Immigration. The late Charles Duff-Miller represented New Brunswick as agent-general for many years. Probably no man has been in London more active in immigration to the province of New Brunswick. He saw to it that literature was circulated, and acted with the officials of the Dominion in that regard; and I know that the federal officials were very much disposed to assist him in the work. So we should not run away with the idea that there has been no co-operation in the past between the provincial and the federal governments in this matter. I think it is due to the committee that my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers), should state exactly what new arrangements have been made in this respect, and how far co-operation has been elaborated as between the several provinces and whether they have reached the point where they will probably co-operate more fully than in the past. I presume that that information is in the department. As we understand that an official has recently been appointed to confer with the provincial governments with a view to closer co-operation than in the past, I think it would be an advantage to the country to know what the arrangements are. I suppose there must have been correspondence and other writings with regard to these plans. Several meetings have been held. I would like to know the nature of the understanding, and, if there are any financial features, what they are—whether there is any arrangement for the division of the expenses that are assumed, and have been assumed by the provincial governments in the past.

Mr. ROGERS. I appreciate what the hon. gentleman has said with respect to New Brunswick in particular. I want to endorse everything he has said with respect to the agent-general, Mr. Duff-Miller, whom I had the pleasure of meeting on more than one occasion in London. He certainly was a most worthy representative of the people of New Brunswick, and a credit not only to that province, but to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. He did much to make pleasant the visit of any Canadian that he met upon the other side while he occupied that position. I can understand that any government will co-operate with and lend assistance to such an individual as was Mr. Duff-Miller, occupying the position which he did in England as the representative of New Brunswick. I had a visit from the Premier and some of the ministers of the province of New Brunswick and we took up this matter. They have a plan of their own in respect to how they propose to divide their work up, and I presume they will announce it in their own legislature in due course. But, I may say to my hon. friend that I gave them the assurance that we were prepared to supply an agent named by the province to represent them at London, England, and to do the work as representing that province, but paid by the Dominion. I also told him that we were prepared to give them one or two agents for special work in the province of New Brunswick. This plan is being prepared, and I shall be glad to furnish any information in connection with its progress to my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I would like to ask the minister if he has sent farm delegates to the British Isles this winter?

Mr. ROGERS. We have followed the general practice and a number have gone. I do not know that we have been able to send as many as went last year, but the number is pretty nearly the same.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). So far as I understand the policy of the minister it is to pursue unremittingly the policy of Canadian immigration propagandism that has been pursued by his predecessor. In regard to these farm delegates, my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will bear me out in what I say, that there were at least two members in what was then the opposition, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), who showed tremendous hostility to these farm delegates being employed. I do not call attention to that subject to express any sympathy with their action then, nor to follow the example of their action myself now. But, there are circumstances in the present condition of western Canada that I think should be in the minister's mind in connection with his immigration policy. We had what to me was a very pregnant admission from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) in this House in another debate the other day. He said that it had to be admitted that for the moment production has outrun transportation in western Canada; that is to say, that production had outrun our present ability to dispose of what we produce. The only object of production is to dispose of what we produce, and, clearly, if we do not dispose of it, it would be better not to be produced. If we are to pursue unremittingly this immigration propagandism the difficulty occurs in my mind that in a few years production must invariably, by the process of logic, still further outrun our transportation and marketing facilities. I do not want to saddle my hon. friend or the government with the responsibility of providing markets, but he is far too clear-headed a man not to see the connection between that part of his departmental work that is now under survey, and the admission of his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Mr. Arthur Hawkes, in the recent election, I understand, made an appeal to the British-born to forego the advantages of a great and freer market.

Mr. Hawkes is now making another appeal to the British-born to come to the same country where he previously pursuaded their fellow countrymen to forego the advantages of this market.

Mr. CURRIE. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will pardon me—?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). No, I will not pardon the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CURRIE. I understand he is making a statement in reference to Mr. Hawkes. When did Mr. Hawkes state—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CURRIE. I am going to ask on what occasion did Mr. Hawkes state that he did not want us to have wider markets. Do not put statements in his mouth that he did not make.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). One has a great deal of trouble with budding ministers in this House. I prefer to deal with actual ones. I do not think the Minister of the Interior resents a single word I am saying.

Mr. CURRIE. The trouble with the hon. gentleman is that he was only in the bud as a minister.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I was pointing out a difficulty which I see in connection with the policy of the Minister of the Interior and of the government. I think, Mr. Chairman, that I was within the rules of order and pointing the difficulty out and drawing the attention of the government and the minister at present before us to the difficulty in parliamentary terms and in courteous language. My point is that it is due to this side of the House to know what the government means to do in the presence of a difficulty which exists out of the mouth of one of the members of that government. Now, as I have said already, I do not want to saddle the minister or the government with the responsibility of providing the markets, but it is very clear that unless this deadlock—because it is that in western Canada to-day—is removed there may be more wisdom than we saw at the time in the contention of the hon. member for Halton and of the present hon. Minister of Public Works that we should hold our hand for a little in this immigration propagandism. I believe that my contention is strictly logical and to the point, and I am sure the minister will bear me no grudge for pointing out this matter to him.

Mr. ROGERS. I can understand and appreciate the difficulties that have occurred this year by reason of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clark, Red Deer) is pleased to term the overproduction of grain in western Canada. It is true, it is a fact, and I am sure that as western members, at all events, we are all proud to notice and declare the fact that we have grown in the three prairie provinces something over 450,000,000 bushels of grain of different sorts. Naturally, in view of that great development, we have had very considerable difficulty in securing railway transportation for that amount of produce. However, I see a brighter outlook for the future perhaps than my hon. friend in this regard. We have now under construction two additional transcontinental railways which will be finished in the very near future, I hope, and in addition to these we have the Hudson Bay railway well under way. I am one of those that have confidence enough in the construction of the Hudson Bay railway to believe that we are going to get an outlet there, not alone for three or four months in the year, but I think that is the only outlet shown on the map of Canada where the people of western Canada will ever be able to get their products transported to the markets of the world for twelve months in the year. In my judgment, if this government undertake and carry on the construction of the Hudson Bay railway to Fort Nelson or Churchill and undertake the construction of a line of railway from the other side of the bay to the Labrador coast, we will be able to have open navigation for twelve months in the year. It is true, as everyone knows, that it would be impossible to secure that by going through the straits, but I think that by avoiding the straits and undertaking the construction of a line of railway such as I have described, we will be able to have, not alone for three or four months in the year but for twelve months in the year, an outlet for the grain that we produce.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). How would you get across Hudson Bay in the winter months?

Mr. ROGERS. It does not freeze over during the winter months.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Surely there is ice there.

Mr. ROGERS. There is ice, but we have ice at Port Arthur and elsewhere. There are ice-breakers that are very convenient for keeping the harbours open in the winter time and I think this is one of the things, at all events, to be considered in the future. Nevertheless, we will get our markets and I hope that we will be able to get our transportation in such shape as will lead to greater development and prosperity in western Canada in the future than we have had in the past.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am rather surprised at the statement made by the hon. gentleman about the Hudson Bay railway. As far as we know navigation through the straits is possible only for two and a half or three months in the year. I know that Hudson Bay itself is navigable at nearly all times of the year. But my hon. friend says that if we build the Hudson Bay railway from the Pas to Nelson or Churchill and that if we build from the other side of the bay to a port on Labrador we will have solved the question of transportation.

That brings up the question of the construction of what is generally called the James Bay railway. When my hon. friend mentions the Labrador railway, does he mean that this section of the Hudson Bay railway would have its terminus on the Labrador coast? The most popular and feasible route would be one from the head of James Bay following the Nottaway river, tapping the Transcontinental railway at some point and coming in a direct line to Montreal or Quebec. That would solve the question of the transportation from the west at all times of the year. I was speaking to Captain Bernier the other day and he told me there are reports in the Department of Marine which mentioin the fact that Fort Nelson is the most available port taking it all the year around, and that very little work would have to be done at it. In order to solve the question of transportation when the Hudson straits are not open it was pointed out the other day by the Minister of Railways and by Sir Lomer Gouin, Prime Minister of Quebec, that the construction of the James Bay railway from the head of that bay to Montreal or Quebec is the proper course to pursue. It is only five hundred miles long and it traverses a splendid territory, rich in minerals and in lumber, and has fine agricultural land being a continuation of the famous clay belt of Ontario.

Mr. ROGERS. I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) but in the development of our country, as he knows, we have to take it step by step. I quite believe that before the suggestion which I threw out a moment ago will be realized we will have in operation the James Bay railway to which the hon. member has referred. In my judgment such an outlet will give a longer period of transportation than would navigation through the Hudson straits.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am told there are about nine months navigation that way.

Mr. ROGERS. In addition to that, this parliament has already voted a large subsidy for the greater portion of the James Bay railway and I hope it will be carried on and that by the time we get our railway built to Port Nelson or Fort Churchill the James Bay railway will be constructed so that we can make a connection and secure all the advantages that the construction of such a line would give to the people of western Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX

Mr. OLIVER. What provinces have agents in England now?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not sure but I think British Columbia, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and I think Quebec is starting now.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Nova Scotia has an agent general who is the representative of the province at large.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is also an agent from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. OLIVER. Will these agents be withdrawn as the result of the scheme of co-operation that is being entered upon?

Mr. ROGERS. That will be a matter entirely for the provinces. I think the provinces now feel important and strong enough to believe that they should be represented by their own agents general who will probably not devote so much of their time to the matter of immigration as formerly, but who will do other work in connection with the provinces which they represent. At least that has been suggested, and I do not know to what extent the practice will be adopted.

Mr. OLIVER. In what way will this duplication of work be avoided, and in what way is the expense to be decreased by the co-operation system proposed?

Mr. ROGERS. We can employ the same offices in many ways and we can have a uniform arrangement in regard to our literature, and in many other ways we can work to advantage by co-operating. I know that all the provinces we have spoken to seem to agree with the idea and see an advantage in it. I certainly do so far as the literature and the using of the same offices are concerned. Take an agent going from Ontario or the west, and generally speaking he knows very little about the conditions in the maritime provinces. Our hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) told us the other day that our present representative in London did not appear to know that there was such a place as New Brunswick, and we want to avoid any suspicion of that kind of thing. We want representatives there that will know the special conditions prevailing in each province of Canada and be able to meet intending immigrants who would be suitable for these particular provinces. For instance, the class of immigrants wanted in New Brunswick would be good market gardeners and the like, and in my opinion we can get immigrants from Belgium who would be suitable for that province. Probably, I might say the same thing in regard to Nova Scotia. In that way it would be an advantage to co-operate and it would pay the duplicating of offices and literature.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Will the minister appoint the men designated by the several provincial governments and will the Federal government pay the salaries?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Will the Federal government pay the greater portion of the maintenance and literature?

Mr. ROGERS. That has to be arranged yet.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). It is only fair I think that the federal government should bear, if not the whole, the greater portion of the cost, because it is not a fair expenditure to force upon the various provinces. I think the minister will agree with me that the several provincial governments in this country have all they can do with their limited financial strength to perform the various public services which fall under their jurisdiction, and these are becoming more burdensome on them all the time. I think in the matter of immigration the federal government might well pay all the expenses of the printing of immigration literature for the provinces.

Mr. OLIVER. I must say that I fail to see the economy of the arrangement so far as the Dominion is concerned, although, of course, there may be economy in respect of the provinces.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not wish to be understood as saying that we will have any increased economy so far as the Dominion is concerned, but we will have increased economy to the extent that between the Dominion and the provinces we will not be duplicating the work, and having two men doing what one man could well do. For instance, the other day the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario arranged with me to join forces in the office in Toronto which is a considerable saving for our department, and he would pay the rental if we would supply him with a certain amount of literature. We save duplicating the work in that way. In a general sense it is not as a policy of economy that we are doing this, but in order that we may work in unity towards the same end.

Mr. OLIVER. I quite understand the situation now, and I think it is desirable that the House should understand that the economy is an economy of effort rather than an economy in money. If I might criticise, I would think that in all human probability the Dominion will have the privilege of bearing a very large share of the cost under the arrangement that is made. It is to be hoped that it will be accompanied by a corresponding increase in efficiency. Does the minister intend to reopen the office at Boston?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, on the 1st of March.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Was the office entirely closed at Boston?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Then why re-open it?

Mr. ROGERS. We found the necessity of it to a certain extent and the closing gave rise to the false impression that we were closing offices in the United States and not going to be as vigorous in our immigration policy towards our neighbours as we had been in the past. We have had a considerable number of applications for information and we found it necessary to re-open the office.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I suppose all the officials employed in that office were dismissed, and I would be very suspicious that the closing of the office was a modus operandi for getting clear of some officials.

Mr. ROGERS. The hon. member is mistaken.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What is the explanation?

Mr. ROGERS. I think the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will bear me out when I say that the officials who happened to be in charge of that office were not desirable for the carrying out of the work, and in any case whether the office had remained open or otherwise it would have been necessary to dismiss them. They were not suitable for the work. Accidents will happen in all cases and this was simply an accident.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Were Mr. Hetherington and Mr. Copp the only officers employed there?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, there were one or two stenographers besides.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Whom does the minister intend to appoint?

Mr. ROGERS. We have not selected any one yet.

Mr. OLIVER. I am afraid I can hardly accept the co-operative principle my hon. friend accords me with regard to the Boston office. If I had held the same opinion of the officials there as he holds it would have been my business to have dispensed with them.

While I admit that the officials had their limitations, they had their good parts. Mr. Hetherington, who was the first agent appointed there, was a New Brunswicker, a man of very good standing in his province, and well known both in New Brunswick and in New England by the New Brunswickers living there, and for that reason it seemed to me that he was a valuable man. I admit that he had attained a considerable age, and was not as active as he might have been, but certainly he had the qualifications for the work. Mr. Copp, who assisted him was a Nova Scotian, and had formerly been a member of this House. He was a younger man than Mr. Hetherington and certainly was an active man, and I would suppose was a suitable agent. I find no fault with my hon. friend. He is responsible to the country for the efficient operation of his department, and has a right to decide on the efficiency of those in the service. But I do not want to leave myself under the imputation of having retained in office persons who were unsuitable. I would be sorry to see the office permanently closed, because I think there is a good field there, on the lines on which we established it, for securing a population for our western country from the maritime province people, who have settled in many thousands in the New England states.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). When Mr. Copp and Mr. Hetherington were dismissed, what reason was assigned in the notification to them?

Mr. ROGERS. No special reason was given further than that the office was to be closed. It was a recommendation of a departmental officer which brought it about, nothing else.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What salary did Mr. Hetherington get?

Mr. ROGERS. $1,800 a year.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What did Mr. Copp get?

Mr. ROGERS. $1,500.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). It was not a very expensive staff. All I have to say is that I do not like the look of the whole transaction. It does not look as if there was departmental candour at least in getting rid of these officials. They were not highly paid officials. In the case of Mr. Copp it has proved to be a great hardship. While not very old, he is well up in years; he is an ex-member of parliament, and has a good knowledge of Nova Scotia, and I think he could have rendered service to the country up to the extent of the small salary he received. It looks as if these gentlemen were dismissed by a policy of fraud and deception. While the reason given was that the office was to be closed, we are told that the office is to be opened again. Unless the minister will take the ground that they were dismissed for incompetency, I think his action was most unfair. He could not dismiss them for political partisanship. I think the chairman (Mr. Jameson) will bear me out in saying that Mr. Copp, since his appointment to that office, has not taken any part in politics in Nova Scotia.

Mr. ROGERS. I may say that there was no politics whatever in the closing of this office or in the dismissal of those connected with it. The action was taken entirely on the recommendation of the officials of the department, for the reason that they did not consider either Mr. Hetherington or Mr. Copp capable of fulfilling the duties they were expected to perform. I did not know them myself; I simply acted on the recommendation of officials of the department. There was no outside interference or request of any description with reference to the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In connection with the immigration from the United States, might I remind the hon. minister that some years ago, under his predecessor in office, and under Mr. Sifton, some French-Canadian agents were appointed specially to look after the repatriation of French-Canadians from the New England States? Amongst the agents appointed were some well-known priests who were well acquainted with the various French-Canadian settlements in the New England States, and I must say that they have been quite successful in repatriating several thousand French-Canadians, many of whom have settled in Saskatchewan and elsewhere, I think, in Alberta. As these agents have proved to be very satisfactory in the past, I hope my hon. friend will continue their services. There is a large population of French-Canadians in the New England States. According to the census returns published by the United States government, the population of French origin from Canada in the United States is nearer one million than a half million. This started many years ago—first at the time of the establishment of the cotton factories in the eastern states, and again during the hard times before 1896. And there was quite an influx of French immigration to the United States. Now the tide has turned, thanks to the efforts of the clergy and to the immigration agents who have been appointed in various cities of the neighbouring republic, and quite a number of these people have come back to Canada. I hope the minister will maintain these agents and see that they continue to do their work well. In this way we can recover many of our people who have not foresworn their Canadian citizenship although they are living on the other side of the boundary line.

Mr. ROGERS. In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) I may say that we are retaining all the officers to whom he has alluded, and that we are favourably considering recommendations for extending this kind of work.

Mr. McKENZIE. We in the province of Nova Scotia are particularly interested in the details of the proposed co-operation because we are very desirous of attracting more people to that province for agricultural purposes. I was glad to hear the minister say they hoped to settle in New Brunswick people who would take an interest in market gardening, and presumably agricultural pursuits generally. In Nova Scotia, more particularly the eastern part of the province, we are confronted with a condition of things that is highly detrimental to agriculture. Prior to 1875 and 1876, farming was almost wholly the occupation carried on in that part of Canada. Almost everybody engaged in agriculture and the cost of living was consequently low. Of recent years large industrial centres such as coal mines, and the steel and iron works, have operated and have had the effect of drawing the rural population from the country. The result is that large tracts of land which previously were thickly settled by farmers, are now practically vacant while there are large centres of population entirely unproductive, requiring tremendous quantities of food stuffs. Hence the cost of living in these busy centres of population and industry is becoming alarmingly high. Our only hope and salvation is that we can secure a class of people who will settle on those vacant lands and make them productive. I have talked to the Premier of Nova Scotia upon the subject, and the question is where are we going to locate immigrants if they come or what inducements can they hold out to them. There is abundance of land but it is not owned by the government, and I would therefore suggest to the minister that in order to effect any substantial progress with his policy in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia he should acquire some of this land. It can be got very cheaply and if it were divided into small farms of fifty acres the necessary inducement to immigrants to come and settle on them would be found. Around Sydney and North Sydney there is much good land available out of which splendid farms can be created. The creation of colonies of fifty or sixty farms in my opinion would be highly successful, and in a short time this scheme would practically make its own way. I am very hopeful that the policy announced will be successful. I wish the minister every success and I trust that his plan will promote the settlement of vacant lands in the maritime provinces.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I would suggest to the minister that in making appointments to the Boston office, it would be desirable to select persons from the maritime provinces who will appreciate the conditions there much better than persons who have lived in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Such a course might also have the effect of influencing immigration from the United States back to the maritime provinces.

Mr. JAMESON. As I was in the chair when the question of closing the Boston office was being discussed I wish now to say a word with regard to that matter. My first intimation that that office was about to be closed, or that any change had been made in connection with it, was the receipt of a newspaper clipping forwarded to me from Digby to the effect that Mr. Copp who was in charge of the Boston office had returned home again. Mr. Copp was my opponent in the election of 1908, and he and I have always been on most friendly terms, and I am glad to say the same friendly feeling exists to-day. Immediately upon receiving the newspaper intimation I went to the department and made inquiries, and after a time was informed that the change had been brought about as a result of a report by an officer of the department to the effect, I believe, that it was necessary in the interests of the department, and of that branch of the department's work. I also heard at the same time from Digby that Mr. Copp was very unwell. The information given to me at the department was that while the Boston office would be closed on the 31st of December, Mr. Copp had been retired on the 21st of October. I then saw the Minister of the Interior and represented to him that Mr. Copp was unwell, and urged that he be reinstated for the remainder of the period that the office would remain open, that if necessary, Mr. Copp, though too unwell to resume his duties, should be allowed leave of absence and his salary paid as though he were still in the service of the department at the Boston office. The minister acceded to that, and Mr. Copp has been paid his salary up to the 31st of December. Only yesterday I received from Mrs. Copp a letter expressing appreciation of what had been done in that regard, and stating that her husband's health was such that she regretted his inability to write me himself. I do not want any member of the House to think for one moment that I had ever done or said anything that would militate against the interests of Mr. Copp as an officer of the department, because, as I have already said, we have always been on the best possible terms, and it would be the last thing I should have thought of under the circumstances.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). No one has ever suggested such a thing.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to ask whether under this proposed co-operative arrangement as applied to the province of Nova Scotia, that province is to nominate an immigration agent with a permanent residence in England, at the expense of the Dominion with two or more subordinate agents. All the provinces are represented in the government, excepting Alberta, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island, and I have no doubt that the ministers representing the other provinces will take care of the interests of those three provinces in this arrangement. I would ask the minister if the arrangement he has sketched is equally open to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island as to the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. ROGERS. The same conditions will obtain in all the provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like to clearly understand the new policy of the minister as regards this co-operative work between the provinces and the Dominion. If I understand rightly the officers thus working together will be paid the one by the province, and the other by the Dominion. And then the Department of the Interior will see to the literature to be issued to the public. Will the literature tend to move immigration towards the west especially?

Mr. ROGERS. No, the idea is to have special literature for each province prepared by the representatives there.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Dominion government will do just as much to help immigration towards the several provinces as towards the public lands of the west.

Mr. ROGERS. Just the same.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When we are next in committee on these estimates I should be glad if the minister will give some details about the mission intrusted to Mr. Oliver Asselin. I understand that he has a commission from the department to look after agencies in Europe.

Mr. ROGERS. I will answer that at once. The mission was simply in connection with the French and Belgian agencies, with a view to widening our scope, the subject we discussed a few moments ago. Mr. Asselin was represented to me as being a suitable man for this work, and he was going anyway. He receives the same salary as a farm delegate. He undertook the work, and will make a report.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the minister received the report?

Mr. ROGERS. Not yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I should be glad if the minister would inform me when it is received. Mr. Asselin is a very able man, a splendid writer; I shall be much interested in reading his report.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). When we are again in Supply, I desire to ask some questions concerning the application made by some of the East Indian population of British Columbia with regard to the admission of their wives into that province.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the hon. gentleman want the information to-night?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). No.

Mr. OLIVER. As to the agents of the provinces appointed in England, will they occupy a part of the offices provided by the Dominion or will they have separate offices? and if so who will provide these offices?

Mr. ROGERS. That has not yet been definitely decided. Some of the provinces are ambitious enough to have their own offices and buildings and wish to remain in them, while others have not. I think we have reached the time when probably this government should do something about securing large and suitable buildings in London for the purposes of the Immigration Department and other departments of government that are represented over there. If that scheme is carried out in the near future, I hope we shall provide, in that building under whatever arrangement we might make, suitable and acceptable accommodation for each province.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly that is an excellent idea. It is the idea propounded the other day by my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). One goes to London, and passing along the Strand sees on one side the Ontario building, on the other side the Quebec building; and a little further, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and all using the magic word 'Canada.' Why not have one big central building for the Dominion with all the provinces located in that building? When my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was Minister of the Interior, a proposition was made by Lord Strathcona to provide for a splendid building in the heart of London. I believe a site could then have been obtained on favourable terms on Trafalgar Square which would have been very suitable. The Department of Immigration has offices on Charing Cross, a small place and occupying a very valuable site, but the display made there, I am sure, has brought thousands of immigrants to this country. Passing there morning, afternoon or evening—for the place is kept bright at night with electric lights, one can always see a crowd looking at the exhibits in the window. And, as

I say, this is a small corner of Charing Cross. If we had the old hotel in front of the Nelson Statue—I think it is called Morley's hotel, one of the old landmarks—

Mr. ROGERS. I am told that is a very expensive site.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It may be so; but you cannot have a central site in London suitable for Canada without paying the piper. But look at the Grand Trunk railway, the Canadian Pacific railway, the Allans, and all the big concerns that have erected splendid buildings and that are doing the advertising for Canada. Canada is big enough and rich enough to do advertising for herself. And certainly I would commend the action of the government if they were to erect in the heart of London, which is the heart of the empire, a big building which would be architecturally beautiful, and would in itself be an advertisement for the country; make it the headquarters of our High Commissioner, and rally all the provinces under that roof. I think it would be the beginning of a very sane imperialism.

Mr. OLIVER. I see that there is an increase of $50,000 in the first item on the list.

Mr. ROGERS. While it appears as an increase it is not such in reality. It is due to the fact that in former years a number of salaries were charged to the vote of contingencies. These were added to the salary list for the year 1912-13. According to a statement prepared early in November, it will require $387,812.26, to pay the salaries of the immigration employees in the outside service, leaving little over $12,000 to provide for new appointments and increases during the ensuing year. While you provided $350,000 you spent $387,817.26 up to November 15. So that it is practically the same thing.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. ROGERS moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. ROGERS. Government Bills, and, if we get through with those, Supply.

Mr. OLIVER. What Bills?

Mr. ROGERS. The Bills on the order paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And when we go into Supply we will take up my hon. friend's (Mr. Roger's) estimates?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.23 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 19, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT OF PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. CURRIE moved that the first report of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER. As this report relates to the Printing of Parliament, which involves an expenditure of money, I am afraid I shall have to ask that it be allowed to stand.

Mr. CURRIE. The Printing Committee recommend in this report that in future all reports presented in either the Senate or the House of Commons, by the other committees which contain requests for the printing of reports, pamphlets, &c., be first submitted to the Committee on Printing. That recommendation should be really unnecessary because, under Rule 64 of the House, a motion for the printing of any paper must be first submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing for report before any action is taken on it. However, an abuse has arisen in the House, and other committees present to the House resolutions accompanying their reports with motions that a certain number of copies of testimony or papers placed before them should be printed and the House has granted such requests. For instance, the Committee on Agriculture recommended that 150,000 copies of Dr. James Robertson's address before them on the matter of conservation should be printed. That would involve an expenditure of something over $15,000. It is a violation of the rules, there was a slight clash over the matter, and as a result this report is now presented to the House. Whether this motion is necessary I do not know, but it is well to pass it, and so remind the chairman and secretaries of committees that this abuse cannot be continued. In 1908 the amount of money required for sessional printing for the House was $85,000, but last session it was over $250,000. We do not wish to be considered parsimonious, but we feel that orders for any printing of such magnitude as this should at least be referred to the committee appointed by parliament to pass upon such things.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). I would suggest that this motion might stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. I requested that the report referred to by the hon. gentleman should stand as it recommended printing, which involves an expenditure, without that question having been referred to the Committee on Printing charged with the duty of looking into such questions and making recommendations with respect to them.

Motion allowed to stand.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. BENNETT (SIMCOE).

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wish to refer to an item in the 'Free Press' personal to myself. It says:

> One of the chief causes of Conservative attack upon Hon. Dr. Pugsley's administration of the Public Works Department was his use of the tug 'Whelan' to break the ice in the harbours of Port Arthur and Fort William. Indeed the investigation into this 'scandal' is still in progress before the Public Accounts Committee. Yet the same tug 'Whelan' is doing the self same work under the administration of Hon. F. D. Monk. What will W. H. Bennett say now?

In reference to the item, all I have to say is this: There is no investigation, to my knowledge, now before the Public Accounts Committee in reference to ice breaking at Fort William or Port Arthur. Last year there was a contract there for $30,000 for that work, but under the withering influence of honest competition and tender, that has shrivelled down to $19,250; and at Midland, with reference to which there is an investigation pending as to the breaking of ice, that contract has been reduced from $5,500 to nothing. That is all I have to say.

MR. JUSTICE RITCHIE OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. MACDONALD. I saw an announcement in the 'Free Press' on Saturday to the effect that Mr. J. J. Ritchie, K.C., has been appointed a justice of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in succession to the late Mr. Justice Laurence. I trust the rumor is true. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether it is true or not.

Mr. CURRIE.

I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that it is desirable that the appointment should be made at an early date on account of the illness of one of the other judges.

Mr. BORDEN. The order in council was approved on Saturday.

Mr. MACDONALD. For Mr. Ritchie's appointment?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes.

MARRIAGE LAWS—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice if the rumour published in the Montreal 'Gazette' is true, that the reference on the marriage question will be submitted to the Supreme Court this week at the opening of the court.

Mr. BORDEN. It will be submitted at the earliest practicable opportunity; I hope this week.

FARMERS' BANK INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MACDONALD. With reference to the statement that Sir William Meredith has been appointed commissioner to investigate matters in connection with the Farmers' Bank, will the Prime Minister bring down a copy of the order in council appointing him?

Mr. BORDEN. It was laid on the table the very day on which it was approved.

PATENTS OF THOMAS B. RAMBAUT.

On the order being called for further consideration in the Committee of the Whole, of Bill (No. 84) respecting certain patents of Thomas B. Rambaut.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. OLIVER. When this Bill came up on Friday one of the members who was very much interested in it asked to have it stand over until to-day when he could be present, and that was agreed to. I would ask that the Bill be allowed to stand for the present.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand that arrangement was made, and the Bill will stand accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 60), an Act to amend the Civil Service Act.

On section 39.—Salaries of Private Secretaries,

Mr. BORDEN. When this clause was under consideration before, I moved that subsections 2, 3 and 4 be struck out for the reasons which I then stated. It was then suggested that I had better give the matter a little further consideration. I have given the subject further consideration, but have not changed my conclusion with regard to it. I therefore beg to move that subsections, 2, 3 and 4 be struck out.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). On what ground?

Mr. BORDEN. The ground is this: The granting of an allowance, or an increase of salary, up to $600 to a person who has been appointed private secretary while in one sense perhaps not undesirable, inasmuch as it would merely restore the secretary to the emolument which he might have at the time when he retires from the service of his minister as private secretary, nevertheless might entail some difficulty and some possible injustice by putting such an official over the heads of a great many persons who had been in the Civil Service a long time, and who would feel that they were not receiving quite the consideration to which they were entitled if that were done. It may be that some other arrangement may be devised for dealing with the matter in a way that would do no possible injustice. I have not, within the limited time at my disposal for consideration of the matter, been able to arrive at any conclusion which I regard as quite satisfactory. For that reason I move that these subsections be struck out.

Mr. OLIVER. I was not present when the Bill was first discussed, and if the Premier would not object I would be very glad if he would give in a few words the effect of that part of the section which remains.

Mr. BORDEN. Perhaps I had better explain what the present law is. Section 39 of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908 provided that any person chosen by a minister to be his private secretary might, without examination and irrespective of age be appointed a clerk for a period not exceeding one year in subdivision B of the second division, and that after one year's service as such secretary he should be permanently appointed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What was the salary attached?

Mr. BORDEN. He would have to be appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and the salary, not under the new provision that I have referred to, but the old one, would be $800 and he would have an additional allowance of $600 as secretary. It was not found possible in some cases to obtain the services of a competent man to fill the position of of private secretary at that figure.

Mr. OLIVER. At $1400?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, and therefore we are asking for authority to appoint to subdivision B of the second division, or subdivision A of the same division, or to subdivision B of the first division.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But the secretaries will still get the allowance.

Mr. BORDEN. They will.

Mr. OLIVER. They are to go into a division higher than the present Civil Service Act permits.

Mr. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. And they get the same extra consideration as secretaries ?

Mr. BORDEN. Quite so.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Will the private secretaries who have served under the last administration be affected by this ? Section 2 provides for the Act coming into force on the 10th of October, 1912. What is the effect of that clause ?

Mr. BORDEN. The effect is that men who are selected as private secretaries to ministers may as of that date be appointed to the positions provided for in this Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Were the secretaries who served under the old government to be affected by this? Is there not precedent for giving those who remain in the Civil Service compensation for the $600 a year that they lose?

Mr. BORDEN. No, there is no provision under this statute different in that respect from that which was originally provided.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Was it not the intention of the right hon. gentleman to do that?

Mr. BORDEN. No, that had not occurred to me; for I had understood that the secretaries of ministers of the late administration had been provided for, except in one case which was brought to my attention, and as to which I undertook to make some provision. I was not aware there was really any difficulty. Of course, the whole subject is, perhaps, not a very easy one to deal with, because of the effect of the legislation which was passed in 1908. I do not know that I have any suggestion to offer other than that embodied in this legislation, but it is clear that it does bring about an inconvenient result. This legislation may have to be changed at another session. The inconvenience is this: A gentleman is appointed as private secretary to a minister. In some cases at least he does not discharge any duties except those incident to his private secretaryship, and the administration of the department is provided for altogether outside of his services. His minister goes out of office and the private secretary remains in the Civil Service. Under the provisions of the Act of 1908, and under the provisions of this amending Act, he is left for the time being without any special duties to perform. And so matters remain until the department can so organize as to make his services available to the country. That is the difficulty which was pointed out to me, and it undoubtedly exists. But it exists no more under this amending Act than under the Act of 1908.

Mr. OLIVER. I think it is hardly fair to deal with the private secretary by ignoring the fact that he has a special case. If a member of the civil service has acted as private secretary to a minister, of course he has received extra consideration. If the minister goes out the private secretary reverts to the salary which he had before he became private secretary. I think that the man who has acted as private secretary to a minister and has been able to fulfil the duties—the somewhat onerous duties—of that position, has thereby acquired an experience and a knowledge that is valuable. Also he has proven himself a man of such capacity as to entitle him to at any rate more consideration than to merely put him back where he was at the beginning of his term of office as private secretary, perhaps four or five years before. While I am aware that that is the position under the law, I understood that the purpose of this Bill was to recognize in some measure the idea I have taken the liberty of placing before the committee. As I said, I shall be very sorry if the Bill is not put in such a form as to give the private secretary some consideration. I do not ask that when he drops the very onerous duties of private secretary he should receive absolutely the same salary as he had while he was discharging those duties, but I think it is entirely unfair, and not in the reasonable interest of the public service, that the man who has occupied that position and who has acquired an experience which should be of value should, on a change of government, revert to the position he occupied before he was chosen for the position of private secretary. I would ask the Prime Minister to give some further consideration to that side of the case, unless he has already considered it and has absolutely made up his mind.

Mr. BORDEN. I have considered that. Those gentlemen who leave their positions as private secretary, in some cases at least at the present time, are left almost entirely without any duties to perform. We have no disposition whatever to deal otherwise than fairly with them, but we have to take into consideration the circumstance that it is very difficult, if not impossible, in some of the departments at least, to make any effective utilization of their services. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) says that they revert to the position which they held at first. That, perhaps, is not an absolutely correct way of stating it, because they have received each year a certain increment in their annual salaries under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. True, they do lose at the moment, the sum of $600 a year, to which they were entitled, by virtue of being private secretaries. But we cannot very well deal with that without taking into our regard other considerations which I mentioned a moment ago, and which were brought to my attention by some members of the civil service. I am placing all private secretaries exactly on the same basis, so far as that is concerned. The provisions embodied in this Bill particularly under subsections 2, 3 and 4, had regard to the men who are being appointed now, and I am striking them out. But I am prepared at some later date—for I have not had sufficient time to consider the subject thoroughly—to take up the question of dealing not only with these but also with the men who went out of office as private secretaries, when the government resigned, but who are still members of the civil service. But I do not think it would be possible for me, purely for lack of time, to deal with that matter this session. So far as the secretaries of ministers of the late administration are concerned, the case of only one of them has been brought to my attention, and he is to be provided for in a way that I hope, will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does the right hon. gentleman allude to the secretary of the right hon. the leader of the opposition?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes. I have taken the matter up with the leader of the opposition, and I think it can be settled in a way that will be satisfactory to him and to the gentleman who is concerned.

On the Preamble.

Mr. BORDEN. With respect to one department of the government, a point was brought to our attention within a day or two, and it may be provided for in an amendment to the Bill. For the present, I will let the Bill stand in committee for that purpose, if you, Mr. Chairman, have no objection.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. BORDEN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 104) to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: The purpose of this Bill is expressed on its face. At the present time there are two Civil Service Commissioners. Inconvenience has been found to arise in more than one instance by reason of the members of the commission being equally divided, in which case no action can be taken. For that reason it has been thought desirable to introduce this Bill to enable the government to appoint another commissioner. There is another reason which I mentioned on the introduction of the Bill. It is hoped that the provision of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, will be extended in the early future to some portions, at least, of the outside service. The leader of the opposition, who was present when I introduced the Bill, alluded to some positions in the outside service, such as postmasters in cities, to which he thought the Act might be extended almost at once. Inasmuch, however, as we do not know how soon this can be accomplished, or how soon the services of another commissioner may be required for that purpose, it has been thought best to introduce a provision in section 2 of the Bill that it shall not come into force until proclamation by the Governor General in Council.

Mr. KYTE. Is it the intention of the Bill to make appointments to the outside service subject to competitive examination?

Mr. BORDEN. I have said that it is the desire and intention of the government to extend as rapidly as possible, to some parts of the outside service at least, the provisions of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908. How rapidly that can be done, what progress can be made in putting it into effect, I cannot say, for the reason that we have not been able, owing to the very numerous matters pressing upon our attention during this session, to give much consideration to it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). It can be done by order in council.

Mr. BORDEN. It can be done by order in council; but we must have regard to some other considerations. I imagine that there would have to be some departmental inquiry necessary in every case to enable the government to form a just conclusion as to how far the provisions of the Civil Service Amendment Act could be brought into operation in any particular department.

Mr. OLIVER. What position will the new appointee take? Is he to be chairman?

Mr. BORDEN. We have not given any consideration to that at all. We merely provide that there shall be three commissioners instead of two, and that one of them shall be chairman.

Mr. OLIVER. What is the salary?

Mr. BORDEN. The same as before, no change.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does the chairman receive a larger salary than the other members?

Mr. BORDEN. It is not so provided in this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. At present the salaries of the two commissioners are the same?

Mr. BORDEN. Exactly the same. They have the rank and salary of a deputy minister.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the chairman be designated by order in council?

Mr. BORDEN. The Governor in Council may appoint one of the members of the commission to be its chairman.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Is there not some general statute which provides that deputy ministers are only removable by joint address of the Senate and House of Commons?

Mr. BORDEN. I am not quite sure. If I remember correctly, that is provided either in the statute creating the department or by some general provision, such as the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

On section 2,

Mr. LEMIEUX. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will not object to reporting progress. I understood the other day that the leader of the opposition had something to say. I suppose he may say it on the third reading?

Mr. BORDEN. Just as my hon. friend prefers.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.—RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 105) to amend the Post Office Act. He said: This Bill is to provide for an improvement in the railway mail clerk service, which is not at present in a satisfactory position. The railway mail clerks now receive a salary of $500 a year on appointment. We have to get them from the outside, and we have a good deal of difficulty in getting good men for the reason that they are not paid as they ought to be. This Bill provides for several cases, which I will briefly explain to the House.

The first clause provides that any person may be employed temporarily as a railway mail clerk for a period of not more than one year at a salary of $500 a year and mileage allowance. The present law provides for the temporary employment of clerks for a period of only six months. We extend that period to one year. This gives the clerks two chances instead of one of passing their examination. When we find some of these men to be good employees, understanding their work, we do not want them to go and take other places. We are allowing them mileage allowance and I am sure that the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), will agree with me that this is a wise provision. We cannot expect railway mail clerks to do good work at $500 a year at the present cost of living. Permanent clerks receive a certain mileage, and these men who are in the service of the department are doing the same work, but they are not now given any mileage allowance. It is hoped that the granting of the mileage allowance will help to retain these men in the service. The experience of the department is that if we do not take better care of our employees we are simply training boys who, when they know something about the service, leave the department to take other situations and we thereby lose some of our most promising employees. We intend to try to keep these men in our employ by paying them decent salaries.

The second clause is one which will appeal to the House. A great number of temporary mail clerks have not passed the examination. The law says that they must pass the examination in order to be appointed permanently. I do not want to reflect on the Civil Service Commissioners, but I will frankly say that I could not pass their examinations nor could many gentlemen in this House. For this very inferior position, and this small salary, men are expected to answer questions which a young man fresh from college might be able to answer, but which a grown up man would be unable to answer. The ex-Postmaster General and myself have been obliged to take men who have not passed the examination, but who are just as good as if they had; they know their business, they do it well, but under the present law we are obliged to send them away. I ask the authority of the House to appoint these men permanently if their services have been satisfactory, and if they are recommended by the superintendent and the controller of the Railway Mail Service. They will have to pass only the preliminary examination, and I have no hesitation in saying that the passing of that examination is a sufficient qualification for the position of railway mail clerk. If they pass that examination they will go up, step by step, to $1,000. They will stop there if they do not pass the full examination. I felt disposed to be even more lenient, but I suppose progress has to be made little by little, and I think this will appeal to the House as being a just and fair measure, both to these railway mail clerks, who have a great deal of heavy work to do, and to the public service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I quite agree with the general lines of this Bill and I concur in the remarks just made. The cost of living is increasing immensely. I remember, although I am not very old myself, that some years ago, a man could bring up a family on a salary of $1,000 a year, but now-a-days it is practically impossible to do so, living in a modest way. The railway mail clerks are most excellent officers of His Majesty's service, and as I have told the House on many occasions, they have to incur risks in the discharge of their duties, which other civil servants do not incur. They are obliged to travel at all times of the year, during the heat of the summer and the cold of the winter. They have to take out insurance policies for the protection of their families, and they have to contend with difficulties not experienced by other members of the civil service. Will the clause providing for the raising of the salaries of railway mail clerks up to $1,000 if they pass the preliminary examination apply to any railway mail clerk who is in the service at present regardless of the number of years of his service?

Mr. PELLETIER. I will treat them well.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Having said so much about what is being done in favour of the railway mail clerks, I wish to emphasize once more before this House, the urgent necessity of extending the provisions of the Civil Service Act to the outside service. It would save my hon. friend or any minister of the Crown much time and worry, if there was one general law applied to civil servants, whether they are in the inside or in the outside service.

When I was in the government, I advocated it, speaking for myself only, but there were some who did not believe that this reform should be accomplished then. However, a bold step must be taken some time, and it is time to take it now. The life of a minister is not worth living if, whenever he moves from Ottawa to Montreal or Quebec, he is to be constantly surrounded by a crowd of office seekers, as I understand my hon. friend the Postmaster General is and as I was when I was Postmaster General. Would it not be better to have the same principle of competitive examination for the outside service as we have now for the inside service? My hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) was not here before the days of the new Civil Service Act, and I can assure him that he is living in Paradise now, because he will never have so many visitors looking for employment as we had before that Act was passed.

Mr. PELLETIER. Did my hon. friend receive more visitors than we do now?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Oh, yes, we were stormed with visitors and letters. That legislation introduced by Mr. Fisher with respect to the inside service afforded a cure for many evils and gave the ministers of the Crown some little time to devote their energies to the business of the country. Under the present Civil Service Law we get a good class of civil servants; the law is known to the people, the minister is bound by it, and his answer to applicants is that he must obey the law. Why not extend this principle of competitive examination to the outside service? What difference is there between an official of the Post Office Department and an official in the post office at Ottawa, or at Montreal, or in the other cities? They both deal with the same matters, they have to perform practically the same duties; in fact I would say that the postmasters in Montreal and Ottawa must have perhaps more ability than some departmental officials. I can assure my hon. friend that when he proposes to put the outside officials under the Civil Service Act—and judging by the remarks of the Prime Minister to-day the government is contemplating that—it will meet with favour from this side of the House. Let there be one law for the inside and outside service alike, and thus the ministers will have more time to work for the country, and they will have to give less time to working for the office seeker.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). How many temporary clerks will come under this, and how much mileage per day would be represented?

Mr. PELLETIER. The mileage will amount to $250 or $300 a year each. I will get the information later as to the number of miles.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (North York). I wish to say a word or two with regard to the railway mail service of this Dominion, and, by way of explanation, I may be frank enough to tell the House that I spent four or five years of my life in that service. I am pleased to know that the Postmaster General realizes the importance of that branch of the department under his charge; I am pleased to know that he realizes that he has good and efficient servants in that branch, and I am pleased to know that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has been able to testify from past experience that the railway mail clerks were faithful and efficient officers during the time he was in charge of the department. I would like to refer now to a Bill affecting the railway mail clerks introduced when the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) was Postmaster General, and I do so for the purpose of making a plea for the railway mail clerks and for that reason alone. In my humble judgment the railway mail service has been sadly neglected in the past and the following quotation from the Bill I refer to will, I think show that:

3. Paragraph (a) of section 32 of the said Act is repealed, and in lieu thereof it is enacted that a railway mail clerk shall be appointed on probation for a period of at least one year, at a salary at the rate of five hundred dollars a year, with an additional allowance or mileage, and on the confirmation of his appointment he may be paid at the rate of six hundred dollars a year, and mileage, with annual increases of one hundred dollars up to eight hundred dollars, and an increase of fifty dollars a year thereafter until the maximum of one thousand four hundred dollars is reached.

Now, I want to point out the injustice of that Bill. Whom does it affect? It affected primarily only the men who had been appointed by the late administration, because it will be noticed that the men who had just been a short time in the service received one hundred dollars a year increase instead of fifty dollars a year, and in the second place it affected that class of men who had been in the service practically for a lifetime and who had already reached the maximum salary of twelve hundred. Thus the great backbone of the service the men not included in those two classes received no immediate benefit whatever from that legislation. The men receiving over eight hundred dollars a year and under twelve hundred received no benefit, because their increase went along at the rate of fifty dollars a year as formerly. I cannot conceive by what process of reasoning any man could decree that a clerk shall receive one hundred dollars a year increase the first year he is in the service when he knows nothing about it whatever, and that after he had been three years in the service and learned the business from start to finish, that that increase should be dropped to fifty dollars a year. That is one phase of the question I cannot understand. I would appeal to the Postmaster General to, if he possibly can see his way clear, right the wrong that was done by this legislation, and a great wrong it is. There is another phase of the question to which I would direct attention. There has been a tendency in past years to place the railway mail service in a lower grade than other post office officials in the outside service. I want to tell the House that the railway mail clerk takes second place to no class of post office employees. There is not a branch of the department in which the men have to work harder or in which more experience is required. Further, it was the first branch of the post office service in which the employees were forced to go through a very strict examination on the duties of office in order to get their annual increase. Until a few years ago the railway mail service was the only service in which the employees had to undergo a yearly examination and take ninety per cent before they were pronounced entitled to their fifty dollars a year increase. I mention these facts in the hope that the Postmaster General will, when the case is fairly and squarely presented, take steps to right the injustice that has been done the railway mail clerks who are, I would say, possibly the most faithful officials in his department. It has been claimed that a railway mail clerk received a salary of fourteen hundred dollars a year and mileage, but when you come to consider the question of salary the mileage should not be taken into account because the mileage is paid only by way of compensation for the extra risk, and the unnatural conditions under which he has to discharge his duties.

I would like to remind the hon. the Postmaster General that only three or four days ago three of his men went down in a wreck in the Toronto division; and I could mention many such cases in that branch of the service. Men go out three or four times a week taking their lives in their hands. Surely these men are entitled to more consideration than men who work in offices. I hope the case of the railway mail clerks of this Dominion will be looked into thoroughly, and that they will receive the justice they deserve; and I am satisfied that they will receive it at the hands of one of the most just and reasonable Postmaster Generals that I think this country ever had.

Mr. NESBITT. I see that a clerk, no matter how long he has served, cannot get over $1,000 without passing a qualifying examination. Is that a special examination for railway mail clerks?

Mr. PELLETIER. No. The railway mail clerk is practically a stamper and sorter. He has to pass what is called a case examination and the annual office examination required by the Civil Service Commission. The limit of $1,000 is for the men who have passed the preliminary examination, to distinguish them from those who have passed both examinations, and whose salary does not stop at $1,000.

Mr. NESBITT. Is the qualifying examination an examination within the department?

Mr. PELLETIER. No, by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. NESBITT. Especially for the railway mail clerks?

Mr. PELLETIER. Of course.

Mr. NESBITT. The reason I ask is that a man who has had experience might not be able to pass the civil service examination, and still be a very well qualified railway mail clerk. If it is an examination into his special qualifications for his work, it is all right; otherwise, I do not think it is.

Mr. PELLETIER. I may say to my hon. friend that I fully expect before long to go further than this Bill is going. While it is very satisfactory to find that this Bill is so well received by both sides of the House, it does not go as far as I would have liked it to go. But we have to make progress little by little. Railway mail clerks are very good men, and I am happy to see that one who started his career as a railway mail clerk, is now a member of the House of Commons, and one of the best. With regard to the qualifying examination, if it is kept on the lines on which it exists now, and we extend the Civil Service Act to the outside service, it will be very difficult for the Postmaster General to find employees. The preliminary examination is all right, but I think the qualifying examination is too severe. It should be such as a certain number of people will be able to pass. Now we are obliged to go outside of the Civil Service Commission to get employees, because they have none to give us.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You mean for the outside service?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes.

Mr LEMIEUX. You are obliged to violate the law.

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, we overstep the law all the time.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1, salaries of clerks,

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). As I understand the law at present, the railway mail clerks are required to pass the civil service examination, but the department has been in the habit of employing temporarily, persons who have not passed the examinations, upon the understanding that they might suffer dismissal if the examination were not passed within a year, and now the minister proposes to take statutory authority for appointing temporarily those who have not passed the examination.

Mr. PELLETIER. It is now done by overstepping the law, and I want the authority of the law to do it.

Mr. MACDONALD. The explanation of the minister clears up a point about which I had some doubt, as a matter of departmental practice. I had assumed that there was some statutory authority under which mail clerks were employed temporarily. I understand the minister to say that is not so, and this Bill will, for the first time, create such an authority. It is therefore, only confirming a practice which has been in existence in the past.

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are now employed as labourers.

Mr. MACDONALD. I quite agree as to the desirability of the legislation in that regard. It has always seemed to me to be a hardship that where you have perfectly competent young men who have passed the preliminary Civil Service examination and who perform their duties—onerous and responsible as they are—very efficiently that they should be prevented from becoming permanent officers because of having to pass a qualifying examination. That examination, as the Minister says, has undoubtedly been too severe and in my view the Civil Service commissioners or those who prepare these examination papers, with all due deference to them, do not apprehend what ought to be the qualifications of those who offer themselves as candidates. That erudition, or knowledge of technical subjects, such as one acquires at school is not going to make a man who passes the preliminary examination for railway mail clerk any more qualified to perform his duties; and the fact that he is not in a position to pass this purely technical qualifying examination ought not to debar him from permanency of employment. In that connection I am aware of a great many cases of hardship which have occurred within the past few years, and I think that the Minister should have some discretionary power. The evil will not be removed if the position of these men, who were admitted to the service temporarily, is confirmed and the hindrances to them getting increases under the Act, which I have mentioned as being a difficulty in the way, is not also removed. I quite agree with the ex-Postmaster General in the proposition that there should be an extension of the civil service reform generally to the outside service. In a great many branches of the outside service, if there were proper examinations, greater efficiency would be secured, and the evils of patronage would be removed to a very great degree. We are all I assume—although there has been a lot of talk about the matter, and we are making but very slight progress towards attaining the desired end—in favour of causing the civil service to so improve as in some degree to approach the high status the civil service occupies in the mother country. I suppose patronage is an alluring thing to hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been without that privilege for so long, but they will find it becomes a very great burden after a while; and I think we ought to reach the stage in this country when both parties can unite in a reasonable and sensible proposition of civil service reform for the outside service. That is a general proposition which is not rightly before us perhaps at this time, but it is a deduction from what I was anxious to see done with regard to the aptness and the sensible character of the qualifying examination, because some of the papers submitted to men who occupied temporary positions in the railway mail service and who desired to be made permanent, on presenting themselves for examination, have been shown to me, and as a means calculated to test their fitness or capacity for their duties were in my opinion absolutely ridiculous. It would appear impossible that educated people responsible for the civil service of this country would set papers of the kind, and there certainly requires to be a remedy in that respect both as regards the inside and outside service, if civil service reform is going to apply. Men who have been temporarily employed and are reasonably efficient in the discharge of their duties should not be debarred from promotion by failure to pass a technical examination. Provided you get integrity and general capacity on the part of the candidate the examination should take regard of a knowledge of the details of the particular service and the responsibility of the party affected. The possession of the necessary degree of intelligence can be very readily ascertained without exceptional educational test. At the first blush the Bill would seem to propose that one should be a graduate of the Military College, or of some university of Canada, but that is of course only an alternative qualifying position and would really dispense with the necessity of a graduate of either of these institutions having to go up for examination again. I hope that the minister, acting in conjunction with his colleagues, will see that a qualifying examination of a practical character is established, and the present examinations done away with, so that we may have a practical and sensible test of the qualifications of those who seek to enter the service.

Mr. PELLETIER. As I stated a moment ago, I would not have allowed the provision for a qualifying examination to remain at all, if I did not expect that this question will be dealt with before long, and that provision will be made for an examination calculated to demonstrate the fitness of candidates for positions they seek to fill and the work they are expected to perform. It seems to me that is the whole question in a nutshell.

Mr. NESBITT. That is the idea.

Mr. PELLETIER. Why put questions about irrelevant matters to a man who is going to sort letters or to become a railway mail clerk? I am strongly of opinion that the preliminary examination is all that is necessary to test the capacity of a man seeking to become a railway mail clerk. We must not advance too rapidly along the path of progress; this is the first instalment. I shall come with other instalments if the present law affecting all the departments is not amended. I shall take care of my own railway mail clerks and my own employees in such a way that they will be able to perform their duties efficiently, and that ridiculous questions shall not be put to them. As far as railway mail clerks are concerned if, having had the opportunity of taking two examinations in one year, they are not able to pass one such examination, they are not qualified to be railway mail clerks, because that examination is not a difficult one, but it proves whether they have the requisite knowledge to fill the office.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I hope the minister does not contemplate the abolishing all tests of educational accomplishments. I do not think you could fairly restrict the examination to what are the routine and practical duties of the railway mail clerk. There must be some educational standard that a man must reach before he can be appointed.

Mr. PELLETIER. There is no question about that.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I agree with the minister that in the past the papers set for candidates entering this particular branch of the service have been unduly severe. At the same time I trust he will maintain an educational standard of some kind.

Mr. PELLETIER. Certainly. What I meant was that the examination to be undergone should bear some relation to the work which the candidate has to perform. Of course the educational attainments must bear some relation to the work. However, it is not necessary for a sorter or stamper in the post office to possess the same degree of education as a man whose duties would require him to engage in correspondence and write letters in proper language. There should be some sort of a sliding scale by which the examinations will be based on the importance of the work the man is going to do. That will be one of the difficulties in extending the control of the Civil Service Commission to the outside service. A proper sense of proportion must be maintained in order to make the idea practicable, but I hope that we will be able to realize the object which the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and I think everybody in this House, has in view.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is no question but that some years ago people were quite satisfied with small salaries in these positions. But to-day, at least so far as this department is concerned, employees are required to pass an examination before promotion.

I quite agree with the Postmaster General that the standard of educational test should be reduced. What is the use of asking a young man who seeks to enter the railway mail service, questions on the history of Greece or Rome, questions involving knowledge of Greek or Latin? I see it stated here, for instance, that those who pass the examinations of the Royal Military College or of any university in Canada are accepted without examination. But such men are of too high a standard to seek entrance to the railway mail service. It is not that I wish to minimize the status of the railway mail clerk, but we must recognize facts. The man who acts as railway mail clerk between Montreal and Quebec, for instance, needs to be a good stamper and sorter, he needs to know the geography and topography of this section of the country, and of the country generally; it would be an advantage if he knows both languages, and he must read and write well. But the test of the university examination is too high for this position. If the Postmaster General wishes to find enough of the right men for this service he will have to lower the standard of the examination. At present he is obliged to violate the law—to overstep it, as he says—because men who can qualify under the present standard of examinations will not accept a position of $500 a year. My hon. friend from North York (Mr. Armstrong), raises objection to the legislation I introduced last year providing for an increase of $100 a year for mail clerks until they reach $800, and $50 a year after that until they reach $1,200. Well, Mr. Chairman, any employer of labour will find that it is when the young employee is on the lower rungs of the ladder that he needs help. Men enter this service usually at the age of twenty or twenty one, or it may be twenty-five or even thirty. Most of them are not married. Well, at twenty-five, it is about time a man should think of being married. And so it is in these earlier years of his service that he needs help, and I think this increase of $100 until $800 is reached is quite reasonable. I do not object, in view of the high cost of living, to an increase of $100 until he reaches $1,200? What I say is that it is at the beginning of his career that he must be helped. It is to be noted also that he does not receive the $100 increase unless he passes certain examinations every year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). What kind of examinations?

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are called case examinations. Every year an inspector goes through the various offices and cars and subjects the railway mail clerks to examination in order to see that they are well trained, and that they maintain their efficiency. But I quite agree with the Postmaster General, and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr .Macdonald) that the educational test for the railway mail clerk is too high. Why, with all due respect to the railway mail clerks, who are good officials and good men—we have heard in this House to-day the maiden speech of a gentleman who tells us that he began life as a railway mail clerk, an excellent speech, indicating that the hon. gentleman will be quite an addition to this House, but I am sure that he will also admit what I say—it is lowering the standard of university and Royal Military College examinations to say that one who has passed those examinations may be admitted to the service.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Are the examinations which these men must pass the qualifying or the preliminary?

Mr. PELLETIER. Both. That is what I would call the absurdity of the present law. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) knows that we cannot keep up our staff of railway mail clerks strictly under the law. We have to take them on here and there under any name, 'labourers' for instance. Once we have engaged them, we take them into the service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In my time railway mail clerks west of Lake Superior were entitled to an additional fifteen per cent on their salaries as a special allowance, because of the greater cost of living in the west. I suppose that is being maintained under this legislation?

Mr. PELLETIER. All through this legislation, we have to take care of the extra cost of living in the west, which is admitted on all hands.

Mr. SHEPHERD. Is a knowledge of French necessary to qualify a railway mail clerk in the west?

Mr. PELLETIER. If we exacted that in all cases, we could not find employees. We have to strain a point; we have to be liberal. In principle it is all right, but in practice, we have to do the best we can. In the west we have great difficulty in finding people to enter the service. In the east, on the contrary, men are anxious to enter. We must constantly send people from the east to the west to maintain our staff there. The cost of living in the west, as is well known, is very high; also the people there seem to make more money than they do here—in spite of the many complaints we hear in the House about losses suffered, everybody seems to be prosperous in the west. I hope that this Bill will enable us to find in the west men who are to work in the west.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that the Postmaster General is not obliged to demand of a candidate that he shall be qualified in both languages. Of course, it is of great advantage to a man to have both languages. But the examinations, by law and the constitution of the country, may be passed in either language. If a candidate goes before the Civil Service Commission for the inside service, he may pass the examination in either French or English. But in this country no man has the same chance of succeeding, unless he speaks, writes and understands both languages. I cannot repeat too often to my English-speaking friends—and I say it with all candour—that the young French Canadian who speaks, writes and understands English as well as French, has two or three chances to one as against his young English-speaking competitor who has command of only one language. Besides in travelling all over the world my hon. friend will find that it is very important to know French.

Mr. NESBITT. I was going to object to that clause making an exception of the Royal Military College and universities, only that the Postmaster General says he is going to look into the question. The people in Ontario think that anybody who has passed through the military college and the universities is good enough for any place in the gift of this government, and surely their certificates are quite good enough to qualify a student for almost any business position in this country.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). I think the minister should, at an early date, revise this whole system of examination. So much has been said as to what are the real duties of railway mail clerks, that one need not go over it again. At present the Civil Service Commission, under the head of 'History,' puts such questions as these to applicants:

What do we owe to the following:—Magna Charta, Habeas Corpus, Wilberforce, and Florence Nightingale—

Who was Jeanne Darc (Joan of Arc)?

What was the Reign of Terror in France? What brought it about? Name the leading men who figured in it.

Sketch the career of William Lyon Mackenzie in the rebellion of 1837.

Fancy asking a young man going into the railway mail service such questions as these. If they were asked something about the career of William Lyon Mackenzie King, it might have been reasonable. Then here is another lot:

Give the plural of poet-laureate, crisis, madam, sheep and buffalo.

What I think should be required of a mail clerk is that he should be a fairly good writer, be able to do easy sums in arithmetic, and particularly be conversant with the geography of this country, of all the provinces in the Dominion; and to have more than a superficial knowledge of the geography of the United States. So far as European countries are concerned, the mail matter as a rule will go over direct to London, and there be sorted out. I hope the minister will cut out these examinations.

On subsection 6,

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the meaning of that word 'university'? Will that cover our classical colleges?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think in Quebec there are 17 or 18 classical colleges affiliated to Laval University, and students who have completed their full course receive degrees, some the degree of Master of Arts, and others the degree of Bachelor of Arts. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if the word 'university' will include such colleges?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the minister what is the regulation by which the mileage apportioned to railway mail clerks is governed, that is, is there any uniformity in the mileage? There are perhaps five or six hundred clerks, and there must be great difference in the length of the routes. Is there any attempt at uniformity in the length of the routes, and the number of miles which each clerk has to travel? Otherwise, I can see that there might be some injustice in the payment of mileage. For instance, a man starting from Halifax and running to Montreal, would have a very long mileage; and I understand it is the same clerk or the same set of clerks who run up to Montreal, and turn to come back the next day. They would have a very long mileage, and consequently a very large pay; whereas a clerk running out of Halifax to Yarmouth, for instance, would have a short run, and short pay. Then again, the run from Halifax to Sydney is comparatively short, as compared with that from Halifax to Montreal. Is there some way by which the clerks are shifted about so that they may be treated with equality in the length of their runs and in the consequent amount of their payment? There are complaints in the service on this ground, possibly they have not reached the ears of the minister—complaints against superintendents, because—I would not like to say it—they put their favourites on good routes, and men who are not their favourites, on poor routes. I would like to see this work put on some basis, put under some independent supervision, so that all mail clerks should be treated on a par, so far as mileage and payment is concerned.

Mr. PELLETIER. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is quite right. I may say that I have not, during the short time I have been at the head of the department, heard of any complaints in that respect. The hon. gentleman says there are complaints; if so, they have not reached the head of the department. If any complaints come to my knowledge, they shall be dealt with in such a manner that all shall be treated fairly and justly. Of course the department has to trust the railway mail superintendents, they are supposed to give each man a fair share of the mileage. I may say—so that it may go down on 'Hansard'—that it will be the aim of the department to treat all the railway mail clerks justly and fairly, so that each member of the staff shall receive a fair proportion of the mileage, and of the payment therefor. If any complaints are made to the head of the department they shall be heard. As a rule, I understand that the railway mail superintendents are doing this business in a fair manner. Of course there may be some difficulty in respect to long distances as compared with shorter runs. For instance, between Montreal and Ottawa, a railway mail clerk may travel as far as Vankleek Hill, and then double back to Montreal, and be with his family the same evening. Such arrangements exist in a certain number of cases. Others would prefer to go all the way from Montreal to Ottawa or vice versa. I understand that as far as is consistent with the interests of the service, the wishes of the clerks are taken into consideration by the superintendent. If complaints of the kind referred to reach me, I shall see that justice is done.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). The inside service at Ottawa stands on a different basis from the railway mail clerks. Railway mail clerks are, of necessity, all males, while in the inside service in Ottawa a lot of young women are employed. It is all very well to go wild on civil service examinations, but there must be limits. Whoever heard of a large steamship company with a line of ocean steamers asking for a competitive examination before appointing a captain? They select men according to their fitness. I know of no reason why a young man passing the ordinary preliminary examination, and in accord with the government of the day should not have preference in appointment. It is all very well for the hon. members for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), those twin darlings of buncombe on all occasions, who stand up and claim entrance to the service for Grit and Tory alike. They have been singularly quiet on that subject for the last 15 years. It may be that they are now fatigued by their efforts, and worn out by the work they have done for their friends, they now want them to be admitted to office by competitive examination. I want to place myself on record as being opposed to the appointment by the commission of railway mail clerks.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have not only advocated equality in the appointment of civil servants, but we introduced legislation to provide for it and in the inside service all parties have an equal chance, irrespective of politics. I ask my hon. friend if he does not think that in this way you secure a better service than by making selections from one party only. Is he of opinion that, after all, the appointment of a man in the outside service, a customs officer, or an excise man, or a letter carrier is of great political assistance to a member? There is an old adage in our province that when you appoint a man he becomes ungrateful, and you make 99 other people dissatisfied. Let it be under one commission, and let applications come from all parts and all sections of the community. Let the civil service be a national institution, not an institution in the hands of one party; let it be for the whole country.

Mr. MACDONALD. Do I understand that this amendment gives a minister power to make permanent those temporary clerks now in the service no matter what their age may be?

Mr. PELLETIER. Irrespective of age, the age limit is struck out, I think it is ridiculous.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is the rumour true which I heard in Montreal, that the old railway mail clerks who have attained the maximum of their salary, and are entitled to their superannuation, will get a superannuation equal to their salary?

Mr. PELLETIER. I have never considered this question at all, it has never been presented to me.

Bill reported, read a third time and passed.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 76) to amend the National Transcontinental Railway Act—Mr. Cochrane.

Mr. KYTE. When this Bill was under consideration on Thursday there was some criticism by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the cost of the railway, and they insinuated that it was owing to improper wastefulness and want of capacity on the part of the commissioners that it was costing so large an amount. The statement presented by the Minister of Railways shows that the total amount chargeable to capital account is $187,781,128. That is the total amount which will be chargeable when the road is completed. Of that amount the total liability of the government is the interest on the actual expenditure of $187,781,128 for 7 years, which comes to $39,434,031. Then there is an estimate for betterments to the road during the 7 years it is operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific without interest of $7,884,840, and the interest on this is estimated at $900,000, making a total of $48,218,871. I am not quite sure how the Minister of Railways and Canals comes to place the amount to be thus spent for betterments, but I presume that he has some reason for doing so. I should think that amount of betterments, $7,884,840, ought to be charged to capital account as is the case with other railways, or, if it is intended as the loss on the operation for seven years it should be charged to the government.

Mr. COCHRANE. Under the agreement the betterment must be made by the government for fifty years.

Mr. KYTE. With that explanation I repeat that the total amount of liability imposed upon the government in respect to the construction of the present Transcontinental railway will be $48,218,871. That is of course assuming that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company will continue to operate the road after the period of seven years and pay the interest they are obliged to pay under the agreement. The statement made by the Minister of Railways included a charge for interest for the first three years after the road is taken over by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and assuming that there is not sufficient earned by the road during these three years to pay this interest, it would be chargeable to capital account, it, therefore, cannot fairly be stated that that would increase the liability of the government in respect to the expenses of building the railway. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) stated that figuring on the statement submitted to the committee by the Minister of Railways, $60,000,000 interest is going to be paid out by the country in connection with the road, instead of the $13,000,000 which we were told would be the cost by the then Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Finance Minister, Mr. Fielding. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) then estimates that the total liability for interest of the country in respect to the construction of this railway will be $60,000,000, and I venture to say that there is no hon. gentleman who will be disposed to believe that the hon. member (Mr. Ames) is in any way disposed to reduce the amount of liability which the country will be under in this respect. Now, $60,000,000 is not a very considerable amount of money when we take into consideration the immensity of the project, when nine years ago the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier undertook the construction of this railway. It is true that the cost of this road to the country will exceed the estimate.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Is the hon. gentleman sure that the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) mentioned $60,000,000 as the cost of the construction of this road?

Mr. KYTE. No. He stated that that amount would have to be paid by the government for interest in respect of this undertaking. The government is not paying for the cost of the road as I understand. The Grand Trunk Pacific are ultimately to pay the cost of the road, either by actually purchasing it or by paying a rental which is estimated to amount to three per cent. on the actual cost.

Mr. REID (Grenville). At what page of 'Hansard' will I find the statement made by Mr. Ames?

Mr. KYTE. At pages 3197-98. It has been asserted time and again that when the Bill was first before parliament, Mr. Fielding, then Finance Minister, stated that in his judgment the total amount for interest chargeable to the government would be $13,000,000. I have heard that alleged statement denied by Mr. Fielding on the floor of the House, and I know that on a subsequent occasion the statement was made that $51,000,000 would cover the liability for interest incurred by the government in respect of the construction of this railway. Therefore, the amount of interest estimated by the late Minister of Finance and the amount which the hon. member (Mr. Ames) says the government will be liable for, do not disagree very much, there being a difference of $9,000,000 in the estimates of the two hon. gentlemen. Now, in the construction of every great undertaking it is not an uncommon thing that the actual expenditure should exceed the estimates. During the last forty years nearly every public work constructed by the government of this country has cost more money than it was estimated it would cost. In the construction of these very parliament buildings which was undertaken by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in 1869, it was estimated that they would cost $2,000,000, but when the buildings were completed it was found that they had cost $9,000,000, a difference of $7,000,000 above the estimate. In the case of the construction of the Panama canal, which was undertaken by the United States government, the actual experience of the work has proven that the estimate of the cost will be exceeded by an immense sum. I think the first estimate of the cost of the Panama canal by the officials who were charged to prepare that estimate, was $100,000,000 but, as an actual fact, the canal will cost $325,000,000 before the work is completed. There are reasons why the expenditure on the Transcontinental railway has largely exceeded the estimate, quite apart from any suggestion that there was want of capacity on the part of the Transcontinental Railway Commission. Take, for instance, that section of the railway betwen Moncton and Chipman; I understand that in the original specifications drawn by the engineers in charge of the work it was stated that for the first fifty miles west of Moncton there was no rock, and that common earth excavation would be the material met with, but, when they came to build the road it was found that this first fifty miles west of Moncton was almost exclusively solid rock. That mistake would seem to reflect to some extent upon the capacity of the engineers who were entrusted with the preparation of the specification in respect to that section. I suppose they could have made a more correct estimate of the cost of construction if they had gone to the expense of sinking test pits, from Moncton to Winnipeg. They would then be in a position to state with greater accuracy what was the nature of the excavations which would have to be done. But, after having sunk these test pits, which would have cost millions of dollars, how much better off would the country be in respect of the knowledge thereby gained? If those who are disposed to criticise the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners are able to prove that they have been guilty of any incapacity or want of integrity in relation to the work which had been entrusted to them, then, of course, it would be a most serious reflection upon them.

But the reason why the cost of the eastern section exceeded the estimate, was because, instead of common excavation, there was solid rock. If test pits had been made in order to enable the engineers to make an absolutely correct report upon the conditions, the country would not have benefited to the extent of a dollar, but rather would have lost the cost of making these test pits. Whatever the nature of the excavation was, it had to be done once the construction of the Transcontinental railway was entered upon, by virtue of legislation, empowering the government to carry on that work. I am going to cite another case—the construction of the railway in the neighbourhood of La Tuque. I understand that when the specifications for that section were being prepared, the engineers thought that owing to the greatly increased cost of constructing the road with a grade of 4-10ths of one per cent., a grade of 1 per cent. might be reasonably satisfactory in that locality. The Grand Trunk Pacific company, however, insisted upon the 4-10ths grade being adhered to, and the consequence was, that a change from 1 per cent. to 4-10ths of 1 per cent. in the neighbourhod of La Tuque, for the distance of a mile, added to the cost of the Transcontinental railway to the extent of $1,250,000.

Mr. COCHRANE. Does the hon. gentleman state that there is a 4-10ths grade between Moncton and Quebec?

Mr. KYTE. With the exception of a couple of pusher grades, I believe it is a 4-10ths grade. Now, the National Transcontinental railway is not the first great railway undertaken in this country. Some 30 years ago, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company undertook to build a railway across the continent. This is a company which was organized for the purpose of building the railway as a private undertaking; and, except for the grants of money and land and other concessions made to the company by the then Conservative government, the obligation to finance the scheme, was entirely in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company itself. That company received from the late Conservative government: in cash, $25,000,000; in railways completed and uncompleted, $65,000,000; and 25,000,000 acres of land, estimated to be worth $144,216,624; a total of $234,216,624 to assist them in carrying out their undertaking. Now, that is an enormous sum of money for the government of this country 30 years ago to bestow upon a company which only undertook to do in respect of a transcontinental railway system that which was undertaken by the government led by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, a few years ago. Of that sum, which the late Conservative government contributed to assist the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, not one dollar came back to the people of this country, and the government does not to-day receive one dollar of interest from that expenditure. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who criticise with such unmeasured language, the extravagance of the late Liberal government in carrying on the construction of the Transcontinental railway, have strongly commended the wisdom and the statesmanship of the government led by the late Sir John A. Macdonald in making that contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Therefore, if the sum of $234,216,624 was only a reasonable assistance to give to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at a time when labour was cheap, when supplies were cheap, when the cost of living was very much less than it is to-day, I fail to see why these hon. gentlemen should criticise and condemn the late Liberal government for contributing $60,000,000 towards the construction of another transcontinental railway, which, in the judgment of all the people in Canada is absolutely necessary to keep up with the present development of this country. In the statement which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals presented to the House the other night, he said that the Transcontinental railway had cost up to the present $113,853,300, and that it is estimated that to complete the road it will be necessary to spend $57,872,700 more. Now, according to the statements which have been submitted to the House from time to time, it is estimated that two-thirds of the whole undertaking is completed at the present time. Therefore, only one-third of the work remains to be done; and, if the figures submitted by the minister are correct, it would appear that it is going to cost the country nearly $1,000,000 more proportionately to complete the one-third of the road than it cost to complete the two-thirds that is now finished.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. gentleman does not mean that to be a fair statement, because he knows that the most expensive part of any road is the terminals and the right of way, which in this case are not yet paid for.

Mr. KYTE. The cost of the land for terminals is largely included in the amount thus far expended, as stated by the Minister of Railways the other evening.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. gentleman cannot prove that statement. He made the statement, as I understood him, that the right of way has been paid for. Now, let him prove that.

Mr. KYTE. I am stating that two-thirds of the road has been completed up to the present time, that one-third of it remains to be completed, and that this one-third, according to the figures submitted by the hon. minister, will cost proportionately $1,000,000 more than the two-thirds of the road now completed. Therefore, notwithstanding the excuse given by hon. gentlemen opposite for terminating the services of the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners that owing to their incapacity and want of experience they allowed the road to cost too much, the future work to be done under the management of Mr. Leonard, the present chairman of the board, notwithstanding the contention that this change is made on the ground of economy, the one-third of the road still to be done will cost $1,000,000 more in proportion than what has been thus far completed.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the argument that this change is to be made in the interest of economy and in order to keep down the cost of the Transcontinental railway, in so far as it is not completed at the present time is scarcely borne out by the facts. Another criticism directed against the board is that they are not railway builders. Hon. gentlemen supporting the present government have questioned the wisdom of the late Premier because, in selecting the members of the Transcontinental Commission he failed to choose men with proper qualifications. It was suggested that instead of merchants, lawyers and business men generally, the right hon. gentleman should have chosen engineers to carry on this undertaking. I have before me the list of the first directors of the Canadian Pacific railway who were entrusted with carrying out the construction of that undertaking some thirty years ago, and in that list I fail to find the name of a single engineer whose judgment and experience seemed to be necessary in order to assist the directors in executing their task in the most business-like and most economical manner. The following are the gentlemen to whom I allude:

George Stephen, Montreal, merchant; Duncan McIntyre, Montreal, merchant; John S. Kennedy, New York, banker; R. B. Angus, St. Paul, Esquire; James J. Hill, St. Paul, Esquire; Henry Stafford Northcote, London, Esquire; Pascal Dr. P. Grenfell, London, merchant; Charles Day Rose, London, merchant; Baron J. de Reinach, Paris, banker.

Now there is not a single engineer in the whole of that list of the original directors of the Canadian Pacific railway. They were business men, they were merchants and bankers, they were men who were accustomed to do business according to the methods in which business was understood in those days but they had had no experience in railway building. When they required technical knowledge or technical assistance, they went to engineers whose services they engaged for that particular purpose. Therefore, the wisdom of the late government is not to be questioned because they did not appoint engineers on the board of the Transcontinental Railway Commission. The Act which constituted that board gave them power to employ the services of engineers for the purposes of the undertaking and that is what was done. Now Mr. Leonard the present chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Board, attended a banquet in the city of Brantford on the 3rd of January last and in responding to a toast there took occasion to refer to the character of the work of the Transcontinental railway that was done by the present commission. Sir, when I hear hon. gentlemen criticising the manner in which this railway has been built, the manner in which the work was carried on, I am inclined to think that Mr. Leonard's speech at the banquet in question is a very excellent reply. Mr. Leonard says:

What the cost will be to complete the road to Moncton is hard to say, but it is now nearly all under construction, all but 400 to 500 miles between Cochrane and Winnipeg. The Quebec bridge which, when finished, will be the largest bridge in the world, will take 48,000 tons of steel, and will take five or six years to build. Going east our line runs at about 4-10 grade, and an engine will haul 1,600 tons, whereas on other roads where a 1 per cent grade exists, 800 is all that can be hauled.

'The Transcontinental,' he declared, 'is being built in the best and most durable manner known. It is also of great military advantage, giving Canada an unlimited width, in spite of the millions that will be spent in its construction.

The National Transcontinental is a national asset, not a burden to the people of Canada. Our enormous grain and mineral wealth goes to show what a truly wonderful country we have, and we should all do our best to make it a strong link in the empire's chain.

Mr. Chairman, that is a certificate of which both the Transcontinental Railway Commission and the late government might very justly be proud. Mr. Leonard has referred to the character of the work that was carried on, and the excellent character of the railway in respect to its carrying capacity as compared with other railways. I need not remind you, Mr. Chairman, that an enormous proportion of the cost incurred in the construction of this railway was due to the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the government of Canada as well, came to the conclusion that they should have a better railway than any transcontinental line existing at the present time. They desire a railway whose carrying capacity will exceed that of any railway at present engaged in transporting the products of western Canada to the maritime provinces and vice versa. In order to do that it was necessary to build a very much more expensive road, but they were amply justified in expending the additional amount of money when we take into account the enormous saving in operating expenses pointed out by Mr. Leonard as compared with similar expenses on the other transcontinental railways. I think that in discussing the liability of the late government and the responsibility of the present commission for the large amount of money which this railway has cost, we must not fail to take into account the circumstance that the whole liability imposed upon the government in regard to the construction of this road, not including the Quebec bridge, is $60,000,000 if we take the statement of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). Compared with that there is the sum of $234,216,224 incurred by the government of Canada and the people of this country for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway. When the transcontinental line is completed it will yield a revenue to the government of Canada equal to three per cent on every dollar that it cost in its construction, and in default of the payment of that rental by the Grand Trunk Pacific it will become the property of the people, whereas the Canadian Pacific railway upon which this large amount of public money was spent in the form of subsidies and subventions which I have referred to, yields not one dollar of interest to the people of Canada, but the whole advantage of this enormous expense has accrued to a private corporation. I have no reflection to make upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but if it was wisdom on the part of the late Conservative government to assist the Canadian Pacific railway to the extent they did from the public funds, surely it does not indicate a lack of statesmanship for the late Liberal government to build another transcontinental railway at a cost of little more than one fourth of the amount which the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway entailed on the people of Canada.

Mr. EMMERSON. It seems to me that this matter has not so far received the consideration which should be given to an important question of this kind.

This matter is not to be regarded from a sectional standpoint but from the standpoint of the whole Dominion. I believe that the people of this Dominion approve of the form of organization under which this great national work was undertaken and under which it has been so efficiently carried on, and that sufficient reasons have not been given for the change that is proposed.

Mr. NESBITT. The other day, when we were discussing the reduction of the number of these commissioners, my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) spoke of the cost of building the Transcontinental railway, and gave that as the reason why these commissioners should be removed from office. I was a little surprised to hear him take up the case in the way he did. It seemed to me a partisan discussion, and I am always surprised to hear a business man discuss a business question from a partisan standpoint.

Mr. COCHRANE. I was asked for a statement, and I gave it. That's all.

Mr. NESBITT. I was not speaking of the minister (Mr. Cochrane), but of the hon. member for St. Antoine. I have no fault to find with the statement of the minister. We asked him for facts, and he gave them. At least, I assume that——

Mr. COCHRANE. They were on the authority of your own engineer.

Mr. NESBITT. Quite so. I have no fault to find with the statement of the hon. minister, but I was surprised, as I have said, at the hon. member for St. Antoine discussing this from a partisan standpoint. Now, I do not pretend to know much about the building of railways, but I have asked many people who do know about the building of railways, as to the quality of this railway which is now approaching completion, and I have been told by one and all who have seen the road that it is finished in a first class manner. We all know that it is quite the custom for railways in this country and in the United States to be built at first in a temporary manner—first get the rails down in any old way, and then go on and finish up the road. Those of us who have read the evidence before the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States on the question of freight rates, know that the capital expenditure on the transcontental railways in the United States has been enormous—I believe quite as much as stated by my hon. friend from St. Antoine when he said that this road would cost $130,000 a mile. I believe there is not a road through a similar country in the United States which has been built and put in reasonably permanent condition at a less cost than $130,000 a mile. I believe also that if the road is finished in the way capable men say that it is being finished at a cost of $130,000 a mile it is a reasonable figure, considering the portion of country through which it runs and the vast necessary expense, in getting in supplies. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was attacked the other day on the ground that this railway went through the section of country that it does. I believe that in a very short time it will be proven that this was one of the wisest steps that could possibly have been taken in the interest of the country at large. This is one of the sections of the country of which we knew little. It will open up a new region and will practically extend the boundaries of this country very largely. I believe that when the road is running you will find that it will pay from the first day so far as traffic is concerned. Local traffic will probably develop in that country never dreamed of, possibly, by the people of Ontario, before this road went through. I repeat but with all due deference to my hon. friend that I believe the road will pay from the time it is built. Also I think most emphatically that considering, as I said, the country through which it is built, it will be found on investigation, and a commission has been appointed to investigate—that the road has cost no more than it should have cost in view of the difficulties that had to be overcome in construction. And I, for one would not vote to-day to have it built in any other way so far as thoroughness is concerned, nor would I vote to have it built through a different section of country. It has been argued here that it should have been built to North Bay, and then via the old Northern to Toronto and by a connection to Montreal. Nobody would think of carrying heavy freight that way.

However, it may be said that this has nothing to do with the question before us. As to the commissioners, I believe in the old adage 'two heads are better than one, even if one is a cabbage head.' I believe that the probabilities are that for the remainder of this undertaking it would be better to leave the commission as it is. But the minister has seen fit to do otherwise. If he can save the expense of the extra commissioners and do the work as well, that will be all right. I do not know the head of the commission. They say he is a capable man. He would need to be a capable man to be as good as four other men. For my part, I am a great believer in a number of counsellors where great undertakings are to be considered.

At six o'clock, the committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NESBITT. When the committee rose at six o'clock I was saying that so far as I was personally concerned, I would rather trust the construction of this road to three commissioners than to one. But if the minister continues that work with one commissioner and does it as well, he will be entitled to credit for the amount saved. I would like to point out with reference to the expense that the Grand Trunk engineer had to be consulted on each of these contracts before they were let. I recognize that there was a dispute between the government engineer and the Grand Trunk engineer as to some of the classifications, but the amount was infinitesimal in proportion to the total amount expended. I would like to point out also that I think it is unfair for any hon. member to attack the expenditure without taking into consideration the quality of the work done. We all know that a man could build a warehouse 60 feet x 100 feet by using galvanized sheets of iron and rough lumber for between $2,500 and $3,000; by improving the quality of the material, he could put up a building worth $5,000 or $6,000; and by using first class material all through he could put up a building worth from $15,000 to $20,000. I think any business man would agree that the latter one would be the cheapest in the end.

There is another thing I would like to point out, and that is the marvellous prosperity of the country which enabled the government to make this expenditure, as shown the other day by the Minister of Railways of Canada, with so little increase of the public debt. I am sure that the late government could not be accused of egotism if they took credit to themselves for at least some portion of that prosperity which enabled the country to bear that expenditure, without increasing the debt any more than it was increased. But the greatest fault I have to find with the attack made by hon. gentlemen opposite on the expenditure for this road is that they do not take into consideration the quality of the work. For my part, I do not know whether the road has been built in the way that has been stated by men who are competent to judge, but if it has been so built, I think it is time to withhold criticism until we know what the road is capable of doing after it is completed.

Mr. BLAIN. I think my hon. friend has missed the point. The point as I understood it, that was that the late government promised a first class road for the amount that they placed before parliament as the expense for the construction of that road, and now that amount has been exceeded. That is the criticism.

Mr. NESBITT. That is not the criticism as I understood it However, if my hon. friend so understood it, that is his privilege. I understood that the attack was made on the enormous expenditure that had taken place. I have no fault to find with the estimate made the other day by the Minister of Railways and Canals; but we must remember that the road is going to be one of the very highest quality. It is also to be remembered that the portion remaining to be constructed will not necessarily be as costly as that part already constructed, because it will not cost so much to get supplies into the part of the road to be constructed. Wages also are not likely to increase in the same proportion as they have done since this road was commenced. So I say on the whole that it is absolutely unfair to judge of the expenditure on that work unless we take into account the quality of the work done.

Mr. KEMP. Our present opposition, it appears to me, are in somewhat of an apologetic mood about something. What is that something if it is not the tremendous cost in excess of the estimates that were placed before this House in 1903 in regard to this National Transcontinental railway. Those of us who were in the House in 1903 remember clearly what was said about it at that time. I have before me a document which hon. members opposite will likely recognize: it is a speech of the right hon. the leader of the opposition who was then Prime Minister, and I wish to read one or two extracts from that speech to show what he said about it at that time, and he said it so well, in the opinion of his followers, that they thought it wise to make a campaign sheet of it, and it was spread broadcast throughout the country in the election campaign subsequent to the session of 1904. Let me read a few words which fell from the lips of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition to-day, in respect to the cost of the National Transcontinental railway.

> So that here again the whole of the liability which is incurred by the government for the building of that section from Moncton to Winnipeg is simply seven years of interest. The sum total of the money to be paid by the government for the construction of that line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific Ocean will be in the neighborhood of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, and not a cent more.

I have never heard the right hon. gentleman explain clearly what he meant by those words, and I have never heard any one of his followers since explain to us what he meant when he made that statement.

We know that he could not have meant that the road would cost $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, that it was an interest charge to which he referred. But we have an estimate from the Minister of Finance of that day, Mr. Fielding, in respect to the cost of this National Transcontinental railway, and I shall take the figures which Mr. Fielding gave us at that time as being the figures which the late government authorized. The figures which Mr. Fielding gave us in the year 1903, in debate in this House were these: The railway from Moncton to Winnipeg would cost $54,609,000, made up in this way, from Winnipeg to Quebec at $28,000 a mile, $41,300,000; from Quebec to Moncton at $25,000 per mile, $10,000,000, a total of $51,300,000. He added to that a certain amount of interest which brought his estimate up to $54,609,000. In the following year, 1904, when the government came before parliament with a revised contract Mr. Fielding brought his estimate up to an average of something over $31,000 per mile, for this section of the National Transcontinental railway, and raised his total estimate to somewhere in the vicinity of $58,000,000. The government of that day went to the people of this country on these figures, and on the figures cited by Sir Wilfrid Laurier of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, and they received the endorsation of the people.

Now we have placed before us the figures which this road has cost up to date, and which it is likely to cost and I have no doubt these figures are correct. According to the figures given us by the hon. the Minister of Railways this part of the road will cost not $25,000 or $28,000, or $31,250, as Mr. Fielding estimated in 1904, but $130,800 per mile; not a total of $54,609,000 as Mr. Fielding estimated in this House, but of $236,000,000. These things should be considered by hon. gentlemen opposite when they are discussing this subject, and I am not surprised to find them in an apologetic mood in regard to this expenditure. I look upon the construction of the National Transcontinental railway as one of the worst bungles of the late government, and it seems to me that the present government were amply justified in adopting another system of management of that great undertaking and changing the commission under whose direction this tremendous expenditure has been made.

What was the object in building this road? In 1900, 1901 and 1902, there was an agitation in this country in respect to getting the crops transported from the west to the seaboard, and to the markets of the world, and there was a desire on the part of the government of that day, as there is on the part of the government of this day, to facilitate in every way the transportation of the crops of the northwest to the markets of the world. In 1902 the Grand Trunk people made an application to the late government in writing, and that document was laid on the table of this House in due course. It was an application for permission to build a road connecting with the Grand Trunk system at North Bay, Ontario, into the wheatfields of the northwest. They asked certain concessions from the government of the day, concessions which would, in my estimation, be very unimportant as compared with the tremendous cost of this railroad as we have it before us to-day. The right hon. gentleman who led the government of that day made some statements with regard to the necessity of doing something in order to alleviate the conditions existing in the northwest. On July 30, 1903, he said in this House:

> We consider that it is the duty of all those who sit within these walls by the will of the people, to provide immediate means whereby the products of those new settlers may find an exit to the ocean at the least possible cost, and whereby, likewise, a market may be found in this new region for those who toil in the forests, in the fields, in the mines, in the shops of the older provinces. Such is our duty; it is immediate and imperative. . .
> To those who urge upon us the policy of to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow; to those who tell us, Wait, wait, wait; to those who advise us to pause, to consider, to reflect, to calculate and to inquire, our answer is: No, this is not a time for deliberation, this is a time for action. The flood tide is upon us that leads on to fortune; if we let it pass it may never recur again. If we let it pass, the voyage of our national life, bright as it is to-day, will be bound in shallows. We cannot wait, because time does not wait.

Here was the situation in 1903, and I must say that the situation is not improved to-day. What has happened? The Laurier government, instead of pursuing a business-like policy in regard to the building of this railway, delayed its construction in every possible way so that in 1912, nine years later, the people of the west have no better facilities for getting out their crops than they had in 1903. But what is more serious to my mind is that instead of the late government proceeding to complete that railroad from Winnipeg to Cochrane Junction where it connects with the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway which connects with the Grand Trunk system at North Bay, in order that these crops might be transported from the west and the people of the west might have relief as was forecasted by the statement of the Prime Minister of that day, what has happened? The government have completed the railway from Quebec to Moncton but it may be three years before they are able to make connection between Winnipeg and Cochrane Junction, to connect with the Grand Trunk system in order that the crops may be brought out.

Thus there are two main grounds of complaint against the late government in connection with the building of this railway, first, the great extravagance which has been permitted in its construction and, second, the unreasonable delay in the construction of that part of the road which would afford much needed relief to the people of the northwest.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is quite evident that the hon. member (Mr. Kemp), who is a sort of fo'castle member of the administration is somewhat behind the times owing to the fact that he was not here in the last parliament. The hon. gentleman does not seem, judging from his utterances, to realize the responsibility that rests upon him as a member of the government. He is worried over the fact that the government did not commence work at Lake Abitibi and branch off east and west, and he seems to have no idea about the conveniences required for getting in supplies and starting terminals and getting in the material necessary to carry on construction. He is such a great railway builder that he would not do anything that expert railway builders thought it wise to do. Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kemp), does not seem to be aware of the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway is in existence from Fort William to the city of Winnipeg, and that even to-day it brings the traffic of the west in touch with the other railway systems of the Dominion. The hon. member (Mr. Kemp), has followed the lead of the hon. member (Mr. Ames), in misrepresenting the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as saying, when he introduced the Bill, that $13,000,000 would be the amount of money the railway would cost this country. I am more surprised at the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Kemp), indulging in such misrepresentations than I am at the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), because we all remember that that latter gentleman a few years ago travelled all over the country with lantern slides and talking of the restitution that was to take place the moment the Conservative party came into power. Well, the lantern slide has been put in the garret and the hon. member (Mr. Ames), is not bothering himself about restitution. The chief occupation of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) now seems to be to act as a bellwether to the Nationalist portion of the gentlemen with whom he is sitting on the government benches, endeavouring to lead them into camp, and to keep them there until they get through the Manitoba school question and other such things, and then of course he won't care much about the Nationalists. The hon. member from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), has given up the lantern slide show, and he comes here to start an extraneous discussion on this Bill and to resurrect old stories which were shown to be baseless time and again in former parliaments, as to the supposed cost of the Transcontinental railway. Now, Sir Wilfrid Laurier never meant to say that the Transcontinental railway was only going to cost the country thirteen millions, and as a matter of fact he never did say so, but these gentlemen want to put such a false interpretation upon the words of the late Prime Minister.

Mr. BURNHAM. What interpretation did you put on these words?

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), is another gentleman who is sitting at the feet of the wrong Gamaliel. I set against their interpretation of the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the opinion of the hon. member from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), who has studied the matter long and laboriously and who, with all respect, knows more about the matter than most gentlemen sitting on the government benches. Here is what the hon. member for South Simcoe said in the last parliament:

> We, the members of the House understood that the Prime Minister did not mean that the total expenditure on the construction of the road would be $13,000,000; he intended to convey the proposition that the money that would be paid out and not received back was $13,000,000.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is not what your campaign literature said.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the hon. member from Manitoba (Mr. Bradbury) go back upon the statement of the man who was his leader in the past parliament in all matters connected with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway? The hon. member for South Simcoe has spent toilsome days and sleepless nights endeavouring to extract some campaign material for the benefit of his party out of the words of the former Prime Minister, and he was able to tell the House what the meaning of the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was and the hon. member from Manitoba (Mr. Bradbury) was not here in that parliament and he knows nothing about it. It is not common sense to suppose that the right hon. gentleman meant that the Transcontinental railway would be built for $13,000,000 because that would represent only $7,200 a mile, and everybody who knows anything, knows that it is impossible to build a single mile of railway anywhere in Canada for $7,200. Contemporaneously with the statement made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the estimate made not by Mr. Fielding, but by Mr. Schreiber, a gentleman of long experience, a gentleman who advised the Conservative government in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, and he estimated that the railway would cost $62,000,000. But the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Kemp) was not deceived as to the cost of the railway, because he, with his great engineering knowledge, made an estimate all his own, and he said that the railway would cost the country $73,000,000.

Mr. KEMP. Where is that in 'Hansard?'

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kemp) will find it in 'Hansard,' and it would be well for him to look over his old speeches and get some new ideas from them. The genial gentleman who represented Lennox and Addington in the past parliament estimated the cost at $114,000,000; the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) entered into the realm of speculation, and he was not worrying about the $13,000,000, for he calculated that it would cost $100,000,000.

Mr. BLAIN. That was a nearer estimate than yours.

Mr. MACDONALD. I had the good sense not to make any estimate; I wanted the railway built as soon as possible in the interests of the people of Canada, and I did not indulge in any guessing. A former Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) estimated the cost at $125,000,000; the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Porter) estimated the cost at $150,000,000, and the estimate of Mr. Speaker was $125,000,000. The hon member who then represented Prince, Prince Edward Island, told us that Sir Edmund Osler's estimate of the cost of the railway was $280,000,000.

His estimate was $280,000,000. Then, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was very careful about his estimate; he was not misled by the late Prime Minister at all; he was not misled even by Mr. Schrieber. I give him the credit of being too shrewd to tie himself down on the question. He said that it would cost anywhere from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000, because nobody could tell within $10,000,000 what it would cost if you were going to have a 4/10ths of 1 per cent grade. He knew that the cost was a great uncertainty. In the face of these facts, can any one say truthfully that anybody in this country was deceived as to the cost? Now, what did you suppose this railway was going to cost? It was to be built through a new country. The idea was to exploit that country, to open it up. Those of us who come from other provinces remember how in the province of Ontario, when it was proposed to build the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, even the optimists hesitated about engaging in an undertaking to build into the hinterland. Everybody knows the splendid results which have come from developing that northern country, stretching from Manitoba to the Atlantic ocean, the greater portion of Canada absolutely undeveloped simply because it had no railway communication. Every gentleman who sat in the House in 1903, whether on the right or the left side of the Speaker, knew that no surveys of any kind had been made before the project was floated. There were general reports of the possibilities of the country, but everybody knew that we were going to build this railway without a location survey. That being so, why do gentlemen of responsibility in this House, on the simple question whether for the best administration of this railway we should have one commissioner or three, talk about misrepresentation in regard to this matter, when everybody knew the situation? Are hon. gentlemen opposite such a set of children that they did not know anything about this matter? Did any of them look at the cost of railway construction elsewhere in 1903? Let me give you a few figures. In New South Wales the cost of railway construction is $64,000 a mile, in Germany $107,000, in France $126,000, in Italy $109,000, in Russia $83,000, in Austria $87,000, in Great Britain $272,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Including the right of way?

Mr. MACDONALD. Does not this estimate of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways include the cost of the right of way? In the United States the estimated cost is $58,000 a mile, with grades of from 1 to 2½ per cent and with only 67-pound rails. Then, what has been the cost of other railways in Canada? What was the cost of the Intercolonial railway per mile? Was it $7,000, as some hon. gentlemen say that the government in 1903 was representing that this railway was going to cost? Was it $30,000 a mile, the figure mentioned by the hon. member for East Toronto? Not at all. It was $63,000 a mile—right of way, too.

Mr. CURRIE. Will the hon. gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. No, I do not propose to answer any questions of my hon. friend from Simcoe. This committee know me well enough to know that I do not mind answering questions, and I have no personal objection to my hon. friend from Simcoe; but this question habit of his is becoming too much of a habit. We are told this railway is going to cost something like $130,000 per mile. Now, let us see just where we are. Mark you, Mr. Chairman, the expenditure which the late government were responsible for was the expenditure which was made down to the day they gave up their office. They are not responsible for the expenditure that hon. gentlemen opposite make. If the plans were wrong, change them; if the grades are too good and cost too much, if the curvatures which the late government desired to obtain cost too much, hon. gentlemen opposite can remedy that. It is in their power; it has been in their power ever since they came into office in October, and will be in their power until this railway is completed. Let us see what has been done. Taking my hon. friend's statement, we find that up to date 1,656 miles of main line track have been laid, and the cost has been $66,000 a mile. Grading has been done on 309 miles more. The situation, then, is that grading has been done and rails have been laid on 1,965 miles at a cost of $56,000 a mile. That is what the late government is responsible for, and every dollar that has been expended since that time and that will be expended in the future, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will be responsible for. He knows that the contracts which have been let are not contracts which bind the government to have the road built on any gradient. The contractors are paid so much a yard for the earth removed, and my hon. friend can send his engineers out to tell them to dispense with a grade of 4/10ths of 1 per cent, to dispense with the features which we had been providing for, and instead of putting in concrete and stone foundations to their bridges, to put in wooden structures; and instead of having iron bridges upon these structures, to dispense with them and put in wooden bridges and put the power in the hands of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to do it. And let me tell you that if from this hour the cost per mile of this railway exceeds the figures which I am giving to-night, the responsibility will rest upon the hon. gentleman whom he appointed. Let there be no mistake about that. My hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) laughs. He has a very curious idea about his position. I wonder what kind of a Minister of Railways he thinks he ought to be? I want to tell him that in what he undertakes he is responsible to the people of this country and to parliament who have to vote the expenditure every year. When the hon. minister comes here and asks us to vote money he is responsible for the expenditure, and I say again if from this moment in the construction of the balance of this railway the expenditure of the past of the late commission is exceeded in any way, the hon. gentleman will be responsible for it.

Mr. BURNHAM. Do you mean that the late government had reached the limit?

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. member from Peterborough is one of these singular gentleman in regard to whom it is most difficult to tell where he is at or what he is driving at. What I say is this: That either my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) is complaining about the late government spending too much in the Transcontinental railway construction or he is not. If he is complaining that the railway has cost too much, the remedy is in the hands of himself and his friends, he can cheapen the cost of construction. He can lessen it in the way I have indicated. Now, I have pointed out that the cost of constructing the railway that has so far been built is $56,000 a mile. To complete the balance of 426 miles it is estimated by my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) and I have taken these figures from his statement in order to show the House and the country what a peculiar position of affairs it is—that although it cost the late government only $56,000 a mile to build what they had built, he proposes to estimate the cost of the remainder at $94,000 a mile. In other words, although these gentlemen who are sitting on the right of the Speaker have been talking day in and day out ever since this railway enterprise was initiated, about the tremendous cost to Canada of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the National Transcontinental railway, and that the late government had completed two-thirds of the railway at a cost of $56,000 a mile, when they come to this House to tell us what they are going to do in future they estimate the cost at $94,000 a mile. Those figures are simply taken from the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) and if he wants to exclude the cost of terminals and shops—

Mr. COCHRANE. Which they had no authority to do.

Mr. MACDONALD. Who had no authority to do so?

Mr. COCHRANE. The government.

Mr. MACDONALD. We will consider that in a moment. At present I am discussing with my hon. friend the question of costs, and I say if my hon. friend excludes from this statement the cost of the terminals and the cost of the shops——

Mr. COCHRANE. Did I say that there was any such number of miles built? If I remember aright there was given in his statement so many miles of grading, and so many miles of track laid. That does not finish a road, and the hon. gentleman knows it if he knows anything about building a railway. What about the ballasting?

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend says that does not finish the road. It goes a long way to finish the road. I am taking his own figures.

Mr. COCHRANE. Then take them in the right way.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend wants to deceive the House when he brings figures here and tells us——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friends opposite are getting very sensitive. The minister brings before this House a statement and here it is: 'Length of the line from Moncton to Winnipeg 1,804·7 miles. Grading completed 1,587 miles, or 76·82 per cent of the whole. Then track laid 1,378·7.'

Mr. COCHRANE. The track cost something.

Mr. MACDONALD. 'Main line and in addition 278·7 miles in siding.' Track laid certainly advanced construction.

Mr. LENNOX. The rails cost something.

Mr. MACDONALD. 'Telegraph line 9,982 miles, bridges 82·75 per cent'.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). How many miles?

Mr. MACDONALD. Nine hundred and eighty-two. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, it could not, of course, be 9,000. Now, here is the point: I say if we take the figures contained in the statement prepared and submitted to the House by the Minister of Railways, and if we exclude the cost of terminals and shops from the estimates of the future cost of the road it still means that the minister to-day contemplates spending $85,000 a mile to build the balance of the road when it only cost the late government $56,000 a mile for the railway built by them. Here is a splendid opportunity for these hon. gentlemen to put into practice all their theories about railway construction. They expressed the belief that the late government did not know how to build railroads and they were not going to get a lot of lawyers and put them on the Transcontinental Railway Commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD. When the government wanted somebody to investigate the late Transcontinental Railway Commission who do you suppose they appointed as chairman? They went to Hamilton and secured my very pleasant friend, Mr. Lynch Staunton, a good lawyer, who year in and year out, is the legal adviser of the Ontario government.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). That is why they get along so well.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon friends will find that the Ontario government is not getting on so well some of these days. Well they have appointed Mr. Lynch Staunton as chairman of this commission of investigation, a gentleman who never had anything to do with a railway in his life, whose specialty is water-powers, and whose occupation has been confined solely to matters of that kind. The late government appointed as the first chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, Mr. Wade, a distinguished lawyer, who had connection with railway corporations in the province of Nova Scotia, who had not only engaged in the operation of railways himself, but helped to build them. He was succeeded by Mr. Parent, who had executive and business ability of the highest character, who had been Prime Minister of the province, and whose judgment as a business man is recognized by men of all classes in the province of Quebec, English and French, wherever he is known.

Mr. BRODER. Did he not have something to do with the Quebec bridge affair? What executive ability did he show there?

Mr. MACDONALD. We will discuss the Quebec bridge matter at the proper time.

Mr. BRODER. I do not think he showed much ability in the Quebec bridge matter.

Mr. MACDONALD. We will be ready to discuss that matter with hon. gentlemen opposite at the proper time, but I don't propose to be diverted from the course of my argument merely for the sake of answering the hon. gentleman. I am asking, after all these wails about putting lawyers on the Transcontinental Railway Commission, what did my hon. friends opposite do, when the time came for them to act? They talked about appointing a Royal Commission, but instead of doing that, when they came into office, they appointed the paid solicitor of the Ontario government, a partisan who has been denouncing the expenditure on the National Transcontinental railway, every time he has been on the stump for the last six or eight years, and they put him in charge of the task of investigating this railway, and he enters upon the task absolutely biased. These are the gentlemen who do not want lawyers forsooth for the purpose of constructing railways! When they want to get a commissioner, they go to a gentleman, who is tied hand and foot to their own political fortunes, and expect the country to believe he is going to conduct an unbiased investigation Then, when they wanted to get another gentleman, did they choose a man of long experience in connection with construction of railways?

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Gutelius is not connected with the construction of railways.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD. He is connected with the maintenance which is entirely different from construction.

Mr. COCHRANE. And construction too.

Mr. MACDONALD. Where did he construct a railway in Canada?

Mr. COCHRANE. He helped in the construction of the Central Ontario railway line.

Mr. MACDONALD. He was in charge of maintenance and my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) will find that his experience is not connected with railway construction. And if I am correctly informed the government could not find a man in Canada who was engaged in railway construction and they had to take a man who was a citizen of the United States.

Mr. COCHRANE. The head of the Grand Trunk railway is a citizen of the United States and you took him up.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend is reverting to the old tu quoque argument which is about all flattened out. My hon. friend and his party have boasted of the ability with which they were to come in to do everything so splendidly and properly. None of the mistakes of their predecessors were to be repeated, none of the errors into which they had fallen were to again occur.

Yet after their anti-American campaign of last fall when they were confronted with the fact that they could not get a man in Canada to associate with their partisan lawyer to investigate this commission but had to go to the United States, they retort by saying: 'Oh, the President of the Grand Trunk Pacific is an American.' That is not satisfactory. We say, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to have an investigation into the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental railway, do not let us have a partisan one of that kind. Let the investigation be made by Canadians who are not connected with or in the pay of any political party, and whose verdict on the question has not been anticipated even before they commenced the inquiry. The country is entitled to make this request of my hon. friend, and I hope he will pay some attention to it, because I submit anything else would be unfair, and any verdict they might give in regard to this matter would have no effect and would not be received by the people with any confidence. My hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) is worrying about this question of the cost of construction. What was their policy when they were in power on a previous occasion? If you turn to 'Hansard' you will find the Minister of the Interior of that day telling the House and the country on the 1st of January, 1904, the then government, in addition to cash subsidies, had handed over no less than 44,242,000 acres of land in Manitoba and the Northwest in connection with railways. Eliminate the 25,000,000 acres which went for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, and we find that hon. members opposite, when in power before, gave 19,242,000 acres of land, for what? For the construction of a little railway here, and a little railway there. That land, at a moderate estimate, would be worth to-day $190,000,000. And this amount of the public domain was handed over for railway construction which was really infinitesimal and played no part in the transportation problem of this country. But here you have a railway of the highest possible standard, the best grades, the lowest curves, heavy rails—all the conditions which insure cheap and quick transportation. And hon. members rise in their places and declare that the cost of this is driving the country to the dogs. They gave away a kingdom in the west for railways that did not amount to anything, railways that did not have four-tenths per cent grades, nor any other grades in particular, nor easy curvatures, nor hundred-pound, or even fifty-pound, rails. But all this makes no difference,—the Liberal party built this transcontinental railway and they must be attacked in any case. The whole question was whether it would be better in the country's interest for the government to build a cheap road with high grades, acute curves, wooden bridges, cheap foundations and light rails, or to do what has been done. If one looks at it fairly and desires to arrive at a fair conclusion apart from partisanship, there is but one issue in regard to this matter. Either the government and the late commissioners did the right thing in building that expensive, high-class road, or they did not. Of course, if they had built with wooden trestles and had put in light rails, if they had not been careful in regard to the gradients or the curvatures, the reduction in the cost of the road would have been very great. But the road is the property of the government, the title to it remains in the people of Canada, subject to the leasing rights, and all betterments have to be provided. Was it not better then, to make one good job of it from the beginning rather than to build piece-meal and string out the expenditure over years of the future? That is a plain question and one that can be fairly debated. I know that many prominent railway men in Canada take the view that it would have been better to pursue the other course. If hon. members opposite had confined themselves to a dispassionate consideration which of these two policies would have been better, it seems to me it would be more becoming the dignity of parliament and the sense of the importance of this great issue which should be present in the mind of every Canadian, whether in parliament or not.

Hon. members opposite suggest that the engineering part of the railway was not properly administered. Let us examine that for a moment. There are hints here and suggestions there, that in the construction of the railway the contractors made more money than they should have made and therefore the road cost more than it should have cost. The Minister of Railways knows that the man who makes the estimates as to whether or not the material removed is rock, loose rock or earth, is the resident engineer. He knows that associated with him are the district engineers and that associated with them are the inspecting engineers whose duty it is to inspect the work on which the resident engineer has made his judgment. In addition to that, there were in this railway, over every division of it, the inspecting engineers of the Grand Trunk Pacific, which company was liable for the interest on the cost and so was interested in having that cost as low as possible. Now, let us be frank about this thing. Is it possible that a wholesale misinterpretation of quantities took place with all these men associated in the determining of that point? Of course, if the estimate had rested with one man, that man might be dishonest and might allow the contractor to charge for solid rock when he had removed only earth. But when you have all these men associated for the determining of the cost, each one knowing that the other is a check upon him, each one knowing that his reputation as an engineer may be destroyed by the other man, who may or may not be friendly to him—is it possible to suppose, I say, that under these circumstances, you could have the wholesale misinterpretation of considerations, to put it mildly, that is alleged to exist in regard to these matters? Consider all that inspection and all the care given by the engineers and by the Grand Trunk Pacific, and then consider that only 2 per cent of the cost of the whole of the road was ever in question so far as the dispute is a question of quantities and classification, and you will see that great care must have been exercised by the men who had to do with the work. There is great talk about the commission in regard to this matter. Was it the commission that went out to determine what the quantities were? Not at all. Who, then, determined these matters? Mr. Lumsden, the chief engineer, of the Transcontinental railway had to sign every statement. The commissioners only paid what Mr. Lumsden and his subordinates signed. Every man from Mr. Lumsden down to the lowest subordinate in the woods north of Lake Abitibi would have to be a criminal or privy to criminality, or imposed upon, in order to have had wrong allowances made in regard to this matter.

The commissioners had nothing to do with the question in any way otherwise than to accept the results handed in by the engineer. Now under these circumstances is it fair in this court of parliament, where men's reputations are at stake, and where men's characters are to be determined to a large degree for the future, is it reasonable to impugn their conduct, and to charge them with wrong-doing? In order to see how carefully all these arrangements have been made, let me read from a report which you will find in "Hansard" of April, 1910, made by this commission:

As has adready been pointed out, the important thing is to see that the contractors shall be paid for only what they are entitled to under the general specifications governing the construction of the railway, and that the work is executed up to the standard required. The commissioners believe that they have taken every possible precaution to safeguard the public interest along these lines. Two inspecting engineers reporting directly to the chief engineer are practically continuously going over the work in the different districts. In addition, there are the inspecting engineers of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company constantly passing on the work as it is performed, and when they do not agree with the engineers of the commission as to the work, their complaints are promptly filed in writing, to be passed upon by the board of experts acting as arbitrators under the authority of the National Transcontinental Railway Act.

With respect to the cost of the line, the fact cannot be too much emphasized or too frequently repeated, that when the National Transcontinental railway is completed, the people of Canada will have a railway constructed to a standard of perfection with respect to gradients and curvature, character of roadbed, and permanency of structures (such as steel bridges and viaducts, culverts, &c.) which but few railways in the world can equal. Railways such as the Canadian Pacific railway and Grand Trunk have within the past ten or fifteen years expended many millions of dollars to bring their lines in some places up to the standard which will prevail over the entire National Transcontinental railway. The costs of operation will be infinitesimal in comparison with those of lines having ruling gradients of one per cent, and the benefits of this economy in operation should accrue to the people of Canada.

Now there is but one issue when you come to look at this question. Did the commission do the right thing when they built this permanent railway in the way in which hon. members opposite admit the work was done, or should they have gone on and put down a railway without much permanency, building these wooden bridges, and leaving to the future to provide what was lacking? My hon. friends opposite complain about the cost. They say it is too great, it is enormous, huge, vast. Let us again say to the the Minister of Railways and Canals that only two-thirds of this railway are yet completed. Upon my hon. friend and his government will rest the responsibility for the expenditure on this portion of the road remaining to be constructed, if he constructs it according to the ideas that have been promulgated in the past by hon. gentlemen who sit behind him.

My hon. friend who spoke a moment ago read from the speech of the right hon. the leader of the opposition, made in 1903, in which he urged that the country could not wait any longer for the construction of this road. His judgment has been fully verified. I do not know whether my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) was one of those gentlemen who thought at the time that it was not a good thing to build the railway.

Mr. KEMP. My objection was not to the western part, but to the part running down to New Brunswick.

Mr. MACDONALD. Well, that is interesting. My hon. friend did not want this eastern section of the road, he wanted it to come down to North Bay. He did not want to open up the hinterland of Ontario and Quebec, that was not his ambition for Canada at all. He wanted to have a branch line down into the city of Toronto, and Canada and all her aspirations could have gone a begging if he got that. Then of course he was reckless as to whether traffic would pass down through the United States. If I recollect right, the hon. member for East Toronto was not one of those who are in favour of a preference being given to Canadian ports. So my hon. friend's ambition for Canada would have been satisfied by a line running down from North Bay to Toronto, and the rest of Canada could go hang. But the men who were in charge of public affairs at that time had a greater ambition for Canada. They looked to this northern land, and they believed, what we all know at the present time, that from year to year the population would increase, and that that great country would steadily grow in importance. Why, my optimistic friend the Minister of the Interior, I am sure, would not agree with the hon. member for East Toronto, because he told us the other night that he was in favour, after you got the Hudson Bay railway down to Port Nelson or Fort Churchill of building another railway further north than the Grand Trunk Pacific, going down to Labrador, and having connection form there to England. So I say that all the evidence points to the fact that we did not start a moment too soon. I had some doubts at one time as to the attitude of the leader of the government on this question, but in the discussion which we had in the House I think two years ago, he said he was not one of those who agreed with the member for East Toronto. I was glad to know that my right hon. friend at that time took the position that he was in favour of the construction of the road from Winnipeg to Quebec. Now we all entered upon that project. Almost every one in Canada came to the conclusion that this railway was a necessity, and everybody agrees to-day that it was not started a minute too soon. Look at the clamour that comes from that western land with 400,000,000 bushels of grain waiting for transport. My hon. friend from East Toronto who did not want this railway built to Quebec in 1903, complains to-day because it is not built fast enough. So I say the policy of the government in 1903 has been amply justified. Everybody in Canada at that time, and ever since, has taken it for granted that the National Transcontinental railway was a necessity, and has not been started a moment too soon. Yet here to-day, when hon. gentlemen get into power, they proceed to change this commission and dismiss three of the commissioners, and they propose to run this whole thing with one commissioner. They start in a peculiar manner with regard to it. After they have decided upon doing away with three commissioners, they proceed in an illegal way to appoint an assistant chairman.

Mr. COCHRANE. No.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will satisfy my hon. friend that I am right. The powers of the government in regard to appointing officials in connection with this railway are limited. The National Transcontinental Commission is a statutory body, it has no inherent rights except what the statute confers upon it. It has no authority except what parliament gives it. In the Act of 1903, parliament definitely laid down the relative powers, both of the government and the commission. Let us see what section 9 of the Act says:

> The construction of the eastern division and the operation thereof until completed and leased to the company pursuant to the provisions of the agreement shall be under the charge and control of three commissioners, to be appointed by the Governor in Council, who shall hold office during pleasure, and who, and whose successors in office, shall be a body corporate under the name of 'The Commissioners of the Transcontinental railway' and are hereinafter called 'The Commissioners'.

They were made a body corporate, and were given certain powers. The Governors in Council were empowered to appoint certain people under section 10:

> The Governor in Council may appoint a secretary to the commissioners, who shall hold office during pleasure, and may also appoint a chief engineer for the eastern division, who shall hold office during pleasure, and who, under the instructions of the commissioners and subject to the provisions of the agreement, shall have the general superintendence of the construction of the eastern division.

So that the powers of the government were exhausted when they appointed the commissioners, the secretary and the chief engineer. The following year, 1904, the act was amended so as to give power to appoint a fourth commissioner, but these were all the appointments the government had any right to make. Section 11 goes on:

> The commissioners may appoint and employ such engineers . . . and such surveyors and other officers, and also such servants, agents and workmen as in their discretion they deem necessary and proper for the execution of the powers and duties vested in them under this Act.

It is quite evident that the appointing power of the government was exhausted when they made the appointment to which I have referred. What were the circumstances? The gentlemen who composed the commission are still commissioners, my hon. friend has not accepted the resignations. If there were no commissioners the whole procedure in connection with the Transcontinental Railway Commission would be tied up, because Mr. Leonard, who was appointed in Mr. Parent's place, would not be able to act, you must have a quorum of the commissioners in order to have legal action. But that is not the way in which it was done. My hon. friend told us how it was done. Mr. Leonard comes to my hon. friend and my hon. friend puts through an order in council and appoints a gentleman vice-chairman, a new office, not provided for in the Act or contemplated in the organization of the board. Mr. Macpherson, who was assistant to the chief engineer, the salary of the chief engineer being $5,000, was illegally and improperly made vice-chairman at a salary of $7,500. They gave him $2,500 more than is paid to the chief engineer of the road, who, under the Act, is the one man on whom responsibility for the carrying into effect of the enterprise rests.

Mr. BORDEN. When was he appointed vice-chairman?

Mr. MACDONALD. I am speaking of the statement made by the Minister of Railways. He said:

The hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) wanted a copy of the order in council. I have a copy of it here. I may say that I find that there was a mistake in that, in the statement that it was recommended by the commission instead of by the chairman of the commission. But I took the matter up with the chairman, and he informed me that his law clerk had advised him that he had a right to do what he had done, and that the matter was brought before the commission, and Mr. McIsaac, one of the commissioners, thought that he was acting within his jurisdiction in appointing Mr. Macpherson. I also wish to say that I was misinformed, and misinformed the House, when I said that Mr. Macpherson's salary had not been increased. I am informed that it has been increased.

Mr. KYTE. What is Mr. Macpherson's salary at the present time?

Mr. COCHRANE. $7,500.

Mr. KYTE. What was it before?

Mr. COCHRANE. $5,000, I think.

The result is the expression 'vice-chairman' was used by the minister.

Mr. COCHRANE. Oh no, I said assistant to the chairman.

Mr. MACDONALD. If that gives any satisfaction to the minister he is welcome to it. There is no power to appoint an assistant to the chief commissioner. There are four commissioners, this Bill proposes to wipe them out and make just one commissioner. It does not say anything about an assistant chairman.

Mr. BORDEN. It does not say assistant chairman.

Mr. MACDONALD. Assistant to the chairman. If there is to be an assistant to the chairman he should be appointed by the commission, clearly so under the law and the commission have not appointed him. But in some way or other the Minister of Railways, who is going to economize and build the railway more cheaply, at the very inception takes a subordinate from under the chief engineer, appoints him assistant to the chairman, and gives him $2,500 more than before, when under the law he has no right to do so. I warn the minister that he will not go very far until he finds some of the acute critics who are versed in all these matters in connection with National Transcontinental railway expenditures, and who sit not far from him, will find that he is inaugurating an expenditure which he has no justification for making. The result of the action of the minister is that instead of doing away with the four commissioners he will still have two commissioners, as he is giving the assistant to the chairman the salary of one of the old commissioners. The minister has acted entirely without warrant or authority.

A word or two in regard to my hon. friend's estimate. Hon. gentlemen will notice that the minister has made some curious estimates here. He says that 72·86 per cent of the whole road is completed. He says that there has already been expended $7,681,700, in engineering expenses. That means that all the location surveys, the preliminary surveys from end to end of the country have been made, and that you have 76 per cent of the road constructed; and yet my hon. friend proposes to spend $3,850,000 more in surveys. How does he work that out in proportion? I have not made an estimate, but any gentleman can figure the proportion.

Engineering and expenses up to date, are set down at $7,681,700, and the minister says that he contemplated this charge will amount to $3,850,000 more, so that I should think some details of that ought to be given.

Mr. COCHRANE. Well, that is the statement signed by the engineer.

Mr. MACDONALD. Well, the minister is responsible and not the engineer and it is the minister who should give the information to this House, by which it may be guided. The minister comes to this House asking us to pass legislation on the basis of certain information he has given, and I say that it is for him to give us some explanation of that exorbitant estimate of $3,800,000 for engineering expenses yet to be incurred. Now, under 'headquarters, salaries and expenses,' the total expense to date since the initiation of the work, is given at $1,732,900, and notwithstanding that only twenty-four per cent of the road remains to be completed, we are told that the expenses of the headquarters staff will amount to, for the future, $1,267,000. Surely we are entitled to some explanation as to how the minister and his engineers have arrived at that estimate. In the past, we have had four commissioners, and although the minister is dispensing with the services of threc of them, and although, according to the rule of proportion, the expenses at headquarters should only be one-half million dollars for the balance of the road, the minister tells us that it will amount to $1,267,000. Surely parliament must have some explanation as to that. Then again, with seventy-six per cent. of the road completed, the minister gives us an estimate that it will cost $2,231,000 for right of way.

Mr. COCHRANE. Scarcely any of the right of way is paid for.

Mr. MACDONALD. Well, that is the information we want, that is what we want put on the table of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. You have the figures here.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, but when the minister comes down with a general statement, showing that the road is supposed to cost $130,000 per mile, surely we must know what the basis of the calculation is. Now, finally, I wish to say that if the present government is not satisfied with the railway as constructed to-day at a cost of $56,000 per mile, the whole thing is in their own hands for the future. From this day on, the Minister of Railways and his commission have to check every dollar of the expenditure; no contractor can get one dollar for any earth he may turn or stone he may blast out, until those now in charge of construction, sign the figures. They can decide what the grades and the curvatures will be, and what the weights of the rails and what kind of bridges will be constructed, and if the balance of the road costs more than $56,000 per mile, it is they, and they alone, who will be responsible for it. It is the duty of the minister to explain these anomalies which I have pointed out, and I submit that the history of this transaction will be that the men who have had charge of this matter for the late government were men who did the work honestly, with capacity, and with integrity, and their work will stand. We will be ready to compare the result of their efforts with those of the gentlemen who have succeeded them as appointees of this government.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially my genial and plausible friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), are disposed to treat this matter with a very light touch, but I can assure them that the people of Canada are not disposed to take that view of it. On the late government, and on hon. gentlemen must be the full responsibility for this miscalculation.

Mr. MACDONALD. What miscalculation?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The miscalculation in the estimated cost of the building of this railway—the miscalculation between $13,000,000 of interest computed by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the $60,000,000 of interest as shown by the estimate of the Minister of Railways, and the miscalculation between the $54,000,000 estimated as the actual cost of constructoin by the former Minister of Finance, and the appalling figure of $236,000,000, which is found to be the probable actual cost. The responsibility for these miscalculations must be assumed by the late government before the people of Canada. There is no use blinking the facts; we must look them straight in the face.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Where is the estimate of $250,000,000?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The amount I referred to was the $236,000,000 brought down by the Minister of Railways as the total cost of this railway, before the Grand Trunk Pacific Company enters upon the lease, and I think I will be able to satisfy my hon. friend that that estimate is correct. I have no desire to discuss this from a political point of view, but, as I have said before, there is no use blinking the facts. It is my opinion that we will discuss no question in this parliament, having regard either to the large amount of money involved or to the future consequences, which will compare in importance with the question of these figures which we have been discussing in connection with the National Transcontinental railway. I make no charges against the Transcontinental Commissioners, but I do say that there have been rumours of misapplication of moneys, and I do say that the people believe that a great deal of money has been misapplied.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Where?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). In connection with the construction of the National Transcontinental railway.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Who made the charges ?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It has been charged by some of the engineers, and I say that the people of this country suspect that there has been misapplication of money.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Who suspects that?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Does not my hon. friend keep in touch with public opinion. I make no charge against the commissioners, but I do say that the increase from $13,000,000 interest, as estimated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to the $60,000,000 estimated by the Minister of Railways, and the difference between the $54,000,000 estimated by Mr. Fielding as the total cost of construction, and the $236,000,000 now shown to be the probable cost, these vast differences form ground for a prima facie case against the late government and against the Transcontinental Railway Commission, which they must explain away. Let us review the situation with deliberation. This agreement was entered into in 1903, and 1904, so that the National Transcontinental railway has been under construction for a period of eight or nine years. Now, I propose to consider for a moment the question of miscalculation in estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD.—Who made it? Mr. Schrieber.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Do not interrupt.

Mr. MACDONALD. You start on the wrong premises.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Wait till I get through. The right hon. leader of the opposition, then the leader of the government, is reported in 'Hansard' as follows:

When completed, the company will lease the road and will pay to us a rental at the rate of three per cent per annum upon the cost of construction, whatever that may be. The same abatement of rent is provided also as in the case of the western section. During seven years the company will be exempt from the payment of rent. For three years the company will be bound to pay the revenues and tolls of the road if they amount to three per cent; and if they fail to amount to three per cent, then the difference between the revenues gathered and the three per cent will be capitalized and added to the cost of construction, and the company will pay interest upon it. So that here again the whole of the liability which is incurred by the government for the building of that section from Moncton to Winnipeg is simply seven years of interest. The sum total of the money to be paid by the government for the construction of that line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific ocean will be in the neighbourhood of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, and not a cent more. Now, Sir, what is $13,000,000 in the year 1903? It is about the surplus of our revenue over the expenditure. The surplus for this year will pay for the construction of this road.

Now, I do not for a moment say, although these words might reasonably give that impression, especially to the public, that the entire cost of this road was estimated by the leader of the late government at $13,000,000. What he had in mind, I believe, was this, that the interest charge during the 7 years of operation by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, during which they were to pay no rental, together with some interest charges which he had in mind, would amount possibly to $13,000,000. What are the facts? The fact according to the estimates of the hon. gentleman from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), based on the figures given by the hon. Minister of Railways is that the cost to this country will be $60,000,000, or five times the cost estimated by the late government. Is that a matter to be treated lightly, as hon. gentlemen opposite have treated it—an estimate falling short of the actual interest $47,000,000? I say there has not been as great a blunder made in estimating in this country since Confederation as that made of the cost of this National Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Moncton. Take the actual cost. It was shown by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) that my predecessor estimated the cost from Winnipeg to Moncton at $54,000,000. It will not do to say that the government engineer estimated it at $51,000,000 or $52,000,000. In approaching an estimate of this kind it is not wise to go it blind. The government should have informed themselves more fully as to the character of the country through which this road would pass, both from the standpoint of the cost of construction and the standpoint of the traffic which the road would derive when completed. But apparently no investigation of any kind was made; at all events, if it was, it must have been of the most superficial kind, having regard to the result. Now, what is the result? My predecessor estimated $54,000,000, as the cost, or $28,000 a mile from Winnipeg to Quebec and $25,000, per mile from Quebec to Moncton. That is specific; there are his figures. It was upon that understanding that the government entered upon the construction of this line. That is the estimate for which the late government must take full responsibility; and what is the outcome? The outcome is that instead of a cost of $54,000,000 from Winnipeg to Moncton, and instead of $28,000 and $25,000 per mile respectively, we have a total cost of $236,000,000, including interest, equal to two-thirds of the net national debt of Canada, and no less than $130,000 per mile. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say, well, we must build the line, and apparently from their arguments this afternoon, it was not of the slightest consequence what the cost would be, because the Grand Trunk Pacific Company must enter on the lease, but it is of the greatest possible consequence, because in the first place no railway can afford to pay a rental beyond a certain amount, I do not care how strong it is; and the first question that arises in this case is, can the company afford to pay three per cent on the cost of that line, amounting to over $200,000,000, after the first seven years of operation? Now, what does that amount to? It amounts to no less than $6,000,000 a year—no less than $20,000 a day of rental to meet the $6,000,000 of fixed charges; and that is over and above the operating expenses. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when in the government, had the idea that this road would reduce freight rates. What is there by way of traffic on that line? It runs through hundreds of miles of desolate wilderness, which will afford no local traffic. What about return freights? The grades are all right, they say; they will bring down trains laden with grain from the west. But what goes back? What hope is there of reducing freight rates in this country, with a fixed charge of $6,000,000 between Winnipeg and Moncton? These are considerations which have been overlooked by hon. gentlemen opposite. Their argument this afternoon proceeded coolly on the assumption that it did not make any difference if the road cost $500,000,000 or a $1,000,000,000, because the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would pay three per cent of the cost. But I want to tell them that every dollar of the $113,853,000 that has been paid out and of the balance of $57,873,000 still to be paid, represents cash to be paid by the people of the Dominion of Canada. There is no blinking that fact. When the leader of the late government estimated $13,000,000 of interest as the entire cost of this line to the people of Canada, what had he in mind? He had this in mind, and no doubt it was logical, that the road when constructed would be operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company on a payment of three per cent on the cost, and that this would carry all the interest on the money which the government would borrow for the purpose of constructing the road, and he estimated that the only thing the country would have to bear would be the $13,000,000. But he had not the slightest conception at the time of the colossal cost of this road as it was ultimately worked out.

Now let us take the western situation, and there you will find miscalculation all along the line, although I believe absolutely in the west and I think I have more confidence in it than some of its representatives here, but I will dwell on that a little later. Take the prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and it will cost $40,000 a mile. Take the mountain section of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and it will probably cost $70,000 a mile. Now take it from the standpoint of freight rates. If there was anything which justified the late government in going into the construction of a line such as the National Transcontinental railway it was for the purpose of regulating the freight rates of the country, of having a line which would regulate them, because there is a clause in the agreement under which the rates are to be arranged subject to revision by the government. Now under the circumstances mentioned what chance is there for a reduction of freight rates? Is there a man on either side of this House who will state that the freight rates can be reduced by reason of the construction of a National Transcontinental on the figures that have been produced here by my friend the Minister of Railways? I doubt very much if there is any man who has the temerity to suggest any such thing. Even supposing, there is a clay belt to be settled north of the line and industries to be developed, what practical use so far as local traffic is concerned can be made of the line for years to come from Moncton to Winnipeg? These are some considerations worthy of attention. Supposing the line were completed from Moncton to Winnipeg, what would it be worth without the lease? A line isolated, hung in the air so to speak, without connections? The Grand Trunk Pacific at the time they entered into the agreement for the construction of that line on the estimate of the government contemplated the payment of 3 per cent of the cost of construction which the late Finance Minister estimated at $54,000,000 a year but which has now been shown to amount to no less a sum than $200,000,000, or as I have said $6,000,000 in interest a year. Now when we come to the question of the physical condition of the line all this argument is absolutely relevant to the matter of the commission. I say that the commission had the construction of this line under their charge and under their direction and I say that if that construction has not gone forward intelligently, if that construction has not been carried on as it should have been carried on according to the best opinion in this country, then I think the responsibility must rest upon the late government. The hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) called attention to the fact that there were certain anomalies in the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. If you look at the statement of items 'National Transcontinental Railway, Eastern Division Road' you will find the 'Grading, contract items, including peering, excavation, culverts, substructures of bridges, track laying, ballasting, etc., value of work done to December 31, 1911, $79,368,700, and value of work required to complete $13,510,300.' If you look down further you will find: 'Buildings, including stations, section and tool houses, and divisional point buildings, value of work required to complete $3,971,780.' That is where the heavy cost is coming in, not in connection with the grading and track laying that has been completed according to the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) to the percentage mentioned. Then a little further down you will find a large item $9,051,500. What is that for? 'Terminals at Quebec and line from Quebec bridge to Quebec city. Value of work required to complete $9,051,500.' If you will look at the two columns you will see that a large expenditure has not yet been made upon a number of the items set forth there. You will notice that there is a very heavy expenditure still to be made, so that there is nothing anomalous in my hon. friend's statement. Referring again to the physical condition of that railway, I say that here the late government in my opinion, and the late commission also are responsible, notwithstanding what my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) has said about that. What is the condition of the line from Mountain to Levis? It is very nearly completed we are told, but of what use is it in that unfinished state? Interest is running upon the cost of it. How long will it be before the line is completed so as to be able to take out grain from the west? My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) smiles at that. He is very much interested in the western situation as we all are. Why is it that grain is not coming down from the west to Cochrane now, and then over the Grand Trunk railway to Toronto, why is it the line is not completed to Cochrane, when the line from Levis to Moncton is practically completed? Hon. gentlemen opposite have been rising in their places and blaming the government for the present situation in the west. I want to tell them that the late government, and the late commission appear to be more blameable than any one else for the present condition of affairs in Canada. There is only one railway line running out to-day from Port Arthur and that is the Canadian Pacific railway line.

Mr. COCHRANE. And the road from Port Arthur to Winnipeg is not completed yet.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). That section is not yet completed, but as I say there is only one line running out to-day from Port Arthur. You may have as many lines running down to Fort William as you like. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) mentioned the line running down from Superior to Fort William. I do not care if you had ten lines running down there instead of one. That does not help the western situation to-day a bit because there is only one line out from Port Arthur and that is the Canadian Pacific railway line.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). What about the Canadian Northern?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It is not yet constructed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Does my hon. friend say there is not a line running from Port Arthur to Winnipeg?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). But east of Port Arthur there is only one line. Remember it is eight or nine years since this contract was entered into, nine years to complete the line to Cochrane, and it is not completed yet, and my hon. friend says it will not be completed for two years. Now who is to blame for the fact that the western grain cannot be moved to the east? Who is to blame for the lack of cars and for all the congestion that we hear of almost daily from hon. members from the west? When the late government were in power did my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) opposite ever rise in his place and tell the government that the line to Cochrane was not completed, and should be rushed no matter what the expenditure might be, in order that the grain might be moved from the east and double the railway facilities from the west? I never heard of it. And my eloquent friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)—I am sorry he is not here to-night, because I think I can place the blame where it belongs—did he ever rise at any time and ask whether means were being taken to double the railway facilities of the west by constructing the line to Cochrane? Not at all. That cannot be gainsaid or denied. What about the line to Superior? The line to Superior even was a year late. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway has been operating its Prairie section for two years. The first year they were unable to take out grain from the west. Why? Because the line from Winnipeg to Superior was uncompleted.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows very well that he is unfair in making a comparison with the prairie section.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I am not unfair. My hon. friend is not the fairest person in the world himself. My hon. friend says I am comparing the construction of a line between Winnipeg and Superior, with the prairie section. My hon. friend is overlooking this fact, which I have made the basis of my argument: the late government had eight years in which to construct this railway and what have we got to-day? Why it is like starting to build a house by constructing the chimney instead of excavating and building the basement. You were a year late in getting to Superior, and you are three years late—because it will take a year and a half or two years to complete it, between Superior and Cochrane—in getting to Cochrane. Now I ask when we hear about this grain blockade in the west, and about this congestion of cars in the west, upon whose shoulders is the blame to rest? Let us be fair in this matter; all we want is fair play. The government has been in power since October 6, and almost daily since the House began its sittings, remarks have been made about our preventing the grain getting out from the west. I do not intend to allow this matter to remain there, but every time I hear this complaint I shall place the blame where it belongs.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does my hon. friend seriously pretend that the congestion in the northwest to-day is due to the fact that the road between Superior Junction and Cochrane is not completed? Is he serious in that?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Yes. My hon. friend does not understand the situation.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Are not the elevators full?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Of course they are full. I thought I had made this matter plain, but apparently I did not. I say, if you had ten lines going to Fort William in winter after the close of navigation, and only one line out from Fort William east, how great is the capacity of your railway? Just as great as that of one line, and no greater. If you have two lines, you double the capacity. One of the greatest complaints of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I think it is one they will not be slow to urge, is that the government has not finished the line between Winnipeg and Cochrane so that they could get the advantage of it. You have the prairie section in operation for two years and only getting down to Fort William last year. So much for the physical condition, except this: First, we have the line from Moncton to Lévis almost completed. But what about the Quebec bridge? Where is it? It is in the river. I do not intend to place the responsibility for the fall of the Quebec bridge; unavoidable accidents sometimes happen. I do not propose to apportion the responsibility for that.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Then why do you mention it?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Because I want to show the situation.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does the hon. gentleman pretend to argue the condition of the Quebec bridge as a justification for the reduction of the commission?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I was answering arguments that are brought forward on the other side. And what I say is strictly relevant. I am not wandering one whit further afield than did the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). I am dealing with the situation of this road. We have heard of the great advantages of the road in the west. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) told us how it was taking out the grain, and others have told us how it was relieving the situation. I am merely meeting these arguments, and what I say is relevant and pertinent to the issue. I am fairly criticising the commission. I have not charged anything against them, but I am fairly criticising them by pointing out the physical condition of the line, and showing the nature of the construction east of Winnipeg. If the commissioners have constructed the line between wrong points or have gone on first with parts of the line which should not have been constructed first, they are fairly open to criticism. Now, the Quebec bridge—I was taking that up when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Halifax—from Moncton to Lévis the road is almost completed. But, of what use is it to the country? And as to the Quebec bridge, I was only narrating when interrupted by my hon. friend——

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am glad to hear that.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I was merely setting forth the historical fact that the Quebec bridge is now in the St. Lawrence. How many years will it be before the Quebec bridge will be capable of forming the last link in the chain between Winnipeg and Moncton? The people have a rough way of adjudicating upon these matters. They judge largely upon results; and if this line has not been completed, either through the fault of the Quebec bridge or for any other reason, they are apt to visit the blame upon the government during whose term this all occurred. I am not going into the question of what responsibility attaches through the falling of the bridge. I am merely stating the situation —and there is the situation. Then, we have the remainder of the road finished or nearly completed, as shown by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane). He estimates that the road should be finished by the 1st of January, 1914——

Mr. COCHRANE. The Quebec bridge in 1917.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Yes, 1917 for the Quebec bridge, and 1914, or two years hence, for the railway. Eight years since the beginning, plus two years more to the finish, makes ten years—ten years for the construction of this line before it is in a position to haul out grain from the west.

The considerations that I have mentioned, I think, are of the greatest possible importance, and I think that they are absolutely relevant to this discussion. Now, what is our position as a government? Our position is that we have fallen heir to this National Transcontinental as a heritage. A damnosa hereditas, or, I would rather call it a hereditas damnosa; I think that is a little better Latin—but either will do; and at all events that is our heritage. On this side of the House we are patriots and Canadians before we are partisans; and there is not a man on this side who does not want to prosecute this enterprise with the greatest vigour and carry it through to completion. The cry was raised during the elections before the last, 'Let Laurier finish his work.' We will have to finish this work, and we will finish it well. I hope that the end of the National Transcontinental will be better than its beginning; and I know that the Minister of Railways will carry this enterprise to completion more economically than the work hitherto has been carried on.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The minister himself does not seem to think so judging by his estimates.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Let my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, Halifax) consider what the completion of a railway means. You may have a railway with a part of its right-of-way not paid for, and yet complete in a physical sense. You have telegraph lines, stations, round-houses and other such things to provide. The heavy expense comes in connection with these matters, and must be considered when looking at the road from a physical standpoint.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. White, Leeds) agree that it is good policy to continue the construction of the road with 4-10 per cent grade? Let us have an answer to that?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). We have inherited a situation. When gentlemen have gone ahead and spent $113,000,000 on construction, and have completed the line at different points, it would not be possible to change the grades even if we wanted to. But more than that: My hon. friend is a good lawyer, yet he has overlooked one thing, and that is that there is an agreement between this country and the Grand Trunk railway as to the standard of construction. The question arises, how far can we change that situation? But all that does not alter the fact that these hon. gentlemen opposite estimated this road at only one-fifth of what it has actually cost. That is the great outstanding fact and you cannot forget it nor gloss it over. But it is what they are trying to do—gloss it over. Thirteen millions as against sixty millions; fifty-four millions as against two hundred and thirty-six millions,—how are you going to get away from the logic of these facts?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). The hon. gentleman (Mr. White, Leeds) agrees that it is a good policy to build with grades of 4-10 per cent, and will continue that policy?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). There is not a man on this side, from the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) down, on his side—and they are down so far as we are concerned—nor on this side of the House either, who would have voted for the National Transcontinental railway if he had known that these figures would be brought down eight years after that agreement was made. I say, where is there a man on either side of this House who would have voted for the National Transcontinental railway if they had known that these figures would be brought down here eight years afterwards? That is why I say that there is nothing we are going to deal with in this parliament that has anything like the importance of this question.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The country does not think so.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The country does think so, and the country is shocked at these figures. Why, Sir, even our hon. friends opposite do not realize what these figures mean—$6,000,000 interest on the line from Winnipeg to Moncton in one year. Now what is our duty? There is not a man on this side of the House that does not want to see the Grand Trunk Pacific railway made a success, that does not want to see it completed through to Prince Rupert, that does not want to see it carried to completion from Moncton to Winnipeg. They know that the country can stand the cost. I want to say this, that the most gratifying feature in this whole matter is that the surplus revenues of this country in the past have been such as to liquidate so large a percentage of the capital cost of that railway. I say that is a most gratifying fact; because I am a patriotic Canadian, I am not a partisan, and I acknowledge the great prosperity of this country during the regime of the late government. Therefore I say there is not the slightest fear for the future. I say, without anticipating the Budget, that we will be able to write off almost the entire expenditure on the National Transcontinental railway for this year, I look forward with faith to the future, and I want honestly and in good faith to carry out this enterprise to completion.

Now the increase in our national debt. Our national debt is of comparative insignificance, having regard to our resources, $340,000,000, not a large national debt. So I say, speaking as the minister responsible for the finances of Canada, that notwithstanding this expenditure, of which a great part has already been liquidated by our surplus revenue, I look forward without the slightest apprehension from the financial standpoint. It is only proper that I should say this, while we are justly criticising the miscalculation made by our predecessors, and when we are meeting their arguments, or their censures, against us in regard to the existing western situation. I think I may rightly traverse their arguments by presenting the other side. At the same time I am free to say that notwithstanding the enormous expense the position of this country is such that we will be able to carry the work through to completion. I have the greatest possible faith in the west. There is no man in this House who is more interested in the west than I am, I claim to be as well acquainted with it as any eastern man can be. I say that our western friends from Alberta and Saskatchewan are continually misrepresenting that country in this House. You have the province of Saskatchewan, probably five per cent under cultivation, and ninety-five per cent still to be cultivated; you have the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba capable of immense development, and of sustaining populations in comfort many times the population they have at the present time. I look forward without the slightest apprehension to the western situation. The Grand Trunk Pacific, and the other lines will take care of themselves. What we want in the west, and what this government stands for, is to give additional spouts to that country, and as many as we can. The Grand Trunk Pacific is pushing through to Prince Rupert, the Canadian Northern railway is running another line to Vancouver, and this government stands pledged to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, another spout to the north; and the Minister of Railways will urge the construction forward of a line between Superior and Cochrane as vigorously as he can, no matter what the expense may be, in order that that link may be completed at the earliest possible moment. Now, with these spouts, two more to the west, one north to Hudson bay, and one east to Cochrane down by the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario to Toronto, then with Mackenzie and Mann constructing the Canadian Northern railway and Ontario east from Port Arthur duplicating the line of the Canadian Pacific railway east to Port Arthur, we have all these additional spouts.

Mr. SINCLAIR. When does the hon. gentleman expect the spout to Hudson bay to be completed?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Just as quickly as we can complete it. Give us the eight years time that you had from Winnipeg to Cochrane, and the Hudson Bay road will be completed.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). When will that road of the Minister of Railways be completed to Labrador?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). We are all optimists here, it is only the hon. gentlemen in opposition who are pessimists. When I was in the west I saw this sign in half-a-dozen hotels, 'If you can't boost don't knock'; and I have heard more knocking of the west from the western members in this House since I came here than I ever heard before. Why, it will take a hundred immigration agents to repair all the damage that has been done by the talk of western members since this session began. What is the situation this year? It is an extraordinary situation, as we all know, a wet year, and a late harvest. We know what the climatic conditions were, and the enormous strain placed upon the railways. The situation is extraordinary, it is not normal. Is it fair therefore to dwell upon such a situation and take so gloomy a view of it as our hon. friends opposite are doing? I say they do not fairly represent the west. The west is the land of invincible optimism, the people of the west are the most courageous in Canada, and they are confronting the situation bravely indeed. They know the climatic conditions are responsible for the situation, they know the congested situation west from Fort William, and still they believe thoroughly in their country. Notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as to how many bushels of grain it costs to buy an agricultural implement on this side of the line as compared with the cost on the other side of the line, notwithstanding all that, what are the facts? There must be some permanent attraction in that great country that draws the people from the republic to the south to come in and take up their homes in that land. What happened last year? Notwithstanding all these gloomy pictures that have been drawn by the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) what happened last year? 130,000 immigrants came in from the United States to make their homes in the Canadian west, to settle upon the soil of the great west. They get the advantage of cheaper land, and of better land, and they have continued to come, and will continue to come notwithstanding the pessimistic talk we hear from hon. gentlemen opposite who misrepresent the west. The western representatives will be looked upon as Jeremiahs if they keep on much longer. But the western people do not want Jeremiahs to represent them, they are optimistic, they are men of the greatest possible courage. Next year they will get a good crop, their harvest will come in earlier, and I hope that the conditions of last year will not be repeated for many a long year to come. The railways will be able to take care of the situation better, and hope will again smile on that great land. I mention these facts to show that our railway systems in the west will be profitable enterprises. There will yet be mixed farming in the west, there will yet be great manufacturers, so I have no fear at all with regard to the railway situation in the west. Those are my views with regard to the west, and with regard to these items of expenditure which the Minister of Railways has brought down to the House.

The late government cannot escape responsibility for this situation, they cannot gloss it over. It cannot be minimized, it was a miscalculation, one of the grossest miscalculations that has ever occurred in this country since Confederation. What the consequences will be, whether, as the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) has said, this government may yet have to assume a part of this responsibility, I shall not venture to prophesy. But you cannot escape two facts, that $13,000,000 estimated by the late Prime Minister as interest, and I must do him the justice to say that he never estimated it as anything else, has grown to $60,000,000 and the $54,000,000 estimated by my predecessor, I have no doubt in all good faith, $28,000 per mile from Winnipeg to Quebec, and $25,000 a mile from Levis to Moncton has now grown into $236,000,000, nearly five times as much and equal to $130,000 per mile. I say that whatever the significance of these figures may be, whatever may be the consequence of that calculation, the responsibility must rest not on the government that finished it, but on the government that started it, that conceived the project and carried it through almost to completion before we came into power.

Mr. CARVELL. Mr. Chairman, rarely have I listened to such a pessimistic speech from a gentleman who claims to be an optimist as we have heard this evening. My hon. friend has devoted pretty nearly one half of his very earnest appeal to the people of this country to an effort to convince them that this road will cost $130,000 a mile, and that the late government should be censured for that condition of affairs. My hon. friend knows that is not the case at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order !

Mr. CARVELL. He knows that the road will only cost $90,000 a mile.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order !

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friends need not get fussy about " order, " I shall not make any statement to which the Minister of Finance could object because he knows the figures as well as I do. So the lesser lights may wait until he objects. I do not want to be unkind enough to ask my hon. friend if he knew anything about this condition of affairs which he so laments to-night when he was supporting the Liberal party. I shall be charitable enough to say that he did not, but that is his misfortune because all these facts have been patent to the people of Canada ever since the construction of the road commenced. Year after year the engineers handed in reports to parliament, and as late as 1908 absolute facts were given the public and the people knew exactly what the road had cost to that date. The leader of the government of that time stated that the road would cost $60,000 or $70,000 a mile and it has been stated time and time again that that would be the cost. I do not mean the cost of the road with the interest added. These Commissioners are being fired from office, according to the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) and the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) because, owing to their lack of business knowledge, this road is going to cost $130,000 a mile, when, according to the figures of the Minister of Railways, as far as the commissioners are concerned, the road will cost less than $90,000 a mile.

Mr. WHITE. (Leeds). Does my hon. friend know what cost of construction includes under this agreement ?

Mr. CARVELL. I think so.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Does it include interest?

Mr. CARVELL. Under the agreement seven years' interest will be added to the cost of construction for the purpose of paying interest, but these commissioners are not responsible for that.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I did not say they were.

Mr. CARVELL. That is the inference from the statement of the hon. gentleman, that is the statement of the hon. member for St. Antoine, of the hon. member for East Toronto, to-night. These commissioners have nothing to do with the interest, they are simply the medium through which this road is being constructed.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance on one point. He is the first hon. gentleman on the Conservative side of the House who has been fair enough to admit that when the late Finance Minister made the statement about the $13,000,000 he was talking about the interest the country would have to pay and not the cost of the road.

Mr. LENNOX. I would remind my hon. friend that on two occasions at least I distinctly called attention to the fact that I understood the Prime Minister to be referring to what it would actually cost the country in outlay which it would not get back.

Mr. CARVELL. I shall have to accept the statement of my hon. friend but I could not have been in the House at the time he made the statements. It has been reported from end to end of Canada that this road would cost $13,000,000 only.

Mr. BLAIN. Did my hon. friend hear the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) make exactly the same statement as is made by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) this evening?

Mr. CARVELL. I was talking about members on the Conservative side of the House, my friends from Peel and from Simcoe and the others have stated in the House and it has been taken up by every Conservative almost in Canada, that Mr. Fielding said this road would cost only $13,000,000.

Mr. LENNOX. I rise to a point of order. When the hon. member says that the member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) on any occasion either in the House or out of it alleged that the late Prime Minister said that this road would only cost $13,000,000 he is making inadvertently a mistatement. I never said so inside or outside the House.

Mr. CARVELL. I had accepted my hon. friend's statement, he need not get nervous. I am glad the Minister of Finance has forced these gentlemen to come out in the open and make the statement that they did not mean that we said that this road would cost $13,000,000. What Mr. Fielding said was that as he figured it the interest charges would be $13,000,000. Mr. Fielding was in error, there is no question about that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friends say 'hear, hear'. I would like to know if Mr. Fielding was the first public man who was ever guilty of an error of judgment in discussing a great public work. Any hon. gentleman who has ever built himself a house knows that the cost exceeded the estimate of his architect. Have they ever heard of a public work that did not cost more than they figured? But my hon. friends say it costs too much more. Let us take the conditions at the time the statement was made. It was made in 1903. No surveys had been made, no expert information had been obtained. The government took the statement of Mr. Schreiber, then deputy Minister of Railways and Canals. Mr. Schreiber told them that in his opinion the road could be built for about $30-000 a mile. It happens that Mr. Schreiber was wrong. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) complains of the delay and says that after nine years this road is not completed. The legislation for the road was not passed until late in 1904. The elections were held that autumn, the actual work of surveying did not commence until 1905, and I think the first contract was not let until 1906. According to my recollection work was done on only a small proportion of the line until 1907. The Minister of Finance (Mr. White) complains that we commenced at the wrong end of the road. Take the physical conditions of the country and see where you would commence to build the road. They commenced building at Moncton, at Edmundston in New Brunswick, at Chipman, at Plaster Rock, at Levis, at Cochrane and at Fort William. They commenced building this road at every point at which a railway crossed or intersected the proposed line of the National Transcontinental railway.

Now, it is about five hundred miles from Cochrane to Fort William and the government, in calling for tenders had stated that the contractors would have to push into the forest two hundred and fifty miles each way from lines of communication, the Minister of Railways knows very well that the schedule rates of the prices in the tender would have gone up fifty per cent. aye yes, or even one hundred per cent. The government took the ordinary reasonable course and they called for tenders giving a fair time in which to build the road. Hon. gentlemen opposite have complained that the road will be completed in New Brunswick first, but they must remember that the contracts for the New Brunswick portion of the line had been all let in 1906 before the unfortunate accident to the Quebec bridge, and at that time, it was believed that the St. Lawrence river would be spanned before the year 1912. The contractors had their plant on the ground in New Brunswick, and they were doing the work, and if they had been called off the damages against the government would have been enormous. It is always easy for people to be wise after the event, and to-night the Minister of Finance comes here and finds fault with the late government for not doing things which, in the light of past events, he thinks, should have been done, but I can tell him that were he face with the conditions of affairs which existed in 1905, 1906 and 1907, he would not have taken any different action from that which the government of the day took. As to the estimated cost, it is true that the rule was laid down in the Statute that the Transcontinental railway should be up to the general standard of the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Toronto, and we all know that the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Toronto is a water level road all the way. Of course, it goes without saying, that man could tell what would be the cost of building a road of that character through a country such as the Grand Trunk Pacific traverses, until he had the actual experience of building the road. Now, these gentlemen opposite know Mr. Schreiber better than I do; many of them have known him all their lives, and they must know that had Mr. Schreiber the faintest idea that we were going to build a road with a four-tenths grade from Winnipeg to Quebec, through the country traversed by the Grand Trunk Pacific, Mr. Schreiber would never for a moment, have said that such a road could be built for anything like $30,000 a mile. Well, the road has been built and it has cost more than Mr. Fielding or Sir Wilfrid Laurier, or any man in this House, believed it would cost. The figures given by the Minister of Railways on Wednesday night show that the road, when completed, so far as the actual construction of the road is concerned, will cost $171,725,000, which, divided by 1,803 miles, represents $95,000 a mile.

Mr. BORDEN. That does not include interest.

Mr. CARVELL. No, that is for the construction of the road proper. I admit we have to pay interest.

Mr. COCHRANE. And under the contract they are to add the interest for seven years.

Mr. CARVELL. I appreciate that.

Mr. COCHRANE. And that adds to the cost of the road.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, so far as interest is concerned, and, therefore, the road if it be a success must pay interest on the interest as well as on the actual cost.

Mr. BORDEN. As I understand it, not only by custom, but also by the terms of the contract, interest must be calculated.

Mr. CARVELL. I am not begging the question at all; I am admitting that according to the contract you must add the interest to the cost of construction for the purposes of the interest earning capacity of the road. The Minister of Finance tells us that there will be about $3,500 per mile of interest annually and he does not believe that the road can pay that interest. Well, I am not a railway manager and, therefore, I cannot give an absolute answer to that from experience, but I think I can give a pretty good answer from the experience of other roads. I find on looking over the annual report of the Canadian Pacific railway for 1909 that there was of capital stock, preference stock, consolidated debenture stock, and mortgage bonds, outstanding at that time, $372,000,000.

Mr. BORDEN. How many miles of road?

Mr. CARVELL. About 9,000 miles of road at that time. I think I am safe in saying that on that the Canadian Pacific railway pays in dividends and interest from six to seven per cent annually. They are paying a higher rate of interest now but for the purposes of calculation I will take the figures as they were then. Thus it will be found that the Canadian Pacific railway in the 9,000 miles, including branch lines, cheaply constructed lines of every kind, roads that do not pay, hundreds of miles of railway that never paid; all included they are paying about $2,500 per mile interest, and we know they have a surplus sufficient to pay if they wish to, another $2,500 per mile interest.

Mr. LENNOX. Does that include their land sales?

Mr. CARVELL. It does not. I, therefore, say that the earnings of the Canadian Pacific railway to-day are sufficient to pay $5,000 per mile interest. But says the Minister of Finance, the Grand Trunk Pacific is going through a district that is not settled, and that I admit, but I leave it to the Minister of Railways who knows the country traversed by the Grand Trunk Pacific, if it is not a far better country than two-thirds of the country travelled by the Canadian Pacific railway from Winnipeg to Montreal. There are a few more people on the Canadian Pacific railway from Winnipeg to Montreal than there will be at first on the Grand Trunk Pacific line, but I am told by engineers who have been in that country that it includes a territory five hundred miles long by two hundred miles wide and that it contains a gread deal of the finest arable land on the continent, so that the country traversed by the Grand Trunk Pacific will assuredly be the home of thousands, yes, of millions of people, in the near future. This railway traverses a wooded country from 150 miles east of Winnipeg to Quebec and on down through New Brunswick, and does any man tell me that a road traversing a country like that will not earn as much as the Canadian Pacific railway does between Winnipeg and Montreal?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Do not the figures which my hon. friend has given include the hotel system, and the steamship lines?

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think they include the steamship lines. They may include the hotels, but they are a mere bagatelle, and I presume they are run at a loss. But even if the figures do include the steamship lines, there is such a margin every year that the line will still pay $4,000 to $5,000 a mile and have a surplus. The Canadian Pacific railway has grown rich through transcontinental business. Take away the transcontinental business which that company gets at Winnipeg and I do not suppose they would feel like maintaining the tracks from Winnipeg to Montreal; and what is true of the Canadian Pacific railway will be true of the National Transcontinental railway. It will cover just as much territory west of Winnipeg; it will get just as much freight to haul; it will have just as much business to do; it will have just as much return traffic; it ought to be in a few years just as big an institution from a business standpoint; and if the Canadian Pacific railway can pay $4,000 or $5,000 a mile of interest, I do not see how any man can say that the National Transcontinental cannot pay $3,500 a mile. But there is something else that my hon. friends fail entirely to recognize in discussing this question. It has been stated by some hon. gentlemen, and strongly intimated by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), that this road has cost too much. I deny that, and I say that it would be a misfortune for Canada if this road had cost one dollar less than it has cost, provided that cost has been honestly expended.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman refer to the last $10,000,000?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, I will include that as well, although I was not referring to it at the time. I will say that the last $10,000,000 was well expended. When that road is completed, it will be the best asset the Dominion of Canada has ever had or will have in the lifetime of any living man. Perhaps there are not many gentlemen here who have taken the trouble to investigate the earning possibilities of a road with a grade of only four-tenths of one per cent, as compared with the ordinary grade of from 1 to 1½ per cent, which is to be found on all the other roads in Canada. I have taken the trouble to investigate certain sections of road. The Canadian Pacific railway, from Montreal to St. John, which is indicative of the ordinary roads through Canada, can transport, with the best engine it owns to-day, about 600 tons of freight per train. Take the same engine and put it on the International railway from Montreal to St. John, and it will handle hardly 1,200 tons. The same engine, put on the Grand Trunk Pacific from Quebec to St. John, with the assistance over two short pusher grades, will transport over 2,000 tons under exactly the same conditions. But take the same engine from the Rocky Mountains to Quebec, without a pusher grade of any kind, and it will transport over 2,000 tons. That is done with the same coal consumption, the same trackage cost, the same overhead expenses. You have three times the earning capacity in the one case that you have in the other. When you have millions of tons of freight from the great west—because that is where the freight comes from for the Canadian Pacific railway and for the Canadian Northern, and will come from for the Grand Trunk Pacific—does any man tell me that when the Canadian Pacific railway can pay interest of from $4,000 to $5,000 a mile, this road will not be able to pay $3,500 a mile? One has only to state the proposition to demonstrate how unreasonable is the argument of the Finance Minister. Then, you have the undeveloped local traffic which will be developed. You have a thousand miles of primeval forest through which the road will pass; you have a thousand miles of territory which has hardly yet been invaded by man; you have all that lumber to transport and all the supplies to go in, and the men to develop that great industry. I come next to the question, has this road cost more than it should cost? Unless my hon. friends contend that it has, they must admit, if they would be logical, that it will be the greatest carrier ever built on the continent, and I believe in the world, for its length. I wonder if these hon. gentlemen know the kind of road that this road will be when completed. Some of them have seen the prairie sections of the road, but very few have seen that portion from Winnipeg to Moncton. I have not had the privilege of going over the whole, but I have gone over a considerable portion of it—on handcar, on flat car and on engine, therefore I think I know something of what I am talking about when I say that I believe there is not such a road in America, and I know there is not in Canada. It will be absolutely complete when handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company two or three years hence. The grading is absolutely perfect. There are probably two or three times the number of culverts that are to be found on an ordinary road, and all of concrete or stone. Nothing has been saved in the way of drainage, or in the way of road-bed ballast; the station houses are to be complete; every mile will be fenced with the most secure and substantial fence. Now, the Minister of Railways and Canals made the statement that in his judgment, or in the judgment of somebody else nearly $8,000,000 will be required in the next eight or nine years for betterments on this road; and just here the minister will perhaps tell me whether these figures are the estimates of Mr. Grant or not. I would like to know if that statement of betterments came with Mr. Grant's sanction?

Mr. COCHRANE. I am not sure whether it was by Mr. Grant or Mr. Leonard.

Mr. CARVELL. I have nothing derogatory to say concerning Mr. Leonard, but I want to tell my hon. friend that these figures would appeal to me with very much greater force if it came from Mr. Grant rather than from Mr. Leonard. What I am trying to get into my hon. friend's head is that there never was a road built in Canada or the United States like the National Transcontinental. I do not believe that Mr. Grant ever made the statement that the road would require nearly nine million dollars of betterments in the next ten years. Therefore you can cut out that $8,000,000 with one stroke of the pen, and you will be perfectly safe in doing so. Now, I come down to the next branch of the case; that this road cost more than it should cost. That is a very important question, because it is all very well for the Minister of Finance to get up here in a pessimistic manner——

An hon. MEMBER. Optimistic.

Mr. CARVELL. No, pessimistic, and say the people are not disposed to treat this matter lightly, and that they believe there has been a great misappropriation of money in the classification of the road. Does the Finance Minister know that the original contract provided for a commission to settle this question of classification, and that a committee of three of the ablest engineers in Canada——

Mr. AMES. Blockers.

Mr. CARVELL. I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the statement that Mr. Schreiber, Mr. Grant and Mr. Kelliher are three of the ablest blockers in Canada.

Mr. AMES. I thought you referred to the commission.

Mr. CARVELL. Will my hon. friend withdraw the statement?

Mr. AMES. Certainly.

Mr. CARVELL. I am glad of that, because if the hon. gentleman had been listening he would not have made the statement he did. It is in the same class with the statement he made last Wednesday night, when he said that the curtain has rung down on the gentlemen responsible for building this road and that they should go into oblivion as soon as possible, and that if hey were allowed their liberty they should be grateful. I have not any brief to defend the gentlemen who formed that commission, but I think that so far as honesty is concerned and their dealings with the people of Canada, their records will bear comparison with many of their traducers.

Mr. CURRIE. Was there not over classification discovered on the Transcontinental railway?

Mr. CARVELL. We have had an investigation of the classification by a committee of this House, also by a board of arbitration, consisting of Messrs. Kelliher, Grant and Schreiber, and what is the result? That out of some fifty or sixty million dollars on classified work on this road, they cut out in district F, about $300,000 or $400,000, and I think in district B, something like $150,000.

Mr. COCHRANE. How much on the Winnipeg section?

Mr. CARVELL. That is district F, about $300,000. Anyway, it is less than half a million. I want to tell my hon. friends opposite that not 5 per cent. of that was the result of over-classification, but was due to a change in overbreak The arbitration held that the engineers had allowed too much for overbreak, and therefore, it was not a matter of overclassification. In plain English the contractors had taken out too much excavation, they removed more material than was necessary, and were not entitled to be paid for it, and a reduction was made of from $300,000 to $500,000. In district B there was also a slight reduction due to overclassification, and with these three exceptions so far as I know, there has not been one dollar taken off the engineer's estimate for classification and overbreak.

Mr COCHRANE. Why have they not paid the contractor?

Mr. CARVELL. What contractor?

Mr. COCHRANE. The contractor west of Cochrane, there is a dispute in regard to that contract yet.

Mr. CARVELL. I want to tell my hon. friend that so far as the arbitrators have gone, that is the net result of their investigation. He and his friends here may rest assured that no investigating commission will ever take off anything appreciable from the charges, by reason of classification or overbreak. More than that, when this investigation is finished, you will be surprised to find out how nearly the results will agree with the results returned by the engineers of the late Transcontinental Commission.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope so.

Mr. CARVELL. Furthermore, I tell the minister that he cannot probe the New Brunswick end of the Transcontinental too carefully to suit me, and every member from that province, and also to satisfy every contractor on that line, to say nothing of the commissioners. I know the excellent condition of things he will find in New Brunswick, and the same good results will be found all over the remainder of the road. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that this railway has cost too much. Do they take into consideration the fact that three fourths of the cost consist of labour which has gone up from thirty-five to fifty per cent. in the last seven or eight years?

Do they also consider that supplies have advanced from 25 to 30 per cent. in that time? Do they also consider the fact that a line with a four-tenths grade has been constructed?

Mr. COCHRANE. Does not the hon. gentleman think that labour is dearer than when the road was started?

Mr. CARVELL. I know it is; I don't 'think' it.

Mr. LENNOX. But that would hardly account for it, would it?—in view of the fact that these contracts were let at schedule rates before the rise in the price of labour took place? These contracts were made as far back as 1905, I presume. In that case the rise in the price of labour would hardly account for what the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. CARVELL. To some extent it would, because there was labour that was not anticipated at that time. It would be interesting if we were able to make a comparison between the cost of this road and other great roads on the continent. But I am afraid that only the railway companies themselves could give us the exact figures. But we can get somewhere near the matter, and I propose to give my hon. friend some of the information that I have been able to extract from the authorities whom I have consulted. I have here statistics on railways in the United States and Canada furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission down to 1908. Let us consider the case of the Canadian Pacific railway. The commission gives the amount of outstanding stocks and bonds and other securities in 1908 as $327,675,000. This makes an average of $58,000 per mile. So far as the bonds and debenture stock and the preference stock are concerned, I am satisfied that they sold at par. So far as the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway is concerned, it is almost impossible to tell what it realised for the road. We know that the first $25,000,000 was sold as low as 25 per cent, 35 per cent, or 50 per cent. But we know also that later issues have sold at par, and the latest was sold, I believe, at 160. Average it up and you will find that the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway has produced pretty near par, and, of course, the bonds have produced par. Now, admit that the stock and bonds of the Canadian Pacific railway produced par, and you have an average cost for the 9,154 miles of this system at that time—including branch lines, colonization roads and all the rest, of over $58,181 per mile.

Mr. BORDEN. Does that include rolling stock?

Mr. CARVELL. I cannot tell; it is not shown here. We know that probably some part of that issue was spent for rolling stock, and we know certainly that millions of earnings have gone into rolling stock and into betterments. I have acknowledged that it is hard to get accurate figures; I give the committee the best I have got. If they are not logical and reasonable, then they are worth nothing. If we admit that $58,000 a mile would be a reasonable amount for the main line on the basis of these figures, then consider something further. We gave the Canadian Pacific railway when it was incorporated about $35,000,000 or $40,000,000 of completed works; that is a matter of history. We also gave them $25,000,000 in cash. And a few years afterwards we loaned them for the purpose of completing their road, $30,000,000 in cash. We know that these three items went into the main line. You have a total there of $95,000,000 to be divided over 3,000 miles in length of the main line, or about $32,000 a mile extra. Add that to the $58,000 already given, and you have $90,000 for the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway—as compared with $95,000 for the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth). Was not the $30,000,000 returned?

Mr. CARVELL. Of course it was.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth). Was it not paid out of the capital stock of the company?

Mr. CARVELL. No.

Mr. WILSON (Wentworth). Are you sure?

Mr. CARVELL. No. I have admitted that these figures are only the best I can find. There have been stock transactions and earnings that have gone into the road, and it is pretty hard to form an accurate estimate. But if I am anywhere near correct, you have $90,000 a mile as the cost of the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway. But no man would tell us for a moment that the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway is anywhere up to the standard of the main line of the Transcontinental. We know that it has not cost so much money, and it ought not to have cost so much money; it has not the transportation facilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific; it is not in it for a moment with the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now, these figures bring us down to 1908. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) could tell better than I can something of what the Canadian Pacific has spent in bettering their lines since 1908. I can speak about the branch line on which I live, which runs from Macadam Junction to Perth. They spent on that since 1908 over $1,000,000 or $10,000 a mile. And this on a branch line. We know that they have spent two or three millions in the west tunneling through the mountains. We know that they have spent immense sums in the great viaduct at Lethbridge. We know that they have practically rebuilt the main line since 1908.

Mr. WILSON. (Wentworth). But all this is included in what the hon. gentleman has already doubled up three or four times.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman has not listened to me. I have told him that these figures are down to 1908; and now I am giving him facts to indicate that tens of millions have been spent since then. Yet the road has never got up to the standard of the Transcontinental and never will, it is impossible. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not like to listen to these figures. And no wonder. They say that the road has cost too much, while we contend that it has not. And we put forward the facts that we have the greatest road on the continent, a road that has been honestly built, every dollar of which has been honestly expended. We court the fullest investigation. And when you have an investigation, as I hope you will, the commissioners will report to the government and the government to the country that we have the finest road on the continent, a road that will pay interest from the day it is handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific. And it will not be more than three or four years before hon. gentlemen opposite will be taking credit to themselves for this great proposition which will bring such benefit both to the east and to the west.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. White) says that if the road had been completed, we should not have had the grain blockade of to-day. I am not prepared to assent to that statement, but, on the other hand, I will not quarrel with him. If we had the road completed we could handle grain that is not now handled. If the Canadian Northern railway were completed, the same would be true. But all this bears out the wisdom, the statemanship of the right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) of the government under which this work was inaugurated. It all bears testimony to the leadership and ability of the men who are building the road and the good judgment they have exercised not only in starting the building of the road when they did but in starting to build that kind of line that is being constructed. Nothing will go down in history which will redound more to the credit of Canadian stasesmen than this great Transcontinental will to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was leader of the House at that time. I want my friends opposite and their friends throughout the country to address themselves, if they can, to this aspect of the case. If they can prove that this road has cost more than it should have cost, I shall be perfectly willing to admit the corn and say that we are wrong. But until we have evidence of that I stick to what I have said —that this road has not cost a dollar more than it should have cost or a dollar more than the people will get results for.

There is another thing which these hon. gentlemen seem to forget. And that is that this money has not been given away, as the money was given away by the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway.

I am not going to find fault with the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway. I want to bear testimony to the fact that it was one of the great works of one of the great men of Canada. Without the Canadian Pacific railway the great west would not have been opened up. But when you compare what the Canadian Pacific railway has cost this country with what the Grand Trunk Pacific has cost, the latter pales into insignificance. We gave the Canadian Pacific railway $25,000,000 in money, $40,000,000 in constructed work, and 25,000,000 acres of land. Those 25,000,000 acres of land have been partly sold, I think they have about 10,000,000 acres left.

Mr. COCHRANE. What were they worth when we gave them?

Mr. CARVELL. What are they worth now? Suppose they gave away the 15,000,000 acres that are gone, and they have only the 10,000,000 acres left, why, these 10,000,000 are worth $300,000,000 to-day. They have got probably $200,000,000 out of what they have sold, or $100,000,000 any way; so we have given them altogether $400,000,000 worth of land. They have given all that away to the Canadian Pacific railway in addition to the $65,000,000 or $70,000,000 given in actual cash or in constructed works. What have we done? The very worst case which even the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) can make out is that we are losing $60,000,000 in interest. But remember that we are getting a splendid piece of property, a property which is ours, it is not the property of the Grand Trunk. We are building a road for ourselves, we own every rail and every sleeper in it. We are leasing it to the Grand Trunk for forty-three years, for which they pay interest on it, and at the end of fifty years they hand us back our property in the same condition in which they received it. Does any one mean to tell me that at the end of fifty years this road will not be worth the $200,000,000 we are putting into it? I would be ashamed to call myself a Canadian if I did not have sufficient faith in this country to believe that in fifty years that road will be worth $500,000,000. I consider it was the most magnificent trade the late government ever made. The greatest bargain they ever made for the country, for the present and for posterity, was when they were able to induce this company to go into the construction of this road. It will not cost the country more than $60,000,000 interest at the end of fifty years, and the $60,000,000 interest will be paid back three or four times over by the appreciation in the value of the property. Now if I am right in my arguments and if I am right in my conclusion, then I say the Minister of Railways is not justified in dismissing from office those three commissioners who have so honestly and so earnestly attempted to carry out their important work in the interest of this country. Is it not a piece of political spite, which is almost too small to be expected from men who have just come into office? Would it not have been better to wait a little while and investigate? But no, it seems that the place hunters were so powerful that something had to be done and it was necessary to dismiss these commissioners from office.

Mr. COCHRANE. Where does the Bill speak about place hunters?

Mr. CARVELL. It is like the rest of the commission. They take a man who has occupied a subordinate position for six or seven years, and for some reason was unable to get promotion, and they have promoted him and given him $2,500 a year more than he got before. I want to tell my hon. friend he will be the first man to regret the course this government is taking in removing from office the men who know the conditions, and who have had oversight of this work down to the present time. I want to tell him something else that he doesn't know; he does not realize the fight these commissioners have had with the Grand Trunk and with the contractors.

Mr. LENNOX. I never heard anything of that. We only heard of this commission fighting for the contractors, and against the country all through.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend has not been so far behind the scenes as I thought he had been. Let me tell him this, the commissioners did fight for the country and against the contractors, and there is hardly a contractor on the line that does not feel he has been improperly treated, because the commissioners have held them down, and have not allowed them to make the profits they hoped to make. The hon. gentleman will know this before very long. For these reasons, I feel that this is ill advised legislation, and the minister would do well to reconsider the rash step he has taken, and not proceed with this Bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I have listened, as a new member, with a great deal of interest to this debate, and to what has been said by those responsible for what I think is one of the most gigantic public crimes that has ever been perpetrated in the history of Canada. It is amusing almost to listen to the remarks that are made to justify the action of the late government with regard to the Transcontinental railway. As I listened to the last speaker (Mr. Carvell), I was impressed with the remarkable knowledge of detail and insight he seemed to have of this question from the contractors' standpoint, for a man who is not in any sense interested in the work.

Mr CARVELL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to insinuate that I am interested?

Mr. STEVENS. I was saying that I was very much surprised to note the intimate knowledge the hon. member had in discussing this question. I was going to say, when he interrupted me, that I must compliment him upon the means he has taken to secure that knowledge, riding up and down the line on a hand car, a locomotive, or a flat car, studying the situation. Possibly if we had had the privilege of studying the question as intimately as he has done, we might be able to speak with more authority on the details of the construction. But I would like to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of this statement of the Minister of Finance, that here is a road which we were told a few years ago, was to cost a certain figure and we find out that it has cost aproximately five times that figure. I also want to call attention to the contradictory arguments that have been presented by hon. members opposite on that question, compared with their statements made a few days ago, with regard to the condition of crops and grain in the Northwest. One set of hon. members tell us they don't care about a railway that connects the prairie provinces with the eastern and western waterways, they only care about an outlet to the south. On the other hand, it was the proud policy of the leader of the late government, in bringing forward his Bill for the construction of this railway, that it was to join the east with the west of this continent. I submit that these arguments are entirely inconsistent. We claim on this side of the House that our policy has been consistent throughout, our policy is to give the prairie provinces relief at the earliest possible moment. As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, that portion of the road from the prairies eastward to Cochrane has been practically neglected.

Further, the western portion, which would have given an all-the-year-around outlet for the grain to Vancouver and Prince Rupert is scarcely started. That was to be completed in 1911, and there is only constructed a few miles from Prince Rupert eastward, and a short distance through the Yellowhead Pass. There is an outlet which could have been easily completed in 1911, and which would have given a very material relief to the congested conditions of the grain areas of the prairie provinces.

The hon. gentleman has told us in criticising the action of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that all the facts in connection with this railway have been before this country for 4 or 5 years. If they were aware of these facts why is it they did not once raise their voices to have the road completed at an early date? They complain about adding interest to the cost of the road although there has been a delay of two or three years. Any business man will agree that in any constructive work until that work is completed and revenue producing, you must charge up to capital the interest on the money during construction and the longer you delay the time of construction the greater will be the amount of interest charged up. I protest that that interest must be added to the cost of construction which thus becomes $130,000 per mile. Some comparisons were made. The hon. member stated that the Canadian Pacific railway had issued $350,000,000 worth of stock, debentures and preferred stock.

Mr. CARVELL. I stated $170,000,000. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), asked me if steamships were included in this estimate. I find they were to the extent of $18,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS. Take a total stock debenture issue of $350,000,000 and it comes to $37,500 a mile. That also includes the rolling stock, a very material factor, and includes betterments down to 1908. Another very unjust statement was made by the hon. member. He included the $30,000,000 which had been repaid, and must necessarily have been repaid out of the capital stock of the company or the proceeds of its sale. So the Canadian Pacific railway cost $37,000 a mile, and the hon. member should keep in mind that when the Canadian Pacific railway was built it went through a practically uninhabited wilderness, it was an engineering feat that was thought to be an impossibility, and one of the great members of the Liberal party said that the Canadian Pacific railway would not pay for axle grease. As a matter of fact the Canadian Pacific railway has been a national and a financial success, and has not cost anything like the figures suggested by the hon. member, whereas with all the facilities for transportation of supplies which the present line has to within a very short distance of the actual construction, this road is costing $130,000 a mile, and the hon. member does not think it is costing a cent too much. The question is so simple and plain to the people of this country that it is viewed as one of the most gigantic public crimes in the history of the country.

Speaking of the land grants to the Canadian Pacific railway, if we were discussing the construction of that railway now I would strongly oppose the granting of a large land bonus but it is well-known that when that road was under discussion the land grant was not only a necessity but the land given was practically valueless, and was so until within the last few years, when, with the development of the country it has assumed considerable value. The hon. member believes that it has a value of $30 an acre and when he asks us to accept these statements it would be well for him to look at the figures of the Grand Trunk Pacific in their present light and not in the light of other days.

Hon. members should remember that two sections of the road that should have been completed two years ago, are scarcely commenced, and that is one of the reasons and the chief reason why we now have such congestion in the west, and I trust that the present Minister of Railways and the present administration will see to it that the Pacific division of the National Transcontinental railway and the division from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, are pushed to an early conclusion in order to give us this relief, which is so much needed in the west.

Mr. OLIVER. The minister might have given more light on the portion of the road remaining to be completed, as compared with the charge which he puts in his estimate.

Mr. COCHRANE. I think I have given a pretty clear detailed statement.

Mr. OLIVER. But he has not explained the reasons for that detailed statement. The details are there but the reasons for them are not. I am not a railway builder or the Minister of Railways, and I must say it seems peculiar to me that a road which has been ironed for over 1,400 miles and which has been graded for nearly 1,600 miles, still is only two-thirds completed so far as cost is concerned. That is rather a peculiar statement and calls for some explanation. It must be that my hon. friend has in some way secured an adjustment of the figures which is not apparent upon the face of the statement.

A road that is within less than twenty-five per cent of completion, should not cost thirty-three and one-third per cent to complete, and yet that is the statement the Minister of Railways puts before us.

Mr. COCHRANE. There is one item of nearly nine million dollars for the terminals in Quebec.

Mr. OLIVER. Precisely, and that is what I want to come to. The Bill before us is a question as to the propriety of decreasing the number of members of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and our discussion has been on the merits of the policy of the government. It has seemed good to our friends on the other side of the House to lay blame upon the members of the commission because of what they are pleased to call the shortcomings in the policy of the late government. Now, I want to know from the minister if this large charge which he puts in here as the prospective cost of the Quebec terminals is properly chargeable to the commissioners whom he proposes to discharge.

Mr. COCHRANE. The head engineer gave a signed statement there, and he was the head engineer under the late commissioners.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not questioning the figures. Will the minister listen to me, and follow what I am trying to get him to tell me. I am not questioning that the terminals will cost the amount stated here, but I am asking him if he is charging that the ministers are responsible for that proposed expenditure.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have not charged the commissioners with one single thing; I have not even criticised the commissioners.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not use the word 'charge' in the sense of the minister alleging anything against the commissioners. What I am asking him is whether he says there is anything wrong in the action of the commissioners, or of the late government with respect to these terminals.

Mr. COCHRANE. That you will have to settle between yourselves.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think there is anything to settle about it. There is no question whatever that it is a matter chargeable to the government and not to the commissioners. The whole argument of gentlemen opposite has been that because the railroad has cost so much the commissioners must be to blame.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am not blaming the commissioners.

Mr. OLIVER. Not to push this argument too far, I think it would be more decent for the minister to make allegations against the commissioners he proposes to dismiss rather than to present a Bill to the House providing for their dismissal, and have his followers on the back benches make insinuations which they cannot support, and which the minister does not dare to. I think that position is absolutely unfair. If these men are being dismissed for fault, let the minister get up and say so, and if they are not being dismissed for fault, I think it is absolutely improper that his followers should get up and make insinuations against the commissioners. Of course, criticism of the policy of the late government is perfectly legitimate; the late government must stand or fall by its policy and take the consequences, but it is not right that the commissioners should be charged by the supporters of the government with that for which if blame there is, the late government was to blame and not the commissioners. There has been nothing brought before the House to warrant the purpose of this Bill. If the suggestion is that the commissioners have been incompetent, there has been nothing brought before the House to show them incompetent, and if the suggestion is that two men can handle the completion of this railroad better than four, I submit that that yet remains to be shown.

Mr. COCHRANE. It is a question of policy.

Mr. OLIVER. As to the suggestion that these commissioners were being dispensed with to save expense; my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) was very strong on the point that we had now a government of economy and the Minister of Railways was going to economize on the Transcontinental Railway Commission by dismissing three of these commissioners. But, as a matter of fact, we have two men on salaries to-day equal to the salaries paid to two of the late commissioners, so that all the Minister of Railways is saving is the salary of two of the commissioners and not even of three.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is not a fair statement, because the other man got $5,000 a year, and he was in the employ of the commissioners before.

Mr. OLIVER. I suppose the gentleman in question is not double; he is still discharging the same duties as he was discharging before he received extra pay?

Mr. COCHRANE. The same duties.

Mr. OLIVER. Is he discharging the same duties as he discharged before, or is some one else discharging these duties?

Mr. COCHRANE. We have not taken on any one else.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not able to understand what the position of the Minister of Railways is in this respect, but we need not quarrel about that. At the present time we have two men doing administration that was done by four, and the two men are getting the same salaries as two of the four were getting. That is unquestionable.

Mr. BORDEN. It is not true in that sense.

Mr. OLIVER. Well I have made my statement which appears to be a statement of fact, and we need not delay all night on that question. There are two men to-day administering the business of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and these two men are drawing the same salaries as the two other men who previously assisted in that administration. I suppose that is right.

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, but one of these men is also doing the same work for which he was paid $5,000 a year before.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, either he was doing very little work before, or he is doing very little extra work now. If he was doing $5,000 worth of work in the position he previously occupied he is not able to discharge these duties and take the position of Assistant Chief Commissioner and earn $7,500 a year in that capacity. If the change has been made it is because it means that somebody else will have to be hired to do the work that Mr. MacPherson formerly did, if the work is to be done efficiently. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the use of talking about administering the expenditure for the completion of this Transcontinental road by one or two men less or more; there is a stupendous work to be done; there is a stupendous amount of supervision to be exercised, and, unless, you have the men to exercise that supervision it is not going to be well done and there is going to be loss and not gain. If the men who have been commissioners have been dishonest or incompetent then certainly they should not remain in their positions, but, presuming them to be honest and competent there is nothing in the argument that they have been dismissed as a measure of economy. It is true that two-thirds of the total expenditure has been paid on the Transcontinental road and that one-third only remains to be paid. But is it not also a fact that it is in closing up the expenditure that the greatest necessity exists for experienced supervision? Is it not also true that as the work of construction is being closed up, there will arise the question of the operation of certain sections of this completed and partly-completed road, and is it not advisable and desirable, in the interest of the country, that there should be commissioners of experience and of reliability to take charge of the arrangements for traffic as well as for construction? Instead of there being less work to do, there is more work to do, of a kind that men of the standing of the commissioners are most capable of doing. It is not now merely a matter of construction; it is a matter of being sure that the work has been properly finished, and of making traffic arrangements that will be both for the benefit of the country and for the benefit of the road itself.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. member is aware, is he not, that those traffic arrangements are all laid down in the statute and in the contract, and that if the Grand Trunk Pacific company sees fit to take over a portion of the road as it is completed, it can do so; and if it does so, the statute provides that it shall take it over on the same terms as the whole, that is, on the basis of 3 per cent. There is no difficulty about arranging anything, because it is all arranged.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no difficulty about arranging anything except that somebody has to arrange it. Nothing has ever been laid down in a statute that has not required some intelligence to carry it out; and our experience is that in coming to arrangements with railway companies, it is absolutely necessary that there should be a high order of intelligence and of regard for the public interest employed on the side of the public in making these arrangements, or the public will get the worst end of the deal. So that instead of there being less need for four commissioners, there is more need now than there has ever been in the history of the road; and unless it is asserted, as it has not yet been asserted by anyone in responsible authority, that these men were either incompetent or dishonest, there is no ground whatever for the provisions of this Bill, and the Bill is on its face not in the public interest.

As to the policy of the government and its responsibility in connection with the construction of this road, I was not a member of the late government when the arrangement was made, but I was a member during the greater part of the period of construction, and I want to say that the late government is prepared to take the fullest possible responsibility for its cost. The late government is prepared to take the fullest responsibility for the bargain with the Grand Trunk Pacific company and for its results as far as it has gone. As the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said, the present government must take the responsibility for the completion of the enterprise. The late government cannot be charged with any extraordinary expenditure that may take place from now forward; but for what has been done the late government is absolutely responsible and is prepared to take the fullest responsibility, and for my part, I have no apology whatever to offer. In my humble judgment, it would have been a crime against Canada if the eastern section of the Transcontinental railway, extending from Winnipeg to Moncton, had been constructed on any lower standard than it has been. If the present government can find any way of constructing railways without paying for them, they will certainly have found a good line for the benefit of the country. The late government never made that discovery; they were able only to get what they paid for, and in doing that they considered they were doing their duty by the country and the country was doing well. Now, there was no other way of getting a first-class road from the prairies to the seaboard than by paying for it; and whether the present leader of the opposition was mistaken or not as to what it would cost, makes no difference whatever in the ultimate result. The country needed the construction of that railway; the late government entered upon that project; the railway is now being constructed; and no government could exist in Canada that would not carry that project to completion, according to the standards of construction which have prevailed up to the present time. When my hon. friend came to office, his first act was to call off work on that construction, but he put it back again very quickly. If he ever had any intention of stopping construction, he got inside information on the subject very soon, and he decided wisely that the work should go on.

Mr. COCHRANE. Where did they call off the work?

Mr. OLIVER. It was announced in the press.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am not answerable for that.

Mr. OLIVER. I am glad to know that my hon. friend did not call off the work, but an announcement to that effect was made in the newspaper press supporting the party with which he is associated.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am not responsible for that.

Mr. OLIVER. At any rate the announcement was made and it was not denied. It was announced that he had called off work on the Hudson Bay railway, but he took another think after that and gave orders for it to be restarted.

Mr. COCHRANE. If I had known what the port would be, the project would have been pressed much faster, but the hon. gentleman and his friends did not have any port to start with.

Mr. OLIVER. We did not have any port to start with and my hon. friend has not got any port yet although he has ordered the construction to go on.

Mr. COCHRANE. You are not sure of that.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes I am absolutely sure that the Minister of Railways has not decided which port the railway is going to. I am not so sure that this work is to be recommenced. But the newspapers have announced the fact, and the minister has not stated that the newspapers were mistaken.

Mr. COCHRANE. I do not contradict everything in the newspapers any more than I contradict a lot of statements which are made in this House.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sure the House would be interested to have a statement from the minister on the subject.

Mr. LENNOX. Let us go on with this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. The minister introduced the question of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman introduced it himself.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg the Prime Minister's pardon. However, if the minister does not see fit to answer a question in regard to a matter he introduced himself that is his business. I must say he seems to have a great lack of information in regard to the business of his department.

Mr. COCHRANE. I gave too much, that is the trouble.

Mr. OLIVER. In regard to a necessity for the early completion of this railway I do not think there should be any question about it. We are all agreed that the railway must be completed at the earliest possible moment and according to the standard laid down in the contract.

Mr. ARTHURS. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) did not say that a few minutes ago. In that respect you differ from him.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes the member for Pictou most decidedly said that we could complete it according to any grade we liked.

Mr. ARTHURS. The hon. gentleman said a few moments ago that we were bound to complete it according to the standard established by his government, and that no government could stand that would do anything else. That is quite a different idea.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all. I say that this government, although its supporters are to-day criticising the policy under which the road was constructed, up to the present time do not dare to change that standard of construction, although as the member for Pictou said they have the privilege of doing so if they dare. But they do not dare. The Minister of Railways had no hesitation in calling off the contract on the Hudson Bay railway, and I suppose he could do the same on the Transcontinental as well. I have made the statement that all the criticism that has been levelled against the bargain made by the government, and the carrying out of that bargain by hon. gentleman opposite, falls to the ground in the face of the fact that they themselves do not dare now to deviate from that standard, and are compelled by public opinion to build the road according to it, although the expense may run to the figures that they have placed before the House. Therefore there is no accusation against the members of the late Transcontinental Commission, nor against the late government in regard to this policy.

Mr. ARTHURS. Will the hon. gentleman say that the railway as so far completed is up to the standard of the Grand Trunk Pacific as set forth in the agreement with that company?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS. I do not think so when a large amount of spruce ties have been used by the Grand Trunk Pacific for hundreds of miles along their line.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know what my hon. friend is talking about, and I do not think he knows himself. I heard a reference to spruce ties. May I ask to what part of the line that applies?

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). To the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. OLIVER. If the hon. gentleman had said that I would have understood him. Now in regard to the standard of this road and in regard to its serviceable character, one would have thought from what has been said that no one had any control over the construction except the Transcontinental Commission or the government. According to the bargain made, this road is to be built to be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and if it is a fact, as the Finance Minister assured the House, that the Grand Trunk Pacific cannot earn the interest upon that cost of construction the company will have to go bankrupt, although I presume the Grand Trunk Pacific Company know their business as well as the Minister of Finance knows it, or the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). The Grand Trunk Pacific must know their business as well as these gentlemen know it for them, and if they saw, from the cost of construction, that they were not going to be able to operate their railway and pay interest, surely they would have had something to say about the matter before now. But as a matter of fact the Grand Trunk Pacific Company are absolutely parties to that standard of construction, because the company wanted that standard and know that they have to pay the interest on the cost. They are aware what the cost is from time to time, because their engineer has to pass upon the cost of every foot of the line. Now these hon. gentlemen have entertained the House at great length upon this question. I do not want to characterize their style of argument, because I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you would call me to order if I did. But when they say that the management of the Grand Trunk Pacific have so little knowledge of their business and so little regard for it that they would assist in carrying on that construction according to that standard with the results that they have suggested to this House, if they could impress the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company or the Grand Trunk Company with that idea there would surely be a change of management very quickly. The reputation of the management of both companies is that of men who thoroughly understand the railway business, and are able to make dividends out of railway traffic.

And I think that, so long as that matter is in the hands of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent that it is, with the responsibilities resting upon the Grand Trunk Pacific as they do, these hon. gentlemen may make their minds easy and not worry about the ultimate result to the western producer or the eastern consumer, or producer either.

The prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific, it is said cost $40,000 a mile. Did the government pay that $40,000 a mile? The government guaranteed the bonds on $13,000 a mile, and the railway has to find the balance of $27,000 a mile in order to have a railway of the standard of this road across the prairies. Why do they make a road of that high standard when they could have a road across the prairie for $13,000 to $15,000 a mile? Because they believed it would pay them to do it and just so they believe it will pay them to have the road from Winnipeg east to Quebec and Moncton of such a standard as it is. For that standard is absolutely with the consent of the Grand Trunk Pacific. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has joined forces with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) as the champion of the interests of the northwest. And he has added his word of advice to those of a good many other members of this House as to what the man in the northwest ought to do. Some people advise the man in the northwest to go into mixed farming; some people advise him to build granaries; some people advise him to raise chickens. But the Minister of Finance advises him to be an optimist.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I said he is an optimist.

Mr. OLIVER. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the man of the west lives on optimism, he is very much mistaken. If he thinks the western farmer is such an optimist that he likes to pay high railway rates, likes to have his grain tied up so that he cannot get it out, likes to be in such a position that he cannot pay his bills, likes to be compelled to pay an extra price for everything he buys—then my hon. friend is mistaken; the western farmer is not that kind of an optimist.

Mr. STAPLES. Why did you not remedy the difficulty during the fifteen years you were in power?

Mr. OLIVER. The Liberal government went out of power on a policy that meant remedying that condition; that is the very thing that put it out of power. And the late government has no apology to offer and no regrets to express that it went out of power on that issue. But never mind about the late government; it is to the present government that the people look for that relief which, according to their policy, this government denies it. My hon. friend told us that the late government was responsible for the grain blockades in the west because this Grand Trunk Pacific was not completed to Cochrane.

Mr. SHARPE. Because you did not build the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. STAPLES. Did not do anything.

Mr. OLIVER. If the road was completed to Cochrane, does not the hon. gentleman know that the grades on the Ontario railway from Cochrane to North Bay are such that the Grand Trunk Pacific to Cochrane would be only half the value that it would be otherwise ?

Mr. COCHRANE. That is only what was built by the Ross government.

Mr. OLIVER. No, what was built by my hon. friend's (Mr. Cochrane) government.

Mr. COCHRANE. No, the Ross government; that is the only grade there is.

Mr. OLIVER. At any rate the facts are as I have stated, that that road has to be completed to the city of Quebec according to the grades laid down before the whole line will be of the fullest benefit to the people of the west. It is true the road is not yet completed. It is also true that hon. members opposite, led by the present Prime Minister, held that arrangement up in parliament for one solid summer, held it back for a whole year; and that if that obstruction had not taken place in 1903, and if the same rate of construction had gone on that rules to-day, the road would have been linked up between Superior Junction and Cochrane. This connection would have been made and would have proven valuable to the people of the west had it not been for the obstruction on that occasion.

There is no question that the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific will be of stupendous benefit to the west. There is no question that the Canadian Pacific railway which offers to-day the only connection, is a road of such grades and curves that no amount of money will ever make it so that it can haul grain to relieve the conditions that exist there to-day. The Canadian Pacific railway is not able to move two hundred cars a day over its line from Fort William eastward; and because of its inability to do this, it is not able even measurably to relieve the grain congestion that exists at this time.

I was struck with the argument of the hon. Minister of Finance. At one period of his discourse he was explaining to us the fact that this Transcontinental railway running through the undeveloped country would have no local traffic, and in the next breath he complained because of the lack of optimism in regard to railway construction. Now, let me say to my hon. friend, who lives in Ontario, and represents Ontario more especially, that the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific through this very region that he talks about is the only thing that will add serious value to the greater part of that province of Ontario. If northern Ontario has any future at all that future will be absolutely created by the construction through it of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Furthermore, my hon. friend told us of the outlets that we should have, to the west, by Hudson bay, and to the east. A magnificent prospect, he said; a magnificent prospect truly; and every part or element of it a part of the policy of the late government, the very policy that he and his friends have been criticising and speaking of as a crime against Canada on this occasion and on previous occasions in this House.

Mr. COCHRANE. The Ontario government subsidized the Canadian Northern before you did.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not speaking of the Canadian Northern railway, but of the Transcontinental. The Canadian Northern railway is another issue altogether. I say that the Grand Trunk Pacific is opening up what is called the clay belt of northern Ontario and giving value to that part of the country, at the expense of the Dominion government, and as a part of the policy of the late Liberal government.

Mr. COCHRANE. You could not get there without going through Ontario, could you?

Mr. OLIVER. I presume it is just as desirable to open up Ontario as it is to open up any other part of the country, and if Ontario has 16,000,000 acres of valuable clay land in the northern part of the province, it is just as much a national enterprise to open that up to settlement as it is to open up any other part of the country.

Mr. COCHRANE. Ontario can open that up herself.

Mr. OLIVER. Ontario did not, and under the present government, never would. There is no doubt that the people of that northern part of Ontario to-day are so ill satisfied with the measure of development they received at the hands of the Minister of Railways and his colleagues, that they are to-day asking to be erected into a separate province in order to get their share of the Dominion subsidies to enable them to carry on their local business.

Mr. NICKLE. Is the hon. gentleman aware that in the last local election recently held, the present government carried thirteen seats out of 14 in new Ontario?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, I am; I am not aware, however, of the methods by which they carried them.

Mr. BORDEN. A word or two with regard to some matters the hon. gentleman has mentioned. He told us that the late government had no apology to offer for their defeat at the last election. Well, I am sure the country has no apology to offer for defeating them. He has stated that this contract was held up by a policy of obstruction in 1903. Is he aware at what date that contract was introduced?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not recollect the date at the moment.

Mr. BORDEN. He had better examine the dates before he makes a statement of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER. What was the date?

Mr. BORDEN. The date was the 30th of July, and the session opened on the 12th of March.

Mr. OLIVER. When did it close?

Mr. BORDEN. It closed on the 24th of October, within two and a half months after the greatest measure of the session was introduced, within two and a half months after effective discussion began on it. My hon. friend refers to that as obstruction. I say there was no obstruction, and the hon. gentleman has no warrant to say otherwise. The hon. gentleman has misquoted gentlemen on this side of the House very often in the course of his remarks. He said that hon. gentlemen on this side referred to the building of this road as a crime. They did not refer to it as a crime, they did refer to the inexcusable delay and the methods of construction as a crime, and I entirely agree with them in that estimate.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the Prime Minister then specify the criminal in the case.

Mr. BORDEN. I say it is absolutely inexcusable that they did not begin the construction of that road eastward from Superior Junction. Why was it any more difficult to do that than to undertake the construction of the road westward from Quebec? Can any hon. gentleman explain that? Why was it any more difficult to begin the construction of the road from Winnipeg eastward, than to begin the construction from Levis towards Moncton, or from Moncton towards Halifax? There is no distinction. Yet the hon. gentleman stands here, when he sees the result of that, and upholds the course of the late government, which undoubtedly now is having very serious consequences.

Mr. OLIVER. There must be some misunderstanding. I am under the impression that the construction was commenced eastward from Winnipeg.

Mr. COCHRANE. It was the Lake Superior division.

Mr. BORDEN. I am referring to the particular portion of the road where there is now no prospect of completion within about two years, from Lake Superior to Cochrane.

Mr. CARVELL. The right hon. gentleman must be in error. I know they commenced the construction from Winnipeg towards Superior Junction.

Mr. BORDEN. I am referring to the whole line from Winnipeg to Cochrane. There cannot be that outlet from Port Arthur to the east, which is absolutely necessary under present conditions.

Mr. OLIVER. But that is from Superior Junction eastwards, not from Winnipeg eastward.

Mr. BORDEN. I see no reason why that road from Superior Junction to Cochrane could not have been proceeded with in just the same way as the road between Moncton and Levis.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman said from Winnipeg.

Mr. BORDEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did inadvertently use that expression. I was referring to that particular portion of the line that will not be completed for a year or two.

Mr. OLIVER. I asked the Prime Minister, if there was a criminal, who was the criminal?

Mr. BORDEN. Why, my hon. friend and his colleagues.

Mr. OLIVER. Then it was not the commissioners ?

Mr. BORDEN. No, I will come to that at once. I stated here before that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals did not come here either to censure or to commend these commissioners, and the leader of the opposition nodded his approval, when I made that statement. He took the responsibility of introducing this measure as one which he thought to be in the public interest, having regard to the condition of the road, and having regard to the capacity of the man whom he placed there as chairman of the commission. This controversy about the work of the commissioners has entirely arisen, as pointed out before, because hon. members on the other side of the House raised the question as to a certain allowance which should be made to these commissioners upon their retiring, and in the course of urging that this should be done, undertook to express very great commendation of the work which these gentlemen have performed. We had not criticised or said anything about them up to that time, but naturally, when that commendation was expressed, in possibly somewhat extravagant language, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took exception to it, and in that way, the criticism has arisen, and it was solely due to the course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have not come here, nor has the Minister of Railways come here, to commend or censure these commissioners; but we take the responsibility of saying that, having regard to the state of construction of this road, we think it eminently in the public interest that it should be completed under the man who has been appointed as chairman of that commission, and we take full responsibility. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was not, it seems to me, quite as fair as he usually is, when he made the statement with regard to the assistant to the chairman. He undertook to say that we proposed to pay the salary of two commissioners instead of four.

When any hon. gentleman undertakes to refer to place-hunters in respect to this commission, I want him to understand that the chairman of that commission very reluctantly undertook that work at my urgent and earnest request, and at the earnest request of the Minister of Railways. He did not seek it at all, he was not desirous of it, and the salary is a matter of absolute indifference to him. Every one who knows that gentleman knows that no such expression as that should have been used in regard to him.

Mr. OLIVER. I hope my hon. friend does not think I used it.

Mr. BORDEN. Some hon. gentleman used it.

Mr. COCHRANE. You used it.

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Not with reference to the chairman.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not know if it was with regard to him, but it was used. As a matter of fact, if we had followed the example of hon. gentlemen opposite we would have filled up the number of the commission even although we thought that it should not be done. We reduced the number of commissioners from four to one, and appointed a man to whom the salary is a matter of utter indifference and who took the position simply with a desire to perform a public service against his own interest and inclination. As to Mr. Macpherson, he was being paid before $5,000, and is being paid now $7,500, an increase of $2,500. In addition to the duties he was discharging before he is now discharging certain other responsible duties. From what I have heard of him, I believe he will give good value to the people for every dollar of salary which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) proposes to pay him.

The hon. member for Pictou made some rather remarkable statements about the report placed on the table by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) and used language with regard to it which means one of two things, either that the man who prepared it is incapable, or that he is dishonest. The man who prepared that statement is a man appointed by the late government by order in council and the observations of my hon. friend in that regard are deserving of consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD. To what does the hon. member refer?

Mr. BORDEN. I cannot quote his language but my hon. friend will see it in 'Hansard.' He criticised the statement in such terms as would indicate that the man who would make a statement of that kind to be submitted to parliament is not a man to be kept in the position he occupies.

Mr. MACDONALD. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend will see his language in 'Hansard.'

Mr. MACDONALD. I said the House was entitled to information as to how the three items were made up. I made no remarks of any kind on the subject beyond requesting that information. One hon. gentleman said he was our appointee. I said that that had nothing to do with the information I wanted.

Mr. BORDEN. I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but that is not how the matter impressed me, and if his statements are justified they are surely deserving of the attention of this government, and that necessary attention will be given to them.

Mr. MACDONALD. What about the information and the details as to the three items, headquarters' salaries and expenses, engineering expenses, and right-of-way?

Mr. BORDEN. We asked the man appointed to this responsible position by the late government for accurate and definite information in respect to these matters. If these items are not correct then that man appointed by the late government is responsible for their inaccuracy.

Mr. MACDONALD. That answer was never good enough for the hon. gentleman when the tables were turned.

Mr. BORDEN. In what case?

Mr. MACDONALD. In any case.

Mr. BORDEN. If my hon. friend will give a case I will be very glad to deal with it. All I have to say is that we have been relying on the statement of the responsible officer of these commissioners who was appointed by the late government. We are entitled to rely on that until it has been demonstrated to us that he is inaccurate, and we have presented the statement to the committee exactly in the manner in which he has presented it to us. My hon. friend repeated several times in the course of his speech that this road had been completed to the extent of 76 per cent. There is absolutely no warrant in this statement for any such assertion.

Mr. MACDONALD. What is the meaning of the statement at the top of the page?

Mr. BORDEN. Exactly what it says, that the grading has been completed to that extent, but the hon. member knows that other matters are involved besides grading. When he says that the road has been completed to the extent of 76·86 per cent, he says what has absolutely no warrant in the statement produced, and he used that statement to make an argument which was absolutely unfair and improper from the statement as a whole. As a matter of fact, the road has not been completed to the extent of 76 per cent. The grading has been completed to the extent of 76 per cent, the track has not been laid in anything like that proportion and any one who examined the items in this report will see that in several unimportant respects three-quarters or nine-tenths of the work still remains to be done. Take the terminals at Quebec, $508,500 have already been expended, there remains to be expended more than $9,000,000. Take car shops with their equipment, $1,171,000 have been expended, and there are $1,120,800 still to be expended. When any hon. gentleman finds fault with the report of this engineer, who is the engineer appointed by their own leader by order in council, and criticise his statement that the betterments during nine years from January 1, 1912 to December 31——

Mr. CARVELL. I asked the Minister of Railways positively if Mr. Grant made that statement, and he would not say he did it, and I am satisfied it was Mr. Leonard who did it.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend criticised it and wanted it struck out altogether.

Mr. CARVELL. I did.

Mr. BORDEN. I would give to my hon. friend some information. The Grand Trunk Pacific has been completed and in running order from Winnipeg to Edmonton for I think about two years and has been carrying grain; and it is estimated and I speak of what I know, that within the next two years the cost of betterments upon that road in order to complete it up to standard, will be just about the amount mentioned here as being required to be expended on this road within the next nine years.

Mr. CARVELL. It was not completed when it was taken over.

Mr. BORDEN. It has been in operation for two years carrying grain.

Mr. CARVELL. They commenced operating it before they had it completed.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the minister give an idea of the nature of the betterments?

Mr. BORDEN. If my hon. friend will apply to the Grand Trunk Pacific and they will take him into their confidence they can give him full particulars as to what the proposed betterments are because in my statement I am relying on their representations and that is precisely the statement that was made to us with regard to betterments that ought to be made upon this road during the next two or two and a half years. That road from Winnipeg to Edmonton is, I suppose, not much more than half the length of the line from Moncton to Winnipeg and the betterments proposed on that road in the next two or two and a half years are about equivalent to the sum which has been estimated by some one, Mr. Leonard or Mr. Grant, as being necessary to effect upon this road during the period of nine years after its completion.

Any hon. gentleman in this House who is familiar with the ordinary subsidence of embankments, knows that no matter how perfectly you may build an embankment in the first instances, it will require repair and betterment in order to bring it up to a standard when it will subside no more. You cannot build a road in the first instance so that it will absolutely require no betterment for a number of years.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps there is a distinction between betterments and repairs.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not familiar with the technical distinction but I do say that no matter how well you may build a railroad in the first instance, it is absolutely necessary for some years afterwards to spend money upon it for the purposes I have mentioned. That statement will commend itself to the common sense and judgment of every hon. member present.

I would like to allude to one other matter; a great deal has been said about the original contract with the Canadian Pacific railway, and the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has informed us that the country gave away $800,000,000 according to his estimate, in land value. But, a great many hon. gentlemen who speak of that contract forget that their own leaders between 1874 and 1878 proposed a contract by which not 25,000,000 of acres but 50,000,000 of acres would be given away to any company that would construct the Canadian Pacific railway. If we apply the principle of valuation which my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) adopted, then the government of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie of which the present leader of the opposition was a member, was prepared to give away lands in western Canada worth $1,500,000,000. I would not be prepared to make any such absurd argument as that.

Mr. CARVELL. Neither would I.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend estimated these lands as being worth $30 per acre.

Mr. CARVELL. I said that the ten million acres remaining to be sold were worth $30 an acre and I say so now.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend made an estimate of $800,000,000.

Mr. CARVELL. I did not say so. I said that the ten million acres still remaining were worth three hundred million dollars and 'Hansard' will bear me out in that.

Mr. BORDEN. I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman; I understood him to value these lands at $30 per acre.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, the 10,000,000 acres remaining to be sold.

Mr. BORDEN. And I am simply remarking that if you applied the $30 per acre valuation to the 50,000,000 acres of land that were offered by the Mackenzie government——

Mr. CARVELL. But I did not apply it.

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. STAPLES. The hon. gentleman denied a statement the other night and 'Hansard' showed he was wrong.

Mr. BORDEN. Perhaps I had better put it this way so as not to wound the feelings of my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell). If you apply a valuation of $30 an acre to the 50,000,000 acres that were offered by the Mackenzie government you would have a sum of $1,500,000,000. I trust the statement in that form will not offend my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL. I don't object to that.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to point out that section 8, subsection 3, of the Act which the Mackenzie government passed through this parliament, provided that a subsidy of $10,000 a mile for the 2,544 miles from North Bay to Vancouver, making altogether $25,440,000. In addition to that the Mackenzie government also offered a guarantee of interest at the rate of four per cent. for twenty-five years from the completion of the work, on a sum to be agreed upon. As a matter of fact, the arrangement that was made by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald for the building of the Canadian Pacific railway was an infinitely better arrangement in the interest of the people of this country than the arrangement proposed by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. Of course to-day, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House can talk glibly about lands that are worth $30 an acre, but those who know what the actual conditions were at the time the Canadian Pacific railway was commenced in 1882 know that the Canadian Pacific railway would have been glad to hand these lands over at that time for fifty cents an acre; it would have been glad to get twelve and a half million dollars instead of the 25,000,000 acres of land. Every one in this country realizes that the conditions were then absolutely different from what they are to-day. It is true that the lands did become very valuable afterwards, but in considering the fairness and reasonableness of the contract, we must estimate the conditions which confronted the country and the Canadian Pacific railway in 1882 and not the conditions as they are at the present time.

Well, we have wandered a good deal from the line of argument applicable to this Bill and perhaps some of my own observations are not pertinent to the actual question before the House, but I can only say that it is the belief of the government that the course which they are adopting in respect of this commission is in the public interest, and that the road can be effectively completed under the chairmanship and superintendence of Mr. Leonard. No effort will be spared to hurry that road on to completion, and especially that part of it which is necessary in order that there may be a line from Winnipeg to the east to afford an opportunity to the people of the western country to get their grain out more effectively in the future than they have been able to do in the winter months in the past.

Mr. CARVELL. I would like this information from the Minister of Railways. I do not want to be offensive, but I do hope he will not tell me again that the figures are Mr. Grant's. I know they are Mr. Grant's figures, but the hon. gentleman is here as the responsible head of the department, and we, as members of this House, have a right to ask for further information before the third reading of the Bill. For instance, in the statement submitted to the House, we are told that the rails and fastenings, including frogs, switches and diamond crossings already completed amounted to $10,214,000, and that there remains to be done of this, work to the extent of $2,995,000, or in other words there is about thirty per cent of that work uncompleted. If you take the total mileage completed of 1,587 as against the total mileage of 1,803, you have only twenty-two per cent of that work to be done and perhaps the minister will tell us wherein the discrepancy comes. There is only twenty-two per cent of the track to be laid and it will cost thirty per cent of the total cost to do that.

Mr. COCHRANE. I do not admit your statement. There are the terminals and the sidings. We gave you the actual mileage where there is no track laid.

Mr. CARVELL. I am not including the 287 miles of sidings. There is also another point on which my hon. friend will probably bring us further information, and that is in regard to the item of 'engineering and expenses.' I find that under that head they have spent already $7,681,000, and that the estimate is given that it will cost $3,850,000, or just exactly half as much is to be expended as has been expended.

Mr. COCHRANE. We won't spend one dollar more than is necessary.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend will surely allow me to ask him a question. He states that they assume that they will be able to hand the road over by the 31st of December, 1913, in other words, in two years. The engineering end of this road has been in operation since 1905, that is, between six and seven years. Now, will the hon. gentleman tell us how his department figures that in two years we are going to require just half as much as we did in the last six years. The same thing applies to the headquarters expenditure, which in the last six years has amounted to $1,732,000, and they expect to spend in two years $1,260,000.

Mr COCHRANE. The hon. gentleman had better put in the right of way.

Mr. CARVELL. The right of way has not been settled in the same proportion in which the road has been built; yet I am satisfied that a good deal more than half of it has been settled. I am not finding any fault in regard to that. I think the Minister of Railways should not assume the attitude he does, because we have surely a right to ask for information. I admit that he is not in a position to give it to-night, but probably he will be able to do so when the Bill comes up for the third reading.

Mr. BORDEN. I would remind my hon. friend that the information he asks for can be easily obtained and will be readily given upon the estimates. It is not concerned with the passage of this Bill. We were asked to bring down a statement to corroborate the assertion of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, that the road was two-thirds or thereabouts completed. He has asked the engineer in charge of the work to make that statement, and it has been given, not only in general form, but in detail. So far as the expenditure of the money is concerned, that is a matter that can be dealt with on the estimates, when my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will be prepared to give the fullest information. We are entitled to rely on the statement of the engineer, appointed not by this government, but by the late government. Therefore I trust that my hon. friend from Carleton will be content to have the information when the estimates of the Department of Railways and Canals are before the House.

Mr. MACLEAN. (Halifax). That may be all very well from the viewpoint of the Prime Minister, but it is not satisfactory to the opposition. The Minister of Railways persists in sitting in his seat like a bump on a log, absolutely refusing any information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order !

Mr. MACLEAN. (Halifax). I did not intend to say that offensively, and if anybody on the other side thinks I did, I shall gladly withdraw it. But at least I wish to intimate to the Minister of Railways that he is not very courteous or free in giving information that is asked of him by the opposition. He is following the example of the autocratic gentleman who lives in Queen's Park, Toronto, and if he does not look out he will be the exact type of that gentleman.

Mr. COCHRANE. Thank you for that compliment.

Mr. MACLEAN. (Halifax). The Prime Minister says that the information contained in this statement is irrelevant to the Bill before the House. That is true, but I want to call his attention to the fact that pretty nearly every hon. gentleman on the other side who has spoken on this Bill has urged, as the ground for the dismissal of some of the commissioners, that the road has cost too much. In fact, after the statement of the minister the other night, the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) took the floor, and, with great indignation and in tones of contempt, declared most vehemently against the commissioners, who he thought were very lucky to secure a mere dismissal and in not having some proceedings, civil or criminal, taken against them. Now, in addition to what is asked for by the hon. member for Carleton, I would like the Minister of Railways when the Bill is next before the House, to state whether it was intended by this statement to lead the House to believe that the first seven years of interest after the construction of the eastern section which is being handed over to the Transcontinental Railway Commission, was to constitute a part of the capital on which the government was to charge interest against the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. LENNOX. The contract says that it does not.

Mr. MACLEAN. (Halifax). I think it is quite clear that it is not part of the capital on which the interest is to be calculated; but I understood, from some hon. gentlemen who spoke this evening, that that seven years' interest was to be added to the capital. If the Minister of Railways is satisfied that it is not, I am content with that.

Mr. MACDONALD. I called the attention of the Prime Minister to the question of the legality of the appointment of Mr. Macpherson. I am very much impressed with the view that his appointment could not legally be made in the way it was, and I had hoped that when he spoke he would have dealt with that. Unless he is in a position to discuss that now, I would like to hear about it on the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE. With reference to the appointment of Mr. Macpherson, the law clerk of the Commission advised Mr. Leonard that he had the power to make the appointment. Mr. McIsaac, one of the commissioners, advised the same thing, and the Commission as a whole, in passing the estimates for the payment of Mr Macpherson, in that way confirmed it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not think that was good enough.

NATIONAL MEANS OF COMMUNICATION.

Mr. BORDEN. Order No. 28, Public Bills and Orders, is a resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). Since the resolution was last discussed there has been no opportunity of calling it except on one occasion when the Postmaster General had to be absent. The hon. gentleman is desirous of not being hampered by having the resolution on the order paper where it cannot be discussed without the consent of the House. I, therefore, move that order No. 28 be called for the purpose of having the resolution withdrawn. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) desires to discuss some of the matters that are embraced within this resolution. A day or two ago when he proposed to do that, the point of order was raised, and it was considered that with the unanimous consent of the House he might go on. However, I think it will be better to proceed in the regular way. It is for that reason I move the resolution.

Mr. OLIVER. Under what circumstances will the discussion come on?

Mr. BORDEN. The discussion will come on at any time the member for Rouville is desirous of raising it, when we go into Supply as I understand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I do not understand that the member for Rouville would have the bringing up of the subject. I was debating the subject and was going to bring it up myself.

Motion agreed to.

Mr ARMSTRONG moved, seconded by Mr. Lennox, that order No. 28 be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA BOUNDARIES.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a resolution under the heading of government notices of motion in regard to the Manitoba Boundaries. Would it be possible to lay on the table the correspondence in connection with this matter, beginning with the conference that was held between the Premiers of Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and the Prime Minister of Canada, and covering the period from that time forward to the present?

Mr. BORDEN. I have already given instructions that the order of the House which has already been made in that regard, be complied with before the resolution is brought on.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. What is the order of business for to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN. We expect to take up government Bills, beginning with the Grain Bill, and after that Supply, proceeding with the estimates of the Minister of the Interior.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.50 a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RESTAURANT COMMITTEE.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved that the name of Mr. W. S. Middlebro be substituted for that of Mr. A. C. Boyce on the Joint Committee on the Restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Before the orders of the day are called I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday I asked the right hon. the Prime Minister as to whether or not an appointment had been made to the Supreme Court Bench of the province of Nova Scotia, and as to whether Mr. J. J. Ritchie had received the appointment. I ventured then to say that I hoped the report was true, but I see that 'Hansard' reports me as having said I hoped the report was not true. I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact, because the statement is so wholly at variance with my own statement that I do not wish it to go on record. I regard Mr. Ritchie as a gentleman of the highest qualifications, and I am satisfied that the government made a very wise choice in appointing him.

Mr. BORDEN. I distinctly understood my hon. friend to say just what he has intimated, that he hoped the report was true.

GOVERNMENT WORKS TOLLS ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 103) to amend the Government Works Tolls Act.—Mr. Monk—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. MONK. I explained when introducing this Bill that its object was to correct a clerical error in the Revised Statutes of Canada. Under the Public Works Act (R.S. c. 39, s. 9, para. (b)) the Minister of Public Works has the management of works for facilitating the transmission of timber, and matters incident thereto. The Government Works Tolls Act (which it is now proposed to amend) gives the Minister of Inland Revenue authority respecting similar works. It is desired that the Minister of Public Works shall have the authority in both cases.

COLLINGWOOD DRY DOCK.

House in committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to ratify and confirm an agreement between the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, and His Majesty, dated the 27th July, 1910, respecting the construction of a dry dock at the town of Collingwood, and to authorize the Governor in Council to pay an annual subsidy of three per cent. per annum for twenty years upon the sum of $306,965.18, being the cost of construction of the said dry dock.—Mr. Monk.

Mr. MONK. This resolution is presented to the House under the following circumstances:

On November 9, 1909, application was made by the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, for a subsidy, under the Act of 1908, to encourage the construction of dry docks, and specification and plans were submitted for a dock of the following dimensions:

Length over all..	420 feet
Width at coping	105 "
Width at bottom..	100 "
Depth on sill, low water	16 "
Depth of dock proper	22 "

While the plans, specification and estimates for this dock were under consideration by the department, with the object of arriving at the total sum upon which subsidy should be granted, the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, chap. 24, of the Statutes of 1908, was repealed by chap. 17 of the Statutes of 1910, which was assented to on the 4th of May, 1910. A recommendation was sent to council on the 4th May, and an order in council passed on the 11th May, 1910, authorizing the department to enter into an agreement with the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, to grant a subsidy on Dry Dock No. 2, of 3 per cent on $306,965.18, for twenty years. The Dry Docks Subsidies Act, chap. 17, of the Statutes of 1910, provides for the payment of subsidy on three different classes of docks, of which the third class is limited to a cost of not more than $1,500,000 with a subsidy of 3 per cent for twenty years. A third class dock must be 400 feet in length, 65 feet wide and 18 feet over the sill at ordinary low water when constructed in non-tidal waters. The Collingwood Dry Dock No. 2 possessed the necessary length and width, but was only 16 feet on the sill at low water, so that it did not qualify under the new legislation. As, however, the consideration of this application, made under the 1908 Act, had been completed before the passing of the Act of 1910, containing the new conditions, and as the dock was, in addition, at that time partially constructed, it was considered only fair that the dock should be subsidized and that special legislation should be introduced at the next session of parliament to enable payment of the subsidy. Accordingly, on the 17th May, 1911, a resolution was moved by the honourable the Minister of Public Works, as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to ratify and confirm an agreement between the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, and His Majesty, dated the 27th day of July, 1910, respecting the construction of a dry dock at the town of Collingwood, and to authorize the Governor in Council to pay an annual subsidy of three per cent. per annum for 20 years upon the sum of $306,965.18 being the cost of the construction of the dry dock, &c.

A draft Bill was also prepared, but was never introduced; the resolution still remaining on the order paper when parliament dissolved.

Under these circumstances the department is submitting the same resolution to the House. I do not think there is any doubt that the company is entitled to the subsidy under the circumstances.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and agreed to.

Mr. MONK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) to authorize the payment of a subsidy to the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE GRAIN ACT.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting Grain.—Mr. Foster (North Toronto).

Mr. MONK.

On section 96—regulations as to binning and cleaning—

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I wish to add a clause as subsection 2 of which I gave notice. This, I think, should be changed in the latter half, after the words 'any terminal warehouseman neglecting to comply within thirty days.' That seems a long time to give, and it might be well to strike out the words 'within thirty days' and insert the words 'within a reasonable time.' Thirty days seems altogether too long, and in some cases would be. In other cases thirty days might be too short if the improvements to be made involve a good deal of altering and changing. I do not see any better way of arranging it, except to say within reasonable time.

Mr. OLIVER. I would suggest that it be made: 'within reasonable time not exceeding thirty days' because in the rush of the grain season, unless the alteration can be made within thirty days there is no use making it at all.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I am quite willing to put that in. Then we will insert the word 'comply', 'within reasonable time not exceeding thirty days'. I move the adoption of the clause as amended.

Mr. OLIVER. The term used in the 'Hansard' report of the previous debate is 'punishable' not 'liable'.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The law clerk put in the other word as being a better legal term.

Mr. OLIVER. Before the minister leaves that page may I ask if he has come to any decision in regard to overages which is alluded to in subsection 7 of section 95?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The whole matter is under consideration. The overages for 1909-10 were considerable—more than considerable in fact. In 1910-11 the overages and shortages showed over the whole quantity of wheat which was passed through, probably 90,000,000 or 100,000,000, a balance of only about 35,000 bushels which is an almost infinitesimal percentage on the whole amount carried through. I am having the whole subject looked into now in view of establishing a basis as to what shall be done as between the shortages and overages. Of course we have a claim upon the elevator men for shortages, but they argue that if they make up the shortages they ought to be entitled to the overages. It is a perfectly allowable claim, I think that they should be entitled to the overages up to the amount that will balance the shortages. Over and above that there may be a question, but I am looking into the subject with my officers so as to come to a basis upon which this shall be regulated.

Mr. OLIVER. If you allow the elevators overages up to what would be a reasonable allowance for legitimate error in weighing, I think they could have no claim or right for anything over and above that, no matter what is done in regard to the shortages.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. Has the minister anything to inform the committee as to the effect of certificates on grain which passes through the States?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I am also taking that matter up with various officers of our own, and of the United States Chambers of Commerce in the different ports. I am getting complete information as to what the custom is all the way through from the time the grain leaves our border until it takes a ship either at New York, Boston or Portland or at any of our own ports.

Mr. OLIVER. There will be no result from that investigation so far as the Act is concerned?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). No. It will be a guidance for the future.

On section 104—offices in Winnipeg,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The next is section 104. I gave notice of that, and moved that a section follow to be denominated 104A. That section is to be found in 'Hansard.' It provides for an official Survey Board to be established for the district of Calgary in the western inspection division—for the manner in which that Survey Board shall be selected—and then applies the positions of other sections applicable thereto. The question raised the other day was as to whether it was wiser to allow the Survey Board to be appointed ultimately by the board upon competent persons being selected by the Board of Trade of Calgary. I think the hon. gentleman who raised the point favoured something like the plan that exists in the Survey Board towards the eastern end of the western inspection division. As I said then, that has worked out in practice to leave the work of the Survey Board completely with the members of it which were nominated by the Board of Trade of Winnipeg. The others having other business to attend to, and not being upon the grain exchange, find it inconvenient to attend and do not attend. In Calgary if you place two nominees from Manitoba, two from Saskatchewan and two from Alberta, the same thing would probably happen, and it would seem that if the board had the competency of the Survey Board within their own hands, there should be no difficulty in getting men eligible in Calgary, on the nomination of the Board of Trade, who would be perfectly fitted to act. There would be no objection, if it were thought best, to have the Minister of Agriculture of Alberta make the nomination. But even then, I think, it should be a person resident in Calgary. And, if it were not so nominated in the Bill, it seems to me you would have a supernumerary rather than a helpful member of the board. I think we should get all that is necessary, and in thoroughly workable form under the plan I have intimated here. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has any fixed convictions on this subject or not.

Mr. OLIVER. I have taken some interest in this provision since my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) brought it in the other day. Conditions in Calgary are different from those in Winnipeg. In Winnipeg, the grain trade interests a very large proportion of the business community, whereas the grain trade does not interest a large proportion of the business community in Calgary. Besides, Calgary, of course, is a much smaller place than Winnipeg. Therefore, we could not look for absolutely the same conditions surrounding the appointment of members of the Survey Board on the nomination of the Board of Trade of Calgary as in the case of those nominated by the Board of Trade of Winnipeg. For these reasons, I could think it desirable that the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan should have the authority to make nominations. I include Saskatchewan because it is expected that some Saskatchewan grain as well as Alberta grain will go through Calgary. I appreciate the desirability of the appointees being residents of Calgary; but I think that, perhaps, it might be wise not to require that by the terms of the Act. What I should like would be that the government of Alberta and the government of Saskatchewan should have the right to appoint two members each. It might be left to their good judgment whether they would appoint residents of Calgary or not. I have had discussion with parties well informed upon, and interested in, this matter, and they consider that six is not a sufficiently large board for Calgary. Under the provisions of the law no person is allowed to sit on a survey who is interested in the transaction under survey. With the small number of people interested in the grain trade in Calgary, and with a small board, it might be difficult to get a Survey Board in a position to act. Too many of the members of the small board might be interested in its transactions and, therefore, incapacitated from sitting. While it might seem that the large board is more cumbersome, it is not necessarily more cumbersome. On the contrary, it may be more workable and more available for work, provided the members are conveniently resident in the city where the transaction under survey takes place.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I quite see the point that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) makes. Part of it has weight, but he will excuse me if I say that the other has not quite so much weight. Calgary is not at present a grain centre such as Winnipeg, and it may be some little time before Calgary attains any such position. But all the aspirations and all the prospects with reference to the matter point to the belief that Calgary will, before very long, become a very important grain centre. And there will not be very much work to do until it has grown in importance, and it is very likely to grow in importance very quickly, depending upon the exits for grain which are available. It seems to me it would not be difficult to find in Calgary, where they have a population of 50,000 a large proportion of whom are business men, the material for a board of six. There is something, however, I think, in what my hon. friend says about responsibility. If one is appointed by the provincial government he is rather amenable to the responsible authority of that province. And if we include Alberta, Saskatchewan also should be included. There is no reason to include Manitoba, because Manitoba grain will probably not seek a market by way of the west. We must be sure to provide that a quorum is to be had, and non-resident members are a difficulty in that respect. If one happens to be interested in the transaction and, therefore, ineligible, and if there are two or three or four non-residents, the making of a quorum may be difficult. Perhaps it would answer if we make the board a board of eight and provide that the provincial government of Alberta and the provincial government of Saskatchewan shall each nominate one.

Mr. OLIVER. I should much prefer to have it two from each provincial government, but I would certainly rather have one than none.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Considering the number of the whole Survey Board, I should think that one from each province would be enough. I move the amendment of this section.

Mr. KNOWLES. Has the minister thought that in Calgary it may be difficult to find six people who are experienced in regard to the duties which will be put upon them under this Act?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have not thought so. If that were the condition, I should think it premature to erect a Survey Board there at all. They must have the six experts, but if they can find no people except those who are incompetent, those people will not be approved of, and so there will not be a Survey Board.

Mr. KNOWLES. I would not think that that was evidence of this being premature, because it is the interest of the grain trade which is dominant, and not that of the citizens of Calgary. The province of Alberta, with all due respect for it, is not a grain growing province such as Saskatchewan or Manitoba. Of course, it excels in other things, in which they do not excel. In line with what the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has said, and in addition to what I have said, we are to remember that the people of Calgary have not been trained in that kind of business. It is easy, of course, to criticise, but unquestionably it is more or less owing to the experiment of preparing for what we hope will be a great movement of our grain westward. I certainly do not wish to throw any obstacles in the way of that movement, but I doubt that you will find men who will sufficiently excel in the knowledge of the grain business to be appointed to this board.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I stand up for Calgary in that respect; I think there is enough both of ability and experience to be found in that city for the creation of this board.

Mr. KNOWLES. There is not an elevator in the place except those connected with the mill.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). They might not be good judges of elevators but they might be good judges of grain, and that is what they are there for. I think my hon. friend's fears are leading away his judgment.

On section 115.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I gave notice of a new section to be substituted for this one:

All good grain that has an excessive moisture, being tough, damp or wet or otherwise unfit for warehousing, shall be entered on the inspecting officer's book as 'no grade' with his notations as to quality and condition.

All grain that is unsound, musty, dirty, smutty, sprouted or contains a large admixture of other kinds of grain, seeds or wild oats, or from any other cause is unfit to be classed under any of the recognized grades, shall be classed as 'rejected,' with the inspector's notations as to quality and condition.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a very radical change from the old clause, and I am not quite clear as to the reasons for the change, that is, good mixed grain, or mixed grain of good quality, is changed from low grade to rejected. I would like to know on what ground that change is made.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The reason for the change is two-fold. In the first place, the custom has been all along to grade the grain, and it has so been known and graded as is set forth in the substituted section. The first has reference entirely to moisture, that is the prime element in it.

Mr. OLIVER. That kind of grain is brought into the rejected class.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It was left out of the first class, and is put into the class of rejected.

Mr. OLIVER. On the face of it, it strikes me that the change is hardly justified. I am not an expert in grain, but I would like to know the reason why the change has been made.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It has always been graded that way, that is the general grade all the way through, and it is better to have the law put in consonance with the practice. But I believe the contention is that the practice is the correct way.

On section 125: security by license,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That has reference to the bond. We had some conversation about it. I have given it considerable thought, and I propose to amend it in this way: The clause, as it reads, provides for a penal sum of not less than $10,000, and not more than $50,000. These are two arbitrary sums. There does not seem to be any principle which underlies the fixing of these sums. If you have a small elevator of 25,000 or 30,000 bushels, although I believe the smallest at Fort William at the present time, is about 65,000 bushels, you can tax it $10,000 and if you have one of 7,000,000 bushels capacity you cannot have the bond larger than $50,000. That appears to be unfair, and I have been making some inquiry about it. I think it is undeniable that the bond imposed upon these terminal elevators, which have very responsible duties thrown upon them and are restricted by very close laws and regulations, the strictness of which has been conditioned by the necessity of preventing violations, should be adequate to the restrictions and responsibilities. In the state of Minnesota I find that they have a bond proportioned to the capacity of the elevator and, on inquiry, I also find that the country elevator system in Canada is run at the present time, where bonds are required, upon that principle. The bond is proportioned to the capacity of the elevator and in so far as I can learn, the system has worked well. So, I propose to apply the same principle to the terminal elevators. But, I do not seem to have the amendment in the form in which I arranged it, and therefore, we will let this section stand in the meantime.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 126, subsection 8: grades not to be mixed,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The section as at present reads:

> In no case, whether in a terminal elevator in the western inspection division or in a public elevator in the eastern inspection division, shall grain of different grades be mixed together while in store.

I propose to add the words 'or public' after 'terminal,' so that it will read:

> In no case, whether in a terminal or public elevator.. . . shall grain of different grades be mixed together while in store.

I think that covers the whole question.

Mr. OLIVER. That is all right.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What is a public elevator?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). A public elevator is an elevator in which grain in inspected in, stored and inspected out again.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What is a terminal elevator?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). A public elevator may not be a terminal elevator. A terminal elevator must be at a terminal point, whereas a public elevator may be outside of a terminal point. Is my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) satisfied with this?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 132: no limiting of liability of warehouseman,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The section reads:

> No terminal warehouseman shall insert in any receipt issued by him any language in any wise limiting or modifying his liabilities or responsibility, except as in this part mentioned and except in so far as all parties concerned consent thereto.

I have on examination concluded that it is not right to leave these words in, and I propose to strike out all words after 'mentioned.' The warehouse receipt is a very important document, it embodies contracts and if you allow a plea to be put up that so and so has agreed to have it otherwise, it will lead to interminable confusion.

On section 151a,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I propose to add to 151 a subsection providing that seed elevators shall not be obliged to store grain for outsiders. It permits them to do so but does not compel them. While thus protecting the operators of seed elevators, we require them to be licensed and to come under supervision.

On section 159,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It was proposed to add a subsection to subsection 4, which provided that the owner of the grain shall have an absolute right of direction of the shipment of that grain for 48 hours after he has placed it in the elevator. On consideration I have decided that this amendment, which was proposed by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), does not give to the owner of the grain any right which he does not now possess under subsection 4.

Mr. OLIVER. I was not present at the last discussion of this section. I quite realize the necessity of the section, but it is a most arbitrary provision and an arbitrary provision in any law is liable to abuse and abuses have arisen. I am inclined to think that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Moosejaw would establish a principle that would be of some substantial advantage to the owner of the grain.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I am not a lawyer, but it strikes me in looking at the English of the section that the proposed subsection gives no more right of detention of the grain than is given under subsection 4. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to providing for 48 hours of absolute detention if the committee think it best, so as to give an opportunity to the shipper of the grain to change his mind and send it somewhere else if he can make a better sale; but this would not very often happen, as we find by experience.

Mr. OLIVER. The implication in the section seems to be that the elevator man, being subject to the requirement, would be prevented from shipping the grain before forty-eight hours had elapsed. The principle, I think, is sufficiently important to warrant us in recognizing the proprietary rights of the owner of the grain for a short period after he puts his grain into the elevator, so that the elevator man shall not be at liberty to ship it out say an hour after he receives it. This point is perhaps more important in Alberta than in Manitoba or Saskatchewan, owing to the possibility of grain from Alberta being routed east or west. It is for that reason that I am somewhat stronger on the point than my hon. friend perhaps thinks I should be.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will make an amendment which will make it obligatory on the elevator man to allow forty-eight hours to pass before the shipment is made. The farmer, of course, can waive that at any time.

Mr. KNOWLES. If it is made obligatory on the elevator man to give forty-eight hours' notice before the grain goes out, this provides all the protection that is given absolutely by subsection 4 of section 159.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If section 164 is passed as amended, it accomplishes everything that is necessary.

Mr. KNOWLES. I would call the minister's attention to the fact that his amendment in section 164 does not provide for the shipper waiving his right so that the grain could be sent off the very day it was put in if he wanted that done.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will see that the waiver is put into section 164 in the same way that it is in section 159.

On section 169—special bins,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I propose to strike out the words 'to any buyer' which should not be in there.

Mr. OLIVER. I think there is a mix up about this section that perhaps is not covered by the amendment my hon. friend proposes unless he has some other amendment.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have given some attention to the section and it strikes me as being all right. The owner is not allowed—which is provided for in another part of the Act—and he is not allowed to allot special bins for other purposes than those which are stated in the provisions of this Bill as to flat warehouses. He is restricted in two things, the time and the purpose. The purpose of these provisions was to allow farmers to get grain out as sound and quickly as possible.

Mr. OLIVER. The special bin in a flat warehouse is only granted to farmers?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is all.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sure it is not intended to restrict a bin in a country elevator to farmers?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). No it is not.

Mr. OLIVER. Yet that is what this section would do as amended. The provision of section 183 is made to apply to this section, and if that refers only to farmers in the case of a flat warehouse, it makes it apply also to farmers in the case of country elevators. I think under such circumstances it is an awkward construction, compelling a person who wants information to go to some other part of the Act to get his information fixed. I would suggest that the minister draft this section in order that it should convey the exact idea which he desires to convey.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). We will strike out the words 'to any buyer' and I will consider the point raised by my hon. friend.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 191—dimensions of loading platforms.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). This takes up the question of the loading platform which I promised to look into, to see if anything could be done to reconcile the warring factions. I now propose to insert the following after the word 'Board' in the 26th line, 'which shall be of such height, width and length as the board prescribes, provided that in no case shall the length exceed 100 feet nor the width 24 feet.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 207, special powers to board to order supply of cars,

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It is proposed to substitute for section 207 the section of which I gave notice, and which, I believe, has been printed. This amended section provides for all the cases of discretion permitted to the warehouse men, and now to the board under the Manitoba Grain Act, which is found in 'A' elevators that are in danger of collapse and in 'D' where there is a liability to heating, and also for the other two cases which were placed in Bill 96 which we passed in this House, which was passed also in the Senate, and is now in operation. It adds also subsection 'E' as follows:

(e) Whenever, after due examination, the board considers it necessary and advisable in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the despatch of grain.

I do not know that it is necessary to explain, after the discussions we have had upon the clause in the Bill which has become law, why this subsection (e) is added here. It would seem proper that the board, which has the whole range of the grain transport in its eye and under its management, should have this discretion vested in it. When, in any particular case it is represented that there is congestion, or the despatch of grain is hindered, the board may make due investigation, and if, after due consideration, it deems it necessary and advisable to relieve the congestion and facilitate the despatch of grain, it is given discretion and power to so order. The purpose is fully explained by the subsection itself. With reference to this matter many objections and representations have been made. One petition has been received from the Credit Men's Association or Business Men's Association, petitions which have been largely signed and numerous copies of which and signatures to which have come into the office, asking for the suspension of the car order provision. Now, the suspension of the car order provision is a very different thing from the granting of this discretionary power to the Board of Grain Commissioners, an extension of the discretionary powers which they, in the person of the Warehouse Commissioner, already have, and which we have extended by our legislation of a few days ago. The moment petitions were circulated and signed in favour of suspending the car order section of the Manitoba Grain Act the farmers and the shippers of grain, of course, were alarmed. They were in complete hostility to the suspension of the car order provisions, for they remembered the situation some years ago, and which was relieved for them by the enactments made in 1905. And they were properly apprehensive of having the provisions suspended or done away with even temporarily, for fear that the old conditions might be brought back.

Now on that apprehension, and with that view, numerous letters and petitions have been forwarded to the department praying that the car order provisions of the Manitoba Grain Act be not disturbed. These two different petitions have come in and have been considered. I made some remarks in reference to this the other day. Whilst there are very strong representations made that it would be more economical and more in accordance with the general purposes and operations of the railway companies in their transport system, to give them the fullest privilege and powers over the distribution of their cars; on the other hand the situation in the west is a peculiar situation. We do not propose for a moment to interfere with the present security of the farmer gained for him by that legislation. At the same time, conditions are various in the northwest, and changes take place from season to season; and with all due regard for those rights and their preservation, I think we will not make a mistake if we give to the Board of Grain Commissioners the restricted but added discretion that is provided for in subsection (e). If you examine the car order provisions and also the practical working out of the same, you can see they are not based on grounds of absolute equality of privilege. The provisions are such that every man who has half a carload of grain to ship, in conjunction with his neighbour who may have half a carload of grain to ship, has the privilege of calling for one car, and for one car only until all other orders are filled. The large farmer who has many thousands of bushels of grain just as valuable to him in its way as the smaller crop is to the smaller farmer, has the privilege of calling for and placing on the order book one car, and until all orders are filled he gets no other. The elevator which is patronized by the buyer, and by the farmer as well to a very large extent, and which serves as both store house and forwarder for the farmers' grain, though it may contain 25,000 bushels or 100,000 bushels, has the privilege of calling for but one car on the order book, and until his turn comes again he gets no more as an elevator company or as an elevator man. The same is carried out all the way through. It is not, then as I say, based on grounds of equality of interest. I am not here to argue that it ought to be altogether based on the grounds of equality of interest in grain to be shipped; for I think if there is any one who needs to be protected, any one who needs to be cared for especially, even to the placing of restrictions upon others, it is the far distant and isolated and small farmer, who is often but a late comer into the northwest, who comes with his hands, and his team, and has little of this world's goods, who may need advances to be made to him to buy the utensils and stock with which to work, who has often to ask the country storekeeper for sufficient provisions and supplies to keep him until his grain crop matures and can be sold.

That person, I think, not only has a right to our sympathy, but he has a right to all the protection that we can possibly give him consistent with the fair rights of others. I do not need to go into an elaborate discussion of this matter to show to this committee that these rights of the small farmer are not only his best possession, are not only the ground for his privilege of ordering a car if he has a carload, but that they are also preserved to him by the facility with which he can get storage and sale of his grain when it is impossible for him to get a car. I have read a good deal in the newspapers, and I have stacks of letters in my department which show the difficulties, and troubles, and the almost absolute necessities of many of the class of people to whom I refer, when after the summer's toil, and the autumn's reaping and the late harvest and threshing of grain, they are able at last to bring their wagon loads, or their half-wagon loads, of grain to the country station, to find that they cannot get a car, to find that the whole elevator capacity is filled, and that there is no purchaser for their grain because the purchaser has neither car to take away the grain nor elevator in which to store it. Then again, we have the conditions that arise with regard to some sections of the country as to frosting, as to late harvest, as to the dampness which ensues, and the like of that. These are cases when those who have the direction of affairs should specially strive to relieve those persons and those sections of the overplus of their grain when it can be best saved, and often when it must be quickly saved in order to prevent it from being a total loss. We propose to have a Grain Commission which shall be able, efficient, honest and broad-minded, and to that Grain Commission I am going to ask this committee to give the discretions which are provided in this clause.

Mr. OLIVER. This is a very important amendment which my hon. friend proposes; it involves a very important principle, and is entitled to the serious consideration of the committee. The legislation contained in this particular part of the Grain Act is, it may be said, very remarkable legislation. It undertakes to deal with the property of one man in the interest of some other man. It is the extreme of what might be called socialistic legislation; I think, perhaps, the most extreme example of socialistic legislation that is on the statute book of any country. It is for the protection of the individual against corporations, or an aggregate of corporations.

It need not be supposed for a moment that such remarkable legislation would ever have appeared upon the statute-books, or having appeared, would have remained there, had there not been the very strongest reasons why, in the public interest, that legislation should be maintained. It has been on the statute-book for a number of years, it has been bitterly opposed from the very beginning on one side and determinedly supported on the other. There is no possibility of the two parties to this, what might be called, irrepressible conflict, coming to any amicable agreement. There is only one thing to do, and that is to take sides with one party or the other, either to maintain the position which has been maintained in the legislation that is now on the statute-book and stand for the right of the individual, or give up that legislation and permit the corporation to have its way. I have heard what my hon. friend has said with regard to the propriety of giving full authority to the Board of Grain Commissioners. On the same principle that my hon. friend has stated to the House it would be just as right to say that we only need one clause in this Act, namely, to give the Board of Grain Commissioners full authority to manage the grain trade of Canada. We are not going to do that and my hon. friend is not proposing to do it. Within the compass of a very long and complicated Act, an Act of very remarkable detail, he is laying down what shall be done in this, that and the other circumstances and conditions. I will admit that this is a remarkable case, but the very fact that this legislation is remarkable is the very reason why the authority of this statute should be there to protect the right of the individual as the only means whereby his right can be efficiently protected and the only means by which he can have confidence in the protection of that right. It, of course, goes without saying that where it is attempted by legislation to interfere with the rights of property in such a remarkable manner as this Act does interfere with the rights of property and the course of trade and transportation, there can be no question but that there will be inequalities and, if you like, cases of injustice under its provisions. Many individual cases have occurred, and are occurring to-day in which it would have been much better if this Act had not been on the statute-book and transportation companies and grain dealers had their full liberty to transact their business as they might see fit. In many cases it would have been to the interest of the individual grain producer that that condition should have prevailed. That must be admitted and we cannot expect ever to have legislation of this detailed character that will not result in that way. At the same time from every part of the prairie country where people are raising grain there comes the same protest to-day as that which has come on every previous occasion against the abrogation of this, what they consider, safeguard of their right to a share in car distribution not according to the quantity of the grain, but according to priority of demand. I understand that during this present year, under the extraordinary circumstances, that have prevailed, there have been occasions when the warehouse commissioner has gone outside of the terms of the Act, and, in defiance of the Act, has ordered cars to certain places for the purpose of relieving the extraordinary conditions that prevailed there at the time. I am quite aware that the provision which my hon. friend proposes to insert in the Act, merely places, by authority of statute in the hands of the board, which is to be appointed, the right to do what has been done, under these urgent conditions without the sanction of law. I hold the view that although there is that precedent for this provision of the Act, it is still in the interest of the people who are the most intimately concerned that the Act should remain as it is. Even if relief, such as has been given during the past year, cannot be granted if the Act remains as it is, still the mind of the people of the west is that the Act should remain as it is and that there should not be that possibility of variation in its terms that my hon. friend suggests. There is a provision for variation in this section. It provides that in the case of an elevator in danger of collapsing or in the case of the grain in the elevator being in danger of heating, they shall have a right to a special order of cars. It would be quite right to add a provision as to a special order of cars in the case of distributing seed grain, but I must take exception and the very strongest exception, to any provision authorizing the ordering of cars to places where grain is damp and thereby liable to become damaged in accordance with the amendment made to the Manitoba Grain Act and to this further provision that cars may be ordered:

> Whenever, after due examination, the board considers it necessary and advisable in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the despatch of grain.

In the first case—that of sending cars specially to places where there is damaged grain—I consider that the provisions now in the section to deal with elevators in danger of collapse and elevators in which grain is in danger of heating go as far as it is safe for the Act to go. When we have provided, as we have provided in the case of the Manitoba Grain Act, that cars may be specially ordered to any locality where grain is damp, and liable thereby to become damaged, we have not dealt wisely with the condition as it actually prevails in this very season, because the condition prevails in so many localities and these localities are so widely separated that if special orders be given in the interest of each locality where grain is damaged it practically means that there is no special advantage to any locality and the matter is reduced down to the point of that locality which is the greatest favourite, or puts up the best story, getting the advantage, which is an entirely undesirable condition of affairs.

I will admit that under this provision it would be possible to give relief in a certain locality, but in such a year as this, where the damage is extended over a wide area, the provision is absolutely valueless, and inasmuch as it introduces the possibility of favouritism, I object most strongly to this provision being incorporated in the Bill. I agreed to its being adopted as a part of the Manitoba Grain Act for this season without having given the subject the fullest consideration; it was represented to be a matter of urgency and we allowed the Bill to go through; but on fuller consideration I am prepared to take the fullest responsibility for the stand I take that this provision should not be embodied in this Bill which is supposed to be a permanent statute. The provision now proposed throws this whole question, which is the most critical connected with the whole administration of the Grain Act, absolutely on the discretion of the board. If we do this, without wishing to cast any reflection on the board, we have spent our time for nothing in providing the long and intricate list of regulations which comprise this Act. If you can afford to let the matter of car distribution go to the discretion of the board we may safely leave everything else to the same discretion. I would be bound to give the strongest opposition I could to the amendment now proposed, except that I would be willing to agree to an amendment that would allow of special orders of cars in the case of distribution of seed grain.

Mr. STAPLES. I know that I may be criticised for what I am about to say, by the advisers whom we have coming from the west so frequently. The same organization who are taking such strong exception to any change in the present Grain Act as regards distribution of cars, have always been very anxious that in constituting such a board as this, we should have an independent board. Where are they going to get their independence, if you surround them with legislation that prohibits them from moving one inch to the right or to the left except by special Act of parliament. Certain districts in the west are suffering because they cannot get their crops to market, and if an independent board has the right to go to that particular locality, and as this Act provides to investigate, to make a thorough investigation, then such a locality could get relief. And why should the board not be permitted to give them relief without coming here and asking parliament, which would take probably a whole session; the board should have that much independence, and if they are not anxious to relieve the people's sufferings to the greatest extent then they are not fit and proper persons to be on that board.

My hon. friend has no objection to the seed grain portion of the Bill but he objects with regard to the damp grain. The law before Bill (No. 96) provided relief for whom? For the elevator man whose elevator was collapsing, whose grain was rotting or spoiling, or heating. Was there any relief for the farmer who might have on his farm 5,000 to 10,000 bushels of grain heating or spoiling? Bill (No. 96) provides that such a man can get relief, the same relief as the elevator man. That portion of Bill (No. 96) which deals with damp wheat or wheat that is going wrong, should be incorporated in this Grain Act. I cannot see any objection to incorporating the whole of it. I shall certainly support the minister in the amendments he has proposed.

Mr. KNOWLES. So far the committee have been very harmonious. We have had division on only one matter, the name of the wheat, which was more a question of opinion than of principle, and I want to congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite that so far they have shown a desire to meet the wishes of the grain growers for whom this Bill is in the first instance framed. On this question, however, we seem to part. The question between the western members on the government side and those on this side is whether we are going to give effect to the opinion and desire expressed to us by the organized representatives of the grain growers who constitute the great majority of our electors and without question constitute the foundation of the whole country in the west at least, There is no question as to what the grain growers in the west want. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sure, have received representations from many constituents requesting that they should support the view expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I would not be outside the mark if I said that they had received no representations to the contrary. As far as we are in a position to know the wishes of our constituents at this distance we believe their desires to be that there should be no radical changes in these clauses in connection with the distribution of cars.

My hon. friend from Macdonald says he wants to give this board powers so that they will be able to turn a little to the right and to the left. I have no objection to giving them power to turn to the right, but I do not want to give them power to make a blunder some day and turn to the left. There might be some occasion when they would do good by exercising this discretion. There is no Cabinet minister or ex-Cabinet minister in Canada who will question this statement, that in the administration of the laws of parliament or the regulations of a department, there are cases in which it would be in the public interest to depart from the law or regulation. In the administration of the lands in the west I have known many a case in which the homestead regulations bore heavily on a man, but at the same time the parliament of Canada is governing, not one man simply, but seven or eight millions of people, and we must adopt legislation which in the long run and on the large scale is going to be for the advantage of the great masses of the people. Would it be to the advantage of the grain trade of the west and of the people of Canada generally to have this clause inserted in this Act? I submit that it would not. I submit that it would be a step in a backward direction. This protection was only put on our statute-book after years of agitation by our farmers for this car distribution. It is not wholly satisfactory but it is in the right direction, and it would be a reactionary step to take away that protection.

Mr. STAPLES. The old Act made provision for the elevator man whose grain was spoiling. I suppose the hon. gentleman is in favour of that part of the old Act, as it stood. Is he opposed to giving the farmer whose grain may be spoiling on the farm the same relief?

Mr. KNOWLES. I am entirely in favour of giving the farmer the relief which my hon. friend thinks he refers to, but which he is mistaken about. Before I sit down I wish to read a few resolutions of the farmers, who are intelligent, and who know as well as my hon. friend does what relief they need. I will first read an official extract from the Grain Growers' Association of the province of Alberta, signed by the secretary, Edward J. Fream. He says:

It has been rumoured that section 207 of the Grain Bill will be considerably changed. This section is, we consider, one of the most important in the Act and one on which considerable time and attention should be bestowed before allowing any changes to be made. It gives a privilege to the farmer which is his only safeguard against the elevator interests, and while a determined onslaught has repeatedly been made upon this provision, yet the opponents of same have never yet been able to present any logical argument why a change should be made. Before this clause was added to the Grain Act the farmers were completely at the mercy of the interests, and if the clause is removed or in any way weakened by dangerous amendments which might be made to give two different meanings, conditions will be such that in a short time the farmers would find the car distribution and the general treatment they would receive from the railway companies and the elevator interests even more intolerable than they were before the clause was introduced into the Act.

I attach a great deal of importance to such an expression as this, as I am sure the minister will. It is my duty also to inform the House of the representations from the associations of farmers in my own constituency. Here is one from the Milden Grain Growers' Association, in the northern part of the Moosejaw district. I will not read the whole of the preamble:

Whereas many statements made in the said petition are untrue and misleading; and

Whereas any change made in the car distribution clauses of the Manitoba Grain Act, would be unfair and detrimental to both the large and small farming interests of this province; therefore

Resolved, that the Milden Grain Growers Association condemns the petition of the Canadian Credit Men's Association, and earnestly requests that no change be made in the aforesaid clauses of the Manitoba Grain Act; and Further resolved, that the secretary of this association be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the Hon. R. L. Borden, Premier of Canada, Hon. Geo. E. Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and to Mr. Knowles, representative of this constituency.

C. MILLS, President.
E. W. HENRY, Secretary.

The following is from Boldenhurst, in the northern part of my riding and further west:

At a meeting of the Boldenhurst Branch of the Grain Growers' Association, the following motion was unanimously carried:—

It was moved by Wilbert Haggarty and seconded by James Parsons, that this association strongly disapproves of any change being made in the Manitoba Grain Act in regard to the distribution of cars.

GEO. E. DAW,
Secretary-treasurer,
Branch of G. G. A., Boldenhurst, Sask.

Another from Marquis, addressed to myself, is as follows:

Dear Sir,—Just a few lines asking your assistance in the present debate before the House on the present Grain Act, especially section 99. We, the members of the Marquis Association do respectively request that the present distribution of cars be not changed, as the smaller farmers would be much more handicapped than they are at the present time. Hoping this will receive your immediate attention.

Yours truly,
ALEX. HENRY, Sec.-treas.,
Marquis, Sask.

Another from Netherhill, as follows:

Therefore, be it resolved, that we the members of the Netherhill Branch of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, here assembled, do hereby protest against the change of clause 99 of the Manitoba Grain Act, whereby the farmer will be deprived of the privilege of an equal allotment of cars with the Elevator Company.

Another from Dinsmore, as follows:

Be it resolved, whereas the Credit Men's Association has sent out petitions calling for certain alterations in clause 99, sections a, b, c of the Manitoba Grain Act;

Be it further resolved, that this branch of the Grain Growers' Association consider this petition to be unfair and misleading and such as to cause serious loss and inconvenience to the farmers of western Canada;

Be it further resolved, that this branch of the Grain Growers' Association earnestly protest against any alteration whatever in the clauses of the Manitoba Grain Act referred to.

Another from the Cataraqui Grain Growers, as follows:

The attempts that are being made in different sections of the country to attribute the cause of the present grain blockade to that section of the Manitoba Grain Act which relates to the distribution of cars, we entirely disagree with, and further, firmly believe that this section of the Act has been, since its inception, of vital importance to farmers in securing more fair and just treatment in marketing and selling their grain, and that any alteration to its present reading we strongly object to.

(Signed) JOS. A. MILNE,
Secretary.

A copy of this has been forwarded to Hon. Geo. E. Foster and Premier Borden.

I have received a communication from a constituent of mine who is a very representative man, Mr. A. Bryan, of Bridgeford, as follows:

Dear Sir,—I have addressed to the Hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce a strong protest against the petition that I understand has been presented to him by the Credit Men's Association of Winnipeg. The object of this is not to help the small farmers, as it is claimed to be, but to further the interests of the elevator people. The small farmer who has not a carload of grain to ship has not asked for it and does not want it. Most of these men here got some at least of their grain into the elevators, while quite a few small farmers who have just a carload to ship have not as yet been able to get a car.

The result of suspending clause 99 of the Manitoba Grain Act would be to compel these men to sell to the elevators. Now it is notorious in the west that the elevators rob the farmers all ends and sides. Not only is there a difference in price of between 5 and 10 cents per bushel between Port Arthur and street prices, but the wheat is knocked down a grade; it is docked extortionately and oftentimes proper weight is not given. On behalf of 200 farmers of the Bridgeford district I emphatically protest against it. Great consternation has been caused in regard to the said petition. and should it be regarded favourably by the government, it might cause considerable friction, even rioting, as the farmers are determined not to have their rights infringed upon.

And they trust, you, as their representative, will make a strong protest when the matter is brought up.

I will now read a telegram from a western farmer, than whom there is none better in Canada. I refer to Mr. Fred W. Green, secretary of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association. The message is as follows:

Moosejaw Sask., Feb., 9, 1912.

W. E. Knowles, M.P., Ottawa.

Received many letters this morning signed Credit Association. Petition under misapprehension. Asked to have names removed. Holders of petition refuse. Asking me what they can do. Farmers generally denouncing Credits. Mean underhand trick.

(Sgd.) FRED W. GREEN,
Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association.

Speaking for myself I have never had any other representation but one side of the question. I have had no constituent ask me to change to the other side. If the constituents of other hon. gentlemen have requested them to take the stand they took well and good, it is their business; but for myself there is no possible doubt in my mind as to the stand I must take viz: That this matter be not changed in the radical way in which the minister desires it should be changed.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I am rather ignorant about the matter. Would the hon. gentleman give me a specific case where the farmers will be damaged by the enforcement of the proposed amendment?

Mr. KNOWLES. In regard to this matter it is feared that a peril would be constantly hanging over the grain growers by reason of the power held by the three men who constitute that board. It is feared that from influences that were not in the interest of the country, the board might order a distribution of cars that would prejudice some and unduly favour others.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I would like to get an instance of that if I could.

Mr. KNOWLES. I could not do that because the board is not yet born, and I do not believe in original sin to that extent.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The farmers must have instances in view, I should think of what might happen.

Mr. KNOWLES. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Then I would like to have instances of that.

Mr. KNOWLES. I think I might answer that question in a brief way by saying that you place great power in the hands of three men. They will doubtless be respectable men, and men of ability, but I have not the least doubt also that they will be strong party men. It is possible they would be subject to influences that are not the highest and noblest—my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has been long enough in politics to know what I mean—and they might order a distribution of cars which would not be in the interest of the grain growers. Therefore, there is a feeling of danger which overshadows the hopes of our grain growers if that power is allowed to rest in the hands of the board. The member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) says why not give them the power to turn to the right or to the left. I stood up in this House when we were framing the section of the Bill providing that the board be given power to make regulations, and I said I could conceive that during the grain rush it might be necessary to make regulations without obtaining the consent of the minister or the consent of the Governor in Council. But the government would not give them even that little power. They said: 'Nothing. Every change in the regulations which this Board of Grain Commissioners make must be approved, not only by the minister but by the Governor in Council. They take the stand that they want the board to possess such wide powers and yet they are tying their hands. So strictly I say that with regard to this very essential and vital matter in the operation of this Act there should be no taking away from the farmer the protection that he is enjoying the benefit of.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would ask the hon. gentleman before he sits down whether he is in favour, or his friends on that side, of the House of incorporating Bill (No. 96) as we passed it in reference to damp grain in this Act?

Mr. KNOWLES. I would have to read the Act over agin.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. This is the Bill that we inserted and it is now law:

Subsection 1 of section 99b of the Manitoba Grain Act, chapter 83 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, as the said subsection is enacted by section 41 of chapter 45 of the Statutes of 1908, is amended by inserting after the word 'collapse', in the third line thereof, the words 'to places where grain is damp and liable to become damaged, or for the purpose of distributing seed grain to any point in the western division.'

Are hon. gentleman opposite in favour of incorporating that Bill in the Act?

Mr. KNOWLES. If the hon. gentleman wants to make it permanent for all the year, and every season of the year, I say no, I am not in favour of it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The hon. gentleman understands my meaning. I believe that the Act is a fair and legitimate one and I am in favour of it. I have received a number of letters and petitions from the farmers throughout my district asking me to exert to the utmost any influence I could, to prevent any change in the clause which refers to the distribution of cars. I received no petitions or letters to the contrary. I think there is something in the suggestion of my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples), that the fears entertained as to what would occur under the operation of the clause are more imaginery than real. The member for South York (Mr. Maclean) asked for an instance of where this would do damage. As the law is not operative yet it is not possible to give an exact instance; but the reason, I understand, why the farmers in my district object to any change is that in 1902, 1906 and in 1908 there were certain amendments made to the clause referring to the distribution of cars, and all the time they have been asking to be put in a position which they believe to be in their interest. The farmers believed they were subject to the influence of certain interests—it may be railway interests, elevator interests or other interests —and, rightly or wrongly, they feel that the clause as we have it in the Manitoba Grain Act is in their interest. Now, in my opinion, if there was not some suspicion, justly entertained perhaps, that the interests were again operating in the belief that the matter had gone too far in favour of the farmers and against the railways and the elevators, they would not be sending us these petitions. This Bill, with the exception of clause (e), I am prepared to accept, and to defend before the farmers of my district. I believe it is in the interest not only of the farmers but of the country, that we should have Bill (No. 96) incorporated in this Act, and the other provisions of the amendment that the Minister of Trade and Commerce sees fit to introduce. But I must say—I cannot help saying—that I am a little afraid of clause (e). If it does not go any further than it says, well and good—and after all perhaps that is the only argument one has a right to make, that it means what it says—but I know that the arguments of the farmers will be that it is the thin edge of the wedge.

This subsection (e) reads:

When after due examination the board considers it necessary and desirable, in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the despatch of grain.

Now, if it always remained there, I believe the farmers would not so seriously object to this subsection. And I would not have it thought that I lack faith in the commission that is to be appointed or in the efficiency of this Bill as a working measure. We have been in committee on this Bill for some days, and, as my hon. friend was good enough to say—and we can all agree with him—this has been a very amicable committee and we have ground out what I believe will be a splendit Grain Bill in the interest of this country. But this is the one clause which the farmers in my constituency do not feel fully satisfied about. Perhaps, for the reasons I stated a while ago they may have good reasons to be fearful of something that might occur if such broad powers as are proposed under this subsection were given to this commission. To repeat what I said before so far as the other clauses are concerned, I am in full sympathy with them. My hon. friend from Edmonton, (Mr. Oliver) does not seem to be willing to go so far. But I am prepared to go upon the platform in my constituency, and support these clauses, as being in the best interests of the farmers, all except this one. I think it was the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples), who said that a farmer might have 5,000 bushels of grain in his granary spoiling, because of damp or of some other reason. Surely it would be of advantage to that farmer if the commission had the powers, although he had had his car, to grant him the privilege of receiving another car. Still, so far as this subsection (e) is concerned, I do not feel that I am in a position to favour so broad an extension of the powers of the commission as this would seem to give. I am strongly in favour of the other clauses, but this subsection (e) I could hardly support without further light.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Keep an open mind.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Yes, I will keep an open mind.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I should like to endorse what has fallen from my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) as well as my hon. friends from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) as to the universality of opinion on this subject among the farmers so far as we can gather from the communications sent to us. Personally, I have for years laid well to heart the teaching of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) as to the importance of mixed farming. I am not immediately concerned with grain farming, preferring to deliver my grain on foot. I have no very strong opinion on this question nor any intimate knowledge of it. But I have an intimate knowledge of the university of opinion which prevails amongst those who do know about it. This is not a party question at all. I had a letter a few days ago from a man who, so far as I know, never gave anything but a Conservative vote in his life until the last election, when he had the good sense, according to my view, to vote for reciprocity, and he spoke about this provision as being the last straw that would break the camel's back. Similar expressions occur in other communications that I have received. That would appear to indicate that the men who are concerned, the men irrespective of party who are growing this grain, have been well served by the state of things as it is. I have not the remotest doubt that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) has brought to bear on this question what he brings to bear upon everything, a passionate desire to know the full details and to do what he believes to be best under the circumstances. I am sorry, on that account, that I have to differ from him on this question. But the representations are so unanimous from those who are concerned that I have no option. I agree with my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Mr. MEIGHEN. The question before the committee is worthy of the most serious attention of which we are capable. I have no fault to find with the statements of fact as generally presented by hon. gentlemen opposite, namely, that there is a very unanimous sentiment in the west against any radical change in section 108 of the Act, and the general provisions referring to car distribution. At the same time, the reasons which I have received, and indeed the reasons so far as they have been presented to the House by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) do not appear to conflict with the principle or with the details of the amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). The position taken by the organized farmers is that the ground gained some years ago—and largely, I believe, as a result of their own agitation—shall not now be lightly surrendered or lost. To my mind, this Bill does not go one step towards the surrendering any of that ground. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) seemed to try to get at the root of the principle involved, and I think, he saw it; but I think he shunned the logical result because he feared it might lose to him some political advantage that he seemed to think in sight.

Now, what is this clause? In former years in this country the rights of property were magnified, they were considered so sacred that public rights frequently were disregarded. And in no case did this idea of private rights predominate more than in the case of the railway companies. One of these rights was considered to be that of placing their rolling stock where they wished, and of carrying the grain as seemed to them most convenient. But parliament came to see in time that the public had a vested interest in this matter as well as the railway company, and parliament took upon itself to say by what rule the cars should be distributed. They declared that John Jones who orders first, and William Smith who orders next, and elevator 'B' that orders next shall receive cars in this order. That was ground gained so far as it went, and so far as it has gone it has worked out to the advantage of the western farmer. The railway has not been able to dictate, since that was enforced, what they should do with what they considered their own property rights. The amendments proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) instead of being a surrender, in my opinion is an advance on this principle. It declares that the general rule laid down shall still be followed, that parliament having once assumed the right to say how this should be done in a general way, still stands to that right; but parliament declares not only for that right in itself, but also that the commission appointed under the authority of parliament, the representatives of the public interest and the public need, shall be able to enforce that right. Hon. members opposite conceded the whole principle when they conceded Bill (No. 96), they conceded the force of the argument presented and the conditions that demand a change which have been brought forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

But now they recoil, and all they can advance to surround themselves is that they received certain resolutions. Why? Because the farmers have been taught to believe, whether rightly or wrongly, that there is going to be a surrender, there is going to be a step backward, and that all the ground gained back in 1907 is to be given up. That is not the case at all. The principle of the resolution read by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) shows that if they understood what is proposed to be done, there would be no opposition. What does Mr. Fream say? In the body of the memorial presented by him, this appears:

> While it may be possible to provide for permission being given to the commission after investigation to supply cars for seed grain, or upon petition of farmers for the removal of wet or damaged grain, or where there was suffering through a shortage of fuel or food supplies, yet if there is any chance of the rights of the farmers being infringed by ambiguous or vaguely worded amendments introduced into the Bill, it will be better for our interests as producers for the clause to remain as it now stands.

Now Mr. Fream states the whole thing; in other words, he says that the better way is to leave the law as it stands and to follow the general rule just as it was, but, if, to the advantage of the farmer, it can be shown that it should bend in individual cases, that is all the bettter, provided the clause is clearly and not vaguely worded. That indicates the stand taken by the western farmer.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does not the hon. gentleman think that clause (e) goes further?

Mr. MEIGHEN. It goes no further in principle at all. But the commissioners would require to be convinced that the farmers' interest was served by a divergence. You can never, by an individual statement of contingencies, state them all. There may be something which we do not conceive in this committee, and to make it advisable that the strict provisions of 198 should be made to bend in the interest of a certain community, clause (e) is neither more nor less than saying that if we have not succeeded in stating what classes and contingencies may occur, then the clause shall give the commission power to go beyond. Now the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says that if you give the commission this power, you might just as well burn the Grain Act, and he says we are appointing a commission who shall superintend the grain trade of this country. Now what is the logical position of the member for Edmonton? What is the principle of the Grain Act? It provides a machinery that shall take care of the distribution and the outlet of the western grain, the grading of it, and so forth; it provides machinery for handling the grain trade of this country. Then it appoints a commission to superintend that machinery, and it says to them: There is the machinery for you, take and operate it, and in operating it, we lay down certain general rules that you must follow. That is the Grain Act. This does not violate the principle in any degree. The general rules are laid down, but to get certain individual instances the commissioners are given power to acquiese in a public demand and in the public interest. Now why does the hon. member for Edmonton argue that this goes too far? He says it is right to take this clause providing for a rotary distribution of cars as a general rule. We lay that down, and I approve of it.

Now he says: You give the Grain Commissioners power in one case to diverge from it, that is, in a case where it is requisite to do so for the distribution of seed grain. That is all right, he says, to give them the power to diverge when it is requisite to do so. That is not violating the principle of the Act or of the constitution; but you are violating both, he says; and you are burning the Act, if you give them power to deal with cases of damp, wet wheat. The hon. member for Edmonton must see that there is no difference of principle at all. Some days ago all the members opposite were prepared to agree, by acceding to Bill (No. 96), that it was quite in accord with the spirit of the Grain Act to give the commissioners discretionary power, not only in the case of its requirement for distribution of seed, but also in the case of its requirement for allowing an outlet for damp grain likely to be endangered; and all along they have been prepared, not only to give that discretionary power in these two cases, but to give discretionary power when the grain was damp and in danger of being damaged in the elevators. So that on both sides of this parliament we have for years recognized that it was in the interest of the people to give the Grain Commissioners, or those who have preceded them in practically the same duties, power to make this provision suit in any individual cases in the public interest. That is all we are doing now. We are extending their discretion, but their discretion must always be exercised in the public interest and as demanded by individual contingencies? There is no principle at stake, there is no ground to be surrendered, it is a public tribunal that is going to have charge of it.

Mr. OLIVER. How do the words in this section limit the action of the commissioners to individual contingencies? I mean in contingencies as relating to individuals.

Mr. MEIGHEN. That is the whole purport of each clause of the amendment. What is the first?

(c) for the purpose of distributing seed grain lapse;

(b) to places where grain is damp and thereby liable to become damaged;

(c) for the purpose of distributing seed grain to any point in the western division;

(d) in cases where the operator of any country elevator reports in writing, under oath, that some portion of the grain in such elevator is heated, and that in order to preserve such grain it is necessary to ship such heated grain to the terminal elevator for treatment; provided, however, that no relief shall be granted in such last mentioned cases as long as the warehouseman has sufficient room in his building for the re-handling of such grain;

(e) whenever, after due examination the board considers it necessary and advisable in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the dispatch of grain.

Individual cases must be thoroughly examined first, and cause must be shown to convince the board that it is necessary and advisable in order to relieve the congestion, and to facilitate the dispatch of grain. So the whole section is built upon the idea that individual contingencies demand the exercise of this discretionary power of the board. Therefore, I think if hon. gentlemen will keep in mind just the actual circumstances as they will present themselves, and will let this go through, I think less than one year will serve to dispel any fear that may be at present abroad in western Canada concerning this requirement.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

PATENTS OF THOMAS D. RAMBAUT.

Further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill (No. 84) respecting certain patents of Thomas D. Rambaut.—Mr. Ames.

On section 2—power to receive petitions and make orders.

Mr. CARVELL. Mr. Chairman, before this section is adopted I want to direct the attention of the committee to something that perhaps is not very apparent on the face of the Bill as it stands. The committee will remember that when this was up, I think a week ago to-night, I asked the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, (Mr. Ames) who has charge of this Bill, if he knew whether these patents, as originally issued, came under the provisions of section 44 of the Patent Act. The hon. gentleman stated that he was not in a position to give me that information. I wrote to Mr. Lynch, chief of the patent office, and, a few days ago, received this communication:

Ottawa, Feb. 16, 1912.

My dear Mr. Carvell,

In reply to your question over the telephone this afternoon, relative to a number of patents granted to E. W. Cooke and assigned to one Rambaut, I beg to say that none of the patents have been under section 44 of the Patent Act (compulsory license system).

Yours very sincerely,
(Sgd.) W. J. LYNCH
Chief of Patent Office.

F. B. Carvell, Esq., M.P.
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Just consider for a moment what the promoters of this Bill are asking parliament to do for them. By section 38 of the Patent Act, which has been the law of the land for many years, it is provided that in order to hold a patent, the patentee, either directly or through some other person, must actually commence the manufacture of the patented article in Canada within two years of the granting of the patent. He must do more than that; he must have the article ready to be sold to any person who applies for it at a reasonable price and continually be in that position, or, to read the section, it is as follows:

Such patent, and all the rights and privileges thereby granted shall cease and determine, and the patent shall be null and void at the end of two years from the date thereof, unless the patentee or his legal representatives, within that period or an authorized extension thereof, commence, and after such commencement, continuously carry on in Canada the construction or manufacture of the invention patented, in such a manner that any person desiring to use it may obtain it or cause it to be made for him at a reasonable price at some manufactory or establishment for making or constructing it in Canada.

That was found, in some instances, to work a hardship. I could give an illustration wherein it would work a hardship. A man might invent a complicated piece of machinery—we will say a certain kind of steam engine, or machinery for the making of some particular, specified article. Take, for instance, a printing press, or anything that you could imagine of which there are not many sales in Canada. It might cost a large amount of money to equip the factory and put it in a position to manufacture this and possibly, when you equipped the factory and had manufactured one or two articles, it might be a number of years before you found sale for more than those two articles. The result would be an enormous loss. In that case many people have failed to keep their patents alive by manufacturing them simply because the initial expenditures in getting ready to manufacture and being in a position to keep on manufacturing the patented article have been so great that they did not feel that they could afford to undertake it. Therefore, in 1903, parliament attempted to get around that difficulty by passing section 44 of the Patent Act as it now stands, and which was codified in the revision of 1906. It is the law of the land to-day. Section 44 provides, speaking generally, that if, in the judgment of the commissioner of patents, an article patented comes within the class I have described, something which it would not be fair or reasonable to expect the patentee to be manufacturing all the time and to be in a position to sell to any person who wants it, then the commissioner of patents has the right to give him a license so that he will not be compelled to manufacture, but he must hold himself in readiness to lease to any other person who wants to manufacture the article at any time, and if they cannot agree upon the royalty to be paid for the right then the commissioner of patents is appointed arbitrator in the matter.

But when this man Rambaut, or his predecessor in title, applied for his patents and his patents were issued, they were not brought within the conditions of section 44 of the Act of 1903, and section 44 was the law of the land, then as it is to-day. Anyone can readily understand why these patents were not brought under the provisions of section 44. They did not apply to a complicated piece of machinery, they were not regarding an article which might never be sold to customers because it was not like a complicated steam engine. They had reference to a method of making a certain kind of food—you might call it dessicated food—something that would be sold, if sold at all, to thousands and tens of thousands of people. If the invention had any use whatever it would be that an industry would be established or the patent would be sold to other people who would be producing all over the country the article covered by it. The hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, when this measure was before the committee on a former occasion, took the ground that if we refused this patent we would possibly be preventing the establishment of an industry in Canada. I want to point out to the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, and the members of this committee that if we pass this Bill as it is drawn, and if we ratify section 2, we are defeating the very object that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, claimed to have in view when he asked us in the committee last week to pass this Bill for him. He said: Refuse to pass this Bill and you will probably prevent the establishment of an industry in Canada. I say that if you pass this Bill as it stands to-night, without any question whatever, you will prevent the establishment of an industry in Canada. You will be giving the owner of this patent the right to hold his patent for the remainder of the term of 18 years, which I think would be about 13 years longer, and he may never expend a dollar in Canada either directly or indirectly. He will never have to expend a dollar upon any manufacturing establishment, he will never have to employ a man, until the expiration of 13 years, and still his patent will be perfectly good. All he has to do is to hold himself in readiness to say: I will give any man the right to manufacture this article providing he pays me my royalty. I am satisfied that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, cannot gainsay one statement I have made, because I have given you the law on the matter and I do submit that this Bill should not be passed. If we have to renew this man's patents, surely this committee ought only to renew them like an ordinary patent under section 1. We should not give this man something which he did not have when he got his original patent. They are asking the parliament of Canada not only to give him something which he had lost by this negligence, but they are asking parliament to give him something which he never thought of holding when he got the patent. The most that can be said is that he had a perfect right, if the commissioner of patents had thought proper, to have had the patent brought under the provisions of section 44, but, because it did not come under the provisions of section 44 I think it is only fair to assume that the commissioner of patents did not consider that it was a case that should have come under the provisions of that section. I have no knowledge of that myself and all I can say is that it looks that way to me. Now, they are asking parliament to put this man in a position that the commissioner of patents would not put him in. Therefore, I do submit that section 2 should be defeated because it is bad enough to give an American who has no interest in Canada the right to continue this monopoly and this sort of business, but it is going too far when parliament is asked to continue a monopoly under which the beneficiary will never be compelled to spend a dollar or employ a man in Canada.

Mr. AMES. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) a week ago and also to-night has endeavoured to create the feeling that this Bill should not pass because the patentee is an American.

Mr. CARVELL. I never made such a statement at any time.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). That was the inference.

Mr. CARVELL. I did not say so.

Mr. AMES. I leave it to the judgment of the House if the whole tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks was not to the effect that he would like to stir up prejudice against the applicant in this case because he was an American and a stranger. Our Canadian patent laws make absolutely no discrimination against members of any nationality, a German, an Englishman, an American, has the same rights to patent as a Canadian. That argument of my hon. friends the House will dispose of once and for all as unworthy of its consideration.

I differ from my hon. friend's interpretation of a portion of the Patent Act. Under the original patent the patentee had the right to proceed under section 38 or section 44. Section 38 makes the patent conditional upon his manufacturing in Canada within two years.

Mr. CARVELL. I spoke to Mr. Lynch and I have his letter stating that this applicant did not come under section 44. If Mr. Lynch has misinformed me, I have misinformed the House.

Mr. AMES. I shall make the matter clear. Section 38 provides that the patent is conditional upon manufacturing within two years and not importing after that time. Section 44 declares the conditions which may be substituted for section 38 in the judgment of the officers. Under that section the patentee may give a license to others to manufacture. Clause 2 of the present Bill does not ask parliament to give this man the rights he originally had in their entirety. This clause simply says that he has the right of patent and the Commissioner of Patents, an official of the government, shall determine whether he can make out a sufficient case to have it declared that he shall have the privileges of section 44. If the Commissioner of Patents is of opinion that it is not advisable to give him the rights under section 44 the commissioner will say so. Inasmuch as the patentee, in the first place, had rights under both section 38 and 44, and purely through a misunderstanding he lost his rights and as this House has affirmed in the second reading that the principle is sound, it only remains for us to settle the terms on which the restoration of rights shall be made. My contention is that he should be given full rights, namely to act either conditionally under section 38, or section 44, at the discretion of the commissioner. He now asks for two years more within which to commence manufacture. If the House says that he shall not have this privilege then I hope that the House will hold to that precedent and deal in the same way with everyone else who comes here and asks for the restoration of a patent. This Bill asks that he be put back in the place he was in originally, the place he lost through no fault of his own.

The House has repeatedly granted relief to applicants who have forfeited certain rights. In 1909 the House passed five Bills of this character, introduced in every case by supporters of the government and in only one instance did the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) object. Last session, a number of others were passed, several of the applicants being Americans. While hon. gentlemen opposite were on this side of the House they agreed to Bills of this character, four or five of them every session. All these patents were restored although the fees had not been paid and they were restored for six years. In this case all fees had been paid for six years and it will be still another year before the time elapses so far as fees are concerned. These parties did not manufacture, that is all they failed to do.

They ask the opportunity within the next two years of establishing a manufactory here. If that opportunity is given them they will establish it, I thoroughly believe. If they are deprived of the opportunity, that industry will not come to Canada. It is not to be expected that an industry of this character will come to Canada if it is not protected in its patent rights. I do not think people will invest money in an industry requiring any expenditure of capital if they can have no security that the man next door will not immediately imitate their process. They must be protected for a certain length of time. Now, this patent has lapsed, and parliament is asked to restore it. I do not know why exception should be taken to that request in this particular case. We have already passed three Bills of the same character, two of which have passed the Senate; but for some reason this particular Bill has been selected, and every possible objection is made to it.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the hon. gentleman say that the Bill that passed here the other night is at all of the same character as this Bill?

Mr. AMES. Yes, very much indeed. On two of the Bills the fees have not been paid, so nothing had been done. In this case the fees have been paid for six years, from 1907 to 1913. The one requirement of manufacture was not complied with, but the parties interested will be very glad to comply with it if they are given another opportunity. I have not gone into the special reasons why Mr. Rambaut did not originally comply with all the provisions of the Patent Act. These were all given to the House a week ago. Inasmuch as the second reading, which involves the principle, has passed, and inasmuch as the Bill has unanimously passed the Private Bills Committee, and inasmuch as the preamble and the first clause, the essential parts of the Bill, have passed, I can only say that if the House desires to restore the Rambaut patent to the position it originally occupied, it will pass clause 2. But if the House decides that a man who allows his patent to lapse, and who comes here to have it reinstated, shall not have the privileges he first had, it will strike out clause 2, and he will have to be content with clause 1.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend misapprehends the whole purport of the Bill which he is asking parliament to pass. In the first place, I want to disavow the idea that an American, a Frenchman, or a Chinaman has not the right to come to Canada to get a patent. The Patent Act allows any foreigner to patent his invention the same as a native. But what I contend is that we ought not to give an outsider, no matter where he comes from, rights which we ought not to give to one of our own people. My hon. friend either begs the question or does not know what he is talking about. He says that if we want to place this applicant in the same position that he was in before his patent expired, we must give him clause 2 of this Bill. I tell my hon. friend that he is wrong, and every other lawyer in this House who looks into the matter carefully will tell him the same thing. He says that under the original patent he had two options: One was to manufacture within two years, under section 38, and the other was not to manufacture within two years, but to license to somebody else to manufacture, under section 44. My hon. friend needs only to read the provisions of section 44 to see that he is in error. Under section 44 a patent is granted automatically. Section 38 provides for the manufacture for two years, and, thereafter the patentee must keep on manufacturing so that any person can buy the article at a reasonable price, otherwise the patent is void. That is all that any man gets under the Patent Act. If Rambaut or his predecessor wanted more than that when he filed his petition in the Patent Office in 1907, he would have been compelled to apply to be brought within the provisions of section 44 at the time he filed his petition or within six months thereafter.

Mr. AMES. In this case he asked for three months.

Mr. CARVELL. But you have not done it for five years.

Mr. AMES. Does my hon. friend allege that on the 7th of May, 1907, when this man took out these letters patent, he had not the two options?

Mr. CARVELL. He had until the 7th of September, 1907, and that date went by.

Mr. AMES. What this Bill asks is that he be put back where he was on the 7th of May, 1907.

Mr. CARVELL. Why should he be?

Mr. AMES. Why should he not be?

Mr. CARVELL. He allowed the 7th of September, 1907, to go by, and put it on the 27th of September, 1907, and there is no power on earth that can give him the right to come under section 44. Therefore, the argument of my hon. friend is fallacious.

Mr. AMES. I understand that he took out his patent on the 7th of May, 1907. If within six months thereafter he had applied to come under clause 44, he might have done so.

Therefore for six months at least we had the advantage we speak of here. Clause 2 of this Bill says: that notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act, or in the patents mentioned in the preamble, the commissioner of patents may within three months give the patentee the right to exercise the title which he had for six months following 7th of May, 1907. If he does not exercise it within six months he never can exercise it at all; he cannot exercise it during the whole year as the hon. member alleges. We are, therefore, only giving him, as far as time is concerned, the right to exercise the title which he had under sections 38 and 44 of the Patent Act.

Mr. CARVELL. He would not have the right to come under section 44 within the six months unless he had the right to apply, and the commissioner would have power to say whether he should come in.

Mr. AMES. It is the same in both cases. That is exactly the case here.

Mr. CARVELL. But that right has gone four years ago.

Mr. AMES. It is exactly the same in both cases. He has the right to apply and if the commissioner will not accept his application that is the end of it.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend is entirely out of court so far as section 44 is concerned. If this man had gone back to the patent office he could not have got the right. How does he propose to get it? He sleeps until he is out of court entirely and his patent is no good. Then he comes back to parliament and says: 'I have been remiss in my duty and have not done that which the law required me to do and I want you not only to put me back in the position I was in two years ago, but to put me in the position I would have been in if I had applied four years ago. My hon. friend is not serious in trying to make this committee believe the man is not asking something which he has no right to ask. My hon. friend says we will be preventing the establishment of a manufactory in Canada, and that if we do not put this Bill through, nobody will have the right to manufacture here the article covered by the patent.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would my hon. friend meet the argument from this point: Is not this man Rambaut's right to be restored to his original position just on the same footing as that he has a right to be restored to the patent? That is to say he claims the right to get back his patent on the ground of an error. If that is good is he not also entitled to get back his option?

Mr. CARVELL. No, the only thing he would have a right to do would be to ask us to replace him in the position which he occupied the day his patent was voided or ceased to be of any value. Now, his patent ceased to be of any value on the 7th day of May, 1907, or on the 7th day of May, 1909. Therefore, on the 7th day of May, or we will say on the 6th day of May, 1909, he did not posses the right of applying to the commissioner on patents under section 44 for the right to manufacture. I do not think we ought to put him in a better position than he was in on the 7th of May, 1907. But if section 2 of this Bill be passed we are placing him in the position he occupied four years ago, we are placing a premium on the man's own negligence. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) stated that if you do not recognize this as the man's patent you may forever prevent the establishment of the industry in Canada. Does he not understand that if the patent has expired every man in Canada has a right to start this industry? It is a monopoly my hon. friend is trying to create, and if this Bill be not passed that monopoly is abolished. My hon. friend is interested in mergers, therefore his mind is running in the direction of monopolies. My hon. friend says that within the last few years many patents have been revived, but can he point to an instance where a patent has been revived giving back to the man something he did not possess at the time the patent was void? The Wadge case has been referred to as an illustration. In that case the patent became void because Wadge had not paid the $15. A patent is given to a man in order to protect the genius of his brain and he has two years in which to commence the manufacture of that article in Canada. If he chooses to do so he can pay $60 and he gets an 18 year certificate If he only pays $20 he gets six years protection. In the case of Wadge it was a matter of paying only $15 or $20 because he was manufacturing the article, had been doing so for many years, and had a big business in Winnipeg. This man Rambaut has never spent a dollar in Canada on the manufacture of the article for which he desires to revive the patent.

Mr. BURNHAM. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said that he dealt with the legal part of the question and that was the main thing. I think that is a very grave error. The principle that underlies the Patent Act is, as he has said, the protection of the genius of the patentee. Therefore, saving all just exceptions, he is entitled, according to all the merits of the case, and the principle I am enunciating, to a patent for the length of time allowed by the Act, ignoring and waiving all technicalities. If we insist upon a technicality we stand in the way of the workingman, or a man who, possibly, has not a large amount of money, and, therefore, possesses comparatively little influence, and has no other asset than his brains. On that account he is, therefore, very likely to get scant consideration, because as we know, and I am not now speaking invidiously, the most influential man is the man who has money, and the least influential is the man who has none. A man who has position is much better situated than the man who has none.

Now, the man who has brains, provided, as I say, there has been no wanton neglect on his part and no acquirement of rights by somebody else, is entitled to every conceivable form of protection. Therefore, instead of saying that this principle of interference is wrong, we should declare it to be right; for the Patent Act is for the protection of such a man and not for the spoliation of him. Therefore, if such a man should come to this House and say: I have lost my right under section so and so, by no fault of my own that is by no deliberate, wilful fault of my own—but by inadvertence, we should say to him: Prove to us that we are not doing anybody else any hurt and we will restore you to your position. To take advantage of the technicalities to stand in his way is to remove the incentive under which the poor man of brains now works and slaves for years knowing that he will have the sympathy of the public in his efforts. Therefore, we should be extremely careful, I submit, in laying down any such principle of non-interference if the merits of the case, not the technicalities, clearly warrant it.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am sorry the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) thought it necessary to introduce party feeling into a question of this kind. His evident purpose was to arouse his partisans to support his case, whether the law or the practice would sustain him or not.

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes, I am in order. It would be a pity if private rights of this character should be subject in this House to party sentiment or party bigotry; and I think that for a member of the age and experience in this House of the hon. member for St. Antoine to introduce such an idea into the discussion of such a Bill as this is rather a pity. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) wanted us to disregard entirely the limitation of the statutes. There are limitations in this statute. There is what is well known in this country as the statute of limitations, dealing with the question of debts. An hon. member on the other side, let us say, loaned his neighbour $1,000 in cash, taking the man's note for it, and put the note in his safe. Through some misunderstanding, he has allowed more than six years to go by before trying to collect the debt. And when he asks for the money, the debtor, dishonest man as he is, says: You cannot collect the money because it is more than six years since I got it, and I will not give it to you.

Mr. BURNHAM. Is there anything in that to prevent the statute of limitations from running?

Mr. McKENZIE. There are so many that it would take too long—as time is short—to tell them to my hon. friend.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does not the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) think that the debtor ought to be paid the $1,000 notwithstanding the lapse of time?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly. But the statute of limitations is there, and the creditor cannot collect. There is a statute of limitations here and one is no more insuperable than the other. Suppose that the creditor in this case were to come to this House and say: This dishonest man is depriving me of $1,000; he has built a house with it and is living in the house; and I want you to remove the statute of limitations in this case so that I may collect my $1,000, he would have no chance of succeeding; in fact, I do not think there is an hon. member of this House who would introduce the Bill. Everybody would say: Such a request is an absurdity; this is the law of the land, and you have to take your medicine. That being our attitude in one case, why should the hon. gentleman propose that we should set aside so lightly the limitations in this case? Whatever the genius of this man's brain has made is now the property of the country. The hon. gentleman must know that. His rights under the statutes have lapsed, the limitation clause of the statute having done its work.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). What was the attitude of the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) toward the previous Bill? ?

Mr. McKENZIE. Here comes the hon. member from Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) again with his party ideas. I would vote for this Bill if I thought it right; I voted for one introduced by just as keen a Tory as my hon. friend from St. Antoine. I did not know until to-night that it made any difference to which party the member belonged who introduced such a Bill, nor can I conceive such an idea now. The hon. member for St. Antoine said that this Bill is necessary to correct an error. I submit to him that mistakes of law are not regarded as errors. The law is not an exact science, and, therefore, a mistake of opinion in the law as between one lawyer and another, one court and another, is not an error and never was so regarded. And if this gentleman who had this patent, by reason of an opinion he got from a lawyer, refused to stand by his rights, that was not an error; it was a construction of the law which is not regard it as an error. If you pay money under a mistake as to the facts, you can get it back, but if you pay it under a mistake in the law you cannot get it back, because the courts do not regard a mistake of law as an error. If this man, having taken an opinion in law, slept on his rights, he cannot wake up now and come here and plead that as an error. We have not been told by the hon. member for St. Antoine what the cause of this was.

Mr. AMES. That was all explained on the reading of the preamble a week ago, if the hon. member had been here.

Mr. McKENZIE. I was here. But the hon. gentleman did not say in his explanation where the mistake of law was. He told us there was a dispute between the heirs of one Cooke, and the person now holding this right. He did not explain how it was, or how it was contended that Cooke had not got a proper title. If the hon. member comes to me as one member of the committee and tells me that he wants to perfect a title which he has received, I will vote with him, but I do not feel that I am called on to support a man who slept on his rights, because he got some mistaken idea of the law and now comes to parliament to put him back, and give him what is to-day the property of the country to which he has no right. I have not heard any satisfactory explanation of what the difficulty was that prevented him from completing his title.

Mr. TURRIFF. It seems to me that if the hon. member (Mr. Ames), would amend this legislation to put the man who had the patent in exactly the same position as he was in when he lost his patent rights through not carrying out the terms on which those rights were granted —manufacturing the article in question in Canada within a given time—if he would amend it so as to give this man exactly what he lost when his patent became void, then I do not think there would be any objection on the part of anybody in this House to reinstate his patent.

Mr. AMES. I have been asking that he be given all that he had when he took out his patent. If hon. gentlemen think that is too much, will they pass the Bill if we strike out clause 2, and leave him in the position he was when his patent lapsed?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE GRAIN ACT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 32) respecting grain—Mr. Foster (North Toronto).

On section 207,—distribution of cars,

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). The question the committee is dealing with known as the car distribution clause, contains one of the most important questions, if it is not the most important, which this House has to deal with in considering this Bill. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) admitted this afternoon that so far as he knew, the producers of grain in western Canada were in favour of leaving the clauses exactly as they stand at the present time. I must say that if I have any knowledge of the district which I represent, I believe that the grain producers there—and I have representations to substantiate what I say—are absolutely in favour of no change being made in the present clause. I am prepared to act on the advice of men who know more about this question than I do, to act, as it were, on the advice of my masters in this matter. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie apparently is not so anxious to act on the advice of his masters. It seems to me that he is going very far afield to get some reason for bolstering up the case that has been made out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the introduction of these suggested amendments. Absolutely the only ground, or the only document that he could find to support his contention that these amendments would be a good thing for the producers, was the memorandum sent, I believe, to each of the members of parliament by Mr. Fream, president or secretary of the United Farmers of Alberta. Now, I say with all due respect to Mr. Fream, that I do not believe he is so well qualified to express an opinion on this subject, even if he were in favour of these amendments, as many men from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, men who have been dealing with and shipping grain, and who have had some experience of the shortage of cars and the working of these clauses since 1902. We know that these car distribution clauses were only put into the Manitoba Grain Act after a tremendous struggle on the part of the farmers. First of all, the Bill was introduced in 1902, then amended in 1905, and subsequently was put into its present condition in 1908. In my short experience of the past ten years I know that there has been no question more discussed among the farmers' organizations, and even among business men, than the question of car distribution. The main clause at present is to this effect, that an applicant may order a car or cars. Now since 1908, among the grain producers of the western country, I have heard no objection taken to that clause except it be this, as mentioned by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon, that it did not give the large farmer, the man who had 10,000 or 20,000 bushels of grain, the advantage he was entitled to, because he could only get car for car with the smaller farmer, or if he ordered at the same time as the small farmer, he would have to wait his turn till the next car. Now what does Mr. Fream say? The member for Portage la Prairie attempted to twist the representations of Mr. Fream into an argument in favour of these amendments suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I submit that Mr. Fream's document does not bear any such interpretation. It means that he is absolutely opposed to any amendments unless they are so framed as to protect the interests of the producer, and he says that he does not believe that is possible. I will read two or three sentences from his memorandum to support my contention.

It has been rumored that section 207 of the Grain Bill will be considerably changed. This section is, we consider, one of the most important in the Act and one on which considerable time and attention should be bestowed before allowing any change to be made. It gives a privilege to the farmer which is his only safeguard against the elevator interests, and while a determined onslaught has repeatedly been made upon this provision, yet the opponents of same have never yet been able to present any logical argument why a change should be made. Before this clause was added to the Grain Act the farmers were completely at the mercy of the interests, and if the clause is removed or in any way weakened by dangerous amendments which might be made to give two different meanings, conditions will be such that in a short time the farmers will find the car distribution and the general treatment they would receive from the railway companies and the elevator interests even more intolerable than they were before the clause was introduced into the Act.

That is his opinion, he is opposed to any amendment being made to the clauses as they stand at the present time. Then he goes on and says:

While it may be possible to provide for permission being given to the commission after investigation to supply cars for seed grain, or upon petition of farmers for the removal of wet or damaged grain or where there was suffering through shortage of fuel or food supplies, yet if there is any chance of the rights of the farmers being infringed by ambiguous or vaguely worded amendments introduced into the Bill, it will be better for our interests as producers for the clause to remain as it now stands.

He turns that to his own advantage. He says it might be possible to provide for specific cases which cases he refers to. He does not say anything about it being possible to provide by subsection (e), which has been introduced by the minister, placing the whole matter of car distribution absolutely in the hands of the commission. As was very truly said by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), this afternoon, if you introduce subsection (e) into this Bill you might just as well do away with the car distribution clause altogether, because it puts the whole matter of car distribution entirely in the hands of the commission. Of all the representations that I have seen and of all the representations that have come to the notice of any member of this House, the only one that can be twisted around in any shape or form to bolster up the amendment introduced by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is this document from Mr. Fream, and I submit that, by any ordinary rules of interpretation applied to the English language, he is not in favour of the amendment at all but is absolutely opposed to it. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), says that the commission must have the largest amount of discretion. I am not sure that I am exactly quoting his words but he advocated leaving to the commission a large amount of discretion. I am thoroughly in accord with that remark of the hon. gentleman in so far as he would go with regard to matters of detail, but this matter of the distribution of cars is not a matter of detail, and I submit in all fairness to the minister, to my hon. friend for Portage la Prairie, and to every member of this House, that the matter of car distribution, having been enacted into law in 1902, amended by the Act of 1906, and placed in its final form in 1908, being perhaps the most important section in the Grain Bill, should not be left to the discretion of any commission no matter how honourable, how independent, or how clever the men who constitute that commission may be. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie and other hon. members have said: You supported Bill (No. 96) which has just passed the Senate. I was favourably disposed to Bill (No. 96), for this reason—and I believe it was supported by members on both sides of the House for the same reason—that it was designed to meet the emergency of car shortage, and grain blockade which exists in western Canada, and has existed for some months past. We supported it for that reason, and because we believed that possibly we might get some relief out of it. At the same time that Bill has been passed only as a matter of experiment. I do not think the Bill has received the Royal Assent as yet, but immediately it does the Bill can go into operation. We will be able to experiment in the main provisions of the Bill, and see if this method of giving additional powers to the Grain Commissioner, as he is at the present time constituted, or to the Grain Commision as it will be constituted, will benefit the farmers of western Canada and lessen the grain blockade. If it is, I am prepared to support an amendment of that kind at an early future period, but we should experiment with the idea before we enact it permanently. If this Bill (No. 96) does prove a success—the next session of parliament will begin this coming fall—we can very well have an amendment to the Grain Bill if we are of opinion that such an amendment will meet any emergency that may occur during the coming fall in just as expeditious a manner as Bill (No. 96) has been passed by the House of Commons and the Senate. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee at length in dealing with this question and in reading petitions from farmers and farmers' organizations, but I merely wish to refer to three or four of these petitions. I have received a large number of petitions and letters from farmers throughout western Canada and Grain Growers' Associations all asking that the car distribution clauses remain in exactly the position they are today. I have not received a solitary representation from any farmer or grain growers' organization asking me to support any amendment that may be introduced. It may be said by my hon. friends that the farmers do not understand what this amendment means. I am not prepared to say that that may not be the reason in some cases. At the same time, as I said at the outset, I believe that the people of western Canada who have been shipping grain for twenty-five or thirty years and who have gone through the whole history of the development of the Grain Act and the question of car distribution, are in a far better position to express their opinion on these matters than any member of the Canadian Credit Men's Association located with headquarters in the city of Winnipeg can be. Let me refer to two or three representations that have been made to me. They do not differ to any extent from the representations that have been referred to by other members but they come from my own district and for that reason I wish to bring them to the attention of the committee. Here is a resolution passed by the Grain Growers' Association of Craik, Saskatchewan:

We the directors and members of the Craik Grain Growers' Association, and business men of the town of Craik, protest against any alteration in the Manitoba Grain Act, re distribution of cars as provided in section 99, clauses (a) (b) and (c) and that the present method of distribution of cars to the farmer has not been the cause of the blockade in wheat and the business of the country at a standstill as the petition circulated by the Canadian Credit Men's Association of Winnipeg has stated, and we further protest against the distribution of cars to be left to the railway commission.

I do not know where they got that idea about the commission but they certainly protest against it being left in the hands of the Railway Commission.

That petition is not only signed by farmers, but by a large number of business men in the town of Craik.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The Credit Men's petition asked that it should be left to the Railway Commission.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I did not understand that. I have not seen the Credit Men's petition. Then, there is a resolution passed by the Grain Growers' Association of Grand Coulee instructing the secretary to ——write the government at Ottawa informing them that the feeling of the local branch of the Grain Growers' Association is very much opposed to any change in the car order book and wish it to remain as it exists at present.

There is also a resolution passed by the Wilcox Grain Growers' Association as follows:

Resolved, by the Wilcox Grain Growers' Association that we strongly condemn the petition circulated by some of the merchants regarding the temporary suspension of that part of the Manitoba Grain Act relating to car distribution as we consider it injurious to our rights and chances of getting cars and we request our merchants to abstain from sending the petition to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I have a letter accompanying the petition in which they claim that the men who went about getting the Canadian Credit Men's petition signed were reporting to the farmers that it would enable them to get more cars. That may have been perfectly true and they may have been sincere in their representations, but they go on to say that farmers who signed it in that district are of opinion that they made a mistake and they wish their names removed. You can understand how these men, with their present car shortage, would naturally grasp at anything that even appeared to be a straw to help them out of their difficulties. I have here a resolution passed by the Farmers' Co-operative Company with head office in Regina protesting strongly against any change being made in the car distribution clauses. Here is the last one that I will refer to, a resolution passed by the Rouleau Grain Growers' Association. The town of Rouleau is quite prosperous and the country surrounding is inhabited by probably one of the best farming communities we have in the southern part of Saskatchewan. The amount of grain produced there is tremendous considering the population and extent of country. They have had a very serious car shortage. The resolution reads as follows:

Information has been received that an attempt is being made by the elevator interests and the business men of our western towns to have the distribution clause of the Manitoba Grain Act temporarily suspended;

Whereas the distribution clause of the said Grain Act is the only safeguard the farmers have against the elevator combine by assuring them cars to load their grain over the loading platform and shipping it independent of the elevators;

Whereas it has been proved by past experience that without the protection of the said distribution clause that we farmers will be debarred from shipping our own grain thereby being compelled to sell to the elevators;

Whereas the farmers will be at the mercy of the elevator combine by having to accept light weights and heavy dockage;

Whereas when such circumstances exist the elevators make too great a spread between street and track prices;

Whereas the elevators make a practice under such circumstances of compelling farmers to accept grades below the actual grade of the grain, thereby causing heavy loss to the farmers;

Whereas the car shortage is not caused by the loading of cars over the platform but by the inability of the railway companies to transport cars after they are loaded:

Therefore be it resolved that we the undersigned grain growers of the Rouleau district are strongly opposed to the suspension of the said distribution clause, and we earnestly request that the distribution clause be not suspended, and, furthermore, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Right Hon. R. L. Borden.

That resolution gets at the whole situation. We know that before the present car distribution clauses were placed in the Grain Act giving the farmer the right to order a car equally with an elevator company, the farmer was at the mercy of the elevator combine or the elevators. Now the farmer goes to the elevator and says: What grade will you give for this grain? The elevator man says perhaps No. 3 Northern. The farmer says I can get better than that, he can immediately order a car get the car and ship over the loading platform. The clause suggested by the minister will open the way to abuses. I do not object to the amendment with respect to the distribution of seed grain. I brought up the question of excepting the seed grain elevator from some of the provisions with respect to country elevators, and I do not object to that because I believe it is of great importance that in the spring when seed grain is required men engaged exclusively in the handling of seed grain should be able to get a car and ship the seed grain into any part of the country. The amendment to which I object is clause (e) which gives power to the proposed Grain Commission to interfere with the distribution of cars whenever, after due examination, the board considers it necessary and advisable in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the distribution of grain. There is no doubt in my mind that that would entirely nullify the present distribution of cars under the Act if the commission so desired. The main clause and also 207 of this Act have worked out satisfactorily in western Canada. I have heard no objection to it. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) will say I am in favour of allowing elevators to get their bad grain out, but I would not support a clause to enable the farmer to get his bad grain out. I am not a farmer like my hon. friend from Macdonald, but I am prepared to leave the matter in the hands of the farmers of western Canada who know whether this is in their interest or not. I doubt if any hon. member has any representations from farmers asking for amendments in connection with the car distribution clauses. These clauses were gained by the people of western Canada only after a struggle, and I submit that we should not interfere with this clause unless we are absolutely certain that the amendment proposed will work out as satisfactorily as the present car distribution clauses have done.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). It is not often that I find myself thinking on the same lines as my good free trade friend from Regina. I am not a lawyer, but I do not like the look of this clause subsection (e). It opens the whole question of the distribution of cars in western Canada and places the whole power of distribution in the hands of the commission. Under this clause the commission could send all the cars to any point they like in western Canada. We must have some hard and fast rule in connection with the sending out of cars for the grain in western Canada. This is too wide a power to put in the hands of any man or any set of men appointed by this parliament. My good friend from Portage la Prairie cited the cases of damp grain and seed grain and said that by adopting this clause we admit the principle of allowing these cars to be sent out in that way. The Act specifically defines what they can do in these cases. Subsection (e) opens the door wide and allows them to do as they like, and I am not in favour of that kind of thing. The clause is altogether too wide for me. If the minister wants to have this clause inserted he should hold the power in his own hands, let the government be responsible and not leave it with three men who may be appointed to run the car situation in western Canada.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), said that he did not think the farmers, in expressing an opinion on the change in the Act, understood the clause being placed in it. The clause of the Credit Men's Association petition is practically the same thing only it leaves the matter to the Railway Commission, and not to the Grain Commission but it is along the same line of suspension of the Grain Act. That clause reads:

Your petitioners therefore pray that the clause in the Manitoba Grain Act regulating the distribution of cars for grain shipment at country elevator points be temporarily suspended and that the control and distribution of cars at such points be placed under the sole direction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada with instructions to the commissioners that absolute impartiality be shown and an equitable distribution be made based on the necessities of the extraordinary situation prevailing and so as to enable all of the producers to stand on the same footing in respect of the shipment of their crops, and that the necessities of the farmers as a whole, large and small, in each locality affected shall be the basis to govern the said commission in the distribution of cars.

This petition was sent to me and at the bottom was the following:

We, the undersigned farmers, members of the Raymond Agricultural Society, hereby declare ourselves in opposition to the above set forth petition for reasons set forth in the enclosed statement.

The 'enclosed statement' was an article written by a farmer in the Raymond district who outlined some reasons why the Manitoba Grain Act should not be suspended and some of these reasons state very clearly the view of the farmers on this subject.

I do not intend to read the whole article, but there are two or three clauses that I consider important:

Under the suspension of this rule, farmers would be compelled to sell almost exclusively to elevator and mill buyers, from the fact that they would get all or nearly all of the cars. We are proud of the fact that the majority of the farmers of this great country are prepared to, and can, ship by car lots, if prices do not hold up to the market level, at local points, so that under the present rule in the Act we are not depending upon local markets. Low grade wheat brings better prices by shipping to points where needed for feed than can be had on the local markets.

Practically every petition which I have received from my constituency is opposed to any change in the Manitoba Grain Act or to any suspension of the car distribution clause, with the one exception of a letter from a large milling company in the city of Lethbridge, which asks me to support the proposed change in the car distribution clause in the interest of the small farmer; but I have had no petition from any small farmer, asking for any change in the Act. This petition from Raymond is practically from small farmers, and they are all opposed to any change. I have a letter from Robert E. Reardon, a farmer in the district of High River, Alberta, in which he says:

With regard to the car distribution, the trouble is not with the Manitoba Grain Act, as that is the only salvation we have, but with the Canadian Pacific railway with its lack of motive power and other equipment, together with late threshing. I have been able to get one car to ship grain since December 21, and there are now 144 orders on order book for cars at High River. It would pay into the hands of the interests O. K. to have the car order book thrown out, and I hope you will oppose any such scheme.

I have a resolution from the United Farmers, of Gleichen, Alberta, an important centre of an irrigated district, where farming is done on a small scale. This resolution, which is signed by W. D. Tregs, secretary, and J. E. Ostrander, president, says with regard to the suspension of the car distribution clause:

Mr. BUCHANAN.

Whereas we, the members of the United Farmers of Alberta, Gleichen, Union No. 96, believe that the railroads of the country can not handle cars grain-loaded by the elevator interests with any greater dispatch than those loaded by farmers; and

Whereas we believe that such a move would only end in forcing farmers to sell their grain to the elevator interests at any price which they might wish to establish which would undoubtedly end in the farmers of the country being forced to sell for greatly reduced prices; therefore,

Be it resolved that we are unalterably opposed to any change or suggestion of any clause in said Act relating to the distribution of cars.

Now, I think this committee would desire to have placed before it the opinion of the organized farmers of the west, and I have before me a statement which was presented to the Minister of Trade and Commerce by the Grain Growers' delegation, and which proves, I think conclusively, that the suspension of the Manitoba Grain Act would not relieve the car shortage, as they claim the shortage is not due to the present provisions of that Act. This statement says:

In view of the claims set forth by representatives of the railway that car distribution clause of the Grain Act handicaps them in the free movement of railway equipment and is partly responsible for the congestion that now exists in the movement of grain from the western provinces. We wish to make the following statement:—

The clause relating to car distribution for shipment of grain was first placed in the Manitoba Grain Act in 1902, amended in 1906, and again in 1908 Not. till the latter amendment became effective did the growers of grain receive the full benefit of that provision of the Act. About one-third of the crops of 1908 and 1909 were loaded in cars by farmers over the loading platforms. That quantity is reported by Mr. Peters of the Canadian Pacific railway as being reduced to 20 or 23 per cent for the first four months of the 1911 crop. That statement may be correct, as at any points where farmers use the loading platform freely the spread between street and track prices that used to be excessive, is reduced to a minimum, consequently growers use the elevators instead of the platform.

	Grain cars.
In the four months ending 31st December, 1907, the railroads submitted for inspection..	35,827
Same period, 1909..	69,748
Same period, 1911..	83,001

That is to say, the movement in 1909 was 33,921 cars more than 1907, and the movement in 1911, 13,253 more than 1909; in other words, the efficiency of the railroads for moving western grain for inspection was increased in the four months of each year under review 93 per cent in the two years 1907 to 1909, and only 19 per cent in 1909 to 1911. The Grand Trunk Pacific, which was not hauling grain to the lake terminals in 1909, is responsible for 7,587 cars, or 9 per cent of the inspection of 1911, so that as a matter of fact the Canadian Pacific railway and Canadian Northern railway increased their efficiency only 10 per cent between 1909 and 1911, as compared to 93 per cent, as between 1907 and 1909, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway operated a double track road as far west as Portage la Prairie and part of the time to Brandon in 1911.

The above refers to inspection. Deliveries at the lake terminals make a worse showing, the report of the inspection department showing as follows for the four months ending 31st December, 1909, and 1911:

Bushels inspected.

1909.. .. .. 66,470,904 or 84%
1911.. 96,766,136

Delivered terminals.

1909.. .. .. 66,460,904 or 84%
1911.. .. .. 76,766,136 or 79%

These figures indicate that the railroads delivered at terminals 5 per cent less of the inspected cars in 1911 that in 1909, and that they made the most progress in moving the crop in the years farmers availed themselves most of the privilege of the loading platform. Railway representatives point to the fact that a car can be loaded in an hour or so at elevators, while it takes 24 hours or more to load a car over the platform. That statement may be true and would be an advantage to the movement of cars were an engine ready to pull a car away from the elevator as soon as loaded, but that rarely happens. It is a common occurrence to have cars placed at loading platform and elevators at the same time pulled out of the station yards together after standing there loaded for some days.

We attach hereto a statement showing the car number, point of shipment, name of shipper, date of inspection, date unloaded at terminal of 882 cars booked by a commission firm in December and first week in January, selecting out cars twenty days and over in transit. It will be noted that cars were shipped from districts scattered over Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and is a fair representation of the movement of cars in the period the statement covers. The list shows that out of 882 cars, 297 had not reached inspection and 654 were not unloaded at terminals on the 26th of January.

It is quite apparent that loaded cars take an average of twenty days or over en route from point of shipment in the west to the lake front allowing ten days for returning, makes 30 days for the round trip. But assuming that less time is required in the early part of the season and allowing an average of 25 days for the whole season and that farmers took one day longer than the elevators take loading each car of the 23 per cent loaded over the platform, it would affect the movement of equipment to the extent of adding one day to 25 on 23 per cent of the cars—a trifling matter when compared to the benefit farmers derive from the privilege of loading their own cars.

Assuming that it takes 30 days for a car to make the round trip from the western wheat fields to the lake front, a car would make four trips between 1st of September and 31st of December. To deliver the 66,500 unloaded at the terminals during that period of 1911 would require 16,600, and the railroads represent they have 40,000 cars moving the crop. If that be true their cars only make about a trip and a half in the four months.

The facts stated above conclusively demonstrate that the congestion in trafic is not in a slight degree due to the distribution clause of the Grain Act and is wholly attributed to the inability of the railroad to keep their cars moving to destination after they are loaded or billed.

I will quote a few cases in which the cars have been out over eighty days, giving the shipping point, the name of the shipper, the date shipped, and the number of days in transit:

Saskatoon—G. Drabble; Oct. 13; 107 days.
Blucher—Jas. Anderson; Oct. 23; 97 days.
Adanac—Geo. Sim; Oct. 23; 97 days.
Webb—H. C. Thierman; Oct. 28; 91 days.
Anglia—L. P. James; November 1; 87 days.
Liberty—M. A. Tannahill; Oct. 20; 99 days.
Keppel—B. J. Brandrith; Oct. 30; 89 days.
Gull Lake—O. E. Clark; Nov. 2; 85 days.

Now I have given the opinion of the grain growers in opposition to the change in the car distribution clause of the Manitoba Grain Act, and I would urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce to seriously consider the position of the western farmers not only individually but speaking collectively through their association against any change in the Act. They prefer to have it remain as it is. They had this clause inserted in the Grain Act some years ago, and think that it should remain there without any change whatever. The opinion of the farmers in my constituency is against any change, and I am bound to support that view because the farmers know more of what is necessary for their welfare than men who are not engaged in agriculture in western Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am not going to delay the House by reading a lot of resolutions, although I have received many petitions from my constituency, each and every one of them asking that no change whatever should be made in the car distribution clause of the Act. This is the first controversial matter apparently that we have had in connection with this Bill, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been most fair and reasonable all through. But the farmers are now asking to have matters left as they are. I do not think the Minister, after the interviews he has had with the members of the Grain Growers' Association of the west, would gainsay the fact that these men understand wheat growing and the handling of the western wheat crop as well as any other class of men in existence. The farmers of the three prairie provinces are absolutely a unit in asking that no change should be made in this clause. Who have we on the other side? We have the millers, the elevator men, the grain exchange men, the railroad men, the Credit Men's Association—we have the corporate interests on one side asking for a change in the interests of the farmer. Why should they speak for the farmer? Cannot the farmer speak for himself?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would the hon. gentleman tell us who these people have approached and asked for the change? I have never seen any of them.

Mr. STAPLES. Nor I.

Mr. TURRIFF. Railroad men have been advocating that change to me half a dozen times. Grain exchange men here advocated a change upon a dozen occasions.

Mr. STAPLES. What change?

Mr. TURRIFF. They have represented that the present system of car distribution is not right, and that it should be done away with or changed.

Mr. STAPLES. They did not ask for this particular change, did they?

Mr. TURRIFF. They did not ask for this particular change but they asked that the clause be changed, although the farmers are urging that it be left alone. This matter particularly affects the farmers and why do these interests come to individual members and ask that a change be made on the ground that it will help the small farmer who has not a fair deal under the present system of distribution of cars? I am not going to say that the present system of distribution may not work a hardship in the case of individual farmers, but the present law is what the farmers as a whole have fought and worked for, for years. All they are asking now is that it be left alone. They are afraid that if any change is made, if any power is granted to anybody else to interfere with the present system of car distribution they will be the sufferers in the end. I absolutely concur in that view. Surely when the men who are chiefly interested in this matter are asking that the clause should stand as it is at present the least that can be done is to comply with their wishes? Suppose this power is given to a commission—and I am not going to make any reflections on any possible commission that may be appointed because I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce will appoint the best men he can find—what relief is going to be given in a season when there is a general blockade all over the country, by changing the system? If there should be demands coming in from 500 or 1,000 points, as there are at the present moment, it would be simply a matter of discriminating as to which point you should relieve. Why not leave this matter alone, and then if some of the farmers suffer in consequence it will simply be because their wishes were complied with and the responsibility will rest with them. The farmers through their association understand the subjects in my judgment just as well as any of these interests that are asking for the change. The grain growers associations throughout the west have proven within the last few years that they understand all questions in relation to the growing of wheat. So that I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to withdraw clause (e). It has been claimed in this discussion that we have adopted this principle in supporting Bill (No. 96). I was in favour of that Bill and supported it with an accurate knowledge of what was doing, knowing that we gave the power in the meantime to deal with the present condition of affairs under which hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat are stacked up on the prairie like coal, but knowing also that the moment the Bill we are now dealing with became law, the other measure would be repealed and be no longer of any effect. It is not fair for any one to advance the argument that because we decided to pass that Bill in order to remedy an exceptional condition of affairs existing at this present moment, that we were binding ourselves to relax the present system of car distribution for all time to come.

I had no such thought in my mind; and had I supposed that by passing that Bill, we should be held to be committing ourselves to the support of this amendement, I would not have voted for it. But it was nothing of the kind. We have now a state of affairs in which the farmers ask for one thing and the interests which are generally supposed to be opposed to the farmers, are asking for something else. The question is, are we going to do what the farmers want done in connection with their own wheat, or are we going to do what somebody else wants done in connection with their wheat?

Mr. WARNOCK. I cannot let this occasion pass without uttering a word of protest against the proposed change affecting section 207 of the Bill. I would not be doing my duty to my constituents were I to remain silent. Like many other hon. members on both sides of the House, I have received a large number of letters, telegrams and resolutions from farmers in Alberta, protesting against any amendment or suspension of this provision of the Manitoba Grain Act. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) speaking this afternoon, referred to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and said that that hon. member saw the principle, but that he also saw a chance to make political capital. Now, I have here the report of the proceedings of a meeting of the United Farmers' Association, of High River, a short time ago. This will throw some light on the opinion of this Manitoba Grain Act, held by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). It says:

The meeting was called at the instance of Mr. Reardon, secretary of the local branch of the United Farmers' Association, who felt that something should be done to show how the farmers of High River viewed the proposed change. In the absence of the president, Mr. R. A. Wallace was appointed chairman, and speaking of the situation he failed to see how the proposed change of the interests would relieve the grain blockage. At the present time he said the terminal elevators were crowded and it was impossible to relieve the blockade at this end. He viewed this as a step on the part of the interests to have obliterated from the statutes the only clause whereby the farmers had any protectection. On this same point he had heard the former Minister of the Interior——

That is the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

——say that the farmers would be extremely foolish to relinquish that one clause for which they had fought so long to obtain from the government, and he urged the local union to go on record as being opposed to any change in that particular clause referred to.

So, the hon. member for Edmonton was opposed to any change in that clause as far back as last summer, while the government of which he was a member was yet in power. So, when the hon. member for Portage la Prairie hinted this afternoon that the hon. member for Edmonton saw the opportunity to make some political capital out of the proposed amendment, I think he was making a rather unfair statement.

There is another matter here, to which I would call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This was stated by some speakers at that meeting:

It was further learned that there are farmers who have shipped cars of wheat when the only grain they grow was oats; and others who have not threshed a bushel of oats or wheat, had made car shipments from High River. Intimation was made by some one present that the law would be enforced hereinafter with regard to false entries for cars.

I understand from this report that some farmers are unprincipled enough to order cars sent ostensibly for their own use and then hand these cars over to the elevators. I do not know whether there is any law to deal with that matter, but I think it should be looked into, and, if there is such a law, the law should be enforced. I do not propose to read any of these resolutions and telegrams that I have received. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster, North Toronto), will accept my statement that I have them. But, as there has been some difference of opinion as to the point of view of the farmer and grain grower delegates who were here a short time ago, I desire to read a memorandum handed to me by Mr. Fream, secretary of the United Farmers of Alberta, before he left for the west, giving an amendment which, I think, we would be prepared to accept:

Provided further that the board may, upon application of not less than three farmers in any new district, after investigation, order a limited number of cars to be supplied contrary to the provisions of this part, to meet cases of actual necessity only arising through shortage of food and fuel supply, such order to state the reason for same and to make regulations governing the prices to be paid for street grain while such order is in force.

I think that under the circumstances and in view of the protests we have had, the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be well advised to allow section 207 of the Bill to pass without further amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I have only a word to add to what I have already stated. By what I have said, I still abide; and it has reference mainly to one or two hon. gentlemen who stated that the farmers in presenting their petitions are represented by me as not understanding the proposed amendment. In so far as I made any remarks in that connection, I simply said and simply meant that what the farmers' petitions so far had opposed was something entirely different from the proposed amendment, and no hon. member has presented, or, I believe, can present, a petition which in any way conflicts with the proposed amendment. I want to make that as clear as it is possible for me to make it. I am sure that no communications in my possession conflict with it. The farmers of my constituency are just as competent to understand this amendment as any other persons, and will understand it when they read it; and I think that the fair-minded ones among them will appreciate one and all of these provisions.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Does the hon. gentleman not think that any requests that no change be made in the present clause conflict with the changes proposed to be made?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I have none that simply say that they want no change and stop there. They want no change along lines suggested in this association's petition. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) points out that the association's petition in so far as it asks that the distribution of cars under the Act be entirely placed with the Railway Commission, is in principle the same as the proposed amendment. Consequently the Credit Men's Association move along the line of these amendments and they are resisted by the farmers, so it is said that the farmers would resist these amendments. Now, if I can see the point at all, it is that that which is asked for by the Credit Men's petition is diametrically the opposite to that. I know no more about it than the hon. member for Cape Breton; I never heard of them except that I got a petition with the name on it 'The Canadian Credit Association, Limited'; and I thought at the time I would like to see some of those credit men myself.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). It is a very strong organization in Winnipeg.

Mr. MEIGHEN. This association asks that the clause be suspended, and it is against the suspension of the clause that the farmers' petition. What would be the result of suspending the clause? It would mean that we would be destitute of any rule of distribution. But now we say to the Railway Commission: We feel that in your hands you are in control of the distribution, we give you carte blanche. The farmers might protest if parliament sets up no rule by which they can be governed. But this clause retains the car distribution rule, and says that rule shall be followed unless individual instances and circumstances are such as to demand a deflection from it. Hon. gentlemen admit that time and again instances arise where a deflection is in the interest of the farmers themselves.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Does the hon. gentleman consider that subsection (e) as proposed by the minister, simply deals with specific cases, where a car shortage would happen?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Absolutely deals with that, and with specific cases only. Hon. gentlemen have repeated, man after man of them, that cases frequently arise, and cases of enormous consequence, in which it is in the interest of the farmers that a deflection be made from the strict line of the rule, and cases that arise are right in line with (a) (b) (c) and (d). They are all agreed on that. But they say, when we come to (e), we are throwing our heads against a wall. What is (e)? It simply states another case, and it puts the burden of proof on the community that sets up the case, and that community has to show, to the satisfaction of the commission, that there exists a state of affairs among them, that will be assisted in granting a deflection from the rule.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is the only difficulty I see about it. Who is to settle that question of fact?

Mr. MEIGHEN. The commission. It has to be shown to the commission that it is necessary and advisable in order to relieve congestion and facilitate the dispatch of grain, and the commission must be convinced by proof in the individual case, or there cannot be a deflection. If it is proved by investigation, as it is bound to be, that the congestion will be relieved, and the dispatch of grain facilitated, then how can you say that in such cases, the farmer himself would not be benefited? How can you hurt the farmer, if you are going to relieve congestion and facilitate the dispatch of grain?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). It is not clear to me what is the meaning of the term, 'due examination.' It might mean anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN. 'Due examination' means just what it means in courts of law, where it has appeared doubtless time and again in the practice of the hon. gentleman, who has asked the question: 'Due examination' means an examination adequate to the condition and to the circumstances in order to get at a correct result; and that is what the commission is for. That is one of their functions, one of the purposes of their creation. Why be frightened at a bogey? Let us get the whole benefit of the Act. You will find cases in western Canada, in the congested parts, say, in Manitoba, where car after car is tied up, where the farmers are taking six, eight, or ten days to load; and at the same time, perhaps, in the northern part, or in the newer part, in some other territory, the farmers are suffering, and their grain is rotting, because they cannot get cars. They are being held up at one end, selfishly, perhaps, and the other end is suffering. If such a case is made out, then who will say that the farmer is not going to get the benefit? Who can picture a case where congestion will be relieved, and the dispatch of grain facilitated, and the farmer not get the benefit of it?

Mr. McKENZIE. Could not that special condition be met without interfering with the order of routine? As I understand it, the man who books for a car first, gets it in the order of booking. Supposing, without interfering with the order of booking in a specific case of that kind, you could get more cars, could you switch the Act in that way, so that the company would be compelled to furnish more cars, without interfering with the booking?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am glad my hon. friend drew attention to that point. In the first place, I do not contend that, as a general rule, giving power to the commission to order the distribution of cars to meet an individual exigency is going at once to relieve the car congestion, not at all; but I believe in individual instances it would. Other things will relieve it far more; there are other obstacles in marketing our grain much more formidable. But the retaining of this clause, and the insertion of the latter clause, to my mind, give the commission this power, that they can say to the railway company what they cannot say to-day: There is at a certain point an especial congestion bringing in its wake an exceeding amount of trouble, and we demand of you relief, that you send an additional force of cars to that point. This gives them that power. So I think the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) will see that there is a very important assistance being given by that clause. I do not know what the authority of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is. I do know, however, that he is a very apt pupil of two gentlemen in western Canada, when he makes a statement that some sinister interests in Winnipeg, the Grain Exchange and the elevator interests, are on one side of the battle, and the farmers on the other side are down here with their bayonets outside parliament endeavouring to get this measure through. I know nothing of that. The hon. gentleman has not said that in so many words, but he has re-echoed statements sent through the west that some sinister influences are behind these amendments. I know of no such interests or influences. I have received petitions against the Credit Men's Association amendments, I have also received requests in their favour. I give them all as mature consideration as I can. But I do think that in addition it is my duty to think the matter out in the light of what is presented to me, and to give the utmost respect to what they present. It seems to me that the power given that commission to go to the office of a railway company and say: Here, there is an especial congestion at Weyburn in Saskatchewan, there is special distress at another point, and we demand that you make special efforts to relieve it, and that twenty cars be within ten days at those points—in legislating to give them that power we are affording practical relief in many cases to the very unfortunate conditions which we find obtaining at the present time. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite. I know the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) understands the matter of shipping grain better than I do. But I do believe that I understand the plain English of this clause, and that an important reform will be effected by it if we will only open our eyes to the occasion.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I ask the hon. member if he considers that in the terms of this Act there is any such authority as he has just stated, that this commission has the right to go to the office of a railway company and order cars wherever they please?

Mr. MEIGHEN. If the hon. gentleman will read the clause he will see that it reads in this way:

Strike out clause 207 and substitute the following:—

The board may, in its discretion, order cars to be supplied contrary to the provisions of this part.

And then it goes on and names the instances. Notwithstanding anything in that part they can go to the railway company and order the cars.

Mr. OLIVER. There is nothing in any part of this Act to give the authority which my hon. friend deliberately stated to the committee was contained in the Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN. What does that give?

Mr. OLIVER. It certainly does not give any such authority. It gives authority to the commission to order a distribution of cars, but it does not give authority over the railway companies to compel them to furnish cars. I think the minister will bear me out in that interpretation.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. gentleman will recognize that it is only in so far as the cars available can be distributed that we can interfere.

Mr. OLIVER. Precisely; then my hon. friend should not have made the very bold and bald statement which he did.

Mr. MEIGHEN. That very bold and bald statement, if you term it such, is still strictly correct. The commission can go to the railway company and say that it shall take certain cars away from a certain point which does not need them so badly and send them to such another point. That power is certainly embodied in that clause. I have not consulted the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I really think that power is certainly embodied there. Let me put it again. Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has within itself power of distribution of 10,000 cars. We cannot make such orders and expect to have them fulfilled as would require 11,000 cars to be supplied, but we can give such orders as, within the scope of the cars available to the company, will force it to send certain cars to a certain place and certain cars to another place.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to know from the minister where that authority is contained in this Bill and how far the authority of the Bill goes in that regard.

Mr. CRUISE. Mr. Chairman, I think I would not be doing my duty to the constituency which I have the honour to represent if I did not put myself on record as being opposed to any change in the car distribution clause of the Grain Act. Like a great many hon. members on both sides of the House, I have received personal letters from different electors in my constituency protesting against any change in these clauses. I have also been favoured with resolutions from pretty nearly every Grain Growers' Association in my constituency adverse to this proposed change. Several of these Grain Growers' Associations have also written me stating that they have had large petitions signed and forwarded to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), protesting against any change. As farmers we regard any change in this clause with a great amount of suspicion, I believe I am justified in making this statement. I have been growing wheat now for about eighteen years, and I can remember that about ten years ago the bankers, the railway companies and the elevator people combined together and refused to give the farmers cars to load their grain. The result was that the farmers were forced to ship their grain through the elevators or sell it to the elevators. This enabled the elevator men to lower the price of grain, and the result was that the spread between the street and track price was about seven cents a bushel. You can readily see the loss that the farmers sustained as a result of that most unsatisfactory condition of affairs. The farmers succeeded in getting placed in the Act the present car distribution clauses and the result has been that within the past three or four years the spread between street and track has not exceeded two or three cents a bushel. Therefore, the farmers realize that they have derived great benefit from the car distribution clause as it is at present embodied in the Act. I, therefore, am strongly opposed to any change. It has been stated here that no person has asked for any change in this clause. If the privileged classes have not been asking for any change certainly the farmers have not asked for any, and, that being so, why make a change? This clause 207 gives the commission all the power that is necessary. It gives the commission power to have cars provided if there is an elevator in danger of collapse or if there is any grain heating in the elevator. They can cause cars to be sent to different points to relieve such a situation as that. If power were given to the elevators to distribute seed grain I think that is all that is necessary and that is all the farmers are asking for. I want to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon the fair stand which he has taken all the way through in connection with this grain Bill and also members on both sides of the House. I may say that while I know a little about growing wheat, I know very little about making laws with regard to shipping and selling wheat. I attended the committee meetings very regularly, and I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I derived a great deal of benefit from them. I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the interest of the producers of this country, to comply with their request and make no change in the Act. If the farmers came down to Toronto, that beautiful city that runs the whole country, and insisted on having anything to say to the manufacturers about the distribution of the cars upon which they load their machinery, the manufacturers would say to them: What business is it of yours? Go home to the west and mind your own affairs. I do not mean to say that it is none of their business, but the view I take of it is that this is purely and simply a farmer's question, and, therefore, the manufacturers of Toronto or anywhere else should not say how our grain should be loaded and shipped. I repeat there should be no change made in the present Grain Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, in common with every other hon. member from the west, I have received petitions and letters protesting against a change being made in this car distribution provision of the grain Act. The farmers in the district which I represent are not suffering in the same way that they are in other sections of western Canada, but at the same time they view with a great deal of alarm any change being made in the Act which has been a great benefit to them in this matter of car distribution. The car distribution clause in the Manitoba Grain Act has had the effect of increasing the price paid to them by the big elevator men and has redounded to the great benefit of the farmers in the matter of selling their grain. I have letters to show where farmers have taken grain to the elevators and been offered a certain price for it, and not being satisfied with the price, and having decided to ship the grain to a commission house, rather than have the grain shipped out the elevator man has come to the rescue and paid the difference in price, that has amounted in some cases to seven or eight cents a bushel. Therefore, the farmers view with a great deal of alarm any interference with this clause which permits them to order cars, turn about with the elevators, and in that way get the advantage of shipping their grain to a commission house or wherever they wish to send it. I am very pleased to see the stand which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) has taken on this question.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) two years ago made a memorable speech which was of great benefit in my constituency in the last election. I had occasion to use that speech more than once. It showed the breadth of view of the hon. gentleman who, I am glad to see, retains that same breadth of view, and is not governed by partisan motives in discussing this Bill, viewing the question altogether from the standpoint of his constituency. Everything has been said that can be said for and against this Bill. I want to place myself on record as in favour of the car distribution clauses in the Manitoba Grain Act being left as they are.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have no fault to find with the discussion on this section. I do not think it has been a partisan discussion; it has been a discussion of men with different views, looking at it from different standpoints. It may be that as we are all human, some of us have the fear or the desire of our constituents behind us, but after all the discussion has been very fair, based on the view of each individual member, as to how it would affect the whole. I want to find a little fault with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I think it would have been just as well if he had not given a little support to the theory that there is an irrepressible and persistent conflict between farmers and railroads. It is not necessary that it should be so.

Mr. OLIVER. I have scriptural authority for the position that there is always a difference of opinion between the buyer and the seller.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I am not finding fault with the hon. gentleman for holding his opinion. Anything which tends to accentuate and perpetuate the idea that two great sections of the community shall and must be eternally in conflict with each other, is not in line with the principles of human progress. There may be differences between them, but we all feel that as we get to know each other better wars will cease. After all, broadly speaking, is not the interest of the railways of that great western country absolutely bound up with the prosperity of the farmer, and is not the best interest of the farmer absolutely bound up with his relations to the great transport interests?

Mr. OLIVER. If the relations are properly adjusted, yes.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes, and I hope that we are on the way to a proper adjustment of these relations. I have every sympathy with the farmers, and the early settlers of that country, and with those who are there now, because I know they have had a hard struggle, a hard struggle with corporate and railway interests, but I believe that both parties now understand each other better, and I am bound from my experience of the last three or four weeks to say that I do not find the railway or transport interests animated with the desire to antagonize the farmer, but rather with the desire that the farmers' prosperity may be as great as possible, so I hope we are coming to the time when these suspicions of ill-treatment will gradually pass away and men will argue upon the present, and not from a recollection of the ills and errors of former times. It seems to me that a great deal of what has been received by myself, and by members on both sides of the House arises out of the old days, and the fear that if any change is made at all the conditions of the past will be brought back again and that the old struggle will have to be renewed. A member says: I must go by what my farmers tell me. But does the farmer necessarily know better about everything connected with the grain trade than we? He knows more about wheat farming and raising and may know a great deal more about wheat selling, but the farmer is localized, necessarily localized. The farmer looks out from his own locality and does not always view this great system of machinery for transporting produce across this great country, he does not see it as a whole and understand its workings. He sees his own side, he knows the difficulties of transport but it is quite possible for us to say that whilst he knows many things much better than we, and knows the local conditions better, we having a view of the whole system and studying the whole system, may see things a little differently from him, and may possibly say that by adopting what he believes to be in the interest of western Canada we may be acting against his interest. Is that not possible? I think it is and so I think a great deal of petitioning and letter writing arises out of this idea. A petition is being circulated asking for the suspension of all the clauses in the Grain Act which have to do with the distribution of cars. They may say: This will bring us back to the old position, we cannot tolerate that, we will send in letters and protests. You may say that the grain growers represent all farmers in that country. That is more than I think can be true. What member can say that the farmers as a unit absolutely desire this or that in the great northwest?

The Grain Growers Association has been a useful and very active organization; it has done a great deal of good and a mighty sight of keen work but that that Grain Growers' Association, which comprises only a small percentage of the great farming population in the northwest, voices absolutely the whole opinion of all the farmers of the northwest on this or any other question I am not prepared to say.

Now, the Grain Growers' Association are militant; they are on the watch. The very moment this Credit Men's Association petition was scattered through the country, their notices went out. Here is something that is going to rob us of our car distribution clauses; that we must not allow; be active and be alive, and flood your members and the ministers with petitions against it. But does that prove to you or to me that the farmers would object, if they knew just what was proposed and the spirit in which it was proposed—that it was not by a lot of men caballing against their interests, but by legislators using the best opportunities they had for information, and doing what they considered best in the premises to alleviate slightly the conditions of congestion and hardship, when those conditions arose, and when after examination they proved them to be conditions which ought to be alleviated? If we could sit down alongside of each one of them and tell them exactly what it was proposed and meant to do, does anybody believe that the farmers of the Northwest would be dead against making any letter or syllable or word of alteration in these car clauses? I do not think so. Now, I have approached this question as a novice and a tyro, knowing almost nothing about it; but I have given some hard work and close attention to it, and to my mind it is a most interesting and absorbing question. I do not look on this as a matter which is before us now and may pass away in a few weeks or a few months. I look on this questioin of grain production and grain carriage in our vast Northwest, only the fringes of which have been developed so far, as one of the most absorbing, one of the most important, and one of the most vital questions we have to deal with in this parliament, and one upon which very great interests in this country are dependent. I have approached this question without the least idea of party interest or party advantage. I want to see the best solution for the best outcome of that great problem, and it will take us this year and several years after this, if we put our whole purpose and our whole effort to it, to have it practically and finally and satisfactorily solved. This little clause which I am introducing is not a violation of legislation which exists in the Manitoba Grain Act, nor a violation of legislation which we have adopted in this parliament this year. It is simply a further application of a discretion by a responsible body which is upon the scene of action, which knows and ought to know—and if it does not know it will not be doing its duty as a commission—the ins and outs of the whole business in that great Northwest—a discretion by which, when a call comes from a lamed section, from a hurt portion, from a diseased part of that great organism in the Northwest, they will be able in some little measure to apply the humanitarian principle, and send help sharply and quickly, even though some in better positions have to be delayed for a little time in the beginning. If a man is drowning in the river every other man who has the heart and soul of a man in him is willing to go to the help of the man who is in trouble, even though it takes from him hours of his good time, and robs him of some of his profits. It is humanitarian. When this matter came up, and those five delegates, who you say represented the united farmers of the west, were in my office, and I put to them the proposition: here is damp grain, liable to damage and utter loss, held to the amount of ten or twelve or fifteen million bushels, by less fortunate men than you, who got your crops, or some of them out, and that is a call, I think, upon our humanity; not a man of them offered a word against it, but every man of them said: Yes, there will be no objection among the farmers to that; it is only common humanity. That arises from the fact that you are close to them, and you can tell them just what you mean to do, and they can sit down and talk it over with you. I think the case was well put when it was said: if you can relieve the district where want and distress are imminent without much disorganizing the general plan for the healthy sections, is it not in the interest of the farmers of the whole country that you should have some power to do it? Some one makes the suggestion, let the Governor in Council do that. Great goodness! the Governor in Council sitting here in Ottawa, consisting of fifteen laymen, perhaps half of them distributed over this country at any given time, knowing absolutely nothing about railway grain transport, with the exception of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and some others of us, who have travelled on passes in private cars, but having no grasp at all on the situation in the Northwest, stretching from the lakes to the rocky mountains. How can they do it? There is nobody that can do it sympathetically and well, and with a knowledge of the circumstances, but the three men who are devoted to that, who are the priests that minister at the altars of the great grain business in the Northwest, and who know just what is necessary for healing and for comfort. Now, that is all that this provision does; why should we object to it? Why should we suppose that these men are going to run amuck? Why should we suppose that they will throw everything into confusion? It will not be to their interest to do it; it will not be in accordance with their sympathies to do it; it will not be in accordance with the spirit of the Grain Act to do it. Their discretions are to be used within the purposes and lines of the Grain Act itself, and the Grain Act, if it means anything, means the relief of congestion and the quick despatch of grain. Whenever congestion is relieved and grain is made to travel quickly, that is for the benefit of the farmer behind, who has more grain to take the place of that which is moved out, and which is waiting, and anxiously waiting for the time when that will be moved out. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), laid much stress on this, and he is right to a certain extent, that the commission, after due examination, and finding that, in their judgment, it is advisable and necessary that the call for help in some parts shall be heeded at once, when they do that, may draw away from the general distribution some cars that are necessary to relieve that congested part. So they may to a certain extent.

But they certainly have this power as well: They have the power and the right to go to the railway companies and say: 'We want some extra cars put in there,' and they may get them. But suppose the railway company turns on them and says: 'We have no extra cars. All our cars are filling in the programme to hundreds of stations and hundreds of districts all over that Northwest, each man having his car ordered, each elevator has a car order, we are filling in all those with every car that we have.' Well, then if you have no more extra cars draw away a little portion from every one of those places and help the portion which is in dire distress. You will do the least possible harm to the others and you will do the greater possible good to those that are in distress. My heart is no more soft than the hearts of other members around this table, but I have letters in my office which would almost make a man's heart bleed. I have one letter in my office of a man living out some 18 miles from his station, a newcomer who was in debt for everything that he had been using, and his implements as well, who had got his grain at last harvested and threshed out lately but who had no order in for a car that could possibly get to him for months may be in the state of shortage and congestion there. Teaming in with his two teams a portion of his grain, what did he find? He had no cars. The car track buyer was there, but there was no car that the track buyer had into which he could put this man's grain if he had bought it. The man on the street was there, or thereabouts, but the man on the street could not buy his grain. He had no place to put it if he bought it; the elevator was chuck full and had not been emptied for a long time. That man tried in vain to sell his grain or to store it, but there was no storing place for it. He took his grain back to his own farm again and kept it there. Others piled their grain out behind somebody's shed and covered it over, may be with some straw; they cannot sell it. Now it does seem to me that talk as we like about elevators and about our corporations, that if that elevator could have been emptied of its 50,000 or 60,000 bushels of grain there would have been a chance for that man with his wagonloads of grain to have sold it, because there would have been a place to store it if it had been sold. It seems to me that taking all these things into consideration it is not so serious a matter we are discussing that it will break up the whole car order system, and that if you do this you might as well burn the Grain Act. These assertions do not tally with the facts, and it seems to me that, looking at it from the point of view of those who are trying to do the best they can for that great interest, we have got to use our own judgment, getting at the view of the people interested as far as we can, and by using that judgment in this way, and giving this discretion to the Board of Commissioners, we are putting a piece of machinery there for use in individual cases of hardship involving sometimes total loss which means very much to those who have to bear that loss; we are putting a piece of machinery there which will enable a live and competent man to relieve distress, to aid in the despatch of grain and so to lighten the whole position. I would read something from a letter addressed to me by Mr. Fream, in order to show the way in which he approaches this matter.

It has been rumored that section 207 of the Grain Bill will be considerably changed. This section is, we consider, one of the most important in the Act and one on which considerable time and attention should be bestowed before allowing any changes to be made.

That is Mr. Fream's position. That is a reasonable position. That is what we have been doing here, bestowing time and attention upon this Act because of its importance, and before making any change in it He goes on to say:

It gives a privilege to the farmer which is his only safeguard against the elevator interests, and while a determined onslaught has repeatedly been made upon this provision yet the opponents of same have never yet been able to present any logical argument why a change should be made. Before this clause was added to the Grain Act the farmers were completely at the mercy of the interests, and if the clause is removed—— or in any way weakened by dangerous amendments which might be made to give two different meanings——

We none of us think of removing it.

We are not weakening it, we are strengthening it. We are not putting dangerous amendments there which might have two different meanings. We are putting a plain definite amendment, as plain as the English language can make it, and for purposes which are clearly to be understood. If that is done, he goes on to say:

Conditions will be such that in a short time the farmers would find the car distribution and the general treatment they would receive from the railway companies and the elevator interests even more intolerable than they were before the clause was introduced into the Act.

I would be disposed to agree with Mr. Fream as to the probable results providing things were done to weaken the clauses, or amendments were placed there that were dangerous, or had a double meaning, or if the purpose of these amendments were to do away with the efficacy of the Grain Act in its distribution clauses. To my mind it is to strengthen those rather than to weaken them. If I thought the clause would weaken them I would drop it at once. Believing that it would strengthen them and would be worked out to the good of the transportation of the farmers' grain in the west, I submit it to the committee and ask for its passage.

Mr. WHITE (Alberta). Mr. Chairman, although there has been a good deal said on this question by western members who object, as I do myself, to any changes being made in this clause, there is one point that I do not think has been brought out, although it is one that the farmers of the west most strongly object to. It is the question of prices. As a great many of the members from the west know, in a great many places—certainly in the case of the majority of towns along the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern where there is only one elevator. Now, we have found from experience that when a farmer brings his grain to the elevator there is no competition whatever. He looks at the market quotations at Winnipeg and finds possibly that oats are 35 cents a bushel here, but the local elevator only offers him 20 cents. He knows the cost of transportation, which is a matter of about eight cents, and if he finds he can make three or four cents a bushel on his grain he orders a car and ships that grain to Winnipeg. Now, if you make a change whereby the farmer is not able to do that, if you deprive him of the privilege of disposing of his grain outside he is compelled to sell to the local elevators at whatever price the elevator operator demands. In my own section of the country that is the objection which has been taken to making any change in this clause, rather than on the car question. I know where a certain price was offered for grain at an elevator, but the farmer was not satisfied, and knowing the Winnipeg price he loaded a car, and the same elevator man offered him 12 cents more for the grain so loaded. That is why the farmers are so much alarmed about the proposed change. It is not a question of cars or car shortage, but simply that they fear the change will place them in the hands of their own local dealer. They cannot draw the grain to the next elevator, which is probably 10 or 15 miles away, they simply have to sell to him if this clause goes through.

So, you place the farmer at once at the mercy of the local dealer; and I think that is the reason the farmers are objecting so much. I have known small farmers not having enough grain to make a carload, and two of them clubbing together to ship a car. I am very much opposed to the proposed change. In Alberta and the far west, there is no doubt about it, if this change is made, the farmers will have to take whatever price is offered by the local elevator where there is no competition; and even where there are two or three, they will combine and pay only a certain price. And the farmer will make five or six or even ten cents a bushel in loading cars for the Winnipeg market.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I would like to make my position perfectly clear in this matter. This amendment covers the whole of clause 207 of the Bill. There are five subsections in the amendment. The first, (a), is in connection with an elevator collapsing; (b), is in connection with the relief of damp grain; (c), is in connection with seed grain (d), is in connection with heating grain. All these I favour. But subsection (e), in my humble opinion, goes a little too far. I would not give that power to the commission. If I were voting on this section separately, I would certainly vote against the insertion of this subsection (e), of the amendment. If I have to vote on the whole five at once, I will have to vote for the amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The natural way is to take it clause by clause.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). If it is taken clause by clause I will vote for the first four and against the fifth. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) has brought to the attention of the committee the conditions in western Canada in connection with the grain blockade. We all know the conditions there. I had a letter the other day from a man who went from my part of the constituency in the province of Manitoba, who tells me that he draws his grain to the elevator, a distance of forty miles, and then must bribe the elevator people to take the grain off his hands before they will take it. I say these conditions should not be allowed to exist. But this Grain Bill does not cover these conditions. We are allowing the railway companies to build branch line after branch line, and that is the reason, largely, for the congestion. The hopper is too large for the spout. We have to get a new outlet for the grain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. To the south.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). No, not to the south—not by a long way. My hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. Douglas), said that my speech of two years ago did him a lot of good in his campaign——

Mr. OLIVER. I also found it very helpful.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). You did not use it fairly then. I stand by that speech just as on the day I made it. And I stood by it through my campaign, and it was on account of that speech that I was able to win out against my opponent—and I could do it again to-morrow. I simply arose to explain my position in connection with this matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I wish to say just a word with regard to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster, North Toronto). It seems to me that in referring to the words of Mr. Fream, who said that the present law on this subject should not be weakened in any way, I understood him to say that it will not be weakened by this amendment. As I understand the law now, the farmers themselves have the control of placing cars according to the order in which they have been called for. When you give another body power to do away with the distribution of cars, you are taking away from the farmers the protection they have under the present law. The burden is upon my hon. friend (Mr. Foster, North Toronto), to show that the present law has worked unfairly, that it has caused dissatisfaction, and hardship. Else why make the change? If the law has worked well—and every hon. gentleman I have heard speak on the subject admits that it works fairly well—I do not see why any change should be made. As to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe), I think he can make his mind easy, for we can take a vote upon the different clauses of the amendment. And, feeling as I do, being in accord with my hon. friend, if there is no other way to take the vote, I will move as an amendment to the amendment that subsection (e) be struck out. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will move that himself. If he does, I shall have much pleasure in seconding it.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to delay the committee, but this is perhaps a more important portion of the Bill than the committee has pet appreciated. I should judge from the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he has not yet fully appreciated the importance of the section, or the relationship that must of necessity exist between the farmer on the one hand, and those who buy and transport his grain on the other. It is not throwing any suspicion upon the grain dealer or railway company to say that in the buying and handling of grain their interests are not the interests of the farmers. It is an absolute necessity of the case, just as it is that two and two make four, that the farmer, and the railway company and grain dealers are in opposition to each other, and that opposition is apt to be a very strenuous one.

I do not wish to introduce controversial matter into the discussion, but if my hon. friend is not aware of the facts, it is his misfortune. The fact is that there is necessarily and actually a very bitter feeling and always has been—I do not know what it will be in the future, but it exists to-day—between the two opposing interests. It is no aspersion upon either of them to say that there is such a feeling, and it is not a proper appreciation of the facts to suggest that by any legislation we can do away with that condition. It is a natural condition, it is not an improper condition, except as it may be strained to improper limits. My hon. friend will be the greatest legislator that ever graced this parliament or any other, if he can bring those two interests into amicable conjunction. I want to impress upon the minister that this matter is one the importance of which cannot be exaggerated, that the action taken to-night is going to have far reaching consequences, and the responsibility thereof must rest upon my hon. friend and his colleagues. I want to allude to the argument made by the minister as to the urgency of the provision of subsection (e). He painted a picture of the deplorable loss to be suffered by reason of damp grain; and the necessity of rushing cars to the relief of the locality suffering from that condition. But my hon. friend does not appreciate the fact that subsection (e) has no necessary application to that condition. On the face of it, it applies to the locality and the condition where the grain is abundant, and may be as good as it is abundant. It applies to the condition of congestion, and gives authority to the commission to relieve that congestion. He sketched the condition to which clause (b) would be applicable; but I say that is not the condition that clause (e) is intended to provide for. From the wording of that clause it applies rather to a condition where the grain is merely abundant, and may be just as good as it is abundant. In such a case the board has the authority of this parliament to suspend the provisions of the Act in regard to car distribution, both at that point where it must go for cars, and at this point to which it will send cars. That is a radical change in the provision regarding car distribution. There can be no misapprehension in regard to the construction to be given those words. The member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) was insistent that it was right and proper to give authority to the board to order cars forward in special cases. There is no special case in subsection (e). Subsection (e) does not provide for a special case, it provides for a general condition. Take the condition that exists in the west to-day, a general condition of congestion, and the board has the right under that section to order any distribution of cars it pleases in any part of the west.

Mr. BURNHAM. Is not that just what we are driving at, the very thing you have enunciated?

Mr. OLIVER. I am glad that my hon. friend appreciates the meaning of the section, but it is not the meaning which we wish to have attached to the legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman mean that under the authority of this clause a general order could be made to the railway companies?

Mr. OLIVER. Surely.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I think the hon. gentleman who sits behind him will tell him that no such order could be made. The Supreme Court has ruled over and over again in cases much less decisive that no general order could be made under the authority of that clause. It would have to be an order of cars to a special point.

Mr. OLIVER. I am saying that under the condition that exists in the northwest to-day the Grain Commission, under the terms of that order, would have full authority to send cars wherever they pleased and whenever they pleased. To-day, if that section were in force, the provisions in regard to car order booking would be to all intents and purposes suspended throughout the northwest. Those are the actual facts of the case. I do not suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce understands it in that way, but I am giving him my understanding of it, with a knowledge of the conditions.

There is another point. As the law stands at present the farmer who has grain to ship knows what his rights are, he knows what he may expect. But if you introduce the provision of clause (e), or even the provision of (b), but especially (e), then the farmer does not know where he stands in regard to his car order. As long as the law stands as it is he gets his order in his turn with his neighbours, but give the commission the discretion that you are proposing to them there—they take the cars from here and send them there—and he is out of his calculations entirely as the result of this legislation. I do not want to delay the committee, I do not want to hold back the passage of this legislation, but I want to emphasize to the minister that he is dealing with that part of the Bill that is most far-reaching, that touches most closely the people who are most affected by the Bill, and that in my humble judgment, and I give it for what it is worth, this section will not be limited to the degree that he believes it will be, that it will go so far beyond that limit that it will have the effect, to all intents and purposes, of destroying the value of the car-distribution provision in the Grain Act as it stands at the present time.

With regard to the provisions in Bill (No. 96) as to forwarding cars for the relief of localities where there is damaged grain, if there were a few isolated localities where the grain was damaged, it would be possible, as it would be right, to provide that this Grain Commission be given authority to specially forward cars to these localities. It was such a condition, no doubt, that the delegates had in mind when they discussed the matter with the minister, but, to-day, with the condition that prevails throughout the prairie provinces, with respect to damaged grain here, there and yonder in a hundred different localities, there is no advantage in giving the right to the commission to send cars to one place or to another place. There are not cars enough available, there is no possibility of them meeting the requirements by any orders they may give, and it just reduces the matter to the point that they will send the cars wherever the loudest noise is made, or wherever the biggest pull exists, which is a most objectionable condition of affairs. That is a feature of the case that did not strike me at the time the Bill was going through the House, but it is the absolute condition, and it may be just as well to be understood in that way.

Mr. BURNHAM. Is not that the condition prevailing in railway circles in Ontario now?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not say, I am sure; but that is the condition that prevails in the west. The condition of damage is so widespread, that there is no possibility of meeting that condition by any special orders that might be given and to give authority to issue special orders under such conditions is simply to give authority to abrogate the advantages of the Bill for the man who wants to use those advantages. We have given the privilege of loading platforms to the farmers in the west. They tried to get them for a long time. They were successful in getting them at last. They have handled a large part of their grain over those loading platforms. Those loading platforms are a cause of offence to the elevator man, to the local grain dealer, and to the railway company, and there is no doubt that: do away with the car distribution clause and the loading platforms might just as well disappear from the scene.

The question has been asked: Who are the men who are demanding changes in this Act, with regard to car distribution? There was some question about it put forward. There is no question about it. Three years ago, when the Grain Act was under amendment, notice was sent by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce to all parties interested, to come and be heard, in regard to these amendments. The matter was public, everybody was admitted and we found there the railway man, the grain dealer, the one side, even the banker, lined up on the one side, every one of them demanding the abrogation of the section of the Act relating to car distribution, and the farmer on the other. There is no secret about who is on the one side, and who is on the other. There is no blame to either party, because they are on the respective sides, but there never has been any mistake about it, or misunderstanding that on the one side is the producer, and on the other are the interests that necessarily handle his product. There is just the same necessary conflict of interest between these two sections of the community as there was between the buyer and the seller in the days of King Solomon, and has been every day since.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to ask the minister whether he proposes having a vote taken upon each clause? The reason I ask it is that members of the committee might not entertain the same view of this clause as they do of others. I think there is quite a consensus of opinion in favour of the other clauses, but there is a very strong objection to clause (e). That objection has been expressed very strongly on this side of the House, and if my hon. friend will not allow the vote to be taken on the different clauses, I would move that the proposed new section be amended by striking out clause (e).

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have no objection to taking them paragraph by paragraph.

Subsection (b) agreed to on division.

Subsection (e) agreed to, yeas 44, nays 29.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not vote because I am paired with the member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler).

Mr. ROSS. I did not vote because I am paired with Mr. Foster.

On section 208—inspection divisions.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The object of the amendment to section 208 is to perfect the erection of Calgary into an inspection division. It follows the provisions with respect to Winnipeg making such changes as are necessary to apply similar conditions to Calgary.

Mr. OLIVER. On the 3rd reading I shall move an amendment to section 246.

On section 13—acquiring of terminal elevators.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Do I understand that this section would allow the board to declare that elevators not only upon the Great Lakes, at Fort William and Port Arthur, but also upon the eastern side of the lakes and at Atlantic ports, terminal elevators, that these elevators being so declared the government has power to either construct elevators or to take over existing elevators? I am not able to see why the provision should not be general, why elevators might not be taken over and operated by the government to as much advantage on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and on the St. Lawrence as at Fort William and Port Arthur.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). This gives power to the Governor in Council to construct, acquire, lease or expropriate any terminal elevator, if parliament has granted the money for such purpose; and a terminal elevator is an elevator which exists at what has been declared by the board to be a terminal point. The only terminal point at the present time is Fort William and Port Arthur.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not see why that should be so. I do not see why the board should have the power to limit and fix what shall be terminal points. Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, St. John, Tiffin, Port McNichol, Vancouver and Victoria, are just as much terminal points as Port Arthur and Fort William. It may be that in connection with the administration of the Grain Act the board might very well be given the power to declare a certain point to be a terminal point; but why this board should have the power to say in effect that the government may construct or take over an elevator at Fort William and Port Arthur, but shall have no right to construct or take over an elevator at any other point which, in reality, is just as much a terminal point as Fort William or Port Arthur, I fail to understand. I would suggest to my hon. friend whether or not this provision might not well be broadened out. The grain does not stop at Fort William and Port Arthur. It moves forward to the Atlantic ports, and on to the English markets, and there is just as much, or almost as much, reason for the government owning and controlling elevators at Atlantic ports and also at the eastern ports on the Great Lakes as at Port Arthur and Fort William. But what I do decidedly object to is that this board shall have the power to decide at what points the government shall take over or construct elevators, and own and manage them.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Certainly, the board should not have that power. It has not the power to establish inspection divisions, except with the approval of the Governor in Council, and it ought not to have the still greater power of saying which should be a terminal point, without the approval of the Governor in Council.

Therefore, I move that subsection (y) of section 2 be amended by striking out the word 'board' and substituting therefor the words 'Governor in Council.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. The idea that the hon. member for St. John has in mind would be met if the word 'public' were inserted either before or after the word 'terminal' in section 13. That would be an elevator that actually did all the work of a terminal elevator, but had not the standing of a terminal elevator for the purpose of issuing warehouse receipts; that is, to do in the eastern terminal elevators just what the hon. member for St. John had in mind.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I do not propose to widen it in that way.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think we ought to discuss the whole question of elevators under section 13. Speaking for the port of St. John, there is the most urgent necessity for additional elevator accommodation for the shipment of grain at that port.

The elevator at St. John was constructed by the Canadian Pacific Company, with some assistance from the city, and the provincial government. It was large enough when it was built, and for some years afterwards, but the business has developed so rapidly, that that elevator is wholly incapable of accommodating the business, and the result is there is great congestion. During the present year the business to that port has already very considerably exceeded the business of last year which was very large indeed. Last year I think the exports from St. John reached the very handsome total of about $25,000,000, and up to the present time they are about $2,000,000 ahead of what they were last year. It seems to me that when we are considering the question of giving the government authority to either expropriate existing elevators or to build new ones, we ought to have some statement from the government as to what is their intention. I have no doubt myself that we have been altogether lacking in the past in the matter of making sufficient provision in the way of elevator accommodation east of the Great Lakes. It is true that during recent years great additional elevator accommodation has been provided at Tiffin and Victoria Harbour. In that respect both the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk railways are doing their duty. There is, however, only accommodation for a few million bushels east of the Great Lakes, while in the city of Buffalo there is elevator accommodation for pretty well on to 50,000,000 bushels which is far and away ahead of anything we have in Canada. By reason of this enormous accommodation, vast quantities of Canadian grain go to Buffalo which ought to be carried to Canadian ports east of the Great Lakes, and the business of transporting that grain is lost to Canada. It seems to me the government must increase the accomodation upon the eastern shores of the Great Lakes, upon the St. Lawrence and upon our Atlantic seaboard. No doubt the same remark will apply to the Pacific coast.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Where does the grain come from that reaches St. John by rail?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some by all rail. Some comes, strange to say, from the American west, although we get more package freight for them.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It only gets to St. John by rail.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. At the present time the Canadian Pacific is bringing a good deal of grain by the all rail route north of lake Superior. There is this curious fact in connection with the trade of St. John, that while our whole export trade up to the present time exceeds that of last year by more than $2,000,000, that increase is almost entirely in American products. The increase of Canadian products carried to the port has only amounted to two or three hundred thousand dollars, while the increase in American products amounts to very nearly $2,000,000. I think the total Canadian products carried to St. John have amounted up to the present time to something over $7,000,000, and the total of American products between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). My hon. friend has given us some interesting information with reference to the increase in the trade of the port of St. John which we are all glad to know. But I think he is mixing up two different things. The Dominion parliament and the Dominion government have the right to build elevators in St. John now if they choose to. The purposes of this Act are special purposes looking to the regulation of the grain trade from the west, and specially at the great terminal points. Certain abuses have existed and it was contended that the control and supervision of the government at those points was not sufficient to protect the grain shippers and the grain exporters and the clause under discussion is meant to in some way cope with that difficulty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. By the government acquiring the elevators?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is the principle involved in clause 13. We take the power to lease or construct.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is it intended to do it?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes. There will be a grant of money asked for during the present session for the purpose of doing it, but I am not in a position to say how large the amount of money will be.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). I agree to a great extent with the hon. member for St. John as to the desirability of including in this policy the eastern elevators as well as those in the west. It would be quite easy to include within the scope of the Bill these eastern terminal elevators. The capacity of those at Midland and Port McNicoll only amounts to about 5,000,000 bushels, but elevators now are being built on a new principle. The Grand Trunk elevator at Midland and that of the Canadian Pacific at Port McNicoll are to-day so well equipped that it simply means the addition of more tanks to increase the capacity from one and a quarter to two and a half million bushels; and I am told some of them might be increased beyond that. It is simply a question of motive power. If the government can see their way to do this to embrace in the Bill the eastern elevators it would be most desirable and I hope the minister will be able to make the necessary provision in this Bill.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The proviso is in the Bill and the powers are given, in the definition of 'Terminal Elevator' as my hon. friend will see:

'Terminal elevator' includes every elevator or warehouse which receives or ships grain, and is located at any point declared by the Governor in Council to be a terminal point.

This links up with section 13, under which the Governor in Council has power to——construct, acquire, lease or expropriate for His Majesty any terminal elevator if parliament has granted the money for such purpose.

So all powers needed are contained in the Bill. I do not wish it to be understood that the government is proposing to undertake the building of all the elevators east and west. It certainly is not proposing to do anything of the kind. And, for the present, it has no plans to construct, lease and operate terminal elevators at any other place than Fort William. The time may come when that policy will be extended to Prince Rupert, Vancouver or some other point on the Pacific, to Hudson Bay or to other places which the Governor in Council, after due consideration, deems it necessary to control in this way. But I do not want the committee to think for a moment that the government proposes to take in charge the building of these elevators. Something is to be left to private and corporate activity, and I think a great deal must be left to that in the future.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If I may be allowed a question, is it not because of the fact that it has been left to private and corporate enterprise at Fort William and Port Arthur that difficulty has arisen?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There are great difficulties between a point like Fort William and Port Arthur and many of the other points mentioned, as the hon. gentleman will see if he thinks of it for a moment.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In what respect?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The head of the Lakes is the point at which nearly all the grain that passes out centres within a small radius and passes through, and it is there that the particular difficulties are to be met with of which complaint has been made.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Are not Halifax and St. John two points at which all the grain concentrates that goes to Europe?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). No, it does not all go through Halifax and St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the winter season?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). No. As a matter of fact, the same causes of difficulty that have operated and led to dissatisfaction at Fort William and Port Arthur have not operated and have not been complained of in the eastern elevators.

These elevators are under supervision and will be kept under supervision, and, as is necessary, they will be kept under stricter and stricter supervision. But at the present time there is no grievance, no cause why these should be taken up all of a sudden and put in the same position as the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur. A certain amount of grain goes out through St. John, and I hope that in future more of it will go out that way. Precautions have been taken which, in the course of the trade, I think, have allowed to rise only one or two cases in which a grievance has existed in shipping grain from Halifax or St. John. Grain is shipped from Montreal, and the elevators there are under supervision in the same way. The supervision and power of the government follows the grain from Winnipeg to all these different places to the time of its transhipment across the ocean. These elevators are carefully looked after, and, if it becomes necessary, as the traffic increases, that they be more carefully looked after, and supervision added to and strengthened, it will be the duty of the government, as it was the purpose of the government, to see that this is done.

Mr. OLIVER. Do I understand the minister to say that he will be prepared to make a statement at some stage of the Bill in regard to the government ownership of terminals?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have made a pretty full statement; but if that does not satisfy my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), when we come to some other portion of the Bill that matter can be taken up and he can put the questions which he thinks are necessary.

Mr. OLIVER. In the lack of fuller information, it will be necessary, on the third reading to move the amendment of this section.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I think we have had a pretty good siege of it today. I would like to have finished the thing, as leaving it over means that it will probably take an hour or two longer.

Mr. OLIVER. Can the minister say without inconvenience, what sections of the Bill still stand?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Yes, sections 3, 121, 122, 124 and 125. These are the sections that remain, and there may be another section to be added.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—CORRECTION—MR. PELLETIER.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER (N. Toronto).

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General). Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns I would like to make a statement. My attention has been called to the fact that at first sight there appears to be a slight contradiction between one part of my speech delivered in this House on the 22nd of January last and another part of my remarks. In looking into the question, I see that something has been omitted and I wish to have the matter put right. I wish to state that on page 1,695 of 'Hansard,' line 9, after the words 'and religious point of view' the following should be inserted:

'This is the condition of affairs which existed before the 2nd April, 1908. The Ne Temere decree now forbids, from a Catholic religious point of view only, mixed marriages before a non-Catholic clergyman, but this is a matter which affects only Catholics and their conscience. It has no civil effect and does not affect those who are non-Catholics. As the 'Tablet' puts it, the Catholic church has no power to change the civil law of marriage. The impediments to marriage which were in force on the first of August, 1866, continue to exist, but those created after do not come under article 125 of our Civil Code which speaks only of impediments hitherto existing.'

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What business will be taken up on Thursday?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). After the softening influences of Ash Wednesday have been experienced by us all, I think it is the intention to take up the Post Office Bill and probably the Tariff Commission Bill, and to give a step forward to the Manitoba Boundaries Bill.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FRASERVILLE WHARF.

* Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is there in the Railway Department any letters, communications, reports or other documents by which it is sought to show that if the Department of Public Works, is constructing a new wharf in deep water at Fraserville, River du Loup, P.Q., or if an extension be made to the present wharf, there would be saved, it is said, an expense of several thousand dollars to the Intercolonial railway, in discharging at River du Loup, Fraserville, all the coal which the Intercolonial railway requires for the eastern division, and which is now discharged at the wharfs at Lévis?

2. If so, does the Railway Department intend to bring pressure on the hon. Minister of Public Works, with the view to proceed as soon as possible with the construction of this wharf or the extension of the one now existing at Fraserville, River du Loup, P.Q., in order to save thousands of dollars, as alleged, uselessly spent each year in continuing the present system of discharging coal at Lévis?

Mr. Lavallée, M.P., was informed on the 12th inst., that an amount of $5,220.20 was still due the contractor. It is suggested, if Mr. Lariviére still has a claim that he submit same at once.

3. That he was a man of good character and habits; references were furnished by the parish priest of St. Justin, who highly recommended him.

MANITOBA BOUNDARY EXTENSION.

Mr. BORDEN moved that the House do to-morrow go into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient, (a) to extend the boundaries of the province of Manitoba northward to the sixtieth parallel of latitude and northeastward to the shores of Hudson Bay, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the legislative assembly of Manitoba and by parliament;

(b) to authorize the Governor in Council, inasmuch as the province was not in debt at the time of its establishment, to pay to the said province an annual sum of $381,584.19, being the equivalent of interest at five per cent on $7,631,683.85, the difference between a principal sum of $8,107,500 and $475,816.15 heretofore advanced by the government to the province for provincial purposes; such annual sum to be paid as and from the first day of July, 1908, but subject, however, as to payments due upon the coming into force of any Act founded upon these resolutions, to the deduction of certain sums received by the said province by way of interest on capital allowance in lieu of debt;

(c) to authorize the Governor in Council to pay to the said province, in lieu of ownership of public lands, an annual sum based upon the population of the said province as ascertained by each quinquennial census thereof, such annual sum to commence with $562,500 (less certain deductions in respect of what are known as swamp lands and university lands) and not to exceed the annual sum of $1,125,000 (less equivalent deductions); the same to be paid as from the first day of July, 1908, but subject, however, as to payments due at the time of the passing of any Act founded upon these resolutions, to a deduction of the aggregate of certain sums received by the province on and after July 1, 1908, on account of indemnity in lieu of public lands;

(d) to authorize the Governor in Council to pay the said province one-half on July 1, 1912, and one-half on July 1, 1913, the sum of $201,723.57 towards the construction of public buildings.

He said: His Royal Highness, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution, has been pleased to give his assent thereto.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would observe to my right hon. friend that it will be impossible to take up the discussion of this resolution without having information of the negotiations which have taken place with the government of Manitoba up to the present time. The motion was made some time ago, I think in the month of December, asking for all correspondence in connection with this matter. That correspondence has not been brought down, and my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) will agree with me that we should have an opportunity of reading it before the debate is proceeded with.

Mr. BORDEN. I think the return is ready, and will be brought down to-day.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT—AUDITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act by providing for the employment in the office of the Auditor General, for a period not exceeding two years, of such temporary clerks as may be necessary in connection with the audit and payment of fees and expenses under the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to.

LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE STATION.

Mr. MONK. I beg to state for the information of the House, that in deference to the wishes expressed by members, we have had a long distance telephone station for their convenience installed at the end of the corridor near this chamber.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 104) to amend the Civil Service Act—Mr. Borden.

Bill (No. 76) to amend The National Transcontinental Railway Act—Mr. Cochrane.

Bill (No. 103) to amend the Government Works Tolls Act—Mr. Monk.

Mr. BORDEN.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 60) to amend the Civil Service Act—Mr. Borden.

Mr. BORDEN. I suggested the other day that the Bill should remain in committee, but I have no further observations to make regarding it, and if there is no further discussion the measure can be reported.

Bill reported.

APPOINTMENT OF A TARIFF COMMISSION.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 88) to provide for the appointment of a Tariff Commission.

On section 5, subsection 7—inquiries to be in Ottawa, but power to hold them elsewhere.

Mr. KYTE. I desire to point out what I conceive to be a defect in the machinery provided for the purpose of obtaining information of parties who may be prepared to give testimony before the commission. I pointed out before that this clause provides for the examination of such persons only, who have been summoned for the purpose of giving evidence. I think this clause should go further and provide for the examination of any person who is willing to go before the commission to represent any interest in Canada, whether he has been summoned or not. With that view, I propose that section 5, subsection 1, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:—

And they shall hear the evidence of persons who appear before them for the purpose of making a voluntary statement and who have not been so summoned.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I think it should be borne in mind that this commission is to be used for the purpose of obtaining information, and to be used intelligently, under the direction of the government. The amendment would very seriously interfere with the action of the commission in that respect. Under section 4 it is provided that the commission is to act under the direction of the Minister of Finance; and it has been previously pointed out that it will be asked to report upon certain matters in the order of their urgency as it appears to the government. In order to take up its work intelligently, the commission must be at liberty to direct its own operations, to summon witneses if they wish, or to allow parties to be heard. I think that if my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte) will look at the provision of the Act creating the Railway Commission, he will find that no one has the right to come and ask that the commission take up a certain matter. That is for the commission to decide. Otherwise the commission, instead of working intelligently, would be at the beck and call of every one who wished to have his particular matter taken up, even though entirely out of its order; and the result would be that instead of intelligent action on the part of the commission, more or less confusion would ensue. I think it may be safely left to the commission appointed by the government, the commissioners, we may assume, will be men of intelligence—to adopt their own methods of obtaining evidence, either by summoning witnesses, or by affording opportunity for parties who wish to be heard to come forward and testify. The last clause of the last subsection of section 5, appears to cover the point raised by my hon. friend.

> The commissioners shall hold their sessions and conduct their proceedings in such manner as may seem to them most convenient for the speedy and efficient discharge of their duties.

In pursuing a certain inquiry it is open to the commission to say that all parties who desire to do so may appear, or they may subpœna witnesses on their own initiative. I have no reason to doubt that they will hear interested parties who desire to be heard on any particular inquiry, but the initiative should be with them, in order, that, as I have said, they may conduct their work with the greatest efficiency and intelligence. But to adopt the amendment of my hon. friend would mean that the work of the commission might be very greatly embarrassed, and we should not be able to accomplish through the commission what we hope to accomplish, namely to obtain information connected with tariff matters required from time to time by the government.

If I may hark back to the discussion of last evening, I would like to add that the time when we shall need the reports of the commission most will be between sessions. It is almost impossible for a government or a minister to consider such important matters as the tariff, and especially tariff changes, during a busy session. The time when such matters should be most particularly considered is between sessions. That is a little apart from the amendment, but I thought it desirable to point it out as it was overlooked by me in dealing with the matter before.

I have no reason to doubt that in practice what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) desired will be carried out, but carried out in such order as the commission may deem proper, for the best accomplishment of their work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It does not seem to me that the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte) is at all objectionable from the standpoint taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds). The hon. minister said that the effect might be to interfere with the orderly conduct of the affairs of the commission. But as I read it, it would not compel them to hear evidence at any particular time, but they might appoint such time as would be convenient for them to hear witnesses who might desire to give their testimony. It seems to me the Minister of Finance forgets one very important object of the commission. He deals with the subject as if their whole duty would be to carry on investigations into specific applications for tariff changes. But, as he knows, the most important work this commission would have to do, would be to consider tariff matters, the cost of raw material, the cost of goods imported into Canada, the cost of manufacture in Canada, and so on, with a view to making general tariff revisions from time to time. Surely that is a matter in respect of which anybody in this country who wishes to be heard ought to have a right to go before the commission and give his testimony with facts in support of the views he may have upon tariff matters. Surely, this board ought not to be allowed to say whom they will call and what opinions they will give and make a report based upon those opinions only. This commission is to have very general powers, and its report must necessarily have great effect upon public opinion and upon parliament. If ever there was a commission in regard to which the public ought to have the right, by representatives or otherwise, to express their views, this is that commission. The hon. minister refers to the railway commission and says that people cannot go before that commission of their own motion. I have not the law before me, but I happen to know that the Board of Railway Commissioners have regarded it as a part of their duty to allow every man to come before them who desires to be heard, whether that particular person may have been summoned or not. They do not require a person to be subpœnaed, but allow people to go voluntarily and state their grievances, and they give what relief they find possible.

This commission is of enormous importance as regards tariff matters, it is a matter of great public interest; and it seems to me its duties can only be satisfactorily discharged if people should have an opportunity of coming voluntarily before it, and giving it such facts as they are able to supply.

Mr. BLAIN. In my opinion, if the committee were to adopt the amendment of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), it would be almost impossible for the commission to conduct any inquiry in this country without persons coming before the commission, and interfering with the examination of witnesses, and asking the commission to hear any person who might offer himself. It might be very well if, after the commission has been at work for some time, there comes a complaint from any portion of the country that the commission had refused, on application, to hear the views of certain persons; then I think perhaps this amendment would be in order, and might be adopted by both sides of the House. This commission is experimental; this is the first time in the history of Canada that we have had a commission of this kind, and I think it would be in the public interest that hon. gentlemen opposite should give it a fair trial. Surely the Finance Minister and the government will make every effort to investigate every tariff question thoroughly; the government will be more anxious than any one else that such should be done. Any person who has a statement to make to the government can come before the government at any time, and make an appointment with the Minister of Finance with respect to tariff matters, and it will be the duty of the minister to hear that complaint, no matter from what part of Canada it may come. I cannot see that this amendment would be good. I think the commission would be quite willing to hear any person, and the government would naturally be anxious that every person should be heard who desired to be heard, no matter from what part of the country he may come. Suppose a day was fixed by the commission for sitting in Toronto to hear a certain matter; under the Bill as it now stands, certain persons would be summoned, and men will understand that they are to come and give evidence. If this amendment were adopted, any persons would have a right to come in and demand that the commission should hear them. If next week, or ten days after, the commission should have an appointment at Hamilton on their route, it would be absolutely impossible for them, under the operation of this amendment, to meet their appointment, or to carry out any general investigation of tariff matters, beginning at one city and going on to another, because the public would crowd in and interfere with their arrangements. It would be the next thing to impossible to give everybody who wished an opportunity of being heard before the commission on any fixed date. Surely this is asking the government to throw the door open too wide. I repeat that if, in the future, it is found that the commissioners are unwilling to hear complaints, and if a complaint is made to the House, I am sure that the government will be quite ready to amend the Act, or make some regulation by which everybody may have an opportunity to state his grievance. For my part I think the amendment is out of order, and I would like to ask the chairman whether it is or not.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the case of members of the government who have been acting as commissioners with respect to tariff matters, and who, when they come to any city, have invited all persons who desire to appear before them and give evidence, has the hon. gentleman ever heard of any inconvenience arising by reason of the public crowding in?

Mr. BLAIN. I cannot say offhand. I do know, however, that the other day we heard a gentleman, who was a member of a former government and a member of this government, saying that he had been one of a committee that had traversed the country to hear complaints, and that when he came back he did not know any more about the matter than before he went away.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Probably he had not studied the evidence.

Mr. BLAIN. I think my hon. friend will agree that he was a gentleman who would have studied the evidence pretty carefully. I do not think that the mover of this amendment should introduce it at this stage, at the very inception of the Tariff Commission. I think it would be in the interest of the public if he would give the commission opportunity of getting into operation; and then, if he finds them failing in the discharge of their duty, an amendment of this kind might be proper.

Mr. KYTE. Notwithstanding the appeal of my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain), I am still of the opinion that the amendment which I have proposed is an eminently proper one. My hon. friend states two objections. One is that it might lead to parties coming in and interfering with the commission, interfering with the line of conduct which they have laid down to guide them in particular instances. I understand that this commission will be in the nature of a court, it will have power to regulate the attendance of witnesses and the hearing of testimony, and like any other court, it would have a right to restrict the number of witnesses who might appear for the purpose of giving testimony upon a particular point.

Mr. BLAIN. Not according to my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. KYTE. I think so. I think the commissioners, being gentlemen of common sense and familiar with the manner in which inquiries of this kind are carried on, would see to it that no undue advantage was taken of the commission by any persons, and that no waste of time should occur by going over the same class of evidence the second time.

Mr. MEIGHEN. How could they so regulate proceedings if the amendment were adopted?

Mr. KYTE. If my amendment is not carried, people may not appear, as a right, before the commission at all. So far there are two evils, I think the amendment is in the direction of the lesser evil.

Mr. BLAIN. Has my hon. friend in his mind that the commission will be unwilling to hear complaints?

Mr. KYTE. I would be sorry to come to that conclusion; but I must confess, in view of certain statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that I am afraid there will not be too great an eagerness on the part of the commission to hear certain representations that might be offered. My hon. friend also objected to my amendment because it would be throwing the door open too wide. That is exactly the difficulty hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have; they don't want to open the door wide enough to allow all persons in this community to represent their views on tariff questions.

Mr. BLAIN. What class of persons has my hon. friend in mind that the commission would be unwilling to hear?

Mr. KYTE. My amendment covers all classes in the community, and in that respect it is not too wide. I can imagine circumstances under which the commissioners might go to certain places for the purpose of taking testimony, and when they might or might not desire to hear certain persons who wished to be heard. I suppose that the commission, before leaving Ottawa, will map out a certain itinerary, will select certain places where they will go to hear testimony. They will go down to Halifax, for instance, and certain persons there will be notified of their coming, and may be summoned to appear before the commission. Certain other persons who would like to put their views before the commission on tariff matters might not be able to appear before the commission.

It will be impossible that the commission should have in mind every interest in a large community that might desire to go before the commission and present their views. No harm can possibly come to the operation of this Act if the amendment is accepted. It will relieve the commission of the charge that might hereafter be made against them of having purposely omitted to notify certain persons or certain interests in the community that they are visiting for the purpose of taking testimony. The regulation of the conduct of the commission will be entirely in their own hands and, as I stated in the beginning, no disorder would be felt from this because the commission will have absolute power to make regulations for their conduct and for carrying out the course which they have laid down for themselves. Therefore, the objection of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), I think, should not prevail because this commission will have power to prevent any unnecessary interference with the business that would properly come before them.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) intend to put it beyond the control of the commission entirely as to the number of persons who shall give evidence or the kind of evidence that shall be given to the commission, because that is the effect of his amendment. There might be a hundred persons who were determined that they should be heard by this commission; the amendment says that they shall be heard and the commission have no power to say that they shall not, or to judge of the kind of evidence that shall be given, but these people simply come there, a hundred in number, and say: We must be heard, irrespective of whether the evidence shall be advisable or pertinent to the question at issue. Does the hon. gentleman want to put the commission in the position that these people shall have the absolute right to come before them and say: We are going to give this evidence; we do not care what anybody does or whether it is relevant to the question or not. That is the effect of the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman. The commission have absolute authority to receive the evidence of anybody who has been subpœnaed both under section 5 and subsection 8 of section 5. If that authority is given to the commission surely they would not prevent evidence being given which was pertinent or proper. If they would I would say that the commission would be no use whatever and would not be doing their duty. I cannot believe that my hon. friend would be willing to force the commission into the position which I have described.

Mr. NESBITT. I am very much surprised to hear the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) even suggesting that the amendment of my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) should be refused. There has been a suspicion throughout the discussion of this Bill that the commission was appointed for a purpose. If there is anything in the world that would make the public believe that it was appointed for the purpose of serving the high tariff party, the action of the Minister of Finance would confirm them in that belief. The hon. gentleman who just sat down (Mr. Middlebro) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) talked about people going and crowding the court room and demanding to be heard. I would like to know what country we are living in. Is this a free country? Are we going to appoint an autocratic commission in a democratic country or are the people of this country going to say that they have the right to be heard on a matter of public interest? Does the minister refuse to accept the amendment of my hon. friend which proposes that anybody in this country who desires to go before the Tariff Commission shall be heard? The Minister of Finance said that it was not so with reference to the Railway Commission. The Railway Commission pride themselves on the fact that anybody in this country, from end to end of it can be heard.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). This amendment says that they 'shall' hear evidence. Are the Railway Commission really compelled to hear evidence as this amendment proposes?

Mr. NESBITT. They do hear it anyway.

Mr. WHITE. (Leeds). Are they compelled to do it?

Mr. NESBITT. This commission should be compelled to do it. Who are they anyway? Do they own the country, or do the people of the country own the commission? Why should we not say that they shall, I would like to know? If there is anything in the world that would cause the people to be dissatisfied with this commission and with its star chamber proceedings, it is the stand which the Minister of Finance takes this afternoon. Why should anybody in this country be refused the right to be heard by this commission? They talk about court rooms being crowded. That is all nonsense. Everybody knows that the commission will be the judge as to the method and as to the time at which they shall be heard. My hon. friend talks about fair play for the commission; there is no man who is going to be so unreasonable that he will not be willing to wait until the time comes for him to be heard, but he wants to be heard and he will see that he does get the right to be heard whether it is now or hereafter. Why should he not? Every man in this country is interested in this Tariff Commission, everybody who buys anything is interested in the tariff, and everybody has the right to be heard. I think the Minister of Finance is standing in his own light in refusing this amendment. I see no reason why he should not do so, and I hope that he will reconsider his decision. What are the people of this country, that they should be dictated to by a Tariff Commission, as to whether they shall be heard or shall not be heard, on a question that so vitally affects them as the tariff? Why, the thing is ridiculous.

Mr. MEIGHEN. One of the reasons, it seems to me, why power should still reside in the commission to hear or reject evidence, is just because it frequently happens before commissions, in courts of law, and in parliament also, that much that is offered to be said is irrelevant to the question at issue. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), should carry, the commission would be robbed of every power which every commission in existence now has, and which the courts of law have as well. The very power which, the hon. gentleman says, resides in the commission is to be taken away by the amendment. Any man, any crank, any enthusiast, any set of people, individually or collectively, could go before the commission and be heard for as long, or as short a time as, in their own individual notions they desired. It would really appear to me that the purpose of the hon. gentleman, in wishing to proceed with the amendment, is to defeat the objects of the commission. If the amendment read with the word 'may' instead of the word 'shall' then the commission would still have power to regulate their own proceedings, but if the amendment read 'may' I do not see that the Bill, as it now stands, would be affected in any way, because under two clauses of the Bill, the commissioners have power to hear any one. So, it is evident that the word 'shall' in the amendment alters the effect of the Bill and it would have the effect of destroying the usefulness of the measure altogether. I know of no way, if the amendment were to carry, in which the commission would have power to reject irrelevant testimony or to determine the time or place at which they would sit. It would have the effect of striking out every other clause in the Bill. I am sure that the hon. member for Richmond, on reconsideration, will see that the purpose which he wishes to be served will be destroyed by the introduction of this amendment. The hon. member for Oxford, (Mr. Nesbitt) it seems to me, inadvertently, stumbled on an objection to the amendment. The Railway Commission of Canada to-day is popular because it has adopted the policy of hearing testimony relative to any issue that is within its jurisdiction. But, the Railway Act, which constitutes the Railway Commission, will be searched in vain for a clause which compels the Railway Commission to hear anybody and everybody who presents himself or any subject that he might choose to talk about.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). It does not give a procedure to enable anybody to get before that commission.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Certainly.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). This Bill does not.

Mr. MEIGHEN. There is nothing in this Bill to prevent anybody getting before it; the commission is there to hear evidence.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Is there anything in the Bill now before the committee to provide a method by which a person may appear before the Tariff Commission if he wants to? I do not think there is a clause in the Bill to give any person the right of appearing before the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I do not think there is any clause in the Railway Act giving any person the right to appear before the Railway Commission in so many words, there is no such procedure for getting before the Railway Commission.

Mr. GERMAN. The procedure for getting before the Railway Commission is well defined.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I have often had appearances made and all I had to do was to write to the secretary of the Railway Commission and ask to be heard, and the secretary replied appointing a day and a place. That can be done under this Act in just the same way.
